on the possibility of acquiring a fortune, his object in life has been the saving of souls and the building up of moral character in the rising generations. Like a benediction, his face and voice have recalled the miner, the tiller of the soil and the merchant to the teachings of his youth, and caused him to pause in the midst of his mad struggle for the smile of mammon. Thus a few honored names are associated with peace and tranquility, rather than the strife of pioneer days, and among these that of Rev. Robert Robe is one of the best known and most worthy.

That Mr. Robe should associate his ministerial labors with the Presbyterian Church was a foregone conclusion, for on both sides of his family there were stanch adherents to the ecclesiastical rule of presbyters. His grandfather, William, was a strict churchman of Scotch ancestry, and became a very early settler at Morgantown, Va. His father, Josiah, was born in Virginia, and established his family in Guernsey county, Ohio, in 1809. He became a large land owner, and took an active part in the church, was an elder therein, and reared his children to follow his worthy example. At the time of his death, on his farm in 1845, he was seventy-five years old, and left behind him a record as a business man and upright, influential citizen. In his youth he married Jane Frame, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Ohio, and who was a daughter of David Frame, one of the early settlers of Ohio. Mr. Frame was an elder in the Presbyterian Church. Robert was the youngest of the three sons and five daughters born to his parents, and he was educated primarily in the public schools. In 1845, shortly after the death of his father, he entered Muskingum College at New Concord. He had previously received some training at a college in Antrim, Ohio, and in 1846 entered Washington College, at Washington, Pa., from which he was duly graduated in 1847. Returning to his home he commenced studying for the ministry, and, in the fall of 1848, entered the Western Theological Seminary at Pittsburg, the following two years being devoted to ministerial labors in the state of Ohio.

As a missionary Mr. Robe came to Oregon in 1851, crossing the plains in an ox-train, and being on the road from the first of April until the latter part of August. For three months he taught a pioneer school in the wilderness, and then, finding that Lane county had no spiritual advisor, he removed to Eugene, making that his headquarters for the whole county. He organized the first Presbyterian Church in Eugene, and was one of three to organize the Presbytery of the Willamette in 1851. This was the first presbytery north of California and west of the Rocky Mountains, and its importance in the history of the church in the state cannot be over-estimated. Rev. Robe assisted in the organization of the first synod in San Francisco, out of which grew the presbytery in the north. He has been a member ever since. During his ten years of residence in Lane county Mr. Robe accomplished a world of good, stimulating right living and gentle judging, and in a strong, forceful manner promoting the cause of education. For some time he was county superintendent of schools, and assisted in laying out the school districts of that county.

After his recall to Brownsville Mr. Robe had charge of the Brownsville Church until he was superannuated in 1895. He has since lived a practically retired life, although his interest in moral and educational promotion continues unabated. Since coming to Brownsville he has organized the church at Crawfordsville, and his voice has been heard in exhortation in many pulpits throughout the county. He is a staunch Prohibitionist, and his own life best illustrates his uncompromising belief in temperate living. At present he is a resident of Brownsville, but during certain portions of his life he has lived on a farm, and engaged in stock and grain-raising. At times his remuneration for services rendered has been small, and would have seemed entirely inadequate to one less devoted to the cause of humanity. During the Civil war, especially, his salary was cut very low, and the prevailing high prices augmented the financial discomfort of this worker for the betterment of the world. His courageous spirit has been the wonder of all who have labored with him, and his life of self-sacrifice undoubtedly has inspired many a weary toiler in other fields.

July 18, 1854, Mr. Robe was united in marriage with Eliza A. Walker, who was born in Murray county, Ga., February 4, 1835, a daughter of William Walker, a carpenter by trade. Mr. Walker removed to Tennessee in 1841, and, in 1843, located on a farm in Missouri, his emigration to Oregon taking place by way of the plains, in 1853. After locating in Eugene he worked at his trade for many years, his death occurring in Springfield, Ore., at the age of eighty years. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Robe, the order of their birth being as follows: William W., residing in Brownsville; Maria J., the wife of Mr. Marsters, of this place; Mary Bell; Emma Annella, Ida Augusta and Robert, deceased; Herman L.; Charles, deceased; Stella, who died in infancy, and Elbert S., a bookkeeper in the mill at Albany.

JAMES H. OLDS. October 18, 1902, there was celebrated in Lafayette the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. James H. Olds, who are among the most honored and well known of the pioneers of '52. An element of more than usual romance is connected with this couple, whose association has been characterized by that fine sympathy and helpfulness engendered by necessary concessions and companionship in the very hard days of pioneer Oregon. As cousins Mr. and Mrs. Olds were married while crossing the plains near Fort Boise, Idaho, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Mr. Reasoner, a Methodist Episcopal clergyman, the principal witnesses being Wilson Cook and Mrs. N. A. Jacobs. At the golden wedding were present ninety relatives, a showing rarely found on occasions of this kind. The many beautiful gifts, the enthusiastic good wishes of many friends, and the general air of rejoicing, but slightly indicated the esteem in which are held these high minded and very prosperous early settlers.

The career of Mr. Olds should furnish encouragement to all desirous of rearing a structure solely upon their own merit. He was born near Sandusky, Seneca county, Ohio, May 29, 1830, and on both sides of his family cherishes a just pride of ancestry. His father, Martin, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1799, and lived until 1877; while his paternal grandfather, Timothy, was born and partially reared in England, and came to the colonies in America when a youth. At the age of nineteen the grandfather enlisted in the Revolutionary war as a private, and after participating in many of the best known battles was present at the surrender of Cornwallis. After the war he was ordained a Baptist minister, and during his ministry took part in the stirring events which have made his time memorable for its hideous religious intolerance. In accordance with the Massachusetts decree: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," he was present at the hanging of a number of supposed witches, but just what attitude he assumed in regard to this travesty of justice is not clearly defined. From Massachusetts he removed to New York state, and later to Seneca county, Ohio, where he died.

Martin Olds followed farming during his entire active life, and wherever he lived took an active interest in politics. In his youth he had limited educational chances, but he learned much from observation and life-long investigation and was always accounted a well informed and progressive man. He was one of the very early settlers of Branch county, Mich., where he attained to great prominence, not only serving as the first county judge, but being elected to the state legislature of 1843-44. Mr. Olds crossed the plains in 1851, and located on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres at the head of the Chehalem waters, where he lived until 1860. He then took up a claim three miles west of Middleton, in Washington county, where his last days were spent. As in Michigan, his special fitness for office was soon recognized, and after filling several offices with extreme credit he was made county judge of Yamhill county. From 1854 until 1858 he was a member of the constitutional convention of Oregon, and he was postmaster of Lafayette for many years. In his youth he married Temperance Parker, whose grandfather, Green Parker, was a Free Will Baptist preacher, and who settled on a farm in New York state near where his granddaughter was born in 1809. She died in North Yamhill, Yamhill county, in 1880. Of the children born of this union we make the following mention: Green is a farmer in Goldendale, Ore.; George died in Washington county in 1862; Martin is in Michigan; James H. is next in order; Nancy H. Jacobs lives in McMinnville; and Mrs. Sarah Cook also lives in McMinnville.

James H. Olds engaged in independent farming in Washington county in 1853, but afterward disposed of this property to his father, and settled on the old homestead on the Chehalem. In 1868 he removed to Lafayette to educate his children, and in 1872 engaged in the warehouse business in St. Joseph. He also became interested in managing a hotel, and for seven years experienced considerable success in this venture. In 1880 Mr. Olds built his present residence in Lafayette, and has since made this his headquarters. The year 1882 found him in the hotel business, from which he retired October 1, 1902. Mr. Olds lived in Clackamas county between 1892-95. Like his father, he has been active in promoting the interests of the Republican party, and has almost continuously served as a member of the school board, a part of the time as clerk. From 1866 until 1870 he served as deputy sheriff, and was justice of the peace for fourteen years, and bailiff of the circuit court for twelve years. As road supervisor he has materially impressed upon the community the necessity for good thoroughfares.

In 1852 Mr. Olds married Nancy A. Parker, from which union there were born three sons and three daughters, the order of their birth being as follows: Mrs. Elberta E. Gates, deceased; D. V., a resident of Lafayette; E. M., also living in Lafayette; Mrs. Della Klosterman, of the vicinity of Lafayette; Mrs. Kate Ferguson, of Lafayette, and P. P., who also resides here. Mr. Olds possesses personal characteristics in keeping with the opportunities of this great commonwealth, and has left his sterling worth impressed upon many departments of its activity. In religion he is a Materialist, but never antagonizes his neighbor with his belief. A man of limited education, he is nevertheless exceptionally well read.

JOHN NEWELL, who is engaged in the livery business in McMinnville, has been a resident of Oregon for a quarter of a century. He was born September 12, 1847, in Meigs county, Ohio, a son of Alonzo and Fannie (Dyke) Newell. The grandfather, John Newell, was a native of Massachusetts and a representative of an old New England family, whose loyal sons served in the Revolutionary war. He settled in Meigs county, Ohio, at a very early day, and there Alonzo Newell was born and reared, becoming a farmer by occupation. Removing to Wayne county, Ill., he there engaged in milling, and in 1876 he came to Oregon, carrying on business as a farmer and stock-raiser in Yamhill county until his death, which occurred in 1892, when he was sixty-five years of age. His wife, a native of Ohio, was a daughter of John Dyke, also born in that state. She died in Oregon. Her four children reached years of maturity and three came to Oregon. John; Mrs. Denica Felner, now of California; and Samuel, of Polk county, this state.

When ten years of age John Newell became a resident of Illinois, where he pursued his education in the district schools, and on attaining his majority he began farming and stock-raising in Wayne county. In 1876, however, he sold his interests there and with the family came to Oregon, devoting his energies to agricultural pursuits in Marion county until 1878, when he came to Yamhill county, purchasing a farm near Sheridan. The purchase comprised two hundred and forty acres of wild land, from which some of the timber had been cut, but the stumps still remained. This he improved and in addition to the cultivation of the fields he raised stock there until June, 1896, when he sold that property and came to McMinnville, where in connection with Mr. De Haven he purchased the livery business of Mr. Yocum, and under the firm name of DeHaven & Newell the barn was conducted for two years. The senior partner then sold his interest to James Henry and the firm of Henry & Newell was organized. They have a large livery, feed and sale stable, 100 x 100 feet, containing all kinds of carriages and vehicles, and in addition to the rental of these they buy and sell horses, shipping them to the Sound country. They keep very fine horses and have the largest livery business in the county.

In Wayne county, Ill., Mr. Newell was married to Miss Elizabeth Ake, a native of that county, and they have five children: Frank, Grace, William, Add and Fannie, all of McMinnville. Mr. Newell belongs to the Knights of Pythias fraternity and is a Republican in politics. He has served as a member of the city board of aldermen and was a member of the new charter committee. In matters of citizenship he is liberal and progressive, and in business affairs has met with gratifying success.

SMITH STEPHENS. The owner of one of the attractive homes and fine farms of Yamhill county is Smith Stephens, who, throughout his entire life, has devoted his energies to agricultural pursuits, with the result that excellent success has attended his efforts. He was born November 15, 1851, in Appanoose county, Iowa, a son of Aaron Stephens, whose birth occurred in Pennsylvania in 1828. During his boyhood the father accompanied his parents to Virginia, and at an early date in the history of Iowa they became residents of the latter state, arriving there about 1850. Aaron Stephens afterward married Miss Mary McGarvey, a native of Virginia, and they resided in Iowa until 1862, when they, too, joined the emigrants who were in those years continually crossing the plains in order to reclaim the wild district of the far west for the purposes of civilization. In addition to the difficulties incident to a long journey across the stretches of hot sand and over the mountains, almost impassable, they had trouble with the Indians, and were continually on their guard for fear of being molested by the savages. When six months had passed, however, they arrived at Portland, and Mr. and Mrs. Stephens came on at once to the Willamette valley, settling upon a tract of land adjoining Hopewell. Mr. Stephens purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land, and upon the place made all of the improvements, including the erection of substantial buildings and the transformation of the wild land into productive fields. Both he and his wife continued to live upon that farm until called to the home beyond, he passing away at the age of seventy years, while his wife lived to be sixty-nine years of age. They were life-long members of the Baptist Church, and their upright characters won for them the warm regard of those with whom they came in contact. They became the parents of five children: Malissa, the wife of Enoch Cooper, who resides upon a part of the old home place; Smith, of this review; Frank S., a resident of Hopewell; Leila, the wife of Isaac Lynch, of Hopewell, and one that died at the age of two years.

Smith Stephens spent the first ten years of his life in the state of his nativity, and then accompanied his parents on their removal to Oregon, remaining upon the old homestead farm until the time of his marriage. During the period of his boyhood he had obtained a good education in the district schools and in the Salem Academy. He wedded Miss Emily Allison, a native of Canada, and they took up their abode upon a part of the old homestead, living there for about ten years, when Mr. Stephens purchased what is known as the Richardson donation claim. Upon the tract which thus came into his possession he made all of the improvements, and he now has splendid modern buildings and a fine farm. At the present time he is in possession of eight hundred acres of land, and he carries on general farming and stock-raising, both branches of his business proving profitable. During the year 1892 he raised fourteen thousand pounds of hops—a crop which has become an important one in the northwest, and brings a good financial return.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Stephens were born five children, but they lost their first child, Myrtle. The others, Mabel, Charles, Howard and Ina, are all at home. Mr. Stephens belongs to the United Brethren Church, of which he is serving as a director. As every true American citizen should do, he keeps well informed on the political questions and issues of the day, and his support is given to the Republican party. He is now serving as school clerk, and has been road supervisor, and for many years has been judge of elections. His success is well merited, because it has come to him through legitimate channels of business. He realized that there is no royal road to wealth, and that the surest foundation upon which to build prosperity is industry and integrity. Upon this, therefore, he has placed his dependence, and as the years have passed his careful management and energy have been the means of winning for him a leading position among the substantial citizens of his community.

RICHARD W. PHILLIPS. Among the pioneer settlers of Yamhill county Richard W. Phillips occupies an altogether unique place, his character, his farm and his career being as familiar to the old-time residents as are his genial face and kindly manner. Mr. Phillips was born in Limestone county, Ala., January 1, 1832, and as far back as is known his forefathers were farmers and large land owners in the south. His paternal grandfather, William E. Phillips, followed the martial forces of Washington during the Revolutionary war, gaining distinction because of his courageous and meritorious services.

The parental family comprised thirteen children, who were given a fair education in the district schools. When their son, Richard W., was seven years old the family removed to Louisiana, and from that age until he was twenty he remained at home with his parents. At the latter age, however, he started out on his own responsibility, and in 1853 crossed the plains with ox teams. He was accompanied on the journey by his brother, George W., and they both sustained some loss, owing to the depredations of the Indians, thereby losing some of their horses. After a wearisome journey of over seven months they finally reached Amity, Yamhill county, where they remained for some time. At the end of the journey Richard W. was possessed of just $5 in currency, with which to begin life in the west, and, as may well be imagined, it did not carry him very far. Soon after his arrival, however, he was fortunate enough to secure employment at farm work, and in 1855 went to The Dalles, where for nine months he was employed by a pack train, under the supervision of the government. In the meantime his brother had enlisted in the Indian war of 1855-56, being under the command of Captain Emery, and acquitting himself creditably as a preserver of the peace in the west.

From The Dalles Mr. Phillips removed to Yamhill county in 1857, and the same year started for California with a bunch of cattle. As this proved a paying venture he made similar expeditions for several years thereafter. For a time in 1859 he was employed at farm work, but the same year returned to Wasco county, Ore., where he dealt quite extensively in cattle, and remained there until 1873. While a resident of the latter county, in January, 1862, he married Mary Hawley, who was born on the Boise river, Idaho, in 1844. After his marriage he removed to the farm which has since been his home, and which he had purchased in 1861, it being located one-half mile south of Whiteson. That Mr. Phillips has utilized the chances by which he has been surrounded in the northwest is proved by the fact that he now owns eleven hundred and eighty acres of land, a truly wonderful increase over his original $5. About five hundred acres are under cultivation, and no farm in this county is better equipped or more extensive in its various avenues of activity. The past season witnessed the gathering of sixteen thousand pounds of hops, an item of commerce which is accounted one of the specialties of the Phillips farm, which is known as Peach Hill Farm. The five hundred head of stock include Shorthorn cattle, Cotswold sheep, Berkshire and Poland-China hogs, and Angora goats. An air of substantiality and thoroughness, also of extreme neatness and thrift, pervades this splendid old farm, as reliable and substantial as is the honored owner, everywhere known as Uncle Dick.

The first wife of Mr. Phillips died in 1875, leaving three children: Richard W., Jr., of Coulee City, Wash.; Anna E., the wife of F. Ferguson, of Amity; and Carrie C., wife of George Hancock, of Cornelius. Some time after the death of his wife Mr. Phillips married Elizabeth Frazer, who was born in Woodford county, Ky., and this union resulted in the birth of four children: George E., at home; Homer C., a resident of eastern Oregon; one child, who died in infancy, and Curry S., who died at the age of six years. Ever since his voting days Mr. Phillips has taken a keen interest in politics, and has always espoused the cause of the Democratic party. He is a welcome member and visitor at various fraternal lodges in the county, notably the Masonic, of which he has been a member for over forty years; the Eastern Star, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is a charter member of twenty-six years' standing. Mr. Phillips has been to the fore in all movements of a social or public nature in his neighborhood, and though extremely careful and conservative, has wielded a great influence in all matters of importance. His farm is the headquarters for several large industries, and friends come from far and near to partake of his hospitality. He is not only one of the largest hop and stock raisers, but is known as by far the most extensive mule raiser in Yamhill county.

JAMES SHEPARD HUGHES. The town of Lebanon, favored because of the high character of its citizens, the extent and multiplicity of its interests, and its clean municipal administrations, has additional cause for congratulation in possessing what is conceded, by those in a position to judge, the best electric lighting system on the Pacific coast. This distinction is directly traceable to the earnest and capable efforts of James Shepard Hughes, owner and operator of the electric light and waterworks of this city, and a man of extended and practical experience in his chosen calling. Additional interest centers around Mr. Hughes because his electrical knowledge is almost entirely self-gained, and because he has enlisted the services of his exceedingly capable and studious wife, herself an electrician of more than ordinary merit.

On both sides of his family Mr. Hughes claims an ancestry connected with the educational and war history of the country, his paternal forefathers living for many years in the state of Pennsylvania, his grandfather, Joseph, being a distant relative of William Penn. His father, James, also born in Pennsylvania, became a very early settler in Monroe county, Ohio, reaching there about 1818. In many ways this pioneer was a unique and unusual character, and he represented a class of men fast receding into the shadows of history, in fact scarcely represented at all at the present time. He was a minister of the Protestant Methodist Church, and for many years was a circuit rider in Ohio, leading one of those strenuous and self-sacrificing lives to which the clergy of today are strangers. A school teacher also, he spent his entire life in the realms of religion and knowledge, was a close student and practical teacher, more especially during the latter part of his life. A farmer and preacher when he first moved to Ohio, an accident turned his attention to teaching, for while crossing the Ohio river he was thrown overboard, chilled to the bone, and took a cold which settled in his lower limbs, incapacitating him for severe physical labor. He lived a comparatively short time, his death occurring in 1854, at the age of forty-five years. His wife, Sarah (Lucas) Hughes, was born in Ohio, married there, and spent her last days in the Buckeye state. Mrs. Hughes was a daughter of Samuel Lucas, born in Ohio, and member of a family noted for its longevity. His grandfather, Samuel, served with distinction in the Revolutionary war, and his great-grandmother lived to be one hundred and twelve years old, and she nursed James Shepard Hughes when he was an infant in arms.

His position as the oldest child and son in his father's family of six children necessitated an early assumption of responsibility on the part of James Shepard Hughes. He was born in Monroe county, Ohio, November 25, 1838, and was therefore eight years of age when his good father went to the silent bourne. The many duties to be performed at home interfered sadly with his early education, and as soon as possible he began to earn money that his brothers and sisters might fare better than it had been possible for him to do. From the age of seventeen he assumed the management of a large Ohio farm, and when he had accomplished all possible for his home people he married in his native state, Louise W. Gatten, born on section 16, Monroc county, June 26, 1842. Like her husband, Mrs. Hughes claims a learned and martial ancestry, from the ranks of which have come educators of merit and influence. James R. Gatten, the father of Mrs. Hughes, was born in Maryland, and for more than a quarter of a century was a teacher of more than local repute in Ohio, to which state he was brought a baby in arms, and where he died at an advanced age. His father, Thomas, and his grandfather, Richard Ellis, were born in the North of Ireland, and the latter was indeed a patriot. That he might espouse the cause of the down-trodden colonies he placed his ample fortune in the bank of England, and with his family emigrated to America, where he enlisted in the Colonial army, serving under the banner of Washington for several years. His son, Thomas, a youth when he came to America, learned the shoemaker's trade, an occupation followed during his entire active life in Ohio. He married Frances Vaughn, born either in Virginia or Ohio, and whose grandfather, Vincent, established his family in the United States in time to serve in the war of 1812. At an early day the grandfather removed to Ohio, and died in Guernsey county after accumulating a competence.

Mr. Hughes' association with the west began in 1876, when he settled with his family at Redwood, Cal., and entered upon his duties as superintendent of the waterworks. That he maintained this position for the long period of twenty years is the best guarantee of his fitness, and that he in many ways identified himself with the general affairs of the town shows a capacity for public service in any community. In keeping with his natural stability and faithfulness was his occupancy of the office of street superintendent for seventeen years, notwithstanding that he was elected on the Republican ticket, and that there were many intervening Democratic administrations. For one term also he was deputy tax collector. Desiring a change, Mr. Hughes came to Lebanon and purchased the electric light plant, and also the water power and a half interest in the old Foly and O'Neal ditch, and has since managed the same with the assistance of his wife, who has trodden with him the intricate and fascinating regions of electricity, and is quite capable of taking her husband's place in an emergency.

It is not surprising that all of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Hughes have developed intellectual superiority, and at least two are representative of the best class of educators on the coast. James B., a graduate of the Yale University with the degrees of M. A. and B. A., and also a graduate of the Indiana State University and the Hopkins Academy of Oakland, Ind., is principal of the high school at Merced, Cal.; Ada, the widow of D. R. Caldwell, is a teacher of drawing in the public schools of Alameda, Cal., and is a painter of merit, having supplemented her art training in this country by a year of study in Europe; Charles C., who served two terms as superintendent of the public schools of Alameda, Cal., having graduated in the pioneer class of Stanford University; Frances H. is the wife of A. B. Milsap, a traveling salesman of Centralia, Wash.; Thomas Dewey was accidentally killed by falling from a building in 1880; and E. M. F. Hughes is foreman of a shipyard at Manila, Philippine Islands. Mr. Hughes is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and is fraternally connected with the Blue Lodge of Masons. The career of Mr. Hughes speaks for itself, and superfluous would be praise of a man whose life efforts have been so unchangeably on the side of stability, thoroughness, and absolute devotion to principle and conscience.

JOSEPH B. PERKINS. Among those courageous pioneers who slowly moved over the plains long before the emissaries of gold rendered less dangerous the vastness of the western country, and who, as they carried civilization with them, were obliged to fight nature at every step, to circumvent untold dangers, and over their camp fires indulged in ghastly prophecies of destruction at the hands of murderous savages, were those messengers of peace and prosperity who arrived in Oregon in 1844. Already the noble Whitman had paved the way for others equally ambitious, and the embryo town called in his honor was suggestive of a semblance of awakening activity. Thither came John Perkins, the father of Joseph B., the latter a farmer of Yamhill county, and born in Tippecanoe county, Ind., January 5, 1841.

John Perkins was born in Genesee county, N. Y., August 21, 1811, and married Sarah Felix, who was born in Union county, Pa., December 6, 1815. Mrs. Perkins, who is now living with her daughter, Mrs. H. F. Bedwell, was reared in Ohio, and removed to Indiana when nineteen years of age. Here she met her husband, who was a carpenter, millwright and blacksmith by trade, and with whom she crossed the plains in 1844. The first winter in the northwest Mr. Perkins passed at Whitman station, and there ran a grist-mill for the man for whom the station was named. In March, 1845, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, adjoining and constituting a part of that now owned by his son, Joseph B., and there remained for the balance of his life. He was unusually prosperous, and admirably succeeded in controlling and utilizing the opportunities by which he was surrounded. At the last he owned two thousand and nine hundred acres of land, all of which was divided among his nine children and wife, the latter holding a dower right on three hundred and twenty acres. He was a Democrat in politics, and was a consistent and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Reared among strictly agricultural surroundings, Joseph B. Perkins left home at the age of sixteen, but soon returned and worked on the paternal farm until about twenty-five. After his marriage he went into the saw-mill business in Washington for a year, and then began to farm on one hundred and forty-seven acres of land six miles north of McMinnville. This property was afterward disposed of to Clem Scott, and Mr. Perkins made his home in Gaston for six years. After living in McMinnville for a year he made his home on a farm in Klickitat county, Wash., for nine years, and on the latter property engaged principally in the sheep business. He also ran a steam ferry across the Columbia river for two years. Upon returning to Oregon he ran a saw-mill for a year, and then had charge of an electric light plant in McMinnville for six months. He then settled on his present farm, which adjoins his father's estate, and of which he has disposed of all but twenty-three acres. Eleven acres of this are under hops, of which the present owner has made a great success, and the present year he had to show for his pains sixty-six bales of this marketable article. Mr. Perkins is a notable addition to the agricultural captains of industry of Yamhill county, and is well known socially and otherwise. He has been a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen for over twenty-four years, and has passed through all of the chairs. In politics he is independent, but has often taken an active interest in supporting worthy friends. In religion he is a member and deacon of the Christian Ad-vent Church.

The family of Mr. Perkins consists of his wife, Ellen E. (Gaunt) Perkins, who was born near St. Louis, Mo., August 31, 1850, and whose father, G. D. Gaunt, crossed the plains in 1853. Of this union there have been born the following children: Mrs. Eleanor Force, wife of T. D. Force, living three and a half miles south of her father's farm; John S.; Fred F., living five miles east of the home farm; Mrs. Rose Helmer, of Portland; Claude C., living with his parents; and Floyd F., also living at home.

HON. CHARLES V. GALLOWAY has the distinction of being the youngest member of the state legislature of Oregon. He is one of the native sons of the golden west, and his record is a credit to the locality in which he has always made his home, for his life has been upright, honorable and worthy of the respect which is uniformly accorded him. He was born January 6, 1878, in Bellevue, Yamhill county, and is a son of William Galloway, a native of Juneau, Dodge county, Wis. The paternal grandparents of our subject both lived to an advanced age, the grandfather dying at the home of his son, William, while the grandmother passed away at the home of her daughter in St. Paul, Marion county, Ore. William Galloway became a resident of Yamhill county in 1852, at which time he accompanied his parents on their emigration to the far west. No railroad then spanned the country, and the long and difficult journey was made with ox teams, crossing the plains and through the mountain passes. That was the year of the great cholera scourge, when many emigrants died of the dread disease. The party with which the Galloways traveled was upon the road for seven months, but at length they were gladdened by the sight of the green hills and fertile fields of Oregon. The grandparents took up their abode on Salt creek, in Yamhill county, near the present site of Amity, securing a donation claim, whereon they lived for several years.

William Galloway remained under the parental roof until he had attained early manhood, experiencing the hardships and trials of pioneer life and also enjoying its pleasures and privileges. After leaving home he and his brother conducted pack trains in eastern Oregon and Idaho, thus gaining a start in the business world. As a companion and helpmate for life's journey he chose Miss Emma Baker, a native of Wisconsin, and they began housekeeping in Bellevue upon a farm.

William Galloway had obtained his more advanced education in Willamette University and was graduated in that institution. For some time he engaged in teaching school, and left the impress of his individuality upon the intellectual development of his community. For ten years after his marriage he and his wife resided at Bellevue and then removed to McMinnville, where he was engaged in the warehouse business for three years. On the expiration of that period he was elected to the position of county judge in 1890, and served upon the bench in a most capable manner for four years, retiring from the office as he had entered it—with the confidence and good will of the public.

After his term of office had expired he continued to reside in McMinnville until 1896, when he removed to Oregon City and was appointed receiver of the United States land office, holding that position until 1902. At the present time he is practicing law there and is a capable member of the bar, having broad and comprehensive knowledge of the principles of jurisprudence, while in the preparation of his cases he is careful and precise, and in their presentation forceful and strong. That he is one of the distinguished residents of the state is widely acknowledged, and as a leader in political circles he is well known. Three times he represented Yamhill county in the state legislature, and in 1894 he was the candidate of his party for governor of Oregon, but was defeated. His influence, however, is widely felt, and his patriotism and loyalty to the public good are beyond question. In his family are three children: Zilpha, Charles V., of this review, and Francis V., the eldest and youngest being at home.

C. V. Galloway having acquired his preliminary education in the public schools, continued his studies in McMinnville College and in the University of Oregon. He remained at home until 1899, when he took charge of a farm of three hundred acres, of which he owns one hundred and fifty acres. Here he carries on general farming and fruit-raising, and upon his farm he has seven thousand prune and apple trees. This is one of the best fruit farms in his portion of the state, and Mr. Galloway is regarded as a leading agriculturist, whose practical and progressive methods are bringing to him good returns. The place is pleasantly located about four miles northwest of McMinnville, and is supplied with all modern equipments found upon a model farm of the twentieth century.

Socially Mr. Galloway is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and with the United Artisans, and he exercises his right of franchise in support of the men and measures of the Democracy. In June, 1902, he was elected upon the Democratic ticket to represent his district in the state legislature, and is now the youngest member of that body, but his ability is not limited by his years, and his interest in the welfare of his state is deep and sincere. Such, in brief, is his life history. In whatever relation of life we find him, in the government service, in political circles, in business or in social relations he is always the same honorable and honored gentleman, whose worth well merits the high regard which is uniformly extended him.

FRANK WILSON SETTLEMIER. Among the representative young men of Woodburn, F. W. Settlemier stands among the leaders, both in business and social affairs. He is the son of a much respected pioneer, J. H. Settlemier, the founder of Woodburn, and grandson of George Settlemier, a pioneer of 1847, who started the first nursery in Marion county. Though young in years the subject of this review has established a reputation for his ability to carry on the business established by his father, and since his early youth has grown into the business, working with his father until January 1, 1892, at which time he succeeded to the entire business. Since assuming control he has established a department of landscape gardening, excelled by few in the state. A native son, Mr. Settlemier was born August 18, 1873, and educated in the common schools of Marion county, after which he entered and was graduated from the Portland Business College, in 1890. As a boy, he impressed his father and others with his natural thrift and business methods; that he has more than merited this confidence is apparent to all who are familiar with the steady growth of the business, and who appreciate the value of the stock sent out from the nurseries conducted by him. This, the oldest nursery in the state of Oregon, does a large wholesale business with all points west of the Mississippi river, and as far south as Texas. Mr. Settlemier takes orders for landscape gardening in all parts of the northwest. Some of his work is shown in his native county, a noticeable example being the grounds of the capitol at

W. J. Elmore

Salem, which were laid out by him. He has also found great demand for his work in the city of Portland. Aside from his occupation and business cares, he takes an active interest in the up-building of his native city, and is accounted one of its public-spirited citizens. In politics a Republican, he has held several local offices. He has never been an aspirant for official recognition, and the positions he has filled have been tendered him for his worth as a citizen. He is a stockholder and director of the Bank of Woodburn, and was elected cashier, serving for two years, 1898-99. During the Spanish-American war he served as recruiting officer, and took an active interest in the advancement of the cause. March 20, 1898, he became second lieutenant of Company H, Second Regiment, Oregon National Guard, and upon the organization of Company D, Fourth Regiment, Oregon National Guard, was elected second lieutenant, and December 13, 1902, was elected first lieutenant of same. He was a charter member of both Company H and Company D; is a member of Woodburn Lodge No. 106, A. F. & A. M., of which he is secretary; high priest of Woodburn Chapter No. 29, R. A. M.; De Molay Commandery of Salem No. 5; Oregon Consistory, A. A. S. R., of Portland; Al Kader Temple, Mystic Shrine, A. A. O. N. M. S., and member of B. P. O. E., Salem Lodge No. 336.

May 11, 1896, in Salem, Ore., he was united in marriage with Miss Mabel Janes, who was born in Humboldt, Cal., and a daughter of Joseph T. and Caroline (Geer) Janes, the latter a native of Oregon and a sister of ex-Gov. T. T. Geer. Mr. Janes came to Oregon at an early day, and is now serving as warden at the state penitentiary at Salem.

WILLIAM PORTER ELMORE. No one man wields a greater financial, social and moral influence in the city of Brownsville, Linn county, than William Porter Elmore, now independent through many years of successful application in the stock business, now the president of the Bank of Brownsville, a minister in the Baptist Church, and a prominent and successful man in the Prohibition party. The advance of Mr. Elmore along the lines that have made him one of the first men of his city is due solely to his own efforts, and he has won the esteem and confidence of all with whom he has come in contact. William Porter Elmore was born in Jefferson county, Tenn., February 4, 1850, the youngest child and only son of the two children which blessed the union of his parents, Calvin, a native of the same locality in which William P. was born, and Sarah, also of Tennessee. The mother was a daughter of Andrew Galbraith, a native of the south, who engaged in farming in Tennessee. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was very active in the work, being a class leader and local preacher. He died in Tennessee in 1861, over eighty years old.

His father being a farmer, William Porter Elmore was reared to that life, engaging at ten years of age in heavy work, on account of the death of his father in 1854, at thirty-four years of age. His education was received in the common schools of his native state, and Maury Academy at Dandridge, Tenn., at the age of eighteen years giving his youth and strength to the support of his mother and sister, on his mother's farm. In 1873 he became a fireman on what is now known as the Southern Railway, but not caring for the roving life of a trainman he returned to Dandridge after three years and entered upon a clerkship in a general merchandise establishment in that city. In the spring of 1878 this employment was given up and he came west, settling three miles west of Brownsville, Linn county, Ore., where he worked on a farm. Two years later he rented a farm two miles east of the city, and there remained until 1882, when he changed his location to eastern Oregon, there engaging in sheep-raising, which proved a profitable employment for his energy and industry. In 1888 he returned to Brownsville and engaged in farming for two years, when he located in the city, purchasing the controlling interest in the Bank of Brownsville. He became very influential in the affairs of the community. In 1894 he was elected a director of the bank, which was followed by his election as president in 1900. In addition to this interest he is also manager of the lands entrusted to the Security Savings & Trust Company.

Mr. Elmore was married in Brownsville to Mrs. Louisa (Brown) Carolin, who was born near here, the daughter of Hugh Leper Brown. The latter was a native of Tennessee, who crossed the plains in 1846 and located near the present location of Brownsville, in which he was the first merchant, and from which the town has taken its name. In addition to being a successful man in business affairs, Mr. Brown was a prominent man in politics. As a Democrat he served two terms in the state legislature, where he ably represented the people who had honored him with their support. A great misfortune marred the enjoyment of his later days, he having been afflicted with blindness for ten years before his death, though his sight had been failing for twenty years. He died in January, 1888, lacking but a few days of being seventy-eight years old. Mr. Elmore was appointed administrator of the estate of Mr. Brown. To Mr. and Mrs. Elmore have been born two children, William Calvin, who is still at home with his parents; Libby Moyer, who is now deceased. A stepson, Matthew C. Carolin, is a farmer near Brownsville. Fraternally, Mr. Elmore is a member of the Society of United Artisans. Politically he is a staunch adherent of Prohibition principles, and has served his party in many ways. He has served two terms as mayor of the city, during the second, in 1896, making the town non-license, his greatest effort having been given to the administration of public affairs without the revenue derived from saloons. He was successful, and at the end of his term had $400 in the city treasury, and the town was in excellent condition. He has also been a member of the city council several years, lending his intelligence and earnestness of purpose to the carrying out of all worthy movements in the best interest of the public. In 1892 he was elected to the state legislature, where he served one term, during which session he served on the engrossing committee, manufacturing committee, and the committee to visit and report on the public works of the state. He is a member of the national committee of the Prohibition party, having been a delegate to the national convention. At the regular election of 1900 and at the special election in June, 1903, he was his party's candidate for member of congress, and in 1902 he was a joint candidate for senator. In religion Mr. Elmore is a Baptist, and in 1897 was ordained a minister in the Missionary Baptist Church, and is now pastor of the churches located at Holley and Providence. He is moderator of the Central Baptist Association, also vice-president of the Baptist State Convention, and a member of the board of managers of the state convention. Much of Mr. Elmore's wealth finds its way into the channels of the church, giving constantly to the demands and needs of the religious organization of which he is a member, and he has also given much toward the upbuilding and growth of the various colleges of the Willamette valley, making his name one to be remembered as that of a great factor in the march of progress in the west.

FRANK SULLY. Though his ancestry is traced back to a little island country where great farms are not the possessions of the many, Frank Sully has shown by his success in the farming line that nature would have been disappointed had he not turned his attention to agricultural lines. Born in Nottingham, England, January 11, 1806, James Sully, the father, spent thirty-four years of his life among English sights and sounds, engaged for some time in the hosiery business, to which he had been apprenticed in his youth. Some years after his marriage with Miss Ann Moss, who was born in Derbyshire, England; December 31, 1814, he gave up the old life that was necessarily very dear to him, and for the sake of his family he emigrated to the United States, landing in New York city, where he made his home for some time, his first move in the new country being to Elizabethtown, N. J. Here he secured employment as a bookkeeper, caring for his little family in the generous way to which they were accustomed. In 1846 the family removed to Canton, Ill., and here Frank Sully was born August 12 of the same year. In that city his father remained for nine years, entering successfully the mercantile life, but in 1855 going to the city of Minneapolis, Minn., engaging again as a bookkeeper, in which work he was more than ordinarily successful. In that city he passed the remainder of his life, gaining a prominent place among the citizens of the city, through his interest and activity in public affairs. For eight years he had charge of the Board of County Commissioners as chairman, discharging his duties intelligently and ably, and when he at last retired from active life he was missed in the circles where his associates had been wont to call upon him, sure of his support. He died in 1877, his wife outliving him by seventeen years. Eight children were born to them: James, deceased; Ellen M., wife of Lucius Babcock; Annie, Mrs. Fillmore; Sophia, deceased; Frank; Mary, deceased; Elizabeth, who died in infancy; and Hattie, Mrs. Crafts.

Though his earliest recollections of his father are those connected with his mercantile life, and every year of his youth being spent in a city, all combined could not take from Frank his intense love of broad fields and deep, green forests, and when he started out in the world for himself he instinctively turned his footsteps toward the country lands. His early education had been received in the common schools of Minnesota, and with his quick, bright intellect he could soon have earned a high place in the city where he was reared, but preferred, instead, to win it through the medium of the farming ways. At fifteen years he was almost entirely self-supporting, working at lumbering along the Mississippi and St. Croix rivers. In 1869 he was able to purchase land, with a view to farming for himself, and he settled upon a farm near Glencoe, McLeod county, Minn., where he remained for twelve years. At the close of this period he was attracted by the glowing tales of the west to go to Oregon, settling in Yamhill county, where he engaged in teaming in McMinnville. After one year of this business he went back to the country, renting a farm two miles east of McMinnville, living there for two years, and going from there into Polk county, where he spent another two years on rented property near the town of McCoy. Returning to Yamhill county he located four miles east of McMinnville, having seen enough of Oregon to know the wisdom of his choice of a location for a permanent home.

Mr. Sully now owns two hundred and fifteen acres of finely improved property just out of McMinnville, in which town he has built a beautiful residence, where he makes his home, superintending the farm, enjoying thereby the joys of country life and the conveniences of the city.

November 19, 1867, occurred his marriage with Fidelity Peck, who was born near Jackson, Mich., March 13, 1849, and of this union four children were born, two sons and two daughters, three of whom are living: Marian, wife of H. C. Patty; James, deceased; Guy L., and Hope. A Republican in politics, Mr. Sully does not aspire to political honors, though he does his duty as a citizen, having served as road supervisor and in various school offices, and with his wide thought and the deep spirit of patriotism that controls his action, he is a much-valued member of the community.

but gradually he was advanced until he became the bookkeeper. He remained with that house until June, 1899, when he started in the warehouse business for himself, becoming a member of the firm of Christenson & Houck. They purchased the old Grange warehouse and engaged in the grain and commission business, dealing in grain and also in hay, potatoes and wool. The partnership was maintained until 1900, when Mr. Houck purchased Mr. Christenson's interest and continued alone until the following year, when he admitted A. J. Houck to a partnership under the firm style of Houck & Houck. They have one large building, 100x80 feet, on the line of the Southern Pacific railroad, and a river warehouse, 40x60 feet. They also rent the old Hendricks warehouse, which is 60x80 feet, and is completely filled with hay. They likewise utilize the old Methodist Episcopal Church, which has been converted into a warehouse, and is 20x40 feet. The firm buys and ships wheat, oats, hay and potatoes on an extensive scale, the last-named product being largely sent to the south. In 1901 their shipment to El Paso, Tex., amounted to thirty-seven carloads, while seventeen carloads were sent to Phoenix, Ariz., and large shipments to other places. They buy all over their state, and their business furnishes an excellent market to the producers. They also do a large and profitable business in the shipment of hay and straw, and annually make extensive purchases of wool, which they ship to Portland. Thus the business has constantly grown until it has taken a place in the front rank of similar enterprises in this portion of the country.

In McMinnville, in 1893, Mr. Houck was united in marriage to Miss Sophia Okerson, a native of Michigan, and they now have one child, Elvin. Mrs. Houck is a most estimable lady, and holds membership with the Baptist Church. Fraternally, Mr. Houck is a representative of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, has held all of the offices of the local lodge, and has been sent as a delegate to the Grand Lodge. His political support is given to the Republican party, and as every true American citizen should do, he keeps well informed on the issues of the day, but has never sought office as a reward for party fealty, his attention being given to his commercial interests. Although yet a young man, he has attained success that many an older man might well envy, and in the control of his affairs has manifested keen discrimination, sound judgment and unflinching diligence.

SAMUEL ROBERTS. Five hundred and eighty acres of the most desirable farming land in Yamhill county is owned and managed by Samuel Roberts, upon whose meadows graze in

W. S. HOUCK, who is controlling an extensive and profitable warehouse business, and is also engaged in shipping grain and potatoes, came to the northwest from the Mississippi valley, his birth having occurred in Buckley, Iroquois county, Ill., June 19, 1873. His father, Wesley Houck, is a native of Ohio, and the grandfather, John Houck, was born in that state, whence he removed to Illinois, where he spent his last days. The father engaged in farming in Iroquois county until 1875, when he came to Oregon, settling in McMinnville. He now has a farm one mile east of the city, where he is successfully engaged in carrying on agricultural pursuits. He is a member of the board of trustees of the Oregon Fire Relief Association. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Ella Snapp, was born in Iroquois county, Ill., and at a very early age was left an orphan. By her marriage she became the mother of five children, and the family circle still remains unbroken by the hand of death.

W. S. Houck, the second in order of birth and the only son, was but two years of age when the family came to Oregon, and here he was reared, beginning his education at the usual age of six years, and completing it by a high school course, being graduated in the class of 1890. His school days ended, he then entered business life as an employe in the warehouse of M. B. Hendricks. He worked at the humble duty of sewing sacks, contentment all manner of fine stock. Six acres are devoted to hops, and besides many marketable commodities are raised in large amounts. Two hundred acres are under cultivation, and the general aspect of things around the farm indicates a continuous effort for the best in agricultural advancement. Mr. Roberts was born in Tippecanoe county, Ind., February 16, 1837, and is a son of Henry and Diana (De Hart) Roberts, who had also the following children: Vincent, a miner in the state of Washington; Jacob, a farmer of The Dalles; Phoebe, the wife of William Laughlin, of North Yamhill; Christopher, a farmer of Idaho; Erastus, deceased, and Albert. Through a former marriage with a Miss Harrison, Henry Roberts had two children, of whom Abraham is deceased, and William lives near North Yamhill. Mr. Roberts came to Oregon in the train of Capt. Joe Watts in 1848, and the following year went down into California to work in the mines. After a year's rather unsuccessful effort he determined to go back to farming, and thereupon took up the donation claim upon which his son is now conducting large operations. Here the balance of his life was spent, and he had the satisfaction of realizing that his adopted state had yielded him fair returns for industry and sober business judgment.

A year after starting out on his own responsibility, at the age of eighteen, Samuel Roberts enlisted in the Cayuse war as a private, and served with credit and courage during this momentous conflict. After the war he worked for three months as a teamster, and thereafter was variously employed until settling, at the age of twenty-four, on the claim formerly owned by his father. The farm was not a gift, but was bought from his sire, and to the improvement of it he has devoted all the intervening years. In 1858 Mr. Roberts married Sarah Griffin, and of this union there have been born three children: Cyrenus, living near his father; Pierce, living at home; and H. W., also at home. Mr. Roberts is a Democrat in politics, and has served as road supervisor for one term, and as school director for a number of years. He is one of the intelligently progressive and substantial farmers of Yamhill county, and his personal characteristics have won the respect and confidence of all who know him.

GEORGE R. JOHNSON. The family of which George R. Johnson is a worthy representative is enrolled among the pioneer arrivals of 1852, that terrible year made memorable by the cholera scourge which devastated the plains, and laid low the hopes and ambitions of many a hardy traveler. In the success with which he is conducting his agricultural and stock-raising enterprise in Yamhill county, Mr. Johnson emulates the example of his emigrating father, William R. Johnson, familiarly known as Black Hawk Johnson.

William R. Johnson was born in Ohio, April 2, 1824, his father, Richard Johnson, of Irish parentage, having been born on the ocean while his parents were emigrating to America. Richard Johnson was reared in Ohio, and through his marriage with Milbrey Graves, a native of North Carolina, reared seven children, five of whom are living, and of whom William R. was the third oldest. This son was reared in the wilds of Indiana, to which his parents removed at an early day, and after his removal to Arkansas married Delphine D. Steward, daughter of John Steward, an old-time resident of the Hoosier state. They had ten children, five of whom are now living: Mrs. Alice G. Stallcop, Mrs. L. H. Messinger, Agnes, George R., and Katherine. March 24, 1852, Mr. Johnson, with his family and mother, started across the plains with the usual equipment of ox teams and wagons, and though traveling most of the way alone with his family, escaped much of the deprivation and disaster which overtook many searchers after western advantages. Arriving in Yamhill county after a comparatively pleasant journey, in which hunting and fishing furnished the principal diversions, Mr. Johnson settled on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Carlton, a portion of which is now owned by his son, George R. There was no village of McMinnville at that time, but there were a few ambitious settlers, among them Dr. McBride, W. L. Adams, James McGinnis, Dr. Sitton, and Zebediah Shelton. Having no money with which to start in the west, he borrowed money at three per cent, and by industry and close application to business was soon able to clear any indebtedness encountered in the early days. At first the family kept house in a small log cabin, but this was eventually replaced by one of the best houses in the county. In time Mr. Johnson became one of the very large land owners in Yamhill county, his home farm comprising seven hundred acres of the best land anywhere around, besides several large tracts in different parts of the state.

On a portion of the claim of Mr. Johnson was erected the first school-house in this section, around which clustered many memories of the old days, and which at present presents a patriarchal and solemn appearance. Where now the nocturnal owl rears his young and mournfully salutes the night, some of the most prominent up-builders of the county met daily after long journeys from their respective homes, to devour such knowledge as was dispensed in the rudely constructed school. Mr. Johnson and his neighbors met in the early part of 1861 and hewed and split the logs for the school-house, and the first teacher was Judge Lawson, afterward a practicing lawyer at Salem. Among the pupils about this time were David and Franklin Stout, John Bunn, the McCulloghs, former United States Senator McBride, Judge Thomas McBride, Jason Peters, the Johnsons, the Sittons, the three oldest daughters of O. H. Adams, and enough more to make up an assemblage of sixty-five pupils. In the course of time the old building became inadequate for its needs and a new school was constructed half a mile to the north. No longer an educational institution, the log house became a shelter for several families, among them Nathaniel Windom, who lived there with his wife and four children. The wife falling ill unto death, the husband became discouraged and lost his mind, and, imagining that all sorts of danger hung over him, committed suicide by hanging himself in the oak grove nearby. Investigation proved that insanity ran in his family, his brother and mother having been committed for mental derangement. Thus the peaceful old school-house was the scene of a tragedy, with which its history will ever be connected.

The first wife of Mr. Johnson died in 1869, and in 1882 he was united in marriage with Mary Shumway, a native of Wasco county, Ore., and daughter of Aurora Shumway, a highly respected Oregon pioneer. By this union two daughters, Lulu and Willie, were born. Mr. Johnson was a Republican in politics, but aside from the formality of casting his vote, took no particular interest in politics. He took a keen interest in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he was a member in good standing for many years. He died on the old homestead September 10, 1901.

George R. Johnson is a native son of Yamhill county, and was born on the paternal claim May 6, 1865, the second youngest of the children of his father's first marriage. At the age of twenty-one he started out to farm on his own responsibility, and in 1893 went to Jackson county, Ore., where he became interested in mining and prospecting. At the expiration of four years, during which time he became the possessor of large mining interests, he returned to Yamhill county, and in 1898 availed himself of the mining chances in Alaska, near White Horse Rapids. He took a few claims in this region, but soon after sold them, and while in the far north worked as a driver on a tramway, and also broke in horses for the tramway company. Returning to Yamhill county in 1898, somewhat disenchanted with the north, he located on the home place, and has since made this his home. He owns fifty acres of the original donation claim, and makes his home in the old house. Twenty-five acres are under cultivation, and general farming and stock-raising are engaged in. Mr. Johnson is variously interested in affairs in the county, and like his father, is a Republican in politics, although he is interested only so far as securing the election of good men is concerned. Formerly he was associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, but has been demitted. He is one of the substantial and reliable Oregonians who may be depended on to further the best interests of their community, and a continuation of his present success is beyond the question of doubt.

JAMES McKAY. Though the old pioneers are surely passing away from the scenes of their early labors in Oregon, their memory is one that will outlast the passage of time. Deeds, not words, was the heritage which they left to the present generation, the evidence of their earnest, self-sacrificing lives scattered throughout the length and breadth of the state and insuring them a place in the hearts of those who live and profit by the success of their efforts. James McKay, a man to be named among the first pioneers of the state, is remembered as one who came to the west with earnest purpose and realized his object of making a personal success and as well gave his best efforts toward the up-building of a commonwealth. Morally strong, honest, energetic and persevering, his was an influence which made a deep impression in all communities where he made his home, and to him and others of like calibre is owed a debt incalculable, since it affects the moral worth as well as financial and commercial interest of the country.

James McKay was of Irish extraction, having been born near Belfast, April 15, 1818, the youngest of three children born to his parents, John Niel and Catherine (McKusker) McKay, both of whom were also natives of Ireland. The death of each occurred in the old home there. Of the children, John, Elizabeth and James, the last named was the only one who sought a home in America. He was educated in the national schools of Glasgow, Scotland, whence his parents removed shortly after his birth, and on attaining sufficient age he learned the trades of carpenter and miller. While in Dundee, working at his trade of ship carpenter, he was married in 1840 to Cecelia Lawson, a native of that place, born November 9, 1822. She was a daughter of William Lawson, a prominent manufacturer of Dundee, and the representative of one of the old families of the country. Shortly after their marriage Mr. McKay brought his wife to America, locating first in Albany, N. Y., where he continued to work at his trade of ship carpenter. Becoming interested in the pioneer possibilities of the middle west he became a resident of Illinois, and locating in Joliet was soon employed on the canal. While in their Illinois home two sons, William and James, were born to Mr. and Mrs. McKay. Early in 1847 Mr. McKay decided to cast in his lot with the vanguard of civilization in the northwest, and accordingly outfitted with ox-teams and various necessities for the long journey across the plains. While coming down the Columbia river from The Dalles the two children were taken ill with measles and died.

On reaching Portland Mr. McKay and his wife remained a few days, when he went up the valley to St. Paul and purchased mill property known as the Old Mission Mill, agreeing to pay $8,000, a sum of money he had yet to make in his new home. He also became the owner of a section of land, a timbered tract, which furnished him with material for his saw-mill, which he conducted in conjunction with a flour-mill. The same year he went to California at the height of the gold excitement, and conducted a tavern at Sacramento until December, when he returned to the northwest and paid for his Oregon property with the result of his successful summer's work. He then entered upon an industrious prosecution of his milling interests, in which occupation he remained for many years. While so occupied he also became interested in other lines, investing his surplus means principally in real estate, in Portland erecting the McKay Building, one of the modern structures of the city. He also owned residence properties, and at one time had in his possession the southwest corner of Yamhill and Fourth streets. That Mr. McKay was successful in the accomplishment of his personal object is shown in the quantity and quality of the property which he accumulated. He owned at the time of his death three farms, business and residence property in Portland, and business property at The Dalles, the whole being the result of his own earnest application and persevering efforts.

After becoming residents of Oregon eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. McKay, of whom two, twins in birth, died in early infancy, unnamed. Those remaining are as follows: William R., now living near St. Paul; Mary, who resides in Portland; John N., who owns the old home at St. Paul; Kate, wife of John McCormick, living near Woodburn; James, who died in early childhood; and Cecelia, wife of John Kirk, of St. Paul, Ore. The wife of Mr. McKay died upon the old home place, June 13, 1870. As a Christian mother, wife and friend she possessed in a remarkable degree those attributes which endeared her to all who knew her and made her an honor and an ornament to society. Mr. McKay remained there until 1886, when he gave up his lifework in St. Paul and removed to Portland, where his death occurred August 29, 1898.

With the passing away of Mr. McKay was lost to Oregon a man of unusual worth. Though of a retiring disposition and always inclined to spend his leisure at home, he was still a broad-minded citizen, interested in the welfare of city and state. He gave his vote and support to the Democratic party, though he was never active in political affairs. In religion he was a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and was always a liberal contributor to church and all charitable enterprises, as well as giving a hearty support to the schools of the country. Upright and honorable, with a clean record, it is just that his memory should live to those for whom he helped to form the commonwealth of Oregon.

LEWIS S. HUTT, living on a farm one and a half miles east of North Yamhill, is a native son of this county, was born November 2, 1865. His father, Thomas B. Hutt, was born in Pike county, Mo., September 12, 1821, his mother, Rachel (Laughlin) Hutt, being also a native of Pike county, and born December 26, 1826. The parents were married in Missouri, and soon after, in 1847, started over the plains with ox teams, and by a mere providential chance escaped being members of the ill-fated Whitman party. Without particular incident they accomplished the long and tedious journey, and in 1848 the father took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres of land, where he farmed and raised stock for the remainder of his life, his death occurring on the home place, July 13, 1876. His wife, who died in Walla Walla, Wash., July 12, 1901, having in the meantime married H. Barney, was the mother of ten children, three of whom are living. Of these, Jane is the wife of Frank M. Bridgfarmer, a farmer of Idaho; and Sarah, Mrs. Flett, resides in Wapato. Thomas B. Hutt was a very successful man, and among the pioneer troubles with which he had to contend were the Indian wars, in which he participated in a most creditable manner as lieutenant. Under Captain Hembree, later killed by the Indians, and supplanted by Captain Lee, he served throughout the war of 1855-56.

At the age of eighteen Lewis S. Hutt removed from the paternal farm near Yamhill to Walla Walla, Wash., his mother and step-father accompanying him. In North Yamhill, November 4, 1891, he married Frances Blackburn, a native of Marion county, whose father, A. Blackburn, was born in England. Mr. Hutt continued to live near Walla Walla until 1897, and then returned to the home taken up by his father, which has since been his special charge. He owns three hundred and twenty acres near Walla Walla, Wash., and one hundred acres in North Yamhill, where he engages in general farming, raising stock to some extent, and carries on dairying on a small scale. The old home occupied by his parents in the long ago still shelters his interesting little family, comprising his wife and four children, Lester T., Verle R., Sylvia P., and Leonard L. Mr. Hutt is interested in educational and other means of progress, and as a school director has contributed his share towards improving the prevailing school conditions. Ever since his first voting days he has affiliated with the Republican party, but the honors of office have never justified him in neglecting his home interests, or striving for their conference on himself.

CHRISTIAN OBYE. Near North Yamhill is to be seen the fine farm of Christian Obye, who was born in Norway seven miles from Christiania, his natal day being February 13, 1835. His father, Lars Obye, was also a native of that locality, and throughout his entire life he carried on agricultural pursuits. In the year 1845 he came to America, induced to this step by the favorable reports which he had heard concerning the new world and its opportunities. He took passage on a sailing vessel, and after a calm voyage of six weeks landed in New York City. He did not tarry long in the east, however, but at once made his way into the interior of the country, locating in Jo Daviess county, Ill. There he purchased a tract of land and engaged in farming until his life's labors were ended in death. He married Miss Katherine Washburn, who was also a native of Norway, and they became the parents of twelve children, nine sons and three daughters, but the only ones now living are Benjamin, who is a resident of Lake City, Iowa; and Christian, who is the youngest of the family. The parents were members of the Lutheran Church and took a very active part in church work, doing all in their power to promote the cause of Christianity. The father died in 1854, at the age of seventy-four years, and the mother survived him for but a brief period, passing away in 1855, at the age of sixty-eight years.

When thirteen years of age Christian Obye left home and has since been dependent upon his resources for a livelihood. He began earning his own living by working as a farm hand, and after that time his educational privileges were very meager. He had previously attended the common schools of Illinois, but later the knowledge that he acquired came to him through the school of experience. He continued to serve as a farm hand in Illinois until 1855, when, attracted by the business possibilities of the far west, he went to California by way of the isthmus route, landing at San Francisco in the fall of that year. He then resumed his journey overland until he reached Shasta county, where he engaged in placer mining, but he was not very successful, and in consequence turned his attention to other interests. In 1858 he started for the Fraser river, proceeding as far as Olympia, Wash. There his supply of money became exhausted, and because of his lack of funds he returned to Yamhill county, Ore., and soon after purchased his present place, comprising three hundred and thirty acres of land in the Pike valley. It was then a tract wild and unimproved, but with characteristic energy he began developing it into fields ready for cultivation, and to-day he has one hundred and seventy-five acres under the plow. Thirty acres are planted to hops, for the production of this product is becoming one of the leading industries of Oregon. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, and in his business is meeting with a fair degree of success.

In 1860 Mr. Obye was united in marriage to Miss Lucretia Turner, a daughter of Samuel Turner, who crossed the plains in 1853. He was born in De Kalb county, Mo., and became one of the pioneers of the northwest. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Obye was blessed with the following children: Lewis S., who is on the home farm; J. E. and S. F., who operate an adjoining farm; Mrs. Mary A. Driscoll, who is in the Klondike; H. C., Emma V., and Nancy C., who are under the parental roof. The parents hold membership in the Lutheran Church of Norway. Mr. Obye is a Republican in his political views, and has served as road supervisor, as school director, as clerk, and for twenty-seven years has been judge of elections. In all these offices he has been found prompt, capable and reliable, and he has the national characteristic of fidelity to duty and unflinching honesty in all relations.

JOHN PERKINS, who came to Oregon in the year 1844, was born in Greene county, N. Y., August 21, 1811, and in 1817 was taken by his parents to Cattaraugus county, N. Y., where he resided continuously until 1832. In that year the family removed to Tippecanoe county, Ind., where, in 1836, John Perkins was united in marriage to Miss Sarah Felix. Subsequently they moved to Benton county, Ind., where they lived until 1844, when they determined to establish a home in the far northwest, thinking that by taking advantage of its pioneer conditions they might eventually secure a good home and comfortable competence. Accordingly they crossed the plains, accompanied by the family of Mr. Perkins' father. They were upon the road for about six months, and endured many hardships, trials and difficulties during that long journey, which led across the hot, sandy plains of the middle west, and over mountains which hardly afforded a trail. In November, 1844, however, they reached Walla Walla. Mr. Perkins there separated from the others of the train and assisted Dr. Whitman in repairing his mills and grinding grain for the emigrants. Mr. Perkins conducted a grist-mill until the fall of 1844, and in the spring of 1845 came to the Willamette valley, locating on a farm near North Yamhill, where, with the exception of the time spent in a trip to California in 1849, he resided continuously until his death. On his return to Oregon, however, he and his father erected a saw and grist-mill, the first in Yamhill county. Shortly afterward Mr. Perkins purchased the property and ran the mills several years. In 1853 he furnished flour to the Spanish packers, who took the same to the Yreka mines of California.

Unto Mr. Perkins and his wife were born nine children, of whom eight are yet living. Mr. Perkins reached the age of seventy-five years, while his wife has attained the advanced age of eighty-seven years, and now resides with her daughter, Mrs. Bedwell. He served as county commissioner, and was a leading and influential citizen of his community. Local progress and improvement were causes dear to his heart, and he cooperated earnestly and effectively in the efforts to reclaim this district for civilization, and to carry forward the work of improvement and advancement here.

H. F. BEDWELL is extensively and successfully engaged in general farming and hop-growing, being a well known representative of the latter industry, which has become an important one in Oregon. He was born January 21, 1842, at Lone Jack, in Jackson county, Mo. His father, Elisha Bedwell, was born September 9, 1819, in Lafayette county, Mo., and April 12, 1847, before the discovery of gold had attracted to the Pacific coast so many emigrants, he made the long and tedious journey across the plains with ox teams, arriving in the northern part of Yamhill county, October 12, after five months spent upon the way. In 1848 he went to the mines of California, and was engaged in mining and prospecting for a time, but in 1849 he returned to Oregon and secured a donation claim near North Yamhill, where he resided until 1874, when he sold that property and removed to Monmouth, there living in retirement from further business cares until his death. He was twice married, his first union being with Miss S. A. Davis, by whom he had two children: H. F., and one that died in infancy. The mother died in Texas in 1844, and June 19, 1850, Mr. Bedwell was again married.

his second union being with Miss A. M. Shelton, who was one of the pioneer women of the northwest, coming to Oregon from Missouri in 1846. They became the parents of ten children, two sons and two daughters still living. By trade the father was a blacksmith, and for many years he followed that pursuit, at the same time conducting his farm. On the 14th of April, 1848, he joined the Christian Church, and thereafter lived a life in consistent harmony with its teachings. He was a well known and popular citizen and an honored pioneer who took an active and helpful part in the work of development and progress here. He died at the age of seventy-six years, and his widow is still living in Monmouth.

H. F. Bedwell was two years of age when his mother died, and he then became a member of the household of his maternal grandparents, who, in 1852, also started for Oregon, and with an ox team crossed the plains, being about six months upon the way. They first settled near North Yamhill, and after they came to this state our subject went to live with his father, with whom he remained until twenty-two years of age. In the meantime he acquired his education in the district schools.

On the 31st of January, 1864, was celebrated the marriage of H. F. Bedwell and Miss Elizabeth A. Perkins, a daughter of John and Sarah Perkins, who were pioneers of 1844. They began housekeeping upon a farm near North Yamhill, where they lived for fifteen years, and on the expiration of that period they removed to North Yamhill. Here Mr. Bedwell first engaged in the butchering business, but after a year he opened a general mercantile store, which he conducted for twenty-one years, his wife assisting him in the store for fifteen years. In 1891 he retired from that business, and is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, carrying on agricultural pursuits with excellent success. In the season of 1902 he raised twenty-six thousand pounds of hops, and this brought to him a good financial return.

Mr. and Mrs. Bedwell have had no children of their own, but the kindness of their hearts and their sympathetic natures have prompted them to care for a number of orphan children. Mr. Bedwell belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and has served as treasurer of his lodge. More than half a century has passed since he became a resident of Oregon, and the history of the northwest is therefore largely familiar to him, for he has seen it emerge from the wild forests to take its place amid the ranks of the states, whose development covers a much longer period. He has seen the giant trees cut down to give way to fields of waving grain or the rich pasture lands, has seen the establishment of industries and of commercial enterprises, and in the work of progress he has borne his full share, so that he is now known as a valued citizen, as well as an honored pioneer.

COL. J. LINSEY HILL, M. D., PH. D., one of the most eminent physicians, surgeons and medical writers of the Willamette valley, has been a resident of Oregon since 1853, and since 1871 has been continuously engaged in the practice of his profession in Albany, Linn county. Born in McNairy county, Tenn., February 28, 1845. Dr. Hill inherits his love for medicine and surgery from his father, Dr. Reuben Coleman Hill. The latter was a native of Tennessee and a descendant from an old and honored family of the Old Dominion. He was a practicing physician and a minister in the Baptist Church, both of which callings he followed during most of his long and useful life. From Kentucky he removed to Tennessee when a young man, and there married Margaret Graham Lair, a native of Kentucky. Thereafter he continued to preach and to practice medicine for many years. Eventually he removed overland to Berry county, Mo., where he lived for seven years, continuing his useful and meritorious labors.

Leaving his wife and nine children, he gave evidence of his courage and determination by crossing the plains on the back of a mule in 1850. After devoting a year to mining and to preaching and practicing medicine in California he came across the mountains to Oregon. He was so well impressed with the conditions which he found in Oregon that he resolved to make it his home. Pending his return to his family he located in Albany, taught the first school established there, and likewise became the first physician of the place. To the traveler of to-day, the distance already covered by this enterprising pioneer would seem quite sufficient for one lifetime, especially when the means employed are considered; yet in 1852 he returned to Missouri in this primitive manner.

In 1853 Dr. Hill outfitted with ox-teams and wagons and started overland for Oregon with his wife and children. After a journey of about six months they arrived in the Willamette valley, and soon afterward settled upon a farm in Benton county. For seven years he made this his home, practicing medicine and preaching the gospel. Almost from the first day of his residence in Benton county he wielded a beneficent influence upon the community, which spread year by year until, upon his location in Albany in 1860, he had become personally known to every family within a radius of many miles, and was greatly beloved by all. He was intensely interested in McMinnville College, of which he was one of the founders and for many years a trustee. He traveled extensively in behalf of the institution, making one trip to the east, raising funds for the furtherance of the work of the school. He founded four permanent scholarships for the benefit of his own descendants and worthy young men who desired to fit themselves for ministry in the Baptist Church. The work which he inaugurated has been carried on since his death by his son, Dr. J. L. Hill, in accordance with the wishes of his father.

When he removed to Albany Dr. Hill took up his residence in the old octagonal house now occupied by his daughter, where he spent the remainder of his life in devotion to the manifold duties which he had imposed upon himself. He took an active and important part in the political undertakings of the county and the state, and for three terms, between 1850 and 1860, represented Benton county in the state legislature. In politics he was a Democrat, but viewed all public affairs with a liberal and unprejudiced eye. He belonged to that class of men possessed of an infinite capacity for hard work, and thought nothing of riding long distances at any hour of the day or night, or in any kind of weather, to minister to the physical or spiritual necessities of the inhabitants of the valley, all of whom were his friends. In many respects he was of that type of "doctor of the old school" immortalized by Ian McLaren in his stories of Scotch life—"Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." The great northwest, with its multitude of rugged, sincere, gracious, unselfish, useful men in all walks of life, probably never numbered among its pioneers a man who became more closely endeared to the people of all classes than he; and his death at the age of eighty-three years, which occurred December 31, 1890, was as deeply deplored as that of any citizen of the Willamette valley. The record of his noble life is eminently entitled to a permanent and conspicuous place in the annals of Oregon, and, besides being a source of profound pride to his descendants, should prove an inspiration to representatives of the present and future generations.

Of the six sons and three daughters born to the union of Reuben Coleman and Margaret (Lair) Hill, four sons and one daughter survive, as follows: W. Lair Hill, an attorney-at-law, now of Oakland, Cal., who compiled the codes of Oregon and Washington; George Alfred Hill, an attorney-at-law of Seattle; Dr. J. Linsey Hill; H. Taylor Hill, a stock-raiser of Washington county, Ore.; Margaret Adeline wife of Rev. Rufus Thompson, of Albany.

Dr. J. Linsey Hill was eight years of age when his father returned to his eastern home from his first journey to the west for the purpose of bringing his family to Oregon with him. His elementary education was received in the public schools of Albany. As a boy he had become familiar with typesetting and other features of the printer's trade, and subsequently was associated for a short time with T. B. Odeneal in the publication of the Corvallis Gazette. In 1865 he began the study of medicine under the supervision of his father, who carefully assisted him in laying a foundation of scientific knowledge which has proven an important factor in his professional career. In 1869 he entered the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated in the spring of 1871 with the degree of M. D. In 1900 he took a post-graduate course in the New York School of Clinical Medicine. McMinnville College conferred upon him the degree of B. A. and the degree of Ph. D. was conferred by an eastern school in recognition of his contributions to the medical literature of the day.

For thirty-two years Dr. Hill has been engaged in a general medical and surgical practice, though he has also made a specialty of mental and nervous diseases. He has been a frequent contributor to scientific journals, setting forth the results of his research in and experience with mental disorders, and his work in this direction has received marked attention from the profession in all parts of the country. He has also contributed profusely to local periodicals, dealing with subjects of immediate interest to the public.

Since 1895 Dr. Hill has occupied the chair of genito-urinary diseases in the medical department of Willamette University, and he is surgeon-general of the Uniformed Rank of the Knights of Pythias. During the administration of Governor Moody he served upon the official staff of the latter with the rank of colonel, his post being that of surgeon-general of the Oregon National Guard. He is past grand chancellor of the Knights of Pythias of the Grand Domain of Oregon. He was made a Mason in Lyon Lodge No. 27, A. F. & A. M., of Independence, and is a charter member of St. John's Lodge, No. 4, of Albany. He is also identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

It is doubtful if any resident of Albany has contributed more extensively to its development and its practical upbuilding than has Dr. Hill. The Hill Block, a fine two-story business structure 56x100 feet in ground dimensions, is one of his most important undertakings in this direction. He has erected a large number of residences in Albany, and is the owner of several of the older buildings in the city, about which cluster historical associations of nearly half a century ago. Among his landed possessions are a farm of two hundred and fifty acres in Benton county, and real estate in Portland and Yaquina Bay. He is an enthusiastic student of ornithology, and has a fine collection of mounted birds from all parts of the world. He is also the owner of the finest museum in the Willamette valley, including a most complete collection of Indian relics and curios.

Dr. Hill was united in marriage on December 30, 1870, with Mary E. Penington, daughter of S. M. and Abigail (Cooper) Penington, pioneers of Oregon. (For family history see sketch of S. M. Penington, which appears elsewhere in this work.) She died on December 28, 1895, leaving three children. Of these Clyde L., the eldest son, is a doctor of dental surgery and is practicing in Wasco, Ore.; Gale S. is an attorney-at-law of Albany; and Emily G. resides with her father.

Dr. Hill has always led a strenuous life. Inheriting the characteristics which made his father one of the most remarkable of the pioneer inhabitants of Oregon, among which is a rare capacity for work, he has made each day of his life one of activity and usefulness. He has always exhibited a deep and unselfish interest in all movements which have appealed to him as well-considered efforts to advance the material interests of the community, and by the inhabitants of Albany has come to be regarded as one of the most enterprising, discreet and public-spirited men of the city. No man enjoys to a greater extent the confidence of all classes in the community where he has spent the better portion of his life, and no one deserves in a greater degree the appreciation of thoughtful people for that sympathy and help in every movement calculated to elevate the social, intellectual, moral and commercial standards of the city. In an eminent degree he is entitled to rank among the best class of thoroughly representative men of the Willamette valley.

JOHN F. COOK, one of the great army of pioneers who have helped to develop the agricultural resources of Yamhill county, and who rose to prominence and wealth solely upon his own merits and indefatigable energy, was born in Tennessee, January 22, 1828, and died on his farm near McMinnville, March 30, 1899. The paternal grandfather, Thomas Cook, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and spent many years of his life in Georgia, where his son, James, the father of John F., was born February 11, 1786. He married Rhoda Faulkner, daughter of a soldier of the Revolution, and who bore him twelve children, all of whom attained maturity, John F. being the tenth oldest.

Reared on his father's farm in Tennessee, John F. Cook in time branched out into independent farming, and before starting for the west, March 6, 1852, had a little farm to sell, which defrayed his expenses over the plains.

Starting earlier than any other trains that year, his party managed to escape the ravages of cholera which rendered hideous the route of later homeseekers, and he arrived in safety at his destination in Oregon City, August 16, 1852. Having exhausted his finances in outfitting and supporting himself on the outward trip, he was obliged to seek employment with the farmers in the county, and during the first winter worked as a farm hand in Yamhill county. For a year he tried his luck in the mines of Eureka, Cal., and while he did not strike it rich, he returned with somewhat replenished finances. For the following two years he earned about $40 per month at farm work in Marion county, and after returning to Yamhill county, continued to lay up money from farm work wages. In time he was in a position to purchase a farm of three hundred and twenty acres six miles southwest of McMinnville, where he engaged in grain and stock-raising. Being a good manager, and having excellent business judgment, he from time to time added to his land and increased the volume of business, so that he left to his heirs more than twelve hundred acres of desirable farm property. The better to educate his children he bought a farm of one hundred and thirty-eight acres near McMinnville, with the active management of which he was engaged at the time of his death.

The practical assistance of Mr. Cook was enlisted in all efforts to better the condition of the community in which he lived, and he was especially alive to the benefits of education. In this connection he contributed the land upon which the Cook school house was erected, and which has ever since borne his name. He was a Republican in politics, but was inclined to espouse the Prohibition platform, so earnestly did he believe in the tenets of that party. With his wife he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. December 11, 1860, Mr. Cook was united in marriage to Esther A. Prosser, who was born in Cleveland, Ohio, the daughter of Henry Prosser, of whom more extended mention is made in another part of this work. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Cook, Mary, the oldest daughter, is deceased; James, a graduate of McMinnville College, and of the Medical Department of the University of Oregon, is practicing medicine in McMinnville; Rhoda died at the age of three years; Wilbur is a farmer near McMinnville; Etta is the wife of Rev. H. B. Blood, and lives in New York state; Royce is living with her mother; and Cora is also living at home.

MRS. E. A. COOK. Among the pioneer women of Yamhill county whose timely assistance and unflinching spirit of courage have smoothed over many rough places and helped to place home life in the west on a footing of permanency may be mentioned Mrs. E. A. Cook, wife of Thomas T. Cook, brother of her former husband, John F. Cook.

Mrs. Cook was born in Cleveland, Ohio, and was reared in Iowa and Illinois until her tenth year, when she crossed the plains with her family. Her father, Henry Prosser, was born in New York state, where had settled his father, Philip, after coming to America from his native England. The grandfather established the family in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he engaged in business for many years, and where his last days were spent. Henry Prosser was well fortified with trades, having in his youth mastered both the tailor and painter's trades. After leaving Ohio he lived for five years in Burlington, Iowa, going then to Abingdon, Ill., in both of which places he plied his trades. He was ambitious and unsettled in the middle west, and readily absorbed all news concerning the more prolific opportunities in the far northwest. Accordingly he outfitted with wagons and horse teams, and without any particular incident during the fore part of his journey across the plains arrived at Fort Laramie. There the party were enjoying a peaceful camp life and were partaking of an appetizing dinner, when they were surprised by the appearance on the scene of about three hundred Indians. Consternation spread among the travelers, for they expected to be massacred forthwith, but the red men proved to be upon a peaceful mission, and intended no harm. By the time they reached Fort Hall winter had set in, so Mr. Prosser decided to stay there until spring, and in the meantime worked at his trade, making many clothes for both Indians and whites, and for the people connected with the Hudson Bay Company.

In the spring of 1853 Mr. Prosser brought his family on to Milwaukee, and June 4 bought a place in Powell's valley, where he lived for two years. His next farm was located two miles from Oswego, and consisted of one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he farmed and raised stock most successfully. On this claim was discovered the first iron ore found in the state of Oregon, and it proved to be of a particularly rich quality. Mr. Prosser sought relaxation from the cares of his farm in a trip back to his old home in Ohio, going by way of Panama, and while there he died, leaving three children to the care of his wife, who was formerly Mary Hecock, a native of Ireland. Mrs. Prosser who came to America with her brother, settling in Ohio, died in Tillamook, Ore. Of the children, William died in the Friendly Islands; Esther A. married Mr. Cook; and George W. is postmaster at Oswego, Ore.

Mrs. Cook was educated principally in the public schools and at Oregon City Seminary, and her first marriage occurred December 11, 1860, with John F. Cook. Mr. Cook became a large land owner in Yamhill county, and at the time of his death owned a property consisting of twelve hundred acres. Seven children were born of this marriage: Mary, who died in Yamhill county; James, a practicing physician of McMinnville, and a graduate of McMinnville College and the Medical Department of the University of Oregon; Rhoda, who died at the age of three years; Wilbur, who is engaged in farming near his mother's place; Etta, who is the wife of Rev. H. B. Blood, of New York state; Royce, who is living at home; and Cora, who is also living with her mother. The second marriage of Mrs. Cook was with Thomas T. Cook, brother of her former husband, and who also was born in Tennessee. Thomas T. Cook crossed the plains with the rest of his family in 1852, and at once went to the mines of California, gradually making his way to the southern part of the state, where he became interested in horticulture. He improved a number of Orange groves in California, and at the time of his marriage in February, 1902, was living on an orange grove west of Highlands. Mrs. Cook is a member of the Methodist Church, and is president of the Ladies' Aid Society. Also she is identified with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and has been evangelistic superintendent for many years. She is a woman of resource and much ability, and her popularity in the vicinity of McMinnville is based upon admirable traits of character, and fine social attributes.

H. C. BURNS, who is engaged in the furniture and undertaking business in McMinnville, dates his residence in this city from 1866. He was born in Missouri January 26, 1851, a son of Harrison G. Burns, a native of West Virginia. The paternal grandfather died in West Virginia, where for many years he had practiced law and was well known. The father became a farmer and, removing to Kentucky, was there married to Miss Jane K. Ball, a native of that state and a daughter of William Ball, who was born in Kentucky and belonged to one of its old families. Mr. and Mrs. Burns afterward removed to Andrew county, Mo., settling upon the farm which he cultivated and improved until the country became involved in Civil war, when the troops invaded his place. He was a Union man and had sons and sons-in-law in the northern army. On one occasion he and his son-in-law, George Henry, were sitting at home when a party of rebels entered the house, saying that they were federal soldiers off guard. They then drew their guns and shot the son-in-law dead and severely wounded the father, but he managed to make his escape into a hemp field, where he lay in hiding for some time. He eventually recovered from his wounds and, disposing of his large landed interests in Missouri, came to Oregon in 1866, accompanied by his family. Settling in McMinnville he established a general mercantile store here which he conducted successfully for some time, but his last eight years were spent in retirement from labor. His death occurred in Salem October 19, 1894, and his wife died in McMinnville in 1884. In their family were thirteen children, nine of whom reached adult age, while three are still living. H. C. Burns, however, is the only one now upon the coast. His brother, Harrison G., died in Oregon when a young man. Another brother, David D. Burns, who was a member of the Thirteenth Missouri in the Civil war, was captured at Lexington, Ky., by General Price. He afterward escaped but was captured a second time at Glasgow by the same rebel leader. He was in active service until the time of his second capture, but he was never exchanged. Mr. Burns also had three brothers-in-law who were in the army.

For fifteen years H. C. Burns remained upon the home farm in the state of his nativity, receiving but limited educational privileges, because of the war which made the continuance of schools in his locality impossible. In 1866 the family came to Oregon by way of the Panama route, San Francisco and Portland, arriving in McMinnville in May. The son afterward had the privilege of attending the Baptist College at McMinnville for a few years, and at the same time, during his leisure hours and the periods of vacations, he assisted his father in the store. In 1872 he was married and then began farming ten miles south of McMinnville, where he carried on the work of tilling the soil until 1890, when he sold out and located in the city. He then purchased the furniture and undertaking stock of Mrs. Fellows and has since engaged in this line of business. In 1899 he erected a fine two-story brick building 30x125 feet. He now deals quite extensively in furniture of all grades and is also an embalmer and funeral director and has the oldest business of the kind in the county. In the furniture department he has an extensive and well-selected stock and his earnest desire to please his patrons, combined with straightforward business methods, has secured to him a large and growing trade.

Mr. Burns was married in McMinnville in 1872 to Miss Mary L. Payne, who was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of Caleb J. Payne, who came from the Mississippi valley to Oregon in juvenile days and began farming here in 1849. With Mr. and Mrs. Burns were born three children: Annie, the wife of H. R. Bills, of Union county, Ore.; Jennie, who died at the age of fourteen years; and William Hollis, who is with his father in business.

Mr. Burns is now serving for the second term as a member of the city council of McMinnville and was a member of the committee that drew up the new city charter in 1902. He has always been an earnest Democrat and has long been a member of the county committee, while for three successive years he was its chairman. He belongs to the board of trade, is connected with the lodge and endowment rank of the Knights of Pythias, holds membership with the Woodmen of the World and belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church. His is a well rounded character. He possesses good practical common sense, added to keen business ability, a pleasant manner and cordial disposition. Such qualities have made him popular and Mr. Burns is well liked by young and old, rich and poor.

PETER HUME. For a great many years the name of Peter Hume has been identified with the commercial and political development of Brownsville and Linn county, and for the past thirty-five years he has been a prominent and familiar figure at Republican conventions. The early life of this prosperous northwesterner was spent in Nova Scotia, where he was born on the Isle of Cape Breton, August 16, 1840, and where his family name was associated with large lumbering and ship-building interests. His paternal great-grandfather, Peter, of Scotch descent, lived at one time in Maine, where was born the grandfather, Peter, the founder of the family in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Reaching the latter country about 1815, he engaged in lumbering and ship-building, and in his day was a veritable lumber king, owning much timber land and many ships. In an unfortunate hour he built a ship, loaded it with lumber for the English market, but after setting sail nothing was ever heard of ship or crew or owner. The lumber king had left his business in good hands, however, for, while yet a youth, his son George, the father of Peter, had been trained in the various departments of the trade, and for several years before the departure upon the sea of the old ship-builder, George Hume had practically managed the enterprise. He was born in either Maine or New Hampshire, and was engaged in lumbering and ship-building almost up to the time of his death, at the age of sixty. He married Christy McKay, who was born in Scotland, daughter of Donald McKay, and who bore him the following children: Cassie deceased; John, living in Australia; Mary, living at Reading, near Boston, Mass.; Peter; George, in New York City; Annie, living in Nova Scotia; David, engaged in mining in Alaska; Donald, a sea-faring man; Sarah, living in Oakland, Cal.; Joseph, a resident of Brownsville, and Maggie, living in Olympia.

In Nova Scotia Peter Hume had small opportunity for acquiring an education, for as early as fourteen years of age he apprenticed to a carriagemaker for four years, and, in 1858, began a similar apprenticeship to a house-painter. In 1862 he came to Oregon via New York, the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco, and the following year, in 1862, he went to British Columbia, located at Nanaimo, where he worked in the mines, and at house-painting and paper-hanging. The year 1863 found him seeking for gold in the great Cariboo mines in northern British Columbia, and, in 1867, he returned to Oregon, locating at Brownsville. For some time he worked at his trade and became much interested in the political agitations then rife throughout the northwest, little realizing at the time the prominence he was to attain in the community. In 1872 he engaged in the general merchandise business with the late W. R. Kirk, but sold his interest in 1876, and engaged in farming on a farm of three hundred and sixty acres near Brownsville. In the meantime, in 1873, with Thomas Kay and others, he re-established the Brownsville Woolen mills and was elected president of the company, an enterprise in which he was interested for many years, and which he was largely instrumental in keeping in Brownsville, for, in 1887, parties in Albany offered a bonus of $25,000 if the mills would move to that city but Mr. Hume stepped in, organized a new company, bought the mills, and they have since been a means of employing labor and stimulating the business life of the town. In 1887, with J. M. Moyer and W. R. Kirk, he organized the Bank of Brownsville, and, in 1892, he removed to Roseburg, where he became cashier of the Douglas County Bank, remaining in that capacity for five years. During that time the bank passed through the financial panic that wrecked many institutions throughout the country, and, during this panic, the bank's deposits diminished over eighty-five per cent. Returning to Brownsville directly after the presidential election of 1896, he resumed his former association with the Bank of Brownsville, retiring from the presidency two years later, in 1898. In 1899 he returned to farming again, but, in 1902, he took charge of the planing-mill, which he managed and put on a good paying basis; but, finding the duties too heavy, he retired from the business in 1903.

Like a sentinel, Mr. Hume has stood by the Republican party in this state, backing it financially and with his own personal efforts, during the trying days of its rising supremacy in the west. He was president of the first city council of Brownsville, and served his first term as postmaster in 1873, being appointed to the same office again in 1881. He was the first recorder of this city, serving two terms, and he has been school clerk three or four terms. Fraternally, he is associated with Brownsville Lodge No. 36, A. F. & A. M., and Lynn Chapter No. 19, R. A. M.

September 9, 1879, Mr. Hume was united in marriage with Mary Walter, daughter of Elias and Naomi J. Walter. Mr. Walter was one of the early settlers of the Willamette valley, and located near Brownsville about the same time as Hon. H. L. Brown, Alexander Kirk and James Blakely, the latter being the only survivor of this, at one time, well known quartette. Mr. Walter took a prominent part in the early politics of his neighborhood, was justice of the peace in his precinct for many years and was elected county treasurer in 1861. He was also a member of the territorial legislature which sat in Oregon City in 1849. His death occurred in 1867. In early manhood he married Naomi Williams, whose mother was born in Ontario county, N. Y., in 1825, and who moved to Michigan with her parents when four years of age, six years later moving to Illinois, her father having died in the meantime. Eleven years later the Williams family settled in Scott county, Iowa, and, in 1845, Naomi crossed the plains to Oregon with her brothers, Charles Austin and Enos C. Williams, Mr. Walter being also one of the party under command of Captain Holliday. Arriving at the south fork of the Platte river they were surrounded by about five hundred Pawnee Indians who tried to stampede their stock, and who held them there during one whole and the part of another night. Knowing that United States troops were within a day's march from them they managed to hold off the Indians with threats and the promise of a cow or two, and were thus allowed to proceed with their stock. Nevertheless, the red men raided their camp and plundered their wagons of considerable provisions, but further than that they had no trouble up to the time of their arrival in Oregon, November 1, 1845. Miss Williams was married at the home of her brother, Enos Williams, in Amity, Ore., October 10, 1846, to Elias L. Walter, and thus the courtship begun on the plains had a happy termination. The young people came to their claim on the Calapooya, fording the Willamette with their ox-teams, and improving the property which is still in the possession of Mrs. Walter's heirs. This pioneer woman (Mrs. Walter) became well known among the early settlers, and in honor of her courageous and fearless life in the midst of danger and adversity, the local cabin of the Native Daughters of Oregon was named in her honor. Two daughters survive her, Mrs. Hume and Ellen, the wife of G. W. McHargue, late sheriff of Linn county. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Hume six are living: Maude, the wife of C. P. Snyder; Clair Austin; Percy E.; Christy J.; Anna I., and Alice L. Mr. Hume is now perfecting a plan to establish a reservoir on Powell Hill, three hundred feet above the town, and thus furnish to the city of Brownsville a water system for domestic use and for fire protection.

GEORGE W. HENDERSHOTT is an honored veteran of the Civil war, and back of him is an ancestry honorable and distinguished because of loyal service in behalf of the country upon its battlefields. He was born in Lenawee county, Mich., October 5, 1848, the youngest of the four children of George and Mahala (Westcott) Hendershott. The father was born in Pennsylvania and was a son of William Hendershott, who was also a native of the Keystone state, and served his country in the war of 1812. Removing to Lenawee county, Mich., in pioneer times, he settled near Tecumseh, where he followed farming until his death. He was of German descent. George Hendershott was a loyal defender of the United States in the Mexican war, and of the same family is Robert Hendershott, the hero of the Rappahannock. George Hendershott died during the infancy of our subject, and the mother, who was born in Lenawee county, Mich., and was of New England descent, passed away when her youngest son was but five years of age. In the family were three boys and one girl, and two brothers are still living, these being James and George. William, the eldest, was a member of the Fourth Regiment of Michigan Infantry during the Civil war, was held for seven months in Libby prison, and died in Michigan. James, who served in the Third Michigan Cavalry, is now a resident of Russell county, Kans.

Left an orphan at the early age of five years, George W. Hendershott lived with strangers through the period of his youth, receiving a limited education in the district schools, and ample training at farm labor, as he worked in field and meadows for those with whom he resided. He permanently put aside his text-books when fifteen years of age, and in February, 1863, he vol-united for service in the Civil war as a defender of the Union cause, becoming a member of Company D, Third Michigan Cavalry, which was assigned to the Sixteenth Army Corps of the Army of the West. He served in Missouri, went on the Banks expedition up the Red river, took part in various engagements in Arkansas, Tennessee and Louisiana, and following the siege of Mobile, assisted in the capture of Fort Blakeley and Spanish Fort. While at Little Rock, Ark., in 1864, he voted for Abraham Lincoln for the presidency, for though not yet of age, the privilege of voting was granted to all soldiers in the field. He was mustered out at New Orleans, and honorably discharged in the fall of 1865.

Mr. Hendershott then returned to Michigan, and soon afterward began working in the lumber woods of Wisconsin. He also spent three years in the lumber mills of Oshkosh, Wis., after which he went to the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, being employed in mills for five or six years. Going to Omro, Wis., he was there married, and purchasing a small tract of land in that locality, there engaged in farming until 1872, when he went to Russell, Kans., where he conducted a hotel and livery barn, also had a mail and stage route. He was in charge of the mail route for one hundred and fifty miles north of Red Cloud, Neb., and fifty miles south of Great Bend, Kans. In 1886, he sold his livery business and engaged in the cattle business, and his enterprise made him well known in his portion of Kansas, while his capability led to his selection for a number of offices. He served as a member of the city council of Russell, Kans., was marshal for six years, deputy sheriff for four years, and sheriff of that county for four years, and in the discharge of his duties was ever found prompt and faithful. A Republican in politics, he attended the state conventions and had considerable influence in public affairs.

In 1893 Mr. Hendershott came to Oregon, settling in Stayton, Marion county, where he conducted a hotel for a year, and then went to Turner, where he continued in the hotel business until 1895, when he came to McMinnville, and has since been proprietor of the Commercial House. He is a popular host, for he puts forth every effort to promote the comfort of his guests, and has the faculty of meeting people in a manner that indicates a friendly, cordial and genuine spirit.

When in Wisconsin, Mr. Hendershott was married to Miss Della A. Wiles, who was born in New York, and they have three children: Jesse, a farmer of Yamhill county; Clarence, who is with his father, and Mabel, at home. Mr. Hendershott was made a Mason in Russell, Kans., and is now a member of Union Lodge

No. 43, F. & A. M. He also took the chapter degree of Royal Arch Masonry in Russell, Kans., and he belongs to the lodge and uniformed ranks of the Knights of Pythias of McMinnville, and to Custer Post, G. A. R., of McMinnville, of which he is a past commander. He is identified with the Board of Trade, and is well known as an earnest Republican, who has served as a member of the county central committee of his party. In matters of citizenship he has fully upheld the splendid family record for patriotism, and is as true and loyal to his country as he was when he followed the nation's starry banner upon the battlefields of the south.

JOHN T. WOOD. Pleasantly located near Amity, Ore., John T. Wood is successfully carrying on general farming and stock-raising. He was born November 1, 1853, in Sullivan county, Mo., a son of Henry Wood, a native of Monroe county, that state, born in 1825 and a farmer by occupation. He married Ara Smith, also a native of that state, and they resided upon a farm near Sullivan postoffice until 1864, when desiring to establish a home in the far west and take advantage of its better opportunities, they started on the long and difficult journey across the plains, their wagon being drawn by a team of oxen. The train was known as the Big Missouri train, and Eli Watson was chosen as its captain. They were upon the road six months, and though there were hardships and difficulties to be met, they had no trouble with the Indians, being unmolested by the savages, who had perpetrated so many horrors upon many other emigrants. They made their way direct to Portland and the Wood family came on to Yamhill county, the father of our subject establishing his home upon a farm near Amity. Here both he and his wife lived until called to their final rest, the former dying at the age of seventy-one years and the latter when seventy-four years of age. They had ten children, all of whom are now living: Hester A., the wife of F. Wood, of McMinnville; Willard H., a resident of Salem; Robert F., who is living near Amity; Mary D., the widow of Thomas T. Cooper, of Hopewell; Benjamin F., who makes his home in Idaho; Susan E., the wife of J. Michael, of Corvallis, Ore.; John T., Nancy J., the wife of Frank Stephens, of Hopewell, Ore.; William H., who is living near Whiteson, and Ella, the wife of Charles Cooper, of Hopewell. The parents were valued members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which Mr. Wood was identified from the age of twelve years. He was a very prominent and influential man who probably had not an enemy in the world and all who knew him esteemed him for his genuine worth.

John T. Wood remained under the parental roof until the time of his marriage, and in the district schools he obtained his education. He wedded Dullcena Cooper, who was born in Iowa and with her people came to Oregon in 1865. Mr. and Mrs. Wood began housekeeping on the Richardson donation claim about two miles north of Hopewell, and their home was blessed with four children: Thomas A., now deceased; George W., Charles E. and Henry C., who are still under the parental roof. In 1896 the wife and mother died and Mr. Wood afterward married Miss Rebecca J. Potter, a native of Tennessee, daughter of D. W. and Mary (Simmerly) Potter, by whom he has one daughter, Myrtle E.

Mr. Wood is the owner of one hundred and seventy acres of land and in connection with general farming and stock-raising he conducts a thresher and is engaged in sawing wood. He has ten acres of land planted to hops and upon his farm is a fine bunch of Jersey cattle. All of the improvements upon his place stand there as monuments to his thrift and enterprise and he has one of the fine country homes of Yamhill county. Neatness and thrift characterize everything about his farm and the place is now a very valuable one, giving evidence of the careful supervision of the owner.

Mr. Wood takes quite an active part in politics and keeps well informed on the issues of the day, giving his support to the Democracy because its platform contains the best elements of good government. He is now serving as road supervisor and has been a member of the school board. He belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen and is one of the promoters of the rural free delivery route No 1 out of Amity. He deserves great credit for his interest in this matter, and in it, as in all matters of citizenship, he has been progressive and public spirited.

JOHN W. COOVERT. A resumé of the men who have been important factors in the development of Yamhill county would be incomplete were no mention to be made of John W. Coovert, a valiant soldier during the Civil war, and at present the owner of two hundred and fourteen acres of land in one of the most fertile parts of the county. Mr. Coovert was born in Preble county, Ohio, February 5, 1845, and was one of a family of six children born to his parents, who were farmers. As his parents died when he was an infant, he was bound out to an uncle, with whom he remained until fifteen years of age. For two years after leaving his uncle's home he was employed at farm work in the neighborhood, but as at that time the Civil war was in full swing, he threw aside the shackles of the peaceful occupation and enlisted in his country's service.

In August, 1862, Mr. Coovert became a member of Company I, Sixty-seventh Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and after being mustered in at Madison, was sent to Louisville, Ky. From there they went to Mumfordsville, Ky., where they were captured, and being paroled the next day, were sent back to Indiana. After remaining in camp in Indianapolis for some time, they were exchanged and sent to Cairo and Memphis and different parts of the south, and finally participated in the Vicksburg campaign, during which Mr. Coovert was captured with about four thousand others at the battle of Carrion Crow, and held for fifty-two days near Alexandria. After being paroled he was sent to New Orleans and held until June 1, 1864, and after being exchanged, went to Baton Rouge, and there rejoined his regiment. The next engagement in which he participated was at Dauphin Island, and from there he went to Ft. Morgan, where the siege lasted twenty-three days. Returning to New Orleans, from there he proceeded up the river, going into camp near Ft. Pickens, and remaining there until March, 1865. He next participated in the siege of Ft. Blakely, from there went to Selma, Ala., then to Mobile, remaining until June 1, 1865, and finally, with his regiment, was mustered out at Galveston, Tex.

For a year after the war Mr. Coovert remained in Ohio, and then went to Elkhart county, Ind., where he married Miss Marguerite Fudge, a native of Ohio, and thereafter lived in the same locality for about three years. In 1869, Mr. Coovert went to San Francisco, and from there came to Oregon by water, and after stopping in Portland one day, he settled upon his present farm in Yamhill county. When he purchased the farm there were about twelve acres cleared, but he now has one hundred and fifteen acres cleared, and has made many valuable improvements in other ways. November 2, 1873, Mrs. Marguerite Coovert died, leaving three children, of whom Letha E. is the wife of M. M. Banister, of Vancouver, Wash.; W. A. lives in Centralia, Wash.; and Asher resides in Salem, Ore. For his second wife Mr. Coovert married Hannah E. Sargent, a native of Iowa. Mr. Coovert is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, a mixed breed of Jerseys being his principal brand. He takes an active interest in all matters pertaining to the general upbuilding of his neighborhood, and is especially prominent in fraternal circles, being past master of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he has passed all of the chairs. He is also a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. In politics he is a Republican, and in religion is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

A. A. Leonard

ABEL A. LEONARD, M. D., whose residence in Oregon covers a period from 1852 down to the present time, was born in Kingston, Caldwell county, Mo., March 16, 1852. He was, therefore, but an infant when brought to the northwest. His father, Leicester Upham Leonard, was born in Pennsylvania, March 23, 1809, and was a son of Abel Leonard, whose birth occurred at West Springfield, Mass.

Abel Leonard, Sr., was a son of Austin Leonard, a native of Massachusetts, and of either English or Scotch descent. Abel Leonard married Abi Leonard in Massachusetts, and afterward removed to Pennsylvania, locating in Springfield township, Bradford county, in 1804. He was a tanner by trade, and was engaged in business for many years at Leonard's Hollow, which is now Leona, Bradford county, Pa. In 1829 he removed to Ohio, and with his son Leicester U. engaged in shoemaking. He died at Richmond Center, that state, when about seventy-seven years of age. In 1828 Leicester U. Leonard had removed to Ohio and located near Richmond Center, where he followed shoemaking and was later joined by his father. At the age of twenty-six years he was married in Richmond Center to Miss Cynthia (Lapham) Blanchard, who died in Oregon. About 1839 they removed from Ohio to Missouri, settling in Kingston, Caldwell county, where the father studied medicine.

In 1852 he brought his family to Oregon, settling about four miles south of Silverton, where he secured a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. After three years he sold this and bought another farm southwest of the town. In 1856, in partnership with Ralph C. Geer, he engaged in the nursery business in the Waldo hills, following that pursuit for two years, after which he turned his attention to farming and also engaged in shoemaking. He was at one time the owner of an orchard which was rated as the most splendidly cultivated in the valley. Mr. Leonard took great pride in its care, and its output was awarded prizes at the state fairs. It contained six acres planted to all kinds of fruits of the best qualities. Mr. Leonard died in the Waldo hills March 20, 1869, respected by all who knew him. His wife was a native of New York and a daughter of John Blanchard, who removed from the Empire state to Ohio, where he carried on farming. Later he took up his abode seventeen miles from Detroit, Mich., at a little town called Farmington, and there he died when about eighty years of age. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Leonard were born three sons and a daughter: Volney, who follows farming and resides at Silverton at the age of sixty-six years; Ellen Sylvania, who is the wife of Calvin Geer, a ranchman of Burns, Ore.; Abel A.; and Horace Wade, who is a stenographer in Portland, Ore.

Dr. Abel A. Leonard obtained his early education in the public schools of the Waldo hills and afterward continued his studies in Silverton until he had prepared for entrance in the Willamette University in the fall of 1872. He spent six months as a student there at that time and afterward returned to the same school in 1876. Not long afterward he went to Utah, and for six months was a student in the University of Deseret at Salt Lake City. Between the years 1871 and 1876 Dr. Leonard was successfully engaged in teaching school in Marion county in order to secure the means necessary for the acquirement of further education. He also worked upon a farm during a part of the time. In 1877 he was employed as teacher of a school near Salt Lake City, where he remained until the spring of 1878, and then went to Montana. During the winter of 1878-9 he was principal of the public schools of Virginia City, Mont., and in the latter year he returned to Salt Lake City, Utah, where he was again engaged in teaching. In the spring of 1880 he was appointed to the position of census enumerator of Salt Lake City, and in the summer of that year he was appointed special enumerator for the manufacturing industries of that place. In the winter of 1881 he entered a wholesale and retail hardware and grocery house owned by the firm of Kimball & Lawrence at Salt Lake City, in the capacity of clerk and bookkeeper, filling this position until 1883, when the firm sold out. Dr. Leonard was afterward connected with different business interests and on February 1, 1884, as corresponding clerk in the central office, he entered the employ of the Singer Manufacturing Company, with which he remained for five years. In 1889 he was promoted to the position of chief clerk and acted in that capacity for a year and a half, when he resigned in the fall of 1890.

Dr. Leonard then went to St. Louis, Mo., and entered the St. Louis Hygienic College of Physicians and Surgeons, in which he completed a full course of study and was then graduated in the spring of 1893. He next took post-graduate work in Chicago in the summer of 1893, and then went to Salt Lake City, Utah, where he was engaged in practice for a year. In 1894 he was placed in charge of the Brewster Sanitarium at Oneonta, Cal. In the fall of 1896 he removed to Oregon, establishing his home at Huntington, where he became railroad surgeon for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation and the Oregon Short Line Railroad Companies. He also conducted a general practice there until the fall of 1897, when he removed to Silverton, where he has since remained. In the intervening years he has built up a splendid practice, receiving patronage from a large number of the best homes of the city. In 1899 the doctor built a fine residence on Main street and he also has a splendidly equipped office.

On the 11th of May, 1881, Dr. Leonard was married in Salt Lake City, Utah, to Miss Nellie M. Van Dam, who was born in Holland, a daughter of Cornelius and Catherine Van Dam, also natives of the same country. Cornelius Van Dam died while en route to Salt Lake City in 1864. Unto the doctor and his wife have been born two children, Lyman Austin, who was born March 22, 1882, and is now a sophomore in the Oregon State Agricultural College at Corvallis; and Leicester Thurston, who was born March 9, 1889, and died on the 21st of June of that year.

Dr. Leonard is connected with the lodge, encampment and Rebekah degree of the Odd Fellows, the Woodmen of the World, the Fraternal Circle and the United Artisans. In his political views he is a Republican but is very liberal on such questions. His religious belief is indicated by a creed of his own framing: "So live today that tomorrow will bring no regrets." That he exemplifies this creed in his life is well known to all who are acquainted with him. There is no resident of Silverton more worthy of the regard of his fellow-men than Dr. Leonard. He deserves great credit for what he has accomplished. Beginning life in a very humble capacity he resolved to work his way upward, and directed his efforts into the channels calling for strong intellectuality and marked business ability. Steadily he has advanced and today he occupies an honored and prominent position among his fellow-men.

JAMES R. DERBY. The lamented death of James R. Derby on his well-improved farm, one mile west of McMinnville, January 10, 1902, recalled to his many friends and associates the very creditable career of this prominent upbuilder of Yamhill county. Mr. Derby was one of the many sons of New York who have found their way to the extreme west, bringing with them the stable traits of the more conservative east, and applying them with satisfactory results to the unsettled conditions which characterized their new home. He was born in New York August 26, 1826, his parents, grand-parents, and more remote forefathers having been engaged in farming during their entire active lives.

There were eleven children in the family of Mr. Derby, and in 1831 the parents and children removed to Michigan, where the children worked hard on the paternal farm, and where they irregularly attended the early subscription school in their neighborhood. His services no longer required on the home farm, J. R. Derby started out to make an independent living, and for about two years gained a good deal of practical experience among the timber lands in the northern part of the state of Michigan. After his marriage, in 1851, to Lucy A. Olds, a native of St. Joseph county, Mich., he lived for about six months in Hillsdale, Mich., and during that time formulated plans for emigration to the west in the spring. This move meant a great deal to the aspiring young man, yet his wife was hopeful as himself, and together they settled their affairs and planned to leave all they held dear behind them. With a wagon and two yoke of oxen they joined a train under command of James H. Olds, who safely conducted the pioneers to Oregon, the journey taking the greater part of eight months. At once Mr. Derby came to Yamhill county and took up a donation claim, six miles north of Lafayette, where he lived for five years, and thereafter engaged in the grocery business in Lafayette for about two years. The next home, and the one upon which this honored pioneer passed nine years, was advantageously located on Deer creek, and from there, in 1869, he removed to the farm now occupied by his widow and son. Of the two hundred and forty-nine acres in this farm, the entire amount is under cultivation, and the amount of work entailed in this operation appeals to all who have taken up timber land in Oregon. Mr. Derby was a practical and successful farmer, in connection with which work he associated many outside interests, and many efforts to secure a stable and progressive state of affairs in the county. His political preference lay with the Republican party, and he always took an active interest in local political undertakings. Although not an office seeker, he held many positions of trust and responsibility in the community, among them being that of school trustee and clerk, road supervisor, and councilman. Of the five children born to himself and wife, Eliza J. is the wife of Joseph Garrison, of Idaho; Jerome is engaged in the feed business in McMinnville; William is engaged in business in Gresham; Mary is the wife of Jesse High, of McMinnville, and James D. is living with his mother. Mrs. Derby has proved herself an excellent manager since the death of her husband, and with her son maintains the progressive policy adopted and always insisted on by her estimable husband.

A. C. CHANDLER, of McMinnville, has been prominent in the establishment and control of one of the leading enterprises of Oregon, the Oregon Fire Relief Association, of which he is now the secretary. He was born in Clackamas county, this state, July 26, 1856, and comes of an old New England family. His paternal grandfather was born, lived and died in Vermont. His father, the Rev. George

C. Chandler, was a native of Chester, Vt., and pursued his education in Rochester College, of Rochester, N. Y., in which he was graduated. In the Green Mountain state he was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist Church, and at an early day in the development of Indiana he went to that state, where for several years he served as president of Franklin College. The rapidly developing west with its opportunities for ministerial labor, however, attracted him and in 1852 he came to Oregon accompanied by his wife and three children. They made the long journey across the plains with an ox team, traveling with a train, and on reaching their destination Rev. Mr. Chandler secured a donation land claim on Mill creek, fourteen miles east of Oregon City. Not only did he give his attention to the development of his farm, but to some extent he engaged in teaching in Oregon City, and in 1858 he came to Yamhill county and aided in the organization and became the first president of McMinnville College, which was formed under the auspices of the Baptist denomination. In 1860 he returned to Clackamas county, but in 1862 he again came to McMinnville as president of the college, and acted in that capacity for four or five years, when he resigned. He was a pioneer minister of Oregon and labored most earnestly, zealously and effectively for the spread of the gospel. He took a most active part in organizing the Baptist Church here, and remained a resident of McMinnville until 1873. In that year he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Forest Grove, where he died in 1883. His wife, Persis W. Heald, was born in Chester, Vt., and still surviving her husband, is now living in Forest Grove. In the family were six children: Edward K., who is a graduate of the Madison University of New York, and is now professor in the theological department in Ottawa College, in Ottawa, Kan.; Julia C., who is the wife of Judge W. Lair Hill, a distinguished jurist of Berkeley, Cal., and the author of Hill's Code; Mrs. Sarah Roberts, of Forest Grove; Mrs. Mary Clark, of Berkeley, Cal.; A. C., of this review; and William B., who died in Forest Grove in 1887.

Throughout the greater part of his life A. C. Chandler has resided in McMinnville, and after attending the public schools for a time he continued his education in McMinnville College. He then engaged in farming for ten or twelve years, followed by several years' service as a bookkeeper in the employ of different firms in McMinnville. In 1896 he accepted the position with the Oregon Fire Relief Association, and in 1900 was elected its secretary. This was established as a county mutual fire association, but a year or two later was extended to cover four adjoining counties. A year thus passed and it was increased to take in the Willamette valley, and when another year had gone by the scope of the enterprise was extended until it embraced the entire state. The growth of the business has been almost phenomenal, the company having entered upon an era of continued progress. Now there are twenty thousand members representing every county in the state and over $13,000,000 of insurance is now theirs, this being more than one-eighth of the entire fire insurance carried in the state. This is all the more remarkable when it is known the company takes no mercantile risks. There is a branch office at No. 719 Marquam Building, in Portland, but all policies are issued from the main office at McMinnville. This is strictly a mutual association and the average cost is less than forty per cent of the regular stock insurance companies' rates. The business has been most capably and successfully managed and the loss ratio is only about twenty-five per cent of the regular stock companies.

Mr. Chandler chose as a companion and helpmate for life's journey Miss Mollie Lynch, who was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of one of the pioneers of the county. They have one child, George C. Mr. Chandler holds membership with the Woodmen of the World and is a Prohibitionist in his political views, and at different times has served as a nominee of the party for county offices. He belongs to the Baptist Church, in which he is acting on the board of trustees, and for fifteen years he has been one of its deacons. He has also been a member of the board of trustees and secretary of McMinnville College since 1886, and in 1898 he was active in the re-incorporation of the college. Although his life is a busy one, largely taken up by the onerous duties of his business, he yet finds time and opportunity to aid in the moral development of the county and is a very influential and honored man.

MERRITT MILLER. As one of the enterprising farmers of Yamhill county Merritt Miller is entitled to mention among the reliable and progressive members of a thrifty community. He was born in Bureau county, Ill., March 25, 1849, and on the paternal side is of Revolutionary ancestry, his grandfather, a millwright and farmer by occupation, having served with courage and distinction under the banner of the immortal Washington.

In Virginia, where he was born January 25, 1800, George Miller, the father of Merritt, was reared on a farm and in time married and reared four children. With his wife he removed to Indiana, where his first wife died, and where he married Tobatha Curren, a native of the Hoosier state. From 1845 to 1854 the family fortunes were located in Illinois, and from then until 1862 in the state of Iowa. Desiring to improve his prospects Mr. Miller outfitted and prepared to cross the plains to Oregon, the means of locomotion being wagons, ox and horse teams, and the journey consumed the greater part of the usual six months. The party experienced practically no trouble with the Indians, a happy state of affairs due to the more settled condition of the plains. Arriving at The Dalles Mr. Miller took a boat to Portland, and from there moved direct to the farm south of Dayton, which remained his home for three years. He then purchased the place of one hundred and sixty acres now owned and occupied by his son, Merritt, where he carried on general farming, and where he lived to be over eighty years of age. His wife, who died at the age of sixty-nine, was the mother of five children: Calvin, deceased; Jefferson, a farmer of Polk county, Ore.; Jane, the widow of M. Morrison, of Eugene, Ore.; Etta, the wife of D. M. Hewitt, of Polk county; and Merritt.

After an uneventful childhood on his father's farm, in which he combined farming and attendance at the district schools, Merritt Miller married Julia Peery, who was born in Missouri, and forthwith assumed the management of the home property. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and many graded Jerseys browse on his meadows. Mr. Miller has taken an active interest in general affairs in his neighborhood, especially in education, having been a member of the school board for over twenty years. Independent in politics, he has zealously labored for the betterment of politics in general, and has served as supervisor of roads for one term. The wife of Mr. Miller, who died in 1895, was the mother of five children, enumerated as follows: Lena, wife of L. Hewitt, of this vicinity; Ethel, deceased; Pearl, the wife of Fred Kirkwood, of Yamhill county; Grace, the wife of Ray Nash, of San Francisco; and Elva, living at home and attending school. Mr. Miller is a member of the Evangelical Church, and contributes generously toward its maintenance. He bears an excellent reputation in the community of Yamhill county, and has many friends among appreciators of sterling worth and unquestioned integrity.

FRANCIS M. YORK. Near LeRoy, McLean county, Ill., July 18, 1855, occurred the birth of Francis M. York, who carries on general farming and dairying in Yamhill county, near Carlton. He comes of a family of English descent that was established in an early day in Tennessee, where his grandfather, Pleasant York, was born. James M. York, the father, first opened his eyes to the light of day near Knoxville, Tenn., April 17, 1829, and was trained to farm work, which he followed throughout his business career. He wedded Sarah Ingle, who was born in Tennessee in 1831, a daughter of Robert Ingle, also a native of that state. At the time of the Mexican war James M. York entered the service as a private and fought for his country's interest in 1847 and 1848. He then returned to Tennessee, and the following year, 1849, removed to Illinois. He was married in that state, the Ingle family having previously emigrated from Tennessee to Illinois, Mrs. York owning a farm, and at the time of their marriage the father of our subject settled upon that property and carried on general agricultural pursuits for many years. In 1891 he disposed of his farming interests in the Prairie state and removed to Kansas, locating near Mount Hope, in Sedgwick county, where he purchased a tract of land and there engaged in general farming until his death, June 13, 1896. His wife passed away in 1877, and of their thirteen children, eleven sons and two daughters, ten are yet living, Francis M. being the third in order of birth. After the death of his first wife Mr. York was again married in Illinois, his second union being with Mrs. Julia Doyle, by whom he had one son, Clyde Fisher York. His second wife died about 1890 and in 1893 Mr. York was again married. His third wife still survives him and is now living in Wichita, Kans.

When twenty-one years of age Francis M. York started out to make his own living. He determined to seek a home in Oregon and traveled by way of San Francisco to Portland, whence he journeyed onward to North Yamhill. He had acquired a good education in his native state, his early school privileges being supplemented by two years' study in the Wesleyan University at Bloomington, Ill. He then engaged in teaching for twelve years, following this profession throughout the entire period in Yamhill county, and for seven years he was a popular, capable and successful teacher in District No. 17. In connection with his educational work he also carried on farming east of North Yamhill, where he owned eighty acres of land. Eventually, however, he sold that property and came to McMinnville in order to enter upon the duties of the office of county assessor, to which position he had been elected in 1888, serving therein until 1894. In 1895 he purchased a farm a quarter of a mile south of Carlton, in Yamhill county, here having two hundred acres of good land, of which one hundred and seventy acres are under cultivation. In addition to general farming he carries on stock-raising and the dairy business, keeping ten cows for the last named purpose, and in the departments of his business activity he is meeting with excellent success.

In 1882 occurred the marriage of Mr. York and Miss Martha Rowland, who was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of Green L. Rowland, one of the pioneer settlers who located three miles northeast of Carlton. Five children have been born of this union: Dottie, Lloyd, James M., Francis M., Jr., and Nina O., all at home.

Mr. York exercises his right of franchise in support of the men and measures of the Republican party and has served as county assessor, as school director and as school clerk for a number of years. He holds membership relations with the Woodmen of the World at McMinnville, where he is a past master, and belongs to the Christian Church. In all of his business dealings he is upright and straightforward and to his honest work and his industry he owes his prosperity.

MRS. ANN SCOTT. Among the honored pioneers of Oregon are women, too, to be numbered, women who have not faltered when duty called them to follow their loved ones into the far west, away from friends and old associations, into the dangers and perils of the unsettled wilderness, there to do and live for the sake of the coming generations. Their name is legion, but too often their courage and sacrifices are passed over to give room to the men whose hands were upheld by some woman's goodness. In the little city of Woodburn, Marion county, Ore., there lives one of these women with many about her to revere and honor her for the good works she has done in her pioneer home. Born near Quebec, Canada, May 22, 1835, she is the daughter of a Scotch emigrant, John West, a millwright, who settled at St. Thomas, where he continued to work at his trade. In 1848 he emigrated to California, coming from there to Oregon and settling in Astoria, where he remained for eight years, at which time he brought his family to share what had been his solitude. In the eight years he had built many mills in Oregon, the last being at Westport. Mr. West enjoyed the distinction of being the pioneer millwright of Oregon, and lived to enjoy his pleasant western home until his death, December 27, 1888.

The wife who shared the trials and troubles of their pioneer life was a bonny Scotchwoman, Margaret West, a cousin of the man whom she married. She passed away at Marquam, Clackamas county, Ore., and is buried at Westport. Of the six children of this union, four daughters and two sons, Mrs. Scott was the eldest. After completing her education in the common schools of Canada she was married at St. Foy, at the age of twenty years, to Robert Hall Scott, a native of the land to which her parents owed their nativity, having been born at Samiston, Scotland, October 22, 1826. When a young man he came to Canada, locating at Beauport, where he secured employment as miller with a man by the name of Henderson. In 1856 he and his wife followed Mr. West and his family into Oregon, locating at Westport, where he engaged with his father-in-law in building mills, their first mill put up in partnership being at Oak Point. After four years at that place he went to Westport, building a sawmill in partnership with four others, remaining here for six years, and working it with a liberal profit for each of those interested. In 1866 Mr. Scott came to the Nolen donation claim, building both a grist and a sawmill, which later gave the place the name of Scott's Mills. With a view to bettering his condition he came to Woodburn in 1892, building the grist mill which is still operated by his son. This mill is a three story structure, called the Woodburn Roller Mills. As the name would indicate, the roller process is used in the manufacture of flour, two brands of which are produced, the White Rose and Snowdrop, both famous throughout the country. This mill uses all the home production of wheat and much of this cereal is imported. Mr. Scott lived to be seventy-one years old, passing away October 11, 1897.

To Robert H. Scott and his wife were born ten children, four sons and six daughters, of whom we mention the following: Margaret, deceased, married Wade Thompson, and they had one son, Carl R.; her second marriage was to William Loveridge. John, living in Tygh valley, eastern Oregon, engaged in milling; Lizzie, deceased, was married to Preston Wood; Jane was married to William Ross, now deceased, and had two children, Ralph and Nellie; her second marriage united her with John Adams; she conducts the hotel at Brownsville, Ore. Charles is written of more fully elsewhere in the volume; Lydia, unmarried, lives with her mother; Ellen is the wife of John Korb of Scott's Mills; Eva, deceased, was married to John Steelhammer, of Salem, Ore.; a sketch of Robert Hall, Jr., appears elsewhere in this volume; Walter is still at home.

Through the strong personality of Mrs. Scott those about her have accomplished their objects in life really unconscious of the deep influence exercised by this quiet woman, filled with the spirit of three good nationalities, Scotch, Canadian and American, and cheerfully upholding their hands by the broad optimism of her own nature. Mrs. Scott has suffered a stroke of paralysis and is, in consequence, unable to give her presence at the social gatherings of the city, in which those of her name have assisted so materially in directing the business interests, and the loss is much regretted, though her absence does not make her any the less remembered as an honored pioneer of Woodburn.

CHRISTOPHER C. PATRICK. New York state has contributed many of her industrious sons for the agricultural upbuilding of Polk county, and among these Christopher C. Patrick occupies an honored place in the vicinity of Salem. His farm consists of two hundred acres, twenty of which have been cleared by the present owner, and one hundred of which are under cultivation. Long since past the age where inclination or health dictated a continuance of arduous labor, Mr. Patrick is enjoying a respite from work in the field and participation in stock deals, and has handed over the management of his property to his son-in-law, Harvey Coyle. Needless to say, he is still interested in watching the progress of things begun by himself in the early days, and will undoubtedly fill his days for many years to come with little happenings around the place, both helpful and interesting.

As the name implies, the Patrick family comes from Ireland, the emigrating ancestor being the paternal grandfather, who settled in New York state at a very early day, where was born his son, James, the father of Christopher. James spent his active life in farming in Cayuga county, where Christopher was born July 28, 1828. The father died in 1832, at the age of fifty, and was survived by his wife, formerly Lucy Preston, who also was born in New York, and died at the age of sixty-five years. Christopher is the youngest of the six sons and three daughters born to his parents, only two of whom are now living, the other being Elvira, the widow of Emmons Hamlin, inventor of the Mason & Hamlin organ. He was but five years old when his father died. Such education as his busy life in youth permitted was acquired in the public schools, and he continued to live on the home farm until removing to Michigan in 1848. Locating in Cass county, he engaged in farming and stock-raising with considerable success, his life passing uneventfully, until the breaking out of the Civil war turned men's thoughts from peace to strife and practically incapacitated them for labor on farm or in shop. September 7, 1863, he enlisted in the Fourteenth Michigan Battery under Captain Heiney, and forthwith relieved the heavy artillery at Washington, D. C., and afterward performed the same service for the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment of twelve hundred and fifty men. There were one hundred and sixty-five men in Captain Heiney's company, and they performed valiant service wherever sent, Mr. Patrick serving as sergeant. After being mustered out of the service July 4, 1865, Mr. Patrick returned to Michigan, incapacitated for a time from the effects of a sunstroke sustained at Camp Berry. He entered again upon agricultural labor and from then on continued to farm until coming to Oregon in 1881. He came direct to Polk county, purchased his present farm, and has lived thereon ever since.

While in Michigan, Mr. Patrick married, July 28, 1850, Harriet Savage, who was born in Ohio, November 27, 1832, and whose father, John Savage, moved to Michigan when his daughter was a child. Twelve children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Patrick, of whom two sons and three daughters are living: Kate, wife of A. H. Coyle; William P., of Tillamook county; Edith, wife of Joseph Bixby, of Tillamook; Albert M; and Hattie, wife of L. D. Gibson. Mr. Patrick is identified with the Grand Army of the Republic, holding membership in Salem Post No. 10, and with his wife is a member of the Presbyterian Church at Zena, of which he is a trustee, and a liberal contributor toward its support. He is enterprising and successful, and has many friends among his fellow agriculturists in the neighborhood.

AUGUST R. FORD. One of the native sons of Yamhill county is August R. Ford, his birth having occurred in McMinnville, July 7, 1872. His father, Francis A. Ford, was born in the year 1837 in Sparta, Wis., and died in the year 1877, when forty years of age. He was both a photographer and musician and had acquired a comprehensive knowledge of both instrumental and vocal music. He taught in both lines in McMinnville and also engaged in farming. In 1862 he made the long journey across the plains to Oregon, his wagon being drawn by oxen, and upon reaching this section of the state he pre-empted a homestead. On this tract he built a house and barn and carried on general farming and stock-raising until his land was transferred into well-developed fields, while in his pastures were seen good grades of cattle, horses and hogs. An earnest Republican in politics, he was active in behalf of the party and he received the nomination for county treasurer. He served as road supervisor and in school offices, and was ever loyal to the welfare and progress of his community. A prominent Mason of McMinnville, he served as master of its lodge for a number of years and was instrumental in extending its influence and inculcating its helpful and brotherly spirit among his fellow-men. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Sarah C. Martin, was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of Nehemiah Martin, who came to Oregon in 1844. It was here in McMinnville that Mr. and Mrs. Ford were married and their union was blessed with three children: Lois A., who is now living in Portland; August R., of this review; and Mrs. Adele H. Lambert, of Portland.

Upon the home farm August R. Ford spent the days of his youth, his life being unmarked by any event of special importance. He acquired a good public school education and worked in the fields and meadows, thus gaining a practical knowledge of farm life. He to-day has one hundred and seventy-five acres of rich and productive land, of which ninety acres are under a high state of cultivation and the fields of grain annually return to him golden harvests. He is likewise extensively engaged in the raising of cattle, and now has upon his place one hundred head of graded cattle.

In 1896 occurred the marriage of Mr. Ford and Miss Jessie M. Rush, a native of Illinois, and their union has been blessed with a little daughter, Ruth M. Both Mr. and Mrs. Ford are highly esteemed in the community, where they have many friends and he is a valued representative of the Ancient Order of United Workmen at McMinnville. In politics he is a stalwart Republican.

HENRY GEE. The history of the mercantile enterprises of McMinnville demands mention of Henry Gee, who is now engaged in dealing in agricultural implements and who is a self-made man, owing his prosperity and creditable business position to his energy and his determination in conquering all obstacles in his pathway. During thirty-seven years he has been a resident of Oregon, having arrived in this state when only nineteen years of age. His birth occurred February 8, 1846, near what is now Moberly, Randolph county, Mo. His paternal great-grandfather, who was a native of Germany, became one of the pioneers who penetrated into the interior of Kentucky, there to establish a home, at which time his son, the grandfather of Henry, was but two years old. Amid the wild scenes of pioneer life he was reared and eventually he was married and established a home of his own in Kentucky. His eldest son, William Gee, was with General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans in the war of 1812.

Levi Gee, the father of our subject, was born in Kentucky, whence he removed to Randolph county, Mo., where he carried on agricultural pursuits until his demise. He wedded Mary E. Grimes, a native of Virginia, and a daughter of Cunningham Grimes, who was born in the Old Dominion, afterward resided in Kentucky, and subsequently moved to Randolph county, Mo., and was killed while on his way back to visit friends in Kentucky. From the age of six years until her death, Mrs. Gee resided in Randolph county, Mo. She was a member of the Christian Church and passed away May 10, 1900, her remains being interred in Antioch cemetery. By her marriage she had become the mother of six children, of whom three are now living, but Henry is the only one now on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Gee was but nine years of age at the time of his father's death, but for a long period he continued to remain upon the home farm and assist his mother. His school privileges were extremely limited but through study in private, through reading and observation he has become a well-informed man. In his youth he was bound out to a farmer, but after two years he left his employer and secured work elsewhere as a farm hand. He continued to follow that pursuit until 1865, when he joined the company under the command of Granville Baker, which started for the Pacific coast. At Nebraska City, however, he abandoned that company and joined the wagon train of Radford Angel. Mr. Gee rode horseback to Fort Hall and afterward drove a team of four yoke of oxen for Dade Seers to Marion county, coming by way of Hams Fork cutoff. He left the Mississippi valley on the 28th of March and arrived in Marion county on the 15th of October, 1865. Indians manifested much hostility and travelers were in constant danger because of this. The trip was a very hard one and was accompanied with many difficulties, but at length Mr. Gee arrived safely at his destination.

He was penniless, however, and the first money which he ever made in Oregon he earned at Milwaukee, where he was engaged in sawing logs for a half day, receiving but fifty cents for his work. He then began working on the farm of John Johnson in Marion county, with whom he remained for four years, when he rented a farm near Wheatland, Yamhill county, and on the 15th of September, 1869, took up his abode thereon and began the raising of grain. In 1872 he purchased a farm which he continued to cultivate until 1877, when he sold that property and removed to a place near Belleville, Yamhill county, where two years before he had purchased two hundred acres of land. At that place he continued his farming operations until 1892, when he rented his farm to which he had added until the place now comprises four hundred and eighty-six acres. At the time he leased the property he came to McMinnville, where he embarked in business as a dealer in monuments, continuing in that line until 1902, when he began dealing in agricultural implements as a member of the firm of Gee & Houser, his partner being S. P. Houser. They engaged in the sale of various kinds of farm implements, including Plano harvesters, the South Bend plows and other machines, and they likewise deal in the Old Hickory wagons and Perry & DeMar buggies. Mr. Gee was also one of the organizers of the Oregon Fire Relief Association, which was formed January 15, 1894, and he became one of the first board of trustees. This organization at first embraced only Yamhill county, but has since been extended until it takes in the whole state and there are twenty thousand members. With the exception of one year, Mr. Gee has served continuously upon the board and is now acting in that capacity.

In Marion county, Ore., occurred the marriage of Mr. Gee and Miss Mary J. Lebold, who was born in Illinois and came to this state with her parents in 1859, the family being established in Lafayette. There is one child by this marriage, Mrs. Anna M. Davis, of McMinnville.

In his political views Mr. Gee is a stalwart Democrat and has served as a member of the county committee, of which he was at one time chairman. For a number of years he has been a member of the school board and he is now serving his third term of the city council and is chairman of the fire committee. In 1902 he was a member of the charter committee, which framed the new city charter of McMinnville. He is likewise connected with the board of trade here and has been an officer in the Woodmen of the World to which he belongs. He is also a member of the Catholic Church. Since coming to Oregon Mr. Gee has attained very creditable success. Arriving here without capital he accepted any employment that would yield him an honest living until he could gain a better start. His enterprise, industry and economy at length enabled him to become a factor in agricultural circles and eventually to win a prominent place among the representatives of commercial interests and his course has ever been such as to commend him to the confidence and good will of those with whom he has been associated.

PROF. H. L. BOARDMAN, who for seven years, from 1896 to 1903, filled the honorable position of president of McMinnville College, is a man whose career may well be worthy of emulation, and his capable fulfillment of the duties devolving upon him has won for him the esteem and regard of all with whom he has been associated. He was born June 23, 1866, in Dover, Ohio, and is a son of T. W. Boardman, who was a native of Vermont. His father, Amos Boardman, was also born in the Granite state and was an honored pioneer of that commonwealth, who followed the occupation of farming.

The family is of English descent and the original founders of the name in America became early settlers of Cambridge, Mass. From there the great-grandfather of Professor Boardman removed to Vermont, where Amos Boardman was born. His son, T. W. Boardman, was there born and reared, and on arriving at early manhood moved to Cuyahoga county, Ohio, where he became a prominent farmer and tradesman. In 1870 he moved to Johnson county, Kans., where he remained until 1874, when he moved with his family to Oregon, settling in McMinnville. Here he remained until 1886, following the wagonmaking trade in connection with general farming. In the year last mentioned he removed to the eastern part of Washington, settling in Colfax. He was a faithful and consistent member of the Baptist Church both in Oregon and Washington, and while living in those states the cause of Christianity found in him a warm supporter and friend. He was for years a member of the board of trustees of McMinnville College, and his influence was ever given toward higher education. In politics he was an earnest Republican, and in him the temperance cause found a staunch supporter. His death occurred in the fall of 1897. His wife was Delia Ann Hanford, who was born in Dover, Ohio, a daughter of Harry Hanford. Her parents were of English descent and were early pioneers of the Buckeye state. Mrs. Boardman now makes her home with her son, Professor Boardman. By her marriage she became the mother of five children, but only two grew to years of maturity: Alfred E., now living in Boston, Mass., and H. L., the subject of this review.

In his youth the latter was brought by his parents to Oregon and in the public schools of McMinnville he received his early education, later taking a course in the preparatory department of McMinnville College. On the removal of his parents to Colfax, Wash., he attended Colfax College, from which he graduated in 1889, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, later receiving the degree of Master of Arts. In 1890 he attended the School of Divinity in the University of Chicago, where he remained until 1893, when he returned to Washington and in Colfax was ordained a minister in the Baptist Church. Later he was assistant to the pastor of the First Baptist Church of Tacoma, Wash. He was afterward pastor of the church of that denomination at Eugene, Ore., until 1896, when he was elected president of McMinnville College. Under the capable management of Professor Boardman the scope and usefulness of the college has been greatly increased and extended, and he has organized a conservatory of music and business college as departments of the institution. The college was incorporated in 1858, under the name of the Baptist College of McMinnville, and in 1897 it was re-incorporated and became the Mc-

Minnville College. It now has a membership of over one hundred and fifty pupils. In the work of organization Professor Boardman took a leading part, and to his efforts is largely due the success of the college. The excellent work of this institution is widely recognized and its patrons are among the best families of the great north-west. Professor Boardman is a member of the College Division of the State Teachers Association, also a member of the American Historical Association, of Washington, D. C., and of the Oregon Historical Society; is professor of history and philosophy in connection with his college duties. He is a man of marked ability, and his understanding of the educational requirements of the great country in which he lives is broad and deep, so that the service which he is able to render in this respect is of a lasting character, beneficial not only to the present, but to the future growth and development of education in Oregon and surrounding states.

In Colfax, Wash., in 1891, occurred the marriage of Professor Boardman and Miss Myrtle A. Jackson, a native of Kansas. She died in 1897. Of this marriage two children were born: Grace M. and Faith G. For his second wife the professor chose Miss Alice Dorris, who was born in California and is a graduate of the University of Oregon, at Eugene. This union has been graced with two children: Katharine H. and Alice Dorris. In his political affiliations the professor is independent, endorsing the men and measures best fitted in his opinion to insure the public welfare. A man possessing the highest qualities of heart and mind, Professor Boardman cannot fail to be a power for good in the community in which he lives, and in which he is numbered among the most progressive and public-spirited citizens.

JOHN CRAWFORD. An Irish-American who possessed the most desirable of Celtic national traits and utilized them for the permanent betterment of his adopted state of Oregon, was John Crawford, whose death in 1901, accentuated the esteem with which he had ever been regarded in the community. Mr. Crawford was born in County Fermanagh, Ireland, May 12, 1820, and in the locality of his birthplace his parents had followed farming for many years. In 1861 they came to Canada with most of their children, and there the father died. Subsequently, in 1870, the mother removed to California with a portion of the family and later still came to Oregon. The mother died at the home of her son John at Pleasantdale soon after her arrival in Oregon, leaving four children: Robert, who lives in Nehalem; Thomas, a resident of Coos Bay; Anna, the widow of H. Osborn and a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio; and Jane, the wife of N. Nelson, of Clackamas county.

The oldest of eight children born to his parents, John Crawford left home when quite young and went to Scotland, where he embarked on a sailing vessel bound for America. After spending a few years in New York City, during which time he was variously engaged, he found his way to Kansas, where, in addition to running a farm which he had purchased, he also engaged in trading to a considerable extent. At the expiration of two years in Kansas he returned to New York and shipped for San Francisco via Panama. In the vicinity of Placerville, Cal., he engaged in mining for a time, but later went to Florence, Idaho, still interested in searching for gold. For several years he experienced the usual ups and downs incident to the average miner's life, but by exercising economy and business judgment managed to lay by a small store of worldly possessions. Returning to Oregon in 1865 he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Savage, a native of Salem, and thereafter went to Polk county, and near Lincoln purchased a farm upon which he made his home for about six years. He then located on French Prairie, near St. Louis, and after six years settled on the Gilmore donation claim near Hopewell, remaining there also for six years. For the following six years he lived on a farm on Pleasantdale Prairie, and bought the fine property now occupied by his widow on the Salem and Portland road. The farm is finely improved and one of the pleasantest homes in the county, representing in every detail the arduous effort of this erstwhile ambitious and enterprising owner.

Mrs. Elizabeth (Savage) Crawford died in December, 1894, having become the mother of eight children, as follows: Sherman, of Hopewell; Belle, the wife of Sim McCamey; Tillie, who resides in Salem; Frederick, of Pleasantdale Prairie; John, deceased; Dora, wife of Van Robinson, of Salem; Lulu, deceased; and William, a resident of Amity. At Niagara, Canada, September 27, 1897, Mr. Crawford was united in marriage with Nancy Peer, a native of Canada, and one in a family of eight children, whose parents were farmers by occupation. When Mrs. Crawford was a mere child her father died, but her mother was spared until 1900. Mr. Crawford took a prominent part in many of the affairs in his neighborhood, especially in politics, which he endeavored in every way possible to elevate and keep in accord with morality and high citizenship. He was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, toward the maintenance of which he contributed liberally at all times, and he was also active as a Sunday school teacher and all round worker. For many years he served in the capacities of road supervisor and member of the school board. An excellent manager and thrifty farmer, he amassed quite a large estate and was enabled to keep his family in all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life. Always a stanch believer in the value of a good education, he made it a point to give his children the best opportunities it was in his power to bestow, and by his private example guided them in the paths of correct living and general uprightness.

CALEB J. PAYNE. The finest rural dwelling between McMinnville and Sheridan has just been completed by Caleb J. Payne, owner of one of the best stocked, best equipped and most thoroughly cultivated farms in Yamhill county. This farm possesses more than an ordinary interest for its fortunate owner and represents not only the field of his mature and successful activity, but is as well the playground of his childhood and the scene of his birth, which occurred December 21, 1858. The inspiration derived from all worthy ancestors has had its effect in forming the character of Mr. Payne, and furthermore it is to his credit that he so well maintains the reputation of one of the noble, capable and resourceful pioneers of the county.

The Payne family was early represented in America, the paternal great-grandfather holding large landed possessions in Pennsylvania. There in 1789 was born his son, Aaron, the intrepid Oregonian pioneer, a man destined to fill a broad niche in the affairs of his time and place. A farmer and local preacher of the Christian Church by occupation, Aaron Payne was also a courageous soldier in the war of 1812, and was later a soldier in the Blackhawk war in Illinois, to which latter service he was prompted by the massacre of his brother, one of the first to fall before the murderous vengeance of the Indians. In the war of 1812 he was with Jackson at New Orleans, and in the Blackhawk war was a member of the Light Horse Dragoons. He was wounded near the place where the great Blackhawk was taken prisoner, but not seriously, and finally located on a farm in Illinois, a stanch advocate of peace won at the expense of Indian extermination. He married a Miss Murphy, who bore him thirteen children, eleven of whom grew to maturity. Her death occurred in 1846, and the following year he joined a caravan bound for the extreme west, and without particular incident arrived at his destination in Yamhill county, Ore. Here he took up a donation land claim, cleared it of timber to a certain extent, and made his home among the crude conditions then prevailing in the state. Leaving his farm to the care of his children he took advantage of the gold rush to California in 1849, but on the way enlisted in the Rogue River war, participating in many of the important skirmishes. The need of his military services over, he resumed his journey to California, where he followed mining and prospecting for about a year, returning then to his donation claim, where he worked at its improvement for many years. He became prominent in politics and represented his county in the state legislature, all the while continuing to preach and run his farm, doing all the good that lay in his power to accomplish. His life was fashioned on self-sacrificing lines, and while directing the lives of hundreds into channels of usefulness and peace, received no remuneration save that conferred by an approving conscience. It was against his principles to receive money for preaching, but his farm netted him a fair income and he was what might be termed a financially successful man. When he was about eighty he retired from agricultural and ministerial work, thereafter living in retirement at North Yamhill until his death, in 1883, at the age of ninety-four years.

While Aaron Payne was living on his farm in Sangamon county, Ill., his son, Caleb J., Sr., the father of our subject, was born May 24, 1821. In time he left the paternal farm and learned the butcher's trade in Illinois, and his search for opportunity was rewarded in 1845, when he was employed by a man by the name of Ramage to drive ox-teams, and make himself generally useful in a trip across the plains. This was two years before the father came west, and at the end of his journey he settled on the farm on the Sheridan and McMinnville pike, near where the son now lives, eleven miles southwest of McMinnville and three and a half miles east of Sheridan, and which is now occupied by his son. At the time of the Cayuse war he was endeavoring to utilize his six hundred and forty acres in general farming and stock-raising, but he responded to his country's needs and enlisted as first orderly sergeant, taking part in all the principal engagements of the war. His peaceful farming existence was further interrupted in 1849, when he went to California and mined for a few months, but his hoard was considerably lessened owing to the time he spent in caring for an old friend, William Ball, who had the misfortune to break his leg. Returning to Portland on the Brother Jonathan, he was forty-seven days en route, but finally reached his claim, the wiser for his various experiences.

In 1850 Mr. Payne married Malinda Toney, who was born in Callaway county, Mo., March 24, 1829, and who crossed the plains with her parents in 1847, settling on a farm in Yamhill county adjoining that of her future husband. But a comparatively brief married life was permitted Mr. Payne, for he died in 1858, leaving to his children a large property, but partially developed. His widow continued to live on the farm until 1872, when she married J. J. Butler and removed to a farm in the vicinity. Her second husband died a few years later, and she herself died in McMinnville in 1898, at the age of sixty-nine years. Five children were born of her first marriage, of whom Amanda is the wife of W. L. Warren, of McMinnville, and Mary is the wife of H. C. Burns, also of McMinnville; twins died in infancy, and Caleb C., Jr.

The present owner of the Payne property was educated in Monmouth and at the Portland Business College. He continued to be an integral part of the home farm until his marriage to Mary Raymond, a native of Marion county, and daughter of Augusta and Mary Raymond, pioneers of 1841. The young people lived in McMinnville for a short time, and thereafter lived on a farm in Marion county for two years. He located on the old home place in 1888, and the majority of the fine improvements now facilitating an extensive general farming and stock-raising enterprise have been of his own making and are the result of his enterprise and progressiveness. He makes a specialty of fine cattle and Cotswold sheep, and derives a substantial income from his fertile and productive property, which comprises three hundred and fifteen acres. Of the three children born into the Payne home Ethel is deceased; and Rita and Raymond are living at home with their parents. Mr. Payne is a prominent Democrat in his neighborhood, and takes an active interest in promoting the interests of his party. For several years he has been a member of the school board, at times serving as clerk, and at present is one of the directors. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Sheridan. Mr. Payne is one of the live, progressive forces of Yamhill county, his beautiful home, his scientific and practical knowledge of farming and his genial and optimistic manner, contributing to a truly enviable reputation.

ELI T. BRANSON owns an excellent farm pleasantly and conveniently located half a mile from the courthouse in McMinnville. He is now practically living retired and his rest is well deserved, for he has reached the seventy-third milestone on life's journey and throughout the greater part of his manhood his career has been one of untiring activity and of honorable effort. The ancestors of the Branson family came from Norfolk, England, in 1733, three brothers leaving their native land at that time, Levi, Eli and Thomas. One settled in Ohio, one in Philadelphia and one in Indiana, and our subject came from the branch of Eli, who settled in Ohio in 1733. Eli T. was born in Sangamon county, Ill., seven miles northwest of the city of Springfield, May 13, 1829, where his father occupied a farm for several years, and on leaving that country he took up his abode in Ohio, where he followed the occupation of farming, and later he went from that state to Indiana and afterward to Illinois, settling in Sangamon county, where his last days were passed.

Eli Branson, the father of our subject, was born in the Buckeye state in 1775, and after arriving at years of maturity he wedded Anna Turner, who was also a native of Ohio. Her parents lived to very advanced ages and died in Sangamon county, Ill., where they had followed agricultural pursuits, her father passing away when a centenarian and her mother departing this life at the very advanced age of one hundred and two years. Mrs. Anna Branson, however, died in 1829, at the birth of her son, Eli T., being at that time about forty years of age. Eli Branson, the father, afterward wedded Thankful Montgomery. The children of his first marriage were: Hannah, Sally, John and William, all of whom are deceased; Mrs. Mary Cadwallader, of Jersey county, Ill.; Calvin, who is living in Fulton county, Ill.; Lydia and Nancy, who are also deceased; and Eli. The children of the father's second marriage have all departed this life, namely: Benjamin, Samuel, Abraham and Martha. For his third wife Mr. Branson chose Mrs. Wilkins, a widow, who survived him for about a year. He became a resident of Sangamon county, Ill., at an early day and there carried on agricultural pursuits until called to his final rest, his death occurring in 1850, when he was seventy-five years of age.

Under the parental roof Eli T. Branson spent the days of his childhood and when eighteen years of age he began earning his own livelihood by working as a farm hand in the locality in which he had been reared, but the business opportunities of the west attracted him and with the desire to embrace the advantages offered upon the Pacific coast, he crossed the plains in 1851, and eventually arrived at McMinnville on the 15th of September. The journey had been made with four yoke of oxen and he was accompanied by William Hussey, but trouble arose between them when they were on the way and they parted on the plains, Mr. Branson going on alone from Snake river. He passed through McMinnville, going on to the home of his uncle, William Branson, at the fork of the Yamhill and Willamina streams. For four years thereafter he was employed among the settlers and was in government survey work for a similar time. The early experience of pioneer settlers came to him, including hardships, trials and difficulties. He took part in the Yakima Indian war, which began in February, 1855, and lasted for one hundred and twelve days, during which time he was subject to much exposure because the troops were not well equipped for military service. When the uprising of the Indians had been suppressed Mr. Branson returned to Polk county and in 1859 purchased a farm on Mill creek, the tract comprising three hundred and twenty acres, which he continued to cultivate and improve until 1869. The following year he purchased a farm in Yamhill county a mile and a half above Sheridan, this being three hundred and ten acres in extent. He retained possession of it until 1897, when he purchased his present farm of forty acres conveniently located only half of a mile from the courthouse. The land is devoted to general farming, but Mr. Branson has practically retired from business life, leaving the care of his property to others, while he is enjoying the fruits of his former toil.

Unto our subject and his wife were born four children, of whom two are yet living: William Arthur and Calvin E., both at home. The latter has been county surveyor for ten years. Mr. Branson has taken the second degree of Masonry in McMinnville and in politics he is a Republican. A half century has passed since his arrival in the northwest and wonderful has been the transformation which has occurred in this period. Railroads have been built and the land has been made to yield its rich resources and gifts to the settlers who have invaded its forests, claimed its splendid timber districts and its prairie lands, working its mines and establishing all kinds of industries known to business life in the east. Mr. Branson takes much pride in what has been accomplished here and his work in behalf of the county has been effective and beneficial, while in the supervision of his farming interests he has gained the success for which all men are striving.

WILLIAM MERCHANT. If it had required money to purchase the men who have put their brawn and energy into the cultivation of the west, Oregon would owe to many a locality for that which they have lost and she has won. A descendant of a sturdy Scotchman, William Merchant claims his nativity in the United States, and works for the welfare of the country through his good citizenship in the state of his adoption. His father, Robert Merchant, was born in Alloway, Ayrshire, Scotland, in December of the year 1792, and at the age of six years he was apprenticed to a shoemaker to learn the trade. Three years later he left home, and from that time on made his own way in the world. In 1808 he decided to emigrate, and after a short visit home, he started for the United States, his manner of traveling showing his determination of character, for not having sufficient money to pay his passage he secreted himself on board a vessel bound for New York, and after an uneventful voyage, he landed in that city, and though penniless and alone he was not resourceless for he had an abundance of courage and energy, as well as a trade to fall back upon. He drifted about from place to place, seeing much of this part of the world, but finally settling in Elkhart county, Ind., where in 1838 he met and married Lucretia Stewart, a native of that state, born July 8, 1818. After drifting to various places in Ohio, Illinois and Iowa, in the latter state taking up government land and farming in conjunction with his trade, he decided to try his fortunes in the west. Accordingly he sold out in 1847, and crossed the plains, landing in Oregon City September 27, having taken about six months in the journey. After a very few days spent in looking about him, he bought the right to six hundred and forty acres of land, and here he passed the remainder of his life, carrying on general farming and also his trade, which latter he found very profitable, working at times sixteen hours a day, making boots for the miners who were going to the mines of California, and receiving for each pair the sum of $16. After sixty-eight years of strenuous living that marked his whole life he passed away, leaving behind him the records of his industry and perseverance in the well-tilled fields of the great farm which he had truly earned in the improvements put upon it. His life had been full of hardships, but with no such word as failure in his vocabulary he left his children a rich inheritance in their western home. The mother outlived her husband many years, dying in January, 1891. Of the eight children that blessed the home, five were born in Oregon, the other three experiencing the trip though almost too young to recall the happenings. Andrew, the eldest, located in Seattle, Wash., where he died in 1899; Sarah Jane, the next in age; William; Warren, the first native Oregonian of the family, now in Vancouver; Mary Maynard, of Colton, Wash.; Mariah Hendricks, of Seattle, Wash.; and Robert, who is engaged in the commission business at the last-named city.

William was the youngest of the children who crossed the plains, having been born in Davis county, Iowa, July 12, 1843, being at the time of the journey four years of age. The years of his boyhood he passed on his father's farm, spending a small part of each year in the schools of Oregon, going several miles to the deserted cabin that served as a school building. At the age of twenty-two years, he went to the mines in Idaho, remaining there for three months, taking away with him several hundred dollars, the result of his labor. Returning home, he went to work among the farmers of his neighborhood, leaving the next spring on another mining expedition, bound at this time for the Blackfoot mines, in company with several others, among whom were Lee Laughlin and Uncle Benjamin Stewart. Mr. Merchant remained in eastern Oregon for three months working on a stock ranch. He subsequently engaged in the sheep business and in the spring of 1867 took six hundred head to Boise City, where he sold them with a liberal profit for his work. In the Boise Basin he tried the livery business, giving it up later, however, as he received at this time his share of his father's land, which was seventy-four acres. In 1868 he married Miss Martha Landess, a native of Washington county, Ore., her father having crossed the plains in the same train with the Merchant family in 1847, settling in this county, where he remained until his death.

From time to time Mr. Merchant has added to his property until he now owns seven hundred and fifteen acres, four hundred and forty of it being land that belonged formerly to his father's place. Nearly all of this large farm is in cultivation, being used for general farming and very extensive operations in the line of stock-raising. Mr. Merchant has interested himself on all public questions, taking an active part in school matters, holding through Republican influence the position of road supervisor and various school offices. He is a very prominent man in the county, giving his energies in the direction of general improvement, and with all his worldly success remembering the early days of Oregon and seeking to perpetuate their memory by his interest in the County Pioneer Association, in which he has served as president.

JONAH WISEMAN MOORE. Half way up the mountains, and commanding a fine view of the city of Brownsville and the surrounding county, is the home of Jonah Wiseman Moore, around whom still clings those fast disappearing characteristics with which fiction and imagination surround the old-time miners of the west and north. This discoverer, and for years partial owner, of the famous Lucky Boy mine in the Blue River mining district, is by nature fitted for a life on the outskirts of civilization, possessing a ruggedness of constitution and a fearlessness of thought and conviction particularly adapted to unsettled regions.

Born on a farm in Sheridan county, Mo.,

October 15, 1839, he comes of an old Tennessee family, established in Missouri by his paternal grandfather, Jonah. His father, Robert, was a small boy when the family fortunes were shifted from Tennessee to Sheridan county, and he was reared to farming and educated in the district schools. He married Malinda Scrivner, a native daughter of Missouri, whose father, James Scrivner, served in the war of 1812. Seven children, six sons and one daughter, were born into the Moore family in Missouri, Jonah being the second. In 1852 the father outfitted with ox-teams and wagons and started across the plains with his family, Jonah being then thirteen years of age, and able to make himself useful driving stock and carrying water in camp. The journey was a memorable one for the homeseekers, for on the way the mother succumbed to the strain of travel, and was left in a wayside grave on the Big Dry Sandy. Mournfully the procession proceeded upon its way, the travelers enduring patiently the hardships and deprivations incident to the times and conditions, rendered doubly dreary by a loss which had taken away the wife and mother. The father took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Harrisburg, and, in 1858, moved to Josephine county, Ore., the following year removing to Curry county, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising. In 1873 he bought a small stock ranch in Del Norte county, Cal., which he managed for several years, and upon which he is now living retired, at the age of eighty-six.

Two years after coming to Oregon with his parents, in 1852, Jonah W. Moore started out on his own responsibility, securing work on different farms in Linn county. His mining career began in the dry diggings near Grant's Pass, in 1859, and when the Salmon river excitement was at its height he made his way thither. After taking an inventory of the situation he made up his mind that there was not gold enough to go around, and that he stood a better chance running a pack train to the mines than in trying to work them, and this he did with fair success for five years. In 1867 he began mining again, and the next year came to the Willamette valley, and in Clackamas county married Elizabeth Garrett, a native daughter of the state. Thereafter he engaged in farming for some time, and, in 1887, began what proved to be the most satisfactory part of his career as a miner. He discovered the great Lucky Boy. How great was his good fortune may be imagined when it is known that upon disposing of his share in the mine, in 1901, to F. C. Sharkey, he realized $20,000. Few men in the state are more familiar with the mines in the west than is Mr. Moore, who has traveled many hundreds of miles from one camp to another, and has feasted in the light of many camp-fires. Fortunately he has not followed a phantom fortune, idealized by an overwrought brain or exaggerated expectations, but has made his work count, and placed himself beyond the reach of want.

Five children were born of the first marriage of Mr. Moore, and of these, Anna May is the wife of C. B. Wilson, of Oregon City; Ivy is the wife of W. W. Waters, of Brownsville; Ettie married S. B. Sawyer, of Brownsville; R. A. owns and manages a grocery store of this town, and Richard Irvin is deceased. The present Mrs. Moore was formerly Mrs. J. W. Hanley, a native of Washington, and daughter of Marcus McMillen, a native of Ohio. Mr. McMillen crossed the plains from his home in Michigan, in 1852, locating in the state of Washington, where he eventually died. Through her marriage with John W. Hanley four children were born: William H. and Ernest F., deceased; Lennie L. and Leo W. Mr. Moore has always subscribed to the principles of the Republican party, but his time has been too much taken up in out-of-the-way places to permit of any political service. For many years he has been identified with the Encampment, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In religion he is a Baptist. Mr. Moore has the sincerity and straightforwardness of a large-hearted and tolerant miner, augmented by generous and admirable traits of character. He has found many opportunities to do kindly and disinterested acts, in consequence of which there are many living in different parts of the northwest who gladly acknowledge their obligations to him. Mr. Moore has recently purchased 16,000 shares in the Lucky Boy mine, and still keeps up his interest in mining circles.

M. S. PEERY. Four miles southeast of Dayton is the farm of two hundred and fifty-seven acres belonging to M. S. Peery, recognized as one of the stable and reliable members of the agricultural community of Yamhill county. From ancestors similarly engaged Mr. Peery inherits a special aptitude for his chosen work, augmented by a practical home training on the paternal farm in Missouri, where he was born October 15, 1852.

Wilson Peery, the father of M. S., was born in Kentucky in 1827, and at a very early date removed with his parents to Missouri, when that state was as yet an undeveloped prairie. As he was one of a large family of children it was necessary for him to assist in the maintenance of the family, which he cheerily did, remaining at home until his marriage, which united him with Miss Maria Compton, who was also a native of Missouri. For several years they kept house and farmed in the vicinity of Pattonsburg, Daviess county, in which town they sold their general commodities, receiving in exchange sugar and other staples. In 1863, Mr. Peery disposed of his Missouri land and prepared to come to Oregon with ox and horse teams, and during the long trip, covering six months, had a comparatively fortunate time. The extent of their unpleasant experiences was the appropriation of some of their stock by the Indians, but otherwise they were unmolested, thanks to the more settled condition of the country. For a year the family located in Clackamas county, and in 1864, removed to Linn county, remaining there for seven years. In 1871, Mr. Peery retired from farming and took up his residence in Dayton, where his death occurred when he was seventy-one years of age. His wife died when sixty-eight years old. Both were members of the Baptist Church, in which they were active workers. Of their eleven children, James is deceased; Hiram lives in Yamhill county; Archibald is a druggist in McMinnville; Jefferson is deceased; M. S. is next in order of birth; Amanda is the wife of B. Harris, of Dayton; Eliza, Julia, Rebecca and Martha are deceased; and America is the wife of Alvis Gains, of Yamhill county.

Directly after his marriage, in 1871, to Rachel Kimsey, a native of the state and a daughter of Alvis Kimsey, represented elsewhere in this work, Mr. Peery went to housekeeping on the farm which is still his home. He has a pleasant rural residence, fine barns and out-buildings, and his land is under a high state of cultivation, about one hundred and sixty acres being used for general crops. Shorthorn cattle, Cotswold sheep and Poland-China hogs are raised in large numbers, and contribute a neat yearly income to the owner. Mr. Peery is a Democrat in national politics, and he has served officially as a member of the school board and as road supervisor. Fraternally, he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mrs. Rachel Peery died February 16, 1900, having become the mother of three children: Nellie became the wife of Prestoen Lung, of Polk county; Anna is deceased, and Maud became the wife of Martin Rhodes, of Seattle. October 1, 1901, Mr. Peery married Hattie Dorsey, the daughter of George Dorsey, of Yamhill county, and one daughter, Mildred, has blessed this union.

ROBERT N. MAGNESS. A native son of Oregon who is reflecting credit upon early teachings and the community in which he lives, is Robert N. Magness, owner of one hundred and ninety-two acres of land upon which he is engaged in farming and stock and hop raising. During the last year he had twenty thousand pounds of hops, gathered from twelve acres of land. Born near Springfield, Lane county, Ore., December 15, 1855, Mr. Magness is a son of John R. and Virginia (Byrd) Magness, natives of Independence county, Ark., and the former of whom is mentioned at length in the sketch of A. P. Magness, brother of R. N.

Mr. Magness received a public school education and was reared without motherly care, for this best friend of any boy died when he was only three years of age. In 1868 he went to the mines with his father and brother, spending the greatest part of his time in Canyon City, Ore. While the older men prospected and mined he worked as a clerk in a grocery store, and also herded sheep, and in this wild and practicably untamable region gained considerable business and general knowledge. Returning to Marion county in 1871, he continued to make that his home until 1876, when he came to Yamhill county and worked on a farm by the month. He also became interested in logging and a general lumber business, and in 1885 determined to settle down and become permanently identified with Yamhill county. After his marriage with Ollie Barndrick, a native of McMinnville, and of Holland descent, Mr. Magness lived for five years on a farm near Wheatland, and then bought the farm upon which he has since expended so much well-directed effort. The improvements are entirely of his own making, and include one of the pleasantest and most modern residences in this part of the county. Mr. Magness also has fine barns, implements and out-houses, and is well equipped for what he intends shall be an extensive and practical farming enterprise.

In political affiliations Mr. Magness is independent, and has never evinced a desire to reap political honors. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of the Maccabees, and a welcome visitor in the lodge at Amity. His wife, who is a member of the Evangelical Church, is the mother of eight children, in order of birth being as follows: Mabel, who is attending school at Salem; Carrie, Josie, Bertha, John, Nettie, Virginia and Adeline, all of whom are at home with their parents.

SAMUEL R. BAXTER. One of the prominent and influential machinists and blacksmiths of Yamhill county is Samuel R. Baxter, owner and manager of an enterprising business in Dayton, and also extensively identified with Republican political affairs. Mr. Baxter was born in Jefferson county, Ind., March 31, 1830, his father, James, having been born in Montgomery county, Ohio, where Dayton now stands, April 5, 1810, and died in Dayton, Ore., February 27, 1903. The paternal grandfather, James, was born in Ireland, and emigrated to America in time to participate in the Revolutionary war, some of his brothers also taking part in the same momentous struggle for independence. James Baxter married Martha M. Stott, affectionately called by her friends Patsy, a name which clung to her up to the time of her death on the home place in 1892, at the age of eighty-one years. She was born near Frankfort, Ky., and was the daughter of a farmer who emigrated to Indiana from Kentucky, and there married and died. Mrs. Baxter was the mother of nine children, four sons and five daughters, Samuel R. being the oldest of those living. Of the other children, Rebecca Long lives in Iowa; Mrs. Sarah Perkins lives in Indiana; Mrs. Nancy Jones lives in Dayton, Ore.; and Raleigh is a farmer of Indiana.

Samuel R. Baxter received his preliminary education in Jefferson county, Ind., and in 1851 crossed the plains with his brother, William, there being twenty wagons in the train, under command of Captain Bob Hariford. At the expiration of six months the party landed in Oregon City, September 10, and from there Mr. Baxter went into Columbia county and located near St. Helens, there becoming identified with the firm of Crosby & Smith, builders of saw mills. He was well qualified for this work, having in his younger days learned the blacksmith's trade in Indiana, and for a year took an active interest in the erection of saw mills for the company. Following this employment he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Troutdale, and at one time engaged in blacksmith work on the corner of Second and Morrison streets, Portland. Here he was obliged to cut down fir trees in order to erect his shop, but the effort was worth while, for during his three years' stay in the then small town of Portland he managed to work up quite a paying trade. In 1858 he engaged in blacksmithing in Dayton, Ore., and has since been an integral part of this town's steady growth. At present he has a machine shop in connection, and at all times of the year he has about all the work that he can turn out.

In 1860 Mr. Baxter was united in marriage with Nancy Comegys, of Polk county, Ore., and a native of St. Charles county, Mo. Mrs. Baxter, who died in 1888, at the age of fifty-six years, was the mother of two daughters, Mrs. Delia Converse, of Eugene, Ore., and Edna, who is living at home. As a Republican Mr. Baxter has taken an active interest in his adopted town, and in fact with the various locations in which he has lived since his voting days. His first active service was inaugurated in Yamhill county during 1878-79-80, when he was serving as a commissioner of Yamhill. For many years he has been a member of the school board, and has also been mayor of Dayton on two occasions. For twenty-five years he has been justice of the peace of Dayton. Mr. Baxter is popular and well known fraternally, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows for thirty years. He has passed through all of the chairs of the order, and has been a member of the Grand Lodge. In 1880 the Baxter family was augmented by the parents of Mr. Baxter, who came from their home in the middle west. This congenial and very hospitable household was saddened by the death of the senior Mr. Baxter February 27, 1903. Mr. Baxter is a man whose word receives the same consideration as would his bond, and who exemplifies in his personality and life a high order of western citizenship.

JUDGE L. FLINN. The cautious, thoughtful and conservative elements so well known in New England towns, but which is less widely diffused west of the Mississippi, have been advantageously utilized in the upbuilding of Albany by Judge L. Flinn, judge of Linn county from 1880 until 1884, and for many years a prominent legal practitioner, banker, and general man of affairs. Born in Ireland in 1837, and arriving in America with his parents while yet a boy, Judge Flinn was reared on a farm in Sudbury, Rutland county, Vt., and was educated in the public schools and Middlebury College. As was the custom in those days, the colleges gave long vacations during the winter season to enable the students to engage in teaching, and Mr. Flinn availed himself of this opportunity. Soon after his graduation in 1863, he removed to Elizabethtown, N. Y., and studied law in the office of Robert S. Hale. In the meantime having determined to spend his future among surroundings offering greater opportunities, he started west via Panama and arrived in San Francisco in November, 1864. He continued his journey northward and spent the first winter in Linn county, and the following summer taught school in Polk county. In 1865 he removed to Albany and began teaching a small school held in one room, but which grew in attendance until in 1868 it required three rooms. His school duties had been combined with further professional researches, and in 1865 he was admitted to practice at the bar at Salem, in 1868 forming a partnership with J. C. Powell. At the end of ten years he severed his connection with Mr. Powell and practiced alone for a year. He then entered into partnership with George E. Chamberlain, under the firm name of Flinn & Chamberlain. This association continued until 1888, when in connection with Mr. Chamberlain and S. E. Young he purchased of John Conner the First National Bank, Mr. Flinn becoming president, Mr. Chamberlain cashier, and Mr. Young vice president. The bank's charter expired, and was renewed April 2, 1903, but in the meantime it has known a remarkably successful era, having increased the capital stock from $50,000 to $80,000, and erected in 1889 the present building, with a frontage of sixty-six feet. It weathered the financial panic of 1893, when so many similar institutions throughout the country were wrecked. Among other interests which have profited by the sagacious counsel and practical co-operation of Judge Flinn may be mentioned the Albany Woolen Mills Company, the Albany Water Company, in which he is a stockholder and of which company he was formerly treasurer, and the Albany College, of which he was a member of the board of trustees for many years. Besides the judgeship, to which he was elected by his Republican constituents, he has served as mayor of Albany for one term, and has been a member of the school board for several years.

Judge Flinn married in Salem, Cynthia S. Church, who was born in Pennsylvania, and is a sister of Stephen and C. P. Church, of Salem. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Flinn, of whom Stephen, the only son, died in his junior year at Princeton College; Anna W., a graduate of Albany College and the Leland Stanford University, is living at home; Orpha J., also a graduate of Albany College and Leland Stanford University, is now the wife of A. C. Schmett of Corvallis, Ore.; and Ruth, a graduate of the Albany College, is living at home.

W. W. NICKELL. The various occupations which have filled the busy life of W. W. Nickell, in all of which he has achieved commendable success, entitle him to the consideration which he at present receives from the agricultural and business community of Yamhill county. He became an occupant of his present farm in 1891, and his location, eight and a half miles south of McMinnville, and four and a half miles west of Amity, is most advantageous from many standpoints, being among the most productive soil in the county. The place is known as the old Robert Henderson donation claim, and Mr. Nickell is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, being an extensive raiser of Cotswold sheep and Shorthorns. He is also interested in a threshing machine, and his farm is fitted with machinery for public feed chopping.

A native of Henry county, Iowa, Mr. Nickell was born June 27, 1859, a son of James McD. and Elizabeth (McClure) Nickell, natives of Jackson county, Ohio, and born, respectively, Deember 27, 1822, and April 18, 1818. They were married in Ohio, September 21, 1843, and removed to Iowa about 1844, there taking up crude land which they improved, and which continued to be their home for the remainder of their lives.

The father lived to be forty-two years old, and the mother sixty-two. There were but three children in the family, of whom Mary J. and Benjamin F. are deceased.

As opportunity offered W. W. Nickell attended the public schools of Wayland, although his education was curtailed at the age of fourteen, when he applied himself to learning the millwright's trade. Thereafter he worked at his trade for many years, and, being frugal and thrifty, managed to save quite a little money. October 1, 1879, he married, at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, Mary L. Martin, a native of Iowa, with whom he continued to live in Iowa for a couple of years. His next place of residence was Winfield, Iowa, where he engaged in the mercantile business for three years, and afterward followed his trade for a couple of years. In 1885, Mr. Nickell came to Oregon and settled for a couple of years in McMinnville, and, as heretofore stated, located on his present farm in 1891. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nickell, Martin McD., Wellman D., Blanche M., Ina E., and Franklin D. Mr. Nickell is a Republican in political affiliation, and is at present serving as clerk of the school board. Fraternaly, he is associated with the Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which latter organization he has taken the degree of honor. In his adopted state, Mr. Nickell has a firmly established reputation for integrity, caution, sterling business methods and progressiveness as an agriculturist.

ROBERT HALL SCOTT, manager of the Woodburn Roller Mills, is one of the men who have been closely identified with the best interests of the Willamette valley for a long period, and occupies a prominent place among the progressive enterprising men who are certain materially to impress their worth upon any community. Heredity and early environment had much to do with fashioning the career of Mr. Scott, and so closely has he always been allied with the milling industry that any other occupation would now be foreign to him.

Mr. Scott was born January 5, 1875, in the center of a thriving industry at Scott's Mills, Marion county, Ore., a beautiful hamlet founded by his father, and comes of sturdy Scotch ancestry. His father, Robert H. Scott, Sr., was born in Saniston, Roxburyshire, Scotland, October 22, 1826, and was reared and educated in his native land. At an early age he learned the millers' trade. In 1849 he emigrated to Canada where he engaged in milling with considerable success until 1856, and in that year came to Oregon, locating in Westport, where he engaged in the operation of a sawmill until 1866. He then established the mills at the point which has since been inseparably associated with his name, and where, from 1866 to 1892, he bent all his energies to building up a community of interests which he might leave as a heritage to his children. He established an exceptional reputation for good fellowship and business integrity, and accomplished more toward developing the resources of that locality and fostering its various important enterprises than any other individual who ever participated in the erection of the great industrial and commercial fabric of the Pacific northwest. In the latter part of the year 1892 he removed to Woodburn and erected the Woodburn Roller Mills, which are devoted to the manufacture of a high grade of flour; and in connection with this industry built a large warehouse. To this mill and its operation Mr. Scott gave the same careful attention which he had bestowed upon his previous undertakings, and his work in this direction proved to be one of the most important features in the industrial life of Marion county. He lived to be seventy-one years, eleven months and twenty days of age, and is recalled as one of the best business men of the county, and as the possessor of sterling personal characteristics. April 11, 1855, he was united in marriage with Ann West, who was born near Quebec, Canada, May 22, 1835, and whose father, John West, was a native of Scotland. John West came to America in early life, and after an extended and successful business career in the Dominion located at Westport, Ore., of which he was the founder, and which bears his name. He built a canning establishment, and was among the first to can fish in Oregon, and was the inventor of useful appliances used in this connection. He died in Westport in 1888, at the age of eighty-six years.

Immediately after the completion of his course in the public schools, Robert H. Scott, Jr., attended the Portland Business College in Portland, and thus, equipped with his milling experience dating from the early years of his life, was prepared for any emergency which the future might present. He succeeded to the management of the mill now owned by his mother and brother, and which is equipped with modern machinery. It has three stories and a basement, and the roller process is used. The principal brands produced are White Rose and Snowdrop, both of which have an extensive sale throughout the northwest and are shipped in large quantities to foreign markets. The mills consume nearly all the wheat produced in their vicinity, and the management also imports from other sections large quantities of this cereal.

June 1, 1898, Mr. Scott was married, in Eugene, Ore., to Maud M. Bonney, a native of Monmouth, Ore., and a daughter of Charles Reuben Bonney. The latter is also a native of Oregon, and at the present time is engaged in the harness trade at Portland, Ore. Mr. Scott is a member of several fraternal and social organizations in Woodburn, but the one to which he devotes the most of his attention is Woodburn Lodge No. 102, I. O. O. F. In politics he is a Democrat, and has served as city treasurer of Woodburn for one term. He is one of the careful, progressive and honored younger citizens of Marion county, and unquestionably will continue to exert a wide influence in business and social circles. With the traditions of his family to encourage and inspire him, a successful future seems doubly assured. Mr. Scott and his wife have one daughter, Rowena, born May 21, 1903.

EDMUND WOOD. A worthy representative of a pioneer family of Yamhill county is Edmund Wood, born back in the hills of Tennessee, in Campbell county, January 1, 1836, the son of John P. and Amy (Witt) Wood. When this son was but nine years old the family moved to Missouri, remaining there for two years and then setting out for the great west, to endure all the privations, hardships and perils of a seven months' journey across the plains for the sake of the home they hoped to make at the journey's end. Besides Edmund there were four other children who crossed the plains at the same time, 1847, namely: Joseph, now deceased; Henry; Sarah Lady, deceased; and Mary E., wife of G. W. Branson. Upon reaching Oregon the family located in Yamhill county on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, two miles west of Sheridan. Here Mr. Wood's father lived for twenty-one years, giving the strength of his early manhood to the hard proposition of Oregon forests and fastnesses, clearing the one and conquering the other until, in 1868, the year he left the place for a retired life, his farm presented the appearance of a well-kept eastern farm, with the difference of the many broad acres stretching away on every side evidencing the plenty of this western land. The death of Mr. Wood's mother occurred on the home place five years after they reached Oregon. Mr. Wood, Sr., moved to McMinnville when he left the farm, where he died in 1892, being eighty years old.

At eighteen years of age Edmund left home, not from necessity but from choice, going to Polk county, where he secured work with Mr. Savage, with whom he remained for eight years, evidently doing justice to the good opinion of his employer. But with the restlessness of a young man who has seen but little of the world he left Mr. Savage at the expiration of this time, going to Walla Walla, Wash., remaining there just one year. After this comparatively brief period of wandering, he came back to the county chosen by his father for their early home, and as if to anchor himself there, he bought one hundred and sixty acres in Yamhill county, five miles north of Willamina, where he has since spent the greater part of his life. Later he increased his farm to two hundred and seventy-six acres on which he is actively engaged in sheep-raising and general farming.

Mr. Wood has been quite active in local politics, holding through Democratic influence the position of road supervisor, also serving as school director for sixteen years, a period of faithfulness not often met with in rural districts. He also received the appointment as superintendent of the farm of the state penitentiary from Governors Grover and Thayer, which position he held creditably for eight years. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Sheridan. In 1882 he was married to Miss Matilda Shook and their union was blessed with four children, the eldest of whom, John, died in infancy. The three living are Lettie, Grover and Andrew.

GEORGE F. EARHART. Among the sons of Ohio who have contributed to the agricultural development of Oregon may be mentioned George F. Earhart, for many years an expert sawmill man, and since 1886 the owner of a farm of ninety-two acres three miles northeast of McMinnville. A native of Darke county, Ohio, Mr. Earhart was born December 22, 1836, a son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Scribner) Earhart, and grandson of George Earhart, a very early settler in Darke county.

Samuel and Elizabeth Earhart were reared on near-by farms in Darke county, and as children enjoyed the same pastimes and attended the same little school house. Samuel was born in Virginia and his wife in Connecticut, and both removed to Darke county with their parents when very young. The maternal grandfather, Azer Scribner, was a soldier in the war of 1812, and paid the price of his life for patriotism, as he was killed at the battle of Bunker Hill. After the death of Samuel Earhart, the support of the family naturally fell upon the shoulders of the children, of whom there were six boys and five girls, George F. being the fifth oldest, and at that time sixteen years of age. With his brother William he undertook the principal management of the farm, and before leaving home at the age of twenty-two, managed between times to serve an apprenticeship of three years to a carpenter. For six years he followed his trade in Darke county, in connection with which he bought and operated a sawmill for four years. He then took up his residence in Polk county, Iowa, where he engaged in the sawmill business for about nineteen years. The sawmill disposed of, he located in Vernon county, Mo., and after two years, in 1886, located in Oregon. After looking around for a desirable location, he finally decided upon the farm upon which he has since spent the most useful and profitable years of his life. His property is equipped with a comfortable residence, good barns and outhouses, and with all needful agricultural implements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and is one of the practical and successful farmers of this locality.

In 1861 Mr. Earhart was united in marriage with Minerva G. Powell, a native of Darke county, Ohio, who is the mother of three sons and two daughters, of whom Hattie is the wife of William McConkey, of McMinnville; the other children being: Ira, Leonard, Charles and Mary Kate. Mr. Earhart is a Republican in politics, and has held the offices of school director and school supervisor. He was elected county road master in January, 1902. Fraternaly he is associated with the Masons of Lafayette, and is treasurer of the organization. In religion he is a member and trustee of the Evangelical Church of Lafayette.

PHILIP R. FENDALL. Upon the farm which is now his home and which has been in the possession of the family since 1845, Philip R. Fendall was born February 5, 1857. This ownership, considered short in the east, is long for the west, and like instances are comparatively few in Oregon. His father, Charles E. Fendall, one of the best known of the pioneers of Oregon, was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1822, and was reared and educated in his native state. In 1841 he became a resident of Missouri, and during his two years there accumulated a great deal of enthusiasm and information concerning the land beyond the Rocky mountains. His trip to the west was accomplished after much preparation and was undertaken in the spring of 1843, under the guidance of Captain Nesbeth. The greater part of the journey he rode astride a horse, and he was one of the hunters of the party, his skill with the gun resulting in the replenishment of many empty larders. He brought in game of all kinds to cheer the weary travelers assembled around camp fires, and made himself generally useful as only a hale and decidedly good tempered boy is capable of doing.

C. E. Fendall landed in Yamhill county and with an old friend, N. K. Sitton, lived on a ranch on Panther creek for two years. In 1845 he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres on the Yamhill river in Polk county, now owned by the Scroggin brothers, and here he erected a log cabin to which he brought his newly wedded wife, Amanda (Rogers) Fendall, a native of Iowa, and whose father crossed the plains in 1845. Here Mr. Fendall spent a few years when he traded for the farm on the Willamina, now occupied by his son, P. R., and here his seventy-three years were rounded out amid the prosperity brought about through his own unflagging zeal. After coming to Oregon he continued to hunt as on the plains, and this constituted his chief source of diversion. In 1849 he availed himself of the mining chances of California, and for two years was fairly successful along the American river. In 1857 he started out to re-stock his farm, and in order to secure the best on the market, made a trip back to Kentucky via the plains, and brought back with him a band of Durham cattle. The severe winter of 1861-62 was disastrous to the cattle, and he lost them all. Again he went to California in 1869-70, so in change his life had its compensations and was relieved from the monotony felt by the average agriculturist. Of the thirteen children born to himself and wife Oscar is deceased; George F. lives in Ashland; Reilly Y. lives in Yamhill county; William E. is a resident of Lane county; P. R. is next in order; Alice became the wife of Lawson Maddux, now deceased; Elbridge G. lives in the vicinity of Newberg; Charles L. is deceased. Laura is the wife of O. E. Highland, of Yamhill county; Annie K. is the wife of Mart High of Salem; Nathan K. is deceased; Frank lives at Seattle; and Fred was accidentally killed. Mrs. Fendall is still living and is seventy-three years of age. Her married life extended over many years, and started in when she was fourteen.

Until his marriage, January 12, 1881, with Laura Savage, Philip R. Fendall lived on his father's farm, but thereafter removed to Washington, where he engaged in the stock business for two years. He then returned to the old home farm on the Willamina, three miles from the village of that name, where he has since lived, and where he now owns five hundred and eighty acres, three hundred and fifty acres being in bottom land. He is engaged in general farming, stock, hog and sheep raising, and has been very successful in the various departments of activity represented on his farm. His property is equipped with modern buildings and machinery, and the evidences of good management are everywhere apparent. Five children are being reared in a practical home atmosphere and receiving such educational advantages as their ambitious parents can provide for them, and are named as follows: Alvie, Kate, Lottie, Richard and Ulric. Willie died at the age of two years. In political affiliation Mr. Fendall is a Democrat. His wife is a member of the Baptist Church.

LESTER POTTER, who is identified with agricultural interests in Yamhill county, was born in Cortland county, N. Y., January 23, 1839, so that almost the width of the continent separates him from the place of his nativity. His parents removed to Wisconsin when he was but five years of age and he was reared to manhood near Oshkosh, that state. In 1859, at the age of twenty years, he crossed the plains with an ox team, the spirit of adventure and the hope of entering upon a successful career leading to this step. He left the train at Umatilla, where he secured a position to carry a chain on a government survey, this work occupying his attention for six weeks. On the expiration of that period he went to Oregon City, where he was employed for a time and then made his way into southern Oregon, where he was engaged in prospecting and mining through the winter. In the spring he returned to Oregon City, where he again became connected with a surveying party, spending the summer in Washington. In the fall he went to Portland and worked in a logging camp for a few weeks, while during the winter season he was employed as an assistant in the penitentiary for four months. When spring again came Mr. Potter went to the mines of Idaho, where he prospected until fall, at which time he made his way to Florence, Idaho. For a year he worked in the mines at that place, making considerable money during the period there passed.

Mr. Potter next returned to his home in Wisconsin by way of the Panama and New York route. He remained for a year with his people in the Badger state and then again came to Oregon, making his way by water to Portland. When he had passed a few months in that city he began placer mining in the Boise basin, where he continued for two years, his labors there resulting in a good financial return. He then went back to Portland and drove stock from the Willamette valley to Victoria, British Columbia, his time being thus occupied for eight months. He then determined to marry and establish a home of his own.

It was in 1867 that Mr. Potter was joined in wedlock to Miss Sarah H. Southmayer and in the fall of that year he settled upon the farm where he has since resided with the exception of a period of three and a half years which were passed in the mines in Sumpter, Ore., where he owned one-quarter interest and was treasurer of the Sumpter Stage and Transfer Company for one year. He also owned considerable property. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Potter has been blessed with four children: Milton W., who has a ranch in Gopher valley; Minnie, the wife of J. B. Fryer, of Sumpter, Ore.; Daisy, who is at home; and Flora, the wife of L. Swiggett of Sumpter, who is interested in mines.

Mr. Potter is the owner of a rich and valuable tract of land, comprising five hundred and thirty-seven acres in the Gopher valley, seven miles north of Sheridan. It is located on Deer creek, so that there is a water supply and he is engaged extensively in the raising of cattle, goats and sheep. He makes a specialty of Cotswold sheep and has a number of fine registered animals. He thoroughly understands the needs of stock, follows progressive methods in his work and is now a leading as well as prosperous representative of his line of business in this part of Oregon. In politics an earnest Republican, he has been elected and served in a number of local offices, including that of school clerk, school director and road supervisor. He filled the latter position for many years and has been largely instrumental in improving the roads in this portion of the county. Through the traits that go to make up honorable manhood he has gained the friendship and favor of many with whom he has come in contact.

WILLIAM SAVAGE, father of Mrs. P. R. Fendall, the latter of whom is one of the prominent pioneer women of Yamhill county, was born in Mexico, N. Y., September 18, 1826, and lived in his native city until his seventeenth year. He then removed to Indiana, where he taught school for a couple of winters, and where he engaged in farming until his removal to Missouri in 1844.

In the spring of 1845 Mr. Savage joined the few who were then seeking to make their home in the west, and with John Ramage crossed the plains with ox teams, in Yamhill county working for Mr. Ramage for two years. He then removed to Polk county where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, and was fairly established as an agriculturist when the cry of gold began to agitate everyone within earshot of California. After a year's trial in the mines along the American river he returned to his claim and farmed until 1867, and that year went to Texas with Richard Perkins, who assisted him in bringing eight hundred steers from the great southern cattle state. These cattle were disposed of on the ranges of Montana, and here Mr. Savage went into extensive cattle interests, which netted him a substantial fortune. In 1891 he entered the arena of finance in Oregon, and with his hard earned money established the Dallas City Bank, of which he was president up to the time of his death, September 20, 1896. He was a man of leading characteristics, and his strict integrity, truly western grit and enterprise, and unusual resourcefulness, made themselves felt in the communities in which he lived in the west.

From the organization of the party Mr. Savage was identified with its most 'progressive principles, and his fitness for official recognition was repeatedly demonstrated. He attended the first Republican meeting in Oregon, and during his two years' service in the legislature, ably furthered the best interests of those who had honored him with their support. He was chiefly instrumental in securing the erection of the Oregon Insane Asylum, now one of the best institutions of its kind in the state. Also he was one of the organizers of the Grange in Oregon, and was master of it for five years.

In 1852 Mr. Savage married Sarah Brown, a native of Illinois, and daughter of James H. Brown, a pioneer of 1850. Ten children were born of this union, of whom Charley is deceased; Edson lives in eastern Washington; Gibson is a rancher in the same locality in Washington; James lives in Polk county; Eugene is deceased; Mrs. Fendall is next in order; William lives in Tacoma; Sarah is the wife of J. B. Stone, of Polk county; Daniel lives at Willamina; and Bud is a member of the livery firm of Savage & Stewart of Sheridan. Mrs. Savage survives her husband, and is living in Sheridan, at the age of sixty-eight.

SYLVESTER CANNON. Since coming to Oregon in 1851 Sylvester Cannon has engaged in various occupations peculiar to the west, and has experienced many of the adventures which he came prepared to meet. Nineteen years of age when the opportunity came to leave the Vermilion county farm in Illinois, where he was born May 14, 1833, he welcomed a change from the monotony of farming, and joyfully anticipated the success which he has realized. Across the plains he drove a team of five yoke of oxen for Martin Payne, thus earning his food and lodging from day to day, an expediency to which many ambitious men resorted in the very early days.

Arriving in Clackamas county after six months of comparatively pleasant travel, Mr. Cannon found employment in a lumber camp for a few months, and then came to Linn county, where he associated himself with a surveying party which was engaged in laying out township and section lines. Beginning in an humble capacity, he remained with the party about four years, in time becoming a practical surveyor. This occupation was interrupted by the outbreak of the Indian war in 1855, when he volunteered in the fall in Company H, First Mounted Oregon Regiment, under Captain Leighton, and served until May, 1856. During the greater part of the service he was in Washington along the Upper Columbia, taking part in the terrible four days' fight at Walla Walla. After the war he purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land four miles east of Albany. He was married in June, 1856, to Johanna Cox, and brought his newly wedded wife to his promising farm. Seven years later he sold his farm and bought land near Salem, but not finding it satisfactory he returned at the end of a year to Linn county, and bought four hundred and eighty acres of land partially improved. In 1891 he settled on his present farm, where he has made many improvements, and where he has a comfortable and pleasant home.

By his first marriage five children were born into the family of Mr. Cannon, of whom Nellie is the wife of George Maston of Albany, and the mother of two children, Vida and George W.; Minnie is the wife of Dr. Cornelius; Malisa, deceased, was the wife of Jess Enyart; Jennie is the wife of S. G. Marvin, to whom have been born two children, Donald and Lucille; and Anderson M. is engaged in the practice of law at Medford, and married Miss Vesta Mason, daughter of D. P. Mason of Albany. She died leaving one child, Carolyn.

March 28, 1886, Mr. Cannon married Martha A. Hunter, widow of Aaron Hunter, and daughter of George Huston, who was born in McDonough county, Ill., and crossed the plains in 1853. Mr. Huston settled on a claim in Linn county, and afterward married Lizzie Phipps, who came across the plains with her parents in 1852. He served in the Indian wars, and prospered in the west, his death occurring on his well improved farm in July, 1900, at the age of sixty-nine years. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hunter, of whom George H. is deceased; Lizzie is engaged in the millinery business in Brownsville; Charles L. is a graduate of the Portland Business College; and Glenn O. The only child of Mr. Cannon's second marriage is Arletha G.

For the past sixteen years Mr. Cannon has been a director of the Farmers' Warehouse Association, and has been instrumental in greatly increasing its efficiency and its capacity for aiding in the disposal of the products of the community. He is a charter member of the Tangent Grange, and in politics is identified with the Republican party. Possessing great capacity for industry, practical business judgment, and unswerving integrity, it is not surprising that Mr. Cannon can lay claim to the consideration and respect of his many friends and associates in the west.

WILLIAM M. RUSSELL. Not always does it happen that the immigrant, passing from the associations and relations of his native country, finds in the one to which he goes those pleasing attributes that characterized his early recollections, for the dual reason that if the surroundings are similar one is inclined to contrast this similarity, with an unconscious disparagement toward the latter; if different, the old ways naturally seem the best. William M. Russell might almost be said to have escaped an inherited tendency along these lines, for it has been his fortune to be an emigrant as well as a pioneer, following in the steps of his paternal grandfather, who emigrated from England in the eighteenth century, settling in Virginia, and meeting with that unhappy fate of an immigrant, in that he never forgot the land of his birth. He did not continue to live in a country that grew more and more distasteful as the war of independence continued unabated and the ardent feelings of those about him made it impossible to remain neutral in the struggle and in 1777 he returned to England, leaving, however, a touch of American independence in the blood of his family, which responded to the call of the country in later years against the flag the early Russells served. Henry Russell, his son, born near Richmond, Va., served in the war of 1812, beginning as a private and later rising to the rank of a sergeant, bearing away with him a slight evidence of the marksmanship of his English brethren in the shape of a wound in the leg, which, however, did not incapacitate him for good work in the peaceful times that followed. While in Virginia he worked at his trade, which was that of a carpenter and joiner, but after his marriage he went to Ohio investing in land, where he carried on general farming in connection with his trade. Eight children were born to himself and wife, two daughters and six sons, the youngest of whom was William M., born near Chillicothe, July 2, 1832, his mother dying when he was but two weeks old. In 1836 the family removed to Indiana, locating in Tippecanoe county, where they remained on a purchase of sixty acres until Mr. Russell's death in 1848, in his sixty-fourth year. Through all his life Mr. Russell was strong in the faith of the principles of the Democratic party.

After the death of his mother, William was reared by his elder brothers and sisters until his father's second marriage, when he found a mother's love and care in the good woman who filled the vacant place. He continued to make his home with his father until the latter's death, passing the years in the common schools of Indiana. Realizing the necessity for striking out in the world for himself, he commenced farming at the age of sixteen years, in which occupation he continued until 1852, leaving then for the far west. With six wagons drawn by ox-teams, the party made the trip, starting March 1, and arriving in North Yamhill, Ore., October 20, where the heart of the young traveler was gladdened by the sight of a boyhood friend, Sam Roberts, who had previously left his eastern home, settling in this location. The ensuing winter William worked for John Perkins in a flour mill, following in the summer with farm work for the same man. During the Indian troubles in 1855, this young emigrant, with no trace of the trait that distinguished his grandfather—love for the land of his birth rather than solicitude for the country of his adoption—enlisted with the troops that went into the tangled wildernesses of the west, serving in eastern Oregon and Washington in Company E, First Oregon Regiment, under the command of Captain Hembree. At the close of the war he returned to Yamhill county, where, in September, 1858, he married Miss Elvira Perkins, born in Montgomery county, Ind., and whose parents crossed the plains in 1844. Four children were born to them, John H., Norris G., Lizzie Prine, all of North Yamhill, and Lucretia, deceased.

In 1866 Mr. Russell bought the farm of two hundred and fifty acres in the Pike valley, where he now makes his home. He first bought nine hundred and fifty acres, the greater part of which he divided among his children, selling the remainder. Mr. Russell is engaged in general farming, hop cultivation and stock-raising, forty acres of the farm in cultivation, and fourteen devoted to hops. In the active life that Mr. Russell has led in the west, always lending himself to every movement that had for its end the welfare of his community, giving up personal ease and comfort to serve the public at its demand, he has proven himself a pioneer in nature as in name a patriot and one of the many men of sterling qualities, without whom Oregon would not be to-day the flourishing commonwealth that commands the admiration of her sister states. As a Republican Mr. Russell has served his community as road supervisor, school director and school clerk.

ALFRED SMITH. Though recollection cannot carry him back, oft repeated tales have made very clear the long, long trip, comprising more than one third the distance around the globe, which Alfred Smith had made before he reached the location where he now makes his home. Born in the city of Birmingham, Warwickshire, England, May 21, 1836, he crossed the ocean at the age of four years, his father also a native of this shire, emigrating to the United States in the hope of bettering himself in regard to his worldly affairs, a hope that met with fulfillment in the latter years of his life. On their arrival in New York they went at once to Racine county, Wis., locating on a farm, though previous to this time he had been engaged in the prosecution of his trade, which was that of a hatter. He took up one hundred and sixty acres of government land and continued in this location for twenty years, after which he moved to Juneau county, of the same state, amply able to afford the life of retirement to which his inclinations led him. He lived to be eighty-four years old, becoming an American citizen in the same sense of the word that he was once an English, taking an active interest in the events of the day and lending himself to all movements that contributed to the general welfare. He was in entire sympathy with the emancipation movement, being a strong Republican in his political convictions. In his religious views he found his church home with the Congregational denomination. He reared a large family and lived to see them all well settled in life: Samuel W., of Mauston, Wis.; Joseph, a farmer of the same place; Alfred, the subject of this sketch; Philip, who gave his life in active service in the Twenty-second Wisconsin, Company H, during the Civil war; Eliza Fluno, of Juneau county, whose husband is a miller; and Mary Palmerton, who is now a widow engaged in the millinery business in Chicago, Ill.

After the days of his youth were passed—days spent, during the summer time upon the farm, in the winter in the primitive school of Racine county—Alfred left home engaging in work for himself, turning naturally to the cultivation of the soil. Until 1864 he worked among the farmers of the neighborhood, going in the last-named year to join an emigrant train bound for the west. After six months of tedious journeying the party arrived safely in Boise City, Idaho, having been singularly fortunate in escaping the depredations of the Indians while on the trip. For twelve months after his arrival in Idaho, Mr. Smith worked in the mines, going in the fall of 1865 to a farm near Portland, Ore., which he worked for one year. He then bought a farm in Multnomah county, situated on the Columbia river, making this his home for the next four years, his next venture being in Yamhill county, where he invested in nine hundred and ninety-six acres of land located in Moor's valley, about four hundred of which are in active cultivation. For the same number of years that his father had spent on the place that gave him his competency—twenty years—he remained here, engaged in general farming and stock-raising, in 1900 retiring from active life, giving over the duties to his sons.

Mr. Smith was married in 1863 to Miss Sarah Miller, a native of New York, and the children born to them are as follows: Mary E., at home; Charles L., of The Dalles; William B., of Carlton; Samuel P., a veterinary surgeon of North Dakota; Alfred, on the home farm; Arthur C., of McMinnville; and Emma Alexander, of Moore's valley. In his political convictions Mr. Smith follows the example of his father, upholding the principles of the Republican party, and serving in the same as road supervisor and various school offices.

LEVI HAGEY. As one may inherit the color of one's eyes and hair, a peculiarity of disposition, a distaste of certain things, a love of others, so the pioneer instinct is transmitted from generation to generation, giving evidence of its existence in the restlessness of the various members of a family. So true is this pioneer instinct and so forcible in its results, that these men make the best inhabitants of an unsettled country, going out to the congenial work with the inner consciousness in complete accord with the work of the hands. This theory may account for the fact that those of the name of Hagey have always been successful in the work they came to do.

August 15, 1825, Levi Hagey was born in Davie county, N. C., the son of Andrew Hagey, born at the same place in 1800. The father was a farmer, and a few years after his marriage with Catherine Grimes, a native of North Carolina, he emigrated to Indiana, taking land there after the laws of that day, in Putnam county, where he remained for six years. The son, Levi, was then eight years of age, and he recalls quite vividly the trip into Des Moines county, Iowa, where his father purchased land, engaging in general farming. In 1848, dissatisfied with their location, the old people followed their son across the plains, settling in Oregon, where Mrs. Hagey outlived her husband by thirty years, his death occurring in 1851, hers in 1881.

Levi Hagey received his education in the log schools of Iowa, gathering with the schooling process the general information and independence that characterized the pioneer schoolboy, and with his pioneer inheritance coming to the front, he was not long in breaking his old associations and starting for the land of the setting sun, where he felt his ability great enough to overcome the thousand and one obstacles in the way of the success of the young man who came empty-handed into the wilderness. It was literally empty-handed with this young man, who went to St. Joseph, Mo., in 1847, joining an emigrant train of one hundred and twenty wagons, one of which he drove on the seven months' trip to pay for his passage. In the fall of 1847 the train reached Chehalem valley, each man hastening to find a suitable location for his future home. Mr. Hagey took up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres adjoining the town of Dundee, Yamhill county, Ore., and on this location he has ever since remained, finding in those uncultivated fields an outlet for his strong pioneer desires. In March, 1900, he removed to McMinnville, intending to pass the remainder of his days here, having divided his farm among his children, and retaining only seventy-four acres in his own name. March 18, 1847, Mr. Hagey was married to Elizabeth Shuck, a native of Indiana, born in that state March 11, 1826. In 1888 Mrs. Hagey died, leaving a family of seven children: Susan Parrot and Anne Robertson, located on their shares of the old donation claim; Andrew, in Newberg; Jacob, farming on his inheritance; Eliza Grames, in Newberg, Henry, on property acquired through his own efforts, also that of his inheritance; and Peter, who is also farming his share of the old homestead. Mr. Hagey's second marriage occurred August 13, 1891, his wife, Mrs. Emily Chaney, being a native of Polk county, Mo., born March 30, 1834, of the union of David and Mary (Hall) Stockton, natives respectively of Tennessee and Kentucky.

Mr. Hagey has served the public in various ways, holding, through Democratic influence, the position of constable, road supervisor and school director at various times. In his religious views, though not a member of the Lutheran Church, is in sympathy with its teachings, as he was brought up in it and it naturally means more to him than any other. He now makes his home in McMinnville, retired from the active duties of life.

D. B. KINGERY. Among the California ar-gonauts who left their homes in the Mississippi valley in search of the golden fleece was D. B. Kingery, and his life history, if written in detail, would present a picture of early conditions upon the Pacific coast following the discovery of gold. The incidents and events which are to most people matters of history were to him a matter of memory, because he participated in the work of development here, lived through the era when lawlessness reigned to a large extent and gladly welcomed in the period when frontier conditions gave way to those of an advanced civilization. Mr. Kingery was born in Dauphin county, Pa., which was also the birthplace of his father, Daniel Kingery, and of his grandfather. The family is of German descent. The father was a farmer and in 1844 removed with his family to Illinois, proceeding down the Ohio and up the Mississippi rivers. He first located at Albany, Ill., later removed to Union Grove, that state, and then settled near Mount Morris, Ogle county. He was a farmer by occupation and died in Polo, Ill. His wife, who in her maidenhood was Susan Hoover, was born in Pennsylvania and died in Iowa. In their family were twelve children, ten of whom reached years of maturity. John died in McMinnville, Ore.; Andrew J., David and Ephraim all served throughout the Civil war and the last-named was an officer.

D. B. Kingery was the fourth of those who reached adult age and was born February 22, 1835. He remained in the Keystone state until the removal of the family to Illinois, where he attended the pioneer schools. He was reared to farm life, and when quite young was employed in the neighborhood as a farm hand. In 1852 he suffered an attack of gold fever and joined a company that outfitted at Dixon, Ill., securing oxen, wagon and supplies, with which they started in February for the Pacific coast, crossing the Mississippi river at Albany and the Missouri at Council Bluffs, in March. There they had to wait until the grass grew on the California trail in order that there might be feed for the oxen and stock. While en route they had trouble with the Pawnee Indians, who were determined to have some of their possessions, but they successfully disputed the question with them and were allowed to proceed up the North Platte. Cholera also broke out among the party and several died of the disease. They proceeded by way of Sublett's cutoff and the Humboldt river, going one hundred and twenty-five miles into the country and making their own road into northern California.

On the 22nd of August, 1852, Mr. Kingery reached his destination, and at intervals for twenty years he engaged in prospecting and mining, but his time was principally devoted to packing and freighting, to the hotel business and to merchandising. He remained at Shasta City until 1854, when he removed to Trinity county, where he engaged in merchandising and mining. In 1856 he removed to Siskiyou county, Cal., locating on the south fork of Scott river, where he carried on mercantile pursuits for a year. In 1857 he made his first trip to Oregon, riding on a mule over the mountains to Willamette. He purchased cattle in Yamhill county and drove them back over the mountains to Siskiyou county, Cal., to his stock ranch. That fall he sold his stock and returned to Illinois by way of the Panama route and New York, arriving in February, 1858, at the home of his parents, who were then living in Freeport, Ill. In May of the same year he again came to California and once more located on his ranch, comprising two hundred and forty acres. He engaged in the cattle business, in general farming and in mining and freighting.

In the latter business he drove teams of from six to eight horses from Red Bluffs to Yreka, using a toll wagon after the road was built, while prior to that time he had done his packing with mules. Thus various business interests claimed the attention of Mr. Kingery and were successfully conducted by him.

In the regular session of 1880 and the special session of 1881 he was assistant sergeant-at-arms in the California senate, and in the fall of the latter year he returned to Siskiyou county, locating in Napa City, where he resided until 1883, when he located permanently in Oregon and purchased a farm of three hundred and forty-seven acres, seven miles southwest of McMinnville. This was but partially improved and he continued the work of clearing and improving it, devoting his energies to the cultivation of grain and the raising of hogs, cattle and sheep. In 1893 he rented his land, but continued to live on the farm until 1899. He spent that winter in California and upon his return he purchased a residence in McMinnville. In 1901 he engaged in the real-estate and insurance business as a member of the firm of Odell & Kingery, handling both city and farm property.

Mr. Kingery was twice married. In Siskiyou county, Cal., he wedded Miss Catherine Hay, who was born in the north of Ireland and died in the Golden state. They were the parents of the following children: George W., who died at the age of twenty-one years; Frederick T., Henry Hoover, Alfred L. of Yanhill county, and Daniel B., all of Siskiyou county, the last named being engaged in mining; Willie Hay, who is principal of the schools in Butte, Mont., and Mrs. Mary Andrews, of Heppner, Ore. In Sacramento, Cal., Mr. Kingery wedded Miss Mary Stoner, a native of Pennsylvania, and they had one son, Clarence Stoner, who is in the United States Navy.

In public affairs Mr. Kingery was quite prominent and from 1888 to 1892 he served as county commissioner, this being the period when the question of the removal of the county seat was agitated, and during the same period the fine new courthouse was built. For about forty years he served as school director and the cause ever found in him a warm friend. In politics he was an unfaltering Republican from the organization of the party. He was a member of the board of trade of McMinnville and belonged to both the lodge and encampment of the Odd Fellows' society. He was made a member in Yreka, Cal., but his membership was latterly at Fort Jones, that state. During his residence of over fifty years in the west he made two trips back to the east, first in 1879 and again in 1882, but his interests were centered in the west, and there he labored earnestly for improvement and progress.

May 25, 1903, at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. Andrews, at Heppner, Ore., Mr. Kingery died, and his remains were taken to Fort Jones, Cal., for burial. He was buried by the Odd Fellows lodge at Fort Jones, of which he had been a member for over forty years.

LOUIS LACHMUND, hop merchant, was born in New York City, December 29, 1870, son of Henry and Louise (Meyer) Lachmund. His father was a native of Bremen, Germany, where he acquired a liberal education. In early life he removed to New York City, and engaged in manufacturing. Upon the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in a New Jersey regiment of artillery, and served until the close of the war. In recognition of his bravery and meritorious conduct on the field of battle, he was promoted to a first-lieutenancy. Fraternally, he was a Master Mason, who, in his daily life, exemplified the beneficent spirit of the order. He died in 1885, leaving a widow and four children, the subject of this sketch being the only son.

Louis Lachmund, after graduating from the public schools of his native city, secured a clerkship in the private banking house of Knauth, Nachod & Kuehne, of New York. His employers soon recognized his ability, and promoted him to the position of bookkeeper. In 1889 he entered the employ of Horst Brothers, as bookkeeper in their New York office, and in 1890 he was sent as their representative to the state of Washington, locating in Puyallup, where he remained for six years. Here he studied the details of the hop business, and familiarized himself with the conditions on the entire Pacific coast. In 1895 the firm of Horst Brothers was dissolved, and the business was incorporated under the present style of the Paul R. G. Horst & Lachmund Company. Mr. Lachmund was elected secretary and treasurer of the company, and made general manager of the business on the Pacific coast. He removed to Salem, where he has resided since. Mr. Lachmund can justly feel proud of the fact that he is part of this company, which buys and sells about fifteen thousand bales of hops annually, distributing them in all parts of the world. A well-known biographer has well said: "Mr. Lachmund is a strong man, mentally and physically. He never does anything by halves. He never rests as long as there is any improvement to be made. He has an intuitive knowledge of men, and therefore his agents are always the best for accomplishing the purposes for which he selects them. In the organization and conduct of the large enterprise with which his name is associated, he has acquired the habits of thought peculiar to all successful men. Broad, but accurate; diligent, but deliberate; patient, but prompt; kind, but firm; fearing no weight of responsibility, yet not careless of it, he always meets and overcomes difficulties."

JOHN T. FORD. As sheriff of Polk county, John T. Ford is looking well to the best interests of the community which has honored him with their confidences, and is proving an efficient and conscientious adjuster of the complications by which he is surrounded. For many of the substantial traits of character which have brought about his success he is indebted to an ancestry traced to that self-sacrificing and morally high Huguenot element which was forced to seek foreign shores for the exercise of religious liberty. Remote members of the family signed their marriage and birth certificates "Fore," but for convenience the American representatives have adopted "Ford." James Ford, the paternal great-grandfather, served with distinction in the war of Independence, and as a member of a Colonial regiment was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was a large planter in Virginia, and at the time of his death left a well improved plantation in Westmoreland county, where his son, Col. Nathaniel Ford, the grandfather of John T., was born.

Col. Nathaniel Ford was reared in Virginia, and as a young man removed to Howard county, Mo., where he became prominent in political and other affairs. He was sheriff of the county for four years, and served for an equal length of time as county clerk. His rank was conferred because of meritorious service during the Black Hawk war, and he was further connected with the military affairs of the state when helping to drive the Mormons from Missouri. As early as 1844 he outfitted and brought his family across the plains, arriving in Polk county in November, and settling on a donation claim four miles east of Dallas, on the Rickreall or La Creole river, and which comprised six hundred and forty acres. As in Missouri, he immediately identified himself with the all-around growth of his adopted locality, and became one of the most prominent and influential men in his county. For several terms he represented his county in the territorial legislature, and he was also county assessor for one term. Needless to say, his sympathies were with the south, for he was a southerner by descent and birth. He was a master Mason, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and was foremost in his district in promoting education. In his young manhood he married Lucinda D. Embree, a native of Kentucky, who died in 1874, at the age of seventy-four years.

Though born in Howard county, Mo., Marcus A. Ford, the father of John T., was educated in Lexington, Ky., where he took the classical course, and distinguished himself for brilliant scholarship. In Howard county he studied law under Ex-Governor Reynolds, and thereafter practiced his profession for some time in his native state. He was one of the courageous band who crossed the plains in 1844, and upon arriving in Polk county he undertook the practice of law, and was the first law partner of Colonel Nesmith. Like his father and grandfather, he was devoted to things military, and has had the opportunity to show his prowess in the Cayuse war under that noble pioneer and famous soldier, General Gilliam. He was the first district attorney of his district, and possessed personal characteristics and pronounced abilities which presaged uninterrupted success. However, when returning from San Francisco in 1853, the ship became becalmed off the coast of Mt. Columbus, and in order to save time he and Mr. Stevens and two sailors started for the shore, but, meeting with a gale, were swamped and lost. Mr. Ford was twenty-six years of age at the time of his death, and left but one child, the present sheriff of Polk county. His wife, who died in 1848, was formerly Amanda Thorp, a native of Missouri, and daughter of Maj. John Thorp, who was born in Kentucky, and settled in Missouri. Major Thorp was a large land owner in Missouri, and enlisted in that state for the Black Hawk war, in which he won the rank of major. He came across the plains in 1845, settling on a donation claim four miles south of Independence, on the Willamette river. In 1849 he became interested in mining in California, speculating to a considerable extent. He was a member of the territorial legislature, and lived to be eighty-one years of age.

Born on the old homestead in Polk county November 17, 1847, John T. Ford was left an orphan at the age of six years, and was reared by Col. Nathaniel Ford. As a youth he was trained in farming, and attended the district schools of his district. When grown he moved to Independence and was identified at times with several business houses of that town, at the same time taking an active interest in politics. Here he married Mattie J. Irvine, a native of Marion county, Ore., and daughter of Samuel Irvine, who came from Missouri in 1852, and died in 1862. Two sons have been born of this union, of whom Marcus A. is a clerk in Dallas, and Walter I. is attending Dallas College. Mr. Ford filled the office of postmaster of Independence from 1885 to 1889 inclusive, and he was also city recorder for two terms. In 1898 he was appointed deputy sheriff, and at the expiration of four years, in 1902, was nominated and elected sheriff on the Democratic ticket, assuming control of his office in July, 1902. Though the precedent is unusual, he keeps all the records of the sheriff's office, and in this way keeps in immediate touch with the smallest details of the work. He is well fitted for his responsible position, has a keen knowledge of human nature in all its workings, is not easily influenced, and under no circumstances can be swerved from what he considers fair and right. He is a man of culture and broad general knowledge, evidenced particularly during his newspaper career in Independence, where he was editor of the Enterprise for four years. Mr. Ford is an honored member of the Polk County Pioneers' Association, and is one of the many leading citizens of the present time who have traveled the long distance from a crude pioneer log cabin to positions of trust and responsibility.

SALMON WHITE CROWDER. Another of those hardy pioneers of the early '50's whose bravery, valor and undaunted spirit prepared the way for those who now profit by the prevailing prosperity, is Salmon White-Crowder, developer of several fine farming properties in Oregon, and an Indian veteran of whom his adopted state has cause to be proud. A man of fine personal characteristics and extreme liberality of thought and heart, Mr. Crowder has arrived at the age where men appreciate the peaceful rather than the money-getting side of life, and in his home in Albany is exempt from business cares, and his environment is all that is pleasant and artistic.

Patriotism may be said to be a leading trait of the Crowder family, for soldiers bearing the name have fought in all of the important wars of this country. The paternal grandfather, Archie, stacked his musket upon the battlefields of the Revolution, and for several years slept in the tents of the Colonial army. He was born in Virginia and lived some years in Kentucky, his death occurring on his farm in Champaign county, Ohio. His son, John, the father of Salmon White, also was born in Virginia, and when the call to arms was issued in 1812, he enlisted and gave valiant service. He eventually settled on a farm near Lewisburg, Ohio, where he died at the age of eighty-two years, having been preceded several years by his wife, formerly Elizabeth (Browder) Crowder, who was born in Vermont, and lived to be sixty years old. Fourteen children were born into this family, all but one of whom attained maturity, and four of whom are living. The veteran father had the satisfaction of seeing five of his sons enlist in the Civil war, participate in the majority of the memorable battles, and return to their respective homes. These sons were named John H., Thomas, Harrison, William, and Sanford, only one of whom, John H., was wounded during the service.

The little log school-house near the Crowder farm was the only means of education available to the large family of children, and they attended irregularly, and principally during the leisure of the winter months. Salmon White remained under the paternal roof until he became of age, and afterward engaged in farming independently until coming to Oregon in 1853. With friends he traveled by boat to Burlington, and there the eight men comprising the party outfitted with ox-teams and wagons, having brought with them one hundred and sixty head of cattle and some horses. This courageous party left Ohio March 6, 1853, and arrived in the Willamette valley in October of the same year. It is not recorded that their trip was in any way out of the ordinary, or that their limited number inspired attacks on the part of the red men. Mr. Crowder reluctantly parted from the men with whom he had been so long and so intimately associated, and after some time spent in investigating the conditions by which he found himself surrounded, located on a claim of one hundred and sixty acres ten miles south of Albany. Even then the Indians were rendering almost intolerable the life of the settlers, and each regarded it as his personal duty to help restore order, and make possible the tilling of their land. During 1855-56 Mr. Crowder was a member of Company H, First Oregon Volunteer Infantry, and in this capacity took part in the battle of Walla Walla or Whitman station, which covered four days of hard fighting, and was one of the notable contests of the Yakima war, as well as many other battles and skirmishes. After being mustered out he returned to his farm, a large portion of which he cleared and improved.

While located at Sand Ridge Mr. Crowder married Lucinda Wishard, who was born in Indiana, and crossed the plains in 1852 with her father, Archie, settling on a farm in Linn county. Of this union there have been born six children, the order of their birth being as follows: Emma, now Mrs. Parish, of Albany; Henry, a carpenter, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Charles, foreman of the round house of the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad in Albany; Salmon A., a carpenter, of Albany; Ada, the wife of John Simpson, an engineer on the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad; and George, engaged in the hotel business in Portland. Soon after his marriage Mr. Crowder sold his farm and moved on a large stock farm at Butte Disappointment, Lane county, where he lived four years. He then bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres eight miles southeast of Albany, but afterward sold this property and bought three hundred acres south of Lebanon. Eight years later he removed to a farm near Miller's station, and after that lived on several farms, all of which he disposed of upon coming permanently to Albany.

In Lane county Mr. Crowder served four years as justice of the peace, elected to the office by his Republican constituents. He is a member of the Christain Church, and of the Indan War Veterans' Association. To an exceptional degree he has the confidence of the country and town communities in which he has lived, and his agricultural, as well as political, war, and general efforts, have always redounded to the credit of his adopted state.

HON. SYLVANDER A. DAWSON. A pioneer of 1861, and for many years connected with the agricultural and political development of Linn county, Hon. S. A. Dawson has been a resident of Albany since 1897, and maintains one of the fine and hospitable homes of the city. Of Scotch descent, he was born in Marion county, Ind., December 4, 1841, and was reared on a farm seven miles north of Indianapolis. His father, John R., was born in Jefferson county, Ky., whither had come the paternal grandfather, William, who emigrated from Scotland. The latter was an extensive farmer and stock-raiser, and lived to an advanced age in Kentucky. John R. Dawson moved as a young man to Marion county, Ind., and there married Juliette Morgan, who was born in Morgan county, Va., a daughter of James Morgan, who spent his entire life in Virginia. Three daughters and three sons were born in Indiana, and accompanied their parents across the plains in 1861, settling on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres five miles east of Albany. Here the father farmed until his death in 1873, he being survived by his wife, who died in February, 1901, at the age of eighty-five years. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. John R. Dawson: Lucinda Jane, married J. W. Swank, of Portland; Sylvander A.; Ann Z., died in early childhood in Indiana; Millard F. lives on a farm five miles east of Albany; Sylvester N. died at age of eighteen years and six months, near Albany; Sarah J., wife of J. B. Haight, of Portland; Ida I., wife of Ed. R. M. Carter, of Portland.

In addition to the public schools of Indiana, S. A. Dawson had the advantage for a year of a school in Danville, Ill., and with this nucleus for his present well stored mind, was obliged to content himself at that time. On the trip across the plains in 1861 he drove one of the ox-teams, while his father drove another, and the hired man a third. They brought considerable loose stock, most of which stood the long jaunt fairly well, the party arriving in Albany six months to a day from the time they left Danville, Ill. Fortunately, half of the farm purchased by the father was broken, and therefore cost him $15.50 per acre. S. A. Dawson remained at home for two years, and the following two years he spent in mining and packing in Idaho and Montana. Returning to Albany, he bought a farm near the old home and engaged in farming and stock-raising, and after the death of his father in 1873 came into possession of the old place of one hundred and sixty acres. From then until taking up his residence in Albany in 1897 he farmed successfully, adding many improvements to the home stead, and so operating the property as to bring him in a comfortable profit.

Beginning with 1878 Mr. Dawson became prominently identified with Republican politics in Linn county, and that year was nominated for sheriff of the county, but was defeated. In 1880 he was elected a member of the legislature, serving in the session of that year, creditably representing the best interests of his constituency. In 1886 he was elected to the state senate, served in the session of 1887, assisting in the election of Senator Dolph, and also served in 1889. Again elected to the senate in 1894, he served in the sessions of 1895-7, but has not been a candidate since. At the present time he is serving his second term in the Albany City Council, representing the Second ward; was formerly a member of both the State Central and County Committees. He has been one of the stanch supporters of his party in the state, and his political service has been characterized by the highest honor and never at the sacrifice of principle.

In Linn county Mr. Dawson was united in marriage in 1873 with Sarah L. Haight, who was born in Linn county in 1849, and whose father, Silas Haight, a native of New York state, crossed the plains in 1844. Georgia C., the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Dawson, is attending the Albany College and will graduate in the class of 1904.

Mr. Dawson was made a Mason in Albany in 1874, and is a member of Corinthian Lodge No. 17, A. F. & A. M.; Bayley Chapter No. 8, R. A. M. Is also a member of Safety Lodge No. 13, A. O. U. W., and was an active member of Harmony Grange No. 23. He has always evinced an interest in all matters that he deemed worthy of his consideration.

U. SCOTT LOUGHARY, a native son, and the present clerk of Polk county, was born on a farm six miles from Dallas, July 25, 1863. His father, L. W. Loughary, owner of a well developed farm in the county, was born in Illinois, but removed as a boy with his father, David, to Des Moines county, Iowa. After coming to Polk county in 1852, he continued to farm and build, occupations to which his entire active life has been devoted. Eliza Simpson, whom he married after coming to the west, and who is still living with him on the old donation claim, was born in Tennessee, and came across the plains with her father, I. M. Simpson, in the latter '40s. Mr. Simpson settled on a claim on the Luckiamute, was very successful, and added greatly to his original land, now occupied by his wife, Martha. Besides U. Scott, the third child of the family, there were born to L. W. Loughary and his wife, three other children, of whom Rosa is now Mrs. O. A. Wolverton, of Monmouth; Rachel is Mrs. J. L. Hirshmer, of the Hood River district; and Frank is living at home.

After attending a course at the State Normal School at Monmouth, U. Scott Loughary taught school for a year, and then attended the State Agricultural College. Following another period of teaching, he engaged in clerking in Independence for five years for Shilling & Van Dyne and their successors, and for two years with the firm of James Meyers & Son. Owing to impaired health he went back and worked on the home farm for a year, and in 1900 was nominated county clerk on the Republican ticket, being elected by a majority of thirty-two over the fusion candidate. In July, 1900, he took the oath of office, and, having most acceptably filled the responsibility, was re-elected in 1902 by a majority of over five hundred and ninety-six, his term of office to continue until July, 1904.

In Spokane, Wash., Mr. Loughary married Arninda Shupp, daughter of Rev. N. Shupp, the presiding elder of the Evangelical Association. Of this union there have been born three children, Gladys, Helen and Lucile. Mr. Loughary is well known in fraternal and social circles of this county, and is identified with Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., Friendship Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., and Woodmen of the World. Formerly he was active in the Knights of Pythias, and was past chancellor of Homer Lodge of Independence for two terms. Mr. Loughary is one of the exceedingly progressive and popular men of the county, and the ability to be an efficient public servant, added to personal characteristics of a high order, have won him a host of friends.

JAMES COLEMAN. That James Coleman is indebted solely to his own pluck and good management for his success in life is evident from the fact that at the age of thirteen he was supporting himself by working in a tan yard in Johnson county, Ind., whither he removed with his parents when five years old. He was born in Franklin, Warren county, Ohio, July 21, 1821, and was the son of parents who were but indifferently successful in life. From Johnson county, Ind., he drove a team in 1839 to Louisa county, Iowa, and was so well pleased with the state that he remained and found work on farms in the vicinity. Frugal and industrious, he saved enough money to justify him in marrying Frances Murray June 5, 1845, and thereafter he continued to farm for others for a couple of years.

In 1847 Mr. Coleman followed the promptings of his good judgment and prepared for the long journey across the plains, in a company commanded by Captain Davidson and Captain Mendenhall, four yoke of oxen being sufficient to convey the family possessions in one wagon. He had purchased some stock with which to begin farming enterprises in the west, but of some of this he was unfortunately relieved by the Indians, who, it will be recalled, entertained a profound admiration for the cattle of the emigrating "pale faces" in the early days. The train came by way of Fort Hall, and they arrived at their destination none the worse for the danger and deprivation which they had experienced. Mr. Coleman found an opportunity for livelihood at St. Paul, Ore., where he operated the Mission sawmill during the first winter. The next spring he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres seven miles above McMinnville, all of which was wild timber land. In the midst of this desolation he hewed trees and built a little log house, his neighbors being few and far between and many miles distant. This log house continued to be the abode of the family for twelve years, and in the meantime the land was yielding fair returns for the labor which had been expended upon it. During the historic year 1849, Mr. Coleman made his way with pack horses to California and mined on the American river for six weeks, afterward trying his luck on Angel's creek. He was successful in a way, and in the fall of the same year returned to Oregon by way of the ocean, going direct to his donation claim.

In 1860 Mr. Coleman sold his claim and came to Marion county, and bought three hundred and twenty acres, which, however, he has never occupied. In the fall of 1862 he bought nine hundred acres, of which he owns five hundred and eighty acres at the present time. His land is under a high state of cultivation, and besides general farming and stock-raising, he has twenty-four acres under hops. A large family of children have been reared in Oregon, six sons and five daughters, all of whom are living and possess sound constitutions. They are named as follows, in the order of their birth: Annie Catharine, wife of W. F. Davidson, of St. Paul; John, of Portland; Mary Elizabeth, wife of Charles O. Pelland, of St. Paul; James R., of Salem; William Thomas, of Champoege; Elizabeth Jane, wife of F. C. Hammond, of Juneau, Alaska; Stephen Henry, on the home place; Charles D., of Juneau, Alaska; Emily Frances, wife of William Murphy, of St. Paul; Helen Louise, wife of John J. Casey, of Portland; Frank N., of St. Paul. Mrs. Davidson, Mrs. Pelland and Mrs. Hammond attended St. Mary's Academy in Portland; all the sons except Frank attended Willamette University, and he attended Mt. Angel College; Mrs. Murphy and Mrs. Casey attended St. Paul's Academy, at St. Paul. Ten are married and have homes of their own, all being active and well to do citizens of Oregon.

Mrs. Coleman died April 26, 1896, aged seventy-two years. She was born in Ireland, and in infancy crossed the ocean to America with her father, Barney Murray.

The record of the life of Mr. Coleman should prove a source of gratification to his family and friends, as well as of justifiable pride to himself. In every sense a self-made man, he has looked with a charitable and indulgent eye upon the struggles of the younger men of the present generation, who have been able to extract from their knowledge of his continuous success no small measure of inspiration in their own undertakings. He has always evinced an interest in the public welfare, and co-operates willingly with his friends and neighbors in all efforts put forth to better the condition of humanity. Such men as he are thoroughly representative of the best and highest interests of the communities in which they reside. The high esteem in which Mr. Coleman is held by all who know him is abundant testimony to the sterling traits in his character and his manifest spirit of fairness and liberality of thought and action in dealing with matters that are of interest to others than himself.

A. P. MAGNESS. Continuously for twenty-two years A. P. Magness has been a school clerk in Yamhill county, and during that time has materially advanced the cause of education in which he takes so keen an interest. He has also served as justice of the peace for a few terms, and has otherwise maintained the prestige of Democracy in a prosperous and progressive region. For many years identified with farming hereabouts, Mr. Magness is now living near the village of Wheatland, and in addition to general farming and stock-raising, derives a substantial revenue from hop culture, to which he devotes ten acres of his well-cultivated farm. During the last year he raised ten thousand pounds, and he is contemplating an increase of this amount in the near future.

Mr. Magness represents one of the pioneer families of Yamhill county, having arrived here in 1854. He was born in Independence county, Ark., January 3, 1847, his father, John R., having been born in the same state and county in 1822. The elder Magness was a farmer and stock-raiser in Arkansas, and while living there married as a young man Virginia Byrd, a native of the same state. The parents lived on this farm until 1854, when, having disposed of their Arkansas possessions, they outfitted and prepared for the long and dreary journey across the plains. There were about thirty teams in the caravan of home and fortune seekers, and owing to the more settled conditions of the country, the little band missed some of the terrifying experiences which befell earlier emigrants. The father started with about one hundred and fifty head of cattle, and owing to the depredations of the Indians, was relieved of his responsibility to the extent of about eighty head. He first settled near Springfield, Ore., where he bought and lived on a farm until 1859, in which year the faithful mother died, leaving her husband and children disconsolate. Thereafter the family removed to a farm upon which is now built the town of Fairfield, Marion county, and where he farmed with average success until 1864. Mr. Magness then went into eastern Oregon on a mining and prospecting tour, and for three years experienced varying good and bad luck. He afterward made a couple of trips back to Arkansas, and on the last trip was taken ill and one of his sons, Robert N., went and brought him back to his home. Here he lived until his death, July 29, 1893, having lived a very active and worth-while life. An otherwise meritorious career was made more interesting by valorous service in the Mexican war, during which service he encountered many of the vicissitudes incident to a time of adventure and rapid happenings. Before the battle of Buena Vista he was taken prisoner and imprisoned for nine months, and during that time had marched one thousand miles to the City of Mexico. Four sons and one daughter were born into his family, of whom A. P. is the oldest; Perry G. is a resident of Portland; David A. lives in California; R. N. is the next in order of birth; and Josephine is deceased.

At the age of seventeen years A. P. Magness went into the mines of eastern Oregon, and until his twenty-second year was engaged in mining and prospecting. He received a fair education in the district schools, and this beginning has been added to in later years, so that at the present time Mr. Magness is a well-informed man on current events and knowledge in general. After his marriage, September 29, 1869, with Amelia Davidson, a native of Dayton, Yamhill county, and daughter of Green C. and Nancy Davidson, he lived in Fairfield for a couple of years, and for two years on a farm near where he now lives. His present farm has proved most pleasant and profitable, and the fortunate owner correctly estimates that he has one of the most desirable farms in his neighborhood. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Magness, John is deceased; Virginia is the wife of T. T. Parker, of Roseburg; David Austin is justice of the peace in St. Paul, Marion county, and is in the hard-wood business on the Willamette river near St. Paul; Gertrude is the wife of Samuel Whitmore, of Dayton; the next child died in infancy and the following complete the family: William B., Maud M., Green Clay and Edna. The last named four children are living with their parents. Mr. Magness bears an honored name in the community and his efforts have ever been for its permanent betterment.

GEORGE MORRISON. Born in the sea-washed isle of Scotland, George Morrison grew up with the frugal and temperate ideas that go hand in hand with the common life of that little country, and bringing them with him across the sea, virtually insured his success in a land where plenty, carefully nurtured, means riches by-and-by.

Samuel Watson, the maternal grandfather, followed farming as his life calling. His daughter, Barbara, who married Alexander Morrison, is living now in that distant land in her seventy-fifth year, a widow, her husband having died January 16, 1900, at the age of seventy-six years. Banff, Scotland, was the birth-place of father, mother, and the nine children that were born to them, five of whom are still in Scotland, William, Charles, and John farming in the locality of their childhood home, Alexander, the second oldest, being a laborer; Barbara, the one daughter, remaining at home to brighten the life of their aging mother; and two beyond the seas in the land of the setting sun, James, the third, and George, the fifth oldest, the latter of whom is reviewed in this sketch.

November 19, 1863, is the date of his birth, in the county before mentioned. At twelve and a half years he was hired to a farmer to work for the consideration of his board and $25 for the first six months. He had attended the common schools of Scotland previous to this and from now on he engaged in farming, working in the rich lowlands of this maritime county, and by the time he was twenty-three years old he had managed to save fifty pounds, his economy and thrift in all these years being for the purpose of having money for his passage to America. With no friends or relatives to welcome him, he came as many another young man did, with only his courage and determination to sustain him in the loneliness of his position. From Boston he came direct to Aurora, Ill., where he engaged in farming for two years, the profits accruing very much more rapidly than in the country of his birth. At the close of the two years he came to Oregon, locating near Amity, Yamhill county, where he worked as a farm-hand for Ladd and Reed for the period of two years and nine months, investing then his savings in a farm of thirty acres near Dundee, having as his partner, his brother James. There were no improvements on the place and they recognized the hardships that barred their opportunity, but with their inherited industry and thrift set to work to bring cultivation to the barren fields. They have a fine orchard of nine-year-old prune trees in full bearing, and with their Italian prune-dryer they prepare splendid crops for the market. When the trees were five years old they had a crop of three tons of dried prunes; when eight years old, twenty tons; when nine years old, thirteen tons. In the winter of 1903, Mr. Morrison bought a ten-acre eleven-year-old prune orchard which makes him forty acres in all. Prune-raising has been the only industry of the farm, and it has proven very successful. In his political views, Mr. Morrison is a Democrat.

GEORGE K. BRYANT is a member of the firm of Bryant & Pennell, owners and operators of a milling plant which is conducted under the name of the Capital City Mills. Mr. Bryant has resided in Oregon only since 1894, but has become an active factor in industrial circles here. He was born in Grand Rapids, Mich., April 6, 1862, and was the third in order of birth in a family of three sons and a daughter born unto John and Rachel (Lumby) Bryant. The father, a native of England, crossed the Atlantic to Ontario, Canada, and afterward removed to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he became purchasing agent for the Chicago & Grand Trunk Railroad. He is still living in that city. His wife passed away during the early boyhood of their son, G. K. Her father, George Lumby, was a native of Connecticut and after his removal to Michigan followed the occupation of farming.

Mr. Bryant of this review spent his youthful days in Grand Rapids, Mich., and to its public school system is indebted for the educational privileges he enjoyed. His mother died when he was but four years of age and soon afterward he was bound out to a miller, J. Wolf.

When very young he assisted in the work of the mill as his age and strength permitted, and in 1876 he regularly entered the mill and completed his trade in the Globe Mills under Mr. Wolf. This mill was operated with the old burr process and subsequently Mr. Wolf purchased another mill at Tallmadge Center. Mr. Bryant remained with him until six months after he had attained his majority, when he removed to Ravenna, Muskegon county, Mich., where he accepted the position of head miller in the Ravenna Mills. Later he was made manager, and while serving in that capacity he put in a roller process. Eventually he leased the mill and for five years was its proprietor, his connection with that industry covering twelve years. This, however, was terminated in 1894, when he came to the northwest.

On arriving in Salem Mr. Bryant looked about for a business opening and leased the Aumsville Mill twelve miles from this city. He was its proprietor for four years and then went to California, spending five months at different places in that state. He next proceeded to Portland and eastern Oregon, but in 1900 he returned to Salem and as a member of the firm of Bryant & Reeves purchased the mill which he now owns. It is a steam mill with a fifty-six horse power engine and a capacity of one hundred barrels per day. The milling plant consists of a building four stories in height and is supplied with a Case system of roller process. The firm is now Bryant & Pennell and the business is carried on under the name of the Capital City Mills, an engraving of the state capitol being stamped upon each sack of flour as its trade mark. Various kinds of flour and breakfast foods are manufactured, one of the main brands being the "Perfection Flour," which, because of its superior excellence and quality, finds a ready sale upon the market. Mr. Bryant has worked up an excellent business and the output of the enterprise is continually being increased to meet the growing demands of the trade.

In Coopersville, Mich., occurred the marriage of G. K. Bryant and Miss Alice Burton, who was born in Ohio, and they have one child, Mildred W. Mr. Bryant was made a Mason in Lisbon, Mich., and an Odd Fellow at Ravenna, that state, and he is also connected with the Knights of the Maccabees, while his political support is given to the Republican party.

WILLIAM CAMPBELL. From early pioneer times William Campbell has been a resident of Yamhill county and his efforts have been far-reaching and effective in the upbuilding and development of this portion of the state. He was born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., and his father, William Campbell, Sr., was a native of Scotland. Crossing the Atlantic to America he took up his abode in the Empire state, where he engaged in farming until his death. His wife was a Miss Logan, and the subject of this review is their only living child and the only one that came to Oregon. His birth occurred on the 4th of September, 1827, so that he has now passed the Psalmist's span of three score years and ten, but he is still an active factor in the business circles of McMinnville, where he is engaged in real estate operations. When sixteen years of age he was apprenticed to learn the blacksmith's trade, which he followed until 1855, and then started for California by way of the Nicaragua route on the steamer The Golden West. After crossing that Central American country he again took passage on a steamer bound for San Francisco, and on reaching the Golden Gate, made his way at once to the mines. In Yuba county he engaged in blacksmithing for three months, and afterwards took up his abode in Marysville, Cal., where he also established a shop. In 1858, the year of the Frazier river excitement in British Columbia, he was attracted northward and proceeded as far as Victoria when he met the prospectors and miners returning. Mr. Campbell then made his way to Portland and thence went to Lafayette, while two months later he arrived in McMinnville.

There was only one store and a few houses here when Mr. Campbell became a resident of the city. He purchased a blacksmith shop on Third street between B and C streets and there he conducted business along the line of his trade for many years, also devoting his attention to wagon and carriage making. He built the first carriage ever manufactured here and continued working at his trade for about ten years, since which time he has devoted his energies to real-estate operations. Through this avenue of business activity Mr. Campbell has contributed in a large measure to the improvement of McMinnville. He erected the Campbell block, which is a brick structure two stories in height, 68x100 feet. He also built another building 60x100 feet opposite the Campbell block and still others has he erected in the business district, while in the residence district he has put up a number of cottages. Mr. Campbell has done not a little for his fellow men by giving people an opportunity to own their own homes by allowing them to pay for them upon the installment plan. He has built more than any other one resident of the city, and when the railroad was contemplated he was a generous contributor to a subscription list that was raised in order to secure the extension of the line to this place. The road had been terminated at St. Joseph, and Mr. Campbell succeeded in securing the right of way from that place to Amity. He realized how important would be railroad connection with outlying points and put forth every effort in his power to secure the building of the road, which has proven of the greatest possible benefit to McMinnville. A meeting of citizens was held at which Mr. Campbell was appointed chairman of the committee to secure the right of way and the depot site, and when he had accomplished this important task the growth of the town received a new impetus that is still felt. Exclusive of time and efforts he gave over $3,000 in money to carry on this enterprise. Mr. Campbell has also improved a number of farms in this portion of the state and owns about one thousand acres of land near McMinnville, most of which is under cultivation, and he may well be termed a captain of industry, for certainly his life is an exemplification of earnest labor and its force as a factor in the business world. He has also been the promoter of a number of enterprises which have been of value to the city as well as to the individual owners. He established the first fruit-drying factory of the county and became president of the company having this in charge. He built the first creamery here and was president of the company owning and controlling this enterprise. He became one of the organizers of the McMinnville National Bank and a member of its first board of directors, and in that same connection he is still associated with the institution.

Mr. Campbell was married in McMinnville April 20, 1880, to Miss Hattie L. Loughary, who was born in Iowa and came to McMinnville in 1864 with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Loughary, who still reside here. Unto our subject and his wife have been born two children: Fuchia Pearl and William Chester. In his political faith Mr. Campbell is a Republican, having been identified with the party since its organization. He has done everything in his power to promote its growth and insure its success and has ever been an active factor in the political interests of McMinnville.

For fifteen years he served as a member of the city council and was the promoter of measures of benefit to the city. He belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of McMinnville, in which he is a past noble grand; is also connected with the Encampment and with the Rebekah degree and has membership relations with the Muscovites. In 1865 he returned to the east by way of the Nicaragua route, and in 1868 he again visited the east, going by way of the Panama route, but since coming to McMinnville his deepest interests have centered here and he has had firm faith in the country and its future.

ALFRED WILSON. Few men are more familiar with western history than Alfred Wilson. What to most of the present generation is a matter of reading is to him a matter of memory. He has been a participant in many of the advances connected with early travel over the plains and with the settlement of the west, and is thus very familiar with life upon the great stretches of country that lie between the Mississippi valley and the ocean. He served in the Mexican war, and is among the few survivors to-day of that struggle. He bore his part in the work of improvement and development as the tide of emigration steadily flowed westward, and to-day he is one of the respected, honored and successful agriculturists of Yamhill county, where he owns a valuable tract of land of thirteen hundred and sixty acres.

Alfred Wilson was born in Tennessee, April 2, 1826, and two years later his parents removed to Howard county, Mo., where he was reared upon a farm. There he became acquainted with Kit Carson and there sprung up between them a friendship which existed until the death of the latter. In 1846, with the noted explorer, hunter and guide, he went to the Rocky Mountains on horseback, starting from Fort Leavenworth. He made this trip in the hope of benefiting his health, and afterward he traveled with Kit Carson, piloting people across the country. Often he slept with Mr. Carson under the same blanket and shared with him in all the experiences, encounters and hardships which went to make up the life history of that famous man. Mr. Wilson has killed many a bear with his hunting knife, thus coming into close contact with the animals. With Mr. Carson he acted as pilot to Stevenson, a trader who went from St. Louis to New Mexico. Mr. Wilson was engaged to drive a six-mule team across the plains, starting from Mann's Fort on the Arkansas river. After being out five days they were attacked by the Indians, and at that time Mr. Wilson killed his first red man, a Comanche. He narrowly escaped death, for five arrows penetrated his clothing. Five days later there was another attack by the Indians, but day after day some progress was made, until finally the party reached the last mountain, when he left the train and returned.

In 1848 Mr. Wilson enlisted for service in the Mexican war as a teamster, and after reaching the land of the Montezumas he enlisted as a scout in advance of the army, or, as they were called, a ranger. He was at the battle and in the siege of Santa Cruz, Mexico, where the troops surrounded the town, and for six days they subsisted upon one meal a day.

Mr. Wilson was one of those chosen to throw bombs into the town, and did his full share in winning American victories there. After the close of the Mexican war he returned northward and several times crossed the plains, making a trip in 1849 and another in 1850. In the latter year he was captain of a company that came to Oregon with an ox-team, journeying from Fort Hall westward. He and his brother also came along to Oregon and on the trip killed three Indians. They proceeded to the vicinity of McMinnville, and Mr. Wilson put in a crop for Dr. Sutton, operating the latter's land on shares for a year. In the summer of 1851 he secured a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres where Riley Fendall now resides. In the fall of that year he was crippled while in the woods by a man hitting him back of the knee with an ax. The injury proved so serious that for eighteen months he was unable to engage in any labor. About that time news came that emigrants crossing the plains were in a starving condition, and Mr. Wilson then busied himself in taking up a collection wherewith to secure provisions to take to the travelers. He raised nearly $800 for that purpose, and it may well be supposed that he was hailed with gratitude as a benefactor to those who were suffering great hardships for lack of food as they journeyed westward. At another time Mr. Wilson suffered a second accident, having a leg broken by the falling of his horse when near McMinnville. However, his life altogether has been a prosperous one and has been filled with many incidents which have made his history eventful, and left to him many pleasant memories. In 1852 he secured a donation claim where he is now living, becoming the owner of three hundred and twenty acres in this way. He has made all of the improvements upon the property, and substantial buildings now stand as monuments to his enterprise, while well tilled fields indicate his careful supervision. As the years have passed he has added to his property until he now has thirteen hundred and sixty acres of land in one body. He is largely engaged in raising horses upon his ranch, and has some very fine animals which bring a good price in the markets.

Mr. Wilson has been twice married. In 1854 he wedded Miss Mary Sailing, and unto them were born ten children, eight of whom are now living: Melicia, wife of Ira Stevens; Ludy, wife of James Le Masters; Melvina, wife of John Lady; Minnie, wife of Andrew Lady; Lillie, wife of George Ball; Bay, wife of William Bridle; Edward and Harley. Mrs. Wilson died in 1890, and in 1894 Mr. Wilson was again married, his second union being with Miss Rebecca Bryan. In his political views he is a Republican, having supported the party since its organization. His life history, if written in detail, would furnish more thrilling chapters than are usually found upon the pages of fiction. He knows what it is to endure hardships, incident to a journey across the plains before the advent of railroads. He also knows what it is to fear the skulking foe and to meet him in battle in the methods of warfare employed by the red men. He has also been a participant in his nation's battles, and he has likewise performed the no less important work of reclaiming a wild district for the purposes of civilization, that nature may yield of its rich resources for the support of men.

ROSWELL L. CONNER, who is engaged in the practice of law in McMinnville, was born in Polk county, Ore., near Dallas, September 18, 1866. He traces his ancestry back through several generations to the Emerald Isle and the name was originally O'Conner. The story goes that Robert O'Conner, a native of Ireland, was a son of wealthy parents. When twelve years of age he became imbued with an irresistible desire to come to America, and knowing that he could never win the consent of his parents, he ran away and went to a sea captain, to whom he represented himself as an orphan and obtained permission from the captain to come to America on his ship. In due time with a little bundle he went aboard the ship which soon afterward set sail. But the boy was missed at home and the father getting some track of him chartered another boat and overtook the one on which his son had sailed. The captain, however, in order to have no trouble, hid the boy in a hogshead, and the last time the boy saw his father was from the hold of a vessel as he peeped through the bunghole of the hogshead. The captain brought him to this country on condition that he would work for the captain for three years in this country, and this Robert Conner did. He was also allowed to attend school and he learned a trade in his youth. After he attained his majority he wrote home to his parents, and his father then offered to start him in any business he might select if he would return to Ireland. This he refused to do. Here he changed his name by dropping the prefix and the family have since had the patronymic of Conner. Robert Conner married and among his children was a son William, who also married and reared a family, including Robert Conner, the grandfather of our subject.

This Robert Conner was born in New York and became a farmer of Ohio, whence in 1847

he started with his family across the plains with an ox-team and eventually reached Oregon. His wife had died in the east and his death occurred in Polk county, this state, in 1865. All of his children came with him to the northwest, namely: William, a farmer, who died in Polk county; John, who died in California; Nathan, who died in Polk county; Job, the father of our subject; Mrs. Sarah Franklin, who died in Multnomah county; Mrs. Elizabeth Hewitt and Mrs. Ann Allaway, who died in the east; Mrs. Mary Metzker, who died in Lake county, Ore.; Mrs. Hannah Dexter, who passed away in Polk county, as did Mrs. Rachel Syron.

Job Conner was born in Ohio, December 3, 1827, and when twenty years of age came with the family to Oregon. For two years he engaged in lumbering in Oregon City, and in 1849 he went over the mountains to California, where he spent one year in placer mining. Upon his return he settled in Polk county, where he purchased the right of a party to a section of land, but could hold only three hundred and twenty acres. This he improved and farmed, living there until his death in 1886. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a Republican in his political belief. In early manhood he had married Polly Ann Riggs, who was born in Scott county, Ill., April 13, 1834, a daughter of Zadoc Riggs and a granddaughter of Scott Adams Riggs, who settled near Exeter, Ill., where he followed farming until his death. Zadoc Riggs was a farmer of Illinois until 1850, when he started with his wife and five children for Oregon, but he died while on the way, near the last crossing of the Sweetwater and was there buried. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Jane Leib, was born in eastern Tennessee and with her father, John Lieb, went to Scott county, Ill., where she became the wife of Mr. Riggs. After her husband's death she continued the journey to Oregon, where she spent her remaining days. Her brother-in-law, James B. Riggs, had settled in Polk county in 1845, and to that locality she went. She secured a donation land claim eight miles north of Dallas and there reared her family, her death occurring in 1872. It was on the 29th of March, 1855, that Polly Ann Riggs became the wife of Job Conner, and she died April 13, 1871, when our subject was four years old. She had seven children: Robert S., of San Jose, Cal.; Thomas E., a farmer of Yamhill county; Mrs. Jane Baxter, of Polk county; Leander, a farmer of that county; Roswell L.; Mrs. Louisa Morrison, of Redlands, Cal., and Mrs. Nancy Berdan, of Spokane, Wash.

On the home farm Roswell L. Conner remained until twenty-one years of age, and after attending the common schools, spent one year in McMinnville College. On attaining his majority he entered Willamette University, at Salem, where he remained two years. In 1889 he went to Sheridan and bought an interest with his brother, Robert S., in the Sheridan flouring mills, which they remodeled into roller mills and conducted under the name of Conner Brothers until 1891, when R. L. Conner sold his interest. He was then appointed deputy sheriff under W. L. Warren, serving until 1896. In the meantime he had taken up the study of law, and under the direction and in the office of Judge J. E. Magers he continued his reading until admitted to the bar, at Salem, in June, 1897. Since that time he has engaged in general practice in McMinnville and now has a large and distinctively representative clientele. In 1900 he was appointed deputy district attorney for Yamhill county, under J. N. Hart, of Dallas, and in his law practice he has shown marked ability in coping with the intricate and involved questions of jurisprudence.

Mr. Conner was married in McMinnville to Miss Myrtie Apperson, who was born in Oregon City. He is a very prominent Mason, having become a member of the order in Sheridan Lodge No. 64, while now he is connected with Union Lodge No. 43, F. & A. M., of which he is a past master. He was exalted in Ainsworth Chapter, No. 17, R. A. M., at Dallas, and now belongs to Taylor Chapter, No. 16, of which he is a past high priest. His membership is likewise with Hodson Council, No. 1, R. & A. M., of which he was thrice illustrious master; the Order of High Priesthood; DeMolay Commandery, No. 5, K. T., having been a knight since 1894; Oregon Lodge of Perfection, No. 1, Ainsworth Chapter, No. 1, Rose Croix; Multnomah Council of Kadosh, No. 1, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. Mr. Conner also belongs to the Commerce Club, of which he is a member of the board of directors, and he belongs to the Christian Church and gives his political support to the Republican party.

In 1897 Mr. Conner married Miss Apperson, a daughter of Albert Jefferson and Eloise Augusta (Cook) Apperson, the latter a native of Batavia, Mich. Mrs. Conner's grandfather, Beverly Apperson, was a son of Jacob and Elizabeth Apperson. Her father is now living retired at No. 472 Yamhill street, Portland, and at one time he was receiver in the United States land office at Sitka, Alaska.

PLEASANT COZINE, extensively engaged in building and contracting in McMinnville, is a native son of Oregon, and was born in Yamhill county, on the site of McMinnville College, January 28, 1849. He was educated in the public schools of McMinnville, and at the age of thirteen had his horizon materially enlarged while on a trip with his father to the Powder river mines in the Boise Basin, Idaho.

In the fall of 1863 he returned to this valley, continued his education for several years, and in connection therewith farmed on his father's large claim. Finally he prepared for future independence by learning the carpenter and builder's trade, in which he has since been engaged most successfully. In the fall of 1882 he removed to Sprague, Wash., and worked at his trade, spending some time also in Seattle, and locating permanently in McMinnville in 1898. To his skill in construction are due many of the finest buildings of recent date in the town.

When Samuel Cozine, the father of Pleasant, came to Oregon in 1843, this state was a stranger to all manner of civilization, and was the haunt of wild beasts and many kinds of Indians. This intrepid pioneer was born in Kentucky and removed with his family to Missouri, from where he started across the plains in 1843. He was full of enthusiasm for the almost unknown west, and, having nothing particular to bind him to any place, gladly set out in a caravan composed of many wagons, and many hopeful searchers after homes and fortunes. He had a happy, buoyant spirit, and made many friends among the members of the party. Not the least important of the families represented in this band of pilgrims was that to which Mahala Arthur belonged, whose youthful beauty inspired a lasting regard in the heart of the young emigrant, who at once began to think of the advantages of a pretty and interesting helpmate. That the attachment was reciprocated was a fact apparent to all the members of the train, and substantiated to the satisfaction of all after their arrival at their destination, the marriage ceremony taking place March 29, 1845. This emigrant train was the first to come to the Willamette valley, and on its arrival the young man, Samuel Cozine, bought the right of Thomas Owens to a claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon a portion of which McMinnville College now stands. The country roundabout was extremely wild, with only an occasional cabin like their own dotting the landscape, and here Mr. Cozine erected also a little blacksmith shop, to follow the trade which he had learned in Missouri. Needless to say this young couple started under the happiest auspices, notwithstanding they had little money, and almost no friends in the wilderness.

In 1849 Mr. Cozine left his wife and children for a time while he went down into the mines of California and endeavored to replenish their finances. The first gold he found was made into the ring now worn by the wife who remained behind at the mercy of the Indians. Mr. Cozine was very successful in his mining deals, returning to his family about $6,000 richer than when he departed. He ever afterward retained an interest in mining, and in 1862 went into the Powder river mines, Idaho, two years later visiting the mines with satisfactory results. In time he had numerous claims to his credit throughout the west, many of which have since proved of great value, but have unfortunately been disposed of. Up to his death, in 1897, he still continued to manipulate the forge, in the meantime taking a lively interest in the town of McMinnville, the growth of which he had watched from its infancy. Both himself and wife took great interest in the college in the town, and the former contributed the twenty acres comprising the college grounds. Also they contributed generously towards its upbuilding, and Mr. Cozine was for many years a trustee of the college. This very early settler was known for many years as Uncle Sam, and his figure on the streets and on the country roads was one of the most familiar in the county. Generous and open-hearted, he gave to everything that pointed to the substantial upbuilding of his locality, and his sound business advice and practical suggestions were invariably sought at times of stress and moment. From time to time this worthy couple converted portions of their land into city property, and at the last Mrs. Cozine had a hundred acres left, while her husband had but forty.

At the present time Mrs. Cozine is living in her pleasant home in McMinnville, where she owns considerable property, and is among the most esteemed of the brave pioneer women of this state. She was born in Jackson county, Mo., near Independence, her father, William, having located there after coming from his native state of Kentucky. As before intimated, Mr. Arthur brought his wife, Millie (Malone) Arthur, a native of Kentucky, and his eight children to Oregon in the same train with Mr. Cozine, and his daughter, Mahala, who had learned to shoot a gun, had ample opportunity to test her prowess on the plains. Of these children born to Mr. and Mrs. Arthur, David died in Clackamas county, Ore.; Richard died near Hillsboro; Brazilla died near Hillsboro; Robert lives in McMinnville; Mahala is next in order; William is a resident of McMinnville, and Mary died in California. There were eight children born to Samuel Cozine and his wife, those living being Mrs. Lucretia Storey, of McMinnville; Mrs. Auburn L. Linn, of Portland; and Pleasant. Mrs. Cozine was one of the organizers and a charter member of the Baptist church of McMinnville, is a member of the Aid Society, and has been identified with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for more than thirty years. Her son, Pleasant, the builder and contractor of McMinnville, is also a member of the Baptist Church, and in political affiliation is a Republican. He is an enterprising and progressive man, and reflects great credit upon the honored name of his father, upon the teachings of his gifted pioneer mother, and upon the community which regards him as one of its most substantial and helpful citizens.

BENJAMIN WINDSOR. A worthy citizen of Polk county, Ore., who, through years of vigorous prosecution of the natural advantages afforded in the west, has won and retained the confidence and esteem of all with whom he has come in contact, is Benjamin Windsor, the subject of this brief sketch. Mr. Windsor was born in Buckinghamshire, England, April 23, 1832, the son of William Windsor, a native of the same shire, where he died in 1845 at the age of seventy-five years. He was a carpenter by trade, and served in that capacity in the British navy under Admiral Nelson. His wife bore the maiden name of Leah Robinson; she was a native of the same shire, dying there at the age of eighty-five years. She was the mother of nine children, five sons and four daughters, of whom Benjamin was the fourth in order of birth,—and the only one in the United States.

Up to the time he was ten years of age Mr. Windsor attended the common schools of England. At that time he was compelled to depend upon his own resources, and accordingly he sought employment among the farmers in the vicinity of his home, his remuneration being six cents per day, out of which he had to provide his own living. When he was nineteen years of age he went to London, where for nine months he worked as a milk carrier. On June 9, 1852, he took passage on the American ship Masonic and after fifty-seven days landed in New York City. Soon afterward he located in Knox county, Ill., where he farmed until February, 1856. He then went to St. Louis, where he took passage for Panama, continuing on his journey to California. He first located in Sierra county, where he engaged in mining on the middle Yuba, near Downieville. There he met with gratifying success, the amount of the gold nuggets reaching as high as $25. From one crevice in the rock he took out thirty-six ounces of gold, which netted considerable money. He soon tired of a miner's life, so he went to San Jose, where he spent but a short time, and from there went to various cities of California, spending thirteen months at Los Angeles. In 1859 he set sail from San Francisco for Portland, Ore., going from there to Lincoln, Polk county, where he entered the employ of Major W. M. Walker. On the boat which brought him from Portland to Lincoln, was the finishing lumber for the Spring Valley Presbyterian Church. Having been saving with his money and being possessed with a spirit of thriftiness, he soon began to invest his earnings in land. His first purchase was one-half of the McLench claim, for which he paid $2.50 per acre. He next purchased one hundred and sixty acres of the Swift claim, for which he also paid $2.50 per acre. In addition to this property he bought one hundred and sixty acres near Lincoln, upon which he at once began farming for himself, making a steady upward climb until he has reached a substantial place among the progressive citizens of the community. He has made other purchases from time to time, until he is now the owner of between thirteen and fourteen hundred acres of as good land as can be found in any part of Oregon. His land is devoted to general farming, and in the raising of grain he has been particularly successful, having raised as high as five thousand bushels in one year, besides devoting considerable attention to raising Cotswold sheep and draft horses.

Mr. Windsor was married April 10, 1872, to Miss Mary Caroline Allison, who was born in Canada, February 28, 1843. Unto this worthy couple were born five children, as follows: John Allison, who died at the age of seventeen years; Caroline, who is now Mrs. John W. Childers; William, Frank, and Anne, who make their home with their parents.

Politically Mr. Windsor is independent in his views, but by no means indifferent to public affairs. He has always been deeply interested in the cause of education, and was road supervisor of his district several times. The first railroad laid in Oregon received the material assistance and co-operation of Mr. Windsor, he having contributed $10 toward the first survey of the same. One of the oldest residents of this section of the county, throughout his entire life Mr. Windsor has been known as a man of thought and action, who has the best interest of the community at heart, and whose life is a worthy example of the possibilities to be attained in this great northwest. He is known as a friend of progress and cheerfully lends his influence to any public enterprise for the betterment of the community, whether social, political or religious, and these qualities have won for him the highest regard of his fellow men.

GEORGE W. JONES. McMinnville owes much to the enterprising efforts and business ability of George W. Jones, who has done as much, if not more, than any other man for the promotion of commercial and industrial activity here. He has seen this portion of the state when much of it was still in its primitive condition, when the work of progress and improvement had scarcely been begun. He was born in Montgomery county, N. Y., April 19, 1835, and his father, Ahijah Jones, was also a native of that county. The grandfather, Lynds Jones, was of Welsh parentage and engaged extensively in the manufacture of flour on Cayadutta creek, in Montgomery county. Ahijah Jones became one of the leading factors in industrial circles there, owning and operating cotton and woolen mills and also engaging in the manufacture of flour and lumber, at what is now Berryville, N. Y. In the fall of 1860 he went to the south to engage in manufacturing but the hard times accompanying the war came on and he suffered heavy losses. He died in Macon, Ga., in 1863. He married Catherine Veeder, who was born in Tribes Hill, N. Y., a daughter of Col. John S. Weeder, who was of Holland Dutch descent and won his title by valorous service in the war of 1812. He took part in the battle of Sackett's Harbor and was in other engagements, and after his military life was ended he carried on farming in Montgomery county. Mrs. Jones died when her son, George W., was but seven years old.

George W. Jones was the only one of the four children of the family who reached mature years. Reared in New York, he attended the public schools and the State Normal at Albany, where he was a student from 1854 until 1856. In his senior year, however, he left school and joined his father, who had removed to New York City. In his youth he had learned the trade of a millwright and miller. For two years he was engaged in the wholesale produce business in New York City and in 1859 he left the Atlantic coast for the Pacific, making his way to San Francisco and thence to Crescent City, Cal., where for two years he was manager of a saw and flouring mill. In 1861, at the time of the Salmon river excitement, he came to Portland, making the journey on foot along the Columbia river. It was an arduous trip, fraught with hardship and even dangers. The snow lay so thick upon the ground that sometimes he was able to cover only six miles per day. At night he lay down in the snow and he lived upon crackers and cold bacon for days, but at length he reached his destination.

In 1864 Mr. Jones went to Grande Ronde valley, where he conducted a sawmill for Stephen Coffin, and in the spring of 1865 returned to Boise, Idaho, where he engaged in mining until August. At that time he returned to Portland, there conducting a sawmill for William L. Adams, on Panther creek, and in 1866, in connection with O. H. Adams, he bought out his employer, the business being continued under the name of O. H. Adams & Company, manufacturing lumber and also conducting a sash and door factory in the city. When Mr. Adams sold his interest to E. J. Crawford, the firm style of Jones & Crawford was assumed, and later Mr. Crawford sold to Mr. Hill, and Mr. Adams again became interested in the business. When the partners were Mr. Adams, H. A. Reasoner, Mr. Hill and Mr. Jones, the enterprise was conducted under the name of Jones & Company, thus continuing until 1884, when Mr. Reasoner sold, and the following year Mr. Hill disposed of his interest, the firm then becoming Jones & Adams. In the meantime O. H. Adams had transferred his interest to his son, Frank G. Adams, and the business has since been continued as Jones & Adams. They have a sawmill at the south fork of North Yamhill river and are extensively and successfully engaged in the manufacture of lumber. They also conduct a planing mill for the manufacture of sash, doors, blinds and mouldings, and both branches of their business are profitably conducted, and a large trade is enjoyed. On the 9th of July, 1891, the firm suffered severely in the fire which swept over the city, causing them a loss of more than $20,000. May 31, 1892, a second disaster occurred to their store building, which with its stock of hardware, paints and oils was burned out, causing a loss of $5,000. Disaster again overtook the firm on the 26th of August, 1896, in a third disastrous conflagration, destroying their mill and other property in the mountains, with a loss of $5,000, but with characteristic energy the firm rebuilt the mill and began business anew with an energy and determination that have been marked characteristics of the house. Mr. Jones had done more building in McMinnville than any other one man. He was the pioneer builder here and has continued the work as the years have advanced until the city is now largely indebted to him in this direction for substantial improvement. He erected a brick block in the business district, and in the face of adverse circumstances he has pushed forward, displaying fortitude and energy which have commanded the respect and admiration of all.

Mr. Jones has been twice married. In Fonda, N. Y., he wedded Miss Rachel Young, who was born, reared and died there, and their only child also died in the Empire state. In Oregon Mr. Jones was a second time married, this union being with Miss Emma E. Adams, who was born in Galesburg, Ill., and was three years of age when brought by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. O. H. Adams, to the northwest. This marriage has been blessed with seven children: Georgia May, of Portland; Lynds W., who is with Fleischner, Mayer & Co., of Portland; Katie V., also of that city; Mary, who was graduated in the high school of McMinnville and is now a student in McMinnville College; Frank, Willard and Ellen, at home.

That Mr. Jones is regarded as one of the valued and leading citizens of McMinnville is shown by the fact that for twelve years, by popular ballot, he was retained as a member of the city council, served on many important committees and was chairman of the committee on ways and means and on accounts and current expenses. He was also a member of the charter revision committee, and for one term he served as mayor of the city, his administration being beneficial because it was businesslike and practical. He has also been clerk of the school board for several terms. He has always been an earnest Republican, with firm faith in the party and the ultimate triumph of its principles for the good of the country. Fraternally, Mr. Jones is connected with Union Lodge, No. 43, F. & A. M., of which he is a past master, and is a charter member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His wife belongs to the Christian Church, and both have many friends in the city where they make their home. Mr. Jones has labored so consecutively along lines of general progress and improvement that McMinnville's history would be incomplete were his life record omitted.

MITCHELL MONTGOMERY ELLIS. The intimate identification of Mitchell Montgomery Ellis, of Dallas, Polk county, with the important interests of the Willamette valley—which, broadly speaking, means the state of Oregon—is well illustrated by the fact that he has been for many years extensively engaged in mercantile pursuits in that city; is the organizer, vice-president and director of the Dallas City Bank; is the owner and operator of the largest prune orchard planted by an individual in the state; is one of the operators of the best flouring-mill outside of the city of Portland; was one of the organizers and principal upbuilders of the Presbyterian Church of Dallas, and is now serving his second term as mayor of that city. These essential features of his career in Oregon form, in themselves, an integral chapter in the history of the development of the commonwealth.

Mr. Ellis was born near Zanesville, Ohio, January 10, 1846, and is the son of Henry and Henrietta (Rowell) Ellis. Henry Ellis was born in Pennsylvania, and in early manhood became a merchant tailor, following his trade near Zanesville, Ohio, and in Ottumwa and Decatur, Iowa. In 1855 he purchased three different tracts of raw prairie land near Decatur, where he engaged extensively in farming and stock-raising until 1865. Having disposed of his Iowa property, he came across the plains to Oregon, settling on a farm near Ballston, Polk county, in the latter year. The journey across the plains was a memorable one. The equipment consisted of mule and horse teams. During the trip the emigrants were stopped three miles east of Kearney, Neb., and held until a company of one hundred men could be assembled, when the government sent a mustering officer to organize them into a military company for the protection of the train, and drill them. They continued as an organized company along the Platte river until the mouth of the Cache la Poudre river was reached, which they crossed with the main body of the train. Though the number had diminished to less than one hundred, they then elected a new captain, and continued on their journey to Salt Lake City. Here the Ellis family separated from the rest of the train, and with eleven teams came over the new stage road four hundred miles to Boise City. From this point they continued down the Snake river without accident, until reaching the Cascade mountains, where they felt themselves to be in comparative safety. They arrived in Salem September 14, 1865. The first winter they passed in Yamhill county, and in the spring of 1866 settled on a farm near Ballston, as before stated.

In politics Henry Ellis was a staunch Democrat. Fraternally he was a Mason, affiliating with Amity Lodge No. 20, A. F. & A. M. In religion he was a Universalist. He died on the home farm in 1900, at the age of seventy-two years.

Henrietta Rowell Ellis was born in Jackson county, Ohio, November 18, 1829, and was the daughter of William Rowell, a descendant of a distinguished family in Virginia. Her Grandfather Rowell followed the martial forces of Washington during the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Ellis is now residing in Salem, at the age of seventy-five years. Through her marriage she became the mother of eight children, of whom Mitchell Montgomery is the eldest. The others are: Elizabeth, wife of Judge N. L. Butler, of Dallas, Ore.; W. R., of Sheridan; Sarah, wife of W. H. Kuykendall, of Lewiston, Ore.; H. J., of Enterprise, Ore.; Mabel, wife of Judge C. A. Johns, of Baker City, Ore.; Martha, deceased wife of Dr. J. N. Smith, of Salem; and J. C. Sheridan, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work.

Mitchell Montgomery Ellis was reared on his father's farm in Iowa, and received his rudimentary education in the public schools of that state. Upon the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in Company I, Thirty-sixth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, but was rejected on account of his age. In 1864 he re-enlisted in Company A, Thirty-fourth Iowa Mounted Infantry, but his regiment was never mustered into active service. In 1865 he crossed the plains in company with his parents, and since 1866 has resided continuously in Polk county.

In the fall of 1867 he entered the Baptist College at McMinnville, where he remained for one year. The following year he was engaged in teaching school in Polk county, after which he re-entered the Baptist College, where he completed his education. In 1869 he went to Portland, and was employed as a clerk for Arnold & Faim and later with Masters & Pratzman, until the fall of 1872, when he engaged in business for himself near where Ballston is now located, and removed to Dallas and engaged in the general merchandising business on his own account.

In the meantime Mr. Ellis had become interested in the political situation in Oregon, and in 1880 was elected county clerk of Polk county, and was re-elected in 1882. The duties thus devolving upon him forced him to dispose of his mercantile interests, in order that he might devote his entire attention to the duties of his office.

After retiring from office in 1884 he purchased the mercantile business of W. C. Brown, and after four years of successful management sold the business to its former owner. In 1888, with the assistance of William Savage, he organized a private concern known as the William Savage Banking Company, and in 1892 assisted likewise in the organization of the Dallas City Bank, successor to the first-named institution, with a capital of $50,000. He became the first president of the concern, serving until 1898, when he resigned in order to devote his attention to the management of his prune orchard. He is now vice-president of the banking company. During the financial panic of 1893 Mr. Ellis, as president of the bank, established for himself a reputation as a man of resources, sagacity and financial integrity, his keen judgment being the most important factor in enabling that institution to weather the storm which wrecked so many similar enterprises throughout the country.

In 1889 he began to set out a prune orchard adjoining the city of Dallas, and at the present time has sixty acres in bearing trees, this constituting the largest orchard of its kind set out and owned by an individual in the state of Oregon. Everything pertaining to this enterprise is on an extensive and modern scale, including well-equipped warehouse, packing-house and the largest drier in the state. The well known brand, "K. & W.," is familiar to consumers of fine fruits throughout the northwest, and in 1902 a consignment of six carloads of the choicest of the product of his orchard found its way to the markets of London, Eng.

In 1902 Mr. Ellis added to his responsibilities by re-purchasing the mercantile business of W. C. Brown, forming a partnership with Alonzo Brown, and the business was conducted under the style of Brown & Ellis until January, 1903, when Mr. Brown's heirs disposed of their interests to D. L. Keyt, of Perrydale, and the firm is now

Ellis & Keyt. In connection with Frank Gibson, Mr. Ellis is the owner and operator of the Rick-reall Flouring Mills, where is manufactured the celebrated "White Lily" flour, which is recognized throughout the entire northwest as the finest flour made in Oregon, outside of the city of Portland. The mill has a capacity of one hundred and fifty barrels per day, and its production finds its way to many foreign ports, large quantities being shipped annually to China and other Oriental countries.

In his political affiliation a Democrat, Mr. Ellis has served as chairman of the Democratic County Central Committee and as a member of the Democratic State Central Committee. Upon the incorporation of Dallas as a city, he was made its first mayor, and in 1901 was again elected to the office of chief executive on the Reform ticket, being the only successful candidate on that ticket. Fraternally he is a member of Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., of which he was master for two terms. Without his financial and moral assistance it is doubtful if the Presbyterian Church of Dallas would have been organized or built. He has been one of its chief supporters, contributing largely to its upbuilding, and is now treasurer of its board of trustees and superintendent of its Sunday school.

In 1871 Mr. Ellis was united in marriage with Ella D'Lashmutt, who was born in Columbus, Ohio, a daughter of Edward L. and Lydia (Morris) D'Lashmutt, also natives of Ohio. The former died in Polk county in 1888. A sketch of his life appears in another part of this review.

Thus is told, all too briefly, the story of the career of M. M. Ellis, one of the stalwart founders of the commercial fabric of the northwest, upon whose shoulders rest lightly great responsibilities. He has freely disseminated his views relative to important business undertakings in this region, whenever his advice has been sought, and his judgment has been deferred to by the promoters of many local enterprises. His sagacity, his integrity and his keen appreciation of the possibilities afforded by this country of wonderful resources have done much to inspire others to their best endeavors, and the record of his career, with its attendant success, will stand an enduring monument to the important part this man of affairs has borne in the development of this yet comparatively new region.

GEORGE J. WOLFER. Occupying a position of importance among the wide-awake, enterprising business men of Hubbard, George J. Wolfer is actively identified with the mercantile interests of the city, and is also proprietor of the far-famed Wolfer's Mineral Springs. A man of energy and decision, public-spirited and am-lations, he has done much to improve and advance the place in which he resides, and is well deserving of the confidence reposed in him by his fellow-men.

A native of Harrison county, Ind., he was born March 25, 1842, a son of Rudolph Wolfer. His father, who was born, reared and educated in Pennsylvania, went with his father about 1835 to Harrison county, Ind. In 1846, with his wife and children, he removed to Bethel, Shelby county, Mo., and joined Dr. Kyle's colony, and was engaged in agricultural pursuits there for seventeen years. In 1863 with this colony he started for Oregon, and crossed the plains in an ox wagon, taking with him his family and household goods. The entire train, consisting of forty-two wagons, was six months on the trip, and suffered untold hardships, not the least unbearable being that of hunger. Locating in Aurora, he continued in the independent calling in which he was reared, successfully carrying on general farming until his retirement from active pursuits, and is still living there, a venerable and respected man of ninety-two years. His wife, whose maiden name was Katherine Voght, was born in Germany, and came to the United States with her parents. She lived to an advanced age, dying on the home farm, in Aurora, Ore., in 1887. Of the eleven children born of their union, seven were boys and four girls, George J. being the fourth child in order of birth.

As a boy and a youth George J. Wolfer attended the district schools of Shelby county, Mo., whither his parents located when he was about four years of age, during the time obtaining a practical knowledge of farming pursuits. Crossing the plains with his parents in 1863, he drove one of the teams in the long train, and on arriving in Aurora began farming with the colony. In 1878 he engaged in business for himself by opening a cooper's shop in Hubbard, Marion county, managing it for five years. From 1883 until 1890, he was successfully engaged in the manufacture of brick and tile, but since that time has carried on an extensive and lucrative business in general merchandise, owning the building occupied by his residence and store, and carrying a varied stock of goods valued at $4,000.

About one-fourth of a mile from the city, Mr. Wolfer owns seventy-five acres of land, on which his celebrated mineral springs are situated, and his bottling works are erected. From a correct analysis of the water obtained from these springs the following matter in solution is found, proving it to be of great value for both medicinal and bathing purposes:

Chloride of sodium and potassium...	29.74
Bi-carbonate of lime.....	6.82
Bi-carbonate of soda.....	16.10

Bi-carbonate of magnesia.....	4.26
Bi-carbonate of iron.....	2.10
Silicia	2.39
Sulphate of soda.....	.58
Manganese	Trace

These springs are for sale on easy terms by the present proprietor.

Mr. Wolfer married, in Aurora, Ore., Miss Ottillia Will, a native of Shelby county, Mo., and into their household four children have been born, namely: Edward I., a resident of Medford, Ore.; Alfred D., of Hubbard; Sadie, wife of Lawrence Scholl, of Hubbard; and Henrietta, living at home. Politically Mr. Wolfer has long been actively identified with the best interests of county, town and state, and has uniformly cast his vote with the Republicans. While living in Aurora he served as constable two terms; has been school clerk and school director in Hubbard several years; road superintendent one term; and served as member of the Hubbard City Council.

GEORGE W. OLDS, a retired farmer, living in McMinnville, and a pioneer of Oregon of 1851, was born in Hillsdale, Mich., July 16, 1831, and is of English descent. His paternal great-grandfather was a native of England and on emigrating to the new world settled in Maine. The grandfather of our subject was Timothy Olds, the father, Abel Olds. The latter was born in Ohio and at an early age was left an orphan. Locating in Hillsdale county, Mich., he there followed farming for a time and afterward removed to the vicinity of Coldwater, Branch county, where he improved a farm upon which he spent his remaining days, dying in 1850. He was a Universalist in religious faith and a man of sterling worth and integrity. He married Anna Thurston, who was born in Lisle, Broome county, N. Y., a daughter of Blakeley Thurston, who, on removing to the west, settled in St. Joseph county, Mich. The parents of Mr. Olds were the first couple married in St. Joseph county. The wife died in 1846 and four years later the husband passed away. They were the parents of six children, one son and five daughters, and the living are George W. and Mrs. Derby, of McMinnville.

Upon a farm in his native state the subject of this review was reared, early becoming familiar with the work of field and meadow, while in the subscription school he pursued his education. He remained at home until after his father's death and in 1851 he started for Oregon, with his uncle, Martin Olds. With horse teams they left Branch county, Mich., and journeyed westward, crossing the Mississippi at Galena, Ill., and the Missouri at Kanesville, their destination being Oregon City. It was on the 10th of April that they left their Michigan home, and on the 31st of October they arrived in Oregon City, where Mr. Olds soon secured work, being in the employ of others until 1857, when he purchased a farm.

In October, 1855, however, he had volunteered in an Oregon regiment for service in the Yakima Indian war and served on the Snake river, in Yakima and Walla Walla counties, and took part in the battles of Fort Simcoe in Yakima valley, remaining with his command until the close of the war, being mustered out May 10, 1856. In 1861 he located on his farm of one hundred and sixty acres, eight miles southwest of McMinnville. This he fenced and improved, devoting his energies to the production of grain and the raising of stock. He erected good buildings there and for forty years he carried on agricultural pursuits, after which he rented the place in 1901, and in July, 1902, he sold that property. Upon leasing his farm he removed to McMinnville and purchased a residence in which he has since lived retired.

On the 10th of November, 1859, in Lafayette, Mr. Olds was married to Miss Nancy Ellen Shuck, who was born near Burlington, Iowa. Her father was born near Crawfordsville, Ind., June 19, 1815, and the grandfather, Jacob Shuck, was born in Pennsylvania, whence he removed to Indiana, locating upon a farm. Later he became a farmer of Iowa and in 1847 he crossed the plains, spending his last days in Yamhill county near Dundee. He had served his country in the war of 1812 and was present at the battle of Tippecanoe. Andrew J. Shuck was reared in Indiana, afterwards becoming a resident of Iowa, and near Burlington, that state, followed farming until 1847. In the meantime he had wedded Mary Conlee, who was born in Byron county, Ky., March 15, 1818, a daughter of Reuben Conlee, who was an agriculturist and a native of the Blue Grass state. He removed to Greene county, Ill., among its early settlers, and served in the Black Hawk war. After his military service had ended he became a resident of Des Moines county, Iowa, settling near Burlington, where his death occurred. He was a leading and influential citizen of that state at an early day and was serving as a member of the Iowa legislature at the time of his death, which occurred while he was in Des Moines attending the sessions of the general assembly. Isaac Conlee, the grandfather of Mrs. Olds, was a farmer of Kentucky and died there in the year 1847.

Andrew J. Shuck, with his wife and six children, started on the long journey across the plains in a slow moving ox train, having been nearly seven months upon the way ere they reached the fertile valley of the Willamette. Mr. Shuck secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near North Yamhill and there he developed his land, providing a good home for his family. At the time of the Indian war he made guns for the use of the volunteers. He was the first sheriff of Yamhill county and served in that position for two terms, after which he represented his district in the legislature for three terms. He assisted in building the first schoolhouse of his locality and took an active part in establishing civilization in this wild and unimproved region. Finally he located in McMinnville, where he built a residence. He was serving as school director at the time of the erection of the fine schoolhouse here and he died in 1894, his death being lamented by all who knew him, because he was a valued citizen and earnest Christian man. In politics he was a Democrat and was a warm friend of the cause of temperance. Mrs. Shuck still survives her husband and now makes her home with Mrs. C. A. Wallace. By her marriage she became the mother of seven children, Mrs. C. A. Wallace being the eldest. Of the others we mention the following: Mrs. Susan M. Openhoff, of Dawson, and Nancy Ellen, the wife of our subject, are twins; Mrs. Matilda Wood is a resident of Yamhill county; William is next in order; Reuben owns the old donation land claim; and Mrs. Anna Fendall resides in Ashland. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Olds were born three children, but Minnie died at the age of sixteen years and Augusta at the age of two and one-half years, the surviving daughter being Ella, the wife of J. E. Durham, of Portland.

Mr. Olds belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen and he and his family are connected with the Grange and Mrs. Olds with the Degree of Honor. In politics Mr. Olds is a Democrat and he belongs to the Indian War Veterans' Association. He is also a member of the County Pioneers' Association and both he and his wife are members of the State Pioneers' Association, whose meetings they have attended each year for the past eighteen years.

J. B. LAYSON. A well known farmer and native son of Yamhill county is J. B. Layson, representative of one of the pioneer families of this district, and during almost his entire life associated with this locality. He was born near Hopewell, December 31, 1846, a son of Aaron M. and Sarah J. (Matheny) Layson, natives of Illinois, and farmers by occupation.

Aaron M. Layson was also the son of farmers, and was reared to that useful pursuit. In 1842 he removed with his parents from Illinois to Missouri, where he lived on the home farm until his marriage with Sarah J. Matheny, and then conducted farming independently until 1843. At this early day a journey across the plains was a truly hazardous undertaking, and required an amount of courage and determination hardly realized by those who to-day observe the thrifty west through the windows of a Pullman palace car. Nevertheless, Mr. Layson disposed of his Missouri interests, gathered together his few worldly possessions, and joined an ox train under command of Capt. William Burnett, one of the intrepid leaders to western opportunity. Without any particular misfortunes the party arrived safely in Oregon, where Mr. Layson took up a donation claim, but failed to prove up on it. Not realizing his expectations here the family moved down into California during the gold excitement of '49, where the father prospected and mined, and also spent considerable time in freighting. In 1851 he returned to Yamhill county, and settled on a farm where Hopewell now stands, and after two or three years bought a place known as the D. B. Matheny donation claim, three miles north of Wheatland. Here he was fairly prosperous, and here died, his wife having predeceased him during their residence in California.

At the age of nineteen J. B. Layson started away from home to make his own living, equipped with an extended farming experience, and with a fair common-school education. With the exception of eight years spent east of the mountains in the stock-raising business, he has since been a resident of this vicinity, where he married Sarah C. Layson, widow of John Layson. With his wife he started in at housekeeping on his present farm, half a mile north of Hopewell, known as the Rachel Matheny donation claim, and on his property has made many improvements, including a pleasant home, fine barns and outbuildings, and general agricultural implements. At the present time he is the owner of about five hundred and ninety-seven acres of land, a large portion of which is under cultivation, and where he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. One child was born to Mr. and Mrs. Layson, whom they christened Howard, and whose early death caused intense grief in the little household. Mr. Layson is not a politician, as the word is usually understood, although he maintains a keen interest in the workings of the Republican party. He is enterprising and thrifty, and commands the respect and good-will of all who are privileged to know him.

J. T. GOWDY. Among the sons contributed by Illinois for the upbuilding of Yamhill county, and who, through the force of their own character and determination to succeed have risen to envious influence in agricultural and other circles, may be mentioned J. T. Gowdy, extensively engaged in the raising of Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep. Of practical farming ancestry, Mr. Gowdy was born in Tazewell county, Ill., November 21, 1835, and when a very small lad was deprived by death of the affectionate care of his parents. Left thus practically alone in the world, his education and general training were naturally restricted, and the fact that at present he is one of the best informed and most progressive men in his neighborhood argues most praiseworthy application during the maturer years of his life. Until his fourteenth year he made his home with relatives, and thereafter found employment with one J. T. Scott, an uncle and father of the present editor of the Oregonian. In the family of Mr. Scott he found a home and interested friends, and although hard work was the order of the day on the farm owned by his benefactor, Mr. Gowdy made great progress physically and mentally, early evincing habits of thrift and industry.

A man of keen insight and much ambition, Mr. Scott determined to follow the tide of emigration westward, and March 4, 1852, started on the long journey across the plains, accompanied by his seventeen-year-old charge, J. T. Gowdy, one of the most enthusiastic and determined of the little band. There were ten wagons in the train, and the youth made himself useful in many directions, particularly as a driver of oxen and cattle. Arriving in Marion county September 27, 1852, his first winter was spent with Mr. Hall at Woodburn, and he afterward entered the employ of a Mr. Brown, with whom he remained for eight years. February 4, 1861, he married Anna Kemp, who was born in Pettis county, Mo., November 23, 1843, and who crossed the plains with her parents many years ago, her father dying on the way to his new home in the west.

After his marriage, Mr. Gowdy located on one hundred acres, purchased some time previously, and there lived for about three years. In the meantime, he prospected and mined in the Caribou country on the Salmon river, near Florence, Idaho. In the fall of 1868 he bought the hundred acres of land in Yamhill county, which has since been his home, and on which he has made many improvements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, his stock including Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Gowdy, of whom Arthur lives in Portland, while Hattie G., Lillian, and Elizabeth live at home. A Republican in politics, it was the good fortune of Mr. Gowdy to cast his first presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln. However, though a staunch adherent of his party, he has never worked for or been willing to receive official recognition. Mr. Gowdy lives three miles southwest of Dayton and five miles from McMinnville, and his home is the typical residence of a hospitable, successful, and very popular westerner.

WALTER J. SARGEANT. The popular postmaster and merchant of Bellevue has contributed his share towards the agricultural development of Yamhill county and is accounted one of the most enterprising and successful members of the pioneer families of '51. He was born near Springfield, Ill., March 10, 1847, a son of Philip and Nancy Ann (Wilson) Sargeant, natives, respectively, of Ohio and Illinois, the former born March 10, 1820.

As a young man Philip Sargeant went away from his father's farm in Ohio to Illinois, where, about 1845, he married, and where he lived until 1851. He then undertook the trip across the plains with ox teams, meeting with few encounters with the Indians, and having in all a fairly successful trip. He took up a donation claim near Grand Ronde, where he lived for three years, and after selling the same, bought a farm near Ballston, Polk county, and there spent the remainder of his life, his death occurring when he was only forty years of age. Ten children were born into this family, of whom Walter J. is the second oldest; Nancy J., the first-born, is deceased; William resides near the old home place; Mary A. became the wife of William Thornton, of Sheridan; Lewis C. and John are deceased; Constantine is a resident of this state; George resides near Ballston; Martha is the wife of D. C. Coleman, of Sheridan; and Frank lives near the old homestead.

While living on the paternal farm Walter J. Sargeant attended the district schools, and also the high school at Salem. At the age of seventeen he began to work at outside employment, and November 1, 1864, enlisted in Company A, First Oregon Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in at Salem. The regiment was first sent to Vancouver and then to Grand Ronde, after which they participated in a winter campaign east of the mountains, and subsequently returned to Grand Ronde, where they were mustered out. Returning to his home in Yamhill county, Mr. Sargeant worked at farm work until his marriage, in November, 1870, with Martha A. Gant, a daughter of Reuben Gant, whose career is mentioned in another part of this work. Mr. and Mrs. Sargeant went to housekeeping on the old Gant homestead, which they still own, and which contains about two hundred acres. Here they engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1892, in which year Mr. Sargeant relinquished farming in favor of a general merchandise business in Bellevue, which he has since conducted in connection with his duties as postmaster. He has an up-to-date little store, where the residents of the town and county may procure in their best quality the commodities most in demand, and which is one of the busy centers of activity in the town. Mr. Sargeant takes a keen interest in Republican politics, and is foremost in all efforts at general improvement in his town and county. He is variously associated with the social organizations in which his community abounds, and is a member of Donaldson Post No. 55, G. A. R., and is past post commander.

FRANK CAMPBELL. Two generations of the Campbell family have been represented in Yamhill county, and the example of industry and progressiveness set by the father is shared in like measure by the son, Frank Campbell, a native son of this county, born northeast of Hopewell July 2, 1873.

The father, John Campbell, was born in Canada in 1839, whither the grandfather had settled many years before. John was reared to farming and a general knowledge of business, and after attaining his majority engaged in saw-milling on a rapid Canadian stream. He married Martha J. Davis, also a native of Canada, and in 1871, disposed of his milling interests and brought his little family to Oregon, remaining in Dayton for about three months. In the meantime he had been looking around for desirable agricultural property, and decided upon a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, one mile north of Hopewell, upon which he settled and farmed for several years. He was ambitious and a good manager, and so used the opportunities by which he was surrounded in the west, that at the time of his death he owned thirteen hundred acres of land. Of the six children born to himself and wife, Nellie is deceased; Robert is living on the old home place; Frank, the subject of this article, is the next in order of birth; Cora is the wife of George Nash, and they make their home in Hopewell; Elmer makes his home in this vicinity, and Jennie is living at home, and attending school in Salem. John Campbell raised considerable stock, and was sixty-three years of age at the time of his death. His wife died in 1887, when about forty years of age.

Until his marriage with Ruth Nash, a native of Minnesota, Frank Campbell remained upon his father's farm, and under the capable direction of the elder man, developed habits of thrift and industry. He then started housekeeping on the farm where he now lives, which was his father's home the last years of his life. Mr. Campbell's home is one of the pleasantest and most convenient rural homes in this vicinity, adding to the value of his farm, as do also the barns and outbuildings, all of which are according to late and improved plans. Of the two hundred and thirty acres owned by this energetic agriculturist two hundred are under cultivation, and besides general farming he is engaged in stock-raising on a moderate scale, making a specialty of Cotswold sheep. Besides the features already mentioned Mr. Campbell has four acres devoted to hops, in the cultivation of which he is very successful. Although independent in politics, Mr. Campbell takes a keen interest in all political undertakings in the neighborhood, and he may be depended upon to further any effort at general improvement in the community. One child has been born to himself and wife, Bessie, who is living at home.

JAMES HOUCK. Few men in the state of Oregon are more interestingly reminiscent of the very early days of the west than is James Houck, at present a farmer of Yamhill county, and one of its most venerable and honored residents. On both sides of his family Mr. Houck is descended from Revolutionary heroes, his grandfathers having left their plows and families to follow the martial fortunes of Washington. Longevity is a condition which Mr. Houck may reasonably expect in his own case, for his paternal grandfather lived to be one hundred and four years old, and his mother's father attained the unusual age of one hundred and seven. His father, another James, was the establisher of the family in Licking county, Ohio, having removed there at a very early age. He was born in 1801, and like his sire lived far beyond the biblical allotment, his life extending up to the century mark.

James Houck was born in Knox county, Ohio, February 14, 1819, and was six years of age when he accompanied his parents to Licking county, Ohio. Possessing excessive vitality and energy as a boy, he felt the limitations by which he was surrounded on the home farm, and like many another youth left the family fireside without due notice, at the time being seventeen years of age. His experience at South Bend, Ind., was not entirely successful, so at the end of a year he returned to his father's farm, and was received with joy by his overanxious family. However, having tasted the joys of independence he again went away, and took up land in Washington county, Iowa, upon which he lived for three years. On the lookout for anything that held out superior inducements he naturally heard much of the possibilities of the far west, and as early as 1843 started overland with a train of emigrants consisting of many families and two hundred wagons. Arriving in Oregon without any particular adventure, Mr. Houck engaged in getting out logs for the Hudson Bay Company in Oregon City, and in 1845 he joined a party consisting of forty other men, one woman and three children, all destined for the state of California.

The California memories of Mr. Houck are interesting in the extreme, and may be taken as typical of all who ventured thus early into one of the most ideal portions of the United States. Yet so little was the climate and resources appreciated or known, that at the time of his arrival in San Francisco a small Spanish settlement was drowsing in the sun, its citizens appallingly ignorant of any particular advantages, or any resources to develop. The real estate in the town was available for $15 an acre, $4 down, and everything was in proportion. No one was busy in those days and the old Spanish way of putting everything off until to-morrow prevailed through the breadth and length of the state. The settlers led a free and careless life, their hospitality being unbounded, and their larder free as long as it lasted. Mr. Houck traveled around the state with little expense to himself, for he was welcome everywhere, and could stay as long as he liked.

The breaking out of the Mexican war offered a chance in the money-making line, and, anticipating a demand, Mr. Houck started out with three hundred head of horses to meet the oncoming emigrants, his partner in business being a man by the name of Walker. At Fort Bridges they came across the searchers after homes in the west, informed them of the state of war in Mexico, and forthwith traded their horses for American mules, which they took to Mexico and sold. In the Mexican war Mr. Houck served for three months under Colonel Donaldson, and afterwards engaged in mule-trading with the Navajo Indians, giving them a certain kind of beads and $12 a head. The mules were taken to Santa Fe, N. M., and sold to the government, and the sale of this hardy animal netted a fair income to far-sighted traders. With another pack of mules Mr. Houck went to Missouri in 1848, and, having disposed of them, visited his old home in Ohio. For the following year he traveled extensively over the country, and in 1849 again crossed the plains, this time with a six-mule team. Arriving in California he made money in various ways, one being in purchasing Spanish prisoners taken by the Indians, and re-selling them to their parents or friends in Mexico. Rich children were the special prey of these sagacious Indians, and the money which passed hands before their ransom was accomplished mounted up into the thousands of dollars.

During his first visit to California Mr. Houck and a couple of friends started up the mountain of Chester Butte, and on the way shot the only white deer he has ever seen. Coming down from the mountain and pausing to drink at a spring, they saw what they thought yellow rock, and, thinking it pretty, filled their pockets with it. Arriving in camp there was not one of the party who knew that it was gold, and thinking it worthless, threw it away. Later when gold had been discovered by more knowing ones, and the announcement thrilled the whole country, two of the party returned to the spot and got the nuggets, which netted them $6,000. In the meantime Mr. Houck had made money, but had the misfortune to go security for many people whom he thought reliable, but who eventually proved his undoing. In this way he lost about $4,700, and, somewhat discouraged, returned to Ohio, where he bought a farm and married Mary Jones. He continued to farm in Ohio until 1875, and then came to Oregon, locating on the farm which has since been his home. He has two hundred and twenty-five acres of land five and a half miles southwest of McMinnville, upon which he has made many fine improvements, and where he has been successful. His first wife dying a year and ten days after their marriage, he married for a second wife Adelaine White, who has borne him five children, of whom two are living: Frances is the wife of John Rohrer, of McMinnville, and has four children, Ada, Bert, Dolly and Charley; and Albert manages a warehouse in McMinnville, and has two children, James and Nettie. Mr. Houck is a Democrat in politics, but has never identified himself with office-seeking. He has been and still is one of the substantial men of the west, and one around whom cluster an unusual number of pioneer experiences. Worthy of mention is the fact that he was a passenger on the first railroad train in the United States, and which extended from Washington to Baltimore. This pioneer attempt at transporting the public was crude in the extreme, the cars being propelled over wooden rails by horse teams.

COL. JACOB C. COOPER. The career of Col. Jacob C. Cooper is typical of all that is resourceful, substantial, intellectual and progressive in northwestern citizenship. Mr. Cooper arrived in Oregon afoot in 1866, and following upon this indication of depleted finances has engaged successively in freighting, school teaching, merchandising, grain dealing, building and contracting, and surveying, in the meantime rising from almost complete obscurity to his present position as one of the most influential men in the state. To his credit is a splendid war record, and his immediate responsibilities include those in connection with his position as a member of the board of directors of the Lewis and Clark Centennial, the American Pacific Exposition, and the Oriental Fair of 1905. He is a member of the Oregon Chapter Sons of the American Revolution, and is an author and writer of more than local reputation, having written several stories, among them the "Yamhills," and he has contributed voluminously to such leading periodicals as the Oregonian, the New York Journal and the San Francisco Examiner.

A descendant of the German family of Keifer, whose early representatives in America translated the name to suit their adopted environment, Colonel Cooper was born in Lawrence county, Mo., January 16, 1845. His paternal great-grandfather was born in Pennsylvania, near the town of York, and from that state enlisted at four different times in the Revolutionary war. The first enlistment was under Captain Larch, and after removing to the state of North Carolina, he served with Marion's men, and participated in the battles of Cowpens, Eutaw Springs, and the siege of 1796, in time witnessing the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. When the Boones went to Kentucky the great-grandfather was one of their party, and he died in Wayne county, that state, at an advanced age. His son, Henry, the paternal grandfather, was born, reared, engaged in farming, and eventually died in Wayne county, Ky., where also was born Elbert Emerson Cooper, the father of Jacob C.

Elbert Emerson was the oldest of the children born to his parents, and the only one to settle in Missouri. In Lawrence county he took up a farm in the wilderness, improved it, and thereon reared seven sons and five daughters. He was a minister in the old school Baptist Church, and though he labored long and faithfully for the uplifting of humanity, received absolutely no compensation for his services. Owing to the prevalence of the Rebel army in his district life became almost unbearable, and he therefore gathered together his family and possessions and crossed the plains in 1863, settling on a claim near Salem, where he died in 1880, at the age of sixty-eight years. His wife, formerly Nancy Wann, who was born in Kentucky and died at Independence, Ore., at the age of seventy-six, was the daughter of William Wann, a native of the south, and an early settler in Missouri. During his former residence in Tennessee Mr. Wann was a member of the legislature with Andrew Johnson, whose intimate friend he was, and in Missouri he was county judge, as was also his son, Daniel, the latter of whom served in the Mexican war. Of the seven sons and five daughters born to Elbert Emerson Cooper and his wife, William H. was regiment saddler and a member of Company E., Ninth Kansas Cavalry during the Civil war, came to Oregon in 1868, and is now living at Slayton, Ore.; Daniel J. was an officer in the Missouri State Militia, came to Oregon in 1863, and is now engaged in farming near The Dalles; Elizabeth is the deceased wife of Mr.

Mann, of Polk county, Ore.; James S. is president of the First National Bank at Independence; Lydia died in infancy; Jacob C.; Sarah J. is now Mrs. Gildow, of Silverton, Ore.; Riley D. is a hop grower and lives at Independence, his twin sister having died in infancy; John E. and Elbert W. are twins, the former living at Ashland, Ore., and the latter at Independence, Ore.; and Patience lives in Independence.

After the war broke up the activity of the little log school house near the Cooper home in Lawrence county, Mo., there was additional inducement for the youth of that district to shoulder arms in defense of the union. At the age of seventeen, April 3, 1862, Jacob C. Cooper enlisted in the Fourteenth Missouri State Militia, and during his year of service participated in the battles of Springfield, Neosho, Prairie Grove and several others, and February 22, 1863, his regiment was consolidated with the Fourth Missouri Militia, and Companies L and G, Volunteer Cavalry, and mustered into the United States service. The new regiment took part in the battle of Mine Creek, or Big Blue, as the bodyguard for General Pleasanton, and was afterward engaged in the battles of Jefferson City and many guerrilla fights. After driving General Price out of the state they were stationed at Jefferson and Marshall, Mo., until the close of the war, and were mustered out at Warrensburg, Mo., April 3, 1865. While with the Fourteenth Mr. Cooper was delegated to carry an important dispatch from near Neosho to Fort Scott, Kan., and to return to Mount Vernon with reply, and while carrying out this order disguised as a country youth without arms, he was captured and detained. The same night he managed to jump the pickets, and two days later succeeded in rejoining his regiment.

After the war Mr. Cooper lived for a time in Fort Scott, and then spent the winter in Lawrence county, Mo. Many thrilling experiences during the war had not dimmed his ardor for adventure or change, and he welcomed the opportunity to cross the plains in 1866 as the driver of a six-mule team for Hugh Kirkendall, the noted freighter. There was plenty of excitement aboard during this trip, for the Indians gave them a great deal of unsolicited attention, even to the point of exterminating a number of the party. Arriving at Helena, Mont., Mr. Cooper walked the five hundred miles between that town and Walla Walla, Wash., and then drove a six-horse team for three days to get money enough to pay his boat fare to Portland. He arrived at Salem October 17, 1866, having left Leavenworth May 25, 1866. In the meantime his family had settled in Spring Valley, and after visiting them he engaged in school teaching during the first winter, and then engaged in the merchandise business at Lincoln. At Zena and Perrydale he built stores which he ran with fair success, and at the same time became rather heavily interested in buying and selling grain. For a time he was secretary of a steamboat company, and afterward was for fourteen years identified with contracting, building, and architecture in McMinnville. After taking up surveying Mr. Cooper became identified with the United States survey in 1881, and while thus employed established government lines of importance. In time he was elected surveyor of Yamhill county, from which position he resigned to assume the postmastership of McMinnville, to which he was appointed by President Harrison in 1889. A change of administration affecting this office in 1894, he turned his attention to his former occupation of surveying, which he has since combined with literary work.

Until 1896 Mr. Cooper was a staunch advocate of Republicanism as a whole, but, favoring silver, has since ranged himself on the side of this issue. He was chairman of the Oregon delegation at the National Convention in St. Louis in 1896, and also chairman of the committee on order of business. In 1901 he was the author of a bill creating a commission of seven to go to Washington and make an appeal before congress, the senate, and president, for pensions for Indian war veterans. He himself was appointed a member of this commission by Governor Geer in 1901, and it is universally conceded that the successful outcome of this mission was largely due to the strenuous and altogether satisfactory work of the commission from Oregon. An ardent admirer of the much beloved William McKinley, it was eminently fitting that an orator like Colonel Cooper should deliver the memorial address at McMinnville on September 19, 1901.

In Amity, Ore., Mr. Cooper became identified with the Masons, and is now a member of the Union Lodge, No. 43, of which he is past master; Taylor Chapter, R. A. M., of McMinnville, of which he is past high priest, and Hodson Council, No. 1. He is a member and past commander of Custer Post, No. 9, G. A. R., and was commander of the Department of Oregon during 1893-4, with the rank of major-general. From 1883 until 1886 he was assistant adjutant-general of the Oregon State Militia under Governor Moody, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in 1891 was a delegate to the National Encampment which was held at Detroit, Mich. In 1898 Colonel Cooper organized and drilled a Manila Guard, consisting of forty girls of McMinnville, a venture which proved highly satisfactory, for the girls proved splendid soldiers, and were so well drilled that they drew encomiums of praise at Astoria, Portland and many other points in the state. The trip to Astoria was particularly interesting, thousands turning out to welcome the handsomely uniformed and martial appearing Manila Guard.

For several years Colonel Cooper was president of the Board of Trade, and during this time, as well as during the greater part of his life here, he has been an important factor in stimulating an interest in the town and county, drawing particular attention to its multiplicity of resources, and its advantages as a home building center. Much of the success of the local affairs of McMinnville are traceable to his enthusiastic support, and his recognition of their desirability has made of the state encampment a joyful meeting place for war scarred veterans. In 1868 Colonel Cooper made a trip back to Missouri via Panama, and while in his native state married Melzena P. Spillman, who was born in Lawrence county, Mo., November 29, 1850, daughter of Judge Nathan C. Spillman, and a sister of Prof. William J. Spillman, government agriculturist of Washington, D. C. Of the children born of this union seven are living, the order of their birth being as follows: Nora J. is the wife of R. W. Doane, in charge of the experimental station at Keyport, Wash.; Dr. Arthur Spillman, a graduate of the Philadelphia Dental College, and now a practitioner on Broadway, N. Y.; Ina P., the wife of E. L. Darr, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Wells C., living in Chicago, Ill., and a member of Company A, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry during the Philippine campaign; Nellie, captain of the Manila Guards, a stenographer and at present private secretary to the president of the State Normal School in Washington; Paul B., a soldier in Company A, Second Oregon Volunteer infantry, a graduate of Pullman College, a pharmacist at Olympia, Wash.; and Frederick Goss, an artist and cartoonist in San Francisco. Lewis J., the oldest son in the family, died from injury at the age of seventeen. Mrs. Cooper is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and is prominent in the Woman's Relief Corps, of which she is ex-president. She is socially well known, and has many friends among the most exclusive people in the state, and past matron of the Chapter of the Eastern Star. In October, 1902, Colonel Cooper was appointed a member of the Board of Directors of the Lewis and Clark Centennial, a position for which his vast experience in various departments of western activity has eminently fitted him, and in 1903 was appointed chairman of the special committee having entire charge of the woman's work and woman's participation in the exposition, through whose efforts the Lewis and Clark Woman's Clubs are now being so extensively organized throughout the state, and will prove an important factor to the exposition.

Colonel Cooper is also performing important work on the committees of Legislation and Agriculture.

HIRAM SIMKINS. As one of the pioneers of 1847 Hiram Simkins has been identified with the very early as well as later development of Yamhill county, and to no one have the early trials and deprivations brought more satisfactory returns both as to character and personal possessions. Mr. Simkins was reared in a family in which there were nine other children, his earliest recollections going back to the paternal farm in Greene county, Pa., where he was born November 25, 1826. His leisure as a boy was very limited, and his schooling opportunities suffered in consequence. Nevertheless, he gained much solid training while working early and late, and started forth in the world with a fair idea of its responsibilities and opportunities.

When his services were no longer required on the home farm Mr. Simkins applied himself to learning the blacksmith's trade in Knox county, Ill., whither his parents had removed in 1836, and where his parents died at the ages respectively of sixty-two and ninety-eight. In 1847 he started across the plains with ox teams and wagons as a driver for Ralph Geer, and after a seven months' journey reached Oregon City, under the able command of General Palmer. Very soon Mr. Simkins made his way to Champoeg, Marion county, Ore., where the breaking out of the Cayuse war found him busily working at his trade. With commendable appreciation of the straits of his adopted state he enlisted in Company H, First Rifle Corps Oregon Volunteers, as a private, and during his service participated in many of the important Indian engagements. After this glimpse of the seamy side of life he returned to Champoeg, Marion county, and there worked at blacksmithing until the country was worked up into a ferment in 1849. To test his ability and luck as a miner he went down into California, but not realizing his expectations returned to his former home in Champoeg, where he found employment in the McLoughlin warehouse for about five years. During three years of this time he was a yard laborer.

In 1857 Mr. Simkins married Mary Ann Gay, a native of Yamhill county, Ore., and daughter of an English whaler. Mr. Gay retired to Oregon after many years in pursuit of the wily whale, locating in Yamhill county as early as 1836. After his marriage Mr. Simkins undertook housekeeping on what was known as the William Crozier donation claim four miles north of Hopewell, and this continued to be his home for the long period of twenty-five years. He then bought the farm upon which he has since lived, which consists of two hundred and seventy-two acres two miles south of Hopewell, on the Polk and Yamhill county line. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and it is needless to say that his reputation as an agriculturist is in keeping with his firmly established name as a progressive and well-informed citizen.

To Mr. Simkins and his wife were born sixteen children, the order of their birth being as follows: Newton, living at home; Frederick, living in this vicinity; John, living near his father; Andrew, a resident of Hoquiam, Wash.; Jesse, living with his parents; Mary and Jane, both living in Oregon City; Isabelle, residing in Portland; Rosa, a resident of Oregon City; Anna and Etta, both of whom are living at home; Florence, a resident of this vicinity; and May, living near her parents. Three of the children died in infancy: George, Alice and Lorraine. Mrs. Simkins died in 1891, leaving behind her many mourning friends, as well as disconsolate children. As a member of an old Democratic family Mr. Simkins has never departed from the teachings of his youth, but has rather strengthened his regard for the politics of the south. He is fraternally identified with Amity Lodge, F. & A. M., having been a member ever since 1870. With his children he is a member of the Evangelical Church. As a reminder of the very early days of Oregon Mr. Simkins has in his possession the trowel used in the construction of the first brick house in Oregon, which mansion was none other than that belonging to George Gays of Hopewell.

MRS. SARAH HELMICK. Not to the sterner sex alone can be given the glory and reverence due the founders of a state, for from the lives, the hearts and homes of women have come the strength that made possible the sacrifices necessary to succeed in the herculean task of leveling forest and upturning field, and following this with the modern movements which characterize the advance of this western section. A most worthy and representative member of these brave products of a western life is Mrs. Sarah Helmick, who bore her share of the burden in pioneer days as the wife of Henry Helmick, with whom she had come on her wedding tour to become a factor in the growth of the west.

Mrs. Helmick was in maidenhood Sarah Stepro, who was born in Harrison county, Ind., July 4, 1824, her parents being Harvey and Catherine (Shuck) Stepro, both natives of Pennsylvania. The father had become an early settler in Harrison county, where he engaged in farming and where his death occurred. The widow then took her family of eight children to Iowa, where she passed the remainder of her days. Of this large family, all grew to maturity and are all now living, with the exception of one or two, and Sarah is the fourth youngest. She made her home in Indiana until 1833, when she became a resident of Iowa. There she engaged in spinning and weaving, manufacturing from the raw material. On account of straitened circumstances she was allowed to attend school but three months in her life. In February, 1845, she married Henry Helmick, a native of Germany, who had come from the Fatherland with his parents and settled in Des Moines county, Iowa, where he was employed at farming, and also engaged as wagonmaker and blacksmith. The following April found them en route for Oregon, with four yoke of oxen and one wagon, the extent of their worldly wealth. They came over the old Oregon trail, fording the streams, facing the depredations of the Indians, and patiently enduring the hardships, privations and dangers of the journey for the sake of the home they hoped to make among the splendid conditions of the new west. Six months and three days after leaving the Mississippi valley found the young pioneers at Cascade Falls, Ore. After coming safely through the dangers of the trip they here experienced the bitter misfortune of losing everything they had through their raft being swept over the falls. Undaunted, however, by their hardships, they continued their journey as best they could, arriving at the Tualatin Plains in October, where they remained until Christmas. They then removed to Salem and spent the balance of the winter. In the spring of 1846 they took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres located on the Big Luckiamute, four miles from Monmouth, Polk county, which remained their home for many years. Affluence and consequent ease is now the portion of this family, but the beginning of their career was that of a crucial nature, for with absolutely nothing they took up the work of farmers in this location. The first year was one of especial hardship, not even three pounds of meat being brought into the house, their entire diet consisting of boiled wheat and peas, upon which they carried on steady, earnest labor. Mrs. Helmick continued her old occupation of spinning, making stocking yarn, and giving the help of a brave, patient woman to the upbuilding and improvement of their own particular part of the state. The farm was improved and cultivated in every possible way, and is still retained in the family. It is now rented, for after the death of her husband in 1878 Mrs. Helmick removed to Albany, Linn county, and located upon East Seventh street, where she has built a comfortable home.

Of the three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Helmick, James is located in Polk county, and is engaged in farming on the home property; Lewis died in Polk county in 1899, at the age of fifty-three years; and Mary is the wife of James Tedrow of Polk county. Mr. Helmick was identified with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of which Mrs. Helmick is a member. The political affiliations of the family have always been Republican, that being the party with which Mr. Helmick cast his vote during his years of citizenship.

W. T. MACY. Among the young men of Yamhill county who are recognized as active and valued factors in business and public life is W. T. Macy, who is popular with a large circle of friends, not only in McMinnville, where he makes his home, but also throughout the surrounding district. He was born in Greenville, Clay county, Iowa, March 19, 1872. His father, Paul Macy, was a native of Indiana, born near Richmond, while the grandfather, Thomas Macy, was born in North Carolina, removing thence to Ohio and afterward to Indiana. He was a shoemaker by trade and followed that pursuit in the localities in which he made his home. He became one of the pioneers of the Hoosier state and subsequently he went to Iowa, where he spent his remaining days. The Macy family is of English descent. Paul Macy was but a boy when his parents removed to Iowa and was reared in Winneshiek county, where he became acquainted with and married Miss Doshia Painter, who was born in Indiana, although her parents were natives of North Carolina. Her father, Edwin Painter, became a farmer of the Hoosier state, dying there at an early day. From Winneshiek county Mr. and Mrs. Macy removed to Clay county, casting in their lot with its pioneer settlers, and there the father developed a good farm. In 1889, however, he left the Mississippi valley and came to Oregon, settling in Newburg, where he is now engaged in general farming and in horticultural pursuits. He and his wife are members of the Friends Society, and he is a trustee of Pacific College at Newburg. The children of this worthy couple are W. T., of this review; Mrs. Effie M. Votaw, who resides in Ashland, Ore.; Walter, who is with the Southern Pacific Railway Company at Newburg; Perry D. and Orie, both at home.

W. T. Macy spent his youth upon the home farm, and after attending the public schools continued his studies in Newburg. He entered Pacific College at that place, remaining there as one of the students in that institution for three years. At the end of that time, in 1892, in Sheridan, he married Miss Mary M. Stowe, a native of Oregon and a daughter of one of the pioneers of the state.

The same year Mr. Macy established a furniture store in Newburg, which he conducted successfully for three years, and in 1896 he was nominated for the position of county recorder upon the Union ticket, being elected to that office over the Republican candidate by a majority of three hundred and eighty. He filled the position so acceptably that in 1898 he was re-elected, being the only one on the ticket who was successful in that year. He received a majority of fifty-five and was thus continued in the office from July, 1896, until July, 1900. No higher testimonial of his capability or of the confidence reposed in him by his fellow-townsmen could be given than the fact of his re-election. At the same time he held local office in McMinnville, for in November, 1899, he was elected to the city council, but after three months he resigned. On his retirement from the office of county recorder he entered upon a business connection with the Spaulding Logging Company and established their lumber yard in McMinnville, conducting it for a year. In January, 1902, however, he resigned, and accepted the agency of the Oregon City Transportation Company at this place.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Macy has been blessed with two children: Glen and Evelyn V. Mr. Macy was a charter member of the Commercial Club of McMinnville and for a number of years has been its secretary. He also belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and to the Woodmen of the World, and for four years has served as clerk in the camp of the latter fraternity. He votes with the democracy and his religious belief is indicated by his membership in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Mr. Macy is a young man possessed of the typical spirit of the west, a spirit of marked enterprise and progress and of adaptability and it is through the united efforts of such men that the upbuilding and progress of this section of the country have been assured.

HUNDLEY SEVIER MALONEY is one of the honored veterans of the Civil war who fought for the preservation of the Union and who in times of peace has ever been loyal to the best interests of his country, laboring for the advancement and upbuilding of his home locality, along material, social, intellectual and moral lines. He has been a resident of Oregon since 1873, his birth occurring in Warrensburg, Tenn., February 28, 1849. His paternal grandfather, Hugh Conway Maloney, was a native of Ireland, and on emigrating to America took up his abode in Tennessee, where he followed farming. He there married a Mrs. Susannah (Conway) Sevier, the widow of John Sevier, first cousin of Governor John Sevier, of Tennessee. William Conway Maloney, the father of our subject, was born in Tennessee and followed farming and surveying near Warrensburg, operating his land with the aid of slaves that he owned. He died in 1882, at the age of sixty-nine years. His wife, who in her maidenhood had been Louisa Cureton, was likewise born in Tennessee, and was a daughter of Richard Cureton, of German descent, one of the heroes of the war of 1812. He, too, followed farming in Tennessee, and it was in that state that his daughter, Mrs. Maloney, died, upon the old family homestead. Unto the parents of our subject were born ten children, but only two are now living, Thomas being an attorney at law in Ogden, Utah. Enlisting in the Civil war June 1, 1863, he served first as a member of Company L, Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, and afterward as a member of Company M, Ninth Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, with the Federal army, and was discharged September 11, 1865, at Knoxville, Tenn. Another brother, Hugh D. Maloney, was sergeant-major in the Fifth Tennessee Confederate Cavalry under General Joe Wheeler.

Hundley S. Maloney, named after Ambrose Hundley Sevier, United States senator from Arkansas, was reared upon his father's farm and attended a private school. During the progress of the war, although but a boy, he joined the Eighth Tennessee Regiment and served for a month, but on account of his age and size could not be mustered in. On the 1st of January, 1864, however, he volunteered as a member of Company D, Fourth Tennessee Infantry, in defense of the Union, and was mustered in at Loudon, Tenn., serving until the close of hostilities. His regiment was engaged in guerrilla warfare against Morgan's Cavalry in East Tennessee, and Mr. Maloney thus took part in numerous skirmishes and battles. The regiment was housed altogether in tents, save when they slept out of doors. In 1865 Mr. Maloney was made a corporal and August 2, 1865, he was mustered out at Nashville, Tenn. He was then but sixteen years of age, yet he had rendered to the country valiant service, and he displayed bravery equal to that of many a veteran of twice his years.

After the close of the war Mr. Maloney became a student in Tusculum College at Greeneville, Tenn., where he remained until 1867. On the 22d of July of that year he was commissioned second lieutenant in the Thirty-third United States Infantry by President Johnson, on the recommendation of Colonel Reeves, for faithful and meritorious service in the Rebellion. He served in Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina during the reconstruction period and at the time of the Ku Klux trouble. Remaining in the south until September 6, 1870, Mr. Maloney then carried on farming, and in the spring of 1873 came to the west, making his way to San Francisco and on to Portland, where he arrived April 30, 1873. He first located near Harrisburg, in Linn county, and then went to southern Oregon in October of that year. He began farming in Umatilla county, where he carried on agricultural pursuits until 1876. His father had been a surveyor and Mr. Maloney had studied surveying under him and practiced it to some extent while in his native state. In 1876 he was elected county surveyor of Umatilla county over Lee Moorehouse, but did not qualify. He afterward spent one season teaching in Linn county, and in October, 1877, he purchased a farm near Sheridan, carrying on agricultural pursuits and surveying until 1880. In that year he was elected county surveyor of Yamhill county and served for three years while from 1887 until 1889 he was deputy United States surveyor and surveyed the Grande Ronde Indian reservation.

Legislative honors were conferred upon him in 1892, when he was chosen to represent Yamhill county in the general assembly. He served during the session of 1893 and was a member of the committee on enrolled bills and other important committees. He took an active interest in the work of the house, giving each question which came up for settlement his earnest consideration and his influence was felt in legislative measures enacted during his term. He was much interested in the passage of the Soldiers' Home bill, providing for the establishment of a home for the soldiers at Roseburg, and his efforts in this and other directions for the benefit of the state were not without result. In 1896 Mr. Maloney was elected county surveyor of Yamhill county for a two years' term, and in February, 1902, he was appointed city recorder of McMinnville. On the 3d of November following he was elected to that office, his name being placed upon both tickets. In connection with the duties of the position he is also practicing surveying. He laid out the original town of Newburg, also Willamina and several additions to Sheridan. In 1897 he located in McMinnville and in 1898-99 was mayor of the city. He has also been notary public since 1880.

Mr. Maloney has been thrice married. His first wife, Laura F. Hale, died November 2, 1872, leaving no children. In Umatilla county, in 1873, he married Miss Mary Metzger, who was born in Tennessee, and died in 1893, leaving seven children, who are still living, namely: Mrs. Lillie Scott, of Sheridan; Louisa M., of McMinnville; Nannie, wife of Charles Nelson, of Cloverdale, Ore.; Hugh, of McMinnville; Carl; John, who is a student in McMinnville College, and Ray. Mr. Maloney's third marriage occurred in Tennessee, Miss Lucy Scruggs, a native of that state, becoming his wife. They have two children, Flora and Emma. Mr. Maloney was made an Odd Fellow in Morristown, Tenn., in 1873 and became a charter member of Sheridan Lodge No. 87, I. O. O. F. He now belongs to Occidental Lodge No. 30, of McMinnville, of which he is noble grand. He retains pleasant relationship with his old army comrades through his membership in Custer Post No. 9, G. A. R. He served for three terms as commander of Donnelson Post No. 55 while living at Sheridan, and he was a delegate to the national encampment at Louisville, Ky., in 1895, and was present at the dedication of the national park comprising the battlefield of Chickamauga. He served as aide on the staff of the national commander, General Clarkson, and has a number of times been aide on the staff of the state department commander. His wife belongs to the Women's Relief Corps and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Maloney also visited the south to attend the Cotton States Exposition at Atlanta in 1895. In 1864, when but fifteen years of age, he cast his ballot for Abraham Lincoln under the rule of allowing soldiers to vote, but since that time he has given his support to the Democracy. Mr. Maloney has led a busy and useful life and one of his most noticeable characteristics has been his loyalty to duty, whether duty to his office he has been prompt and faithful and he is a man of pleasant manner, kindly disposition, of strong integrity and of marked liberality.

MILTON S. CHAPIN. Starting out in life with assets consisting solely of his own perseverance and good common sense, Milton S. Chapin has so adjusted his opportunities as to be numbered among the most substantial up-builders of Yamhill county. A courageous soldier during the Civil war, for many years a successful farmer and stock-raiser, and at all times a broad-minded and enterprising citizen. Mr. Chapin has earned the right to the comparative immunity from active business cares which he now enjoys.

A native of Branch county, Mich., Mr. Chapin was born April 28, 1837, and is the oldest of the three children born to his parents, one son being deceased, while Nelson is a farmer of Polk county, Ore. His father, who was a contractor and builder for the greater part of his active life, died in Michigan at the age of forty-five years, and was survived by his wife—for many years a school teacher—until her death in Yamhill county in 1878, she having been a resident of this state for ten years. In his youth Milton S. Chapin attended the district schools of Michigan, and when sixteen years of age determined to henceforth make his own living. Removing to Lagrange county, Ind., he remained there until 1861, in August of which year he enlisted as a private in Company G, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteer Infantry. After being mustered in at Fort Wayne he was sent to Independence, and from there to Louisville, Ky., later to Nashville, Tenn., being under command of Colonel Lawton, who subsequently met his death in the Philippines. Besides many minor engagements he participated in the battles of Shiloh, Corinth, Stone River, Chickamauga, and the Atlantic campaign, and though subjected to the thickest of the fight fortunately escaped injury sufficiently serious to incapacitate him for fighting. Not more than thirty per cent. of the brave Thirtieth returned to Indiana, and it was said that no regiment was subjected to greater danger or hardship, or more courageously stood by their leader and colors.

After his discharge from the service September 24, 1864, at Indianapolis, Mr. Chapin engaged in farming near Springfield, Ill., and September 1, 1866, he married Mrs. Jane (Crum) Arthington, a native of Illinois. Thereafter he continued to live in Illinois for nineteen years, and was known in his neighborhood as one of its most reliable and successful agriculturists. Four children were born in Illinois, of whom Jennie is deceased; Charles is a farmer in this locality; Pratt is deceased; and Harry is a resident of Sherman county, Ore.

In 1884 Mr. Chapin disposed of his Illinois interests and, removing to Oregon, settled on what was known as the Galloway farm, three and a half miles east of Sheridan, where he lived for sixteen years. In 1900 he built a delightful little home on a small portion of his property, and this is all that remains to him of the three hundred and sixty-four acres which he once owned in this fertile section. The rest of the property has been divided among the children of Mr. Chapin. In politics decidedly independent, Mr. Chapin has never taken an active interest in the political agitation by which he has been surrounded, but has rather chosen the quiet and unobtrusive life of the high-minded, popular and unostentatious country gentleman. For more than fifty years he has been a member of the Christian church, and during that time has exerted his emphatic energies toward its upbuilding and general support. He is a welcome member of Custer Post No. 55, G. A. R., and has passed all of the chairs in connection with that organization. To an exceptional degree Mr. Chapin enjoys the confidence of his fellow townsmen, and his fine personal characteristics have won and retained for many years the most desirable of friendships.

ISAAC LEVENS. Although years have elapsed since the death of Isaac Levens, in 1892, he is still recalled by his friends and associates as a whole-souled and public-spirited citizen, whose efforts were invariably directed towards the betterment of the conditions around him. Mr. Levens was born in southern Illinois, and was reared on the farm of his father, Otho Levens, one of the very early settlers of that state. The rumors of gold penetrated into the district of which the Levens family was an upbuilding factor, and the sons determined to give up farming operations in Illinois and seek their fortune in the west. Besides Isaac, Thomas and Zachariah, there was a cousin, Henry Levens, who joined the little party in their trip across the plains, in 1848, and of these Thomas died in Amity, Ore., and Zachariah died on the Umpqua river.

Isaac Levens stood the journey well across the plains, and, after arriving at his destination, traveled around considerably in search of a desirable location. A part of the donation claim which he purchased constituted what is now the western part of the city of Dallas, and was six hundred and forty acres in extent. Here he commenced to clear his land, and prepare for the reception of crops. He prospered in his adopted state, and at the time of his death, at the age of seventy-one, was the possessor of as fine a property as one could desire. For a while he was interested in the butchering business, and was for some years a partner in the Ellendale Woolen Mill Company. He laid out a portion of his property into city lots, the sale of which brought him good financial returns. He was progressive and quick to see an opportunity among the complexity of interests by which he was surrounded. A Democrat in politics, he served as county coroner for several terms, and also acceptably filled other positions of trust and responsibility in the neighborhood. He was a member of the Christian Church.

Near the town of Monmouth, Ore., Mr. Levens married, in 1850, Eleanor S. Whiteaker, who was born in Old Virginia, near Abingdon, a daughter of Benjamin Whiteaker, a native of Tennessee. Mr. Whiteaker was of English descent, and a son of Richard Whiteaker, a native of Virginia, and an extensive planter. At an early age Mr. Whiteaker settled near Dixon, Lee county, Ill., where he conducted a hotel for about twelve years, and in this capacity had an opportunity to hear much about the prospects of the west. Accordingly, outfitting with ox teams, he brought his wife and nine children across the plains in 1848, being five months on the journey. From Oregon City he went to Independence, Polk county, and there bought the claim of Dr. Boyle, consisting of six hundred and forty acres. In this home he spent the remainder of his days, and died at the age of seventy-seven years. He was a Democrat in politics, and came out fearlessly for the principles of his party. In religion he was identified with the Baptist Church. Mr. Whiteaker married Mary Hayter, who was born in Tennessee, a daughter of Esau Hayter, who was born and died in Virginia. Mrs. Whiteaker lived to be seventy-five years of age, and died on the old homestead. Nine of her children attained maturity: David, a soldier in the Indian war, and who died in Independence in 1902; William, who died several years ago in Washington; Rachel, now deceased, was the wife of Mr. McGee, of Washington; Mrs. Levens; James, who died in Washington; Benjamin, who lives in Polk county; Maria, a resident of Los Angeles; Mrs. Mirah Ogden; Mary, who died in Polk county, and George W., of Independence.

Mrs. Levens was born in Tennessee, November 3, 1832, and was fifteen years of age when she came with her parents to Oregon. She had fortunately attended the public schools in Illinois, otherwise her education would have been very limited, as there was no school in the vicinity of her father's home, after their arrival in Oregon. She was a capable and willing girl, and readily set about helping to make the wilderness home as pleasant and attractive as possible. She was well schooled in household arts, and her husband found in her an invaluable assistant in hewing out his fortune in the west. She came immediately to the farm, upon which she lived for so many years, and for which Mr. Levens paid $1,600. After her husband's death she built her present residence in Dallas, although she still retains eighty acres of the original claim, and has purchased ten acres adjoining, which includes a hop-yard. Mrs. Levens is possessed of excellent business ability, and shows rare discretion and judgment in her many charities. She is a typical member of that noble band of pioneer women to whom their husbands were indebted for the greater part of their success, and from her early struggle with adversity has evolved a strong and self-reliant character, inspiring to all who are associated with her in whatsoever capacity. She is a member of the Christian Church, and contributes liberally towards its charities and general support. Of her two daughters, Nellie is the wife of Frank Rowell, of Dallas, Ore., and Annie is now Mrs. James Dougan, of Tacoma, Wash.

JUDGE BENJAMIN F. RHODES, who is serving upon the bench of Yamhill county and has for a number of years maintained a position among the leading representatives of the bar in this section of the state, came to Oregon in 1873. He was born in Madison county near Fredericktown, Mo., January 15, 1860. His father, John Rhodes, was also a native of that county and the grandfather, John Rhodes, Sr., was born in North Carolina, whence he emigrated at an early day to Missouri, becoming one of the pioneer farmers of that state, where his remaining days were passed. The great-grandfather was a resident of Pennsylvania and removed from the Keystone state to North Carolina, where he became a planter. He was of German descent.

John Rhodes, the father of the judge, was reared as a farmer boy and also became a mechanic and builder. He remained a resident of his native county until 1873, when he brought his family to Oregon, coming by way of San Francisco and Portland. He made his way to Salem, but a few weeks later settled at Monmouth, Polk county, and after another two months had passed he went to Portland, where he was engaged in the building business. Eighteen months later, however, he was obliged to abandon that pursuit on account of failing health and removed to a farm in Polk county, whence, in the fall of 1879, he came to McMinnville. Here he again resumed work at his trade and was identified with the building interests of this place until he retired on account of a stroke of paralysis. He died thirteen years later, in August, 1900, and McMinnville thus lost one of its representative and worthy citizens. He was a Master Mason and his life exemplified the helpful and beneficent spirit of the fraternity. In religious faith a Baptist, he was always loyal to the teachings of his church and for twelve years he served as a trustee of the Baptist College at McMinnville. His wife, who in her maidenhood was Eliza Graham, was born in Madison county, Mo., and died in 1890. She was a daughter of the Rev. Carter T. Graham, a native of Kentucky, who became an early settler of Madison county, Mo., where he followed farming in order to provide for his family, but on Sundays he engaged in preaching. He did not, however, accept any recompense for his services as a minister of the Baptist Church. He was of Scotch descent so that the judge comes of German and Scotch ancestry. Unto John and Eliza Rhodes were born three children—Benjamin Franklin, Josephine S., who died in childhood, and M. D. L., who is an attorney in Seattle, Wash.

The judge spent the first thirteen years of his life in the county of his nativity and then accompanied his parents to Oregon, where he further continued his education in the schools of Portland and of Polk county. In September, 1879, he entered McMinnville College, where he remained as a student for four years. In the meantime he had begun teaching, taking up that work in 1883. He followed the profession for a year in Yamhill county, after which he again spent a year as a student in McMinnville College. He was afterward connected with mercantile life for a year, followed by three years spent as a teacher, and during the last two years of that time he also pursued the study of law under the direction of William D. Fenton. In February, 1890, his mother died and about that time he and his brother began in the insurance and real estate business in McMinnville, which they carried on until Benjamin F. had completed his law course. In June, 1896, he was admitted to the bar in Salem and at once opened an office in McMinnville, where he has since been known as a leading representative of his chosen calling. Wealth and influence avail little or naught in the legal profession. One does not trust important litigated interests to unskilled hands and it is the man of broad learning, who correctly applies his knowledge to the point in litigation, that secures the legal business of a district. Judge Rhodes manifested skill and ability that soon won for him recognition as one of the leading lawyers at the Yamhill county bar and in the spring of 1902 he received the Democratic nomination for county judge, being elected by a majority of two hundred and forty-two in a county which usually gives a Republican majority of more than five hundred. He thus won a noble victory and in July he took his seat upon the bench where he is now serving in a most capable manner. His decisions indicated absolute fairness and freedom from judicial bias, broad learning and a thorough understanding of the points in evidence and already his course has won the warm approval of the members of the legal profession in McMinnville.

The judge was married in McMinnville to Miss Mary I. Collard, who was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of John J. Collard, who in pioneer times came to Oregon from Illinois and settled in Clackamas county. He crossed the plains when a boy with his parents and subsequently he came to Yamhill county and now resides in McMinnville. The home of the judge and his wife has been blessed with three children—Veda Ethelyn, Dada Althea and John Alvin.

The judge was made a Mason in Union Lodge, No. 43, A. F. & A. M., of McMinnville, and has twice served as its master. He is also connected with the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of the Maccabees, and in politics he has been a stalwart Democrat since attaining his majority. In 1892 he was appointed justice of the peace and was afterward elected for a two years' term and was then re-elected, continuing in the office until elevation to the bench in 1896. He belongs to the Baptist Church of McMinnville and since 1894 he has been an active and valued member of the board of trustees of McMinnville College. He is a man of strong intellectuality, of keen foresight and practical judgment and his co-operation with any measure therefore becomes a forceful factor in winning for it success. His influence is ever on the side of progress, reform and improvement and he is to-day recognized as one of the influential and prominent residents of the adopted city.

J. C. MICHAUX, M. D. As a leading exponent of medical and surgical science Dr. J. C. Michaux is catering to a constantly increasing patronage in McMinnville and Yamhill county, and is besides winning many friends because of stable and admirable personal characteristics. The doctor is a transplanted easterner who did not have to become acclimated in the west, but rather brought with him a breeziness and enterprise which instantly adjusted him to the vigorous opportunities here represented. While appreciating and utilizing the best that his profession holds, his versatility invades various social and other strata, a particularly pleasing trait being his fondness for that noble friend of man, the horse. In the well-equipped stable of Dr. Michaux the horse is seen at his best, both as to appearance and speed, and when he travels upon town thoroughfares or country roads one may be sure that he encounters in his equine life such treatment as is dictated by an innately humanitarian instinct.

The old-time ancestors of Dr. Michaux emigrated from France, with other religiously persecuted Huguenots, and after various migrations settled in America in time to participate in the Revolutionary war. His paternal grandfather, J. E. Michaux, was a planter in Virginia, the paternal great-grandfather having been a very early pioneer of that state. Here was born J. G. Michaux, the father of the physician of McMinnville, who also was a physician, and who practiced for about half a century in Newport, Tenn. The elder Michaux was a man of resolute character and uncompromising ideas of honor, and during his lifetime claimed many distinguished friendships, among them being that of Andrew Johnson. He lived to be seventy-six years of age, and was survived by his wife, formerly M. J. Wells, daughter of Robert Wells, a native of North Carolina, and who at present lives with her son in McMinnville.

The third oldest of the five children in his father's family, Dr. Michaux, was born in Newport, east Tennessee, September 13, 1858, and in his youth was favored with exceptional educational advantages. After graduating from Nashville College in 1878 he attended Vanderbilt University for a couple of years, and then entered upon his professional training at the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, graduating therefrom in 1889. After practicing for five years in his home town of Newport he removed to Lafayette, Yamhill county, in 1886, and for thirteen years devoted his energies to ameliorating the physical ills of that community, taking also an active interest in the social and other life of the town. He became associated with McMinnville in 1899, and it is to be hoped that his enthusiastic reception by a large contingent of the town and country will inspire a permanent residence within these hospitable and profitable borders.

With him from Tennessee came the wife of Dr. Michaux, formerly Miss M. E. Easterly, a native also of east Tennessee, and the mother of one son, Carl. The doctor is a Democrat in political affiliation, and is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Lafayette, Ore; the Encampment of Dayton; the Ancient Order of United Workmen; and the Knights of the Maccabees. Genial, optimistic, alert to the pleasures as well as the disadvantages of living; whole souled and generous and thoroughly honorable, the doctor is indeed an acquisition to his adopted town and county.

OLIVER H. ADAMS. More clearly than that of any other inhabitant of McMinnville the name of Oliver H. Adams is outlined against the background of its history and substantial interests, its moral, intellectual and industrial growth, and its just claims to distinction among the thriving communities of Yamhill county. No other kind of existence could be expected of Mr. Adams, through whose veins flows the blood of two illustrious servants of this government, John and John Quincy Adams, both of whom filled the popular eye and ear in the highest office within the gift of the American people. The emigrating ancestor was a Protestant of Scotch origin who came from the north of Ireland, and settled in Massachusetts while yet the banner of England waved over increasing discord in the colonies. The paternal grandfather of Oliver H. Adams was a soldier of 1776.

A native of Painesville, Geauga county, Ohio, Mr. Adams was born March 25, 1819, a son of Sebastian and Eunice (Harmon) Adams, natives of Vermont, and born respectively in Salisbury, August 3, 1789, and in Rutland, October 24, 1798. The parents were married in Painesville, Ohio, May 6, 1818, and of their three sons and five daughters three sons and two daughters are pioneer residents of Oregon, Oliver H. being the oldest. Of the children, William L. is a practicing physician on the Hood river and crossed the plains in 1848; Sarah J. is the deceased wife of A. N. Phelp, of Illinois; S. C. died in Salem; Mary P., Mrs. Skinner, resides in Kansas City, Mo.; Eunice M. is now Mrs. McBride, of Portland; Charlotte Ann is the deceased wife of W. H. Hardman, of Oregon; and Caroline E. is the deceased wife of A. Dunney, of Montana. Sebastian Adams was a prominent farmer of Geauga county, and for years was county sheriff. Afterward he owned a large farm in Huron county; and subsequently engaged in lumbering and farming in Jonesville, Mich. After removing to Galesburg, Ill., he built the first hotel in that place, and died in the little town destined to become an educational center, March 8, 1847. Some time after his wife married a Mr. Goodale, with whom she started across the plains in 1852, Mr. Goodale succumbing on the way to the prevailing cholera of that year. Continuing her journey with her children, Mrs. Goodale located in McMinnville and died in Eugene City, December 4, 1883, at the age of eighty-six years. She was a remarkable pioneer mother, possessing exceptional mental alertness, retained with exuberant health to almost the end of her life.

An uneventful home life in Ohio on the part of Oliver H. Adams was broken into by his attendance at the Huron County Academy, of which he was still a student when the family fortunes were shifted to Michigan. Overcome with homesickness he left the academy and joined his parents in Michigan, and with them removed to Galesburg in 1840. Here he married, October 20, 1846, Sophia Hills, a native of Connecticut, and daughter of Walter Hills, born also in Connecticut, and the descendant of an old New England family. After his marriage Mr. Adams began to farm and team, and eventually drifted into freighting between Galesburg and Chicago, a distance of over two hundred miles. The round trip consumed the greater part of two weeks, and during the winter time the winds of the prairies were frightfully cold. Going up to Chicago and meeting people from all around that section Mr. Adams heard considerable about the prospects of the far west, and March 9, 1852, he started from Galesburg with his wife and three children, Alice, Emma and Mary, his mother and stepfather, and two sisters, for Oregon, the family equipment being ox and cow teams, and three wagons. The party came along the old Oregon trail, and this being the year of the terrible cholera epidemic, they were horrified by many evidences of departed travelers, who, like themselves, had started forth with high hopes for the future. Accidents also marred the pleasure of the journey, one being the breaking of a wheel which was first successfully repaired, but which came to pieces a second time with altogether dire results. In consequence, Mr. Adams was obliged to resort to a mongrel two wheeled cart for the conveyance of the utensils, and thus crippled they started on their way. October 1, 1852, the party arrived at Panther creek, where lived Dr. Adams, the brother of Oliver H., and the latter bought a claim of three hundred and twenty acres for $200, and was soon comfortably settled with his family. He was not slow in recognizing milling possibilities on the rapid little creek, and so constructed the first mill in that neighborhood. A little later he took in a partner in the milling business who was none other than G. W. Jones, a practical miller, and later one of the chief upbuilders of McMinnville, and with this addition to his resources bought another mill, for many years operated in connection with the original. The combination of pioneer energy and business judgment accomplished much toward building up the section in which their milling was conducted, and the two men represented all that was substantial and of good report in the county.

In 1872 the mills were sold out and Mr. Adams and his partner moved into McMinnville and built a factory in the heart of the then small town. As the population and interests increased they moved out on Third street, and there the sash and door factory of Jones & Adams entered upon an era of continuous prosperity. Eventually the business was handed over to the son of Mr. Adams, who still continues to maintain the financial prestige of the pioneer industry. Probably no man in McMinnville has built more than has Mr. Adams, especially deserving of mention being a large brick building on Main street; the brick building of Jones & Adams; numerous residences besides his own commodious home, and several stores and warehouses.

After coming to Oregon nine children were added to the family of Mr. Adams, and of the entire number eleven have attained maturity: Inez Ione is living with her father; Carrie Cornelia is the wife of C. C. Scott, of Portland; Austin Hill is a sash and door manufacturer of Astoria; Frank Grant is a member of the firm of Jones & Adams; Lillie May died at the age of fifteen; Alice Amelia is now Mrs. Crawford, of Eugene, Ore.; Emma Ellen is the wife of G. W. Jones, of McMinnville; Mary Maria is the wife of W. G. Henderson, of McMinnville; John Quincy died in this town at the age of three years; Ida Irene is now Mrs. H. A. Reasoner, of Washington; Eva Ellen is now Mrs. Simons, of Washington; and Ada Ann is the wife of W. A. Hill, of McMinnville. Mrs. Adams died in McMinnville March 3, 1902, at the age of seventy-four years. She was a staunch adherent of the Presbyterian Church, in which both she and her husband labored for many years.

A Republican in national politics, Mr. Adams has ever maintained that character rather than party should prevail in local offices especially, and has therefore voted impartially on many occasions. In his youth he labored zealously for his friends, but has been somewhat averse to assuming official responsibility himself. However, he has been councilman for several years, and his services as a member of the school board have been of lasting benefit to the community. He assisted in the building of the first log school house which offered educational advantages to the rising generation hereabouts, and has been the chief instigator of the larger and more modern institutions which have supplanted the primitive effort. Possessing the potent characteristics best appreciated and developed in this man-making region, Mr. Adams has adjusted his life to high principle and large accomplishments, and his name will be enrolled among the foremost promoters of the peace and prosperity of Yamhill county.

H. Z. FOSTER, the treasurer of Yamhill county, a resident of Oregon since his tenth year, and formerly an educator and agriculturist, was born twenty miles north of Keokuk, Lee county, Iowa, October 8, 1843. At a very early age his paternal grandfather removed from Indiana to Tennessee, in which latter state his father, Harrison Foster, was born in 1801.

Harrison Foster emigrated to Illinois about 1822, and lived in that then wild and inhospitable region until his removal to Lee county in 1838. In Illinois he married his first wife, a Miss Barber, of that state, and the five children of this union were born in Illinois and Iowa. Of these, four are living, James Barber being a minister of the Baptist Church in Boise City, Idaho; Jesse D., a Congregational clergyman in California, and Mrs. Sarah J. Death and Mrs. Margaret V. McComas, both residents of California. In Lee county, Iowa, Mr. Foster married his second wife, Sarah Booth, a native of England, and daughter of John Booth, who emigrated from England to New York state. The second Mrs. Foster died at the old home in Oregon at the age of eighty-three years, leaving two children, the present treasurer of Yamhill county, and Mrs. Mary E. Wood, of Tillamook county. With his wife and children Harrison Foster undertook the journey across the plains in 1853, starting out from Council Bluffs, Iowa, in April, and proceeding up the Platte and Sweetwater and down the Snake river to Umatilla, then down the Umatilla. On the way they overtook many other emigrants from Iowa, and the six months' journey passed off without any particular incident, or any of the harrowing details incident to the plain travel in the early days. The father took up a claim in the hills, and in the spring of 1854 bought the right to a claim of three hundred and twenty acres on the Willamina, where he lived and worked for many years, and where his death occurred in 1876, at the age of seventy-five years. He was a quiet, unostentatious man, but successful withal, and in his adopted county made many friends. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church.

For some years after crossing the plains with his parents H. Z. Foster had no educational opportunities, for the neighborhood in which he lived had not yet risen to the dignity of maintaining a log school house, or a teacher to distribute knowledge to the rising generation. The advent of the first school house was heralded with delight by both pupils and parents, and among the first to assemble in the little log enclosure was the youngest son of Harrison Foster. At the age of sixteen the youth spent a year in the old McMinnville College, and then studied for a year with Professor Johnson, of the same institution. In 1872 he entered the Willamette University at Salem, from which he was duly graduated with the degree of B. S., in the class of 1875. The same summer he returned to the parental farm, and in 1878 located in Sheridan, where he taught school, worked in a warehouse, and finally engaged in clerking. In Sheridan he married Edith LaFollette in 1885, a native of Dallas, Ore., and daughter of Capt. Charles LaFollette, born in Indiana, and an early pioneer of Oregon.

In 1890 Mr. Foster returned to the old farm and lived there until locating in McMinnville in September, 1900. He has already accumulated property in the town, and the sale of his farm presupposed a permanent residence in this thriving community of interests. His capacity for public services found recognition in October, 1901, when, upon the resignation of County Treasurer Rood he was appointed to take his place by the county court. So satisfactory were his services that he was duly elected county treasurer by one of the largest majorities on the Republican ticket in July, 1902, and thereupon took the oath of office for two years. He has affiliated with the Republican party ever since casting his first presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln. Fraternally he is allied with the Masons of Sheridan, and has been past master of that lodge. Since 1873 he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has been very active in both church and Sunday-school work. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Foster: Charles, Robert and Mary.

ALVIS KIMSEY. Although many years have elapsed since the death of Alvis Kimsey, there are many in Yamhill county who recall his worthwhile endeavors while making a home for his family in this then wild section of country. Mr. Kimsey was born in Missouri May 26, 1816, and owing to the death of his father when he was but thirteen years old he was early obliged to assist in the maintenance of the family. His mother eventually married a second time, and when his services were no longer needed on the home farm he also married, taking for his wife a Miss Simpson, who was born in Missouri. The death of his wife temporarily shadowed his life and left him with one small child, with no guiding hand at the hearthstone.

Joining a band of west-bound emigrants in 1846 Mr. Kimsey reached his destination in California without any particular difficulty, and once arrived at his new destination he had the opportunity of serving in the Mexican war. During a part of his service he was a commissioned officer, and his soldier days were marked by particular courage and devotion to the cause. In 1848 he removed from California to Oregon and took up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres on what is now called the Middle Salem and Dayton road, about four and one-half miles southeast of Dayton. In September of the same year, 1848, he married Mrs. Elizabeth Fulkerson Dorris, who was born in Missouri, and whose husband died while crossing the plains in 1847. When Mr. Kimsey purchased his claim there was a small log house upon it and this continued to shelter the family for a few years, but subsequently he put up a more comfortable and commodious residence. The discovery of gold in California about this time enticed him thither, but his stay was of short duration, and upon his return home resumed his agricultural duties. In 1855 he retired from active labor and took up his residence in The Dalles, the change being necessitated by overwork and responsibility. His death occurred in the latter home September 14, 1865, and was mourned by all who had known him. At one time he took a prominent part in politics, and served as sheriff of Yamhill county, an office which he was compelled to resign on account of impaired health.

Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Kimsey: Mary J., born on the old homestead, where she now lives, in 1849; Rachel E., deceased; and Wiley A., a resident of Albany, Ore. Some years after the death of her husband Mrs. Kimsey was united in marriage with Willis Gains, who crossed the plains in 1852. After their marriage they took up their residence in Linn county, where Mrs. Gains died at the age of sixty-seven. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Gains: Holt is deceased and Anna became the wife of John A. South, and resides in Linn county. Mary J. Kimsey became the wife of R. W. Powell, who crossed the plains in 1852 with his parents. One child blessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Powell: Addie, now the wife of A. A. Launer, and they make their home in Dallas. Four years after his marriage Mr. Powell died, and two years later Mrs. Powell became the wife of H. W. Peery. Seven children were born of this marriage, of whom we make the following mention: Minnie E., the wife of W. L. Jackson, of Albany; Edward C., a resident of Linn county; Edith, the wife of Ed Hoffman, of Oregon City; Amy C. and Claud C., twins, who are at school, as is also Willie. One child died in infancy. Mrs. Peery still owns one hundred and eighty-nine acres of the old donation claim settled by her father, and this property is classed among the most desirable in Yamhill county. The family have one of the finest rural homes in the neighborhood and have many friends and well-wishers in the community in which they reside.

J. L. HOSKINS. In an effort to maintain the prestige of a fine old southern family religiously associated with the Society of Friends, and in civic life identified with pioneering and other substantial occupations ennobled by sterling English worth, J. L. Hoskins, recorder of Yamhill county, has mapped out a career in harmony with agricultural, educational and general ideals. In accord with the workings of the twentieth century philanthropic mind, institutions of learning have come to be regarded as the medium through which the good of the world is to be derived, and this being the generally accepted theory, promoters of education must needs be the chief factors of civilization. It is perhaps in this connection that Mr. Hoskins will be longest remembered, for he has been one of the advance guard of the Pacific College at Newberg, and has earnestly and disinterestedly labored for the betterment of this well-equipped institution of learning.

A native of the vicinity of Wellington, Clinton county, Ohio, Mr. Hoskins was born March 20, 1846, a son of Joseph, and grandson of George Hoskins, the latter of whom was born in North Carolina, and removed with his parents to Clinton county, Ohio, when a mere boy. The grandfather later improved a farm in Clinton county on his own responsibility, and there was passed his long and meritorious life. Joseph Hoskins was born in Ohio, and from there removed to Rush county, Ind., where he farmed for many years, prior to spending his last days with his son in Yamhill county. He married Sarah Ann Hodson, a native of Clinton county, Ohio, and sister of J. M. Hodson, of Portland, represented at length in another part of this work. Mrs. Hoskins also died in Oregon, leaving four sons, her only daughter, Carrie M., having died in Indiana. Cyrus E., the oldest of the sons, is a farmer at Gold Hill, Ore.; A. M. is engaged in mining in Jackson county, Ore.; and Cyrus E. served in the Thirteenth Ohio Cavalry during the Civil war, with his brother, J. L.

As has been the case in the lives of many worthwhile men in this country the Civil war presented itself as a developing factor in the immature youth of Mr. Hoskins, and when not yet seventeen, he enlisted in the Fourth Ohio Cavalry, later consolidated with the Thirteenth Volunteer Cavalry. He was mustered in during March, 1863, and was mustered out in Virginia, in September, 1865, being later discharged in Columbus, Ohio. During the time of his service he participated in many of the important battles of the war, including the Wilderness, Cold Harbor, the sieges of Richmond and Petersburg, Appomattox, and many others. The siege of Petersburg, on July 2d, proved most disastrous for the regiment, for a roll-call revealed the death of at least half of its members. Mr. Hoskins marched up Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, when peace had been declared, and this grand review terminated his association with affairs military.

Saddened by his experiences on the battle field, but with clearer defined ideas of life and its responsibilities, Mr. Hoskins returned to Ohio only to find that his parents had removed to Indiana, and were living on a farm in Rush county. He joined them, and while assisting his father, taught school for a couple of years, during the winter season, working in the harvestfield in the summer time. In 1879, he came west to San Francisco, and from there by steamer to Portland, soon after purchasing a little farm of fifty-six acres in the brush near Newberg. This he proceeded to improve and develop, and while engaging in general farming, has reaped a liberal income from an orchard and small fruits, also considerable stock.

A staunch Republican ever since casting his first presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln, in 1864, Mr. Hoskins was not particularly active until 1900, when he was nominated county recorder in June, and elected by a large majority. So satisfactory were his services that in 1902 he was re-nominated, and re-elected by a majority of five hundred and five, leading the ticket. His assumption of office began in July, 1900, and will continue until July, 1904. He is an ex-member of the county committee, and has attended many conventions during his residence in Oregon. Fraternally, Mr. Hoskins is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having joined that organization in the early '70s. He is now past officer and past grand representative of Willamette Lodge of Newberg; a member of the Encampment at McMinnville, and member of the Woodmen of the World. He is also connected with Shiloh Post, G. A. R., of Newberg. In religion, Mr. Hoskins adheres to the faith of his forefathers, that of the beautiful and impressive Society of Friends.

JACOB GRAUER. At the age of ten years Jacob Grauer came to America with his parents, having spent his previous life in Germany, where he was born January 31, 1856. His father, another Jacob, was born in Germany in 1823, and was by trade a weaver, which trade he followed for many years in his native land. He married Catharine Grauer, a native of the same part of the kingdom, and with her came to America in 1866, settling on a farm in Iowa. Here the father enjoyed moderate prosperity, and here he died at the age of sixty, his wife surviving him until sixty-nine years of age. There were eight children in the family, the order of their birth being as follows: Mary, a resident of Iowa; George, also living in Iowa; Christ, a farmer in Iowa; Lizzie, living with her brother, Jacob; Jacob; Kate, a farmer's wife in Iowa; Adam, a farmer of Iowa; and Anna, deceased.

Until his twenty-first year, Jacob Grauer lived on the paternal farm in Iowa, contributing his share towards the support of the large family. He attended the district schools as opportunity offered, and his pastimes and diversions were those of the average farm-reared youth. For ten years after his marriage with Rosa Gutbrod, a native of Germany, he continued to farm independently in Iowa, and, in 1891, brought his family to Yamhill county, Ore., settling near Newberg on a small farm. At the expiration of two years, Mr. Grauer bought a farm of M. S. Sheridan, but after a year removed to the Raleigh place, three and a half miles northeast of Sheridan. In 1899 Mr. Grauer bought the farm of one hundred and seventy acres which has since been his home, and to which he has in the meantime added, so that he now owns five hundred acres in all. Many fine improvements are the result of the good management and industry of this enterprising farmer, his buildings, agricultural implements and general farm furnishings being the best known to the model, up-to-date farmer. Mr. Grauer is independent in politics, although he usually votes the Republican ticket. Office-holding has never held any charm for him, as he prefers to devote his time to his farm and family.

He is a member of the Lutheran Church. The following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Grauer: Louis, Anna, George, Jacob, Frederick, Adam, Edgar and William, at home, and Carl, deceased.

ABRAM COOVERT. Though at present living a retired life in Dayton, Abram Coovert is known as one of the broad-minded and energetic developers of Yamhill county, and has been closely allied with its agricultural, milling, educational and religious affairs. An additional distinction is attached to Mr. Coovert, growing out of the fact that he and his wife, who died March 31, 1903, were undoubtedly the oldest married couple in this county, and one of the oldest in this part of the state. The parents of Mr. Coovert were farmers during their active lives, and lived for many years in Butler county, Ohio, where he was born April 24, 1819. As his mother died when he was ten years old, leaving six other children, he was bound out to a family to remain until his twenty-first year, at the expiration of which time he was to receive $100 and a suit of clothes. The consideration was fulfilled according to contract, the youth in the meantime developing thrifty and industrious traits of character.

Left to fashion his career as suited him best, Mr. Coovert went to Indiana in 1840, and for five years made himself useful to one of the wealthy and appreciative farmers of the Hoosier state. In 1845, he married Martha A. Odell, a native of Wayne county, Ind., and thereafter he made his home in that state until 1851. He then prepared to seek a home in the far west, and with two wagons, six yoke of oxen and two horses, joined a train under command of Captain Elder, and spent six months on the way to Oregon, arriving at Wheatland October 4, 1851. That same year he bought a squatter's right to the farm which he now possesses, located four miles southeast of Dayton, and which was originally three hundred and twenty acres in extent. Every improvement on the place is due to the energy and progressive spirit of the owner, who has kept abreast of the times and equipped his place with all known devices of a labor-saving and improving character. Much of this property has now passed into other hands, but Mr. Coovert still owns ninety acres of about the finest farm land in the state of Oregon. In 1857 he erected the first grist-mill in this vicinity, and for many years this picturesque old mill ground out flour and feed for the agriculturists for many miles around. Located as it was on the Dayton & Salem road, it was easy of access, and became a common meeting place in which to discuss the important happenings of the county.

An active politician during his years of greatest activity, Mr. Coovert has at times labored faithfully for the political advancement of his worthy friends, although he himself has never desired office of any kind. However, his active interest in educational matters resulted in his acceptance of a position on the school board, and he has also served as road supervisor, thus filling two of the most important and far-reaching offices in the community. Mrs. Coovert had been a member of the church ever since her fourteenth year, and he has been similarly connected for more than half a century, being still a trustee in the church. In 1899 Mr. Coovert left his farm to the care of younger hands, and retired, making his home on the farm, and is now enjoying the rest from care and responsibility which he has so richly earned. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Coovert, named in the order of their birth, as follows: John Q., deceased; Sarah C., the widow of W. D. Nichols, of this neighborhood; Mary E., the wife of John Lambert, of Yamhill county; Wilbur L., deceased; Ida, wife of N. Harris, and who resides at home with her father; and Henrietta and Ora, both of whom are deceased.

CHARLES MITCHELL. When Charles Mitchell landed in the United States, in 1884, he brought with him a silver medal, which indicated that he had come out first in a plowing contest. This reward of merit was conferred in his native country of Scotland, where he was born September 10, 1860, and where thoroughness is the national watchword in all lines of activity. In Banffshire, Scotland, the Mitchell forefathers had tilled the soil for several generations, and here the father of Mr. Mitchell owned a large farm, and in Banffshire his mother is still living, at the age of four score years. There were seven children, who were left practically on their own resources when the father died, at the age of forty-six, but all had been reared to industry and frugality, and their assumption of responsibility was therefore less difficult than it would otherwise have been.

Having arrived at the age of sixteen Mr. Mitchell started out to make his living as a farm hand, and for eight years was in great demand, because of his excellent workmanship and conscientious application to business. Arriving in America in 1884, he came at once to Oregon, and soon after entered the employ of Duncan Ross, near McMinnville, and afterward had charge of the Ladd place, near Portland, for about nine years. In 1894 he purchased the farm upon which he now lives, and to the one hundred and eleven acres has added by more recent purchase, and now has two hundred and fifty-seven acres. His industry and enterprise have resulted in the equipment of the farm with a modern dwelling, convenient barns and outhouses, and the most modern of agricultural implements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, but his chief source of revenue is the raising of Angora goats. The year 1895 is recalled by Mr. Mitchell as most disastrous to his prospects, for he had the misfortune to burn out, and for a time felt the weight of this loss. However, he has more than made up for the loss, and is to-day an independent and comparatively well-to-do agriculturist.

In 1888 Mr. Mitchell married Ellen Crimmins, a native of Oregon, daughter of John and Jane Crimmins, and of this union there were born six children: Robert, Raymond, Jeanette, Carl, Lillian, and one child who died in infancy. Mr. Mitchell is independent in politics, and believes in voting for the man best qualified to serve the public interests. He has served as a member and clerk of the school board, and as road supervisor. The Mitchell farm is located four and a half miles southwest of Amity, on the Amity and Ballston roads.

DUDLEY G. HENRY. Since coming to his present farm near Salem, in Polk county, in 1878, Dudley G. Henry has successfully engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and now has three hundred of his three hundred and forty acres under cultivation. His property and its appointments are worthy the progressive spirit and practical insight of the owner, and speak volumes for the untiring industry and thrift which has characterized his entire active life. Many of the present large landowners of Oregon received their first impressions of life and work in Pike county, Mo., and here Mr. Henry was born September 20, 1843, a son of John D. and grandson of Alexander, the latter of whom was born in Yorktown, S. C. The grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812, and participated in the battle of New Orleans, his death occurring in Pike county, Mo., whither he removed at a very early day, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. His son, John D., was born on a farm near Nashville, Tenn., and as a child accompanied his parents to Pike county, where he grew to maturity, and where he married Nancy Walker, a native of Virginia. The parents eventually removed to Red Lodge, Mont., where the father died in 1896 at the age of eighty-six, and the mother in 1900, at the age of seventy-eight. Dudley G. is the third oldest in the family of four sons and four daughters. His brother, W. A., an extensive stock-raiser of the vicinity of Spokane, Wash., is an ex-member of the Washington legislature, and a prominent man in his district.

For about three months during the year Dudley G. Henry attended the public schools in Pike county, Mo., and at the breaking out of the Civil war he was busily employed on the home farm, being then eighteen years of age. In July, 1861, he enlisted in Company C, Fifth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and served for six months as a private under Colonel Anderson in the home guard. This service expired, he became a private in Company D, Thirty-third Missouri Volunteer Infantry, under command of Col. Clinton B. Fisk, and went to St. Louis as a member of Gen. A. J. Smith's Sixteenth Army Corps. In this capacity he participated in many of the notable engagements of the war, principally in the battle of Vicksburg, the Red River campaign and the campaign against Price, and he was discharged August 23, 1864, and sent back to St. Louis. Returning to Pike county, Mo., he again engaged in farming on the old place, and remained there until 1868.

The long water journey around the Horn was chosen by Mr. Henry as the most desirable way of reaching Oregon, and from Portland he went over the mountains to California, where he mined and engaged in the cattle business on Feather river for about a year. He then returned to Portland and went into Klickitat county, Wash., where he engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1876, when he returned to the Willamette valley. February 22, 1876, he was united in marriage with Nancy Walker, who was born in Polk county, November 18, 1852, and whose father, Major W. M. Walker, crossed the plains in 1848. Her mother, Jane (Mackey) Walker, is at present living in Salem, Ore., and is eighty-four years old. Soon after his marriage Mr. Henry took his wife to Seattle, Wash., where he engaged in street contracting and grading for a couple of years, and in 1878 returned to Oregon and purchased his present farm of three hundred and forty acres. He has taken a keen interest in the all around improvement of his neighborhood, has been prominent in local politics, and among other positions held that of school director for many years. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church at Zena, and is an officer in the same, towards the maintenance of which he contributes generously. His oldest son, Clyde, is a druggist at Evanston, Wyo.; Wayne is living at home; and Worth is a student at the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis. Mr. Henry has excellent business ability, broad-minded views of general happenings, and bears a reputation for unswerving integrity in all his undertakings.

R. M. WOOLWORTH. A hop-raiser and farmer entitled to special mention among the developers of Yamhill county is R. M. Woolworth, one of the types of men who have hewed their way through the world without much assistance, either financial or influential, and who are accountable only to themselves for their success in a given line of activity. Mr. Woolworth was born in Cortland county, N. Y., August 9, 1847, and comes of English ancestry authentically traced back to the paternal great-great-grandfather, Richard first, who was born in England in 1600.

Calvin W. Woolworth, the father of R. M., was born in Stratton, N. Y., his wife, Phoebe (Lovell) Woolworth, being a native of the same state. Through his entire active life the elder Mr. Woolworth was a carpenter, and in 1854 crossed the plains to California, engaging in mining for about three years. He then returned to New York and worked at his trade until 1872, in which year he removed to Michigan, and died in Tustin, that state, in 1887. Of the two daughters and eight sons born to Mr. and Mrs. Woolworth, four sons are living, R. M. being the fourth oldest. Randolph is a resident of Butteville, Marion county, Ore.; Albert lives in Silverton, Mich.; and Dwight lives in Mt. Angel, Ore.

A disagreement with his father when seventeen years of age resulted in the departure from his home of R. M. Woolworth, who forthwith removed to Schuyler county, N. Y., and lived there for a couple of years. While there he enlisted in the One Hundred and Twenty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, Company H, but was naturally too late in the service to participate in any of the history-making battles. However, he was sent south under General Grant, and was eventually changed to Company C, Sixty-fifth New York Volunteer Infantry. After being mustered out in 1865 he returned to Rochester, N. Y., lived there a year, and in 1867 went to Michigan, thereafter engaging in farming and logging in several counties in the northern part of the state. In all he lived there for about sixteen years, and, rich in experience, came to Oregon in 1886, determined to henceforth exert his abilities in the wonderfully prolific west. Mr. Woolworth purchased his present farm of thirty acres near Dayton, Ore., and has since cleared one-half of it, seven acres being at present under hops. Also he is engaged in general farming, and his land has yielded him a fair income for labor expended.

In 1867 Mr. Woolworth married Eunice Doud, who was born in Michigan, and who became the mother of the following children: Mrs. Lena Wade, of McMinnville; Charles, a resident of Dayton; Grace, deceased; Mrs. Mary Abdill, of Dayton; Hugh, living at home; and Maudie also living with her parents. A Republican in political affiliations, Mr. Woolworth has been school director for nine years in Oregon, and in his old home in Michigan he served as constable and school director. Fraternally he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Dayton, in which he has taken the degree of honor; and with Upton Post No. 75, G. A. R., of Dayton.

MONTGOMERY M. McDONALD, who was born in Ohio in 1821, departed this life in 1876 and in Yamhill county, where he was living, his death was deeply mourned. His father, Hugh McDonald, was born amid the highlands of Scotland, and the grandfather left the land of hills and heather with his grandson, M. M. McDonald. The latter was in early life employed as a salesman in a dry goods house in Missouri and also held a similar position in Kentucky. In his early manhood he engaged in teaching school to some extent. As a companion and helpmate for life's journey he chose Miss Mary A. Hayes, who was born in Westmoreland county, Pa., May 18, 1833, a daughter of J. L. Hayes, who was also a native of Westmoreland county, and who followed the occupation of farming. His wife, Mrs. Julia Hayes, was a native of Maryland.

Mr. McDonald removed from Ohio to Kentucky and afterward to Missouri. Later he took up his abode in Iowa and began business in Hollyville, Taylor county, in connection with Nave & McCord. His wife removed from Pennsylvania to Iowa and it was in Taylor county that they became acquainted and were married, the wedding being celebrated in the year 1857. They began their domestic life there and remained residents of Taylor county for about five years, when, on account of the failing health of Mr. McDonald, they removed to Missouri, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits. In 1866 they left that state for the far northwest, taking a circuitous route, which led them by way of New York, making the Isthmus of Panama, thence over the waters of the Pacific to Portland. On reaching the last-named place they at once started for McMinnville, Ore., and in the succeeding spring Mr. McDonald purchased three hundred and sixty acres of rich land about four and one-half miles from the town. Taking up his abode thereon he began its further cultivation and improvement, continuing to develop that property through the succeeding ten years of his life. In 1880 his widow and sons purchased the farm of two hundred and twenty acres upon which the former now resides.

Unto this worthy couple were born four sons: William Douglas, who makes his home in McMinnville; Robert, who is living with his mother; George and Henry, both deceased. Mr.

McDonald was a prominent Mason of McMinnville and in his life exemplified the beneficent and helpful spirit of the craft. In politics he was a Democrat, and his career was that of a good, industrious, honorable man, who in all life's relations was found true to duty. He passed away in 1876, at the age of fifty-five years, and the community lost a valuable citizen; his friends one whose faithfulness was above question and his family a devoted husband and father.

CATHERINE ELIZABETH STUMP. One of the oldest living pioneers of Polk county, Ore., is Mrs. Catherine Elizabeth Stump, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1844, enduring with a pioneer's courage and patience the trials and privations incident to the life of the early settlers, and proving with the passing of the years her title to citizenship of this great western commonwealth.

The father of Mrs. Stump, Aaron Chamberlin, was born in New York, July 4, 1809, and removed to Michigan with his parents when a young man, his father having settled near Detroit. On attaining his majority he married Catherine Viles, a native of New Jersey, and after a time spent in Iowa, they removed to Missouri, locating near St. Joseph. This city was in the pathway of the western emigrants, and it was only a short time until Mr. Chamberlin was imbued with the idea of the advantages and opportunities of the west, and after two and a half years they joined an emigrant train drawn by oxen, and started upon their journey. During the six months before they reached Oregon City their greatest difficulty lay in their limited provisions, but without other incident they arrived at their destination a week before Christmas, having left their home May 10. As soon as the donation act went into effect, Mr. Chamberlin at once took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, located south of Luckiamute, Polk county, upon which he remained until 1868, making a success of his western venture. In the last named year he went to Sonora, Mexico, to visit a son, and while there he was taken ill with the fever and died, March 4, 1869, in his sixty-first year. His wife died on the home place in Oregon October 20, 1883. She was the mother of six children, four of whom are now living, two daughters and four sons, Joseph Chamberlin, Catherine, Ann and Enoch, the third being Catherine, who was born in Michigan, near Detroit, February 23, 1835.

Though but nine years old when the journey was made to their new home, Mrs. Stump was old enough to realize the trials and privations which they necessarily experienced, and she continued to bear with patience whatever fell to her lot during the years in which her father was making his competency. A very limited education was received through the medium of the early schools located in the vicinity of their home, after which she was married March 10, 1850, to David Stump, who was born in Ohio, October 29, 1819, and who, in 1845, when twenty-one years old, crossed the plains alone by ox-team and after his marriage settled on a donation claim near Luckiamute, Polk county, and engaged in farming and cattle-raising. In his combined interests he met with most gratifying success, at his death owning in the county twenty-three hundred acres of land. Not satisfied to be alone a financial success, Mr. Stump gave much of his time to public works of various description, being actively interested in the Christian College, which was organized in 1865, and also other notable movements, whose aim was toward the upbuilding of the town of Monmouth. As a Republican he ably represented his party in the state legislature for one term. Religiously he was a member of the Christian Church. His death occurred February 20, 1886, at the age of sixty-six years. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Stump, Mary S. is the widow of Rev. T. F. Campbell, a professor in the Christian College and for thirteen years its president; since his death his widow has made her home with her mother; Joseph Solomon, a mining man of Nome, Alaska; Catherine B. also makes her home with her mother, and John B. is located on a farm of six hundred acres in this county. Mr. Stump had built a handsome residence in Monmouth, on the corner of Jackson street and College avenue, and in 1878 had occupied it, giving to his children the advantages of the college at Monmouth, now the Oregon State Normal School, while the two daughters took a post-graduate course at Wellesley, Mass.

GEORGE T. CARY. A descendant of a descendant of a pioneer is George T. Cary, his father, Job Cary, being born in Yamhill county, February 14, 1855, the son of Miles Cary, who crossed the plains in 1843, in the interests of the Hudson's Bay Company, settling in Yamhill county, Ore., where he took up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres near the town of St. Joseph. Upon this claim he lived for many years, rearing his family here, and putting into the broad acres the strength of his manhood that the tangled wilderness demanded should a harvest time be desired. His son Job worked with him until he was twenty years old, going at that age to make a home for himself. He first bought a farm north of Lafayette, which he worked for some time, but becoming dissatisfied he sold it, investing the money in the land where his son now lives. He married Miss Sarah Perkins, a native of the eastern state, and of this union three children were born: Elma Doney, of Lafayette; Edward, engaged in the dairy business in Tillamook county; and the youngest, George T., who was born December 29 of the Centennial year, and died February 13, 1903.

At nineteen years of age, George T. left home to engage in the teaming business over the country, a business which at that time, though full of hardships, still meant a great change from the humdrum existence of life on a farm, he being just at the age when he could most enjoy the adventures incident to such a life in a new country. But having been reared with the broad acres of harvest promise about him, the hills covered with the life for which he must care, it was impossible to keep away from the joys of tilling the soil, consequently he came back and occupied the farm which his father had bought and which the latter now left, purchasing another in the near neighborhood. Of one hundred acres in the homeplace, forty-five are in active cultivation. Twelve acres are devoted to the cultivation of hops, the remainder being utilized for stock-raising.

December 5, 1895, Mr. Cary married Miss Sarah Rogers, a native of Cowlitz county, Wash., and three children share the home, Luvern, Leonard and Sirene. Mr. Cary took pride in the fact that he was independent of any political party, voting rather for the man than the platform, believing that the greatest good will result for his country in a ballot so cast.

R. W. McCALL. On the old farm in Montgomery county, Tenn., around which clustered memories of his father and grandfather, R. W. McCall was born February 21, 1851, his father having been born on the same old landmark December 11, 1825. His mother, Martha A. McCall, was also a native of Montgomery county, her natal day being January 22, 1825. She was the mother of nine children, four daughters and five sons, R. W. being the second oldest.

Although fairly successful in Tennessee, D. W. McCall realized the larger opportunities which awaited the sojourner to the west, and in 1851 emigrated with his family to Hancock county, Ill., where he bought a farm and continued to improve the same until 1865. Gathering together the needful possessions he then joined a caravan of one hundred and twenty wagons bound for the Pacific coast, his own wagons being drawn with horse rather than ox teams. Dr. Goodwin, the amiable and helpful captain of the train, proved equal to his large responsibility, and safely piloted his numerous charges over the plains, arriving in eastern Oregon September 17, having started out April 25. Mr. McCall located in Union county for a year, and engaged in ferrying on the Grand Ronde river. In 1866 he came to Yamhill county, locating on a farm of two hundred acres three miles southwest of McMinnville, where he farmed and raised stock until 1870. During that year he became the possessor of a farm upon which his son is now living. A few years before his death, which occurred September 11, 1899, he moved into McMinnville, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement, his life rendered lonely and purposeless because of the death of his wife on the home farm in November, 1886.

Notwithstanding the excellent training which R. W. McCall received under his father, he attended the agricultural college at Corvallis for a couple of years, and there learned of the progress attained in this most useful of sciences. That this knowledge has been well applied is evidenced to all who are privileged to visit his well appointed farm, which consists of three hundred and fifty acres, and which he inherited from his father in 1899. Following close upon his marriage, in December, 1875, with Melissa J. Michael, born in Linn county, Ore., June 14, 1858, Mr. McCall remained on the home place four years, and in 1881 bought one hundred and sixty acres of land near his present home, where he lived until 1889. For the following six years he rented land from his father, and then moved onto a farm near by, where he worked and prospered until coming into his present inheritance. Mr. McCall is especially interested in stock-raising, and during the many years of his agricultural independence has bought and sold many head of valuable cattle, horses, hogs, and sheep. Although not interested in politics aside from the formality of casting his vote, he is a staunch supporter of Democracy. Mr. McCall has for many years been an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, is steward and trustee, and is at present doing excellent work as superintendent of the Sunday-school. The utmost respect and good-will is evidenced towards Mr. McCall by all his associates and his worth-while career is worthy of emulation from many standpoints.

WILLIAM WESS, substantially identified with farming interests in Yamhill county, was born in Germany, February 19, 1847, his parents, John and Kate Wess, being also natives of the Fatherland. John Wess was a cabinetmaker by trade, and came to America when his son William was very young. After spending some time in New York City he came on to Wisconsin, and worked at his trade in Milwaukee for the balance of his life, his death occurring in 1852. There were but three children in his family, two sons and one daughter.

Jesse W. Pugh

After the death of his father William Wess lived with his mother and brother and sister, and although they were in somewhat straitened circumstances, he managed to receive a fair education at the public schools of Milwaukee, and to gain a slight knowledge of general business. At the age of seventeen he availed himself of the opportunity to serve his country as a soldier, and in 1864 enlisted in Company E, Thirty-eighth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, as a private, and was sent to Madison, then to Washington, and later to the front as a member of the Army of the Potomac. He participated in the battle of the Wilderness, Petersburg, Spottsylvania, Appomattox Court House, Richmond and many others, and was mustered out in August, 1865, thereafter returning to his former home in Wisconsin. After attending school for a year and a half Mr. Wess repaired to northern Wisconsin and worked for several years in the sawmills, afterward continuing in that line of activity in Menominee county, Mich. .

In 1875 Mr. Wess came to Oregon, and in Yamhill county bought eighty acres of land, to which he has added by more recent purchase. Out of one hundred and twenty acres in his present farm forty acres are under cultivation, and many improvements add to convenience and profit of a general farming enterprise. There is also an orchard of nearly five thousand fruit trees, including both apples and prunes. In 1871 Mr. Wess married Sarah A. Coates, who was born in New York, and who is the mother of three children, of whom Ira J. is a resident of eastern Oregon; Hugh E. is living at home; and Gertrude O. also is living with her parents. Mr. Wess is interested in various fraternal and other organizations in which Yamhill county abounds. A Republican in politics, he has served as school director and clerk for a number of years, and is also road supervisor. He is a welcome member of Custer Post, No. 9, G. A. R., and is past grand commander. In religion he is identified with the Christian Church and was its clerk for several years.

JESSE W. PUGH. The value of temperate living and of upright business methods finds illustration in the life of Jesse W. Pugh, who, though eighty-five years old, still retains his normal faculties, and manages his splendid farm with as much skill as he did half a century ago. The life of this honored pioneer, than whom there is none more popular or influential in this part of the county, began in Kentucky, October 26, 1818, and as a small boy he moved with his parents to Illinois, soon afterward going to the state of Iowa. The father was a farmer in Kentucky, Illinois and Iowa, and led the strenuous life of those days. He was killed by lightning in 1822, his son Jesse being then four years old.

While on the home farm in Iowa Jesse Pugh conceived the idea of joining the pioneers of the western slope, and in 1846 joined a party bound for the coast. With him came his wife, formerly Sarah Ransom, who was born in England, and who came to Iowa with her parents when she was three years old. The emigrants met with little trouble from the Indians, although one of the men of the party, by name Edward Trimble, was killed by a murderous red man. Mr. Pugh and his wife spent the first winter in the west at Whitman's Station, and in the spring of 1847 came to Washington county, Ore., where he bought a squatter's claim and upon which he lived for about five years. He became a resident of Linn county in 1852, taking up the claim of six hundred and forty acres upon which he has since lived, and which is located eleven miles south of Albany, and six miles west of Shedd's. Practically all of the improvements have been made by the present owner, who has availed himself of all known devices for conducting a model scientific agricultural enterprise. More land has been purchased by him at different times, and once he owned eight hundred and forty acres. His ranch is most complete in all of its arrangements, and bears evidence of the years of patient care which have been expended on it. He raises large numbers of Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep, besides fine horses, and grain. It is one of the model farms in the county, and is exceptionally valuable from a monetary standpoint.

From time to time Mr. Pugh has taken a keen interest in politics, but has never been willing that his name should appear as a candidate for office. For many years himself and wife have been members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and have attended regularly when the weather and their health permitted. The little church has been maintained largely through the generosity of Mr. Pugh, whose influence for good has been further felt in the educational matters of the county. He is a staunch believer in education, and in all that is progressive and helpful. Seven children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Emma is the wife of D. Jenkins of eastern Oregon; James lives on a farm near his father; Alice is the widow of H. Wright of Albany; Adelaide is the wife of H. Jackson of the vicinity of Tangent; and Anna is the wife of A. M. Kendell, near Shedd's. Kindly in manner and generous in his judgment of all with whom he has to deal, Mr. Pugh has always maintained the most friendly relations with his friends and associates, and no man in the neighborhood more forcibly represents the substantial and thoroughly reliable western farmer.

J. T. FRYER, who owns and operates one hundred and forty acres of land in Yamhill county, near Carlton, was born in Washington county, near Hillsboro, May 6, 1858. His father, John L. Fryer, was a native of Green county, Ky., born June 30, 1823, and when a young man he became a general tradesman and later he engaged in farming. With his parents he went to Missouri and then gave his attention to freighting, making trips from St. Louis, Mo., to Santa Fe, New Mexico. That was in the early days, before the building of the railroads across the plains, and such a life brought many hardships and oftentimes was very dangerous. In these pioneer times William Fryer, the grandfather of our subject, also crossed the plains, making the trip in 1852. He started with his wife and four sons and three daughters. The three sons besides John L. were Alex, James M. and Joseph, Alex being the only one now living. John L. Fryer was married to Mrs. Diana (Decker) Landess, the daughter of John Decker, and was born in Indiana, July 9, 1823. By her first husband, Abram Landess, she had four daughters and one son: Ellen, Mary Jane, Adeline, Martha and George W., of Lafayette. Mr. and Mrs. Fryer became the parents of three daughters and one son, namely: Sarah, deceased; J. T., of this review; Mrs. Angeline Edson, of Carlton; and Mrs. Nettie May Edson, now deceased. Mrs. Fryer's father and Abram Landess crossed the plains from Illinois in 1847, locating in Washington county, near Hillsboro. When John L. Fryer came to Oregon he took up his abode in Yamhill county and in 1854 removed to Washington county, where he resided until 1863. He then returned to Yamhill county and purchased the farm upon which his son J. T. is now residing. There he lived until his death, devoting his energies to agricultural pursuits. He passed away January 23, 1877, and his wife's death occurred in April, 1882.

J. T. Fryer spent the days of his boyhood and youth in his parent's home and when nineteen years of age entered upon an independent business career, taking charge of his father's farm. He received his education in the common schools and in the State University at Eugene, where he spent a year and a half, being one of the first students in that institution. Throughout his entire career he has carried on farm work and his careful management and supervision of his place has led to the development of a highly improved property.

In 1879 occurred the marriage of Mr. Fryer and Miss Sarah E. Hutchcroft, who was born in Wisconsin on the 7th of August, 1862. In their family were four children, but one died in infancy. The others are Harry L., Millard J. and Robert L., who are at home. The farm comprises one hundred and forty acres of rich land, of which one hundred and ten acres are under cultivation. Mr. Fryer is now making a specialty of the raising of hops, having twenty-five acres planted to that crop. In his political views he is a Democrat and has filled several local offices, serving as road supervisor, justice of the peace and in school offices. He belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen at Carlton, also to the Artisans of that place, and is connected with the Woodmen of the World at North Yamhill. His entire life has been passed in Oregon and he has therefore been a witness of much of its development as it has left behind the conditions of frontier life and advanced to a leading place among the great states of the west.

P. A. BATES. Since his eighteenth year, Mr. Bates has seen more even than the average emigrant, of the boundless west, his life from the time of his leaving his Michigan home being full of incident and replete with interest. He was born in Wayne county, Mich., April 26, 1832, his father, Allen Bates, being a native of Vermont, born in Springfield, Windsor county, May 5, 1788, his wife, Anna, being a native of the same place, born December 17, 1790. In 1830 the family removed to Wayne county, Mich., where the father engaged at his trade, which was that of a carpenter, until his death January 21, 1862, with the exception of a few years in the mercantile business, shortly before his demise. Of the ten children born to them, four are now living, all at a distance from the home of their childhood. Joseph D. is a farmer in Washington county, Ore.; Lydia A. is the wife of J. S. Fisher, a farmer of Livingston county, Mo.; Ellen S. Kinney resides in Brown county, Kans., and it was with this daughter that the widowed mother made her home until her death in 1870; the next to the youngest of the family is P. A. Bates.

In addition to the education P. A. received in the common schools of Michigan, he picked up with unerring instinct the carpenter trade. Attracted by the reports from the west, with a boy's intense enthusiasm he set out in 1850, for California, going by way of the Isthmus of Panama. On reaching New York City he set sail for the isthmus, and on arriving he decided there was opportunity in that little country, so he remained for a year and a half, working at his trade. From the isthmus he came to San Francisco as ship carpenter, settling in Sacramento, and during the prosecution of his trade it was his unique fortune to measure the hives of the first lot of bees ever brought west from eastern states. Not yet satisfied as to his location for a home, he left California, coming by water to Portland, and from there to Oregon City, where he took up a homestead claim, leaving it, however, in a short time for a farm near Forest Grove, Washington county, where he passed ten years of his life, meeting with unbroken prosperity in the union of his trade with the tilling of the soil. In 1863 he sold out, moving to Yamhill county, settling in Chehalem valley, where he bought six hundred and twenty acres, six miles west of Newberg, remaining in this location for twenty-seven years, giving his industry and energy in the improvement of one of the fine farms of the county. With the proceeds of the sale of this property he invested in a flour mill in Lafayette, making good profits until 1899, when the loss of the mill by fire induced him to again follow agricultural pursuits. Near the city of Lafayette he now owns four hundred acres of land the farming of which he superintends, being also engaged in conducting a warehouse in the city.

Mr. Bates was married April 22, 1855, to Miss Nancy Bird, of Forest Grove, and two daughters were born of this union: Anna S., deceased, and Mary A., wife of P. A. Smith, of North Yamhill. After the death of his wife, March 9, 1859, Mr. Bates remained alone for nineteen years, marrying the second time February 27, 1878, Olive E. Stout, a native of Kansas. One son, Albert T., was born of this union. In his political convictions Mr. Bates is a Republican, serving as road supervisor and various school offices through this influence. He is quite active in church work, being a steward and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Lafayette, and in his fraternal relations he is connected with the Grange of Chehalem valley.

B. F. KAUFFMAN. For a number of years Mr. Kauffman was a respected and worthy citizen of Yamhill county and when called to his final rest his death was deeply regretted by many friends. A native of Pennsylvania, he was born near Millerstown, in Perry county, June 28, 1829, one of a family of five children. His father was a farmer and in his youth the son became familiar with all of the duties and labors that fall to the lot of the agriculturist. He remained at home until seventeen years of age, when he started out to make his own way in the world. He had pursued his education in the district schools and for many winter seasons he engaged in teaching vocal music, possessing splendid natural ability in that direction. When a young man he was engaged in the stock business, and to him was due the credit of establishing the Nekoda post-office. At that place he opened the first mercantile store and also engaged in dealing in farm implements.

Having made some progress toward the acquirement of a comfortable competence and feeling that he was justified in maintaining a home of his own, Mr. Kauffman was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Stewart, a native of Pennsylvania. Unto them were born five children, of whom James S., Clara E. and Albert are all living in the Keystone state, and William and Julius are deceased. While still living in Pennsylvania the wife and mother died, and in 1867 Mr. Kauffman was again married, his second union being with Mary Merideth, a native of Pennsylvania. They continued to live in that state until 1880, when they removed to Kansas and Mr. Kauffman engaged in the stock business near Columbus. There they lived until 1885, when they came to Oregon and here he purchased a farm of two hundred and fifteen acres, two miles east of McMinnville. Upon this tract he placed all of the improvements, building the largest house in the locality and also a very extensive barn, in fact, he owned one of the best equipped farms in the neighborhood, it being one of the attractive features of the landscape and at the same time the richly cultivated fields returned to him a good income.

Unto the second marriage of Mr. Kauffman three children were born, Herbert J., Cora B. and Howard B., who are still living on the old home place. The parents were devoted members of the United Brethren Church and their lives were in consistent harmony with their professions. On May 29, 1899, Mr. Kauffman's labors were ended by death, but he left to his family not only a comfortable competence, but also the priceless heritage of an untarnished name. His widow and sons then conducted the old homestead until March 11, 1901, when Mrs. Kauffman also passed away and the sons are now managing the property which has come into their possession. They are extensive dealers in stock and raise annually large numbers of Shorthorn cattle, Poland-China hogs and Cotswold sheep. They have recently engaged in the dairy business, which they have instituted on an extensive scale and their farm through their able management has remained a paying investment as it was in their father's time.

Herbert J. Kauffman is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of the Foresters of America, and has served as trustee of the latter lodge. Howard B. Kauffman is also connected with the same fraternal organizations and is secretary of the Foresters. Both brothers are independent in politics and are well known business men, progressive, far-sighted and energetic. Their business methods are such as commend them to the confidence of the public and all who know them esteem them for their genuine worth.

FIELDING D. STOTT, one of the pioneers of Oregon who crossed the plains in 1851, and creditably identified himself with farming and other undertakings in Yamhill county until his death, December 23, 1889, is recalled by all who knew him as one of the most honorable and ambitious upbuilders of this part of the state. A native son of the Hoosier state, Mr. Stott was born October 1, 1842, a son of Samuel R. and Lucy (Denny) Stott, the former born in the state of Kentucky.

Samuel R. Stott moved from Kentucky when a young man, and was a farmer for many years in Indiana. In 1851 he started over the plains with ox teams, and arrived at his destination in Oregon without any out-of-the-ordinary experiences enlivening his journey. Near Beaverton he bought six hundred and forty acres of land, which he occupied until 1861, and then traded the same for an equally large farm on the shores of Wapato Lake. Here he lived until his death at an advanced age. Eight children were born to himself and wife, four sons and four daughters. Of these, Mary J., Mrs. Myers, is deceased; Mrs. Avarilla Thompson is a resident of East Portland; Fielding D. is the next in order of birth; Raleigh and Frank are deceased; Mrs. Rebecca Ball is also deceased; Samuel is a farmer of Sumpter, Ore.; and Frances is deceased.

On his father's farm Fielding D. Stott was reared to hard work and large responsibility, and acquired his education in the public schools. Upon starting out to earn an independent livelihood he moved onto a farm near Wapato station, and there farmed for about nine years, afterward removing onto his father-in-law Perry's place, where he engaged in dairying and farming. In August of 1878 he assumed charge of the station at North Yamhill and for the balance of his life acted as agent. He was a Republican in politics, and was much interested in the cause of education, his offices as school director and clerk enabling him to exert a broadening influence in regard to the schools of his locality. He was a practical and successful farmer, and took his place among the progressive and adaptive element of Yamhill county.

In Washington county, October 1, 1866, Mr. Stott married Mary Ellen Perry, a native of Worcester, Wayne county, Ohio, and born August 18, 1842. Mrs. Stott is a daughter of Robert and Martha (Rossiter) Perry, natives of Somersetshire, England. Mr. Perry emigrated to America as a young man, settling in Ohio, from which state he removed to Oregon via the plains in 1852. He located on three hundred and twenty acres of land five miles northwest of Yamhill, and in 1855 bought a place near North Yamhill station of about the same amount of land. For the balance of his life he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and was fairly successful both as a farmer and business man. In his family were two sons and one daughter, Mrs. Stott being the youngest child and only daughter. Thomas W. Perry is a farmer near North Yamhill; and Johnson O. H. Perry is deceased. Mrs. Stott still lives on the old homestead, and is one of the highly respected and well known pioneer women of this county. She has been agent for the Southern Pacific Railroad at North Yamhill for twenty-five years, and gives every department her personal attention besides overseeing two farms. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Stott were born five children: Hazzard Stott, a farmer of Yamhill county and chairman of the Republican County Committee; Daisy M., wife of Everett Bullock, of Portland; Madge, deceased; Olive P., wife of Adolph Gabriel, of New York City, and a graduate of the New York law school, and in active practice in New York City; and Becca, wife of W. J. Partlow, residing with her mother.

G. C. MORGAREIDGE. The Morgareidge family has been represented in Oregon since 1875, and is associated with substantial efforts along general farming and stock-raising lines. The present chief bearer of the name was born in Morgan county, Ohio, October 9, 1838, his strong constitution and capacity for work having been inherited from forefathers long engaged in tilling farms in different parts of the middle west. To his worthy parents were born twelve children, being evenly divided, six sons and six daughters, and of this number eight are living. About 1856 the family moved to Iowa, and there heard a great deal about the prospects of the west, of which they decided to avail themselves. Accordingly, in 1875, directly after the marriage of G. C. Morgareidge and Elizabeth

Miles Lewis

Harper, arrangements were made to join one of the numerous caravans bound for the fertile plains and valleys along the western coast.

Soon after arriving in Oregon Mr. Morgareidge purchased his present farm, which originally comprised three hundred and ten acres, and then lived for a year in Portland, thereafter returning and settling permanently on his farm. Practically no improvements whatever had been made on the tract at the time it came into his possession, and the well-tilled acres, fine residence and well constructed barns and outhouses are the result of unremitting endeavor on the part of a thoroughly practical agriculturist and business man. About seventy-five acres out of his hundred and five are under cultivation, and general commodities are raised, as well as considerable stock. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Morgareidge, of whom Oden is deceased; Anna is the wife of C. O. Baxter; Raymond lives on an adjoining farm; and Dell, Nora and Wesley are living at home. Mr. Morgareidge is a Republican in politics, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

MILES LEWIS. Prominent among the many residents of Marion county, who are industriously engaged in the prosecution of a calling upon which the support and wealth of the nation greatly depends, is Miles Lewis, a progressive and prosperous agriculturist, carrying on general farming and stock-raising on one of the largest and finest equipped farms in the vicinity of Silverton. He is a descendant of distinguished Colonial stock, his paternal grandfather, James Lewis, having been a second cousin of Daniel Boone, and a son-in-law of John Couch, who fought with Gen. George Washington, and had the distinction of being the largest man in the American army, at his death weighing upwards of five hundred pounds.

Miles Lewis was born June 23, 1837, in Perry county, Ky., a son of Daniel Lewis, one of the early settlers of Marion county, Orè. Daniel Lewis, born in North Carolina, January 23, 1807, went with his parents to Kentucky in 1810, and was there reared and educated. Learning the trade of a stone mason when young, he followed it in Kentucky until 1840, when he moved with his family to Platt county, Mo. Eleven years later, in 1851, he started with his family for Oregon, making the long journey with ox teams, being one hundred and thirty days on the way, and bravely daring all the hardships and privations incidental to life in an undeveloped country in order that his children and their descendants might enjoy the comforts, and even the luxuries, of life without the labor and toil in which his life was spent. Taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in township seven, eight miles southeast of Silverton, on the Waldo Hills, he first built a small log cabin, and as the years passed by and fortune smiled upon his labors, that was replaced by a frame house of more modern construction. Here he worked at his trade, also carrying on the various branches of agriculture, until his death, at the venerable age of eighty years. He was a Democrat in politics, and a trustworthy citizen. When but seventeen years of age, on November 18, 1824, he married Margaret Spurlock, who was born in Virginia, January 9, 1808, and then a girl of sixteen years. They trod life's pathway together for nearly sixty-three years, she surviving him a number of years, and dying at the age of ninety-one years. They were the parents of ten children, two of whom are now living, namely: Jesse H., of Whitman county, Wash.; and Miles, the subject of this review.

Coming with his parents to Marion county in 1851, Miles Lewis has since resided here, and has been actively identified with the agricultural interests of the place. As a young man he taught school for a number of terms in Marion county, and has since evinced great interest in educational matters. Remaining beneath the parental roof until after his marriage, he ably assisted his father in improving the homestead, on which he subsequently lived with his wife for nineteen years, carrying it on with profitable results. Purchasing then four hundred acres of the H. Jones donation claim, about one-half mile west of his father's old farm, he has added to its improvements, and secured excellent results from his labors, the land being rich, and under his management yielding good crops each year. In addition to general farming, Mr. Lewis makes a specialty of raising Durham cattle, Berkshire hogs, and Shropshire sheep, meeting with good success in this branch of industry. He invariably casts his vote with the Democratic party, and is a member of the Primitive Baptist Church.

On January 1, 1882, Mr. Lewis married Nancy Jane Dillon, a native of the White river country, Indiana, having been born June 15, 1855, and into their household three children have been born, namely, Isaac M., Lulu M. and Mary E.

DR. GEORGE W. ODELL. Although at present living retired on a small place at Chase, Yamhill county, Dr. Odell has ministered for many years to the physical woes of humanity, and but for his own failing health would undoubtedly still be applying a science which he adorned with erudition and true appreciation. Dr. Odell is one of the many Hoosier citizens who have swelled the ranks of home and fortune seekers in Oregon, and his birth occurred in Carroll county, Ind., October 3, 1838. His father, John Odell, was born in South Carolina in 1800, and died in 1869; while his mother, Sarah (Holman) Odell, was born in Kentucky in 1803, and died in January, 1887. John Odell was a farmer during his entire active life. As a young man he emigrated to Ohio at an early day, but spent his last days in Indiana, where he owned a farm of considerable size.

The third youngest in his father's family of six sons and five daughters, Dr. Odell spent his earliest youth in Indiana, and in 1851, when thirteen years of age, started across the plains with his parents, and a company consisting of the owners of twelve wagons and their families. The future follower of Æsculapius entered heartily into the novelty and zest of this expedition, and made himself useful in divers ways, as only a sturdy and inquiring boy can. His father was captain of the train during a portion of the trip, and his place was afterward taken by one Captain Allen. All went well as far as serious trouble with the Indians or large loss of cattle was concerned, and upon arriving near the vicinity of Dayton, Ore., the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he passed the balance of his life.

When twenty-two years of age Dr. Odell began a self supporting existence by driving stock to southern Oregon, after which hardening occupation he began to study medicine at Salem, and later at San Francisco. The medical diploma of the doctor came from Willamette University in 1872, and soon after he took up his residence in Lebanon, where he practiced with increasing success for seven years. For the following seven years he was a professional member of the community of Eugene, Ore., and then removed to within four miles of Dayton, where large professional responsibilities undermined his health, and compelled retirement to a higher altitude. Accordingly, the doctor removed to his present home of forty acres near Chase, where he lives with an older sister. The doctor is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Masons of Dayton, of which he is past master. Also he is the owner of a farm of one hundred and eighty-two acres near Dayton, which he rents, and which is devoted to general farming and stock-raising. In 1870 Dr. Odell married Mary Biddle. Dr. Odell is well known in his vicinity, and bears a name identified with public spiritedness, generosity, professional excellence, and unquestioned personal integrity.

DUNCAN ROSS. Were one in search of ideal general farming and stock-raising interests it were not necessary to go further than the splendidly equipped farm of Duncan Ross, situated four and one-half miles east of McMinnville, and containing in all seven hundred and fifteen acres. Since coming under the present management this property has undergone such vital changes as to bear scarcely any resemblance to its former state, rebuilding and additions having been unstintingly and continuously made. Six hundred acres are under cultivation, and Mr. Ross farms about five hundred and fifty acres. General farming is maintained on a large scale, but the farm might properly be spoken of as a stock farm, for this department furnishes the greatest source of revenue. In cattle a preference is given to Shorthorns, and in sheep the Cotswold brand is found the most profitable. That Mr. Ross contemplates enlarging upon his present herd of two hundred sheep is evidenced by the fact that he has recently paid $165 for an imported Cotswold buck. In horses, the ponderous and finely fashioned Clydesdale yields a handsome yearly income, and but recently a team weighing thirty-five hundred and twelve pounds brought their owner $475. Considering the fact that Mr. Ross came to Oregon with a very small capital his well deserved success and prominence in the community are well worthy of emulation.

Born among the hardy peasantry of Rosshire, Scotland, in November, 1847, Duncan Ross was one of ten children whose father was a blacksmith and carpenter. The lad was reared in a practical home atmosphere, and plenty of muscular exercise, wholesome food and ordinary branches of study contributed to a mental and physical soundness. At the age of twenty-five he migrated to Canada and managed the farm of Andrew Allen, of the ship company lines, for about six years, and in 1877 came to Oregon, where he bought part of the Armstrong donation claim seven miles south of McMinnville. Four years later he engaged in farming on land on which the town of Dundee now stands, and after remaining there three years, purchased part of the White donation claim four miles east of McMinnville, where he lived four years. The present farm of Mr. Ross came into his possession in 1889, and of course at that comparatively late day he was able to profit beyond the early settlers, who were obliged to clear their land from the timber.

An important factor in the success of Mr. Ross has been the sympathy and encouragement given by his wife, formerly Anna McClennan, who was born in Scotland, and whom he married in 1875. Mrs. Ross became the mother of the following children: Duncan R., deceased; Lizzie, the wife of James Cruickshank, living on an adjoining farm; Emily, the wife of Fred McMikee, of Portland; Rhoda, attending college in Portland; Lottie; Anna; Alexander; Flora and Kittie. Mr. Ross is identified with the Masons and Eastern Star, and in religion is a member of the Presbyterian Church. To an exceptional degree Mr. Ross occupies an honored place in the community and he is recognized as one of the best authorities on stock-raising and scientific farming in Yamhill county.

F. M. GLOVER, who owns and operates five hundred and seventy-seven acres of valuable land in Yamhill county, was born March 20, 1840, in Grundy county, Mo., one of a family of seven children, and a son of John Glover, a merchant of Albany, Mo. The son obtained his education in the district schools near his home and remained under the parental roof until he was fifteen years of age, when he started out to make his own way in the world, being first employed as a farm hand, which occupation he followed in Missouri until 1864, when he started to cross the plains. This was long prior to the era of railroad travel in the distant west and he made the journey after the usual manner of the times—with ox-teams—joining a train of about thirty-five wagons which was upon the road for six months. He first stopped at Virginia City, Mont., where he remained for about a month and from there made his way to The Dalles as passenger in another wagon. From that place he proceeded to Portland by boat, arriving at his destination with only ten cents in his pocket. He came direct to Yamhill county and spent the first winter with George Phillips, being principally engaged in that season in hunting and catching wild hogs. For a few years he was a general laborer, but industry and economy enabled him to eventually become a landowner, and he is now one of the prosperous farmers of Yamhill county.

In 1869 as a companion and helpmate for life's journey Mr. Glover chose Mrs. Sarah J. Monroe and they settled upon a farm about three miles west of Whiteson. Unto them were born three children: Nettie, who is now deceased; James A., who makes his home on the old homestead; and Thomas H., of Honolulu, Hayti, who is a member of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Coast Artillery, United States Army, having spent two years in the Hawaiian Islands. In 1876 the wife and mother died. Mr. Glover, however, continued to reside on the old home place until 1897, when he removed to his present place of residence in Whiteson. For his second wife he chose Jennie N. Mills, a native of Kansas, and they have one child, Mary Beatrice, who is at home.

Mr. Glover owns four lots in the village of Whiteson in addition to his valuable farming property comprising five hundred and seventy-seven acres of rich and arable land. He is now living a retired life, his investments yielding him a good income. From a very humble financial position he has steadily worked his way upward and may well be termed a self-made man. His life history proves how potent industry, enterprise and careful management are in the acquirement of success. His political support is given to the Democracy.

JAMES MONROE CROWLEY, M. D. The medical and surgical practice of Dr. James Monroe Crowley was inaugurated in Monmouth in 1891. The doctor has many claims upon the consideration of the community, among them being the fact that he is a native son, and representative of an influential pioneer family. He was born at what is now Crowley Station, four miles north of Dixie, May 27, 1859, his life beginning under conditions directly the reverse of those of the remote forefathers, one of whom settled in the extreme east long before the Revolution, and participated with the colonies in the effort to shake off English rule. The paternal grandfather, John Crowley, was born in Tennessee, September 27, 1810, and married Nancy Jane Curtis, a native of Missouri, and daughter of Elijah Curtis, member of an old Tennessee family. Of this union were born three children, among whom was Solomon Kimsey Crowley, the founder of the family in Oregon in 1852. The latter came west in 1864, locating first in Polk county, and later in Benton county, his death occurring at the home of his son at the age of sixty-eight years.

Solomon Kimsey Crowley was born in Ray county, northwestern Missouri, November 1, 1833, and was of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Until his nineteenth year he lived in his native state, spending a somewhat unsatisfactory youth, and looking always for chances to better his condition. His mother had died when he was a child, and his father, when approached, at first refused to sanction his emigration to the west. Eventually he was persuaded, and the youth, having a chance to drive a team across, started out, encountering on the way many difficulties. The year 1852 was prolific of disaster on the plains, cholera and smallpox vying with each other in destructiveness. The smallpox was especially virulent, and the way of the train in which young Crowley traveled was often blocked by travelers burying their dead. Strong men were bowed beneath the terrible sorrow of losing all that they held dear in life, and mothers were left with large families of children, or else utterly alone in the world. The party crossed the Missouri river May 10, and reached The Dalles August 16th, having stopped nine days on the way to nurse a sick child, and always rested from their labors on the Sabbath, that the animals might have time to recuperate. Reaching the Snake river, the cholera broke out, and the camp was thrown into a panic because of the death of three people within the short space of five hours. Solomon Crowley, however, suffered from none of the vicissitudes which overcame the others, but was able to eat three square meals a day, and had never a touch of cholera, smallpox or mountain fever. He finally met with a man engaged in packing to the mines of California, and accompanied him thither, where he increased his little hoard to the extent of about $1,000. Mr. Crowley reached Oregon in 1852, and bought land in Fulkerson Gap, four miles north of Dixie, and where Crowley Station is now located. From time to time large tracts of land passed through his hands, and he finally became the possessor of a thousand acres. He here lived and prospered, and in 1876 retired from active life, his home at the present time being in Oak Grove. Mr. Crowley is a fine type of the early pioneer, and is a broad-minded and liberal man, and has accumulated an extensive and valuable property. In 1876 he took his entire family to the Sandwich Islands, returning in August of the same year, after having a most delightful and instructive trip.

His wife was Hannah Rebecca Fulkerson, whose father, Judge J. M. Fulkerson, was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains in the early '40s, settling in Oregon. He finally removed to the Fulkerson Gap, named in his honor, where he died in 1881, at the age of eighty-three years. To Mr. and Mrs. Crowley were born nine children, four sons and five daughters, of whom the doctor of Monmouth is the second child; Mary V. is Mrs. W. Faulk of Oak Grove; J. F. lives in Seattle; Nancy Jane is the wife of Milton Taylor of Crowley Station; S. H. lives near Crowley Station; and Ada B., Effie L. and Ora P. are living at home. Mr. Crowley is a Democrat in politics, and with his wife is a member of the Baptist church, of which he has been a deacon for many years.

In the fall of 1875 Dr. Crowley entered McMinnville College, which he attended for one year. He then turned his attention to farming, but having had from earliest youth an admiration for and leaning towards medical science, he began to study in 1884 under Dr. Lee of Independence, in 1888 entering the Missouri Medical College at St. Louis, from which he was graduated in 1891. The same year he came to Monmouth, and, in order to keep abreast of the times in his chosen profession, took a post-graduate course at the Chicago Polyclinic in 1898.

While living at Oak Grove, Ore., the doctor was united in marriage with Emma King, who was born in Missouri, a daughter of Andrew King, who was born in the east and came to Oregon in 1880. Mr. King located at Crowley Station, of which he was postmaster and station agent up to the time of his death in 1893, at the age of seventy-two years. Seven children have been born to Dr. Crowley and his wife, the order of their birth being as follows: Estella Katura, a student at the Monmouth Normal school; Azilla Emma, a student also at the Normal; Graves F., also a student at the Normal; Douglas S., Wendell T., Norman G., and James I. Dr. Crowley is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Baptist church. He is popular and enterprising, and his kindness of heart, skill as a physician and surgeon, and his many humanitarian and charitable acts are well known throughout that locality.

SAMUEL M. DANIEL. In the estimation of all who know him Samuel M. Daniel is a typical captain of industry of the western slope, his mercantile business in Monmouth contributing in no small measure to the financial soundness of the town. No more familiar or welcome figure is seen on the streets of this thriving community, nor does any one represent in greater degree the whole-souled interest which, also, is suggestive of the west. A native son of Oregon, he was born near Scio, Linn county, May 14, 1865, and in his younger days laid the foundation for his present sound physique while rising early and laboring long on the paternal farm.

Francis M. Daniel, the father of Samuel M., was born in Crittenden, Ky., March 10, 1826, and as a young man removed to Missouri, whence started so many thousands of emigrants for the coast in the early days. In 1852 he joined a train bound for the other side of the plains, and upon arriving at his destination in this state, located on a farm near Dallas, after three years removing to Scio, Linn county. In time he disposed of his land and located in the town, where he engaged in the general merchandise business during 1864-5, under the firm name of Daniel & Curl. Eventually he retired from active business, and made his home on a farm near Scio, where he remained until his death, which occurred March 3, 1901. John T., the grandfather, came from farming stock, and lived on a farm in Kentucky for the greater part of his life and lived to the remarkable age of one hundred and two years. Mary Elizabeth Daniel, the mother of Samuel M., was born in Missouri, and was a daughter of Willis Gaines, born in the east and an early resident of Missouri. Mr. Gaines crossed the plains in 1852, his equipment being the old-time ox-teams, and upon arriving in Oregon located on a donation claim eight miles southeast of Scio. Here he cleared his land and prospered as the years went by, accumulating quite a competence for those dependent upon his care. He lived to be more than seventy years old, and during his most active years was prominent in town affairs.

Besides Samuel M., there were five other children in his father's family, only two of whom are living, one being a daughter. Samuel M. is the oldest of the children, and was educated in the district schools, entering the Christian College at Monmouth in 1881, and graduating therefrom in 1885, with the degree of B. S. Beginning with 1888 he engaged in the mercantile business in Scio, which he continued until April, 1899, when he transferred his interests to Monmouth, which has since been his home. He carries a mercantile stock valued at $14,000, and besides owns stock in the Monmouth Improvement Company. An additional source of revenue is a farm of two hundred and thirteen acres half a mile east of Scio, a portion of which is improved, and which serves as relaxation from business to the fortunate owner. Other property in the family is a forty-five acre farm four miles west of Monmouth, belonging to Mrs. Daniel. In Eugene, Ore., Mr. Daniel was united in marriage with Verona F. Peek, a native of Junction, Ore., and daughter of Henry Peek, who was killed in the mines when she was an infant. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Daniel: Norma E., Luella E., Lorena, Clarence, and Edward Gail. In politics Mr. Daniel is a Prohibitionist, and he has served as councilman four or five terms.

JOHN DICKINSON. Though not long a resident of Oregon Mr. Dickinson has already made for himself a prominent place in the affairs of the city in which he now makes his home. His parents, William and Elizabeth (Scarborough) Dickinson, were both natives of Lincolnshire, England, who with their four sons and one daughter emigrated to the United States in 1841, locating in Jackson county, Iowa, where the father took up government land to the amount of four hundred and eighty acres, upon which he engaged in farming. Politically he adhered to the principles advocated by the Republican party. His death occurred upon his farm in 1879, at the age of seventy-three years, his wife afterward dying in Bridgewater, S. Dak.

The fourth of the family of children was John Dickinson, born in Lincolnshire, England, March 16, 1838, and coming with the family to America when but three years of age. His early education was principally received at home from the busy father and mother, with the assistance of his brothers and sister; at the age of twenty-six years engaging in the work to which his early training had inclined him, for six years remaining in Jackson county, Iowa, tilling the soil. Later he found remunerative employment in conducting a grist-mill on Beaver creek of the same county, and for sixteen years he continued in this business. In 1881 he removed to South Dakota, where he took a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres near Marion, two years later disposing of his mill in Iowa. For three years, 1877-79, Mr. Dickinson managed the grain elevator for the Interstate Elevator Company of Winona, Minn. In 1901 he moved his family to Oregon, where he bought three hundred and twenty-seven acres located six miles southwest of Independence, Polk county, upon which he is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He has since purchased property near the city, comprising four acres of well cultivated ground, with a beautiful residence and fine surroundings. Here he now makes his home.

The first marriage of Mr. Dickinson united him with Miss Elizabeth Chafer, a native of England, who died in Sabula, Iowa. Six children were born of this union, who are as follows: Mary, living in Iowa; Harvey; Percy, and Don, of Oregon; Aloie and Elizabeth, deceased. His second marriage also occurred in Sabula, Iowa, Miss Minnie Cleveland, also of England, becoming his wife. Two sons and three daughters blessed this union, all of whom are still at home, and are named in order of birth as follows: George, Henry, Gertrude, Belle and Queen. Mr. Dickinson is identified with the Masons, being a member of the Blue Lodge, the Royal Arch Chapter and Eastern Star. Politically he is a Populist and has often been called upon to serve in public offices. In McCook county, S. Dak., he was county commissioner for a term of three years, and has also served as school director and road supervisor.

LYMAN DAMON. To have lived so well, so successfully, and so agreeably as to have one's name spoken with terms of warmest commendation and even affection by hosts of friends and associates, is an achievement of Lyman Damon, one of the pioneer upbuilders of Polk county, and at present the owner of a little fruit and hop ranch of twenty-five acres across the river from Independence, in Marion county. Mr. Damon comes of farming ancestry, and he himself was reared on a farm in McHenry county, Ill., where he was born February 20, 1849. His paternal grandfather, Hosier, was probably born in the state of Ohio, and at an early day located in the then wilderness of Illinois, where he farmed and prospered, living to a good old age. His son, George W., the father of Lyman, was born in Grundy county, Ohio, and with his parents moved to Illinois when very young. After his marriage he located on a farm in McHenry county, near Marengo, and in 1860 took up his abode in Winneshiek county, Iowa, where he became the owner of five hundred acres of land. For sixteen years he was a factor in the development of Winneshiek county, and, after disposing of his land at a profit in 1876, he located two miles south of Monmouth, Ore., where he engaged in farming upon three hundred acres of land until his demise in 1884 at the age of sixty-five years, his death being caused by an accident while harrowing in his fields. Through his marriage with Charlotte Levens, a native of Pennsylvania, and who died in Oregon in 1886, at the age of sixty-three years, seven children were born, five sons and two daughters, Lyman being the third.

Of an eminently ambitious nature, the youthful Lyman began to realize his limitations on the Iowa farm, and looked around for a broader field. With a friend, Edward Snell, he preceded his parents to Oregon in 1873, locating for a year in Salem, Marion county, where he engaged for a year in farming and trucking. Beginning with 1874 he held the position of superintendent of the Malheur Indian Reservation, and so successful was he that his salary was raised from $20 per month to $100 per month in less than a year. After serving in this capacity for three years, during three different administrations, he came to Monmouth in 1877, and bought a farm of one hundred and fifty acres of his father. Here he lived and improved his property until disposing of it in 1890, after which he located in Independence, and engaged in the truck and dray business for a year. He then purchased a farm of forty acres one mile south of Independence, cleared the land of timber and planted hops, finally devoting sixteen acres to this hardy growth. This farm continued in his possession until 1902, when he sold out and bought his present little property across the river from Independence in Marion county.

In Salem, Ore., Mr. Damon married Nellie Mitchell, a native daughter of Scotland, and whose father, William, came to America about 1870. Mr. Mitchell located on a farm near Dayton, Ore., soon after emigrating from his native land, and here died at an advanced age. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Damon, of whom Jessie is the wife of Oliver Locke, clerk in a dry goods store in Salem; Grace is a telegraph operator at Salem; Samuel is a student in the freshman class at Corvallis, Ore.; and Nellie is at home. Mr. Damon is a Republican in political affiliation, and for one term served as school director of Monmouth. Fraternally he is variously connected with the lodges in which the town and county abound, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the Rebekahs; the United Workmen, in which he has taken the degree of honor; and the Knights of Maccabees. Aside from his position as an agriculturist and general business man Mr. Damon has been identified with certain upbuilding agencies of the pioneer nature in this county, notably in the early days when farmers were struggling with the problem of rendering their grain marketable. At this crisis he purchased a threshing machine, which soon attained popularity, and was very useful in facilitating the handling of the enormous grain crops for the following fifteen years.

JAMES A. GRIGSBY. One of the many worthy citizens and capable and progressive agriculturists of Polk county is Mr. Grigsby, proprietor of a highly improved and attractive farming estate two miles north of Independence. A farmer by choice, he has acquired skill by experience in the various branches of this important industry, and is meeting with deserved success in his extensive operations. A son of the late Benjamin F. Grigsby, he was born in Meigs county, Tenn., December 23, 1848, of Irish ancestry. His paternal grandfather, Samuel Grigsby, was a native of Virginia, but became a pioneer settler of Tennessee. Benjamin F. Grigsby was born in Tennessee in the early part of the nineteenth century, his birth occurring in 1816. He has been a life-long resident of his native state, and during his active career was engaged in general farming, but is now living retired in Meigs county. He married first Rebecca King, who was born in Bradley county, Tenn. She died in 1849, leaving three children, of whom James A. is the youngest. The father married for his second wife, Polly A. Owen, and they have nine children.

After finishing his studies in the district school James A. Grigsby attended Athens College, in Athens, Tenn., for a time. At the age of twenty-one years he began the battle of life on his own account, becoming a farmer in his native state. Emigrating in 1875 to Oregon, he located first in Polk county, near Independence, and was there prosperously engaged in agricultural pursuits for fifteen or more years. Purchasing his present farm in 1891, Mr. Grigsby has since successfully pursued his pleasant and profitable occupation here, making improvements of an excellent character, and rendering the estate one of the most productive and desirable pieces of property in the neighborhood. In addition to managing his own farm, he also has control of the Hurshburg farm of four hundred acres. He devotes his attention to general agriculture, making a specialty, however, of stock-raising, rearing Cotswold sheep.

Mr. Grigsby married, in 1871, Miss Mary J. Jordan, a native of Meigs county, Tenn., and a daughter of Thomas and Nancy (Grigsby) Jordan. Six children have been born of their union, four of whom are living, as follows: Adra B., wife of Albert Dockster; Robert C.; Savannah T.; and Martha Jane. Politically Mr. Grigsby is identified with the Republican party, and fraternally he is a member of Independence Lodge No. 29, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons.

HENRY FLICKINGER. For an example of the prosperous farmer of the northwest one need go no further than Henry Flickinger, whose many years of good management have resulted in substantial gains, and enabled him to live in retirement with his daughter and son-in-law. This honored pioneer of 1850 comes of an old-time family of Lancaster county, Pa., where he was born on a farm, January 27, 1830, his father, Henry, having been born there in 1801. The paternal grandfather, another Henry, was born near Reading, Pa., and was of German descent. The younger Henry was a tanner by trade, and through his marriage with Annie Schnader, a native daughter of Lancaster county, and also of German ancestry, he reared a family of sixteen children, four daughters and twelve sons, of whom Henry is fourth, and the third in the family to bear the name. In 1855 the father moved from Pennsylvania to Stephenson county, Ill., where he bought a farm and remained for many years, locating in the town of Freeport, Ill., two years before his death, in 1874. His wife survived him until 1893, attaining the age of eighty-five years. She was born in 1808.

His father removing from Lancaster to Center county, Pa., Henry Flickinger attended the district schools as opportunity offered, and at an early age learned the tanner's trade of his sire. He was a strong and industrious lad, and ambitious withal, for when twenty years old he left home and started out to battle with the world independent of either money or influence. The little which he had earned on the home farm was expended for a ticket from New York to San Francisco via Panama, and the trip thither had all of the charm and novelty usual to one who had seen little of the world. Arriving in San Francisco May 8, 1850, he went at once to the mines of Eldorado county, Cal., and met with better success than falls to the majority who stake their all on the prospects of mining. In the fall of 1851 he came by pack-horses over the mountains from Yreka to Salem, Ore., reaching the latter town October 18. Observing the absence of fresh meat in the mines, he thought that to take cattle down there would be a paying investment. Having purchased his cattle, he returned to California, and was so successful in disposing of them that he continued in the business for three or four years.

In 1856 Mr. Flickinger married Martha N. Pyburn, a native of Jackson county, Mo., and daughter of Edwin Pyburn, who crossed the plains in 1852. With his wife, Mr. Flickinger located on his present farm of two hundred and nine acres, where he engaged in general farming, stock and grain-raising, and succeeded beyond the average farmer. Some time ago he handed the management of the firm over to his son-in-law, H. Maxfield, who married his third child, Lilie. Of the other four children, Caroline is the widow of Lyman Maxfield, of Corvallis, Ore.; Annie is the wife of Frank Brown, of Airlie, Polk county; and Elizabeth is the wife of James Dalton, of Burns, Harney county, and the eldest, Alfred, resides near Suver. Mrs. Flickinger died at the family home on December 24, 1873, at the age of thirty-three years. Mr. Flickinger cast his first presidential vote for a Republican candidate, and has since given that party his stanch support. Although in no sense an office-seeker, he has served as school director and road supervisor, and worked for the advancement of his friends. The Flickinger family was well represented in the Civil war, for Oliver, Charles and William, brothers of Henry, served all through the contest, and as a result of wounds received Oliver died in Linn county, Ore., in 1898. Mr. Flickinger has the respect and good will of the community, towards the development of which he has earnestly striven, and in his character, attainments and general substantiality is worthy of emulation by younger generations.

MARTIN PARIS FRUIT. Although comparatively speaking the livery business of M. P. Fruit is a recent venture in Corvallis, having been started in 1900, the size of the patronage accorded it, and the many-sided excellence of its equipment and management would suggest an enterprise of many years' standing. The Brick Stables are the result of the consolidation of the Egglin stables, bought by Mr. Fruit, and the stables of Mr. McMahan, at present the partner and half-owner of the livery business, and they are maintaining one of the finest livery establishments to be found anywhere in the country.

A native son of the Golden West, Mr. Fruit was born at Hellsboro, Sonoma county, Cal., February 13, 1862, and is of German-Scotch descent. His father, Peter, was born in Indiana, where he lived on a farm, and from where he came to California in the historic year of '49. After experimenting in the mines of California for a time he settled down to horticulture near the Red Bluff, and he was the first in his vicinity to set out peaches, apricots and small fruits. He had a fine orchard, which he eventually disposed of, and engaged in the wholesale fruit business in Hellsboro. In 1867 he removed to Oregon, and for some time engaged in the stock business at Brownsville, at present making his home on a farm three miles from Crawfordsville, where he is living, at the age of seventy-seven years. During the Rogue river war he acted in the capacity of guard at the fort. His wife, formerly Martha Teeters, was born in Scotland, a daughter of Henry Teeters, who settled in Oregon City in 1849. Mr. Teeters was a stock man in this state, an occupation which he continued after removing to California, and settling at Red Bluff. His death was a tragic one, and resulted from falling from a horse. He is survived by his wife, who is the mother of eleven children, six of whom are living.

The third in his father's family, the liveryman of Corvallis lived in California until 1867, and then accompanied the family to Oregon, driving with horses over the mountains. He attended the public schools at Brownsville, Linn county, and when fifteen years of age found employment in the warehouse at Halsey, the same county. For seven years he was associated in a business capacity with T. J. Black, and finally resigned his position to engage in farming on the old Wilson place near Halsey. Here he remained for seven years, making quite a profit out of the fertile farm, and at the expiration of that time bought a farm of two hundred and thirteen acres five miles south of Brownsville, and at the foot of the Twin Buttes. Here he lived and prospered until 1900, when he rented his farm, moved to Corvallis, and engaged in his present lucrative and successful livery business. In Linn county, Mr. Fruit was united in marriage with Emiline Michaels, a native of the county, and who has become the mother of three children: Eli Victor, George Henry and Glenn. Mr. Fruit is a member of the Grangers and the United Artisans, while the family is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

HENDERSON SIMPSON. Another name to be mentioned among those of the early pioneers from the Mississippi valley is Henderson Simpson, who came to Oregon in 1845, in company with his parents, growing to manhood among the privations incident to the life of the first settlers in a new country. He is now retired from the active duties of life and makes his home upon the ranch which he purchased near Airlie, Polk county.

The father of Henderson Simpson, Rice W., was born in Tennessee, reared in Alabama, and on attaining manhood he removed to Arkansas. In 1845 he followed the example of the many other inhabitants of the Mississippi valley and sought a home in the west, crossing the plains by the route known as the Meeks cut-off, the greatest difficulty experienced on the journey being the lack of water. During the winter of 1845-6 he made a home for his family on Tualatin plains, after which he located near Luckiamute, Polk county, where he remained for one year. In 1847 he removed to Washington, locating seventeen miles above Vancouver, on the Columbia river, his removal from this place being brought about by the report of the discovery of gold in California, whither he repaired in 1849 and engaged in the life of a miner. Returning in the fall of the same year he purchased, in the spring of 1850, a ranch of six hundred and forty acres on the Luckiamute and near Airlie, Polk county, for the sum of $200. On this land he established a comfortable home, and as the years have passed by and land increased in worth it has become a valuable piece of property. The remaining years of his life were spent upon this farm, his death occurring in 1882 at the age of seventy-five years. His wife, Rebecca, also a native of Tennessee, died here in 1863, at the age of fifty-four years. She was the mother of nine children, six sons and three daughters.

The second oldest of this family of children was Henderson Simpson, who was born in Franklin county, Ark., January 30, 1841, and made the trip across the plains at the youthful age of four years. To the extent permitted by circumstances he attended the district schools in the neighborhood of his home, in his boyhood years, being trained to the useful and practical life of a farmer. Some time previous to his twentieth birthday he was engaged in farming and stock-raising, and at that age he went to Montana and was employed as a miner, after which he tried life in the sunny clime of California. For a brief period of his life he lived in Umpqua valley, and for one year in Tillamook county. In 1883 he went into the logging business, on Luckiamute river, from which he has reaped the fruits of a laborious life, being interested in log contracting. In addition to his home ranch he owns eighty acres located on Ritner creek, which has not, however, been improved.

Mr. Simpson was married in Airlie to Miss Martha Faulkenberry, a native of Arkansas, whose father, Hugh, of Tennessee, started from Arkansas in 1853 to Oregon, and died while on the way. He was buried near the present site of Denver. Mrs. Simpson's mother was Sarah Esteš, also of Tennessee, and she ended her widowhood by becoming the wife of William Sebring, who is now deceased. He was born in Ohio and crossed the plains in 1844 and located in the Willamette valley. To Mr. and Mrs. Simpson were born the following children: Jefferson and Hugh, deceased; Phy, a sketch of whose life appears elsewhere in this work; David H., engaged in farming and logging near Pedee, Ore.; Lelia now Mrs. Hugh Hanna, of Independence, Ore.; Fain, engaged in the logging camp; and one child who died in infancy. Mr. Simpson is a Democrat as to his political preferment, and religiously is a member of the Evangelical Church at Pedee.

JOHN REDMOND. Few men in Oregon have done as much for the development of the stock-raising industry as has John Redmond, and for this he deserves credit, as the man who improves the grade of stock thereby advances prices and the entire agricultural community profits in consequence. More than forty years have passed since Mr. Redmond came to this state, and he has therefore been a witness of the greater part of its growth and development. He was born in Ontario, Canada, August 26, 1839, upon the family homestead, about twelve miles southwest of Hamilton. He is descended from a prominent family of Ireland, and the two Redmonds who are members of parliament from the Emerald Isle, are own cousins of our subject. His grandfather, John Redmond, was a farmer, and spent his entire life in Ireland. William Redmond, the father, was born in Wexford, Ireland, and he, too, followed agricultural pursuits. When a young man he went to Canada, settling first in Goderich, but afterward purchasing his farm near Hamilton. That was then a new country, and in the midst of the forests he hewed out his home. He assisted in erecting the first three houses in Hamilton, and devoted his energies to the cultivation of the land, which he had secured from the government, until he had transformed it into a fine farm. He wedded Margaret Buckley, who was born in Newfoundland, a daughter of Daniel Buckley, whose birth occurred in Dublin, Ireland, and who served in the English army. On crossing the Atlantic to Canada, the vessel in which he sailed was shipwrecked off the coast of Newfoundland. For a time he remained in that country, and then took up his abode near Hamilton. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Redmond was blessed with four sons and two daughters, and with the exception of one son, all are living. These are John; Daniel, who came to Oregon, but of whom nothing has been heard for some time; Francis William, of McMinnville; Charles Wesley, of Hillsboro, this state, and Margaret and Mary Ann Smith. The father passed away in the year 1865, and the mother's death occurred in McMinnville. They held membership in the Episcopal Church.

John Redmond, of this review, early manifested the trait of character which has shaped his business career—his love of horses. He was reared upon the home farm in his native country, and when not engaged with the duties of the school, assisted in the labors of the fields, or the care of the stock. In 1862, when twenty-three years of age, he started for Oregon, making his way to New York, where he took passage on the vessel North Star, bound for Panama. Thence he sailed on the San Diego de Cuba to San Francisco, and from there proceeded by steamer to Portland, where he took up his abode. In Canada he had learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed in Portland for a year, after which he made his way to the mines in the Boise basin of Idaho, engaging in prospecting and mining for five years. In 1867 he returned to Canada by way of the Nicaragua route to New York, and thence to his old home. He purchased a farm in the vicinity of the old family home near Hamilton, where he carried on agricultural pursuits for five years, but he had become attached to the west, and about 1873 he sold his property in the Dominion and returned to Oregon, going by rail to San Francisco. For a time he followed the carpenter's trade in Portland, and in 1874 came to Yamhill county and purchased his present farm of three hundred and twenty acres, three miles southwest of McMinnville. He now has three hundred and forty acres, and for almost thirty years he has continuously carried on general farming and stock-raising here. He was the first man to raise standard-bred horses. In 1878 he returned to Goshen, Orange county, N. Y., where he purchased three stallions, which he shipped to the coast, being among the first standard-bred stallions brought to Oregon. They were Kisbar, sired by Rysdeck Hambletonian; Durock Prince, by Messenger Durock Hambletonian; and Rockwood, by Truesdall Hambletonian. Mr. Redmond owned these stallions several years, and he has done much to improve the grade of stock in Oregon, raising many fine horses here. In 1899, however, he left his farm, and took up his abode in McMinnville, where he now makes his home.

Mrs. Redmond was born in Scotland, and died in Yamhill county, leaving three children: Wesley, Mina and Roy. In his fraternal relations Mr. Redmond is a Mason, belonging to Union Lodge No. 43, F. & A. M., of which he is a past master; Taylor Chapter No. 16, R. A. M., of which he is a past high priest; Hodson Council No. 1, R. & S. M.; Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T.; Al Kader Temple, N. M. S.; and the Oregon Order of the High Priesthood. He is likewise connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. For forty years he was a member of the Episcopal Church, but as there was no congregation of that denomination in McMinnville he is now connected with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. His political support is given to the Republican party. Mr. Redmond is a high-minded and liberal man, prominent in public affairs, and all recognize his devotion to the best interests of his adopted county and state.

ALPHONSO WEBSTER STANARD.

Owning and occupying one of the pleasantest and most desirable homesteads of Linn county is A. W. Stanard, of Brownsville, who is distinguished not only as one of the original settlers of this section of the county, but as a veteran of the Rogue River Indian war. His land is under a high state of cultivation, and, with its comfortable and convenient farm buildings and their neat and tasteful surroundings, invariably attracts the attention of the passer-by, and bears speaking evidence of the thrift and good management of the proprietor. He comes of a New England family of worth and stability, and was born April 24, 1829, in Newport, N. H., the home of many of his ancestors.

Removing with his parents to Van Buren county, Iowa, when a lad of seven years, Mr. Stanard was brought up on the farm which his father bought, and was educated in the common schools. During the winter of 1851 and 1852 he taught school near the town of Bonaparte, Iowa. In the spring, impelled by the restless American spirit that led so many to seek new locations in the wild lands of this section of the Union, he started for Oregon. Joining Claybourn Hill's train, he drove an ox-team across the plains, being six months on the way, before he reached Linn county. The trip was an eventful one for him, as during the journey he fell in love with Mr. Hill's daughter, Eliza J. Hill, wooing her so earnestly that he won her love in return, and, having gained the consent of her father, married her in the fall of 1852, soon after their arrival in Oregon. Taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in November, 1852, Mr. Stanard erected a one-room log house, in which he and his bride set up housekeeping. Clearing and improving a homestead, he carried on general farming most successfully, in the course of time erecting his present residence, and other necessary buildings. With the exception of two years, from 1866 until 1868, when he served as county clerk of Linn county, and the following three years, when he was engaged in mercantile business in Albany, and where, in 1868, he was elected representative to the state legislature as the nominee of the Democratic party, and in 1870 re-elected, serving two terms, Mr. Stanard has devoted his entire attention to agricultural pursuits, becoming exceedingly prosperous in his operations. A man of practical judgment and executive ability, he served as mayor of Albany during two of the five years that he resided in that city, rendering efficient service while filling that office.

During the Indian troubles of 1855 and 1856, Mr. Stanard enlisted, in the fall of 1855, in Captain Keeney's company, Second Regiment of the Oregon Mounted Volunteers, and was elected first lieutenant of his company by his comrades. After serving three months in the Rogue River campaign, he was discharged, and returned to his home. Re-enlisting in the spring of 1856 in the same regiment, he was made orderly sergeant of Captain Blakeley's company, and again spent three months in the Rogue River country, serving as long as his services were needed.

In 1854 Mr. Stanard's first wife died, leaving his hearthstone desolate. Two years later, in the fall of 1856, Mr. Stanard married Elizabeth Hill, a sister of his first wife. Of his first union one child was born, named Melissa, who is deceased. By his second marriage there were ten children, three of whom have passed away: Clara, Frederick and Bert. Those living are William Obed, Charles Edwin, George Claybourn, Harvey Alfred, Frank Coleman, Idilla, wife of A. S. McDonald of The Dalles, and Minnie, living at home. Politically Mr. Stanard was for many years an adherent of the Democratic party, but is now a sturdy supporter of the principles of the Prohibition party, which in 1902 nominated him for the state legislature. He is a consistent member of the Baptist Church, with which he has been identified for fifty-one years, and in which he has served as clerk and deacon for many years. Mr. Stanard is a brother of E. O. Stanard of St. Louis, who was at one time lieutenant governor of Missouri and served as representative in congress from that state. He is one of the best known residents of St. Louis, where he has extensive milling interests.

ADDISON P. BLACKBURN. Two and a half miles east of Plainview lives Addison P. Blackburn, owner of a farm of four hundred acres in the valley, and of four hundred acres in the mountains. An inspection of this property is both interesting and instructive, for the owner, a self-made man in the truest and fullest sense of the word, is a keen appreciator of country life, and brings to his aid those scientific and modern devices which distinguish the successful and progressive from the conservative and less ambitious farmer.

Born in Clinton, Monroe county, Mo., May 12, 1844, a son of Robert and Salissa (Pollard) Blackburn Mr. Blackburn was educated in the public schools, and was reared in a family where industry and moral rectitude were of prime importance. His uneventful youth welcomed the outbreak of the Civil war as an opportunity in which to try his mettle, and with the first call to arms he enlisted in September, 1861, under General Price, with whom he afterward served as orderly, and whose banner he followed until defeat overcame the brave little band. After six months in the field Mr. Blackburn located on a farm in Hancock county, Ill., where he met and married, July 3, 1864, Arabella Woodworth, daughter of Hiram and Polly (Glenn) Woodworth. Two years later he moved back to Missouri and settled in Saline county, purchasing the farm upon which he lived until 1877. The same year he came to Oregon and spent several months in investigating different parts of the state, finally settling on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres in Linn county. Purchasing his present home farm in 1883 he lived thereon until 1898, in which year he moved to Lebanon, remained four years, and then returned to the old place. On his home and mountain farm he raises large numbers of high-grade cattle and sheep, and is unquestionably one of the best judges of stock in the county.

Executive ability has made of Mr. Blackburn a welcome addition to the social, political and business element of the county, and few efforts at advancement but receive his stamp of approval or are aided by his practical assistance. For many years he has been prominent among the Odd Fellows, and is a member of Lebanon Lodge No. 47, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is noble grand and treasurer, and which he represented at the Grand Lodge in 1902. Mr. Blackburn has been a member of the Presbyterian church since his youth, has invariably supported it with his means and active interest, and has been an elder in the church for many years. He is a man of strict integrity and upright character, and his place among the upbuilders of this section is an assured one. To him and his wife ten children have been born, named as follows in the order of their birth: Luella, deceased, wife of H. E. Heller of Pendleton, Ore.; Lester, of Umatilla county, Ore.; Jennie, wife of Edgar Nichols of Lebanon, Ore.; Horace Eli, of Brownsville, Ore.; Minnie, wife of L. H. Fletcher of Lebanon, Ore.; Charles, deceased; John, of Pilot Rock, Umatilla county, Ore.; Walter, Edith and Ethel, all residing with their parents.

WILLIAM M. DAVIDSON. The landed possessions of William M. Davidson in Linn county include the home farm of three hundred and seventy acres, where he is engaged in general farming, and a foot-hill farm of four hundred and eighty acres where he raises large numbers of stock. The home farm has all those aids to scientific and modern farming and to up-to-date and comfortable living, which distinguish the progressive farmer. His dwelling, barns, fences, shrubbery, plants, trees, and general adornments, constitute a beautiful as well as productive possession.

The early life of this substantial and popular farmer was passed in Fulton county, Ind., where he was born April 8, 1845, a son of Henry and Sarah (Montgomery) Davidson, natives of Ohio, and born respectively May 28, 1818, and December 27, 1824. Of Scotch-Irish descent, Henry Davidson inherited the thrift and resource of this combined ancestry, and made a corresponding success of his life. As a young man twenty-one years of age he left home and went to Fulton county, Ind., where he began farming for himself, and married in 1841 and remained there until 1852, when he came to Oregon, thereafter settling the first winter on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres three miles north of Halsey. In 1876 he moved into the town of Halsey, retired permanently from active life, and died in 1894, being survived by his wife, who still makes Halsey her home. William M. is the second in order of birth of the four children in the family, Mrs. H. M. Murphy, the oldest daughter, being a resident of Independence, Ore.; Theodora, living near Eugene in Lane county; and Mary, the wife of R. Cunningham, living in Lebanon, Linn county.

His father's success and his own industry permitted of more than the average education for William Davidson, and from the public schools he went to the Christian College at Monmouth, which he attended during the seasons of 1863-64. Leaving college he went to eastern Oregon and engaged in stock-raising. In 1866 he returned to Linn county and the following year bought a place two miles and a half east of Harrisburg, remaining thereon until the fall of 1874. He then sold his farm and bought his present home five miles east of Harrisburg, which he has since converted into one of the very valuable and desirable properties in this county. In June, 1867, Mr. Davidson married Rosetta Morris, who was born in Missouri, October 24, 1848, a daughter of George G. Morris, who crossed the plains in 1853, and settled two miles southwest of Harrisburg. Of the eight children born of this union six are living, Clara, the oldest daughter, being the wife of Clyde McCoy of Harrisburg; Bruce H. is living at home; Elsie is the wife of George Pugh of Brownsville, Ore.; John H. is a resident of Rowland, Ore.; Oril E. is a citizen of Corvallis, Ore.; and Lydia is living at home. Mr. Davidson is a Republican in political affiliation, and has served acceptably as school director and clerk for a number of years. He is a member and active worker in the Christian Church, and is at present a deacon. He is one of the broad-minded and liberal farmers of this vicinity, and numbers his friends and well-wishers by the score.

WINFIELD S. GARDNER. The old-time photographer, with his genius for exact imitation, and his appalling ignorance of light, shade and color effects, has long since been relegated to the limbo of things obsolete. In his place has arisen a successor who, in his best form, is something more than a reproducer, and who oftentimes has at his command more resources than has the painter or sculptor. More and more is photography regarded as an all-important and distinct art in itself, and its proper and most successful practice demands of its devotees a spirit and ability in harmony with its own infinite possibilities. W. S. Gardner, of Corvallis, is credited with being an especially keen appreciator of his art, and the work so zealously prosecuted in his modern and well-equipped studios bespeaks the mind and heart not entirely given over to the money-making phase of his calling. Though making a specialty of his college trade, which in itself constitutes a liberal yearly income, Mr. Gardner has done much to perpetuate the beauties of nature found in this valley, and his photographs and views find their way to all parts of the world, and are admired as specimens of the highest development in photographic reproduction.

A native of Tioga county, Pa., Mr. Gardner was born November 30, 1863, his father, Thomas, being a native of New York state. A carpenter and builder by trade, the father brought his family to Oregon in the fall of 1876, settling in Salem, where he plied his trade up to the time of his death, June 10, 1885. His wife, formerly Sarah Cornelia Cole, and who is now living in California, is the mother of five children, all of whom are living, three being in California and two in Oregon, W. S. being the second child; Arthur is a plumber, in Sebastapol, Cal.; Capitola is the wife of John Hulburt, of Benton county; Van Ness lives in the vicinity of Santa Rosa, Cal., and is engaged in horticulture; and May is Mrs. Homer Donten, of Woodland, Cal.

Thirteen years of age when the family fortunes were shifted to the northwest, W. S. Gardner had the advantages of the public schools of both Pennsylvania and Oregon, and when fifteen years of age, in 1878, began to look around for a means of livelihood. Realizing that congenial work means successful, and having an artistic and high-strung nature, he seemed to see in a dim sort of way the possibilities which opened before the student of photography. Accordingly, he began to study with W. P. Johnson, of Salem, and in the capacity of apprentice and assistant remained with this prominent artist for about nine years. As may be imagined, he was a real student of the art, constantly seeking development in his chosen calling, and became an expert in his profession, devoting all of his time to improving himself and keeping pace with the times. Coming to Corvallis in 1887, he inaugurated the business in which he has since been engaged, and for the accommodation of which and to house his family, he has built one of the really fine residences in the town. The second floor is devoted to the studio, and a large suite of rooms constitutes the gallery and reception rooms.

In Corvallis Mr. Gardner married Louisa I. Hurlburt, a native of Benton county, and a daughter of Riley A. Hurlburt, a native of Huron county, Ohio. Mr. Hurlburt was born November 26, 1830, a son of Abel Hurlburt, the latter born in New York state. The grandfather, Abel, was a blacksmith by trade, and at an early day settled in Huron county, Ohio, moving later to Kalamazoo county, Mich. Still later he settled in Chariton county, Mo., where he worked at coopering and blacksmithing. In 1851 he brought his family to Oregon, settling first on a donation claim in Benton county, where he farmed, and from where he removed to near Sheridan, Yamhill county. Here his death occurred at an advanced age, his wife, Anna (Reed) Hurlburt, having died in Benton county. Of their seven children but two are living. With Abel Hurlburt to Oregon came his son, Riley A., then twenty-one years of age, and very useful in helping to drive the oxen and care for the loose stock. Riley A. located on a claim of one hundred and sixty acres in Benton county, where he lived for four years, and then bought a farm on the river. From time to time he added to his land, and now owns eleven hundred acres, all in Benton county. He was successful in the west, and reared in comfort his large family of nine children. In Benton county he married Sophia Whittaker, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Jacob Whittaker, a stonemason by trade, who brought his wife and children overland in 1852. He settled on a farm in Benton county, but eventually retired to Corvallis, where his death occurred, being survived by his wife. Of the children born to Riley A. Hurlburt and wife, Mary Ann is now Mrs. Wrenn, of California; John T. is living on the old home farm; George F. is in Utah, and engaged in mining; Louisa is Mrs. Gardner, of Corvallis; Jane is Mrs. Caton, of eastern Oregon; Seth is engaged in mining in Utah; Margaret is now Mrs. Smith, of St. Louis, Mo.; Fannie is Mrs. James Mace, of Portland; and Jacob is a farmer in Benton county.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Gardner, Edna and Viola. Fraternaly Mr. Gardner holds membership with the Woodmen of the World. Mr. Gardner is a member and deacon of the Baptist Church, and is ex-superintendent of the Sunday school. He is a man of high moral principle and pronounced public-spiritedness, and his place in the business and social world of Corvallis is an enviable one.

AMOS SMITH GLEASON. The agricultural interests of Marion county are well represented by Amos S. Gleason, who is the owner of a fine farm of three hundred and twenty acres situated one and one-half miles south of Hubbard, one hundred and thirty acres being under cultivation and the balance used for pasturage. Aside from general farming Mr. Gleason makes a specialty of Shorthorn cattle, and of these he has some of the finest on the Pacific coast. He also conducts a dairy and is very successful in this line. From his youth up Mr. Gleason has had a predilection for the occupation he has always followed, and at the age of twenty he started out to make his own way in the world. That he has achieved success is indicated by the prosperous condition of his farm, the many improvements he has added to it, and the fact that he has acquired an independent fortune. All this is due to the fact that his aim was high, that whatever he undertook he carried forward to completion, and that he considered anything he did worth doing well.

The early history of Amos S. Gleason is that of the average farmer lad. His birthplace was Ripley county, Ind., near Milan, the date of his birth October 13, 1832. He is a son of Parson and Mary A. (Smith) Gleason, the former a native of Vermont, born August 2, 1799; the latter born in Connecticut in the year 1798. The parents started housekeeping in Indiana, making that state their home until 1851. The father had removed from Vermont to Indiana when he was twenty-one, and through frugality and economy had accumulated sufficient money to purchase a farm, on which he lived with his family until the year above mentioned, when they crossed the plains, coming direct to Clackamas county. They were five months on the way, and the journey was made with ox-teams, without anything of importance occurring on the way except that they could not fail to be impressed with the grandeur of the scenery, when they reached the mountains, and the broad, almost interminable stretch of the plains with scarcely anything to relieve the eye over that vast territory. Mr. Gleason, Sr., took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of land on the present site of the town of Needy. The Gleasons were pioneers in this locality, the work of civilization having been scarcely begun at that time. The land was all wild and unimproved, and Mr. Gleason set about making a home for himself and family. He built a hewed log house in which the family resided for about four years, when they removed to a farm on Pudding river, three miles east of Hubbard, remaining there until the death of the parents. In this family were twelve children, of whom three are now living: Aaron B., of Hubbard; Amos S., of this review; and Irving E., of Benton county, Ore. The father of this family lived to be over ninety years of age, while the mother passed away at the age of eighty-three. They were faithful and earnest members of the United Brethren church and were the principal promoters and builders of Hopewell Church. Mr. Gleason was an ardent and active politician, taking an active part in political matters, and ever voting with the Republican party. He was a farmer all his life and also conducted a dairy.

Amos S. Gleason received his preliminary education in the district schools of his native county, and later pursued a course in the university at Salem, afterward teaching school for about seven years. December 29, 1859, he was married to Jane Amanda Johnson, who was born in Illinois and came with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Neil Johnson, to Oregon in 1851, settling near Woodburn. After their marriage the young couple established their first home on Butte creek, six miles north of Silverton. One child was born of their union, Jane Amanda, the wife of Herod Choate, of Clackamas county. In 1861 Mr. Gleason was called upon to mourn the loss of his wife. He afterward married Miss Elizabeth J. White, who was born in Callaway county, Mo., and with her parents came to Oregon in 1852. Her family history is given elsewhere in this volume, in connection with the life record of her brother. Mr. and Mrs. Gleason continued to reside on Butte creek until they removed to their present home. In the meantime he was engaged in the sawmill business in Marion and Yamhill counties for about eight years. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Gleason has been blessed with four children: Effie, wife of H. C. Moon, of Woodburn; Sarah V., wife of S. T. Loudon, of Aumsville; Nina A., at home; and Arthur A., deceased.

February 22, 1856, Mr. Gleason enlisted in Company E, First Regiment Oregon Mounted Volunteers, under Capt. William A. Cason, and was mustered in at Oregon City for service in the Indian wars. The troops were sent east of the mountains to protect the emigrants from the Indians and outlaws which infested the region at that period. Mr. Gleason served for one hundred days, during which time his company had no severe engagement. His duty having been performed, he returned to his home and took up the work of the home farm. He has also served as road supervisor, justice of the peace and as a member of the school board. In every respect his public service has met with the approval of the people, and he stands high in his community as an advocate of good roads, good schools, and law and order. In politics he is an earnest Republican, while his religious views are indicated by his membership in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

To say that Mr. Gleason is a man of practical ideas, broad-minded and liberal in his views, and of the highest integrity of character, is but doing him simple justice. He takes pleasure in fulfilling the duties of his daily life, and casts his influence on the side of progress and general advancement.

MOSES PARKER. No pioneer resident of Linn county has more substantially aided in the development of its agricultural and other resources than Moses Parker, who has been a resident of this portion of Oregon ever since 1852, and who, in 1855, bought the second threshing machine in the county, and has ever since operated some one of these necessary machines. True, the old time lumbering, wheezing, and unreliable thresher has been many times supplanted by more modern innovations, steam has taken the place of horse power, and expediency in the disposal of the grain has left far in arrears the slow and laborious pioneer methods. While his fellow-agriculturists were struggling with the old-time cradle, gathering the golden grain into small bundles, and depositing it at intervals in rows in the field, this energetic and progressive tiller of the soil brought a reaper into the county, the first to arouse the curiosity of field laborers here, and a subject of endless investigation and discussion. Criticism soon gave way to praise, and others followed the example of progress set by their honored compatriot. To equal extent but in different directions Mr. Parker has fostered advancement in other fields, supporting with his influence and practical assistance schools, road building, good government, and humanitarian projects for the uplifting of the people.

The earliest years of Mr. Parker were spent on a farm in Ross county, Ohio, where he was born November 4, 1830, remaining there until the family removal to Burlington, Iowa, in 1845. The ambitious lad saw beyond the borders of the paternal farm, with its ceaseless drudgery and small remuneration, and at the age of seventeen, in 1847, he went to Burlington and learned the carpenter's trade. Becoming a journeyman carpenter, he worked faithfully and lived economically, hoping all the time for better things, and finally coming to believe that he would find them in the west of which he had heard so much. In 1852 the opportunity came to him, and with his brother Allen he outfitted with a wagon and four yoke of oxen, crossing the plains without any extraordinary happening.

In the fall of 1852 Mr. Parker took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres on the Santiam river, in Linn county, Ore., three miles north of Lebanon, and while his summers were devoted to his trade, for which he found great demand, his winters were spent on the farm. After living alone until 1856, he married Mary C. Humphreys, and thereafter continued on the farm until selling out in 1858. Mr. Parker then bought his present farm of three hundred and twenty acres, and with the exception of three years in Sweet Home valley, he has since made this his home, and not only farmed and raised stock, but has assisted neighboring farmers with his threshing machine with the coming of every harvest. He has added to his land and now owns four hundred and eighty acres, all in the valley, wheat and stock comprising his principal source of revenue. In the early days he met many obstructions to his progress, the Indians proving at times very troublesome. During the war of 1856 he enlisted in the Second Oregon Mounted Cavalry, and saw service in the Walla Walla country, taking part in many of the principal battles and skirmishes in that memorable contest.

In political affiliation Mr. Parker is a Democrat, but he has never desired office. He is sociable in the extreme, a very pleasant and genial man to meet, and one who is inclined to look on the bright side of life. He is connected with the Grange, and has greatly advanced the best interests of that helpful institution, and is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Parker, of whom the oldest son, Perry P., lives near his father; Lewis T. is a resident of Portland; Hiram is a farmer in this vicinity; William E. lives in the vicinity of the home place and is operating a threshing machine; while Annie, Mary A., John and Allen are deceased.

GEORGE R. FARRA, M. D. In 1877 Dr. George R. Farra came to Corvallis, established an office in a modest and unassuming way, and from a small beginning long ago became an important figure in professional circles in Benton county. Nor have his efforts been confined to a large practice, for his pronounced business and executive ability have resulted in a position of equal prominence as a promoter and financier. From a childhood containing little of the joy or expectancy of life the doctor has evolved single-handed his present success. He was born on a farm in Woodford county, Ky., September 13, 1843, a son of John R. and Martha J. Farra, natives of the Blue Grass state, and of German and Scotch ancestry, respectively. The parents were married July 30, 1840, thereafter continuing to live in their native state until 1847, removing then to Platte county, Mo., where the father died September 9, 1852, his wife afterward re-marrying.

Dr. Farra was nine years of age when his father died, and this loss in the family was a severe blow to the growing and ambitious boy. He was required to work hard to promote the general support, and his education was sadly neglected, a deficiency which he was not slow to realize after reaching years of discretion. His first insight into regular business was acquired in a grocery store in Humboldt, Allen county, Kans., where he remained for two years, and for the following two years was interested in the drug business in Platte county, Mo. In the meantime he had been reading medicine under a well known physician and surgeon of Platte county, Dr. W. P. Moore, and during 1875 entered the medical department of the University of Louisville, from which he was duly graduated in 1877, having completed the course in a remarkably short time. After a short practice in Louisville he came to Corvallis, where he has since rendered himself indispensable to hundreds of families in this county. Many things have contributed to his successful practice, not the least of which is an agreeable and optimistic manner, and the ability to keep abreast of the progress of medical and surgical science. In this connection he has for many years been a member of the Oregon State Medical Society.

The doctor is not only a large stock-holder in many of the important enterprises of Corvallis and vicinity, but has been the chief promoter and instigator of many of them. From the time of its incorporation in 1885, he has taken a keen interest in the Corvallis Water Company, of which he is the president and chief stockholder, and which owes its present prosperity to his far-sighted management and progressive methods. He is a director of the old Oregon & Pacific Railroad Company, now the Corvallis & Eastern, and of the Willamette Land & Loan Association, the latter incorporated in 1889. While living in Corvallis Dr. Farra has built two residences, the latter, built in 1903, being by far the finest in the town. He married in Platte county, Mo., February 9, 1873, Anna Hamilton, a native of Missouri, who became the mother of two children, both of whom are deceased. Dr. Farra is a staunch upholder of the Democratic party, but has never worked for or desired official positions. However, he has been a member of the city council, and has served as county physician. He was for several terms a member of the pension board. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he was examining physician for many years; the Woodmen of the World, of which he is a charter member and the examining physician. He is also a member of the Blue Lodge of Masons.

FRED BENTS. One of three brothers who have made a signal success in the cultivation of hops in the state of Oregon is Fred Bents, whose birth occurred in Platte county, Kans., April 13, 1855. His parents were natives of Switzerland, his father, Henry, being born on a farm in that country, where he was reared, and in manhood married Anna Bosshard, with whom he emigrated to the United States in 1854. The journey was not an uneventful one to this young Swiss family, their first venture into the world being shadowed by a perilous sea-voyage, the sailing vessel on which they came springing a leak in mid-ocean; and the sad death of their first child, which occurred upon the trip. Six weeks from the date of sailing the vessel anchored in New York harbor, but the young people were not satisfied to make this their home, having heard many glowing accounts of the rich farming lands of the Mississippi valley, and toward that location they continued their journey.

Settling in the eastern part of Kansas, Mr. Bents took up a homestead, where he remained farming until 1863, at that time losing his home and all the improvements which he had put upon it through a defective title. Nothing daunted by the misfortunes which had attended him he decided to seek a home still farther in the west, starting in this last-named year for Oregon, with four oxen drawing the wagon which contained his worldly possessions. Six months later the little party reached their destination, settling first in Marion county on the claim of Barney Eberhard, where they remained until 1864, when Mr. Bents bought the farm of three hundred acres which is now in the hands of his children. He paid but $500 for the entire tract, which at that time was a wilderness of brush and timber. He bought the land of John Scheurer, giving him $100 for the first payment, in addition to the remaining ox of the four with which he had commenced the journey. In later days Mr. Scheurer proved a valuable friend to this pioneer family, assisting the father in many ways to gain a competency for his family. Upon his farm Mr. Bents at once built a cabin of hewed logs, which consisted of two rooms, the entire building being only 16x16 feet, and in this the family found shelter for many years, going out from this humble home each morning with the pioneer's determination to win an honorable place in this new state. Mr. Bents died June 20, 1869, at the early age of forty years; a successful man, financially and socially, and his death meant a personal loss to the community. His wife survived him many years, her death occurring February 20, 1890, at the age of sixty-four years. They were both consistent members of the Lutheran Church. Of their children all but one were born in the United States, those living being as follows: Fred, of this review; Edward, located in Salem; William, a farmer and hop-grower on a part of the home farm; and Henry L., also on a part of the home farm.

On the death of his father, Fred Bents, the oldest of the sons and then only fifteen years of age, took entire charge of the farm, which he conducted with remarkable skill until 1881, when he left the conservative lines of the general farmer and undertook the cultivation of a five-acre field of hops. Meeting with gratifying success he gradually increased the number of acres until, with the interests of his two brothers, William and Henry L., he has nearly seventy acres devoted to its cultivation. In 1902 he alone raised twenty-seven thousand, four hundred and fifty-three pounds of hops. In partnership with these same brothers Fred Bents owns the original three hundred acres purchased by their father, and upon his share of the same in 1887 he put some handsome improvements in the line of buildings, etc., and moved to the present location of his home. He has a finely improved farm one and one-half miles from Butteville, Marion county.

The marriage of Mr. Bents occurred April 3, 1885, and united him with Minnie Byland, a native of Linn county, Ore. Four children have been born of this union, named as follows: Mary, William, Clarence and Hattie.

In politics Mr. Bents is a Republican. Fraternally he is a member of Champoeg Lodge No. 27, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and of the United Artisans. He is known as one of the liberal-minded, progressive citizens of the county, and actively interested in promoting its welfare whenever the opportunity to do so presents itself.

WALTER HUSTON. It is a far step from the educational life in the early days of Virginia to agricultural pursuits in the lands of Oregon, but it is not an exaggerated one, and it may be possible that Walter Huston owes his intelligent and progressive labors to that ancestor, Archibald Huston, who was one of the educators in the state upon the Atlantic coast, where the grandfather, Walter Huston, was born, his Irish ancestry transmitting sturdy, steady virtues which have made their influence felt among various scenes and at different crises of the country's history. A well known member of this family and one whose history is indelibly associated with that of the country to the southwest, is Gen. Sam. Houston, the cousin of the grandfather of Walter Huston.

The father, J. B. Huston, was born near Nashville, Tenn., December 22, 1810, and when a young man went to Henderson county, Ill., there engaging in farming as one of the early settlers of that part of the country. A year after his settlement there he returned to his home in Tennessee, and while there married Katherine Huston, who was born in 1811, near the same location in which Mr. Huston first saw the light of day. They removed to Illinois, where they remained pleasantly located until 1853, when, with their ten children, they crossed the plains to Oregon, ox-teams being used in the traveling and the journey occupying six months of the year. The first winter was spent in Linn county, where the father bought the right to a claim twelve miles south of Albany, to which they at once removed and engaged in cultivating and improving the same. The death of Mr. Huston occurred in 1879, upon the farm selected upon their first arrival here. The mother survived him until 1893, when she died in the same location. Politically he was a Democrat and religiously he was a member of the Christian Church at Sand Ridge, Ore.

Of the twelve children which blessed the union of his parents Walter Huston was the fifth in order of birth, and was born in Henderson county, Ill., March 1, 1839, and there lived until he was fourteen years old, attending the district school in the vicinity of his home in the intervals of his home duties, which early training, and a brief attendance in Linn county, Ore., constituted his education. He removed with his parents to Oregon in 1853, and remained with them for the ensuing seven years. When he reached his majority he left home and sought livelihood and independence by prospecting east of the mountains, and later extending his operations throughout the entire northwest. Satisfied with the returns after about four years of this kind of work, he bought a farm located eight miles from Brownsville, where he engaged in farming for about ten years. Industry, energy and perseverance are never without their reward, and in 1874 he was able to make a purchase of one hundred and sixty acres which now make up his present farm. This is located one and a half miles east of Harrisburg, Linn county, where his time is largely devoted to stock-raising, as he has for the present retired from active farming.

The marriage of Mr. Huston occurred in 1868, upon his father's place, and united him with Susan E. Smith, a native of Missouri, whose death occurred in 1876. In 1878 he married Lodenma A. Shelley, who was born in Lane county, October, 1855, the daughter of Michael Shelley, who crossed the plains in 1848 and located in the county where his daughter was born. By his first marriage he was the father of the following children: Rosa B., the wife of Alfred Huelat, of Seattle, Wash.; and Estella, the wife of Roy A. Reed, of Walla Walla, Wash. By the second marriage the following children have been born: R. C., now located in Seattle, Wash.; Raymond; Ethel; Veda; and Blanche. In his religious views Mr. Huston follows his father's convictions and holds membership with the Christian Church, Harrisburg, where he officiates as deacon. His wife is a member of the same church. Politically he casts his ballot with the Democratic party.

E. P. WALKER, who is serving his third term as a member of the city council of Salem, has made for himself a record as a public official that is above condemnation or criticism. He has been a resident of this city since 1880, coming from the Mississippi valley. He was born in Shelby county, Ill., the son of Jesse D. and Sarah (Calvin) Walker, both natives of Kentucky, and the former of Scotch descent. Removing to Illinois, the father settled in Shelby county, where he carried on farming until his death in 1852, while his wife passed away in the same state in 1844. They were the parents of eight children, of whom two sons and two daughters are now living, the brother of our subject being Harvey Walker, represented elsewhere in this work. The daughters are Mrs. Pauline Bankson, of Bethany, Ill., and Mrs. Martha Moore, of Moultrie county, Ill.

Mr. Walker of this review was born April 13, 1832, and was reared upon the home farm in Shelby county until nineteen years of age. During that time he pursued his studies in a log schoolhouse which was seated with puncheon benches and had other primitive furnishings. Quill pens were used and the text books were very crude as compared with those used at the present time. He spent but three months during the winter seasons in school and the rest of the year worked in the fields. When nineteen years of age he went to Van Buren county, Iowa, where he spent the summer and then returned to Illinois, having in the meantime been employed as a farm hand for $12.50 per month. After he again located in his native state he entered the employ of an Englishman who gave him $25 per month for feeding and caring for the stock. That he was faithful to the work intrusted to him was shown by the fact that he remained in the Englishman's service for seven years and during that time he saved his money until he was enabled to purchase a land warrant, for which he paid $160. This entitled him to secure one hundred and sixty acres of land in Moultrie county and at different times he made purchases and trades. In 1865 he removed to Tazewell county, Ill., settling near Pekin, where he secured a farm of two hundred and forty acres which he successfully cultivated until 1880, when he came to Salem, Ore. He had visited this country in 1875, his object being to ascertain what prospects the country afforded, and at that time he made his way to the Rogue river. That he carried away with him favorable impressions is shown by the fact that he returned in 1880 and two weeks after his arrival purchased a farm of one hundred and eighty acres for which he gave $16,000. This is one of the finest farms in the valley, located four miles northeast of Salem on the Silvertown road. Subsequently he extended the boundaries of this property until the farm now comprises three hundred and eighty acres in one body, his land being operated by his two sons. Since 1893 Mr. Walker has lived retired from the active duties of farm life. Two years of this period have been spent in Pasadena, Cal., but at the end of that time he returned to Salem, where he has resided continuously since.

Mr. Walker was married in Tazewell county.

Ill., to Miss Clary M. Davis, a native of that locality and a daughter of one of the early pioneer farmers of the state. Seven children were born of this marriage: Thomas F., who is living on the home farm; Mrs. Sarah Savage, who died in Salem; Mrs. Annie Martin, who also passed away in this city; Mrs. Emma Savage, of Brooks, Ore.; Harvey, who is living on the home farm, and two who died in infancy.

Since 1877 Mr. Walker has been a valued member of Chemeketa Lodge, No. 1, I. O. O. F. and is identified with the encampment of Salem. On questions of national importance he gives an earnest support to the Democracy and in 1898 he was nominated on the Citizens' ticket for the office of councilman from the first ward. Having been elected he was appointed a member of the ways and means committee, also of the committee on accounts and current expenses and chairman of the printing committee. The duties of the office he regarded as a sacred obligation which he fully met, giving to every subject which came up for settlement his earnest consideration. He was very active in reducing the city debt from $85,000 to $65,000 and in funding the latter amount with four per cent bonds in place of eight per cent bonds and these were sold as popular loans. He was also instrumental in reducing the expense of the electric light of the city to one-half the former amount. His fellow townsmen, recognizing his worth and value in office, re-elected him on the Citizens' ticket in 1900 by a large majority and during the second term he was a member of the fire and water committee, of the committee on accounts and current expenses and chairman of the ordinance committee. In 1902, against his wishes, however, he consented to again become a candidate and is now serving for the third term of two years. Over the record of his public career and private life there falls no shadow of wrong or suspicion of evil. He is a man of much worth and high standing and is also classed among the wealthy residents of Salem. This fact is due to a life of industry carefully directed. He started out for himself without means, but was determined to win success if it could be gained through honorable methods and persistency of purpose and today he is one of the substantial men of his adopted country. Mr. Walker is entirely self-made and out of debt. No man can say that he ever presented any obligation to him that was not promptly met.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN CHUTE. Although comparatively a newcomer in Monmouth, Mr. Chute is well known, and wherever known is respected. Great interest in all of the local enterprises is maintained by him, and he does all within his power to promote the general prosperity of his adopted city. The birth of Mr. Chute occurred in Faribault county, Minn., September 22, 1863, and his parents were William E. and Mary Ann (Hill) Chute, both of Canadian birth. Shortly before the birth of the son the parents had left their home in Canada and settled on a quarter section of land in Faribault county, Minn., which from that time until 1901 continued to be the family home. In the year last mentioned, however, the father retired from active cares and made his home with his son, who in the meantime had removed to Chicago, Ill., and there the father's death occurred in 1902, at sixty-five years of age. The maternal grandfather, Walter Hill, was also a Canadian by birth, and upon emigrating to the United States located on a farm near Eagle Lake, Minn., where the remainder of his life was spent.

Of the five children born to Mr. and Mrs. William E. Chute, four sons and one daughter, Abraham L. was the oldest son and second child. His education was received in the excellent schools for which Canada is famous, and in getting an education he worked with the same energy that has characterized all his efforts in life, doing with a will and determination whatever he set his hand or mind to do. At twenty years of age he felt himself sufficiently equipped to take up the affairs of life on his own account, and forthwith took from the government a grant of land in South Dakota which he improved and cultivated for seven years, but in 1890 he sold the land and went to the Northwest Territory, where he also filed on a piece of land and engaged in farming. It was in the year 1894 that he cast in his lot with the citizens of Oregon, and at once became identified with her immense lumber interests. One winter at this, however, sufficed to prove that it was not a line that he cared to continue permanently, and in June, 1895, took up his abode in Monmouth, Polk county, and here he expects to make his home continuously.

It is said nothing which we learn in life can be wasted, but on the other hand can always be turned to good account, and so it has proved in the case of Mr. Chute. It was while he was in Canada that he learned the blacksmith's trade, and ever since his identification with the city of Monmouth he has followed the latter calling, for which he seems to have a special aptitude, and is meeting with gratifying returns from a monetary standpoint. His faith in the city of Monmouth as a desirable place of residence has been further indicated by the fact that in the southeastern part of the city he has erected a fine residence, which is not only a credit to the owner, but to the city as well. In addition to this property he also owns nine acres of land within the city limits.

It was while in South Dakota that Mr. Chute and Miss Maggie Connor, a native of Canada, were united in marriage. Three children were born to them and all are still at home, their names being as follows: Ray William, Blanch Victoria and Stella May. Mrs. Maggie Chute died May 1, 1896, at Monmouth, and in 1897 Mr. Chute was married to Annie Henson, a native of Missouri, and three children have been born to them, Lora Anna, Mary Elizabeth and John Lincoln, all being at home with their parents.

Private interests have not consumed the entire attention and time of Mr. Chute, as his two terms of valuable service as a member of the city council will testify, and in behalf of the Prohibition party he has done all that has been possible within his power to further the cause of the party. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World and the Fraternal Union of America. The family are members of the Evangelical Church, liberally assisting in its support.

JOHN M. McCARTNEY. Countless as were the number of men who cheerfully accepted the hard conditions incident to life among the undeveloped regions of Oregon in pioneer days, there is scarcely the name of one lost from the history of the country. Although nearly a score of years has passed since John M. McCartney died, he is still remembered among the people with whom he mingled as a pioneer of the Willamette valley, there giving his energy to the upbuilding of the country as a cultivator of the broad fields of the generous western land.

Mr. McCartney came with his parents to Oregon in 1852, when he was only fifteen years old, having been born November 18, 1837. He was a native of Gibson county, Ind., and a son of Henry A. McCartney, who was born in Tennessee, a descendant of Scotch ancestry. The mother was Margaret A. Finney, of English descent. When but one year old his parents removed from Indiana, locating in Monmouth, Ill., being there among the early settlers, after which they spent six months in crossing the plains, the journey's end finding them in Linn county, Ore. There they passed the first winter, after which the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located on the banks of the river and upon the present site of Peoria, and of this little town Mr. McCartney was one of the benefactors.

He also served two years in the Oregon legislature. The mother died August 12, 1862, at Peoria, and in 1881 Mr. McCartney sold his property and removed to Sodaville, where he died January 15, 1893.

The early education of Mr. McCartney was received in the common schools of Linn county, where he remained until attaining his majority, when he left home and bought one hundred and sixty acres of land located one and a half miles west of Shedd's, where he took up farming. After eight years' residence there he removed to his father's old claim in 1872, and continued there for four years, at the expiration of that time becoming the owner of the two hundred and twenty acres which his widow now has in her possession. This is located two and a half miles north of Harrisburg, and consists of two acres more than was included in the original purchase. From the time of the purchase until his death, which occurred February 2, 1885, Mr. McCartney remained here engaged in farming. The wife of Mr. McCartney was in maidenhood Melinda J. Porter, a native of Boone county, Ind., having been born there December 1, 1844. She was the daughter of James A. Porter, who was born in Russell county, Va., June 15, 1816, and died in Harrisburg, Linn county, Ore., in 1880. He had married Nancy S. Knott, a native of White-water, Ind., who died in 1862 near Halsey, Ore., when forty-seven years old. In 1853 Mr. Porter brought his family across the plains, September 11 finding them in the Willamette valley, where he bought the right to a donation claim located four miles northwest of Halsey, where Mrs. McCartney was reared. After her education was finished she married November 14, 1861, and became the mother of four children, namely: Asbury A., who now lives at home and conducts the farm; Nancy A., the wife of A. J. Basey, of Salem; Edgar I., deceased; and Guy M., at home. Since the death of her husband Mrs. McCartney makes her home upon the farm, where general farming is now carried on. Mr. McCartney was a Republican in politics. Mrs. McCartney is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Harrisburg, in which she officiates as trustee, and has held that position for the past five years.

JAMES S. BUCHANAN. Among the prominent men of Polk county, Ore., is to be named James S. Buchanan, whose success in life has been entirely the result of excellent business judgment and the ability to execute his plans, combined with a quickness of decision by which he has taken advantage of many an opportunity which would have escaped a less astute man. Mr. Buchanan is now a merchant of Airlie in a building which he erected in 1902, his business comprising no small item among the mercantile interests of the city.

The father of James S. Buchanan, Thomas, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, and on coming to Canada at an early day he became employed at Montreal in building the docks. Later he was engaged at Carryall Rapids in building a canal, his business being that of a civil engineer. Later in life he became the owner of a large farm, where he was engaged in farming and breeding fine horses, meeting his death while at this latter business in 1849 by the running away of a horse attached to a sleigh. He was a finely educated, popular man, and was very prominent in the local politics of his community and exercised no little influence in public affairs. His business ability was indicated by the fortune which he had acquired at the time of his death. He married Floranda Hutchins, a native of New York City, whose father was a lumber merchant at the Lake of Two Mountains, and was very successful in his business, exporting large quantities of lumber. He came to his death at a comparatively early age while running a raft at Power's bridge at Lachute.

Of the eight children born to his father and mother, five sons and three daughters, James S. Buchanan was the seventh child and the youngest son, and was born on the Lake of the Two Mountains, May 24, 1836. After his education in the common schools was complete he and his brother Paul were sent to the Ray school in Newark, N. J., from which they graduated at an early age. After serving an apprenticeship at the boot and shoe trade he engaged in the manufacture of these articles at the age of nineteen years, locating in Upper Canada, Huron county. Until the Civil war broke out in the United States he carried on a splendid business, having ten men employed. Taking advantage of the need in the neighboring country, he began importing horses into the United States to sell to the government, and continued at this with handsome profits until the close of the war. In 1866 he decided to make his home in the United States, locating first in Roscoe, Ill., where he engaged in broom manufacturing. After a year there he sold his interests and removed to Sheridan county, Mo., making a purchase of eight hundred acres of land upon which he remained engaged in farming until 1873, when he again changed his residence, taking up a homestead in Graham county, Kans., near Hill City. He proved up on his property and paid out, but not meeting with the success which he had hoped to find in stock-raising he came to Oregon in 1887, purchasing a mercantile establishment at Wren, Benton county. For three years he made this his sole interest, building up a fine custom, and at the expiration of that time he bought a store at Summit, conducting the two for some time. In 1892 he disposed of this second interest at a comfortable profit. Leaving his son, Orville, to conduct his interests at Wren he came to Airlie and engaged with his son-in-law, A. D. McKisson, in a general merchandise establishment, the partnership later being dissolved by Mr. McKisson leaving the country for Nome, Alaska, when Mr. Buchanan became sole owner of the business. The business in Airlie having grown to larger proportions than Mr. Buchanan cared to handle alone, he sold his interests in 1901 in Wren and gave his son employment in this city, in 1902 putting up the building now occupied by his business.

Mr. Buchanan was married in Goderich, Ontario, to Miss Eliza Dickson, a native of Brockville, Canada, the daughter of a lumber merchant, who died in that country when quite young. Of the children born of this union Floranda is now the wife of F. P. O'Neil of Washington; Annie is Mrs. D. M. Collop, of Fairhaven, Wash.; Kate, deceased, was the wife of M. Sexton; Rosena is the wife of A. D. McKisson of Montavilla, Ore.; Orville makes his home in Airlie, engaged in business with his father, with whom he has always worked, being business manager of the mercantile establishment. He was born in Missouri, and is married; Mrs. Fay Glassford, who has three children living—two sons and a daughter—Paul, Neal and Gay; Evy, the wife of W. J. Newton, a farmer located near Colfax, Wash.; John and Samuel, deceased, and buried in Blueville, Canada; and two daughters who died in infancy and were buried in Missouri. Mr. Buchanan is a Democrat of the Jacksonian type. His wife is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

HENRY H. BRINKLEY. A meritorious war record preceded the coming of Henry H. Brinkley to Oregon in the fall of 1866, and he has since lived on a well improved farm of three hundred and three acres in Polk county. Born in Paducah, McCracken county, Ky., April 18, 1838, he is a son of William W., and grandson of Timothy Brinkley, both of whom were natives of North Carolina, and of English descent. Special mention is due William W. Brinkley, who was a cripple, and notwithstanding this discouraging circumstance, accomplished much during his active life, acquired a good education in his youth, and also prepared for the future by learning the shoemaker's trade. For many years he was a school teacher, and in connection therewith made shoes, and also managed a farm. When his son, Henry H. was a mere boy he removed to Illinois, locating on a farm in Gallatin county, subsequently residing on farms in Hardin and Hamilton counties. He was a staunch Democrat, and served for many years as justice of the peace, and about 1850 represented Hamilton county in the state legislature for a couple of terms. In Gallatin county he was united in marriage with Mary Hall, a native of Gallatin county, and whose grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mrs. Brinkley died in Hamilton county at the age of forty, leaving five children, three sons and two daughters. Her husband survived her until 1870, and died in Hamilton county at the age of seventy.

With the other members of his family Henry H. Brinkley moved around a great deal in Illinois, and at irregular intervals attended the early subscription schools. He was living on a farm in Gallatin county when the war broke out, and September 16, 1862, enlisted in Company E, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry as a private, and served as first duty sergeant. The regiment was stationed at Peoria, Ill., for five months, and afterward sent to Louisville, from which headquarters it scoured the state under the command of General Hobson. In the spring of 1863 it was sent in search of General Morgan under command of General Shackleford, returning to Glasgow, Ky., at the expiration of five weeks. In September, 1863, the regiment was sent across country under General Burnside to Knoxville, Tenn., and was later with Sherman in the Atlanta campaign, eventually falling back and joining General Thomas in the fight at Nashville. During the last mentioned battle Mr. Brinkley received a slight wound on the left hand from a sabre, and also was hit in the face with a shell. After being mustered out at Pulaski, Tenn., July 31, 1865, he returned to Gallatin county, Ill., and remained there until coming to Oregon in 1866. He took steamer at New York city, crossed the Isthmus of Panama, and arrived in San Francisco, from which port he sailed for Portland.

The Brinkley farm is valuable and well improved, and is devoted to farming and stock-raising, a specialty being made of Cotswold sheep. A comfortable and commodious residence, good barns and the latest implements contribute to the pleasure and profit of one of the most peaceful and satisfactory occupations in the world. In 1871 Mr. Brinkley married Annie Wilds, a native of Benton county, and born on Soap creek, upon which her father, John Wilds, settled after crossing the plains in 1846. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brinkley: Mary, the wife of A. J. Bagley of Athens, Ore.; John, living in Boise City; Jessie, the wife of Fred Koomtz, of Athens, Ore.;

Walter, at home; Annie, living at Salem, Ore.; and Thomas, at home. Mr. Brinkley is a Republican in politics, and has been road supervisor and school director. He is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Corvallis, and the Grand Army of the Republic of Independence.

JOSEPH ELMER HAMILTON. The pioneers who came to Oregon before the rush for gold sent countless numbers out upon the plains, thus minimizing the danger of travel, are deserving of more than passing mention, exhibiting as they did a courage almost beyond the belief of those who today occupy palace cars, and gaze upon the farms which have supplanted the haunts of the Indian from one ocean to the other. Among the class of men who were influenced rather by the fertility of the soil than the contents of the mines, and who swelled the emigration westward of 1847, must be mentioned Joseph Hamilton, former agriculturist, merchant, state legislator, and promoter of Linn county. This honored pioneer was the father of Joseph E. Hamilton, occupant of the old homestead at the present time, and who was born thereon, June 17, 1862.

Joseph Hamilton was born on a small farm near Londonderry, Ireland, March 25, 1819, and came to the United States with his parents in 1826, settling on a farm in Ohio, where he grew to manhood. He was married, in 1846, to Caroline Owens, born near Richmond, N. C., and after his marriage continued his occupation of threshing in Iowa, to which state he had in the meantime removed. In 1847 he outfitted with ox-teams and a prairie schooner, joined a train of people bound for Oregon, and was on the road six months. The party had several skirmishes with the Indians, and one of the men was killed; they also had a number of cattle stolen. The first winter was spent near Salem, and in the spring of 1848 Mr. Hamilton came to Linn county and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres eight miles southwest of Albany, which property is now occupied by his namesake son, Joseph E. The elder Joseph built a little log cabin, as all the settlers were obliged to do, and the substitution of this by a more modern dwelling was an event of special significance, indicating, as it did, the success achieved by the father in clearing and cultivating his land. A large part of his property was prairie land, and this he devoted to general farming and stock-raising, in time starting a general merchandise store on his land, the first place in the vicinity to sell goods. This little store was quite a curiosity in its way, and people came from far and near to purchase household necessities, and incidentally to meet their friends and talk over important happenings among the settlers. The stock of the store was necessarily limited, owing to the difficulty of transporting goods from Portland, but it paved the way for other and larger undertakings, and filled a long-felt want among the pioneers.

In 1850 Mr. Hamilton left his store and farm to other hands and went to the mining districts of California, and here, as elsewhere, he showed his shrewd business sagacity. Realizing that many were called but few chosen to succeed as miners, he avoided being one of the latter class by engaging in merchandising and freighting rather than mining, and so wise proved this decision, that he returned to his farm in Oregon the richer by several hundreds of dollars. He took an active part in politics from the time of attaining his majority, filling a number of prominent positions, representing Linn county in the state legislature, and serving as county commissioner. Even as a boy he was much interested in the Presbyterian Church, and the older he grew the more he appreciated church associations. Himself and wife were among the organizers of the First Presbyterian Church in their vicinity, and from year to year contributed to the best of their ability towards its maintenance and charities. Even now at the age of seventy-seven years, the wife who survives him is a regular attendant at Sunday services. He was actively identified with the organization of what is now the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad Company and the construction of its line and served on the committee which endeavored to acquire the right of way and the necessary legislation. He became one of the stockholders in the company and was interested in the project for many years. He had previously been interested in the construction of the first wagon road from Corvallis to Yaquina Bay. In later years he was associated with other leading men in the promotion of the County Agricultural Society, and from its inception he was one of the chief promoters of the State Fair held at Salem, which he annually attended in an official capacity. He and his brothers brought with them, in 1847, the castings for the first threshing machine ever operated in the Willamette valley. This machine they made in Ohio, and operated it in that state and Iowa. After reaching Oregon they put the parts together and operated it for several years, the only implement of the kind in the valley. Mr. Hamilton lived to be sixty-five years old, and he left a finely improved property to his wife and children. He was a man for whom all entertained the most profound respect, and his death, September 12, 1884, was mourned by a host of friends and associates. He left six children, of whom Joseph E. is the fifth. Angelina, the oldest daughter, is the wife of George Riddell of The Dalles; Josephine is the wife of George Henderson of Baker City; Jennie is the wife of Rev. A. M. Acheson, of Pennsylvania; Nellie is the wife of G. T. Hamill of Idaho; and William B. is a physician practicing in Portland.

In his youth Joseph E. Hamilton had the advantages of the public schools and Albany College, and has always lived on the home farm. Since his father's death he has managed the farm for his mother, with whom he is part owner, and that he has made a success of it is not questioned by anyone who visits the place, and inspects the modern facilities for conducting an extensive general farming and stock-raising enterprise. At present he and his mother own eight hundred acres, quite an increase over the father's original purchase, and one hundred and fifty acres are under cultivation. The family have a comfortable and pleasant home, and the barns and outhouses are of the best. September 8, 1891, Mr. Hamilton married Anna E. Greenlee, who was born near Joliet, Ill., and reared in Kansas. Of this union there have been born four children, Robert Bruce, Joseph Allen, Mary Isabella and Anna Irene. Like his father, Mr. Hamilton is a member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he is an elder. In political faith he is a Republican, with a strong leaning towards prohibition. No family in the county represents in greater degree moral and agricultural excellence, conservative growth and reliability, than does the pioneer and prosperous family of Hamilton.

AI PORTER. A worthy representative of one of the finest and most influential families of the Willamette Valley is Ai Porter, the fortunate owner of six hundred and fifty acres of land six miles southeast of Silverton. This farm, and especially the house, has a two-fold interest for Mr. Porter, for it represents the place of his birth, December 31, 1873, the scene of his childish pastimes and small labors, and the surroundings among which developed his rugged ancestral characteristics. At present he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising under the most favorable circumstances, his barns, outhouses, implements and general improvements keeping pace with agricultural advancement as understood by practical and scientific toilers of the soil.

The Porter family was established in Oregon by Edward S. Porter, who removed from Ohio to a location in Fulton county, Ill., about 1835, and there worked at his trade of blacksmith for about twenty years. He came to Oregon in 1853 with ox-teams, and in Marion county located with his wife and children on what is now known as the Porter donation claim, five miles southeast of Silverton. He lived to a good old age, and after the death of his wife, Anna (Anderson) Porter, made his home with his youngest son. His son John, the father of Ai, was born in Richland county, Ohio, October 6, 1830, and when five years of age removed with his parents to Fulton county, Ill., where he was reared and educated. He was twenty-three years of age when he came across the plains with the rest of the family, and two years later, on his father's donation claim near Silverton, he married Annis White, who was born in Missouri, and who came across the plains with her parents in 1852, settling on the White donation claim five miles southeast of Silverton. Mr. Porter is possessed of marked business ability, and to the farm upon which he first located he added materially, and at present owns nearly sixteen hundred acres of land. Two years after his marriage he located near Fairfield, and in 1864 located on the White donation claim, remaining there until after the death of his wife in 1897. Since then he has made his home with his children, at whose homes he is a welcome guest at all times. To an exceptional degree Mr. Porter enjoys the confidence of his fellow-townsmen, and his services in behalf of the up-building of this county have been appreciated.

Ai Porter was educated in the district schools, and has always taken kindly and even enthusiastically to farming, for which occupation he was prepared by his wise and sagacious father. October 22, 1901, he was united in marriage with Miss Josie Baller, a native daughter of Oregon and, like her husband, educated in the public schools. Her parents were Rosie and Abraham Baller. To Mr. and Mrs. Porter there was born July 29, 1903, a son, whom they call Clarence. In politics Mr. Porter is a Republican.

HENDERSON W. MURPHY. The head of the Murphy family, Rev. John E. Murphy, brought with him into the wilderness several families to swell the growth of the western territory, being accompanied on the journey by his own immediate children, sons-in-law and their families and several other relatives. The train was known as the Murphy train, so many of that name and blood did it contain, in fact, by the time their destination was reached being alone, as they had parted company with the other emigrants long before.

Rev. John E. Murphy was born in Barren county, Ky., in 1806, and was the son of William Murphy, also a native of that state, having been born there of Irish ancestry. The elder man was a farmer by profession, and brought his children up to this life. In religion he was a member of the Christian Church, and the moral instruction which accompanied that of daily duty bore great and good fruit in the person of his son, John E. At an early day Mr. Murphy took his family into Illinois, where they located in Warren county, John E. Murphy engaging then in the Christian ministry as well as following agricultural pursuits. In Kentucky he was married to Frances W. Daughty, who was born in Barren county, in 1810, and in 1852 they had quite a large family, many of the children being married and having homes of their own. When the trip to the west was talked over they were nearly all in accord, and at once began making preparations to leave the Mississippi valley in the spring of 1852, four wagons drawn by oxen conveying the possessions of Mr. Murphy. There were about thirty wagons in the train when it left Monmouth, Ill., April 13, 1852, but as before mentioned they broke up into smaller parties before the journey was ended. Five months after the time of starting their destination was reached, and their first winter was spent where Crowley is now located, the next spring finding them upon a claim of three hundred and twenty acres to which Mr. Murphy had bought the right. This was located near Airlie, and they remained for two years, when he sold the farm and removed to Monmouth, Polk county, engaging in farming and stock-raising near that city. In addition to his agricultural pursuits was the ministerial life of Mr. Murphy, for as he had made that his principal occupation in the Mississippi valley he made it so here, and no small debt is owed to him by the congregations of the Christian Churches of Oregon. For many years he gave himself almost entirely to the establishment of churches and evangelistic meetings, both in Oregon and Washington, and he met with great success, for he was a speaker of unusual ability and strong personality. He was also interested in all educational movements and was active in the organization of the Christian College at Monmouth, which has since become the state normal school. This was established in 1856, and he became a trustee and financial agent, discharging his duties with the admirable faithfulness which characterized his entire life.

Many incidents in the life of Mr. Murphy are characteristic of his strong sense of right, which was his, partly through inheritance, as his father was also a Christian in the truest sense of the word. The family was of southern blood, and was well-to-do in every way, and like many other Kentucky families its wealth consisted of negroes, inherited from an estate in Virginia, the former home of the Murphys. Opposed to slavery in every thought and principle, though every year up to the time of manhood had been spent among these conditions, Mr. Murphy used his influence toward the liberation of the slaves held by his father, and was successful both with father and an uncle, who also owned quite a number of negroes. During the Civil war he was strong and earnest in using his influence for the defense of the Union, as he had been in the case of the two plantations. During a too brief life he made many friends by the kindness and Christian charity which he ever gave to those about him, and his death, which occurred in Monmouth, in 1876, was a loss felt by the entire community. His wife, who had faithfully assisted him through the long years of their married life, survived him until December 30, 1891, when she died in the eighty-first year of her age.

Of the twelve children which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Murphy, Henderson W. Murphy was the fourth, and was born in Warren county, Ill., February 3, 1835, and received his principal common school education in the schools of Illinois. After settling in Oregon he attended the Christian College at Monmouth for some time, and when his education was considered complete he went into the stock business in Polk county, later removing to Klickitat county, Wash., where he continued the work. Until 1882 he remained in that location, when he purchased the property which he now owns and upon which he makes his home. After five or six years here he returned to Klickitat county and engaged in the sheep business, having at one time forty-five hundred head. He was very successful, and after four years there he once more settled upon his farm and for the last sixteen years he has been interested in general farming and stock-raising, having at present one hundred head of cattle and seventy sheep. He is also interested in dairying and hop-raising, having twenty-two and a half acres devoted to the cultivation of this plant. Altogether he has nine hundred and forty-three acres, six hundred of which is in active cultivation.

In 1862 Mr. Murphy was married to Rebecca L. Davidson, a native of Indiana, born there in 1842, and the daughter of Henry Davidson, who crossed the plains in 1852 and located in Linn county. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Murphy, Sarah is the wife of W. L. Wells; John D.; Omer is located in Independence; Nellie is the wife of A. M. Rayburn of Adams county, Wash.; Kate is the wife of Wilmer Cooper, of Klondike, Sherman county, Ore.; Carrie is the wife of Charles Dickman, of Monkland, Sherman county; and Claud is still at home. Politically Mr. Murphy is a Republican, and in religion both himself and wife belong to the Christian Church at Monmouth. Some years ago he served as his father had done in the capacity of trustee for the Christian College at Monmouth, and has also served as school director and road supervisor.

WILLIAM M. PORTER. Not even second to the thought that one is numbered among the pioneers of this great commonwealth of Oregon is the pleasure to be gained from the fact that one is the son of a worthy man among them, and the native son of the state which has been an asylum and refuge for so many homeless wanderers. The grandfather of W. M. Porter, Samuel Porter, after his removal to Missouri from Tennessee, followed this up with a trip to the Sunset state, where his last days were spent. The father, John, was born in Tennessee, and removed with his parents to Missouri, from which he emigrated to Oregon in 1848, in company with his wife and child and two brothers. They went over the Barlow route in an ox-train, the journey occupying six months. Upon their arrival in Oregon Mr. Porter took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres ten miles south of Corvallis, Benton county, where was located the town which at that time was called Marysville. Upon this farm he remained for some time, engaged in active farming and improving his property, later removing to Lane county, and, with the proceeds of his sale of his Benton county property, investing in another farm in this section. And once more, before being entirely satisfied with his surroundings, he made a sale, settling in Harrisburg, Linn county, in the latter place remaining until his death. His wife was formerly Mary Winkle, a native of Alabama, whose father, Isaac, moved to Missouri at an early day, crossing the plains in 1848, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres at Winkle Butte, nine miles south of Corvallis, making this his home until his death. Mrs. Porter is also deceased.

Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Porter, five are now living, the fourth oldest W. M., who was born in Benton county, Ore., January 3, 1861, being brought up on the farm in Linn county. His educational advantages consisted of a very irregular attendance upon the common schools in the vicinity of his home the three months of the year in which they were in session. He remained with his parents until he was twenty-four years of age, at that time commencing an apprenticeship under a blacksmith to learn that trade. These years were not disagreeable ones to the young man, his business relations being with his brother, Thurston, who was a blacksmith in Harrisburg. When his education in this line was completed he left his brother and opened a business for himself in Corvallis, of his native county. This event was in the year 1893, and since that time his business has grown to splendid proportions, through the manner in which he has served the public. Not only a good blacksmith, he is patronized by all who have horseshoeing to be done, as he has made a specialty of this branch of the business, and is an acknowledged leader in this section of the community.

In Harrisburg occurred the marriage of Mr. Porter which united him with Miss Marie Pierce, a native of that place, and daughter of James Pierce, who came to Oregon in 1847 and settled in Linn county. One daughter, bearing the name of Mildred, has blessed the union. Fraternally Mr. Porter is past master of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, belongs to the encampment, and is also a member of the Rebekahs. He is also identified with the Woodmen of the World. As to his political affiliations he votes the Democratic ticket and in religion is a member of the Christian Church, in which he now serves as deacon.

EDWIN A. ALDERMAN. A native son of Yamhill county, who has done much to increase its agricultural prestige, is Edwin A. Alderman, born on his father's farm November 30, 1866, a son of Albert and Charlotte (Odell) Alderman. Albert Alderman was born in Old Bedford, Conn., December 16, 1820, and in his youth learned the cooper's trade. From his native state of Connecticut he moved to New York when a young man, and from there to Michigan, in both states being engaged in farming and stock-raising. In 1846, with ox teams, he crossed the plains to Oregon, Captain Dunbar being captain of the party. In Yamhill county, Mr. Alderman took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres the following year, located near Dayton, the same on which he now resides, and which has been brought to a high state of cultivation.

Mr. Alderman's first wife was Mary J. Burns, and at her death left four children, of whom Margaret is now Mrs. Hubbard, of Polk county; William is also a resident of that county; Marita, Mrs. McCowan, is also a resident of Polk county, and Medorem was the youngest child. The second marriage of Mr. Alderman occurred in 1866, with Charlotte Odell, a native of Carroll county, Ind., and daughter of John R. Odell, the latter of whom was born in Indiana and crossed the plains in 1851, locating in Yamhill county. By his second marriage the family of Mr. Alderman was increased by four sons and one daughter, Edwin A. being the eldest. Ennis resides south of Dayton; Lewis R. is principal of the schools of McMinnville; George is deceased, and Eva E. is the youngest member of the family.

Until the paternal donation claim was divided among the children Edwin A. Alderman remained at home with his father, receiving a thorough agricultural and common-school education, and evincing from the earliest youth, habits of thrift and economy. In 1896 he received his share of the home farm, which amounted to one hundred and fifty acres, of which he has one hundred acres under cultivation. While Mr. Alderman has derived considerable profit from general farming, he also enjoys a substantial income from his stock enterprises, in connection with which he conducts a good-sized dairy.

On the first day of the year 1897, Mr. Alderman was united in marriage with Mary Bliss, daughter of John and Rose (Hubbard) Bliss, both of whom were natives of Lewis county, N. Y. One son has blessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Alderman, who bears the name of Dwight E. Private affairs have not consumed all of the time and talents of Mr. Alderman, and his public life has been above reproach. For several years he was a member of the city council, and it was his privilege to be the first chief executive of Dayton. Political matters have always been of interest to Mr. Alderman, and he has been a staunch defender of the principles of the Republican party from young manhood. He is usually a delegate to the county conventions, and has served as recorder of Dayton. School matters have likewise been benefited by his abilities, his service in the cause of education being felt while he was school director. Fraternally, he is identified with the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The Dayton Grange also claims Mr. Alderman as one of its members. All in all, Mr. Alderman is one of the rising young men of Yamhill county, to whom the younger generation may look as an example of honorable, upright living.

WILLIAM SHEPHERD. After one has achieved a success in life there is a pleasure in taking a retrospective view of one's career and following the various steps which have led to the place now honorably occupied, and many things serve as reminders, especially in a country like Oregon, justly proud of the rapid advancement which has characterized the growth of the state. To William Shepherd, a pioneer of '47, the past is recalled by a few old blacksmith tools, which helped him to earn a livelihood during his early days in the west, and by the broad acres of his original donation claim, upon which stands an old building of hewed logs, the first house of worship put up in the country of the early times. By a long, prosperous and helpful life in this vicinity Mr. Shepherd has come to be known among the people as one who helped to lay the corner stone of Oregon's greatness, the esteem in which he is held being evidence of his worth.

The life of Mr. Shepherd has been full of interesting events, patriotism, a love of adventure and a spirit of justice inducing him to give his aid in various causes. He hails from the Emerald Isle, being born near Belfast, County Down, November 26, 1821, and having lost his father when he was nine years old he was thrown upon his own resources. When only sixteen years old he came with his mother and sisters to make a new home among the more hopeful conditions of the United States; and after a voyage of two months they landed and became residents of Catskill, Greene county, N. Y. In that city Mr. Shepherd served an apprenticeship with a blacksmith, after which, in 1842, he removed to Illinois. In the same year he enlisted under Captain Stevenson for services in the war between Texas and Mexico, where he remained for about six months, during which time he took part in the battle of Matamoros. His remuneration for this period of service in the cause of Texas was three hundred and twenty acres of land, the value of which is shown in the fact that he traded the entire tract for a horse. After a siege of sickness which kept him in Texas more than a year Mr. Shepherd crossed the United States to Canada, and after a short time there he visited his old home in New York, and then located in Pittsburg, Pa. Afterward he returned to Illinois, where he remained until 1847, when he started across the plains with ox-teams, his brother-in-law being in the same train. The journey occupied six months, during which they encountered no difficulties, and upon their arrival in Linn county Mr. Shepherd at once took up a donation claim, which he eventually lost by enlisting again in the army. From that location he came to Oregon City and worked at his trade until he enlisted in Phil Thompson's company for services in the Cayuse war, remaining in Thompson's command for six months, and was then under Captain Martin for three months. It was his fortune to serve in every engagement of this war, after which he was mustered out, and returning to Linn county, he again took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located four miles south of Peoria. He here built the log cabin before mentioned as the first place of worship in this country. In 1849 his spirit of adventure was aroused by the gold excitement of California, and with ox-teams he journeyed thither and successfully followed mining and prospecting for four months. Returning north he engaged earnestly in the cultivation of his donation claim, transforming the wilderness into a farm of fine, well kept appearance, a comfortable dwelling and modern out-buildings testifying to the prosperity which has followed the well directed efforts of Mr. Shepherd. In addition to his farming Mr. Shepherd has always been employed at his trade, the first blacksmith shop in this country being his, many of the tools being still in his possession.

In 1851 Mr. Shepherd made a trip back to New York state, via the Isthmus of Panama, and on December 25, of the same year, he married Mary F. Palmer, a native of that state, and in the spring of 1852 they crossed the plains together with horse-teams, after six months reaching the claim where their home was henceforth to be. Of the children born to them, William H. is located in the vicinity; George B. is at home; Sarah A. is now Mrs. Williams, of Harrisburg; Ida B. is Mrs. Bromwell, and Margaret is Mrs. Allenham both of this vicinity. Mrs. Shepherd having died in 1890, Mr. Shepherd now makes his home with his son. In politics Mr. Shepherd has always voted the Republican ticket, though he has never been actively identified with any political movement, nor has he aspired to political office, satisfied with the honor which his own sturdy efforts have brought to him, the position among his neighbors and friends as a worthy pioneer of Oregon.

C. H. HOAG. On a farm in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., where he was born September 15, 1841, C. H. Hoag was reared to habits of thrift and industry, and laid the foundation for the strong constitution and natural aptitude which have been so advantageously used during his residence in Oregon. His father, Daniel Hoag, was born in Dutchess county, N. Y., and by trade was a carpenter, although his entire active life was devoted to farming as well. As a young man he married Eliza Barlow, who was born in England in 1823, and when twelve years of age came to New York state with her parents, locating on a farm. Seven children, three boys and four girls, were born to Daniel and Eliza Hoag, and all were reared in New York, where the parents lived until about 1890, when they came west to visit their children. They were an unusually well mated and happy couple, and even in death they were not long divided, for both died in Chehalis county, Wash., in 1897, the father at the age of seventy-seven and the mother at the age of seventy-four.

During his youth C. H. Hoag worked on his father's farm in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., and irregularly attended the near-by district school. Arriving at his majority, he desired to depend solely upon his own efforts, so engaged in farming on his own responsibility. He was fairly successful, and in 1872, when thirty-one years of age, came west by way of New York, Panama and San Francisco, and for a year engaged in teaming in Santa Cruz. In 1873 he came to Marion county, and at Jefferson became manager for a saw-mill for a year and a half. While thus employed he met his future wife, Nora Terhune, who was a native daughter of Marion county, and born in December, 1852. Her father, Jabez, crossed the plains at a very early day, locating on a donation claim near Jefferson, Marion county. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hoag, Dwight, of Chehalis county, Wash., and Artie Gertrude, deceased.

In 1875 Mr. Hoag went to eastern Oregon, and in Wasco county engaged in the cattle and sheep business for two years. Returning to Marion county he soon after came to Polk county, and in 1878 bought his present farm of one hundred and twenty-five acres, one hundred of which are under cultivation. Mr. Hoag is engaged in stock-raising and general farming, and he has a well-improved place, with commodious residence and barns, good fences and modern agricultural implements. He is a Republican in politics, and has served as road supervisor and school trustee. With his wife he is a member of the Evangelical Church, of which he is at present a steward. Genial and kindly in his manner, enterprising and thrifty, Mr. Hoag commands the respect and good will of a host of friends and associates.

COL. JOHN KELSAY. High on the roll of fame in Oregon appears the name of Col. John Kelsay, and his influence has been felt far beyond the limits of the locality in which he made his home. He was long regarded as one of the most learned lawyers of the state and was not only a leading representative of the legal fraternity, but was a student of the questions relating to the social conditions, the labor interests and the citizenship of this country. In fact, his reading compassed almost every subject affecting the weal or woe of the nation and his voice was raised in defense or opposition to measures advanced, as he believed in their utility or felt that they would prove detrimental to the country. None doubted his patriotism, all admired his wisdom and even those holding different views acknowledged his honesty of purpose and honored him therefor.

Colonel Kelsay was born in Wayne county, Ky., October 23, 1819, his parents being Alexander and Jane (Kelley) Kelsay. He came of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and was ten years of age when in 1829 his parents removed from Kentucky to Cooter, Mo., afterward locating in Morgan county, that state. The educational privileges in Missouri were then extremely limited, but his mother was a lady of rare intellectual attainments and his early knowledge of books was gained at her knee. She not only instilled into his mind lessons that proved a foundation for broad literary learning, but also planted in his mind lessons of truth and uprightness which developed into a character that has ever commanded the highest respect. Early in life his mind seemed to possess an analytical turn and when he had attained his majority it seemed but natural that he should take up the study of law. In July, 1845, having read quite extensively, he was admitted to the bar and licensed to practice in the courts of Missouri. He remained a member of the legal profession of that state until 1853 and in the meantime met in forensic combat some men of ability who were forced to acknowledge his skill. At the age of eighteen he had been commissioned a captain of militia and two years later he was promoted to the rank of major, but not only military honors awaited him, but political as well, for in 1844 he was elected to represent his district in the legislature.

While Colonel Kelsay won distinction as a legislator and lawyer in Missouri the far west attracted him. He believed that amid the natural resources and great opportunities of Oregon he might find a broad field of labor, and therefore in 1853 he crossed the plains, arriving in Benton county in September of that year. Immediately afterward he entered upon his practice, opening an office in Corvallis, and while he won distinction in that way, he was ever alive to the best interests of the county and state and co-operated in many measures for the general good. On the breaking out of the Rogue river war he organized a company with which he went to the south and took an active part in the contest against the Indians. He then resumed his legal business and his clientage constantly grew and became of a nature distinctively representative. His knowledge of the law, his fitness for leadership and his marked ability led to his selection for honors somewhat outside of the strict path of his profession and yet having close connection with the welfare of the territory. In 1857 he served as chairman of the military committee on forming the state constitution. Again in 1868 he was called to public office, being elected a judge of the supreme court of the state, and upon the bench he showed himself the peer of the ablest men who have ever graced the higher court. While upon the bench he carefully lifted the judicial ermine above the mire of parties. Devotedly attached to his profession, systematic and methodical in habit, sober and discreet in judgment, calm in temper, diligent in research, conscientious in the discharge of every duty, courteous and kind in demeanor and inflexibly just on all occasions, these qualities enable Judge

Kelsay to take first rank among those who have held the highest judicial office in the state and made him the conservator of that justice wherein lies the safeguard of individual liberty and happiness and the defense of our national institutions.

While residing in Missouri in December, 1846, Judge Kelsay was united in marriage to Miss Martha C. Monroe, a daughter of General Monroe, one of the distinguished and eminent citizens of that state. Her death occurred November 20, 1854, and for his second wife the judge wedded Miss Countner, by whom he had two children, Annie and Lyman P., the latter dying in the Philippine Islands.

Judge Kelsay was a man of broad mind and liberal views, strong in his convictions and thoroughly in earnest in whatever work he undertook. He gained a high place in his profession by hard work, and few lawyers have made a more lasting impression upon the bar of the state, both for legal ability of a high order and for the intellectuality which impresses itself upon a community.

JOSEPH M. NOLAN. Where the sons of Erin are found, there are also found good citizens and enterprising business men. Versatility, energy and adaptability are the characteristics of the men that Ireland has sent to the new world, and J. M. Nolan of this review is a worthy scion of his race. He is now a leading merchant in Corvallis, and widely known in the valley. His birth occurred in Dublin, Ireland, in December, 1842, his parents being Matthew and Judith (Tiernan) Nolan, who were also natives of the Emerald Isle. The father was a farmer by occupation and came of a family that through generations had followed agricultural pursuits. By his marriage he had eight children, of whom our subject is the seventh in order of birth and the only one in America.

Reared upon his father's farm until sixteen years of age J. M. Nolan during that time acquired a good practical education in the national schools. He then entered upon an apprenticeship in a general mercantile store in Tullow, County Carlow, Ireland, where he served for a term of five years, and afterward continued in the employ of the same house for nine consecutive years—a fact which indicates unmistakably his fidelity to the interests of his employers and his absolute trustworthiness. He afterward went to the city of Dublin, where he was employed as a clerk in a large dry goods store until 1872, when he resolved to come to the United States. He made the voyage across the Atlantic to Quebec and thence crossed the continent to San Francisco, where he secured a clerkship in a dry goods establishment, remaining there until 1877, when he came to Oregon, settling in Albany. There he started in business on his own account, having a capital of a few hundred dollars which he had accumulated in San Francisco. He prospered in his new undertaking and in May, 1884, seeking a broader field of labor, he moved his stock to Corvallis, where he is now conducting a large dry goods and clothing business. He has built up an excellent trade through honorable methods, and in all his dealings he closely adheres to the strictest commercial rectitude, so that his business career is alike honorable and commendable. Today he occupies the central section of the First National Bank building, having a room twenty-five by one hundred feet, with an annex 25x25 feet, and around the whole is a broad gallery. Six years ago the firm of Nolan & Callahan was formed, the junior partner having learned the business while in the employ of Mr. Nolan as clerk.

Mr. Nolan has been twice married. He first wedded Miss Mary Callahan, who was born in Vancouver, Wash., her parents having been pioneers of the northwest. She died in Corvallis, leaving two children: Thomas Joseph, who is a graduate of the Mount Angel Business College and is now in his father's store; and Mary Kate, who is a student in St. Mary's Academy, Portland, Ore. For his second wife Mr. Nolan chose Miss Kate Thompson, a native of Oregon, and their marriage was celebrated here. There are two children by this union, Edward Victor and Gertrude. In national politics Mr. Nolan is a gold Democrat, but at local elections votes independently, regarding the capability of the candidate without reference to party ties. He has served for one term as councilman of Corvallis. For twenty-two years he has been a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His residence in America covers a period of thirty-one years, during which time he has worked his way steadily upward and by honorable methods has achieved success.

WESTON McLANE. The descendant of Scotch ancestry, Weston McLane has brought with him into the west those traits which distinguish the natives of that country, winning through perseverance and industry a prominent place in the business affairs of a community, and the esteem of those with whom he mingles. With no capital but an indomitable will, he broke away from the associations of his boyhood and set his face steadily toward the setting sun, becoming an emigrant in 1853.

The father of Weston McLane, Milton, was born in Scotland, the son of Maylord McLane.

also a native of that country, where he combined the two interests of tailoring and farming. Induced to cross the water to America he brought his family and located in Mason county, in what was then Virginia but is now included in West Virginia. There he made his home until his death. In that location Milton McLane grew to manhood, and was there married to Mary Summerville, a native of Mason county, and of the three children born to them, two sons and one daughter, the only one now living is Weston McLane, the oldest, who was born in Mason county, W. Va., May 30, 1833. The father afterward became a resident of Indiana, engaging in farming and stock-raising, and dying there in 1865, at the age of eighty-seven years.

Six months of the life of Weston McLane was spent inside the four walls of a school-room, this being in West Virginia, during which he acquired, necessarily, but little knowledge, and not content with this he has bent every effort toward self-improvement in the years that followed that short attendance of a public school, and through this perseverance and energy he has become a well informed man, keeping in touch with the events of the day. Early forced to seek his own living, he left West Virginia when only a boy, and going to Missouri, he located in Pike county, where he engaged in farm work on his uncle's plantation, acting as overseer of the negroes. In the spring of 1853 he outfitted for the trip across the plains, intent on seeking the gold mines of California, and after five months and four days he arrived safely with his wagon and five yoke of oxen, locating near Volcano, Amador county. Alternating his work for others with independent action he engaged in mining until 1878, when he came to Oregon by water and located the same year near Suver, Polk county. After two years in which he engaged in farming he followed teaming, soon, however, ending that to accept the position of agent for the Southern Pacific Railroad at Suver, in which employment he has since remained. While in California he combined the management of the Amador Sulphur works, with his mining ventures, continuing in that position seven years.

Just previous to taking his trip across the plains Mr. McLane married in Pike county, Mo., Sarah Yeater, who was born there, March 31, 1833. She was the daughter of Henry Yeater, an emigrant from Germany. Mr. and Mrs. McLane have had three children, of whom Edward is in the warehouse business at Suver, and is named as one of the prominent men of the town; and Francis and Martha deceased. Mr. McLane is independent in his political views, preferring to be free to exercise his judgment in the matter of voting, though he inclines to the principles of the Republican party. Being interested in educational matters, he has served for eight years as school clerk. In religion, he is a member of the Evangelical Church at Suver.

AMON SHADDEN. It was on December 20, 1853, on the farm where he yet lives near McMinnville, that Amon Shadden was born, a representative of an honored pioneer family. He is a son of T. J. Shadden, one of the pioneer settlers of this portion of the state. The days of chivalry and knighthood in Europe cannot furnish more interesting or romantic tales than our own western history. Into the wild mountain fastnesses of the unexplored west went brave men, whose courage was often called forth in encounters with hostile savages. The land was rich in all natural resources, in gold and silver, in agricultural and commercial possibilities, and awaited the demands of man to yield up its treasures, but its mountain heights were hard to climb, its forests difficult to penetrate, and the magnificent trees, the dense bushes or the jagged rocks often sheltered the skulking foe, who resented the encroachment of the pale face upon these "hunting grounds." The establishment of homes in this beautiful region therefore meant sacrifices, hardships, and oftimes death, but there were some men, however, brave enough to meet the red man in his own familiar haunts and undertake the task of reclaiming the district for civilization. The rich mineral stores of this vast region were thus added to the wealth of the nation; its magnificent forests contributed to the lumber industries and its fertile valleys added to the opportunities of the farmer and stock-raiser, and to-day the northwest is one of the most productive sections of the entire country. That this is so is due to such men as T. J. Shadden, whose name is inseparably interwoven with the history of the region. He was born February 26, 1809, near Nashville, Tenn. His parents were farmers by occupation, and when he was but a small boy his father was accidentally killed in a sparring match in which he was engaged for exercise. The son then remained at home with his mother until about fifteen or sixteen years of age, when he started out to make his own way in the world, going first to Mississippi, and afterward to Arkansas, where he worked as a general laborer. In early manhood he married Martha Sumler, a native of Arkansas, and in 1842 they joined a small colony of emigrants for the northwest. Their outfit consisted of a wagon drawn by oxen, and they carried with them a few household effects. Long was the journey and difficult the way, but eventually they reached Green river, Idaho. There they abandoned their wagons and came on by pack trains to Oregon as far as The Dalles, proceeding thence by skiff to Portland, while the cattle were driven across the country. Mr. Shadden and his wife first settled in Tualatin plain, where they remained until the spring of 1844, at which time they started for California, also journeying by pack train at that time. They became residents of Sacramento, where they resided until 1850, and there Mr. Shadden followed prospecting and mining. He also engaged in speculating to some extent, and conducted a large ranch and trading post, bravely meeting the difficulties and hardships incident to frontier life. In 1850, however, he returned by boat to Portland, after a successful sojourn in California, bringing with him $180,000 in gold dust. He took up a donation claim on Beaver creek, about two and a half miles west of McMinnville, and there he continued to make his home until his death. His labors resulted in the transformation of his land from a wild tract to one of rich fertility. He placed many improvements upon his farm, and at one time he owned two thousand acres of rich land in this vicinity. Extensively engaged in raising and dealing in stock he found it profitable, and as the years passed he added continually to his possessions. Mr. Shadden was a self-made man who deserved great credit for what he accomplished. He carried forward to successful completion whatever he undertook. He had no advantages, but with determined purpose and unfaltering energy he worked his way upward, and all that he acquired was the direct result and merited reward of his own labor. He was also a popular and prominent citizen, deeply interested in the welfare and prosperity of his community, and was a liberal contributor to school and church enterprises. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Shadden were born thirteen children: Lucilla, Madison, Jasper, Thomas, Henry, Mary, Eliza and Riley, all of whom are deceased; Amon, of this review, and four, who died in infancy. The father passed away in 1894, at the age of eighty-five years, and the mother, when eighty-six years of age, and both were laid to rest in McMinnville cemetery.

Amon Shadden, whose name introduces this record, began his education in the district schools and afterward attended high school and McMinnville College. He married Maggie Mitchell, a native of New York City, and they went to the home of Mr. Shadden's parents, whom they cared for in their declining years. Both became helpless and had to be wheeled around in invalid chairs for a number of years. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Amon Shadden was born one son, Granville, who is now living upon a part of the old donation claim. For his second wife, Amon Shadden chose Emma Stewart, a native of Minnesota, and their only child, Emma, is now deceased. His third wife bore the maiden name of Docia Gillum, and is still living with him upon his farm in Yamhill county.

Throughout his entire life Mr. Shadden has carried on general agricultural pursuits and stock-raising, making a specialty of Jersey cattle, Berkshire hogs and of draft and trotting horses. He owns about two hundred and sixty-four acres of land, most of which is the old donation claim. He has placed his fields under a high state of cultivation and has done not a little to improve the grade of stock in this locality by introducing valuable animals. In recent years he has discovered gold upon his place. He has found large quantities of blue quartz encased in silver coating, besides lead, silver and gold indications, and he is confident that the mineral deposits will give him a rich yield. His life has been one of untiring industry and his energy has been a large factor in his success. In his political views Mr. Shadden is a Democrat, and his religious faith is indicated by his membership in the Christian Church. For a half century he has lived upon the farm which is now his home, and this period covers his entire earthly pilgrimage. There have been no exciting chapters in his career or startling incidents, but probably no sketch given in this volume proves more conclusively the force of industry and honesty as factors in winning success.

JOHN H. GLASS. Among the prominent business men of Brownsville, Linn county, must be named John Hamilton Glass and Wilson Blaine Glass, who have been influential factors in the financial progress of this city and community. Through the display of exceptional business sagacity they have won an enviable place in the ranks of the progressive men of the Willamette valley. The business life of John H. Glass is so closely interwoven with that of his brother that a history of one would scarcely be complete without that of the other.

The first representative of the Glass family on American soil was John Glass, a native of County Antrim, Ireland, who came to the United States in 1818. He first located in Philadelphia, Pa., remaining for only a short time before he went on to Ohio, where his son, Robert, the father of the Glass brothers, was born, July 28, 1823, in the town of Steubenville. In 1831 the family removed to Illinois, settling in Warren county, locating six miles from the town of Monmouth, and there engaged in farming. During the gold excitement of 1849 Robert Glass was so imbued with the spirit of adventure and profit held out by a trip to the west that he determined to make the journey across the plains. He found a gratifying success at Feather river, near Marysville, and several other good localities famous in the early history of California. Satisfied with the result of his mining, he ventured north, in 1850 taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, located in Linn county, on the present site of the town of Crawfordsville. For some time he was located in the city, engaged in a general merchandise business, but soon returned to the farm, where he died July 13, 1903, at the age of nearly eighty years, active in the business of stock-raising and general farming up to the time of his death. He recently celebrated the golden anniversary of his wedding, having been married February 8, 1853, to Jane Gray, a native of Ohio. Her father was John Gray, born in Kentucky, and who went to Ohio in an early day, and followed that with a trip across the plains to Oregon in 1852. He located three miles southwest of Brownsville, on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres which occupied the present site of Twin Buttes. He met his death in 1889, at the age of seventy-six years, being the victim of confidence men while passing through Portland from a visit at Prineville, eastern Oregon. The children which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Glass are five in number, four sons and one daughter, of whom John H. and W. B. reside in Brownsville; D. H. is assistant city engineer of Seattle, Wash.; J. W. is a farmer in this locality; and Ivy J. resides on the old home. After his son's settlement in the west John Glass came to Oregon, via the Isthmus of Panama, and made his home with the family, dying here May 26, 1870, over eighty-eight years old. He was a sturdy member of a good old Scotch family of whom the eldest son had been given the name of John for many generations, a complete history of the genealogy of the family being in the possession of a relative in Corvallis, Lillian Glass by name. Religiously he was a Presbyterian.

John Hamilton Glass, the eldest son, was born on his father's donation claim at Crawfordsville, June 12, 1855, and was there reared to manhood, receiving his education in the common schools of Oregon, until he was nineteen years old, when he spent the winter of 1874-5 in the Oregon Agricultural College of Corvallis. In 1880 he became interested in a planing mill, conducting the same for several years, when the business was transferred to Cottage Grove. Later, Mr. Glass and his brother, W. B., invested in the Great Northern Mill & Mining Company, for a half of which the two put in a four-stamp mill. The claim is located in the Blue river mining district, one and one half miles northeast of the Lucky Boy mine, and has been splendidly improved in every way, tunnels, mills, etc., making it a very valuable property. The company is now incorporated with a capital of $120,000, $100,000 of which is paid up, and Mr. Glass is its president and business manager. In 1896 he entered the bank of Brownsville as cashier, in which position he remained until January, 1903, when he became vice president of the institution.

Mr. Glass' first wife was Bessie Trigg. She was a native of Kentucky and while there on a visit in 1885 with her husband she died, leaving one son, Robert. Several years afterward Mr. Glass was married in Crawfordsville to Althea Chance, a native of Ohio, and who died in 1899. Two daughters were born of the second marriage, Ava and Hazel, who make their home with their father. Fraternally Mr. Glass is a member of the Blue Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons; Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Knights of Pythias; and Rathbone Sisters. In his religious views he follows the convictions of his ancestors and belongs to the Presbyterian Church. As a Republican he has been of no little service to his city, serving as city recorder for one year and since that time as city treasurer for some time. He has also been school clerk since 1896.

The brother with whom Mr. Glass has been so closely associated is Wilson Blaine Glass, next to himself in age, having been born six miles east of Crawfordsville August 30, 1858, spending a large part of his youth upon the paternal farm. He was educated in the common schools in the vicinity of his home, later attending a private school, from which he received a diploma for a business course. In 1883 he engaged with his brother John in the planing mills of Crawfordsville. In 1897 he came to Brownsville and assumed the position of secretary of the Eagle Woolen Mills Company, three years later going to Cottage Grove to look after the interests of the planing mills, which which had been removed to that city. In June, 1902, he sold his interest in Cottage Grove and returned to Brownsville, where he took the position of assistant cashier in the bank of Brownsville, and in January, 1903, was elected cashier, a position which he has creditably maintained up to the present time. As previously mentioned he is interested in the Great Northern Mill & Mining Company, being a partner with his brother in that concern.

The marriage which united W. B. Glass to Vina E. Ramsey took place in Halsey, she also being a native of Oregon, having been born in Lane county. Fraternally, Mr. Glass is associated with the Woodmen of the World, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Religiously he is a member of the Presbyterian Church at Crawfordsville, and is a Republican in politics, now serving as clerk of school district No. 3, Linn county.

WILLIAM P. IRELAND. At the present time William P. Ireland is the owner of twelve hundred acres of land in different parts of Oregon, the greater portion being in Polk county. A native of Jackson county, Ind., he was born April 16, 1846, his father, David, having been born in Ohio in 1819. His mother, formerly Mary A. Sanderson, was also born in Jackson county, in 1825, and was reared on her father's farm, remaining at home until her marriage. David Ireland removed with his family from Indiana to Illinois in 1853, locating on a farm in Effingham county, where he remained for one year. Next he located in Iowa for a year, and in 1864 crossed the plains with mule-teams, which they found a great improvement over the old-time oxen. Six months were consumed on the trip, and upon arriving in Oregon Mr. Ireland purchased a farm of six hundred and forty acres adjoining the one now occupied by his son, and here he spent many happy and successful years, attaining to a prominent and influential place in the community.

William P. Ireland was educated in the common schools of Lucas county, Iowa, and was eighteen years of age when he came to Oregon. At the age of twenty-three he started out on his own responsibility, and from then until the present time has had no help in carving out his fortune. With his earnings he bought a portion of his father's donation claim, which formed the nucleus for his present large landed possessions, and forthwith inaugurated large general farming and stock-raising enterprises, a preference being given to the latter. He is an excellent judge of stock, but inclines to the reliable and substantial rather than fancy breeds. February 9, 1869, Mr. Ireland was united in marriage with Cornelia Staats, who was born in Yamhill county, January 11, 1851, a daughter of Stephen Staats, one of the foremost pioneers and up-builders of this county. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ireland, of whom Ora D. is a dentist of Portland; Anna L. is the wife of C. M. Tetherow of Lewisville; Clarence E. is at Independence; Glenn O., Willard W., Fred M., and Bessie F., are living at home. Mrs. Ireland is a member of the Rebekahs, and with her husband is active in the Christian Church. Mr. Ireland has always subscribed to the principles of the Democratic party, but has never directed his efforts towards office-holding. He is a broad-minded and progressive citizen, devoted to his farm, his home and his friends, and one in whom the community at large places the utmost confidence.

The Staats family was very early represented in the state of New York, where settled the first German emigrants. Stephen Staats, the father of Mrs. Ireland, was born in Albany, N. Y., July 21, 1821, a son of Isaac W. Staats, who also was born in New York, and who was a merchant for many years of his life. The grandfather came west on a visit around the Horn, and died in Polk county at the age of seventy-six years. He married Jane Ann Crowlins, also born in New York, and who bore him ten children, few of whom are living. Mr. Staats was reared in Albany until fifteen years of age, and then went across the country to Kansas where he secured a position as clerk in a store at Leavenworth. With his father he removed after two years to Platte county, Mo., of which county they were the very first settlers, and the first white people to whom the Indians sold land. The father put up the first house in the county, and lived there for eight years, or until 1845. That year Isaac and Stephen Staats crossed the plains in an ox-train, one of the members of the train being John M. Forest, whose daughter, Cordelia, afterward became Mrs. Staats. The journey was a pleasant one, rendered so no doubt by the presence of a winsome face, which he decided should henceforth brighten his fireside. Arriving in Oregon the Staats brothers each located a section of land on the Luckiamute, and built log cabins in which they lived until the marriage of Stephen, March 29, 1846. The following year the young people, with Mr. Forest and his family and Isaac Staats went over the mountain with pack mules, to California. Locating in Santa Clara county, Stephen Staats secured work in the redwoods, and was at Sutter's Fort when gold was discovered. Afterward he clerked for Sam Brannan on Mormon's Island, the stock in trade being blankets and general provisions for the Indians and early settlers. The Indians had to pay ten dollars apiece for blankets, the price being paid in gold dust, determined by placing ten dollars in silver on one side of the scales, and balancing it on the other side with gold dust. In this way a great deal of gold was taken into the crude little store, and Mr. Staats came to regard the precious metal as a very common and easily gotten commodity.

In 1848 the same party wended their way northward to Oregon, Mr. Staats having made up his mind that gold was so common it would no longer have great value. The ocean voyage for himself and wife cost three hundred dollars, and upon arriving in Portland they decided to spend the winter there. In the spring they returned to the claim in Polk county, which the owner afterward traded for a rifle, and purchased six hundred and forty acres adjoining, upon which he lived until his death, April 7, 1898. Ten children were born to himself and wife, the son, John H., being the first white child born between the Luckiamute and La Creole. Mr. Staats was an enterprising and progressive man, and took an active part in promoting the interests of the Democratic party in his adopted state. A fluent speaker, he assisted in many a campaign, and his eloquence was equally appreciated in the Grange, of which he was a lecturer for many years. He was a justice of the peace for many years, and represented his county in the territorial legislature in 1876. He was president of the County Pioneer Society.

WASHINGTON R. TOWNSEND. The success of W. R. Townsend, one of the most enterprising farmers in Marion county, should serve as an example to all who are willing to travel the path of industry, business integrity, and progress. Mr. Townsend is a representative of one of the prominent pioneer families of the state, and on his maternal side traces his descent from a Revolutionary forefather named Sampson. W. R. Townsend was born in Fulton county, Ill., November 27, 1846, and is a son of G. G. Townsend, who was born in New York state August 12, 1803.

G. G. Townsend was one of the men who builded solely upon his own energies, and with practically no assistance from outside sources. His father died when he was a small boy, and afterward he was put out to work, his earnings going towards the support of his mother. While still a boy he removed with his mother to Ohio, where he grew to manhood, and married Mariam Sampson, a native of Ohio, whose father served six years and six months in the Revolutionary war. Mr. Townsend eventually removed with his wife and children to Illinois, and in 1850 started across the plains with ox teams, six months being required for the journey. The family came direct to Marion county and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres two and a half miles southeast of Woodburn, which consisted entirely of wild land. In this wilderness a little log house was built for the accommodation of the family, and the desolation of their situation may best be understood when it is known that their nearest neighbor was four miles distant. In time golden harvests rewarded the industry of the father and children, a new house took the place of the rough hewed log structure, and many blessings came the way of the industrious and thrifty family. On this same farm sixteen children received their start in life, and here the father lived to be eighty-one and the mother eighty-two years of age. Of the three children living of this large family Ebenezer Leonard is living with his brother W. R., and Jonathan Rockwell lives on a farm near Troutdale.

It is interesting to note the religious enthusiasm accredited to the father, who was devoted to the welfare of the Christian Church, going regularly to a meeting-house ten miles distant from his home. In politics he was a Republican.

In spite of the disadvantages attending his acquirement of an education, W. R. Townsend managed to qualify as a teacher, and was thus engaged for a couple of years. At the same time he continued to make the old donation claim his headquarters, but after his marriage with Nancy Emeline Stephens, who was born December 21, 1857, and whose parents crossed the plains in 1852, settling near Needy, Clackamas county, he went to live on the farm which has since been his home, and which consists of ninety acres. The most modern of improvements, practical management, and up-to-date methods have contributed to make the Townsend farm one of the most desirable in Marion county. The owner has just completed a modern two-story frame dwelling, and his barns and out-buildings are substantially constructed. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, twenty-eight acres being devoted to hops. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Townsend, of whom Delbert H. is deceased; May, deceased, was married to Nathan Jones; they had one daughter, Cecil, who lives with her grandparents; Clyde S. is living at home; Winona G. is the wife of Grover Todd, of Woodburn; Ammi Rockwell and Ada are living with their parents.

A Republican in politics, Mr. Townsend has taken an active interest in local affairs, and has served as road supervisor, member of the school board and as justice of the peace. He is a member of the Woodburn Grange No. 79, and in religion is connected with the Christian Church.

WILLIAM R. MCKAY. One and a half miles from Champoeg is a farm which, from the standpoint of equipment, cultivation and general productiveness, is unexcelled in Marion county or in the entire Willamette valley. That its owner, William R. McKay, is a master in his line and an agriculturist who works along scientific lines, is evident to all who are permitted to avail themselves of the hospitality of this ideal rural home, and to visit the various departments which contribute to his large annual income.

Much may be accomplished on seven hundred acres of land located in the center of one of the most fertile valleys in the world; and this fact has not been lost upon Mr. McKay, who has the keen and far-sighted judgment of the typical northwestern business man. Three hundred and fifty acres of his estate are under cultivation, and the balance is devoted to timber and pasturage. During the year 1902 the yield from his forty-acre hop-yard was fifty-two thousand pounds, and for the proper care of this product he maintains three large hop-houses. The barns, outhouses, implements and general improvements are on the most extensive scale, in keeping with similar enterprises in the oldest and most advanced centers of agricultural activity. Upon the fertile pastures graze large numbers of Shorthorn cattle and other high-grade stock, and general farming is conducted on a large scale.

The knowledge of such marked success naturally presupposes years of exertion and struggle with adversity, which are emphasized in the career of Mr. McKay. He is a native son of Oregon, having been born near St. Paul, Marion county, December 30, 1849. His father, James McKay, was born in Ireland and came to America in young manhood where after various locations he made his way to Oregon and from that time until his death was actively interested in the growth and upbuilding of the state. For more complete details, refer to the sketch of James McKay, which appears on another page of this work. William R. McKay was favored with an education in the public schools and Santa Clara College, Santa Clara, Cal. In 1873 he became foreman of the Glynn ranch at Jacinto, Cal. For about five years he resided in California, spending most of the time in Sacramento and San Francisco. Upon his return to Oregon he first assisted his brother, John N., in the management of his father's ranch, where general farming and stock-raising was carried on on an extensive scale.

January 13, 1885, Mr. McKay was united in marriage with Anna Kavanaugh, a native of St. Louis, Marion county, Ore., and a daughter of Daniel and Catherine (Doyle) Kavanaugh, both of whom were natives of Ireland, came to America in youth, were married in Illinois and settled in Oregon about 1861. In that year he and his brother severed their partnership, William R. McKay removing to the farm upon which he has since accomplished such splendid results. He and his wife are the parents of five children: Stanley J., Arthur W., Estelle C., Justin L. and Albert J.

Mr. McKay is a Democrat in politics and with his family he finds a religious home in the Roman Catholic Church. To an exceptional degree he enjoys the esteem and confidence of all who know him, and his personal characteristics are such as to render him a popular member of the community. Though he has never been a seeker after political honors, he has been actively identified with most of the movements of a public nature calculated to benefit the moral, educational or industrial standing of Marion county. The indefatigable energy, the industry and businesslike methods he has displayed in the development of his magnificent farm have naturally resulted in placing him in a conspicuous position among his fellowmen, and the younger men of the present generation feel that, in him, they have an example well worthy of emulation. Few agriculturists have done so much as Mr. McKay to illustrate the possibilities of the soil of the Willamette valley, and for this reason, if no other existed, he is entitled to rank among the representative men of the valley.

HENRY S. SMITH. In a little log cabin still standing, on what is now known as the James Haggard place, Henry S. Smith was born April 8, 1854, two miles northeast of Lewisville, Polk county, Ore., the son of John H. Smith, a pioneer of 1849. The latter was born in Montgomery county, Mo., the son of James Smith, who came to Oregon in the early days of her history, dying at Lewisville at a ripe old age.

In the course of time John H. Smith grew to manhood and married Martha J. Lewis, a native of Kentucky, and with the courage born in the American pioneer the two outfitted with ox-teams and other articles necessary for such a trip and in 1849 started across the plains for the great northwest, regardless of the dangers and months of weary travel that lay between them and their destination. During the six months which their trip occupied they had many encounters with the Indians, but managed to come through safely, and on arriving in Polk county, Ore., Mr. Smith at once took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, where Mrs. Smith now makes her home, the land having been retained in the family through the passing years. As a farmer Mr. Smith occupied all his time, though for many years prior to his death, which occurred January 13, 1893, at the age of sixty-eight years, ten months and twenty-five days, he had been disabled through a spinal affection, caused through exposure during service in the Cayuse war in 1855-6. He was a member of the Christian Church at Lewisville, and one of the organizers of the congregation at that place. Politically he was a Democrat.

Of the nine children born to his parents, three daughters and six sons, Henry S. Smith was the second, and on his father's farm, which was located three miles northeast of Lewisville, he grew to manhood, receiving his first knowledge of books at the little log school-house in the vicinity of his home. When his education was considered complete he went to work for his father in the farm duties to which he had been trained from his earliest boyhood, and when twenty-three years of age he entered upon the business himself.

June 4, 1879, he was united in marriage with Miss Kate Yeater, a native of Benton county, Ore., born March 5, 1855. Of the three children born to them Lulu A. is deceased; Ray L. lives in Falls City, Ore.; and Myrnie F. makes her home with her parents. Politically Mr. Smith is a Republican, and has served as school director. His wife is a member of the Evangelical Church of Lewisville.

Mr. Smith has met with a modest success. Mrs. Smith owns sixty-four acres of land, thirty-six of which her husband is busy cultivating, and which is principally in hay. In addition to his farm he also has a small store at Lewisville, and acts as postmaster of that town. Before settling steadily to his farm work he acted as traveling salesman for a large implement house, gaining an insight into the commercial world, which has been of great benefit to him.

OREN D. RIDER. Among the extensive and well-to-do agriculturists of Polk county, Mr. Rider is prosperously engaged in his chosen vocation on one of the pleasantest and most desirable homesteads in the town of Independence. He also owns considerable city property, one of his buildings being now rented for mercantile purposes, and not far from the city limits he has a small but valuable farm of thirty-four acres, fourteen of which are devoted to the raising of hops, while five acres are planted with prune trees.

A native of New York, Mr. Rider was born, in April, 1839, at Lawrence, Otsego county, of English ancestry. His father, Abraham Rider, was born at Leeds, Yorkshire England, about 1803. After learning the trade of a moulder he emigrated to America in search of fortune, coming here in 1823. Settling in New York, he followed his trade at West Point, and in different parts of the state, for many years, being successful in his labors as a foundryman. He subsequently removed to La Salle county, Ill., and from there to Palo Alto county, Iowa, where he resided until his death, in 1876. He married Sarah M. Harrison, who was born in the western part of Connecticut, not many miles from Poughkeepsie, N. Y. She came from distinguished ancestry, being a descendant of General Harrison, at one time governor of the Northwestern territory. She is still living, making her home with her son, W. S. Rider, in Oregon City. Three children were born of their union, namely: Oren D., the subject of this sketch; W. S., of Oregon City; and Mrs. Sarah A. Laurie, who died in Kansas.

Receiving such educational advantages as were offered by the public schools of New York state, Oren D. Rider remained at home during his early manhood, subsequently working with his father and brother until permanently settled in Oregon. Removing from Illinois to Iowa, he was there engaged in his independent occupation of farming until 1875, when he became a resident of Oregon City, Ore., where he remained eight years as an agriculturist. Coming to Polk county in 1883, Mr. Rider purchased his present home farm of seventeen acres, on which he has made valuable improvements. He has erected a substantial dwelling-house, built necessary barns and outbuildings, and has all the implements and machinery essential to a well equipped farming estate. He carries on general agriculture, making somewhat of a specialty of the culture of hops, to which nine acres of this farm is devoted. For twelve years he also had the management of the Hurschburger farm of twelve hundred acres. In his agricultural labors he has been prosperous, his practical and systematic methods, excellent judgment and his skill being conducive to success.

In 1861 Mr. Rider married Mary E. Newell, who was born in Ashtabula, Ohio. Eight children blessed their union, six of whom are living, namely: Fred, a resident of Washington; Mrs. Hattie E. Clark, of Salem, Ore.; Mrs. Lena O. Jones, of Independence; Mrs. Cora E. Edwards, of Washington; Frank, at home; and Netta, wife of Frank Buckley, of Washington. In local affairs Mr. Rider evinces a deep interest, keeping well informed on current events, and contributing generously towards all enterprises calculated to promote the prosperity of town and county. He is a Republican in politics, and has served as road supervisor and as school director. While living in Illinois he became a Mason.

JAMES H. MULKEY. A man whose sustained efforts have been productive of many returns is James H. Mulkey, born in Benton county, Ore., four miles west of Corvallis, November 24, 1848, the son of Luke Mulkey, one of the early settlers of this state. The father was born in Kentucky, May 9, 1810, the son of a farmer, who died when Luke Mulkey was quite a young man. With his remaining parent he went to Missouri, and there met and married Miss Ruth Allison, born in that state in 1816.

The father was one of nine children, several of whom crossed the plains to Oregon, Johnson Mulkey being the first. He made several trips, the first one being in 1845, his return to the east the next year being followed by his emigration to Benton county, Ore., in 1847. Thomas Mulkey, another brother, followed after his father located in Yamhill county, but died three days after his arrival. Luke Mulkey crossed the plains with his family in 1847 with ox-teams, and after six months on the trip they arrived in Benton county, where they passed the winter. In Benton county Mr. Mulkey took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, remaining upon it until 1858, when he sold the place and removed to a farm near Monmouth, Polk county. His farm here consisted of four hundred and seventy acres, upon which he remained until his death, which occurred at the age of eight-four years in 1893. His first wife having died in 1859 he married Mrs. Narcissa Brents, who died in 1865. The third partner of his joys and sorrows was Mrs. Sarah Caton, who departed this life in 1894. Mr. Mulkey was an eminently successful man among the farmers of this county, whose competency came through his own well directed efforts, and nothing could tempt him to depart from his ways and engage in the worrying cares of public life.

James H. Mulkey was one of six children, the others being as follows: Rachel Waller; Eliza Hawley; W. J., of Monmouth; F. Y., also of the same city; and Renna Boney, of Portland. At the age of seventeen years, and after his education in the schools of Monmouth had been completed, James H. left home, going to California, where he remained for sixteen months. On his return to Oregon with the substantial returns of his trip, he located in Wasco county. Here he took up a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres and engaged in stock-raising, meeting with a success broken only by one misfortune. On a trip to Colorado with a drove of cattle the mercury fell so low that he lost nearly all his stock. In 1881 he returned to Polk county and located on the place where he now makes his home. The farm contains four hundred acres of land, three hundred and fifty of which is tillable. He is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and is also interested in an apple orchard, eleven acres being devoted to its cultivation. Mr. Mulkey's property in Monmouth consists of two brick store-buildings.

In 1871 Mr. Mulkey married Miss Emily J. Porter, born in Linn county, Ore., her father, Samuel Porter, having crossed the plains in 1852. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Mulkey, eight of whom are now living. They are as follows: Frank H., at home; May M. McGowan, of Sherman county; Alice G. Holman, of Josephine county; and Augusta, Blanche, Zona, Edna and Myrle, all at home with their parents. Being a public-spirited man and one interested in the affairs of his city and county, Mr. Mulkey has been selected by the Democratic party, of which he is a strong adherent, to act as road supervisor and school director of his district, having held the former for many years. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church, of which he is a deacon.

REV. I. N. MULKEY. From a long line of ancestry has been transmitted to Rev. I. N. Mulkey those traits which have distinguished his useful life, though not yet having passed the three score and ten years allotted to man. His forefathers have been men of God, in whose service in pioneer fields they have left the impress of their strong and capable personality in the upbuilding of commonwealths. John Mulkey, the grandfather, was born in Fairforest, Spartanburg county, S. C., in the year 1773, and as a young man served as a minister of the Baptist Church, but was early identified with the Christian Church, in November, 1809, organizing a church of this denomination. The father of I. N. Mulkey, Jonathan, was born in Kentucky, in September, 1795, whither his parents had removed from their South Carolina home, and in that state he grew to manhood, engaged in the cultivation of the soil. In Kentucky he married Tealitha Hardin, born in North Carolina, in the year 1800, and together they removed to Franklin county, Ill., where he purchased a farm and spent the greater part of the remainder of his life engaged in its cultivation. His death occurred in Williamson county, Ill., in February, 1860, his life having been spent rather for the benefit of those about him than for the accumulation of wealth. Of the fourteen children born of their union, five are now living: Lucinda, now Mrs. Harlin of Iowa; Jacob, of St. Joseph; Rev. I. N., of this review; W. J., who is conducting a hotel in Eugene, Ore.; and Rev. A. H., of Coquille, a minister of the Christian Church.

In Monroe county, Ky., February 9, 1840, occurred the birth of I. N. Mulkey, and after a very limited education received in the primitive schools of Illinois, he was apprenticed to a blacksmith, with whom he remained for three and a half years. Upon the close of his apprenticeship in 1866 he moved to Missouri, settling in Worth county, and continued his trade. In 1868 he went to Nebraska, settling in Lancaster county, where he took up a homestead claim.

Mr. W. Stewart

From the combined industries of farming and blacksmithing he derived a good income. With the hope of broadening his capabilities he removed to Oregon in 1871, locating at Pleasant Hill, Lane county, where he engaged at his trade, and soon began to take an active part in religious work, preparing himself by a close study of the Bible, and finally took permanent charge of pastorates throughout the country as a minister of the Christian Church. In October, 1898, Mr. Mulkey was appointed pastor of the church at Bethel, Polk county, where in addition to pastorate work he engaged in gardening upon the six and a half acres of land which he had purchased.

In September, 1861, Mr. Mulkey was united in marriage with Miss Sarah F. Randolph, a native of Posey county, Ind., born July 12, 1846. Her father, James Randolph, died in 1854, in Williamson county, Ill. Her mother, Margaret (Williams) Randolph, also died in Williamson county, Ill., in 1856. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Mulkey seven are now living. They are as follows: B. F., ex-state senator from Polk county and now president of the state normal school at Ashland; Luella, now Mrs. Parks, of Pleasant Hill; P. J., principal of the schools at Arlington; J. E., of Palouse, Wash.; J. R., of Colfax, Wash.; Charles, of Ashland, Ore.; and Veda, still at home. As a Republican in politics Mr. Mulkey has always stood for the best interests of the county. Fraternally he is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Springfield, Ore.

MATHIAS W. STEWART. Five hundred acres of the most desirable farming land in Polk county is owned and operated by Mathias W. Stewart, an enthusiastic appreciator of the many advantages of this great state, and one of the most enterprising and resourceful of the sons of New York to seek a home in the northwest. Mr. Stewart was born at Auburn, Cayuga county, N. Y., August 2, 1832, and from his father, David C., inherits the traits of perseverance and business ability which have encompassed his success. The father spent his entire life in New York state, where he was born in 1806, and died in 1856. During the greater part of his active life he was engaged in mercantile pursuits, in which he achieved great success, and accumulated quite a competence. He was prominently identified with county affairs, and was treasurer thereof for at least twelve years, during his term of service faithfully serving the best interests of Cayuga county. A Democrat in politics, he was a staunch supporter of his party, and filled many positions of trust besides that of county treasurer. In religion he was a Presbyterian, as was also his wife, formerly Elizabeth Hoffman, a native of New York state. Mrs. Stewart died in New York in 1869, having borne him four children, three sons and one daughter. Catherine is deceased. The oldest son, Charles, sailed around the Horn in 1848, and after mining and prospecting returned to his home by way of Panama in 1852. The following year he again came west, returning to New York in 1856. During the Civil war he attained the rank of colonel in a New York regiment, while his brother, David, the youngest of the children, became a lieutenant during the same momentous struggle, and eventually died in New York.

While attending the academy at Auburn, N. Y., Mathias W. Stewart was a companion of the late Roscoe Conkling, who now sleeps in a graveyard at Utica, N. Y. He was also acquainted with that distinguished secretary of state under Lincoln, William H. Seward, who came from the same town, and with whom he played as a youth. After leaving the academy Mr. Stewart entered his father's store, remaining there until 1853. Becoming interested in mining, he then came west via Nicaragua, and for eight years tempted fortune with varying success and failure in the northern part of California. In 1861 he located in Salem, Marion county, Ore., and in 1862 went to Idaho, engaging in various occupations until 1864. Returning to Salem, he engaged as clerk in the general merchandise store of R. M. Wade for five years, in 1868 removing to his present farm near Independence. A large portion of his land is under cultivation, and he has a fine rural residence, commodious barns, convenient outhouses, and all necessary agricultural implements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, besides raising some fruit, and his scientific and practical methods have resulted in gratifying returns.

In 1868, in Polk county, Mr. Stewart married Elizabeth Davis, who was born in Kane county, Ill., January 26, 1839, a daughter of James Davis, who was born in Kentucky May 5, 1805, and died January 28, 1848. Mr. Davis married in his young manhood Lavisa Lawrence, born in Kentucky July 6, 1808, and died April 1, 1879. She was the mother of two sons and three daughters, of whom Mrs. Stewart is second youngest. Mr. Davis started across the plains in 1847, but died on reaching St. Joseph, Mo., in January, 1848. The same year his wife and children came over the plains to Oregon. The mother took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Independence, and in 1850 married Joseph Carmack, her death occurring on the old donation claim as before stated. Mr. Stewart is a Democrat in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Independence. He was one of the first stockholders in the Independence National Bank, and for several years was a director. Mr. Stewart is a man of sterling integrity and forceful personal characteristics, coupled with determination and good business judgment.

MATHIAS GAULET. Worthy of mention among the upbuilders of Marion county is Mathias Gaulet, at present living a retired life in Gervais, but formerly extensively engaged in farming, and in plying his trade as carpenter. Mr. Gaulet was born in the district of Three Rivers, Canada, July 15, 1827, and is the son of Peter and Madeline (Vannas) Gaulet, natives also of Canada, the former born in Quebec. As the name indicates, the remote ancestors came from France, and settled in Canada at a very early day. Peter Gaulet was a blacksmith by trade, and followed his chosen occupation for many years in Canada, and in 1848 engaged in the grocery business in Montreal, which he followed until his death in 1862, at the age of eighty-two years. His wife, who lived to be eighty years of age, died in 1863; she bore him eleven children, three of whom are living, of whom Mathias is the second child. Antoine, born in 1815, lives in Gervais, Marion county, and Virginia, born in 1831, lives in Montreal, Canada.

Following upon his completion of the public school training in Canada, Mr. Gaulet learned the carpenter's trade, for which he showed very early aptitude. At the age of fourteen he started out to make his own way in the world, and in 1848 settled in Monroe, Mich., where he learned his trade, later returning to his old home in Canada. In 1851 he was again a resident of Monroe, and the following year he and his brother Antoine outfitted and crossed the plains with a horse team, being about six months on the way. For a short time he followed his trade in San Francisco, Cal., and then in May, 1852, came to Marion county, Ore., where he soon after bought a farm about three miles northwest of Gervais. In 1855 he was united in marriage with Nancy Baker, a native of Virginia, born in 1840, who with two sisters crossed the plains in 1843.

Until 1892 Mr. Gaulet lived on the farm, which he improved to the best of his ability, and made of it a fine home and paying venture. Realizing that his powers were waning as far as physical endurance was concerned, and believing himself entitled to a few years of relaxation from arduous duties, he located in a pleasant home in Gervais in 1892, and has since made that his permanent place of abode. Mr. Gaulet also owns other town property, and taken all in all, is the possessor of a very fair competency.

In political affiliation Mr. Gaulet is a Democrat, and among the offices held by him with credit is that of treasurer of Gervais. He is a member of the Catholic Church, as are also the other members of his family. His wife died in 1880, leaving one son, George, born in 1858, who is engaged in mining in Alaska, is married and lives in British Columbia. Four children died in early childhood.

In 1891 Mr. Gaulet married Mrs. Philomena (Piatt) Campbell, who had four children by her former husband. Mr. Gaulet is a man of strict integrity, and his many desirable personal characteristics entitle him to the esteem and consideration of all.

DAVID WRIGHT GRIERSON. To that honored pioneer, David W. Grierson, is due the distinction of having imported the first Clydesdale horses into the state of Oregon. Although deceased in 1895, Mr. Grierson is recalled as one of the best farmers and most progressive men in Marion county, as indicated principally by the farm now occupied by his widow, which has few superiors from the standpoint of equipment and fine cultivation.

A native of Duffrieshire, Scotland, Mr. Grierson was born February 28, 1833, and was reared on the farm owned and occupied by his father, who was a mason by trade, and quite a successful man. At the age of seventeen the son started out to make his own living, and, after landing in America made his way to the gold fields of California. That this was a congenial and successful occupation was proven by the fact that he remained at it for seventeen years in the Cherokee mines. He then took a trip back to Scotland, and brought back with him some of the Clydesdale horses for which that country is famous, and engaged in their sale in Salem, where he located in 1873. He was fortunate in this venture, for the strong and beautiful animals won friends wherever they were sold, and their practical worth was soon demonstrated to the satisfaction of all who appreciated the fine points of a horse.

In 1875 Mr. Grierson married at Salem, Marcella Hensley, who was born in Marion county, Ill., March 5, 1854. There were four children born to them: Thomas, who died in infancy; Florence B., the wife of Henry Frank, of Salem; they have one daughter, Helen A.; Mary M., living at home; Frank C., also living with his mother. Ten months after his marriage, Mr. Grierson left Salem and settled on a farm three Hooker and Meade, and took an active part in many of the more important battles of that time, among others being the Seven Days' Fight, when he received a bayonet wound in the hand; Gaines' Mills, South Mountain, Antietam, and Gettysburg. During the latter engagement he served at General Meade's headquarters as a courier. On March 3, 1864, at Rapidan, Va., he received his honorable discharge, and left the army in April, 1864, going directly to New York City.

A short time later Mr. Strong went to South Carolina in search of contraband cotton, returning the following year to New York. Removing to McLean county, Ill., in 1867, he engaged in agricultural pursuits, continuing there until September 3, 1888, meeting with unquestioned success in his operations. Coming then to Oregon, he spent six months in Salem, then settled at McCoy, taking possession of his farm on March 4, 1889. He has ninety-one acres of land, on which he has added many substantial improvements. He managed it himself with most satisfactory results for several years, but is now living retired, enjoying a well deserved leisure.

Mr. Strong married, in 1873, Mary E. Simkins, who was born in Highland county, Ohio, August 28, 1846. Her father, Jeremiah Simkins, was born January 22, 1822, in New Jersey, while her mother, Margaret Rhodes, was a native of Pennsylvania. Mr. and Mrs. Strong have one child, William L. Strong, who operates a saw-mill about five miles from McCoy, but lives with his parents. Mr. Strong is a Republican in politics, and has served as school director at McCoy.

Mr. and Mrs. Strong removed in August, 1903, to McMinnville, Yamhill county, where they intend to reside permanently.

ELIJAH BAILEY. So well has Elijah Bailey made use of the opportunities which have come his way in the northwest that he is today one of the foremost farmers and largest landowners in his neighborhood in Polk county. Mr. Bailey's rise in life may be studied with profit by any who desire to overcome obstacles and slowly but surely make their way to the front, for in his make-up he has the traits of character most needful for the well-being of substantial communities. Born in Adair county, Ky., March 6, 1834, he is a son of Robert and Ailsey (Hendricks) Bailey, natives of Virginia. His grandfather, Lewis Bailey, was also born in Virginia of Irish descent, while his maternal grandfather, William Hendricks, was of English descent, and by occupation was an old-time school teacher. Robert Bailey served in both the Creek and Cherokee wars, but died comparatively young in 1835, when his son Elijah was but a small boy.

Of the thirteen children, nine sons and four daughters, in his father's family, Elijah and Cynthia Larkin, of Sonoma, Cal., are the only survivors. When a year and twenty days old Elijah moved with the rest of the family to Sangamon county, Ill., and was there reared on a farm. He was educated in a limited degree at the early subscription school of his neighborhood. In 1849 the family moved to Greene county, Mo., and settled on a productive farm, raised general farm produce, and remained there until coming to California in 1854.

Mr. Bailey contracted to accompany a herd of cattle en route to California in that year, for which he was paid $10 per month. He brought his family with him. They were fairly successful as miners, and returned to Greene county via the Isthmus in 1858, remaining there until Mr. Bailey again crossed the plains with ox teams in 1860. He located a place twenty-five miles above Stockton, Cal., and in 1862 went down to the Pajaro Valley, which place he sold two years later, and came overland to Oregon.

Locating in Polk county, Mr. Bailey bought a farm of one hundred and three acres in Spring Valley, where he lived eight years, engaged principally in a flourishing dairy business, and in the buying and selling of stock. In 1872 he bought his present farm of six hundred acres, of which three hundred and fifty acres are cleared, and where he raises sheep and goats, besides general farming. He has been successful, being an excellent business manager as well as a practical and scientific agriculturist. The household of Mr. Bailey is presided over by his wife, who was formerly America Mann, born in Indiana in 1837, and whose father, John Mann, emigrated to Lawrence county, Ind., at a very early day. Of the four sons and three daughters born of this union five are living: Loren W., of British Columbia; Melvin, living at home; Elijah, living on a donation claim near Salem; Mrs. Olive Tilley, of Independence; and Leona Burden, of Oregon City. A Prohibitionist in politics, Mr. Bailey has held many positions of trust in the communities in which he has lived, including those of school director and road supervisor. He is a member of the Christian Church of Salem.

THEODORE JEFFRIES. The name of Jeffries is an honored one in Polk county, and the second generation, represented in Oregon by Theodore Jeffries, maintains the reputation for industry and personal honor established by that old pioneer, Thomas S. Jeffries. The latter was born in the state of Ohio, and as a young man removed to Missouri, where he married a native daughter, Susan R. Nichols, born in the vicinity of St. Louis. The following year he outfitted and crossed the plains, locating in Marion county, five miles south of Salem, where he remained until he came to Bethel, Ore., where he engaged in the mercantile business for several years. In 1867 he shifted his mercantile interests to the center of mining activity in Canyon City, Wasco county, Wash., freezing his feet on the way, necessitating amputation, and seven years later returned to Polk county. He purchased the right to a donation claim now occupied by his son, and only living child, and one other child in the family having died in infancy. He was successful in his general farming and stock-raising, succeeded in paying for his entire farm, and left a highly improved and valuable property. His death occurred in 1895 at the age of seventy-seven years, his wife having preceded him in 1882.

Better educational advantages than fall to the lot of the average farm-reared youth facilitate the life-work of Theodore Jeffries, and his consequent breadth of mind and capacity for business are apparent in the manner of conducting his large property. From the public schools he passed to the Bethel Academy, from which he was duly graduated, after which he completed the business course at the Portland Business College. He then returned to the farm near McCoy, upon which his father had in the meantime settled, and which has since been his home. He has two hundred and forty acres of the original claim, one hundred and sixty of which are under cultivation. General farming and stock-raising net him a fair yearly income, and he is thus enabled to maintain his family in comfort, and educate his children according to his well known high ideas of citizenship. A commodious and modern residence, well arranged barns, good fences, and late agricultural implements, combine to make one of the desirable and profitable farming enterprises of Polk county.

Near Amity, Yamhill county, in 1881, Mr. Jeffries married Susan E., daughter of Isaac Robinson, who was born on a farm near Amity, May 1, 1855, and whose father crossed the plains at an early day, and died at Amity in 1897, aged seventy years. Elsie, the only child of this union, is living at home. Mr. Jeffries is a Republican in politics, but aside from the formality of casting his vote, has never interested himself in the local undertakings of his party. Fraternally he is identified with the Amity Ancient Order of United Workmen, and at one time was financier of the organization. He is progressive and upright, well informed and agreeable, and has many friends among the best families of his native county.

groceryman, and farmer, W. G. Evans, a resident of the place since 1894, and of the state since 1865. Mr. Evans has gained a diversified idea of life and work in Oregon, and is one of those men who deserve great credit for their successful circumvention of early hindrances, and wise disposition of later opportunities. He was born in the state of Tennessee January 21, 1833, his mother, a native of Tennessee, was Miss Rebecca Keyton before her marriage, and his father was William Evans, a native of Virginia.

When a small boy Mr. Evans was deprived by death of the care and affectionate solicitude of his mother, and the family soon after removed to Kentucky, where they lived until taking up their residence in Arkansas in 1843. Here the father died about sixty years of age, and the eight children thereafter conducted the farm, and succeeded as best they could. When about twenty-four W. G. saw an opportunity to go to California to assist in driving five hundred head of cattle, and his experiences while crossing the plains with his numerous charges are recalled most vividly at the present time. Arriving in California August 2, 1857, he followed various kinds of employment until 1865, working both on farms and in the mines of the great western state. In 1865 he came to Oregon and settled near Brooks, and for the four following years worked on different farms, in the meantime managing to save considerable money.

In 1869 Mr. Evans married Letitia Savage, who was born November 3, 1852, and reared in Oregon, her people having crossed the plains in 1845. The couple went to housekeeping about three miles west of where the town of Brooks is now located, and remained there until they removed to Brooks in 1894. Seven children have been born of this union, of whom Hugh C. lives on a farm near the town, is married and has three children: Nellie A., deceased, was married to George Dodge and had one daughter; Threasa is the wife of James Fruit, of Salem, and has two sons; B. Frank lives in Brooks, is married and has two daughters; Minnie is the wife of Fred Neusom; Lena Estelle, deceased; and John C. is living with his parents. Although his store and post-office duties consume the greater part of his time, Mr. Evans still manages his farm, and the family spend a portion of each summer there.

A staunch Republican, and an active promoter of the best interests of his party, Mr. Evans has been influential in local affairs of a political nature, and besides serving as postmaster for several years, having been appointed by Grover Cleveland during his first term, he has been clerk of the school board in his district for many years, road supervisor for several terms, and justice of the peace for twelve years. He and his family are members of the United Evangelical Church, and contribute to the support of the same. Mr. Evans enjoys an enviable reputation in the neighborhood for sobriety, enterprise and honesty. His tactful management of the post-office interests, his business sagacity and an accommodating and genial spirit, have secured him a substantial place among the upbuilders of Marion county.

HENRY MEIRING. Although not a land owner in Marion county, Henry Meiring is one of the very successful and prosperous farmers around Gervais, where he is operating five hundred and seventy acres of land comprising the Landet donation claim. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, having at his direct disposal three hundred and seventy acres of cultivated land. An additional source of income is derived from operating a threshing machine, in which he has been interested for the past fifteen years. Mr. Meiring has further added to his responsibilities by purchasing a flouring mill at Gervais, which is proving a paying and successful enterprise.

In Hanover, Germany, where he was born September 15, 1849, Mr. Meiring was reared on his father's farm, and educated in the public schools. His father died when he was twenty-one, and his mother when he was six years of age, and thereafter he lived with his brothers and sisters. At the age of twenty he was drafted into the German army, participating in the Franco-Prussian war, and was in the front of many of the notable combats of that memorable time, culminating with the battle of Sedan. In 1876 he was united in marriage with Mary T. Klene, who was born December 10, 1855, and reared in Germany. Directly after their marriage they came to America, settling near Buena Vista, Ore. For about ten years this continued to be their home, and in 1886 Mr. Meiring came to Marion county, locating on the farm upon which he has since lived.

To Mr. and Mrs. Meiring six children have been born. Annie K. is the wife of George H. Finney of Gervais, where the latter is operating the mill owned by Mr. Meiring; they have two daughters and one son. Helena is the wife of Edward A. Finney, residing on a farm in Marion county; they have one son and one daughter. Mary, Kate, Herman and Adaline are at home.

In politics Mr. Meiring has been a Republican ever since he came to this country, and he has held some local offices, including those of road supervisor four years and school trustee and clerk. He takes an active interest in all upbuilding enterprises in the county, and is a staunch advocate of the agricultural and other advantages which exist in this well favored state. Fraternally he is identified with Salem Camp, No. 118, W. O. W., and Fraternity Lodge, No. 9, A. O. U. W. He is a member of the Bankers' Life Association of Des Moines, Iowa, and with his family is a member of the Catholic Church.

JOHN KNIGHT, until April, 1903, a prominent farmer and politician of Marion county, was born in Shelby county, Mo., January 25, 1849, a son of Joseph and Catherine (Achticer) Knight, the latter a native of Bèride, Bavaria.

Joseph Knight was born in the state of Pennsylvania January 15, 1799, and by trade was an iron-worker, in which method of livelihood he excelled. About 1838 he located in Shelby county, Mo., and in that comparatively wild section built a home and cultivated a farm. In 1853 he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and his train was the first to cross the Cascade Mountains to Steilacoom, Wash., from the old Ft. Walla Walla. For about a year he lived in Shoal Water Bay, Wash., and then came on to the Cascades, where he found employment with the Portage railroad, and was thus engaged when the Cayuse war demanded all the able-bodied men in the state. For several days the people were surrounded and confined in blockhouses, and suffered other inconveniences due to those troublesome times. About fifteen persons were killed before they were able to reach the blockhouses. In 1856 Mr. Knight returned to Missouri, and in 1863 prepared to again cross the plains, this time taking with him his family, and such possessions as were required for housekeeping in the far west. As before, he took up his residence in Shoal Water Bay, Wash., and after two and a half years came to Marion county, Ore., remaining here for three years. His last home in the state was on a farm in Clackamas county, where he died in 1872, his wife surviving him until 1876. He was an industrious and successful man, and of the fourteen children born into his family and reared to years of usefulness and honor, but four survive. George and William live in Canby; Mary is the wife of S. Burchem, of Cottage Grove, Ore.; and John is living retired in Salem. The elder Knight was a staunch Republican, and delighted in discussing the principles and issues of his party. He took an active interest in politics from his first voting days, but was always averse to filling local offices.

For twenty years of his life John Knight remained with his father, and then served an apprenticeship to a blacksmith at Aurora, Ore. During the three years spent in qualifying as a knight of the forge and bellows, he received in compensation board and clothing, and at the end of his apprenticeship was not in a position to start either a bank account or a business of his own. For a year he followed his trade in Portland, and in 1875 located in Salem, in and near which he has since resided. For the first eighteen months in Salem he worked for an established blacksmith here, and then started a business of his own, uninterruptedly conducted until 1892. In the meantime his interest in Republican politics resulted in his becoming well known in the community, and in 1892 his fitness for official responsibility was recognized by his fellow townsmen by his election as sheriff of Marion county, an office maintained with distinct credit for two terms.

In Salem Mr. Knight was united in marriage with Angeline Snyder, a native of Sullivan county, Pa., who was born in 1855. He later purchased a farm of one hundred and seventy-six acres five miles north of Salem, on the old territorial road. This land comprised a part of the old William Stevens donation claim, and on it Mr. Knight conducted general farming and stock-raising. He makes a specialty of onions, and during 1902 raised about four thousand bushels of this much-demanded vegetable. Three children have been born into the Knight family, of whom Edna A. is living at home; and Claude S., an accountant, is employed at The Dalles; Benjamin W. met an accidental death when about eleven years of age. Mr. Knight is one of the most influential and popular men in his neighborhood, and one of the best known men in Marion county. For a term he served as alderman of Salem for the Second ward, and he is associated with various fraternal and social organizations throughout the county. He was one of the promoters of the first lodge of Elks organized in Salem, Ore., was the first exalted ruler of Salem Lodge, No. 336, and has actively interested himself in the welfare and growth of the order. He is also a member of the Ancient Order United Workmen, Valley Lodge No. 18. In the spring of 1903 he disposed of his farm and removed to Salem, where he is enjoying a well earned rest.

CATHERINE S. BASKETT. The life history of Catherine S. Baskett is deserving of a place in this work, although not filled with stirring events. Her influence and position in the social and business world is important. Possessed of strong individuality, combined with a charming personality, Mrs. Baskett is well and favorably known. She was born in Macoupin county, Ill., September 21, 1828. Her father, Elijah Bristow, was born in Washington county, Va., and her mother, Susan Gabbert, in Overton county, near Nashville, Tenn. Her father's family emigrated to Tennessee, where Mr. Bristow served as apprentice at the hatter's trade, but he did not engage in it. Afterwards he removed with his family to Cumberland county, Ky., where he engaged in farming. In 1812 the family again removed to Illinois, locating first in Macoupin county, where they lived for two years, and then took up their abode in McDonough county, where Mr. Bristow engaged in farming until 1846, when he crossed the plains to California. In 1848 his family removed to Oregon, crossing the Missouri river at St. Joseph, April 21, 1848, and the Cascade mountains at Barlow Gate. They located at Pleasant Hill, where Mr. Bristow took up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres of land twelve miles south of Eugene. He built the first house in Lane county and petitioned the territorial legislature to have his claim named Pleasant Hill, which was done. Mr. Bristow lived there until his death, in his eighty-fourth year.

Mrs. Baskett's husband, George J. Baskett, was born in Shelby county, Ky., February 25, 1818. His father was William Baskett of Virginia, who, with his wife and son, aged ten, moved to Missouri, locating in Howard county, remaining there until 1848, when George crossed the plains. On his trip across, he met his future wife. He located first in Rickreall, but soon went to California, where, during the gold excitement, he was quite successful. In 1852 he returned to Oregon and married Catherine S. Bristow. The young couple settled in Polk county, buying the right to their present place of six hundred and forty acres. They lived there, engaging in farming and stock-raising until Mr. Baskett's death in 1883. His family consisted of eight children, but two of whom are now living—Josephine, wife of Henry Clay Fox, of Rickreall, and George La Fayette Lee, of Elk City, Idaho. The family own all of the original place. Mr. Baskett was a Democrat in politics, and with his wife held membership in the Christian Church of Salem.

JOHN BLANTON. One of the extensive hop raisers of the vicinity of Brooks is John Blanton, who bought seventeen acres of land in 1871, and has since devoted fourteen acres to hops. That he has improved his land to the best possible extent would seem apparent from the fact that 1902 netted him seventeen thousand pounds of hops.

The paternal great-grandfather, John Blanton, served under Washington in the Revolutionary war, and his descendants located in different parts of the east and middle west. Mr. Blanton himself located in Ray county, Mo. Here Joseph Blanton, the father of John, was born. He learned the cooper's trade, and here married Jane Muncus, also a native of Missouri. The father followed his trade near St. Louis until 1844, and then started across the plains with seven yoke of oxen, hoping to improve his fortunes after reaching the northwest. He died near Council Bluffs, Iowa, en route to Oregon, aged thirty-nine years, leaving his widow and children dependent upon their own resources. The mother turned back to Andrew county, Mo., and three years later married Samuel Hackwith, and continued to live in Missouri for the remainder of her life. She died aged about sixty-seven years.

John Blanton was born in Jackson county, Mo., April 29, 1833, and with his parents started to cross the plains in 1844. He lived with his mother in Missouri until nineteen years of age, and attended the district schools as opportunity offered. For about three years he was employed as a farm hand. In 1853 he had an opportunity to come west as a driver of oxen, a chance which he very readily accepted. The train was on the road for three months and eleven days. Mr. Blanton stopped for a short time at Big Sandy, then went to live with an uncle, Isaac Blanton, eight miles south of Salem. In 1861 he went to the mines of southern Oregon, where he met with fair success. In 1865 he married Catherine Shephard, born in 1846 in Crawford county, Ark. Mrs. Blanton crossed the plains with her parents in 1852. Mr. and Mrs. Blanton went to house-keeping on a farm near Eugene, in Lane county, and after five years moved to Jackson county, where Mr. Blanton engaged in the stock business for a couple of years. He afterward lived in Polk county for four years, and for a year in the Waldo Hills, Marion county. In 1871 he purchased his present home.

Twelve children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blanton: James M. died aged twenty-one; Ida May, the wife of Charles Van Ausdell, a railroad man of Nebraska; Hannah J., the wife of Alexander Veach, of Salem; Mary E., the wife of William Raney, of Salem; William, a resident of Eugene; John, died in 1900, leaving two children; Marion, who is living in Brooks; Rose died at age of nineteen years; Raymond, living in Brooks; Pearl, at home with her parents; Franklin, died in infancy; and Alice, the wife of Enos Waite, of Salem. Mr. Blanton is a Democrat and a member of the United Evangelical Church. His many fine traits of character, and unquestioned devotion to the general welfare of his adopted locality, have won him the lasting regard of all with whom he is associated. He has served as school director in his district and as supervisor of roads.

ilies of the northwest. Up in Canada the Moisans were known for many years as merchants and tradespeople, the French blood of remote ancestors contributing the national thrift and resourcefulness. Near Montreal, Canada, in 1810 was born Thomas Moisan, the father of F. Xavier, who was reared and educated in his native land, and was the only one of ten children to come to the United States.

Before attaining his majority, Thomas Moisan had started in upon a paying lumber business in Canada, and was also interested in furs and trapping, in which he dealt extensively. When twenty-two years of age, in 1838, he made a trip through the United States on horseback, bringing up in New Orleans, where he found a ready market for his furs. About 1840 he started to make a trip across the plains, and for some time was located in Vancouver, Wash., removing later to Marion county, where he took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres eight miles north of Salem, on French Prairie. Half of this property was prairie land. Here he erected a small log house, the following year taking to himself a wife named Harriet Longtrain. Miss Longtrain was born in Vancouver, Wash., May 16, 1824, a daughter of Andrew Longtrain, a famous trapper in the employ of the Hudson Bay Company. Thomas Moisan lived on his claim until his death, and there reared the three children born to himself and wife, of whom F. Xavier is the oldest. Philomena married F. J. Balter, of Salem, and Alexander lives on a farm adjoining that of his brother. Mr. Moisan was a man of pronounced characteristics and the most scrupulous honor, and during his life in the west materially promoted the interests of religion and education. He was a devoted member of the Catholic Church, and was the means of securing the erection of several churches throughout the county. His widow, who still survives him, has uninterruptedly made her home on a part of the old donation claim.

September 30, 1872, Francis Xavier Moisan married Mary V. Manning, a native of Perry county, Mo., born July 11, 1854, who came to Oregon in 1865 by way of the Isthmus, with her parents, and they are living near St. Louis, Ore. Her parents, G. A. and Caroline Manning, were born in Missouri, and there farmed for many years before coming to the west. All of the modern improvements on this old donation claim have been inaugurated by the present owner, who has a fine large frame dwelling, a good barn, and modern agricultural implements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and in the meantime has taken an active interest in the general affairs of his neighborhood. In politics a Republican, he has filled the offices of school director and road supervisor, and since his first voting days has taken a keen interest in all matters political. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Brooks Lodge, No. 137, and in religion is a member of the Catholic Church. Fourteen children have been born into the family: Thomas, who is farming in Marion county; Caroline, deceased, wife of John Roach; Gustave, living in Gervais; Lewis, an attendant in the Insane Asylum; Albert, Rose, Tercilla, Agnes, Charles, Francis, Winnie, Frederick, Hubert and Joseph.

FRANCIS XAVIER MOISAN. On the farm upon which he is still living in Marion county, F. Xavier Moisan was born December 16, 1845, and comes of one of the prominent pioneer fam-

Andrew Longtrain, one of the famous trappers of the northwest, was born in Canada about 1791, and came west to Spokane, Wash., when a young man. Here he married and engaged in trapping for many years, selling his furs to the Hudson Bay Company. After a time he took up his residence in Vancouver, and at that time there were very few white people in this part of the country. He lived to be about eighty-seven, while his wife died at the age of seventy-six. He was a typical rugged pioneer of the far west, and his name was known from one end to the other of this trapper's paradise. The monument erected at Champoeg in 1902 in commemoration of the American purchase of the territory stands on the claim originally owned by Mr. Longtrain.

GEORGE W. YOUNG. Among the veteran pioneers of Linn county who have spent the better part of their lives within its precincts, aiding in every possible way its growth and development, G. W. Young, now living retired in Albany, stands pre-eminent, having a good record for length of days, and for long-continued and useful activity. After his marriage he migrated to this state, bravely daring all dangers and privations incidental to life in an undeveloped country in order to pave the way for those who followed, and to establish a home where his children and their descendants might enjoy the comforts, and even the luxuries, of this world without the labor and toil in which his earlier years were spent. Wild animals of all kinds were then numerous and destructive, and the majority of the residents lived in log cabins of the typical pioneer style. These have long since been replaced by substantial modern structures, and the land, having been brought to a high state of cultivation, yields abundantly of the grains and fruits common to this region. The small hamlets have grown into thriving towns, villages and cities, and prosperity smiles on every side. A native of Ohio, George W. Young was born in Richland county, November 4, 1828, a son of Benjamin Young.

Of stanch New England ancestry, Benjamin Young was born and reared in Connecticut. Removing to Ohio when a young man, he worked at the cooper's trade until 1837, when he settled in Knox county, Ill., where he was actively engaged in coopering and farming until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Sarah Mesmore, was born in Ohio, and died in Illinois. Of their large family of children, ten grew to years of maturity, and eight, five girls and three boys, survive. One son, John Young, went to the front during the Civil war as a volunteer in an Illinois regiment, and died while in service.

The second son of the parental household, G. W. Young, was brought up and educated in Illinois, attending school in the old log schoolhouse. While yet a lad he acquired a good knowledge of agriculture, also becoming familiar with the cooper's trade by working in the shop with his father in bad weather. He subsequently learned the carpenter's trade, at which he worked for awhile, remaining at home until reaching his majority. The following six years he was engaged in farming for himself, first in Knox county, Ill., then in Peoria county, and again in Knox county. In the spring of 1853, influenced partly by love of travel, and partly by a desire to try the "hazard of new fortunes" he started for the Pacific coast. Leaving Illinois in March, with one wagon, which was drawn by four yoke of oxen, he, with his wife and one child, crossed the Missouri river at Council Bluffs on April 6, and there took the old Oregon trail, coming along the Barlow route, and arriving in Linn county in October.

Locating in Sweet Home valley, Mr. Young took up a donation land claim of one hundred and sixty acres and later purchased one hundred and sixty acres on Sand Ridge, about fourteen miles from Albany, and at once began the establishment of a homestead. Clearing and improving a large tract, he met with good success in his agricultural labors, and has since owned many different estates, buying and selling at a profit, at one time having a clear title to seven hundred acres of fine land. In 1866 he removed to Albany, where he has since resided, a prosperous and highly esteemed citizen. For eight or ten years he carried on a good business as a contractor and builder, being especially interested in bridge contracting, and doing a great deal of work for the county, having charge of the construction of many of the bridges in Linn county. Although he has lived in Oregon a full half century, Mr. Young has never lost interest in the home and friends of his youth, but on two occasions has visited the east, going first in 1872, and again in 1883.

While living in Illinois, Mr. Young married for his first wife Clarinda Simons, who was born in New York state, and died in Lebanon, Ore. Of the children born of their union, one daughter is living, namely: Malinda, wife of John H. Clelen, of Albany. To John H. Clelen and wife have been born four children—three of whom are living: Otto, an engineer of Albany, married Anna Reninger and has two children, John and Grace; Edna, wife of Charles G. Rawlings of Albany; they have two daughters, Madaline and Ruth; Benjamin, resides in Albany; Georgiana died at the age of one year.

Mr. Young's second wife was Miss Rose Clark, who was born in Princeton, Ill., of New England ancestors. Her father, Joseph S. Clark, was born and reared in New Hampshire, where he learned the trade of a brick mason. Subsequently removing to Illinois he lived for awhile in Princeton, then came to Oregon, locating in Albany in 1874, where he followed his trade for many years, living in this city until his death. He married Harriet Richards, a native of Medina county, Ohio, and they became the parents of eleven children, nine of whom grew to years of maturity, and seven of whom are now living.

Mr. Young has had a busy life as well as a prosperous one, his success in the accumulation of property being entirely due to his own energy, perseverance, good judgment and honest business principles. Politically he is a sound Democrat. Fraternally he is a member, and past officer, of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which he joined in 1855; of the Encampment and of the Oregon Pioneer Association.

FRANKLIN S. POWELL. On a well developed farm in Sangamon county, Ill., Franklin S. Powell, one of the foremost pioneers of Polk county, was born March 20, 1830. As one of the many hundreds who crossed the plains in 1851 he has entered heartily into the development of many northwestern enterprises, benefiting all with his business ability, and conveying to them his peculiar and contagious enthusiasm. On both sides of his family the ancestors were very early settlers in America, and patriotism found expression in the paternal grandfather, Joseph Powell, a native of Kentucky, and a soldier in the war of 1812; and the maternal great-grandfather, Peter Borders, followed the martial fortunes of Washington.

John A. Powell, the father of Franklin S., was born on a farm near Dayton, Ohio, February 10, 1807, and in 1825 removed with his parents to Sangamon county, Ill., and was there reared and educated, eventually taking as his wife Savilla Smith, born in Ohio, September 10, 1812. At a comparatively early age Mr. Powell entered the ministry of the Christian Church, and during almost his entire active life he combined the cultivation of the soil with the preaching of the gospel. For some time after his marriage he lived in Menard county, Ill., and in April, 1851, outfitted and crossed the plains to Oregon. With him came his wife and nine children, among them Theresa, wife of Wm. McFaden, whose death after leaving the Blue mountains, at the age of twenty-two, was the only sad or unfortunate occurrence during the entire trip. Mr. Powell settled with his family on a donation claim on the Santiam in Linn county, and there lived until retiring to Albany in 1870, in which town his death occurred in 1880. He was a unique and in some ways remarkable man, and during his active life accomplished much good. An earnest worker in the church, an eloquent and forceful speaker, a sound reasoner, and thorough bible student, his voice was heard in earnest exhortation in many places in Oregon and Washington, and especially was he known and appreciated in the Willamette valley. Mr. Powell was a fine specimen of physical manhood, weighing two hundred and twenty-five pounds. He was a Republican in politics, and was a man of influence, personal magnetism, and broad humanitarian views of life. Eight years after his death, in 1888, the wife who had shared his trials and joys, reared his children to men and women of usefulness, and been his chief consoler and sympathizer, died at the home of her son near Monmouth, at the age of seventy-eight.

Franklin S. Powell was the oldest of the four sons and five daughters born to his parents. Before leaving for the west he married, March 20, 1851, Louise J. Peeler, who was born in Illinois, a daughter of Rev. Abner Peeler, a native of Maine, and a minister in the Christian Church. Upon arriving in Oregon Mr. Powell located on a donation claim eight miles east of Albany in Linn county, where he built a little house, and began the improvement of his land. In time abundant harvests rewarded his tilling of the soil, a larger house took the place of the primitive structure, and twenty-one years rolled by with ever increasing prosperity. During the Civil war he served two terms as justice of the peace for Lebanon precinct. In 1874 he came to Monmouth, Ore., built the home in which he now lives, and has since identified himself with this community. In 1898 he sold the farm near Albany, and now owns a farm of three hundred and twenty-six acres two and a half miles northwest of Monmouth, during the bright summer months living in his rural retreat, and in the winter time availing himself of the advantages of the town.

At all times Mr. Powell has held himself in readiness to aid in the development of his adopted locality, and many enterprises have reached completion through his energy and practical assistance. He is one of the organizers and stock-holders of the Polk County Bank, and is also one of the founders and a stockholder in the Independence and Monmouth Railroad. He also aided in the construction of a warehouse at Albany and one at Independence, and is one of the chief upbuilders of Christian College, with which he has been identified as trustee and member of the executive board for many years. In fact his removal to Monmouth was practically dictated by a desire to be near and assist in every possible way this very admirable educational institution. In Republican politics he has taken an active part, in 1888 being elected to the state legislature, and serving during the session as chairman of the agricultural committee. This was about the time of the great county-seat contest between Independence and Dallas, and Mr. Powell entered into the thickest of the fight. While a member of the legislature, in 1889, he introduced a bill to convert the Christian College at Monmouth into a State Normal School, and while the bill was defeated by only one vote, yet it laid the foundation for the accomplishment of the same object by the succeeding legislature in 1891.

Eight children have been born into the family of Mr. Powell, of whom James M. is a physician of Spokane, Wash.; Cyrus is deceased; John H. is a farmer near Farmington, Wash.; Lavina is deceased; Marinthia is the wife of A. M. Arant, a fruit rancher west of Monmouth; P. O. is a teacher of mathematics, commercial law and literature in the Normal School at Monmouth; Ira C. is represented in this work; J. F. is living at home. In March, 1901, Mr. and Mrs. Powell celebrated their golden wedding at their home in Monmouth, where over one hundred friends came from far and wide to wish them many years of happiness. In the estimation of his hosts of friends there is no more worthy man in this county than Mr. Powell, whose well known business integrity, conservative yet progressive judgment, and capacity for large undertaking have made him a power in a cosmopolitan community.

GEORGE C. SMITH. The advantage of learning a trade, and thereby having something in the way of making a living upon which he could always depend, was one of the teachings which found practical expression in the life of George C. Smith, one of the successful farmers and stock-raisers of Polk county. Were Mr. Smith to dispose of his farm and locate in some of the busy marts of the country, he could undoubtedly command good wages as a practical brick and stone mason, a trade to which he devoted three years of his life as an apprentice, and which he plied for some little time.

For many years the family of Mr. Smith was identified with farming interests in Virginia, in which state he was born in Jackson county, February 14, 1833. His father, John, was born in Virginia in 1788, and spent his entire life in the Old Dominion state. Left alone in the world when a small boy, the elder Smith was confronted by the responsibility of his own support, and proved himself capable of coping with the difficulty. For some time he worked on boats on the Ohio river, and when quite young started in to farm for himself, eventually purchasing with his earnings about a hundred acres of land. He never had any desire to desert his old southern state, and lived contentedly and in comparative comfort there until his death in 1878 at the advanced age of ninety years. In his young manhood he married a native daughter of Virginia, Julia A. Cummins, born in 1800, and who died in 1855. Of this union were born fourteen children, seven sons and seven daughters, of whom six are now living: Conrad, George C., John, David; Julia, wife of Freeman Showerman; Levina, wife of A. J. Moffit.

So large a family taxed the resources of the Virginia farm, and of necessity the children were forced to take themselves into outside fields of activity when quite young. Thus it happened that the sixth child, George C., resolutely turned his face towards an independent livelihood, working at such occupations as came his way. At the age of twenty-four he removed to Ray county, Mo., and apprenticed himself to a brick and stone mason for three years, and after working for a while at his trade decided that he liked farming better, and so found a position on a farm in Ray county. He was not insensible of his limitations in Missouri, and in 1865 hailed the opportunity to cross the plains with ox teams. In the meantime he had married Eliza A. Craven in 1859, she being a native of Ray county, Mo., and the daughter of a large land owner. His wife and children therefore accompanied him across the plains, their outfit consisting of four yoke of oxen. The train had one hundred and nine wagons to start with, but the party eventually separated, according to the desired destination of its many members. They were five months and five days on the way, and Mr. Smith located in the Eola hills, where he rented land for five years. Frugal and industrious, he managed to save considerable money while farming his rented land, and in 1870 bought his present farm, which consists of one hundred and twenty-two acres, and is a portion of the old Babcock donation claim. In addition to general farming and stock-raising, he has ten acres under hops, and is contemplating devoting more land in the future to this important and marketable commodity.

The wife of Mr. Smith survived the journey across the plains, and the hardship of pioneer conditions for but three years, her death occurring in 1869. She was faithful to her trust as a mother and wife, and left to the care of her husband three children, Laura, wife of S. H. Crowley; David Ackley and Charles Jackson. In 1874 Mr. Smith married Sarah M. Coulter, of which union there have been born the following children: Rosetta, wife of Sam T. Smith; Stella M.; Elsie, wife of C. B. Whaley; Seth; Lavina; George C., Jr., and Lanora Alice.

Mr. Smith adheres to the principles of the Democratic party, and he has served the community as road supervisor and school director. He is a liberal and enterprising man, and a success as a farmer and promoter of general prosperity.

WILLIAM FRY. A venerable and very highly esteemed citizen who was formerly closely identified with the colony at Bethel, Mo., and later at Aurora, and who is still a resident of this favored city, is William Fry, a blacksmith by trade, and a man of sterling characteristics. Mr. Fry passed the first years of his life in Huntington county, Pa., where he was born September 16, 1835. About 1845 he removed with his parents to Bethel, Mo., and at a later period moved to Adair county, Mo., where he plied his trade as blacksmith, and also engaged in farming.

In 1863 Mr. Fry became a resident of Aurora, Ore., having crossed the plains with ox teams, and taking five months for the journey. His experiences on the plains were of a more peaceful nature than those which characterized the journeyings of earlier emigrants, and he arrived at his destination in good health and spirits. He at once started up a little blacksmith shop, the first in the city, and he has never had a competitor in the business. Needless to say he has a flourishing business, and is known as a master workman throughout the surrounding country. He is the owner of a ten-acre home near the town, where he raises staple commodities, and has a pleasant and home-like residence. Here live his wife, formerly Anna Miller, a native of Columbiana county, Ohio, born in 1841; and four children, Andrew M., George W., Matilda, and Walter O.

A Republican in politics, Mr. Fry has held numerous offices of trust and responsibility in the city, including that of councilman for nine terms, an office which he still occupies with great credit. He has always taken an interest in the cause of education, and has served for three terms as a member of the school board. Some military experience has enlivened the career of Mr. Fry, who enlisted in Company E, Missouri Home Guards, at Kirksville, Mo., and was elected Second lieutenant and served until his leave of absence in order to come to Oregon. Mr. Fry is a natural mechanic, and a large share of his success along this line is due to the fact that congenial work makes the successful workman. His business methods are above reproach, and his name stands for integrity and reliability.

GEORGE W. L. VINTON. Of fine old Colonial ancestry, George W. L. Vinton, one of the foremost farmers of Marion county, was born in Boston, Mass., December 25, 1823. From an industrious and worthy sire he inherited traits of industry and thrift, his father being a cooper by trade, and a fairly successful man. The elder Vinton was not unmindful of his duties as a citizen of a grief-stricken republic, and in 1812 responded to the call for soldiers, serving the American cause as became a strong and rugged personality. He was three times married, and his useful life extended beyond the biblical allotment of seventy years.

The advantages of the public schools fell to the lot of George W. L. Vinton, and he naturally connected the future with some one of the useful trades, finally selecting that of the painter, for which he served an apprenticeship of three years. Thereafter he plied his trade for about five years. In 1848 he removed to Illinois, locating on a farm in Bureau county. In 1853 he was united in marriage with Alfreda Wilbur, who was born in Pennsylvania. They resided in Illinois until 1861, when they removed to Iowa, where they remained until 1864. Of ambitious tendencies, Mr. Vinton foresaw in the far west opportunities not found in Iowa, and therefore emigrated to Oregon in 1864, being one of a train of one hundred and twenty-four wagons under command of Captain Hulbert. Mr. Vinton himself had eight yoke of oxen, and was on the way about seven months.

In Marion county Mr. Vinton settled on a claim twelve miles east of Salem, and at the expiration of eighteen months rented a place on Howell prairie for about a year. Following this he worked at his trade for about four years, and in 1870 bought his present home of three hundred acres fourteen miles from Salem, on the Howell Prairie road. The clearing of his land presented a large labor problem, but the present owner has succeeded to the extent of about fifty acres, which is devoted to general farming and stock-raising. A well appointed home, substantial barns and out-buildings, and up-to-date agricultural implements are among the additions inaugurated by the enterprise and thrift of this successful farmer.

Politics have not escaped the attention of Mr. Vinton, who is a staunch upholder of Republican principles, and who has acceptably served as supervisor and school clerk. Eight children have been born into this family, of whom Charles W. is a resident of Albino; Cora A. was married to William Ramsdon, but is now deceased; Mary B. is the wife of John Waltman of this vicinity; H. Almina is the wife of C. McElwain, of Fruitland; Anna Eva became the wife of E. Stevens, but is now deceased; George W. L., Jr., lives at his father's; Walter Augustus lives on North Howell prairie; and Arthur G. is still at home.

HENRY J. MILLER is one of the young men of Aurora who, recognizing an opportunity, has taken advantage of it, and by sheer force of will power and business judgment has dignified his undertakings with large success. Ten years ago Mr. Miller started, with a capital consisting of brains and determination, to buy hops on a small scale, and so well has he succeeded that he is to-day a large property owner, and one of the most substantial men in the town. The adaptations of the surrounding country to the raising of hops has been his great opportunity, and he buys in large quantities, and ships to the markets of New York and London. He is one of the best judges of this commodity in the county, and his operations influence the price of hops to a material extent.

Mr. Miller is a native son of Aurora, of whom his fellow-townsmen are justly proud. He was born here January 14, 1873, his father, Joseph Miller, having been born in Bethel, Mo. The elder Miller came to Oregon in 1863 with a colony, bringing his possessions with ox teams, and experiencing the usual number of adventures on the way. He located with his family near Aurora, and is at present a resident of the town, being sixty-three years of age. His wife, Gertrude (Schuele) Miller, was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains in 1863. She is the mother of a son and five daughters.

Henry J. Miller was educated in the public schools, and at the age of twenty began his active business career. In Aurora he owns the property upon which the postoffice is erected, and he also owns property on the corner of Washington and Twelfth streets, Portland. This property has all been bought with the money earned from his hop enterprises, and certainly reflects vast credit upon this enterprising and popular young man.

In politics Mr. Miller is a Republican, but as yet he has taken no special interest in the local undertakings of his party, aside from serving as clerk of the school board. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Rathbone Sisters. Mr. Miller is unmarried and lives with his parents.

ELMER W. FINZER, D. D. S. A lucrative practice is always the aim of the professional man, and the subject of this review has attained a position in Woodburn, Ore., of which many men of maturer years and time of service might well be proud. A member of an old and much respected family, the ancestral history is covered in the review of a brother, Capt. W. E. Finzer. The name of Finzer retains in a marked degree the business and moral worth so characteristic of the children of Switzerland.

Dr. Finzer is the third of nine children born to Benjamin and Elizabeth (Hostettler) Finzer, and was born near Shanesville, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, June 22, 1871. While his father was engaged in working at his trade of carpenter, Elmer Finzer was attending the public schools of that place, preparing himself for the future. In 1888 he accompanied the family to Oregon. They settled in Woodburn, and here he completed his education, and was employed as a clerk in a general merchandise store where he gained a practical business education. He was one of those enterprising lads who have the ability to succeed in the face of many obstacles, and after due consideration of the lucrative professions, the possibilities of dentistry appealed to him. In 1894 he began as assistant to Dr. George L. Fox of Woodburn, remaining for two years, then with Dr. G. H. Marker of this city, where he remained three years, and in June, 1899, successfully passed the examination before the State Board of Dental Examiners. Upon receiving his certificate he at once opened an office in Woodburn, where he has built up a practice in a short time far beyond his expectations. To keep in touch with the advanced methods he took a post-graduate course during May and June, 1902, at the Northwestern University of Dental Surgery at Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Finzer was married in Woodburn May 5, 1898, to Miss Minnie Tasker, an estimable young lady, who was born in Mitchell, Canada, October 10, 1875, a daughter of William Tasker, a native of Yorkshire, England. He emigrated to Ohio at an early day, and located in Akron, where he was engaged as machinist. Some time later he removed to Canada, and while there his daughter was born. Returning to Akron, she was reared and educated in the public schools. Mrs. Finzer completed her education in Salem, and at the age of seventeen began teaching school, and continued until her marriage. In 1886 Mr. Tasker and his family removed to Oregon, and conducted a general merchandise store in Salem for a time. For a long time Mr. Tasker had been deeply interested in Socialism. In order to study social conditions under a regime of this character, he went to New Zealand in January, 1900, and, with his wife is now making that their home. His son, Charles, is living in Peoria, Ill.; Walter in Denver, Col..

One child has been born to Dr. Finzer and his wife, Beatrice Irene, born March 9, 1899. In his fraternal relations Dr. Finzer is a member of Woodburn Lodge No. 102, I. O. O. F., and, with his wife, is a member of Daughters of Rebekah, Woodburn Camp, No. 47, W. O. W., and Woodburn Lodge No. 106, A. F. & A. M. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and in politics is a Democrat. He is very conscientious in his work, and has set a high standard of professional ethics for his own guidance.

JOHN J. FINN. Immediately identified with the agricultural interests of Polk county, Mr. Finn is carrying on general farming with signal success at McCoy. An active, enterprising man, he has won his way in the world by his own efforts, and has made a good record as an industrious, intelligent citizen, and as a business man of ability. A son of the late John Finn, he was born June 27, 1852, at Canton, Mass.

John Finn, the father of John J., was born in County Limerick, Ireland, about 1788, and spent the earlier part of his life in the Emerald Isle. Crossing the Atlantic in 1847, he located in Massachusetts, where he was successfully employed in agricultural pursuits until his death, which occurred in the town of Stoughton, Mass., in 1864. He married Mrs. Annie (Dunn) Fitzpatrick, who was born in Queens county, Ireland, in 1816, and is now living in Massachusetts, a venerable woman of eighty-seven years. Of the five sons and four daughters born of their marriage, John J., the second child, and his brother William, are the only survivors.

Leaving the district school at the age of eleven years, John J. Finn worked for a year in a woolen mill, remaining meanwhile with his widowed mother. The following year he left home, and from that time until twenty years old wandered around through New England, working at whatever he found to do. Enlisting in 1872 in the Fourth United States Cavalry, he served in Texas and the Indian Territory until disabled by injuries received by being thrown from a horse, when, in 1876, he was honorably discharged from the service. After making a short visit in Massachusetts, Mr. Finn came to Polk county, Ore., locating on Mill creek, where he worked for wages for a number of years. Being prudent and thrifty, he saved his money, bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres on Mill creek, sixty acres of it being timber land, where he remained until 1882. He then took passage from Portland on the vessel "Ivy," and went around the cape to Queenstown, Ireland. Returning via Boston, Mass., he visited his mother at Stoughton, reaching Oregon again in the spring of 1883.

In 1884 he married Mrs. Julia A. (Rider) Davis, and moved onto her farm of one hundred and forty-eight acres near McCoy. Mrs. Finn's father, Dr. James Rider, moved in 1876 from Minnesota to Oregon, locating in Polk county, where he resided until his death on May 30th, 1900.

By her first marriage, Mrs. Finn has three children, namely: Capt. Milton F. Davis, U. S. A., a graduate of West Point, who served with the first cavalry in the Cuban campaign, afterwards was assistant adjutant general on the staff of Brigadier General Bell in the Philippine Islands, and now stationed at Fort Leavenworth; Myrtle, living at home; and Richard, who enlisted as a private in the Fourth United States Infantry, rising from the ranks to a first lieutenant in charge of a company of Filipino scouts. Mr. and Mrs. Finn have one child, J. Waldo Finn.

Mr. Finn is independent in politics, voting for the best men and measures regardless of party restrictions, and has served as road supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of Amity Lodge No. 20, A. F. & A. M., Oregon Consistory No. 1, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rites, and McCoy Lodge, I. O. O. F.

WILLIAM A. WENGENROTH. The standing and importance of the Wengenroth family in Germany is best understood when one recalls the picturesque little town of that name on the Rhine, where for several generations members of the house pursued their various occupations, principally as merchants and manufacturers. At Wengenroth was born the manager and proprietor of the Valley Manufacturing Company of Woodburn, May 26, 1845, and there also was born his father, Daniel, a wagon and carriage manufacturer of his native town. The father amassed quite a fortune by reason of well applied industry, and the frugality characteristic of his people, and his name stood for all that was honorable and of good report. He was actively engaged in business almost up to the time of his death in 1897, at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife, Margaret (Schuster) Wengenroth, was a native of the Rhine province, born at Stalhofen, and her death occurred in Germany in 1870, at the age of forty-five.

The eldest of the six children born to his parents, William A. Wengenroth received a practical home training, and was educated in the public schools. At an early age he began to learn his father's business, in time taking a responsible position with a large wagon manufacturing concern. He emigrated to America in 1879, locating at Champoeg, on the Willamette river, where he engaged in wagon making for two years. After a short time in Portland he worked in Buena Vista, Independence and Woodburn, and in April, 1902, started an ax handle manufactory under the firm name of the Valley Manufacturing Company. Though comparatively in its infancy, this enterprise bids fair to become one of the solid upbuilding forces of Woodburn, location, available material, and market conspiring in favor of this ambitious new arrival. In addition to ax handles the firm turns out many other kinds of handles, including sledge, adz, auger, hammer, hatchet, and broom handles, as well as neck-yokes.

With him from Germany Mr. Wengenroth brought his wife, formerly Emma Hoefer, a native of the Rhine province, and whose father, Martin, was a blacksmith in Germany. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wengenroth, of whom William is with his father in business; Johanna, deceased, was the wife of S. H. Brown of Gervais, Ore., and left one daughter, Gertrude; and Walter is living with his parents.

Mr. Wengenroth in politics is a Republican, and is a member of the Champoeg Lodge No. 27, A. F. & A. M. He is a master workman, and his many years of practical experience here and in Germany have placed him among the most expert in his chosen occupation.

JOHN J. HILL. It is doubtful if any enterprise in McCoy has contributed more materially to the upbuilding of the town than has the warehouse business of John J. Hill. Since 1892 he has been handling large quantities of grain, wool, hops, and other commodities which flourish in this locality, and by his staunch support of the agriculturists has fostered and encouraged their efforts along these lines. During the year he has handled no less than sixty-thousand bushels of wheat and thirty thousand bushels of oats.

Mr. Hill came to McCoy with a great deal of practical experience behind him, gained in several busy marts of trade. He was born in Platte county, Mo., November 17, 1839, his grandfather, Spencer, and his father, Archibald, having been born in Virginia, the latter in January, 1804. Archibald Hill was a man of prominence, especially after removing to Missouri in 1836. Although his entire life was spent on a farm, he filled positions quite remote from that kind of life, and was postmaster of Ridgely, Platte county, under the administration of thirteen postmaster generals. He was successful in farming, and lived until 1876. His wife, Eleanor McManamy, was also a native of Virginia, and was born February 13, 1807, her marriage occurring in her native state, where her husband was at that time engaged in a general merchandise business.

Having completed the training of the public schools John J. Hill attended Columbia University for a year, and thereafter lived for some time on his father's farm. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in Company E, Thirty-ninth Regular Militia, and was employed in guerilla warfare in the state of Missouri, eventually attaining to the rank of sergeant. October 16, 1863, he enlisted in Company E, Sixteenth Kansas Cavalry, and served under Generals Curtis, Pope and Scofield. In 1865 he was sent to fight Indians in the Yellowstone Park, Montana, Wyoming and the Dakotas, and in December of the same year brought up at Fort Leavenworth, where he received his discharge. Returning to his home he engaged in farming on his own responsibility, and between 1866 and 1870 engaged in mail contracting. After completing his mail services he continued to farm in Missouri until 1876, when he came to Oregon, locating near Bethel in Polk county. His farm consisted of two hundred and eight acres, and this he brought to a high state of cultivation, living thereon until taking up his residence in McCoy in 1892.

In Missouri, in 1863, Mr. Hill was united in marriage with Mrs. Jemima Packwood, who was born in Indiana, February 13, 1836. Of this union there have been born two children, Effie and Mattie, the latter being the wife of George Richards, of Portland.

Mr. Hill is a Republican in politics, has been school director and held other offices. Because of services during the Civil war he is identified with Custer Post No. 9, G. A. R., of McMinnville. Possessed of sound business judgment and unquestioned integrity, Mr. Hill commands the respect of all with whom he is associated, and it is to be hoped will long continue to be an important factor in the community of McCoy.

FREDERICK W. WILL. A hostelry in Aurora to which weary and travel-stained tourists are glad to repair, is that owned and managed by Fred W. Will, a native son of Oregon, and who was born in Portland, January 29, 1875. Like many of the present population of the town, Mr. Will owes his principal interest here to his father's pioneer association with the sister colony of Bethel, Shelby county, Mo., from which he emigrated with the other colonists in 1863. The elder Will was born in the Bethel colony, and after crossing the plains and locating in Aurora, took up his residence for a time in Portland, where he followed his trade as a wood-turner. In 1883 he again became a citizen of Aurora, and in partnership with A. Kocher, started a general merchandise store. This was a comparatively short-lived venture, for at the end of a year he bought out his partner and ran the business alone until disposing of it to his son, Allen H. Will, in 1902. He married Henrietta Miller, who was born in Missouri, and who came to Oregon in 1865, settling with her parents in Aurora. Of the eight children born of this union three are deceased, Frederick W. being the oldest of the three sons and two daughters now living.

After completing his education in the public schools of Portland, and graduating from the Portland Business College in 1901, Frederick W. Will engaged in the general merchandise business at Needy, Ore., for six months, selling out at that time to his partner. In Aurora he afterward worked for his father in the general merchandise store, and in January, 1902, bought the hotel which has since been his greatest care. A bar is maintained in connection with the hotel, and the appointments of the entire enterprise are modern, and in accord with successful entertainment of the traveling public. Mr. Will has identified himself with important affairs in Aurora, and that he has served as city treasurer argues that his standing in the community is an honorable and worthy one. He is a Republican in politics, and fraternally is a member of Hermes Lodge, No. 56, Knights of Pythias.

In Needy, Ore., December 25, 1900, Mr. Will married Lettie M. Thompson, who was born in Missouri, and whose father, William Thompson, is an old settler and prominent farmer near Needy. Mr. Will is energetic and prosperous, and his natural qualifications of tact, good nature and knowledge of human nature, are such as are most required of the up-to-date hotel man.

HENRY A. SNYDER. Possessed of a versatility which would make him an important factor in any community, Henry A. Snyder has found a prolific field of activity in Aurora, where he has many financial irons in the fire, all of which are followed by unquestioned success. Mr. Snyder is a young man to have found his rightful place in the world, he having been born in this town March 10, 1872, the son of Charles Snyder, a pioneer of 1848.

Charles Snyder was born near Canton, Ohio, and is the son of Henry Schneider, a native of Germany, and who came to the United States when twelve years old, settling in Ohio. When Charles Snyder was a year and a half old his mother died, leaving six other children to the care of her husband, who lived to be sixty-five years old. The father came to Oregon in 1848, and at that time Charles was eleven years old. In 1869 he married Christian Schuele, who was born in Bethel, Mo., and whose parents became members of the Aurora colony. At the time of the disruption of the colony he was working at his trade as carpenter, and he received for his share of the property fifty-seven acres of timberland near the town, while his wife received a house and lot in Aurora. Mr. Snyder has been industrious, thrifty and thoroughly honorable in all his dealings, and at present owns a farm much larger than his original grant, besides considerable property in the town. Nine children have been born to himself and wife, the order of their birth being as follows: Andrew C., Henry A., twin boys who died in infancy; Amelia and Augusta, twins; Ernest and Ida (deceased) twins; and Lawrence J. Mr. Snyder is a Republican in politics, but has never added his name to the membership of secret organizations. He is one of the solid, substantial and thoroughly reliable citizens of this part of the county, and the farm which he is now conducting is a credit to the agricultural standing of his section.

Henry A. Snyder received his education in the public schools, and at the age of fifteen embarked upon his first business experience as a clerk in the general merchandise store of F. & J. Giesy. Under these well known merchants he was also assistant postmaster, and after severing this association was employed by the Willamette Trading Company, of Aurora. March 3, 1898, he was appointed postmaster of the town, an office which he still holds. He is a staunch defender of the Republican party, and various positions have come his way because of special fitness, among them being that of school clerk, city recorder for three years, and president of the town council for one year. He has been a delegate to county and state conventions, and has been a prominent and influential political figure in this part of the county.

In connection with the management of the post-office, Mr. Snyder is running a confectionery and tobacco store, and he also has an undertaking establishment, and in partnership with W. S. Hurst handles a large amount of real estate. He has branched out into journalistic prominence as half owner of a local paper known as the Aurora Borealis. Mr. Snyder is social and genial, traits of character which have made him a welcome member at various lodges in the county, including Champoeg Lodge, No. 27, A. F. & A. M.; the Knights of Pythias, in which he has passed many of the chairs; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has passed all of the chairs; the Woodmen of the World, and the Native Sons of Oregon.

July 1, 1903, Mr. Snyder was united in marriage with Diana Vandeleur, daughter of John Scott Vandeleur.

B. F. BRIDGES. It may truly be said that the character of B. F. Bridges has been strengthened and developed in the hard places of life, and it is doubtful if he can recall many instances of money coming to him without most arduous effort on his part. The average man who spends much time in the lumber camps of northern Michigan gains physically, and in the case of Mr. Bridges, his mental, moral and physical powers were quickened into useful and rugged growth. His patriotism was tested by a long and meritorious service in the Civil war, and his later years have been enriched with most successful results by his present mercantile business in Albany.

Years before the oppression of the colonists culminated in historic strife, those bearing the name of Bridges came from Scotland and presumably located in Massachusetts. Here was born the paternal grandfather, who served in the Revolutionary war under Washington, settling after peace was restored, in Livingston county, N. Y. On a farm he reared several sons and daughters, among whom was Marchus, the father of B. F. The father was engaged in farming and stock-raising in Livingston county for many years, finally settling in Breedsville, Van Buren county, Mich., where he died in 1852 at the age of sixty-six years. He married Fazine Kelley, a native of Geneseo, N. Y., where she also died, leaving three children, of whom B. F., the youngest, was born in Geneseo, in March 1840.

Eight years of age when his family moved to Van Buren county, Mich., B. F. was reared in an unsettled and desolate region, the nearest school-house being two miles away. In the heart of a lumbering region, he naturally became interested in sawmilling, a trade which he learned in South Haven, and at which he was working when the country was convulsed by the declaration of war in 1861. He volunteered for service in 1861, in Company A., Third Michigan Cavalry, was mustered in at Allegan, and participated first in the battle of Corinth, afterward marching through Missouri and taking part in the battles of Island No. 10, Iuka, Second Corinth, Tallahoochie, and a minor skirmish with Forrest's men. The regiment was finally brigaded with the Seventh Kansas and kept fighting General Forrest, but was later sent to Arkansas, and took part in the battles of Little Rock and Duval's Bluffs. They then went to Mobile, were present at the surrender, and afterward went to Baton Rouge and Shreveport. From the latter town the regiment marched a distance of five hundred and fifty miles to San Antonio, Tex., where they were mustered out in March, 1866, Mr. Bridges having been four years and seven months in the service. He began as bugler of his company, and for the last three years of the service was in the regimental band. He was singularly fortunate as far as the disasters of war were concerned, for he was injured only on one occasion, when, during a guerrilla fight, he received a charge of buckshot in his left leg.

Returning to Michigan after the war, Mr. Bridges became a sawyer in a mill and liked the business so well that in 1870 he and Andrew Green bought a mill in Allegan county, Mich., and ran it for eight years. Then they set their mill up near Macosta, on Mud Lake, and at a still later period moved it to Lumberton, nine miles west of Big Rapids. This proved the best place in which they had operated, and during twenty-six months' time they cut twenty-seven million feet of timber. In Delta county, at Masonville, twelve miles above Escanaba, Mr. Bridges repaired at the end of three years and became an important factor in the upbuilding of the little town. He started a general merchandise store and built piers out into the lake at an expense of $11,000. Hopeful as the situation seemed, he was doomed to disappointment, for the pier which was to bring trade to the town, was rendered useless owing to the falling of the water of the lake, and all his plans for a many-sided little center of activity were as though they had never been. Having nothing further to retain him in this locality, he left in 1898, and became foreman of the Metropolitan Lumber Company, at Metropolitan, Mich., remaining with the company for eight years, until all of their work was completed. His last years in Michigan were spent at Rapid River, and while there he duplicated the success which had attended all of his lumbering interests, his experience at Masonville being the only unpleasant and discouraging proposition with which he had to contend.

In April, 1899, Mr. Bridges transferred his residence and business interests to Albany, Ore., and at the same time located a timber claim of a quarter section near Cascades, in the eastern part of Linn county. He sold the same at the end of a year, and at present owns a timber claim in Klamath county, this state. In 1892 he started his present merchandising business in the town, under the firm name of Bridges & Lemke, purchasing the store originally occupied by Mr. Chandler, on the corner of Main and Salem streets. He carries a general line of the commodities in demand at such stores, and judging by the results so far achieved, his permanent success is not to be questioned.

Harvey Walker

In South Haven, Mich., Mr. Bridges was united in marriage with Helen Briggs, a native of Van Buren county, Mich., and who died in Masonville, Mich., leaving one daughter Belle, now the wife of D. B. Adams, of Seattle, Wash. His second marriage, in Escanaba, Mich., was with Edla Nygren, born in Stockholm, Sweden. Mr. Bridges is independent in politics, but aside from serving as postmaster of Masonville for eight years, he has never been willing to accept official recognition. He is fraternally connected with the South Haven Lodge, A. F. & A. M., which he joined in 1867, and with the Knights of Pythias of Kalamazoo, Mich. He is a member of the Grand Army Post of Seattle.

HARVEY WALKER. Among the venerable and highly honored agriculturists of Polk county who are enjoying immunity from labor after years of successful striving is Harvey Walker, occupying his finely developed farm of three hundred and fifty-five acres near McCoy. The Walker family is of Irish descent, and was presumably established in America by the paternal grandfather, Thomas, who settled in North Carolina, where was born Jesse D., the father of Harvey. As a young man Jesse D. moved with his parents to Kentucky, settling in Christian county, where he married Sarah Calvin, and settled down to farming. His son Harvey was born September 16, 1826, and four years later he removed to Shelby county, Ill., remained there about five years, and then settled in Moultrie county, the same state, where his death occurred in 1852, at the age of fifty-five years. He was the father of eight children, five daughters and three sons, Harvey and his twin brother, Madison, being fourth and fifth in order of birth. Madison attained maturity, but died at the age of twenty-five years.

The many tasks to be performed on the Moultrie county farm left but little leisure for the Walker children, and their attendance at the public school in the neighborhood was at best irregular. At the age of twenty-two Harvey started out on his own responsibility and located on a farm in Tazewell county, Ill., where he worked by the month for a couple of years, and thus managed to save a little money. For the following two years he lived on the home farm in Moultrie county, returning thereafter to Tazewell county, where he took up farm land for himself. In 1850 he married Hannah Davis, a native daughter of Tazewell county, who was born March 7, 1843. Her father, William Davis, was born in Tennessee in 1801, while her mother, Jane (Eads) Davis, was born in Gardner county, Mo., in 1806.

After his marriage Mr. Walker engaged in farming in Moultrie county, in 1852 returned to Tazewell county, and three years later in 1855, bought a farm in Logan county. In the latter county he was fairly successful, became well and favorably known, and made it his home until 1882.

Arriving in Oregon with his wife and children, Mr. Walker located on a farm near Salem, where he lived seven years, and then sold out and purchased his present farm, advantageously located near McCoy. His painstaking methods and unfailing industry have accomplished much for the place, and although it was a valuable property at the time of purchase, it has increased many fold since passing into the possession of the present owner. In 1895 he took up his residence in McMinnville, remained there until 1901, and then came to spend the remainder of his life on the old farm. He is passing his days in comparative rest, for the farm is rented to others, who still carry on the work so carefully planned and systematized by him. In his younger days Mr. Walker took quite an interest in Republican politics, but of late has been seen at the polls only, and never at any time has desired or worked for public honors. For many years he has been identified with the Masonic fraternity, and is now connected with the lodge at Amity. Seven of the children born to himself and wife are living, and of these, Adelaine, wife of John Shields, lives in Washington; Alice Walker lives in McMinnville; Hettie, the wife of George Shields, lives on the home place; Fannie is at home; Mrs. Jennie Stairs lives in Washington; Lewis is also in Washington; and Clara Bewley is in Salem. Though not one of the pioneers of Oregon, but a comparatively brief period of his life having been spent in the northwest, Mr. Walker has a firmly established place in the hearts of his fellow townsmen, and the business contingent regards him as one of its thoroughly reliable and upright members.

LAWRENCE M. SCHOLL. Among the prosperous young business men of the present day, in Hubbard, Marion county, who are leading industrious and useful lives, the name of Lawrence M. Scholl must not be overlooked. Mr. Scholl was appointed postmaster of that place April 26, 1900, in addition to which he owns a half-interest in a drug store in the same city. He is a son of John and Mary (Warner) Scholl and grandson of George F. and Dora Scholl. His birth occurred in Aurora November 1, 1875.

George F. Scholl, the grandfather, a native of Wurtemberg, Germany, emigrated to the United States in 1832. He located for a time in New York and later near Shoustown, in Pennsylvania. He afterward went to Missouri, settling at Bethel. In 1865 he went to the far west and found a permanent home in Aurora, Ore. He attained the age of seventy-two years. His widow survived him many years, her demise having taken place in 1896, at the great age of eighty-two years. Three sons and two daughters were born to this worthy couple, the second youngest being John, the father of our subject.

John Scholl was born at Bethel, Shelby county, Mo., February 15, 1847. He accompanied his parents to Oregon and in 1881 engaged in carpenter work. Later he followed farming between Aurora and Hubbard for a brief period, and then purchased a quarter section of land, which he cultivated until 1898, removing to Hubbard at that date to re-engage in carpenter work. In 1903 he entered the implement house of Mr. Fry, where he purchased an interest.

While a resident of Aurora he married Mary Warner, a native of Ohio, born in 1845, and four sons were born to them. Henry F., who is married, and George F., the oldest two, conduct the farm, while Lawrence M., the third son, is the subject of this writing, and David J., the youngest son is serving as assistant postmaster. John Scholl is a Republican in politics, and has served his party as a member of the city council. He has also served as school director for twelve years and socially he is allied with the Odd Fellows. He has a nice residence in Hubbard and is one of her most straight-forward citizens.

Lawrence M. Scholl had exceptional educational advantages. His common school education was supplemented by a thorough course in the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated in 1896. After leaving college, he spent one year clerking for the Marks Shoe Company, in Portland, and later filled a similar position with the Bebee Merchandise Store in Hubbard. In 1898 he was appointed assistant postmaster under J. L. Calvert, and served as such until 1900, when he was appointed postmaster of Hubbard, which position he is now filling.

In July, 1901, Mr. Scholl was joined in the holy bonds of matrimony with Sadie Wolfer, who is a native of Oregon. Like his father, our subject affiliates with the Republican party. He is an active politician and is now serving his fourth term in the council. Socially, he is a valued member of Hermes Lodge No. 56, K. P.

JENNINGS BELLINGER COMLEY. For many years a prominent lumber manufacturer, and a well known business man Jennings B. Comley, now living retired from active pursuits in Albany, is numbered among those energetic and enterprising pioneers who have contributed largely toward the development of the industrial prosperity of Linn county. Coming to this state fifty years ago, he made the long and tedious journey overland, with an ox-team, the popular mode of traveling in those days. Settlements in this part of the county were few and far between, and the people hereabout realized in no small measure the hardships and privations that had to be endured in a new and undeveloped region. Neither railways, telegraph nor telephone lines spanned these broad acres, and few evidences of civilization then existed. Through the strenuous efforts of the courageous pioneers, wonderful changes have occurred, flourishing towns, villages and cities have sprung up, and fertile farms yielding an abundance of grain and fruit have usurped the forests and plains, in the transformation Mr. Comley performing his part. He was born September 21, 1823, in Lancaster, Ky., a son of John Comley. His grandfather, David Comley, a native of Manchester, England, settled first in Virginia, and served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Subsequently, following in the footsteps of Daniel Boone, the famous backwoodsman and trapper, he settled in the then almost unknown country of Kentucky, and there spent the remainder of his long life.

John Comley, a life-long resident of Kentucky, died on his farm at the advanced age of eighty years. Inheriting the patriotism and bravery of his father, he took part in the war of 1812, on January 8, 1815, serving in the battle of New Orleans. He married Martha McFadden, who was born, and died in Kentucky, whither her father, James McFadden, had removed from Virginia. Of their family of twelve children, Jennings B., the ninth child in order of birth, is the only one residing in Oregon.

Brought up on a Kentucky farm, Jennings B. Comley left home in early manhood, and subsequently learned the carpenter's trade in Princeton, Ky., and at Lexington, Ky., became familiar with the trade of a stair builder, which he followed in connection with carpentering until 1853. In that year taking advantage of the opportunities afforded to builders in a new region, Mr. Comley came with his wife to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams, being six months and ten days en route from the Missouri river. Following the old Oregon trail, he stood guard one-half of each night while passing through the Indian country, coming through safely. Spending the first winter in Benton county, he went in the spring of 1854 to Astoria, where he built the stairway in the old lighthouse. Returning then to Benton county, he purchased a residence in Corvallis, and having there established his family went to California, where he was engaged as a prospector and miner in Siskiyou county, Scotts river, Indian creek, Greenhorn and Deadwood. While at the latter place, the Indians cut off all trails so that he was forced to abandon mining. Going, therefore, to Scotts valley, he built a flour mill, putting in two burr-stones, and helped run it for awhile. In 1856 Mr. Comley returned to Oregon with a comrade, coming across the mountains on horseback, and while passing through the Indian country, at the close of the Rogue river war, had several narrow escapes from the wily savages. Purchasing a ranch in Corvallis, he rented that and worked at his trade for a few years.

In 1859 Mr. Comley removed to Albany, which has since been his home, and from that time to the present day has taken a keen interest in advancing its welfare. Erecting the first steam mill in this locality, and the first sash and door factory, he ran them both for seventeen years. Selling out his mill and factory in 1876, he, in company with Messrs. Comstock and Heard, embarked in the lumber business, hauling a mill to Pass creek, Douglas county, with horse and cattle teams. The mill, which had a capacity of seventy thousand feet per day, he continued to operate until good timber in that vicinity became scarce. Then, with Henry Miller and Mr. Comstock, he was engaged in the manufacture of lumber on Myrtle creek for awhile. Going from there to Wolf creek, Douglas county, he built a mill for Abramson & Willis, after which he engaged with Mr. Comstock, and was engineer of a mill on Gray creek until 1883. Returning to Albany in February, of that year, Mr. Comley remained here a short time, and then went to the Selitz reservation, where he built a sawmill for the Indians. He subsequently spent a brief time at Yaquina bay, but since that time has resided in Albany, being sadly afflicted with rheumatism.

Mr. Comley married, in Mississippi, Dorinda D. McFadden, who was born in Louisiana. She died in 1893, leaving three children, namely: Georgie, now Mrs. Walling, of Idaho; Adrian, who is successfully engaged in the lumber business in Washington; and Edward, superintendent of the electric light plant at Spokane, Wash. Politically, Mr. Comley is identified with the Democratic party, and has served four terms as a member of the city council. Fraternaly he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

JACOB GIESY. The name of Jacob Giesy is known to every man, woman and child in Aurora and possibly to most inhabitants of Marion county. Ever since 1870 he has conducted a hotel and restaurant business in the town, and for many years trains arriving at this station have depended upon his viands to appease the hunger of thousands of passengers. At first Mr. Giesy ran his hotel in the interests of the colony, but after its dissolution he proceeded independently, and in the meantime has won a reputation as one of the successful hotel men in the county. The Aurora Hotel is a large and roomy structure, with airy rooms well furnished, and all modern improvements. Under the present ownership many changes and additions have been made, including wide porches, which extend the entire length of the front of the house. Arrangements for satisfying the inner man are in accord with the broad knowledge of human nature possessed by the genial proprietor, who realizes that a well fed man is usually an agreeable one, and therefore easy to get along with.

Mr. Giesy has enjoyed many years of successful activity, and is still a leader in the affairs of his adopted town. He was born in Pittsburg, Pa., March 20, 1827, and to an unusual degree inherits the substantial traits of his Teutonic ancestors. His father, Andrew, was born in Basel, northern Switzerland, near Baden, Germany, and came to the United States in 1827. Near Allegheny, Pa., he lived on a farm for many years, and in 1845 removed to Shelby county, Mo., settling in the Bethel colony. In 1855 he came to Washington with a small colony, and there died in 1860, at the age of sixty-nine years. He married Barbara Giesy, no relation, and also a native of Basel, who died in Aurora, to which town she removed after the death of her husband, at the age of seventy-four years. This pioneer woman was faithful to trusts imposed, and carefully and conscientiously reared ten sons and four daughters, all of whom came with her to Washington from the colony at Bethel, Mo.

In the public schools of Pennsylvania, Jacob Giesy received his preliminary education, and he accompanied the family to Missouri in 1847. Here he engaged as a clerk in a general merchandise store, and came to Oregon via the Isthmus in 1855, living for a time in Portland, and coming to Aurora in 1856. In 1860 he made a trip back to Missouri, where he enlisted in the Home Guards, and remained there until the fall of 1862. Via Panama he then returned to Oregon and soon inaugurated his hotel and restaurant business. In connection with the hotel he maintains a well equipped livery stable, and he owns thirty acres of land near the town, as well as other town property, including the Lutheran Church building. Mr. Giesy is a Republican in politics, and has been constable and school clerk. He is a member of the Pioneer Association, and of various social organizations which abound in this vicinity. Through his marriage with Caroline Fry, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Missouri, one child was born, Sarah, who is now the wife of Emanuel Keil, of Aurora. Mr. Giesy is very popular in this community, and it is doubtful if any upbuilding agency in the town has exerted a greater influence than has his well conducted and paying hostelry.

GEORGE M. FRY. Every community has its quota of business men who are more or less successful. The gentleman whose name heads this sketch has had a wide experience in the mercantile world, being at the present time engaged in handling all kinds of agricultural implements, farm machinery, etc., at Hubbard, in Marion county. He has been a resident of Oregon since 1863.

Mr. Fry was born near Shoustown, Pa., January 31, 1842, and is a son of John and Sarah (Gates) Fry, both of whom were also natives of the Keystone state. The father was born October 11, 1801, was married in 1828, and went to Missouri with a colony, settling at Bethel, Shelby county. He followed various occupations for a livelihood and was finally cut off by death January 4, 1854. The mother of our subject was born April 6, 1811, and she passed to her final rest five years prior to the death of her husband, November 22, 1849.

George M. Fry is the seventh child born to his parents, the family consisting of eight children—four sons and four daughters. He was educated in the public schools of Missouri and in 1863 he crossed the plains in company with a colony on their way to Oregon. He located with the colony at Aurora, where he opened a jeweler's store, and carried on a successful business in that line for many years. In 1887, he moved to Hubbard and engaged in similar business for a period of twelve years. In 1890 he sold out to advantage and spent about six years in general merchandising; again selling he engaged in handling agricultural implements, farm machinery, and all kinds of farm supplies, which is his business today, in company with John Scholl, who purchased an interest in the business in the spring of 1903.

Mr. Fry has met with success in his business ventures and owns a fine residence in the heart of Hubbard. He also acts as agent for his sister, having control of her large estate in Marion county, which contains eight hundred acres, on which Mr. Fry carries on general farming, has twenty acres in hops, and leases out a part of the land. While a resident of Aurora, he was joined in matrimony with Caroline Scholl, who was born in 1845, near Shoustown, Pa. They have two children, Sarah A., now wife of Harvey A. Hinkle, and Frank W., who married Nellie Dimick. Sarah A. was born June 5, 1871, and Frank W., November 15, 1873.

Mr. Fry is a Republican in his political preference, and at the present time he is a member of the city council. He is also greatly interested in educational matters, having served on the school board for nine consecutive years. In fraternal circles he is a valued member of the Odd Fellows. The sister above referred to, in whose behalf Mr. Fry acts as agent, is Mrs. Elizabeth Preobstel, who was born in Pennsylvania, assisted in colonizing Oregon, and whose husband died in Albina, this state. Mr. Fry deserves great credit for his successful endeavors and the rich fruitage they have borne, and he ranks among the substantial business men of his community.

CHARITY J. LUPER. Both as daughter and wife, Mrs. Charity J. Luper, a worthy member of the society of Tangent, Linn county, Ore., has experienced the trials of pioneer life, having crossed the plains in 1852 with her parents, and a few years later married John Luper, another of the sturdy and reliable citizens of the new territory. Mrs. Luper was in maidenhood Charity J. Fanning, born in Morgan county, Ill., November 30, 1840, her parents being Levi and Nancy (James) Fanning. The birth of her father occurred in Virginia, February 8, 1810, and that of her mother in Kentucky, November 18, 1806, their marriage following in Illinois, whither they had removed. In Morgan county they made their home until the spring of 1852, April 1 of that year finding them upon the plains with two wagons and eight yoke of oxen to each, bound for the broad lands of Oregon. While on the journey the mother died on Snake river, August 2, 1852, leaving one son and two daughters. The family continued their way into the west, where the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located three miles southeast of Tangent, remaining there for many years. A few years previous to his death, which took place June 5, 1888, he removed to a farm three-quarters of a mile south of Albany and engaged in farming. In August, 1853, he had married Jane Gilliland, who is also now deceased.

Of her father's family Mrs. Luper was next to the youngest in age, and the principal part of her life has been passed among the scenes of Oregon. She was married April 23, 1857, near Tangent, to John Luper, who was born in Crawford county, Pa., November 10, 1824. He crossed the plains in 1853 and took up a donation claim one mile northeast of Tangent, where he engaged in farming for nearly forty years, after which he removed to Tangent and died there March 29, 1902. His widow, now a resident of Tangent, has a life lease on the farm of two hundred and twenty acres, and also owns forty-one lots in this city. Of the children born to them, Commodore P. is deceased; Ella Florence is the wife of John McFarland, located near Albany; and Lola Charity is the wife of J. E. Ownbey, located two and a half miles southeast of Fangent. Another member of the family is Loren B. Luper, an adopted son, who now lives on the old homestead. Mr. Luper was a staunch supporter of the Prohibition principles in the west, and fraternally was a member of the Grange. He was a liberal supporter, member and class leader of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Mrs. Luper and her family are members.

CHARLES W. YANNKE. Upon the ranch where he now lives, not far from Salem, in Marion county, Ore., Charles W. Yannke was born April 2, 1872. His father, Frederick William Yannke, was a native of Germany, born June 2, 1826, and while still in the Fatherland he served in the German army for three years. About 1847 he bade adieu to his native country and sailed for America, the journey being made in a sailing vessel and occupying about four months. He established his home in Belleville, St. Clair county, Ill., where his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Yannke, had settled two years before. With his father and his family Frederick Yannke came across the plains in 1852, making the journey in the primitive manner of the times with an ox-team. They had no trouble with the Indians, but six months had elapsed before their eyes were gladdened by the sight of the green fields of Oregon. The first winter they spent at the mouth of the Columbia river and in the succeeding spring Frederick W. Yannke came to Salem. He was in limited financial circumstances, and in order to earn a living he drove an ox-team and hauled logs for a sawmill, following that pursuit for some time. In the summer months, however, he was employed on ranches and also worked in the fields during the harvest season, swinging a cradle. He was married February 29, 1871, to Elizabeth Frölich, who was also a native of Germany, and this worthy couple became the parents of six children: Charles W.; Emma, who became the wife of Frank Feely and died at the age of twenty-four years; Mary, who died at the age of six years; Frederick, whose death occurred when he was two months old; Louise, who died at the age of four years; and Frank J., who is employed by the Oregon Shoe Company, of Salem.

In the spring of 1862 Frederick Yannke purchased the farm of two hundred and fifty acres upon which his son Charles made his home until recently. In the fall of that year he removed his family to that place and hereon spent his remaining days. He made all of the fine improvements upon the farm, cleared the land, placed the fields under a high state of cultivation and erected excellent modern buildings. He devoted his energies to general farming and stock-raising with good success throughout the remainder of his life, and September 29, 1895, his life's labors were ended in death. He was a zealous member of the Catholic Church and a man who deserved great credit for what he had accomplished, for he entered upon his business career empty handed. When he purchased his property near Salem it was all unimproved land, with the exception of about thirty acres; and its development was entirely due to his own energy and perseverance. His widow still survives him and is now living in Salem at the age of sixty-three years.

Charles W. Yannke, whose name introduces this review, was born and reared upon the home farm and in the public schools of Salem he pursued his education. In early boyhood he assisted his father as much as his age and strength permitted, and when he had completed his school life he became his father's assistant and partner, their work being carried on together until the death of F. W. Yannke, when the son assumed the entire charge of the home place. He to-day carries on general farming and stock-raising with good success. He has fine horses upon his place and is engaged in the raising of cereals best adapted to the soil and climate. To some extent he is also engaged in the dairy business. The old home is pleasantly located two miles from Salem, near the penitentiary. On July 1, 1903, in partnership with Albert A. Disque he purchased the well-known Club Stables in Salem, and in the fall of that year removed his family to the city.

September 29, 1897, Mr. Yannke was married to Miss Helena Neibert, and they have an interesting little daughter, Genevieve Louise. The family are identified with the Catholic Church. In his political affiliation Mr. Yannke is a Democrat. For one term he served as road supervisor in his district.

PLEASANT MARION SCROGGIN. Connected with the banking business of Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., Mr. Scroggin is lending himself heartily to the forward march of the enterprises of this city in a way which has thoroughly won the commendation of his fellow townsmen. In 1899 he established the banking firm of P. M. Scroggin & Co., with a capital of $25,000 and a surplus of $5,000. His able management has since advanced it among the business enterprises of Linn county until it ranks first with institutions of like character. His energetic yet conservative methods have proven his executive ability and clear judgment, and there is every prospect of a steady advancement and a gratifying success in the many years of life which, in all probability, Mr. Scroggin has before him.

Pleasant Marion Scroggin was born near Sheridan, Yamhill county, Ore., May 9, 1872, the son of P. M. Scroggin. The latter was born in Logan county, Ill., in 1830, and on attaining manhood he followed the life of an agriculturist, to which he had early been trained. From Mount Pulaski, Ill., he removed to Iowa, and from that state emigrated about 1863 to Oregon, settling first near McMinnville and later near Sheridan, where he became the owner of a thousand acres adjoining the city on the south. He died there April 18, 1894, at the age of sixty-four years. As a Democrat he had been popular in his own party, and had served for two terms as county commissioner. He was married in Iowa to Sarah Howard, a native of that state, who crossed the plains with her husband and died in the same year in which the latter's death occurred. Of the eight children who are now living P. M. Scroggin is the eighth in order of birth, and received his preliminary education in the common schools of Oregon, after which he attended the Portland Business College for one year, graduating in 1894 in the banking and business course. In the same year he engaged in the hardware business in Sheridan, the next year finding him in Lebanon in his present business enterprise.

The marriage of Mr. Scroggin occurred in Ashland, Ore., and united him with Lydia W. Washburn, a native of Iowa. Two children now add to the happiness of the home, namely: Seymour Ralph and La Verne. Mr. Scroggin is a member of the Christian Church, and politically he adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party.

JESSE L. MCKINNEY. One of the most pleasantly situated and highly cultivated farms in the vicinity of Hubbard is that owned by J. L. McKinney, situated one mile north of the city. Its owner is noted throughout Marion county as a progressive agriculturist, and for years he has been prominently identified with the advancement of general farming and hop-growing interests.

Ohio claims Mr. McKinney as a native son, his birth having occurred in Highland county, that state, July 1, 1862. His father, Hardin McKinney, was a native of North Carolina, born May 1, 1829. At a very early date in the history of Ohio the latter settled in Highland county, where he worked by the month on a farm until his marriage in 1858 to Louisa McKinney. The lady whom he made his wife was born February 6, 1836, and reared in Highland county, Ohio, and the young couple began their married life on a farm there, remaining in that locality until 1876, when they removed to Marion county, Iowa. There they made their home during the winter of that year. They then decided to try their fortune in the northwest. Journeying to Marion county, Ore., they purchased the farm which is now the home of Jesse L. McKinney. They were pioneers of this locality, as the land was then wild and unimproved, giving little evidence of the present well cultivated fields. Hardin McKinney immediately set to work to make a comfortable home for his family. He cleared twenty-five acres of the land, built a home and carried on general farming and stock-raising, providing comfortably for his family, consisting of his wife and three children: Sarah E., the wife of E. C. Churchill, of Salem, Ore.; Jesse L., of this review; and William H., who lives in the vicinity of Hubbard. The father of this family took an active part in politics and cast his ballot for the Republican party. His death occurred in his sixty-third year, March 13, 1891. His wife still survives and makes her home with her son Jesse L.

The life history of J. L. McKinney is worthy of mention from many standpoints, but the principal one which we will name is the fact that he, like the great majority of those who represent the farming interests of the country, is one of those substantial, quiet, unassuming men who perform their duties in life without ostentation, and leave the world better and the community more prosperous for their having lived. Success, fairly and impartially considered, is not so much owing to the fact that a man has achieved a great name, that he has accumulated vast riches, or has donated large amounts to charitable institutions, as that he has found the vocation best suited to him in life, that he has filled that vocation honorably and well, has developed the very best talent that is in him, and has used that talent for the benefit of himself and mankind. All this may be said of Mr. McKinney. As a youth he pursued his education in the district schools, remaining at home and assisting his father in the cultivation of the farm, during the seasons of vacation and after he had left school. Thus he grew to man's estate, when, October 2, 1892, he wedded Anna Clausen, who was a native of Valparaiso, Ind. Mr. McKinney brought his bride to the family homestead, where their lives have since been passed, and where they have reared their family of three children, namely: Louis Melvin, Elmer Clausen and Harold Hardin, all at home. Mr. McKinney is an acknowledged authority on the best farming methods, and has eight acres devoted to the cultivation of hops. He has been very successful in the raising of this staple product and his income is annually increasing therefrom.

Mr. McKinney takes a deep interest in the cause of education, and has ever been in favor of good schools and good teachers. For several years he served as a member of the school board. In politics he is a Republican. Influential and prominent in the community in which he resides, Mr. McKinney has gained popularity and friends by reason of his excellent traits of character.

MARSHALL W. CANTER. Twenty acres of land adjoining Harrisburg on the east, four valuable town lots, his own residence property, and a well equipped carpenter shop in which to ply his useful trade, is an accumulation resulting from the well applied industry of Marshall W. Canter, who came here a poor man in 1866, and is now one of the town's successful and honored citizens. Born near Nashville, Tenn., January 17, 1836, Mr. Canter comes of an old family of the south, his father, James H., and his mother, Anna (Fuqua) Canter, having both been born in Tennessee, the former in 1808. The family moved to Missouri about 1838, locating first in Platt and afterward in Buchanan county, and engaged in farming and stock-raising. The father, who died in 1888, at the age of eighty years, was a Democrat, and he was very active in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife also died in Missouri, leaving ten children, six sons and four daughters, of whom Marshall W. is the second.

At the age of twenty Marshall W. Canter left home and learned the carpenter's trade, thereafter plying the same as a means of livelihood until 1864. For a couple of years he mined and prospected in the Dwight region, Idaho, made quite a sum of money, and in 1866 came to Oregon to investigate the prospects for an industrious and capable carpenter. Pleased with the people and surroundings of Brownsville, he located there in 1867, one year later taking up his residence in Harrisburg, which has since been his home. Much of the best work in the town is due to his knowledge of his trade, and his little shop is never out of material awaiting his attention. The start he got at the mines while comparatively inconsequent, enabled him to invest in town lots, all of which have increased in value, with the result that he is today in a more than comfortable financial position.

Although not an office-seeker, Mr. Canter has been induced to exert his activity in promoting the local wellbeing of the Democratic party, and to serve as mayor of the town for three terms in succession, to be a member of the council for eighteen years, and to fill other positions of trust and responsibility. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Rebekahs, of which latter organization he is an official. In Lane county, Ore., in 1868, Mr. Canter married Margaret Gage, who was born in Benton county, Ore., near Corvallis, a daughter of Samuel Gage, who crossed the plains with his family at an early day, locating near Corvallis. Mr. Gage later removed to Lane county, but his death occurred near Rosalia, Wash., where he had engaged in mining for eight or ten years. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Canter, of whom Charles, the oldest and only son, is a brakeman on the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's road with headquarters at Portland; and Lillian is the wife of Lewis B. Maxon, and lives on a farm near her father. Mr. Canter is popular in his adopted town, and his influence has always been exerted in favor of education and all-around advancement.

RICHARD C. SHISLER. Though a comparative newcomer to this town, having arrived in 1903, Richard C. Shisler has already demonstrated his ability to entertain the traveling public in comfort, if his management of the Harrisburg Hotel can be taken as a criterion. The hostelry in question is the only place of the kind in this flourishing community, and as such it takes high rank among other hotels in the county, being modern in construction and furnishings, and having thirty-two rooms. Mr. Shisler understands among other things regarding the hotel business that an excellent cuisine is not to be despised, and he therefore lays particular stress upon this department of his well conducted house.

Prior to going into the hotel business Mr. Shisler farmed for many years, that being the occupation to which he was reared in his youth on the paternal farm in Ontario, Canada, where he was born April 10, 1858. His father, Conrad, and his mother, Mary Ann (Flagg) Shisler, were also born in Canada, and his grandfather, John, a native of Lancaster county, Pa., settled in Ontario at a very early day. The grandfather took up a large farm, and in time enlisted in the war of 1812, his death occurring in his adopted country. The ninth child in his father's family of four sons and six daughters, Richard C. received his preliminary education in the public schools, and at the age of fourteen began to make his own way in the world by working as a farm hand in the vicinity of Buffalo, N. Y. The same kind of work was pursued near Albany, Ill., in 1873, and in 1877 he went to Whiteside county, Ill., continuing to work on a farm for several years.

Mr. Shisler invested his earnings in land near Hiawatha, Brown county, Kans., in 1880, and two years later bought a farm near Falls City, Neb. In 1896 he removed to Missouri and located on a farm of one hundred and forty acres near Meadville, and in March, 1903, came to Oregon and purchased the Harrisburg Hotel, which had been built in 1902. In Illinois, Mr. Shisler was united in marriage with Minerva J. Sharer, who was born in Pennsylvania, and who is the mother of five children: Lulu M., Ralph E., Milo G., Lloyd W. and Hoy. A Republican in political affiliation, he took a prominent part in political affairs in Nebraska, and served many terms on the school board. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is prominent in the Presbyterian Church, of which he was an elder while living in Missouri. As becomes a hotel man, Mr. Shisler is affable and genial, possessing a fund of good spirits and good will, and the tact to deal with all with whom he comes in contact in a most satisfactory manner.

DANIEL J. YODER. Perhaps no part of Marion county is better adapted to general farming, stock-raising and hop-growing purposes than that portion surrounding Hubbard. In the midst of this rich agricultural region the thriving town appears as a gem in an emerald setting, and the cultivated fields which may be seen on every side are an indication of the prosperity and industry of the farming people who are residents of the community. A worthy representative of this class is D. J. Yoder, who resides on a good farm of twenty-five acres situated two miles east of Hubbard. Here he carries on general farming and hop-growing and also, since coming to Oregon, has followed the carpenter's trade continuously, meeting with excellent success in both occupations.

Mr. Yoder was born in Pennsylvania, September 9, 1850, and is descended from honest, industrious farming people. He was one of six children born unto his parents, who removed from Pennsylvania to Indiana, where the father is still living at the age of seventy-eight years. The mother was called to the home beyond at the age of fifty-seven years. D. J. Yoder spent the days of his boyhood and youth upon the home farm in Indiana, receiving his education in the district schools and remaining at home until he grew to manhood and prepared for having a home of his own by his marriage with Louisa Miller, a native of Indiana. The young couple remained in Indiana until the year 1881, when Mr. Yoder, becoming impressed with the opportunities for advancement offered by the Pacific coast, decided to bring his family and establish a home in the Willamette valley. Accordingly he purchased the farm which is now his home. At this time the work of improvement in this vicinity had been scarcely begun. Mr. Yoder has since developed and cultivated his farm until it is one of the best in the county. He has erected a good home and other buildings, and everything that can conduce to the comfort of the family and to the conduct of the farm is supplied. In the summer of 1903 he erected a commodious new house. In coming to a comparatively new country such as Marion county was when he settled here, Mr. Yoder has found the trade of carpenter to be a very useful and remunerative one, not only in constructing his own dwellings, but many others, and he has thus added substantially to his income as the years have gone by. Five acres of his farm is devoted to hop-growing.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Yoder have been born sixteen children, twelve of whom are now living, as follows: Laura, now the wife of D. Ramage, of Hubbard; Clyde, who is at home with his parents; Rose, of Albany, Ore.; Clara, Jamie, Harvey, Wilme, Grant, Minnie, Grace, Willis, and Raymond. Mr. Yoder has always felt that it was his duty to be informed on the issues of the day. He casts his ballot for the Republican party. The fraternal relations of life are also maintained through his membership with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Wherever known, Mr. Yoder is accorded the friendship and respect which he deserves, as his life has been one of active industry, casting an influence for good among his fellow-men.

DAVID S. BUSEY. A career identified with the mining and agricultural development of Oregon since 1852 is that of David S. Busey, who arrived in the state with a strong constitution when a man of twenty-two. Mr. Busey, who is now living retired in Harrisburg, is a native son of Indiana, and was born in Putnam county, November 14, 1830. Four years later his father, L. W., also a native of Indiana, removed to Illinois and in 1839 located in Mount Pleasant, Iowa. The elder Busey was a bricklayer by trade, in connection with which he farmed during his active life, his last home being a large tract of land near Fayetteville, Ark., to which he removed in 1872. He was successful in both his occupations, although the Arkansas farm netted him the largest returns, and enabled him to leave his family well provided for at the time of his death in 1877, at the age of sixty-nine years. As a young man he married Jane Penney, also born in the Hoosier state, who died in Iowa when David S., the second child of her three sons and three daughters, was nine years of age.

The little log school-house near the Busey farm in Indiana at best furnished but scanty opportunity for a practical education, and as one of the oldest and strongest in his father's family, David S. found little chance to escape from his home duties long enough to attend school even irregularly. In 1851 he left home and worked on a farm in Henry county, and while there became interested in a projected trip across the plains which was being agitated in the neighborhood. As a driver he secured the chance to accompany the party, which was headed by Captain McCulley. Without any particularly dangerous experiences he drove his team of oxen during the six months required for the passage, and upon reaching his destination at Foster's, Ore., August 11, 1851, went at once to Milwaukee, where he remained until the next spring. In the fall of 1852 he went to the mines of eastern Oregon, and upon returning to the western part of the state in 1854 took up a donation claim of one hundred and twenty acres one mile east of Harrisburg. This he sold in 1862 and bought three hundred and twenty acres three miles north of the town, but eventually sold all but eighty acres, which he still owns. He also has a farm of one hundred and twenty-four acres near Sodaville, Ore., both of which properties are under fine cultivation, and available for stock and general produce.

In Linn county, Mr. Busey married Nancy Porter, born in Indiana, and daughter of W. D. Porter, a native of Virginia who crossed the plains in 1853, and who located near Harrisburg, where his death occurred. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Busey: Oscar L., the oldest son, lives in Canfield, Wash.; W. D. lives in Sodaville, Ore.; Mary is the wife of W. R. McDaniel of Los Angeles, Cal.; Laura is deceased; Florence is the wife of J. H. Butler of Medford, Ore.; and Annie is deceased. As a Democrat Mr. Busey has served in the Harrisburg council about four years, and for many years he has been a school director and road supervisor. Fraternally he is connected with the Blue Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. With his family he is a member and active worker in the Christian Church. Mr. Busey has invariably proved himself a broad-minded and liberal farmer, a sincere and amiable gentleman, and an enthusiastic advocate of the many advantages to be found in the great northwest.

Donaca, for in financial standing, public spirit and personal integrity, he occupies a high position among the developers of Linn county. A native of Knox county, Ill., Mr. Donaca was born May 4, 1836, his parents, Samuel and Elizabeth (Cook) Donaca, being natives, respectively, of Virginia and Ohio. Samuel Donaca came to Ohio at an early day, and in that state enlisted in the war of 1812 as a private. He married in the Buckeye state, and, in 1830, located in Illinois, purchasing a farm of three hundred acres in Knox county. His association with Oregon began in the fall of 1852; after a long and tedious journey across the plains, he having started April 4, and proceeded via the Platte river route. Locating in Marion county, near Sublimity, he lived until 1862 upon his farm of one hundred and sixty acres, removing then to Lebanon, where he lived in retirement until his death at the age of eighty. His wife, who died in Knox county, Ill., was the mother of nine children, six of whom were sons.

The only educational advantages in Illinois available for the Donaca children were the early subscription schools, invariably held in log houses, and located more or less remote from the farm houses. At best, William, the seventh of the children, attended school irregularly, for he had to work hard on a farm which scarcely supplied a living for the family. His father's available resources were consumed in the equipment for crossing the plains, and William walked the entire way, barefooted, but with the spring of youth and strength in his step, hopefully looking forward to accomplishing great things in the region for which he was headed. He continued to live on the home farm until 1870, and then engaged in the livery business in Lebanon, in the meantime running the stage between Lebanon and Albany. He made a great success of the line, and he brought the first mail to Lebanon, thereafter securing the mail route in this direction. Between 1880 and 1890 he engaged in the grocery business in Lebanon, and, in 1890, began speculating in stock, real estate and grain, meeting with marked success, and continuing thus until his retirement from active life in 1900.

As proof of his confidence in the future of Linn county, Mr. Donaca has invested heavily in town and country properties, and at present owns three farms, one of one hundred and eighty-eight acres on Crabtree creek, one near Lebanon of one hundred acres, and one of sixty-five acres one mile north of the town. He was one of the incorporators of the town, has served in the council many terms, and has been mayor one term, besides holding the majority of the minor offices within the gift of his Republican townsmen. In 1883 he built the first brick block in the town, and still owns it, and he also constructed the warehouses there, as well as other buildings, and his own two-story residence. He is identified with the Blue Lodge, A. F. & A. M. In 1871 Mr. Donaca married Lenora Jane Harbin, a native of Missouri, and daughter of John Harbin, who crossed the plains in 1865, lived first in Yamhill county, and later in Lebanon, and died in Washington. Mr. Harbin was a blacksmith by trade, and during his active life accumulated a competence.

Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Donaca, the order of their birth being as follows: John Middleton, a clerk in an Albany hardware establishment; Lizzie Ellen, the wife of O. H. Oliver, of Portland, Ore.; William Hayes, of Portland; Charles Walter, of Portland; Ferrell Coler, of Lebanon, and Morton Winford, of Portland. Mr. Donaca has observed the greatest caution in all of his business undertakings, and they have never partaken of the "wild-cat" order, as is so often the case with people speculatively inclined. He has a thorough knowledge of general business, and an appreciation of values, and is possessed of a high public spirit.

WILLIAM L. JACKSON. It is interesting to note the progress and development of our present splendid system of public instruction, and to compare the numberless facilities of the school of today with those of pioneer times. To be fitted for the requirements of the position, the present day school teacher undergoes far more thorough preparation than was ever thought necessary in former years, and the position of county superintendent of schools presents difficulties and problems that can only be successfully solved by one who has had experience in teaching and whose executive ability is of the best. Linn county, Ore., has been particularly fortunate in her selection for this office, and in the present incumbent, William L. Jackson, many excellencies are united.

Mr. Jackson was born near Hannibal, Mo., October 25, 1867, and for nine years following was a resident of that vicinity. His parents were Martin and Callie (Blackburn) Jackson, the father born near Nashville, Tenn., and the mother a Kentuckian by birth. Martin Jackson became an agriculturist and continued in that business until he retired. During the terrible conflict waged between the north and south he saw three years of active service as a soldier in the Confederate army, and at the close of the war he left the south for California, where he spent two years in mining before returning to his old home in Missouri. Mr. Jackson was so well pleased with western life and saw so many advantages for one who remained as a permanent resident that in 1877 he took his family and came west to Linn county, Ore., following his life occupation there as in Missouri, and in addition raising live-stock. This he continued until he felt that he had accumulated enough to support him in his declining years, and he is now living in retirement, respected and highly honored by all who know him.

While in Shelby county, Mo., he was united in marriage with Callie Blackburn, and their three children are as follows: William L.; Ray B., a prominent stock-dealer of eastern Oregon; and Ida M., widow of G. L. Calavan, of Linn county. In politics Mr. Jackson was well known as a firm Democrat.

William L. Jackson spent nine years of his life in Missouri, and when his father removed to Linn county, Ore., he also came with him. His early education was attained in the public schools of Linn county, where he applied himself earnestly to his books. This training was supplemented by a normal course in the Santiam Academy at Lebanon, after which he taught in the district schools of the county and later became instructor in the public schools at Brownsville, occupying the principalship in that city. All these years were preparing him for the greater position he was to occupy. In 1900 he was elected county superintendent of Linn county schools and has proven efficient in this line of work. His special effort during his term as superintendent has been to establish a uniformity in the work of the rural schools, and he has brought the entire system to conform to the state course of study. Through all the trials of office he carries himself in a truthful, conscientious manner as befits his position.

September 12, 1893, Mr. Jackson was joined in marriage with Minnie E. Peery, who was born in Yamhill county, Ore., and is a daughter of Hiram W. and Mary J. (Kimsey) Peery. Hiram W. Peery is one of the solid, substantial farmers of Yamhill county and is descended from one of the old established families of that county. He and his wife are esteemed citizens of worth.

Mr. Jackson resides in a pleasant, comfortable home at No. 906 East Sixth street, Albany. He and his wife have but one child, Glenn L. In religious affairs they attend the First Presbyterian Church, of which Mr. Jackson is a member. In politics he is a Democrat, as was his father before him. Fraternally he allies himself with the Knights of Pythias and the Maccabees. Mr. Jackson has been connected with educational work all his life and is a member of the State Teachers' Association, being particularly identified with the county superintendent's department of work in the association.

JOHN C. HASTINGS has been for several years an honored resident of Airlie, and an Oregon pioneer of 1852. A Southerner in ancestral connections and early training, Mr. Hastings was born in west Tennessee, March 18, 1833, a son of John Hastings, and Annie (Estes) Hastings, both born in North Carolina. John Hastings removed as a young man to near Paris, Tenn., and from there came farther west to near Westport, Ark., where he farmed for many years, and from where he removed to near Batesville, where his death occurred at about fifty-two years of age.

The fourth in a family of seven children, five sons and two daughters, John C. Hastings received a limited education in the south, owing to the necessity of the children early starting out to earn their own living. The sons seem to have been ambitious and alert to opportunities for improving their prospects, for three of them, John C., A. L. and B. L., became interested in the glowing reports which reached them from the west, and determined to shift their chances to the coast. With ox-teams and wagons they joined a caravan of home-seekers bound for the other side of the Rockies via the Platte river route, and after six months arrived in Polk county, Ore., having experienced the usual number of adventures on the way. The same year they went to the mines of California, but returned in 1853, locating in Polk county. John C. and A. L. then became interested in building and contracting, and in this capacity put up a great many barns throughout the county. In 1856 John C. left off building and enlisted for the Indian service in Company K, Second Regiment of Oregon and Washington, and served for more than four months, and participating in many skirmishes, and in the battles of Grand Round and Walla Walla.

After being discharged from the service in September, 1856, Mr. Hastings returned to Polk county and married Melissa Wood, who was born in Arkansas, and whose father, Frank Wood, was a trader and farmer, who crossed the plains in 1853. Locating near Eugene, Ore., he traded and farmed until his death. Of this marriage there have been born eight children, the order of their birth being as follows: James Francis and Martha Jane, deceased; Henry Greenbury, a farmer near Airlie; B. S., a farmer of this county; Joseph L., a conductor on the Southern Pacific Railroad, with headquarters at Roseburg, Ore.; Mary Alice, the wife of Clyde Jackson, of Utah; John Franklin, living at Walla Walla, Wash.; and Clara Olive, living at home. For a time after his marriage Mr. Hastings lived on a rented farm in Polk county, and then went to Walla Walla, intending to make that his home. However, he changed his mind after eighteen months and came back to Polk county, where he bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres on the Willamette river, but sold the same in 1871. He then purchased his farm of four hundred and forty acres adjoining the town of Airlie, one hundred and sixty acres of which is at present under cultivation, and all is fenced and improved. His son, Henry G., at present has charge of the property, and he is enjoying life after many years of arduous toil. Mr. Hastings is a Democrat in politics, and has served as road supervisor and school director, having held the latter office for twelve years. He is a member of the Christian Church, and has been since his young manhood. Honorable and upright in all of his dealings, with a stern sense of duty and the claims of citizenship, Mr. Hastings has won the respect and good will of all with whom he has come in contact in the west, and his success is a matter of pride in this progressive community.

L. ARTHUR CHURCHILL. Not only has Mr. Churchill known no other home than Linn county, but he has known no other home than the farm upon which he now resides, as it was here that his birth occurred, March 20, 1857. His father, Lewis Churchill, was a Kentuckian by birth, born in 1806, and in many respects he had an interesting as well as successful career. When a young man he removed with his parents to Sangamon county, Ill., which was his home until his marriage in 1834, with Miss Mary A. Cooper, a native of Tennessee. Shortly after their marriage the young people removed to Iowa, which was their home until the year 1853, when they were seized with an ambition to cross the country and try their fortunes in the west. They were more fortunate than many another pilgrim who traveled the same path, in that they were not molested by the Indians. For three years they made their home in Douglas county, Ore., but in 1856 came to Linn county, and ten miles southeast of Albany purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, formerly a part of the John Lineberger donation claim. To his credit be it said that all the improvements upon the place were the work of his hands, as when he assumed ownership of the land it was wholly uncultivated. Success attended his efforts, and in time he was enabled to purchase two hundred and forty acres of additional land. Stock-raising was his specialty, and in this department of agriculture he met with more than average success. In the course of his career he accumulated quite a large property. His political sympathies were in accord with the principles laid down by the Republican party. At the time of the Black Hawk war he was still a resident of Illinois, and he took a hand in quelling the Indian uprisings, his experience in those days furnishing topics of conversation in after years. It was in 1847 that Mr. Churchill crossed the plains to California and Oregon for the first time, making the journey on horseback, but his return to Iowa followed soon afterward, where he remained until the final trip to the west in 1853.

To Lewis and Mary A. (Cooper) Churchill were born eight children, and of those living we make the following mention: James Madison is a resident of Plainview; Eliza A., wife of Amos Dunham, makes her home in Prineville; Elizabeth, wife of M. Lafayette Wilmott, resides in Albany; Winfield Scott lives near Plainview; Emma A., widow of William T. Jordan, resides with her brother, L. Arthur. The father lived to reach his sixty-fourth year, and the mother was eighty-two years of age at the time of her death. Both were devout and faithful members of the Christian Church.

L. Arthur Churchill attended the district schools in the vicinity of his home during his boyhood, and early in his career took an interest in things agricultural. After his father's death in 1869 he continued the work begun by the latter, and still has charge of the old home place, which has been improved and kept in an up-to-date condition. The dwelling and barns on this estate are not excelled by any in the vicinity. Mr. Churchill owns two hundred and fourteen acres of the old home farm, of which one hundred and fifty are under cultivation, general farming and stock-raising forming his chief industries. Mr. Churchill's interest in fraternal affairs is indicated by his affiliation with the Knights of the Maccabees. Politically he is a Republican. Following the early training of his parents, he is a member of the Christian Church, to the support of which he contributes liberally. Several times he has been called upon to fill positions of trust in his community, and the obligations have always been discharged in a faithful and painstaking manner. Quiet and unostentatious, Mr. Churchill bears a reputation for honorable and upright living which all might envy.

WILLIAM EDWARD WILLIAMS. One need look no further than William Edward Williams, of near Airlie, Polk county, for the typical agriculturist of the northwest, breezy and inspiring of manner, large and rugged of physique, shrewd, large-hearted and thoroughly progressive. One ought also to say genial and companionable, for these enviable traits have been predominating ones in the life of this honorable native son, and have won and retained a host of friends. Born on the farm upon which he now lives, March 7, 1852, he represents one of the prominent early families of the state, his father, James E., having arrived here in 1845.

James E. Williams was born near Nashville, Tenn., in 1803, and in his native state married Martha Wicher, who was born in Virginia. Seven children were added to the family in the east, and with these and his wife, Mr. Williams started across the plains in 1845, experiencing on the way an aggregation of adventures of a more or less novel and dangerous nature. However, glad as they were to reach Polk county, after the wearisome journey, they were destined for still further discomfort, for the first night of their arrival, while camping on the banks of the Luckiamute a severe storm caused the river to rise, and in the darkness they were obliged to seek a camp higher up on the bank, a very wet and most disgusted little band of home-seekers. Mr. Williams took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres of land, and though at the time he had little in the world save energy and physical strength, he soon managed to make a comfortable home for himself and family in the wilderness. For many years they lived in a log house, but this was afterward replaced by a more modern structure, and barns and general improvements added as time went on. A very broad-minded and public-spirited man, he took an active part in the political undertakings of the territory, and served two terms in the territorial legislature. He also helped to form the state laws, and all forward movements for his neighborhood received not only his sanction but practical support. His death occurred in 1865, at the age of sixty-two, while his wife, who shared his joys and sorrows, and helped to bring about his success, survived him until 1888, dying at the age of seventy-five. This pioneer couple were very popular in their county, and their home was the center of much early hospitality. Both were members and active workers in the Southern Methodist Church, and the itinerant preachers who chanced that way were always sure of a warm welcome as long as they desired to remain under the Williams roof.

In an atmosphere of industry, thrift and goodness, William Edward developed into a useful and high-minded lad, and at the age of thirteen was more matured than most lads of that age. This was fortunate, for his father died at this time, and it was necessary for him to be of use to his mother, whose older children, numbering six sons and five daughters, had many of them gone to manage homes of their own. On attaining his majority he received his share of the property, which was only fifty-three acres, but he was not dismayed, for he had worked hard during his minority, and had saved considerable money. In time he bought out the other heirs and became sole owner of the large property, to the improvement of which he has unceasingly devoted himself, and out of which he has made a fine living for those dependent on him for support. In 1894 he built a modern two-story rural residence, one of the best in the county, and here is maintained that spirit of hospitality and good fellowship for which his parents established a precedent in the pioneer days. Mrs. Williams was formerly America Price, a native of Polk county, Ore., and whose father, Larkin Price, crossed the plains in 1849, locating on a claim in Polk county, consisting of six hundred and forty acres. Mr. Price accumulated a competence in the west, and at the time of his death was a very well-to-do member of the community. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Williams, of whom Marcus Clyde lives in Independence, Ore.; Wade Hampton is living on the home farm; Floyd A. is attending the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, and is in the junior year; W. E. is on the home farm; and Vern Whitman is also living with her parents.

To enumerate the many public services rendered by Mr. Williams in his capacity of broad-minded and progressive citizen were to follow the footsteps of a very discerning and practical philanthropist. He has helped to bring within the range of the farmer many of the conveniences hitherto enjoyed only by townfolk, among them being the rural mail route No. 1, twenty-three miles long; and the Luckiamute Rural Telephone Company, of which he is a stockholder and director. He is also a stockholder in the Independence National Bank. A Democrat in political affiliation, Mr. Williams has held the position of deputy sheriff of Polk county for the past eight years, and has been a member of the school board for four years. The church to which his father gave his earnest support for so many years finds favor with the son, who is a most generous contributor towards its maintenance and charities.

EDWIN RUTHVIN SEELY. Among the prominent pioneer families established in Oregon in 1850, the one of which Edwin R. Seely is a worthy representative takes foremost rank. Mr. Seely was born on his father's farm near Boone's Ferry, Clackamas county, Ore., May 13, 1862, a son of Lucius Alexander and Sophia H.

(Buckman) Seely, natives of Potsdam, N. Y., and born respectively August 10, 1821, and February 16, 1825.

L. A. Seely was the son of a blacksmith, and when a young man removed with his people to Sangamon county, Ill., where he married and continued to live until 1850. His neighborhood was agitated by reports of land and mining opportunities on the coast, and the young man and his wife were among the most eager listeners to these tales of returned travelers. On account of ill health he took this opportunity to seek a more congenial climate. Accordingly they outfitted with ox-teams and wagons, taking with them considerable blooded stock, including some very fine horses. At a certain stage of the journey the stock was transferred to Mormons, much to the grief and consternation of the rightful owners, who bitterly resented the thieving propensities of the so-called religious enthusiasts. The train was a large one and represented many beliefs and occupations, a curious fact in connection with their migration being that, after taking a vote as to whether they should travel on the Sabbath day, those holding to the negative reached their destination a month earlier than those who failed to heed the biblical injunction. Needless to say, Mr. Seely, throughout his entire life a stanch Presbyterian, was among those who believed in rest for man and beast on the sacred day, and he was therefore among the first to arrive at his destination in Oregon. The first winter he stopped at Canemah, and in the spring bought a farm on Baker's Prairie, where they lived only a year. Again they settled in Canemah, and later bought the farm near Boone's Ferry, where they reared nine children of their own and one adopted daughter, and where the father died at the age of seventy-five, in 1879, while his wife survived him until seventy-six years of age, dying in 1901. The children were as follows: Jira J. is deceased, leaving a family of wife and seven children; George B. is a farmer in Clackamas county; Joseph B. also lives in Clackamas county; Harriet B., deceased, was married to James Whitmore, and left four children; Franklin F.; Stephen B.; Judson L.; Robert I., all of Clackamas county; Edwin R.; and Emma, the adopted daughter, deceased. Mr. Seely was a stanch supporter of the schools of his neighborhood, and he was very active in the church, contributing liberally towards its maintenance, and attending the services whenever his health permitted.

Until his marriage with Julia E. Turner, June 24, 1883, Edwin R. Seely remained on the home farm. His wife was born in Pike county, Mo., November 24, 1863, and crossed the plains with her people in 1865, making the journey with the time-honored ox-teams, and bought a farm near Oregon City, in Clackamas county. The young people went to housekeeping for a couple of years near Boone's Ferry, and then purchased a farm of one hundred and twenty acres on Butte Creek, three miles east of Woodburn. At the time of purchase there were thirty-five acres under cultivation, and at present there are about ninety acres devoted to the raising of the general products of this section. To a considerable extent Mr. Seely is interested in hop culture, and has thirty-five acres devoted to its cultivation. He also has two and a half acres in onions, and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising. Everything about this farm indicates the careful and practical manager and agriculturist, and it is doubtful if any man in the neighborhood is deserving of greater credit for the part he has taken in the improvement of his district. So industriously has he applied himself to making an ideal home for himself and family that he has foresworn political aspirations, and all else that would interfere with the discharge of his primary obligations. He is a Prohibitionist in politics, and is a supporter of the same church to which his father devoted so many years of his life. Nine children have been born into his family, the order of their birth being as follows: Harry B.; Perry W.; Lucius R.; Thomas L.; Ruth E.; Chauncey C., deceased; Percy H.; Julia E.; and Ethel A.

WILLIAM McDONALD TURNER. At the age of eighteen, in 1835, William McDonald Turner crossed the plains with his parents and brothers and sisters, leaving behind the prosperous little farm in Johnson county, Mo., upon which he was born November 3, 1835, and where he had developed into a strong and self-reliant youth. His father, Jonas, was born in Tennessee, as was also his mother, Luhettie (Gilliam) Turner, although they were married in Missouri, shortly afterward settling on the farm in Johnson county. The long and wearying trip across the plains was accomplished without any particular incident, wagons, oxen and the various members of the party bearing up well under the necessarily severe strain upon their endurance. Setting out May 3, 1853, they spent the first winter in the Washoo valley, Nev., and the next spring went on to California, locating in Mariposa county for a couple of years. They then went to Sonoma county, where the father bought land, improved it, and lived thereon until the death of both himself and wife.

Hard work on the home farm interfered somewhat with the education which William Turner desired, and he really saw little of the public schools of either Missouri or California. What education he has received has been almost entirely of recent acquisition, and has resulted in his becoming a well-informed and liberal-minded man. At the age of twenty he started out to work among the farmers of Sonoma county, Cal., receiving as compensation four dollars a week and board. He was frugal and had few wants, and by 1861 had saved quite a little money, sufficient at any rate to bring him to Polk county, Ore. Here he worked on farms for a few weeks, and not being satisfied with the prospects he went to eastern Oregon and engaged in the laborious work of packing from The Dalles to the Idaho mines. A frontier existence was both congenial and profitable, and for nearly six years he continued freighting, and otherwise interested himself in the occupations of the crude and as yet undeveloped country.

In 1867 Mr. Turner returned to Polk county, and after living on rented farms in the Willamette valley for several years bought his present farm of one hundred and forty-five acres, advantageously located a few miles from Airlie. Some of the finest horses in this country have been bred upon the well-equipped Turner farm, and have brought their owner substantial returns for his care. Since 1873 Mr. Turner has had the companionship and ready sympathy of a very helpful and devoted wife, who was formerly Mary J. Waters, born in Iowa, October 20, 1847. Edward Waters, the father of Mrs. Turner, crossed the plains with his family in 1853, locating on a farm in Polk county, near Pedee. Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Turner, Dorsa N., John C., William Troy, Andy J., and Emmett live in or near Airlie; Benjamin F., the oldest son, resides near Pedee and Emmett and Luhettie, the youngest children, are living on the home farm. The Turner home is a hospitable and pleasant one, and all of the members are popular and well liked in their respective neighborhoods. Mr. Turner subscribes to the principles of the Democratic party, and has held various official positions in his adopted county, including that of school director and road supervisor. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Lewisville, of which both himself and wife are trustees.

WALTER K. TAYLOR. On October 15, 1902, the Clover Leaf Dairy was organized and is now one of the busiest industries in the thriving city of Corvallis, and if the past success of the enterprise is any index of its future growth and importance, its success is certainly assured. The plant is equipped with all the latest devices for the proper conduct of an establishment of this nature, and the proprietor is ever on the alert to acquaint himself with inventions and ideas bearing upon his line of endeavor. The plant is modern in every respect, and is equipped with an aerator, separator, and all the machinery required in a first-class dairy. Sixty cows supply milk for the plant, and it is the endeavor of the proprietor to replace all of them by animals of the Jersey breed.

Walter K. Taylor is a native of Mifflin county, Pa., born July 27, 1871, a son of M. P. and Rhoda W. (Kearns) Taylor, both of whom were also born in Mifflin county. By occupation the father was a farmer and followed that calling in Pennsylvania until the removal of the family to Kansas in 1878, settlement being made in Osborne county. As in Pennsylvania, so in Kansas, he followed farming, but in 1889 he again changed his abode, this time coming to Oregon and engaging in the dairy business not far from Corvallis. When the family left the Keystone state it was their intention to locate in Washington, but ere they reached their destination death entered their ranks and at Prineville, Cook county, they buried their son Herbert. It was while at the latter place that they made the acquaintance of Mrs. Sarah Moore, whose praise of Benton county as a desirable place to locate changed their plans entirely. Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor three are living and Walter is the oldest of the number. He was eighteen years old when the family came to Oregon, and as soon as old enough began to assist his father in the duties of the dairy. At the time of the latter's death he was thoroughly acquainted with every detail of the business, and from that date, May, 1895, he assumed control of the business, running the same until the fall following, when he sold out and went to Linn county, engaging in farming there until 1898, when he again became proprietor of the Corvallis dairy. After running the same for two years he sold the plant to Jacob Frank. In the meantime, in 1899, he had purchased a tract of ninety-two acres adjoining the city limits of Corvallis, and here may be seen one of the model homes of the country roundabout. It is up-to-date in every respect, and is supplied with hot and cold water all over the house. A windmill supplies a tank of twenty-five hundred gallons capacity, from which water is piped to the house and barn, the latter of which is 60x70 feet ground dimensions.

In Corvallis October 23, 1895, occurred the marriage of Mr. Taylor and Miss Christine Leuger, the daughter of John Leuger, and a native of Eugene, Ore. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, named in order of their birth as follows: Hugh, Herbert, Rhoda and John. Mr. Taylor's name may be found enrolled among the members of the Odd Fellows, in the local lodge, of which he is serving as past grand, and is also identified with the Rebekahs and Woodmen of the World. The family are identified with the First Presbyterian Church of Corvallis, which Mr. Taylor is serving as deacon.

OLIVER P. COSHOW. In more than one direction has Oliver Perry Coshow made his personality felt in the state of Oregon, for though a successful business man in the days of her prosperity, he crossed the plains in the time of danger and desolation and, coming into the wilderness of the west, he turned his energies along the lines necessary to profit by the multitude of opportunities presented in the untried fields. He is a pioneer of 1851, and during the intervening years he has served his adopted land as patriot, farmer, merchant and the leader of the woolen industry in the city of Brownsville.

The ancestry of the Coshow family is traced back to Revolutionary times, the great-grandfather of Oliver P. Coshow being one of the soldiers who accompanied La Fayette through the country during his visit in 1824. The grandfather, William, was born in the state of Virginia, later in life making his home in Kentucky, where his son, Robert Coshow, the father of Oliver P., was born, April 30, 1808, near Lexington. At a later date the family fortunes were changed to Indian creek, Ohio, and to Clermont county, same state, where the grandfather died. Being reared to the life of a farmer Robert Coshow continued in this occupation, removing in manhood to Fayette county, Ind., and in 1842 changing his location to Muscatine county, Iowa, where he remained for one year. After settling in Scott county, Iowa, he combined the trade of a carpenter with his agricultural pursuits, and remained at this until 1860, when he came, via the Isthmus of Panama, to Oregon, making his home, until his death, at the age of eighty-three years, with a daughter, Mrs. Carpenter, of Salem. He married Julia Perin, who was born near Connorsville, Ind., and died in Scott county, Iowa. She was the daughter of John Perin, a native of Massachusetts, who, with his brother Samuel, settled in Indiana, later making his home in Iowa, where he died at the age of ninety-four years. The great-grandfather of Mrs. Coshow was Lemuel Perin, who was the first to change the spelling of the name bequeathed to him by his ancestor, John, a native of England, who settled in Massachusetts in 1635.

Of the ten children born to his parents, three sons and seven daughters, all but one of whom attained maturity, Oliver Perry Coshow was the oldest son and the second child. He was born

July 4, 1831, in Connersville, Ind. Interspersed as his home duties permitted he attended the public schools intermittently as circumstances would allow, growing up to the life of a farmer, at which he remained until 1850, when he entered a store in Appanoose county, Iowa, as a clerk. In 1851 he decided to try his fortunes in the west and accordingly made arrangements with the late Hon. R. B. Cochran, of Lane county, Ore., whereby he was to have his passage for driving an ox-team across the plains. Beyond the minor trials incident to life on the plains the trip was made without harrowing experiences, the party arriving safely in Oregon, where after helping Mr. Cochran to build a cabin on his claim, Mr. Coshow ventured to the Rogue river mines. Being prevented by illness in the continuance of this work he took up, in 1853, a donation land claim of one hundred and sixty acres, located one and one-half miles north of Brownsville, Linn county, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising. In 1858 he bought two hundred and eighty acres five miles southeast of Harrisburg and continued in his work. For the better educational advantages of his children he removed to Brownsville in 1868, and in connection with H. R. Powell bought an interest in the general merchandise business of J. M. Morgan, but after one year Mr. Morgan withdrew and Mr. Coshow and Mr. Powell conducted the business for four years. In 1863 he traded his merchandise interest for an interest in the Brownsville woolen mills, but operated the store in the interest of the new company, being also secretary of the latter. The company then erected the business block on Main street, for which Mr. Coshow parted with his one-fourth interest in the woolen mill, in 1880, taking as a partner C. H. Cable, a resident of this city. In 1888 he sold out to C. E. Stanard, who has since conducted the business, and with the exception of the handling of real estate and the duties of a notary public Mr. Coshow has retired to private life. As a patriot Mr. Coshow enlisted, October 24, 1855, in Company C, Second Oregon Regiment, under Captain Keeney, and returned home without accident after three months' service, as did all but one man of the one hundred and twenty engaged.

The marriage of Mr. Coshow occurred in Brownsville, September 23, 1853, uniting him with Sarah E. Cochran, who was born in Putnam county, Mo., January 23, 1837, and died March 6, 1903. Her father, William Cochran, a native of Kentucky, came from Missouri to Oregon, crossing the plains in 1847, and locating first in Molalla, Clackamas county, Ore., when, after two years, he came to Linn county, and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising. He died near Rowland, of this county, in the home of his youngest daughter, at the age of eighty-eight years, having lived a very successful life. Of the ten children born to Mr. and Mrs. Coshow, William Luther is a farmer and stock-raiser in Lake county; Sophronia Alice is the wife of J. M. Howe, a merchant of Eugene, Ore.; Robert Heron is the secretary of the Thomas Kay Woolen Mills Company, of Salem, Ore.; James Nelson resides in Brownsville; Mary Ellen is the wife of John Franzen, a mechanical engineer, of Portland, Ore.; Oliver Perry, Jr., is an attorney at Roseburg, Ore.; Sarah Elizabeth is the wife of R. H. Chaplain, Seattle, Wash.; Ida Alva is the wife of G. C. Stanard, of Portland; George Helm makes his home in Brownsville, where he is secretary of the Brownsville woolen mills; and Kate Ethel is the wife of A. B. Cavender, the business manager of the Brownsville Times. Fraternaly Mr. Coshow is a member of the Blue Lodge chapter, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and in religion is a Baptist. Politically he is a Democrat and has been quite active in the affairs of the city. He is a member of the council, having been one of the first officers elected in the town, and has served in the capacity of president. He has also served as city recorder for several years. He was appointed notary by Governor Lord and has served continuously since.

HENRY M. BERRY. Coming to Oregon in such manner that he was obliged to begin at the bottom round of the ladder, that well-remembered pioneer, Joseph Berry, accumulated an estate of eight hundred acres, all of which has since been divided among his children, one of the most successful of whom is Henry M. Berry, owner of two hundred acres of the original donation claim. Joseph Berry was born in Chester county, Pa., June 17, 1819, and as a young man removed to Linn county, Iowa, where he was variously employed, and where he married Lucinda Osborn, who was born in Iowa, and died in 1874, when forty-three years of age. Soon after his marriage, in 1853, Mr. Berry crossed the plains with ox-teams, and settled on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres fifteen miles north of Corvallis. His property was heavily timbered, and instead of devoting his energies to clearing it for crops, he was primarily interested in converting the giant trees into shingles, an occupation in which he engaged about four years. He then traded his claim for a farm of sixty acres near Airlie, and in 1866 he bought a claim of two hundred and twenty acres, which he partially cleared, and put in good condition for general farming. His activities enlarged to such an extent that more land was required, and he finally became the possessor of eight hundred acres, a large portion of which was valuable farming land. As before stated, his children have been the beneficiaries of his industry and bounty, and all are profiting by the start in life which a less kindly fate denied their resourceful and very successful sire. Mr. Berry was never prominent in politics, but he took a keen interest in good roads, schools and general improvements in the county, contributing his share towards any measure calculated to add to the peace or welfare of his fellow-agriculturists. His death occurred in 1900, at the age of eighty-one years, and he left behind a reputation for strength, moral courage and great kindness of character.

The third of the five sons and three daughters in his father's family, Henry M. Berry was born May 30, 1855, in Benton county, and was reared to hard work on the home farm. Such education as came within his grasp was acquired in the public school near the farm, and when he arrived at his majority he was given the two hundred acres which constitute his present farm. He has many fine improvements to facilitate a general farming and stock-raising enterprise, and so well managed is his place that he derives a large yearly income. Like his father, a Republican in politics, Mr. Berry has served as road supervisor, but has never desired official recognition. He is a member of the Grange at Lewisville. Upright in all of his dealings, fair-minded and progressive, Mr. Berry commands the respect of all with whom he has to do, whether in a business or social capacity.

George E., the youngest brother of H. M. Berry, resides with him, and is also engaged in farming.

ELIAM S. MORRIS. The east holds innumerable records of long residence upon a given place, but in the comparatively newly developed west, to live for half a century among absolutely the same surroundings, is an occurrence rarely heard of. Yet, such has been the experience of Eliam S. Morris, one of the most venerable farmers of Yamhill county, who settled on his present home February 10, 1852. Although ninety-two years of age, Mr. Morris retains, unimpaired, many of his most useful faculties, and is still able to interest himself in the various departments conducted on his farm.

Mr. Morris is one of the many natives of Pennsylvania who have found their most prolific field of activity in the west. He was born in Union township, Fayette county, Pa., November 15, 1811, his father, William, having been born in Berks county, Pa., as was also his mother, Priscilla (Springer) Morris. William Morris was a shoemaker by trade, and also a farmer, and he spent his entire life in his native state. Eliam S., the third oldest of the five sons and six daughters born to his father, had an uneventful childhood, his educational opportunities being confined to the early subscription schools. Until twenty-four he remained with his people on the home farm, and then removed to within nine miles of Mineral Point, which continued to be his home for thirteen years. During this time he was not only engaged in farming, but was active in promoting remunerative lead mines. Hoping to improve his prospects, he gathered together his possessions in 1851, and started for Oregon with ox teams and wagons, and was six months on the journey. The first winter he spent three miles from his present place, and the following year bought three hundred and twenty acres of land, comprising his present home.

In 1840, Mr. Morris married Susanna Good, who was born in Missouri, December 6, 1822, and comes of English ancestry. Richard Good, the father of Mrs. Morris, was born in England, and her mother, Sarah (Adams) Good, was born in the Old Dominion. Seven sons and four daughters were born into this family, named as follows: Sarah P., Mrs. J. D. Phillips; John Calvin; Harriet S., deceased wife of Fred Chatfield; Justin G.; Charles E.; Martin Luther; Joann, Mrs. L. C. Triplett; Jordan D.; William R.; Morris Good and Elizabeth M.; and Oliver G. Holmes, who has been a member of the household from his infancy. Mrs. Morris has also reared two grandchildren, a son and a daughter of Harriet S. Chatfield. Mr. Morris is a Republican in politics, and has been road supervisor and school director, as well as justice of the peace, in both Oregon and Wisconsin. He is one of the honored members of the community for whose well-being he has so faithfully labored, and he has many true and tried friends among those who have lived and struggled with him in the early pioneer days.

JOSEPH LOE. At the time of his death, June 9, 1899, Joseph Loe held an honored position in the community around Rickreall, Polk county, and was esteemed as one of the best farmers and most enterprising men in his neighborhood. He came to this section in 1883, and bought one hundred and twenty acres of land three and a half miles north of Monmouth, to the cultivation of which he devoted the most mature and last years of his well-directed life. A native of Wayne county, Ky., he was born October 6, 1826, his father, John, being a native also of the Bourbon state. On the maternal side he was of Welsh descent, for the forefathers of his mother, Rachel (Gross) Loe, pursued their various occupations among the sheltering hills of Wales. John Loe removed to Adair county, Mo., in 1828, and in this wilderness created a home for himself and little family, remaining there for the remainder of his life, his death occurring in 1871, at the age of seventy-one years.

The Missouri farm was productive in a way, and John Loe found it a pleasant place upon which to live and rear his family, but to the growing son, Joseph, it offered scant opportunities for the future. It seemed necessary for him to seek a wider field if he desired more than the necessities of life, and accordingly he set forth at a very early age, bent upon the problem of self-support. Mr. Loe started across the plains with ox-teams, being accompanied by his brother, John Loe. The first winter in Oregon was spent in Portland, where he helped get out timber for ship-building, and the following spring he went down into the mines of California, where he experienced considerable success as a miner. Two years later he returned to Adair county, Mo., and purchased a farm with his earnings, living thereon for many years. In 1858 he married Mary Kilgore, a native of Adair county, Mo., born in 1837, and whose mother, Millie Kilgore, is now living in Umatilla county, Ore., at the age of one hundred years. In 1861 he suffered the loss of his wife, who left a daughter, who is now Mrs. Clarissa McNutt, of Forest Grove, Ore.

While still living in Adair county, Mo., Mr. Loe married for his second wife, October 25, 1866, Sarah J. Kirkpatrick, who was born in Knox county, Ohio, February 22, 1833. Her father, Nathaniel M. Kirkpatrick, was born in Knox county, Ohio, October 6, 1808, and her grandfather, Alexander, a native of Virginia, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Her mother, Susan (Correll) Kirkpatrick, was born in the town of York, Pa., May 19, 1810. Nathaniel M. Kirkpatrick was a farmer during the greater part of his active life, and in 1839 removed from Ohio to Pulaski county, Ark., where he lived until 1846. His final place of residence was a farm in Polk county, Mo., where he died at the age of fifty-four years. After his second marriage Mr. Loe continued to live on the farm in Adair county until 1873, in which year he came to Oregon and bought a farm ten miles northwest of Hillsboro, Washington county, where he lived until removing to the farm now occupied by his widow, in 1883. He took an active part in the general undertakings of his neighborhood, and was especially prominent as a churchman, being a member and steward of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Dallas. Politically he was a Republican, but, being of a quiet and unostentatious disposition, he never sought an office or actively identified himself with local or other affairs of his party. He served during the Civil war first as home guard, later as member of the Missouri state enrolled militia, and later in the regular United States service, serving with the western division, under Capt. Dudley Brown. At the present time the entire one hundred and twenty acres of his farm are under cultivation, and in this pleasant rural home live his widow and two sons, John S. and Robert F.

SAMUEL T. HILLMAN. The many rich and productive homesteads in the agricultural section of Marion county have largely been brought to their present state of perfection through the strenuous efforts of practical farmers who have come here from older states, noteworthy among them being S. T. Hillman, who emigrated to Silverton from Kansas a few years ago. He was born February 5, 1849, in Center, Des Moines county, Iowa. His father, a native of Ohio, removed to Iowa when a young man, and there followed the carpenter's trade for many years. He married Mary Ann Chapman, a native of England, and of the eleven children born of their union seven survive.

Samuel T. Hillman acquired his elementary education in the district schools, and after completing his studies at a high school was employed as a teacher for a number of terms. Subsequently becoming proficient in the carpenter's trade, he followed it for a while in Kansas, then returned to Iowa and was there married, but began housekeeping in Kansas, living there, with the exception of a few years spent in Missouri, until 1889. Removing then with his family to Oregon, he settled eight miles southeast of Silverton, on a farm owned by Miles Lewis, remaining there two years. Moving then to a place somewhat nearer Silverton, he lived there a short time, then purchased his present home farm, lying eight miles from Silverton. Mr. Hillman has seventy-three acres of land, well improved and judiciously cultivated, constituting one of the most attractive farms of the neighborhood, and is engaged in stock-raising and mixed farming, finding his work profitable and pleasant.

On September 20, 1873, Mr. Hillman married Elizabeth Beard, who was born and educated in Iowa. Of their union nine children have been born, namely: Mary C., living in Montana; Samuel W., of Washington; Thomas A., deceased; Charles H., of Washington; Victoria E., deceased; Theodore F.; Elizabeth A.; Daniel H., and Violet E. The four last-named children reside with their parents. Mr. Hillman is an earnest Democrat, ever sustaining the principles of that party by voice and vote, and has served his district as school director. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

SAMUEL AMES. Among the well known merchants of Silverton is Samuel Ames, one of the leading hardware dealers, who has been intimately associated with the business interests of this thriving city for upwards of a quarter of a century, and has contributed his full share in promoting its advancement and prosperity. Thrown upon his own resources when but a boy, he has proved himself courageous and brave, overcoming all the difficulties that have beset him in his varied career, and achieving success by his industry, thrift and good business management. Of substantial Scotch stock, Mr. Ames was born in Ohio, July 24, 1855, being the youngest of a family of four children, all boys, born of the union of Jacob and Charlotte (Ccle) Ames, the three older sons being Jacob, John and Louis. The father, a native of Scotland, emigrated to the United States when a young man, and settled in Richland county, Ohio, where he followed the trade of a stone cutter until his death, at the age of fifty-three years, in January, 1869, outliving his wife but a few months, her death having occurred the preceding April.

At the age of thirteen years, being left an orphan, Samuel Ames began the battle of life on his own account, his only equipment being the meagre store of knowledge acquired in a few years' attendance at the district school. After working a short time in a tobacco store in Mansfield, Ohio, he entered a machine shop, and later served an apprenticeship as a carriage painter, a trade that he followed a few years. Going west in 1874, he spent a short time in Iowa, then proceeded to Colorado, where he was for a time engaged in silver mining. Coming to the Pacific coast in 1877, he located first in eastern Washington, then settled, the same year, in Silverton, Ore., where has since resided. Establishing himself in business as a sash and door manufacturer, he operated the factory for several years most successfully, in partnership with his brother Louis, and still retains his interest, renting it for manufacturing purposes. In 1885 Mr. Ames purchased a half interest in the hardware business of John Hicks, with whom he is still associated, and later, in 1899, formed a partnership with his brother, Louis Ames, in the same line of business. In their new store, Messrs. Ames have a large supply of everything likely to be found in a first-class hardware establishment, carrying a large and complete stock, and by their enterprise, energy, unflin-

g courtesy and systematic business methods have won an extensive and lucrative patronage. Louis Ames is also a large landholder, owning three or four farms, and devotes a part of his land to the raising of hops, a crop which has proved quite remunerative in the past few years.

Mr. Ames married, in Silverton, Ore., Clorinda A. Davis, who was born in Silverton, January 14, 1858, a daughter of the late Leander and Mary F. Davis, prosperous members of the agricultural community of this locality. Three children have been born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Ames, namely: Lora May, born January 10, 1883; Roscoe Davis, born May 3, 1887; and Norris Harold, born July 22, 1889. Politically Mr. Ames is a staunch Republican, and socially he is a member of the Woodmen of the World.

MANLY MARTIN. The ancestry of Manly Martin is traced back to Germany, a descendant of which settled in Pennsylvania and engaged in farming. There Jacob Martin, his father, was born, March 20, 1812, and following the example of his father, he found occupation in tilling the soil, a part of his life being spent in Iowa, on the line between Iowa and Missouri. Desirous of obtaining a better place in the farming interests than Iowa offered, Mr. Martin crossed the plains to Oregon among the early pioneers of 1848, the journey being made with ox-teams and occupying six months of the year. Upon his arrival he took up a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres, located in Benton county, twelve miles southwest of Corvallis. For twenty years he remained upon this farm, putting into its cultivation the strength and energy of his manhood, and bringing it to a state of fertility and consequent beauty. In 1868 he parted with the scenes of his early labor, trading the property for a farm in a better location. This was located near Independence, Polk county, and there was nothing lost in the exchange. Mr. Martin died April 13, 1882. His wife was Miss Evaline Parks, born in Iowa. She was the mother of twelve children, seven sons and five daughters, nine of whom are now living. Mrs. Martin died at the home of her son, Manly, in July, 1903, at the age of eighty-eight years.

Manly Martin was the eighth of the children born to his father and mother, his birth occurring April 22, 1851, three years after their removal to Oregon. It was therefore his privilege to assist in the cultivation of the first farm owned by his father and later be of great service on the farm for which his father traded. In the winter seasons he profited by the advantages offered in the schools of Benton and Polk counties. Upon the death of his father he assumed control of the farm, conducting it for some time with good judgment and management, but after his marriage in 1885 with Miss Maggie Link he bought a farm near Eola, Polk county, and continued to live there until 1900. In this last-named year he returned to his childhood's home, and purchasing one hundred and eighty acres of the estate, engaged in general farming and stock-raising. The children born of his marriage are five in number and are named as follows: Ralph, Clara, Iva, Roy and Frank, all of whom are at home with their parents. Republican in his political affiliations, he has held the positions of road supervisor and school director.

JUDGE OLIVER P. GOODALL. One of the foremost agriculturists of Linn county, Judge Oliver P. Goodall is numbered among the enterprising, progressive and skillful farmers who thoroughly understand the vocation which they follow, and are carrying it on with pleasure and profit. In the many places in which the judge has resided, and the different industries in which he has been interested, he has ever been regarded as a man of integrity and honor, and is held in high esteem by the community in which he now resides, and to promote whose advancement and prosperity he is always ready to lend a helping hand.

Oliver P. Goodall was born August 1, 1828, in Jefferson City, Mo. Receiving excellent educational advantages in his native place, he was subsequently sent to St. Louis to finish his studies, but while at school in that city, at the age of seventeen years, ran away to enlist as a soldier in the Mexican war. Joining Price's regiment, he served with that gallant commander in Kearney's division, throughout the conflict. Returning home, he was subsequently sent to a school in Luray, Va., where he continued his studies nine months. He afterwards resided in his native city until 1852, when he came across the plains to Oregon, driving cattle all the way for Hiram Smith. Arriving at Harrisburg, Linn county, Mr. Goodall spent a few months in this locality, in the summer of 1853 locating a donation claim in Washington county, where he lived four years. Removing then to The Dalles, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits two years, and the following two years carried on a good business as general merchant in Middleton, Idaho. Settling then in the Grand Ronde valley, Union county, Ore., the judge was extensively engaged in stock-raising for thirty-six consecutive years in that locality, becoming one of the most prominent and prosperous stock-raisers of eastern Oregon. Selling out his property in Union county in 1899, he came to Linn county to settle permanently. Purchasing four hundred and fifty-seven acres of land on the Callapooia river, about two and one-half miles east of Crawfordsville, he is continuing his former occupation with characteristic energy and success.

In October, 1853, Judge Goodall married Louisa Bell, who bore him three children, namely: Brooks W., of North Dakota; John W., also living in North Dakota; and Ada, wife of John Brown, of Spokane, Wash. The judge married a second time, in 1864, Grace Gray, by whom he has had nine children, namely: Kitty C., Scott W., Mary, wife of Stephen C. Cunningham; George O., of LaGrange, Ore.; Lynn W., of LaGrange; Perry P., of LaGrange; Byron, of Brownsville, Ore.; Grace, in school at Brownsville; and Fanny, living at home. While a resident of Union county Judge Goodall was very prominent in public affairs, and filled many offices of trust and responsibility. For four years he was county assessor; for four years served as county judge, and was subsequently for four years a member of the State Board of Equalization. In politics he is a Populist, uniformly casting his vote in favor of that party. The judge was one of the organizers of the local Grange, which he served as master a number of years, and is now an active member, and master, of Holley Grange, No. 325.

JAY E. WINEGAR. Born in St. Charles, Minn., January 29, 1879, Mr. Winegar's earlier years were passed similarly to those of all farmer boys, giving his father the benefit of his services until he reached his twenty-first year. In the meantime, however, he had laid a good educational foundation by attending the public schools in the neighborhood of his home. He is a son of Meltire and Mary (Coulson) Winegar, the former a native of New York state and the latter a native of England. From New York the parents removed to the west, settling in St. Charles, Minn., in the vicinity of which the father carried on farming. The extreme west, however, held out more glowing prospects, and in 1895 the family wended their way across the country, with Oregon as their destination. Settling on a farm near McMinnville, he at once set about to put his land in condition for cultivation, and that he has not failed in his efforts is evidenced by the fine farm which he has today. Of the eight children born to the parents six are living.

As previously stated, J. E. Winegar remained at home with his parents until he had reached his majority. After having charge of his father's farm for several years, in October, 1901, he changed the scene of his labors as well as his occupation, and in Corvallis bought the livery and feed business of F. Elgin, which is now conducted as a feed stable. With the same energy which characterized all his undertakings he at once stocked his stables with a fine lot of superior animals and has successfully followed the livery business ever since. In addition to his feed stable on Third street he also conducts a livery and sales stable at the corner of Jefferson and Third streets, and here as well as in the first-mentioned stable he is meeting with the success which he merits for his good business qualities and perseverance. Recently Mr. Winegar has taken a partner in the person of Thomas Vidito, the firm name now being Winegar & Vidito.

In McMinnville, September, 1900, Mr. Winegar married Miss Hattie Hodge, a native of Kansas, and of this union one child has been born, to whom the parents have given the name of Clair. In fraternal matters Mr. Winegar takes an interest to the extent of allying himself with the Modern Woodmen of the World, and politically votes with the Republican party. The Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a member, receives his support, and all measures set on foot tending to benefit his fellow-men receive his aid unstintingly.

FRANKLIN YOCOM. After many years of agricultural activity in Yamhill county, Franklin Yocom is now enjoying the fruits of his labor in retirement in Sheridan, where he is honored for his many fine traits of character, and for his generally substantial accomplishment in the west. Born in Montgomery county, Ky., July 30, 1820, when seven years of age, he was taken by his parents to Illinois, where they entered six hundred and forty acres of land in Sangamon county. Here Franklin grew to manhood among the crude and pioneer conditions then existing in Illinois, and his education was received in the little log subscription school-house in the vicinity of the paternal farm. The property was located near Springfield, and at the time that the elder Yocom allied his fortunes with that section, there was just one little store to prophesy the capital and flourishing city of to-day.

In 1842, Franklin Yocom was united in marriage with Nancy J. Darnell, and of the ten children born of this union, Allen is a farmer near Sheridan; Evelyn is the wife of James H. Brown, of Yamhill county; Marilla J. is the wife of David Carter, of Washington county; Eliza is the wife of Allen Bradford, of California; Rebecca is deceased; the others are: Tillie, Loretta, Harvey, Lonah, and an infant, deceased. Mrs. Yocom died June 29, 1897. With his family Mr.

Yocom prepared to emigrate to Oregon in 1851, and, equipped with three yoke of oxen, crossed the plains in six months. The party was exceedingly fortunate during their entire journey, and with the exception of having one ox stolen, suffered no inconvenience at the hands of the Indians. The farm upon which Mr. Yocom located, and which is still in his possession, is in Polk county, just across the line from Yamhill county, and four miles west of Sheridan. Three hundred and twenty acres comprise this donation claim, and about half of it is bottom land, lying along the Yamhill river. At first the owner erected a little log cabin, 16x20 feet, ground dimensions, and there lived with his family and improved his property until 1876. Somewhat weary of strenuous farming life, he then moved into Salem, where for fourteen years he engaged in the slab-wood business, made possible by the large number of mills in the neighborhood. He was very successful in this effort, following which he returned to his farm and lived there four years. From the farm he came to Sheridan, and has since lived a retired life. Mr. Yocom is a very large land owner, and besides his home ranch, increased to seven hundred acres, owns also two thousand in another body.

While carrying on general farming and stock-raising, Mr. Yocom has variously interested himself in the affairs of his community, and has been especially active in promoting the interests of the Republican party. However, locally, he votes for the man best qualified to serve the interests of the people, regardless of party, and this breadth of thought has characterized his entire career in the west. For nearly sixty years he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but is now identified with the Christian Scientists. He is one of the highly-esteemed pioneer residents of Yamhill county, and his moral, agricultural and general influence has been of the best.

WILLIAM L. WELLS. Identified with both the political and agricultural pursuits of his county, William L. Wells has won a place of no little consideration in the esteem of his fellow-citizens who have, in the past, favored him with their support for various offices for which the Republican party has nominated him. He is a native of Oregon, his father, George A. Wells, having emigrated in 1853 to the west, where he passed the remainder of his life.

George A. Wells was born in Pike county, Mo., January 14, 1830, the son of R. F. Wells, who was of English and Welsh descent, and when eighteen years old had followed his parents into Pike county, Ill. There George married in 1850 Henrietta Turner, who was born in Virginia, December 4, 1831, and had come to Illinois with her parents. In 1853 the two prepared to cross the plains. With the customary ox-teams they made the journey in six months, and first settled in Benton county, where Mr. Wells took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Philomath, and there remained for four years. At the close of that period he sold out and removed to Marion county, where he purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land near the present site of Hubbard, and he there continued until March 14, 1867, when he again disposed of his property and invested his money in a farm located one mile north of Buena Vista, Polk county. Here his death occurred April 25, 1891, his widow still surviving him, and now making her home with her daughter, Mary S. Bevens, who is located in the same vicinity. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Wells are as follows: R. F., of San Francisco; Mary S., now the wife of W. P. Bevens, of Buena Vista; Sarah E., the wife of Alexander Collins, of Dallas; Margaret, now deceased; William L., of this review; C. P., of Independence; George A., of Buena Vista; Emma J., the wife of F. P. Ground, of Buena Vista, and John E., of Buena Vista.

The fifth of this family of children was William L. Wells, who was born January 6, 1859, upon his father's farm in Marion county, though his education was received principally in the public schools of Buena Vista. Upon the completion of the school course he engaged in farm work with his father, remaining so employed until 1886, when he was elected county assessor upon the Republican ticket. After a two-years service he returned to the farm and continued there until 1890, and was then called to public office once more, for two terms serving as county sheriff. On again returning to private life he engaged in business in Dallas from 1894 to 1896, and in the last-named year was elected county judge, in which position he remained until 1900. He was then nominated joint representative for Polk and Lincoln counties on the Republican ticket, and was defeated by but forty votes. Returning to his farm he has since engaged in general farming and hop-raising, leasing one hundred and ninety-five acres for the former and twenty-two and a half for the cultivation of the latter, and meeting with gratifying success in the work. He owns a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres in Lincoln county, Ore.

The marriage of Mr. Wells occurred December, 1887, and united him with Miss Sarah F. Murphy, who was born in Linn county, Ore., January 5, 1865, and was the daughter of H. W. Murphy, a pioneer of 1852. Five children have been born of the union, who are as follows: Leroy G., Albert, Goldie R., Gladys and Leonard, all of whom are at home. Fraternally Mr. Wells is a very prominent man, being a member of the United Artisans of Dallas; past noble grand of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Ancient Order of United Workmen of Dallas; and the Native Sons of Oregon, holding membership in Nesmith Camp of Dallas. In religion he belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Buena Vista.

JAMES WINSTANLEY. There have been developed within the last few years in Oregon many industries and enterprises which have contributed in a large measure to the prosperity of the state and of its citizens. Among the various businesses developed is that of hop-growing, and of this James Winstanley is a prominent representative, being now the secretary of the Oregon Hop Growers' Association. He is a man of keen discernment, quick in recognizing opportunities and accurate in his judgment of the difficulties and the obstacles which are to be found in all lines of business. While laboring earnestly for his own financial advancement, his efforts have at the same time been of value to the state, and in his present position his labors are proving of marked benefit to Oregon in the development of one of her important industries.

Mr. Winstanley was born in Warrington, Lancashire, England, September 12, 1847, and is the second in order of birth in a family of six children, of whom three sons and a daughter are now living. His father, Peter Winstanley, was born at Winstanley Hall in Lancashire, and became the owner of extensive warehouse interests in Warrington. In religious faith he was a Wesleyan Methodist, and he died at the age of sixty-eight years. His wife, Hannah Walker, was born in Cheshire, England, a daughter of William Walker, who was engaged in the transportation business between Liverpool and Manchester. She, too, died in her native country.

James Winstanley, of this review, is the only representative of the family in America. He was reared in Warrington and pursued his education in the national schools of England until ten years of age, when he was apprenticed to learn the stair-builder's trade in his native town, entering upon a seven-years' term of service. He followed that pursuit, and also the trade of pattern-making, and later he began conducting business on his own account, doing contracting and building, and being thus engaged until he came to the new world. Mr. Winstanley arrived in Oregon in 1888. Taking up his abode in Salem, he secured employment in a sash and door factory, where he remained for a year. He afterward spent three years as a pattern-maker in Drake's foundry, but in the meantime he became interested in other lines of business. Upon his arrival in Oregon he had purchased a farm a mile and a half from Salem, comprising forty-four acres, which was covered with stumps. With characteristic energy he began to clear and improve this tract, which he planted to fruit and hops. He now has a large prune orchard, having fourteen acres planted to fruit and ten acres in hops. He has made splendid improvements upon the property, including the erection of a comfortable residence, substantial barns, a hop house and fruit and prune dryer. He uses the Allen dryer, having a capacity of two hundred and sixty-five bushels. After four years devoted to his trade he abandoned that pursuit in order to give his entire time and attention to horticultural interests and to the hop industry. In 1898 he assisted in organizing the Oregon Hop Growers' Association, was elected its secretary and manager and has since served in that capacity. The object of this association is to encourage and promote the industry of hop-growing and to disseminate knowledge concerning the best methods of producing hops.

Mr. Winstanley was married in Warrington, England, to Eleanor Barlow, a native of Cheshire, that country. They have three children: John B., who is a graduate of the State University, and is now a student in Capitol Business College; Edith Eleanor, and James Henry. The parents attend the Baptist Church, and Mr. Winstanley gives his political support to the Republican party. He is a man of excellent business ability, and the enterprise and sound judgment which he has brought to bear upon the development of his fine farm has made it a valuable property, whereby he is classed among the substantial citizens of his community.

HENRY MILLER ROBERTS. The wayfarer who chances to pass by the farm of Henry Miller Roberts, adjoining Harrisburg on the east, is delighted with the prevailing order and thrift, and the many evidences of a prosperous farming enterprise. If fortunate enough to personally know the man who has made this his home since 1881, and whose energy and good management are responsible for the well kept buildings, orderly fences, and modern labor-saving devices, he has undoubtedly listened to many interesting accounts of hairbreadth escapes in the early days, and of divers encounters with the resentful red men of the plains. In fact the experiences of Mr. Roberts have been of a most thrilling nature, and when recounted in his eloquent and enthusiastic manner, are not only diverting, but of historical moment.

To Harrison county, Ind., William Roberts removed from his native state of Kentucky, and in the comparative wilderness worked at his trade of turner in the winter time, devoting his summers to running flat-boats down the Ohio river. Here his son, Henry Miller Roberts, was born October 22, 1835, he being the third child in a family of six sons and three daughters. The mother, Mary Jane (Miller) Roberts, was born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Henry Miller, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Indiana. The turner and boatman succeeded well in Indiana, but the family harmony was upset by his son Henry, who became discontented with the quiet life by which he was surrounded, and who unceremoniously took leave of the household at the age of fourteen. The youth made his way to McDonough county, Ill., where he found employment on the farm of his uncle, John K. Roberts, with whom he remained for two years before knowing the relation that existed between them. At the end of that time he returned home and was received with the greatest kindness, and in 1851 returned to Illinois with his parents, who were influenced by his glowing accounts of the state. His father later removed to Nebraska with his family, and near Brownsville engaged in cattle raising until starting across the plains in the spring of 1857. The journey extended from May until September 17th, and at Angeles Camp, Cal., the elder Roberts engaged in stock-raising until 1869. He then removed to Sonoma county, of which he was one of the early settlers, and in 1864 took up his residence in Watsonville, then a small aggregation of houses. He was a pioneer of that locality. His shrewd mind anticipating the increase in land values, he bought up property and speculated with more than expected results. He possessed strong characteristics, and while inducing settlers to locate on his land, naturally formed a wide acquaintance, many of his purchasers becoming his warmest friends. He was energetic and shrewd, while he adhered to principles of fairness and honesty. His death occurred at the age of eighty-eight, and he left behind him a name which is treasured and honored by his children, and respected by all who were associated with him.

The spirit of adventure and rebellion at restraining influences which caused Henry M. Roberts to desert his home as a boy, has followed him through life. It has led him into the dangers and excitement of the west, and resulted in his investigating the many typical industries here represented. From his father's farm near Angel's Camp he went forth to earn his own living at whatever presented itself, and in 1860 found his way across the mountains to Canyon City, eastern Oregon. He was one of the first to reach the gold mines of that section, but he was not particularly successful, and so came in 1862 to near Readville, Washington county. In 1881 he purchased his present farm of one hundred and eighty-one acres, where he has one of the ideal rural homes of the county, and is engaged principally in raising cereals.

At Hillsboro, Washington county, Ore., Mr. Roberts married Elizabeth Jane Stewart, a native of that town, and the first white child born there. Mrs. Roberts' father, Thomas, was born in Missouri, and came overland with ox-teams in 1847, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Hillsboro. He was a blacksmith by trade, and a hard-working man, accumulating, during his thirteen years in the west, quite a competence. Ida, the eldest child born to Mr. and Mrs. Roberts, is living at home, while Myrtle is the wife of E. J. Hern; S. P. is a railway agent at Harrisburg; and Edward is at home. Mr. Roberts is a Republican in political affiliation, and has served the community as recorder, and member of the council many terms. Of strong and forceful characteristics, he has exerted an influence for good in the town, and has especially worked for the suppression of the vicious element. In this he is fearless and determined. As a reminder of the numerous encounters with the Indians in Oregon and Washington Mr. Roberts has an arrow mark on the pit of his stomach, and other healed wounds indicate the extent of his operations among the Indians who so bitterly resented the encroaching civilization. The arrow mark was received on the Platt river in 1862, and about this time this intrepid investigator escaped many times from places of imminent danger. He never participated in organized fights against the Indians, his services being purely voluntary, and rendered according to the exigencies of the situations in which he found himself. Mr. Roberts is fraternally connected with the Blue Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and in religion he is a member of the Christian Church.

ISAAC W. STARR, M. D. An eminent physician of Linn county, whose years of successful practice have won him the lasting appreciation and good will of the community, is Dr. Isaac W. Starr, of Brownsville. A native son of Oregon, he was born on his father's donation claim near Monroe, in Benton county, November 28, 1853, shortly after the arrival of the family in the west. He comes of an ancestry which must necessarily have inspired an ambitious lad to endeavor, for his father, Philip M., and his grandfather, John Wesley Starr, were ministers in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and were renowned for their self-sacrificing characters. John Wesley Starr was born in the east, and crossed the plains to Oregon in 1850, locating on a claim in Benton county, where his farm was headquarters for church services for a period of between twenty and thirty years. He was an earnest and noble man, giving unstintingly of his time and substance for the furtherance of the cause which he represented. In connection with preaching he managed his farm, and died at the age of seventy-five, leaving behind him a record unsurpassed for nobility of heart.

Philip M. Starr was born in the state of Ohio, April 18, 1825, and was reared on his father's farm in Guernsey county, until the family removal to Iowa in 1833. Under the inspiration of his father's Christian life he also resolved to devote his life to the ministry, and at a comparatively early age prepared for his lifework under the father's direction. He was ambitious and in 1849 took advantage of the tide of emigration wending its way to the coast, hoping to find broader fields for his life's labors. He returned to his home in Iowa via Panama in 1852, and there married Ann Maria Rambo, who was born in Elkhart county, Ind., February 14, 1831. The following year, in 1853, Mr. Starr brought his family to Oregon, making his second trip across the plains with ox-teams. Locating near Monroe, Benton county, on a large claim he made this his home for many years, and like his father, combined the management of his property with an active ministry in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was twenty-five years in the church in Oregon, and during that time he served for one term as presiding elder of the Portland district, and in 1878 was delegate to the general conference at Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1890 he retired from active life, and his death occurred in Brownsville, Ore., October 22, 1900. His first wife died at the age of twenty-four years, leaving one son, Isaac W. He afterward married a second wife, who bore him two sons and two daughters, two of whom are living, Ann Maria Leper and Edward D. Starr.

After completing his education in the public schools, Isaac W. Starr entered Philomath College, where he remained for two years. In 1874 he entered the medical department of the Willamette University, graduating therefrom in the class of June, 1877. After a short practice in Monroe, Ore., he located in Halsey in 1879, and the same fall came to Brownsville, taking up the practice of Dr. S. C. Stone, now located in Salem. During the intervening years the doctor has made himself an integral part of the community, contributing to its sanitary and physical well-being, and evidencing at all times an appreciation of the magnitude and possibilities of his noble profession. For twenty-five years he was part owner of a drug store in the town, disposing of the same to Osborne & Hume in the fall of 1903. In Brownsville, Dr. Starr married, in 1882, Clara L. Bishop, who was born in Oregon, a daughter of Rev. W. R. Bishop. Chester Harvard, the only son in the family, born October 23, 1882, will graduate from the classical course at Eugene in 1906; and Georgie, the only daughter, was born March 16, 1892. On account of educating the children, the family of the doctor made their home in Eugene, and in the fall of 1903 the doctor removed his family to Salem for a permanent home. The doctor is a Republican in political affiliation, and fraternally is associated with the Blue Lodge, No. 36, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and Royal Arch Chapter, No. 19, of Brownsville; with the Knights of Pythias; the Woodmen of the World; the Artisans; and the Independent Order of Foresters of Albany. Genial, tactful and optimistic, the doctor makes friends wherever he goes, and nowhere more than in the sick room.

HENRY FRED FISCHER. For many years the name of Henry Fred Fischer was a power in milling circles in Benton county, although for several years before his death, September 23, 1902, he was practically retired, his son, Lewis Henry, assuming the greater part of the responsibility, and in 1900 took entire charge of the Fischer Flouring Mill at Silverton.

As his name implies, Mr. Fischer was of German ancestry, and his birth occurred in Hanover, Germany, March 25, 1838. His father, Fred, was also a native of Hanover, and by occupation was a farmer, who brought his family to the United States in 1842, locating on the farm in Du Page county, Ill., where the balance of his life was spent. Henry Fred Fischer was about four years old when he came to America, and his youth and early manhood were spent on the farm near Elmhurst, a very undulating part of the state, the house being located on a hill thirty feet high. At an early age he evinced decided business ability, and when barely twenty-two years old, built a mill in the neighborhood of his home, which had many years of uninterrupted success, and which is even now standing, and is used for the manufacture of flour. The old mill was built on a stone foundation and was of the Holland order, the entire structure being one hundred and sixty feet across, while the main shaft was 14x14 feet, and the tower reared into the air one hundred and seventy-five feet. The mill was arranged with sails for motive power, and had a capacity of forty barrels a day, originally, but it was later equipped with steam apparatus, which greatly increased its capacity. Thus Mr. Fischer became an influence in the commercial world of Du Page county, Ill., and in time acquired a competence through his milling business.

Having disposed of his Du Page property, Mr. Fischer came to Oregon in 1877, and, in Corvallis, bought a third interest in the Corvallis Mills, owned by Gray, Corthacur & Co. This mill was a small affair, having a capacity of only thirty-five barrels per day, and had been built about four years. Mr. Fischer assumed the active management thereof, and, as may be imagined, after his long independent milling experience, he did not particularly relish the partnership feature of the business. Almost immediately he decided that he would either sell his share or buy the others out, and it happened that at the end of three years he was sole possessor of the Corvallis mill, with ambitious projects for its future. The capacity was greatly increased by the addition of modern machinery, the dam was enlarged, and three large crib warehouses erected, each having three floors, 36x130 feet in dimensions, the combined capacity being one hundred and sixty thousand bushels of wheat. In time the capacity of the mill became two hundred and twenty-five barrels a day, being one hundred-horse (water) power, and the steam plant an eighty-horse engine. Mr. Fischer also built a warehouse at Peoria with a capacity of eighty thousand bushels.

In 1899 Mr. Fischer bought the Oregon Milling Company's mill at Silverton, enlarged and remodeled it, and made of it a sifter mill with a capacity of two hundred and twenty-five barrels a day. The combined milling interests were then under his control, although by that time the infirmities of age began to tell upon his powers, and he naturally adjusted his affairs accordingly. His son, Lewis Henry, had been trained with special reference to supplanting his father as a miller, and his knowledge of milling interests has resulted in his prominence as the manager of the Silverton mill, of which he assumed control in 1900, and which he has greatly improved in the meantime, increasing its capacity to two hundred and fifty barrels per day. The flour turned out of these mills has a reputation far beyond the borders of Oregon, and its merit is best indicated when it is known that it took medals at the Trans-Mississippi Fair at Omaha, the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, and the Charleston Fair. The product was also exhibited at the Osaki, Japan, exposition. Willamette valley wheat is used exclusively in the manufacture of the flour, and such well known brands as Corvallis and Pride of the Waldo Hills finds its way to the markets of California, South America, Alaska, Havana, the Philippines, and the ports of the Orient.

In his young manhood Mr. Fischer married Sophia Rathjc, who also was a native of Germany, and who came with her parents to America, locating among the pioneers of Du Page county, Ill. Mrs. Fischer, who, at the age of sixty, is living in Corvallis, is the mother of eight children, of whom six are living. In the order of their birth the children are as follows: Emma, the deceased wife of William Rotermund, of Addison, Ill.; William was bookkeeper for the mills, and died in 1899, at the age of thirty-five years; August W., manager for the Corvallis mill; Lewis Henry, manager of the Silvertown mills; Ernest, employed in the Corvallis mill; Lousie, the wife of Richard Kiger, of Benton county; Martha and Frederick, living at home. A Republican in politics, Mr. Fischer never identified himself with political undertakings further than the formality of casting his vote. In religion, he was a member of the Lutheran Church. At the time of his death he was sixty-four years of age. He was buried in the churchyard at Corvallis, and was mourned by the hosts of friends won by his sterling personal traits, his unquestioned integrity, and his great services in behalf of the upbuilding of Marion and Benton counties.

JAMES WILLIAMS COMPTON. Since 1889 James Williams Compton has made his home in Scio, Linn county, where he bought property at that date, and is now enjoying a rest after an active life of well directed effort toward a successful utilization of the advantages which the state offered in its pioneer days. He was born in Washington county, Mo., November 17, 1831, the son of John Compton, who was born in Woodford county, Ky., in 1794, and the grandson of Richard Compton, also a native of Kentucky. The latter spent the greater part of his life in his native state, and later moved to Missouri, where he located near Jackson, and engaged in farming, living to a ripe old age. The father, John Compton, married in Kentucky Margaret Schoffner, a native of that state, and from there he moved to Missouri in 1818, in which state his wife later died. He located first on the Merrimac river, and removed to Washington county, in the neighborhood of the county-seat, and there engaged in farming and lead-mining. In 1849 he made the trip which was then so attractive to the inhabitants of the Mississippi valley, and after a time in California, where he met with some success, he returned to Missouri, in March, 1850, and died in April of

Of the twelve children, nine sons and three daughters, born to his parents, James William Compton was the tenth child. His education was received through the medium of the subscription schools of his native state, the amount of instruction and the worth of it being somewhat limited, as was often the case among the hampering conditions of those early times. In 1852 he engaged in farm work on his father's farm, until the fall of that year, when he took up a claim, remaining until March 27, of the next year, when he followed the example of his father, and with ox-teams, started across the plains for the west. He chose the route along the Platte river, and August 20, 1853, he arrived at his destination, in the Willamette valley, Ore., reaching at this date what is known as Foster's place. He first located in Benton county, where he split rails and did a little farming, and in November of the same year he took a donation claim fourteen miles south of Corvallis, purchasing the squatter's right to a tract of three hundred and twenty acres. He remained there for four years. In March, 1857, he purchased a farm in Linn county consisting of three hundred and twenty acres, four and a half miles southeast of Scio, and in February, 1858, moved upon it. Here he engaged in farming, and later added one hundred and seventy acres, and again a small tract of four and a half acres, making the entire amount four hundred and ninety-four and one-half acres, which he sold May 14, 1902, at $20 per acre. His residence has since been in the town of Scio, and his principal occupation the loaning of the money which he derived from the sale of his land.

Mr. Compton was married in Missouri to Melinda Sumpter, a native of that state. She was the daughter of Alexander Sumpter, who was born in east Tennessee, May 6, 1810, and was but four years old when he removed with his parents to Indiana, where, near Greencastle, he followed the vocation of farming. In manhood he removed as an early settler to Missouri, locating about ninety miles below St. Louis, on Black river, where he continued to farm. In 1849 he journeyed to California, and, though taken sick en route, he recovered and entered the mines, finding employment in the Santa Clara valley. In 1851 he returned to Missouri, and two years later came to Oregon across the plains, bringing his family with him, and located six miles south of Scio, Linn county, where he bought a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he lived until 1872. In the last-named year he removed to Crook county, Ore., and later traveled over many different counties of the state, and Idaho, in October, 1896, making his home with Mr. Compton, with whom he has since lived. The fourteen children which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Compton are: George W., a farmer in Linn county; John E., a farmer in Polk county, Ore.; Margaret Jane, the wife of E. A. Bishop, a farmer in Willow county, Ore.; Henry Clay, located in Linn county; James Silas, who is in Lebanon, Ore.; Charles Dudley, in Scio; Riley, who is deceased; Albert Lee, who is located southeast of Spokane, Wash.; Emma May, the wife of Henry Kinser, of Linn county; Thomas Jefferson, in Whitman county, Wash.; Martha Alice, the wife of J. J. Arkison, of Baker City, Ore.; Nancy Ella, who is deceased; Larkin Lafayette, also deceased; and Otto William, who is in Whitman county, Wash. Mr. Compton is a member of the Baptist Church, and politically is a Democrat, and for many years has served as road supervisor and school director.

WILLIAM E. OWEN. Though a resident of Oregon but nine years, William E. Owen has built up a substantial and lucrative business in Monitor, Marion county, in the accomplishment of which he has won the good will and esteem of the citizens of this community through the many good qualities which have distinguished his life in the west. He was one of two children in an Iowa family, whose occupation was that of tilling the soil, and after his birth in Monroe county, May 1, 1866, his parents, John E. and Elvira J. (Berry) Owen, continued in this occupation, rearing him to the same life. His education was received through the medium of the district schools, which he attended for some time. Upon attaining manhood he remained with his father engaged in farming until 1894, when he left home and, coming to Oregon, located at Monitor, Marion county, where he now makes his home.

In this village Mr. Owen soon found employment with the Monitor Mills, where he remained for eight years, giving the best of satisfaction to his employers and winning the respect of all by his application to business and his energetic efforts toward success. Upon his resignation from this position he took charge of the Monitor Trading Company, a mercantile establishment in which he has been a partner ever since 1897. Under his management a large business is conducted, the principal stockholder being Mr. Owen. Since his connection with the establishment the business has improved in many ways and has shown a steady increase in volume.

Mr. Owen was united in marriage, January 30, 1901, to Emma McKee, a daughter of David and Caroline McKee, who was born and reared in the state of Oregon. They at once went to housekeeping in the house in which they still make their home. Through Republican influence, of which party Mr. Owen is a strong adherent, he was appointed postmaster of Monitor, August 25, 1902, by President McKinley. He has also served as judge of election. Fraternally he is quite prominent, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, at his old home in Iowa, to which he has belonged since his twenty-first birthday; Woodmen of the World, French Prairie Camp No. 47; and Modern Woodmen of America, Monitor Camp No. 8281. Mr. Owen owns his home in the village, and is also owner of the building in which the mercantile business is conducted. He has always taken an active interest in school matters, and is chairman of the board of Harmony District No. 70.

CHARLES FRANKLIN MOIST. Through his association with the agricultural interests in this section of the state Charles Franklin Moist has become known in Linn county, and as a successful farmer he has added much to the importance of the industries of the state. He is a native son, having been born on his father's donation claim, three miles north of Lebanon, Linn county, January 13, 1851. His father, Joseph Moist, a native of Pennsylvania, settled first in Iowa, from which state he crossed the plains by ox-teams in 1845, and became the owner of six hundred and forty acres of land. The remainder of his life was spent upon his farm, where he died in 1893, at the age of seventy years. He married Elizabeth Jane Ralston, who was born in the east and crossed the plains with her parents, and she now makes her home in Albany, at the age of seventy-five years. Her father was Jeremiah Ralston, who came from Iowa to Oregon across the plains in 1847, and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres upon the present site of the city of Lebanon. In the establishment of the town he gave much earnest help, being the first merchant, and later conducting a general merchandise business. On his farm property he engaged in stock-raising, and met with gratifying success. His death occurred in this city. To Mr. and Mrs. Moist were born four sons, of whom Charles Franklin was the eldest.

Mr. Moist was reared upon the paternal farm, and received his education in the common schools of the county. In 1877 he undertook the management of his father's farm, and in 1882 he bought fifty acres west of Lebanon, upon which he engaged in farming until 1890. At that date he became the owner of one hundred and thirty-seven acres of what is known as the Morgan Kees donation claim, and upon which he is now engaged in stock-raising, buying and selling stock. He has his farm well improved, his dwelling being a handsome, two-story building, well located in the midst of his broad acres. In addition to this property he also owns one hundred and forty acres west of the town.

The marriage of Mr. Moist occurred in Lebanon and united him with Mary Wasson, a native of Oregon, and whose father, Jonathan, came from Iowa to Oregon in 1846, and took a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, five miles north of Lebanon, and died in 1899 upon this place, at the age of seventy-three years. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Moist are: Joseph; Frank, deceased; Carrie, also deceased; Ruth and Charles, who are at home with their parents. Politically, Mr. Moist is a Democrat.

JOSEPH THOMAS ROSS. The Ross family was established in Oregon as early as 1852, the leader of the exodus from Morgan county, Ohio, being Thomas Ross, an expert carpenter and builder, and experienced farmer. Thomas Ross was born in Pennsylvania in 1807, and was reared on a farm, receiving a limited education in the public schools. As a young man he removed with his parents to Ohio, settling in Morgan county, where he learned the carpenter's trade, to the application of which he devoted many years of his life. In Ohio he married Margaret Van Horn, a native of the Buckeye state, with whom he went to housekeeping on a farm, thereafter combining farming and carpentering with some success. In 1852 he outfitted and crossed the plains with ox-teams, and during the six months' journey encountered many difficulties with the Indians, besides illness and bad roads, but nevertheless the party managed to reach its destination in fairly good health and spirits. In Clackamas county Mr. Ross took up a donation claim of two hundred and eighty acres near Marquam, and the remainder of his life was devoted to rendering profitable this fine property. He lived to be sixty-six years of age, dying in 1873. His wife died in 1879, at the age of sixty-four years. To their credit was the rearing of a family of nine children, of whom the following are living: Robert, of Dayton, Wash.; George, of Palouse City, Ore.; Olive, wife of D. Wilcox, living five miles from Palouse City, Ore.; Mary, wife of James Marquam; Clara, wife of George Foster, of Portland; and Joseph T. Mr. Ross became very prominent in his adopted locality in Oregon, and probably accomplished more carpenter work and building in this vicinity than any other one man. He took an active interest in politics, and from his first voting days was a staunch adherent of the Republican party. In the Methodist Episcopal Church he worked for many years, and contributed of his means towards its general support. Honorable and straightforward in all his dealings, he not only won the confidence of the business public, but by his kindly and sympathetic manner made and retained many friends.

Reared on his father's farm, J. T. Ross was educated in the public schools, and under his father's practical guidance learned to be an excellent farmer. Just before leaving home he married America Qualls White, who was born in Callaway county, Mo., in June, 1849, and a complete history of whose family may be found elsewhere in this work. The young couple went to housekeeping on the White donation claim, and then located on the farm upon which Mr. Ross now lives, one and a half miles northwest of Marquam. The farm was all wild land at the time of the purchase, and at the present time the owner has accomplished the clearing of fifty of his one hundred and forty-seven acres. Butte creek runs through the property, and the other watering facilities are admirable. A comfortable residence, good barns and outhouses, and plenty of agricultural implements of modern make, facilitate a general farming enterprise, and give an impression of substantiality and thrift. A Republican in politics, Mr. Ross takes a keen interest in local affairs, and has served as school director, road supervisor and for two terms as constable. Fraternally he is associated with Marquam Tent, Knights of the Maccabees. Mr. Ross maintains the prestige accorded the family name, which was established by his father, both as to work accomplished and fine personal characteristics. His career has been marked by strict integrity, splendid business qualifications, broad-mindedness and liberality of heart, together with other qualities which combine to render a man dear to his friends and a factor in the prosecution of the affairs of life. Mr. Ross' family consists of one child: Vert, who was born January 18, 1879, and was married in October, 1901, to Miss Alta Winslow, and they reside with the father, J. T. Ross.

JOSEPH MAYER. A successful young blacksmith of Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., is Joseph Mayer, whose birth occurred in Sauk City, Sauk county, Wis., June 2, 1861, his parents being John and Katherine (Lycum) Mayer. The father was born in Prussia, and came to the United States in 1847, locating at once in Sauk City, Wis., where he followed his trade of blacksmithing. After a thirty-years residence in that part of the Union he came to Oregon, and bought seventy acres of land five miles east of Lebanon, Linn county, and there he died in 1882, at the age of sixty years. Through constant application and industry he had met with success in his efforts to gain a livelihood, making a competency for his family before he was called upon to surrender life. He was a member of the Evangelical Church, and was always active in its work. Mrs. Mayer was born in Luxemburg, Germany, and when about ten years of age she crossed the ocean with her parents, and with them made her home near Sauk City, at which place she was married. Her death occurred in Lebanon, Ore., in 1893. She was the mother of five sons and daughters, of whom Joseph Mayer was the fourth.

Joseph Mayer received his education in the common schools of Sauk City, and there made his home with his parents until he was sixteen years old, when he accompanied them to Oregon in 1876. Having learned the trade of a blacksmith he engaged in 1883 at that work, investing his earnings in a shop in Lebanon, in which he has since pursued his vocation. He now requires the help of another man in the shop, where he does general blacksmith work and horseshoeing. An evidence of Mr. Mayer's prosperity is found in the handsome little cottage which he has built in his adopted city, and where he now makes his home.

The marriage of Mr. Mayer occurred near Lebanon, and united him with Ida Willard, a native of Idaho, and who now shares his pleasant home. The one child born of the union is Maysel, a daughter. In fraternity circles Mr. Mayer is exceedingly prominent, being active in the Ancient Order of United Workmen; Knights of the Maccabees; Modern Woodmen of America; Knights of Pythias and Fraternal Order of Reindeer. He adheres to the principles of the Republican party, taking an active interest in movements toward a betterment of municipal affairs, and lending his best efforts in this direction. At the behest of his party he has served as city marshal for one year.

CHARLES LEVI BLAKESLEE. The descendant of New England stock by both paternal and maternal ancestry, Charles Levi Blakeslee has brought with him into the west the thrift and steadiness which characterize the people of that section of country. He was born in Battle Creek, Mich., in 1848, the son of Lafayette and the grandson of Levi Blakeslee. The grandfather was born in Connecticut, near Hartford, and early settled in New York, where his son was born in New Berlin of that state. Later he took up his residence in Michigan, and engaged in farming, his New England birth combining with his Scotch-Irish blood in his quiet, steady pursuit of a competency. Upon attaining manhood Lafayette Blakeslee also engaged in farming in Michigan, where he remained throughout his entire life, dying there at the age of seventy-eight years, in 1902. He married Sarah Mills, who was born in Cooperstown, N. Y., also a descendant of an old New England family, and of the union six children were born, five of whom are now living. Mrs. Blakeslee still survives her husband and makes her home near Battle Creek, Mich.

The eldest of this family of children was Charles Levi Blakeslee, and upon his father's farm he grew to manhood, engaging in the duties that fell to his lot in his position. It was his fortune to receive a good education, as, after his days of attendance in the common schools was over, he attended the Kalamazoo College. At the age of twenty-one years he removed to the state of Kansas, where he bought land on the Delaware reservation and proceeded to put improvements upon it, and intelligently cultivate it. After just having made a start which encouraged him to persevere in his efforts, there came the year of the great disaster caused by the grasshoppers, and he was left again at the beginning of his career. Until 1875 he remained in Kansas and upon this farm, but feeling that the disadvantages were far greater than the wealth the land might in time bring, he left in this last-named year, and for the ensuing two years was engaged in farming near Bedford, Iowa. In 1882 he came to Oregon, and settling in Roseburg, continued in the same occupation for five years, 1887 being the date of his settlement in Corvallis. Upon locating here Mr. Blakeslee furnished himself with a modern equipment for house-moving, and since that year he has found his business lucrative. In 1897 he also became interested in fruit drying, building a dryer, which has added much to his income, it having a capacity of two hundred bushels per day.

Mr. Blakeslee was united in marriage in Kansas with Miss Zeporah Burge, a native of St. Joseph, Mo., and the daughter of James Burge, who settled in Douglas county, Ore., in 1879, and whose death occurred in Roseburg. Mrs. Blakeslee is the mother of seven children, named in order of birth as follows: Sarah, now Mrs. James V. Brown, of Sellwood, Ore.; Adella, now Mrs. Frank Porter, of Portland; Clara, now Mrs. C. R. Franklin, of Anacortes, Wash.; Lafayette, Ethel, Ernest and Birdie. Mrs. Blakeslee is a member of the United Evangelical Church. In his political associations Mr. Blakeslee affiliates with the Socialists.

JAMES MONROE CAMERON. As his name indicates, Mr. Cameron is a descendant of a Scottish family who, though not forgetful of the land of their nativity, have still imbibed the spirit of patriotism which characterizes the citizens of this country, an outward expression of the feeling being typified by the cognomen which this representative bears. The great grandfather of Mr. Cameron first settled in Bucks county, Pa., upon his emigration from Scotland, later removing to Ohio, where his family was reared. The grandfather, William, was born in this last-named state and in the course of his life proved the sincerity of his patriotism by serving in the war of 1812. He was a carpenter by trade, and spent his entire life in this state engaged in the pursuit of this employment, located principally in Hamilton county. He married Miss Mary Robinson, a native of Philadelphia, Pa., whose father participated in the hardships and glories of the Revolutionary war. Of this marriage was born Daniel Cameron, father of James Monroe Cameron.

Daniel Cameron was born in 1811, and was early instructed in the trade of his father, making this and farming his occupation. His first move from the paternal roof was into Clinton county, Iowa, where he settled at Dewitt, later following farming in the same state. Dissatisfied with his prospects in the latter state, he decided to try his fortunes in the west, locating in Chico, Cal., in 1870, where he remained for one year engaged in agricultural lines, at the close of which time he came to Oregon, spending eighteen months in Jackson county. His home was eventually in Clark county, Wash., where he was employed in a saw-mill in addition to the farming which he continued in whatever location he found himself. His death occurred in his Washington home. His wife was in maidenhood Jane Abger, born in White House, N. J., in 1827, a daughter of Isaac Abger, who was of German parentage, the last days of the father being spent in Ohio, where he had removed from his New Jersey home. Mrs. Cameron survived her husband until March 9, 1903, when she passed away, in Corvallis, Benton county, Ore. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Cameron are as follows: William, who was a soldier in the Eighth Iowa Infantry and served through the Civil war, and is now engaged in the cattle business in Little Medicine, Wyo.; Mary, now Mrs. Samuel Gaudy, living in Iowa; Daniel, a confectioner, in Portland; James Monroe, of this review; Annie, who died in Corvallis; E. G., engaged in the harness business in Union, Ore.; Ambrose S., employed by his brother, James Monroe Cameron; Ellsworth, a confectioner, in Portland; and Nellie, who makes her home with her brother, Ambrose S.

James Monroe Cameron was born March 17, 1858, in his home in the Mississippi valley, and though only twelve years old at the time of his father's removal to California, he sought and found employment on a ranch in the vicinity of their home, where he worked for $1.00 per day, giving his first earnings to assist in the support of the family. Up to the time of his father's death he continued to work on the surrounding ranches, but was then called back home, and being the eldest of the family at home he took entire charge of the farm, conducting it with great energy and success until affairs were in such a condition that he could leave and begin work for himself. In 1877 he came to Oregon, locating in Dayton, where he continued at his old occupation of farming for one year, at the end of that time becoming interested in the harness manufacturing in the employ of his brother, at Hillsboro, and later working for his brother's successor. In 1880 he came to Corvallis and was employed by Mr. Hemphill, a harnessmaker of this city, continuing with him for one year, after which he engaged with Mr. Briggs, and when he bought him out, twelve years later, employer and employe parted with the remarkable record of having never having had an unpleasant experience in all their association. Since his purchase of the property Mr. Cameron has enlarged the business in every possible way, carrying a general line of harness of all descriptions, which he manufactures, having the largest establishment of its kind west of the city of Portland. He uses in his business Land's leather manufacturing machine.

The marriage of Mr. Cameron occurred in Salem and united him with Miss Melissa Graves, a native of that city. Seven were born of the union and are as follows: Thomas, Winnie, Clinton, Jennie, Mildred, Eva Linton and Donald. Mr. Cameron is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Woodmen of the World. As a Republican he was nominated by acclamation for sheriff in 1900, and of all the men who had run for this office in the past sixteen years he received the largest ballot, being defeated by only sixty votes. In religion Mr. Cameron is a member of the Christian Church, in which he officiates as elder and trustee. In addition to the property which Mr. Cameron owns in the west he, with other members of his family, is heir to a large and valuable tract of land located near Philadelphia, Pa., the original place of settlement of the first Cameron who came to the United States.

WILLIAM BOGUE. During a residence of thirty-seven years in the northwest, William Bogue has been actively and prominently identified with agricultural and mercantile interests and is now engaged in the hardware business in Corvallis, while at the same time he has important farming and stock-raising interests in Linn county. He was born near Indianola, Warren county, Iowa, April 3, 1853. His father, Amos Bogue, was a native of Ohio and removing westward settled in Illinois, where he was married to Miss Mary Hayworth, a native of that state, and a daughter of William Hayworth, who became one of the early settlers of that state and afterward removed to Iowa. His family were of the Society of Friends or Quakers. After his marriage Amos Bogue removed to a farm in Iowa and in 1866 crossed the plains, accompanied by his wife and their four sons and two daughters. Their destination was Oregon, and on May 10 they crossed the Missouri river, making the journey with horse and mule-teams. After traveling for three months they reached the Willamette valley and on August 18, 1866, located in Polk county. The father began the operation of a sawmill on the Little Luckiamute, purchasing the mill which he conducted for two years. In 1869 he went to the Goose lake country, where he entered land and engaged in the raising and herding of cattle. He followed that business for three years and then went to Linn county, settling three miles east of Corvallis. He purchased a farm there, and made it his home throughout his remaining days, his death occurring in 1900, when he was seventy-three years of age. His wife had passed away in eastern Oregon in 1871. Both were Quakers in religious faith. In their family were four sons and two daughters that reached adult age, and three sons and a daughter are yet living. The family record is as follows: Job is a cattleman on Crooked Creek in eastern Oregon. William is the second of the family; Mahala died in Multnomah county; Ami died in eastern Oregon; George is engaged in the raising of cattle in southeastern Oregon; and Mrs. Luzetta White resides in Portland.

William Bogue spent the first thirteen years of his life in Iowa and when crossing the plains to Oregon with his parents he took his turn in standing guard all along the way. He continued his education in Dallas, Ore., and afterward went with his father to the Goose lake country. In 1872, however, he returned to Linn county and, with his father, purchased three hundred and six acres of land, which he improved and cultivated, making a specialty of raising wheat. He was thus engaged until 1890, and in the meantime he extended the boundaries of his farm by the purchase of additional land. He now has more than four hundred acres in Linn county, three miles east of Corvallis, and is engaged in the stock business, raising cattle and fine Cotswold sheep.

In 1890 Mr. Bogue removed to Corvallis, and, purchasing an interest in a hardware store, engaged in that business as a member of the firm of Simpson & Bogue. After a year, however, he sold out and resumed farming, to which he gave his attention exclusively until 1899, when, with Mr. Huston, he became the owner of the store of which he had formerly been half-owner, and which was conducted under the firm name of Huston & Bogue. They improved the store, enlarged the stock and carried a large line of shelf and heavy hardware. Their storeroom was 25x100 feet, and their warehouse 50x50 feet. Accurate and reliable, their business methods required no disguise, but were always open to rigid investigation. The enterprise met with deserved success, and Mr. Bogue's mercantile as well as farming interests returned to him a desirable income. July 1, 1903, Mr. Bogue disposed of his interest in the business and is now devoting his entire attention to the management of his farming interests.

In Polk county, Ore., Mr. Bogue was married to Miss Mary A. Ellis, a daughter of John Ellis, of Dallas, and they now have a son, Floyd, who is attending the Oregon Agricultural College. Socially Mr. Bogue is connected with Barnum Lodge, No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is a past noble grand, and he also belongs to the encampment, while he and his wife are connected with the Rebekah degree. Mrs. Bogue belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church and is a most estimable lady. In politics Mr. Bogue is an unflinching Republican, and for one term he served as a member of the city council, giving his support to many measures for the benefit of Corvallis.

ENOCH CHAMBERLIN. Among the prominent farmers of Polk county, Ore., is to be named Enoch Chamberlin, who is located upon a farm taken up by his father in the spring of 1845, having altogether two hundred and eighty-four acres of land, eighty-four of which is utilized in general farming, while the remainder is in pasture, upon which he raises cattle.

The father, Aaron Chamberlin, was born in New York state, in 1810, and he married Catherine Viles, a native of New Jersey, born in 1806. After a short residence in Missouri Mr. Chamberlin gathered together his worldly wealth, and with his wife and children, joined an emigrant train bound for the great northwest. The train was commanded by Captain Gilliam, and the trip was one which was never forgotten by those who experienced the trials and troubles of their nine-months' journey. At the beginning they were continually delayed by storms, and a large number grew discouraged and despaired of ever seeing the land which they were seeking. A Mr. Mudgett canvassed the party and found thirty who were willing to endure the hardships which they foresaw before the journey was ended, and, electing this man captain of the divided train, they continued upon their journey, arriving safely in Oregon in 1844, Captain Mudgett having proven a worthy man for the position to which he was chosen. Though fairly well equipped at the beginning of the journey, Mr. Chamberlin had but one yoke of oxen upon his arrival at Salem, Ore. After the first winter, which was spent at Salem, he took up a donation claim in the spring of 1845, consisting of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he lived until October, 1867. In that year he took a trip to Mexico in the hope of recovering his health, and died in Sonora, in March, 1868. His wife survived him until 1883, her death occurring upon the home place. The entire width of the continent had been traversed by these two pioneers, from the scene of their marriage, which occurred in the state of New York, to the then western state of Michigan, Iowa and Missouri, leaving St. Joseph, a city of the latter state, for the two thousand-mile journey which meant a separation from all that associations had made dear. Worthily they proved their citizenship in the western state, Mr. Chamberlin doing his part toward its upbuilding by the industrious tilling of the soil. Of the four sons and two daughters born to them Joseph is a stock-raiser, of Arizona; Catherine E. makes her home in Monmouth, Ore.; Sally Ann is the wife of J. L. Coombs, of Grass Valley, Cal.; and Enoch, of this review, is the youngest child; Andrew J. and Aaron are deceased.

Enoch Chamberlin was born near Suver, Polk county, Ore., October 10, 1851, and through his ancestry, English on the maternal side, and German on the paternal side. The grandfather, Enoch Chamberlin, was a near descendant of an emigrant from the latter country, his home being in the state of New York, where as a farmer, he lived and died, and thus Enoch Chamberlin inherited the traits which distinguish natives of the two great European countries. He received his early education in the common schools of Polk county, and at sixteen years of age had completed the course. He then engaged in farming, assisting his elder brother in conducting the home farm, his father having died the preceding year. Nine years later he took entire charge of the farm, and continued the care of his mother, which he had begun at the age of twenty, taking her to Arizona, where they remained for nearly five years, and then returned to the old home farm in Polk county. This has been his home ever since, and he has continued the success which he has always enjoyed as a farmer. He now has two hundred and eighty-four acres.

Mr. Chamberlin married, February 15, 1885, Miss Ellen Christian, a native of Polk county, and a daughter of Henry Christian, who came to Oregon via Cape Horn from his home in the Isle of Man. They are the parents of one child, Ross L., who makes his home with his father and mother. As a Democrat Mr. Chamberlin has served as road supervisor and school director for a number of years. Fraternally he affiliates with the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Independence, and with the Artisans of Wells, Benton county.

HARRY H. CRONISE, the agent for the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad, at Corvallis, has been continuously in the service of the company for a longer period than any other man, entering the employ of the road when it was known as the Oregon-Pacific Railroad. He has arrived at a minute knowledge of its affairs through successive stages of promotion, and is now one of its most trusted and all around useful representatives.

The characteristics of the Teuton, so productive of order and strength in any community, are possessed by Mr. Cronise in marked degree. From Germany, many years ago, came his paternal grandfather, Henry, who settled in Fredericksburg, Md., where he engaged in a mercantile business. Later he removed his business to Tiffin, Ohio, where he became prominent in mercantile and agricultural affairs, amassing a fortune and becoming possessed of landed possessions. His son, Henry, the father of H. H., was born in Fredericksburg, and with his father engaged in the merchandise business in Tiffin, where he married Louise Hosmer, a native of Seville, Ohio, and daughter of Henry Hosmer. Mr. Hosmer was born in Connecticut and settled in Medinah county, Ohio, where he farmed and owned many acres of land. He came of an old New England family, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. and Mrs. Cronise started housekeeping in Tiffin, and there was born their son, H. H., July 10, 1851. One year later the family fortunes were shifted to Peru, LaSalle county, Ill., where the elder Cronise engaged in a mercantile venture, but after about twelve years he returned to Tiffin, where his death occurred. His wife died in Seville, Ohio, leaving four children, of whom H. H. is the second; Estella, the oldest daughter, is the wife of S. R. Graves, of Seville, Ohio; Thomas is a photographer, of Salem, Ore.; and Amma is the wife of Mr. Trover, a photographer, of Salem.

After completing his education in the public schools, H. H. Cronise attended the Hildeberg College at Tiffin, Ohio, until his senior year, and then quit to come to Oregon, in 1875. He was the first member of his family to venture so far away from home, but his subsequent enthusiastic advocacy of the west inspired his brothers and sisters to do likewise. He located first in Josephine county, and the next spring went to Junction, Lane county, where he found employment on a farm. In 1877 he became associated as brakeman with the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and six months later became a clerk in Junction. Going to southern Oregon, he became bookkeeper for E. J. Jeffrey, builder of tunnels, and was thus employed for about one year. Arriving in Portland in 1882, he engaged in the mercantile business for a year, and in the fall of 1883 went east, visiting his friends and relatives in Ohio. In the summer of 1884 he was again in Oregon, and in October of the same year entered the employ of the old Oregon-Pacific Railroad, now the Corvallis & Eastern, which at that time had just been opened to business. From the position of clerk under William M. Hoag, general manager, in the general offices in Corvallis, he advanced to the position of agent in 1885, and has ever since been agent and purser. He was located at different times at Chitwood, Wren and Harris, as agent, and as purser was on the steamers William M. Hoag, N. S. Bentley, Three Sisters and Albany, plying between Corvallis and Portland for three years. From 1890 until 1893 he represented the company in Portland, and was then agent at Philomath for about two years. For the following year he was purser on a boat belonging to the company running between Portland and Corvallis, and in 1897 assumed his present position as agent at Corvallis.

Politically a Republican. Mr. Cronise has never taken an active interest in politics. He is socially popular, and is identified fraternally with Barnum Lodge No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is ex-representative to the grand lodge, and past noble grand. He is also a member of the Artisans, and is connected with the Corvallis Improvement Company. The wife of Mr. Cronise was formerly Ludora, daughter of Valentine Kratz, extensively engaged in the milling business in the west for many years. Mr. Kratz was at one time located at Junction, Lane county, and then at McMinnville, and is at present living in Los Angeles, where he is engaged in horticultural pursuits. His industry and good business judgment have brought him a goodly share of this world's goods, including property at Mabelville and in Dunne, additions to Portland. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cronise, Harry Kratz and Mabel Estella.

WILLIAM RILEY SCHEURER. On the old donation claim near Butteville, Marion county, Ore., upon which his father located many years ago, W. R. Scheurer was born January 26, 1854, and he has since grown to manhood, and attained to a prominent place in the business world of his immediate native vicinity.

John Scheurer, the father of W. R. Scheurer, was born in the walled and historic town of Darmstadt, Germany, August 25, 1825, and in the quaint Hessian city, with its museums and churches, its splendid educational institutions and palaces of the princes, learned in his younger days the trade of wagon maker. In 1844 he came to America in a sailing vessel and located in Illinois. At the outbreak of the Mexican war he was carrying on quite a wagon-making industry. Nevertheless, with that patriotism which characterizes the German born in any country he chances to call home, he enlisted in the war, and after a meritorious service returned in the fall of 1848 to his trade in the Illinois town. Soon afterward, August 26, 1849, he married Elizabeth Yergen, who was born in Germany, June 6, 1833, and in 1852 brought his wife across the plains with four yoke of oxen and a wagon, six months being consumed in the long and arduous journey. They arrived in Oregon in September of that year. After remaining in Portland for three months Mr. Scheurer removed with his wife to Butteville, where he lived until 1870. His property consisted of two farms of three hundred acres each, which are at present in one farm. Five hundred acres are cleared and one hundred acres are still in brush. In 1870 Mr. Scheurer returned to Portland, where he resided until his death, which occurred June 7, 1887. His wife and five children are still living.

W. R. Scheurer was educated in the public schools and at the Portland Academy, terminating his school life at the age of nineteen. At the age of twenty-two he assumed the management of the paternal farm with his brother Joseph, and after a year removed to Butteville and built the warehouse which has proved the basis of his subsequent large produce business. At the present time he is hauling enormous quantities of feed, grain and hops, and at the same time is agent for the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, which has a line of boats operating on the Willamette river. He is also the owner of a hop ranch of fifteen acres, and has some valuable town and county holdings in real estate.

As a staunch Republican Mr. Scheurer has been before the public in various capacities, principally as treasurer of Butteville for several terms. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Grange, being treasurer of the latter. He is also treasurer and a member of the Native Sons of Oregon. Mr. Scheurer has pronounced business ability, unquestioned integrity, and great capacity for utilizing successfully the opportunities by which he is surrounded. Mr. Scheurer has two sons by his first marriage, Fred W. and John J. In September, 1899, he married his second wife, Mrs. Mary Osborne Geer, an Englishwoman.

Fred Scheurer is married and has one daughter, Violet. Mr. Scheurer was a grandfather when forty-five years of age.

WILLIAM H. CURRIN. Conspicuous among the foremost business men of Corvallis is Mr. Currin, manager of the house of R. M. Wade & Co., one of the best-known and finest-stocked hardware establishments in Benton county, and one in which Mr. Currin is also financially interested. During the twelve years that have elapsed since he came to this city he has identified himself with its highest interests, heartily endorsing all worthy enterprises to promote its industrial, educational and moral advancement, proving himself in every respect a valued member of the community.

He comes of Virginian stock, and was born May 15, 1864, at Currinsville, Clackamas county, Ore., a son of George Currin. The father, a native of Virginia, came to Oregon prior to his marriage, and settled on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres in Clackamas county, at Currinsville, where he was subsequently engaged in mixed husbandry, including stock-raising, until his death, in 1879. Having crossed the plains in 1845, he was truly a pioneer settler of that part of the state, performing his full share of the labor of improving it. On his long journey he was accompanied by three of his brothers, namely: Hugh, who died in Clackamas county; John, now a resident of Lane county; and William, whose death occurred in Lane county. George Currin married, in Clackamas county, Lydia Wade, who was born in Missouri, and came to Oregon in 1852, with her brother, R. M. Wade, of Portland, Ore. Ten children were born of their union, of whom six daughters and two sons are now living, the eldest son, and fourth child, being William H. Currin, while the other son, Robert Currin, is a farmer in Clackamas county. The mother survived her first husband, and is now the wife of L. F. Marrs, of Salem, Ore.

Acquiring his early education in the old school-house near his home, William H. Currin assisted in the labors incidental to farm life until twenty-two years of age, when he entered the employ of Knopp, Burrill & Co., in Portland, remaining with that firm four years, gradually working his way up from the lowest office to the highest position in their store, in the meantime advancing his education by taking an evening course at Armstrong's Business College, from which he was graduated in 1888. Continuing his connection with the same firm, Mr. Currin went to Spokane Falls, Wash., in 1888, as bookkeeper, later to Tacoma as their salesman and collector. Coming in the spring of 1891 to Corvallis he established the branch house of R. M. Wade & Co., of which he has since had control as manager, and has here built up an immense and lucrative business in his line of merchandise, consisting of hardware of every description and agricultural implements of all kinds, from the smallest tool to the largest piece of machinery.

Mr. Currin married, in Corvallis, Miss Jennie Buchanan, who was born in Benton county, Ore., a daughter of Robert Buchanan, and a sister of W. A. Buchanan, whose sketch may be found elsewhere in this volume. Mr. and Mrs. Currin have one child living, namely, Margaret Currin. Mr. Currin is a staunch Republican in his political affiliations, and is prominently identified with the Odd Fellows, belonging to Barnum Lodge, No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is a past officer, and which he has represented at the grand lodge; to the Qui Vive Encampment, of which he is past chief patriarch; and to the Rebekah Lodge.

EDWARD C. HERREN. Opportunity encompasses the whole human race, but the successful man is he who can recognize and utilize this opportunity. The name of Herren is closely associated with the development of what has become a very important industry in this region—hop-growing. It is to the production and sale of this commodity that Edward C. Herren gives his attention, and almost from the beginning of the hop industry in this state he has been actively and successfully identified with the business.

"To know something of a man we must know something of his ancestry," wrote a famous historian. Edward C. Herren is descended from good old Revolutionary stock. His great-grandfather, a resident of the Old Dominion, fought for the independence of the colonies as a member of the Virginia troops. His grandfather, John Herren, was also born in Virginia, where his ancestors had lived for many generations. The family is of English and Welsh descent. John Herren became a farmer of Kentucky, afterward removing to Indiana, and later carried on agricultural pursuits near St. Joseph, Mo., until 1845, when he crossed the plains to Oregon. He was in the Meeks cut-off, and suffered the hardships of a long and perilous journey. At length, however, he reached his destination, settling near Turner, Marion county, where he secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres. This he brought to a high state of cultivation. Here his life's labors were finally ended in death.

Capt. William J. Herren, father of Edward C. Herren, was born in Lexington, Ky., in January, 1824, and accompanied his parents on their various removals, including their journey across the plains in 1845. During that memorable expedition the water supply became exhausted. On horseback Captain Herren started in search of water, and discovered the Blue Bucket spring. He also found some shining lumps of metal, which he took back with him and exhibited to the members of the party. They were encamped in that location for three days, and, seeking these bright lumps, piled them all in one place. But they did not recognize the value of their find.

Captain Herren went through all the experiences of a pioneer in the northwest, when the country was being won from the domination of the red men. In 1847 he married and secured a donation claim of a section of land located on Salem prairie, four miles east of Salem. This he cultivated for some time; but, wishing to afford his children better educational advantages, he moved to Salem, where he spent his remaining days, dying at the age of sixty-nine years. He was captain of a company in Colonel Nesmith's regiment in the Rogue River Indian war, his commission from Governor George L. Curry dating September 28, 1854. He went to the mines of California in the fall of 1848, being among the first who sought wealth there after the discovery of gold. In the spring of 1849 he returned, but made a second trip to California a few weeks later, returning home in the spring of 1850. He served as sheriff of Marion county during the territorial days, filling the position for two terms, his appointment being signed by Acting Governor Hintzing Pritchette, dated June 1, 1850. In 1872 he organized the Salem Shipping and Trading Company, and built the Grangers' Warehouse, which he conducted for many years. He finally consolidated his business with milling interests under the name of the Salem Flouring Mills, of which he was manager for three years. In 1886 he was appointed by Governor Moody commissioner on the Board of Assessment and Taxation to fill the vacancy caused by the death of his brother-in-law, Daniel Clark. He also served as a member of the old state Railroad Commission.

He was a man of affairs, alert and progressive in business, and was the father of the hop industry in this state. It was he who induced William Wells of Buena Vista and Ralph Geer to set out the first hop yards in Oregon—about 1873. But the settlers were slow in taking up this work, and even by 1880 only about seven thousand bales of hops were grown in the entire state. There was not much increase until 1882, when the price reached $1.15 per pound. This stimulated the business, which thereafter steadily increased until, in 1890, the crop amounted to over twenty-seven thousand bales, and in 1895 there were one hundred and three thousand bales—the largest crop ever produced in the state. In 1895 the price was so low that many yards were ploughed up, but during the past two years the industry has again assumed considerable importance. Captain Herren was very prominent, a man of forceful individuality, and wielded a wide influence in business and social circles. He held membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His wife, Eveline (Hall) Herren, was born near St. Joseph, Mo., in 1830, a daughter of James and Cynthia Hall, who came to Oregon in 1845, and were in the Meeks cut-off. Mrs. Herren is now living in Oregon.

In the family were five sons and one daughter, the latter being deceased. The sons are: David A., a stockman of Heppner, Ore.; Albert W., a grain merchant of Independence, Ore.; George, a commission merchant of Portland; Willard H., who is also a stockman of Heppner; and Edward C.

Edward C. Herren was born in Salem April 27, 1863. He obtained his education in the public schools of that city and Willamette University. In 1881 he became associated with his father in the hop business, but continuing his education, he had graduated from the Portland Business College in 1880. He then went to Heppner, where for two years he was engaged in general merchandising. Upon his return to Salem he was again associated with his father in the hop, grain and wool trade, this business connection being maintained until the latter's death in 1891, since which time he has been alone. In years of activity he is the oldest hop merchant in the city. He is also engaged in the production of hops, owning a yard of thirty acres six miles south of Salem, besides leasing other yards. The product of his own yards and that obtained by purchase is shipped to eastern and foreign markets. In 1901 Mr. Herren, with his brothers, and with George Conser, the banker at Heppner, and E. C. Redfield, an attorney of that city, organized the Heppner Coal and Railway Company, which has begun the development of what promises to be an extensive coal mining property located principally on D. A. Herren's ranch twenty miles southeast of Heppner. The plans of this company contemplate the construction of a branch railway line from the mines to Heppner, and it is expected that the work of shipment will begin within the next two years. Experts who have examined the product, which has been tested on various parts of the Pacific coast, state that it is a fine quality of cannel coal, containing about nineteen per cent of fixed carbon, which is higher than any other coal produced on the coast.

Mr. Herren was married in Salem April 4, 1898, to Lizzie V. Holman, who was born in California, a daughter of Richard D. and Carrie (Whitney) Holman, formerly of London, Ontario. They were of English descent, and moved from Canada to California. Mrs. Herren is a member of the Unitarian Church. Mr. Herren is identified with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Oregon Hop Buyers' Association, the Oregon Hop Growers' Association, and Daniel Waldo Cabin, Native Sons of Oregon. In his political affiliations he is a Democrat. Having spent his entire life in Marion county, he has become thoroughly imbued with the progressive spirit which dominates this section of the country, and in his business career his close application and keen discrimination have put him in control of enterprises that bring to him good returns.

CONRAD A. GERHARD. A book and stationery store to which it is a delight to go, is that owned and managed by Conrad A. Gerhard, a native son of Corvallis, and representative of one of the very old and prominent families of Benton county. Already the larger cities of Oregon have their commercial aristocracy, their citizen names which typify sound and permanent growth, and stand for integrity and fair dealing. To this class of men the Gerhards belong, and as such are enrolled among the upbuilders of the great northwest.

Joseph Gerhard, the founder of the family in America, and the father of Conrad, was born in the city of Alberschweiler, Bavaria, in the Palatinate, in 1825, a son of Johann and Anna Maria (Webber) Gerhard, natives of Germany, and the former a tradesman by occupation. Joseph learned the blacksmith's trade when young, and, as was the custom, enlisted for service in the army, his term covering six years, and including the war of 1848. He came to America in 1852, and after a short time in New York city moved to Boston, his brother, Lorenzo, coming to Oregon, where he eventually died. In Boston Joseph married Elizabeth Dorr, born in Martinza, Bavaria, in 1835, daughter of Peter and Elizabeth (Reischman) Dorr, born, reared and died in Bavaria. Mrs. Gerhard is one in a family of eight children, seven of whom are living, five being in America. She was educated in the public schools of Germany, and in 1853 came to Boston from Havre in a sailing vessel. After several years of happy married life in Boston Joseph Gerhard prepared to emigrate to Oregon, the start being made March 5, 1858, and the way being via the Isthmus of Panama. One month later they reached San Francisco, and from there embarked for Portland, coming almost immediately to Corvallis. The first summer Mr. Gerhard worked at his trade near Monroe, this county, and in the fall of 1858 came to Corvallis, but located across the river at Orleans, Linn county, where he bought a house and shop and started up a nice little business. The flood of 1861-2 convinced him that he had chosen a very undesirable location, so he came over to Corvallis and bought a piece of land fifty by one hundred feet on the corner of Second and Madison streets. Here he built a residence and shop and engaged in the blacksmith business for many years. He prospered exceedingly, and his busy little shop was the center of a flourishing and popular trade. A fire which laid low the shop did not discourage him in the least, for he soon rebuilt and proceeded as before, confident that the west had only ultimate good for him. As proof of his faith in his chosen town he invested his hard-earned money in town property, and among others owned four lots on First street. Finally, weary of the anvil and hammer, he bought a farm of one hundred and ninety-three acres on old Palmer island, and there moved with his wife and sons. The island afterward became known as Gerhard island, a name which it still retains. Farming and stock-raising filled the later life of this pioneer blacksmith, and his death, July 5, 1886, at the age of sixty-two years, found him the possessor of a comfortable home in an ideal part of the county. He was a Republican in politics, and a stanch member of the Catholic Church. The wife who survives him profits by his many years of industry, having a nice home in Corvallis, but spends her summers on the island farm. Of her six children, George is a civil engineer, of Fairhaven, Wash.; Henry is living on and managing the island farm; Leopold died in Roseburg, Ore.; Mary and Kate are at home; and Conrad is engaged in the book and stationery business in Corvallis.

The youngest in his father's family, Conrad A. Gerhard was born in Corvallis, February 20, 1876, and was educated at Mount Angel College, Marion county, from which he graduated June 22, 1891, with the degree of Master of Accounts. He was an unusually apt scholar, and from the first of his school life appreciated the great advantage of a thorough and systematic education. This was demonstrated particularly by his post-graduate work. He afterward spent a couple of years on the farm, and in 1898 bought the book and stationery store to the improvement and enlarging of which he has since devoted his attention. He is now located in the Occidental block, and has the largest business of the kind in Benton county. He makes a specialty of school supplies, and of the incidentals which a cosmopolitan community expect to find in a modern and up-to-date store.

In Corvallis Mr. Gerhard married Adelaide Horton Fullington, a native of Harrisburg, Ore., and daughter of H. S. Horton, an old settler of this county, now residing in Corvallis. Mr. Gerhard is a member of the Corvallis Improvement Association, and in politics is affiliated with the Republican party. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World. Like his father, himself and family are members of the Catholic Church. This popular stationer stands high in the public esteem of his native town, and is accounted one of the most successful and promising young business men.

GEORGE FRANKLIN CRAW. To a far greater extent than the average man, George F. Craw has realized his painstaking and well directed expectations. Just as the pent-up enthusiasm of twenty-one found expression in a meritorious war service, so the mature and public-spirited plans of later years have resulted in his election to every office to which he has been nominated by his fellow-townsmen, as well as in a financial standing merited by marked business ability and fearless adherence to high moral principles. The present manager of the Postal Telegraph Company, he is also the treasurer of Lane county, and was for six or seven years city treasurer of Eugene. At the present time he is serving his twelfth appointment as notary public, and in November, 1903, rounded out his twenty-four years in this capacity. Notable among his achievements in behalf of the town of his adoption have been his whole-souled and practical efforts to improve the educational facilities of the town. With his resignation as school clerk in May, 1902, ended fifteen years of truly remarkable educational advancement, nearly all of the school buildings in Eugene having been erected within that time, the sole exception being the oldest school house in the city limits. Shortly after his election as county treasurer in June, 1902, he was stricken with creeping paralysis, but the disorder yielding to treatment at the end of five months he was able to assume the responsibilities of office, to the joy of his many friends, his election being a credit to the community which has honored him with its unbounded confidence.

The youngest in a family of nine children, Mr. Craw was born in the center of eastern conservatism, Hartford, Conn., November 10, 1841, and was reared on the farm of his parents, Abial and Rhoda (Belknap) Craw, natives of Connecticut, and of Scotch ancestry. Both the paternal and maternal families were established in Connecticut by the grandfathers, the former coming from Aberdeen, Scotland, and locating on a farm in Hartford township. Abial Craw inclined to his father's occupation, and he and his wife died on the farm which had been their care for so many years, and where they had reared their large family of children. George F. was not the only member of the family whom ambition beckoned to the west, for his brother, Edward, crossed the plains in an ox-train in 1850, and, after varied experiences in the mines on the coast, died in San Bernardino, Cal.

The well worn farm in Hartford township failing to provide for its many occupants, each set about early in life earning his own living. George F. Craw has received practically no assistance from any source since he started in to work in a woolen mill at the age of twelve. His summers were spent in the mill and his winters were devoted to attending the public schools. At the age of sixteen he began to clerk in a store in East Hartford, and was thus employed when the long-smouldering hostility between the north and south culminated in the Civil war. August 7, 1862, he enlisted in Company D, Twentieth Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered into service at New Haven, Conn. After participating in the battles of Antietam, Chancellorsville, and some minor skirmishes, he was stricken with sun-stroke at four o'clock in the afternoon while on the march to Gettysburg in June, 1863, and failed to recover consciousness until midnight of the same day. Opening his eyes in a little Fairfax Station church, he realized that his war experience was practically ended, although after being sent to a hospital in Alexander he was anxious to rejoin his regiment, being prevented only by his commanding physician. Unable to stand the rays of the sun or exposure to heat, he was relegated to hospital duty for the remainder of the war, and was mustered out July 23, 1865.

Returning to Portland, Conn., Mr. Craw clerked in a dry-goods store in the town, and at the same time devoted his leisure to learning telegraphy. His first telegraphic charge was with the Connecticut River Valley Telegraph Company, in the affairs of which he afterward became prominent, being advanced to the position of superintendent of construction. In 1869, about three weeks after the completion of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads, he made his way to the coast on one of the new lines, arriving in Portland, Ore., in August, 1869. Going to Salem, he found employment in the woolen mills for two weeks, and for the following year was employed as a clerk in the book and stationery store of J. K. Gill of Salem. For six months he clerked in the grocery store of Logan Adams, of Salem, and in 1871 secured the position as agent and operator under Ben Holliday, at the Portland car shops of the Oregon & California Railroad. Six months later he was transferred to Harrisburg, where the bridge was being built, and remained there until the completion of the road to Eugene. At Jefferson he was agent and operator for a period of two years, and after a visit of three months to his old home in Connecticut, was agent at Aurora for two weeks. At Junction City he remained agent and operator for seven years to a day, resigning his position January 12, 1879, to come to Eugene as agent for the Wells-Fargo Express Company. Six or seven years later, when the Postal Telegraph Company opened an office in Eugene, he became its general manager, holding the combined positions until 1893, when he resigned from the express company, and devoted his entire time to the telegraph company. For fifteen years he was agent at this point for the Oregonian, resigning therefrom June 1, 1903, on account of impaired health, and an excess of outside work. For the past seven years he has been interested in the sale of pianos and organs, managing this line of business with the same business acumen and success which has characterized all of his undertakings.

In Portland, Conn., in 1867, Mr. Craw married Emma Griswold, a native of that town, who died in May, 1895, leaving two children. Of these, Nellie, the wife of E. E. Awbrey, of Irving, Ore., has four children; and Mabel is the wife of Elmer Roberts, of Eugene. In Portland, Conn., Mr. Craw became identified with the Masonic fraternity, and in Salem ex-Governor Chadwick conferred upon him the Scottish Rite degrees. He is at present a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M. He is also connected with the Oregon Consistory No. 1, of Portland, and with the J. W. Geary Post No. 7, G. A. R., being past commander. Mr. Craw is not unmindful of the moral and social advantages of church membership, as well as its great opportunities for well-doing. For many years he has been an active worker in the Episcopal Church, has served as junior warden, vestryman and treasurer, maintaining at the present time the first two offices. He is a man of broad and tolerant sympathies, of great generosity towards public benefactions, and intense and vitalizing zeal in promoting educational and general town interests. His friends are many, and his business standing and personal reputation such as any man might do well to emulate.

LUTHER WHITE. Not the least among the brave pioneers who left home and friends and with their few belongings undertook the long, perilous journey across the western plains, were Luther White and his wife, who in 1847, left their home in Platt county, Mo., for new and untried fields. After the usual six-months journey they dismounted and unpacked their household goods, the first location being upon a donation claim eight miles south of Brownsville, Linn county, and comprising six hundred and forty acres. For many years, until 1872, this continued to be the home center, but at that time Mr. White retired from the active duties of farm life and took up his abode in Brownsville, and has found his time sufficiently occupied in looking after his property.

In referring to the personal history of Luther White we find that his birth occurred in Ohio, near the shores of Lake Erie, January 20, 1815. His father, John White, a native of Connecticut, had located in Ohio in an early day, but in 1815, shortly after the birth of his son, moved to Wabash county, Ill., settling at what was known in that day as Barney Fort, but is now called Friendsville, about eight miles north of Mount Carmel. The Indians in those days were anything but friendly, and in order to protect themselves from their depredations the settlers were compelled to unite their efforts in the matter of safety, hence the founding of Barney Fort. As a soldier in the Revolutionary war the father did his part in protecting and fighting for the cause of the colonists. His death occurred on his farm in Wabash county when in his sixty-ninth year. His wife, who in her maidenhood was Sarah Knapp, was born in Massachusetts, and she, too, died on the home farm in Illinois.

Of the seven children born to these worthy pioneer parents Luther was next to the eldest. His education had been sadly neglected, owing to the fact that his help was necessary in the management of the home farm, and his father's death occurring when he was eighteen years old, ended all thought of future education for the time-being. For one year he worked at any honorable employment that presented itself, and finally it was his good fortune to meet a Mr. Smith, who was engaged in surveying public lands. Mr. White was an apt pupil, and it was not long before he, too, could handle the compass and line. Subsequently he went to Louisiana with another surveying party, and for six months was engaged in this southern state. The lack of opportunity in his earlier days for gaining an education was made up for in his later life, and when he returned to Illinois he took a position as teacher in the house in which he had been reared, but which at that time had been devoted to school purposes. In 1833 he removed to Platt county, Mo., where for one year he taught school, but in the meantime having prepared himself for the ministry, he accepted a charge as pastor, having charge of a circuit in Grundy county, for one year in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In 1843 Mr. White resumed farming operations, and it was about this time that he was united in marriage with Miss Martha Ann Mansfield, a native of Kentucky. Her death occurred in Brownsville, Ore., January 4, 1894, at the age of seventy years. Eleven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. White, but only two of the number are living. In order of birth they are as follows: Sarah Elizabeth, John H., Eliza Eleanor, Silas H., Mary Adeline, Samuel Thurston and Finis E., all of whom are deceased; Rose B., who is at home with her father; Martha and Marguerite, both deceased; and Robert, who resides on the old donation claim taken up by his parents in 1847, and which was their first home in the west. As a public official Mr. White served as a member of the state legislature for one term in 1852, and at one time filled the office of city recorder for two terms. In school matters he takes a keen interest, and as school director and clerk his services have been of great value to the community. He makes his church home in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and in political affairs gives his influence and vote to the candidates of the Prohibition party, whose platform he believes best calculated for the ultimate highest good of the nation.

JAMES HILTIBRAND. As an able and successful farmer of Polk county, Ore., James Hiltibrand has followed in the footsteps of his father, who gave to the growth and upbuilding of the statehood of Oregon the strength of his manhood. The name has been well and worthily known in the northwest since 1845, the father, Paul Hiltibrand, coming at that early date to make one of the many pioneers who made the state.

Paul Hiltibrand was born in Ohio, June 7, 1822, the son of John, who was a native of Germany, and had come to the United States in 1798 with his father, Jacob, and settled in Pennsylvania. While serving in the war of 1812 he was wounded in the wrist by a gunshot in the battle of New Orleans. From his home in Ohio he later removed to Kentucky, where he spent the remainder of his life, dying November 7, 1867, having lived a worthy and useful life in the country of his adoption. When only sixteen years of age Paul Hiltibrand left home and, going to Missouri, he remained there until 1845, when he joined an emigrant train, under the command of Solomon Tetherow, and bound for Oregon. The journey was made in seven months and sixteen days, counting the time from St. Joseph, Mo., to which city Mr. Hiltibrand had gone from his farm in Clay county to join the train, until their arrival in Polk county, Ore. With an interval of but three weeks' inaction Mr. Hiltibrand took up the land which is now owned by his children, six hundred and forty acres in all, and commenced the improvements which were necessary to make the farm what it is today. In time he added four hundred and sixty-six acres to his original farm, and then owned considerably over a thousand acres. He engaged for many years in stock-raising and general farming, and lived the remainder of his life upon this claim. He died September 29, 1895, in the home wherein he had spent so many worthy and useful years.

In the trip across the plains was the beginning of the romance which gave Mr. Hiltibrand his wife, for Captain Tetherow had his family with him, and his daughter, Evaline, was married in 1846 to her fellow-traveler. For a fuller account of the life of Captain Tetherow refer to the sketch of James P. Tetherow, which appears on another page of this work. The children which blessed the union of Paul Hiltibrand and Evaline Tetherow are as follows: Levina, who became the wife of Charles Cottell; Elizabeth, now Mrs. Marshall Scafford; James, of this review; and John W., of Suver. As members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Luckiamute, Mr. and Mrs. Hiltibrand added much to the moral life of the community, giving freely of time and means in the growth of the church. For many years Mr. Hiltibrand was elder and clerk in this church and his death was a loss felt by many. Fraternally he belonged to the Grange.

James Hiltibrand was born in Polk county, Ore., November 12, 1850, being reared on the paternal farm, and alternating his home duties with an attendance at the district school in the vicinity of his home. When eighteen years old he left school and went to work on a neighboring farm, and at twenty-one he began farming for himself, and has since continued in this occupation with entire credit for the judgment and energy which controls his actions. He now owns two hundred and eleven acres of land, a part of the original claim taken up by his father, and upon which he has put all the improvements, consisting of a house, well situated on a hillside, barn and other outbuildings, making a comfortable home. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, being principally interested in goats and sheep.

In 1870 Mr. Hiltibrand married Lavina J. Fuqua, who was born in Jackson county, Mo., July 30, 1850. Her father, Richard J. Fuqua, crossed the plains in 1864, and died at Parker's Station in 1882, the farm in Polk county being now occupied by the son, William Fuqua. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Hiltibrand are four in number, of whom John B. is in Independence, Ore.; Pauline is the wife of Frank Skinner, a drayman, of Independence; Ernest E. and Clarence G. make their home with their parents. Like his father in politics, Mr. Hiltibrand is a staunch Democrat, and through his influence has served as road supervisor and school director, holding the latter position for five years. Fraternally he is a member of the Grange of Suver and Modern Woodmen of America.

ADELBERT YERGEN. On his father's farm, three miles east of Butteville, Marion county, Adelbert Yergen was born November 28, 1854, and, as his name indicates, is of German ancestry. His father, Augustus Yergen, was born in Meilheim, Germany, November 28, 1831, and at ten years of age came across the ocean in a sailing vessel, many weeks being spent upon the deep. With his parents he located in Belleville, Ill. At the time his father was very poor, having barely enough to bring his family to the United States. Nevertheless, the fertile soil and desirable conditions of Illinois enabled the elder Yergen to prosper in a modest way, and make a comfortable home in a fertile and resourceful state. However, he was doomed to meet with misfortune, for his wife died a few years after crossing the ocean, and he was left comparatively alone in the world. Augustus Yergen was married, March 28, 1852, to Elizabeth Griffin, and a few days later crossed the plains with ox-teams, taking six months to accomplish the journey. For two years Mr. Yergen lived in Washougal, Wash., and then came to Marion county, Ore., where he purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty acres three miles from Aurora. Here he prospered and reared his children, and here his death occurred May 24, 1902. Of his six children, Adelbert was the oldest, and next is George, who is living on the home place; Mary E., the wife of J. V. Swan, of Portland, Ore.; Frank, living on a farm near Aurora; Frederick, also near Aurora; and Henry, working the home place. The wife is still living on the old homestead, and though in her seventy-first year, still retains her interest in the farm and the doings of her children.

The education of Adelbert Yergen was acquired in the country schools and in those of Portland. His youth was uneventful, as is that of the average farm-reared boy. November 9, 1880, he was united in marriage with Ida J. Carter, who was born in Yamhill county, a daughter of Benjamin and Jane (Lee) Carter, the latter of whom was a daughter of James Lee, who crossed the plains in 1852. Mr. Lee came from Springfield, Ill., and after a six-months trip located on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres near Gaston, Yamhill county, upon which his son now lives. Benjamin Carter was born February 22, 1826, in Hagerstown, Md., in a house located exactly on the boundary line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, and from the Keystone state enlisted in the Mexican war, serving for two years. He then went to Iowa, whither his family had in the meantime removed, and where he lived until 1852. He crossed the plains in that year with ox-teams and the usual outfit, locating near Hillsboro, Ore., where he worked at his trade of millwright. He was a practical mill builder and operator, and during his life in the west erected many mills in different parts of Oregon. After his marriage with Jane Lee, September 1, 1863, he bought what is known as Graham's Ferry across the Willamette, and operated it continuously until the year before his death, May 26, 1882. He was survived by his wife until July 21, 1886, and of his two children Mrs. Yergen is the oldest, Irvin Lee being a resident of Tacoma, Wash. It is a noteworthy fact that Mrs. Yergen's parents and Mr. Yergen's father are buried in the Butteville cemetery, which will be the last resting place of all four parents.

Soon after his marriage Mr. Yergen came to Butteville and engaged in the butcher business for three years. He then went to Portland, and for another three years had a very large dairying business. At times he milked sixty-five cows, and supplied a large trade in the city and suburbs. Returning to Butteville, he engaged in the butcher business for six years, and has since turned his attention to hop-growing on a farm two miles south of Aurora. He has twenty-six acres under this paying commodity, and is contemplating an extension of his present output. He has a pleasant rural home, and has two children, Leonard G. and Martin D. He is a Democrat in politics, and a member of the Maccabees, while his family is represented in the Congregational Church by his wife and sons. His interest in educational matters is shown by the fact that he served for nine years continuously as school director in his district.

KERSEY C. ELDRIDGE. The creamery business, as understood and operated by Kersey C. Eldridge, of Independence, constitutes one of the most profitable sources of income in this part of the county. An expert in his line, Mr. Eldridge invests his enterprise with the vim and progressiveness of a genuine enthusiast, with the result that his commodities are sought in all marketable centers along the coast, and have a reputation for excellence unexcelled. He came to Oregon in 1897, and, having successfully started and maintained a creamery plant in Newberg, came to Independence in 1899, his efforts here being attended with equal good fortune. To such an extent has the business increased that he has established a plant at Jefferson, Marion county, in connection with the one at Independence. He has a capacity of twenty-five thousand gallons of milk per day, and makes one thousand pounds of butter a day. The most modern machinery known to dairymen has been introduced in his plants, and he is contemplating even more extensive operations in the near future.

A native of Lawrence, Kans., Mr. Eldridge was born March 4, 1863, and in his youth had the advantages of the public schools of Lawrence and New York city. His father, Edwin S. Eldridge, is a mining expert, and a constant traveler from one mining section to another, visiting from time to time such mining centers as Colorado, California and Mexico. He was born in Pittsfield, Mass., January 18, 1831, and located in Kansas City, Mo., about 1856. During the Civil war he lived in Lawrence, Kans., and in 1879 took his family to New York City. Eventually, however, he returned to Kansas City, which has since been his headquarters, and the center of his extensive mining operations. He is a well-known mining promoter, and his opinion is sought by those who desire to invest in this most precarious of ventures. His wife, formerly Augusta Spicer, was born in Yates county, N. Y., and died in Lawrence, Kans., in 1867, leaving a son and daughter, of whom Kersey C. is the youngest.

Previous to coming to Oregon Mr. Eldridge engaged, in 1880, in the dry goods business with J. H. Diggles, of New York, and in 1883 he returned to Lawrence, Kans., and traveled with his father in his mining business. In 1886 he was employed as traveling salesman by a large grocery firm, and in this capacity visited principally New Mexico. In 1891 he went to Utah, near Ogden, and engaged in the creamery business, and being successful he determined to try his fortune in Oregon. That this decision was a wise and far-sighted one has been repeatedly demonstrated, and unquestionably Mr. Eldridge congratulates himself upon his happy choice of a location, having established the creamery at Newberg in 1897, Independence in 1899, and at Jefferson in March, 1903.

He was married in Placerville, Cal., to Ruth A. King, daughter of Charles King, who was born in Vermont, and came to California in 1848-9. Four sons have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Eldridge: Neville, Kersey C., Jr.; Shalor and Lawrence. Mr. Eldridge is by no means confined to the limits of his business, but has a public-spiritedness which concerns itself with social and other business interests of the town. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Woodmen of the World, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in all of which lodges he is a welcome visitor. Politically he is arrayed on the side of Republicanism, although he has never sought or accepted official positions. He is a man of shrewd business ability and unquestioned integrity. At the present time Mr. Eldridge is erecting a plant at Portland for manufacture of butter and ice cream.

WILLIAM EDWARD FINZER. Among the many claims to distinction which make Adjutant General Finzer, of Woodburn, one of the most popular and highly appreciated men of the state is a military career of a particularly stirring nature, excellent business ability, and commendable service as an executive. He was born in Shanesville, Ohio, September 25, 1867, and comes of ancestors long connected with the Republic of Switzerland. His paternal grandfather, Benjamin, was born in Berne, Switzerland, and in his native land was a farmer and stock-raiser, an occupation which he continued after locating in Tuscarawas county, Ohio, on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. He was one of the early settlers of that region, arriving in 1845, and he lived to the advanced age of eighty-nine years. His son, Benjamin, the father of W. E. Finzer, came with him from Berne, where he was born May 5, 1835, and in his youth was apprenticed to learn the carpenter's trade in Shanesville. He came to Oregon in 1888 and located near Hubbard, where he worked at his trade, made money, and advantageously invested in town property. He died in April, 1889. A Democrat in politics, he became prominent in the local affairs of his party, and served the community as constable and road supervisor, while in Ohio. He married Elizabeth Hostetter, a native of Ohio, who was born April 7, 1847, and died in February, 1890. Her father, Isaac, came from Pennsylvania and spent the rest of his life in Ohio, owning over a thousand acres, which was considered a very large farm.

The oldest of the five sons and four daughters born to his parents, General Finzer was educated in the public schools. In Shanesville and New Philadelphia he clerked in mercantile establishments. He came to Oregon in 1889, and in 1891 engaged in the grocery business in Woodburn. That he had considerable enterprise and ability is evidenced by the fact that at the end of three years he owned the business and continued it independently until 1897. In 1891 he was appointed postmaster of the city, and filled the obligations of this office in connection with his successful store. The dry-goods business, in which he is now engaged, was started in 1897, and the following year he responded to the call for soldiers to participate in the Spanish-American war. As first lieutenant in Company M, Second Oregon Regiment, he served for one and a half years, and during that time he took part in the battles of Malabon, Polo, Marilao, Tay-Tay, Morong and others of equal interest. He was honorably discharged from service in San Francisco, in August, 1899. During his absence in the Philippines, General Finzer made a practical study of the people and conditions, and his descriptions and observations have proved of vital interest to the friends and associates who remained behind. He has been further connected with military affairs as captain of Company D, Fourth Regiment, O. N. G., and his experience on the field is apparent in the high state of efficiency to which he has brought the company. The appointment of Captain Finzer to his present position, that of adjutant general of the state of Oregon, is of recent occurrence, he having taken charge of the office September 1, 1903, in the discharge of the duties bringing to bear the attributes of the typical soldier, an endowment of courage, resourcefulness and coolness. His adopted town is justly proud of his soldierly bearing and gallant service.

After returning from the Philippines General Finzer engaged in the dry-goods business with E. A. Austin, and at present has a well equipped establishment which caters to a flourishing trade, by far the largest in the community. Before leaving for the war, General Finzer was elected mayor of Woodburn, but resigned to go to the front. He has served as school clerk and city treasurer, and in all his political associations has proven himself broad-minded, enterprising and thoroughly in accord with municipal well-being.

In Portland, Ore., in 1892, General Finzer was united in marriage with Louise Roberts, who was born in Canada, January 7, 1872, and whose father, Robert Roberts, was also born there and came to the United States in 1887. Mr. Roberts located in Butteville, Ore., and engaged in farming, and his death occurred on the day that President McKinley was shot, at the age of seventy years. William Marvin Finzer, who was born July 23, 1900, is the only child of the general and his wife, and is a bright and interesting lad. General Finzer is well known fraternally, being a member of Woodburn Lodge No. 106, A. F. & A. M.; Woodburn Lodge, R. A. M.; Hermès Lodge No. 56, K. P., of Aurora; Woodburn Lodge No. 37, A. O. U. W., and French Prairie Camp No. 47, W. O. W., in the three orders last named having passed all the chairs.

MARSHALL SCRAFFORD. As a prominent and successful agriculturist of Suver, and as a pioneer, and the son of a pioneer of Polk county, Marshall Scrafford is well worthy of representation in this biographical volume. He was born in Delavan, Walworth county, Wis., June 5, 1845, a son of John J. Scrafford, coming of German ancestry. His paternal grandfather, Adam Scrafford, was born in Schoharie county, N. Y., and there spent the greater part of his life.

Born on the ancestral homestead, in Schoharie county, N. Y., August 3, 1817, John J. Scrafford lived there until after his marriage, and then, in 1843, emigrated with his family to Wisconsin. Locating in Walworth county, he took up land near Delavan, and was there engaged in general farming for many years. Removing to Cedar county, Iowa, in 1861, he there continued his independent occupation for about five years, when he again followed the tide of emigration westward. Joining Captain Bean's company, he crossed the plains with horse-teams, there being thirty armed men in the train. Arriving in Benton county, Ore., in the fall of 1866, he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land on Soap creek, and there improved a farm, on which he resided until after the death of his wife. Removing then to Corvallis, he still makes his home in that city. He married, in New York state, Martha Richardson, who was born in Schoharie county, February 22, 1819, and died, in Benton county, Ore., January 2, 1873. Her father, James Richardson, a farmer by occupation, was born in the Empire state, of Irish ancestry. He was a private in the war of 1812, and took part in the engagement at Sackett's Harbor. Seven children were born of the union of John J. and Martha (Richardson) Scrafford, four of whom are living, namely: James B., of Walla Walla, Wash.; Marshall, the subject of this sketch; Mary, wife of Ira A. Miller, of Newport, Ore.; and E. A., wife of J. K. Morrison, of Monmouth, Ore.

Obtaining his first knowledge of books in the district schools of his native state, Marshall Scrafford subsequently attended a public school in Iowa, and for seven months was a student at Cornell College, in Mount Vernon, Iowa. Leaving that institution, he enlisted, December 30, 1863, in Company D, Twenty-second Wisconsin Infantry, in the same company to which his brother, James B. Scrafford, belonged, being a sergeant. Joining his regiment at Murfreesboro, Tenn., he spent the winter in camp at Nashville, and in the spring of 1864 joined Sherman in his memorable march to the sea. Arriving in Savannah, Ga., he started with his comrades through the Carolinas in pursuit of General Johnston, whom they captured at Raleigh, N. C. Being mustered out of service, at Louisville, Ky., July 8, 1865, with the rank of corporal, Mr. Scrafford proceeded with his regiment to Madison, Wis., and a short time later returned to the home of his parents. Entering the academy at Tipton, Iowa, he continued his studies there until the spring of 1866, when he came with his parents to Oregon. While on the way the company to which he belonged was frequently troubled by men who attempted to steal their horses and cattle, and on one occasion Mr. Scrafford distinguished himself by shooting one of three horse thieves that were disguised as Indians.

Arriving in Benton county, Mr. Scrafford spent the first winter there, in 1867 locating in Polk county, where he taught school in District Twenty-eight, for a term of five months. He subsequently taught three months in Benton county, then returned to Polk county, and the following year married, and set up house-keeping on a farm near the Luckianute, where he resided two years. The following year he spent in eastern Oregon. Afterwards buying one hundred acres of land near Buena Vista, Polk county, he carried on general farming until 1881, when he was completely washed out by the overflowing of the Willamette. The next eleven years he was employed in farming on the Luckianute, and then assumed possession of his present fine ranch, which contains two hundred and ten acres of land, one hundred and twenty-eight acres of it being adapted to the raising of grain and fruits, while the remainder is used for grazing purposes. He carries on general farming, devoting eleven acres of his land to hops, and in his various undertakings is meeting with well merited success.

In 1868, on the farm which he now occupies, Mr. Scrafford married Elizabeth Hiltibrand, who was born in Polk county, Ore., October 11, 1848. Her father, Paul Hiltibrand, born near Maysville, Ky., crossed the plains in 1845, and located on the present homestead of Mr. Scrafford, and was here engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, in 1896. Mr. and Mrs. Scrafford have one child, Kirk Scrafford, who was born April 30, 1878, and is now living with his parents, assisting in the management of the ranch. Politically Mr. Scrafford is a strong Republican, and has never shirked the responsibilities of public office. He has served as road supervisor, and for twenty-eight years served as school clerk. In 1898 he was elected representative to the state legislature. The court house being burned at that time, and all of the ballots destroyed, his election could not be contested, and the legislature decided that his election was legal. Fraternally Mr. Scrafford is a member and a trustee of Gibson Post, No. 64, G. A. R., of Independence.

MARSHALL N. SUVER. The youngest of the family of children in the home of Joseph W. Suver was Marshall N. Suver, who is now a prominent farmer in Polk county, Ore., in the neighborhood of the town of Suver, which was named in honor of the father, who was a pioneer of 1844. In the effort to establish for himself a position of comparative financial importance the elder Mr. Suver traversed the entire continent, from Virginia, where he was born, April 14, 1814, to the Pacific slope, and from the time of his emigration to his death, August 26, 1890, he was one of the notably successful men in this part of the state.

On his arrival in Oregon Joseph W. Suver took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres located in Polk county, and after two trips made to California he settled down on this farm, having married, in 1850, Delilah Pyburn, a native of Missouri, and the daughter of Amos Pyburn, who brought his family across the plains in the same train with Mr. Suver. Mr. Pyburn located on Soap creek, near the claim selected by Mr. Suver. For about fifty-six years Mr. Suver made this claim his home, engaging in general farming and stock-raising, until his death. The mother also died on the home place, the date of her death being March, 1860. For a complete account of the lives of these pioneers refer to the sketch of Green B. Suver, appearing on another page of this work.

Marshall N. Suver was born five miles south of Monmouth, Polk county, Ore., April 1, 1858, and was reared upon his father's farm. His education was received in the common school in the vicinity of his home, though his attendance was more or less limited on account of the various obstacles which impeded the acquisition of knowledge in the early days. At sixteen he left school, but, more fortunate than many, he was well informed through instruction given by his father, outside of school sessions. He at once began work upon his father's farm, with whom he remained until the land was divided, about one thousand acres being given to the heirs at the death of the old pioneer. Mr. Suver now has four hundred acres, two hundred and fifty of which is tillable, and upon this he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

The marriage of Mr. Suver occurred June, 1884, and united him with Hettie Patterson, the daughter of John H. Patterson, who crossed the plains in an early day, and now makes his home in Jefferson, Marion county. Two children were born of the union, Fred and Nora, both of whom are at home. Politically Mr. Suver follows the convictions of his father, and adheres to the principles of the Democratic party, and through this influence has served as school director for a number of years.

WILLIAM H. MURPHEY. One of the many worthy citizens and capable and industrious agriculturists of Polk county is William H. Murphey, who is engaged in his independent vocation on one of the finest and most desirable homesteads near the town of Buena Vista. A native of Oregon, he was born May 13, 1855, in Marion county, a son of William Murphey. His grandfather, Charles Murphey, was born, of Irish ancestors, in Salem county, N. J., and there spent his entire life, dying in 1824, on his farm. His wife, whose maiden name was Margaret McCasson, was a life-long resident of Salem county, N. J., her birth occurring December 1, 1779, and her death in 1835. She bore her husband five children, four sons and one daughter, and of these one child only, William, is living.

Born in Salem county, N. J., June 28, 1818, William Murphey was left fatherless when six years of age. When a boy of twelve years he went with his widowed mother and her family to Wilmington, Del., where all of the children began working in the factories. Three years later the entire family removed to Philadelphia, and the boys sought employment as they could find it in order to help support their mother and sister, William Murphey securing work in a brickyard. Returning to New Jersey in 1832, the boys found employment as farm laborers, and the family remained together until the death of the mother, in 1835, but after that event the children became separated. Going to Ohio in 1838 William Murphey worked in various sections of the state, including Warren and Green counties. Migrating from there to Illinois, he located near Quincy, where he rented land for a few years, and when the Black Hawk purchase was thrown open, went there. Going thence to Eddyville, Iowa, he remained there engaged in agricultural pursuits until the spring of 1847. Starting then for Oregon, he bought an outfit, crossed the river at St. Joseph, Mo., and after a long and wearisome journey of six months arrived in Marion county, Ore., September 20, 1847. Locating in Lane county, he remained there until 1849, when he joined the gold-seekers in California, where he was successfully engaged in mining on the American river for about six months. Returning to Oregon in the fall of 1849, he purchased a claim on Howell's Prairie, Marion county, and in the spring again took up mining in California, remaining in Trinity county until the next fall. Then assuming possession of his farm of three hundred and twenty acres, situated in Howell, about seven miles from Salem, he afterwards devoted his entire time and attention to the care of his homestead property, developing and improving a valuable and productive ranch.

In 1852 William Murphey married Elvira Ann Griffith, who was born in Pike county, Mo., February 27, 1829, and died July 9, 1869, in Marion county, Ore., leaving five children: W. H., Margaret Ann, Charles, Walter W., and Edward Grant. Her father, John W. Griffith, came to Oregon from Missouri in 1852, and bought a claim near Buena Vista, where he spent the remainder of his life. In 1880 Mr. Murphey married for his second wife Mrs. Jane (Nelson) Ward. She bore him one child, Mary Murphey.

One of a family of five children, four boys and one girl, William H. Murphey grew to man's estate beneath the parental roof-tree, receiving his education in the pioneer school-house on Howell Prairie. Becoming familiar with the various branches of agriculture under the wise instruction of his father, he chose farming as his life occupation, after his marriage settling on a ranch in the Silverton hills. Subsequently purchasing land near the old home farm, in Howell, he resided there until 1883, when, in March, he disposed of that property, and bought his present farm near Buena Vista. His ranch contains two hundred acres, mostly farming land, which he cultivates with most satisfactory results, in addition to general farming raising a good deal of stock.

On January 14, 1879, Mr. Murphey married, on Howell Prairie, Elmira Kays, who was born in that place, October 29, 1859. Her father, James Kays, born in Illinois, October 30, 1832, came to Oregon in 1852, and settled first in Howell Prairie, but is now living in Oregon City. He married Sarah Headrick, who was born in Pike county, Mo., May 29, 1840, and died in Oregon, January 17, 1889. Mr. and Mrs. Murphey have one child, William Lester Murphey. Mr. Murphey is a Republican in politics, and fraternally is a member of Homer Lodge No. 5, K. of P., of Independence, and of the Buena Vista Lodge, W. O. W., in which he has passed all the chairs.

JOHNSON E. RICHTER. Not always is it years that make the man, nor yet years that make the opportunity. Some very young men have attained a splendid manhood, becoming a power in their community, lending the strength of their character and the command of their intellect for the upbuilding of that part of the world with which they are in touch. To such men, old or young—if old, a product of the times that laid the foundation of a country; if young, their age making them but the beginning of a bulwark of defense and honor for a country where men are counted man by man, rather than in the masses—the western lands now owe the debt that the east once owed its pioneers, and which the latter is paying by passing on some of her brightest lights and noblest blood to transmit their virtues through generations to come to the development of the northwest.

Comparatively early in the history of our eastern states, among the emigrants from European shores, came the grandfather of J. E. Richter, John Christian Richter, born in Dresden, Germany, who took up his home near Staunton, Va., where he remained for some time, working at the trade learned in the Fatherland, that of a millwright and miller. In the Virginia home his son, Christian Richter, was born in 1826, and in 1836 the family emigrated to Carroll county, Ind., where the elder man continued in the prosecution of his trade, training his son in a similar one, that of a carpenter and builder. In 1871 Christian Richter brought his young family across the continent, which, though not the perilous journey that it had once been, still meant the separation from friends and kindred associations, the breaking of ties formed in the happy years spent in the pastoral scenes of the well tilled middle west, to a country comparatively new, with hills to traverse and forests to thread before their eyes could be gladdened by the sight of the broad lands glowing with the harvest yields. After eight years spent in residence near Perrydale, Ore., where Mr. Richter engaged in farming, the family removed to Yamhill county, purchasing a farm near Sheridan, where he remained up to the time of his death, which occurred in October of the year 1891, having been a resident of Oregon for twenty years. The wife who shared this western home was, in maidenhood, Catherine Earnist, born in Indiana, the daughter of Johnson Earnist, the latter a native of Ohio, born near Cincinnati. He was a tanner by trade, and ran a tannery in Carroll county, Ind. The three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Richter were: Augusta, who died in Yamhill county in 1887; Ella, now the wife of Dan P. Stauffer, of Dallas, and Johnson E.

J. E. Richter was born near Camden, Carroll county, Ind., February 17, 1864, and was seven years old at the time of the removal of the family to Oregon. He attended the public schools in the vicinity of his home during the winter season, the summers being spent on his father's farm. When he attained manhood he continued with his parents, working the home farm, and after the death of his father, assuming entire control, managing affairs with an efficiency inherited from his German ancestry. He now owns one hundred and thirty acres of land adjoining Sheridan, which is rented at present, while he makes his home in Dallas, to which he removed in 1897. In 1900 he built the comfortable residence now occupied by himself and mother. Mr. Richter is quite a prominent man in his fraternal associations, having been a member of Sheridan Lodge No. 87, I. O. O. F., since 1887, of which he is past noble grand. He is also a member of Rebekah Lodge at Dallas, and in his political affiliations supports the Democratic party.

GREEN B. SUVER. The name which appears at the beginning of this sketch is well known in Polk county, Ore., being that of one of the earliest settlers of Oregon, and the first man to hold a donation claim on the banks of the Luckiamute. Of the land that came into the possession of Joseph W. Suver, father of Green B. Suver, have been made several fine farms, adding greatly to the commercial value of property in the neighborhood, and to the prestige of the pioneer who hewed his pathway through the forest and first upturned the soil.

Joseph W. Suver was born in Virginia, April 14, 1814, the son of John Suver, who was a near descendant of a French ancestor, and whose wife was of German descent. From his farming interests in Pennsylvania, where he was born, John Suver removed to Virginia, and when Joseph W. was a young lad the family settled in Ohio, where his father died in 1844. In 1830 Joseph W. Suver left Ohio and passed the next few years in the state of Illinois, Iowa and Missouri. When only a boy he herded cattle on the plains of Illinois and other states, and afterward bought and sold cattle. In 1844 he decided to take the western trip, since that promised more for him than farming in the middle west could ever do. On arriving in Oregon Mr. Suver left the train and coming on to Luckiamute he settled upon the claim which is now in the possession of his heirs, trading for the same a pair of blankets which secured the land from the Indian owner. With his ox-team and a few head of cattle, which he had brought safely through the six months' journey across the plains, Mr. Suver equipped his farm in the fall of 1849, having left the other emigrants on Tualatin plains. Before deciding to remain in Oregon, however, he had made a trip to California, going overland, where he engaged in mining, and meeting with success he returned to Oregon in the fall of the same year, 1847, and in 1848 took back with him a large party. On account of sickness he did not then engage in mining and in the fall he returned to Oregon and settled upon his farm of six hundred and forty acres. Here he continued to live for many years, being principally occupied in stock-raising, taking cattle into Idaho, Montana and the eastern states, and meeting with success in every line. He married in 1850 Delilah Pyburn, a native of Missouri, daughter of Amos Pyburn, who crossed the plains in 1847. Delilah Pyburn was born in 1837, and she died in February, 1860, on the home place. They had five children, four of whom are now living, and in order of birth are as follows: Caroline, the wife of William M. Fuqua, of Parker; Lena, the wife of John T. James, located near Suver; Green B., of this review; and Marshall N. Politically, Mr. Suver has been a Democrat all his life. At the time of his death, August 26, 1890, he was making his home with Green B. Suver, having suffered a stroke of paralysis, and had been tenderly cared for for ten years by his son's family.

The birth of Green B. Suver occurred in Polk county, Ore., five miles south of Monmouth, September 1, 1856, and he received his education in the common schools in the vicinity of his home, though his time of attendance was exceedingly limited, being in all about six months. When he left school he engaged with his father on the farm, and has ever since been interested in farming and stock-raising. He now has six hundred and thirteen acres of land, all a part of the original claim taken in '49, and the greater number of acres is devoted to general farming, being tillable land.

Mr. Suver was married March 16, 1898, to Grace Pyburn, a daughter of Edward Pyburn, who crossed the plains in 1853, and now lives in Benton county, near Rand's station. They have one child, whose name is Joseph W., in affectionate remembrance of the sturdy old pioneer, who once lived here. In his political convictions Mr. Suver prefers to remain independent, casting his vote regardless of party restrictions. Before the station of Suver was built the elder Mr. Suver bought the section of land owned by George Pyburn, and when the railroad was put through in December, 1879, the place was named in honor of the owner, and quite a little town has grown up on the site.

JOHN O. FRY. An enumeration of the native sons of Linn county, who are profiting by the worthy example of their sires, and maintaining an excellent agricultural standard, would be incomplete without due mention of John O. Fry, who was born on the farm of his pioneer father, Olney Fry, November 2, 1859. In his youth Mr. Fry worked hard on the home farm, but at the same time was not unmindful of the many advantages of a good education, which he earnestly strove to acquire at the public schools. Later he attended Albany College for a year, and the impetus thus given has remained with him unceasingly and inspired him to further research along general lines.

At the age of twenty-one Mr. Fry left home and engaged in farming on his own responsibility, achieving considerable success by virtue of well-directed industry and good management. March 9, 1897, he married Gertrude Holloway, and to their family has been added a daughter, Zelma M. In 1902 Mr. Fry came to his present farm, which comprises one hundred and ninety acres, devoted to general farming, cattle and sheep-raising and dairying. In addition to the home farm he has one hundred and ninety-six acres, well improved, located a short distance from the home place, besides eighty-seven acres of the old homestead, which was given him by his father about one year ago. He has progressive and practical ideas of farming, and a thorough knowledge of stock. Since casting his first presidential vote for a Democratic candidate he has adhered to the principles of Democracy, although, in local matters, he believes that character and ability, rather than party, should count. He is fraternally connected with the Grange No. 10, of Grand Prairie, in which organization he is popular and well liked.

JOHN D. PARSONS. Five miles east of Albany is to be seen one of the finest and best-managed farms of Linn county, and here, in addition to carrying on general farming and dairying, Mr. Parsons conducts an orchard of three thousand trees, divided among prunes, apples and pears. An air of thrift pervades the place, and it is an easy matter to discern the owner to be a man of intelligence, and one who thoroughly understands the work which he has in hand.

A native of England, Mr. Parsons was born in Devonshire, June 24, 1840, and, until eighteen years of age, lived under English skies. It was at the latter age that he severed home ties and boarded a vessel which, in due season, landed him in Ontario, Canada. For a time he was in the employ of his brother, who was conducting a mercantile establishment twenty-five miles from New London. In 1859, by way of the Isthmus, he went to California, and in Nevada county was engaged in mining for the following year and a half. By this time he was satisfied that the returns for his labor were not as remunerative as his efforts would warrant, and decided to embark in something that would secure to him a more regular income. In freighting supplies to the mines he received satisfactory returns, and after continuing this line of endeavor for one summer, he went to the Caribou country, in 1862, remaining there one season. From the latter place he was attracted to the Puget Sound country, and for two years was engaged in lumbering, meeting with good success in his undertakings.

From Washington Mr. Parsons returned to Canada, remaining there for a short time, and upon his return to Oregon, purchased eighty acres of land, which he improved, and upon which he resided for one year. It was at this point in his career that good fortune led him to select his present farm, which comprises two hundred and twenty-two acres of as fine land as is to be found in the county. He has not made his home here continuously since, however, for, in 1873, he removed to a farm on Oak creek, and for the ten years following improved a farm there. From the latter year until the present time he has made his home upon the farm where he is now residing, and where he expects to round out his life.

Mr. Parsons was united in marriage with Miss Matilda Payne, the daughter of Martin Payne, who, in 1852, came to Oregon and took up the donation claim upon which Mr. Parsons now resides. All matters which tend to up-build his community have the hearty support and co-operation of Mr. Parsons. He is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

JUDGE JOHN H. SCOTT, now serving as county judge of Marion county, and residing in Salem, was born near Mount Angel, Marion county, September 10, 1865. His father, Alexander D. Scott, was a native of Canandaigua, N. Y., and the grandparents were natives of Scotland, from which country they crossed the Atlantic to the United States, settling in New York. When seven years of age, however, Alexander D. Scott was left an orphan. He was reared upon a farm, and about 1852 the gold excitement drew him to the Pacific coast. He came to Oregon, making his way across the plains, and thence proceeded to the gold mines of California. In 1855, however, he returned to Oregon and was married in Marion county to Mrs. Ellen (Morris) Miller, a native of Missouri, who came with her mother, two brothers and two sisters, to the northwest. They, too, made the overland journey and arrived in Marion county in 1853, settling near what is now Mount Angel. Mrs. Scott's first husband was Bluford Miller, who came here in pioneer days and followed farming. When a young man he served as captain in the First Oregon Regiment in the Yakima Indian war of 1855-56, and in the struggle he was wounded. He then returned to his home, and as typhoid fever set in, this disease, together with his wound, caused his death. He left one child, Bluford Miller, who died at the age of seven years. At the time of their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Scott settled near Mount Angel upon a farm where he carried on agricultural pursuits until July, 1876, when he was accidentally killed by a runaway team. His widow continued to reside upon the old farm, and there reared her family until 1891, when she located in Salem, where her death occurred in 1895. From early girlhood she had been a devoted member of the Christian Church, and to her family she was a most loyal and tender mother. She had nine children: Charles, of Montana; William H., of Marion county; Lewis H., of Wasco county; John H., of this review; Mary E., of Salem; Clara G., who is a teacher in the same city; Elmer H. and Alexander D., who reside in eastern Oregon, and Alwilda, who died in Salem.

In the county of his nativity and of his present residence Judge Scott was reared, remaining upon the home farm until twenty years of age. In the meantime he had acquired a good education in the district schools, and in the Silverton High School. He then entered Willamette University, where he remained as a student for a year. Through the succeeding year he taught school and then spent another year as a student in the university, followed by two more years of teaching. In 1892 he removed to Portland, where he engaged in the real estate business, and while there he became interested in law and began the study of the profession. Entering the Portland Law School he completed a year in that institution, and was then called to Salem on account of his mother's death. Here he continued his studies, and in 1895 was admitted to the bar. It was in the fall of that year that he became a senior in the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he was graduated in 1896 with the degree of Bachelor of Law. He then returned to Oregon, making the trip on his bicycle through Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Wyoming. He left Michigan on the 30th of June and was four months upon the road, during which time he covered about five thousand miles. The trip was a very enjoyable one and gave him an excellent opportunity of seeing the country.

Upon his return Judge Scott began the practice of law in Salem, and soon secured a good clientele of a distinctively representative character. His ability was soon recognized, and in June, 1900, he was nominated for the position of county judge on the Republican ticket, being elected by a good majority. In July of the same year he entered upon the duties of the office for a four-years' term, and upon the bench his course has been in harmony with his record as a man and a lawyer, characterized by unwavering fidelity to duty. He has a comprehensive knowledge of the principles of jurisprudence, weighs carefully any point of evidence and the law bearing upon it, and in his decisions is strictly fair and impartial, neither fear nor favor swerving him in the slightest degree from the course of an upright jurist. He is a member of the county commissioners' court, and, aside from his legal duties, is interested in lands, and finds recreation, pleasure and profit in farming and horticulture. He has an orchard near Marion and makes a specialty of the production of prunes.

December 18, 1901, in Salem, occurred the marriage of Judge Scott and Miss Maude Alice Martin, who was born in this city, a daughter of James Martin, a pioneer settler of Salem and one of the superintendents of the Salem city waterworks. The judge is past chancellor in the Knights of Pythias fraternity, a member of the Fraternal Union and the Native Sons of the Golden West. He is also identified with the Christian Church, and is now serving as a member and secretary of its board of deacons. In politics he is a Republican, and while deeply interested in the success of his party, he has allowed political labor in no way to interfere with the faithful and impartial performance of his judicial duties.

SAMUEL NENIAN STEELE. Occupying a position of influence and prominence among the foremost citizens of Albany, Samuel N. Steele is held in high regard as a man of integrity and ability, and is well known throughout this section of the county as an extensive and successful dealer in real estate. Coming here in 1889, he has since identified himself with the best interests of the community, and has always been the encourager and supporter of everything calculated to advance the intellectual, moral and social welfare of the people. A son of the late Samuel Steele, he was born and bred in Montgomery county, Ind., coming from sound old Revolutionary stock, both of his great grandfathers, Andrew Evans and Col. Samuel Newell, having fought in the Revolutionary war, both being in the thickest of the fight at King's Mountain. His paternal grandfather, James A. Steele, was a Kentuckian by birth, but settled as a farmer in Indiana, where all of his children were born.

Samuel Steele, a life-long resident of Indiana, was engaged in agricultural pursuits, including stock-raising, until his death, which occurred in August, 1861. He was for forty-seven years a member of the Odd Fellows order, in which he took an active interest. He married Harriet Evans, a native of Indiana. Her father, Jesse Evans, who removed from Kentucky to Indiana at an early day, was a soldier in the war of 1812. She was born in March, 1823, and lived in Indiana several years after the death of her husband. Removing, in 1868, to Iola, Allen county, Kans., she resided there until 1891, when she came to Albany to make her home with her son, Samuel N. Steele, with whom she now resides. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church, with which she has been identified for many years. Of her family of five sons and three daughters, five children are still living, namely: Theodore C., a talented artist, now residing in Indianapolis, Ind., pursued his art studies in Munich, Germany, for five years; Charles A., of Wichita, Kans., is a successful farmer and merchant; William J. is a resident of Jefferson, Ore.; Altice Howe is engaged in mining in Jacksonville, Ore., and Samuel N.

Removing from his Indiana home to Iola, Kans., with his mother, in 1868, Samuel N. Steele there completed his early education, graduating from the Iola High School. He subsequently assisted in the management of the farm for awhile, and then went to Junction City, Kans., where he learned the trade of a harnessmaker, which he afterwards followed in Moran, Allen county, until 1886. Locating then in Burlington, Kans., he was there engaged in the abstract business three years. Coming then to Oregon, Mr. Steele was associated with the Jarvis Conklin Mortgage Trust Company, in Portland, for a year. Establishing himself in the real estate business at Albany in the spring of 1890, he has since resided here, and as head of the enterprising firm of S. N. Steele & Co., has been one of the largest real estate operators in this section of the state. He is the owner of farming and city property, including a fine orchard about four miles northeast of the city.

While living in Moran, Kans., Mr. Steele married Abbie M. Southard, who was born in West Salem, Wis., of New England ancestry, and of Revolutionary stock, her great-grandfather Southworth, as it was then spelled, having served in the Revolution. Her grandfather, Jonathan Southard, a native of New England, changed the family name from Southworth, as it was originally spelled, to its present form of Southard. Mrs. Steele's father, Newell Southard, was born and reared in Fairfax, Vt. Becoming a pioneer settler of Wisconsin, he engaged in business as a miller at La Crosse, then at West Salem, after which he lived for awhile in Logansport, Ind., where he was superintendent of a railway company. Returning to La Crosse, he resided there until 1890, then settled in Allen county, Kans., coming from there to Albany, where his death occurred, at the age of seventy-nine years. He married Wealthy Pierce, who was born in Vermont, the daughter of Helkiah Pierce, of that state, and the granddaughter of a soldier of the Continental army. She died in Indiana, leaving four children, namely: Mrs. W. A. Ross, of Pasadena, Cal.; Mrs. D. C. Wadsworth, of Tacoma, Wash.; Mrs. Frank G. Norton, of Massachusetts, and Mrs. Samuel N. Steele.

Mr. and Mrs. Steele are the parents of three children, namely: Horace Newell, Medora Wealthy, and Leighton Howe. In politics Mr. Steele is a sound Republican, and though not an office-seeker, takes a genuine interest in local and national affairs. He belongs to various fraternal and social organizations, including the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Alco Club. He is also a member of the Real Estate Exchange. For many years he was chorister in the Presbyterian Church, of which he is now ruling elder, and at the present time is serving his second term as one of the board of trustees of Albany College.

J. C. AVERY. History recounts the deeds and records the indebtedness of the state to J. C. Avery—one of the honored and prominent pioneers of the Willamette valley, whose efforts for the upbuilding of the state were of the most helpful character. Tales of heroism have been the theme of song and story throughout the ages, and there is no greater heroism shown than that of the men who, reared in comfortable homes, accustomed to all the privileges and conveniences of life, have come to the wild western districts and braved hardships untold. They have also been menaced by the danger of death at the hand of the treacherous Indian. Volumes have been written, yet the story of the pioneers has never been adequately told. They deserve all praise and honor, and the mighty states of the west, with their splendid improvements, enterprises and tokens of civilization, are monuments to their memory.

Corvallis owes its existence to the efforts and labors of J. C. Avery, who laid broad and deep the foundation for the present prosperity and progress of the city. Mr. Avery was a native of Pennsylvania, born in Luzerne county, June 9, 1817. His father, Cyrus Avery, was a native of Connecticut and removed to the Wyoming valley of the Keystone state, where he followed farming. He died at Tunkhannock, Pa. His son, J. C. Avery, was educated in the schools of Wilkesbarre, Pa., and when a young man removed to Stark county, Ill., where he engaged in surveying, and was also a real estate and loan agent. He was married March 13, 1841, near Wyoming, Pa., to Miss Martha Marsh, who was born in Kingston, Luzerne county, January 14, 1824, a daughter of Daniel C. Marsh, who was a native of Connecticut and removed to Kingston, where he engaged in teaching. He wedded Esther Pettebone, also a native of Connecticut, and in their early married life they removed to New York, and afterward to the Wyoming valley. Mrs. Marsh was a daughter of Oliver Pettebone, who was a pioneer of Pennsylvania, and lived there throughout the period of the Indian troubles. His brother was killed in the Wyoming massacre. Mr. Avery removed to Illinois in 1834, not long after the Black Hawk war, when the state was wild, unbroken prairie. There Mr. Avery carried on farming until 1845, when he made the long and hazardous journey across the plains to Oregon and secured a claim at the junction of the Willamette and Marys rivers. In 1846 he moved onto this and built a log cabin, thus establishing a home for his family. In the following year he was joined by his wife and children. They had traveled with a company commanded by Captain Sawyer, who had come with Mr. Avery to Oregon in 1845. Captain Sawyer then returned to Illinois for his family, and Mr. Avery arranged that his wife and children should travel with the captain's party when he again made the journey. It would have taken Mr. Avery eighteen months to go to Illinois and return with his family and he was afraid his claim might be forfeited in that time. Mrs. Avery had an outfit consisting of a five-yoke ox-team and a wagon filled with provisions. She also brought two milch cows and was exactly six months upon the way, being met in eastern Oregon by her husband, who then guided the party by way of the Barlow route over the Cascade mountains to his claim at Corvallis. They had started April 2, from Stark county, Ill., had crossed the Mississippi at Burlington, Iowa; the Missouri river at St. Joseph, and had proceeded up the Platte river to the Oregon trail. After crossing the Missouri the train numbered eighty wagons, but from Independence Rock only six wagons came on to Benton county, arriving here on October 2, 1847.

In the fall of 1848, following the discovery of gold, Mr. Avery went to California, where he engaged in mining. He spent the succeeding winter at home, but in the spring of 1849 returned to the mines, where he remained until the autumn of that year, making a few thousand dollars. He then returned, bringing with him a stock of general merchandise which he had purchased in San Francisco and shipped to Portland, thence up the Willamette to where Corvallis now stands. This was the first store of the place. The following year Mr. Avery laid out the town and called it Marysville, but because of there being a town in California of the same name some confusion was occasioned and the Oregon town changed its name to Corvallis—the core or center of the valley. He was instrumental in securing the establishment of the postoffice and served as the first postmaster. He was also the general postal agent for Oregon and Washington.

Mr. Avery continued to engage in merchandising at Corvallis until within four or five years of his death. He rented his land and laid out additions to the town, which have become the principal part of the city. He also built several stores and was always active in the improvement of the city which he founded and which owes much of its early progress to his practical efforts. He was greatly interested in the building of the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad, but died before its completion. He was chosen, together with J. F. Miller and B. F. Doughet, to make the selection of a site for the Oregon Agricultural College, and their choice fell largely upon the broad meadows of Lake county, the best lands then in the state open for selection. He took a very active part in the building up of the college, and his efforts were not without result.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Avery were born eight children, of whom six are living, Charles and James C. having died in Corvallis. The others are Punderson, a prominent citizen here; Napoleon; George; Mrs. Florence Jones; Mrs. Frances Helm; and Gertrude, the wife of J. B. Irvine.

Mr. Avery was a Master Mason and his life was in harmony with the beneficent spirit of the craft. In politics he was always a Democrat, and he was twice elected to represent his district in the state legislature, where he served with ability, and during that time he had the name of Marysville changed to Corvallis. He figured prominently in the politics of the county for a quarter of a century, and he had many warm and true friends and few enemies. He died June 16, 1876, but though a quarter of a century has since come and gone he is yet remembered by many who knew him and his memory will ever be revered as the founder of Corvallis. He was a man of noble and generous impulses and a warm heart, noted for his deeds of charity, his acts of kindness and hospitality so freely extended to the suffering emigrants in an early day. Mrs. Avery still survives her husband and lives at the old home. She is a member of the Baptist Church and is one of the brave pioneer women who shared with the husbands and fathers in the hardships and trials incident to the settlement of the northwest.

DANIEL H. BODINE. The farm upon which Daniel H. Bodine now makes his home and upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising is located four miles east of Albany, Linn county, Ore., and is the old donation claim of Stephen D. Haley, which his father, Daniel H., Sr., purchased when he came to the northwest as a pioneer of 1854. The father was born in Indiana, and was there reared to manhood, where he learned the trade of a carpenter. Subsequently he joined the tide of emigration which was setting toward the west, crossing the plains in company with Nelson Wright. On his arrival here he bought of Stephen D. Haley the right to a claim of one hundred and sixty acres of land in the location above mentioned, and one hundred and eight acres of school lands. Soon after his arrival in Oregon he was united in marriage with Margaret Foster. His death occurred upon this farm, September 9, 1869, when he was forty-seven years old. His wife survived him until 1899, dying then at the age of seventy-two years on the home farm. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bodine were members of the United Presbyterian Church of Albany, in which he had always been very active, at the time of his death officiating as elder. Of the six children born to these worthy pioneers, Albert A. resides near Albany; Oscar T. is deceased; Matilda I., a teacher, makes her home with her brother, D. H., on the home place; Samuel S. is also near Albany; Daniel H., of this review, is on the home place, and James A. is in San Francisco, Cal.

The birth of Daniel H. Bodine occurred upon his father's farm in Linn county, Ore., December 21, 1865, and with the exception of a few years passed in attendance of various schools he has always lived here. His education was received in the common school in the vicinity of his home and the Oregon Agricultural College of Corvallis, after the completion of which he assumed charge of the home farm, being then but nineteen years of age. He has since remained in the work there, industry, perseverance and intelligence aiding him to make a success along agricultural lines. He has become a man of influence in his locality, and has served his party as school clerk for four years. In politics he is a Republican. In fraternal orders he also occupies a prominent position as member of the Grand Prairie Grange, No. 10, serving in 1893 and again in 1898, as master. He is also a member of Corinthian Lodge, No. 17, A. F. & A. M., of Albany, in which he has passed all the chairs.

EDWARD BELL. Prominent among the native sons of Polk county is Edward Bell, who was born on the paternal ranch near Bethel, January 4, 1860, and is now one of four heirs to a farm of four hundred acres left by his father, George C., the founder of the family in Oregon, who was born in Morgan county, Ohio, May 20, 1825, and in his youth learned the carpenter's trade. March 30, 1851, he was united in marriage with Mary A. Delong, born in Morgan county, Ohio, December 28, 1828, and the day after the wedding started on the long and perilous journey across the plains. This strange way of spending the honeymoon seems to have been adopted by many in the early days, and the courage involved in the undertaking can hardly be appreciated by united hearts who today have their way paved with every comfort. Nothing out of the ordinary befell the young people during their four months' travel with ox-teams, and after arriving in Oregon, they spent the first winter in the city of Portland. Having ascertained the whereabouts of several desirable farming properties, Mr. Bell investigated their respective merits, and in the spring of 1852 located on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Bethel, to which he later added eighty acres. There were practically no improvements on the place, and in time he substituted a more pretentious modern residence for the little log house. About this time his carpenter's trade proved useful, for the settlers were arriving in the neighborhood, and he secured the building of many of their homes. He was a good workman and his work constantly became more remunerative, so that between farming and his trade he managed to get along better than the majority of the settlers of that time. He made a specialty of fine stock, and as time went on inaugurated many changes on his place, making of it a valuable and desirable farm. He was a Republican in political preferment, and held many of the minor local offices in his neighborhood, including that of justice of the peace and school trustee. He was a member of the Grange, and of the Baptist Church. Mr. Bell met a tragic death August 7, 1893, being run over by a train while crossing the railroad track between McCoy and Amity. He was survived by his wife until June 19, 1902.

The only son and fourth of the six children born to his parents, Edward Bell was educated in the public schools and at Bethel Academy, from which institution he was duly graduated in the class of 1878. Thereafter he engaged in farming with his father, and in 1882 went into Gilliam county, eastern Oregon, and engaged in sheep-raising. He was fairly successful in this line of activity, and upon returning to Polk county in 1893, came to McCoy and has since made this his home. He at present rents the farm of four hundred acres, and devotes himself to managing the farm in Lincoln county. Mr. Bell is independent in politics, but has never been active in local undertakings connected with any party. He is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World of Salem; the Masons of Rickreall, and the Grange of Oak Grove. He is one of four survivors in his father's family, his sisters being Mrs. Julia Jones, of Portland; Mrs. Agnes Bean, of Bethel, and Mrs. Olive Raddeway, of Oregon City. Public-spirited and enterprising, Mr. Bell commands the esteem and consideration of the thoughtful and appreciative community in which he lives, and which numbers him among its successful and substantial land owners.

ALBERT CAMPBELL was born August 29, 1862, the son of William and Margaret (Simpson) Campbell, the father being of Scotch descent. Mrs. Campbell's father, Robert Simpson, emigrated from Scotland and took up his residence in the northern part of Canada where she was born.

At a youthful age Albert left Port Huron, Mich., where he was born, and went to West-branch, Ogemaw county, Mich., where he worked in the lumbering camps in the winter and at the carpenter trade in the summer. In 1884 he came to Oregon, stopping at Dallas, where he remained for a short time, taking up ranching for his employment the first year, following that up with a year of various kinds of work and in 1886 going into the employ of Riley & Coad, contractors and millmen. After two years of building in the city he went into the planing-mill, continuing at this until 1890, when he commenced contracting and building on his own account, at which business he has remained since. There is a certain satisfaction to Mr. Campbell in the fact that he has contributed largely to the general appearance of the little city of Dallas in the erection of some of the finest buildings, of which the town can boast, and also the most useful, having just finished the round-house of the Salem, Falls City and Western Railroad, from King's Valley to a distance seven miles below Salem. He enjoys an enviable reputation, and from his humble beginning he has advanced to his present success by integrity and constant application to his work.

E. C. KIRKPATRICK, one of the prominent and influential men of Dallas, a Mason of high degree, and one of the largest and most successful hop-growers in Polk county, was born in Camp Point, Adams county, Ill., February 24, 1867. His family was established in the middle west by the paternal grandfather, David, who came from Scotland with his parents when a boy, settling first in Tennessee and afterward in McDonough county, Ill., near Table Grove.

Dr. J. E. Kirkpatrick, the father of E. C., was born on his father's farm near Knoxville, Tenn. At an early age an appreciation of medicine and surgery influenced him to strain every nerve to acquire the best possible training in this direction, and eventually he graduated from Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York City. His early practice was in Quincy, Ill., and Camp Point, the same county, and in 1877 he located in Scio, Linn county, Ore., where he practiced for six years. After coming to Dallas in 1883 he became well known in the surrounding country, and successfully ministered to the physical maladies of a large and appreciative patronage. For two terms he served as county coroner, and held other offices of a local nature. Taking with him the good will of all with whom he had to do in Dallas and vicinity Dr. Kirkpatrick retired from practice in Los Angeles, Cal., in 1898, and will doubtless spend the remainder of his life in the restful and beautiful city of the angels. In early manhood he married Mary Griggsby, who was born in Illinois, a daughter of Benjamin Griggsby, who was born in Pennsylvania, and early removed to near Quincy, Ill., where he conducted a distillery for many years.

The second of the eight living children in his father's family, and the only one on the coast, save Mrs. G. M. Hyland, of Portland, E. C. Kirkpatrick was ten years of age when his father brought him to Oregon, and he at once began to attend school at Scio, Linn county. In 1884 he entered La Creole Academy, remaining there until undertaking an apprenticeship at the printer's trade. For a year he worked on the Polk County Itemizer, and for the following year on the Salem States- man, under General W. H. Odell and W. H. Byers, after which he became foreman on the Benton Leader. In 1890 he returned to Dallas to engage in hop-growing, and the first year of this experiment set out five acres of hops one-half mile from Dallas. So successful was the yield that the next year he increased his acreage to forty-five, an average maintained up to the present time. In 1894 Mr. Kirkpatrick formed a partnership with Mr. Williams, the firm now operating under the name of Kirkpatrick & Williams. The firm now has about one hundred and sixty-four acres under cultivation, divided into fifteen and fifty-acre yards, located six miles from Dallas. They are also engaged in buying and selling hops throughout the county, and in 1902 they led the market, paid the highest prices and bought in all four thousand bales, the lowest price paid being twenty-one cents.

In political affiliation Mr. Kirkpatrick is a Republican, and is active in local and state undertakings. He is fraternally one of the best known men in the county, being especially prominent as a Mason, being the present master of Jennings Lodge, No. 9, A. F. & A. M.; a member of Ainsworth Chapter, No. 17, R. A. M., Oregon Consistory No. 1, of the Scottish Rite, and the Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. Also he is a member of the Woodmen of the World, and has attended every convention since the local organization, and served as chairman of the district convention. He is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In Dallas, Mr. Kirkpatrick married Mary V., youngest daughter of Henry Hagood, the latter born in Henry county, Va., and became one of the pioneers of Oregon. Mr. Kirkpatrick is variously interested in city and county affairs aside from the hop industry and has dealt largely in real estate. He is a progressive factor in the community, and is possessed of resource and business ability, without which little can be accomplished in the northwest.

TIMOTHY DARIUS ALLEN. On the farm near Silverton, adjoining the one where he now lives, T. D. Allen was born, February 21, 1854, a representative of one of the pioneer families of 1852. His father, Henry Allen, one of the self-made men who have contributed to the upbuilding of this part of the state, was born in Tennessee, in December, 1827, and when a small boy removed with his parents to Illinois. He was reared on a farm, and was an industrious, ambitious lad, who kept his eyes and ears open, and impatiently awaited an opportunity to better his condition. He managed to save enough money to go to California in 1848, via the Isthmus of Panama, and there followed mining and prospecting for a couple of years. Returning to Illinois, he married Frances Rockwood, a native of Illinois, who had been reared and educated near the home of her husband. Together this couple came to Oregon in 1852, outfitting with ox-teams for travel across the plains, and accomplishing the journey without any special incident. At first they conducted a hotel at Salem, but the limited population and the generally pioneer conditions rendered this enterprise impracticable, and Mr. Allen located on a donation claim of one hundred and twenty-six acres in the Waldo hills. After a short time he bought part of the Leonard farm, upon which he farmed for some years, and in 1866 bought the place now occupied by his son, T. D., three miles south of Silverton, upon which he lived until 1902. At present he is living retired in Silverton, enjoying the competence which has rewarded his years of industrious application. Besides Timothy D., who is the oldest of the children, there is R. D., a resident of Salem; H. L., a resident of Baker City; Allie, the wife of L. F. Mascher, of this vicinity; and Adelle, living with her parents in Silverton. Though possessing limited educational facilities in his youth, Mr. Allen became a well read and well informed man, and always took a keen interest in the schools of his district.

Until his marriage, January 4, 1881, with Geneva Aramatha Wolfard, T. D. Allen remained on his father's farm, and thereafter went to housekeeping on a place near Silverton. Mrs. Allen is a daughter of Erhardt Wolfard and was reared near Silverton, her parents having crossed the plains in 1853, locating in the Waldo hills. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Allen, of whom Reber Glenn lives in Silverton; Lowell Clay lives with his parents; Floyd Wolfard; Wynola Frances; Dewey Rockwood; and Fay Anita. In 1902 Mr. Allen came to the old home place, where he manages five hundred acres of land, and is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Ten acres are devoted to hop culture. Mr. Allen has never been active in politics, although he is a staunch supporter of Republican interests. He has been road supervisor and school trustee, and like his father has taken a great interest in the cause of education. He is a member of the Woodmen of the World, and is sociable in his tastes, having many warm friends among the surrounding farmers.

JAMES HAYES. During the two score or more years that James Hayes, late of Benton county, resided in this state, he held a position of prominence among the leading agriculturists of his community, and was a distinguished pioneer of Oregon, a veteran of the early Indian wars, and the discoverer Gold Hill Mine, in Jackson county. Possessing excellent business capacity, sound judgment, and an integrity that was never questioned, he met with deserved success in the various enterprises with which he was identified. An upright man, a good citizen, a kind husband, indulgent father, and a firm friend, his loss will long be felt, and his memory cherished by all who enjoyed his acquaintance or friendship. A native of New York, he was born May 20, 1833, and died January 8, 1903, on his farm near Oak creek, Benton county, Ore.

Reared on a farm, he went with his parents from the Empire state to Illinois when a boy, and resided there until 1852. Hoping in the far west to improve his financial condition, he then joined a party coming across the plains with ox-teams, and as a passenger paid $100 for his transportation. Coming directly to Oregon, he located in Jackson county, where he resided about eleven years, in the meantime having varied experiences in pioneer life. While working for Mr. Chavner, in April, 1859, Mr. Hayes went out one morning on horseback to assist a man named Wilson in the finding of a blind mule, which had strayed away. In going down the side of the mountain near Rogue river, his saddle became loosened, and he was thrown to the ground, much to the amusement of Mr. Wilson. In recinching his saddle, Mr. Hayes picked up a piece of brownish quartz which he saw shining on the ground, and showed it to his companion, who pronounced it of no value. After the finding of the poor old mule, Mr. Wilson left for California. Mr. Hayes subsequently showed the rock which he had found to a man named Ish, who spent the night at his cabin, and he declared there was gold in the specimen.

Two weeks later Mr. Ish returned to the cabin, bringing with him an emigrant, and the three men at once proceeded to the mountain side where the quartz had been picked up. Reaching the point where he had been unhorsed, Mr. Hayes at once picked up another rock that seemed to be half gold, and soon saw that the ground roundabout was thickly strewn with similar pieces of quartz for a distance of two hundred yards or so, the place having since then been known as Gold Hill. Continuing along the gold-lined pathway until a rock of steel-gray color was reached, Mr. Hayes there applied the pick which he had brought with him, and discovered it to be literally filled with the golden metal. The three men were nearly wild with excitement, and sat down to consider what had best be done under the circumstances. Not being willing to trust Ish to go alone to Jacksonville, as he had proposed, his proclivity for drink being known, the emigrant was left to guard the gold plant, while Mr. Hayes went with Ish to secure filing papers, which were prepared by Mr. Huffman, clerk of the court.

Ish, as expected, was soon under the influence of poor whiskey, and Mr. Hayes returned alone. Stopping at his cabin to get a grub stake, he proceeded to Gold Hill, where he and the emigrant tented that night. Ish having given away the secret of the discovery while drunk, at least one hundred and fifty men were on the ground the next morning, and within three days Gold Hill was swarming with miners of all kinds and conditions, crowding about so thickly that no further investigations could be made for a week. Small pieces of quartz were given away, and these proved rich with the shiny metal, one small piece given to a man named Bill Ballard netting him $120. Spreading their blanket over the rich specimens which they picked up from time to time, Mr. Hayes and the emigrant slept each night on the rocky bed, but even then could not prevent the miners from stealing valuable specimens from under their heads. Ish, as one of the three partners who had secured the claim, gave Messrs. Long and Miller, two notorious gamblers, an interest in the mine, and Mr. Hayes, with characteristic generosity, made his friend, Tom Chavner, a stockholder, likewise. The emigrant sold one third of his interest for $5,000. Mr. Hayes deposited $3,000 which he had picked up with Murray & Davis, in Jacksonville, and, being a tenderfoot, easily imposed upon, and with no idea of the immense value of his find, sold his Gold Hill interests to Charles Williams & Co., for $4,000. These men subsequently persuaded him that the money he had already taken from the mine rightfully belonged to them, so he lost his $3,000 also. The gold pocket which Mr. Hayes discovered, and from which he realized such an insignificant sum was in reality worth $300,000.

Removing to Polk county in 1863, Mr. Hayes followed farming for four or five years, then located in Benton county, buying a farm about eight miles south of Corvallis. In 1872 he removed to the city of Corvallis, where he carried on an extensive business as a money broker, amassing a valuable estate. He subsequently purchased five hundred acres of land near Oak Creek, and was there living at the time of his death, which came without warning. In addition to his farm he owned other valuable pieces of real estate, including considerable town property. Beginning life poor in pocket, but rich in courage and strength, he was in truth a self-made man and the architect of his own fortunes, his prosperity being due solely to his own earnest efforts.

On October 20, 1861, Mr. Hayes married

Caroline Henkle, who crossed the plains with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henkle, in 1853, and settled in Jackson county, Ore. Of the seven children born of their union, five are now living, namely: Sarah B., wife of Thomas Bell, of Corvallis; Cora A., wife of I. Hunter, of Waterville, Wash.; Nancy B., wife of E. Phillips, of Corvallis; John William, of Corvallis; and Clyde, who assists his mother in the management of the home farm. Although interested in local, state and national affairs, Mr. Hayes never aspired to public office. He was a Republican in politics, invariably supporting the principles of his party at the polls.

JACOB AMSTUTZ. The highly improved and prosperous condition of Marion county is in a large degree due to its farming population, which is for the most part composed of men who are strong in character, energetic in disposition, sensible in judgment and prompt to see and take advantage of every opportunity that presents itself. Among this class of citizens it is but just to mention the name and give a short résumé of the life of Jacob Amstutz. In the province of Alsace, then a part of France, but since 1871 under the protection of the German empire, his parents were born and there received their education and early training. At a very early day the father came to our hospitable shores, unaccompanied by any of his kinsmen, and at once sought work at his trade, wagonmaking. This remunerative employment he continued to follow until he retired from business life. In the early days he went to New Orleans, and thence traveled extensively through various parts of the country, finally locating in Allen county, Ohio. He lived to enjoy a peaceful old age, passing away in his eighty-first year. He was preceded many years by his faithful wife, who at the time of her death was fifty-five years of age.

Twelve children were born to the parents of Jacob Amstutz, and of the six who are now living he is the only one who resides on the Pacific coast. His birth occurred at Bluffton, Allen county, Ohio, November 27, 1854. In the district schools in the neighborhood of his early home he received his first knowledge of books. To prepare himself for an independent life he learned the carpenter's trade, and for twenty years, more or less, followed this calling. Not content with the limited possibilities of his home surroundings, in 1877, when twenty-three years of age, he crossed the country, with Oregon as his goal. Work at his trade he found awaiting him in Polk county, and after carrying on the same there for two years he located on Howell's prairie, Marion county. It was in the latter place, in 1880, that he took as his life companion

Miss Rosina Biery, who was born in Wayne county, Ohio. The young people at once took up their abode in the Waldo hills, where they have since resided, with the exception of two years spent in Salem, Mr. Amstutz in the meantime following his trade.

Mr. Amstutz's landed possessions aggregate one hundred and eight and one-half acres, fifty of which have been improved and are under cultivation. Great credit is due the enterprising owner, as when he came into possession of the tract it was but partly improved, and all the improvements now to be seen are due to his untiring efforts. General farming and stock-raising form his principal industries. Into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Amstutz seven children were born, and of these four died in infancy. Of those who were reared, Elizabeth died at the age of twelve years, and Melvina, aged eighteen, and Theodore E., aged one year, are at home with their parents. Aside from his personal interests Mr. Amstutz finds time to assist in matters of public concern, as is shown by his seven years' service as clerk of the school board. He has also rendered valuable service in the capacity of road supervisor. In politics he is independent, principle, not party, gaining his vote.

D. W. GIBSON. In this age when so much is heard of public corruption in places of official preferment, it is interesting and gratifying to find a man who regards a public office as a public trust, and who brings to the discharge of his duties the same loyalty and earnest attention which he would give to the conduct of individual business interests. Such an official is D. W. Gibson, the efficient chief of police of Salem.

Mr. Gibson was born in Pike county, Ill., near Pittsfield. The grandfather, Samuel Gibson, who was of Scotch-Irish descent and for many years followed farming in Missouri, spent his last year in Illinois. His son, Guoyan Gibson, the father of D. W. Gibson, was born in Pike county, Mo., and afterward resided in Pike county, Ill. In 1850 he started for the northwest on the overland trip, which seemed of much greater distance at that time than at the present, when the railroad has bridged over space and practically annihilated time. He was accompanied by his wife and five children, two daughters and three sons, and they traveled with a four-horse wagon upon the six-months' trip, being a part of the wagon train commanded by Captain Ball. While en route the Indians stole their stock, but perhaps they were fortunate in escaping with their lives, as many of the emigrants met death at the hands of the treacherous red men. Arriving in Oregon in the fall, the father settled upon a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres twelve miles southeast of Salem, in the Mill creek bottom, there establishing a pioneer home in which the family lived while he broke his land and brought his farm to a high state of improvement. He died there about 1894, at the age of seventy-two, but his wife is still living at the age of eighty-one. He was long an exemplary Mason and one of the valued frontiersmen of his locality. His wife bore the maiden name of Sarah Ann Taylor and was born in Kentucky, a daughter of William Taylor, who settled in Illinois at an early day. In the Gibson family were three sons and four daughters, and six of the family are yet living. An uncle of our subject, Davis Gibson, first crossed the plains in 1845, after which he returned to Illinois, but in 1852 he came again to the northwest, settling in Polk county. Other uncles—George and Albert Gibson—also came in 1852, and thus the family contributed in no small degree to the development and upbuilding of Oregon. D. W. Gibson is the eldest of his father's family, the others being Henry, who resides on the old home farm; Mrs. Mary McHaley, of Heppner, Ore.; Mrs. Ellen Hobson, who died in Marion county; Mrs. Mattie Lucas, who also passed away in this county; George, of Salem; and Mrs. Frankie Putnam, of Walla Walla, Wash.

The natal day of D. W. Gibson was September 5, 1846, and therefore he was only about six years of age when the family arrived in this state. Upon the home farm he was reared and in the district schools he pursued his studies until eighteen years of age, when he began earning his own living by working as a farm hand. In 1866 he went to the mines in the Boise basin of Idaho, where he remained for two years, mining and prospecting, when there occurred an accident that covered him with loose dirt up to the neck and his head was under water. A friend however, discovered him, and held his head up until the water had washed the dirt away and he was rescued. For two weeks, however, he was ill and then returned to Oregon to recuperate on the home farm. In 1869 he made his way to the Grande Ronde valley in eastern Oregon, where he was engaged in breaking horses on a large horse ranch for a year, when he returned home, and for three years thereafter was engaged in clerking in Stayton. He also spent two years in Sacramento, Cal.

About that time Mr. Gibson was married and located on a farm near Stayton, and later he removed to Grant county, Ore., where for two years he was engaged in raising sheep. In 1887 he became a resident of Salem and accepting the position of superintendent of the farming department of the penitentiary, acted in that capacity for over two years, when in 1890 he was appointed to a position on the police force of Salem, acting as night policeman for seven years. During this period he served for one year as deputy sheriff. In the December election of 1898 he was chosen by popular suffrage on the Citizens' ticket for the office of city marshal, was re-elected in 1900 and again in 1902 and is thus head of the police force. Under his administration radical changes and improvements have been made in the police system of the city and his course inspires the confidence of all law-abiding citizens and is a menace to evil-doers.

Mr. Gibson was married in Stayton to Miss Ora A. Wilcox, a native of this state and a daughter of Thomas Wilcox, who came to Oregon in the period of its early development. Mrs. Gibson died in Portland and their son, Eugene, died in 1901, at the age of twenty-six years, while Grace, now Mrs. Eves, is a resident of Portland. For his second wife Mr. Gibson chose Miss Minnie Daniels, who was born in the east. They were married in Salem in 1898, and they now have a daughter, Ruth. Mr. Gibson has always been a stalwart Republican, interested in the welfare and success of his party, but never allowing party bias to influence him in the faithful performance of his duty. Socially he is identified with the Odd Fellows lodge here. Without fear or favor, he has discharged the duties of his office promptly and capably and has supervision over the members of the city police force in a way that results in loyalty in all who represent this department of the city government.

H. W. KAUPISCH. Among the business men of Corvallis who have made a success working along the line of their own methods is H. W. Kaupisch, proprietor of the two large creameries, the Corvallis and Halsey, which consume the greater part of the milk produced in this section of the country. Upon the purchase of the Corvallis creamery, Mr. Kaupisch put in the latest and most approved machinery, steam being the motive power, this purchase in 1901 being followed by that of the Halsey creamery in 1902, it also using the same motive power. In the latter the simplex churn is used. The production from the Corvallis creamery is immense as to the quantity, and the fame of its quality has reached all the adjacent cities, and the demand far exceeds the supply. The butter is sent direct to the retail dealers in Portland, and in that city principally, has won its just renown.

The congeniality which this employment has for Mr. Kaupisch has been the growth of years, his father, J. C. Kaupisch, having followed this business for many years. The latter, a native of Saxony, Germany, gave up his employment of this nature to emigrate to the United States, where, with the broader opportunities and less crowded living, he hoped to accomplish greater things in his work. He first settled in Elgin, Ill., where for twelve years he was employed by John Newman & Co., as superintendent of their creameries there. Later he ventured to California, following the business on his own account in that state; from California to Carson City, Nev., then to Vancouver, Wash., and Portland, Ore., in each place spending some time in his chosen work. A veteran in the business he assists very materially in his son's affairs, the home of the older man also being in Corvallis.

H. W. Kaupisch was born in Saxony, Germany, the oldest child in his father's family, which followed him to America in 1886, where they made their home in Elgin, the young lad gaining his education in the public schools of that city. At thirteen years of age, however, he left school to assist in his father's business. He was capable and bright, and early gave promise of the success which is now making him prosperous among the citizens of Corvallis. After assisting in California he followed his father to Vancouver, and in 1891 took charge of the creamery there, where he remained for four years. In Portland he had charge of the butter-making department of F. C. Barnes' creamery, later taking a more important position in the Kaupisch creamery, after which he returned to California, and engaged in the Bakersfield creamery, where he remained for one year. After his return to Oregon he managed the Corvallis branch of the Hazelwood creamery of Portland, in 1900, in 1901 inaugurating the business which has grown to such splendid proportions.

Not only one of the most successful men in the creamery business in the Willamette valley and one who thoroughly understands from long experience every detail of the management that makes for success, Mr. Kaupisch has made himself a popular man in the city of Corvallis where his exceptional ability is widely known and appreciated. Fraternally he is identified with the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JOHN ENGLISH. For nearly four decades the life and work of John English have been closely interwoven with the history of the development of the agricultural interests of the Willamette valley. He was born near Washington, Daviess county, Ind., March 7, 1837, and is the only son born to John and Sarah (Smiley) English. Sarah (Smiley) English removed to Oregon with her son, and spent the remainder of her life with him. She was born in Sullivan county, Tenn., October 15, 1812, and died at the home of her son in Silverton, Ore., March 2, 1900. Her husband died October 16, 1854, in Daviess county, Ind. His parents emigrated from Tennessee during the pioneer days of Indiana, in which state they continued in their occupation of farming, rearing their son in this vocation. He received his education in the district schools maintained in the vicinity of his home. Until he arrived at the age of twenty-eight years he remained with his parents, assisting in the operation of the farm. At that time, believing the prospects for a successful career were better on the Pacific coast than at his home, he decided to come to Oregon. He made the journey hence in 1865, and soon after his arrival purchased the farm in Marion county upon which he has since resided. During the thirty-eight years of his residence upon it, the place has so changed as to be unrecognizable as the tract he selected at that time. The farm consists of one hundred and thirty acres, and is pleasantly situated three and one-half miles northwest of Silverton. Sixty acres are under cultivation, eighteen acres of which are devoted to hops. Mr. English is engaged at present in general farming and stock-raising, in which he has met with uniform success.

On January 1, 1871, Mr. English was united in marriage with Alice Hendricks, a native of Marion county, Ore., and the daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Morrison) Hendricks, who crossed the plains about 1850 and took up land in this county. Mrs. English was left an orphan at a very early age. The married life of this couple began on the place where they are now spending the evening of their life contentedly together. Seven children have blessed their union, all of whom are living. In the order of their birth they are named as follows: Willard and Willis, who are located in the vicinity of their birthplace; Linnie, wife of Leroy Simeral of Macleay, Ore.; John; Osa, wife of Norris J. Thomas, residing on a part of the home farm; Elvin, who resides at home; and Sadie, at home. The family have all enjoyed good educational facilities, and Mr. English's sons are becoming good, worthy citizens.

Mr. English has been a useful man in his community. He has taken a deep and unselfish interest in public affairs, and does all in his power to advance the material welfare of Marion county. His interest in the cause of education is illustrated by the fact that he has served for fifteen years as clerk of the school board, and has always advocated securing the best possible teachers for the school in his district. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church, to the support of which he is a liberal contributor. In politics he is independent, preferring to keep himself free from allegiance to any particular party, and casting his ballot for the men, who, in his opinion, will administer affairs for the best general interests of the state and country. Personally he is a man who is held in the highest esteem by those who have been favored with his acquaintance and thereby have learned to appreciate the numerous fine qualities which go to make up his character.

LUTHER ELKINS was born of English stock in Cornville, Me., in 1809, the youngest of nine children. His father, Samuel Elkins, was one of the first settlers in Somerset county and was granted a quarter section of land for having the first white child born in that county—his eldest son, Smith Elkins, who after growing to manhood was a captain of a company of volunteers at the battle of Plattsburg, under Col. Winfield Scott in General Brown's command in 1812, became a practicing lawyer in New York City, and died at an advanced age in Missouri, an ex-judge.

At the age of thirteen Luther Elkins was left an orphan in the state of Indiana, whence his father had moved. He grew to be a tall, strong man, taking jobs of labor as he could secure, being at one time in company with mischievous Jo Wright at Bloomington on a contract for pulverizing sandstone for brick making. This same Jo Wright in after years became the distinguished statesman and jurist, and died while United States minister, at the Court of Berlin.

Mr. Elkins was married in 1830 to Miss Philo-theta Williams in the city of Wheeling, where he worked at his trade of wagon and carriage making. Thence they moved to Mt. Pleasant, Ohio. Mr. Elkins made a permanent settlement in Belmont county of that state, entering into the merchandise and milling business, connecting the same with wholesale buying of leaf tobacco, in which his operations were successful; however, for having, as justice of the peace, fined one of his own hands for disturbing a temperance meeting when drunk, the fellow set fire to the great tobacco houses for revenge, and their entire loss almost financially ruined Mr. Elkins. He therefore resolved to cast his lot in Oregon, and on May 1, 1852, crossed the Missouri river above St. Joseph, entering upon the great plains of Nebraska, with two teams of four yoke of oxen each, with his two eldest sons, James, aged twenty, and Joseph, aged eighteen, at the helm, hauling their "little all," with the wife and their eight children, of whom, besides those named, were Louisa, Elizabeth, William S., Clara, Julia and Chas. W. After a tedious journey of five months they landed, September 26, at "Foster's," east of Oregon City, on the mountain overlooking the "land of promise," with one team only. Their journey was without incident of note, beyond the usual privations and hardships over a journey of two thousand miles, except that which came near stranding the little train after three days out on the wild plains. Near sundown, the cattle having fed over a bluff, out of hearing from the bells, alarm was given that three Pawnee Indians were seen whooping with flying blankets driving the band of cattle southward. With the only horse in camp, which Mr. Elkins mounted, he gave pursuit with desperation, realizing all was lost if the cattle were not recovered. He overhauled the stock after a chase of four miles, the Indians scudding out of sight, and he returned with the entire drove after dark, to the great joy of all concerned, whose settlement in Oregon came so nearly being indefinitely postponed.

Settling first upon a claim in the Santiam valley, he subsequently was a general merchant in Lebanon, Linn county, from 1858 to 1865. He became prominently identified with the upbuilding of this section of the state, being a projector and liberal supporter of nearly every enterprise inaugurated to benefit the county. He, with Jason Wheeler, Abram Hackleman, William Ralston, C. P. Burkhart, M. Luper, Andrew Cowan and Jacky Settle, was one of the promoters of the Willamette Valley and Cascade Mountains wagon road, four hundred miles in length, extending to the eastern boundary of the state. The road company was inaugurated by this enterprising merchant and his farmer co-operators for the sole purpose of enabling emigrants and stock to cross the great Cascade mountains, that settlement of central Oregon could be more speedily brought about, avoiding what, at that day, was the exorbitant expense of traveling around by way of the Columbia river. The road was to be kept open by reasonable tolls. The company had no forethought at the time, nor until much work had been done, to apply for a land grant, which was afterwards obtained from the government. The travel became immense over this road and continued so until closed by winter, exceeding that of any other mountain route, being materially improved by a subsequent company. The enterprise has proved the wisdom of the originators, in creating a direct convenience to the public and an improvement to central Oregon.

Mr. Elkins, with several of his old co-operators, constructed the Albany and Santiam Canal at a cost of $65,000, including terminal lands, which has been of inestimable value to the growth of the city. This property, however, was entirely lost to the original builders, from a forced sale of the property by outside influences—unnecessarily so, as Mr. Elkins had secured the promise of abundant means to relieve the financial situation. But this was thwarted, and his answer to a sympathizer was: "Yes, it has ruined us, but saved the town."

Mr. Elkins was likewise a prime mover, with enterprising men in Albany and Lebanon, in influencing the Southern Pacific Railroad managers, Villard and Kohler, to construct the twelve miles of railway between Albany and Lebanon, and to the question propounded to him personally by Villard—"Will this piece of road pay?"—he replied: "Yes, better than any feeder you can have." This settled the construction of the road, and the result was assured, and a great boon to Lebanon and Albany accomplished.

Being a man of force and strong views, he readily attracted prominent notice, and twice represented in part his county in the territorial legislature. He was a member of the constitutional convention and also served as state senator after the granting of statehood. Being president of that body, he had the honor, on the thirty-fifth ballot, of casting the vote that elected General Nesmith and Col. E. D. Baker, two loyal men, to the United States senate, in 1860. Mr. Elkins had endeavored by his influence to elect Nesmith and Judge George H. Williams, or Nesmith and Delazon Smith, determined that Oregon should be represented by two loyal union senators in Washington. Seeing the approaching storm of secession, he warned O'Meara and other leading Democrats of the Lane faction that he would not be responsible much longer for a non-election of United States senators, when it depended upon his vote, and he was compelled to give his casting vote on the last ballot for Colonel Baker, a man of national fame, to accomplish that result, thereby making certain the election of General Nesmith. By doing this Mr. Elkins received the plaudits of the war Democrats and Republicans, but incurred the enmity of very many of his old Democratic friends in his county, and was accused of being "bought"; when in truth Colonel Baker and his friends did not expect Mr. Elkins' support, relying upon Amery Holbroke to eventually cast the requisite vote. Mr. Elkins had avoided Colonel Baker's pressing invitations and social intercourse, and no man who should offer to bribe him could escape his denunciation. He was high-minded, and dealt not in any dishonorable means or secret plans. From that time on Mr. Elkins ceased to be held a leader. While still being classed as a Democrat, he frequently acted independently.

Luther Elkins was a firm believer in the doctrines of Christianity. He led a busy and active life, was warm-hearted, brave and forgiving, and true to his friends, and well calculated to be a pioneer. Though amassing small fortunes at various times in his eventful life, he died at the age of seventy-eight a poor man. The last few years of his life were spent with his son Joseph at Lebanon, in retirement, suffering in his old age from a general breaking down of his physical and mental powers. He left a large number of friends to remember the industry of a man to whom Linn county is more indebted for her material prosperity than to any other one individual. His wife, whose maiden name was Philotheta Williams, was born in Chenango county, N. Y., and preceded him in her demise in Lebanon, Ore., in 1881, at the age of seventy-four. She was a helpmate indeed, and a comforter in her husband's trials—a fond mother, beloved by all.

The oldest child of the parental household, James Elkins was educated in Belmont county, Ohio, and as a young man was first a clerk in the auditor's office there, and afterwards in his father's store. Coming with his parents to Linn county in 1852, Mr. Elkins took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near the property of his father, which he improved. For two terms he taught school, being the first teacher employed south of Crabtree creek. In 1855 and 1856 he was clerk in the Quartermaster General's office at Salem, Ore., during the Indian war of those years. His brother, Joseph, going out with the volunteers to fight the Indians, James was afterwards appointed clerk in the Surveyor General's office, under General Zieber. At his father's request, Mr. Elkins gave up his clerkship in 1858 to become a partner with him in the mercantile business at Lebanon, remaining there until 1862. Being then elected county clerk of Linn county, Mr. Elkins removed to Albany, and in 1864 was re-elected to the same office for the ensuing two years. Becoming secretary of the Wagon Road Company, he served from 1866 until the road was sold in 1869 to Colonel Hogg, after which he dealt in real estate for a time. In 1870 he was a candidate for secretary of state, against Judge Chadwick, but with the rest of his ticket—General Palmer for governor, Myer Hirsch for treasurer and Joseph Wilson for congress—was defeated by the small vote of three hundred and fifty. He was appointed by Benjamin Holliday as the first railroad agent at Albany, serving from 1870 until 1871, when, on account of ill health, he was forced to resign. Going to eastern Oregon, he was engaged in the cattle business in Crook county, near Prineville, for awhile, then removed to Beaver creek, where he enlarged his operations, carrying on an extensive business for a number of years as a stock-raiser and dealer. His sons wishing a change of occupation, he sold his property and returned to Albany, where he has since resided. In June, 1902, Mr. Elkins was elected county treasurer, and assumed the duties of his responsible office July 7, 1902.

In 1860 Mr. Elkins married Miss Helen Millard, who was born in Burlington, Iowa, in October, 1842, and came across the plains to Oregon in 1851 with her widowed mother, Amelia Millard (who afterward became the wife of Rev. Edward Fisher). Mrs. Elkins died in 1899, leaving six children, namely: Charles M., a general merchant in Prineville, Ore.; Collins W., a merchant in Lyle, Wash.; Luther, an attorney in San Francisco, Cal.; Frank, a mechanic in Prineville, Ore.; Helen and James, Jr., at home. Politically Mr. Elkins is a staunch supporter of the principles of the Republican party, and fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and is one of its board of trustees.

WILLIAM HAGER. One of the most prominent merchants and leading business men of Marion county is William Hager, who has been engaged in mercantile pursuits from his youth. In that line he has achieved success and has become well known as a man of integrity and honor. He meets promptly all obligations, his word being as good as his bond, and in the commercial world he is recognized as a keen and sagacious business man, thoroughly up to date and alive to the requirements of his patrons. Mr. Hager is now at the head of a large establishment in Fairfield, conducts a general mercantile business, and also has a large warehouse and deals extensively in grain. He has made good use of his business opportunities and owns five hundred acres of valuable land, including real estate in Portland and Salem, Ore., besides a very nice residence and store building in Fairfield. This prosperity has come to Mr. Hager through his own well directed efforts. He comes from Switzerland, that little independent country which nestles among the Alps, and whose sons are as familiar with the word "Freedom" as are our own American born citizens. It is an acknowledged fact that emigrants from that country have ever been thrifty, upright and self-supporting, and on coming to America have always acquired a competence for themselves, at the same time advancing the prosperity of the land of their adoption. Mr. Hager has been no exception to this rule. He has established a home and a name for himself in the new world, of which any one may well be proud. As a private citizen, he is highly honored, while in public life his record is alike commendable, he having served as postmaster of Fairfield for twenty-two years.

In St. Gall, Switzerland, May 28, 1850, Mr. Hager was born. There he acquired his education and entered into the mercantile business, serving as an apprentice for three years and receiving nothing for his services except the experience which he gained. This, however, was good capital for a bright lad such as he was, and proved to be an excellent foundation for the future success which awaited him in America. The family history of Mr. Hager is of tragic character, owing to the death of his beloved mother at the hands of an assassin, and the demise of the father a year later, which resulted from the shock at the loss of his wife. John Hager, the father, was born in St. Gall, Switzerland, in 1824, and in that land followed the occupation of farming. In the home of his youth he was married to Barbara Klingler, a native of the same place, born in 1825. The family resided in Switzerland until 1865, when Mr. Hager, hearing of the great opportunities to be found in America, crossed the broad Atlantic, settling in Minnesota, where he resided until 1869, at which time he removed to Portland, Ore. In 1871 the wife and children came to America, joining the father who immediately rented a farm near Oregon City, and here they lived very happily until Mrs. Hager was murdered. She had received an inheritance from her native land and the murderers probably thought the money from the inheritance was in her possession, and, although it is known who did the deed, the perpetrators have never been brought to justice, yet this great crime is not hidden from Him who sees all hearts and knows all things. As has been stated, her husband survived only a year after her death, she living to be fifty-five years of age and her husband fifty-six. Three children were born unto this couple: William, of this review; Mary, the wife of Charles Hickethier, of Cedar Mills, Ore.; and Matilda, who is deceased.

The life history of a man who from a small beginning has made his way upward in the world, is always of interest to others, as it indicates the amount of vim and energy which has culminated in success, and to those who have come to America from other countries, bringing with them the very life-blood with which to form a new and great nation, is due the marvelous growth and progress of this great land. In this connection the career of Mr. Hager is an eminent example. On arriving in America in 1871, he made his way to Portland, remaining in that city for about six months, then proceeding to Fairfield, in 1872.

In the latter place he was engaged as a clerk, serving in that capacity until 1879, when he purchased a one-half interest in the business. Thus was his progress toward success made step by step. In 1880 he became sole owner and proprietor of the general mercantile business which he now conducts and through his fair and honorable dealings Mr. Hager has gained the good will and patronage of the public.

In 1887 Cordelia Byrd became the wife of William Hager, the marriage taking place in Fairfield. Her parents were L. A. and Martha Byrd, who came to the Pacific coast in 1849. The present home of Mr. and Mrs. Hager is the place where they first began housekeeping. Four children have been born to them, but only one, Harold B., is now living. He makes his home with his parents. As postmaster for twenty-two years, as school clerk for several years, Mr. Hager has contributed with his best efforts to the advancement and prosperity of his adopted city. In politics Mr. Hager has always allied himself with the Republican party.

CAPT. S. B. ORMSBY. The family of which Capt. S. B. Ormsby of Salem is a representative was founded in America in the early colonial days by descendants of the head of the ancient Scottish clan Ormsby, who fought under Robert Bruce for the freedom of Scotland. They were of the Scotch nobility, possessed of a coat of arms, were sturdy, brave lovers of freedom, stern in their dispensation of justice, with a large body of retainers who were ever ready with sword and lance to defend the honored name and person of their powerful chief. Through many generations and the admixture of other blood, these prime characteristics still remain dominant in representatives of the family, evidence of which may be found by study of the life, the work and personality of the subject of this brief memoir.

Joseph Ormsby, the grandfather of Captain Ormsby, was a young man when the Revolutionary war began, and during the early days of the struggle offered his services to the cause of the colonists. Enlisting in the Continental army as a member of the Third Regiment of the Pennsylvania Reserve, commanded by Gen. Anthony Wayne, he served throughout the war with distinction. He was placed on guard at the door of the room in which was held the court-martial which resulted in the conviction of Major Andre, the British spy, and witnessed his execution. In the war of 1812 he served as guide to General Hampton in his Canadian invasion, and was captured by the British. While held as prisoner along the St. Lawrence river, he was sent out to fish in company with a boy, and while on his mission succeeded in making his escape. He made his way to the American lines, and eventually reached St. Albans, Vt., where he decided to locate and establish a home. At this place he engaged in farming for several years, finally removing to Parishville, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., where he spent the remainder of his life. He died at Ogdensburg, N. Y., at the age of eighty-eight years.

Lyman Ormsby, father of the captain, was born and reared at St. Albans. With his parents he subsequently settled in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., where he became a farmer. Later in life he moved to Jackson county, Wis., settling near Black River Falls, where he died at the age of eighty-six years. Throughout his life he carried on agricultural pursuits. A devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he was its class leader for sixty years, taking a very active part in the work of the church. He voted at every presidential election from the time he cast his first ballot for John Quincy Adams until including the election of Benjamin Harrison. He married Laura Bell, who was born near Burlington, Vt. She was of English descent, and died in New York state. Of this marriage there were born two children—Mrs. Delia Howard of Lincoln, Neb., and S. B. Ormsby, subject of this sketch.

Captain Ormsby was born at Parishville, N. Y., October 18, 1835, and was dependent upon his own resources from the age of eight years, at which time his mother died. After acquiring his rudimentary education in the public schools, by working for his board among the farmers he became qualified to teach and in this way he gained sufficient means to enter St. Lawrence Academy at Pottsdam, N. Y., where his studies were completed. In 1856 he moved to Michigan, traveling by boat to Detroit, whence he proceeded to Montcalm county. For a time he taught school near Greenville, after which experience he entered the Michigan State Normal School at Ypsilanti. He continued to teach at intervals in order to meet the expenses of his normal course, being thus engaged until the fall of 1860, when, because of failing health, he went to Missouri. At Versailles and Tipton, in that state, he continued to teach school until the outbreak of the Civil war. Being a staunch Union man, and taking part in the election of delegates to the state convention, he made himself obnoxious to the Confederate leaders and was ordered to leave the state. Upon his refusal to do so he was arrested and held as a prisoner for a time; but managing to escape he made his way to St. Louis, thence to Michigan, where he again entered the Ypsilanti Normal School, from which he was graduated in March, 1862.

Immediately after leaving school he enlisted in Company K, Fifth Michigan Cavalry Volunteers, and was mustered in as a private in August, 1862, in Detroit. His command was assigned to duty with the Army of the Potomac. He remained with this regiment until June, 1864, and with it participated in the Gettysburg campaign and the operations immediately following it. In June, 1864, he was commissioned first lieutenant of Company C, One Hundred and Eighth United States Colored Infantry. In 1865 he was promoted to the captaincy of Company A, and held that rank when he was mustered out in March, 1866. After receiving his commission he served in Kentucky, and for about six months guarded Confederate prisoners at Rock Island, Ill. The remainder of his service was in Mississippi.

Returning to Michigan upon the close of the war, Captain Ormsby resumed teaching in Washtenaw county. In August, 1868, he removed to Carthage, Jasper county, Mo., where he became principal of the high school. Later he was elected superintendent of the public schools of Joplin, in that county, a position he filled until May, 1882, when he resigned and returned to Michigan on a visit. In January, 1883, he started for the Pacific coast, arriving in Marion county, Ore., in June. For seventeen years continuously he was engaged in stock-raising in the mountains of Marion county. He homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres of land twenty-seven miles northeast of Salem, improved this, and bought two hundred and forty acres adjoining, all of which he operated with success.

While in Missouri Captain Ormsby had taken an active interest in politics as a staunch supporter of the Republican party, having cast his first vote for John C. Fremont in 1856. Upon coming to Oregon he at once became interested in the political situation in this state, laboring diligently for Republican success. In 1892 he was the candidate of his party for the state legislature, and was elected, serving in the session of 1893. He was the father of the bill resulting in the establishment of the Soldiers' Home at Roseburg, and promoted other legislative measures of importance. In 1894 the governor appointed him member of the board of trustees of the Soldiers' Home, and he served as its president until July, 1897, when he resigned to take charge of the office of superintendent of Forest Reserve in Oregon, having been appointed July 1 by Secretary Bliss. This office he filled until it was abolished January 1, 1903. Captain Ormsby's duties included the protection of the forests from fire and from timber trespassers, and the management of stock-grazing upon the range. The total area of the reserves in his charge was 4,548,640 acres, and is included in the Cascade, the Bull Run, and the Ashland reservations. These ranges were a feeding ground for from two to three hundred thousand head of sheep and about five thousand head of cattle. His administration of the affairs of the office gave entire satisfaction, not only to the government, but to the men who occupied the ranges.

Captain Ormsby has disposed of his cattle interests and now rents his ranch. He has, however, considerable private business interests, having acquired mining interests in Coos county, Ore., where he is actively engaged in mining and where he is developing several gold claims, which promise to become the leading mines of southern Oregon.

In Ypsilanti, Mich., in 1862, Captain Ormsby was married to Adelia Merritt, who was born in Ontario, Canada, a daughter of Jefferson Merritt, a native of Vermont. The Merritt family came originally from France, settling in Canada, and Mrs. Ormsby's father became a resident of Michigan, following the wheelwright's trade in Ypsilanti for many years. He died in Ionia, Mich. Unto Captain and Mrs. Ormsby has been born one son, Lyman Merritt, who is a graduate of the School of Mines at Scranton, Pa., and is now engaged with his father in developing their mines in Coos county, Ore.

Fraternally a Mason, Captain Ormsby was initiated into the craft at Ypsilanti and afterward joined the lodge at Carthage, Mo. He is a member of Sedgwick Post No. 10, G. A. R., and was Commander of the Department of Oregon in 1894-95. He also served as an aide on the staff of Grand Commander-in-Chief Adams. He is a member of Oregon Commandery of the Loyal Legion, and has always exhibited a deep interest in military matters and the condition of the veterans of the Civil war. He served for a time as justice of the peace for Silver Falls precinct, but otherwise has held no local office. In the state and federal positions he has filled he has discharged his manifold duties in a manner which reflects credit not only upon himself but on the appointing power. A man of strong mentality, of an engaging personality, of culture and refinement, he commands the respect of his fellow-men who find him an entertaining and agreeable companion. His life record, a brief outline of which is here preserved for future generations, shows him to have been a thoroughly representative man, and an honorable, patriotic citizen.

WILLIAM C. JACKSON. As a blacksmith and a dealer in all kinds of hardware, buggies and wagons, William C. Jackson supports both commercial and industrial lines of business in Shedd's, Linn county. His business probity and sterling character have made him one of the most popular men in the town and one deserving the confidence and esteem of his fellow-townsmen. Mr. Jackson was born March 6, 1862, in Whiteside county, Ill., the son of Barney K. and Malinda (Constant) Jackson, the former being born in Mount Vernon, Ohio, December 21, 1827, and the latter being a native of Illinois. When only a boy B. K. Jackson removed with his parents to Illinois, and there grew to manhood and married, following teaching and clerking until the breaking out of the Civil war, when he enlisted in Company E, Twenty-seventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in which he served about sixteen months. He then returned to Illinois, where he lived until 1866, when he removed to Franklin county, Iowa, and there followed farming for twenty years. In the year 1886 he came to Linn county, Ore., locating near Brownsville, where he lived retired until his death at the age of sixty-nine years. Both himself and wife were members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. After the death of his wife, which occurred at the age of fifty-one years, Mr. Jackson married a Mrs. Wilson, who still survives him. Besides William C. Jackson of this review, there were the following children: Charles L. located in the home place; Mary, the wife of Charles Sickle, of Topeka, Kans; and Anna, wife of Charles Manas, located in Porto Rico. Her husband served as a lieutenant in the regular army during the war with Spain.

In tracing the life of William C. Jackson we find that it has been very much like that of many other early Oregon pioneers. He enjoyed a comparatively brief time of school attendance in his home district, after which, at the age of nineteen years, he took up the blacksmith trade, in 1883 taking up his residence in California, where he earned his livelihood by the prosecution of his trade. At the close of eight successful years in this locality he changed his location to Shedd's, Ore., succeeding E. Becker in a blacksmith shop of this place. Having met with a success in his work he felt financially able in 1902 to enter into a hardware business, now handling all kinds of farm implements, buggies, wagons, etc. He owns both his business and residence property here, and is enjoying a well earned prosperity.

In California in 1885, Laura Brummett, a native of Missouri, became the wife of Mr. Jackson, and they now have three children, all of whom are at home—Gladys, Ellsworth and Mildred. In his fraternal relations Mr. Jackson has held all the chairs in the Woodmen of the World, in which he is past consul. In religion he is a member of the United Presbyterian Church, and in politics cast his vote with the Republican party.

GARY E. LAWRENCE. A paying mercantile business is being conducted at Scott's Mills by G. E. Lawrence, who has succeeded so well that he owns his store building and a fine residence, and is substantially identified with the upbuilding of his adopted town. He comes from farming ancestors, later members of which were located in the state of Iowa, where he was born at Magnolia, May 24, 1870. His father owns a large farm in Iowa, but at present is living retired, at Battle Creek, Iowa, after a life of unusual activity and usefulness. His success has been reflected in the lives of his four children, all of whom profited by a liberal education, and had advantages not enjoyed by the average farm-reared youth.

G. E. Lawrence attended the public schools and concluded his studies at the Normal School at Woodbine, Iowa, remaining at home until he was about eighteen. In search of greater opportunities he went to Nebraska, where he found employment in a general store at Pender, and at the expiration of four years had saved sufficient means to negotiate the purchase of a grocery and queensware store in the same town. In 1890 he disposed of comparatively flourishing interests to come to Scott's Mills, Ore., where a year later he started out in the business in which he is at present engaged. He carries a complete line of general necessities, and his correct business methods, genial and considerate manner, and personal popularity, insure a continuation of present prosperity.

October 19, 1898, Mr. Lawrence married Lisa M. Lint, a native of Richland Center, Wis., who became the mother of one child, Irene E. In politics Mr. Lawrence is a Republican, and in religion is a member of the Christian Church.

REUBEN A. HASTINGS. The owner of a finely improved farm lying two miles east of Pedee, Reuben A. Hastings occupies an assured position among the more intelligent, enterprising and active citizens of Polk county. He is carrying on general farming with success, year by year adding to his wealth, and, having the respect and confidence of his neighbors and friends, is regarded as a valuable member of the community. Native and to the manor born, his birth occurred, January 26, 1857, on Soap creek, Polk county, near Suver Station, on the homestead which his father, Burres L. Hastings, took up from the government.

His paternal grandfather, John W. Hastings, was born April 15, 1798, in Orange county, N. C. Emigrating to Tennessee with his bride, just after his marriage, he lived in Henry county until 1840, being engaged in agricultural pursuits. He subsequently continued his independent vocation in Fulton county, Ark., until his death, April 2, 1847. His wife, whose maiden name was Anna Estes, was born in Orange county, N. C., and died, in 1850, in Arkansas. They reared five sons and two daughters, Burres L. being their third child.

Born April 2, 1832, in Henry county, Tenn., Burres L. Hastings obtained the rudiments of his education in his native town, completing his studies in the common schools of Arkansas. In 1852, in company with his brothers, John and Archibald, he came to Polk county, Ore., where all three located, and one of the brothers, John Hastings, now resides in Airlie. Leaving Arkansas on April 7, 1852, the brothers were a little more than four months on the road, arriving in Portland, Ore., August 26. They remained on the Luckiamute, Polk county, about two weeks, and then proceeded to California, where they were engaged in mining on Weaver creek for some time. Having poor luck, Burres L. Hastings returned to Oregon in the summer of 1853, and took up a donation claim on Soap creek, near Suver, and on his farm of three hundred and twenty acres engaged in mixed husbandry, including stockraising, for four years. Selling out, he purchased a ranch containing one hundred and sixty acres, about two miles north from his present home, and lived there a year and a half. Disposing of that estate, he settled on the Luckiamute, near Airlie, renting a farm for three years, and then buying a ranch, which he occupied until 1871. Renting that farm, he moved into Tillamook county for the benefit of his own and family's health, and lived there fifteen months. He subsequently lived for a time on his Airlie ranch, then carried on farming on his Tillamook county ranch for a year. Returning then to Airlie, he resided there until 1875, when he sold his farm, and moved to his present homestead, in the vicinity of Pedee. He has a well improved estate of three hundred and seventy-nine acres, seventy five of which are in a good state of cultivation, and he is carrying on general farming and stock-raising with good results.

Burres L. Hastings married, in 1854, Sophia Simpson, who was born in Fulton county, Ark., April 5, 1837, and of their union four children have been born, namely: Rebecca Alice, deceased; Reuben A., the special subject of this sketch; Hannah J., wife of William Elkins, of Dallas; and R. W., of Cottage Grove, Ore. Mr. Hastings is a Democrat in politics, and has served as road supervisor and school director. Both he and his wife are members of the Evangelical Church at Pedee.

Born near Suver, Reuben A. Hastings, obtained his early education in the common schools of Polk county, and when yet a boy moved with his parents to the mountains near Pedee. As soon as old enough to be of use, he began assisting his father on the farm, and as early as practicable engaged in agricultural pursuits on his own account. Locating on his present ranch, not far from Pedee, he has one hundred and twenty-nine acres of land, forty of which are in cultivation, yielding excellent crops. In addition to general farming he carries on a substantial business as a stock-raiser. He also has charge of his father's large ranch, managing it ably and satisfactorily.

Mr. Hastings has been married three times. He married first, October 12, 1879, Ella Price, daughter of Fantley Price, who crossed the plains in 1852, and located near Salt creek. She died, at Pedee, in 1884. His second marriage, which occurred August 3, 1890, united him with Etta Johnson, daughter of John Johnson, who crossed the plains in 1844, and settled near Lewisville, on the farm now occupied by his widow. She died on the home farm, February 20, 1895. Mr. Hastings married for the third time, November 4, 1901, Tena Waters, a daughter of John Waters, an early settler of Pedee. Mr. and Mrs. Hastings have one child, Grace Rowena. Politically Mr. Hastings is actively identified with the Democratic party, and has served his fellow-citizens as school director, and as road supervisor.

JOHN N. MCKAY. For more than twelve years John N. McKay has successfully combined agriculture with business interests in Portland connected with his father's estate, and thereby has led a varied and by no means monotonous existence. Nevertheless he is a farmer by inheritance and early training, and takes great pride and delight in maintaining the high standard established by his father on the old homestead. He is the owner of six hundred and twenty acres of the old donation claim, the greater part of which is improved, and is carrying on stock-raising and hop-growing, having thirty-five acres under the vine.

On the farm which he now owns Mr. McKay was born March 7, 1855, a son of James and Cecelia (Lawson) McKay, natives respectively of Ireland and Scotland, who came to America early in life and settled at Albany, N. Y. After various changes of location he crossed the plains to Oregon in 1849 and subsequently purchased the right to a donation claim in Marion county, developing the farm now occupied by his son, John N. McKay. Later in life he became extensively connected with real estate operations in Portland, in which city he spent his last days. For more complete details of his life refer to his sketch which appears elsewhere in this work. John N. McKay was educated in the public schools of Marion county and Portland. At the age of twenty-five years he assumed the management of his father's farm with his brother, William R., continuing this association until the marriage of the latter in 1885. His brother sought a new location at that time, but the subject of this review remained on the homestead until 1891, in which year he went to Portland to assume charge of his father's city property. He remained a resident of Portland for six years, devoting practically all his time to the management of his father's estate. Since that time he has divided his time between the farm and city property, discharging with exactitude and rare business judgment the many obligations devolving upon him by reason of his twofold responsibility.

He was united in marriage November 26, 1900, to Caroline Bochsler, a native of Switzerland and a daughter of Joseph and Mary Bochsler. Mary A., the eldest child of this union, was born September 11, 1901, and the youngest daughter, Cecelia Florence, was born August 19, 1903. Mr. McKay is highly esteemed by the citizens of Marion county and Portland for the many admirable traits of character which he possesses. Though he has taken no active part in the political life of the community he has always evinced a disposition to assist in furthering the best interests of the county, and in various ways has shown himself to be the possessor of a liberal mind and public spirit. He is regarded as one of the most substantial men of the county, and his probity and consideration for the rights and privileges of his fellow-men have never been brought into question. In religion he is a member of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Paul.

MRS. PHOEBE A. JOHNSON. The farm of one hundred and fifty-one acres now owned and occupied by Mrs. Phoebe A. Johnson, is a portion of the old homestead taken up by her husband, John Johnson, as early as 1845. Many of its improvements, and more especially the pioneer clearing of the land, and the establishing of a varied agricultural enterprise, are traceable to this very early settler, whose death July 13, 1877, cut short a very useful and well balanced career. Mr. Johnson was born in Worcester, Tompkins county, N. Y., July 29, 1816, and came to Oregon in 1845, making the long trip with ox-teams in a train containing many other home-seekers. He took up the donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres since divided between his wife and children, and in 1850 returned to the east, via Panama, remained in Michigan for a year, and again crossed the plains in 1851. To the average traveler, however ambitious, these two jaunts would seem quite sufficient, but Mr. Johnson again returned to Michigan in 1851, and in 1852 outfitted with ox-teams for his third tramp across the plains. In this party was James Taylor and his family, one of whom was Phoebe A. Taylor, of whose many charms of person and character Mr. Johnson was fully conscious. March 19, 1854, near Pedee, he married Miss Taylor, who proved a sympathetic and helpful wife, and bore him three children, of whom Alcida is the wife of Nicholas Tarter, of Corvallis; Esther is deceased; and Fred is working his mother's farm. After his marriage, Mr. Johnson settled on the farm he had taken up in 1845, and from then until the end of his life engaged in general farming and stock-raising, making a success of both occupations, and bringing his land up to a high state of cultivation. He was a man of high honor, and his upright and well directed life was a credit to the promising community of which he was one of the most respected members.

Mrs. Johnson, now living on the old homestead, was born in Erie county, N. Y., September 11, 1829, her father James Taylor previously mentioned, having been born in Kennebec county, Me., September 24, 1794. James Taylor was a blacksmith, carpenter, and farmer, and in the east married for his first wife, Esther Aldrich, who was born in Rhode Island, in Smithfield township, and died in Erie county, N. Y., July 19, 1833, at the age of about thirty. Of the children of this union Mrs. Phoebe Johnson is the oldest, while Esther is the wife of W. S. Gilliam, of Walla Walla, and Alcida died in infancy. With his first wife Mr. Taylor moved to New York, located on the farm in Erie county, and worked at his trade for several years. In 1835, hoping to find a more desirable place of residence, he went to Michigan, leaving his two motherless children with his mother in New York. In Michigan he married in 1836, Margaret Johnson, who bore him four children: Anderson, deceased; John, living near Lewisville; James, deceased; and Persis, deceased. In 1837 Mr. Taylor went back east for his children and brought them to Michigan overland in a wagon, and in 1852 outfitted and crossed the plains in the same party with his future son-in-law, Mr. Johnson. Mr. Taylor reached Polk county, Ore., November 26, 1852, and the following spring bought the right to the farm upon which he lived until his death, January 19, 1858. He was taken with his final illness while in Dallas, whither he had gone to build the county jail, which he did not live to complete. He was a prominent man in this county, and took a great interest in Democratic politics, serving as judge of Polk county from 1853 until 1858, a position he was holding at the time of his death.

Mrs. Johnson was educated in the public schools, and has always been a great reader, keeping well posted on current events, and having a wide knowledge of the most progressive agricultural methods. She lives with her son, Fred, who is manager of the farm, and who is, like herself, in favor of modern improvements, and the many inventions which at present make farming life as admirable as it is comfortable and congenial.

JOHN STEWART. An unusual amount of pioneer interest is centered around the lives of John and Mary (Scott) Stewart, the former of whom died in Corvallis in 1885, at the age of eighty-five years, and the latter of whom still occupies the home in this town to which she and her husband retired from active life in 1881. These courageous homeseekers of '45 lived close to the deprivation and discouraging conditions of the very early days, and undertook with stout hands and hearts the conquering of a great adversity. Mrs. Stewart was the first woman to live on the land upon a portion of which Corvallis is built, and she, more than any other, has stored up in her mind innumerable reminiscences while this section was being awakened to a sense of its possibilities as an agricultural region.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart come from Revolutionary ancestors. John Stewart was born in the Old Dominion state in 1800, his father, George Washington Stewart, and his grandfather, being natives of the same state. The grandfather stacked his musket on many of the battlefields of the war of Independence, and his son served in the war of 1812. George Washington Stewart removed from Virginia to Indiana, and from there to Missouri, and finally died on his farm in Oregon. He married Mary Smith, who was born in Virginia, and came to Oregon in 1851, where her death occurred. John Stewart was fourteen years old when the family removed to Missouri, and his life was uneventfully passed on the paternal farm. In Switzerland county, Ind., January 7, 1842, he married Mary Scott, a native of that part of Indiana, and daughter of William Scott, who was born in old Virginia. The paternal grandfather Scott was a Revolutionary soldier, and passed his entire life in Virginia. William Scott removed from Virginia to Kentucky, and afterward became one of the very early settlers of Indiana, arriving in time to participate in the Indian difficulties which for a time made life hazardous in the Hoosier state. His wife, Rachel (Mounce) Scott, was born in New Jersey, a daughter of Thomas J. Mounce, also born in New Jersey, and who was a soldier in the Revolutionary and Indian wars. Mr. Mounce died in Indiana, as did also his wife. He was the parent of nine children, two of whom are living. Two sons and one daughter succeeded in reaching Oregon, where one of the sons served in the Cayuse war; and one of the sons died on the plains.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart farmed for some time in Holt county, Mo., and in the spring of 1845 prepared for the hazardous journey over the plains. One child had been born in the meantime, and accompanied its parents, who were outfitted with two wagons and eight yoke of oxen, besides having one hundred head of loose cattle. There were one hundred wagons in the train, and they started from Missouri May first, all going well until they reached Boise City. One of the party by the name of Meeks thought to shorten the course by striking out from the main road, but he got lost on the desert, and the rest had to proceed without him. Without any particular incident they arrived at Sheets, and then came down to The Dalles, arriving in the valley in November, 1845. On the way they had lost nearly all of their loose cattle, but otherwise they were in fairly good condition, at least possessing fair health. After wintering at Tualatin Plains, they stopped near Rickreall and raised one hundred bushels of wheat, and in March, 1846, took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres just north of Corvallis. Here their troubles began in earnest, for at first they were obliged to subsist almost entirely on boiled wheat and peas, but finally they discovered that there was an abundance of wild game, a most welcome addition to their limited menu. On the banks of the Willamette Mr. Stewart built a comfortable little log house, and this same house proved a blessing indeed to that uncivilized neighborhood. The faithful wife made the clothes for the family out of buckskin, and she was obliged to make about six pairs of moccasins a week, so fast did they wear out. They were of course intimately associated with the Indians, who readily recognized the friendship of the white settlers, and displayed no animosity towards them.

Of importance in connection with these early days was the organization of the first Methodist Church in Benton county, which took place at the Stewart home, and there received its first impetus towards usefulness. The first pastor was Rev. Leander Ballew, who crossed the plains with Mr. Meeks. For three years the services were held in the hospitable home of the Stewarts, the people coming from many miles around with ox-teams, and invariably staying over night. They also partook of the boiled wheat and game, and left refreshed materially and spiritually. After three years a log school-house was erected where Mrs. Stewart's house is built in Corvallis, and thereafter the services were held there, thus relieving these earnest pioneers of their courageously borne responsibility.

In time Mr. Stewart cleared considerable of his land and was rewarded with golden harvests, and still later fences enclosed the property, and agricultural devices of a modern nature facilitated the large enterprises he had inaugurated. In 1850 he took a run down into California, spent the summer in the mines, and experienced fair success. He engaged during his active life in the west in general farming, although he devoted considerable time to stock-raising and depended for the larger part of his revenue upon cattle and hogs. Before his death he disposed of one hundred acres of his land, and in January, 1881, retired to a well earned rest in his pleasant and comfortable home in the town. Mr. Stewart was a Republican in politics, and although he was not active therein in the west, had served as probate judge in Missouri.

Since her husband's death Mrs. Stewart has continued to live in the town home, where she is honored not only for her brave and helpful life in the past, but for those enduring qualities of sympathy, humanity, and womanliness, which have made her so conspicuous among the pioneer women of Benton county. Mrs. Stewart still owns five hundred and forty acres of the original donation claim, which is being managed by her son-in-law, Miner M. Swick, husband of her second oldest child, Cerenda. Her oldest child, and only son, John, was born in Missouri, is married, has one child, Lenora, and lives near Tacoma, Wash. Mrs. Stewart has been a member of the Methodist Church since her girlhood days, and is a member of the Pioneer Association.

BARTHOLOMEW WIESNER. On the Parkersville and Aumsville road, ten miles northeast of Salem and five miles west of Silverton, Marion county, Ore., is located the farm of Bartholomew Wiesner, presenting a fair picture of rural comfort. The house, barns and outbuildings are all substantial and up-to-date, and the farm itself is well stocked with Angora goats, horses, Jersey cattle, Brown Leghorn and Barred Plymouth Rock chickens, the fowls having taken first prize at the Oregon State Fair, where they are exhibited each year.

The birth of Mr. Wiesner occurred near Zunderbach, Germany, March 7, 1835. His father, Adam Wiesner, born in 1799, was a manufacturer of tile and brick and also engaged in farming up to the time of his death, which occurred at the age of sixty years, in the year 1860, the mother, Margaret Happ, born in 1809, having died when about fifty years old. Bartholomew Wiesner was one of eight children, and the large family prevented him receiving as many advantages as would otherwise have been accorded him. His school days were ended at the age of twelve years, at which time he started for America. Having his own livelihood to earn, he sought with remarkable judgment the best field wherein to spend his energy. It was in the year 1847 that he came to the United States and settled in Buffalo, N. Y., where he served as an apprentice to his uncle, who was a tailor. After a period of three years spent in that city, Mr. Wiesner removed to Canada West, locating in what is now Ontario, where he secured employment on a farm, and remained until 1862. In the last-named year he came to Oregon, via New York, Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco, and after a stop in British Columbia of a few months, he came to Marion county and settled on a farm on French Prairie, where his management and industry resulted in sufficient means to enable him to purchase land in 1864. This first purchase was located on the Prairie, and there he bought the farm which he now owns, consisting of one hundred and seventy-two acres, though since his purchase he has added twenty more. One hundred and twenty acres of his land is under cultivation. Mr. Wiesner has put all the improvements on this place and has brought it to the present high state of cultivation.

April 6, 1868, Mr. Wiesner was united in marriage with Miss Louise Jane Cawood, who was born in Daviess county, Ind., and with her parents crossed the plains with mule teams in 1865. They took up their residence on the farm on French Prairie, and in 1870 removed to their present location. Eight children were born of the union, of whom Emma is the wife of Edward Baughton, a contractor of Portland, and they have two children, Ralph and Mamie; Philip is in Mesa, Ariz., engaged in bee culture; Ephraim G. and Ernest C. are at home; Opha is the wife of Warren Gray, of Marquam; Bertha and Archie B. also make their home with their parents, and Oso died in infancy. One of the most important events in the life of Mr. Wiesner was obtaining his marriage license and teacher's certificate on the same day. He taught school one term, organized a new district, there having previously been no building, the pupils meeting in a room of his own house. Politically Mr. Wiesner is a Socialist and is a member of the Christian Scientists. He has served in public offices at different times, being elected justice of the peace, serving four years, and school director from 1870 to 1890. Mr. Wiesner is influential in the Grange, and is now overseer in the Pamaona Grange and master of North Howell Grange, No. 274, having passed all the chairs of the subordinate Grange.

WILLIAM D. CLAGGETT, whose fifty-one years of residence in Oregon covers almost the entire period of development and improvements here, was for many years extensively engaged in farming and stock-raising and still supervises his interests in those directions from his home in Salem, where he has resided since 1880.

A native of Missouri, William D. Claggett was born near Albany, Gentry county, November 28, 1840, a son of Charles Claggett, who was born in Woodford county, Ky., October 13, 1813. The latter's father died in Kentucky when Charles Claggett was an infant. Charles Claggett was reared in that state, and after attaining his majority began farming on his own account in Gentry county. In 1852 he left the Mississippi valley for the coast, making the long and tedious journey across the sands and through the mountain passes until he reached Marion county. He settled four miles north of Salem, where he secured about three hundred and twenty acres of land covered with a heavy growth of timber. He at once began to improve the property, and in those early days he burned charcoal. His pits were long enough to take in logs of seventy-five feet, and would contain two thousand bushels of charcoal. Each pit would be left to burn for three months, before the product was considered ready for the market. In this Mr. Claggett was quite successful, although the early years of residence here were a period of hardship to the family. The father had but a single dollar at the time of his arrival, and the first home of the family was a log cabin, 16x16 feet, and without a floor of any kind, or a stove or a fireplace. Through many years, however, Charles Claggett successfully engaged in the raising of stock and grain, and added to his original purchase the adjoining farm. His death occurred October 7, 1902, and thus passed away one of the honored pioneer settlers. He had a brother, Mason Claggett, who was a soldier in the Mexican war.

The mother of William D., Mrs. Mary (Irvine) Claggett, was a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Jesse Irvine, who removed to Missouri, where he engaged in farming until his death in 1842. Mrs. Claggett passed away in Salem in 1891. In the family were ten children, of whom only four reached adult age: Mrs. Margaret McNary, who died near Salem; Mrs. Sallie A. Pugh, who also died near Salem; William D., and Mrs. Martha Savage, who was accidentally killed in Marion county.

When but eleven years of age William D. Claggett came with his parents to Oregon. They left their Missouri home on the 1st of April, with two wagons drawn by oxen, and some loose cattle. The boy William drove an ox-team of four yoke, and in the lead had a pair of three-year-old oxen which he had broken from calves, and had made so tractable that he could stand on the wagon tongue and guide them simply by speaking to them. The party crossed the Platte river where it was three miles wide. Mr. Claggett had his three-year-olds in the lead of seven yoke of cattle, and had they stopped swimming the wagons would have sunk. This yoke of oxen crossed the Platte seven times in one day, leading the other big teams. At length they reached the old Oregon trail and proceeded slowly until they arrived at Fort Hall, when they quickened their pace and passed every team which they overtook upon the road. On July 4 they reached the North pass and came on toward Oregon, arriving at The Dalles, September 13, and proceeding down the Columbia on a flatboat, while the cattle were brought by the trail.

Mr. Claggett arrived at Salem October 13, 1852, and proceeded to make himself useful on the home farm. In the winter months, when his services were not needed at home, he attended the district schools, and between the years 1852 and 1862 he was a student in the Willamette University. For some time he continued with his father, assisting in the operation of the home farm. Soon after reaching maturity he bought one hundred acres, to which he added another hundred, then three hundred and forty and subsequently other tracts, until he now owns over nine hundred acres in Marion county. His farm is devoted principally to the production of grain and the raising of stock. He has made a specialty of fine Angora goats and now has a large and valuable herd. He is one of the pioneers in this industry in Oregon, and has the largest herd, and has taken many prizes with his goats at the state fairs. He has also owned many fine horses, including registered Clydesdales and some fine trotting stock, on which he has also won first premiums, and has raised fine sheep. Mr. Claggett has always been a lover of high grade stock and has ever kept on hand animals of superior excellence. One of his horses, Homdell, has a race record of 2:18, and has a halfmile time record of 1:08.

Mr. Claggett married Miss Ella Hennis, who was born in Iowa and died in Marion county, Ore., leaving two children: Mrs. Annie Cospers, of Salem; and Mrs. Ellen Welch, who is living on the old homestead. For his second wife Mr. Claggett chose Miss Eliza Parrish, who was born in Iowa and died in Oregon. There were eight children of that union: Amelia, of New York; Charles W., of Salem; Archie, who is on one of the father's farms: Thomas of Washington; Clyde, who is also on one of his father's farm; Benjamin, Margaret and Harriet at home. Mr. Claggett's third marriage was to Miss Lizzie Jacobs, who was born in Marion county, her father having been one of the first settlers of that state, arriving here in the earliest pioneer days.

Since 1880 Mr. Claggett has been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and has held office in the lodge and encampment. In politics he is an active Republican. As the years have passed, through the careful conduct of his business interests, through judicious investment and unflagging industry, he has prospered, and is today one of the substantial citizens of Salem, having extensive and valuable property holdings in Marion county. Soon after his arrival in the county he was ill for a short time with mountain fever, but has since enjoyed remarkable health, for the past fifty years never missing a meal a single day. He is familiar with pioneer history, and has witnessed the development of the county, as early conditions have been replaced by those of an advanced civilization, making Oregon one of the most promising commonwealths in this great country.

MAJOR MATTHEW H. ELLIS, M. D.

One of the prominent physicians and surgeons of Linn county is Major M. H. Ellis, M. D., who has met with noteworthy success in his professional career, and attained an enviable position among the foremost citizens of Albany. A native of Ontario, he was born near Owen Sound, being the oldest of the eleven children of John Ellis. His grandfather, Thomas Ellis, was born in the North of Ireland, of Scotch ancestry. When a young man he emigrated to Ontario, where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death. He was held in high esteem as a citizen, and was an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

John Ellis was born and educated in Ontario, and was subsequently engaged in the hotel business in Rochester, N. Y. Removing from there to Port Hope, Ont., where he resided several years, he then removed to Minneapolis, Minn., where he lived retired from active pursuits until his death, in 1902. He married, at Port Hope, Eliza Dean, who was born in the North of Ireland, of Scotch ancestors. Her father, the Rev. Matthew Dean, came to Canada with his family, and settled in County Durham, Ont., where he engaged in general farming, and for some time preached in the Methodist Church. John Ellis and his wife were both members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mrs. Ellis died in 1898. Seven of their children are still living, two of them, the doctor and his sister, Mrs. C. E. Sox, being residents of Albany.

After his graduation from the Collegiate Institute at Port Hope, Ont., Matthew H. Ellis entered the medical department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1879. Beginning the practice of medicine in Belmont county, Ohio, he remained in Jacobsburg two years, when, in 1882, he returned to Minneapolis, and there followed his profession until coming to Oregon in 1884, and located in Albany, where he has gained an extended reputation as a skillful physician and surgeon, and has met with merited success in his special work of treating diseases of the eye and ear. Progressive in his methods, ever aiming to keep himself well informed in regard to the advances of medical and surgical science, the doctor is still a close student, and in 1895 took a special course at the Post Graduate College in Chicago, Ill.

In 1887 Dr. Ellis was appointed regimental surgeon of the Oregon National Guards, a position which he filled until the breaking out of the Spanish-American war. In 1898 he was commissioned, by Gov. T. T. Geer, surgeon of the Second Oregon Infantry, with the rank of major. Going with his regiment to the Philippine Islands, he took part in various engagements, and at the Battle of Norzagaray, was wounded by a shot in the right leg, but by riding a horse he remained with his regiment, heroically performing his duties. During the Malolos campaign Major Ellis was brigade surgeon of the Staff of Brigadier-General Lloyd Wheaton. Returning home with his regiment, the major was mustered out of service at San Francisco in August, 1899, returned to his home and resumed the practice of his profession. He was subsequently re-appointed major and surgeon in the Oregon National Guard and still holds the position. He is likewise United States Pension Examiner.

Politically Dr. Ellis is one of the leading Republicans of the Willamette valley, having served as delegate to the state conventions of his party. In 1895 he was a delegate to the National Convention of the Republican League held in Cleveland, Ohio. For four years he was a member of the State Central Committee, representing Linn county. Fraternally the doctor was made an Odd Fellow in Ohio, and is a member of Albany Lodge, No. 4, I. O. O. F., and is a member and Past Chief Patriarch of the Albany Encampment, I. O. O. F. He is also a member of Albany Camp, M. W. A.; the Independent Order of Foresters; the Knights of the Maccabees, and of the Oregon State Medical Association.

NEWTON HOUSTON. A commodious residence, excellent out-buildings, good fences and the most modern of agricultural implements help to make the farming property of Newton Houston one of the most valuable and desirable in Linn county. Located four miles east of Albany, and in extent five hundred and ten acres, it is principally devoted to stock and grain-raising, and the most scientific and successful kind of general farming. As one of the very early pioneers of Oregon Mr. Houston has accomplished much for his adopted state, and has been unceasing in his efforts to improve the conditions among which he has found himself. Born in Miami county, Ohio, near Piqua, September 27, 1828, his father, Robert Houston, had a large farm in the interior of the county, where he married Mary Brown, and where he reared a family of five sons and three daughters. An ambitious man, he gave ready credence to the reports of greater fertility in the northwest, and in the spring of 1848 prepared for the long journey across the plains. For the transportation of the husband, wife and eight children they had two wagons with three yoke of oxen on each, and another with five yoke, and they also took with them three cows and two horses. Seven months of travel brought them to Linn county, this state, where the father took up a claim just outside of Albany, and where he died at the age of eighty-five years.

Ten years of age when he came to Oregon in 1848, Newton Houston went into the mines of California in 1850, accompanied by his brother, Milton, with whom he drove across the mountains. For six months he alternated between success and failure, and after returning to this county he continued to farm on the home place. In 1852 he married Louisa Parish, soon after purchasing a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, to which he has added and now owns five hundred and ten acres. Having a thorough understanding of farming, and a fine knowledge of stock-raising, he has succeeded in his adopted county and is one of its most conscientious and painstaking agriculturists. Five sons and three daughters have been born into his family, all of whom have been accorded the best educational opportunities in their neighborhood. Robert E. resides on a farm near the home place, having married Aurelia Marshall, a native of Oregon; they have two children, Ala E. and Robert L.; Katherine, wife of W. W. Phillippi of Walla Walla, Wash., and they have four girls, Della, Laura, Amy and Elsie; Charles W., who resides at the home place, and married Rose Wilson, to whom have been born three children, Chester, Van and Ilda; Brown J. and Leroy reside in Portland, Ore.; Minnie (now deceased) was the wife of Preston B. Marshall, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere in this volume; Calista C., wife of A. B. Custer of Linn county; they have one child, Ira

N.; Edward P. resides in Boise City, married Nora Mills and has one child, Robert E.

A Democrat in politics, Mr. Houston was prominent in the early days, and at times has been school director and road supervisor. He is a member of the Grange, and his stanch support has greatly facilitated the growth of this institution. Although so many years have passed over his head, Mr. Houston is still active, and not only still performs his share of the labor of life, but heartily enters into its joys and diversions. Honored by all who know him, he has a cheery home, to which his many friends like to go, and where they invariably receive a warm and convincing welcome.

WILLIAM R. BILYEU. A judicial mind and temperament, excellent business ability, and a capacity for hard work well developed, has placed Hon. William R. Bilyeu among the foremost legal practitioners in Linn county. Of French origin, he represents a family the earliest emigrants of which settled in Virginia, and from the Old Dominion state branched out into various parts of the south and east. His paternal grandfather was the establisher of the name in Tennessee, where was born Joseph Bilyeu, the father of Hon. William R., the latter of whom settled at an early day in Miller county, Mo. Joseph Bilyeu cleared a wilderness farm in Miller county and married Anna Osborn, who was born in Sangamon county, Ill., a daughter of William Osborn, a farmer who died in Illinois. In Missouri were born six of the ten children reared by these parents, of whom William R., the oldest, was born March 19, 1847. In 1862 the father outfitted with wagons and ox and horse-teams and brought his family across the plains, on the way escaping many of the unfortunate experiences which rendered terrifying and uncertain the way of the earlier immigrants. Leaving Missouri May 5, 1862, the party arrived at its destination in Portland October 7, of the same year, William and his brother driving the stock down the old Columbia river trail, arriving a few days later. Mr. Bilyeu settled on a claim in Linn county, and the same winter removed to Polk county, where he bought the farm which he improved, and upon which he lived for many years. A later place of residence was a farm near Turner, Marion county, from where he moved to Albany, where his death occurred May 29, 1902, at the age of seventy-nine years. From early manhood he was a member of the Christian Church, as was also his wife, who died in Marion county in 1899. Of the large family of children, the following seven attained maturity: William R.; Larkin, an attorney at Eugene, and representative for several terms; James, an educator at Scio; Lydia, now Mrs. Ennis, of Eureka, Cal.; Tabitha, now Mrs. Vaughan, of Salem, Ore.; John, who died in Linn county, Ore., at the age of twenty-seven, and Joseph, who died in Linn county at the age of twenty, and who was the only one born in Oregon.

The education of Hon. William R. Bilyeu was acquired under difficulties, for, as the oldest son in the family, he was early confronted by large responsibility, the fulfillment of which crowded out many opportunities. He was fifteen when the family came to the west, and on the way he made himself useful by driving a team of three horses. On the western possession he performed his share towards clearing off the timber and rendering the land profitable, and through the exercise of great economy gained admission to the Tualatin Academy when he was twenty. This institution afterward became the Pacific University, and his tuition was met from the proceeds of his several years of teaching in Washington, Linn and Marion counties, thus enabling him to take a six years' course, from which he was graduated in 1873 with the degree of Bachelor of Science. In conformity with a long-thought-out determination, he began the study of law in the office of Mallory & Shaw, of Salem, and after being duly admitted to the bar in 1875, engaged in practice in Albany, where his entire professional life has been centered. He is known as an astute and most capable lawyer, and has received his share of the legal patronage of Albany and Linn county.

A stanch upholder of Democracy, Mr. Bilyeu has rendered signal service in state affairs, but has never been induced to hold local office. He was elected to the state senate in 1878, and re-elected in 1882, and in 1902 was elected to the house of representatives in the twenty-third biennial session. While in the latter body he drew up and was instrumental in securing the passage of the mortgage tax law, which was litigated in the courts, but finally sustained by the United States Supreme Court. This session also passed the Indian veteran bill, which gave an appropriation of $100,000 for the veteran fighters of '55-'56. In 1888 he was nominated presidential elector on the Democratic ticket, and has attended many conventions, but never as a candidate. For several terms he was chairman of the County Central Committee, and he is an ex-member of the State Central Committee. Fraternaly he is associated with St. John's Lodge, No. 62, of which he is past master; Bayley Chapter, No. 8, R. A. M., of Albany; Temple Commandery, K. T., No. 3, and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He married, in Corvallis, Mary Goldson, a native of Mississippi, and who has borne him two children, Charles and Walter. Mr. Bilyeu ranks among the foremost legal exponents in the Willamette valley and personally he embodies those strong and admirable characteristics which win respect and command attention.

WILEY NORTON. Among the keen, progressive, and substantial agriculturists of Polk county, conspicuous for their ability and worth, is Wiley Norton, whose father, Lucius C. Norton, and maternal grandfather, Nahum King, were Oregon pioneers. An important factor in promoting the industrial interests of this section of the state, he is actively and prosperously engaged in his free and independent calling near Lewisville, his home farm being one and one-half miles from the village. A native of Missouri, he was born at Big Bend, Carroll county, March 27, 1844, and was but a year old when he was brought to Oregon.

Born in Illinois, December 26, 1818, Lucius C. Norton subsequently settled in Carroll county, Mo., where on October 7, 1839, he married Hopestill King, who was born February 7, 1816. Her father, Nahum King, an early settler of Missouri, was born in New York state. In 1845 Mr. Norton and Nahum King, with their families, crossed the dreary plains, coming to Oregon with ox-teams. Losing the trail at Meeks' cutoff, they were nine months on the way, and endured terrible hardships and privations, their provisions giving out just as they reached The Dalles. After spending the first winter on the Tualatin plains, in Washington county, they proceeded to Benton county, where both men took up donation claims of six hundred and forty acres each. The town thus founded, was afterwards named Kings Valley in honor of Mr. King, who became one of the leading men of the place. He was a tanner by trade, but engaged in general farming from the time he came to Benton county until his death, in 1853. Mr. Norton's farm adjoined that of his father-in-law, and he was there successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits during the remainder of his active career, dying at Kings Valley, May 6, 1859. His wife survived him many years, dying November 16, 1893, at Norton's Station, Lincoln county, Ore. Four boys and four girls were born of their union, six of whom are now living, namely: Isaac, a resident of Benton county; Wiley, the subject of this brief sketch; Ashnah, wife of James Plunkett, of Kings Valley; Sereptah, wife of Willard L. Price, of Kings Valley; Nahum, residing at Blodgett, Benton county; and Lucius C., of Lincoln county.

After completing his studies in the district school, Wiley Norton assisted his brothers for a while in the care of the home farm, after their father's death. On coming of age he married, and began housekeeping on a homestead farm of one hundred and sixty acres in Blodgett's valley. He continued there as one of the most successful farmers of the vicinity until 1900, when he assumed possession of his present farm, near Lewisville, Polk county, it being a part of the donation claim which Mrs. Norton's father took up from the government. He has ninety-three acres of land, the greater part of which is in a high state of cultivation, twelve acres being especially devoted to the cultivation of hops.

On May 18, 1865, on the farm which he now owns and occupies, Mr. Norton married Nancy A. Zumwalt, who was born on Tualatin plains, Washington county, Ore., May 25, 1847. Her father, the late Isaac Zumwalt, was born in St. Charles county, Mo., May 29, 1815. Coming to Oregon as a pioneer in 1846, he took up a donation claim near Lewisville, in Polk county, and was here engaged in mixed husbandry until his death, March 21, 1891. He married Sarah Crow, who was born in Missouri, June 13, 1815, and died on the home farm, in Polk county, June 8, 1885. Twelve children, seven boys and five girls, were born into their household, Mrs. Norton being the sixth child in succession of birth. Mr. and Mrs. Norton have six children living, namely: Arthur, residing in eastern Oregon; Warren, of Benton county; Le Roy, of Benton county; Walter, at home; Serena, a stenographer, in Idaho; and James Emmett, at home. Mr. Norton is a strong Republican in politics, and has served as road supervisor, and school director and clerk.

MRS. MARGARITE BECK. The business interests of Salem find a worthy representative in Mrs. Margarite Beck, who was for some time the owner of the Capital Brewery. She is the widow of Seirphein Beck, who was born in Alsace and came to America when nineteen years of age. He made his way into Illinois where he learned the brewing business, and in 1878 he came to Salem in the employ of Mr. Adolph, who was the owner of the old Salem Brewery on Trade street. Mr. Beck served as head brewer and subsequently he removed to Portland to act in the same capacity for Mr. Weinhard, filling that position until he was taken ill, when he returned to Salem. Later he again entered the employ of Mr. Adolph and because of his business ability and thorough understanding of the brewing industry he was admitted into partnership under the firm name of Adolph, Klinger & Beck. This relationship was maintained for three years, when Mr. Adolph sold out to his partners, Messrs. Klinger & Beck continuing together in the conduct of the old Salem Brewery. Later they purchased a new site and built a new brewing plant, conducting it under the name of the Capital Brewery until the death of Mr. Beck, on April 25, 1899.

In Salem, in 1879, Mr. Beck had been united in marriage to Miss Margarite Neibirt, who was born in Wisconsin, a daughter of Paulus Neibirt, whose birth occurred in Germany. He wedded Annie Frizholtz, also a native of the Fatherland, and soon after their marriage they came to the United States, settling in Wisconsin, where Mr. Neibirt followed farming. In 1871 he came to Oregon, settling in Benton county, and in 1872 removed to Sublimity. There he purchased a farm, but was not long permitted to enjoy his new home, for he became ill and died about 1876. His wife also passed away in Marion county in October, 1897. In their family were seven children, of whom four are yet living. One son, George, is a resident of Stayton, Marion county; Lizzie Schutt, a daughter, died in Sublimity; Mrs. Barbara Clasp, another daughter, is living in San Francisco, and Mrs. Mary Wolf now lives in Salem; another son, Conrad, was murdered while defending his house against an attack by robbers.

Mrs. Beck is the youngest of her father's family, and was born in Wisconsin. She attended German schools of that state and is a lady of culture and refinement, who possesses marked business ability and keen discrimination in matters of trade. After her husband's death she assumed the management of his business affairs, and, in 1901, she bought out the interest of Mr. Klinger's heirs and was the sole owner of the Capital Brewery until 1903, when she sold out. She remodeled the entire plant, and new machinery of the most modern kind and improvements was installed. In this connection she also operated an ice plant, engaged in the manufacture of pure ice, besides operating an extensive malt plant. While Mr. Beck and Mr. Klinger were associated in business they built the Klinger & Beck building on Commercial street, which has since passed into other hands.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Beck were born three children: Joseph Seirphein, Mary Leona and Louie Conrad, who died at the age of ten years. Mr. and Mrs. Beck belonged to the St. Joseph Catholic Church, in which faith Mr. Beck died, and was laid to rest in the Catholic cemetery. Mrs. Beck is still identified with the church, and is a liberal contributor to its support.

THOMAS LINCOLN AMBLER. The present postmaster of Mount Angel was formerly a well known educator. He was born in Pike county, Ohio, June 14, 1864, a son of Thomas and Catherine (Brill) Ambler, natives respectively of Guernsey and Pike counties, Ohio, and the former born July 7, 1831.

Thomas Ambler married Catherine Brill, whose father was born in Pennsylvania, and became an early settler of Pike county. He served in the war of 1812 as a private, and when the Civil war occurred he again entered the military service, enlisting in the Ninety-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in 1861, and was with the Army of the Potomac. While on picket duty he was taken prisoner by the rebels, and that they might not secure possession of a whole gun, he broke it over a log. He was confined in Libby prison, and was honorably discharged in Virginia, in 1865. Mr. Ambler was an active Republican. His death occurred at the home of his son in Illinois, at the age of eighty-four. In 1866 Mr. Ambler removed to Champaign county, Ill., where he settled on a small farm, and remained there until 1878. He then took up his residence near Fredonia, Wilson county, Kans., and ten years later removed to a farm near Bentonville, Ark., where his death occurred at the age of sixty-three years. Of the seven children born into his family, those beside Thomas Lincoln Ambler, of this review, are: William H., deceased; Sarah C., deceased; one child, deceased in infancy; Josiah E., engaged in the bakery business in Kansas City, Mo.; Effie V., the wife of E. D. Wright, of Portland, Ore., and Arletta M., the wife of Z. Briggs, their home being in Iowa.

The third of the children in his father's family, Thomas Lincoln Ambler received his elementary education in the public schools of Kansas, and eventually took a course in the Fredonia High school. At the age of fifteen he began to make his own way in the world, devoting his summers to hard manual labor and his winters to hard study. His efforts were not in vain. In his twenty-second year he began a most successful record as a teacher, which terminated sixteen years later. He taught for five years in the schools of Nebraska. He then removed to Oregon, where he soon won a reputation which placed him in the front ranks of his profession. In 1892 he located at Mount Angel, and for four years taught in the public schools at this place. He then devoted the last six years of what we may term a successful life to the welfare of Hazel Dell district, which adjoins Mount Angel on the south, and while thus employed, in 1898, was appointed postmaster of Mount Angel. His discharge of the duties of this office has necessitated his withdrawal from educational work, and it is a well-known fact that the strict attention to duty on the part of Mr. Ambler has brought the service in the city to a high state of efficiency. The office is now third-class, and under the administration of the present incumbent, and principally through his enterprise and public-spiritedness, the present postoffice building has been erected. This, a two-story building, is adequate for all present demands, and the system maintained has been prolific of good results. Fraternally Mr. Ambler is a member of Silverton Pine Camp No. 198, W. O. W., and politically has always been active in the Republican party.

In Salem, Ore., March 17, 1892, Mr. Ambler married Flora Wolf, who was born in Illinois, December 20, 1858. Her father was Daniel Wolf, a native of Preble county, Ohio, and was born February 9, 1835. Mr. Wolf removed from his native state to Illinois, thence to Missouri, and from there to Nebraska, locating near Lincoln. In 1892 he came to Oregon, but was not long permitted to enjoy the west, for his death occurred in 1896. The wife, who survives him, makes her home with her two sons on a farm near Silverton.

Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Ambler, Eda May and A. Dewey, the latter of whom was named by special request of his mother just a few moments before her death, which occurred June 18, 1899. The loss of this dear and sympathetic companion and wife has been a severe trial to Mr. Ambler, and he has found it difficult to take up alone the tasks that confront him from day to day.

JOHN D. HAMPTON. The roll call of the early plains emigrants, who struggled day after day and month after month in the effort to reach their northwestern goal, and who afterward lent an unwavering courage and dignity to Oregon's agricultural upbuilding, would be sadly incomplete without mention of John D. Hampton, a pioneer of 1845, who came to the state at the age of fourteen, and continued to make this his home until his lamented death, in March, 1899, at the age of sixty-seven years. Mr. Hampton bore himself well among the trials and dangers which beset the pioneer settlers, and though only a boy, seemed to realize the immensity of the task which rested on the shoulders of the forerunners of western civilization. He not only accomplished his individual mission as he saw it in his most ambitious moments, but left behind him six sturdy sons to perpetuate his fine personal characteristics and to become progressive and influential factors of a latter-day development.

Of a fine old southern family, Mr. Hampton was born in Lexington, Mo., in 1831, a son of Jacob Hampton, who was born in Kentucky, and grandson of a native of Virginia, who became an early resident of Kentucky. For many years Jacob Hampton built and contracted in Lexington, Mo., and in 1845 brought his family to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and settling first on the Tualatin plains, Washington county. Afterward he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres in Yamhill county, resided here until 1852, and then removed to a farm near Goshen, Lane county, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising for three years. Returning to his Yamhill county farm he lived there many years, and for several years also lived on a farm in Lake county. His last years were spent with his son, John D., near Goshen, and he died rich in experience, and with a moderate share of this world's possessions.

Following his father's footsteps, John D. Hampton became early interested in stock-raising, and when a comparatively young man took up a three hundred and twenty acre donation claim near Goshen. To this farm he brought his newly wedded wife, whom he married October 26, 1854, and who was formerly Mary Eleanore Moore. Husband and wife "put their shoulders to the wheel" to improve the crude property, and render it not only a profitable but a pleasant place in which to live. Harvests rewarded their efforts in well-doing, and soon more land was required for carrying on the large plans of the owner. Accordingly he increased his possessions to six hundred and fifty acres, all of which is still owned by his widow, one of the representative pioneer women of Lane county. Some time before his death, Mr. Hampton moved into Eugene and retired from active life, his last days being spent among friends whom he had long known, and by whom he was held in the highest esteem. Throughout his life he cherished high ideals, and instinctively impressed others with his absolute sincerity and truth. His business and private life was above reproach, and his steady, calm temperament, enabled him to pursue unflinchingly a course once marked out and clearly defined. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church from his sixteenth year, and during his life contributed generously towards its support.

Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Hampton has lived in the home in Eugene, and draws a liberal income from the farm. Born near Montezuma, Vermilion county, Ind., January 31, 1836, she is a daughter of William Moore, who was born in Pennsylvania, and who moved with his father, Jonathan, also a native of Pennsylvania, to Ohio, at a very early day. The family was established in Indiana in 1832, and there

William Moore owned a large farm and prospered as a farmer and stock-raiser. He was a discerning and ambitious man, and though cautious and conservative, readily grasped the full significance of the favorable reports which reached him from the west. Being well-to-do, he fared better on the plains than many of his neighbors, for he was able to purchase every comfort for his wife and four children, and to go well supplied with horses and cattle, as well as ox-teams. Although they suffered small inconvenience from the Indians or cholera, the alkali water of the desert killed many of their cattle, and they were obliged to replenish their stock by purchasing of other emigrants. The survivors of the long, six-months expedition still recall the details of the trip, and Mrs. Hampton, who was then twenty years of age, vividly remembers the trials and hardships endured by those brave pioneers who bore the brunt of the journey with Spartan courage. Mr. Moore took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Goshen, and died there at the age of seventy-five, his wife, who was formerly Eleanor Limerick, of Pennsylvania, surviving him until seventy-seven years of age. Mrs. Moore came of the famous old Limerick family, of Ireland, and her father rendered valuable service in the war of 1812. Jonathan L., one of the older sons of William Moore, was a first lieutenant in the Rogue river war, and died from drowning in Fall creek, about thirty years ago. Mrs. Hampton is the third child of her father's family, and although she has reached her seventy-first year she has a heart and mind in tune with the beneficent present. She is a believer in high living and high thinking, in courtesy and absolute fairness in all the little ways of life, and all who come in contact with her feel the charm of goodness and ideal sympathy. She is justly proud of her six sturdy sons and one daughter, and hopes to watch their successful careers for many years to come. Frank, the oldest son, is a member of the mercantile firm of Hampton Brothers; Horace lives on and farms the old home place; Hugh is a farmer near Eugene; Alton and John are at the head of Hampton Brothers, merchants; Austin lives in Eugene; and Nellie is at home.

W. E. CRESSY. As an educator of many years' experience, W. E. Cressy came to Oregon in 1881, and, in 1883, located in Independence, where he lived retired for many years. A man of more than ordinary endowments, he was a linguist and scholar, a brilliant performer on the violin, and a keen appreciator of things artistic and beautiful. Therefore, his influence was rather in the intellectual than the business world, and in this regard he filled a nook hitherto unoccupied to a great extent. A native of New Hampshire, Mr. Cressy was born September 23, 1846, and was reared on a farm, receiving his preliminary education in the public schools. Into an otherwise uneventful youth came the opportunity to serve his country during the Civil war, and at the age of seventeen he enlisted in Company H, First Regiment, New Hampshire Cavalry, serving for three months, or until a severe case of measles compelled his retirement. The bent of his mind is shown by his subsequent disposition of his bounty money, for he used it to pay his way through a New Hampshire college, from which he was duly graduated with honors.

In 1870 Mr. Cressy removed from New Hampshire to Henry county, Ill., where he engaged in teaching, and while there married and had two children, of whom Warren P. is a resident of South Bend, Wash., and Jessie is deceased. In 1873 Mr. Cressy located in Chico, Cal., and taught in the public schools of that city, winning praise for his thorough and practical methods of imparting knowledge. Desiring a change, he brought his family to Oregon in 1881, as heretofore stated, and here his first wife died in 1886. He entered heartily into various phases of northwestern life, his personality and gifts winning for him many admiring friends. After retiring from teaching he retained his interest in the languages, which he spoke with fluency, and also derived much comfort and satisfaction from composing music, of which he was unusually fond. On the violin he played with expression and delicacy, and in order to further an interest in music in Independence he organized an orchestra which he drilled, and of which he thought much. He was well posted on current events, was in touch with the political situation, and in conversation was most interesting and instructive. Although caring nothing for office, he served for a time as councilman. In religion he was a member of the Unitarian Church.

In 1889 Mr. Cressy married his second wife, Mary T. Turner, a native of Rock Island, Ill., and daughter of Elihu Turner, a native of New York City. Mr. Turner came from a mercantile rather than agricultural family, and that his parents were in moderate circumstances was perhaps the best for the strong young boy. At the age of twelve he apprenticed to a shoemaker, and, having mastered his trade, worked thereat until removing to Rock Island, Ill., in 1837. Rock Island was then but an embryo hamlet, so small that the industries represented did not include a shoemaking establishment. Mr. Turner therefore filled a waiting and necessary nook, and from a very small beginning worked up a trade which rendered him a comparatively wealthy man. He was influential in other lines than business, took a deep interest in political and other affairs, and was prominent and honored in the community, where his death occurred June 18, 1888, at the age of seventy-three years. He married Ann Tracy, who was born in Limerick, Ireland, and who came to Canada with her parents when six years of age. The family of Tracy moved to Rock Island in 1838, one year after the arrival of Mr. Turner. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Turner, three sons and three daughters, of whom Mrs. Cressy is the fourth. The latter was educated in the public schools of Rock Island, but in youth was not favored with a very robust constitution. In order to improve her health she removed to Denver, Colo., and later to Leadville and Cheyenne. She came to Oregon in 1889, and the same year occurred her marriage with Mr. Cressy. Mrs. Cressy is a woman of broad and liberal ideas, and during her husband's life was his most sincere appreciator and his unfailing sympathizer and helper. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

LORENZO A. BYRD. The story of the early experiences of the pioneers of the northwest is always of more or less interest, and particularly so when the journey was made overland, compelling the pioneer parties of the '40s frequently to endure hardships and sufferings which no pen will ever be able to describe. The reminiscences of such a man as Lorenzo A. Byrd, who is now living retired at No. 209 Union street, in Salem, would make a volume of intensely interesting narrative, from beginning to end. Surrounding him is that absorbing interest which is inseparably associated with the hardy forerunners of northwestern civilization, to whom danger was a spur, and deprivation an accepted heritage.

Lorenzo A. Byrd was born on a farm near Batesville, Independence county, Ark., December 10, 1822, a son of John and Mary (Wise) Byrd, both natives of Kentucky. Mr. Byrd was but two years of age when his father's death occurred. His mother afterward became the wife of Reuben Millsaps, an officer in the American army during the war of 1812, who commanded a portion of the forces under General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. To John and Mary Byrd were born three children: Micajah Luther, who died in Oregon; Virginia, also deceased, who became the wife of John Magnes, and Lorenzo A.

The first twenty-four years of the life of the subject of this sketch were spent upon the home farm in Arkansas, and it is safe to assume that he lost nothing from close association with the soil, correct living, and exercise which developed an already strong constitution. In his boyhood he knew no relatives excepting his mother and a first cousin. Like the other farmer lads of his neighborhood, life did not pass by unobserved by him, for he was keenly alert to all that the future might have in store for him. Accordingly, when the opportunity to cross the plains came to him in 1846, he welcomed it as a special dispensation of Providence, believing that the chance thus offered him reflected all that he had thought and dreamed regarding his future. The party of which he was a member was under the guidance of the Rev. Josephus Cornwall, the train consisting of eighty wagons. Starting out April 15, 1846, with a large number of oxen, the man for whom young Byrd drove found his resources dwindled down to two yoke of oxen before the journey was completed. During the journey many great hardships were experienced by the travelers, but the greatest of these were met with in the Applegate cutoff, where they suffered untold agonies of mind and body, nearly dying of starvation. If the members of the party had not been possessed of marvelous physical endurance fatalities must have ensued as the result of this most trying experience. The relief of the members of the party upon their arrival in Polk county in January, 1847, can scarcely be appreciated by modern tourists, who travel amid all the comforts, even luxuries, of the twentieth century.

In the month of April, 1847, Mr. Byrd located on land in the Waldo Hills, Marion county, fifteen miles east of Salem, but failed to prove up on the three hundred and twenty acres he intended to occupy. In the fall of 1848 he traveled overland to California, and after mining near Redding's Fort, on the Sacramento river, and on the American river, returned to Marion county in the spring of 1849. During the fall of the latter year he again visited California, where he remained until January, 1851. He made his way back to his home by water, and in 1852 bought the right to a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres fifteen miles north of Salem, on French Prairie. Wild and destitute of all improvements, this land underwent a great transformation at the hands of as earnest and hopeful a pioneer as ever turned a sod in the west. In the course of time this property, naturally very fertile, approached a cultivated and valuable state, supplying not only general farm produce, but large numbers of high-grade stock. In order to better educate his children, Mr. Byrd left the farm and made his home in Salem in 1890. Though still owning his farm, he rents it to others, and is now enjoying a well-earned rest from the cares and responsibilities of a long and very active life. Two hundred and ninety-two and a half acres still remain to him of the original claim.

January 1, 1854, after being thoroughly established on his claim, Mr. Byrd was united in marriage with Martha C. Savage, who was born in Missouri, December 3, 1836, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1850. Her father, Dr. John Savage, was for many years a very popular physician and farmer in Marion county, and left a large property at the time of his death. Eight children have been born unto Mr. and Mrs. Byrd, as follows: William H., a prominent physician of Salem, an extended sketch of whose life appears elsewhere in this volume; J. C., a hardware merchant of Spokane, Wash.; E. F., also a resident of Spokane; Cordelia J., wife of William Hager of Fairfield, Marion county; Lorenzo A., who lives in Fairfield; Virginia, who is an employe in the United States Land Office at Roseburg; Bertha C., who is engaged in educational work in the public schools of Salem, and Roy, who resides with his parents, and is now a student in the medical department of Willamette University.

A Democrat in politics, Mr. Byrd has served as school director for many years, but has not otherwise been actively interested in official life. Though past four score years of age, he still retains his mental and physical alertness to a remarkable degree, and exhibits a keen interest in the affairs of his family, his friends and the community in which he is a venerable and honored acquisition. He is a striking type of the better class of pioneers who founded the commonwealth, and the record of no man's life is more worthy of a place in the historical literature of the Willamette valley.

BENJAMIN C. MILES, a captain of industry of whom Oregon may well be proud, and who has been variously interested in the industrial, commercial, educational and political upbuilding of Newberg and vicinity, was born in Westbranch, Cedar county, Iowa, January 3, 1865, and is of English descent. The great-grandfather Miles came from England and settled in North Carolina, in which state his son, William, the paternal grandfather, was born, and whence he removed to Ohio, his last place of residence.

Benjamin Miles, the father of Benjamin C., was born in Miami county, Ohio, and was a farmer by occupation. During the early '50s he located in Cedar county, Iowa, where he engaged in farming, but later entered the Indian work, being appointed superintendent of the Osage Agency schools, a position maintained for six years. Mr. Miles became prominent in promoting the best interests of the Indians, and among his other attempts to ameliorate the condition of these wards of the nation was the establishment of the Manual Labor Institute, near Salem, Iowa, of which he was superintendent and manager for four years. This institution was run by contract with the government, Mr. Miles receiving so much per capita for educating the pupils under his charge. He accomplished a great and lasting work, and is enrolled among the noble and disinterested men who have labored for the uplifting of a race fast receding into the background of American history. Mr. Miles became associated with Oregon in 1887, and settled in Newberg, finally locating on sixty-five acres of land adjacent to the city of Newberg. Here he lived in comparative retirement up to the time of his death in 1890. His wife, Elizabeth R. (Bean) Miles, was born in New Hampshire, a daughter of a farmer and woolen manufacturer.

The youngest in his father's family of three sons and two daughters, Benjamin C. Miles was educated in the public schools and at Penn College, Iowa, from which latter institution he was graduated in the spring of 1886, with the degree of B. S. He came to Oregon in 1886, at the age of twenty-one years, and for a year engaged in educational work in the Friends' Pacific Academy, located at Newberg. He then became interested in a general merchandise business with F. A. Morris, and in 1893 became cashier of the bank of Newberg, which position he maintained until 1897. At the present time he occupies the responsible position of president of the bank of Newberg, and he is also secretary and treasurer and a large stockholder of the Charles K. Spaulding Logging Company. Near the town Mr. Miles owns sixty acres of land on the river, which he rents and which is devoted to general farming.

As a staunch adherent of the Republican party, Mr. Miles has filled many positions of trust and responsibility in the community, his active service being inaugurated in 1888, when he began a term of four years in the city council. In 1902 he was nominated and elected state representative from this district, and is ably and conscientiously advancing the interests of those who placed him in power. He is a member of the Friends' Church, and is fraternally associated with the Woodmen of the World.

In Newberg, Ore., Mr. Miles was united in marriage with Anna E. Bell, who was born in Iowa, and whose father, Martin Cook, a native of Indiana, was one of the early settlers of Iowa. Mr. Cook came to Oregon in 1887, after years of farming and successful service as a railway agent; he is now living a retired life in Newberg. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Miles, Lyra B., Ross C. and Eva, all of whom are living with their parents. Mr. Miles is typical of that class of men who invade the undeveloped regions of the world, leading them better and more advanced, and indelibly stamped with their strong personality.

JACOB G. MILLER. A citizen who owns one of the finest residences in Aurora, and occupies an honored place in the business and social world of the town, is Jacob G. Miller, a wheelwright by trade, who was formerly prominently connected with the colony founded by Dr. Keil. A native of Mahoning county, Ohio, Mr. Miller was born April 23, 1837, and is the fourth of the eight children born to Samuel and Sarah (Betts) Miller. The family was established in Ohio by the paternal grandfather, George, who was born in Pennsylvania, January 18, 1773, and who died in Mahoning county, Ohio. He married Mary Koup, who was born December 31, 1783, and who died in Oregon, to which state she came with her son in 1863, at the age of ninety-two years. She was the mother of eleven children, of whom Samuel, the father of Jacob G., was the oldest, he being born in Berks county, Pa., August 26, 1801, and moved with his parents to Ohio when quite a young man, and engaged in farming.

Jacob was a mere youth when he became interested in the colony at Bethel, with which he took up his abode in 1845. He subsequently became prominent in the affairs of the colony. His death occurred in Aurora in 1886.

The youth of Jacob G. Miller was characterized by hard work and little recreation, and still less opportunity for acquiring an education. He developed early a strong and wiry constitution, so that when very young he could accomplish almost a man's labor during the day. In 1863 he came to the branch colony in Aurora, and during his father's absence in Bethel, he took the place of the elder man as one of the lieutenants of Dr. Keil. When the father returned to the west the son went to Bethel and took his place at that end of the line, becoming in time president of the colony, and filling that position until the dissolution of the colony in 1880. Thereupon he took up his residence in Marion county, where he purchased a farm and lived thereon until coming to Aurora in 1899. Here he built a modern and comfortable residence which is a distinct credit to the architectural appearance of the town, and at the same time continues to own his farm of one hundred and twenty-four acres. He is also the possessor of three hundred acres of unimproved land in Clackamas county. In his youth in Missouri, Mr. Miller learned the trade of wheelwright, and devoted considerable time to the making of wagons and spinning-wheels. On his property in Aurora he has built a cabinet shop, and passes some of his leisure time in working at his trade. In 1882 he rented and ran a saw-mill from the fall until the summer of 1883, but did not make of it the success which he had anticipated.

In politics Mr. Miller has upheld the principles of the Republican party, and has held some prominent positions within the gift of his fellow-citizens, among others being that of recorder, to which he was elected in 1900. He has been road supervisor, and is now serving as councilman. Mr. Miller cast his first presidential vote for Abraham Lincoln. He is a Christian, but does not affiliate with any particular church. When he came from Missouri Mr. Miller brought with him five people, to all of whom he gave a home for the remainder of their lives. Of late he has been appointed guardian for Morton L. and Frederick A. Giesy, both of whom are living with him at the present time. Mr. Miller is a man of broad humanitarian tendencies, and a great deal of the good that he has accomplished during his life is of the unostentatious kind, the sole reward of which is found in an approving conscience and in the gratitude of individual hearts.

LEVI M. HERREN. A substantial and prominent farmer of Marion county, Ore., Levi M. Herren, who was born in Decatur county, Ind., September 7, 1835, is the son of John Herren, a Kentuckian, who, after his marriage in that state to D. Robbins, removed to Indiana, where he engaged in farming. In 1838 he took his family to what was then known as the Platt Purchase, near Arkansas City, Kas., where they made their home until the spring of 1845, when, with three wagons and three yoke of oxen to each wagon, they started across the plains. While on the way they fell in with Stephen Meeks, a brother of Joe Meeks, who attempted to pilot the party by a nearer route, but failed. The trip was made memorable, aside from the various incidents which made interesting the journey across the plains, by a dearth of provisions, the company being entirely out of flour at the time of their arrival at The Dalles, Ore. There Mr. Herren built a flatboat and with his family floated down the river to Cascade, Wash., and from there went to Whiteson, Yamhill county, Ore., where lived an uncle of the family. After one month spent there, they moved upon a farm on Salem Prairie, in March, 1846, and located four miles east of Salem, Ore., purchasing the right to six hundred and forty acres of a Mr. Gobin. A cabin having been erected there, the family at once found shelter. In 1848, Mr. Herren was attracted to California in the hope of sharing in the rich profits of mining, and after an absence of about five months, returned to Oregon with $2,000 in gold dust. He was thirty-nine days making the voyage from San Francisco to the mouth of the Columbia river, a fierce storm having driven them about on the ocean.

In 1849 Mr. Herren took up a donation claim of six hundred and thirty-five acres, located on Mill creek, six miles southeast of Salem, and near which the State Reform School has since been built. He remained here until his death in 1864, at the age of sixty-four years. Religiously he was a member of the Christian Church. His wife also died here when seventy-seven years old. Of the thirteen children born to them, all attained maturity, seven sons and six daughters, seven of whom are still living. Of these, Susanna is the wife of W. T. Wallace, of Josephine county, Ore.; Mary J., the wife of John Kiser, of Salem; Martha, the wife of Judge N. T. Katin, of Sprague, Wash.; Sarilda, the wife of T. S. Leonard, of Dayton, Wash.; N. F., located in Salem; and Levi M., of this review. Those now deceased are as follows: William, John, Daniel S., James R., Perry L., Bertha and Elizabeth H.

But ten years of age when his parents came to Oregon, Levi M. Herren has spent practically all his life in this state. He was reared on the paternal farm, engaging in home duties until 1859, when he located on a hundred-acre farm on Salem Prairie, where he followed farming until his father's death, at which time he returned to take charge of the home place and care for his mother, which he did until her death. He was married November 15, 1860, to Martha E. Mathews, a native of Missouri, who started across the plains with her parents in 1852, and met with the loss of both parents while on the journey. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Herren, of whom Thomas is still at home; Ida is the wife of R. N. Morris, of Oregon City, and Flora is the wife of George Bailey, of Portland. Mr. Herren now owns three hundred and eight acres, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising. In politics Mr. Herren is a Democrat. Though not a seeker after political preferment, he has filled local offices, and has always exhibited a deep interest in the welfare of his party. Fraternally he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and of the Turner Grange, and has been master of the latter body for several years.

Mr. Herren occupies a high place in the esteem of his fellow citizens in Marion county. He is known as a man possessed of a public spirit, always willing to assist in the promotion of all enterprises intended to enhance the material advantages of the community in which he resides, by the contribution of both time and money. He takes a broad-minded view of affairs in general, and in all ways has shown himself to be a useful citizen, meriting the respect of all with whom he comes in contact.

ALVIN A. BURTON, who has the reputation of making the best brick in the Willamette valley, was born near Rochester, N. Y., October 8, 1852, and from his father, Alvin A., Sr., acquired an appreciation of the merits of brick manufacturing. The elder Burton was born in Vermont, and came from an old and honored family. He learned brickmaking in early life, and eventually had a large plant at Brighton, N. Y., whence he removed, in 1853, to Princeton, Ill. Here, for many years he was the foremost brick manufacturer in the county, and, in 1866, removed to Marseilles, La Salle county, Ill., where his death occurred in 1877. He was a member of the Baptist Church, and in politics was a Republican. Mr. Burton married Harriet M. Baker, a native of Greenville, Greene county, N. Y., and daughter of David Baker, a farmer and miller by occupation. Mrs. Burton, who died in Illinois, was the mother of ten children, all of whom attained maturity, seven of whom are living, and four of whom are engaged in the brick business in Oregon.

In Princeton and Marseilles, Ill., Alvin A. Burton, Jr., received his education, and as a boy, learned brickmaking under the instructions of his father. He realized the advantage in dealing in a commodity for which there must always be a demand, and he was the first in his family to transfer his allegiance to Oregon, which promised such splendid results. In December, 1874, he made his way to this state, and in order to get a start, engaged as a clerk in a grocery store for three or four years. He was then employed by the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company as foreman of their woodyard at Celilo, and at the end of two years returned to Salem and became foreman of the State Penitentiary brickyard. This position was maintained by him for five years, and during that time the yards turned out an enormous number of brick, among other contracts making the brick used in the construction of the State Asylum for the Insane. The yearly output was two and a half million brick, and the quality was unsurpassed up to that time. Luman Burton, one of the brothers of the superintendent, came to Oregon in 1878, and filled a position in the yard with his brother, and some years later two other brothers, Edwin and Percy, arrived in the state, eventually making up the firm of Burton Brothers.

Upon severing his connection with the penitentiary, in 1883, Mr. Burton took charge of the brickyards of George Collins, of Salem, for five years, and of Theodore Jensen, of Portland, for three years. In the meantime, in 1890, with his brothers, he had purchased the Salem yards of Mr. Collins, and the following year came here to superintend their management, conducting his business under the firm name of Burton Brothers. In 1894 he became sole owner of the yards, and has since conducted them independently. He owns twenty acres of clay land on State street, also three and a half acres on Twenty-fourth street, between State and Asylum avenue. The capacity of the yards is sixteen thousand a day, or more than two million a year, and abundant facilities for shipping are furnished by a switch run into the yards from the Southern Pacific Railroad. Aside from the numerous contracts filled in Salem, Mr. Burton has furnished the brick for the construction of the State University at Eugene, and for the government Indian school at Shewawa. In Salem he has supplied brick for the Odd Fellows' building, the city hall, the Bayne building, the Schriber building, and many others of equal importance. The brick are manufactured with horse power machinery.

The beautiful brick residence built by Mr. Burton on East State street, between Twenty-first and Twenty-second streets, is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Daisy G. Colwell, a native of Comanche, Iowa, and daughter of C. H. Colwell, a native of Delaware. Mr. Colwell was a builder and contractor, and an early settler in Iowa, where he lived for many years in Moingona, Boone county. In 1875 he came to Salem and continued his occupation up to the time of his death, in March, 1884, at the age of sixty years. He was a member of the Baptist Church, as is also his wife, Hannah (Howard) Colwell, a native of Greenville, N. Y., and who still lives in Salem at the age of seventy-three years. Three of the children born to Mr. and Mrs.

Colwell are living, Mrs. Burton being the second. She is the mother of two children, of whom Roy, a graduate of the Capitol Business College, is bookkeeper for the banking firm of Ladd & Bush, and Delbert is living at home. Mr. Burton is a Republican in politics, and finds a religious home in the Baptist Church. He is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JAMES STARR VAN WINKLE. The descendant of an old Knickerbocker family, James Starr Van Winkle has well kept up the traditions of the early Hollanders in New York state, both in personal characteristics and public prominence, becoming in this western state, of which he is a native son, a man of wide popularity and gratifying success through the many admirable traits which distinguish him. Chiefly by his own efforts has Mr. Van Winkle won the position he holds today in Albany, one of social prominence and intellectual equality.

The grandfather of Mr. Winkle, Isaac, spent the greater part of his life in the middle west, living in Kentucky and Tennessee, and from the latter state emigrating to Oregon in 1859, where he died in Linn county soon after his arrival. He was a worthy representative of an old Dutch family that had made New York its home at an early date in the history of our country, fighting for national honor both in the war of 1812 and the Mexican war. His son, Isaac N., was born in Kentucky and reared in east Tennessee, among the Cumberland mountains of Morgan county, engaging in agricultural labor on the paternal farm, and crossed the plains of Oregon with his father's family in 1859, where he located in Linn county. He went first to the mines of Bannock City, Idaho, where he remained for several seasons, at the close of that period returning, and with the fruits of his labor purchasing a farm near Halsey, where he is now engaged in farming. Religiously he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he is an ordained minister. Fraternally he affiliates with the Masons. He married Elizabeth Pearl, a native of Missouri, and daughter of James Pearl. The latter was born in Ohio, and on attaining manhood settled in Missouri, from which state he emigrated in 1852 to Oregon, crossing the plains and locating first in Linn county, near Jefferson, and later taking up a donation claim east of Harrisburg, upon which he lived for many years. Upon retiring from the active cares of life he located in Halsey, where his death occurred in 1898. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Van Winkle are as follows: James Starr, of this review; I. H., an attorney of Salem; J. O., a student in the medical department of Willamette University, of Salem; J. F., of the United States Hydrographic office in Portland; Charles W., on the home farm, and Sarah C., now the wife of J. G. Patterson, of Salem.

James Starr Van Winkle was born near Halsey, Linn county, Ore., December 30, 1866, and was reared upon the paternal farm until he was seventeen years old. At that age, having acquired a fair education through application and attendance at the district school in the vicinity of his home, he began teaching in the common schools of his native county, with the view to appropriating the funds so acquired for a collegiate course. Energy and perseverance succeeded, and he later entered Willamette University, where he remained for three years. For some time after leaving college he engaged in the drug business in Silverton, Ore., and in 1888 located in Albany, where he has since made his home, being then interested in the abstract of title business, and later one of the founders of the Linn County Abstract Company, of which he was manager for some time. In 1898 he was appointed chief clerk of the Albany postoffice, and in 1899 was elected city recorder of Albany, and was re-elected in 1901. He is now justice of the police court, justice of the peace, and city recorder.

December 19, 1888, Mr. Van Winkle was married in Marion county to Miss Lida B. Hayes, a native of Marion county, and daughter of John C. Hayes, a druggist of Silverton, and of the union three children have been born, being named in order of birth as follows: J. Stanley, V. Keith and James Hayes. Fraternally, Mr. Van Winkle is prominent. In the Knights of Pythias he is past chancellor, and was representative to the State Grand Lodge; as a member of the Knights of the Maccabees he is past officer and for six years served as state commander, and is now serving as past commander; he is ex-president of Delazon Smith Cabin, No. 9, Native Sons of Oregon; consul of the Woodmen of the World; past workman of the Ancient Order of United Workmen; and a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He is also secretary of the Alco Club, having held this position since its organization.

ELISHA P. MORCOM. As an exponent of legal science Elisha P. Morcom ranks high in professional circles in Marion county, for although Woodburn claims him as her pioneer and foremost attorney, his skill in adjusting complications touching the law has created a demand for his services far beyond the borders of his promising little town. Mr. Morcom was born in Dodgeville, Wis., February 6, 1860, his father, John, having been born near Sunny Corners, England. His grandfather, Captain John Morcom, was captain of the Bodmonic (Wis.) mines, and was sent by an English company to Eagle Harbor, Mich., where he opened the first copper mines of that vicinity. These mines proved a source of great profit to their promoters, and so practically exhaustless are they that they are being worked at the present time. The grandfather died in Michigan before his grandson was born, leaving behind him an example of industry and correct living. His son, John, eventually located at Dodgeville, where he combined mining and farming, and where he died at the early age of thirty years. His wife, Lucy (Scourick) Morcom, was born in St. Ives, England, of Cornish descent. Some years after the death of John Morcom, she married James Pratt, a native of Yorkshire, England, who came to the United States with his parents when twelve years of age. He is engaged in mining in Wisconsin, making his home in Dodgeville.

The only child in his father's family, Elisha P. Morcom was left to the sole care of his mother when six months of age. He was educated in the public schools, graduating from the high school in 1883. At a very early age he became interested in the study of law, and it was practically no trouble for him to decide upon devoting his life to this interesting profession. At the age of sixteen he began to study law with the firm of Briggs & Jenks, of Dodgeville, and thereafter devoted his leisure to increasing his knowledge in this direction. For four years he was assistant postmaster of Dodgeville, and in 1887 took up his residence in Tower, Minn., where he was admitted to the bar in 1891, and formed a co-partnership with W. H. Johnson, of Tower, an association amicably continued until 1893. He practiced law for three months in the Marquam building at Portland and in January, 1892, came to Woodburn and the next year he removed to Silverton. Having better opportunities in Woodburn he returned in 1894, and took up his practice under very favorable conditions, as he had no competitor in the profession, and there was a large field for a substantial and reliable man in the community. For seven years he has acceptably served as city attorney of Woodburn, and at the same time has had in charge the greater part of the important cases in the neighborhood. He has a profound understanding of law, is lucid and clear in his expositions, and eloquent and convincing in his argument.

In Dodgeville, Wis., Mr. Morcom was united in marriage with Libbie Hooper, who was born in Dodgeville, October 23, 1860, and whose father, William Hooper, was born in England and emigrated to America when a boy of twelve. Mr. Hooper was for many years identified with a flourishing merchandise business in Dodgeville, but is now retired from active life. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Morcom, Lucy A., is in the second year of the preparatory department of Willamette University at Salem. Mr. Morcom is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with Lodge No. 102, I. O. O. F., and Knights of the Maccabees, Tent No. 8. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is superintendent of the Sunday school, and has had charge of the senior Bible class since coming to Woodburn.

ALEXANDER SEAVEY. If any man is able to appreciate the peace and tranquillity of an agricultural existence it seems as if that man might be Alexander Seavey, now engaged in a large stock-raising and hop business on his farm of eleven hundred acres, near Eugene. The early life of Mr. Seavey was sufficiently crowded with daring and eventful happenings to please the most ambitious seeker after adventure, and many a boy whose ideas of life are gained from books of travel and imagination might well envy him his early experiences in the midst of danger and hair-breadth escapes. As a lad he played in the sands of Penobscot bay, on the west shore, and ten miles from the ocean, in front of the town of Rockland, Me., where he was born April 1, 1824. As he thus played, his thought was centered more on the outgoing than the incoming boats, and he wondered whither they were going and what their errand across the deep. As he grew older he used to go out in fishing-boats, and his joy and sorrow was gauged by the size of the catch which he sold as a means of livelihood. Gradually the shore limits grew tiresome, and to realize his dreams he embarked in a sailing vessel in the West Indian trade, in 1849 shipping as mate on the bark Challenge. The Challenge was destined for a dreary ending of its career, for off the Brazilian coast, South America, it burned, the crew making their escape in boats. For three days the faithful mariners wandered around the open sea, and after reaching land remained on Brazilian territory until the following July.

Taking passage on a Scotch ship, Oughtertyre, from Aberdeen, Scotland, Mr. Seavey was certainly risking his life, for he was regaled with the cheerful information that the former crew, with the exception of the captain and cook, had died of yellow fever. This boat was destined for San Francisco, and one hundred and seventy-three days were required to round the Horn, severe storms impeding the progress of the stanch little craft. Once in California, Mr. Seavey went to the mines of Trinidad, and there embraced a waiting opportunity by purchasing mules and running a pack-train. Accustomed to the life of a land-dweller, and liking it quite as well as the sea, he started a little store on Althouse creek, Josephine county, Ore., in partnership with George O. Collins. This little store proved a decided success, and was continued uninterruptedly for five years, at the end of which time Mr. Seavey sold out to his partner and went on a mining expedition to the Rogue river. In 1855 he came to Lane county and took up one hundred and sixty acres of land in the hills, three miles north of Springfield, and there engaged in stock-raising on a large scale, starting with a band of three hundred and fifty cows and calves. With the money made from this successful enterprise he purchased his present farm of eleven hundred acres, and in 1883 started hop-raising on a small scale, gradually increasing until his one hundred acres are invaded by an army of pickers every fall and reap for their employer a handsome fortune.

Through his marriage with Sarah A. Blachly the following children have been born to Mr. Seavey: William C. is a farmer of Lane county; James, John and Jess are at home; Anna is the wife of Ed Bushnell; Alwilda is the wife of Jasper Wilkins; and Sophronia is deceased. It will be seen that perseverance and industry have been leading factors in the life of Mr. Seavey, and that the humble sailor starting away from the coast of Maine had the heart and brain and good judgment to put to practical use the abilities and opportunities which were his by natural right.

BENJAMIN F. GIESY, M. D. A promising young medical practitioner, destined to reflect great credit upon his native town of Aurora, Benjamin F. Giesy, born here February 15, 1875, is the representative of a family numerously represented in the medical profession.

Martin Giesy, from whom his son inherits a keen appreciation of the importance of medical science, was born in Pennsylvania, and came as a child with his parents to Bethel, Mo., whence he came with the other members of his family to Oregon in 1855, across the plains. He was a very warm friend of Dr. Keil, the founder of the Aurora Colony, and through him became interested in medicine, for the practice of which he qualified in the state, and thereafter entered upon a practice covering many years. In the early days he experienced all of the discomforts of a laborious and extensive country practice, and used to ride long and weary distances to patients who placed implicit faith in him, and hesitated to call anyone else. He was very popular with all classes, and, added to a profound knowledge of his chosen calling, possessed a genial and optimistic disposition, which not only made but retained friends. His very presence in a sick room seemed to be an antidote for many of the ills to which flesh is heir, and his retirement from practice was deeply regretted by his many hundreds of patients. As his practice increased he saw the necessity of a drug store in the place, and at present owns the only one in the town. Through his marriage with Martha Miller, seven children have been born into his family, five boys and two daughters, of whom three sons and one daughter are living.

The preliminary education of Benjamin F. Giesy was received in the public schools of Aurora, Ore., after which he studied Greek, German and Latin with a private tutor. In 1892 he entered the State Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1896, and thereafter, from 1896 to 1897, served as house surgeon in the Good Samaritan Hospital in Portland. He was also graduated from Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1900; and entered upon the active practice of medicine in Aurora in 1897. He is filling his father's place to an extent hardly prophesied by the most sanguine, and has won a popularity and good will which presages uninterrupted success. Dr. Giesy is well known fraternally, and is identified with the Masons, the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees. He is examining physician for all the local orders that have insurance privileges except the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JAMES L. ATWATER. One of the many enterprising men engaged in farming in the rich and fertile lands of Polk county is James L. Atwater, residing near Lewisville, who has brought to his chosen calling good business methods, and is meeting with deserved success in his labors. A son of Miles L. Atwater, he was born February 4, 1852, in Fulton county, Ill. His paternal grandfather, Lyman Atwater, was born in Connecticut in 1798, and died in Illinois in 1863. Migrating westward from his New England home he located first in Ohio, afterwards settling in Illinois as a pioneer of Fulton county. He was a man of great activity; fully interested in the welfare of his county and state, and after serving in the Blackhawk war assisted in driving the Mormons from the Nauvoo settlement in Illinois.

A native of Ohio, M. L. Atwater was born October 20, 1825, in Ashtabula county, but was reared in Fulton county, Ill., where he learned the cooper's trade. On the breaking out of the Civil war, he enlisted in the Sixth Iowa Infantry, but after serving six months had the measles, and was subsequently discharged on account of physical disability. Re-enlisting in the Eighty-fifth Illinois Infantry, in Company G, he served throughout the remainder of the war, being with Sherman on his march to the sea. Passing through various engagements without being wounded, he was mustered out of service and returned to Illinois, where he turned his attention to agricultural pursuits. In 1891 he came to Oregon and purchased a farm near Lewisville and afterwards lived with his son, James L. Atwater, near Lewisville, until his death, April 20, 1898. His wife, whose maiden name was Harriet Baldwin, was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, December 8, 1832, and now resides in Portland, Ore., making her home with her daughter, Mrs. Hollister. She bore her husband four children, namely: L. H., who lives at Hillsboro, Ore.; James L., the subject of this sketch; Emma J., wife of Thomas Hollister, living at University Park, Portland, Ore.; and William, also of Portland.

Leaving school when thirteen years of age, James L. Atwater worked as a farm laborer for about six years. The following twelve years he was employed on the Wabash railroad as a stonemason, in the meantime learning the trade of a carpenter and bridge-builder. Going to Minnesota in 1880, he was engaged in carpentering in Minneapolis for four years. From there he went to Idaho in the spring of 1884, and until August of that year was engaged in mining in the Coeur d'Alene district. Not meeting with success, Mr. Atwater continued westward to Polk county, and located on his present farm, near Lewisville. He has seventy-three acres of land, which were formerly a part of the donation claim taken up by his father-in-law, Mr. I. Zumwalt. In addition to general farming he pays much attention to stockraising, and is carrying on a substantial business, each year adding materially to his income.

In 1895 Mr. Atwater married Amelia Zumwalt, a native of Polk county, and they have three children, namely: Essie, Hattie and Mamie. A staunch supporter of the principles of the Republican party, Mr. Atwater takes an intelligent interest in public affairs, and since 1888 has served as school director. He is a member of the South Methodist Episcopal Church of Lewisville, of which he has been one of the board of trustees since its organization. Mrs. Atwater belongs to the Evangelical Church of Lewisville.

SARAH C. PRICE. Previous to their marriage in Ohio, Edward B. Waters and Sarah Griffith had moved with their parents from their respective homes in Frederick county, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and from Ohio moved to Porter county, Ind., where Sarah, the future Mrs. Price was born, the third in a family of two sons and three daughters. The children were reared in the public schools of Indiana, and the parents, having heard much about the superior agricultural and other advantages in the far northwest, determined to see for themselves if these reports could be verified. Accordingly, they disposed of the Indiana farm in 1852, and in the fall of the same year went to Iowa, remaining in that state until the following spring. In Iowa they made the necessary preparations for crossing the plains, outfitting with ox-teams and loose cattle, and their journey extended from May until October. They encountered many Indians on the way, but were able to hold their own, and arrived at their destination in Polk county in fairly good condition. In the spring of 1854 the father took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Pedee, but in 1859 disposed of it and settled on a farm in Klickitat county, Wash. In 1865 they came to Polk county, Ore., and settled on a farm near where Mrs. Price now lives, but in later life they lived in retirement in Dallas, where the father died at an advanced age. The mother at present lives with W. D. Turner, of Airlie, Ore.

Sarah Waters remained at home with her parents until her marriage, in 1859, with Marcus D. L. Gilliam, son of that splendid old pioneer and Indian fighter, Cornelius Gilliam, around whom centers a world of adventure and romance, and whose name will be connected with the earliest civilization of Oregon as long as history endures. Marcus Gilliam was born in Platte county, Mo., and crossed the plains with his father in 1844, settling temporarily on the farm of his father near Dallas. He afterward took up the claim upon which Mrs. Price now lives, and where the father and mother spent several years of harmonious married life. Mr. Gilliam was not destined for long life, for he died on this place, March 27, 1868, at the age of thirty-four years, two months and eleven days. His life was ennobled by a self-sacrificing service in the Yakima war of 1855-6, and it is said of him that he was an excellent farmer, a kind husband, and a good friend. Three children were born to himself and wife, and of these, Frank, the oldest, is managing the home farm; Alice A. is the wife of W. D. Mohney, of Salem, Ore.; and Esther is deceased.

About 1883 Mrs. Gilliam was united in marriage with Larkin Price, who was born in Virginia. Mrs. Price owns two hundred and seventeen acres of land, which is proving productive and remunerative under the excellent management of her son Frank. She is one of the highly respected and broad-minded women of her neighborhood, and many friends delight to visit her hospitable and comfortable home. General farming and stock-raising are carried on extensively, and fine improvements are combined with modern and scientific methods.

PHILIP T. AND CHARLES F. HICKS.

In the vicinity of Silverton are to be found many rich and productive farming estates, and among the energetic and self-reliant men who are conducting its agricultural interests the subjects of this sketch occupy no unimportant place. They are numbered among the brave pioneers of this section of Marion county, and are still living on the farm on which they settled with their parents in 1866, their property being situated on Silver Creek road, about two and one-half miles southeast of Silverton.

Coming from excellent New England ancestry, they are sons of Frisby Hicks, who was born July 27, 1806, in Vermont, but was reared and educated in New York state, and in Indiana, his parents having lived in both states. As a boy of sixteen years, Frisby Hicks determined to make his own way in life, and with that object in view began flat-boating on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. A few years afterward he had made such progress in his new occupation that he found himself the owner of a line of steamboats plying between St. Louis and New Orleans. He made his home, however, in Indiana until 1846, when he removed with his family to St. Louis, where he lived a year. Giving up his boats at that time, he located in Iowa, and was there successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1866, when, lured by the prospects of cheap land in a new country, he came to Marion county, making the five months' journey by team across the plains, and having but little trouble with the Indians on the way. Buying the four hundred and eighty acres of land comprised in the present homestead of his sons, he labored, with the help of his children, to redeem a farm from the wilderness, and by dint of hard labor, thrift and good management succeeded well, rendering it one of the finest estates in the vicinity. He lived to the ripe old age of four score and four years, honored and respected by all. He took an intelligent interest in public affairs, and while a resident of Iowa served a number of terms as justice of the peace. In 1839 he married Catherine Taylor, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died at the age of seventy-two years, on the home farm in Silverton. Of the children born of their union, six are living, namely: Philip T.; Charles F.; Mary E., wife of John Maulding, of Yamhill county; John, of Silverton; E. Pitt, and Harry P., who live near Silverton.

Philip T. Hicks was born March 22, 1844, in Patriot, Switzerland county, Ind. He received excellent educational advantages, and in his younger days taught school several terms. During the Civil war he gave evidence of his patriotism by enlisting May 16, 1864, in Company H, Forty-fifth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, being mustered into service at Keokuk. With his regiment he was sent first to Memphis, Tenn., and assigned to garrison duty during the four months prior to the expiration of his term of enlistment. On returning from the scene of conflict, he remained at home until 1866, when he crossed the plains with his parents, and from that time until the present has resided on the homestead which he ably assisted his father in clearing and improving, and is now successfully employed in general farming and stock-raising. He is a staunch Republican in politics, and has served on the school board, and as road supervisor. He is an active member of the Grand Army of the Republic, in which he takes great interest. Philip T. Hicks married, December 22, 1881, Nettie Morley, a native of Silverton, and a daughter of John Morley, and into their household six children have been born, namely: Alma, Morton, Audrey, Tero, and Avery M. and Avis M., twins.

Charles F. Hicks was born in Patriot, Ind., December 26, 1841, and was educated in the district schools of Iowa. In 1863 he offered his services to his country, enlisting in Company B, Fourth Iowa Independent Battery. After being mustered in at Davenport, he went to New Orleans, where he assisted in protecting railroad property, being on guard duty a large part of the time that he was in service. At the close of the war he returned to the parental homestead, and the following year, accompanied his parents and their family in the long trip across the plains. He labored with characteristic energy in the clearing and improving of the farm on which his parents settled, and where, with the exception of five years that he had charge of a grist-mill in Silverton, he has since resided. He is actively engaged in farming, being associated with his brother Philip, with whom he makes his home, and is deservedly prosperous in his undertakings. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and is a staunch Republican in politics, being a leader in party affairs. He has served to the satisfaction of his constituents in various public offices, and represented his county in the state legislature one term, having been elected to the office in June, 1886.

JOHN C. MCCREA, commissioner of Yamhill county, represents a type of citizen in whom is blended enthusiasm for whatever he has to do, a healthy mind and sterling integrity, and that most precious of possessions—hard common sense. In the hard school of self-culture Mr. McCrea learned all his lessons of life, his affiliation with the serious and responsible side of life having been inaugurated at a very early age. He was born in Branch county, Mich., September 16, 1847, and at the age of five years lost his father, John McCrea. The elder McCrea was a native of Ireland, and in his native land was engaged in farming and saw-milling. He came to the United States with his parents, settling in Crawford county, Ohio, from where he removed to the farm in Michigan, where his death occurred at the age of fifty years. He was a practical farmer and expert lumberman, and managed by industry and frugality, to lay up quite a little property. His wife, Rachel (Eberhard) McCrea, was born in Pennsylvania, and came to Ohio with her parents when a child. Her great-grandfather served in the war of 1812. Mrs. McCrea had nine children, four sons and five daughters, John C. being the youngest son and eighth child.

Left fatherless, at the age of five, John C., at nine, was leading a horse that was working a stump puller, and from this minor occupation graduated into work requiring muscular development and business ability. Childish diversions were almost unknown to the lad, who in 1871, departed from his native surroundings, having acquired considerable experience while managing comparatively large interests. In search of a favorable permanent location, he lived for a year in Freemont county, Iowa, and one year in Clay county, Mo., 1873 finding him again in Freemont county. In 1874 he located in Republic county, Kans., on the state line, and, in 1875, removed to California, locating forty miles southeast of San Francisco. Here he drove a six-mule team, and also farmed and worked in a brickyard. In 1876 he investigated conditions up in the Sound country, and in March, 1877, located on a farm of two hundred and fifty acres on the Willamette river in Marion county, to which he added later by purchase, one hundred and sixty acres. This property was improved to a large extent by Mr. McCrea, and disposed of in 1901, although he had taken up his residence in Newberg in 1899. The McCrea residence is one of the most beautiful in the town, situated in the midst of five acres of orchard land on the banks of the Willamette. The members of the family are popular and well known, and the hospitality and good fellowship dispensed are proverbial.

A staunch Independent, Mr. McCrea has taken an active interest in the political undertakings of this county, and has variously served the interests of the communities in which he has lived. In Marion county he was road commissioner for several terms, and in Yamhill and Marion counties he has been a member of the school board. On the Populist ticket he was elected county commissioner in 1902, and is acceptably filling this important responsibility. Among the many outside interests which claim the attention of Mr. McCrea may be mentioned the vice-presidency of the Chehalem Valley Bank, of which he is a stockholder, and of which he has been a director for seven years. He is also interested in oil wells in California, and in mines, being a stockholder in the Little Giant Gold Mining Company, the prospects of which look very encouraging. Mr. McCrea is fraternally associated with the Blue Lodge of Masons, the Knights and Ladies of Security, and the United Artisans.

At Burr Oak, St. Joseph county, Mich., on December 25, 1867, Mr. McCrea married Altha Eleanor Baldwin, whose father, Daniel, was born in Connecticut and died in Michigan, at the age of fifty-five. Six children have been born into the McCrea home: Frederick L., born in Branch county, Mich., May 16, 1869, resides in Umatilla county, Ore.; Willis J., born in Clay county, Mo., January 15, 1873, died December 28, 1873; Elsie C., born in Branch County, Mich., December 12, 1874, died April 25, 1902; Edith A., born in Marion county, Ore., October 2, 1882; John C., born in Marion county, Ore., August 2, 1885; Archie E., born in Yamhill county, Ore., November 23, 1894. Mr. and Mrs. McCrea have five grandchildren, four boys and one girl.

JAMES N. B. FULLER. Foremost among the men of large capacity who are developing the giant lumber industry of Oregon is James N. B. Fuller, partner of J. B. Hopkins, in the Eugene Lumber Company, and a man of forceful characteristics and practical upbuilding tendencies. In common with all of the captains of industry who have achieved success in the state, the early life and environment of this merchant are of interest to an onlooking public, for unquestionably the majority who are struggling for a competency may profit by a knowledge of the means pursued by those high in public esteem.

The Fuller ancestry is an interesting one, and reaches far back into dim colonial days to one Thomas Fuller, whose desire for larger opportunity inspired him to embark from English shores in 1632, and assume the life of self-sacrifice and small compensation to which the earliest settlers of Massachusetts were heir. The next in order of succession of whom record has been kept is Israel Fuller, the paternal grandfather of James N. B., and who represented the sixth generation in the United States. This sire was born in the stronghold of conservatism in Danvers, Mass., and in time established his family in New Hampshire, where he owned and operated a large farm for the balance of his life. At one time he lived in Amherst, N. H., where his son, Samuel, the father of James N. B., was born, in 1807, and who continued to spend his days in Hillsboro county, his death occurring two miles from where he was born, at the age of eighty-five years. He married into the Hastings family, which also had its representatives among the colonists. Mrs. Fuller was born and reared in Shirley, a post township of Middlesex county, Mass. Four of the six children born to Samuel Fuller and his wife are living, James N. B., the only son in the family, dating his birth from October 9, 1850.

Educated in the public schools and at the New Ipswich Academy, James N. B. Fuller applied himself to the mastery of civil engineering when he was eighteen years old, eventually following the same in Hillsboro county, N. H., for three or four years. After coming to Oregon in 1877 he spent the first winter in McMinnville, and in the spring of 1878 engaged in the planing-mill business in Crawfordsville, Linn county, with Mr. Crawford, after whom the town was named. In 1884 the partners extended their operations to the banks of the Mohawk, where they built a water-power sawmill, operated it for a year, and then built a steam-mill at the mouth of the Mohawk. This mill was not long after removed to McGowan Creek, and operated until Mr. Fuller came to Eugene in 1890 to help start on its successful career the Eugene Lumber Company. With his partner he built the mill by the bridge, which in 1900 was burned to the ground, and which calamity necessitated the building of the present modern structure.

In Baldwin, Kans., in April, 1893, Mr. Fuller married Mamie Carman, a native of Omaha, Neb., being born in August, 1862. Mrs. Fuller is the daughter of John and Mary (Lynde) Carman, now residents of Eugene, the former born in England and the latter in New York. One son, James Carman, a bright and interesting child, has blessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Fuller. Mr. Fuller is a Republican in political affiliation, and is variously connected with fraternal and social organizations in the county. He possesses the elements of popularity and success, and to an exceptional degree enjoys the confidence of the community in which he dwells.

JOHN T. JAMES. Diversified farming, stock and hop-raising are being successfully conducted on the three hundred and ten acre farm of John T. James, in the vicinity of Suver, Polk county. Mr. James has been a resident of this county for so many years that he is considered an important part of its development, and a typical representative of its prosperity. From a middle-west farm in Cumberland county, Ill., where he was born January 17, 1848, he crossed the plains in 1866 with his parents, Samuel M. and Julia A. (Troxel) James, the latter a native of Indiana, and the former born in 1818. On the maternal side Mr. James is of German descent, his mother's family having been represented in America for many years. Samuel M. James was a shoemaker by trade, and also farmed during the greater part of his active life, devoting himself exclusively to the latter occupation after locating on his farm in Douglas county, Ore., in the fall of 1866. He was not destined to long enjoy his life in the west, for his death occurred in 1868. He was survived by his wife until 1888, when she died at the age of sixty-seven years. Besides John T., the youngest of the three children, there is J. H., the oldest son, living in Coquille, Coos county, Ore., and Mary Jane, the wife of George Hall of Ashland, Ore.

The farm-reared youth of today can hardly realize the difficulty which John T. James had in acquiring an education, for his father's ill health in both Illinois and Oregon made it imperative that the sons assume the entire responsibility on the farm, a fact which gave them little opportunity to attend the schools of their neighborhood. That Mr. James is today a well informed and well educated man is due entirely to later application, and to his appreciation of books and periodicals. He was eighteen years of age when he came to Oregon, and three years later, in 1870, he moved to Polk county, and near Suver engaged in the pork-packing business. Afterward he engaged in other occupations in the neighborhood, remaining there about four years. Later he returned to Douglas county, and near Oakland went into the stock-raising business, being thus employed until 1891. He then sold out and returned to Polk county, locating on a farm formerly owned by J. W. Suver, near Suver, eighteen acres of which are under hops.

Notwithstanding his busy agricultural life Mr. James has found time to interest himself in politics and social diversions, thus placing himself in touch with all phases of life in this county. On the Democratic ticket he has been elected school director and clerk, and has also served as road supervisor. Fraternally he is connected with the United Artisans of Wells, and the Masons of Oakland, Douglas county. March 15, 1873, he married Carolene Suver, who was born in Polk county, December 9, 1854, and in honor of whose father the town of Suver was named. Seven children have been born of this union, the order of their birth being as follows: Joseph H., of Washington; Julia Ann, at home; Mary Alice, the wife of A. E. Harper, of Springfield, Lane county, Ore.; John E., at home; Carolene, the wife of O. M. Allen, of Suver, Ore.; Harriett Elizabeth, at home; and Lenora Belle, also at home. Mr. James is a practical and scientific farmer, and his buildings, fences, and general improvements give evidence of a progressive and resourceful mind. He is appreciated for his many fine traits of character, and especially for his sincerity and public spiritedness.

Theron A. Ireland. As fine and productive a farm as one would care to own is that occupied by Theron A. Ireland, one of the successful stock-raisers and farmers of Polk county. Of Scotch-Irish descent, Mr. Ireland claims Jackson county, Ind., as the place of his nativity, the date thereof being December 10, 1842. His parents were David and Mary A. (Sanderson) Ireland, and his grandparents were James and Sarah (Burnell) Ireland, the grandfather being a native of Pennsylvania.

Near the paternal farm in the vicinity of Sheridan, Lucas county, Iowa, to which the family had removed from Indiana, was a little log schoolhouse where knowledge was dispensed according to old-time methods, and hither went Theron A. when the work on the farm permitted. At the age of twenty he began to devote all of his time to farming, assisting his father with the management of the property and drawing his regular income from the sale of grain and other commodities. In the meantime he was thinking of broader opportunities than those by which he was surrounded and decided to cast his lot among the emigrants to the unknown west. Nancy L. Brummett was born in Brown county, Ind., December 15, 1845, and her marriage with Mr. Ireland took place March 17, 1864. Thereafter the young people devoted their time to outfitting for crossing the plains with mule-teams, and made the start from the home farm April 4, 1864, less than a month after their marriage. Their long and tedious journey was accomplished without mishap and they arrived at The Dalles, September 26, 1864. The first winter was spent near Monmouth, and the following spring Mr. Ireland rented a farm of eighty acres two miles south of the town, where they lived for one year. The farm proved undesirable, and he removed to his present farm, which consists of three hundred acres, a large portion of which is under cultivation. In addition to general farming the owner is engaged extensively in stock-raising, and while making no attempt at registered or fancy breeds he keeps a substantial and generally high grade of cattle. He is successful in his chosen occupation, and attributes his good fortune to industry, good business judgment, economy, and strict integrity.

A Socialist in politics, Mr. Ireland has held several offices of responsibility in his neighborhood, including that of road supervisor and school director. He is a member of the Christian Church of Monmouth, Ore., and since young manhood has supported, as his means permitted, his chosen denomination. Six children have been reared in his home to make useful members of the community: William H., living on the Mackenzie river in Lane county; Frank V. lives on a ranch near Santa Ana, Orange county, Cal.; Mary B. is at home; Effie M. is the wife of Sam Tetherow of Lewisville; Mellie M. is the wife of G. W. Girard of Independence; and Clara E. is living at home.

J. EARL HOSMER. Among the wideawake and progressive young journalists who are helping to mould public opinion in Marion county is J. Earl Hosmer, editor of the Silverton Appeal, a weekly, seven-column, eight-page newspaper, devoted to promoting the best interests of this wonderfully fertile valley. The Silverton Appeal has a large circulation throughout the entire county, and its pages are filled with valuable suggestions on all departments of living, it being a stanch advocate of fundamental things, such as hygiene, diet, education, agriculture and home-building. It is the effort of the management to obliterate such information as tends to lower the standard of a progressive and inquiring community, and to place all in touch with clean, optimistic views of life. A live paper in every sense of the word, the Appeal is destined for a long era of prosperity, and is not likely to fail through advocacy of issues or principles not founded on common sense, and the individual rights of man.

Mr. Hosmer was born in Durand, Pepin county, Wis., February 17, 1862, and is the son of Albert M. and Cynthia (Earl) Hosmer, natives respectively of Vermont and Canada. Albert M. Hosmer removed from Vermont to New York state when eleven years of age, and before the Civil war settled in the colony at Durand, Wis., where he died at the age of sixty-four years. As an early settler of that region, he was identified with various pioneer industries, among them hotel keeping, ferrying, stage driving, farming and carpentering. His wife removed to New York with her parents when a child, and was reared in St. Lawrence county. She was the mother of five children, four sons and one daughter, of whom the editor of the Appeal is the third child.

J. Earl Hosmer acquired his preliminary education in the public schools of Durand, and the Oregon State Normal School, from which he was graduated in 1893, with the degree of B. S. D. This training was supplemented by a course at the Western University of Chicago, Ill., from which he was graduated in 1897, with the degree of Ph. D. His youth contained somewhat of hardship and responsibility, for at the age of twelve he began to drive a team for his father, and afterward engaged in active farm work. In 1901 he bought the Silverton Appeal, installed the plant with modern water-power machinery, and has increased the subscription list one hundred per cent. Aside from his journalistic work Mr. Hosmer is interested in real estate, and is president of the Cascade Real Estate Company, which has at its disposal vast areas of timber lands, improved farms, stock ranches, saw-mill property, and city property. This company has done much in promoting the well-being of Marion county, and in placing its many merits before prospective purchasers.

September 1, 1885, Mr. Hosmer was united in marriage with Minnie Page, who was born in Minnesota, March 30, 1867, and removed when young to Durand, Wis., with her parents. She was educated in the high school of the latter town, eventually engaging in educational work, locating in Oregon in 1890 with her husband. The pre-empted claim of one hundred and sixty acres taken up at that time by Mr. Hosmer in Tillamook county was sold by him in 1903. Mr. and Mrs. Hosmer were among the founders of the Liberal University at Silverton, and reluctantly resigned from the association because of their inability to coincide with certain beliefs which crept into the university. Mrs. Hosmer died February 1, 1901, and August 4, 1902, Mr. Hosmer married Frances Rauch, a native of Marion county. Mrs. Hosmer is the capable assistant of her husband in his newspaper work.

A. M. CLOUGH, who is engaged in the undertaking business in Salem, has been a resident of the city since 1876. He was born in St. Johnsbury, Vt., September 4, 1850, being one of a family of seven children born unto Gardner and Laura (Joslin) Clough. The father was a native of Massachusetts and the family is of Scotch lineage, for the grandfather, Jabez Clough, was a native of Scotland, whence he emigrated to the new world, establishing his home in the Bay state. A few years later he removed to Vermont, where he carried on farming and at the time of the war of 1812 he aided his adopted country. Gardner Clough was a pat-termaker and millwright and followed his trade in Vermont until 1856, when he removed to New York, and in 1857 to northeastern Iowa, settling in Winneshiek county. He built some of the first grist-mills in that part of the state and was thus instrumental in establishing a new industry there. He resided near Bluffton until September, 1861, when he volunteered for service as a defender of the Union cause, enlisting in Company I, Twenty-seventh Iowa Infantry. At the end of his term of enlistment he re-enlisted and served until the close of the war, but his health became impaired from the effects of his long and arduous service, and he never fully recovered. Upon his return in 1865 he secured a homestead farm in Buena Vista county, Iowa, where he died about five years later. In politics he was a staunch Republican and held the office of county commissioner and county recorder in Buena Vista county. His wife, who was born in Kirby, Vt., was a daughter of Sylvanus Joslin, also a native of that locality and a farmer by occupation. He belonged to one of the old Puritan families of New England, held membership with the Congregational Church and died at the age of eighty-nine years. Mrs. Clough survived her husband for many years and passed away in Iowa at the age of seventy-eight. In their family were seven children, of whom five are yet living. Fernando, the eldest, who was a member of Company B, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, served for two years and four months in the Union army and was taken prisoner at Little Rock, Ark., while carrying dispatches. Afterward he was exchanged, and he now resides at Elk Falls, Kans. The next member of the family is A. M. Clough of this review. The others are Fred M., John O., and William L., all residents of Iowa.

A. M. Clough was seven years of age when he accompanied his parents to Iowa and took up his abode upon a farm in Bluffton township, Winneshiek county. He spent his boyhood days in the usual manner of farm lads of that period, and the public schools afforded him his educational privileges. When the Civil war broke out his mother removed to Waukon, Iowa, where the family resided during the period of hostilities, the father being absent, serving in the army. In the spring of 1865 A. M. Clough ran away from home to McGregor and enlisted, but after thirteen days with the troops he was rejected on account of his age and size. In the same year, after the close of the war, the family removed to Buena Vista county, Iowa, settling near Sioux Rapids, and our subject resided upon the home farm until 1866, when he took up his abode in Waukon and for three years was engaged in driving stage. He then went to Bluffton, Iowa, where he engaged in farming and also learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed for about three or four years.

In 1876 Mr. Clough arrived in Oregon and secured a situation in the Babcock cabinet shop, working in their undertaking establishment until 1884, when Mr. Babcock was elected county clerk. In that year Mr. Clough purchased his undertaking business and has since continued as undertaker and funeral director. He is a graduate of three different schools of embalming, of which he makes a specialty. He is very successful in his chosen field of labor.

In Cresco, Howard county, Iowa, in 1873, Mr. Clough was united in marriage to Adella Rider, who was born in Woodstock, Ill., and with her parents came to Oregon in 1876. Her father is now deceased, but her mother is still living. In Mr. Clough's family are three children: Bertha L., Mona M. and Alice L. The parents hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Mr. Clough is a trustee. He has always been a staunch Republican, attending the county and state conventions, and his influence carries weight in the councils of the party. In 1894 he was elected county coroner, and so capably did he serve that he was re-elected in 1896 and 1898. On the expiration of his third term in 1900 he retired, but in 1902 he was again elected and will continue in the position until July, 1904. He belongs to the Greater Salem Commercial Club, to the lodge and Rebekah degree of the Odd Fellows society, to the Union Artisans, and is past master and member of the Woodmen of the World.

GEORGE W. KNIGHT. The best mercantile interests of Hubbard, Ore., are being maintained by George W. Knight, who, in partnership with Peter Susbauer, who owns the building, is conducting an up-to-date store. The stock, valued at $13,000, comprises such necessities and luxuries as would be required in any cosmopolitan community. It is the policy of the partners to observe the greatest courtesy and consideration for patrons, and this, combined with cleanliness, and absolute business integrity, has assured to the firm of Knight & Susbauer many years of uninterrupted success.

Mr. Knight comes of an honored old pioneer family of the state of which he is a native son. He was born in Canby, Clackamas county, April 14, 1874. His father, Dr. Charles Knight, for many years a practicing physician of Canby, was born in Harrisburg, Pa., December 10, 1828, and moved with his parents to Pittsburg, Pa., in 1831. He became an employe in a foundry in that city, and at the age of eighteen found a less strenuous position, which enabled him at the same time to study medicine. In 1845 he removed to Missouri, and made that state his home until coming to Oregon in 1871. He was the first to settle in Canby, the first to map out the future of the town, the pioneer dwelling of the embryo village being due to his constructive ability. He was known throughout the entire surrounding country, and in connection with a large and lucrative practice conducted a drug store for many years. His death, July 22, 1893, removed a man whom all delighted to honor, and who had an enviable reputation as man and physician. He married Catherine Schriver, who was born in Frankfort, Ohio, in 1834, married in 1862, and died October 16, 1898. She was the mother of nine children, five sons and four daughters, of whom George W. is the eighth child. Those living are: Louisa, Henry, George W. and Esther.

George W. Knight was educated in the public schools, and his youth did not differ materially from that of the average boy of his town. He was employed for some time in his father's drug store, and while still living in Canby became interested in Republican politics and served on the town council for four years. At the age of eighteen he went into the employ of Carlton and Rosecrans, remaining for seven years. He went to Hubbard, February 27, 1899, bought out the general merchandise business of George H. Beebe, and converted it into the present reliable and progressive business. After settling there he married Minnie Whitney, a native of Oregon, born November 19, 1884, and daughter of John and Anna (Feller) Whitney, formerly prominent farmers in the vicinity of Woodburn, but now living retired near that city. Mr. Knight has served in the council of Hubbard, and has otherwise identified himself with the upbuilding of the city. He still owns a one-third interest, twenty-four acres of his father's original donation claim adjoining Canby, ten acres of which are devoted to hops, and the remainder to general farming. Though one of the younger generation of business men in this county, Mr. Knight is esteemed for his general business qualifications, and for many estimable traits of character. He is a member of Hermes Lodge K. of P. No. 57; passed the chairs and represented the local to Grand Lodge three times. Is a member of Hubbard Lodge I. O. O. F. No. 76. Passed the chairs of Columbia Lodge No. 47 A. O. U. W.

GEORGE N. FRAZER. Outside of Portland, the Eugene Iron Works is the largest enterprise of the kind in the Willamette valley. George N. Frazer, the owner and proprietor, is unquestionably one of the most experienced in all kinds of iron manufacturing on the western coast, and as such enjoys a prestige commensurate with the worthy and far-reaching industrial results of which he is the chief incentive. Born in Brockport, Monroe county, N. Y., June 12, 1851, he is of English ancestry, his parents, James Scott and Sarah Ann (Kenworthy) Frazer, having been born in Oldham, Lancashire, England, where had lived many generations of his grandfathers. Upon emigrating to America, the father settled in Monroe county, N. Y., where he worked at the moulder's trade, and in time practically started the town of Brockport, by establishing the first store and butcher shop. Meeting with financial reverses in 1858, he disposed of his interests and removed to San Francisco, where he followed his trade until 1870, removing then to the city of Portland, Ore. His death occurred by drowning in the Willamette river in 1872.

The necessity for early self-support overshadowed the diversions and even education of George N. Frazer, for at the age of twelve he learned the moulder's trade from his father. While serving his apprenticeship in the San Francisco Iron Works he came to a realization of the possibilities of his trade and applied himself with zest to learning all that his superiors had to teach him. From the San Francisco Iron Works he went to the Oregon Iron Works, and in 1871 went into business with his father, operating the Eagle Iron Works of Portland. Encouraged by a contract for the iron work for the construction of the Clackamas river railroad bridge below Oregon City, the business progressed rapidly, many notable and paying contracts being filled under the able leadership of father and son. Mr. Frazer afterward started the Pioneer Brass Foundry in Portland, and after its destruction during the great fire, he entered into partnership with W. J. Zimmerman in an iron business which was later operated under the same management in Ashland and Roseburg.

Disposing of his business in 1886, Mr. Frazer came to Eugene and started the Eugene Iron Works in partnership with J. C. Land, the latter retiring at the end of the first year, and leaving the business to the sole supervision of the senior member of the firm. That the iron works have more work than can be accomplished at present, and in fact are six months behind with their orders, may be taken as a fair indication of their standing in the community. The most modern of machinery facilitates the conduct of a business which embraces the most delicate as well as the heaviest of iron productions, ranging from donkey engines to structural iron work, sawmill machinery and engines weighing many tons. The machine shop proper is two stories high and 36x50 feet ground dimensions, the foundry is 40x70 feet, and the blacksmith and boiler shop is 50x40 feet. Needless to say, Mr. Frazer is at home in any department of his business, having mastered the minutest details, and is therefore able to command the best possible effort from his men. Having no competition south of Eugene in the state, his trade is drawn from a wide territory, orders coming in from all along the coast, and from the principal cities of the surrounding states.

The agencies inaugurated for the improvement of Eugene have invariably received the staunch support of Mr. Frazer. He is the friend of education, of municipal purity and political uprightness. As a Republican he has served on the county committee for several years, although office-holding has never appealed to him, or been in accord with his otherwise busy life. An enthusiastic advocate of the climate, resources and general advantages of Lane county, he has shown his faith in its future by investing heavily in town and country property, his own residence being one of the finest and most hospitable in the town. He is interested in the Eugene Opera House Company, and various substantial enterprises of public character, and his social associates include the cultured and progressive element of the town. Fraternally Mr. Frazer is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Eugene, in which he has thrice been noble grand; with the Encampment, in which he is past chief patriarch, and the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Congregational Church of Eugene. In Ashland, in 1877, he was united in marriage with Ella E. Jackson, who was born in California, and who is the mother of two children: George N., Jr., who is interested in business with his father; and Arthur L., instructor of the piano at the University of Oregon.

LAFAYETTE F. HALL, of Newberg, identified principally with loans and insurance, is a worthy representative of one of the best-known pioneer families of Yamhill county, and one most intimately connected with its growth. Mr. Hall was born in Carlinville, Macoupin county, Ill., January 17, 1846, his father being a native of North Carolina, and born February 5, 1798, while his mother, Malinda, was born in Tennessee.

Mathew Hall was one of those strong and rugged personalities which stands out vividly from the pioneer ranks of Yamhill county. As a youth in his native state he learned the blacksmith trade, and as a young man grown he settled in Macoupin county, Ill., where he plied his trade for a number of years. He was one of those courageous men who braved the dangers of the plains before the craze for gold made the expedition one of comparative safety, and in 1847 set out with a party, eventually arriving at his chosen destination in Clackamas county. The first winter was spent in Molalla, and in the spring he engaged in ranching near Astoria, on the Columbia river. Not being favorably impressed with that farming section he went to Portland and worked at his trade, and the quality of his work may be estimated when it is known that when he took his departure in 1849, the people of Portland offered to give him a house and lot and place to put his shop if he would remain. Notwithstanding this tempting offer he decided to settle on a farm near where Newberg now stands, and, having comfortably installed his family, he went down into California and struggled for a year among the mines in that state. Although fairly successful he was not forcibly impressed with mining as a means of livelihood, his practical and shrewd mind detecting easily the chances in favor of the few rather than the many. Returning to Oregon he settled on his farm of six hundred and twenty acres, a portion of which he improved, and where he died in 1869, at the age of seventy-one years. He was known far and near as Squire Hall, as he filled the office of justice of the peace for between twelve and fourteen years. In his rulings he was invariably just and impartial, and rarely were his decisions questioned.

The youngest of three sons and four daughters born to his parents, Lafayette F. Hall was educated in the public schools, supplemented by one term at McMinnville College. During six years of his life he was an educator, and during that time was also manager of his father's farm. In 1875 he abandoned teaching and divided his attention between farming and outside business. He has since been engaged in a general business, and in connection therewith handles collections and insurance, and a little real estate. He is a notary public, and has been justice of the peace for two terms. Mr. Hall is the owner of considerable town and country property, including two lots on Columbia Heights, two lots upon which his residence is erected, an additional lot elsewhere in the town, and three hundred and twenty acres of the home place, now being managed by his son, W. L.

The first Mrs. Hall was formerly Amanda S. Ellison, who was born in Virginia, and died in Yamhill county in 1879, leaving four sons: William L., on the home farm; O. E., in Washington; Elmer C., engaged in mining near Gratz Pass; and Ellis, also engaged in mining near Sumpter. For a second wife Mr. Hall married in November, 1885, Frances M. Rowland, who was born in Tennessee, as was also her father, R. P. Rowland. Mr. Rowland came to Oregon in 1885, located for a time on the Lewis river, and is now conducting a dairy farm near Mount Tabor. Of this second union there has been born one daughter, Ethel, living with her parents. In political affiliation Mr. Hall is a Democrat, although he is decidedly averse to the silver platform.

PUNDERSON AVERY is a capitalist and very successful man who is uniformly spoken of in terms of praise, commendation and good will. He is an extensive and successful manufacturer of flour and is the leader in this regard in the state. He is now serving as president of the city council of Corvallis, and Benton county has profited by his efforts in her behalf along many lines. It is, therefore, well that he should be mentioned among the representative citizens of the Willamette valley and it is with pleasure that we present to our readers this record of his career.

Mr. Avery is a native of Stark county, Ill., born in 1843, and is a son of J. C. Avery, who was the founder of Corvallis and is represented elsewhere in this work. In the year 1847 Mrs. Avery came to the northwest to join the father, who had crossed the plains in 1843. She was accompanied by her three children, Charles, Punderson and Florence, and they were met in eastern Oregon by the husband and father, who conducted them by way of the Barlow route over the Cascade Mountains to the old town of Marysville, now Corvallis. Mr. Avery had secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres and upon this the city of Corvallis was established.

On the old family homestead Punderson Avery of this review was reared and in early life became connected with merchandising. He pursued his preliminary education in the district schools and afterward became a student in the Baptist College at McMinnville. Later he spent eight years in his father's store and in 1872 he removed to Lake county, Ore., where he was engaged in the cattle business, having a large range on which he herded his cattle and also put up hay and feed for the market. His father, together with John F. Miller and B. F. Doughthet, was selected by the state to choose a site for the Agricultural College, and made choice of the meadow lands of Lake county. They gained considerable knowledge of the state while endeavoring to make a location and Punderson Avery, hearing favorable reports of the Lake county land, concluded that he would remove to that district and engage in the cattle business. Accordingly, he located there in 1872 and purchased one thousand acres of the college land which he fenced and improved. For fifteen years he remained there, being extensively engaged in the cattle business, and success attended his efforts. At the time of the Modoc war he and other residents of that locality built Fort Chewaucan which they occupied for four months during the Indian troubles. In 1887 he disposed of his business interests in Lake county and returned to Corvallis. In 1889 he began the milling business here, forming the present company in connection with Mr. Smith and Mr. Rickard. They built the Benton county mills and five years later incorporated the business under the name of the Benton County Flouring Mills Company, of which Mr. Avery has since been the president. The mill was erected in 1889 and has since been operated by steam power. The plant has a capacity of two hundred and twenty barrels daily and manufactures flour which is unexcelled in the state. In fact, the firm received the highest award at the Oregon state fair in 1902 and again in 1903 on the Benton and Snowfall brands. Other premiums have been awarded to the firm which not only manufacture wheat flour, but also place upon the market graham flour and cereals. The business was begun with a capacity of one hundred barrels, but in order to meet the increased demand of the trade the capacity was increased to two hundred and twenty barrels per day in 1899. The Wagner roller system is used and the plant is equipped with all modern facilities, the mill being one of the best in the northwest. It is a four-story structure and the power is supplied by a seventy-five-horse-power engine. The product is shipped to California, South America and the American possessions in the Pacific and to the Orient. In addition to his milling property Mr. Avery owns two fine farms in Benton county devoted to the raising of grain and stock. One of these farms comprises four hundred acres and is situated a mile and a half south of Corvallis, while the other comprises three hundred and twenty acres and is about twelve miles south of the city. Mr. Avery and his brother laid out two additions to Corvallis, most of which has since been sold and improved by the erection of good buildings.

In Corvallis Mr. Avery was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Mobley, who was born in Missouri and went with her parents to California in early life, coming thence to Benton county, Ore., in 1860. Her father, William Mobley was a farmer by occupation. Unto this marriage have been born five children: Chester, who is engaged in the cattle business in Lake county; Clarence W., who is a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College and is now engaged in the stock business and is also manager of the Bingham Spring, near Pendleton; Mattie, who is now the wife of Professor Fulton of Corvallis; Grover and Virgil, who are at home.

In 1870 Mr. Avery was elected county treasurer of Benton county and served for one term, while for many years he has been a member of the city council of Corvallis and is now its president. He has always been a Democrat in politics and for many years was chairman of the county committee, and was also a member of the state committee. He belongs to the Oregon Pioneer Association and to the Corvallis Business Men's League and his wife is a member of the Presbyterian church. He stands today among the prominent business men of the Willamette valley. Keen and clear-headed, always busy, always careful and conservative in financial matters, moving slowly but surely in every transaction, he has few superiors in the steady progress which invariably reaches the objective point.

DELAVAN S. SMITH. Born on the homestead which he now owns and occupies, February 16, 1858, Delavan S. Smith is distinguished not only for his enterprise, ability and honesty of purpose, but as the worthy representative of one of the most honored pioneers of Linn county. He comes of excellent New England stock, the blood of many of the early families of that part of the Union flowing through his veins. Prominent among his more immediate ancestry are several families of distinction in the annals of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, among others that may be mentioned being those of Hopkins, Briggs, Harris and Wilkinson. Stephen Hopkins, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was descended from the same immigrant ancestor. A direct descendant in the fifth generation from John Smith, of Rhode Island, his lineage is as follows: John, Capt. Jonathan, Archibald, Delazon, Delavan S.

John Smith, a resident of Scituate, R. I., and a citizen of influence, reared seven children, six stalwart sons and one daughter, namely: Richard, Joseph, Jonathan, Oziel, Thomas, Hope and Sarah. Richard served in the old French and Indian war. Joseph was one of those brave Green Mountain Boys that stormed the breastwork in the battle of Bennington, while his son, a lad of fifteen years, took part in that famous engagement. Jonathan and Thomas were soldiers in the Revolution, the latter losing his life while in service.

Capt. Jonathan Smith was lieutenant of a company that responded to the Lexington Alarm call, on April 19, 1775, and marched with his company as far as Cambridge. He subsequently served throughout the war, afterwards receiving a bounty for his services while in the army.

Archibald Smith settled in New Berlin, N. Y., where he was engaged during his active career as a mechanic. He married Miss Briggs, a woman of much culture and force of character. Her father, Joseph Briggs, was born in Massachusetts, but subsequently removed to Vermont,

He took an active part in the grand struggle for independence, being captain of a company, and took a prominent part in the battle of Bunker Hill, the battle of Bennington, witnessing Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, and being in the midst of the conflict at Monmouth. Archibald Smith's wife died in early womanhood—in 1825—leaving five young sons, one of whom subsequently lost his life on the battlefield during the Mexican war.

Delazon Smith, the fourth son of his parents, was born in New Berlin, Chenango county, N. Y., October 5, 1816. Left motherless at the tender age of nine years, he secured such education as his limited opportunities afforded. In 1831, taking all of his worldly effects in a small package under his arm, he joined an elder brother in the western part of his native state, and remained there two years, continuing his studies as best he might. Hearing that at the manual-labor college in Ohio he could pursue the higher branches of learning, and at the same time find employment to defray his expenses, he entered, in the spring of 1834, the Collegiate Institute, at Oberlin, and remained two years, withdrawing then, as he was not in sympathy with the anti-slavery movements of the school and the place. Going from there to Cleveland, he studied law, and was a frequent contributor to the leading newspapers of that day. In 1838, being urged to assist in establishing a paper in Rochester, N. Y., he accepted the invitation, and for two years thereafter edited the New York Watchman. Prior to that time this embryo attorney had taken active part in state and national politics, and during the stirring campaign of 1840 edited and published a paper called the True Jeffersonian. He also did able work throughout New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, taking the stump for Van Buren and Johnson. He afterwards published the Western Herald a short time, but was not successful. Returning to Ohio, he established a paper devoted to the interests of the Democratic party, naming it the Western Empire, which remained in existence several years. In 1844 Mr. Smith supported the Democratic candidate for presidency, James K. Polk, and at the close of the campaign was appointed by President Taylor a special commissioner to Ecuador, S. A., being given full power to treat with that government. After staying a while at Quito, he found that on account of an internal quarrel he could not accomplish his mission, so returned home.

Removing to the territory of Iowa in the spring of 1846, Delazon Smith settled on a farm, which he carried on a few years, also practicing his profession to some extent. He became prominently identified with the political issues of the time and place, supporting the Democratic prin-ciplès and candidates with vigor and ability. In the campaign of 1848 he edited the Iowa Democrat, and stumped the state for Cass and Butler. The climate of Iowa proving unhealthful to himself and family, he came to Oregon in the spring of 1852, being five months making the trip from the Missouri river to The Dalles. Losing all of his cattle while on the way, he came to Linn county almost penniless. With brave courage, he set about retrieving his fortunes. Taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, lying about six miles southeast of Albany, he cleared and improved a good homestead. In the meantime he opened a law office in Albany, where he built up a substantial practice, becoming widely known. Being nominated in the spring of 1854 for the state legislature, he was elected on the Democratic ticket by a majority of two hundred votes. The following year he was re-elected as a representative to the legislature, this time his majority being doubled, and when the Assembly met he had the honor of being chosen speaker of the house. In 1856 he was again re-elected to the house of representatives, and in 1857 was made a delegate to the constitutional convention. In July, 1858, by a four-fifths vote of the legislature, he was chosen one of the first United States senators from Oregon, and in casting lots drew the short term. Soon after his return from Washington, where he had rendered efficient service in the national congress, he passed to the great life beyond, dying in Portland November 18, 1860.

Delazon Smith was twice married. His first wife, whose maiden name was Eliza Voke, died in early life, leaving one child, Volney V., now deceased. He married for his second wife Mary Shepherd, by whom he had five children, four of whom have passed away, namely: Ianthe, who married P. C. Harper; Viola; Elizabeth; and Delazon D. The only survivor of the parental family is Delavan S. Smith, the subject of this sketch. The mother died on the home farm in 1871. The father was a charter member and the first master of Corinthian Lodge, F. & A. M., of Albany.

Delavan S. Smith grew to manhood on the parental homestead, acquiring the rudiments of his education in the common schools, and attended Albany College for two years. At the age of twenty-one years he was made deputy sheriff under I. C. Dickey, and afterwards served in the same capacity under Sheriffs George Humphrey and J. K. Charlton. In 1886 he succeeded Sheriff Charlton, and for two years was sheriff of Linn county. He was subsequently deputy sheriff under John Smallman and Matt Scott for a year, and again under C. C. Jackson for one term. In 1895 Mr. Smith returned to the old homestead, of which he owns two hundred acres, and has since carried on general farming and stock-raising.

On December 14, 1881, Mr. Smith married Carrie M. Clark, daughter of J. S. Clark, and they have six children, namely: Ina M., Volena, Delazon, Merrill, Mary and Ianthe. Politically, Mr. Smith, following in the footsteps of his honored father, is a staunch Democrat, and fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias. Both Mr. and Mrs. Smith are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ISAAC M. SIMPSON. As a native-born citizen of Polk county, an extensive and progressive agriculturist and stock-raiser, and as a worthy representative of one of the most widely and favorably known families of the Willamette Valley, Isaac M. Simpson is entitled to honorable mention in this biographical work. A son of the late I. M. Simpson, he was born April 23, 1857, at Simpson's Station, on the farm where he has since resided. His paternal grandfather, Malachi Simpson, was born of Scotch ancestry, in Georgia, and lived there until about 1815, when he removed with his family to Franklin county, Tenn., settling about three miles from Nashville, being a pioneer of that place.

Born on the Georgia homestead in 1812, I. M. Simpson was but a small child of three years when he accompanied his parents to Tennessee, where he grew to man's estate. Choosing the vocation of a farmer, he migrated to Arkansas in 1835, settling in Lawrence county, where he lived ten years. Leaving there early in 1845, he stopped a short time in Jackson county, Mo., then crossed the plains to Oregon, making the journey with wagons drawn by four yokes of oxen, coming by way of Meeks' cut-off, and being six months on the way. At once locating in Polk county, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres at what is now Simpson's Station, in the fall of 1845, and at once began the improvement of a farm. During the gold excitement of 1849, he went to the California mines, but soon returned on account of ill health. Resuming his agricultural labors, he resided on the farm which he cleared, until his death, July 11, 1887. He was a man of unblemished character, deeply respected by all who knew him, and was a member of the Baptist Church. In his political affiliations he was a Democrat. At Lawrence county, Ark., in 1836, he married Martha Jackson, who was born November 8, 1815, in Franklin county, Tenn. She was a daughter of Thomas Jackson, who emigrated from Tennessee to Arkansas in 1835, at the time that Mr. Simpson went there with his parents. Four children were born of their union, namely: Amos C., deceased; Marshall W., of Elk City, Ore.; Eliza, wife of L. W. Loughary; and Isaac M., the special subject of this brief sketch.

Receiving a practical education in the public schools of his district, Isaac M. Simpson assumed the management of the home farm when nineteen years old, and has since had sole charge of the estate. He has seven hundred acres of productive land, and is extensively and profitably engaged in general agriculture, including dairying, stock-raising, hop-growing, and the culture of fruit. He keeps Cotswold sheep, Durham cows, and Angora goats, and has forty acres of land planted to hops, which do well in this climate, and yield excellent returns for the time and money expended in their culture.

Mr. Simpson married, in Lincoln county, Ore., Tabitha Morrison, who was born in Dallas county, Iowa, June 3, 1861. Her father, Barney Morrison, who comes of Irish ancestry, was born in Lincoln county, Tenn. Crossing the plains in 1862, he settled first in Yamhill county, Ore., removing from there to Polk county, and now resides in Lincoln county, this state. His wife, whose maiden name was Jemima Stone, is of German descent. Mr. and Mrs. Simpson have one child, Otto Simpson, who is a student at the Oregon Agricultural College, in Corvallis. A stanch Democrat in politics, Mr. Simpson served as county commissioner four years, being elected on the Democratic ticket in 1880. In 1890 he represented Polk and Lincoln counties in the state legislature, and is now a school director. He is a member of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Independence, and of Royal Arch Masons. He also belongs to Valley Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Independence, and to the Woodmen of the World, of Airlie, in which he has served as council commander for two terms.

JOHN W. PROPST. For forty-two years John W. Propst has lived on his farm four and a half miles east of Albany, and during that time the once timbered property has undergone many changes, new buildings taking the place of their worn-out predecessors, and modern machinery making light tasks that were once arduous. But it is not only as an agriculturist and stock-raiser that Mr. Propst has contributed to the upbuilding of his neighborhood, for he has exerted a moral and educational influence as well, promoting to the extent of his power the schools of the district, and generously contributing to the advancement of the Christian Church, of which he is one of the substantial and honored members, and in which he has been an elder for twenty-five years. The Ancient Order of United Workmen has profited by his membership for many years, and during the latter part of his life he has furthered the interests of the Republican party.

The early life of Mr. Propst was uneventfully passed in Maynard county, Ill., on the farm where his birth occurred April 12, 1837. In 1852, when he was fifteen years of age, he took an active part in completing arrangements to cross the plains, his father desiring to settle in the west, where he hoped to make more money with less of the hard work to which he had been accustomed from his boyhood days. With ox-teams and prairie schooners, cattle and household goods, the little party set out, arriving at their destination in Marion county at the end of the usual six months. Lucinda (Powell) Propst, the mother, died in eastern Oregon on Butter creek en route, and Anthony Propst, the father, died just after crossing the Cascade mountains at Foster. John W. Propst lived for a year on a farm near Parkersville, and after that went to the farm of his uncle, Noah Powell, in Yamhill county, making that his home until 1855. He then came to Linn county and lived with another uncle, John A. Powell, who had been appointed his guardian after the death of his parents, and remained there until he was twenty-four years of age. Still making his home with his uncle, he worked on surrounding farms until twenty-four years of age, when, having saved considerable money, he married Margaret J. Cole, November 1, 1860. For the following year he lived on a farm on the Santiam, and in the fall of 1861 came to his present farm, where he has lived ever since. To himself and wife have been born three children, of whom Quincy E. is living in Albany, married and has two children, Leona and Elmer. Frank W. died at the age of twenty-nine years in Albany; Leona died at the age of twenty-one years, at home. A practical farmer and an earnest, conscientious man, Mr. Propst does credit to this garden spot of Oregon, where he is so well known and so highly respected. He is a member of Harmony Grange. He served as school director and clerk for twenty-five years, and two years as constable. His farm of one hundred and ninety-seven and one-half acres has all been improved by his own efforts. In connection with his farming he has run threshing machines, reapers, headers, etc., among the farmers in his locality for the past thirty years.

ISAAC MEEKER. As a farmer in the broad fields of Oregon, Isaac Meeker is giving the strength and intelligence of his manhood toward the growth and upbuilding of state citizenship, and especially in the county of his father's adoption. He was born in Rock Island county, Ill.,

March 1, 1847, the son of John Meeker. The latter was a native of Butler county, Ohio, having been born there September 6, 1822, and was there married to Lydia Miller. In the fall of 1847 Mr. Meeker went to St. Joseph, Mo., with the intention of emigrating from that location to the west. In the spring of the next year he crossed the plains, his worldly wealth embodied in one wagon and an ox-team. After six months of journeying the party arrived in Oregon, and the first winter found them located in the Santiam valley, Linn county.

Being driven from their first settlement in Linn county by high water, Mr. Meeker took his family farther west in the county, where he became the owner of a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, situated three miles from the town of Jefferson. This consisted principally of prairie land. After the erection of a log cabin they made this their home, remaining here until 1880, when he removed to a location upon the banks of the Willamette river, directly opposite the city of Albany. His death occurred in that place in 1883, his wife surviving him three years. Like the lives of many early settlers, Mr. Meeker's was full of varied experiences, one being a prospecting trip to the gold mines of California in 1849, from which he returned on a sailing vessel which landed him at Astoria thirty days from the date of sailing from San Francisco. In 1855-6, during the Rogue River war, he hauled supplies to the soldiers in the southern part of Oregon. Of six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Meeker, Elizabeth is the wife of Samuel Smith, of Washington; Isaac is the subject of this review; William was drowned February 17, 1903; Mary is the wife of William Bowman; Martha was the wife of H. Butcher, and died in 1864; and Edward, the youngest child, is located on a part of the old claim.

Practically the entire life of Isaac Meeker has been spent in Oregon, for he was but one year old when the trip was begun, and he remained at home until he was thirty-one years old. He was reared to the duties of a farmer. Upon beginning work for himself he followed his early training, now being located upon one hundred and sixty-eight acres of his father's claim, and is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He first married, January 20, 1878, Melvina Hale, who was born in Oregon, the daughter of William Hale. Three children were born of this union, the one now living being Clyde. Mrs. Meeker died January 15, 1898, and October 24, 1900, Mr. Meeker married Mrs. Mary Wilson, who was born in Marion county, Ore., the daughter of Joseph J. Groshong. Politically, Mr. Meeker is a Democrat, and fraternally belongs to the Grange.

MART V. MILLER. To the very early and widely scattered settlers of Linn county the building of the first log school-house was quite an undertaking, and established the community as progressive and enterprising. Of hewed logs, and with slab benches and desks, it was innocent of glass at the openings called windows, nor was there a door to keep out the rain or snow. But the pupils gathered there when their home duties permitted. Among these original pupils was Mart V. Miller, who was ten years of age when he came to the state with his parents, and who plodded in all kinds of weather to the primitive school-house near Albany. The lessons there learned have proved of immense value to him in later life, and served as a nucleus for later study. Since 1850 he has lived on his present farm, two hundred and seventy-five acres in extent, and located five miles from Albany. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and is successful and prosperous, enjoying to an unusual extent the confidence of his fellow-agriculturists.

Born near Jamestown, Boone county, Ind., February 28, 1837, Mr. Miller is a son of Christian and Mary A. (Coddington) Miller, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Christian Miller located in Indiana when a young man, lived there many years, and in 1847 went to Huntsville, Mo., to outfit for crossing the plains. In the spring of 1848 he started out with two wagons, in a train of forty others, the trip across covering about four months. With him, besides his wife and children, was his brother Isaac, who subsequently acquired distinction as an Indian fighter, serving in both the Modoc war and the war of 1855-6. Christian Miller settled on a section of land half a mile south of Albany, and in the spring of 1850 sold his property for $500. Near Knox's Butte he bought a squatter's right to another section of land, and in the fall of 1851 came to the farm now occupied by his son Mart. A cow was the price paid for the three hundred and twenty acres, and Edward Streitheoff was the man who received the cow in lieu of his land. Mr. Miller's death occurred in 1874, at the age of sixty-five years. During his life in the west he seemed to have a happy faculty for making the best of things, and success rewarded his untiring industry and wise management. A change from farming came in the golden year of 1849, when he went to California and ran a pack train from Sacramento City to the mines on the American river. His wife, who died September 8, 1892, at the age of eighty-six years, was the mother of six children. They were: Maria, who died in 1897, having married Eli Miller; Moses, living on a farm near Albany; Nelson, who died young; Mart V.; John, who died in youth; and Enoch, who lives on a farm near Scio, Linn county. Christian

Miller deserved great credit for his rise in life, for he was a man of little education, and therefore dependent upon his innate shrewdness and common sense. The first winter in Oregon himself and family lived on boiled wheat and New Orleans molasses, and in after years, when success came, and the luxuries of life were possible to him, he used to recall, with thankfulness for present blessings, the dark days wherein deprivation and poverty played so large a part.

March 15, 1860, Mart V. Miller was united in marriage to Mary C. Cunningham, of which union there were born four children: Alonzo, a resident of Albany; Elam, also a resident of Albany; Wayne, in California, and identified with the railroad; and Homer B., deceased. Mrs. Miller died in 1875; and April 26, 1878, Mr. Miller married Maria Propst, who is the mother of seven children: Iona B., wife of Frank Warner; Ray F.; Eunice M.; Ernest C., who has been a helpless cripple for nine years, unable to move a limb or any part of the body; Roma D.; Victor V.; and Fay. Mr. Miller is a man of high moral character, and for twenty-five years has been an active worker and elder of the Christian Church.

FRANK M. MILLER. Among the industrious and deservedly successful farmers of Linn county Frank M. Miller holds a recognized place, having been for many years an agriculturist of this section of the state. He now owns three hundred and fifty acres of rich, productive land, which land was once a part of the donation claim taken up by Jacob L. Miller, the brother of Frank M., in the year 1847, immediately after crossing the plains with his wife. The entire claim amounted to six hundred and forty acres. Though rich in land he desired something more, and in 1849 he followed the current setting toward the gold mines of California, before his father, Abraham Miller, had brought his family into the west.

Abraham Miller was born in Tennessee in 1789, and when a young man he removed to Indiana, where he met and married Mary Little. He subsequently removed to Mercer county, Ill., and founded the village of Millersburg, and in the spring of 1850 they followed their oldest son, Jacob L., across the plains. Their worldly wealth consisted of four wagons with four yoke of oxen to each, and after a six months' trip he arrived with his wife and six children in the country wherein they were to make a new home. The first fall found them located near Jefferson, Marion county, but across the county line in Linn county, on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, the right to which had been purchased from Ashby Pierce. A one-story log house offered the family shelter and into this they moved, ambitious to make from this wilderness a fertile farm, and the productive valley land promised them speedy returns for the springtime sowing. Here the family remained for a great many years, the father reaching the ripe old age of eighty-six before meeting his death, December 29, 1875, when he was killed by the cars, his deafness preventing him hearing the approach of the train. His wife died February 15, 1879, aged seventy-two years. She was born in Wayne county, Ind., January 1, 1807. They were the parents of eleven children, ten of whom attained maturity, though the only two now living are Frank M. and Betsey, the latter of whom is the wife of Samuel Brown, and now makes her home in Galesburg, Knox county, Ill.

Frank M. Miller was born November 20, 1843, in Millersburg, Mercer county, Ill., and was seven years old when the trip was made across the plains. He was reared upon the paternal farm and educated in the common school in the vicinity of his home, where the most primitive conditions prevailed, slab benches being used for seats. When grown he engaged with his father in carrying on the duties of the home farm until his marriage, which occurred May 15, 1873, Nancy E. Bowman becoming his wife. She is the daughter of Preston H. and America (Allphin) Bowman, who came to Oregon from Missouri in 1847, and were married in Linn county October 11, 1850. After his marriage Mr. Miller changed his location, coming to the farm which has ever since occupied his attention. Mr. and Mrs. Miller are the parents of two children, of whom Nora is the wife of Arthur Holt, of Albany, and Albert A. is located in Jefferson. Mr. Miller is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising and has eighteen acres devoted to the cultivation of hops. Politically he is a Democrat and fraternally belongs to the Grange.

EDWARD MEEKER. Many agriculturists whose intelligence, enterprise and progressive spirit are a benefit to any community in which their lot may be cast, are to be found in Linn county, one of the open gateways to the east. Among them is Edward Meeker, the youngest son of one of the sturdy pioneers who early sought the western life for the sake of the multi-fold opportunities awaiting the perseverance and energy of such men as himself.

His father, John Meeker, was born in Butler county, Ohio, September 6, 1822, and in the spring of 1848 he left the city of St. Joseph, Mo., with one wagon and an ox-team, for the six months' journey across the plains.

Presley Conroy
Abelinda J. Conroy

Mr. Meeker first located in the Santiam valley but was driven out by the high water, whereupon he removed to another part of the county and took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres very near the dividing line between the counties of Linn and Marion, within three miles of the town of Jefferson of the latter county. He later became a resident of a location directly opposite the city of Albany, and there his death occurred in 1883, followed by that of his wife, formerly Lydia Miller, in 1886. The elder Mr. Meeker was variously interested in the affairs of his adopted state, and took part in many of the movements for her welfare, a fuller account of which can be found in the sketch of Isaac Meeker, the oldest son of this worthy pioneer.

Edward Meeker was born on his father's old donation claim in Linn county, July 17, 1858, and was there reared to manhood, receiving his education in the common schools of the county. He remained at home until his marriage, March 14, 1880, to Miss Ollie A. Allphin, when he moved upon the part of the farm where he now lives. He owns at present one hundred and fifty-four acres of land, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising. In addition to his farming interests he has always taken an active part in politics, being a stanch Democrat. In 1900 he was elected on that ticket as county recorder of Linn county, which office he maintained for two years.

Mr. and Mrs. Meeker are the parents of one child, whose name is Stacy. Fraternally Mr. Meeker affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holding membership with Santiam Lodge, of Jefferson.

PRESLEY COMEGYS. The name of Presley Comegys is familiar to most of the residents of Lane county and carries with it an impression of influence and unquestioned integrity, his life as a farmer in this section of the country evidencing those qualities which win popularity. Mr. Comegys was born in St. Charles county, Mo., July 2, 1830, the son of Benjamin and the grandson of Abraham Comegys, both owing their nativity to the state of Maryland. The family is of German ancestry, the members of which have followed agricultural pursuits for many generations, which in a measure accounts for the excellence of the work of this citizen of Oregon. The grandfather removed to St. Charles county, Mo., about 1819, and the father became a farmer in that state, where he died in 1844. He married Lucinda Scott, who was born in Monongahela county, W. Va. She was the daughter of Felix Scott, a native of Virginia, who became a farmer in West Virginia and later settled in Missouri, where he continued to follow that occupation. In 1845 he made the journey to California and wintered there, the year following crossing the mountains on the old pack trail to Oregon. He first settled in Yamhill county and later removed to Lane county, where he became a farmer and stock-raiser. In the winter of 1859 he went east via the Isthmus of Panama, and in Kentucky purchased several fine horses, with which he started across the plains, taking the southern Oregon route. On this return trip in 1860 he and his men were murdered in the Modoc country by the Indians, and the horses entirely disappeared. Mrs. Comegys died in Oregon, the mother of three children, the two besides Presley being Wilmer, who died in southeastern Oregon, and Nimrod, now located in Burns, Ore.

Presley Comegys was reared in Missouri until he reached his fifteenth birthday, when, with his mother and family, he removed to Magnolia, Putnam county, Ill. With but a very limited district school education he was compelled to go to work on a farm, as that had been all of his early training. In 1850 he and his brother Wilmer joined an uncle and with ox-teams crossed the plains to California, where they remained in the mines until 1851, when they came to Portland, Ore., and thence made their way into Lane county. The same year Mr. Comegys took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres located three miles northeast of Springfield, and there began the improvement and cultivation which was to make that one of the substantial farming enterprises of the county. Thirty-seven years passed away before he removed from that location, during which time his well merited success enabled him to purchase more land. He now owns two hundred and thirty acres.

Mr. Comegys has been married twice, the first ceremony being performed near Springfield, Ore., in 1863, uniting him with Melzena Duncan, a native of Iowa, and the daughter of Warren S. Duncan, who came to Oregon in 1862, and engaged in farming in Lane county. Mrs. Comegys died on the home farm, April 30, 1868. The two children born to them are Viola, widow of W. W. Withers, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work; and Melzena, wife of O. A. Campbell, of Camp creek valley, Lane county. The second marriage of Mr. Comegys occurred in 1872, Malinda J. Clearwater, of Indiana, becoming his wife. She was the daughter of Martin W. Clearwater, a native of Ohio, who settled in Putnam county, Ind., removed in 1851 to Marion county, Iowa, and in 1864 brought his family across the plains, locating near Springfield, Ore., where he engaged in farming and remained there until his death, which occurred in 1898, at the age of eighty-three years. Mr. Clearwater married Elizabeth J. Evans, a native of Tennessee, and of the seven children born to them only three are now living, the third being Mrs. Comegys. Mr. and Mrs. Comegys have one child, Arthur, who is a telegraph operator in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company, in Grant's Pass. Fraternally Mr. Comegys is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He and his wife belong to the Christian Church, in which Mr. Comegys is both elder and trustee. He also belongs to the Oregon Pioneer Society. In politics Mr. Comegys is a Democrat, and at various times he has served in the interests of his party, for one term acting as county commissioner. His first vote was cast in 1851, in Lane county. He came from Colorado August 12 of that year to the city of Portland, which had then a population of three hundred inhabitants. Mr. Comegys served on the first grand jury impaneled in Lane county, in March, 1852, and of the sixteen men he is the only one now living.

MATHEW C. CHAMBERS. Four miles east of Albany is a farm which, for value and actual productiveness, has few equals in Linn county. Associated with its earliest development, with its timber and log-house days, and with its later prosperity, is the name of one of the very early settlers of the northwest, and one who represented in his character and attainments all that was best among early pioneers. Mathew C. Chambers was born in Bridgeport, Vt., in 1817, and was reared on a sterile and mountainous farm which held out small inducements for an ambitious and physically robust boy. As a youth he appreciated the advantages of a good education, and he so disposed of his home work that all possible time could be spent at the early subscription school of his neighborhood. This desire for knowledge followed him on the long overland trip from Vermont to Galesburg, Ill., whither he went at the age of about twenty-one.

Having no ties to hold him in the middle west, Mr. Chambers heard with every manifestation of interest of the superior land and mining inducements in the west, and in 1847 crossed the plains with an ox-train which included among its homeseekers Ashby Pierce. The two men became warm friends, and many a night was spent side by side over the camp fires, discussing their plans for the future, when they should arrive at the New Eldorado in Oregon. The tramp across the plains was not particularly eventful, and no serious trouble seems to have been experienced with the Indians, nor did illness lessen the ranks of the band. Mr. Chambers spent the first winter in Linn county, and in the spring of 1848 took up the donation claim of six hundred and forty acres now owned by his heirs, four miles from Albany. He was in time to participate in all of the excitement centering around the early days, and his first important experience was during the gold craze of '49. With pack mules he crossed the mountains to California, and mined and prospected with fair results. Like many of the settlers he had a great deal of trouble with the Indians, and his little log cabin was often visited by bands of red men intent upon appropriating whatever of value suited their fancy. Later on he took part in the Indian wars, principally that of 1855-6, and gladly contributed both time and money to secure a more settled state of affairs.

Through his marriage with Margaret M. Knox, he became associated with a family which had crossed the plains earlier than himself, having arrived here in 1845. Eleven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Chambers, of whom Robert lives at Toledo, Ore.; William is a resident of San Francisco, Cal.; Martha is the wife of William Stevens, of Crook county, Ore.; Mathew is a farmer in Gilliam county, Ore.; Lettie is living at home; Edward is mining in Idaho; John is on the home farm; Lillian is the wife of Jerome Williams of Albany; Thomas lives in Astoria; Jacob W. is on the home ranch; and Cordelia, wife of J. J. Brown, of Douglass county. Mr. Chambers became prominent politically in Linn county, and was the first county judge, discharging his duties with rare discretion and satisfaction. He continually improved his farm, adding new buildings from year to year, and more extensively raising all kinds of stock. Since his death, in 1898, his son Jacob W. has carried on the farm, and in his management evidences the same superior judgment and far-sightedness which marked the progress of his lamented father. Mr. Chambers is survived by his wife, now very aged, who serenely contemplates the things around her, and retains to a gratifying extent her sight, hearing, and other useful faculties.

JAMES B. DAVIS. Four miles west of Jefferson, Marion county, just across the line into Linn county, is situated the finely improved farm of James B. Davis, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He now owns one hundred and sixty acres once embodied in the farm where he first saw the light of day, for he is a native son of Oregon, and the son of a pioneer of 1852.

The birth of James B. Davis occurred in Linn county, December 22, 1856, his father being James J. Davis, a native of Indiana. The father was also reared to a farmer's life, and on attaining manhood he removed to Lovilia, Iowa, where he remained until crossing the plains in 1849. With the customary ox-teams he journeyed to California and spent the ensuing three years in prospecting and mining. At the close of that period he came to Oregon, in 1852 settling in Santiam City, Linn county, where he conducted a ferry and a small store. He was there married to Mary A. Miller, and soon after his marriage he removed to the farm now owned by his children, making many excellent improvements on the four hundred and eighty acres which comprised the property. He carried on general farming and stock-raising until his death, March 8, 1890, at the age of sixty years. His wife had died in April, 1875. Besides James B. of this review they were the parents of the following children: Delia, wife of Henry Long of Marion county; Florence, the wife of George W. Birtchet, on the old home place; Dalleson, deceased; and Mary R., deceased wife of George Connor.

James B. Davis was reared upon his father's farm, and was trained to the duties of a farmer, receiving his education in the common schools of Jefferson. Upon growing to manhood he removed to a farm of two hundred and fifty acres, which he proceeded to cultivate for a few years, but at the death of his father he was compelled to return to the home farm and take charge of the management there, where he remained for three years. In 1893 he moved to his present location. Mr. Davis was married November 9, 1880, to Rosa Lewis, and four children have blessed the union, who are as follows: Jessie, Cleveland, Nora and Paulina. In addition to his farming interests Mr. Davis also owns property in the city of Albany. In politics Mr. Davis is a Democrat and fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holding membership with Santiam Lodge of Jefferson.

CHARLES P. GLOVER. In Lincoln county, Mo., Philip and Sarah (Koentz) Glover lived on a large farm which yielded sufficient livelihood for their ten children, among whom was Charles P., now one of the prosperous farmers of Linn county, Ore., whose birth occurred June 7, 1840, in Lincoln county, Mo. To the quiet and uneventful farming locality came rumors of gold and fertile lands on the coast, and to the elder Glover this seemed an opportunity to improve the condition of his family, an opinion in which his wife and the oldest children heartily concurred. The farm being disposed of, the preparations for removal proceeded rapidly, and for the accommodation of the family three wagons were required, having three yoke of oxen each, and enough loose stock to furnish milk and meat for the travelers. The train consisted of thirty-six wagons. Charles P., then a youth of nine, rode one mare and led another owned by a Mr. Gibson, one of whose colts sold at $600 and the other at $550 in Marion county. For this troublesome service the lad received a pair of shoes, a remuneration which would scarcely appeal to the youth of today.

The Glover family met with few adventures on the way across the plains, and once in Oregon the father took up a donation claim of six hundred and seven acres in the Waldo Hills. His children helped to clear the land and put in the crops, and all in all the emigration to the west proved a decided benefit to all the members of the family. Chas. P. left home in 1862, at the age of twenty-two, and tried his fortunes in the mines on the Salmon river, six months convincing him that he was not a born miner, and was much better adapted to work on a farm. Returning to the old home farm he remained until 1892, and then came to his present farm of two hundred and thirteen acres six miles east of Albany. His farm is well improved, and many years of industry and economy have placed him in a position of independence and thrift. In 1865 Mr. Glover married Clarissa Palmer, who proved a helpmate and a ready sympathizer in the vicissitudes which have come into the life of her husband, and died in February, 1886. In an atmosphere of kindness and goodness eleven children have been reared, five sons and six daughters, all of whom are living. Lenora, at home; Laura C., the wife of George U. Ashby, a merchant of Weizer, Idaho; Samuel, near Antelope, Ore., a rancher.; Orange, of Portland, Ore.; Narcissa, the wife of Harvey S. Taylor, of Macleay, Ore.; Wallace, of Goldendale, Wash.; Edith, at home; Matilda, the wife of Clarence Turner, confectioner of Lebanon, Ore.; Ralph, of Salem, bookkeeper; Ronald, at home; Mable, also at home. These children were born in the Waldo Hills and educated in the common schools, and schools of Monmouth and Salem.

In political belief Mr. Glover is a Republican, but he has chosen rather his own farm and fireside to the excitement and always doubtful success of the politician. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient order of United Workmen. A good manager, excellent business man, and unquestionably reliable in all his dealings, Mr. Glover commands the respect of all who know him and is deserving of the success which has come his way.

JOSEPH A. JONES. Located upon a farm of three hundred and thirty acres in Linn county, Ore., Joseph A. Jones is engaged in carrying on general farming and stock-raising, one hundred and twenty-five acres being devoted to cultivation and the remainder used as pasture. He has followed the early training received from his father along agricultural lines, and has certainly made a success of his work since taking it up for himself.

The birth of Joseph A. Jones occurred in Linn county, Ore., December 3, 1857, upon the old homestead. He is the son of Samuel T. Jones, a native of Illinois. The father emigrated from his native state in 1849, crossing the plains into California, where he engaged in mining, but, later returning to Illinois, he again made the journey west, in 1852 coming to Oregon and settling in Linn county. He here bought the right to a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres from Jackson Allphin, and at once moved into the little log cabin which had already been erected upon the place. The remainder of his life was passed upon the property, converting it from an uncultivated wilderness into a fruitful farm by energy and perseverance. At his death he owned four hundred and eighty acres of land. Politically he was a Republican. Mrs. Jones also died in their western home. She was the mother of two children, of whom Mary, the wife of Perry Miller, is deceased; and Joseph A. is the subject of this review.

Joseph A. Jones was born and reared upon his father's farm, growing into manhood there, his earliest remembrances being those of farming duties. He was educated in the common schools of the county, and was married December 3, 1882, to Mary E. Rainey, and they have five children, being named in order of birth as follows: Fred, Nellie, Frank, Myrtle and Charles. Like his father, Mr. Jones adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party. He has served for seventeen years as school clerk in the district where his home is located, five miles west of Jefferson, Marion county. Fraternally he affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being a member of Santiam Lodge No. 27, of Jefferson.

SMITH COX. On his father's donation claim, eight miles southeast of Albany, Smith Cox was born February 2, 1859, and was there reared to a practical agricultural life. Although his family was comparatively poor, and the children were obliged to work hard, he managed to secure a fair education in the district school, which he attended at irregular intervals, and mostly during the winter season. In 1888, at the age of twenty-nine, he left the home farm and moved upon his present claim, which consists of one hundred and sixty acres, all but twenty of which are under cultivation. Seventy acres of this land is in the bottoms and is unusually fertile, well adapted to wheat and general grain-raising, of which the owner makes a specialty. Mr. Cox owns one hundred and sixty acres of timber land in Douglas county.

Two years after starting out to farm on his own responsibility, Mr. Cox tired of keeping bachelor quarters, and married, March 5, 1890, Annie Archibald, a native daughter of Linn county, who is the mother of two interesting children, Roya and Edna. Mr. Cox is a Democrat in political affiliation, and though not an office seeker, has served both as school director and road supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. Thrifty, and with great capacity for industry, Mr. Cox well deserves the reputation of being one of the worthy and successful farmers of Linn county.

EDWIN G. COX. As a general farmer and stock-raiser Edwin G. Cox reflects credit upon Linn county, Ore., where he was born on a large donation claim eight miles east of Albany, November 22, 1852. For many years his father, Lewis Cox, was known as a successful farmer in Ohio, in which state he was born near Dayton, May 11, 1818, and from where he moved at the age of seventeen to Wabash county, Ind. About 1845 he took up his residence on a farm in Iowa, and there he married his first wife, a Miss Castor, who bore him one child, Cynthia, now Mrs. Thompson of Denver, Colo. His second wife, Elizabeth (Trites) Cox, was born in New Brunswick, and with her Mr. Cox crossed the plains in the spring of 1850, outfitted with one wagon, three yoke of oxen, and two cows. They were on the way some four months, meeting with few unpleasant experiences. Mr. Cox purchased the right of six hundred and forty acres of land of Lud Maxwell, which contained a log cabin and a sawmill. He was obliged to go in debt to the amount of $3,000 on his property, but so well did he succeed that by 1856 he had cancelled this indebtedness and had $3,000 clear profit. In the meantime he had thought always of returning to Iowa and spending his last days there, so he took his little hoard, all in gold, and made his way back to the scene of his earlier efforts. Like the majority who return after years to old and familiar surroundings, he experienced a keen sense of disappointment, and made up his mind that Oregon, after all, held far superior inducements. Thus it happened that the little fortune was re-invested in Oregon, to which state he returned by way of Cape Horn, being six months on the way. Locating on the farm which is now owned by his son, he remained there until his death, February 20, 1884, at the age of sixty-six. He attained considerable prominence in political circles, serving as county commissioner one term. Twelve children were born of his second marriage, four of whom died young.

MR. AND MRS. GODFREY DENTEL.

Mary J., the oldest daughter, is the wife of Elias Maxwell of Linn county; Anderson is deceased; Edwin G. is the third; Smith lives near Albany; Vallalio lives at Coos Bay; Ira is a farmer in Linn county; Lewis lives with his mother on the home farm; and Agnes is the wife of Alexander McNabb of Centralia, Wash.

The youth of Edwin G. Cox was not unlike that of other farm-reared boys in the northwest, and he had the average number of advantages and diversions. He was a diligent student at the public schools, and as a boy and man has been industrious and painstaking. He located on his present farm at the age of twenty-one, and has since made many fine improvements on his property. Of his four hundred and eighty acres of land, one hundred and sixty are under cultivation, and the greater part of his property is in the valley. He raises a high grade of stock, and the general produce of a farm increases his yearly income to a considerable extent. He is a Democrat in politics, and in religion is a member of the Christian church. In 1875 he married Clarissa Morgan, of which union there have been born seven children: Annie, wife of W. H. Schiller of The Dalles; Plessie died at the age of eighteen; Lewis G.; Clarence; Archie; and two deceased. Mr. Cox is popular and well liked, responding generously to all appeals for assistance in the community, and in his farming maintaining the high standard established in one of the most fertile and resourceful parts of the state.

GODFREY DENTEL was born in Saxony, Germany, December 17, 1844. He was brought by his parents to America in 1847, the family making their home in Monroe county, Mich., on a farm eight miles west of Monroe, where Godfrey Dentel grew to manhood. At the age of twenty-two he located in Sangamon county, Ill., and began working on a farm near Springfield, that county. He continued working by the month for three years, and was then married to Miss Elizabeth Buirgy, December 23, 1869. Mrs. Dentel was a native of Clermont county, Ohio, and after her marriage she ably assisted her husband, performing the duties of the household in an exemplary manner. They continued to reside in Sangamon county for about twelve years. In 1877 they removed to Portland, Ore., remaining there for a period of three months. The duration of their stay in Clackamas county covered a period of two years, at the end of which time they settled in Marion county, near Aurora, on their present farm, which comprises one hundred and sixty acres. When Mr. Dentel took up the work of improvement upon this place there had been nothing whatever done in that direction, but with determined zeal he went to work, and placing his standard high, he has reached a degree of excellence in the cultivation and management of his property, which is not excelled by any, and is equaled by few. When he purchased this farm it contained no buildings, but Mr. Dentel has built a comfortable and commodious residence and all necessary out-buildings for the shelter of grain and stock, and the appearance of thrift and neatness is everywhere apparent. Mr. Dentel is an experienced hop-grower, having been engaged in that enterprise for the past eighteen years, and at present he has fourteen acres under hops. His attention has also been given to general agricultural pursuits, and as he is a man who never fails in anything he undertakes, his efforts have resulted in his becoming well-to-do and prosperous in a marked degree. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Dentel have been born eight children, seven of whom are now living: Arbon, of Marion county; Mattie, the wife of A. H. Giesy, a merchant of Aurora; Clara, the wife of Chris F. Siegler, a resident of Marion county; Fred, also of Marion county; Ruth, Lizzie and William, who make their home with their parents.

It will easily be understood that a man who can ably conduct a large farm, thus advancing the agricultural interests of the community in which he lives, must necessarily be broad-minded and public-spirited, and it comes as a matter of course that Mr. Dentel should take a prominent part in promoting the general progress of his county. He has ever favored good schools and good roads, realizing that both are essential to the ultimate success of any section, and has served both as road supervisor and as school director. He favors the platform of the Republican party and votes accordingly, while his fraternal relations connect him with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. His religious views are expressed by his membership in the Presbyterian Church.

The history of Mr. Dentel may be read with interest by those who have their own way to make in the world, and who start out in life wishing to gain, through the experience of others, the key-note to success. Reading between the lines of this record, it would appear that the causes of Mr. Dentel's success have been his untiring energy, his indomitable will, which has overcome all obstacles, and his inherent integrity, which is unquestionable.

EDWIN MCGREW. Under the able administration of Edwin McGrew the Pacific College at Newberg has undergone a transformation extremely gratifying to interested spectators of educational advancement in Oregon. Although young in years for so important a responsibility, Professor McGrew has long since passed the experimental stage of his career, and possesses to an unusual degree that financial and executive ability which, combined with scholarly attainments, meets the requirements of latter-day educational standards. The management of the college, which is under the auspices of the Friends Church, was undertaken by Mr. McGrew in 1900, and at the time was deeply in debt. Due partially to funds solicited in the east by the president, who made a special trip for that purpose, the indebtedness has been completely wiped out, and the scholarship roll has been increased. The college is well equipped for scientific and other research, and the thoroughness of the training possible in its various departments precludes any reasonable possibility of its usefulness waning or its present prestige being diminished as one of the important educational factors of Oregon.

A native of the vicinity of Marshalltown, Marshall county, Iowa, Mr. McGrew was born March 4, 1868, a son of David D. and Alpha (Pierson) McGrew, natives of Ohio, and the latter a daughter of John Pierson, of Ohio. The paternal grandfather, Jacob B., was born in Pennsylvania, and from there removed at an early day to Ohio, where his death occurred several years after his retirement. Like his father, David D. McGrew was a farmer during the greater part of his life, and his death occurred in Marshall county, Iowa, at the age of sixty-five years. Of the three children born to David D. and Alpha (Pierson) McGrew, Edwin is the only son, and second child.

The education of Mr. McGrew was acquired in the public schools and at the Friends Academy at LeGrand, Iowa, from which latter institution he was duly graduated in 1887. In 1890 he graduated from the Capitol City Commercial College, and in 1895 from the Penn College at Oskaloosa, Iowa, with the degree of B. S., receiving from the same institution the degree of M. S. in 1898. Besides being a student at the college Mr. McGrew was also an educator, and in the capacity of principal was identified with the preparatory department from 1895 to 1897. In 1895 he was recorded as a minister in the Friends Church at Oskaloosa, Iowa, and though still occupying this position does very little preaching at the present time. In the fall of 1897 Mr. McGrew assumed charge of the Friends Church at Earlham, Madison county, Iowa, and in 1900 undertook his present responsibility as president of the Pacific College at Newberg.

In New Providence, Iowa, Mr. McGrew was united in marriage with Edith Ware, a native of Indiana, a daughter of Talbot Ware. Talbot Ware is still a resident of Indiana, where he is engaged in farming and the mercantile business and is also interested in building and contracting. To Mr. and Mrs. McGrew has been born one child, Marion Edwina.

JULIUS C. HODSON. The men's clothing house, owned and managed by Julius C. and C. A. Hodson, is one of the substantial and upbuilding business enterprises of Newberg. Julius C. Hodson, one of the most prominent men of the town, was born in Spiceland, Henry county, Ind., November 11, 1860, and is a son of Caleb Hodson, a native of North Carolina. The family was established in America by the paternal great-grandfather, Robert, who left his ancestral home in England to profit by the less trying conditions in the New England colonies. He eventually found his way to North Carolina, where was born his son, Jesse, the paternal grandfather of Julius C., the founder of the family in Henry county, Ind. As a young man Caleb Hodson removed with his father to Indiana, where he in time bought a farm, and after the death of his father purchased the old homestead in the Hoosier state.

The sixth of the nine sons born to his father, Julius C. Hodson was educated at the public schools and at an academy, and, having qualified as an educator, was thus employed after his removal to Yamhill county in 1879. His mother purchasing property near Newberg, he made this farm his headquarters, and until 1891 was engaged in teaching in Washington and Yamhill counties, and in eastern Oregon. In 1891 he located in Newberg, and for nine years had charge as principal of the public schools of the town, in the meantime materially advancing the standard of education in the county. In 1897 he started the present clothing business with his brother, C. A. Hodson, and two years later relinquished his educational work to assume entire control of the clothing business.

In Fountain City, Ind., Mr. Hodson was united in marriage with Lorena Townsend, a native of Indiana, as was also her father, James Townsend. Mr. Townsend was a farmer for the greater part of his active life, owning farms in both Iowa and Indiana, but finally settled in Fountain City, Wayne county, Ind. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hodson: Esther L. and James L., both of whom are living at home. Mr. Hodson is a welcome member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a Republican in politics, and for some time has been president of the Republican Club of Newberg. He was a candidate for county superintendent of schools in 1896, and has served on the city council. Mr. Hodson has given evidence of his faith in the continued prosperity of this section by investing in considerable town and country property. He is one of the most helpful citizens, and broad-minded cultured men who have invaded Yamhill county to the advantage of the large community.

LEWIS RITNER. Among the native sons of Polk county who have spent their entire lives upon farms where they were born in the pioneer days of the state, is Lewis Ritner, whose birth occurred November 2, 1857. He is a son of Sebastian and Sarah (Woodling) Ritner, and is the second of three children born of the second marriage of his mother. Mrs. Ritner was born in Northampton county, Pa., August 5, 1817, and before her marriage was Sarah Woodling, daughter of Peter and Mary (Houghner) Woodling, the former born in England, and a farmer during his entire active life. In her native state Miss Woodling married for her first husband, in 1833, John Ritner, who was born in Switzerland, and came to the United States at an early day, locating in Missouri, Platte county. He was a mechanic by trade, and combined that with farming during nearly all of his working life. Hearing favorable reports of the agricultural prospects in the far west, he sold his farm, and left to others his little business, outfitting in 1852 to cross the plains with ox-teams. He was not destined to reach the Mecca of his desires, for on the plains he succumbed to illness, died, and was buried in a lonely wayside grave. His wife and four children finished the journey to the coast, and the mother took up a donation claim of two hundred and thirty acres, which is the present home of the family. In 1854 Mrs. Ritner married Sebastian Ritner, brother of her former husband, who was also born in Switzerland, the date of his birth being 1815.

Sebastian Ritner crossed the plains as early as 1845, but it is not on record that he experienced any particular adventures. He farmed for a time in Oregon, and in 1847 went to the mines of California, returning at the end of a year considerably richer than when he went. With his earnings he took up a donation claim of three hundred acres, and so successfully operated it that he was able to add to his possessions, and at the time of his death owned nine hundred acres. He engaged in general farming and stock-raising, although in his youth he had worked as a mechanic, and had a wide range of knowledge bearing upon mechanical subjects. He was a thoroughly reliable man, upright and considerate in all of his dealings, and of more than ordinary business shrewdness. He died at his home near Pedee, September 10, 1887.

The children of the first marriage of Mrs. Ritner who are now living are: Mary E., the wife of Lew Hannam, of Lewisville; Missouri Anna, the wife of Joe Edwards, of Pedee; Anna, the wife of Richard Dunn, of King's Valley; and Flora, the wife of John Waters, of McTimmons Valley. By the second marriage there were four children: John Ritner; Lewis; Sophrona, wife of James Grant; and Frank Ritner, deceased.

Lewis Ritner spent an uneventful youth on his father's farm, and was so thoroughly trained in the science of farming that he took charge of the whole property at the age of eighteen years. This responsibility came to him because of the marriage of his brother and his removal to a farm of his own. In April, 1883, Mr. Ritner married Corinda, daughter of James Edelman, Mrs. Ritner being a native of Benton county, Ore. The father was born in the state of Pennsylvania, and located on a farm in Benton county, where he died at the age of sixty-two years. Mr. Ritner is farming five hundred acres of his father's claim, and has large numbers of fine stock, including thoroughbred horses, red and roan Shires, Cotswold sheep, and dairy cattle. An additional source of revenue is a logging business in which he engages for a portion of each year. He also has sixteen acres under hops, and considerable fruit. He is very successful, and is regarded as one of the most scientific and practical farmers in the county. He is a Republican in politics, and with his wife is a member of the Evangelical Church of Pedee, in which he is a steward and active worker. Mr. Ritner has the sterling and reliable traits of character which brought about his father's success, and which have brought him many staunch friends, as well as the esteem of the entire community. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Ritner have been born three children: Ella, wife of Frank Sheythe; Annie and Martin P. Ritner, at home.

CHARLES FRANCIS DE GUIRE (Da Guera, French spelling). Born September 12, 1846, among the quiet scenes of Fredericktown, Madison county, Mo., Mr. De Guire still recalls his first great journey in the world taken in 1854 over the wild, uncultivated lands that lay between the Father of Waters and the peaceful waves of the Pacific ocean. It was not the first journey into the west, made by members of his family, as his father, Francis B., who was born March 30, 1818, in Ste. Genevieve county, Mo., had gone to California in 1849, having fallen a victim to the gold craze. Returning after about two years of prospecting and mining he again made the perilous journey, in company with his family, traveling by ox-team, and arriving safely at their destination with the usual experiences incident to the life on the plains by which they recall their long trip of six months.

After one winter spent in that state, another journey was taken, the family coming by horse-teams over the mountains to settle near St. Paul, Marion county, Ore. In this location Mr. De Guire again followed the occupation of his forefathers, engaging for three years in agriculture, and at the end of that time removed to a farm six miles southeast of Silverton. In his Missouri home he had married Eleanor St. Geme, a native of the same state, and after her death in 1862 he made his home with his son, C. F. The remaining children that blessed the union were as follows: John, who makes his home with C. F.; Mary C., wife of D. R. Hubbard, of Marquam, Clackamas county, Ore.; Louisa, and Clotilda, of Salem; James L., deceased; and Henry, of southern California. Personally, the elder Mr. De Guire is energetic and lively, bearing his eighty-six years lightly, his unimpaired memory recalling days of his struggles in the west with genial satisfaction. He had given up a lucrative position in his home community, being then dealing in lead mining stock, and enjoying the popularity and esteem of a successful man, to try his fortunes in the west, and through the trying years of his pioneer life he had been confident of the fruition he now enjoys. Another incentive to his removal to Oregon was the fact that his brother, J. B. De Guire, having made the journey in 1840 in the interests of the American Fur Company, had taken up a donation claim near Rays Landing, being one of the first settlers of Oregon. It was his distinction to come west in company with Captain Sublett. Fifteen years of his life were spent in the Rocky mountains, where he hunted and trapped, gaining a wide reputation as a furrier.

C. F. De Guire was reared in Oregon, where he attended the public schools when occasion offered, which was but little of the time, so that his wide knowledge and general information are due largely to his own efforts, made through the years in which he has been gaining his livelihood. At the age of fourteen he started out into the world to make his own way, going first into woolen mills where he learned weaving, in which business he continued for six years. On May 13, 1873, he married Miss Arlena Brown, a native of Silverton, Ore., and the daughter of James Brown, who crossed the plains in 1846. After a year of married life in Salem, the young people moved to their present location, being a part of the Brown donation claim, of which there is left in the family about one hundred and fifteen acres. Upon his farm Mr. De Guire has put almost all the improvements of which it boasts, and is now busily engaged in general farming and stock-raising. The death of his wife occurred in October, 1885. In January, 1893, Mr. De Guire married a native of England, Miss Julia Brydge. He has four children, of whom Murton E., a son by his first wife, is a dentist in Silverton; the other three, Olfan, Alvis H. and Vada being born of the second union, and all at home.

Mr. De Guire is well known and a very popular man in his community, having been in the jewelry business in Silverton for ten years, also dealing in city and farming property for several years. While in that city he served for some time as deputy postmaster, being politically independent. He was delegate to the first Prohibition convention held at Salem. He has also seen military service, having enlisted December 9, 1864, in Company C, First Oregon Infantry, mustered in at Salem. The regiment was first sent to Vancouver, later to Ft. Stillicom, where they did garrison duty, and received his discharge in October, 1865. He was one of the organizers and a charter member of Geo. H. Thomas Post G. A. R. of Silverton.

GEORGE CUSITER. To an appreciable extent Silverton has profited by the shrewd business ability of George Cusiter, one of those rugged and honest Scotchmen whose thrift and industry have been the making of many a community in the United States. The early life of George Cusiter was passed in the vicinity of Edinburgh, Scotland, where he was born August 18, 1860, and where he received a practical home training in a typical Scotch family. His father, George Cusiter, was born in the Orkney Islands, off the north coast of Scotland, and spent the greater part of his boyhood and young manhood among these rather bleak and cheerless Scottish possessions. His ancestors had long tilled the soil of the unprofitable lands, and his grandfather and great-grandfather spent their entire lives where the mists hung heavy for the greater part of the year, and where the crops were backward and limited to few varieties. George Cusiter was an educator of prominence at Dalke, his education having been received at that school, and he was also a man of science, having made a particular study of coal gas. At frequent intervals he contributed articles on chemistry and science to the leading journals throughout the United Kingdom, and withal was a profound and conscientious student. His death occurred in 1874. He was survived by his wife, formerly Miss Mary Young, a native of Selkirk, Scotland, who is now sixty-six years of age.

The only son, and the oldest of the four children born to his parents, George Cusiter had the inspiration to study which his father's scholarly life furnished, and he had the advantage both of a common school education, and of a course in the George Watson College at Edinburgh, from which he was duly graduated in 1876. The year of his graduation he embarked upon a business life as a clerk in the office department of a wholesale grocery concern, and there laid the foundation for the practical life in which he has since engaged. The thoroughness required of employes in all departments of activity in Scotland had its effect, as did the upright methods everywhere recognized as a shining characteristic of Scottish national life.

Armed with his experience and with great hope in the future of America, Mr. Cusiter came to the United States in 1885, and after crossing the continent to Portland, Ore., remained there for a couple of months. Not being particularly well impressed with the northern city he found his way to Silverton, where he secured a position as bookkeeper for the flouring mills of this city. Five years' association in this capacity convinced him that he had found a good place in which to live, and one which held out a helping hand to all who were industrious and capable. Desiring to engage in business on his own responsibility, he bought out a merchandise business with a partner, and thus continued to cater to the needs of the community for several years. In 1902 he bought out his partner, and has since conducted the business alone. His store contains a stock valued at $8,000, and his goods are selected with reference to supplying a large and exacting trade. The greatest consideration is shown patrons of this well managed enterprise, the proprietor encouraging in his assistants, tact and patience, and the greatest order and neatness.

In Salem, Ore., in 1893, Mr. Cusiter married Nettie Ridings, a native of Clackamas county, Ore., near Marquam. Mr. Cusiter is a Democrat in political affiliation, and among the positions of trust held by him during his residence here may be mentioned that of mayor of the city for three terms, and member of the council for two terms. He is fraternally connected with Silverton Lodge No. 45, A. F. & A. M., and Home Lodge No. 35 Knights of Pythias. The friends and associates of Mr. Cusiter speak of him as a whole-souled, honorable and public-spirited gentleman, and one in whom his adopted city may well repose the greatest confidence.

farm operated by the two brothers, and the hop business conducted by M. J. & J. R. White & Son, represent all that is substantial and reliable, both as to the extent and scope of their operations and the character and attainments of the men conducting them.

On a farm in Callaway county, Mo., Marion J. White was born September 17, 1845, while his brother, John R. White, was born November 17, 1846. Peter White, their father, whose first wife had lived but a short time after their marriage, was born in Pennsylvania in 1810, and in young manhood removed to the far-off state of Missouri. There he learned the trade of silversmith, and was employed at the same until his second marriage, in 1843, with Virginia Q. Foster, who was born in Virginia in 1813. Subsequently, he settled upon a farm in Callaway county, Mo. Upon the outbreak of the Black Hawk war he left his duties on the farm and enlisted in a Missouri regiment, serving three years in this memorable conflict. His military experiences were interesting. He was attached to the escort of General Fremont during the latter's expedition to the Rocky mountains, and participated in numerous important engagements. After being mustered out, he returned to the farm and pursued the even tenor of his way until 1852. In the meantime, four children had been born into his family, named in the order of their birth, as follows: Elizabeth J., wife of A. S. Gleason, of Hubbard, Ore.; M. J.; J. R., and America Q., wife of J. T. Ross, who resides near Monitor, Ore., on part of the White homestead.

In the spring of 1852, Mr. White disposed of his Missouri property and outfitted for a journey over the plains, M. J. and J. R. then being six and five years of age, respectively. Always full of lurking dangers, and uncertain of accomplishment, this journey, as did many in those perilous times, proved the futility of the plans of mankind. All went well until Fort Laramie was reached. There the father was stricken with the cholera, and died while the party was stopping on Deer creek. The disconsolate widow buried her greatest treasure at that lonely spot, and fortified herself to bear, unaided, the greatest blow that had ever befallen her. Wearily she traveled the rest of the distance with her little family, and with a heavy heart and little hope for the future, took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres on Butte creek, two and a half miles southeast of Monitor, in Marion county. The land was a wilderness, and the immediate resources must have been pitifully small; but good fortune came her way from the start, for her sad story touched the hearts of the neighboring settlers, who, one and all, put their shoulders to the task of building her a little log cabin, in which she might at least find shelter from the inclement

MARION J. AND JOHN R. WHITE. As small and irresponsible lads, M. J. and J. R. White came across the plains in 1852; but as strong, courageous and resourceful men, they occupy an important position in the agricultural world of the Willamette valley. Side by side, they have worked and progressed along natural lines of development, until to-day the weather. Food and other necessities were also forthcoming, and, being one of those courageous and dauntless pioneer women of whom one reads with feelings of the most profound admiration, she succeeded, in spite of adversity, in rearing her children and in making them a comparatively comfortable home. When the boys were old enough to do so, they erected a more pretentious modern structure, and the farm began to take on the aspect of an up-to-date and enterprising center of activity. This pioneer mother continued to guide the affairs of her household for many years, and lived to be sixty-nine years of age, dying April 6, 1883.

Of the sons who have attained prominence in Marion county, Marion J. lived at home until 1874. In that year he made his home with his brother, with whom he has since resided. He has never married. He received his education in the public schools, as did also his brother, John R., both also attending the high school at Silverton. John R. finally engaged in educational work for a few terms. He was united in marriage, October 3, 1872, to Mary A. Birtchet, a native of Yamhill county, Ore., born December 1, 1853. Her parents, George and Elizabeth (Haughn) Birtchet, came from Missouri to Oregon in 1853, crossing the plains and locating near Wilsonville. Mr. and Mrs. White began housekeeping on the farm which is still their home, and where, with his brother, John R. is laying by a competence. Of the farm of four hundred and ninety-six acres, two hundred and fifty are under cultivation, fifty-six acres being devoted to the culture of hops. In 1902, the hop harvest yielded fifty-four thousand pounds. All of the improvements on the White farm have been made by the brothers, for they had to deal with wild land from the beginning, and much arduous labor was required before the seed could be placed in the ground, or any hope of gain indulged in. At present large numbers of Shorthorn cattle browse in the fertile meadows, and other high-grade stock contribute to a substantial income. While the farm in general is managed by the brothers, the hop industry, which entails additional responsibility, is under the care of George Gasner, son of J. R. White. To Mr. and Mrs. J. R. White were born nine children; Lulu P. became the wife of A. L. Briggs, of Cottage Grove, Ore., and they have two sons, Merl and Verne; Marion P., who resides in Clackamas county, married Hattie Taylor, and they have one son, Drexel; Euphe M. died at the age of twenty years; George Gasner, who lives on the home farm, married Mary Pursifull; Virginia Elizabeth became the wife of R. Scheurer, a resident of Plaza, Wash.; America R., Volney J. R., Rosetta and Merton O. are living at home.

The White brothers occupy an enviable place in their neighborhood, where both are regarded as public-spirited and progressive men. Politically both view public affairs from an independent standpoint, and John R. White has been prominently identified with local matters. Both brothers are members of the Butte Creek Grange. Mr. and Mrs. J. R. White are members of the Christian Church, in which Mr. White is a trustee, and for twenty-five years he has served as clerk of the school board.

HOMER C. DAVENPORT. Perhaps no other newspaper artist in the United States has been the subject of so many "write ups" as the person whose name heads this article. His appearance among the foremost cartoonists was so sudden and unheralded that writers of all degrees were tempted to try their descriptive and analytic powers upon him. Of necessity, they had not much data to draw from, for he had no diploma from any American art school; had not been in England, Germany, Italy or France; in fact, had not been educated in art anywhere; and as he was not a lineal descendant from artists, as any one knew, it was not strange that many of the "interviews" were as grotesque as the artist himself could wish. He never claimed to be an artist, and so when questioned as to the employment of his youth, he generally gave such facts as would make a humorous picture, such as firing on a steamboat, wiping locomotives, breeding and fighting game chickens, playing clown for a circus, feeding lions and tigers in a menagerie, clog dancing in a minstrel show, umpiring base ball games, or any other of the thousand and one things boys attempt in the rattle-brain period of existence. As such things made up the greater part of his antecedents, upon which his interviewers delighted to dwell, the opinion became prevalent that his case lies outside of heredity and that early art training is unimportant. If from such vagaries, and without previous training, a green Oregon boy could enter the field of art and carry off high honors and emoluments, why not others do the same? Hence, all over the Pacific coast, boys who had never taken a thought of how pictures are made, began to draw cartoons, full of enthusiastic purpose, to become famous like Homer.

Young men just beginning to encounter the earnest tug of existence and wanting to find an easier way of making a living; and boys who had seen Davenport's pictures in the Examiner and Journal and were stirred with emulation, these brought samples of their art yearnings to be examined by the celebrated cartoonist, during his short visit in Salem two years ago. One hopeful woman desired him to leave the train and go six miles into the country to see the work of her darling boy, who had been drawing for only three months, and never made a line until he was twelve years old. One of Homer's early companions, now editor of a Seattle paper, said, "It is too bad, so many young people should abandon pursuits in which they can make a living, and spend their precious early years in drawing hideous pictures and dreaming of brilliant success in art." To satisfy his regret of such a condition, he proposed to publish his opinion that Homer's success is the worst calamity that ever befell the boys of the Pacific coast.

Such a statement, however emphatic, will not deter any ambitious boy, for has not everybody seen the catchy write-ups of Homer, who was pictured in spicy phrase as a queer, jolly fellow; a veritable freak of nature, given to all sorts of vagaries, and having a disrelish of book learning, as well as any remunerative employment, and that his present success is the result of one or two lucky incidents?

One, that he painted, on the outside of a hen house, a game cock so life-like that his bull dog thought it a veritable live cock and bristled for a fight every time he passed that way; another, that a friend having confidence in the sagacity of the dog, suggested to Homer that he had better work at art for a living. There is plenty in all this to rattle the boys and make them believe there is an easy way to fame and fortune, such as Homer had found or strayed into.

But the dear school of experience is a very effective teacher, and two years of experimenting and cartooning has convinced most of the boys that the hill of art is as hard to climb as the hill of science which they abandoned to loiter in the royal road to fame.

Only here and there an art scribbler is left, punishing himself in the vain endeavor to evoke a faculty too weak for self-assertion; very much like making something out of nothing. The plain, unvarnished truth, as respects Homer's early years, would have saved the boys from the unlucky diversion, but his interviewers were not informed thereof. In fact Homer himself attached no importance to his early habits, nor had he considered the controlling impulse which prompted them. It is doubtful if he could have given as good a reason for himself, as Topsy did, that he "just grow'd."

The common mind everywhere takes but little account of what is most influential in the formative period of human character. Unless a person has received an academic education, he says at once, "I am uneducated," and considers as unworthy of mention the early, constant, and unaided exercise of his mental faculties, the only true and reliable education. And it is owing to the omission of the basic conditions, the absolutely essential antecedents, from the biographical sketches, that make of Homer an inexplicable personage. Very creditable accounts, however, have been written within a year by Allan Dale, Julian Hawthorne and Arthur McEwan, but they contain no antidote to the irrational intoxication which possessed the young would-be artists of Oregon. If they could have been assured, for a fact, that although Homer never attended an art school or had an art teacher, he had spent his whole life in the daily and almost hourly practices of art, not as technically understood, but of drawing such pictures as suited his fancy, not because any one else was an artist, or to satisfy an ambition to be an artist, for he was void of purpose, but from an inherited endowment of special faculties and an irrepressible desire to exercise them, they would have dropped their pencils in utter amazement, to think of following in the track of such a being. He didn't wait until he was twelve years old before he began to trace his mental pictures on paper. Before he was three years old he was observing and drawing, rudely but continuously, subject to such intermissions of play as children take. It is nothing uncommon for young children to draw, but it is very rare to see one absorbed in the work hour after hour, putting his observations to paper as though it were a devotion. His extraordinary love for animals, and especially of birds, was exhibited when only a few months old. Unlike other babies, toys afforded him but little amusement. Shaking rattle boxes and blowing whistles only fretted him, and his wearied looks and moans seemed to say that he was already tired of existence. Carrying him around into the various rooms and showing pictures soon became irksome, and in quest of something to relieve the monotony of indoor life, his paternal grandmother found a continuous solace for his fretful moods in the chickens. It was worth the time of a philosopher to observe the child drink in every motion of the fowls and witness the thrill of joy that went through his being when the cock crew or flapped his wings. Such a picture is worth reproducing. Old grandmother in her easy chair upon the veranda; baby sitting upon the floor by her side; his little hands tossing wheat, at intervals, to the clucking hen and her brood, the latter venturing into baby's lap and picking grains therefrom, despite the warnings of the shy old cock and anxious mother. This lesson, with all its conceivable variations learned, ceased to be entertaining, and a broader field was needed. So grandma, or her substitute, carried baby to the barnyard, and there, sitting under the wagon shed, acquaintance was made with the other domestic animals, which afforded him daily diversion. At first their forms and quiet attitudes were of sufficient interest, but as these became familiar, more active exhibitions were required, and the dog perceiving his opportunity, turned the barnyard into a circus of animals.

Whether this was the cause and beginning of Homer's extravagant love for dogs, is probably not material, but unlike Madame DeStael, who said, "The more I see of men the better I like dogs," he has love enough to go all around. All this seems very commonplace, as any child would be likewise entertained, but it is a very rare infant to whom such scenes and acquaintances are a necessity. And that the forms and actions of his speechless friends were being photographed upon his brain, was shown by the fact that as soon as he could use a pencil he began to sketch them, very imperfect in proportions and form, but exhibiting them in action with sufficient accuracy before long to label one as untamed, another mad, and another frolicsome. After his mother's death from smallpox, on the 20th of November, 1870, the family was subjected to several months of social isolation, during the rainy season, when Homer, just recovered from the dread disease, was kept in doors. During these dull months he worked more assiduously at drawing than ever since for pay. Sitting at the desk or lying prone upon the floor, it was draw, draw, draw. Fearing the effect of such intense application upon the slimsy fellow, his grandmother tried various diversions without much success. She could interest with Indian or ghost stories, but such gave him no bodily exercise and only set him to drawing how granny looked when telling ghost stories.

Plainly observable, even thus early, was his love of the dramatic in everything having life. Though much attracted by beautiful specimens of the animal kingdom, his chief satisfaction came from representing them in their moods. His pictures were all doing something. Horses, dogs, monkeys, chickens, ducks, pigeons, were exhibiting their peculiar characteristics and so fitted to the occasion as to awaken the supposition that the artist must be "en rapport" with all animated nature. Of course, his artistic creations were wide of the mark, as respects conformity to natural proportions, which his visiting critics unflinchingly pointed out. "Homer! this horse's legs are too long for his body; his back is too short and his neck too long. And this dog, chasing the horse, is too long bodied and too short legged. Nobody ever saw a dog like that." His reply was, "That is a bench-leg dog and the horse can't kick him." The real excellence of the disproportioned animals, which the voluntary critics did not see, lay in the fact that they were truly acting out their natures, under the circumstances, and exhibiting the same controlling animal desires in every limb and feature. A mad horse was mad all over, and an ardent dog showed it in every part, regardless of proportions.

It may be said that these are a fond parent's after-thoughts, or the result of his own suggestions at the time, but neither of these suspicions can be true. The suggestion as to harmony in dramatic composition and co-ordination of details might be elaborated to a student a thousand times, and yet, without natural faculty to perceive, without the sympathy with nature, the suggestions would result in a mere artificiality as devoid of life as "a painted ship upon a painted ocean." Art education at the highest schools cannot supply an artist's natural deficiency in mechanical aptitude or give him a receptive sympathy with life.

A highly accomplished Parisian artist, working on the Examiner, saw a cartoon by Homer, representing the havoc created among the animals of a barnyard, by the passing of the first railroad train through it, and remarked, "No man who was not born in a barnyard could do that." Evidently that artist was off in his casuistry, for he, too, had seen ducks and geese, cows and calves, goats and sheep, horses and mules, all of them in action, and while he could represent them in action with far more accuracy as to proportion of parts, his animals in such a scene would be doing some very poor acting, in fact, not looking and acting like themselves. If an early acquaintance and continuous existence with domestic animals could make an artist then all farmers' boys would be artists. The poor Irish who raise pigs and chickens in the house, and the Arabs who tent their horses and children together from birth, should be artists. Such incidents do not make artists; they merely furnish opportunity for the exercise of birth endowments.

And Homer's early method of work, if an impulsive employment may be dignified by the term method, was "sui generis" and probably unique if not wonderful. Coincident with the drawing of a mad horse, was the acting by himself. The work would be arrested at times, seemingly for want of appreciation or mental image of a horse in that state of feeling, and then he took to the floor. After viciously stamping, kicking, snorting and switching an improvised tail which he held in his hand, behind his back, until his feeling or fancy became satisfied, the picture was completed and referred to me with the question, "Is that the way a mad horse looks?" Yes, he appears to be mad through and through.

Granting that the importance of harmony in a composition was frequently spoken of in his youth, I lay no claim to being his teacher, for he was moved by an impulse that paid but slight regard to the technical restrictions of scribe and rule,

And although it has been said by a writer in the New York World that he "has a robust contempt of art," his natural ability and aptitudes for accomplishing such results as the critic would call artistic are unsurpassed. The mechanical aids and dilatory processes of the schooled artists are never resorted to by him. He does not use a snap-shot camera or wait for a dead-rest pose, but sketches on the spur of the moment, and "shoots folly as it flies." Under such circumstances, faultless art is out of the question, nor does a daily newspaper need it. During the Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1892, a famous horse race occurred and all the great newspapers sent artists to sketch the winning horse. Homer's picture for the Chicago Herald easily surpassed all competitors. What other artist in America can study a man's features for a minute or two, then walk a mile to his studio and draw a better likeness of him than was ever done by any artist having a pose? Sam Rainy's picture was taken in this way and he was so pleased with it that he procured the original from the Examiner and has it framed in his office. And still Homer makes no pretensions to serious art, as taught at the schools. His forte is caricature, though Clara Morris says it is not, but that he is a great actor. He fell in love with the beautiful beasts and birds at first sight, and the attachment continues unabated. His fondness for dramatic scenes, first noticed in connection with them, did not end there. Very early, even at three years of age, he was experimenting with his playmates, for no observable reason, except that he desired to see them act. People said he was a hector, a tease, and few of them discovered the cause, as there seemed to be no connection with anger or ill will. Many a delightful play ended in a rumpus, which he eagerly eyed, the only placid and sweet-tempered one of the company. One woman said she believed Homer loved to see children quarrel and cut up. Indeed, she had come very close to the truth, but the motive she had not divined. Likely, he was probing human nature and assimilating its moods. I do not take him to be a philosopher. His peculiarities in this respect are referred to his mother, who was the most consummate reproducer of social scenes. No person, however odd in feature, form, voice or gesture, was beyond her powers of imitation. And it was all so natural that I did not call it acting. Rather, it was being. I asked her once how she could do this, and she said, "I feel like them." I have often thought, when seeing Homer immersed in his work, that he, too, feels like his subjects.

All through his boyhood days he was fond of pictures and spent much time in poring over illustrated books and papers and in visiting art galleries, but he was never known to copy from them. His innate desire and tendency, as well as my advice, was to illustrate his own conceptions and fancies. His first observations, as before narrated, were at home in his father's barnyard, but as he grew he began to roam in quest of something new, and when he heard of any strange breed or any extraordinary specimen of the animal creation, he was at once seized of what ordinary people would call an irrational desire to see it. And to see, in his case, meant the most intense study, not for a few minutes or an hour, but continuously until the subject became a part of him. Of scores of pigeons he knew every individual and discovered that the old story of their marital faithfulness is a myth; that they have their little jealousies and love intrigues like human beings. Of his visits over the country, people said they were idle, purposeless; that he was sowing wild oats, a mere pleasure seeker, but I noticed that he came home full, not of book learning, but of the only kind of acquisitions for which he cared, new birds and beasts, new men and their character manifestations, as he could prove with his ever ready pencil. They were as much voyages of discovery as Columbus undertook in 1492. Unlike the great navigator, his cruisions were not for wealth or power or the introduction of religion to heathen lands; they had no ulterior purpose of financial gain, for the thought had never crossed his brain that he was in this spontaneous and almost unconscious way preparing himself for a gainful occupation. But he was approaching manhood and I occasionally remarked to him that he had so far been acting as though life here were a holiday or a visit, when in fact it is a very serious matter and requires earnest effort to get a good living. He did not dissent from my view of it, but seemed at a loss in deciding for what he was best fitted.

We had a general merchandise store and he had experimented enough in selling goods to know that his mind could not be tied to the business. Customers buying tobacco got it at their own price and shopping women objected to his habit of stretching elastic tape when selling it by the yard. There was fun in such things but no perceptible profit. He opened the store in the morning while I was at breakfast and took his afterwards, and upon going in one morning and finding the floor unswept, I soon saw what had engaged his attention during the half hour. A magnificent carrier pigeon on the wing, and above it in colored letters, this legend, "How glorious the flight of a bird must be!"

My mind was made up; Homer is an artist or nothing; he shall fly. As a preparatory step, he was sent to the Commercial College in Portland, which was of great advantage to him, although he spent considerable time in his life-long habit. The principal reported him bright, but not sufficiently studious of the works in vogue, and mildly suggested that bookkeeping by double entry was not, as a rule, illustrated by animals, wild or tame. Receiving a letter from me, containing a reprimand for his want of earnestness, he, no doubt, gave an hour or two to retrospection, and passed in review his various attempts at the employments which afford other men a living, and wisely regarding them as hopeless for him, he turned to the only thing he could do and applied for a position on the West Shore, an illustrated monthly published in Portland. The publisher sent him to the head artist, a Mr. Smith, who eyed the young man rather contemptuously. "Then you think, Mr. Davenport, that you have a natural talent for drawing?" Mr. Davenport, somewhat withered, thought he had some. "Do you see that man across the street, leaning against a drygoods box? Draw him," and the artist went down stairs and across the street to where the leaning individual was, thinking, as he went, that one egotistical green-horn was effectually disposed of. He was surprised, upon his return, to find the green-horn had finished two pictures, the leaning person and Mr. Smith. "Where did you take lessons in art?" "I never took any," said Davenport. Thinking there was a misunderstanding, he asked, "What art school did you attend?" "I never attended an art school." Mr. Smith slowly and musingly ejaculated, "Well, young man, you are either a liar or a fool." Homer felt let down at such abuse, but I consoled him by saying it was the only genuine compliment he had ever received from a professional, though couched in rough language.

Shortly afterwards I said, "Homer, the Fates are against us, we must separate; here is some money, go to San Francisco, and recollect, it is art from this on." We had supposed that the head of an art school would be glad to welcome a young man with such decided predilections as Homer had shown, and be willing, as well as able, to add improvement and give discipline without attempting to destroy his individuality, but in this we were completely in error. Homer was soon informed that his art was not art at all, but an uncouth vagary which must be forthwith abandoned. Henceforth he must drop his fancies and draw by scribe and rule; everything must exist in natural and therefore proper proportion; expression without it is a veritable nightmare, and the boy who would undertake to draw a figure without, in the first place, blocking it in proportion, is a fool from whom nothing excellent can be expected. This lesson was dinned, with so much rudeness and so continuously, that the benefit hoped for was impracticable.

Homer was too long for the teacher's Procrustean bed, and, therefore, spent very little time in that school. As before, the city with its zoological garden and heterogenous population became his school, at which he was not laggard in attendance.

A siege of la grippe sent him home, and soon after he got a position on the Portland Mercury, and worked several months for that paper, using star plates, the abomination of all artists. While working there he was sent to New Orleans to sketch the Dempsy-Fitzsimmons fight, and made some very clever drawings of the combatants.

The short time he was in the south was very valuable, as it introduced him to a new world, and one rich in that unrestrained and exuberant abandon of the negro race. He returned with his head and heart full of it and for several days was oblivious to all surroundings, until he had put into form the queer characters he had observed away down in Louisiana. He has never produced anything better than the darkey preacher, traveling on the train through Texas, engaged in his pastoral work. It was equal to anything from A. B. Frost and with the addition of Homer's humor, which is extravagant enough for any darkey, was superb. In sanctimonious swell, the negro divine far exceeded the Rainsfords and Talmages of the north. Though his plug hat was somewhat battered by long and rough usage, his clothes seedy and threadbare, and his patent leather shoes really spurning his ample feet and grinning with more teeth than a shark, they did not prevent a lugubrious flow of religious uncton all impossible to the thin-lipped Caucasian.

If I were inclined, like some of Homer's interviewers, to distrust the force and persistency of inherited genius, I might say that if he had not made that picture, he would not have obtained his present place upon the New York Journal, and the conclusion would not be as violent an assault upon human nature as much that is written about him. That picture was an evidence of his ability to go up much higher, and I thought so well of it that I sent it with some others to C. W. Smith and Wm. Henry Smith, our cousins living in Chicago, who received them in the presence of the head of the art department of the San Francisco Examiner, and by the aid of those gentlemen, Homer was forthwith employed upon the great daily. But that was only an opportunity and one so hedged about with unobserving control that his expressed desire to begin the work to which he is by nature best adapted, was unheeded. He is a humorist and caricaturist, but at that time Mr. Hearst was absent in Europe and his art manager had either not made the discovery or was doubtful of that sort of work being a paying investment. Being tied up rather sternly and his pet yearnings often rebuked, he went to the San Francisco Chronicle, where he was allowed more liberty and was fairly beginning to show how the world of humanity looks when stretched in the line of its tendencies, when the desire to see the World's Fair took him to Chicago. At its close, he returned to the Chronicle, and the Mid-Winter Fair coming on soon after, he found therein an ample field for the use of his faculties, and exercised them with but little hindrance from the kind and appreciative art manager of that paper. At that time he was getting but $35 a week, and when W. R. Hearst returned from Europe and took in the situation by personal inspection, he saw what all others, managers and artists alike, had failed to see, viz.: that a caricaturist so affluent in imagination, so overflowing with distinctively American humor, so fertile in artistic expedients and withal so rapid in execution, could be put to a higher and more extended use than merely making people laugh. The result of Mr. Hearst's discovery was the employment of Homer upon the Examiner at $100 a week. Everybody knows the rest. The purchase of the New York Journal by Hearst, the transference of Davenport to that paper in which the unschooled Oregon boy has proved himself equal to the ambition of his employer.

Anyone visiting him at his home in New Jersey will readily see that although he is no longer a resident of the Webfoot state, in respect of character there has been no change. He works from the small hours in the afternoon until near midnight at the New York Journal office in the Tribune building, New York City, and after breakfast in the morning he and his two children live in his barn-yard, that has a larger assortment of choice animals than his father's had. His rest, relaxation and inspiration are with his earliest idols. Game chickens with long pedigrees, from the parks of United States senators and foreign noblemen, aristocratic bull dogs with immaculate hides and no taint of cold blood, a beautiful Arab steed, Koubishan by name, and a real child of the desert with a grace and style worthy his lineage of a thousand years; a Kentucky thoroughbred carriage horse; numerous parks of native and foreign pheasants; quails from the Pacific coast, and carrier pigeons suggestive of the legends of his youth. To be with these and of these, is his only dissipation. Every room in his house is ornamented with pictures by Nast, Remington, Frost, besides his own pen pictures of distinguished men, odd characters by nature, and the abnormal or excruciating shapes of humanity, the products of social environment, religious mendicants of Rome, cockneys of London, colored southern gentlemen, unscrupulous political bosses and less heartless thieves.

It may be said that he is not a user of tobacco, opium or stimulating drink of any kind, not even of tea or coffee. While most artists are frequently incapacitated for work by reason of intemperate habits and are subject to spells of mental dejection or irrational stimulation, he is competent every day to get the best output of his faculties. Young people desirous of succeeding should think of this, and also that something more is needed to attain success than a "pull." A "pull" at the right time may bring an opportunity, but the main thing is the inside "push" which does not wait for a "pull." And again, Homer's mental and physical make-up is not an accident, as people say; he comes by it honestly. With controlling art and dramatic tendencies on both sides of the ancestral house, there is no need of exploiting the regions of fancy to account for outcroppings of similar tendencies in the children. And inherited tendencies, whatever they may be, do not lie dormant all through childhood and all at once spring into prominence, creating geniuses and prodigies. They show from the first, and it is from the early and continuous discipline of such birth endowments that excellence comes. Great poets begin very early to lisp in numbers and great inventors to conjure with mechanical tools. It is well enough for young people to aspire to high places in the line of human endeavor, but it must be in accordance with their natural aptitudes and tendencies or they cannot rise. A great amount of time is lost and the lives of many people rendered fruitless, by a wrong direction of their energies, and it is to aid in preventing such occurrences that this brief sketch is written.

[The foregoing sketch of Homer Davenport was written by the noted cartoonist's father, Hon. T. W. Davenport.]

JAMES P. G. HENDERSON. Four miles south of Philomath, and not far from the village of Fern, is located the finely cultivated farm of two hundred and seventy-six acres owned and operated by Mr. Henderson. Here he carries on general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Jersey cattle, two hundred and fifty acres of the tract being under active cultivation. Mr. Henderson was born October 17, 1848, in Buchanan county, Mo., the son of Perman Henderson, who was born September 19, 1801, near Knoxville, Tenn. With his parents, who were farmers, he remained at home until he was eighteen years of age, when he started out in the world on his own account, going direct to Missouri. His first employment was on a farm, but he later became interested in the saw and grist mill business, and with the proceeds of his labor purchased land, at one time owning property which is now the site of Kansas City, Mo.

It was in Kansas City that Perman Henderson and Miss Sarah Trapp were united in marriage. Mrs. Henderson was born in Tennessee August 27, 1805. Until 1852 the young people resided in Missouri, when they outfitted for the west; but before they had gone very far they deemed it wise to retrace their steps on account of the cholera scourge that broke out at that time. In the spring of the following year they resumed the journey, and by means of ox-teams made the trip in five months, experiencing no serious difficulty with the Indians. About one mile from Wren and twelve miles from Corvallis, in Benton county, they took up a donation claim on which they resided about four years, and then bought a tract three hundred and twenty acres in extent, located three and one-half miles south of Philomath, a part of which is now owned and occupied by his son James. The father made all the improvements to be seen upon the place at the time he lived upon it, and in addition owned other property, at one time being the possessor of thirteen hundred acres in this vicinity. The parental family originally comprised thirteen children, but with the exception of five all are deceased. Martin resides in California; W. J. lives near Wren; L. M. resides eight miles southwest of Philomath; Keziah is the wife of W. S. Gibbs, and resides in Linn county, and James is the youngest of the family. The father was a very public-spirited man, popular with all who knew him and very successful in all his business undertakings. He served two terms as county commissioner, and in politics was a staunch Democrat. In the work of the Christian Church he took a keen and active interest, and during his membership of about sixty-five years in that denomination took a part in all its avenues of usefulness. He lived to reach the unusual age of ninety-three years, and his wife died when over eighty-two years of age.

When his parents crossed the plains to Oregon James was a child only four years old, so that he recalls little or nothing of his birthplace. His education was received in the district schools and in the State Agricultural College at Corvallis, he in the meantime making his home on the parental farm. His marriage united him with Miss Emma Frances Baumgartner, a native of Oregon, the young people at once settling on their present homestead. Their neat two-story frame dwelling is modern in every respect and is a credit to the owner, as well as to the locality. Five children blessed the marriage of

Mr. and Mrs. Henderson, all of whom are at home, whose names are as follows: Earl B., Mary F., Esther P., Catherine L. and Grace W. Politically Mr. Henderson takes an active interest in matters which affect the Democratic party, and always votes for its candidates. As was his father, he is a member of the Christian Church.

CHARLES P. McCORMICK. The McCormick farm located three and one-half miles northwest of Woodburn, Marion county, has attained about the highest state of productiveness known to modern agricultural science. With its pioneer development is associated the name of one of the most potential of the early settlers of Oregon—Mathew McCormick—whose land holdings have steadily increased to the possession of six hundred and forty acres, and whose name is honored and respected wherever it is known. For many years assisting in the management of the farm, his son, Charles P. McCormick, has been in almost entire control since 1897, and may be said to have inaugurated the splendid enterprise of the latter day which has helped to establish the farming and stock-raising prestige of the county and the Willamette valley. Mathew McCormick was born in County Meath, Ireland, December 12, 1825, and was seven years of age when his family boarded a sailing vessel for America. Arriving in Genesee county, N. Y., his father, Patrick McCormick, bought a farm. Mathew McCormick spent his youth on this farm with his brother, John. There was need for the boys in the family to embark upon self-supporting careers as soon as their physical and mental powers were developed. At the age of fifteen Mathew McCormick went to Rochester, N. Y., and was apprenticed to a carriage-maker, and while thus employed was interrupted in his work by the demand for his services in the Mexican war. In 1844 he enlisted in the Fourth United States Infantry. At the battle of Monterey, he was wounded above the left knee while charging to take a battery, and was laid up for some time in a hospital. He was afterward sent on a furlough to New Orleans, where he was discharged from the service. Going to St. Louis, Mo., he became a member of the police force, on which he served for a year. For another year he was engaged in blacksmithing and wagon-manufacturing, and in the meantime was looking about for a permanent outlet for his ambitions. Hearing about the men who were seeking new homes in the far west, he determined to cast his lines with these heroic and daring investigators. Outfitting with five yoke of oxen to a wagon, he set forth upon his mission as a miner and fortune-hunter.

WILLIAM J. HUMPHREYS

After six months of varying adventures, he reached California in October, 1849, and prospected and mined on the Feather river until late that year, in the meantime finding living very expensive, being compelled at times to pay $1.25 per pound for flour.

Upon the conclusion of his mining experiences, Mr. McCormick embarked on a schooner for Portland, and was three weeks on the journey, encountering severe storms on the way. Arriving at Milwaukie, Ore., he remained there for some time, but finally decided to settle in Marion county. His first location was on French Prairie. In the fall of 1850 he settled on his present farm of six hundred and forty acres, known as the La Rock donation claim. Incredible as it may seem, he purchased this entire property for $1,000. At the time there were but a few acres cleared, and a log cabin had been erected. With this small encouragement he set about to make himself and his family comfortable, and in time his labors were rewarded with abundant harvests and fine cattle.

In 1846 Mr. McCormick married Johannah Clancey, and of the seven children born to this couple but two survive—John and Charles—both of whom are engaged in farming in Marion county. Mr. McCormick is a Democrat in politics and in religion is a member of the Roman Catholic Church. For about twelve years he served as school director. He is a man of sterling worth, and the value of his services in behalf of the upbuilding of his adopted state can hardly be estimated, nor can it be in the cases of any of the noble and self-sacrificing men who came in the early days to conquer the wilderness.

Charles P. McCormick, manager of the paternal farm, was born within speaking distance of his present home March 25, 1857, and has always resided upon the farm. He was educated in the public schools and in St. Lawrence College, Montreal, Canada, and at an early age was taught to assist in all departments of farm work. Together father and son operated the broad expanse of fertile land until 1897, in which year the son assumed complete charge, and is now responsible for the success of the enterprise. Beginning with 1890, hop-raising was inaugurated with the planting of thirteen acres in that plant. This area has since been continually enlarged, until at the present time he has sixty-five acres under this product. In 1902 the yield from his vines was seventy-five thousand pounds.

On October 24, 1888, Mr. McCormick was united in marriage with Mary Van Wessenhove, daughter of Frank and Ellen (Coyle) Van Wessenhove, of which union seven children have been born, the order of their birth being as follows: John T., Josephine C., Caroline E., Zeta A., Rosa, Nellie, and Grace Irene.

Like his father, Mr. McCormick is a Democrat in politics, and in religion a Roman Catholic. He is a man of enterprise and energy, is practical and progressive, and his farm is one of the most neat and well cultivated in Marion county. He is highly respected by those who know him, for he has always taken an active interest in those affairs tending toward the promotion of the best interests of his community, and makes good fellowship one of the cardinal principles of his daily life.

WILLIAM J. HUMPHREYS. The Humphreys brothers, both of whom are large land owners and very successful farmers, stock-raisers and miners, are men of solid worth, and have materially contributed to the well being of Marion county. William J., the oldest in a family of eleven children, five sons and six daughters, was born in Monroe county, Tenn., December 4, 1828, a son of Thomas M. and Jane (Harrison) Humphreys, farmers for many years in Tennessee.

On the Tennessee farm Mr. Humphreys received a substantial home training, and his educational opportunities were those of the early subscription schools of his district. In his neighborhood was a family by the name of Wilson, who had two interesting daughters, with one of whom Mr. Humphreys became much impressed, his brother, John P., entertaining an equal regard for the other sister. A double wedding, celebrated July 21, 1852, united the four hopeful young people who had shared each other's joys and sorrows since earliest childhood, and the following September, the two brothers and their wives, Mr. Humphreys, Sr., and his family, besides others from the same neighborhood, started overland for Missouri, where they spent the winter. The following spring they outfitted for crossing the plains, and without any particular misfortunes succeeded in reaching their destination in Oregon, having lived well on the way, game and fish contributing towards a varied and by no means undesirable diet. Mr. Humphreys located in the Waldo Hills, and in the fall of 1854 bought the right to one hundred and sixty acres of land of John Greenstreet, the property having a little log house of one room ready for occupancy. Otherwise there were no improvements on the place, and the new owner at once began to clear his land and prepare the way for planting. This farm, comprising three hundred and seventy acres, is one of the best in the county, and the visitor is impressed with the innumerable evidences of neatness, thrift and practical management.

In the spring of 1854 Mr. Humphreys bought a claim in Jackson county, Ore., and operated it for several months. Since then, however, he has been interested in mining from time to time, at present owning a number of valuable claims. Though living a very busy life, he has invariably evinced a keen interest in general affairs in Marion county, and as a staunch upholder of the Republican party has filled local positions of trust, though he has never aspired to political offices. He is identified with the Grange, and is a member of and liberal contributor towards, the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of the large family of children born to Mr. and Mrs. Humphreys, Margaret is deceased; John M. lives near Heppner, Ore.; Augustus lives in Portland; Texanna B. is the wife of Joseph Rogers, of Portland; Sarah J. is the wife of Grant Ashby, of Antelope, Ore.; Mary L. is the wife of J. B. Ashby, of East Salem; William lives in East Salem; the next child, a son, died in infancy; Carrie P. is the wife of C. L. Rogers, of Rose-dale, Marion county, Ore.; Minnie C. died at the age of eleven years; and Harrison H. is managing his father's farm. Mr. Humphreys is successful and popular in his neighborhood, and has made many warm friends during the years of his residence in the northwest. He is a man of marked integrity of character, has given frequent evidence of the possession of a high public spirit, and is always ready to assist in the promotion of enterprises tending to advance the best interests of the county.

HON. TIMOTHY WOODBRIDGE DAVENPORT. The family which in the present generation claims Homer C. Davenport, the famous cartoonist, as one of its most gifted representatives, is one which has ever treasured high ideals, and numbers among its members, both in the present and past generations, eminent scholars, litterateurs, artists, sculptors, musicians and scientists—all of whom have striven to attain the greatest heights in their chosen fields of endeavor. Creditably maintaining the precedent long since established by his family is the Hon. Timothy Woodbridge Davenport, one of the most erudite scholars of the west, a prolific writer on educational and scientific topics, physician, lawyer, ex-member of the state legislature, surveyor and stockman.

Mr. Davenport was born on a farm in Columbia county, N. Y., July 30, 1826, a son of Dr. Benjamin Davenport, a grandson of Jonathan Davenport, a great-grandson of Benjamin Davenport, and great-great-grandson of Thomas Davenport. The latter, the founder of the family in America, emigrated from England prior to 1640, locating at Dorchester, Mass. His son, Benjamin, was born in Boston, Mass. Jonathan Davenport, of the third generation, was born in Rhode Island, and eventually became a farmer of Columbia county, N. Y. His death occurred at Spencertown, in that county.

Dr. Benjamin Davenport, great-great-grandson of the founder of the family and the father of the subject of this review, was born on a farm in Columbia county, N. Y., June 24, 1799. He was educated in the Pittsfield Medical College, at Pittsfield, Mass., from which he was graduated either in 1824 or 1826. In 1831 he engaged in the practice of medicine in Lucerne county, Pa., removed to Union county, Ohio, in 1836, and ultimately located in Champaign county, continuing his professional labors in both localities. In 1850 he went to Newark, Mo., and in the spring of 1851 outfitted for the journey across the plains. Arriving in Oregon in the fall of that year, he settled upon a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in the Waldo Hills, Marion county, where his death occurred in February, 1857, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. He married Sarah R. Gott, a native of Columbia county, N. Y., where she was born in 1803. Her father, Story Gott, was born in New York state, and held a commission in a New York regiment during the Revolutionary war, in which he served with distinction. He was an extensive land-owner and cattle trader, amassing great wealth through this occupation. In keeping with a genial and hospitable nature, he spent his money lavishly, supplying his table from a well filled wine cellar and a larder which indicated his fastidious and epicurean tastes. He lived to an advanced age, his death occurring in Columbia county in 1842. He was possessed of an impressive personality, and he commanded great popular attention during the many years of his active life.

Four sons and one daughter were born to Dr. Benjamin Davenport and his wife, of whom Hon. Timothy Woodbridge Davenport is the eldest. The remaining members of the family were: John C., of Aberdeen, Wash.; Joseph W., deceased; Lucinda, wife of Judge Orange Jacobs, of Seattle; Benjamin Franklin, who resides on a part of the donation claim in the Waldo Hills.

Dr. Davenport took an active interest in politics, and in his younger days was an ardent Abolitionist. During his residence in Ohio, his home was one of the stations of the famous "underground railway," and he assisted many slaves to freedom. Upon the organization of the Republican party in 1856 he identified himself with that body, and was one of five who attended the first meeting for its organization in Marion county. Of profound wisdom and excellent judgment, combined with unimpeachable integrity and a nobility of character which made him a conspicuous figure wherever he lived, he was also firm, quick to arrive at a decision, and generally right beyond question. Through the possession of these marked characteristics, he left the stamp of his individuality upon the community. He was also gifted as an artist and musician. It is not to be marvelled at that the many talents he possessed have been inherited by representatives of the family in later generations, with their broader opportunities for study and contact with the world in a more cosmopolitan age.

After completing his elementary studies in the public schools, the Hon. Timothy Woodbridge Davenport was graduated from the academy at Woodstock, Ohio, and attended a course of medical lectures at the Starling Medical Institute, at Columbus, Ohio. From the fall of 1846 until the spring of 1847 he was engaged as an instructor in Wilson's Academy at Woodstock, Ohio, after which he devoted another year to study in the Starling Medical Institute. In the fall of 1848 he returned to Ohio, and engaged in the practice of his profession at Woodstock. In 1850 he removed with his parents to Missouri, and in 1851 crossed the plains with the rest of the family, locating on a tract of three hundred and twenty acres adjoining that taken up by his father, which he had purchased. There he engaged in farming and surveying. It was not long before he became interested in the political undertakings of his neighborhood, and in 1864 was elected county surveyor, and was re-elected in 1866, filling the office for four years. In 1868 he was elected representative to the state legislature, was re-elected in 1870, and in 1882 was elected to the state senate. In 1895 Governor Lord appointed him state land agent, and he occupied that office four years.

In Marion county, November 17, 1854, Mr. Davenport was united in marriage with Flora Geer, a native of Madison county, Ohio, and a daughter of Ralph C. Geer. She was a cousin of the Hon. T. T. Geer, formerly governor of Oregon. Mrs. Davenport was an unusually gifted woman, an artist of more than local renown, and possessed of rare histrionic ability. She died of smallpox November 20, 1870. She became the mother of four children, of whom Olive died at the age of four years; John died in infancy; Orla is the wife of John D. Renshaw, a farmer and rancher on the Pend d'Oreille river, and Homer C., the cartoonist, is a resident of New York. (A more extended sketch of the latter appears elsewhere in this work.)

October 1, 1872, Mr. Davenport married Mrs. Elizabeth Wisner, a native of Hancock county, Ill., and a daughter of John W. Gilmour. Her father was born in Kentucky, September 13, 1813, and came to Oregon in 1851, locating on a ranch in Linn county. For several years he has resided for a portion of the time in Silverton, but spends considerable of his time with his children. Five children were born of this marriage. Of these, Timothy Clyde is deceased; Adda is a sculptor and musician; Alice is also a sculptor and musician, and assistant manager of the Barnard Concert Tour Bureau, of San Francisco, Cal.; Georgia is a well known and talented contralto soloist; and Mary Delle is a talented young musician.

Throughout his life Mr. Davenport has been a profound student, and it is doubtful if any man on the entire Pacific coast has better trained mental faculties or a more comprehensive knowledge. His erudition is recognized by scholars and educational institutions in the east, and he is frequently consulted on those subjects pertaining to the foundation of modern knowledge, especially in regard to the law, mathematics and medicine, all of which sciences he has mastered. He has been a frequent contributor to leading periodicals published in the east, and has prepared monographs on subjects pertaining to medical science. A recent contribution which has evoked widespread comment was an article on "An Object Lesson in Paternalism," published in the March number of the Oregon Historical Quarterly.

Thus is recorded, in outline, those events in the life of Timothy Woodbridge Davenport which illustrate his identification with the world of letters, of science, and of politics. It is seldom that a man of such strong mentality and splendid equipments is to be found spending his life amid pastoral scenes; but the environments of Mr. Davenport have not adversely affected his usefulness to the world, which, for many years, has benefited by his published writings and his correspondence with other brilliant leaders in the advanced thought of the day. The example he has set for his children has been a magnificent one, and they have been inspired to the utmost development of their inherent talents. An illustration of this faculty of Mr. Davenport is the following tribute to his gifted son, Homer Davenport, which was written by James Montague:

"Homer Davenport, of all successful Americans, is the least puffed up by his achievements. He is entitled to no credit whatever, he says; it all belongs to his father. And out on the cartoonist's remarkable menagerie-farm, at Morris Plains, N. J., may be seen a quiet old gentleman, feeding the flocks or watching the many birds that enliven the landscape, who is not at all willing to shoulder the glory thus thrust upon him, but asserts with equal positiveness, that the boy has grown from a lank country youth to a world-famous cartoonist, unaided by any parental word or hand. Yet, whatever may have been the influence of the older Davenport upon the younger, there is just one man in all the world who thoroughly understands the mixture of high purpose and utter irresponsibility which make up the character of Homer Davenport, and that one man is his father. From babyhood to boyhood, on up through an unpromising youth to a remarkable manhood he has followed the career of this nature lover, and has noted, as if with a register, every step in his development. Fond, but unbiased, he has discovered how and why his son succeeded, and what he has written here will be worth while not only to such youth as aspire to fill four columns on the first page of the great dailies with masterpieces of satire that shall make one-half of the world laugh while the other half squirms, but to every boy who is honestly and solidly interested in making something of himself."

REUBEN GANT. A pioneer of pioneers is Reuben Gant, one of the jolliest of the daring venturers who left peaceful homes in the east and ventured across the trackless plains in 1845. It is doubtful if in the length and breath of this state there may be found one whose memory is so stored with incident, so interestingly reminiscent of the days when law and order were as yet unestablished, and when all was new and at the disposal of whomsoever might arrive with his humble ox-teams and limited possessions. During the intervening years Mr. Gant has taken his place enthusiastically and helpfully, all the while smoothing the way of his friends with his optimistic and genial views, with his jest and merry-making, and his encouragement which follows in the wake of all who make the best of their opportunities, however meager and difficult.

May 16, 1818, Mr. Gant was born in Franklin county, Ind., in which state and county his paternal grandfather, Tyrra, had settled upon removal from his native state of North Carolina. In Franklin county was reared Cador Gant, who was born in North Carolina, and came with his parents overland to Indiana. About 1820 he removed to Bartholomew county, Ind., bought a farm and improved it, and there died in 1844. He was a Democrat in politics, but was never active or an office-seeker. Through his marriage with Katherine Jones, also a native of North Carolina, he became connected with Revolutionary stock, for Samuel Jones, the grandfather of Mrs. Gant, came from England long before the Revolution, and participated in the effort to establish independence for the colonies. Tyrra Gant was the parent of twelve children, eight sons and four daughters, of whom Reuben is the second child.

floors and benches, Reuben Gant learned the rule of three, and incidentally was included in the discipline which figured conspicuously in the early school teachers' methods of imparting information. With these pioneer conditions went also the fever and ague, prevalent in low lands, and superinduced by inefficient drainage. This distressing ailment afflicted Reuben to such an extent, that in 1840 he removed to Missouri, and in the vicinity of Springfield hunted and trapped for a few years. The country thereabouts was wild and undeveloped, and the free spirit of the youth found great pleasure in thus exposing himself to danger, and bringing down the game which abounded in that section. While out with his gun he was in a position to hear a great deal about the west, and having nothing to hold him in any one place, he determined to avail himself of the opportunities as yet but imperfectly understood on the coast. April 17, 1845, he cracked his whip over the backs of well fed and sleek oxen, and slowly started on a journey which in those days meant everything or nothing to the adventurer. His well loaded wagon was the first to cross the Cascade mountains into the Willamette valley, a feat accomplished at the expiration of about eight months, he arriving at his destination November 17, 1845. In July, 1846, he arrived in Oregon City, having come via the Mount Hood route. Locating in Yamhill county near Bellevue, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, January 8, 1848, and his farm, with its innumerable reminders of struggle, privation, loneliness, and hard work, is still in his possession. He built a small log cabin, and made a home for himself and family. Thus he advanced step by step, interesting himself in the progress of the neighbors who began to settle at rather remote distances, all the while keeping up his reputation as a whole-souled, honest and royally jolly companion, the casual meeting with whom put every one in a comfortable frame of mind.

It is a well known fact that many romances began and developed on the vast expanse of the plains, the long days, the slow-moving train, and the opportunities for social intercourse in the camp being ideal for the framing of united fortunes. Reuben Gant drove the oxen of one Carmi Goodrich, who was born in the east, and who located on a claim near Dayton, Ore. Mr. Gant and Mr. Goodrich became very warm friends, and sat many a night talking over the camp fires. Incidentally the daughter of Mr. Goodrich, a bright-eyed girl called Nancy, became an earnest participant in these communings, and so impressed was Mr. Gant with her womanly and fine qualities of mind and heart, that the couple were married in Yamhill county. Mrs. Gant did not live long enough to rear her entire family, for she died when only thirty-eight years of age, leaving seven of her eight children to the care of her husband. These were John Wesley, who makes his home on the old farm; Martha is the wife of W. J. Sargeant, merchant and postmaster of Bellevue; Carmi, deceased; Ithigena, now the wife of George Sawyer of Idaho; Sarah Jane, the wife of Ben Mitchell of Washington; Mary Ellen, the wife of John Hinkle of East Portland, and engaged in the real estate business; Albert, deceased in infancy; and Henry, living in Idaho. For a second wife Mr. Gant married Mrs. Elizabeth (Speedie) Finlayson, born in Perthshire, Scotland, and who came to the United States with her brother in 1884, locating in Forest Grove. The father of Mrs. Gant, Peter Speedie, was born in Scotland, was reared there, and married and died in his native land. In politics Mr. Gant is a Prohibitionist. He is a liberal-minded, humane, and very intelligent pioneer, brim full of good nature, and bearing malice towards none. He has lived retired in Philomath since 1892, for he found that good men were scarce to work his farm, and so rented his land to avoid all further responsibility. He is one of the familiar figures on the streets of the town, and he always has something genial and witty to say to any who stop to speak with him.

WILTON LEROY SIMERAL. March 22, 1896, Wilton Leroy Simeral was appointed steward and head farmer of the Oregon State Reform School by Governor Lord, and with the exception of a nine-months leave of absence, he has since held this large responsibility. In the estimation of those who are privileged to witness the many improvements inaugurated by the present steward, no better man could have been found for the position, his many years of association with various lines of activity in the west having fitted him for most tactful and satisfactory dealings with trustees and others interested in state institutions. There are six hundred acres in the school farm, all of which land is under his direct supervision, and the operation of which involves a large amount of calculation and good business judgment. He also has charge of the purchasing of the cattle and other stock.

The many claims to consideration acknowledged by all who know him, are by no means based solely upon his good work with the reform school, for Mr. Simeral has been a resident of Oregon since 1865. He was born near Maquoketa, Jackson county, Iowa, March 9, 1855, the son of John H., a veterinary surgeon, and the grandson of another follower of the same calling. The father came of German ancestry, and was born in Indiana, where he was there reared to manhood, removing thence to Iowa. In 1864 he outfitted with wagons, provisions and horse teams and crossed the plains, settling near Boise City, Idaho, soon after removing to Pendleton, Ore., then a small hamlet containing a hotel and blacksmith shop. In September of 1865 he came to Marion county by team, locating near Salem for two years, and then moved upon leased land in the Waldo Hills. In 1871 he bought three hundred and twenty acres of timber land in Clackamas county, which he occupied for two years, when he sold that and bought one hundred and twenty acres near Silverton, where he lived until 1890. Some months later he died in Macleay, at the age of sixty-six years, the date of his death being December 21, 1891. He is survived by his wife, who was in maidenhood Elmira E. Crane, and who was born in New York, October 28, 1832. W. L. is the oldest of a family of five children, the second oldest of whom is A. Frank, a boot and shoe merchant at Silverton; he married Elsie Riches, and they have six children: Vernie, Ada, Wayne, Frank, Manley and Elsie. Carrie is the wife of H. S. Hicks, of Silverton, their one daughter being Florence. Newell L. died in 1864, at the age of three and a half years; and Clarence John is a traveling inspector for the San Francisco machine firm of Baker & Hamilton; he married Ariadne Cornelius, and they have one son, Claire, and make their home in Salem.

At the age of twenty-one years, W. L. Simeral started out into the world to make his own way, and was married November 29, 1876, Emma Catherine Anderson becoming his wife. She was the daughter of John Franklin and Lucinda (Jarvis) Anderson, the father being a farmer on Howell Prairie, and justly famed for his neat, practical methods in the pursuit of his agricultural labors. He also served as county commissioner in Marion county. Of the other children of Mr. and Mrs. Anderson we mention the following: Solomon F., a successful farmer in the Waldo Hills, married Amanda Stormer, by whom he has one son, Carl; George S., engaged in farming on his father's place, married Elizabeth Limbeck, and they have one daughter, Ruth; Elizabeth M. became the wife of Robert Florer, who is located near Des Moines, Iowa, their five children being as follows: Jennie, Margery, Maxwell, Maurice and Dorothy. Carrie is the wife of Frank Bowers, the cartoonist, living in Indianapolis, Ind. Both parents are still living, and make their home on Howell Prairie, the father being sixty-nine and the mother seventy-one years of age. For a year after his marriage Mr. Simeral rented the Hubbard farm, four miles from Salem, with his father, then removed to Howell Prairie, and with his father-in-law farmed one year, and then moved three miles southeast of Turner and rented a farm of three hundred and twenty acres of W. C. Morris. After six years of successful management of this large property he felt justified in branching out into land ownership, and purchased one hundred and sixty acres in the Waldo Hills, ten miles east of Salem. In 1899 he removed with his family to the Governor Geer farm, and now owns in all two hundred and five acres of land. An aid to Mr. Simeral in his farming and stock-raising enterprises has been his knowledge of veterinary surgery, learned from his father and grandfather, and which he has had occasion to use extensively since engaging in independent farming. He was appointed county stock inspector, serving for nine years, and was associated for some time as local inspector with State Veterinary Surgeon James Whitcomb. This was carried on in connection with general farming, and was not abandoned until the appointment to his present position with the reform school. For nine years he served as chief marshal of the Oregon State Fair.

A Republican in politics, Mr. Simeral has never aspired to office, though solicited many times by his friends. Fraternally, he is a member of Pearl Lodge No. 66, A. F. & A. M.; Macleay Lodge No. 50, A. O. U. W.; Degree of Honor No. 84; charter member of Salem Camp, M. W. A.; Capital City Lodge No. 34, I. O. L., and member of the Macleay Grange. Four children have been born into the Simeral home: Leroy J., who was educated at the Oregon Agricultural College, married Linnie English, resides in Macleay, and is rural mail carrier; Raymond W., a page in the state senate in 1894, when twelve years old, and is now operating the home farm; George F., who graduated from District No. 100, of the public schools, at the age of sixteen years; and Myrtle C., at home. The two older sons are members of Macleay Lodge No. 50, A. O. U. W., in which Raymond acts as recorder, and Mrs. Simeral is a member of the Degree of Honor and has passed all the chairs of the same. George is also a member of the Degree of Honor and holds the position of recorder. Mr. Simeral is capable and resourceful, and keeps abreast of the times on agriculture and general business. He is upright and progressive, and in his relations with his subordinates maintains the first principles of consideration, tact and humanity.

HENRY T. BRISTOW. The birth of Henry T. Bristow occurred September 13, 1852, in Macon county, Mo., he being a son of Wesley O. and Sarah (Cherry) Bristow, natives respectively of Virginia and Illinois, the former born April 15, 1815. The father's family, who were of English descent moved from the Old Dominion when their son was a mere youth and settled in Illinois in the early days of that state's history. It was while residing there that he met and married the future sharer of his joys and sorrows, Sarah Cherry. Some years after their marriage, in 1839, they removed to Missouri, which was their home thenceforth until their death, Mr. Bristow passing away when seventy-two years of age, and his wife when comparatively a young woman, at the age of forty-one.

Of the twelve children who comprised the parental family, Henry T. Bristow was the eleventh in order of birth. His earliest knowledge of books was obtained in the district schools in the vicinity of his home in Macon county, Mo., and subsequently it was his good fortune to attend the state normal at Kirksville, Adair county, Mo. Upon graduating from the latter institution he began teaching school, and for the following ten years was engaged in this vocation, a portion of the time in Missouri and the remainder in Oregon. It was in 1874 that he became identified with this growing state in the west, settlement being made in Lane county. There in 1884 he was united in marriage with Joycy Laird, a native of that county, and there the young people made their home for five years, or until 1889, when they located in Polk county. His identification with Benton county dates from the year 1890, when he purchased his present farm of five hundred and sixty acres, conveniently located one and one-half miles west of Bellfountain. Many improvements have been made since the property came into Mr. Bristow's possession, and he now has one hundred acres planted to prunes, and fifty acres to apples and pears. In order to properly prepare the fruit for the market Mr. Bristow has erected a large modern drying house, equipped with all the latest improvements and devices that can be utilized in the business.

To the marriage of Henry T. and Joycy (Laird) Bristow four children were born, and all of them are at home with their parents, their names being as follows: Gretta E., Floyd O., Hazel D. and Dorothy R. Although Mr. Bristow has resided here but a comparatively short time, the improvements he has caused to be made and the regard in which he is held by his fellow-citizens might represent a much longer residence. In addition to his fine fruit ranch he also raises stock quite extensively, and from this branch alone realizes a good income.

Mr. Bristow and his family are identified with the Church of Christ, and are ever to be found on the side of all measures that have for their object the betterment of mankind. Fraternally he himself is identified with the Fraternal Union of America, and in politics is a staunch believer in the principles laid down by the Republican party.

FRANK BUSKEY. The great fertility of Marion county has furnished a competence to Frank Buskey, owner of a farm of three hundred and eight acres, about two hundred of which are under cultivation. The watering facilities could hardly be excelled, and the improvements are of the most modern kind known to agriculturists in the northwest. Stock-raising, general farming and hop-growing represent the three distinct departments of activity on the farm, seventeen acres being under hops.

Of French-Canadian ancestry, Mr. Buskey was born in Michigan, and at a very early age was thrown on his own resources. In 1859 he had the opportunity to come to Oregon with a Samuel Gouley, and in Marion county worked on a farm for Mathias Gouley until 1861. Hoping to find a short road to fortune, Mr. Buskey went to Idaho in 1861, and after two seasons of experience as a miner, returned to Oregon, and was glad of a position on a farm. With the money thus earned he bought some mining claims near Boise, Idaho, and this time was more fortunate, making considerable money. His total experience as a miner covers a space of six years.

In Marion county, Ore., he married, in 1871, Elizabeth Bauer, who was born in Missouri in 1848, and came with her parents to Marion county, Ore. Her father, Andrew Bauer, was born in Bavaria, Germany, in 1810, and came to America with his wife in 1837, settling in Indiana. Later he removed to Missouri, and from there came to Oregon over the plains, six months being consumed in reaching The Dalles. From there he came to Portland in a skiff, and thence to Champoeg, arriving in the latter town with a wife, three children and five dollars in money. Fortunately he soon found friends, for he was allowed to live in a small house on the Kennedy farm, but the same year made arrangements to buy the right to a donation claim of two hundred and forty acres. Soon after he started a blacksmith shop on his place. In the spring of 1849 he went to Sutter Mills, Cal., where he mined with considerable success until fall. Returning, he joined his wife on their place, and made that his home until his death in 1884. For many years he conducted his little shop, and was well known in his neighborhood as a skilled workman and honorable man. His last years were comparatively lonely for his wife died in 1869, having reared nine children, three of whom are living. These are Mrs. Buskey; Fred, who is a resident of Woodburn; and Katie, the wife of William Chambers, of Portland.

After his marriage Mr. Buskey rented Mr. Bauer's farm until the death of the latter, and he then purchased the right of the other heirs, thus owning the entire farm. Four children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Mary E. is a teacher; Elsie was educated in St. Paul convent; Theresa was educated at Mount Angel Convent; and Frank is a graduate of the Mount Angel College. Mr. Buskey is a Republican in politics, and his wife and children are members of the Catholic Church. He is industrious and prosperous, and in his community is esteemed for his thrift and success. He is entirely a self-made man, having been thrown upon his own resources in his youth by the death of his father.

BARNEY KENNEDY. Although so many years have elapsed since the death of Barney Kennedy, December 28, 1865, there are many old settlers in Marion county who recall this earnest pioneer, who crossed the plains in 1847, bringing with him a rich Irish nature and capacity for hard work, and in time becoming the possessor of twelve hundred acres of land.

Born at Blown Rock, County Donegal, Ireland, in 1811, Mr. Kennedy remained on the small and unproductive farm until his youth was passed, and then made his way across the sea to Canada, where he lived for a few years. Coming from Canada to the United States, he located in Joliet, Ill., and there met and married, in February, 1839, Arah Underwood, who was born in Orange county, Ind., February 10, 1819, and of which union there have been born the following children: Charles, deceased; John, now living in Woodburn; William, living on the home place; Thomas, deceased; Hugh, deceased; Mary, and Sarah, both on the home farm. After his marriage Mr. Kennedy removed to Louisa county, Iowa, where he remained until 1847, and that year outfitted with his brother, John, for the journey over the plains. Each of the brothers had a wagon with three yoke of oxen, and on the way they crossed the Missouri river at St. Joseph, taking the usual six months for the trip.

Arriving in Oregon, Mr. Kennedy purchased the right of Mr. Doughran to six hundred and forty acres of land, upon which had already been erected a small round-log cabin, into which the family moved and began to make themselves comfortable. In time the cabin was supplanted by a hewed-log house. The farm was improved to a considerable extent during the life-time of Mr. Kennedy, whose start in life may be ascribed partially to mining, in which he engaged in California during 1849. He crossed the mountains with pack mules in the spring, was successful as a miner and prospector, and returned in the fall considerably richer than when he left Oregon. In his day agricultural improvements had not attained their present perfection, but as far as possible, he kept pace with those around him, and made of his property a valuable and paying one. His large farm is still in the possession of his family, and Sarah, his youngest daughter, has the superintending of nine hundred acres. She has a hop-yard of fourteen acres, and is conducting general farming and stock-raising. She is a woman of good business and general judgment, as evidenced by her wise disposition of her land, and its large yearly profits. Mrs. Kennedy is still residing on the homestead, in good health and quite active in spite of the eighty-four years of her life.

GUILFORD BARNARD. Prominent today as a man of sterling worth, Guilford Barnard has won his position in Benton county through a half century of the strenuous living which characterized the pioneers in the state of Oregon in the days when men's lives were counted small in the balance with the statehood which sagacious minds foresaw for this section of the country. It was in 1852 that Mr. Barnard was first numbered among the citizens of the west, and since that date he has lived a strong, influential life, now occupying an enviable place in the esteem of all those with whom he has come in contact, as a financial, social and moral power, unselfishly given for the growth of the community.

A native of Bourbon county, Ky., Guilford Barnard was born February 9, 1825, the son of a farmer, who, in 1834, removed to Missouri and in 1844 to Illinois. In the latter state the father and mother spent the remaining years of their lives, dying there in the sixty-sixth year of their ages. Mr. Barnard was one of seven children, and he was educated principally in the district schools of Missouri, at the age of twenty-one leaving the home which was then in the state of Illinois to make his own way in the world. With no capital but energy and industry he began working as a farm hand in Adams county, Ill., following the training which had been his from earliest childhood. Until the spring of 1852 he continued in that work, but was then impelled to undertake the journey into the west for the sake of the opportunities offered in the new lands. Outfitting with ox-teams and the necessary articles for such a trip he started with his family across the plains that year, and though during the six months no trouble was experienced from the Indians, the dread disease of cholera claimed many victims among the emigrants to the west. Fortunately Mr. Barnard suffered but a mild attack of the disease and came through safely, spending his first winter in Clackamas county, Ore., in the spring of 1853 locating on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, situated seven miles east of Harrisburg, Linn county. For four years this was the home of the Barnard family, after which they removed to another place in the same neighborhood, where they remained until 1869. In the last named year Mr. Barnard came into Benton county and purchased six hundred acres, located one mile east of Bellfountain, and a part of which purchase now forms their farm of the present day. Immediately after investing in the land Mr. Barnard set to work to improve the farm, now boasting the best buildings in the way of dwelling, barns, etc., in the vicinity. The house is situated on an elevation which gives an outlook over the broad sweep of the valley, making an ideal location for a home. Mr. Barnard now owns four hundred and sixty-five acres, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising, and excelling in every line which he attempts.

The marriage of Mr. Barnard occurred April 1, 1849, and united him with Catherine Wigle, who was born in Adams county, Ill., April 2, 1832. Of the six children born to them two now survive and are named as follows: Mary M. and Francis M. The former is the wife of S. C. Starr, of this vicinity, and the latter makes his home with his parents. Landa W., the oldest child, died of cholera while crossing the plains with his parents. In politics Mr. Barnard is a Republican, and has filled many minor offices in the interests of that party. Though not affiliating with any church organization, Mr. Barnard has certainly taken for his guide in life the precepts taught by the golden rule, for he has let pass no opportunity to extend a helping hand to another weaker than himself and to remember with kindness the helpless. In addition to his own children four others owe to him the care and attention which they missed from a parent's hand, remembering gratefully the happy years spent in Mr. Barnard's home. In public affairs ever broad-minded and open-hearted, he was a moving power in the establishment of the United Brethren College at Philomath, on the board of which he served for many years.

ADAM RADIR. The successful farmers of Benton county include Adam Radir, one of the many sons of the German empire to cast their lot with the fertility and bounty of Oregon. In his youth in the fatherland, where he was born July 29, 1830, he learned the blacksmith trade of his father, and practiced the same for several years in his home locality. His work was interrupted however, by the national demand for his military services, and he served three years in barracks and on the field ere he resumed work at his trade. He was successful as a master mechanic; and, being able to command correspondingly good wages, managed to get ahead financially.

Thinking to widen his prospects, Mr. Radir disposed of his shop in Germany and came to the United States in a sailing vessel in 1852, and in Pittsburg found work at his trade until 1876. The same year he married Margaret Lieson, a native of Ireland, and with her came to the west, purchasing soon afterward the farm of one hundred and eighty-one acres upon which he now lives, and which is located one and a half miles east of Corvallis. From time to time he has added to his land, and now has two hundred and ninety-three acres. It is no exaggeration to say that this is one of the finest properties in the neighborhood, for Mr. Radir has wide-awake ideas of farming and things in general, and means to avail himself of modern inventions insofar as they appeal to his common sense and practicability. His home is modern, his barns large and convenient, his fences kept in good repair, and there is a general air of neatness which suggests a master hand at the helm of affairs.

Politically Mr. Radir is a Republican, but no office-seeker, and fraternally he is associated with the Free and Accepted Masons. To himself and wife have been born four children: Mary is living in Corvallis; Sadie is in Pennsylvania; Permillia is at home; and William T. is deceased. This part of Oregon has no more substantial advocate than this very successful agriculturist, who has made many friends, and in innumerable ways shown a degree of public-spiritedness consistent with the continued prosperity of this county.

EDGAR O. TOBEY. One of the most extensive and prosperous wheat growers of Oregon is E. O. Tobey, a resident of Eugene, who owns and operates a large wheat ranch in Gilliam county. Possessing keen business ability and excellent judgment, he has been unusually fortunate in his agricultural operations, and through his own strenuous efforts has accumulated a competency. He was born in Tuscola, Mich., December 31, 1852, a descendant of an old New England family, his grandfather, Samuel Tobey, having been a life-long resident of Eliot, Me., and his father, Oliver P. Tobey, a native of the same place.

Born in Eliot, Me., February 26, 1826, Oliver P. Tobey was there reared and educated. Following the tide of emigration westward, he went to Tuscola, Mich., in early manhood, and there began life for himself with no other means than stout hands and a willing heart. Energetic and persevering, he accumulated money, and in course of time became the owner of a well improved farm. Removing to Oregon in 1884, he engaged in farming in Gilliam county for eight years, then went back to his Michigan home, where he remained eight years. Returning again to Oregon, in 1900, he lived retired from the activities of life, in Eugene, until his death, April 14, 1903, at the age of seventy-seven years. He was a strong Republican in politics, and a member of the Baptist Church. He married Augusta M. Slafter, who was born in Norwich, Vt., and who now resides in Eugene, Ore. Her father, William Slafter, removed from Vermont to Michigan, where he spent his last years. Five children were born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver P. Tobey, four sons and one daughter, and of these the sons are living, namely: E. O., the special subject of this sketch; F. W., a wealthy grain farmer, living at The Dalles, and W. L. and F. L., merchants and farmers in Olex, Gilliam county, Ore.

Brought up on the home farm in Michigan E. O. Tobey obtained his early education in the district schools, and was well trained in agricultural lore while yet young. Hearing through a friend, who settled in Oregon in 1878, of the fine chances for a young man of industry in this fertile country, he and his brother, F. W. Tobey, came to this state in 1879, taking a boat at San Francisco, and from The Dalles proceeding by horseback to Gilliam county. After working for wages three years, he and his brother invested their earnings in a bunch of sheep, intending to embark in business as sheep raisers. In the spring of 1883, they purchased forty acres of land, and in the fall each of them filed on one hundred and sixty acres of near-by land. Fearful of risking their sheep on the range in the winter season, they sold out their stock the next fall, intending to purchase more in the spring. Having a horse, they began plowing their land that fall, and as sheep were very high in price the following spring they gave up their plan of buying more, and continued to work their land, putting in eight acres of wheat, which yielded well, averaging forty bushels an acre. Succeeding so much better than they had expected, Mr. Tobey and his brother continued their agricultural operations as wheat-raisers, and have been exceedingly prosperous. Both have become extensive land owners, having four hundred and eighty acres of tillable land in partnership, besides which Mr. Tobey has three thousand, one hundred and fifty-seven acres in one body, and another wheat ranch of nine hundred acres. His land lies thirteen miles south of Arlington, in Gilliam county, and is especially adapted for wheat-raising, producing from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand bushels each year. In cultivating his land, he uses four large three-bottom, fourteen-inch plows, and employs forty horses. In harvesting their wheat, he and his brother have a steam thresher and header, and stack their grain.

Desirous of making a home for himself and family in the valley, Mr. Tobey purchased a house in Eugene in 1898, and has since resided in this city, visiting his ranch three times a year. He owns considerable property of value in Eugene, and is also interested to some extent in timber lands and mines. He is a true type of the self-made man of this state, having made such judicious use of the seventy-five dollars that he had when he arrived at The Dalles that the small sum has developed into a fortune, which he is using wisely and well.

Mr. Tobey married, in Halsey, Linn county, Ore., in 1892, Miss Iness Cummings, who was born in that city, of pioneer parents, Berryman and Hannah (Bond) Cummings. Mr. and Mrs. Tobey have three children, namely: Frank E., Myrtle G and Ralph B. In politics Mr. Tobey is a straightforward Republican, and does all that he can to advance the interests of his party. He was made an Odd Fellow in Michigan, and now belongs to Spencer Butte Lodge No. 9, I. O. O. F. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World, and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is prominent in social circles, and belongs to the Commercial Club of Eugene. Mrs. Tobey is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

MRS. ANNE BURNS SYLVESTER. In the establishment of a commonwealth in the northwest there were probably as many women who gave their strength and intelligence to the cause as there were men. In Polk county, Ore., is located the home of one of these self-sacrificing and courageous women, Mrs. Anne Burns Sylvester, but who came to the west as the wife of Lambert McTimmonds, the two being pioneers of 1845, and together they worked side by side toward the fulfillment of the promises which bespoke the future of Oregon. The valley in which Mrs. Sylvester now lives is known by the name of McTimmonds, as their donation claim of six hundred and forty acres was here taken up when there were no other inhabitants, and when wild animals were their only companions, an experience of Mrs. Sylvester's being the picking of blackberries on one side of a log while a huge bear rested against the other. The conditions changed with the passing years, and from hardship and privations the family came to that prosperity which distinguishes the early settler of determination and energy, their labor having brought them ample returns.

Mrs. Sylvester is not a native of the country wherein she has become a citizen of such long standing, having been born in County Donegal, Ireland, in May, 1817. When fourteen years old she came to America, following her parents, Michael and Anne (Scandlin) Burns, both of Irish birth, who had emigrated two years before with one of the children of the family. Michael Burns had located in Wilmington, Del. He was a stone mason by trade and later removed to Philadelphia, Pa., where his death occurred in 1833. After the death of her father Anne left home and went to live with a married sister, who had preceded Anne to America, and who lived in Quincy, Ill., later locating in McDonough county. When eighteen years old she married Lambert McTimmonds, who was born in Worcester county, Md., September 10, 1797. When a young man Mr. McTimmonds had removed to Ohio, becoming a pioneer of that state, from which he later located in Quincy, Ill., where he followed farming and also helped to survey the first railroad that came into that little city. There the young people made their home for two years, while they conducted a boarding-house, when they removed to Missouri and lived in various places, at one time being residents of St. Louis. Early following the westward trend of civilization they crossed the plains in 1845, leaving May 1 and arriving in Portland in October, all the perils and weariness of a journey across the plains with ox-teams being theirs. Their first winter in the west was spent upon Tualatin plains, Washington county, and the following spring they located in Polk county, where Mr. McTimmonds took up his claim in May. Here he engaged in farming and stock-raising being principally interested in the latter, which he continued until his death on the old home place in June, 1878, after an active and useful career as a hardy and practical pioneer.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. McTimmonds are as follows: Henry C., of Linn county; Alexander, located in California; Erastus C., on the home place; Joseph, also at home; and Charles, in eastern Oregon. There were six other children who are not now living. The number of acres in the farm had been increased to seven hundred and thirteen before the death of the father, and the work of this farm is now conducted by the two sons, Erastus C. and Joseph, cultivating one hundred and seventy-five acres, while they are extensively engaged in the raising of goats, sheep and general stock. Mr. McTimmonds was a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Dallas, where his wife now holds membership. In politics he was a Republican.

In Corvallis, in 1879, Mrs. McTimmonds became the wife of John Sylvester, a native of Maryland. Mr. Sylvester crossed the plains in 1845 and located in Benton county, taking part in many of the defenses of the country in the early times, and serving valiantly in the Cayuse war in the neighborhood of Snake river. He died in 1890, in Corvallis, and his widow, now in her eight-fifth year is cared for by her two sons, Erastus C. and Joseph, her home being upon the old home place.

HERMANN STOLLE. It is a well known fact that the greater part of Oregon is arable, and large crops are now raised on lands formerly used for grazing or supposed to be unfruitful. It is the cultivation of this land that occupies the attention of H. Stolle, the subject of this biography, who resides on a fine fifty-seven acre farm near Silverton, in Marion county, having been a resident of this state for the past quarter of a century.

Mr. Stolle is a native of Oldenburg, Germany, and he was born November 9, 1853. In choosing the occupation of a farmer, he but followed in the footsteps of his forefathers. He attended school in his native country and his education was further supplemented by his attending district school after coming to the United States. When fifteen years old he accompanied a brother to this country, and they settled in Wisconsin, where young Stolle found employment as farm-hand by the month, continuing to work in that capacity for a few years. He subsequently spent five years in Nebraska at similar work, and in 1878 came to Oregon.

Mr. Stolle followed farm work in the vicinity of Silverton until his marriage, December 2, 1881, with Lena Schnackenberg, daughter of John and Gesché (Schnackenberg) Schnackenberg. Mrs. Stolle is of German descent but was born in Minnesota. Immediately after marriage, the young folks went to housekeeping on a farm near Mehama, where they lived four years. The following year they lived on Salem Prairie. Afterward they moved to Salem and later to Silverton. Mr. Stolle was engaged as teamster for some time, but subsequently followed agricultural pursuits on a farm south of Salem for a brief period, previous to locating permanently on his present farm near Silverton, which he purchased in the fall of 1900.

He carries on general farming and stock-raising, having about twelve acres of hops. Many modern improvements have been made on his farm, which is located about two miles north of Silverton. Mr. and Mrs. Stolle have five children, namely: Rena, Jessie, Elda, Violet and Omar. Politically, our subject is a staunch supporter of the Republican party and in fraternal circles ranks among the members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

ROBERT GLASS. A prominent name among those of the original settlers of Crawfordville is that of Robert Glass, who, until his death July 13, 1903, was closely connected with the development and advancement of this part of Linn county. During the fifty or more years which he passed here he was influential in promoting its agricultural and mercantile industries, and was a prime mover in establishing many beneficial enterprises. When he first came to this locality the country was but thinly populated, wild beasts roamed the wilds, Indians were numerous, and, as there were no markets near, the pioneers subsisted chiefly on farm products or game. He lived to see populous cities and towns spring up in the wilderness, finely cultivated, well stocked farms on every hand, and the luxuries of the seasons grace the farmers' tables. A native of Ohio, he was born January 28, 1823, in Jefferson county, near Steubenville, and lived there until eleven years old. In 1834 he removed with his parents to Warren county, Ill., near Monmouth, and there grew to man's estate.

In 1849, fired with enthusiasm by the reported discovery of gold in California, Mr. Glass determined to try his fortune in the land of glowing promise. Therefore, in partnership with three Hanna brothers, he purchased an outfit consisting of two wagons and four yoke of oxen, and on April 1, 1849, started for the Pacific coast. Arriving in California August 12, after a safe and comparatively short journey, he was engaged in mining on Bear river for awhile, but was not very successful. He subsequently made some money hauling freight from Sacramento to the mines, where he sold flour at $1.00 per pound, but in his next venture, which was that of hiring men to make shingles, he lost money. In the spring of 1850 he spent a few months in buying gold claims opposite Nevada City, and at Gold Run, but did not find his transactions very profitable. In June, 1850, Mr. Glass came to Oregon, crossing the mountains with a pack train, consisting of nine horses, journeying through the Rogue river Indian country. Settling in Linn county he looked about for a favorable location, and in the fall took up three hundred and twenty acres of land at Crawfordville, lying mostly in the valley, and improved a fine homestead. Succeeding well in his agricultural labors he invested his surplus in other lands, and became the owner of seven hundred acres of valuable land. In addition to general farming he was prosperously engaged in stock-raising and dealing, a profitable industry in this country. In 1875 he embarked in mercantile pursuits, opening the first store in Crawfordsville, and for thirteen years was postmaster of the town.

In 1853 Mr. Glass married Jane Gray, who came across the plains to Oregon in 1852, and five children were born to them: John H., of Brownsville, Ore.; W. B., also of Brownsville; David H., who is living at Seattle, Wash., where he is in the employ of the city engineer; Joseph W., a farmer of Crawfordsville; and Ivy J., living at home. Mr. Glass warmly upheld the principles of the Republican party, and filled various public offices with credit to himself, and to the eminent satisfaction of his constituents. For a number of years he was justice of the peace and school clerk, and served in the state legislature in 1864, and in the extra session of 1865. He was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he served as elder from 1870 until his death.

RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, M. D. One of the most distinguished physicians and surgeons of the Willamette Valley is Dr. Richard Cartwright, who for thirteen years has been engaged in the practice of his profession in Salem. A native of Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, he was born July 9, 1851, a son of Edmund and Jane (Clarke) Cartwright. His great-grandfather, the Rev. Edmund Cartwright, was a minister in the Church of England. While his life was devoted chiefly to the work of the church in England, he also possessed marked mechanical ingenuity and invented and perfected the first power loom ever used in the manufacture of cloth. His son, Richard, grandfather of the subject of this review, was a manufacturer of Leicester, England, and it was in that city that Dr. Edmund Cartwright was born and reared. He was provided with excellent educational privileges. Upon the completion of his classical course he was graduated from King's College, London. The foundation of his medical knowledge was gained in the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, London, from which he received the degree of doctor of medicine. In young manhood he came to America and became a practitioner at Hamilton, Ontario, where he remained until 1857. In the latter year he removed to Iowa, and continued the practice of his profession in Charles City, Waukon and Decorah. His death occurred in the latter city in 1900, he having attained the age of eighty-one years. He possessed marked skill and ability in the practice of medicine and surgery. He married Jane Clarke, a native of Lincolnshire, England, who is still living in Iowa. Of the six children born to Dr. Edmund Cartwright and his wife, five survive.

Dr. Richard Cartwright, the second child in the family, was reared in Iowa, where he received his preliminary education. After leaving the high school of Waukon he devoted his attention to farm work for some time, and also served as builders' clerk. When he finally determined to enter the ranks of the medical profession, he displayed the strength of his character by providing the means for his own education. In 1873 he entered the Detroit Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1875 with the degree of M. D. He began practice in Fayette, Fayette county, Iowa, where he remained for two years. Upon the expiration of that period he located in West Union, Fayette county, Iowa, where he remained in practice until 1879. While a resident of West Union, Dr. Cartwright married Miss Cora Aiken, a native of Iowa, but after two years of happy married life she passed away.

Leaving the Mississippi valley in 1883, Dr. Cartwright came to Oregon, but soon afterward located in Grass Valley, Nevada county, Cal., where he was engaged in general practice until 1890. In that year he returned to Oregon, and at once opened an office in Salem, where he has since remained continuously in practice. In June, 1900, he erected the Florence Sanatorium, a private hospital, one of the most perfectly equipped on the entire Pacific coast. He makes a specialty of chronic and surgical cases, and has become well known in Salem and throughout the surrounding country, by reason of the great success which has attended his professional labors.

Dr. Cartwright's preparation for his chosen work was very thorough. Not content with the foundation of medical knowledge obtained in the school which conferred upon him his first degree, he took a full course in the Chicago Homœopathic Medical College, from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1882. He made a special study of clinical gynecology in the medical department of Willamette University, pursued a course in the Post-Graduate College in New York, and took a post-graduate course in Chicago in 1893. He is continually broadening his knowledge by individual research and investigation. Since 1895 he has given special attention to gynecology, and occupies a place among the foremost representatives of this important branch of medical practice in the Pacific northwest.

Dr. Cartwright was married a second time in Portland, Ore., to Miss Florence Byrne, a native of Illinois, who was reared in California. They are the parents of three children: Gladys L.,

Constance and Florence Elizabeth. The doctor and his wife occupy an enviable position in social circles, and their own pleasant home is celebrated for its gracious hospitality. He has always been an earnest Republican, though never a seeker for political honors. He is well known in Masonic circles in Oregon, being a member of Salem Lodge No. 4, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, in which he is past master; and of Multnomah Chapter No. 1, Royal Arch Masons, of Salem. He was one of the organizers and a member of the board of directors of the Illihee Club, of which he is now the president. His wife is a member of the Unitarian Church. In connection with his profession he is a member of the Marion County Medical Association.

Dr. Cartwright is constantly overburdened by the demands upon his time, both professionally and socially. He leads a strenuous life; anything that tends to bring to man the key to that complex mystery which we call life elicits his earnest attention; and in the alleviation of human suffering his labors have been far-reaching and successful. During the years of his residence in Salem he has proven himself a useful citizen and man of affairs, always not only willing, but anxious, to assist in the promotion of all worthy enterprises, and especially all those movements calculated to advance the material interests of the community in which he resides. It is to such men as Dr. Cartwright that the northwest is indebted for the inculcation into the minds and hearts of the present generation of its manifest spirit of progress; for he is a man of most advanced ideas, wide-awake to the manifold opportunities of the state of Oregon, of whose future greatness he feels assured.

JOHN WATERS. Upon his farm of one hundred and seventy-three acres, located two and a half miles west of Lewisville, Polk county, John Waters has spent thirty-six useful years, indicated now by the substantial appearance of his property, on which he has made all the improvements, beginning in the pioneer days of the country. Out of a wilderness of shrubs and brush he has brought forty-five acres under cultivation, which he devotes to general farming, and is also largely engaged in raising sheep, goats and cattle.

Mr. Waters is of Scotch descent, his great-grandfather, Zachariah Waters, having emigrated from Scotland and settled as a farmer in Maryland, where the descendants of the family passed many years. Joseph, the grandfather, was born in Frederick county, Md., and likewise Edward B., the father of John Waters, his birth occurring in 1807, and it was there he died in 1816, after a life of industry and energy as a carpenter and joiner. Being but nine years old when his father died, Edward B. Waters went to live with an uncle, and while making his home there he served an apprenticeship of three years with a blacksmith at Fredericksburg. In 1831 he came as far west as Ohio and located in Perry county, where he worked at his trade, combining it with the interests of a farm. He there married, in 1836, Sarah Griffith, who was born in Greene county, Pa., January 18, 1813, of German descent, and from which location she had removed with her parents to Ohio, where her father engaged in farming. For five years they continued to make their home in Ohio, and in 1841 Mr. Waters took his family to Laporte county, Ind., where he engaged in farming until the fall of 1852, when he went to Clinton county, Iowa, the following spring finding them en route for Oregon. The trip across the plains occupied six months, and at the end of the journey they located for the first winter at Ritners, near King's valley, to which they had come on their arrival on the Luckiamute. The next spring they went up Edward's creek and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which they remained for six years, engaged in general farming and stock-raising, after which, in 1859, Mr. Waters sold out, and going to Klickitat county, Wash., he took up a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres. Until 1865 he followed the business of stock-raising, when he returned to Polk county and bought six hundred and forty acres of land located on Pedee creek, where he continued to live for five years. In 1870 he retired from the active cares of life, his choice of location for the remainder of his days being Dallas, Polk county, where his death occurred June 23, 1879, after which Mrs. Waters went to live with her daughter, Mary Jane Turner, located near Airlie. Mr. Waters was a radical Republican in politics, having been so since the Civil war, and in religion he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having joined that denomination in the east. Besides John Waters, his parents had the following children: William, of Wheeler county, eastern Oregon; Sarah C., now Mrs. Price, of Pedee, Ore.; Mary J., now Mrs. Turner, near Airlie; and Martha A., the wife of Nathaniel Holman, of Dallas, Ore.

John Waters was born in Perry county, Ohio, May 5, 1839, the second of his father's family. He received his education through the medium of the common schools of Indiana, after which he went to the farm with his father and engaged until his twenty-first birthday in working for him, after which he became independent, though he remained at home. He was married June 19, 1867, to Flora A. Ritner, who was born December 7, 1850, in Platte City, Mo., the daughter of John Ritner, who died on the plains en route to Oregon, in 1852. Of this union ten children were born, eight of whom are living, namely: Sarah J., the wife of R. A. Hastings; Mary A., the wife of C. J. Pugh, of Falls City; Francis M., who is employed by I. M. Simpson; Della M., attending school at Monmouth; Ida A., at home; Chester D., also at home; Flora E., a student at Monmouth; and Gertrude E. at home. After his marriage Mr. Waters bought the farm on which he now makes his home.

In his political relations Mr. Waters is, like his father, a staunch Republican, and as such has served in the interests of his party in various minor offices, among them being road supervisor and school director, the latter office having been faithfully filled by Mr. Waters for twenty-seven years. In his fraternal affiliations he is a member of the Grange of Lewisville, and in religion both himself and wife are members of the Evangelical Church, of Lewisville, in which he has officiated as steward.

THOMAS WILLIAMS. When Thomas Williams came to Lewisville, Polk county, Ore., he had but $17 in money, and a family to rear and educate, and in face of such an outlook a less courageous, energetic, determined man might have faltered and lost the battle when success was just within his grasp. He came here December 13, 1893, and at once started a little blacksmith shop, that being his trade, and after two years he was able financially to purchase thirty-five acres of land, located three-quarters of a mile south of the city, upon which he erected a shop and began to clear his property; at the present time he conducts a general blacksmith and wagon shop and a chopping-feed mill, and has built a fine residence and many other valuable improvements which indicate the prosperity which is the fruit of his industry and perseverance.

Mr. Williams was the third of a family of fourteen children, ten sons and four daughters, and was born in Denbighshire, Wales, July 14, 1851. His father was William Williams, a native of the same locality, and who died in Shropshire, England, in 1896, when seventy-three years old. He had been occupied throughout his life in a manufactory of woolen goods. His wife was Elizabeth (Edwards) Williams, who was born in Merionethshire, Wales, and is now living in her native country, over eighty years old. On account of limited means, Mr. Williams was unable to attend school, being apprenticed to learn the trade of a woolen worker when only eight years old, and after seven years devoted to this he was apprenticed to a blacksmith, where he served for six years. He was then twenty-one years old, and after his marriage in 1872 with Eleanor Roberts, a native of Merionethshire, Wales, born there January 3, 1852, he emigrated to the United States, confident, though he could neither read nor write, that determination and will power were as potent factors in winning the battle of life as education, and that he could succeed where these qualities were recognized and appreciated. He landed at New York City, thence to Laporte City, Iowa, where he remained four years, two of which he gave in the work of his trade to pay his passage to America. In 1878 he located in Madison county, Neb., where he engaged for himself in the work of a blacksmith, finding employment on the Union Pacific Railroad in every section of the middle west. In 1892 he left the Mississippi valley and coming west, he located first in Kitsap county, Wash., and a year later found him in Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., where he remained for nine months. His next move was to Lewisville, from which he removed to his present location, at Maple Grove, which village he founded. In addition to his interests in his business, he owns a farm of one hundred and sixty acres two miles west of Lewisville, which is utilized for stock-raising, the stock being cattle, goats and sheep, also carrying on a little farming.

To Mr. and Mrs. Williams were born thirteen children, twelve sons and one daughter, and the seven sons now living are as follows: William C., T. Henry, John L., Albert E., Ira S., Arthur B. and Kenneth L., all of whom are at home. In his political relations Mr. Williams is a Republican and in the interests of his party he is at present serving as school director. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Dallas, and both himself and wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Lewisville, in which he officiates as trustee.

JAMES E. EDWARDS. A prosperous and worthy life has been that of James E. Edwards, a prominent citizen of Benton county, who, though now in his eighty-seventh year, enjoys remarkably good health and lively spirits, which are evidenced in his animation as he recalls the days when Oregon was a wilderness of unthreaded forests and fallow fields, and he was numbered among the hardy men who gave their youth and strength of purpose to the formation of the western statehood. He first settled in Benton county in 1853, and has made this his home ever since, ably profiting by the many opportunities presented in the early days, and now enjoying the evening of his life amid the changes which the years have brought.

The birth of James E. Edwards occurred in Fayette county, Pa., May 2, 1817, his father being a farmer in that section. When only a child he lost this parent, and the widow and her children then removed to a piece of land which had been taken up by the father in Ohio in an early day. Their removal was made in 1823, and there the mother married a second time, making her home upon this property until her death, at the age of fifty years. The early education of Mr. Edwards was received in the district school in the vicinity of his Ohio home, remaining in the latter until his mother's death, when he sought employment among the neighboring farmers. He was then twenty-one years old, his residence in that state continuing until 1853, when he decided to change his location to the western slope of the country, whither so many people were taking their course. The first step in this direction was made by water as far as St. Louis, in that city purchasing the oxen and necessary outfit for the trip across the plains. May 7, 1853, found them started upon their journey, and after six months of uneventful travel the party reached Oregon, where Mr. Edwards took up a donation claim in the Alsea valley, Benton county, and there remained for four years, at the close of that time purchasing property located northwest of Dusty. Until about 1863 this was the home of the Edwards family, Mr. Edwards, at that date, purchasing the farm upon which they now live. This consists of three hundred and twenty acres of land, located fifteen miles southwest of Corvallis and one and one-half miles from Bellfountain, and upon which Mr. Edwards has put all the improvements, even to the doing of the carpenter work himself. He has a fine location for a home, the outlook taking in the wide sweep of the productive valley and well-improved farms about.

The marriage of Mr. Edwards and Mary Longworth, the latter a native of Maryland, was solemnized in 1844, the trials and hardships of the memorable journey across the plains and the long years of patient toil in the new land having been shared by his wife, who lived to be sixty-five years old. Of the nine children which blessed this union six are now living, of whom Lucinda is the wife of Nathan Wheland, of The Dalles; Isaac is located in Lane county; William is in Douglas; Lewis is in the vicinity; James F. is in Indiana, and Joseph Harold is still on the home place. As a Republican, Mr. Edwards has been active in the affairs of the county, having served for fourteen years as county commissioner, ten years as school clerk, and a great many years as school director. For over fifty years he has been a faithful member of the United Brethren Church. Though now at a ripe old age, the mental and physical faculties seem not to have suffered a loss in activity and Mr. Edwards is still actively interested in the affairs of his community.

CHARLES LEONARD STARR, superintendent of schools of Polk county, and one of the successful and promising educators in the state, was born near Santa Clara, Cal., February 13, 1877, a son of J. P., and grandson of Llewellyn Starr, who came from England and lived in the south before locating in New Jersey.

J. P. Starr was born in Rahway, N. J., and reared in Columbia and Washington counties, N. Y. In early manhood he learned the blacksmith trade, and for a time, near New York City, engaged in buying and selling stock. Upon locating in Santa Clara county, Cal., he worked at his trade from 1870 until 1878, and then removed to Oregon, residing for six months in Dayton, five years in McMinnville, a number of years in Sheridan and Falls City, industriously plying his trade in all of these places. Since 1898 he has lived a retired life in Dallas. Mr. Starr married Adeline Crawford, who was born in Rhinebeck, N. Y., a daughter of John Crawford, a native of Erie county, Pa., and a member of an old Pennsylvania family. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Starr, of whom Charles Leonard is the third. The oldest son, Arthur P., is engaged in the hotel and stage business at Falls City; Harry E. is a farmer near Falls City; Marianna is a resident of Dallas, and William died September 11, 1903.

The education of Professor Starr was acquired in the public schools of McMinnville, Dallas and Falls City, and under private tutorships, covering four or five years. He entered upon his educational career in 1894, as a teacher in the district schools. In 1900 he was nominated for superintendent of schools of Polk county on the Republican ticket, and was elected by a majority of one hundred and eighty, the largest majority of any candidate on the county ticket, save that of senator. Upon the resignation of County Superintendent of Schools J. N. Hart, July 1, 1900, to assume the office of district attorney, Mr. Starr was appointed to fill the unexpired term by the county commissioner, and was thus prominently brought to the notice of the public. His term of office dates from August, 1900, until August, 1904, and already Mr. Starr has demonstrated his particular fitness for his large responsibility. The present educational administration is universally conceded to be the best in the history of Polk county, and is directly traceable to certain innovations suggested by the practical forethought of Professor Starr. The teachers' institute forms an important part in the educational system, and through this medium the teachers are kept in touch with the plans of their adviser, and are continually stimulated to greater and more advanced effort. Monthly reports sent in by the teachers have proved advantageous, and the schools are visited by the superintendent at least once a year. Superintendent Starr lays great stress upon the "practical" in education, and it is his wish to place students in a position to meet the every-day issues of life. He is a member of the State Teachers' Association, president department of superintendents. In political affiliation he is a Republican, and fraternally is identified with, and a charter member of, the Falls City Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

WILLIAM J. WILLBANKS. A typical southerner who has transferred his allegiance to the bountiful northwest and materially assisted in promoting its agricultural and other interests is W. J. Willbanks, a large land owner of Benton county, but now living retired in Corvallis. Mr. Willbanks came to Oregon in 1874, and in Linn county bought a farm of two hundred and ninety-two acres one mile east of Corvallis Ferry, where he conducted a very successful wheat and sheep-raising enterprise. The large profit from the sale of these commodities enabled him to branch out as a land owner, and to his original purchase he added an adjoining two hundred and fifty acres. At the present time he owns five hundred and forty-two acres of improved land in one of the garden sections of Oregon, and which is more valuable because in one body. Here he farmed until 1891, and then left his son with the management of the large property, he himself taking up his residence in Corvallis.

The boyhood of Mr. Willbanks was spent in the Anderson district, South Carolina, where he was born August 22, 1834, the sixth in the family of eight children, of whom two sons and one daughter are living. His father, Elijah, was also born in the Anderson district, where his emigrating ancestor presumably settled after coming from Scotland. From South Carolina he removed to Carroll county, Miss., where he farmed, and where he married Nancy Presley, a native of Carroll county, and daughter of David Presley, also of Scotch descent. In Carroll county Elijah Willbanks passed his last years, as did also the wife who so faithfully and practically reared her large family. Of the sons, W. J. attended the early subscription school held in a log cabin in the Anderson district, and he remained on the home farm until twenty-three years of age. He was first married to Eleanor J. Mecklin, a native of the Abbeyville district, South Carolina, and in 1857 removed to Carroll county, Miss., where he bought a farm and engaged in raising cotton. In time he had one hundred and sixty acres under cotton cultivation, and at the time of the culmination of hostilities between the north and south in 1861, had a very profitable source of livelihood. He wisely scented danger owing to the unsettled condition of the south, and the uncertainty as to the outcome of the Confederacy, and disposed of the greater part of his cotton. However, he had four bales left, amounting to two thousand pounds, or one ton, and this he left on the barn floor covered up with cotton seed.

Enlisting in Captain Barns' company, Varden Artillery, of Carroll county, Mr. Willbanks started for the war, and served four years and four months. He participated in the battles of Shiloh, Corinth, and the siege of Vicksburg, and three months later was captured and exchanged and sent to Mobile, Ala. After the evacuation of the latter city he was sent to Demopolis, Ala., and remained until the surrender of the city, thereafter serving as assistant to the regiment surgeon, Allison. In the latter capacity he had charge of the tents and hospital appliances, and was also hospital steward until the close of the war. Returning to his home in Carroll county, Miss., he found the four bales of cotton unmolested on the barn floor, notwithstanding the fact that the county was raided several times, and he himself was otherwise almost impoverished thereby. Nevertheless, the cotton served as a nucleus for a new beginning, for he sold it for forty-five cents a pound, and thus had a nest egg of $900. Continuing on the old farm after the war he found things sadly changed, and by 1874 had sold his property and prepared to take up his residence in the west.

Two weeks after his arrival in Oregon, Mr. Willbanks lost his wife by death, and five children were left to his care. Of these, Katie is the wife of Mr. Adler of Gilliam county, Ore.; Nettie is the wife of W. A. Buchanan of Corvallis; Josephine is now Mrs. Bogue of Paisley, Ore.; James is a farmer in Benton county; and John is on the home farm. The second marriage of Mr. Willbanks occurred in Portland, Ore., and was with Margaret C. Mecklin, April 21, 1875, the second wife being a sister of the first. Her father, David Mecklin, was born in South Carolina, and his father came from the north of Ireland. David farmed in South Carolina, but eventually removed to Mississippi, where he died, as did also his wife, Elizabeth (Caldwell) Mecklin. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs.

Mecklin, three of whom are living. Pearl, the only child born to Mr. and Mrs. Willbanks, is now the wife of Clarence Hout of Corvallis. A Democrat ever since his first voting days, Mr. Willbanks has been prominently before the public of Benton county, and in 1899 was appointed councilman of the third ward to fill an unexpired term of one year. So satisfactory were his services that he was regularly elected in 1900 for a period of three years, and during that time was chairman of the street committee. He is a member and deacon of the Congregational Church, and contributes generously toward the maintenance of the same. An excellent business man, progressive in his ideas and abreast of the times, Mr. Willbanks is a notable acquisition to the general life of Corvallis, and has made many friends by reason of his public-spiritedness and admirable personal characteristics.

WILLIAM M. SHERER. The farming lands of Linn county comprise its most valuable property, and the men who have reclaimed the wilderness from its primitive condition occupy no unimportant position among a vast and intelligent population. William M. Sherer properly belongs to this class, and as a reward of his efforts, he is the possessor of one of the best and most fertile farms in the entire county. General farming and stock-raising form his chief occupation, and in the latter department he makes a specialty of raising Percheron horses, Durham and Holstein cattle. Modern buildings adorn the place, prominent among which is noticeable the family residence, a fine structure recently erected. Commodious and well arranged outhouses enhance the appearance of the place, and facilitate the labors incident to managing a large farm.

In Columbiana county, Ohio, whither his parents had settled about 1826, William M. Sherer was born July 29, 1828. That he himself is an agriculturist of no inferior order is a natural sequence, as he is descended from a long line of tillers of the soil. His father, David Sherer, was a native of Pennsylvania, born in Beaver county in 1797. The Keystone state was also the birthplace of the mother, in 1800, who was known in her girlhood as Sarah Miller. It was about the year 1826 that the parents took up their abode in Columbiana county. From Ohio the family removed to Henderson county, Ill., in 1838, and for the following fourteen years made their home in the latter state, carrying on general farming. The belief that larger opportunities awaited him in the newer western country induced the father, in 1852, to seek a home there, and, accordingly, he started with his family and household belongings, the wagons being drawn by the slow-moving ox-teams. Ere they had reached their destination, however, the father was stricken with cholera, from which sickness he never recovered. He died and is buried on the Loup, fork of the Platte river, and thus the little party was left without a leader. With true pioneer courage the mother assumed the responsibility which was thus put upon her shoulders, and after nursing her son William back to health, he, too, having fallen a victim to the disease, she proceeded to Linn county, Ore., one redeeming feature of the journey being that the Indians gave them no trouble whatever. Seven months had expired before they finally reached Linn county, but the mother at once took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres, about four miles from Shedd's, to the improvement of which she set about immediately. This tract of land was at the time in its primeval condition, but through her efforts it was transformed and all the improvements were due to her indomitable persistence. Here her death occurred at the age of sixty-four years. The family comprised five children, but of the number only two are now living, William M. and Elizabeth, the widow of William Millhollen, of Albany.

William M. Sherer received his education in the district schools of Illinois, principally, and at the time the family removed to Oregon was about twenty-four years of age. Owing to the death of his father much of the care and responsibility of the family naturally fell upon him, and he was not reluctant in discharging the duties. Until his mother's death he made his home with her on the old donation claim, which she took up on coming to Oregon in 1852, and subsequently he took up an adjoining claim, on which he now resides, and upon which he expects to pass the remainder of his life. As the greater part of his life has been spent in the confines of Linn county it is but natural that he should take an abiding interest in its progress and development, and none will dispute the fact that he has done his full share in making it the magnificent farming region that it now is. In politics Mr. Sherer takes a keen interest, and Republican candidates are sure of his vote and support.

NORRIS P. NEWTON. To his numerous friends and associates in Philomath it would seem that Norris P. Newton has cause to congratulate himself upon his fortunate disposal of western opportunities. The owner of a flourishing little harness shop and store, of a comfortable residence, two stores, and a farm of one hundred and seventeen acres adjoining the town on the northeast, he certainly has much to show for years of patient attention to business, and for that eternal vigilance which establishes a reputation for sobriety, honesty and enterprise.

Born on a farm within sixteen miles of Columbus, Ohio, April 18, 1830, Mr. Newton comes of ancestors located for many years in the state of Massachusetts, in which seat of Puritanism his father, Abiathar, was born in 1806. The elder Newton went to Kentucky at a very early day, locating in Louisville, where he worked at his trade of blacksmith and boilermaker. While that state was young in enterprise he removed to Ohio, and near Columbus bought and lived on government land until 1841. A later place of residence was Van Buren county, Iowa, where he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land, and improved the same into a paying property. Ambitious and resourceful, he was one of the first in his neighborhood to give credence to the stories of fertility which reached them from the coast, and in 1848 he sold his land and outfitted for the long and tiresome journey over the plains. No experiences of a thrilling or unusual nature are recorded of this trip, and it is supposed the train of home-seekers arrived at their destination in fairly good health and spirits. Mr. Newton took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Corvallis, in Benton county, where he farmed exclusively, no longer paying attention to his trades. He lived to the advanced age of eighty-six years, his wife, formerly Rachel Garlinghouse, born in the east in 1806, also attaining to and beyond the biblical allotment. Of the eight children there were four sons and four daughters, Norris P. being the second child and oldest son.

As a boy Norris P. Newton had the advantages of the public schools of Ohio and Iowa, and was of course reared on the paternal farms in these states. He was just eighteen when the family preparations were made for crossing the plains, just the age to appreciate the situation, and profit largely by the all around change. Near his father's farm he took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, lived thereon until 1890, and then engaged in the livery business in Philomath for about seven years. Seven years later, in 1897, he embarked in the harness business, which he has since followed with successful results. He is a practical harness maker, and besides catering to a large retail purchase trade, makes a specialty of repairing old harness.

Near Corvallis Mr. Newton was united in marriage with Justina Knotts, who was born in Ohio, and who has borne him nine children: Cynthia, Mrs. Hinkle, resides near Corvallis; the others are Abiathar and Walter, both of Philomath;

Edwin, deceased; Harvey, residing in eastern Oregon; Laura, now Mrs. William Haynes of Forest Grove, Ore.; Ernest, of eastern Oregon; and two children who died in infancy. As a staunch Republican Mr. Newton has been active in local affairs, and has served as school director and as a member of the city council. He is prominent in fraternal affairs, and is identified with the Corvallis Lodge No. 14, F. & A. M., and the Chapter; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Rebekahs. With his family he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

LOUIS HENRY FISCHER, who is now manager of the Fischer Flouring Mill at Silverton, was born in DuPage county, Ill., September 14, 1870, and was but seven years of age when he came to Oregon. His father, Henry Fred Fischer, was born in Hamburg, Germany, March 4, 1838, and was a son of Fred Fischer, who was also a native of Hamburg, and brought his family to the United States about 1842, locating in DuPage county, Ill. There he followed farming throughout his remaining days. The father of the subject of this biography was only four years of age at the time of the emigration to the new world. He built a flour-mill near Addison, Ill., being the first built there, fourteen miles west of Chicago, when twenty-one years of age and was thus identified with industrial interests in that locality. In 1877 he came to Oregon, locating in Corvallis and there he purchased the Corvallis Flouring Mill, which he conducted up to the time of his death, September 25, 1902. He had learned the miller's trade in Illinois and was an expert in that work. He married Sophia Rathje, who was born in Germany and came to the United States when but three years of age with her parents, the family locating in DuPage county, Ill. Her father was Fred Rathje, who was also a native of Germany and was a farmer by occupation. He prospered in his undertakings after coming to the new world and was worth about $50,000, when he died in Illinois at the age of eighty-four years. His sons are William and Louis, who are bankers in the Englewood National Bank of Chicago, Ill. His daughter, Mrs. Fischer, still survives and is now residing in Corvallis. She is actively connected with the Fischer Flouring Mill. Unto the parents of Louis Henry Fischer were born eight children, five sons and three daughters.

Louis Henry Fischer, the third in order of birth, acquired his early education in the public schools and afterward entered the Portland Business College, where he was graduated in the class of 1891. From early youth he was familiar with the milling business as he assisted his father in the mill and in 1900 he became manager of the Fischer Flouring Mill of Silverton. Under his control the business has grown to very extensive and profitable proportions. He has overhauled all of the machinery and the plant is now equipped with a full roller process and has a capacity of two hundred and fifty barrels per day. The mill is operated by water power and the product is shipped to Portland, San Francisco and also sells to the home trade. Mr. Fischer has a thorough understanding of the business in every detail, and his capable management has been a valued factor in the successful conduct of the business.

In Corvallis, Ore., Mr. Fischer was united in marriage to Miss Lida McDaniel, who was born in Independence, Polk county, Ore., a daughter of Joseph McDaniel, of Polk county, who is now connected with mining interests in Alaska. Mr. and Mrs. Fischer have two interesting children, Harvey and Raymond, both of whom are at home. In politics Mr. Fischer is a Republican.

THOMAS SKAIFE. In Silverton are many men who have won undoubted success in the business world by sheer persistency and force of will, prominent among the number being Mr. Skaife, who has been an important factor in developing the lumber, manufacturing and agricultural resources of both eastern and western Oregon.

Mr. Skaife is a native of Wisconsin, his birth occurring September 8, 1847, in Grant county. He comes of English ancestry, his father, Robert Skaife, having been born October 26, 1818, in Yorkshire, England, the life-long residence of John Skaife, the father of Robert, and grandfather of Thomas Skaife. (For a more extended account of the life of Robert Skaife, see biography of Michael Skaife.) In 1857 Robert Skaife located in Jackson county, Iowa, and was there engaged in milling for nine years, owning and operating a grist-mill. In 1866 he journeyed by way of the Isthmus and San Francisco to Oregon, and located in Salem, going from there to Lincoln, this state, where he bought a farm of one hundred and eighty-three acres, which he managed successfully until his retirement from active pursuits.

Thomas Skaife acquired his early education in the district schools of Iowa, where his youthful days were spent. Coming to Oregon with his father and arriving June 13, 1867, he and his brother, Michael Skaife, were first employed in a flour-mill in Salem, remaining there until 1872, when they purchased a saw-mill in the near-by town of Lincoln, and at once erected a flouring-mill to operate in conjunction, their property adjoining the farm which their father subsequently bought. They afterward exchanged their mills for the farm of J. D. Cooper, later trading the farm for a half interest in a Silverton flour-mill, which they operated in partnership with the Mackintosh Brothers, and another brother, Jasper Skaife, for four years, when they bought out their partners, subsequently running the mill alone for two years, when it was known as Skaife Brothers Milling Company, then disposing of the property to the Oregon Milling Company. From that time until 1887 Mr. Skaife was connected with a flour-mill in Salem, then went to Summerville, where he was successfully engaged in business for fourteen years. Returning to his former home, he remained in Silverton a brief time, then assumed charge of the La Grande Flouring Mills, formerly known as Alliance Flouring Mills, retaining that position until 1902, when he settled at his present home in Silverton. He now owns considerable real estate in this vicinity, including a house and some lots in the city, and a valuable farm on the Abaquá river, about one hundred acres of which is in a good state of cultivation, nine acres of it being devoted to the raising of hops.

Mr. Skaife married, in Summerville, Ore., Lenona May Settlemier, who was born in Albany, July 17, 1872, daughter of Alexander and Linnie (Allen) Settlemier, the former a native of Illinois, who came to Oregon across the plains in 1852, and located on the Pudding river, becoming a pioneer settler of that part of the state. Politically Mr. Skaife strongly advocates the principles promulgated by the Republican party, and fraternally he is a member of Silverton Lodge, No. 45, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and with his wife is a member of the Eastern Star.

MICHAEL SKAIFE. A farm that never fails to attract the attention of the passerby is one located three miles south of Silverton, Marion county, Ore., belonging to Michael Skaife, into the improvement of which he has put the unwearied strength and eager effort of a man who tills the soil from a love of it, and not from necessity. He was reared to the life of a miller, that being the trade of his father, Robert Skaife, a native of Yorkshire, England, born October 26, 1818. Emigrating to the United States in 1840, the father settled near Dubuque, Iowa, where he engaged in farming till about 1846, after which he removed to Grant county, Wis. In the spring of 1850 he removed again to his farm near Dubuque, Iowa, and in 1857 removed to Jackson county, Iowa, where he engaged in the milling business. In 1867 he came to Oregon, sailing from New York to the Isthmus of Panama, and on the Pacific side stopping at San Francisco on his way to Portland. He first settled at Salem, where he worked at his trade for a short time, soon, however, changing his residence to Polk county. After a period of twelve or thirteen years spent in this county, he removed to Silverton, Marion county, where he passed the remainder of his life. His wife, Jane Skaife, also a native of Yorkshire, England, born June 9, 1818, had borne him eight children, named in order of birth as follows: Joseph, born August 22, 1841; Emma, born June 6, 1839, and John G., deceased, born December 29, 1842, the latter dying while serving in Company I, Twenty-fourth Iowa Regiment during the Civil war; Michael, of this review; Thomas, of Silverton; Jennie, born July 25, 1850, and Mary A., born June 1, 1855, also deceased; and Jasper, born December 19, 1861, now living in Colfax, Wash. Mr. and Mrs. Skaife were devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, being very active in church work. The death of these old people, occurring to each in their eightieth year, was a loss mourned by many.

Michael Skaife was born April 18, 1845, in Dubuque county, Iowa. He received his early education in the district schools, later attending a high school and a business college. From his father he learned the milling business, following it steadily from 1867 to 1885. The last eight years in which he was engaged in this business he spent at Silverton, where with his brothers, Thomas and Jasper, he conducted the mills of that place. There in 1878 he married Miss Anna Schnackenberg, a native of Missouri, born August 28, 1858, who had come with her parents to Oregon in 1876. Four children blessed their union, their names in order of birth being as follows: Roy A., Bennie M., Robert Guy and Mary J. The two last named are now deceased.

In 1887 Mr. Skaife moved his family to the farm where he now lives, three miles south of Silverton, the place containing three hundred and twenty acres, one hundred and ninety of which are under cultivation. Here he carries on general farming and stock-raising. He is also interested in hop cultivation, having twenty-six acres devoted to this plant, which in 1902 produced nearly seven tons. Mr. Skaife further improved his property by erecting a handsome, modern house.

In public affairs Mr. Skaife has always taken a prominent place, serving as mayor of Silverton and in minor offices, also as school clerk and member of the board of education. Politically he is a Republican, and fraternally is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and with the Daughters of Rebekah, having passed all the chairs, and also filled one appointive office in the grand lodge. Mr. Skaife has proven himself an able and earnest citizen whose broadest aim is to assist in the upbuilding of the country's prosperity. His success is seen, not only in the well tilled fields of his farm, but also in the general esteem in which he is held by the men with whom his associations have lain for so many years. When the brothers located in Silverton there were but two hundred and fifty inhabitants, and they built up the milling business and also extended the railroad to their mill, and in other ways liberally contributed to all movements that advanced the interests of the city and people.

ANDREW G. STEELHAMMER. Many of the most thriving and enterprising agriculturists and business men of Marion county have come from the land beyond the sea, and of this number Mr. Steelhammer is a worthy representative. The second child in a family consisting of two sons and a daughter, he was born in Carlstadt, Sweden, January 6, 1847, and was there reared and educated. After leaving school, he worked as a puddler in the iron works of his native town until 1869, when he emigrated to America, a land supposed to be flowing with milk and honey.

Arriving in the United States, Mr. Steelhammer located first near New Boston, Ill., where he worked as a farm hand about three months, when he joined a harvesting gang, which he followed through northern Illinois, Minnesota and Iowa. The ensuing year he was employed in the construction department of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, laying rails for a year. Settling in Winona, Minn., in 1871, he served as an apprentice at the carriagemaker's trade, which he followed in that place for ten years. Going then, in 1881, to North Dakota, he was there engaged in blacksmithing for ten years, when he followed the tide of emigration westward to the state of Washington, where he stayed about two months. Early in 1892, Mr. Steelhammer came to Silverton, Ore., and at once established himself as a blacksmith, meeting with signal success from the first. He has since purchased twenty-eight acres of land, one half of it adjoining city property, and has materially improved his purchase by the erection of a fine residence on the hill overlooking the city of Silverton. He has further utilized his land by devoting three acres of it to the raising of prunes, and eight acres to the raising of hops.

At Winona, Minn., in 1871, Mr. Steelhammer was united in marriage with Miss Christina Anderson, who was born and reared in Norway, living there until 1869, when she came to the United States, settling in Winona, Minn. Of their union the following named children have been born: John F., a resident of Salem, Ore.; Carl G., deceased; Helma, wife of A. P. Allen, San Francisco, Cal.; Oscar Adolph, connected with the Military Band at Salem, Ore.; Louie R., of Salem, Ore.; Artie E., living at home; George W., at home; and William H., living with his parents, plays in the Silverton band.

Mr. Steelhammer is a staunch adherent of the Republican party, and takes an active interest in political affairs, attending all local and county conventions. He is prominent in fraternal circles, being a member and past master of Silverton Lodge No. 45, A. F. & A. M.; Ramona Chapter No. 58, Eastern Star; past grand of the Silver Lodge No. 21, I. O. O. F.; and past chief in the Ridgley Encampment.

FRANK VAN WESSENHOVE. Farming and mining have been followed by Frank Van Wessenhove with equal success, although he undoubtedly would give the preference to farming, in which he has been continuously engaged since 1859. This industrious and exemplary farmer is one of the many who have come from the little country of Belgium and identified their special abilities with the upbuilding of this fortunate nook of the world. He was born on a farm not far from Brussels, March 8, 1841, and was but three years of age when his parents embarked in a sailing vessel for American shores, reaching their destination after many weeks of storm and calm. The parents located in Monroe county, Mich., where the son Frank grew to manhood, and where he secured a fair education in the public schools.

Of all the youth in the farmer families of Monroe county none listened more attentively to the accounts of wealth in the west than did Frank Van Wessenhove, then approaching eighteen years of age. Accordingly, he made preparation to cross the plains in a train of emigrants in 1859, and located the first winter in Portland. In the spring of 1860 he came to the French Prairie, in Marion county, and after living on a farm for a year tried his luck in the mines of Idaho. He was fairly successful in the latter enterprise, and upon returning to Marion county located on a rented farm near Gervais, where he lived until 1867. In the meantime, in 1863, he had married Ellen Coyle, a native of Minnesota and a daughter of James Coyle, who came to Oregon in 1853, locating in Yamhill county, whence he moved to St. Paul. He married Charlotte Scott, a native of Wisconsin, who died on the Platte river while crossing the plains. Mr. Coyle died at the home of Mr. Van Wessenhove in 1897. In 1867 Mr. Van Wessenhove and his wife located on the farm which has since been the family home, and which is located one mile from Champoeg. Of this first marriage there were born six children, of whom four are living: Mary, the wife of Charles P. McCormick; Josephine, wife of Thomas Kerr, of St. Paul; Alexander J., of Portland; and Eliza, wife of John Kerr, of Washington county, Ore. June 1, 1898, Mr. Van Wessenhove's first wife died, and February 5, 1901, he was united in marriage with Mrs. Ellen Ramsey. She was reared in Boston, a daughter of William and Mary (McArthur) Walsh. She is a niece of Archbishop Walsh of Ireland; and a sister of Rev. James Walsh, a priest now located in Queenstown, Ireland. She was united in marriage with Patrick Ferguson, and they became the parents of two children, George and Agnes. Her second marriage united her with Edward Ramsey, and they had one daughter, Henrietta. All now reside at home. Mrs. Van Wessenhove has been a resident of Oregon eleven years.

The Van Wessenhove farm consists of four hundred and sixty-five acres, upon which is conducted general farming and stock-raising. An additional source of revenue is a hop yard of forty-seven acres, with which the owner has had great success. In political affiliation Mr. Van Wessenhove is a Republican, and fraternally he is associated with Hubbard Lodge No. 76, I. O. O. F., and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In religion he is identified with the Roman Catholic Church. He is thrifty, enterprising, thoroughly honorable and popular, and his worthy career has added materially to the upbuilding of the agricultural interests in Marion county.

SAMUEL CLINTON BROWNE, M. D. In the extent of its breadth and activity the life of Dr. Samuel Clinton Browne has exceeded by far that of the average medical and surgical practitioner. A resident of Scio since 1898, the doctor has won a large and appreciative practice in the town and surrounding country, devoting himself to general practice of medicine and surgery.

The family to which Dr. Browne belongs was established in Pennsylvania by his paternal grandfather, Hugh Browne, who came from Londonderry, Ireland, at an early day, and engaged in the manufacture of brick. He was successful in his chosen occupation, and at the time of his death at the age of sixty left those dependent on him in comfortable circumstances. A military strain runs through the family, remote ancestors having been distinguished for their knowledge of warfare and their bravery on the field of battle. This patriotic tendency was apparent in at least three of the sons of the grandfather, two of whom, Edward and Hugh, served all through the Mexican war, while Andrew, the father of Dr. Browne, devoted nearly all of his active life to military service. This father was born near Lebanon, Pa., and married Sarah Clinton, and they had three children, two of whom died in early childhood, Samuel Clinton Browne being the only survivor.

Born on a farm bordering on the Susquehanna river, near Harrisburg, Pa., January 13, 1856, Dr. Browne went from the public schools to Palmyra Academy in 1874, and in 1875 began a two-years' course at the Lebanon Valley College at Annville, Pa. In 1877 he went to Dickinson county, Kans., and engaged in teaching school for a couple of years, and from 1879 until 1883 combined teaching with studying medicine under Dr. A. S. Gish, of Abilene, Kans. At the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati, Ohio, which he entered in 1884, and from which he was graduated in 1890, he took a special course in the eye and ear department, receiving a diploma for proficiency therein. In the meantime, in 1887, he had taken his mother to Oregon for her health, and had been much impressed with the climate and apparent resources of the country. After graduating, he returned to Oregon, and opened his initial practice in Mill City, remaining there for two years. In 1894 he changed his location to Salem, in 1896 moved to Fall City, and from the latter town, to Scio, in 1898.

Through his marriage in Salem, Ore., with Ida R. Bunn, a native of Pennsylvania, Dr. Browne became identified with a family splendidly honored by the remarkable professional services of Mrs. Browne's father, Prof. James M. Bunn, M. D., who also was born in the Quaker state. Dr. Bunn was a graduate of the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, Pa., and was a scholar of wide scientific research. The associate of many of the most learned men of the country, and the fellow of the most prominent and time-honored medical and scientific associations in America and Europe, he received international attention as one of the finest bacteriologists which this country has produced. Few have accomplished so much in this particular line. He was the founder, and up to the time of his death, December 15, 1896, the president, of the National Bacteriological Society, and as such contributed many notable papers on the subject. For many years he made his home in Altoona, Pa., where his demise was brought about through neuralgia of the heart. Fifty years of professional activity had made him a power in the Quaker state, and the loss sustained by the scientific world at large, especially that part devoted to the study of organisms, was greatly felt.

Dr. S. C. Browne is a member of the Oregon Eclectic Medical Association and the National Eclectic Medical Association. Since coming to Oregon Dr. Browne has by no means confined himself to professional undertakings but has entered heartily into the promotion of the civic, social and military development of his respective localities. In 1893 he was appointed on the hospital staff of the Second Regiment Ohio National Guards and surgeon of Southern Veterans United States of America, of which he was captain of a cavalry company at Camp Sumpter and later at the dedication of the Soldiers' Home at Roseburg, May 9-10, 1894. He was elected and commissioned lieutenant-colonel and served one year as such. He is a military man in his bearing and character, being of particularly forceful nature and feels at home on tented field.

DAVID H. JOHNSTON. In the community of Scio David H. Johnston is regarded as an excellent business man, a wide-awake and progressive citizen, and a loyal and high-minded friend. Many admirable characteristics have contributed to his success, not the least of which are common-sense indefatigable industry, and unswerving integrity. At present the bookkeeper and business manager of a planing mill which he bought for his sons in 1900, Mr. Johnston has been identified with agricultural and stock-raising interests in Oregon ever since coming here in 1873, and it is from these reliable sources that his present ample fortune has been derived. The farm upon which he lived for twenty-seven years in Marion county, and which he still owns, is located near Stayton, and is five hundred and fifty acres in extent. Needless to say, every known aid to scientific farming has been introduced on this modern property, and during the residence of the family there, they were surrounded with all the comforts and many luxuries of life.

A native of Fifeshire, Scotland, Mr. Johnston was born November 8, 1838, and in his youth had the advantages of the public schools. His father, George Johnston, also a native of Scotland, was a linen manufacturer, and owned and operated a mill of three hundred looms at Wemyss. He was successful in his chosen occupation, and amassed a competence, making a name for himself as one of the foremost and influential men in the community. His entire life was passed in Scotland, and his death occurred at the age of sixty-five, his wife, Jane (Sibbald) Johnston, also dying in her native land, after rearing a family of seven children. David Henry, being the oldest in the family, naturally became interested in his father's linen business, and as a youth began at the bottom and learned to be a practical linen weaver. In time he assumed partial responsibility in the management of the manufactory, and was thus employed until coming to America in 1873. With him to America came his wife, formerly Alice Christie, who died in Scio in 1900, at the age of sixty years, leaving two sons, George C. and Harry S., who are now in business with their father. Mr. Johnston is a Republican in politics and has taken a keen interest in local affairs, serving for several years as school director and road supervisor. Resourceful and ambitious, Mr. Johnston has demonstrated the worth of conservative and cautious business methods, of a temperate and equable disposition, and tact and consideration. He has many friends in Scio, as well as in the locality where so many successful years of his life were passed.

NICHOLAS GOODING. Born in Prussia, January 18, 1832, Nicholas Gooding was a very early emigrant to the United States, having come with his parents to this country in 1844, his first home being in Vernon, Jennings county, Ind., where his father purchased a farm and became interested in the cultivation of the soil. Upon this farm the boyhood days of Nicholas Gooding were spent, his training being principally along agricultural lines, though he received a substantial education in the common schools of the neighborhood.

Upon attaining manhood Mr. Gooding departed from his early training, and after a thorough apprenticeship with a blacksmith passed the twelve years following his seventeenth birthday in that business, acquiring sufficient means to launch him well in farming which, after all, proved more congenial. After engaging in this work for twenty-eight years in the middle west, he concluded to test the opportunities of the lands of the Pacific coast. In 1889 he came to Oregon and invested the proceeds of his many years' work in the farm known as the Gratton farm, and which included seventy-five acres of land located southeast of his present farm. In that location he remained until 1895, engaged in general farming and hop-raising, having fifteen acres devoted to this plant. In the last-named year he made the purchase of the farm which he now owns, formerly known as the Clary place, consisting of one hundred and seventy-one acres, and located three-quarters of a mile from St. Paul, Marion county. At the present time he is interested in general farming and hop-raising, eighteen acres of the farm being utilized in hop-cultivation.

In 1860 Mr. Gooding was united in marriage with Mary Erbsland, daughter of Joseph and Tracy (Lang) Erbsland. To this union eleven children have been born, eight of whom are now living. They are as follows: George, at home; Lizzie, wife of John Glatt, of Jennings county, Ind.; John and Charles, in Marion county; Lawrence, located near St. Paul; Annie, wife of Fred Davidson, living on a farm south of St. Paul; Joseph, a merchant of St. Paul; and William L., at home. Those deceased are Tracy, and Peter and Jacob, twins, who died in infancy.

In politics Mr. Gooding is a Democrat, though he has never been a seeker after official life. In religion he is a devoted member of the Catholic Church. He has never shirked any responsibility which has been placed upon his shoulders, and has always accomplished all in his power toward the improvement of educational, moral and social conditions in Marion county. He is widely known as a good citizen in the highest sense of the word, being possessed of a disposition to assist in the promotion of all worthy enterprises.

JAMES M. HERRON. On the farm now occupied by James Martin, in Benton county, James M. Herron was born October 9, 1863, his parents, Robert and Mary W. (Neil) Herron, having moved there in 1861. Robert Herron was born in Ireland, and came to the United States in 1851, passing through Illinois, where his future wife was living with her parents. He came on to Oregon via the Isthmus of Panama, and in Oregon took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres five miles northeast of Monroe. Ten years later, in 1861, he returned to Illinois and married Miss Neil, with whom he returned to the west and settled on his donation claim, and where he lived to be fifty-five years old. He was a soldier in the Rogue river war, and was a worthy man and helpful citizen. His wife married for her second husband James Barclay, who was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains in 1851. He took up a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, the location being twelve miles from Corvallis, where he lived until his death in 1892. At present his widow is occupying this property, and is managing successfully a large general farming and stock-raising enterprise.

James M. Herron was educated in the public schools, and remained on the home farm until twenty-seven years of age. He then purchased three hundred and eighty-five acres of the Aaron C. Richardson donation claim fourteen miles south of Corvallis on the old Territorial road, and for two years kept desolate bachelor quarters. Realizing that to best succeed in life he needed the assistance of a discerning and sympathetic wife, he married, March 21, 1894, Ella Montgomery, who was born in Linn county, Ore., but spent most of her maidenhood in Lane county, Ore., and with whom he went to housekeeping under a little more cheerful auspices. He has prospered exceedingly, has a variety of interests on his farm, and is equally successful in all of its departments. A substantial revenue is derived each year from Cotswold sheep and Jersey cows, and he has twenty acres under hops. He has been particularly successful with his hop culture, the last year netting him eighteen thousand pounds. Mr. Herron is a Democrat in politics, and among other offices has held that of road supervisor and school director. Fraternally he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Modern Woodmen of America. Mr. Herron is not only a successful and scientific agriculturist, but he exerts a broad influence in the community because of sterling personal characteristics. He is a power in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which he is a trustee, steward and Sunday school superintendent.

THOMPSON D. HINTON. Though not one of the very large land-owners of Benton county, Thompson D. Hinton is one of its most successful farmers, and most popular and influential residents. His name is a well known one hereabouts, and was established in the west by his father, R. B. Hinton, a pioneer of 1846. The elder Hinton was a typical forerunner of civilization, and his career in the west, productive of such advancement in Benton county, has elsewhere received the extended mention due him. Two of his sons, Wesley and Thompson, are maintaining the prestige established by their father, and of these, Thompson was born in Franklin county, Mo., July 31, 1840, and was therefore six years of age when he accompanied the family across the plains. On the large donation claim near Monroe, Mr. Hinton was reared to farming, and his education was acquired in the near-by district school, augmented by further study in the town schools. At the age of twenty-one he followed out a long-intended plan, and in the mines on the Salmon river sought to multiply his gains in short order. The fact that he remained but a year would suggest comparative failure of his expectations, and his return to farming indicates an appreciation of that peaceful and sure means of livelihood. After a couple of years on the farm he again engaged in mining, this time on the John Day river, but after several months returned to the old claim settled by his father in the early days. February 12, 1865, Mr. Hinton married Margaret Barclay, a native of Missouri, and who crossed the plains with her people in 1850. For a year after the wedding the young people kept house on the old claim, and then moved to the J. E. Barclay place, remaining thereon for about three years. Mr. Hinton then bought the home where he now lives, and which consists of ninety-three acres, in the vicinity of Bruce. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and has so wisely disposed of his property that his profits are large and enable his family to live in comfort.

At all times quiet and unostentatious, Mr. Hinton has never been associated with political matters in his neighborhood other than as a voter, nor does he allow outside interests of any kind to interfere with the even and very industrious tenor of his way. Nine children have been born into his family, and of these, Henry C. lives in Linn county; R. W. lives near his brother in Benton county; Amy E. is one of the industrious members of the household; George E. assists his father with the home farm; Fred also is one of his father's main-stays; Minnie C. is the wife of C. Sickles, of Linn county; Ivan lives near his father; Wade is at home; and Eddie F. met a tragic death by drowning. Mr. Hinton is a member of the American Guild. He possesses the same regard for business integrity which characterized the dealings of his honored sire, and as a father, husband and agriculturist, reflects credit upon his prosperous home district.

WILLIAM D. BARCLAY. A prominent farmer of Benton county, Ore., is William D. Barclay, the son of William Barclay, deceased, the latter of whom was a pioneer to the west in 1850. The Barclay family came originally from Scotland, the emigrants to the United States being the parents of William Barclay, and their first settlement was made in North Carolina. They later became residents of Missouri, in the latter state making their home until their death. There William Barclay was born, in 1805, and reared to manhood, following for a livelihood surveying and school teaching, and there marrying Mary Ann Brown, a native of Tennessee. They continued to make their home in Missouri until 1850, when they were induced to join the pioneers of the Pacific slope. With the usual ox-teams they started upon their journey, reaching without incident the South Platte, where Mrs. Barclay died from the effects of the dread disease, cholera. There was nothing left but to continue the journey with saddened hearts, and on arriving in Oregon they first settled in Yanhill county, where they spent the winter following the trip. In the spring of 1851 they came to Benton county, where Mr. Barclay took up a donation claim, located twelve and one-half miles south of Corvallis, on which he lived until his death. He was the father of seven children, of whom Robert S. is located in Alsea valley; Mary E. is the widow of Andrew Rickard; James is also in Alsea valley; Margaret is the wife of T. D. Hinton, of this vicinity; Winnie is the wife of William LeVaugh, of Linn county; and William is the subject of this review. Mr. Barclay lived to be eighty-three years old, the many years which he spent in this community being filled with the practice of good citizenship, winning thereby the esteem and confidence of all with whom he came in contact. He filled many minor offices, among them being that of justice of the peace. At his death he was a very wealthy man, his years of earnest effort toward the fulfillment of the many promises of Oregon's early opportunities bringing him rich returns.

William D. Barclay was born in Missouri, March 21, 1850, and in the same year was brought across the plains. He has therefore spent practically his entire life in this state. He grew to manhood on the paternal farm, engaging in the various duties which his home life afforded, attending the district school in pursuit of an education. He remained at home until his marriage to Eliza Reeves. She was a native of Oregon, her parents having crossed the plains in 1844 and settled in Benton county. The young people went to housekeeping on the place where they now live, which was a part of the old home place. He has made the greater part of the improvements which have so much enhanced the value of the property, having good barns, out-buildings, and a commodious dwelling. He now owns two hundred and eighty-seven acres, one hundred and thirty acres of which are under cultivation. He is engaged at present in general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Shorthorn cattle.

The union of Mr. and Mrs. Barclay has been blessed by the birth of three children, of whom Ina is the wife of Edward Bryan, of Ontario, Ore.; Chauncey is located in the vicinity; and Iva is at home. Fraternaly Mr. Barclay is a member of the Masonic order and Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Democrat.

JEFFERSON D. ISOM. Beyond any consideration of money-making the farm of Jefferson D. Isom is a valued possession, for on this same land he was born July 4, 1861, and here passed his childhood days, developed into manhood, and still lives, a successful and popular member of a thriving community. His father, John Isom, was born in Grayson county, Va., October 7, 1827, and while still a youth removed to Jefferson City, Mo., where he apprenticed himself to a blacksmith. He married a widow by the name of Elizabeth (Smith) Duncan, and in 1853 crossed the plains with ox-teams, accompanied by his wife, her brothers and her father, and numerous emigrants from his neighborhood. The journey was uneventful, and after six months they arrived in Linn county, where Mr. Isom took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres upon which he lived for a short time. He then purchased the present farm now occupied by his son and engaged in stock-raising until 1884, when he went to Albany and bought the Parker & Morris warehouse. This large structure he converted into the Red Crown Flouring Mill, which he operated until 1895, and after that made his home with his son until his death March 14, 1903, at the age of seventy-six years. He was prominent as a Democrat, and took a keen interest in local affairs, serving among other capacities as county commissioner. The widow is still living, making her home with a daughter in Albany. She was born in 1824.

With his seven sisters and two brothers Jefferson Isom was reared on the Linn county farm, and all of the children received a practical education in the public schools of the country and Albany. He was thrifty and industrious as a youth, characteristics which are apparent to all who visit his well kept and highly developed property. In 1883 he married Mabel Woolen, who died after ten months of wedded life. For a second wife Mr. Isom married in 1885, Jane Arehart, who was born in Linn county, a daughter of George and Minerva (Matthews) Arehart, both now living in Junction City, Lowe county, Ore. Of this union there have been born three children, of whom Hugh and Jefferson are living, while one, Ira, is deceased. Mr. Isom at present owns six hundred acres of land, and makes a specialty of high-grade stock, Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep, many of which are registered. His farm is also devoted to a model dairy business, his butter and dairy products taking high rank in the local market. The farm is located fifteen miles southeast of Albany, and in its general aspect shows the many years of good management to which it has been subjected. Like his father, Mr. Isom favors the Democracy, but he has never taken an active interest in local party affairs, other than casting his vote. He is fraternaly a Knight of Pythias, and is a member of Dowdell Lodge No. 16, of Brownsville. Industrious and capable, Mr. Isom maintains the most friendly relations with his neighbors and associates, and that he is honored and esteemed by all argues well for his personal integrity and general characteristics, for his entire life has been an open book to those, who, like himself, have lived many years in this community.

COLUMBIA READ. Personal characteristics of a high order, a life of devotion to the responsibilities imposed upon him, as well as the fact that he is a native son and representative of one of the old pioneer families of the state, entitle Columbia Read to mention among the up-builders of this well favored nook of the world. Although a resident of Corvallis only since 1892, he was born on the old donation claim seven miles north of this town, December 29, 1852, a son of Thomas, and grandson of a soldier of the war of 1812, who died when a very young man. The family is of English descent. He is now practically retired from active life, but still oversees his productive farming property, and rejoices in the possession of some of the finest Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep this side of the Rockies.

To all old settlers, and in fact to all who have kept pace with the progress of Oregon from a wilderness to its present prosperous condition, the name of Thomas M. Read is a familiar one. Because of brains and perseverance he emerged from poverty and obscurity to the possession of three thousand acres of land, and great influence in his community. Born in New Hampshire he early settled in Iowa and engaged in steamboating on the Mississippi river, also turning his attention to the manufacture of brick at Fort Madison. In 1845, while still a young and unmarried man, he crossed the plains with ox-teams to Oregon, and after a six months' trip located on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres in Benton county. Having very little capital with which to start out, he had some difficulty in getting along at first, and used to resort to various devices for making a livelihood while his land was being cleared for crops. He used to go to Oregon City and assist in the manufacture of brick in order to get a little money ahead. During 1849-50 he tried his luck in the mines of California, but it would not seem that he materially improved his prospects by this venture. At different times between 1862 and 1868 he drove stock to the mines of Idaho, sold his cattle for big money, and always returned richer in hope and finances. It is not surprising that one of such resource and many-sidedness should prosper, or that he should add to his lands, and render them valuable through cultivation. He made his money chiefly through grain-raising and stock manipulations, and at the time of his death in September, 1892, was one of the well-to-do men of Benton county. For two years he was survived by his wife, whom he married in Benton county, and who was formerly Nancy White, a native of Iowa. Nancy White married for her first husband a Mr. Hawkins, with whom she started across the plains in 1845. He was not destined, however, to profit by his chances in the west, for he was overtaken with disease on the plains, and died on the Snake river. Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Read, five are living, four sons and one daughter. Of these, Theresa, was the deceased wife of John Benson, of Benton county; Perry is a stockman in Crook county, Ore.; Columbia; Sumner is a business man of Tacoma, Wash.; Charles is living in Oregon City; and Clara is the wife of Tolbert Norton, of Corvallis.

Until his twenty-first year Columbia Read lived with his father, and from him learned to be a successful farmer and stock-raiser. Upon starting out to farm independently he bought a ranch two miles from his old home, and now owns a farm of four hundred and eighty acres near Wells Station. Needless to say, his property is finely improved, is all under cultivation, and for many years has been devoted principally to grain and stock-raising. Having amassed a competency, Mr. Read moved to Corvallis in 1892, bought a piece of property, and built his present large and modern home. In Benton county he married Tillie Dudley, who was born in Illinois, near Rock Island, a daughter of Gustavus Dudley, who brought his family to Oregon in 1868. William and Bert, the two children in the family, are living in Corvallis. Mr. Read is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of the Maccabees and the Artisans. Mrs. Read is a member of the Baptist Church. Mr. Read is a genial and popular man, and has many friends in the town and county.

THOMAS LEESE. Though a young man and a new-comer to the state, Mr. Leese is nevertheless much interested in Oregon, and during his short residence in Corvallis he has proved his worth as a substantial citizen of the place by his straightforward business methods. Mr. Leese is manager of the Willamette Valley Banking Company, which carries on a general banking business, and he has had wide experience as a banker, being interested at the present time in no less than four banking houses. An Englishman by birth, with Crewe, Cheshire, as his birthplace, he is a descendant of an old and honored English family. He obtained a good education in his native land, where he attended college. His father, Isaac Leese, was a farmer by occupation, as was also his grandfather, Abraham Leese. His mother was a native of Staffordshire, England, and was before marriage, Sarah Wood, a daughter of John Wood, a prominent stockman. She died in her native land and Isaac afterward crossed the ocean and sought a home in America.

Thomas Leese was born December 16, 1862, and was the only son of his parents. After leaving an agricultural college he served three years as surveyor and civil engineer at Capesthorpe. In 1883 he emigrated to America and engaged in farming with his father in Manitoba, Dominion of Canada. They improved the land and farmed on a large scale, meeting with unlimited success in that line. He was elected county treasurer of Birtle county, Manitoba, in 1890, serving until 1900. He was also engaged in exporting fine cattle to England and Scotland, from Manitoba and Northwest Canada, shipping direct to Liverpool, London and Glasgow.

In 1894 Mr. Leese first engaged in the banking business by establishing a bank at Birtle, and later an associate bank at Russell. In this venture he had two partners, J. C. Dudley and William Scarth. The partnership then formed is still in force, and although Mr. Leese has left that section of the country, he still retains his interests in both banks. In 1900 Mr. Leese left Manitoba and the following year came to Oregon, opening the Lincoln County Bank of Toledo, and served as active manager for one year. In July, 1902, he opened the Willamette Valley Bank in Corvallis, of which he is now manager, leaving the Lincoln County Bank in charge of Mr. Scarth.

Mr. Leese was united in marriage with Emma Fields, of Ontario, that happy event taking place in Wisconsin, and they unite in worshiping at the Episcopal Church. In fraternal circles, Mr. Leese holds a membership with the Knights of Pythias and he is a valued member of the American Bankers' Association.

BUSHROD W. WILSON. There are few men whose lives are crowned with the honor and respect which was uniformly accorded Bushrod Wilson, but through many long years of connection with Oregon's history his was an unblemished character. With him success in life was reached by his sterling qualities of mind and heart. True to every manly principle he never deviated from what his judgment would indicate to be right and honorable between his fellowmen and himself; he never swerved from the path of duty, and in the evening of a long and eventful career he could look back over the past with pride and without regret for any unworthy action done. In fact, he had the right to enjoy the consciousness of having gained for himself by his honorable, straightforward career the confidence and respect of the entire community in which he lived. He stands high in the history of the state, in that he filled the position of a county clerk for a longer period than any other man who has ever resided in Oregon. His life record presents many exemplary traits of character and may well prove of great benefit to others, if they will but heed the obvious lessons which it contains.

In pioneer times Mr. Wilson became a resident of Oregon. He was born in the far-off state of Maine, his natal year being 1824 and his birth place Columbia Falls. On the paternal side he comes of Anglo-Saxon lineage and on the maternal side he was of French Huguenot descent. Perhaps the early trials of his mother's family, who had been exiled from Arcadia, were somewhat responsible for the intense love which he always manifested for our American free institutions and for the country in which man can worship according to the dictates of his own conscience. However this may be, Mr. Wilson always displayed the utmost fidelity to the country, and in matters of citizenship he was most loyal and progressive. He was also a bitter opponent of anything that seemed to him out of harmony with the keeping of the American spirit of freedom and protection for all, and thus it was that in early life, he became a free-soil Whig and afterward a stanch abolitionist, ever known as the champion and friend of the cause of the oppressed.

When but nine years of age Mr. Wilson accompanied his parents on their removal to New York, and to some extent attended the public schools of that city, but his educational privileges were somewhat limited. In later years, however, reading, experience and observation brought to him broad knowledge and he became a well informed man. Especially did he keep in touch with everything pertaining to his country and her interests. His independent spirit and self-reliance were early manifested, for from a very youthful age he depended upon his own resources and by the time he had reached the age of seventeen he had gained much skill in various pursuits that brought to him a substantial return. He worked at the printer's trade with Horace Greeley, and when nothing better offered he would run errands and thus add to his weekly income. It was not necessity that forced Mr. Wilson to do this, for his father was in rather comfortable circumstances, but an innate spirit of independence was his and he was in no way afraid to work. In fact, throughout his entire life indolence and idleness were utterly foreign to his nature, and he was ever busy either with his own private interests or in furthering measures and movements for the general good.

In the year 1840 Mr. Wilson's father removed to Illinois when the greater part of that state was an unbroken prairie and the city of Chicago was open fields. The mother of Bushrod Wilson had died some years previously, and after moving west the father married again. After a time, being of an adventurous disposition, Bushrod Wilson, desiring to see more of the world, made his way to the Atlantic coast and took passage upon a whaling vessel, bound for the Pacific waters, on a three-years' cruise. He sailed under Captain Taber on the bark Harvest, and experienced the hardships and difficulties incident to such a trip at that time. Whaling at that time was also attended with various dangers and it was necessary that the men should become expert swimmers, as they were often thrown into the water. He related that when out in the middle of the Pacific with the boat crew he was several times in the water for the greater part of a day. When the voyage was over Mr. Wilson paid a visit to his father and brothers in the west and then again went to sea, making several voyages up the Mediterranean, and subsequently acted as pilot on the lakes, in which capacity he was employed for five years. On the expiration of that period he made a trip around Cape Horn in the ship William Gray, arriving in San Francisco in time to participate in the celebration of July 4, 1850. The present populous city was then scarcely more than a mining camp. After spending one season in the mines on the Yuba and American rivers Mr. Wilson started for Umpqua as a passenger on the schooner Reindeer. He was induced to take this step through reports which had been circulated by the transportation people concerning the richness of the mines of the Umpqua district, but he was doomed to disappointment on reaching his destination, as the reports had been entirely wrong. He then started up the Umpqua river in a canoe, leaving at the landing his chest of ship-carpenter's tools valued at $300, and when he returned these were nowhere to be found. Proceeding up the coast to the Willamette valley he arrived at the site of Marysville, Wash., late in the fall of 1850. Although his advent into Oregon seemed unprofitable, it after all worked for his good, for he was pleased with the Willamette district and eventually became a resident of this portion of the state. Taking up a claim, he afterward gave this away and secured another one, which in turn he traded for a saw-mill property at Peoria. There he engaged in the manufacture of lumber, the splendid forests of the state offering ample opportunity for the prosecution of this business, but there was no market for the product and he lost all that he had invested. After some ten years employed in carpenter work and mining, Mr. Wilson secured employment in the office of Eugene Perham, county clerk of Benton county, and at the election in 1864, having been nominated by his party for that office, he was chosen by the popular vote for the position wherein he continually served through reelection, for thirty years. He then declined further nomination and voluntarily retired from the position as he had entered it—with the confidence and good will of the entire public. His official record is certainly commendable, for over it there fell no shadow of wrong-doing or suspicion of evil. He was prompt, methodical and systematic in the execution of his duties. He was ever willing to aid all who came to him in connection with the business of the office, and it is said that the only enemies that he ever had were certain lawyers who felt that he infringed upon their rights by giving freely information to those who sought it in the office of the county clerk. Mr. Wilson made one other investment aside from his saw-mill, which did not prove entirely profitable, and yet became of the utmost value to the state. He was one of the founders of the Oregon & Pacific Railroad, his idea being to build the road to Yaquina, and thus afford direct shipping facilities for Europe, that the grain producers might ship their wheat direct to the different parts of the old world. Mr. Wilson induced other men to join him in the enterprise, and he became a secretary and trustee of the company, and also one of its directors until his health failed. The road was completed, put in running order and met the needs of the community in the direction which Mr. Wilson had indicated. He did not realize, however, from his investment, in fact, lost heavily, but his work has proved of the greatest benefit to the people of the state.

Whatever tended to advance the welfare and progress of Benton county or of Oregon awakened the interested attention and helpful efforts of Bushrod Wilson. To enumerate in detail what he has done would be to overstep the bounds of history. In the early days he was more than usually active in the establishment and up-building of the State Agricultural College, and for many years he gave substantial support to the Gazette, assisting it over many difficult places in its early career. He took from his funds only enough to enable him to meet his obligations and to provide a comfortable home for his family and the remainder of his income went in benevolent and charitable work or in co-operation in movements for the general good.

In 1856 Mr. Wilson was united in marriage to Miss Priscilla O. Yantis, who was born in Missouri in 1838, and in 1850 crossed the plains with her parents, James M. and Sarah A. Yantis, who located on a donation claim in Linn county, two miles from Shedd's Station. There her father improved a fine farm upon which he spent his remaining days, passing away in 1879. His wife bore the maiden name of Sarah A. Hamilton and is also deceased. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Wilson were born nine children: Lafayette Y., who is engaged in mining in Alaska; E. Belle, the wife of J. B. Walker, who is on the editorial staff of the Scientific American in New York City; James O., who follows farming near Corvallis; J. H., an attorney of Corvallis; Robert J., a practicing physician of New York City and is now serving on the New York board of health and is an instructor in Bellevue Medical College and the University of New York and sanitary inspector of greater New York; Thomas E., who is an attorney in California; Minnie A., who is employed in the First National Bank of Corvallis; Cara H. M. and Bushrod W., who reside in Corvallis.

Mr. Wilson, the father of this family, passed away March 4, 1900, and is still survived by his widow, who yet resides on the old homestead. His life was devoted to his family, his friends and his country, and his unswerving purpose, his unquestioned fidelity, his unflinching honesty, and his unchanging will commanded the highest respect of all. He was a leader in the cause of liberty, of freedom and of progress and his hearty co-operation was ever given to that which tended to elevate mankind. Mr. Wilson was made a Mason in Corvallis Lodge over forty years ago. He attained the thirty-second degree Scottish Rite and was also a member of the Noble Mystic Shrine. He passed all the chairs in the subordinate lodges. Four of his sons are Master Masons.

JOHN W. RANSOM, M. D. A resident of Marion county since 1887, Dr. John W. Ransom has, during the past fifteen years, endeared himself closely to the inhabitants of Turner and vicinity, where he has been engaged in a laborious professional practice, in connection with the management of an extensive general merchandise business.

Dr. Ransom was born near West Bedford, Coshocton county, Ohio, August 18, 1841, and is a son of Robert and Nancy Ransom, of Pennsylvania. In 1850 his parents moved to Hartford City, Blackford county, Ind., where they located on a farm. There Dr. Ransom was reared, receiving his rudimentary education in the public schools. His early studies were supplemented by a course in Tiber College, located at Portland, Ind., after the completion of which he returned to the farm and continued to render his father such assistance in its management as was demanded of him. In 1860 he was united in marriage with Elizabeth Anderson, daughter of William Anderson and a native of Indiana.

Having determined to prosecute the practice of medicine, Dr. Ransom entered the medical department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor in 1863, where he remained a year. He then continued his studies for four years under the supervision of Dr. Mills of Hartford

City, Ind. After having qualified for his chosen field of labor, he engaged in practice for two years with his preceptor, at the end of which period he opened an office in Tustin, Osceola county, Mich., where he conducted a successful practice for fourteen years. Finding this field too limited for a man of more than ordinary capabilities, he decided to remove to the far west, and in 1887 came to Oregon. Locating at Turner, he has since made that town his professional and business headquarters, and has never had cause to regret the happy inspiration which directed his footsteps toward the region beyond the Rocky mountains. Eleven years after settling in Turner Dr. Ransom established a general merchandise store, in company with his son, and is now transacting a business which has assumed satisfactory proportions.

In 1861 Dr. Ransom's first wife died, and in 1862 he married Tabitha C. Anderson, of which union there were born ten children, as follows: Rhoda, deceased; Susan, deceased; Effie, wife of W. A. McGovern, a resident of Tustin, Mich.; Thomas, living in Tustin, Mich.; Charles, a partner with his father in the mercantile business in Turner, Ore.; Mary, wife of B. J. Oller, of Portland, Ore.; Alice, residing at Cadillac, Mich.; John, a resident of Omer, Mich.; Harvey, of Tustin, Mich.; and Clayton, a graduate of the medical department of Willamette University, of Salem, Ore., and now practicing in partnership with his father. In 1889 Dr. Ransom married Olive M. Gulvin, with whom he is now living.

Since 1866 Dr. Ransom has been identified with the Masonic fraternity, and is now a member of Jefferson Lodge No. 33, of Oregon. He has been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows since 1875, and is now a member of Fidelity Lodge No. 36 of Oregon. Dr. Ransom possesses an exceedingly social disposition, and his optimistic temperament undoubtedly has contributed largely to his success as a medical practitioner. By his numerous friends he is highly esteemed for the many splendid traits in his character, and for the unselfish interest he has taken in those projects which are intended to benefit the community in which he resides.

L. F. MASCHER. Not alone for its beautiful surroundings and fine improvements is the farm of Fred Mascher noted, but for the fact that its owner is the only man in the vicinity who can boast that every year of his life of over half a century has been spent upon the location where he first saw the light of day. Time has not diminished his attachment for his birthplace, as is shown in the care and attention which he gives to every detail that tends toward the improvement of his home; each recurrence of the seedtime and harvest yields recalling the days of boyhood and young manhood spent on the farm from where he looks forward to a happy old age among the same pleasant scenes.

The father of L. F. Mascher, Christ F., was born December 29, 1811, in Germany, and emigrated in 1836 to the United States, settling in Baltimore, Md., where he engaged in the iron works as a puddler. Soon after his arrival in America he married Sarah Eisenhardt, also a native of Germany. In 1844 the family removed to Missouri, where the father engaged in farming, remaining, however, but eight years, the next venture taking them to the Pacific coast, the journey being made by means of ox-teams and lasting seven months. The only trouble experienced from the Indians on the trip was the loss of some of their cattle. On reaching Oregon, they came direct to Marion county, where Mr. Mascher bought the squatter's right to six hundred and forty acres located in the Waldo hills, three miles south of Silverton, engaging in general farming and stock-raising. Here Mr. and Mrs. Mascher passed the remainder of their days, living to the ages of eighty-seven and seventy-five, respectively. Mr. Mascher was actively interested in politics and in all public affairs, taking an intelligent interest in matters of educational advancement and giving a strong support in church movements, and in all matters tending to morality.

Of the six children born to his parents, L. F. Mascher is the only one now living. His birth occurred December 6, 1850, the same year in which his parents made the trip from the middle west, and on the farm where he now makes his home. In his youth he attended the district schools in the vicinity, and on attaining manhood engaged with his father in farming, which occupation he has continued his entire life. In 1875 he married Allie J. Allen, also an Oregonian, the daughter of Henry Allen, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. Three daughters were born to them, of whom the eldest, Lillian M., is the wife of L. J. Burnham, of Tacoma. The two remaining daughters, Grace and Minnie, are still at home with their parents.

In the farm of Mr. Mascher are included three hundred and fifty-five acres of the old donation claim taken by his father, upon which stands the house in which he and his wife first began housekeeping and where they now live. The land is devoted to general farming and stock-raising, Mr. Mascher making a specialty of hops and Shropshire sheep. From thirty-three acres of hops the crop produced amounted to thirty-six thousand pounds in 1903. Mr. Mascher has given his entire thought to agriculture, and in the last twenty-five years has demonstrated his ability to get the best returns possible from the cultivation of the soil. Politically he is a Republican and in religion he and all the members of his family are members of the Christian Church.

ASBURY PEARNE STARR. With the exception of three years spent in Salem educating his son, Asbury P. Starr has lived all his life on the farm one mile southwest of Belfountain, where he was born April 22, 1853. He comes of one of the fine old pioneer families of this section, and in his youth had the advantage of a Christian home, presided over by a father whose life was devoted to the welfare of those around him, and who, as pioneer preacher in this county, accomplished a world of good for the early settlers. As one in a numerous family dependent upon the poorly paid services of the father, Asbury P., was reared to habits of thrift and industry, and remained under the paternal roof until his marriage, December 22, 1878, with Carrie Tharp, who was born in Kansas and came to Oregon in 1864. One son has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Starr, Philip Ray, who is living with his parents.

After his marriage Mr. Starr located on his part of the home ranch, which consists of three hundred and forty-four acres, fifty of which are under cultivation. The finest of modern improvements facilitate a general farming and stock-raising industry, a specialty being made of high-grade stock, including Jersey cattle, Cotswold sheep and fine horses. The farm is one of the most desirable and valuable in Benton county, and the methods employed in conducting it are those of the intelligent, well informed, and scientific student of ways and means, who surrounds himself with the comforts and luxuries, which mark the difference between the successful and the unsuccessful landsman. As an upholder of Republicanism, Mr. Starr has filled many local positions in the county, but always reluctantly, as he has never sought or worked for official distinction. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Rev. John W. Starr, father of Asbury P., was born in Maryland, April 22, 1794, and as a boy moved with his parents to Virginia, and in after years to Ohio, where the old people died. The son remained on the home farm in Ohio until attaining his majority, and then studied for the ministry, to which he devoted his entire active life. His first wife, a Mrs. McWilliams, bore him five children, of whom Mrs. Nancy Belknap of California, and J. W. Starr of Junction City, Ore., are living. Mrs. Starr lived but a few years, and after her death in Ohio her husband married Eliza A. Lucas, with whom he removed to Iowa in 1840, and who bore him twelve children, of whom the following are living: Mrs. Precious Shedd of Corvallis; S. E. of The Dalles; M. L. of Bellfountain; L. H. of Albany; Mrs. E. A. Burlingame of Sheridan; S. C.; A. P. of Bellfountain; and Mrs. M. E. Tharp of Bellfountain. In 1848 Rev. Starr disposed of his interests in Iowa and crossed the plains with his wife and children, outfitting with ox-teams, and being the usual time, six months, on the way. The little party was not seriously disturbed by the Indians, and Capt. J. Belknap was their competent guide to the far-off north-western country. The journey was saddened by the death of one of the children, but otherwise all went well, and upon arriving at his destination Mr. Starr took up the donation claim near Bellfountain, upon a portion of which his son is now living, and which consisted of six hundred and forty acres of land.

Rev. Starr is entitled to more than passing mention among the early settlers of Benton county, for his influence was a broad and humanitarian one, and was not only exerted in favor of agriculture and stock-raising, but extended to educational and moral development. He was known as "Uncle John," and his home was always open to whomsoever might come that way, no matter what his need or mission. He was the first local preacher in Benton county, or indeed anywhere around this section, and he was never too weary to go on a long journey to perform marriage ceremonies, to bury the dead, or comfort the living. Strong, sincere and fearless, he was an inspiration in the early and lawless days, and many a discouraged pioneer has been turned towards more hopeful things by the force of his eloquence, and the honesty of his convictions. He was one of the promoters and builders of Simpson's chapel, the first place of worship in this vicinity. Rev. Starr lived to be seventy-four years old, and the wife who had shared his lifework for so many years, and who had so faithfully reared her large family of children to be noble and helpful men and women, survived him until eighty-three years old.

Though still a comparatively young man, Captain Hunt had risen to a position of distinction at the bar before deciding to lay down the cares his practice imposed upon him, and those most familiar with his character and ability, inherent and cultivated, express the opinion that his attainment of high political office would have been dependent solely upon his own desires in the matter, had he cared to remain in professional and public life.

Capt. M. W. Hunt was born on a farm in the Waldo hills, Marion county, April 14, 1860, and is a son of George W. and Elizabeth (Smith) Hunt, pioneer settlers of the Willamette Valley. (An extended sketch of the Hunt family will be found elsewhere in this work.) His elementary education was acquired in the public schools in his neighborhood. At the age of seventeen years he entered Willamette University, remaining a student in that institution from the fall of 1877 to the spring of 1880, when he returned to his home upon the farm. Soon after leaving college Captain Hunt decided to enter upon a military career, and enlisted as a private in the United States Heavy Artillery. He was assigned for duty with Battery B, First United States Artillery, and was stationed at Fort Point, San Francisco, for about a year. At this station the accidental discharge of a gun disabled his left hand, incapacitating him for further duty, and he was honorably discharged and permitted to return to his home. October 8, 1883, he was united in marriage with Miss Minnie G. McMonies, the daughter of John and Mary J. (Ros-siter) McMonies, all natives of Canada. Mrs. Hunt's parents are now residents of Portland. Two years later, in 1886, Captain Hunt removed to Salem for the purpose of qualifying himself for the practice of law, a profession for which he had for some time entertained a preference. For two years he studied in the office of S. T. Richardson, and after being admitted to the bar in 1888, entered into partnership with S. L. Hayden. Six months later he entered into a similar relationship with W. H. Pratt, now of Kansas, and subsequently this firm consolidated its interests with those of the Hon. J. J. Shaw, under the firm name of Shaw, Pratt & Hunt. For several years thereafter this firm was recognized as one of the strongest in Oregon, and conducted many cases which became celebrated in the annals of jurisprudence in the Willamette Valley.

CAPT. MELANCTHON W. HUNT. After many years of arduous professional labor as one of the leading representatives of the bar of Oregon, Capt. M. W. Hunt retired in the spring of 1902, to his farm of two hundred and sixty acres near Whitaker, Marion county, where he contemplates devoting the remainder of his life to the less strenuous occupation of agricul-

In recognition of his profound knowledge of the law and his excellent judgment in the application of its principles to the cases intrusted to his charge during the years of his practice, Captain Hunt was appointed attorney for the Oregon State Land Board in 1891, filling the post with credit to himself and conserving the best interests of his client, the people, until his resignation and retirement from practice in 1902. Prior to this period he had received from President McKinley, in July, 1889, an appointment as a member of the board of United States commissioners for Alaska, there being three other members of the body. After serving in this capacity for three months he resigned. For two terms he served as a member of the Salem city council, taking an active interest in the promotion of those projects calculated to enhance the material advantages of the city. He was also deeply interested in the military organization of the state. In 1884 he enlisted as a member of Company C, First Regiment of the Oregon State Militia, and was elected captain of that company. Upon the reorganization of the militia, in July, 1884, as the National Guard, he was commissioned captain of Company C, Second Regiment, serving until 1886, when he resigned and went to Salem. In July, 1887, he was commissioned second lieutenant of Company B, Second Regiment, O. N. G., and on August 2, 1887, was promoted first lieutenant and adjutant Second Regiment, O. N. G., and on November 29, 1889, was commissioned captain of Company B, Second Regiment, O. N. G., and on April 29, 1890, to the position of lieutenant colonel of the same regiment. In December, 1893, he resigned and went back to the ranks, and on February 21, 1894, was commissioned second lieutenant of Company B, Second Regiment, O. N. G., and in March, 1894, was promoted to a lieutenant colonelcy on the staff of Governor Lord, remaining in this capacity throughout the terms of Governors Lord and Geer, a period of nine years.

Captain Hunt has always been a Republican, and has been actively interested in the success of his party in the local, state and national elections. Fraternally he is identified with Salem Lodge, No. 4, A. F. & A. M., and with Multnomah Chapter No. 1, R. A. M.

The decision of Captain Hunt to retire from the practice of law brought with it a distinct loss to the bar of the state. Few men of his years have been so successful in their professional labors, and none had a higher standing among his contemporaries or with the laity than he. Unquestioned integrity marked his conduct of all causes which he espoused, and no charge of questionable tactics was ever laid against him, even by innuendo. He is a man possessed of a masterful mind, quick to grasp the essential points, pro and con, in any case, a forcible pleader, never resorting to those tricks in practice which are too common among the exponents of this branch of science. Though now permanently retired from active practice his work has not been forgotten, as he is still spoken of as one of the brilliant minds which have adorned the bar of Oregon. Captain Hunt's family consists of his wife and four children, the names of the children being as follows: George M.; Percy C.; Homer and Gertrude E., all of whom are at home with their parents.

M. P. BURNETT. The present sheriff of Benton county comes of a family of whom much is expected, a precedent for great accomplishment having been established many years ago, and faithfully maintained by successive bearers of the name. From their firmly knit and substantially endowed ranks has stepped forth Peter H. Burnett, the first governor of California, who undertook the responsibilities of his position under the most unfavorable and trying circumstances, but who, with the help of able men around him, managed to weather the storm of opposition and enmity created by jealousies and to overcome the difficulties encountered because of an empty exchequer. As is well known, the state of California began administrative business without a cent in its treasury, and at the time owned neither inkstand, pen, nor yet a ream of paper. That the financial stringency was lifted, and appropriations forthcoming, was due largely to the tact and forbearance, as well as financial and executive ability of the pioneer occupant of the gubernatorial chair.

Several of the brothers of Governor Burnett came to the coast, nearly all of them having been born in Clay county, Mo. Among the brothers was James White Burnett, the father of M. P., the sheriff of Benton county; Thomas, who died in California; William, who died in McMinnville, and who was the father of Judge George Burnett; Glen O., and Horace, who died in California. James White Burnett, a native of Clay county, Mo., crossed the plains in '49, engaged in mining for some time, and then operated a farm in Colusa county, Cal. He came to Oregon in 1867, settling in the Chehalem valley, Washington county, where he engaged in farming, and from where he removed to near Bethel, Polk county. At a later period he lived at The Dalles, but returned to near Bethel, Polk county, where he died at the age of sixty-five years. He was a member of the Christian Church, and a Democrat in political affiliation. In his young manhood he married Sarah J. Turner, who was born in Fayette, Mo., January 4, 1828, and now lives in Corvallis, and whose father, Thomas Turner, was born at Lexington, Ky., in 1797, and was an early settler in the state of Missouri. Mrs. Burnett is the mother of four sons and seven daughters, of whom three sons and three daughters are living, M. P.

being the second son. Of the daughters, Florence is living in Crook county, Ore.; Lulu is living in California; and Mattie is a resident of Corvallis.

M. P. Burnett, sheriff of Benton county, was born in Colusa county, Cal., August 11, 1861, and when seven years of age came over the mountains with his parents to Oregon, traveling by means of ox-teams. Although he has made his own way in the world since twelve years of age, he has succeeded in acquiring an excellent education, studying not only in the public schools but at the academies at Bethel and La Creole. At first his remuneration from a business standpoint was extremely meagre, working on a farm until the age of twenty-one, when he began as clerk in McCoy, receiving $10 per month, out of which he had to board himself. Six months later the merchant with whom he was employed came to Corvallis, and his competent clerk accompanied him, making no arrangement, however, in regard to wages. At the end of the year he was presented with $50 per month, and as time went on he became practically the head of the establishment, managing its affairs and doing the entire buying. At the expiration of four or five years he severed his relations to engage in business for himself, and after successfully conducting a cigar store for some time he was offered the position of managing a store closed out by the administrator. Later he engaged as clerk for Jacobs & Nugos for a year, and then for J. M. Nolan, and finally became identified permanently with Z. H. Davis, with whom he remained for six years, making a splendid record as a business man and faithful employe.

In 1890 Mr. Burnett was elected county treasurer by a large majority, and re-elected in 1892, serving until July, 1894. In July, 1896, he became deputy sheriff under Peter Rickard, and after serving thus for four years was elected sheriff by a majority of one hundred and twenty-six. In 1902 he was re-elected by a majority of three hundred and seventeen, the county at that time having a Republican majority of two hundred. In order to have his affairs in perfect order, and that he may understand about everything connected with his responsibility, Mr. Burnett keeps his own books, and attends to all of the business himself. He is well equipped to serve as sheriff, having a keen knowledge of human nature, a great fund of good nature, perfect command of himself at all times and under all circumstances, and absolute fearlessness.

Since living in Corvallis Mr. Burnett has married Minnie Huffman, who was born in Benton county, Ore., and who is the mother of two children, Leo, aged fourteen years, and a baby unnamed. At the age of twenty-one Mr. Burnett became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Bethel, and he is now a member of Corvallis Lodge No. 7. He is also identified with the Woodmen of the World, the Knights of the Maccabees and the Knights of Pythias.

FRANK J. MILLER. Albany is the home of many of the leading enterprises that are building up and adding to the importance of Linn county as an industrial center, and among the men that are actively identified with the establishment and development of these industries Frank J. Miller, secretary of the Albany Iron Works, occupies a position of influence. A man of energetic ability and keen foresight, he has met with much success in his various undertakings, and is one of the popular and esteemed residents of Albany. A native of Ohio, he was born September 6, 1857, in Dallas, now Ansonia, Darke county, a son of Albert S. Miller.

Born in Massachusetts, Albert S. Miller comes from sturdy Puritan stock. Remaining in the old Bay state until twenty-three years of age, he there learned the trade of bridge building, and then removed to Ohio, where he was for a number of years superintendent of bridge building on different railways. During the Civil war he offered his services to his country, but on being examined, was rejected. Coming to Oregon in 1873, he lived first in Lebanon, Linn county, then in Eugene, Lane county, engaged as a bridge builder and contractor. When the first railway was built through the valley, he accepted the contract for building the bridges between Roseburg and the Rogue River valley. He subsequently had charge of the construction of the bridges, east of Portland, for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and on the completion of the road embarked in mercantile business in Portland, in which he continued until his retirement from active pursuits. He is now living at Grant's Pass, Josephine county, a hale and hearty man, eighty-two years old. He is an honored member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he has taken the degree of R. A. M. He married Cecilia Harris, who was born in Ohio, in 1821, of French ancestry, and the daughter of an early settler of that state. She died in Portland, Ore., in December, 1883. Five children were born of their union, namely: Mrs. Nellie Burgess, who died in Salem, Ore.; Harry B., formerly a manufacturer and merchant at Grant's Pass, is now United States Consul at Niuchwang, China; Frank J., the subject of this review; Leroy, who died in Ohio; and Albert, who passed away in Portland.

Obtaining his elementary education in the public schools of Ohio, Frank J. Miller remained in Toledo until he came with his parents to Oregon. On the opening of the University of Oregon, he entered the first class, and there continued his studies three years, leaving the institution during his senior year on account of the removal of the family to Salem. Becoming familiar with the trade of bridge building when young, he assisted his father in the construction of many of the bridges on the O. & C. Railroad. In the fall of 1883, Mr. Miller entered into business as a bridge contractor on his own account, and during the two years that he was thus engaged, built bridges for counties and cities in Oregon, Washington and Idaho. The ensuing two years he acted as agent for the San Francisco Bridge Company, which he represented throughout the northwest, from 1885 until 1887. He was subsequently associated with bridge constructing on the C. & E. Railroad for a while, and then became superintendent of bridges and buildings on the O. P. R. R., a position that he retained three years. After working at bridge building for a short time, he then accepted the appointment of secretary of the Oregon State Board of Railroad Commissioners, which he held two years, from 1891 to 1893, his headquarters being in Salem.

During the year 1892-93, he was supervising engineer for Albany for the building of the Albany steel bridge, which, with approaches, reaches nearly one-half mile in length.

Purchasing an interest in the Albany Iron Works in 1892, Mr. Miller served as president of the company several years, and is now its secretary and treasurer. When he entered the firm, its business was comparatively unimportant, but has rapidly increased, and has now control of all the iron work required on the C. & E. R. R., and on the Oregon & Southeastern Railway. The company also makes a specialty of manufacturing heavy saw-mill machinery, carrying on an exceptionally large business in that line, furnishing many of the mills in Oregon with machinery and supplies. The buildings connected with the works cover four full lots, and in the shops twenty-five men are kept constantly employed. Mr. Miller has also other interests, with his brother owning, at Grant's Pass, a thirteen hundred acre ranch, which is devoted to agriculture and horticulture, much hay, grain and fruit being produced each year.

Mr. Miller was married in Eugene, Ore., December 1, 1880, to Miss Maggie Gray, who was born, reared and educated in Eugene. Her father, Hon. J. G. Gray, for many years a prominent merchant in that city, was for sixteen years county treasurer of Lane county. Mr. and Mrs. Miller are the parents of three children, Lena, Inez and Nellie Gray, students at Albany College, and J. Franklin. Mr. Miller is prominent in Masonic circles, and is a member and past master of St. John's Lodge No. 62, A. F. & A. M.; past high priest of Bayley Chapter No. 8, R. A. M.; illustrious master of Adoniram Council No. 4, R. & S. M.; past eminent commander of Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T.; is grand master of Third Vail in the Grand Chapter of Oregon; is grand junior warden of the Grand Commandery of Oregon; is a member of Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland; and is an officer in the Order of High Priesthood. Socially he is a member of the Alco Club. He is an active member of the First Presbyterian Church, and for many years has been one of its trustees, serving two terms as chairman of the board, and is now serving as president of the board of trustees of Albany College. He is actively and prominently identified with the Republican party, and has rendered good service as a delegate to county and state conventions.

MRS. MAHALA F. TURNER. Continuing in the work which her husband laid down at the summons of death Mrs. M. F. Turner is carrying on the routine of a general farm and stock-raising business with the success which always characterizes the methods and plans of one who has made a thorough and far-reaching study of agricultural pursuits. She is located upon a farm of two hundred and twenty acres six miles northeast of Harrisburg, Linn county, this being a part of the donation claim which her husband's father made in the early history of the country, and which became the property of her son, G. H. Turner, through her husband's purchase of his childhood's home.

Mrs. Turner was before marriage Mahala F. Cochran, her father being William Cochran, who was born in Madison county, Ky., November 20, 1813, his principal occupation on attaining manhood being that of stock-raising. He married Ollie Johnson, a native of Putnam county, Mo., having been born there September 6, 1813, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and in 1847 they outfitted for the trip across the plains, bringing their worldly wealth to Oregon in a six months' journey with ox-teams. In the fall of the same year they located on Molalla river in Clackamas county, where they remained for two years, after which, in 1849, they became residents of Linn county. Here Mr. Cochran took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, located one mile north of Brownsville, which remained the home of the family for many years. In 1889 Mr. Cochran removed to San Jose, Cal., near which he lived retired until 1898, when he returned north and located permanently in Albany, in which city he lived until January 24, 1900, when he went to the home of Mrs. M. F. Turner, where he remained until his death, which occurred August 4, 1901, and his last resting place is in Albany cemetery beside his last wife, who died January 7, 1900. He was married four times, his first wife having died September 12, 1854, in their home near Brownsville. They were the parents of ten children, of whom the ninth in order of birth was Mahala F., born in Putnam county, Mo., July 14, 1846.

The early education of Mahala F. Cochran was received in the common schools at Brownsville, beyond which she has no recollection, as she was but one year old when the journey was made to their new home. When only seventeen years old she became the wife of Francis M. Rice, who had crossed the plains in 1852 and located three miles west of Brownsville. After her marriage her home was eight miles southeast of Harrisburg for a period of three years, after which, in 1866, they moved to a farm adjoining that on which she now lives, where her husband's death occurred in 1880. In this same location Mrs. Rice remained until her second marriage, which occurred October 12, 1887, uniting her with Thomas Turner. Mr. Turner was born in Indiana, January 16, 1835, and when he was seventeen years old crossed the plains with his father, the latter of whom took up the donation claim before mentioned in 1852. This Thomas Turner bought of his father and made it the home for his wife and son George, at the time of his death owning three hundred and sixty acres. He died February 7, 1900, at the home place. Mr. Turner's life had been one of active interests, eight years of which, between 1854 and 1862, he passed in the gold mines of southern Oregon, and as a Democrat in politics he had always taken an active interest in every movement calculated to advance the tide of civilization and improve the conditions of his own community. He served variously as road supervisor and school director. He was a member of the Christian Church at Harrisburg, where his wife now holds membership.

Of the seven children born to Mrs. Turner, six by the first union and one by the last, Farmer J. is located on the adjoining farm; Rettie is deceased; Archer is at Ione, Morrow county, Ore.; William is at Northport, Wash.; Mahala is the wife of T. J. Rogers, of Harrisburg; Frances M. is the wife of C. D. Bucknum, of Junction City; and George H., the son by the last marriage, is still at home with his mother.

CASPER ZIEROLF. The name of Zierolf is a well known one in Oregon, its two representatives being men of the highest moral character, supplemented by good business ability and pronounced capacity for industry. Peter Zierolf, a resident of Corvallis, is the youngest, and Casper, of whom this sketch makes mention, is the oldest of the six children in his father's family. His birth occurred in Boston, Mass., December 8, 1840, his parents having settled there after coming from their native land of Bavaria, Germany. The family later removed to Medina county, Ohio, and from there to Henry county, where the father lived to be sixty-five and the mother sixty-three years of age. Both are buried in a little Ohio churchyard, where they were laid to rest by their well loved children, who honored them for the practical and conscientious training which they had given them. The father was a rope-maker by trade, but, though he followed that in Bavaria, he devoted his energies entirely to farming in his adopted country. Besides Peter and Casper, already mentioned, are Mary, who is the wife of John Whitaker of this vicinity, and William, who is living in Ohio.

In his youth Casper Zierolf had ambitions not entirely centered in farming, for while still quite young he served an apprenticeship to a brewer, and followed that business for about four years. The breaking out of the Civil war offered an opportunity for action which was thoroughly appreciated in a hitherto uneventful existence, and April 13, 1861, he enlisted in Company D, Fourteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, as a private, and was mustered in at Defiance, Ohio. The regiment was first sent to Virginia, and in their order took part in the battles of Philippi, Laurel Hill, Cheat Mountain and Carrick's Ford, in which last engagement Mr. Zierolf was wounded and forthwith returned to his home, his term of service having expired. Not satisfied with his comparatively short service he re-enlisted in Company E, One Hundred and Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and after being mustered in at Toledo was sent to Harper's Ferry to join the Ninth Army Corps. After the memorable battle at the Ferry he was transferred to the Twenty-third Army Corps of the Western Army, sent to Louisville, Ky., Bowling Green and Murfreesboro, and later to Frankfort, Ky. From east Tennessee he went to join Sherman in his march to the sea, and at Atlanta Mr. Zierolf was wounded and sent to the hospital. Later he was sent to Camp Dennison and mustered out, immediately returning to his home in Ohio, where he rested, and then continued his association with the brewery.

In 1869 Mr. Zierolf married Mary Hauck, who was born in Ohio, and in the fall of 1870 the young people came to Oregon and settled near their present home. In 1871 he bought his present farm of two hundred and sixty acres, twelve and a half miles south of Corvallis on the old Territorial road. He has made all of the improvements which go to make it a valuable and productive property, including a fine rural house, large and commodious barn, and the latest in agricultural implements. To his original purchase he has added and now has two hundred and ninety-six acres, one hundred and seventy-five of which are under cultivation, and devoted to general farming and stock-raising. By no means narrow in his views or circumscribed in his interests, Mr. Zierolf takes a keen interest in the political and other developments in his neighborhood, and as a staunch Republican has materially influenced party undertakings. He has served as road supervisor, school clerk and is at present director, and in these capacities has invariably worked for the best good of the community. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Zierolf, the order of their birth being as follows: Albert, living in this vicinity; Eva, the wife of C. Dennis, of Monroe, this county; Lorenzo, conducting general farming near Bruce; Cora, living at home; Irena, making her home in Pendleton; Judd and Jay, twins, living at home; Ada, the wife of J. Hurlburt, of the vicinity of Corvallis; Florence, living at home; Isaac, and Ida.

The wife of Mr. Zierolf died in Portland on April 19, 1903, after a short sickness. She was a devoted wife and a kind and loving mother. She was a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church and is buried in the cemetery at Monroe, Benton county. She was fifty-nine years of age at the time of death.

ABRAHAM B. B. LEWIS. In the days of his buoyant youth, and when teaching school or farming, or risking his life on the battlefields of the Mexican or Civil wars, Abraham B. B. Lewis was as fine a specimen of physical manhood as one could find in the length and breadth of this great country of ours. Six feet two inches in height, broad chested, perfectly proportioned, and erect as an arrow, he was the cynosure of all eyes wherever he went, and the admiration of all who were permitted to note the harmonious blending of his material and mental endowments. At present Mr. Lewis is a very old man, four score and two years, and paralysis has caused his shoulders to stoop, and his hardihood to vanish, but his mind is clear and rich in memory, and he is still a comfort to his many friends in Philomath.

For centuries the Lewis ancestors pursued their various occupations in the snug little country of Wales, the first to think seriously of departing from accustomed haunts being the paternal grandfather, John, who came to America at the age of fourteen. He settled presumably in the state of Kentucky, where he farmed for the rest of his life, and from where he enlisted in the Colonial army during the Revolutionary war. In Kentucky was born his son, Thomas S., the father of Abraham B. B., and who in 1819 removed to near Madison, Ind., later taking up his residence on a farm near Indianapolis, Ind., where Abraham B. B. was born June 3, 1821. Thomas S. Lewis removed to Schuyler county, Mo., and in 1855 to near Humboldt, Kan., where he died in 1858. He was a successful farmer, and to an otherwise creditable life added valuable service as a non-commissioned officer during the war of 1812. Through his marriage with Margaret Ellen Bayle, a native of Scotland, and who died near Indianapolis, eight children were born, five sons and three daughters, Abraham being the second oldest.

Educated in the common schools and at Franklin College, Indiana, Abraham Lewis began teaching school in the Hoosier state in 1844, and in 1854 shifted his educational field to Higginsville, Ill. In 1874 he removed to St. Clair, Mo., and after teaching a term engaged in general farming and stock-raising for about twelve years. Coming to Oregon in 1887, he took up a homestead near Vernonia, Columbia county, and successfully improved his one hundred and twenty acres, remaining thereon until retiring from active life in Philomath in 1895. Interspersed principally with his teaching has been the military service of Mr. Lewis, which began in May, 1846, when he enlisted as a private in Company H, First Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and went to the front in Mexico, remaining away from home until the following January. He then re-enlisted in Company D, Fourth Indiana Volunteer Infantry as first lieutenant, and served until his discharge in July, 1848. During the service he participated in the battle of Huamantla, Mexico, a town located two days' march from Pueblo, and where the Mexicans were defeated by the Americans October 9, 1847. He also took part in innumerable skirmishes of a more or less serious nature, during the first part of his service being in the Taylor line, and during the latter part in the Scott line. During the Civil war Mr. Lewis enlisted July 3, 1861, in Company I, Thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry as captain, and at St. Louis was under General Fremont, and later under General Buell. He took part in many minor battles and skirmishes, and in 1862 found himself in Louisville, Ky. Here he was overtaken by a severe attack of rheumatism, in consequence of which his service was curtailed, and his discharge took place in Louisville in 1863.

Near Williamsport, Warren county, Ind., Mr. Lewis was united in marriage with Artemisa Harris, a native of Marion county, Ind., and daughter of Benjamin Harris, who came from Kentucky to Indiana, locating in Marion county, and afterward removing to Boone and Warren counties. Mr. Harris was a Baptist preacher and a farmer, and died in Park county, Ind. Of the ten children born to Mr. and Mrs. Lewis two are deceased. The oldest son, Willis Oscar, is living in Missouri; William Wallace is a resident of Oregon; Milton Douglas; Benton Edgar; Minnie Agnes is the wife of J. K. Atkison, of Gaston, Ore.; Effie Estella is now Mrs. William H. Dark, of Portland, Ore.; Orphia Nina is the wife of Robert A. Clark, of Philomath; and Louise E. is the wife of S. O. Watkins, the latter a professor in the Philomath College. In politics thoroughly independent, Mr. Lewis has served as justice of the peace in Missouri and Oregon for about eleven years, and he was a school director in Columbia county, Ore. He is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and during his life has contributed unstintingly toward its maintenance. A man of fine principle, great capacity for industry, and unflagging zeal in whatever he undertook to do, he furnishes a worthy example of the transported easterner who soon becomes at home and at ease in his new and more purposeful surroundings.

LEWIS ABRAMS. Among the men first connected with the business enterprises of Lincoln, Polk county, Ore., is Lewis Abrams, the pioneer merchant and warehouseman of this city. He is not a native of the west, having been born in Monmouth county, N. J., February 29, 1824, the son of Stephen Abrams, also a native of that locality, and died in Scott county, Ill., in 1862, at the age of sixty-two years. The family of this name was first located on American soil in the state of New Jersey, the grandfather having also been born there, of English parents, and on attaining manhood proving his loyalty to his country by serving as a colonel in the Revolutionary war, under Washington. The grandmother was of German parentage, giving to her descendants the sturdy qualities which characterize the people of that country. In 1833 the father brought his family to Morgan county, Ill., though afterward, through a division of the counties, he found himself located in Scott county, and there he engaged in farming and milling, meeting with excellent success. Religiously he was a Methodist. His first wife was Letitia Conover, a native of the same state; she died in Illinois in 1835, having become the mother of six children, of whom Lewis Abrams is the only one living. Mr. Abrams afterward married Anne Taylor, and three children were born of this marriage.

Lewis Abrams was nine years of age when the family fortunes were changed to Illinois, and he was there educated in the primitive log school houses of Scott county. When sixteen years of age his education was considered finished and he started out into the world to make his own way, as was the custom in those early days, and he secured employment on the Illinois river. Meeting with success he invested his earnings in a boat, running it from St. Louis up the river, and continuing thus employed for about four years. In 1849 he gave up these interests to make the journey to the gold fields, crossing the plains in an ox train under the command of Captain Pope, of Booneville, Mo. Beyond minor incidents the trip was uneventful, and on arriving at his destination he went at once to the mines at the American river, and though not finding a fortune in the mining venture he left the mines in 1861 with considerable money. Still interested in the precarious life of a miner he started with a pack train for the Fraser river, but stopped at Colville, Stevens county, Wash., where he engaged in a general merchandise business, packing his supplies from Portland. Meeting with considerable success he remained there until the spring of 1868, when he sold out and came to Polk county, Ore., locating at Lincoln in the spring of 1869, having previously lost about $30,000 in the mines of British Columbia. He at first entered into partnership with J. D. Walling, but the death of the latter occurring soon afterward he became sole proprietor of the mercantile business, remaining in the same since, with entire success. In addition to his mercantile business he has been engaged for many years in the buying, storing and shipping of grain. His store and warehouse are situated on the banks of the Willamette river, affording convenient transportation to Portland. He has handled as much as one hundred thousand bushels of grain per annum, and is still conducting a large and lucrative business. He is the owner of a fine residence in Lincoln, which he built in 1869.

Mr. Abrams was married in 1864, in Scott county, Ill., to Mary Shea, a native of that state, who died in Lincoln in 1869. Five years later he married Phosia Witten, a native of Portland, Ore., the daughter of Joshua Witten, a native of Tennessee, and a pioneer of 1852. By his first marriage Mr. Abrams has one daughter, Lois, now Mrs. L. Rea Green, a music teacher in Philomath, Benton county, Ore., and three children by his later marriage, Letitia E., a teacher of elocution at Philomath College, Benton county; W. Carleton, a reporter on the Statesman, of Salem, and who served in the Philippine Islands with the Second Oregon Regiment as sergeant in Company K; and Chester W., now in his second year in Corvallis College. Politically Mr. Abrams is a Republican and has held several offices through this influence, among them being that of postmaster, to which he was appointed in 1870, and several terms thereafter; road supervisor and many school offices. Religiously both himself and wife are members of Lincoln Methodist Episcopal Church, which they assisted materially in building and in many other ways since its organization. Mr. Abrams is a steward and trustee, filling the offices in a manner which has won and retained the confidence of the citizens of the community. Throughout his entire business career, he has been known as a man of honor and integrity, whose name is above reproach.

VICTOR P. MOSES. Benton county's leading citizens find a worthy representative in Victor P. Moses. The qualities essential to honorable and strong manhood are his—diligence, intelligence, reliability—and he has for a number of years been regarded as one of the most popular and prominent citizens of this portion of the state. He is a leader in musical circles and in public office his course has awakened the commendation and good will of even those opposed to him politically.

Mr. Moses is a native of Quitman, Ark., and has back of him an ancestry honorable and distinguished. His father, the Rev. P. A. Moses, has in his possession the ancestral history of the family back to the time when representatives of the name left their homes in Amsterdam, Holland, and crossed the Atlantic to the new world, settling in Pennsylvania, at an early epoch in the seventeenth century. Prior to the Revolutionary war the family was founded in Virginia and when the colonies became involved in war with England the family was represented in the Continental army by loyal patriots. Samuel Moses, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Virginia and there engaged in surveying. His son, Rev. P. A. Moses, was also a native of the Old Dominion and was graduated in Randolph-Macon College, of Lynchburg, Virginia, with second honors of the class of 1855. He became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and removed to Arkansas, where he became prominent as a divine and educator. He served for a time as president of Quitman College and during the Civil war he for three years filled the position of chaplain, with the rank of major, in the Thirty-fourth Arkansas Regiment Confederate Volunteers. In 1875 he came to Oregon, settling in Linn county, and for one term served as county superintendent of schools there. He was also principal of the schools of Albany and principal of the Lebanon Academy for several years, and throughout this time he also continued his labors in the Methodist ministry. He is now living a retired life in Corvallis, and well does he deserve the rest which has been vouchsafed to him, as his has been a most useful life, his labors proving of marked benefit and helpfulness to his fellowmen. He married Miss Lucy Howell, who was born in Arkansas of Scotch descent and who has been to him for many years a faithful companion and helpmate on life's journey. They have six children: R. J., a merchant of Philomath, Ore.; A. W., who is connected with the Indian service department at Chilocco, Okla.; S. H., who is also engaged in merchandising in Philomath; Mrs. Susie Jenks, of Tangent, Ore.; Josie, now Mrs. S. E. Trask of Corvallis; and Victor P.

The last named was born September 20, 1875, in Quitman, Ark., and the following year the family joined the father in this place, Rev. Moses being at that time principal of the Brownsville school. The son pursued his education in Albany, completed the high school course in 1892 and in the fall of the same year he entered Albany College, where he remained until the spring of 1893, after which he engaged in teaching in Douglas county. In the fall of the latter year he came to Corvallis and matriculated in the Oregon Agricultural College, where he continued the work until he had reached the senior year. He was leader of the band while in Albany College, and was also leader and instructor of the band of the Oregon Agricultural College and under his guidance it attained a high degree of proficiency and became one of the attractive features of the school.

In 1896 Mr. Moses accepted the position of deputy county clerk under Virgil E. Watters and acted in that capacity for nearly six years, when, without his solicitation he was nominated by the Democratic party, in 1902, for the position of county clerk and was elected by a majority of twenty-three. He took the oath of office on July 7, of the same year, to serve for two years, and his previous experience in the position of deputy having made him familiar with the duties of the office, he is now proving a most capable official. He is methodical, accurate and reliable in the discharge of the duties which devolve upon him and his course is winning for him unqualified commendation. He is also clerk of the county commissioners and probate courts.

Fraternally Mr. Moses is connected with the Woodmen of the World, is consul commander and served for five years as clerk. He is also a member of the Uniformed Rank of the same order and is past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias Lodge at Corvallis and chaplain of the Knights of the Maccabees. While interested in political and social work, he never neglects the higher, holier duties of life, being a faithful and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He is serving as a member of its board of trustees and since he attained the age of twenty years has been superintendent of the Sunday School, putting forth strenuous effort for the promotion of the cause. He is a charter member of the Jeffersonian Society of the Oregon Agricultural College and was at one time its president. In musical circles Mr. Moses is very prominent and has done much to promote the musical culture of the city in which he makes his home. He possesses a fine tenor voice, has a broad knowledge of the art and has done much to cultivate a taste for both vocal and instrumental music in his city. He has been a teacher of both and is also active in the musical development of the college and vicinity, taking an important part in the musical festivals of the college and the Willamette Valley Choral Association. Other interests of Corvallis also claim his time and attention. He belongs to Hose Company No. 2, of the Corvallis Fire Department, of which he has been captain and for two terms he was its president. His is a finely balanced mind and a well rounded character, enabling him to view the various departments of activity which constitute life in their true portions and to give due attention to each. His splendid qualities, his ready smile, his kindly nature and his unfailing courtesy render him very popular and have gained for him a host of warm and sincere friends.

CHARLES BRUCE MONTAGUE. With a wide knowledge of the advantageous locations of various parts of the world, Charles Bruce Montague selected Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., as a place of residence. There he has become an important factor in the business and political affairs of the community. Previous to his retirement from the active cares of life, in 1892, he had been engaged in the mercantile business, for twenty-five years having successfully conducted a store. He has held various political offices, his broad-minded, earnest thought and effort being calculated to elevate the character of both state and municipal government.

Mr. Montague is the representative of an old Scottish family, his ancestors having figured in various political warlike movements associated with the fortunes of England. His grandfather, Andrew Montague, a native of Scotland, and the son of another Andrew, whose birth and death occurred in that country, held the rank of major at the battle of Waterloo. He died in Scotland, when fifty years old. The father of

Mr. Montague, Thomas, was born in Scotland and came to the United States about 1847, and as a contractor he was employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. After spending four years in different sections of the Union, and seeing the greater part of the western country, he returned to Scotland in 1853. His wife, Katherine De Courcey, likewise a native of Scotland, where she died, was the mother of four sons and three daughters, of whom Charles Bruce was the fourth. He was born in Argyll, Scotland, January 4, 1833. He came with his parents to America in 1847, when he was sixteen years old. His education was obtained in private schools in his native land. Having an uncle, John De Courcey by name, located in San Francisco, Cal. Mr. Montague passed a part of the year 1852 with him, working in his uncle's mercantile establishment. Returning to Scotland, he enlisted in 1854 for service in the Crimean war, and served until the fall of 1856, with the commission of lieutenant. After the close of his service he returned to London, England, from which city he made trips to various parts of Europe, journeying through Ireland, Scotland, France, Egypt, and Greece, spending some time in Athens. In 1858 Mr. Montague returned to the United States, and after a short time spent in San Francisco he came to Oregon. Soon after he started for the mines of the Fraser river, but changed his mind when he reached Salem, and began teaching school in the Waldo Hills. Three years later he joined the First Oregon Cavalry, became first sergeant in Company B, and freely gave his services to his adopted country in her time of need. He remained in the service from 1861 to 1864, in the last-named year being mustered out at Vancouver, Wash. In the same year he became chief clerk, under Captain Hopkins, of the United States quartermaster depot, stationed at Vancouver. In 1866 he was ordered to San Francisco. The next year found him located in Sitka, Alaska, by order of the government. Three years later he resigned his office as chief clerk and, coming to Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., he was there engaged in the mercantile business for twenty-five years.

Mr. Montague was married in Marion county, Ore., in 1860 to Martha Peebler, a native of Iowa, who died in Lebanon. She was the daughter of David Peebler, a pioneer of 1852, who died in Lebanon at the age of ninety-six years. The six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Montague, three sons and three daughters, are named in order of birth as follows: Elmer E., of Albany, Ore.; Clara N.; Mary, the wife of G. W. Giboney, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Spokane, Wash.; Charles D., a member of the board of examiners in the United States custom service in Portland, Ore.;

Ida M., wife of Dr. J. S. Courtney, of Dayton, Ore.; and Robert B., who is engaged in the real estate business in Albany. In 1879 he was united in marriage with Mrs. Priscilla C. Redpath of Albany, Ore. She is a native of Saline county, Mo., the daughter of Dr. Nathaniel Ostrander, deceased. He was a native of the Hudson valley in New York state, removed to Missouri in young manhood, and in 1852 came to the Pacific coast, locating on the Cowlitz river. For about forty years he was continually engaged in the practice of medicine, being located for over a quarter of a century in Olympia, Wash., where his death occurred in 1901. Mrs. Montague's uncle, J. L. Yantis, D. D., a native of Kentucky, became a pioneer minister of the Presbyterian Church in Oregon, and founded the First Presbyterian Church of Portland in 1852. In 1853 he removed to Linn county and took up a donation claim located near the site of the town of Shedd. The latter years of his life were spent in Missouri.

In addition to the property upon which Mr. Montague makes his home, a large and handsome dwelling, which he built in 1890, he owns other residence and business property in Lebanon and also farming land near Vancouver, Wash. In his political associations a Democrat, in 1891 he ably represented his party in the state legislature, as a member of the house of representatives, and there exercised no little influence through his associations upon various important committees. He has been active in municipal affairs, having served as mayor of the city for many terms, and also as a member of the council. In 1896 he became county clerk for Linn county, a position he filled for two years. Fraternally Mr. Montague is a Mason. He belongs to the Presbyterian Church.

ABNER DAVIS GARDNER. A man whose business career has contributed materially to the prestige of Stayton, Marion county, is A. D. Gardner, the character of whose work has extended beyond the narrow confines of that little city, reaching two-thirds of the way to the Atlantic coast, the section of country which has found it hard to believe all that is said of the great resources of this part of the northwest. The flour produced by the mills of the Gardner Brothers has been awarded two prizes for its excellence, the first being at the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, in 1893, and the second at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha, in 1898; and the awards are emphatically indorsed by thousands of consumers throughout the west.

The father of the subject of this sketch, A. D. Gardner, Sr., was born in Ohio in 1819; subsequently removed to Osage county, Mo., and in that state was united in marriage with Sarah P. Johnson, in 1842. Immediately thereafter he removed to a location near Des Moines, Iowa, following the occupations of farming and preaching, the latter in the local way so popular in the earlier days. Not realizing a sufficient remuneration from his combined efforts, he decided to emigrate to a more western state, following up his intention in the spring of 1852 by heading a party bound for Oregon. Mules and ox teams were employed in the expedition, and Mr. Gardner was chosen to command the train. After a wearisome trip of several months the caravan arrived in Oregon. Mr. Gardner and his family spent their first winter here near Salem, where he made as careful an investigation of the resources of various sections of the Willamette valley as was possible under the circumstances. As the result of his inquiries he decided to locate in Linn county, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres the following spring. The house erected on the claim, though constructed of roughly hewn logs, was regarded as a very fine one in those days, since it possessed two rooms, where most settlers were content, or appeared to be, with but one room. Most of his farm was bottom lands at Fox Valley, on the Santiam river, and was provided with excellent natural advantages for general farming and stock-raising. The remaining years of his life were passed upon this estate, with the exception of a few years, during which he conducted a hotel at Scio, to which town he removed for better school advantages. He died in 1885, at the age of sixty-six years.

Mr. Gardner was the father of eight children, named in the order of their birth as follows: Mary L., widow of Dr. L. S. Skiff, of Salem, Ore.; Isaac W., living on the homestead; Sarah, wife of James Berry, residing near Mill City, Ore.; Electa J., wife of J. I. Crabtree, of Stayton, Ore.; Abner D., of this review; Elizabeth E., deceased; Marilla, wife of James Gardner, of Baker City, Ore., and Etta, wife of Charles Mills, who resides in Fox Valley.

Abner D. Gardner was born in Fox Valley, Linn county, Ore., March 27, 1855. He was reared on the homestead, receiving every advantage in the educational line which the public schools of Scio afforded, in addition to private schools. When twenty-one years of age, he purchased a drug store at Stayton, in partnership with Dr. McCauley, and six months later bought the interest of his partner. It is not necessary to enlarge upon his success in this undertaking, for in a country where opportunities are so plentiful that they tempt men to try another than their own established business, success is reasonably sure to follow.

In 1891 Mr. Gardner purchased the Stayton flouring mills, which are now operated under the firm name of Gardner Brothers. Upon his purchase of this industry he reconstructed the mill, putting in the most improved modern machinery, including that necessary for the roller process. The capacity of the mill is about eighty barrels per day. The location is very advantageous, being upon the Santiam river, which furnishes the motive power. In 1899 he disposed of his drug store in order that he might give his undivided attention to his milling interests, which have increased, year by year, as the territory he supplies becomes more thickly populated.

In 1878, Mr. Gardner was united in marriage with Minnie Schneider, a native of Iowa, and a daughter of Albert and Mary (Mohr) Schneider, who were born in Switzerland and Germany, respectively. Mr. Schneider was one of the youngest soldiers in the Mexican war. Four children have blessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Gardner: Ethel E. and Veva A., graduates of Willamette University, and Norma and Abner Davis, Jr. Mr. Gardner has an interesting family, and is giving to his children every possible educational advantage, realizing that a good mental equipment will have a greater bearing upon their future lives than a liberal heritage of worldly goods. In 1901, Mr. Gardner embarked in the dairy business, and has eight hundred acres devoted to this industry.

That Mr. Gardner's good citizenship has not been unappreciated is evidenced by the fact that in 1876 he was appointed postmaster of Stayton, and for thirteen successive years served in this office, under both Democratic and Republican administrations. As a boy he received training that proved helpful to him in this work, his father having been postmaster at Fox Valley for several years. Though a staunch Democrat in his political convictions, he has never exhibited a narrow or offensive partisan spirit, but has shown himself to be, first of all, a splendid type of the American citizen. He has been a member of the town council for two terms, and has served for some time on the school board. Fraternally he is identified with the Masons, being a member of Santiam Lodge No. 25, A. F. & A. M., in which he has been secretary for several years, as well as filling other positions; is also identified with Aumsville Lodge, A. O. U. W.; Degree of Honor No. 147, Stayton Camp No. 51, Woodman of the World, and is a charter member of Stayton Circle No. 142. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he has officiated as class leader, and is now trustee and steward.

Mr. Gardner is in the highest sense a public-spirited citizen. He contributes freely of his time and his means toward the success of all movements which have for an end the improvement of the moral, educational, social or industrial status of the community, and is recognized as a man of probity and a high sense of personal honor. It is to such men as he that the north-west owes much for its advancement, and the state of Oregon for the position which it has attained among the sisterhood of states in the American commonwealth. Those responsible for the compilation of this volume take pleasure in honoring the request of those who know Mr. Gardner best, that he be accorded a place of more than passing distinction in the memoirs of the men who have taken the lead in the march of progress in the Willamette valley.

PHILIP PETER GOULEY. Born in Monroe, Mich., September 21, 1845, Philip P. Gouley carries with him the characteristics which are the native gifts of the sons of the middle west, as well as those which are his by inheritance through his Canadian ancestry. His father, S. A. Gouley, was born in Canada, March 2, 1817, being reared to manhood in this country. Having learned the trades of carpenter and wagon-maker, he left his native country and, coming to the United States, settled in Monroe, Mich., where he remained until 1852, engaged in the prosecution of his combined business interests. In his Michigan residence he met and married Marcelles Duval, a native of that state, being born near Monroe, in 1821, and in that city the young people first made their home. In 1852 Mr. Gouley took his first western trip, coming by horse teams across the plains to California, leaving his family in the home in Michigan to await his return. But briefly interested in the mining prospects of California, he came to Oregon during the same winter, settling in Marion county, near Woodburn, where he remained until 1856, at that time returning to Michigan by water, when he was again united with his wife and children. In 1859 he brought his family across the plains in the same manner in which he had first made the trip. Coming directly to his property near Woodburn, which he had purchased, they continued to make it their home until 1886, then removing to Woodburn for a short time. In 1896 they came to their present home in Gervais, where Mr. Gouley now leads a retired life, himself and wife being very popular in the society of that town. Of the five children born to them Philip P. Gouley, of this review, is the eldest; Fred is located in Salem; Ellen is the wife of Dennis Manning, living east of Parkersville; Minnie is the wife of Michael Murphy of Gervais; and Henry makes his home in Woodburn.

The education of P. P. Gouley was received in the common schools of both Michigan and Oregon, being fourteen years old at the time of his father's removal to the latter state. He continued to make his home with his parents until his marriage, in 1872, with Miss Lydia Lerwill, who was born April 3, 1856, and reared on French Prairie, Marion county, Ore. Her parents were William and Sarah (Stanton) Lerwill, who crossed the plains in 1852 and settled at Parkersville. Mr. Lerwill was a miller, the first mill of Salem being under his management. Three children were born to them, as follows: Lydia, Mrs. Gouley; Emily, wife of D. W. Cross of Los Angeles, Cal.; and Walter, in Pardee, Cal. Neither of the parents are now living, the mother having died at the age of thirty-three years, and the father was killed at the age of sixty-six by the running away of the team which he was driving. Mr. Gouley and his wife commenced their married life on a part of her father's old donation claim, located nine miles north of Salem, on the Oregon City and Salem road. They have two hundred and twenty-seven acres of land, the majority of it being under cultivation, and here Mr. Gouley is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, also having a hop yard of forty-five acres, the latter pursuit yielding him a good income. In 1902 he raised forty-seven thousand pounds, and the year before over fifty thousand pounds of hops, this amount representing quite a sum of money. All the improvements upon the farm are the work of Mr. Gouley, the substantial dwelling house and good out buildings giving indisputable evidence of his success in his chosen work.

To Mr. and Mrs. Gouley two children were born. Homer, born December 21, 1874, is married and has one son, Lawrence Homer, farming near Brooks; Romeo, born August 9, 1885, is at home. Both of the sons were given business educations.

Personally Mr. Gouley is a man who has made himself useful in the community in which he lives, his attitude in regard to national and local affairs being always for the broadening influences likely to carry the country or community to a higher plane of morality. He has never swerved in his allegiance to the Republican party, his maturer mind following the principles endorsed by his youth, and in the service of this party he has acted as school director for several years. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, being a charter member of Fraternity Lodge No. 9, but later he was transferred to Brooks Lodge No. 137.

CHARLES MILLER. The son of a pioneer, Charles Miller has not depended alone on the strength of his father's worth and ability, but has built up for himself a position of prominence in the affairs of his adopted county and state, as well as a place of financial importance among the enterprising men of the community. Principally through his own efforts Mr. Miller has acquired the title to a farm of five hundred acres of rich and productive land, his first purchase being made with the fruits of a trip to the gold mines of California in 1849. Since that time he has made his home upon this property, with the exception of the years 1861-2, when he again visited the southern state. Every intelligent effort has been put forth in the making of a model farm and an ideal residence of the spot selected by his father on his first settlement in the west.

Back beyond the events of the last fifty years, when men were following the march of progress toward the setting sun, Isaac Miller, the father of Charles, sold his farm in Miami county, Ind., to which he had removed four years previously, from Montgomery county. The sale was made with the full intention of emigrating to the west, but he met with such opposition from his mother that, out of consideration for her affections, he changed his plans and remained in the state, purchasing a farm in Montgomery county, where he lived until her death two years later. In the fall of 1847 Isaac Miller and his brother, Christian, went to Missouri, where they passed the winter, outfitting in the spring for the journey across the plains. Mr. Miller had three wagons with five yoke of oxen to each wagon, and his brother had two. The train of which they composed a part consisted of thirty wagons, over which Mr. Miller was appointed captain, and the journey from the Missouri river occupied four months and ten days. They were provisionally spared the depredations of the savages, the only encounter being in Nebraska with the Pawnee Indians.

Upon arriving in Oregon Mr. Miller took up a donation claim, consisting of six hundred and forty acres located in Marion county, and after one year's residence he sold the property to his two sons, Charles, of this review, and his brother, Samuel. He then removed to Clackamas county, and later to Linn county, in the latter locating near Albany, and later buying land near Millers. He continued accumulating property embodied in the broad lands of the northwest until he owned twelve hundred acres, when he sold out and removed to Ashland. There his death occurred in 1878, at the age of seventy-two years, he having been born February 8, 1806. In the early history of the country no one man contributed more toward the growth of the state than Isaac Miller. He was a member of the territorial legislature, and during the Indian war he held a commission as major by appointment of the governor of the state. He also served in the Rogue River war, 1855-6, during which service he was wounded. He also served during the troubles of that period on the Snake river. Mr. Miller was recognized as a power in his own neighborhood, helping to lay out roads, establish schools and many other important movements calculated to establish a successful government in the new land. He was the father of nine children, five sons and four daughters, his wife, who was born in Tennessee, in 1805, dying on the same day that marked his death. They were buried in the same grave at Ashland. They were both members of the Christian Church.

Charles Miller was one of the party who crossed the plains, having been born near Crawfordville, Montgomery county, Ind., February 23, 1830. His first move was made when he was ten years old, his parents then settling in Miami county, where they lived four years. His fortunes continued to lie parallel with those of his father's family until he was nineteen years old, when he went with his brother Samuel to the territory of California. The trip was made on horseback, with packs containing their outfit and supplies, and on their arrival they went to work on the American river. The work of a summer found them satisfied, and they returned to Oregon with $1,500 each, and at once invested the money in the farm which their father was ready to sell. Trained as were the sons of other pioneers, Mr. Miller was able to turn his hand to almost anything, and for some time he engaged in carpentering. As before mentioned, Mr. Miller now owns five hundred acres, which is finely improved, and upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising. He has a large herd of full-blooded Jersey cattle, and as one industry of his own farm he has built a creamery, thus affording a livelihood for many laborers and a ready market for his milk.

In 1854 Mr. Miller was united in marriage with Miss Nancy Vaughn, one of the number of heroic women who faced the perils of the plains and the privations of the wilderness with the courage of the old-time pioneers. She was a native of West Virginia, and just previous to the western venture she made her home with her parents in Platte county, Mo., where her father died in 1842. The family joined the current of emigration in 1852, and coming through safely, they settled near Turner, Marion county, where Mrs. Vaughn lived with her son, William. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Miller, of whom Louisa is the eldest; Lydia is the wife of J. B. Hoyt, of Jefferson; Ada is now deceased; Charles is located on a part of the home place; Nancy J., now also deceased; Ida is the wife of Fred Looney, of this county; Emma makes her home with her parents, and the youngest child died in infancy.

As a member of the Democratic party Mr. Miller was elected to the state legislature in 1885, and in 1892 he ran for congress on the Populist ticket. He has served as justice of the peace for several years, and was chairman of the Populist State Central Committee during the campaign of 1894. Fraternally he has been a Mason since 1864, being a member of Jefferson Lodge No. 33, A. F. & A. M., and is a charter member of the Grange. Mr. Miller was one of the founders of Jefferson Institute, established half a century ago, and is the only survivor in the neighborhood who was actively identified with its upbuilding for many years. He served as president of the board of directors for several years, and was largely instrumental in the construction of the school building. His wife belongs to the Christian Church, which is situated two miles north of Jefferson.

A little incident in the life of Mr. Miller in the early days of the territory is worthy of mention, as showing the dangers and trials which are necessarily a part of the lives of those who lay the foundation of a great commonwealth. With several companions, among them being George W. Hunt, Lewis Streidt and Samuel Hart, the latter a mountaineer, Mr. Miller camped in 1851 on the Rogue river, and during the night the Indians stole nineteen of the twenty horses which they had. On discovery of the loss Mr. Miller with one of the others, started out on the departing trail in the hope of overtaking the Indians and securing the return of the animals. Though finally successful in the recovery of the horses they had much trouble and a long hunt, following the Indians seven days and nights on one trip and eight days on another before finding them, as, after going fifteen miles they had separated and driven the horses in different directions. In the meantime they had captured the two chiefs, putting their Indian families under guard, which operated in their favor and induced the return of the stolen property.

CLARENCE BUTT. As the standing of a community is best illustrated by the character and attainments of its legal exponents, Newberg is fortunate in being represented by Clarence Butt, a self-made man, and one of the most promising and brilliant of the younger generation of orators as well as lawyers. Born in Columbia county, Pa., May 27, 1871, Mr. Butt comes of reliable English ancestry, and from that source inherits not only professional, but business and social abilities. The family was first represented in America by the paternal great-grandfather, William, who came across the sea with his sons, Joseph and Zephaniah. Zephaniah became a college man and medical graduate, and after settling in Ocala, Fla., managed to amass quite a fortune, being worth at the time of his death, $150,000. His son, Joseph, the paternal grandfather, was born in 1812, and in his young manhood settled in the eastern part of Pennsylvania. For a time he ran on the canals of that section of the state, but in after years turned his attention to farming, an occupation engaged in almost up to the time of his death at the age of seventy-two years. Although but moderately successful financially, he yet wielded an important influence in his community, especially from a political standpoint. He was an almost rabid Republican, and did not hesitate to show his colors in the Fishing Creek Confederacy.

Zephaniah A. Butt, the father of Clarence, was born in Pennsylvania, May 18, 1849, and at the present time is one of the leading Republicans and citizens of his community. He lives on the home farm in Yamhill county, and conducts lumbering in connection with farming, and is fairly successful in both occupations. Although in a strong Democratic community he courageously waves the Republican banner whenever opportunity offers, and in this connection is one of the strongest supporters of the party in his county, and has many staunch friends among those who have known him for a lifetime. When comparatively young he married Clara Everhart, a native also of Pennsylvania, and daughter of Daniel Everhart, born in eastern Pennsylvania, and by occupation a lumberman and farmer. Mr. Everhart, who was a Democrat in politics, and fairly successful from a business standpoint, died in his native state at about the age of seventy years. Of the two sons and two daughters born to Zephaniah A. Butt and his wife, the popular lawyer of Newberg is the oldest; William lives at Benton, Pa.; Mary is an educator in Pennsylvania; and Anna lives at her home in the Quaker state.

After completing his education in Pennsylvania, Clarence Butt attended the Bloomsburg State Normal, and then entered the law department of the Northern Indiana Law School. At the expiration of two years he graduated from the latter institution with the degree of LL. D., and after being admitted to the Indiana bar removed to Hamilton, Mont., where a residence of three months convinced him of its undesirability as a field for practice. Fairview, Ore., was a future field for experiment, and in 1895 he came to Newberg, and has since engaged in a general practice of law. Since coming here Mr. Butt has entered enthusiastically into all Republican matters, and has made an honored place for himself among the higher ranks of politicians. Possessing a ready command of language, and concise knowledge of all facts in connection with his party, his services have been in great demand upon all important occasions. He was a delegate to the state congressional convention in 1896, and was chairman of the Republican county convention in 1898. The same year he was nominated and elected state representative, and re-elected again in 1900. During both terms he was on the railroad committee, and during the first term was on the committee to investigate state university affairs. During the second term also he was chairman of the banking and business committee, and a member of the special committee on the state land board. During his second term in the house Mr. Butt caused considerable excitement by his effort to reduce the railroad fare in the state from four to three cents. Although the only one of the committee in favor of it, he submitted three minority reports, and succeeded in getting the minority reports adopted by the balance of the house, an act which led eventually to the desired reduction by the railroads themselves.

In Fairview, Ore., Mr. Butt was united in marriage with Inez Barrett, who was born in Elmwood, Peoria county, Ill., and whose father, George Barrett, was a farmer and stock-raiser in Illinois, where his death occurred. Mrs. Butt received her education in her native state and at the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso, Ind., and after coming to Oregon a year before her husband, she engaged in educational work for a couple of years. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Butt, Ralph and Dale who are living at home with their parents. Mr. Butt is fraternally associated with the Blue Lodge of Masons, with the Eastern Star, and the Artisans. In the Methodist Church, of which he is treasurer and trustee, he is active in promoting its charities and general work, and contributes generously towards its financial necessities. Mr. Butt possesses a judicial mind and temperament, excellent business ability and judgment, and a capacity for hard work well developed. A minute comprehension of the theory and practice of the law, supplemented by those admirable characteristics, faithfulness and energy, assure him not only a continuation but an increase of his present professional prominence.

CAPT. JULIUS HOWD. A large portion of the six hundred acres of land purchased by Capt. Julius Howd in 1869 was covered with dense timber, and necessitated arduous labors before the clearing and cultivation of the same was completed. That three hundred acres are now available for general crops is in itself an index to the industry and enterprise of the successful owner. Many fine improvements increase the value of the property, the residence, barns, outhouses and implements being such as to facilitate an extensive and remunerative farming and stock-raising enterprise. Located in the Waldo Hills, about eight miles east and three miles south of Salem, the land is adapted to the culture of grain and general produce. Captain Howd has also made a specialty, for many years, of high-grade sheep, many of those sent out from his place being registered.

For his start in life Captain Howd was not indebted to any especial mark of good fortune, for his parents were not prepared to lend him any material assistance toward a successful career. He was born in Onondaga county, N. Y., December 6, 1829, the son of Isaac C. Howd. At the age of six years he was taken by his parents to the vicinity of Carthage, Ill., and was there reared on a farm, eventually succeeding to the management thereof. In 1852, when twenty-three years of age, he started across the plains with an ox-train. After six months of varied adventure he reached Silverton, Ore., where he spent the first winter splitting rails. Afterward he worked on a farm for several months. In 1855 he went to California with a herd of cattle, assisting the owner in getting them safely over the mountains. Upon returning to Silverton the same fall he volunteered for service in the Cayuse Indian war, under Captain Bennett. During the six months of his service he engaged in the campaign in the eastern part of the state, participating in the battle of the Yakima, and afterward taking part in the battle of Walla Walla, Wash.

Soon after the close of the war Captain Howd went to Salem, where he was employed in a livery barn for one year. He then returned to his old home in Illinois, by way of the Isthmus of Panama and the Mississippi river. A year later he came back to Oregon, and soon went to work upon a farm. Subsequently he rented a farm for four years. In the meantime he had saved some money through his frugality and thrift, and in time he purchased one hundred and thirty acres near the State Insane Asylum, nearly all of which was timbered. He cleared a considerable portion of this property and resided upon it for six years, for the first four years keeping bachelor quarters. November 7, 1865, he married Mary Baker, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of W. Harrison Baker. Of this union there have been born five children, the eldest of whom, Eva, is the wife of Henry King, residing in the vicinity of Shaw, Ore.; Elizabeth is the wife of Andrew Smith, who resides at Cottage Grove, Ore.; William H. operates the home farm; May is the wife of J. L. Patton of Cottage Grove, Ore.; and Maude is the wife of W. J. Haberly, who resides near Willard, Ore.

Two years after his marriage, in 1867, Captain Howd moved upon a farm of two hundred acres, now owned by Reuben Lee, where he resided for two years. This property he then traded for the farm which has since been his home.

Captain Howd became a charter member of the Salem Grange, and has since transferred his membership to the Grange at Macleay. In religion he is identified with the Christian Church. Politically, he affiliates with the Democratic party, but he has never aspired to or been willing to accept political office. Notwithstanding his own large family he has added to the responsibilities of his household by adopting a homeless boy named John Ulrich, who is still living with him, and who came to his home when eight years of age.

The benefactions of Captain Howd are always quietly and unostentatiously conducted, and rarely reach the ears of the public. The record of his life is free from blemish—that of an upright, honorable man. No man in the county is more fully entitled to a permanent place among the representative men of the Willamette valley than he, and the careers of few afford a greater inspiration to the youth of today.

WILLIAM L. CUMMINGS, formerly principal of the Oregon State Reform School for Boys, is eminently qualified for responsibilities of that character, his experience for many years as an educator having given him a thorough knowledge of human nature, and a patience and wisdom in dealing with children. During his residence in Oregon Mr. Cummings has touched upon various phases of endeavor in the northwest, has been successful as an agriculturist and horticulturist, and has served his community with distinction in the legislature.

A native of the vicinity of Racine, Walworth county, Wis., Mr. Cummings was born September 7, 1848, and when five years of age moved with his parents to Berlin, in the same state. His youth was a somewhat migratory one, for his father was a lumberman, and prosecuted his business in several lumbering localities in the state, finally locating on a farm in Clark county in 1862. The son was educated in the public schools and at Galesville University, and at the age of nineteen began a period of teaching in the graded schools of Trempealeau county covering sixteen years. In 1884 he was elected county superintendent of schools in Trempealeau county, and while serving thus for eight years, materially elevated the standard of education in the district over which he had control. In 1893 he removed to Oregon, purchased near Shaw five acres of land, and made thereon many fine improvements. He now owns forty-five acres. At first he set out five acres in Italian prunes, and at the present time he has nine acres under this favorite fruit, and five acres under apples, pears, and cherries.

Refreshed by a year of experience in the country, Mr. Cummings returned to his former occupation, and after teaching for a year at Turner, acted as assignee for a bankrupt store at Shaw for a year. In the meantime he had become active in politics, and in 1898 was elected to the legislature on the Republican ticket, serving in the special and regular sessions. In the spring of 1899 he was appointed principal of the Oregon State Reform School for Boys, a position maintained by him with great satisfaction to all concerned.

In 1872 Mr. Cummings was united in marriage with Adelaide Bunn, of which union there have been born the following children: Florence, a teacher; Carroll, for some time a teacher in the public schools of Oregon and Washington; Susie, the wife of Otis Bates; Sybil, a graduate of the State Agricultural College at Corvallis, class of 1903; Alson, attending the Salem Business College; Arthur and Laura. The Cummings family are members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Cummings retired from the principalship of the Reform School April 1, 1903, and since then has devoted his time to the culture of fruit.

MARY E. HUNT. A woman who, herself a success financially, gives generously of her abundance, contributes in countless ways to the happiness and well-being of those around her. Such an one is Mary E. Hunt, of Scio, known to all, and lovingly called "Aunt Mary." There is no more popular residence in the town than that owned and occupied by this earnest and kind-hearted business woman, who loans money, looks after her large property interests, and is a staunch supporter of the Missionary Baptist Church.

Before her marriage Mrs. Hunt was Mary E. Shelton, and she was born in Jackson county, Mo., April 2, 1837. Her father, Hayman Shelton, was born in the Old Dominion state, and there married Priscilla Fitzgerald, also a native of Virginia, who died at the home of her son in Linn county in 1876, at the age of seventy-seven years. After his marriage, Mr. Shelton removed to North Carolina, thence going to Missouri, locating on a farm in Jackson county. This he afterward sold, and bought a farm in Andrew county, near St. Joseph, which continued to be his home until crossing the plains in 1847. In the meantime twelve children had been born into the family, seven sons and five daughters, of whom four sons and four daughters are living. The children were all members of the little party which set out on its perilous journey, and, from May until October, endured the hardships of travel by day, and precarious camping at night. Mr. Shelton looked around him in Oregon for a desirable location, and finally selected a claim six miles east of Scio on Thomas creek, where he lived until his death, March 8, 1876, seven months before the death of his wife.

The children were reared to habits of thrift and industry, and each was obliged to perform his or her share towards the general support. Mary E. was no exception, and the discipline was beneficial, for she grew into a strong and self-reliant woman, learning her lessons of life from her immediate surroundings, rather than from the country school which she attended irregularly. After coming to Oregon she lived on the home farm, making herself useful in its management, and each year developing the lovable and generous traits of character which are the delight of her friends of today. In 1857 Enoch Hunt, who had been in California, and was on a visit to his brother in Oregon, became acquainted with Miss Shelton, admired her character and attainments, and finally persuaded her to share his life fortunes. They were married in the fall of 1864, and their united life proved a very happy one.

Enoch Hunt was born in North Carolina, July 25, 1825, his father, Nathan, being a native of the same state. The family moved to Missouri at a very early day, and at Lone Jack the father owned a farm, distillery and flouring mill, which he operated with considerable success. The remainder of his life was spent in Missouri, where he lived to an advanced age, honored and esteemed by all who knew him. Enoch came to California across the plains in 1852, by means of slow-moving oxen, the journey lasting about six months. He was fairly successful in the mines, and when he came to Oregon had no intention of remaining. A year after his marriage he took his wife to California, and in Napa county they lived on a beautiful ranch devoted to deciduous fruits and general farming, and where the rest of their married life was spent. Here Mr. Hunt died in 1887, leaving a very comfortable fortune to the wife who had been his companion and sympathizer. He was a quiet, unassuming man, and after he came to California thought it the garden spot of the world. He was a Democrat in politics, but chose rather the quiet of home life than the strife and uncertainty of political office-seeking.

After her husband's death Mrs. Hunt came to Scio, and she has since been the promoter of multitudinous good works, and many business interests. Her sympathetic ear is always attentive to the woes of others, and she invariably has good cheer and practical counsel with which to dispel discouragement and hopelessness. Truly "Aunt Mary" occupies an enviable place in the hearts of those who comprise the community of Scio.

COLLIN AUSTIN WALLACE. No state can boast of a more heroic band of pioneers than Oregon. There came to the northwest men who were not adventurers or fortune seekers, but were intent upon establishing homes for themselves and families and of founding a community of law-abiding citizens who wished to take advantage of the natural resources of this portion of the country. Mr. Wallace was a representative of this class, and in the years of his business career he has gained success. He is thoroughly familiar with the early history of the state, his memory forming a connecting link between the primitive past and the progressive present. He arrived in Oregon in 1852, coming to this state from the Mississippi valley. His birth occurred in Branch county, near Coldwater, Mich., January 17, 1834, his parents being Timothy and Roxy (Thurston) Wallace. The father was born in Connecticut and the grandfather, Payne Wallace, died in that state. The family is of Scotch descent and was established in New England in colonial days. Timothy Wallace removed from Connecticut to Branch county, Mich., where he improved a good farm upon which he spent the remainder of his life. His wife was a native of Sandusky, Ohio, and a daughter of Jason Thurston, who was born in Ohio and became a farmer of Burr Oak, Mich. Mrs. Wallace also passed away in the Wolverine state. By her marriage she became the mother of six children: Edward P., who came to Oregon in 1852 and now resides in Amity; Lewis K., who arrived in the same year and died in 1886; Collin A.; David, who came in 1861 and resides in Yamhill county; Roxelane, the wife of Dr. Woodard, of Olympia, Wash., a resident of the state since 1852; and William, who died at the age of four years.

Collin Austin Wallace was reared in the usual manner of farmer lads. His father died when he was but fourteen years of age and his mother the following year, and thus he was early thrown upon his own resources. In his youth he attended the subscription schools. After his parents' death he was employed in teaming at the time of the building of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad. In 1852, he and his two brothers, Edward P. and Lewis K., came to Oregon, starting from Branch county, Mich., on the 25th day of March with an ox-team and some cows. They traveled by the way of Chicago, crossing the Mississippi river at Galena and the Missouri at Council Bluffs and by the way of Fort Hall continued the journey arriving at The Dalles on the 17th of October. Collin A. Wallace continued on his way to Portland, where he remained for a short time, but the same fall took up his abode in Lafayette, Yamhill county, where he spent the winter. In June, 1853, he went to Olympia, Wash., where he remained for five years, acting as mail carrier and express messenger for Governor I. I. Stevens of Washington Territory. At various times there were outbreaks among the Indians and Mr. Wallace volunteered for three months' service in the Indian war, joining the First Washington Regiment under Captain Eaton. About twenty-one days later Governor Stevens detailed him to act as express messenger, and he carried the express from Olympia to Vancouver and Snake river points for a year. This was oftentimes a hazardous undertaking, but the duty was always faithfully performed. While in the military service he took part in the battle of Walla Walla valley, being with a company of volunteers who engaged the Indians there. In 1856 he secured the mail contract in Washington, but later sold out and turned his attention to farming.

In 1858 Mr. Wallace came again to the Willamette valley and through the succeeding winter conducted a butcher shop. In 1859 he resumed farming and in 1861 purchased a tract of land six miles southwest of McMinnville. He at once began the cultivation and improvement of this land, and in 1865 sold it and purchased a farm of two hundred and fifty acres two and a half miles from McMinnville, upon which he developed a splendid farm, pleasantly located on the Sheridan road southwest of the city. There he carried on agricultural pursuits with good success until 1878, when he removed to McMinnville and established a grocery store, but later retired from mercantile life and devoted his energies to the supervision of his farming property until April, 1903, when he moved to Salem. He sold his original farm and now owns the old fair grounds at McMinnville, comprising ninety acres, on which there is a fine track a mile in extent, and which is unsurpassed by any in the state. Here he has a nice park, and he also owns other lands in Yamhill county devoted to farming purposes. He has raised fine standard-bred horses, owning some very valuable stock, including Alta Dell, who at three years made a record of 2:16. In 1888 Mr. Wallace went east and brought out a carload of full-blooded Holstein cattle. These he purchased from Captain Wales, of Iowa, and they were among the first blooded cattle brought into the state. Mr. Wallace was one of the organizers of the Oregon Fire Relief Association of McMinnville, and served on its first board of trustees, filling the position for several years.

In North Yamhill in 1857 occurred the marriage of Mr. Wallace and Miss Eliza J. Shuck, who was born near Burlington, Iowa, a daughter of Hon. Andrew J. and Mary (Conlee) Shuck. Her father was born near Crawfordsville, Ind., June 19, 1815 and her grandfather, Jacob Shuck, was born in Pennsylvania, whence he removed to Indiana, locating upon a farm. Later he became a farmer of Iowa and in 1847 crossed the plains, spending his last days in Yamhill county near Dundee. He had served his country in the war of 1812 and was present at the battle of Tippecanoe. Andrew J. Shuck was reared in Indiana and afterward became a resident of Iowa. He there followed farming near Burlington, until 1847. In the meantime he had wedded Mary Conlee, who was born in Byron county, Ky., March 15, 1818, a daughter of Reuben Conlee, who was an agriculturist and a native of the Blue Grass state. He removed to Greene county, Ill., among its early settlers and served in the Black Hawk war. After his military service had ended he became a resident of Des Moines county, Iowa, settling near Burlington, where his death occurred. He was a leading and influential citizen of that state and was serving as a member of the Iowa legislature at the time of his death, which occurred while he was in Des Moines attending the sessions of the general assembly. Isaac Conlee, the grandfather of Mrs. Shuck, was a farmer in Kentucky and died there in the year 1847. Andrew J. Shuck with his wife and six children started on the long journey across the plains in a slow-moving ox-train, having been nearly seven months upon the way ere they reached the fertile valley of the Willamette. Mr. Shuck secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near North Yamhill, and there he developed his land, providing a good home for his family. At the time of the Indian war he made guns for the use of the volunteers. He was the first sheriff of Yamhill county and served in that position for two terms, after which he represented his district in the territorial legislature for two terms and was a member of the first state legislature. He assisted in building the first schoolhouse in his locality and took an active part in establishing civilization in this wild and unimproved region. Finally he located in McMinnville, where he built a residence. He was serving as school director at the time of the erection of the present fine schoolhouse, and he died in 1894, his death being lamented by all who knew him. In politics he was a Democrat and was a warm friend of the cause of temperance. Mrs. Shuck still survives her husband and now makes her home with Mr. and Mrs. Wallace. By her marriage she became the mother of seven children, of whom

Mrs. Wallace is the eldest. The others are Mrs. Susan M. Oppenhoff, of Dawson City, Alaska; Mrs. Nancy Ellen Olds, of McMinnville; Mrs. Matilda Wood, of Yamhill county; William and Reuben, who own the old donation claim; and Mrs. Ann Fendall, of Ashland.

Mrs. Wallace was born in Iowa in 1839 and in her youth attended a subscription school held in a log building. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace have three children: Edward West, who for fourteen years was a grocery merchant of McMinnville, but is now living upon his father's farm; Mrs. Anne Todd, wife of Joseph Todd of Napa, Cal.; and Cora, the wife of T. B. Kay, who is president of the Salem Woolen Mills of Salem.

Mr. Wallace has always been honored and respected by his fellow-citizens, and was twice elected to the McMinnville city council, serving as president for one term. Both he and his wife hold membership in the Christian Church, in which they take an active interest. He was a member of the board of elders and was superintendent of the Sunday school for a number of years, while Mrs. Wallace was president of the Ladies' Aid Society. In politics Mr. Wallace is independent and is a strong temperance man. He belongs to the Indian War Veterans Association and was captain for a number of years. It is not difficult to determine upon what side of a question C. A. Wallace will be found, for he is outspoken and fearless in the defense of his honest convictions. He has been not only a witness of the development of Oregon for a half century, but also a participant therein. He has done much effective work for Yamhill county and well deserves mention in this volume.

FRANKLIN PROPST. Seven miles east of Albany is the one hundred and ninety-three-acre farm of Franklin Propst, a well known and successful farmer of Linn county. Born on a farm in Fayette county, W. Va., April 10, 1832, Mr. Propst removed with his parents near Petersburg, Ill., in 1842, and there grew to manhood, receiving his education in the public schools. His youth was uneventful, and he gladly welcomed the opportunity to come west which presented itself in 1852. With his uncle, Anthony Propst, and his family, he started across the plains with ox-teams. On the way the uncle and aunt died, leaving the youth entirely dependent upon his own resources. Five months and ten days from the time of starting he reached his destination in Linn county, and there found employment in the saw-mill of Mr. Lewis Cox,

Francis M. Dodge

an occupation to which he readily adapted himself.

In 1853 Mr. Propst went to southern Oregon, and on Althouse creek worked for about six months, at placer mining; but this was such a wild and desolate region, and so infested with Indians, that he was obliged to seek employment in safer quarters. Returning to the saw-mill of Mr. Cox in Linn county, he worked for several months, and in July, 1854, went into partnership with Frank Powell and rented the Powell mill. This association was amicably continued for about nine months, when Mr. Propst was married, in 1855, to Mary Powell, and with her removed to a farm near by, which he had bought. There have been born seven children of this union: John Henry, of eastern Oregon; Marion, a farmer of Linn county; Maria A., wife of Martin Miller, of Linn county; Zidana, wife of F. C. Butler, of Linn county; Anthony G., who resides on the home farm; Layton B. residing near Lebanon on a farm; Mary S., wife of Thomas Reilly, a railroad man of Albany.

In 1872 Mr. Propst sold his farm and moved to his present home, which he has greatly improved, and made valuable and productive. Outside interests have contributed to a substantial yearly income, and have served to bring into play the many abilities of this popular farmer. In 1893 he added to his responsibilities by starting a tile factory, which he successfully managed for about seven years. He has never taken a more than passing interest in politics, but is nevertheless a staunch supporter of the Republican party, for whose candidate he cast his first presidential vote in 1853. Mr. Propst is highly esteemed in his neighborhood, is enterprising and thrifty, and his farm is a model of neatness and good management.

FRANCIS M. DODGE. In his pioneer venture into the west Francis M. Dodge was not alone, having the support of his parents, who came with the courage of youth to add their touch to the growing civilization when the sun of their lives was well in its zenith. The father, John Dodge, was born in Susquehanna county, N. Y., in 1810, the son of a farmer, and to this training he added the trades of a brick mason and plasterer. His early discipline was calculated to foster the traits of independence and self-reliance, as he was forced by the death of his parents into the struggles of life at a very youthful age, and his course throughout his career has evidenced his good judgment and earnestness of purpose. He married Sarah Ives, a native of Middleton, Conn. In Pennsylvania they made their home until 1844, when they removed to Stark county, Ill., leaving the latter home in 1853 for the long and dangerous journey across the plains, made with the slow-plodding oxen, and in the eight most pleasant months of the year. There was no serious trouble with the Indians to mar the pleasure of the trip, nor in any way was their progress impeded.

Coming direct to Salem, Ore., Mr. Dodge was satisfied to make a home there for his family, and ten years passed before they again made a move. In 1863 they went to the Puget Sound country, locating fourteen miles from Olympia on Miami Prairie, and after residing there for some time, returned to Marion county, Ore., but later making the former place their permanent home. The death of both of the parents occurred at Mud Bay, the father dying at the age of eighty-two years, the mother at seventy-six. Of the children born to them Bruce, Desdemona and Samuel make their home near Olympia; and Francis M., of this review, is a resident of Marion county, Ore. At all times a Republican, Mr. Dodge served for some time as Indian agent on the Black river, through this influence. Though not a member of any church he was a believer in Christianity, and practiced it to the extent of his ability.

Francis M. Dodge was born in Crawford county, Pa., October 29, 1835, and was thus seventeen years old at the time of his father's removal to Oregon, nine years having been spent in the state of his birth. His early education was received in the common schools of the last named states and in the schools of Salem, though he left home soon after the removal to the west. Going to Miami Prairie, Wash., he enlisted in 1855 in the company commanded by Capt. Gilmore Hayes, for service in the Cayuse Indian war, during which he took part in numerous engagements, among them being those at White river, South Prairie, Connell Prairie and Walla Walla, and was a member of Shaw's train at the time it was captured. On being mustered out a year later he returned to Miami Prairie, where he had previously taken up a donation claim, and upon this property he remained until 1861, at that time removing to Oregon. After a few years spent as a teacher in this state, Mr. Dodge invested his earnings in land near Portland, and remained upon the same for a year, at that time purchasing the one hundred and sixty acres upon which he now makes his home. This is located on Butte creek, three and a half miles east of Woodburn, and at the time of the purchase was wild land with the exception of six or seven acres. Through his own efforts he now has one hundred acres under cultivation, all of the improvements being a credit to his energy and an evidence of his prosperity. He is engaged at present in general farming and stock-raising.

In 1865 Mr. Dodge was united in marriage with Jane Caples, a native of Andrew county, Mo., having been born there November 2, 1847. In 1849 she crossed the plains with her parents, William and Nancy (Nowell) Caples. Mrs. Dodge is a cousin of Judge John F. Caples, whose sketch will be found elsewhere in this volume. To this union of Mr. and Mrs. Dodge were born six children, of whom Robert Bruce died at the age of eighteen years. Elmer John, unmarried, makes his home with his parents; Edgar is located in Eugene and has one son, Ray; Lizzie Willema is the wife of A. Pugh of eastern Oregon; Walter S. is at home; and Oscar died at eight years of age. Like his father Mr. Dodge is a Republican in politics and has always taken an intelligent and active interest in the movements of this party. Mr. and Mrs. Dodge are members of the Oregon Pioneer Association, and both are living true, Christian lives, in word as well as in deed.

ABNER LEWIS. The family to which Abner Lewis belongs is one of the oldest in Oregon, his father, Reuben, having been a member of the first train of emigrants to cross the plains in 1842. This heroic traveler was born in the state of New York in 1814, was reared on a farm, and with a very meager education began to make his living on the canal at the age of sixteen years. Gradually vistas of usefulness opened before him further west, and he finally located in Iowa, where he worked at whatever he found to do. There was no shadow of hesitancy or any want of courage in his character and when the projected trip across the plains began to take definite shape he prepared like a Spartan for a plunge into the unknown region, which of necessity held the possibility of death in every step of the way. This, the first emigrant train to brave the dangers of the plains, consisted of sixteen wagons. As the trials of the early home-seekers have been told in romance and history innumerable times, it is hardly necessary to go into the details of their daily life, or follow their progress too closely, as they overcame obstacles undreamed of by the tourist of today. Mr. Lewis contributed his services as a hunter in return for accommodations on the plains, and much large and small game and fish were brought into camp for the relief of hunger stricken travelers by this intrepid hunter. Arriving at Fort Hall the party abandoned their wagons, and with packs strapped to their backs, proceeded on foot to their destination in Oregon City.

In the primitive community of Oregon City Reuben Lewis helped build a mill, and February 14, 1844, married Polly Frazier, who, with her mother and step-father, John McHaley, had crossed the plains in 1843. With his newly wedded wife he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres one and a half miles northwest of Aumsville, and erected a rude log house 16x16 feet, ground dimensions. In this primitive house Abner Lewis was born December 10, 1846, the second of the nine children born to his parents. His older brother, William H., resides in Ohio; Newton lives at Gates, Ore; John is a farmer near Aumsville; Melinda is the widow of J. Chambers of Turner, Ore; Nelson died when quite young; Mary A., deceased, was the wife of Charles Bowie; Frank is a resident of Pendleton; and Sarah died September 10, 1881.

In the early days his father took a keen interest in his crude surroundings, and while cutting down his timber and getting his land in shape for the seed looked out also for the general improvement of the locality. He took a special interest in laying out roads, in establishing schools, and erecting churches, and he was a man of untiring industry and great business judgment. Necessarily he had to contend with the encroaching Indians, and he took an active part in the early efforts to exterminate the murderous red men. At the age of seventy-five years, April 6, 1886, this pioneer of pioneers passed quietly from life, leaving behind a fair competency for those dear to him, and the legacy of a good name earned by industry and integrity. His wife had preceded him to the unknown July 14, 1862, at the comparatively early age of thirty-five. Both were members of the Christian Church. Mr. Lewis took no very active interest in politics, probably because there was little political agitation in his neighborhood. He favored statehood for Oregon, and used his influence and vote in behalf of the movement toward that end.

The success of his father enabled Abner Lewis to start out in life with a better education than falls to the lot of the average farm-reared youth, for he not only studied at the district schools, but received supplementary training at the Willamette University. He remained at home until his marriage, December 12, 1869, with Margaret A. Baker, a native of the vicinity of Turner, Marion county, Ore. Soon after he purchased a part of the farm upon which he has lived most of the time since, and which is now increased to two hundred and forty acres of land in the home farm. Mr. Lewis is also the owner of eighty acres near Aumsville, and one hundred and five acres seven miles south of Salem. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and has some of the finest and best-improved property in Marion county. A practical and scientific farmer, he stands at the head of his calling in his neighborhood, keeping abreast of the time in agricultural and general matters, and contributing in every way in his power to the stability and upbuilding of his district. Of the children born to himself and wife, Emma was born December 8, 1870, and died October 3, 1883; Albert is a resident of Portland, and was born April 27, 1872; Elmer was born February 7, 1874, and lives in Idaho; Oren Edwin was born January 7, 1876, and lives south of Salem; Julius was born July 1, 1877, and lives in southern Oregon; Carl was born April 28, 1879, and is deceased; Clifford, a school teacher, was born April 6, 1881; and Floyd was born August 3, 1885.

Mr. Lewis has been a member of the school board for many years, and his appreciation of the value of a good education has made him an earnest advocate of a high standard of intellectual training. Mr. Lewis has always been a supporter of the principles of the Republican party and active in the councils of that party. In June, 1897, he was elected to the state legislature representing Marion county and serving in the special session of October, 1897, when he supported Hon. Joseph Simon for the United States senate. He also served in the regular session following and was appointed a member of the committees on assessment and taxation, roads and highways, public library, and was chairman of the committee to examine the accounts of the secretary of state.

HON. J. H. ACKERMAN is now serving for the second term as State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Oregon, and the fact that he was re-elected by an increased majority stands as incontrovertible evidence of his capability and his effective labors in behalf of education. He was born in Warren, Trumbull county, Ohio, November 7, 1854, and is of German lineage. His paternal grandfather spent his entire life in Germany, and his father, John Ackerman, was born in Wurtemberg, Germany. In early life he learned the blacksmith's trade and when a young man, prior to his marriage, he emigrated to the new world, settling in Warren, Ohio, where he engaged in blacksmithing until 1855. In that year he removed to Toronto, Clinton county, Iowa, where as a pioneer blacksmith of the place he carried on business with success until 1900. He then established his home in Hale, Mo., where he is now living a retired life. Twice he volunteered for service in the Civil war, but each time was rejected on account of disability.

In religious faith both he and his wife are Lutherans, and in political belief he is a Republican. He wedded Caroline Hartman, a native of Trumbull county, Ohio, and a daughter of Philip Hartman, who came from Germany and settled upon a farm in Trumbull county. Subsequently he took up his abode at Arcadia, Trempealeau county, Wis., where he carried on agricultural pursuits. Mrs. Ackerman, the mother of our subject, died in Iowa, leaving four children: J. H., of this review; George, a farmer of Missouri; Frank, a merchant of Black Hawk county, Iowa, and Mrs. Virginia Sennett, of Missouri.

Professor Ackerman was reared in Toronto, Iowa, and in his youth acquired a public school education. From the age of sixteen years he has made his own way in the world and is truly a self-made man. At that time he began work upon a farm and between the ages of seventeen and twenty he followed carpenter work on railroads in Iowa and Illinois. Then came the financial panic of 1873, and his employer, who had just taken a contract for building a section of the Northern Pacific Railroad, found that the company had failed and the work was abandoned. Accordingly Professor Ackerman lost his position and in 1874 he went to Arcadia, Wis., where he had an uncle engaged in contracting and building. While there his uncle advised him to go to school and his teacher suggested to him that he should teach. The county superintendent persuaded him to take an examination and he did so, thereby receiving a certificate in the spring of 1875. He became a district school teacher at a salary of $25 per month and thus he entered upon what has been his lifework—a profession in which he has attained distinction, while his labors have been a great benefit to the localities in which he has lived. He continued to teach in the district schools near Arcadia, Wis., and afterward in Minnesota and Iowa until 1888 and during that period was principal of the high school at Arcadia for six years. Wishing to receive better instruction himself, he then took an examination for entrance into the State Normal School at Milwaukee, Wis. His knowledge had been supplemented by reading, observation and study, but previous to this time he had received no mental training, save that of a district school course. However, he was graduated from the Wisconsin State Normal in 1889 and in that year he came to Oregon, locating first in Portland, where he accepted the principalship of the Holladay school. For a year he thus served and was then elected city superintendent of the schools for East Portland. After a year the schools were consolidated with those of the main city of Portland and he was made assistant superintendent. In 1892 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for the office of county superintendent of schools of Multnomah county and was elected by a good majority. In 1894 he was re-elected, receiving the highest vote on the ticket and from 1894 until 1896 he not only served as county superintendent but also as principal of the Harrison Street school, and continued to act in that capacity until 1898. He was then nominated on the Republican ticket for state superintendent at the Astoria convention and was elected by a plurality of about ten thousand. In January, 1899, he took the oath of office and removed to Salem, where he is now living. Throughout the state he received the endorsement of leading educators and public men of all classes, and in 1902 he was re-nominated and re-elected by a majority of nearly fifteen thousand, his term of office continuing until January, 1907.

Since becoming state superintendent Professor Ackerman has re-organized the State Teachers' Association and divided it into the eastern and western divisions, each having its individual organization and officers, while before there had been but one society, with the superintendent of public instruction as its president. He originated the preparation of a state course of study for all of the schools of Oregon, so that there is now a uniform course from the introduction into the schools until the completion of the high school work. During his administration he has also been instrumental in obtaining a thorough revision of the school laws of the state. He is a member of the National Educational Association, and has served as representative from Oregon to its conventions and was one of its trustees. He is a member of the State Historical Society, of which he is a trustee. By virtue of his position he is ex-officio member of the board of regents of the State Normal schools at Monmouth, Drain and Ashland; also of the State Agricultural College of Corvallis. He is likewise ex-officio member of the board of trustees of the State School for the Blind at Salem, and of the State School for the Deaf at Salem. During his incumbency in office Professor Ackerman has twice visited every county in the state, except Curry, has done much to infuse his own enthusiasm and deep interest in the work into those who are promoters of educational work and advancement throughout the state.

In Arcadia, Wis., occurred the marriage of Professor Ackerman and Miss Ellen Boorman, a native of that state, while her parents were from Illinois. They have three children: Lilian, who was graduated from the University of Oregon with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and is now Mrs. Carlton, of Albany, Ore.; Mrs. Caroline Burton, who is a graduate of the Portland high school, and is serving as chief clerk in the office of the state superintendent of public instruction; and Isabella. Fraternally, Mr. Ackerman was for some time connected with Arcadia Lodge, No. 45, A. F. & A. M., but now holds membership in Washington Lodge, No. 46, of Portland, of which he is a past master. He took the royal arch degree in Washington Chapter R. A. M. of Portland. Both he and Mrs. Ackerman are members of the Eastern Star, of which he is past worthy patron of Martha Washington Chapter. They hold membership in the Unitarian Church.

Professor Ackerman has always given his political endorsement to the Republican party. There is no interest which is more closely allied to every household than that of public education, and it is therefore of the greatest moment that he who stands at the head of the educational system of the state shall be a man of high scholarship, of strong mentality and of irreproachable character. Such a one is Professor Ackerman, whose advancement to the prominent position which he now occupies has been steady and well merited. He has ever been a student, thorough and painstaking, and is not only ready to quickly follow every idea or improvement advanced by others for the improvement of schools, but is also instituting many methods of reform and improvement of his own, and under his guidance the schools of Oregon have taken rank with those of the older states, and the citizens of Oregon have every reason to be proud of their educational system.

HARRY B. CLOUGH, M. D. Probably every state in the Union has sent representatives to Oregon, and among those that Vermont has furnished to the Sunset state is Dr. Harry B. Clough, who is now practicing his profession in Newberg. He was born near Montpelier, Vt., May 4, 1864, and is a son of Storrs S. Clough, also a native of the same state. His grandfather on the paternal side, Thaddeus Clough, was likewise born in the Green Mountain state, and throughout his entire life he followed agricultural pursuits. He represented an old New England family of Scotch descent that was founded in America by the great-grandparents of the doctor. In the control of his farming interests Thaddeus Clough manifested perseverance, diligence and sagacity and as the years passed became the possessor of a very desirable competence. He died at the age of seventy-two years.

Storrs S. Clough likewise turned his attention to farming, and in connection with the raising of the cereals best adapted to the soil and climate he also established a nursery upon his farm and to some extent he dealt in dairy products. He became the owner of a large and valuable tract of land and was a successful agriculturist. He married Jane Snyder, who was born in Huntington, Vt., a daughter of John Snyder, whose birth occurred in New England and who in early life conducted a flouring-mill, while later he engaged in farming. He, too, enjoyed a fair degree of prosperity, and he lived to be seventy-eight years of age. When his country became involved in hostilities with England a second time he joined the American army, thus serving in the war of 1812.

Dr. Clough, of this review, was the youngest of a family of five children, three sons and two daughters. His boyhood days were spent in the Green Mountain state and he acquired his early education in the common schools, while later he was a student in the Vermont Methodist Seminary of Montpelier, being graduated in that institution with the class of 1887. Going thence to Hanover, N. H., he was apprenticed to a pharmacist for two years, devoting his attention to the mastery of the business with such good results that he was advanced from time to time by his employer until he became the head of the house. Such friendship did his employer entertain for him that he released him from his three years' contract and encouraged him to pursue a course in medicine. Acting upon this advice Dr. Clough entered the medical college at Dartmouth, where for six months he attended a course of lectures. At the end of that time he went to Boston, Mass., where he entered the city hospital in order that he might earn the money which would enable him to resume his own studies. Owing to over-work there which undermined his constitution he suffered from an attack of grip, and this changed his plans.

In the year 1891 Dr. Clough arrived upon the Pacific coast, locating first in Portland, where he remained for a few months, when he went to Moscow, Idaho, spending three years in that city. There he took up medical work again and afterward went to Louisville, Ky., entering the medical college of that city, in which he was graduated in 1897 with the degree of M. D. He also won the gold medal in the line of obstetrics and returned to Oregon with a comprehensive and thorough knowledge of the principles of the medical science. Making his way direct to Portland he there passed the examination before the state medical board and in the spring of 1897 he located in Yoncalla, Douglas county, Ore., where he engaged in practice for two years. In 1898 he removed to Whitman county, Wash., where he was engaged in practice for four years, and in August, 1902, he arrived in Newberg, where he opened an office and is now located.

Dr. Clough was married in Newberg, in 1893, to Miss Anise Brown, a native of Champaign county, Ill., and a daughter of John Brown, who was likewise born in Illinois, and came to Oregon in one of the first trains that crossed the continent. He settled in the vicinity of Newberg and has been a resident of the city for about thirty-nine years—classed among the honored pioneers who have been instrumental in developing their localities. Three children have been born to the doctor and his wife, but only one is now living, Dorothy, who is still with her parents. The doctor belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holds membership in the Presbyterian Church, and gives his political support to the Republican party. He has a comfortable residence in Newberg. Near it is his office, which is centrally located on the main street of the city. In addition to his practice he owns a sixteenth interest in the Orient Gold & Copper Mining Company, which was incorporated for $1,000,000, and which is a paying investment. His attention, however, is largely given to his practice and already he has gained in Newberg a liberal patronage, accorded him in recognition of his skill and ability. He has always been a close and discriminating student and his knowledge of the principles of medicine is good.

Dr. Clough is a member of the Whitman County (Wash.) Medical Society, Washington State Medical Society, Yamhill County and the Oregon State Medical societies, and the American Medical Association.

JOHN LICHTY. Prominently identified with the lumber interests of Marion county is Mr. Lichy, who owns and operates a large and finely equipped manufacturing plant on Silver creek, in Silverton, where he carries on an extensive and prosperous business. During the many years in which he has been engaged in this industry he has labored unceasingly, gaining wisdom by practical experience, and has now reached the point where every effort put forth brings him in rich reward for the time and money so lavishly expended.

A native of Switzerland, Mr. Lichy was born December 21, 1852, in the canton of Berne, and was there reared and educated. His father, also named John Lichy, spent his entire life in the same canton, being a successful farmer and stock-raiser and one of the active members of the Mennonite Church. To him and his wife, whose maiden name was Mary Ann Lark, eight children were born, John, with whom this brief sketch is principally concerned, being the second in order of birth. Neither of the parents are now living, the father having passed away at the age of sixty-five years, and the mother when sixty-three years of age.

John Lichy became familiar with agricultural pursuits in his youthful days, remaining at home and assisting his father in the farm labors until about nineteen years old. Filled then with an ambitious desire to try his fortune in a newer country, he emigrated, in 1872, to the United States, and located first in Wayne county, Ohio, where he served an apprenticeship at the carpenter's trade, which he followed for four years. Making another move westward in 1876, Mr. Lichty came to Oregon in that year, and being impressed with the desirability of Howells Prairie as a place of location, he there purchased ninety acres of timberland, from which he improved and cleared a good farm. As an agriculturist he has been unusually successful, from time to time adding to his original purchase, his farm now aggregating three hundred and sixty acres, and being one of the most valuable and well kept in its vicinity. Here he and his family have a most attractive home. In 1890, Mr. Lichty, with characteristic enterprise, erected a sawmill on Pudding river, and for twelve years was there engaged in the manufacture of lumber. Disposing then of that property, he immediately transferred his business interests to the city of Silverton, locating on Silver creek, where he has built one of the largest lumber mills in the Willamette valley. The plant which includes a sawmill, a planing mill, a dryer, etc., is fully equipped with the most approved modern machinery, the total cost being $20,000, and the capacity of the plant being 25,000 feet of lumber per day. He has also been fortunate in so fixing the dams in Silver creek that he can at any time, no matter how low the water, so manipulate the gates as to float his logs down to his mill, the damming expenses amounting to $7,000. He also owns sixteen hundred acres of timber land nearby, from this cutting much of the material used in his plant, the output of which he sells principally in the local markets.

Mr. Lichty married at Wooster, Ohio, Elizabeth Stefen, who was born in Wayne county, Ohio, May 1, 1856, and died June 24, 1899. Eleven children were born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Lichty, namely: Minnie, the wife of Gideon Welty, the family residing on the home farm; William, Henry, Matilda, Alexander, Bertha, Josephine, Lillian, Lida, Ruth and John. In politics Mr. Lichty has always been a Republican.

HEZEKIAH H. WINSLOW. Preceded by many years of activity as a merchant, farmer, dentist and politician, Hezekiah H. Winslow came to Oregon in 1886, and though agriculturally successful during several of the following years, is now living retired on one of the finest little places in Newberg. Mr. Winslow has ten acres of land on the outskirts of the town, made attractive and homelike with a two-story, comfortable-looking dwelling, surrounded with trees, shrubs and flowers.

The Oregon career of Mr. Winslow gives but a faint conception of the large accomplishment which has characterized his active life. He was reared in three middle western states, and was born in Randolph county, N. C., November 15, 1838. His father, John Winslow, preferred farming as an occupation, and conducted the same for many years in his native state of North Carolina, removing in 1841 to Grant county, Ind., of which he was one of the very early settlers. In 1852 he took up his residence in Howard county, Ind., where he engaged in the merchandising business until 1870. At a later day he returned to Grant county, where he lived retired and eventually died, at the age of seventy-four years. His wife, Elizabeth (Henley) Winslow, was also a native of North Carolina, and died when her son Hezekiah was four years of age, he being the youngest of the five sons and three daughters in the family.

The first business experience of Hezekiah H. Winslow was acquired in Indianapolis, whither he removed at the age of seventeen, and where he was identified as a clerk with the firm of J. M. Tolbott & Co., wholesale dry goods merchants, from 1856 until 1859. Upon returning to Howard county, Ind., in the latter part of '59, he was appointed deputy sheriff, a position creditably maintained until the breaking out of the Civil war. In 1861 Mr. Winslow enlisted in Company D, Sixth Indiana Infantry, and for three months served as corporal of his company. After being mustered out he again enlisted, in August, 1862, in Company F, Eighty-ninth Indiana Infantry, and upon the organization of the regiment was made sergeant-major. In the spring of 1863 he was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant, and for the greater part of the service was detailed at brigade headquarters as aid-de-camp. In 1864 he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant of Company F, but still remained on detail service. He participated in the Red river campaign under Gen. A. J. Smith, and was in the battle of Nashville, later going down the river to New Orleans and around to Mobile, Ala., where he was finally discharged, at the close of the war.

After the war Mr. Winslow returned to Indiana, and upon locating in Kokomo, studied dentistry with his brother, at the same time becoming vitally interested in Republican politics. In 1866 he was defeated for the nomination for treasurer of Howard county by one vote, but was elected to the office of county clerk in 1867, a position creditably held for four years. He was elected a second time without opposition, and during his occupancy of this office for eight consecutive years gave a very satisfactory service. In 1876 he was appointed postmaster at Kokomo under Grant's last administration, and in 1879 resigned in order to remove to a farm near Independence, Montgomery county, Kans. After years of successful farming he went to the vicinity of Liberty, Mo., and four years later, in the spring of 1886, came to Oregon to investigate the country with a view to future residence. Convinced that he had found a desirable location, one promising the largest financial and home-building returns, he went back to Missouri for his family, with whom he located on a farm in the Waldo hills the following fall. In 1887 he settled on a farm near Sheridan, Yamhill county, and in 1898 came to his present home, for which he traded his Yamhill county farm.

While living in Kokomo, Ind., Mr. Winslow married Angelina Fenton, who was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, and whose father, Jesse, a farmer and merchant of Indiana, moved from there to Kansas and engaged in farming. Mr. Fenton finally removed to Missouri, and then about the time his son-in-law came to Oregon, located in Jacksonville, Ill. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Winslow, of whom Jessie is the wife of J. W. Bewley, of Salem; Ralph F. is engaged in the jewelry business at Roseburg, Ore.; Glenn is engaged in the jewelry business at Pendleton, Ore.; and Sadie is now the wife of William H. Manning, and they reside upon a farm. Since the beginning of his voting days Mr. Winslow has been identified with the Republican party, although he is extremely liberal in his political tendencies. He is fraternally identified with the Grand Army of the Republic.

Since the foregoing was written Mr. and Mrs. Winslow have sold their home in Newberg and have bought back their old home near Sheridan and now reside there.

HON. JOSIAH C. NELSON. Were one to search the state of Oregon over for a narrator of happenings in the early pioneer days, one could hardly find one more interestingly reminiscent than is Hon. Josiah C. Nelson, for many years associated with agricultural, mercantile, and political affairs in Yamhill county, and now living in retirement in Newberg. Mr. Nelson was born in Jackson county, Mo., May 25, 1827, his ancestors having arrived from England prior to the Revolution, in which momentous struggle they fought on the side of the colonies.

George S. Nelson, the father of Hon. Josiah, was born in east Tennessee, July 20, 1801, and was a farmer during the greater part of his life. He was a very capable and ingenious man, mechanical in his bent, and able to build almost anything. At the age of sixteen years he removed to Missouri, and this being 1817 there were practically few settlers in his district. Nevertheless, he succeeded in developing a paying farm in the wilderness, but, after his marriage, sold this and located on one hundred and sixty acres of land in Jackson county, purchased at $1.25 per acre. Afterward he lived both in LaFayette and Andrew counties, and in the latter was obliged to give up some of his land when it was surveyed. Thereafter he sold out and removed to two miles east in the same county, remaining there until preparing to cross the plains in 1844. The family started May 1, and on the way encountered many obstacles, owing chiefly to overflows of the rivers, and depredations on the part of the Indians, who stole six head of valuable cattle on the Nemaha river. One of the children died of mountain fever at Vancouver. They settled on a donation claim of six hundred and forty-five acres near what is now Newberg, and for some time lived in a little log house, built the previous year by a man who had sowed and harvested a little wheat and planted some potatoes. These commodities served for food for the parents and four children during the long cold winter, and as may well be imagined they endured many hardships while waiting for the spring sunshine to warm the earth. Upon arriving here there were but eight families in the valley, in six of which were Indian or half-breed wives. Here Mr. Nelson farmed and prospered until his sixty-fifth year, when he sold his farm, and for a few years lived with his son in Kings Valley. He then removed to LaFayette, Ore., where his death occurred December 31, 1884, at the age of eighty-three years, five months and nine days. His wife, whom he married in 1825, was formerly Margaret Crawford, a native of Tennessee, and her death occurred April 15, 1886. Of the six children born to this couple, renowned for their hospitality and cheerfulness under trying pioneer conditions, five grew up, the eldest having died in infancy. Of these, Josiah is the oldest; William died at Vancouver, Wash., on the way to Oregon; Mary Jane is the deceased wife of Clark Rogers, of Portland; Cornelius G. died at the age of four in Grass Valley, Baker county, Ore.; and Thomas H. is a resident of LaFayette. Mrs. Nelson was left an orphan at the age of three years, and was indebted for her early training to a cousin with whom she remained until her marriage.

Owing to the unsettled state of both Missouri and Oregon, the early education of Josiah C. Nelson was most fragmentary, and was irregularly acquired at the little frontier log schools, sparsely furnished, always a long distance from home. At the age of twenty-three he was united in marriage with Mary E. Bird, who was born in Illinois, and of which union there were born two children: Nancy Jane, the wife of Charles T. Belcher, of the St. Charles Hotel, Portland; and William W., of Newberg. Directly after his marriage Mr. Nelson bought out a claim from a man whom he came across, giving in payment of the right a mule and a cow for five hundred and one and three-fourths acres. Some time after the death of his first wife, Mr. Nelson married Sarah C. Cummins, who was born in Indiana, and who bore him five children: Cora Alice, deceased; Cornelia Mary, now Mrs. A. P. Fletcher, whose husband owns two hundred acres of land in La Fayette, Ore.; Mary Estella, wife of T. H. Bryant, who lives on the Nelson farm; Maggie L., the widow of Dr. Littlefield, who died recently; and Walter Hugh, of Newberg, Ore.

In 1898 Mr. Nelson moved into Newberg, built himself a comfortable and commodious residence, and has been living in retirement ever since. From time to time he has been before the public in the capacity of a politician, his interest in politics dating from the time when he cast his first presidential vote for Stephen A. Douglas. In 1858 he was elected to the first Oregon state legislature; was re-elected in 1882-4, and in 1885 served in a called session of the legislature. After embarking upon a general merchandise business in La Fayette, Ore., in 1875, he served as member of the council of the town during his seven years' residence there. He has also been a school director almost the entire time of his stay in Oregon, and for many years was clerk and road supervisor. While using his farm for a headquarters, Mr. Nelson has not been oblivious to other opportunities in the west, and besides his mercantile venture, engaged also in mining in California from October, 1849, to April, 1850. He was fairly successful as a miner, and was successful as a merchant. As a soldier in 1848 he performed his part in suppressing the Indians, and served in this capacity under Captain Thompson for about three months. Mr. Nelson is typical of the broad prairies, the generosity engendered among pioneers of whatever region, and the strength and stamina developed while laboriously striving for the best that the west has to offer.

ALBERT B. BOND. The pioneer annals of Oregon must needs contain the name of Nathan W. Bond, who twice crossed the plains to the west, and whose son, Albert B., is at present the part owner of his original donation claim. Nathan Bond was born in Tennessee, and as a boy moved with his parents to Illinois, and from there to Iowa, in which latter state he married Elizabeth J. Trailer. Leaving his wife and children on a farm he crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1850, and after a few months in the gold fields of California returned by way of the Isthmus of Panama. The ship in which he sailed was becalmed, and for forty days the anxious crew and passengers looked in vain for a breeze to fill their sails and bear them away. Provisions became scarce, and water low, and their successful landing became problematical. Eventually reaching his Iowa farm, he remained there until the spring of 1853, and then packed together his household goods, laid in a store of provisions, and started several teams of plodding oxen across the plains. The first winter was spent in the Looney settlement, and in the spring of 1854 the father bought the right to a three hundred acre claim. So successful was he, and so confident of the ultimate development of this entire part of the country, that in 1856 he bought three hundred and thirty acres more. For twenty-nine years he labored successfully in his adopted state, his death occurring in 1889, at the age of seventy-three years. The wife who had shared his joys and sorrows, and who had materially aided in bringing about success, survived him until 1896, or until seventy-three years of age. Caroline, the oldest of their children, is the wife of Lewis Cox, of Washington; Annie is the wife of John Reed, of Lebanon; Benjamin F. died in the midst of a successful medical practice at Dallas, in 1871; and Susanna died in Iowa at seven years of age.

The youngest in his father's family, and three years of age when he came across the plains, Albert B. Bond was reared on the home farm, and at irregular intervals attended the district schools. He assisted with the management of the entire farm until his marriage with Cornelia J. Beeler, at the age of twenty-three, after which he purchased one hundred and thirty acres of farm land near Scio, and there he farmed for eight years, and then went to eastern Oregon, where he remained two years, and in 1882 he moved upon his present farm of two hundred and eighty acres, the same being a part of the old donation claim. He has made those modern improvements upon which the latter-day farmer prides himself, and for many years has engaged in general farming, stock and grain-raising. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bond, of whom the oldest son, William B., was a soldier in the Spanish-American war, and as a member of the Fourth Infantry was present at El Caney and Santiago, afterward being under command of General Lawton in the Philippines. Clara E., Benjamin Franklin, Archie T., Looney C., and Loren are living at home with their parents. Mr. Bond is devoted to his farm and home, and has never found time or inclination to step out into the glare of political or other publicity. He is honest in all of his dealings, kindly and considerate in his association with those around him; and inclined to look on the better side of life.

JOHN WESLEY RICHARDSON. Illinois has furnished no more substantial acquisition to the agricultural element of Linn county, Ore., than John W. Richardson, whose farm of three hundred acres, located six miles southeast of the village of Scio, is one of the most remunerative tracts in the vicinity. While to a certain extent he follows general farming, stock-raising is more to his taste, Poland-China hogs and Hereford cattle being his specialty.

As previously intimated, Mr. Richardson is a native of Illinois, born in Adams county, twenty-five miles east of Quincy, January 1, 1832. His father, John Richardson, was a native of the same state, born in Monroe county in October, 1798, and descended from good fighting stock, his father, George Richardson, who was of Irish descent, having served valiantly in the Revolutionary war and later in the war of 1812. At the time of the latter conflict John Richardson was a mere youth. His enthusiasm was great, and though only fourteen years old he enlisted as a private, and participated in the battle of the Narrows, now Quincy. His uncle, John Belts, was killed by the Indians during the engagement on the island in the Mississippi at that point. John Richardson continued to make his home in his native state until 1851, when with his family, he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and was six months in reaching Linn county. The year following his arrival he took up a donation claim six miles southeast of Scio, upon which he engaged in farming the remainder of his life, his death occurring April 14, 1873. His wife was in maidenhood Miss Orpha Thompson, a native of South Carolina. She lived to reach her sixty-seventh year, passing away in Linn county in 1863. The twelve children of John and Orpha (Thompson) Richardson were named as follows in the order of their birth: Milton Empson, who died in infancy; Thomas Jefferson, who died at Jefferson, Ore., in 1894; William Winston, who died at Scio, Ore., in 1900; George Washington who died at Salem in 1880; Lewis Clark, who died on his father's farm in Linn county in 1870; Elijah Thompson, now living at Spokane, Wash.; Obadiah Waddle, of Wasco, Ore.; John Wesley, of this review; Andrew Jackson, of Stayton, Ore.; Enoch Numbers, who died in infancy; Dr. James Asher Richardson, of Salem; and Rebecca Jane, deceased, wife of James Ennis, deceased, of Shelburn, Linn county. All were natives of Illinois, and all who grew to maturity became pioneers of Oregon, settling in Linn county. "Richardson Gap," a picturesque cañon southeast of Scio, was named for the family, who occupied nearly all the land in that vicinity in the early days of the county's history.

Of the children born to his parents, all of whom were boys with one exception, John W. Richardson was the eighth in order of birth. His life upon his father's farm was devoid of any unusual experiences, and when not attending the district school was helping with the chores about the farm. When twenty years of age, in 1852, he assumed the responsibility of carrying on a farm of his own, taking up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres adjoining his father's farm. It is safe to conjecture that he met with success in his agricultural venture, for two years later, July 23, 1854, followed his marriage, which united him with Miss Mary A. Conkrite, born in Pike county, Ill., October 14, 1836, daughter of Jacob and Mary (Hill) Conkrite. She had crossed the plains with her mother in 1853, settling in Linn county. Mr. and Mrs. John W. Richardson became the parents of six children, of whom we make the following mention: Melvina is the wife of Peter Brenner and resides near Heppner, Ore.; Almira became the wife of James Curl and makes her home in Spangle, Wash.; Melissa, Mrs. John Turner, resides in Waterville, Wash.; Wallace is deceased; Wilson is at home with his parents, and Truman B. is a resident of Washington, where he is actively engaged in the sheep industry.

Mr. Richardson takes a commendable pride in Linn county, and especially in that portion of it in which he resides, and every movement looking to its material advancement meets his encouragement and active support. Educational affairs have always had a staunch ally in Mr. Richardson, who for thirty years has been school director and clerk of his district. His services in the capacity of county thistle commissioner for the past four years have also been of material benefit. The Christian Church of Scio numbers Mr. Richardson among its worshippers and for many years he officiated as deacon. The Republican party is sure of his vote at elections. He was one of the charter members of Santiam Grange and for many years was identified with that order.

JOHN R. COOPER. Three great commonwealths have contributed to the admirable character of one of the representative men of Polk county, these being the states of Kentucky, Illinois and Oregon; the first through inheritance, it being the land of his father's birth; the second the scene of his own; and last, that which has become the home of his mature years. Without the advantages which are the birthright of the youth of our times Mr. Cooper has elevated himself by his own unaided efforts to a position with the first men of the county, both as regards erudition and finance. His wide reading and ready assimilation have made him a master of past events, while his broad mind and hearty benevolence keep him in touch with every public movement, whether political or charitable. His courage has been tested in the years gone by, and his acts of courtesy and kindness extend not only to his neighbors but to the "beasts of the field and the birds of the air."

John R. Cooper was born in Sangamon county, Ill., November 5, 1836, the state being that to which his father, Louis L., had moved at a very early day. The father was born in Kentucky, in 1796, and after his removal to Illinois he engaged in farming. In 1839 he took his family to Missouri, locating near Sheridan, where he became interested in the raising of cattle and hogs. Missouri was then giving many pioneers to the great west, and Mr. Cooper early caught the emigration spirit, and in 1852 he again bade farewell to the home which he had established there, and set out across the plains with the customary ox-teams and wagons. After a journey without any special incident his party arrived in Oregon, spending the first winter in Marion county, the spring finding them located seven miles from Independence, Polk county, on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres which Mr. Cooper purchased. Upon this property he remained until his death in 1875, at the age of seventy-nine years. His wife was formerly Miss Mary Linzie, also a native of Kentucky, and whose death occurred in Oregon in 1853, one year after their removal from Missouri. She was the mother of seven children, four sons and three daughters, of whom John R. Cooper was the youngest son and next to the youngest child.

Being sixteen years of age when the trip was made from the east, John R. Cooper recalls vividly the long, tiresome months of the journey and especially that part which intimately concerns himself. The cholera broke out in the train, and though Mr. Cooper also experienced an attack of the disease he was not seriously ill, and soon recovered. With the exception of about six months' attendance at the common schools he gave all the years of his boyhood and manhood to the cultivation of his father's broad fields. During the Indian uprising of 1855 Mr. Cooper enlisted in the company commanded by Miles F. Elkhorn, November 10 of that year and continued in the service until May, 1856, in which time he was in the engagements at Deer creek, Rogue river, Murphy's creek and Big Meadows. With the cessation of hostilities he became interested in the mining possibilities of Jackson creek and remained there for three years, at that time returning home where he again found employment on his father's ranch. In 1864 he engaged in farming for himself, renting land until 1869, when he bought seven hundred and fifty acres, two miles west of Monmouth, upon which he remained for five years. He then sold his farm and came to Independence, and has since been extensively engaged in brick manufacturing, his factory furnishing bricks for almost every business house in Independence. For many years his was the only successful factory of its kind in this section of the country, and therefore his business was markedly successful. Just across the river in Marion county, Mr. Cooper owns a seventy acre farm, forty acres of which is cleared, and upon this he is engaged in agricultural pursuits. Much of the hop-raising industry in this country is due to his judgment, his farm having been the first to be devoted to its cultivation, in the year 1882. Thirty-six acres of hops now yield him a handsome income. In addition to these interests he is also connected with the lumbering interests of Oregon, owning a logging camp which is thoroughly equipped for carrying on the business, six men being required for its management.

April 3, 1864, was the date upon which he was united in marriage with Miss Lavilla Williams, born near Independence, Ore., the daughter of Leonard Williams, who crossed the plains in 1847 and took up a donation claim in this part of the country, and by his integrity and public spirit winning a prominent place in the affairs of the community. For some time he served as postmaster of Independence. His death, which occurred in this city, was regretted by many. To Mr. and Mrs. Cooper were born seven children, of whom Roselia is now the wife of O. F. Dixon, of Washington; Lillian is the wife of Dr. F. B. Eaton, of Berkeley, Cal.; John A., of Montana; Pearl is at home; Earl is deceased; and Ivy and La Villa are at home. As to his political affiliation Mr. Cooper casts his ballot with the Republican party.

THOMAS B. CUMMINGS. So thoroughly has Thomas B. Cummings become identified with the reliable business interests of Newberg that he is regarded as an integral part of the town's present and future prosperity. Although a resident of the town only since 1891 he has accomplished as much as would many in a decade, a showing traceable to his sound business judgment, and thorough mastery of his chosen occupation. As a builder and contractor his many years of experience have fitted him for the successful conduct of so large a business as now claims his attention, an additional distinct advantage of the town being that he is able to give employment to many people. Besides building and contracting he owns and manages an undertaking and furniture store, and carries quite a stock of goods for which he receives liberal patronage from the town and surrounding country.

Much of the push and energy which is characterizing the career of Mr. Cummings is inherited from a father whose ambition was boundless, and who was many things in the communities in which he lived. John M. Cummings was born in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., in which town his father, Thomas, conducted a large and profitable brewery. The grandfather claimed Scotch descent, and in truth possessed sufficient Scotch perseverance to make an entire success of his business, his fortune at the time of his death being quite considerable for those days. John M., his son, became a merchant tailor in early life, but in after years departed somewhat from his early teachings and invaded other avenues of activity. At the age of thirty he moved to Cambridge, Wayne county, Ind., where he plied his trade, and also read and practiced law. He became a prominent man in the community, and was elected to the legislature of Indiana for two terms. He was an uncompromising Democrat, and tolerance of the opposite party was not one of his strong points. During the Civil war he became captain of the Sixty-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served his cause with courage and distinction. His death occurred near Anderson, Madison county, Ind. His wife, formerly Elizabeth Chapel, died in Fayette county, Ind. Of the three children born of this union, one son and two daughters, Thomas B. is the oldest.

Equipped with a common school and academical education, Mr. Cummings entered upon a building apprenticeship in Indianapolis directly after his graduation from the Academy at Knightstown, Ind., at which time he was twenty-one years old. Having qualified as a builder he worked in Indianapolis and the surrounding country and towns for some time, and in 1876 went to Junction City, Kans., and there worked for what is now the Union Pacific Railroad Company. He was employed by the railroad company all along their line from Kansas City to Brookville, Kans., and during his association with the company lived for two years in Junction City, about the same length of time in Topeka, and for several years in Newton, Kans. In 1891 he came to Newberg, Ore., as before stated, and has had no cause to regret the happy circumstance which dictated so advantageous a location.

In Indiana Mr. Cummings was united in marriage with Capitola M. Hoskins, who was born in Iowa, and whose father, Ely, was a native of Ohio. A shoe manufacturer by trade, Mr. Hoskins lived for many years in Iowa, and then returned to his native state, where his last years were spent, and where he lived to be fifty years of age. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cummings, of whom Claude is a partner in his father's business; Pearl is living at home, as is also Thomas L. Disregarding the parental example, Mr. Cummings is as staunch a Republican as his father was a Democrat, and he has been initiated into public office through the confidence of his fellow-townsmen. For two terms he was coroner of Yamhill county, and while in Newton, Kans., was a member of the city council from the first ward. Fraternally he is identified with the Knights Templar of Masonry, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he carries $2,000 insurance.

GEORGE TOWLE. Though a resident of Oregon for but thirteen years, Mr. Towle has become closely and prominently identified with one of its most important interests—that of prune culture. Previous to the year 1890, when he took up his residence in Oregon, he had lived in various parts of the United States. At the present time he is known as one of the most extensive and successful prune growers in Marion county. Upon locating near Aumsville in 1890 he purchased a farm of fifty acres, one mile from the town and to this he has added by the purchase of twenty-two and one-half acres. Soon after establishing himself at this point he began to set out Italian prune trees, and twenty acres are now devoted to the culture of this fruit. About five acres more are under other fruits. So greatly did Mr. Towle's business increase after it was once established that in 1897 he erected a prune drier for the preparation of his own fruit for the market and the accommodation of his neighbors; but as the years went by its capacity proved wholly inadequate, and in 1902 he built one of the largest and most completely equipped driers in the Willamette valley. This drier covers a space 62x62 feet, and is equipped with the most modern machinery for the use of horticulturists. It has a capacity of five hundred bushels for each drying.

Of rugged English ancestry, Mr. Towle was born near Montreal, Canada, October 4, 1836, a son of William and Mary (Abbott) Towle. His father was a native of Lincolnshire, England, and his mother of Montpelier, Vt. While he was yet a youth his parents removed to County Oxford, Ontario, Canada, and there he was reared on a farm and educated in the public schools. At the age of twenty years he went to Prescott, Wis., where he engaged with friends in the manufacture of brick; but not finding this occupation satisfactory, he returned to his former home in Canada, where he soon afterward engaged in farming and stock-raising. In 1875 he removed further west in Canada, locating near Lake Superior, where he resided until 1880. North Dakota became his next field of activity, and near Park river, Walsh county, in that state, he homesteaded a claim of six hundred and seventy-two acres. For the succeeding ten years he experienced varying successes and failures as an extensive grain producer. In 1890, having become imbued with a desire to devote the rest of his life to a region of country where the climate and natural advantages were more satisfactory, he decided to remove to Oregon, and since that year he has been continuously engaged in the scientific culture of prunes and other small fruits. He has made his farm one of the landmarks of Marion county, a place attractive to the eye, as well as a venture which has proven pleasing and profitable.

Mr. Towle was married in October, 1859, to Mary J. Service, a native of Ontario. They are the parents of the following children: Ida, wife of Richard Claxton, a well known fruit grower residing on a farm adjoining that of Mr. Towle; George E., cashier of the First National Bank of Park River, N. D.; Edward A., one of the foremost citizens and best-known ranchers of the vicinity of Park River, who has twice served as a member of the North Dakota legislature; and James E., a teacher, a graduate of the Monmouth Normal School, class of 1893, residing with his parents.

During the years of his residence in Marion county, Mr. Towle's fellow-citizens have come to regard him as a man of sterling worth—progressive, enterprising, broad-minded in his view of affairs and a warm friend of the cause of education and of good roads. His attitude on all questions of local interest has been such as to win for him the regard and esteem of all.

W. W. WALKER. At the present day it means but a short, pleasant trip to pass from the extreme northeastern part of the United States to its opposite on the Pacific coast, with the thousands of miles marked by straight, true lines, over a peaceful, pastoral country, in elegant coaches, and ready service at every stopping place. But in the days gone by a journey from Maine to Oregon meant many months of danger from the depredations of the Indians who harassed the trail of the emigrant train, and hardships and trials and troubles without number.

From Maine to Oregon William W. Walker has come, making the journey, however, in not a few months, but in many years, as his life has been full of the adventures incident to the history of a man who was thrown upon his own resources in the early days of our country. Born in Washington county, Me., April 14, 1836, he was the son of John S. and Ellen (O'Neil) Walker, natives respectively of Oldtown, Penobscot county, Me., and County Cork, Ireland. When a young man the father had joined a party of men going to Canada, near Quebec, there to work in a logging camp, in which employment he remained for some years. It was while thus engaged he met and married Ellen O'Neil. He then brought his family back to Washington county, where he engaged in the saw-mill business, continuing in this occupation up to the present time.

The early education of William W. Walker was necessarily rather limited, as school facilities were very meager, but he put in the years in the common schools of Maine, and after he left home at the age of nineteen years, he took up a work in which discipline is not the least requisite for its success. He shipped from Millbridge, a city on the coast of Maine, in a square-rigged brig, under two masters, its trade being that of a coaster. For nine years he remained in this business, acting as mate after two years' service. Later, he was captain of the brig, the May Hand, on a voyage from New York to Africa, going as far south as the equator, a trip which was full of adventure and varied experience, as well as success financially. In 1858 he went to California, locating in San Francisco, where he remained for two months, but with the restless spirit incited by a sea-faring life, he was soon off again, having shipped for the Fraser river in British Columbia. For some time after that he was engaged in boating on the waters of Puget Sound, going to Portland in 1860, where he remained for one year steamboating on the Columbia river. With wide experience in the waters of the world he now sought a knowledge of the bowels of the earth, giving up the roving life of a seaman for the alluring prospects of a miner. At Pierce City, Idaho, he first took up this employment, working with notable perseverance until March, 1870, when he returned to Portland. In the varied positions in which he found himself in his adventurous life he had acquired a knowledge of some trades which proved to be exceedingly useful to him as a landsman, now putting into practice one of them, that of a carpenter, working for two years at this before he decided to change his residence. In 1872 he came to Yamhill county, inclined now to settle down for life and choosing the tilling of the soil as the most congenial labor, being that at which he had first turned a hand, in the long-past days of his boyhood in the old Pine Tree state. After a year and a half spent in employment under R. R. Thompson, he engaged in farming for himself, locating in 1876 on his present property, and now owns one hundred and thirty-three acres, fifty of which is in active cultivation, being utilized for general farming.

Mr. Walker securely anchored himself to the land by his marriage with Miss Lucretia Perkins, in 1873. She is a native of North Yamhill, Ore., born in 1848. In their pleasant home there are five children now to make bright the quiet years that might otherwise become monotonous to the seaman whose life has been so filled with exciting changes—Jennie M., G. L., W. O., F. N., and John P.—F. N. being the only one who is not a member of the household, his employment being in Washington. In his political convictions, Mr. Walker is a Democrat, serving as road supervisor and school director through the influence of this party. In his fraternal relations he is identified with the Masons, being a member of Lodge No. 3 of La Fayette, and also of Lodge No. 29, I. O. O. F.

JESSE W. LOONEY. When only four years of age Jesse W. Looney became a resident of Oregon, having crossed the plains in company with his parents, who were seeking a home in the west, not so much for the wealth they foresaw in the possibilities of the new land as to make a link in the chain which was to bind the great northwest to the middle and eastern states. A perusal of the history of the lives of these pioneers, setting forth the conditions and privations which tried their souls, will clearly show the moral stamina which laid the groundwork for the statehood.

The father of Jesse W. Looney, also named Jesse, was a native of Knoxville, Tenn., having been born there in 1801, and reared to manhood on a plantation. When a young man he went to Alabama, and for several years thereafter he traveled about in the states of the middle west, spending some time in Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri, in the latter state feeling more strongly than ever before the current setting toward the western lands. Impelled through an intense hatred of the condition of slavery to seek a home in a different section of the country, he looked favorably upon the western movement, in 1843 going to St. Joseph, Mo., where he outfitted for the trip. He bought four wagons and a large number of oxen, planning to have from three to five yoke for each wagon, twenty head of fine cows, five mares, and a great quantity of fruit seeds, intending to establish a model home beyond the wide prairies. The journey was safely made, the fall finding them at Whitman's station, and in the spring of 1844 he came by water on the Hudson Bay boat to Oregon City, after which he settled three miles south of Salem. He there erected a small log cabin, but remained only a short time, when he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres at the foot of what is now known as Looney's Butte, and upon this property his sons, N. H. and David now make their homes. This was principally prairie land located in the valley and was rich and productive.

The marriage of Mr. Looney occurred in Alabama, in 1827, and united with him Ruby Bond, a native of Knoxville, Ky., but who had removed to Alabama when she was but nine years old. Through their long years of pioneer life in Oregon she was in entire sympathy with her husband, giving him the help of a brave, tender woman in his battle in the wilderness. She, too, had been anxious to leave the south, and to bring their children, of whom there were six at the time of their removal to the west, to a free country. Until the railroad was built through his section of country these pioneers kept the overland stage station, where all passengers stopped for meals, and the coaches to change horses. During the early days of the community Mr. Looney gave much thought and effort to the upbuilding of the country, helping to lay out roads, organize schools, etc. He was a member of the first provisional government, and was instrumental in many progressive movements, taking an active interest in the welfare of his adopted state. He had also the distinction of being the first settler in the Santiam valley, the first schoolhouse of which being built upon his land. At his death, March 25, 1869, he owned over two thousand acres. His wife survived him many years, living to the age of ninety-two years, her death occurring May 7, 1901. She was the mother of thirteen children, ten of whom are now living, and are given in order of birth as follows: Susan, the wife of Fred Stivers, of Salem; John B., of Jefferson; Ellen, the wife of Abner Gaines, of Portland; Jesse W., of this review; Benjamin F., in the Looney settlement; Pauline, of Jefferson; David and Norris H., who are located on a part of the home farm; Frankie, the wife of Wilbur Connell, of Salem; and Ada, the wife of Augustus Fairbanks, of California.

Jesse W. Looney was born in Springfield, Mo., August 27, 1839, and the greater part of his life has been spent in the state of Oregon. He grew to manhood on the farm which his father had chosen for a home on his first settlement in the west, and on attaining manhood he farmed a part of his father's property for two years. At the close of that period he decided to change his location, and he then settled upon a farm in the neighborhood of Jefferson, where he remained until his retirement, in 1898, when he made his home in Jefferson, Marion county, where he now lives. He now owns four hundred and fifty acres embodied in two farms, upon which is carried on general farming and stock-raising.

The marriage of Jesse W. Looney occurred in 1861, Miss Mary Gunsaulus, of Illinois, becoming his wife. She had emigrated to Oregon in 1853. Of three children born to them Fred is a farmer in Marion county; Frank is located in Jefferson; and Walton is on the home farm. Though a Republican in politics Mr. Looney has never sought political preferment, as he has always inclined to the quiet, industrious life of a country gentleman. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and of the Grange.

JOHN A. SHAW. Among the well known business men of Linn and Marion counties is John A. Shaw, general manager of the Curtis Lumber Mills at Lake City, and a prominent resident of Albany. Enterprising and capable, with a remarkable degree of push and energy, he has been especially active in advancing the lumber interests of this section of the state, and has likewise taken a noteworthy part in promoting the general prosperity of town and county. He was born December 2, 1849, on a farm near Lakeside, Oxford county, Ontario, Canada.

John A. Shaw obtained a practical education in the district schools of Lakeside, Ont., and worked on the old home farm until after attaining his majority. During winters of the following two years, from 1869 until 1871, he was employed in the lumber regions of Michigan, and was engaged in logging. Coming to Oregon in 1875, he carried on general farming near Salem for awhile. In 1878, with Thomas Sims, he purchased the Stayton saw-mill, and for five years was successfully employed as a lumber manufacturer and dealer. Forming a partnership with W. H. Hobson & Company in 1883, Mr. Shaw embarked in the mercantile business in Stayton, Marion county, and for many years had an extensive and lucrative trade. Organizing the Santiam Lumber Company in 1887, he was made secretary and manager. Erecting the first and only saw-mill in Mill City, the company engaged in the manufacture of lumber on an extensive scale, their plant having a capacity of 35,000 feet per day. In 1899 the company dissolved, selling the mill property to the Curtis Lumber Company, of which Mr. Shaw was made general manager, a position that he has since ably and satisfactorily filled, his wide experience in the lumber business particularly qualifying him for the office. The plant has since been enlarged, having now a capacity of 80,000 feet per day, and the two hundred employes are kept busy in supplying the coast markets with its products. Taking up his residence in Albany in 1896, Mr. Shaw is numbered among its most progressive citizens. After an absence of more than a quarter of a century, he, accompanied by his wife and son, Angus, in June, 1901, visited his old home in Ontario, being away two months, the trip being in every way most enjoyable.

Mr. Shaw married, July 3, 1873, in Ontario, Canada, Elizabeth Quinn, who was born in Thamesford, Ontario. Four children blessed their union, namely: Robert S., who was educated in Albany College, the State Normal School at Monmouth, and a graduate of the Salem Business College, and is now a merchant in Mill City, Ore.; Angus Albert, who was graduated from Albany College, is engaged in mercantile pursuits at Gates, Ore.; Daniel O., a student at Albany College, died in August, 1900, aged seventeen years; and James Royal is a student at Albany College. Politically Mr. Shaw is a firm Republican. Fraternally he was made a Mason in Pearl Lodge, A. F. & A. M., of Turner, and now belongs to Santiam Lodge, at Stayton; he joined the Scio Chapter, R. A. M. and is now a member of Bayley Chapter, R. A. M.; is a member of Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T.; and belongs to the Mill City Lodge, I. O. O. F. Both Mr. and Mrs. Shaw are members of the Presbyterian Church at Mill City.

WILLIAM C. KRUGER. Prior to entering upon a retired life in Newberg in 1902, William C. Kruger had an extended experience as an agriculturist and business man, and that he was successful in both departments of activity is shown by his present affluent and thoroughly comfortable circumstances. Mr. Kruger has erected a commodious house in a pleasant part of the town, and, because of ill health, is contemplating spending the coming winter in the milder climate of California. This esteemed and well known German-American was born in Westphalia, Germany, December 20, 1847, his father, Fred, being a native of the same part of the country.

The Kruger family came to America in 1868, locating on a farm in Manitowoc county, Wis., from where they removed to Iowa in 1876. The father purchased a large farm in Adair county, and farmed and raised stock almost up to the time of his death in 1900. His wife, Fredericka, was a native of the same part of Germany, and though dying at the comparatively early age of forty-six years, seven months and seven days, was the mother of ten children, five of whom attained maturity, three sons and two daughters, of whom William C. is the third.

Soon after coming to the United States in 1866, William C. Kruger found employment near Newton, Jasper county, Iowa, and in time saved sufficient money to purchase one hundred and twenty acres of land. This he improved to the best of his ability, and in 1877 came to Oregon, spending one year in Portland. Not entirely content with the prospects in the northwest he returned to Cherokee county, Iowa, but soon had a return of the western fever, and determined to again try his luck in the great timber state. In 1887 he bought a hardware and implement business in Newberg, and from a comparatively small beginning increased his business from time to time, and finally gained the greater part of the patronage of his section. His health being undermined, he was advised to step out of business entirely, and in 1902 sold out to A. R. Moomaw & Son, and in Newberg built his present residence on First street.

For his first wife Mr. Kruger married Lizzie Grauer, also a native of Germany, and whose father, Jacob, came to America in 1866, locating in Iowa, where his death occurred. Two children were born to them, Rosa and Leland. Mr. Kruger married for a second time Mrs. Ida May, daughter of Lewis Platt of Newberg. They have one child, Gladys. Mr. Kruger is a Republican in politics, and has twice been a member of the town council. Fraternally he is associated with the Blue Lodge, F. & A. M., and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Artisans. He is well known in Yamhill county, and in all his dealings has won the respect and confidence of the community at large.

FRANCIS A. MORRIS is one of the most energetic and capable real estate, insurance and loan men in Yamhill county. Equipped with a common school education, excellent home training, and considerable mercantile experience, he came to Newberg about sixteen years ago, and has since been active in mercantile and real estate circles. Boone county, Ind., where Mr. Morris was born October 10, 1852, was the home of his father, William E., who became identified with the town of Thorntown, as a young man, and in time was one of the most prominent men in the community. He was born in North Carolina, where his father, Zachariah, was also born, the latter being a planter and land owner in his native state.

William E. Morris married Ella Binford, she being a native of Virginia, and whose parents were pioneers of Montgomery county, Ind. Soon after he removed to Bloomingdale, Park county, where he engaged in a general merchandise business, and also ran a grist-mill. These combined industries proved most profitable and netted their owner at least a comfortable fortune. He has reached the age of seventy-five years and is still enjoying the respect and appreciation of his fellowmen. Five children were born to himself and wife, one son and four daughters, of whom Francis A. is the oldest;

Mrs. Stanton Newlin, living near Bloomingdale, Ind.; Mrs. Fred M. Davis of Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. Edgar Palm, also of Minneapolis, Minn.; and Alice, who died at the age of fourteen years.

The first actual business experience of Mr. Morris was acquired as a clerk in a dry goods house in Indianapolis, Ind., with which he was connected in increasingly responsible capacities for about ten years, at the time of his resignation being assistant manager. After coming to Newberg he engaged in a general merchandise business for about twelve years in partnership with B. C. Miles, an outline of whose career may be found elsewhere in this work. Upon disposing of his store interests Mr. Morris embarked upon his present undertakings in real estate, loans and insurance, and much valuable town and country property has in the meantime passed through his hands. Nor have his abilities been confined entirely to mercantile and real estate concerns, for so public-spirited a man must needs fill many niches in a wide-awake community. For two years he was president of the Chehalem Valley Bank, and he has taken an active interest in promoting the erection of modern and substantial buildings. The firm of Morris & Mills was responsible for the first brick building in the old town of Newberg. As a Republican Mr. Morris has contributed his share towards filling important offices, and aside from being councilman for many terms, he has served as mayor of the town for two terms. He is a welcome member of various fraternal organizations, including the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World, in both of which he is extremely active.

At his old home in Indiana Mr. Morris was united in marriage with A. M. Maris, who was born in Park county, Ind., a daughter of Jonathan Maris, a native of North Carolina. Mr. Maris was a farmer for many years in Indiana, of which state he was a very early pioneer. He came to Oregon to visit his daughter and son-in-law, and died here at an advanced age. Mr. Morris is a member of the Society of Friends. A peculiarity in connection with the family of Mr. Morris is that there has been established for many years a circular letter system, put into effect periodically, and by means of which information concerning every member is passed around with the greatest regularity, no stoppage being allowed for more than four days. This custom is a very old one, and is so interesting and admirable that one wonders why it is not oftener utilized to preserve an interest in members of a given family.

tial citizens of Newberg, he has a meritorious record as a farmer and large landowner in Wisconsin, Minnesota and Oregon, in which states he has promoted in no small measure agricultural, educational, moral and general growth.

The fine and substantial traits of character which have made the canny Scotchman a welcome settler in any country under the sun are inherited by Mr. Larkin from a long line of Scottish ancestors, first represented in America by his paternal grandfather, John Larkin, who was a sailor and died at a comparatively early age. John Larkin, son of the mariner, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., and when a young man engaged in the restaurant business in Boston, Mass. In 1846 he located among the pioneers of Wayne county, N. Y., where he bought ninety-six acres of land near Massadon, and lived there until his retirement in 1856 to a couple of acres of land at East Marshfield, Mass. The last years of his life were spent in Michigan, where he bought one hundred acres of land, and where he lived until his death at the age of seventy-five years. He had quite an interesting life, and was fairly successful as a farmer, his youth having been enlivened by service in the war of 1812, when, at the age of seventeen, he enlisted as a privateersman with his father. He married Lydia Quimby, who was born in Maine, and whose father, Dr. Samuel Quimby, was a practicing physician during the greater part of his active life. Seven children were born of this union, two daughters and five sons, of whom John S. is the oldest living.

At the age of eighteen John S. Larkin began to clerk in a store at Liberty Square, Boston, Mass., and in 1855 removed to Wisconsin, settling on one hundred and sixty acres of government land in Adams county. He improved his land and raised general produce, and in 1863 located in Blue Earth county, Minn., and took up six hundred acres of land. This continued to be his home until 1887, when he came to Oregon and near Newberg purchased one hundred and twenty-eight acres of land. At first he engaged in general farming, but later planted an orchard of prunes, pears and apples, the products of which constituted his principal source of revenue.

In Blue Earth county, Minn, January 22, 1866, Mr. Larkin was united in marriage with Eliza Jarman, who was born in St. Clair county, Mich., a daughter of a Michigan farmer who removed to Minnesota and then to Iowa, in which latter state his death occurred. Seven children were born of this union, of whom six are living: The children in the order of their birth are as follows: Charles; Josephine, wife of N. C. Christenson; John; Elizabeth, who died in Minnesota; George; Nellie, now Mrs. Hugh Nelson, of Newberg; and Jennie, living at home. Mr. Larkin has reason to be proud of his bright and enterprising sons, who inherit his adaptability and business capacity. George Larkin, a practicing and very successful young dentist of this town, was educated in the commercial and common schools of Minnesota and Oregon, and also spent three years at the Pacific College of Newberg, and three years at the North Pacific Dental College, at Portland, from which latter institution he graduated with honors in May of 1902. Formerly a member of the Omega Dental Fraternity, he is now associated with the State Dental Society. Although but a short time out of college, he is making rapid strides towards the best that his profession holds, and he will undoubtedly rank among the best of his profession ere many years have elapsed. John Larkin, no less ambitious and successful than his brother, has ability of a mercantile order, and owns a half interest in the largest mercantile establishment in Newberg, the firm of Porter & Larkin. The sons are both living with their parents, and both are unmarried.

Mr. Larkin is a Democrat in national politics, and has been prominently before the public in support of his party. In Minnesota he was chairman of the board of supervisors during four or five terms, and was also member of the Minnesota legislature. He is fraternally connected with the Blue Lodge of Masons and the Eastern Star. Mr. Larkin has an enviable reputation in the community of Newberg, his sterling honesty, progressiveness, and all around worth having met with the deserved appreciation of his fellow-townsmen.

JAMES SIMPSON. Another one of the family names connected with the pioneer days of Oregon is that to which James Simpson is heir, a prominent citizen and farmer now living on a portion of the original donation claim upon which his father settled in 1847. The latter, William Simpson, was born on an old cotton plantation in North Carolina in 1794, his father being a member of a family long connected with the south. When ten years of age he went with his parents to another farm in Tennessee, and here grew to manhood, and in time married Mary Kimsey, settling on a farm of his own in the neighborhood. Outfitting with teams and wagons he took his wife to Howard county, and later to Johnson county, Mo., and in 1837 removed to Platt county, on the Platte purchase, where he took up government land and lived thereon until April, 1846. In Johnson county was born the son, James, December 23, 1833, the paternal farm being near Warrensburg, and in a very fertile tract of land. At one time there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Platte Purchase, as there was throughout the whole middle western section, and William Simpson was one of the first to seriously consider the proposition of uprooting entirely and removing to the far west. Having decided to do so, he packed together such possessions as would be required for housekeeping in the new country, and with two wagons, one with four, and the other with three yoke of oxen, he set forth with his wife and eight children for the hopeful country beyond the mountains. Behind him remained one child who was old enough to look out for himself, and one child lay in its grave in a little Missouri churchyard. Leaving home April 18, 1846, they arrived in Yamhill county, Ore., in September, and spent the first year in North Yamhill.

In the fall of 1847 Mr. Simpson located on the farm upon a portion of which his son James now lives in the Waldo Hills. Two and a half miles from Aumsville he took up six hundred and forty acres, upon which he built a rude log house 16x16 feet, and containing but one room. In these circumscribed quarters this large family lived contentedly and even happily. Fortunately game was plentiful, and the head of the family was a good shot, and in the creeks was an abundance of fish. Several of the children were old enough to make themselves useful in clearing the land, and the good work grew apace until a semblance of civilization took the place of primeval stillness and inactivity. Mr. Simpson was a great church man, and he organized and helped to build the first Baptist Regular Church in this section of the country. He also had much to do with building and improving the schools, and in the making of roads. In 1858, the year in which he died, occurred also the death of his faithful wife, and thus even in death this well-mated and always helpful couple were not divided. Of the children, Ellen married James Anderson; Thomas K., deceased, came to Oregon in 1851; Benjamin lives in Portland; Harriet, deceased, was the wife of Larkin Price; Mary A., deceased, was the wife of William Macklin; Elizabeth, deceased, was the wife of N. B. Wisdom; David is a resident of Salem; Martha J., deceased, was the wife of N. Ford; James and W. B., who live in Salem.

To a boy of thirteen the journey across the plains was invariably a most interesting proceeding, and James Simpson was no exception to the rule. He helped to drive the cattle and make himself generally useful, and after locating on the donation claim with his parents and brothers and sisters, found time during the winter season to attend the early subscription school held in a little log house in the neighborhood. At the age of nineteen he rented land and engaged independently in farming, and in 1853 married

Mary C. Havens, who was born in Missouri, and came to Oregon in 1852. In 1854 Mr. Simpson brought his young wife to the farm which is still their home, and which consists of two hundred and thirty acres, one hundred and fifty of which are part of the old donation claim. He is engaged in general farming, and upon his fertile meadows graze large numbers of fine stock. He is progressive and popular, and his farm presents a scene of activity, thrift and neatness. He is a Democrat in political affiliation, but has never sought or desired official recognition. Ten children have been born into the family, of whom Gilbert died at the age of three years; Cassie is the widow of Hiram H. Hicks; Melissa Ann is deceased; Nancy J. is deceased; Rosa is at home; William; James; Frank; John E. is deceased; and Barnett, deceased.

PHILIP PHILE. For many years a familiar and interesting figure in the river life of Corvallis, Ore., Mr. Phile has won by his genial and whole-souled manner a host of friends among the people whom he has ferried across the Willamette river. Not a native son of this state, nor yet of the nation, Mr. Phile has, however, grown strongly attached to the land of his adoption and in proportion as it has given him prosperity he has returned an earnest patriotism and hearty interest in public events, a characteristic of value in the citizens of a country.

The forefathers of Philip Phile have long been natives of the grand duchy of Baden, Germany, where they have engaged in the cultivation of the soil, his father, Christopher Phile, passing his entire life in that location, his wife, Magdalene also giving to her children, of whom there were five sons and one daughter, an inheritance of the qualities of this section of Germany. Philip was the fourth child in the family, and was born August 31, 1825, in Baden-Baden, near Karlsruhe, and under his father's instruction was reared to the life of a farmer. His early education was received in the German schools. Upon attaining manhood he decided to try his fortunes in the great land of the western world of which he had heard so much, whose only drawback was the change of language and the loneliness which must necessarily follow the wanderer from home and friends. To alleviate this latter burden his sister, the one daughter of the family, took upon herself the hardships of the pioneer, and together the young people boarded the sailer, Havre, at the city of that name in France, and after the remarkably short voyage of twenty-one days they arrived in New York city, the trip having been made on the best clipper of the ocean.

Having an uncle by the name of Fred K. Zimmerman living near Wheeling, Ill., Mr. Phile at once sought the middle west, coming by the way of Chicago, and though there were opportunities in plenty in that city he did not care to make it his home, as at that time Chicago seemed to be somewhat precariously located in the mud and water about Lake Michigan, without any clear distinction as to where the lake ended and the land began. Hunting up his uncle he went to work on a farm in the vicinity of Wheeling, remaining there for five years, at the end of that time coming still farther west, a corruption of Horace Greeley's advice being "Go as far west as you can." With a party of ox-teams he left Illinois early in March over the old Oregon trail, crossing the Mississippi river at Rock Island and striking the Missouri river in almost a direct line west of that place, crossing the latter where the town of Council Bluffs is located. The trip was a long and tedious one, not differing greatly from the many others made in that early day. The party was never left without a guard, day or night, each man's duty being a half of the night. After an eight months journey the party arrived safely in the Willamette valley, and Mr. Phile went at once to Linn county to Cushman's place, and in passing through Corvallis he was offered work at the ferry, but did not then accept. After spending the winter in King's valley hauling rails he returned to Corvallis and accepted the offer made him in November, going to work for Isaac Moore, the ferryman. Later Mr. Moore built a new boat, following the suggestions of Mr. Phile, who had in mind for a model a boat which plied upon the river Rhine. The boat was a great success, and Mr. Phile made himself of so much value, not only through his suggestions but by his steady, trustworthy work, that the ferry company, which had now become a firm of two under the firm name of Moore & St. Clair, employed him to conduct the ferry. Originally a rope ferry was used in the conveyance of people at this point, the buoy ferry later taking the place of the more primitive affair, this also being at the suggestion of Mr. Phile. For twenty-one years Mr. Phile served in the capacity of ferryman for Corvallis, and the few moment's talk as the little boat swung out into the stream sent many a traveler on his way with a lighter heart, for a merry word and a genial smile were as truly a part of this man's life as the daily work which was given him to do. In storm and sunshine his boat plied upon the river, and he recalls many times when the tide was running high and peril was imminent, but no accident ever came to him to mar the enjoyment of the life which he followed. For ten years he bore the responsibility of conveying the overland mail across the river in the night, the one from Portland coming in at eleven p. m., followed by the San Francisco mail at two a. m. In 1874 Mr. Phile retired from his duties, erecting a house in Corvallis, where he has since made his home.

February 10, 1875, Mr. Phile allied himself by marriage with a descendant of a German family, Mrs. Catherine (Rodemocher) Tideman, who had removed to Corvallis in 1863. She was born in Germany, on the estate of Hanover, her grandfather, John, and father, Biern, both being natives of the same place, where they engaged in farming. Her mother, Margaret Gossen, was also born in that locality, and was the daughter of a farmer. Of the eight children born to her father and mother six came to the United States and settled in Oregon, four of whom are now living, and are as follows: Lucy, now Mrs. Tideman of Portland; Annie, Mrs. Schlosser of Albany; Carsten, of Corvallis, now a retired farmer; and Catherine, now the wife of Mr. Phile of this review. In 1860 Mrs. Tideman commenced the journey toward Oregon, coming from New York city to Aspinwall, and after crossing the Isthmus of Panama she took passage on a steamer bound for San Francisco and from there to Portland, the remainder of the trip to Corvallis being made by stage. She was married in San Francisco in 1860 to Matthias Tideman, also a native of Hanover, and who had come to the Californian mines in 1850. In Linn county Mr. Tideman took up a claim located three miles east of Corvallis, where he engaged in farming. In 1871 Mr. and Mrs. Tideman took a pleasure trip back to their German home, returning in 1872, when Mr. Tideman died of smallpox in a hospital in New York city, the widow finishing the journey alone. The three children born of the union, Caroline, Mary and Henry, all died in youth.

Mr. Phile takes an intelligent interest in the affairs of his adopted town, and is always ready to assist in any worthy movement toward the development of its resources. Politically he has been a stanch Republican since the Civil war, and through this influence has served as councilman for one term. He is a member of the Lutheran Church.

J. B. SHANKS. The Shanks family in Oregon is associated with successful agricultural enterprises, and with an earnest and hopeful ministry in the old school Baptist Church. J. B. Shanks, representing the second generation in the northwest, and the owner of a farm near Monitor, Marion county, was born on a farm in Carroll county, Ind., March 11, 1839, and is the son of Abner and Anna (Lenon) Shanks, natives of Ohio, and the former born in Miami county, December 27, 1810.

Abner Shanks, the founder of the family in Oregon, moved with his parents from Ohio to Indiana as early as 1829, and there settled on a farm in a comparatively wild section of country. His father was a minister in the Baptist Church, and from him the son undoubtedly inherited his ability as a preacher and humanitarian. About 1853 the family removed to Iowa, where Abner Shanks followed farming and preaching, and also for a time engaged in the general merchandise business. In 1865 he outfitted for the long journey across the plains, and during the passage encountered numerous difficulties with the Indians, although his family stood the trip with great courage, reaching their destination in Marion county in comparatively good health and spirits. For seven or eight years Mr. Shanks lived on a farm in the Waldo Hills, and then purchased a farm on Howell's Prairie, which continued to be his home until 1882. In the meantime he had continuously preached the gospel, and in this way accomplished much good, filling many hearts with hope and encouragement. Eventually he took up his residence in Turner, but after the death of his second wife, who was formerly Elizabeth Ewing, he lived with his children, his death occurring at Stayton, November 26, 1902, at the age of ninety-two years. He was a genial, kindly man, very public-spirited and liberal, and during his helpful earthly pilgrimage made many friends. Of the children born of his first marriage five are living: J. B., of University Park, Portland; N. J., of North Yakima county, Wash.; Henry, of Weston, Ore.; J. S., of Turner, Ore.; and Elizabeth, widow of J. M. Hosier, of Mt. Angel. Mr. Shanks' first wife died in Indiana, and of the second union there were born six children, of whom five are now living: Levi, of Portland; Benjamin, of Palouse, Wash.; Martha, wife of H. Anderson, of Stayton; Maggie, wife of M. Anderson, of Oregon City; and Anna, wife of F. Cook of Grant's Pass.

With a common school education at his command, and with the mental balance acquired in a Christian and very orderly home, J. B. Shanks started out to make his way in the world when twenty-two years of age, and after engaging in teaming for one year went to Montana and mined and prospected for a couple of years. In 1865 he met his people at Boise City and came with them to Marion county, where he resumed teaming up to the time of his marriage. His wife was formerly Sarah Lenon, a native of Indiana, who crossed the plains in the same train with her husband, settling with her parents on a farm in Marion county. The young people went to house-keeping in the Waldo Hills for a couple of years, and then removed to Monitor, remaining in that town for twelve years. Mr. Shanks then purchased his present home of one hundred and twenty acres one and a fourth miles southeast of Monitor, three miles from a railroad and here he has since engaged in general farming and stock-raising. At present he has fifty acres under cultivation, and his buildings and general improvements are in accordance with scientific and intelligent farming. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Shanks, of whom Luella is the wife of Charles McKee, of McKee, Ore.; Anna is the wife of F. M. Girard, of Monitor, Ore.; L. S., Jr., of Monitor; and Misses Mary and Maggie, of Portland. Three of the children died in infancy.

Mr. Shanks is one of the very prominent men of this community, and to an exceptional degree enjoys the confidence of his fellow townsmen. He has abundant opportunities to display his public spirit and broad-mindedness, and has demonstrated in various ways his possession of those characteristics which go to make up the acknowledged man of affairs. No worthy movement toward the promotion of the public welfare is allowed to pass unnoticed by him. He has always exhibited a desire to witness the highest possible improvement in the moral, intellectual and spiritual condition of those surrounding him. It is to such men as Mr. Shanks that the state of Oregon owes a debt that it can never pay, for the high and unselfish spirit which has actuated all his actions in dealing with matters outside of his own domestic circles. He is entitled to rank with the most thoroughly representative men of the Willamette valley, and to occupy a position of prominence in a record of this character.

B. A. CATHEY, M. D. The world instinctively pays deference to the man whose success has been worthily achieved, who has attained wealth by honorable business methods, acquired the highest reputation in his chosen calling by merit, and whose social prominence is not the less the result of an irreproachable life than of recognized natural gifts. We pay the highest tribute to the heroes who on battlefields win victories and display a valor that is the admiration of the world. Why should the tribute be withheld from those who wage the bloodless battles of civil life, who are conquerors in the world of business? Greater than in almost any line of work is the responsibility which rests upon the physician. The issues of life and death are in his hands. An incorrect prescription, an unskilled operation may take from man that which he prizes above all else—life. The physician's power must be his own; not by purchase, by gift or by influence can he gain it. He must commence at the very beginning, learn the very rudiments of medicine and surgery, continually add to his knowledge by close study and earnest application and gain reputation by merit. If he would gain the highest prominence it must come as the result of superior skill, knowledge and ability, and these qualifications are possessed in an eminent degree by Dr. Cathey. He is known as one of the most eminent members of the profession in the Willamette valley and his opinions are largely recognized as authority throughout this section of the state.

Dr. Cathey was born near Gresham, Multnomah county, Ore., on the 17th of February, 1854, and is a son of W. G. and Thersa J. (Cornutt) Cathey. The father was a native of Johnson county, Mo., and the grandfather, Andrew Cathey, died in that state. W. G. Cathey was reared as a farmer boy and in the fall of 1853 he came to Oregon, making the overland trip with ox-teams. He settled near what is now Gresham in Powells valley and purchased a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of land, after which he turned his attention to agricultural pursuits. He now resides on the old homestead, retaining possession of eighty acres of land. His farm is along the street car line from Portland. His wife, also a native of Missouri, is a daughter of Alfred Cornutt, who was born in Virginia, whence he emigrated westward, becoming a Missouri farmer. In 1853 he made the journey by ox-team to Oregon and here followed farming near Gresham for a period of ten years. He then removed to Douglas county where he purchased a farm and carried on agricultural pursuits until his death. He was a local minister of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Cathey, the doctor's father, is now living at the age of seventy years, but the mother passed away in 1888. In their family were eleven children, of whom six yet survive.

The doctor spent the days of his boyhood and youth upon the home farm. If the roll of successful and prominent business men were called to determine what were their early surroundings it would be found that a large majority had been reared amid rural scenes, gaining there strength for the duties of later life. The doctor attended the district schools and for a short time was a student in the Portland high school. He engaged in teaching for six months and then entered the Albany College, where he remained for a period of six months. He then accepted the position of principal of the North Brownsville school, where he served for four terms, after which he again spent a year in Albany College. Thus he worked his way through, meeting the expenses of his course by teaching in the public schools and also by teaching vocal music. For one year he was the principal of the Halsey school and he afterward taught in Canyonville and in Riddles. He was principal of the Roseburg school for three years and then returned to Canyonville as principal of the schools of that place. During four years of this time he was also engaged in reading medicine, for he had determined to engage in the practice of the profession as a lifework. Soon after his return to Canyonville he had to dismiss his school on account of an epidemic of diphtheria. Some difficulty arising, the local physician had to leave the town and his patrons came to Dr. Cathey for medical assistance, knowing that he had for some time been studying. It was thus that he began practice and the doctor said that his early work in that direction was the hardest he had ever done in connection with his professional career. It was not his desire to engage in practice before he had completed his medical studies, but he finally assented to the wishes of the people of the community and was very successful in his work. He lost only three cases out of thirty and two of these had been treated by others before his services were called upon. The disease had reached its last stages when he attempted to render assistance, so that in reality he lost but one case out of twenty-eight. A year later another physician located in the town and began practice. Dr. Cathey then proposed to discontinue his own labors in the profession, but those who had employed him opposed this step and he therefore continued in practice at that place for four and a half years. He sold out his drug store in order to give his entire attention to the alleviation of human suffering, and his success indicated that nature certainly intended him for that line of activity.

In the fall of 1888 Dr. Cathey entered the medical department of Willamette University, which was then located in Portland, and was graduated in that institution in 1890 with the degree of M. D. He then located in Woodburn, where he practiced until 1899, when the medical college was transferred from Portland to Salem and in that school he was elected professor of physiology, filling the chair for four years, when he resigned in order to establish his home in Corvallis. Since coming to this city he has built up a very extensive practice, in fact, is regarded as one of the leading physicians in the valley. As a medical and also as a surgical practitioner he has been extremely successful and has the largest surgical practice in the city and county.

Dr. Cathey was married in Brownsville, Ore., to Miss Lucinda Elizabeth McFeron, who was born in Missouri, and their marriage has been blessed with five children: Cecil C., George A., Collins F., Alice Marie and Evelyn. The second son is now a student in the medical department of the Willamette University. The doctor became a Mason in Canyonville, became a charter member of the lodge at Woodburn and is now affiliated with Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, A. F. & A. M. He is also connected with the Order of the Eastern Star and the Woodmen of the World. His religious faith is indicated by his membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, in which he is serving as a trustee. Professionally he is connected with the State Medical Society and he is continually reading and studying in order to promote his skill and efficiency in the line of a profession which by many is regarded as the most important to which man can direct his energies. His knowledge is broad and comprehensive, and not only has he a love of his calling because of his scientific interests, but also because of his broad humanitarian spirit. Dr. Cathey today stands among the most eminent members of the profession in the Willamette valley and is possessed of marked ability and comprehensive professional learning.

MARTIN WOODCOCK. There is something in the story of the life of the pioneer that is always of keenest interest. This is perhaps because it displays bravery such as is manifested by the soldier on the field of battle. It requires no little heroism and strength of purpose to meet the conditions which existed on a frontier region, and it is well that we preserve the history of those who met those conditions and made their portion of the country habitable, rich in fruitage and pleasing to the eye. Martin Woodcock was one of the distinguished early settlers of Oregon who became a prominent factor in the business life of Benton county. Wherever he went he commanded the respect and confidence of those with whom he was associated and his life history contains many elements which are worthy of emulation and should serve as a source of inspiration to others.

Mr. Woodcock was born in Schoharie county, N. Y., July 20, 1824, and passed away in the early morning of March 22, 1884, his life record therefore covering almost sixty years. He was a son of William and Catherine Woodcock. His ancestors, as far back as is known, were from Holland, whence they went to England and from the latter country three brothers of the name crossed the Atlantic to the Empire state. From one of these the subject of this review was descended. On his mother's side the first ancestors, as far as is now known, were Peter Cooper, Martin Cooper, Catherine Hamm and Regina

Krum, all of whom were born in the town of Westerwald, Prussia. Coming to America they settled in Livingstone Manor in Dutchess county, N. Y., in 1761. From the marriage of Peter Cooper and Catherine Hamm there sprung two children, one of whom was given the name of Peter and was born July 6, 1775. By the marriage of Martin Cooper and Regina Krum there were seven children, one of whom was named Regina Cooper. In 1796 Peter C. Cooper, the son of Peter Cooper, and Regina, the daughter of Martin Cooper, were married and unto them were born nine children, including Catherine, who on August 12, 1821, gave her hand in marriage to William Woodcock. Mr. and Mrs. Woodcock, accompanied by six of their children, including Martin, who was then fourteen years of age, left New York in 1838 and settled in what was then the wilderness of Woodland in Wisconsin, about eight miles from where now stands the city of Milwaukee. There the father, with the assistance of his sons, Horace and Martin, hewed out a farm in the midst of the heretofore unbroken forests, earning the means with which to pay for the homestead by cutting cord wood. From that time on Martin Woodcock assisted in the work of the home farm and was there reared to manhood. He lived under the parental roof until twenty-four years of age and on August 28, 1848, he was united in marriage to Amanda J. White. They became the parents of one son and two daughters. The son, M. S. Woodcock, is now president of the First National Bank and is ex-mayor of Corvallis. One daughter, Mrs. Eva L. Stannus, born February 7, 1855, resides in Idaho. The other daughter, Carrie L., was born July 2, 1865. When gold was discovered in California the news of the find spread like wildfire throughout the country. It reached the ears of Mr. Woodcock and others in Wisconsin and, being attracted by the many advantages then offered on the far-off Pacific coast, Mr. Woodcock resolved to seek his fortune in the west, and, with his wife and son, accompanied by his older brother, Horace, with the latter's wife, and a younger brother, W. C. Woodcock, and his sister, Rena A. Dayton and her husband, H. C. Dayton, started for Oregon on February 24, 1853. It was mid-winter, and in wagons drawn by oxen they loaded all that they possessed and turned their faces toward the setting sun in search of the land of promise—the then but little known Oregon. After a long and tiresome journey across the plains they arrived at their destination on September 24, and after looking over various parts of the Willamette valley for land subject to location under the donation act Mr. Woodcock and his brother, W. C., settled upon adjoining farms about fourteen miles west of Eugene City in Lane county.

This land was wild and unimproved, but with characteristic energy Mr. Woodcock began its development and there lived for about four years, during which time he built a new home and made good improvements upon his property. During the succeeding two years he was engaged in learning the wagonmaker's trade of a neighbor, Jacob H. Wellsher and in the fall of 1859 Martin Woodcock and his brother Horace joined Mr. Wellsher in forming a partnership for the purpose of engaging in the manufacture of wagons and carriages. They all removed to Monroe, Benton county, where they continued in that business until the winter of 1863, during which time they built up a large trade. Their wagons found favor with the public because of their neatness, durability, light draft and the evident care with which they were constructed. They thus had many purchasers, some of whom came from long distances.

About the time of his removal to Monroe, Martin Woodcock also entered into partnership with his brother, W. C. Woodcock, for the purpose of conducting a general mercantile business at that place. They established their store and conducted it with success until the winter of 1869. In the spring of 1874 Mr. Woodcock, with his wife and daughter, removed to east Portland and in the succeeding fall he purchased a part of the William Herron farm near Salem, whereon he resided for some time. He built another home there and devoted his energies to the supervision of his farming interests until the spring of 1882, when he sold that property. During the following summer, accompanied by his wife and youngest daughter, he visited the old home in Wisconsin where his aged mother was still living on the land he had helped to clear for her and his father in his early boyhood days. She was then seventy-eight years of age. Returning to Oregon, Mr. Woodcock then removed in April, 1883, to the farm about a mile east of Salem, which continued to be his place of abode until his demise. There he once more commenced to build a home for his old age in which he hoped to rest from hard work and care, but after an illness of a few weeks he died surrounded by his loved ones and many friends. He passed away at the age of fifty-nine years, eight months and two days. In February, 1884, he had been summoned to serve on the county jury. The weather at that time was very cold and there was a deep snow. During the first week of his jury services Mr. Woodcock contracted a severe cold, but instead of asking to be excused by the court he continued to act on the jury and at the end of the two weeks his cold had developed into a severe attack of pneumonia, which resulted in his death. Thus closed the life of another honored pioneer, whose best years were closely identified with the growth and prosperity of his beloved Oregon. His life was characteristic of untiring energy and unswerving integrity. He was often heard to say that his whole aim in life was to do to others as he would wish others to do unto him, and this motto was not lightly regarded by him, but had a broad significance which made it enter into every detail of his daily life, and to be his rule and guide in all transactions with his fellow-men. When he neared the end and the shadows of death were falling across his path, almost his last words were that he could look back over every act of his life with satisfaction. This was because he had never taken advantage of the necessities of his fellow-men, but had lived honorably with them and therefore he was not afraid to die. One who knew him paid the following tribute to his memory: "His scrupulous exactness in performing all he promised and his straight-forward course in whatever path duty called, regardless of all else, had gained him the respect of all who came in contact with him and the esteem and warmest affection of those who knew him best. Many will mourn him as a friend gone and his memory will be cherished long after his form is returned to dust from whence it came. May his fidelity to his favorite motto exemplified in his whole life give it new and nobler meaning to his friends who survive him."

AUGUST HODES is a very successful grocery merchant of Corvallis and therefore a leading representative of commercial interests in the city. He is one of the worthy citizens that Germany has furnished to the new world, his birth having occurred in Herstelle, Westphalia. His paternal grandfather, Cornelius Hodes, was also a native of that country and was engaged in the canal-boat business. Becoming a member of the German army, he served in one of the wars in that country. His religious faith was that of the Catholic Church. Henry Hodes, the father of our subject, was also born and reared in Westphalia and became a mason and builder, while later he was superintendent of large stone quarries at Herstelle. There he died in the year 1880, and his community mourned the loss of one of its representative business men. He married Miss Julia Hodes, who was born in Westphalia, but although of the same name belonged to a different family. She died in 1863 when our subject was nine years of age, and the father was afterward again married. By the first union there were four children, three of whom are still living, namely: Amelia, now Mrs. Zierolf, of Corvallis; August; and Mrs. Mina Wusterfeldt, of Corvallis. Of the second marriage

The birth of August Hodes occurred on March 27, 1853, and in his parents' home the days of his youth were passed, while in the common schools he pursued his education. From boyhood he followed canal boating until seventeen years of age and then in 1871, thinking that he might have better opportunities in the new world, he came to America, sailing from Bremen to New York. He then made his way across the country to San Francisco, Cal., and thence traveled to Portland, Ore. In May, 1871, he arrived in Corvallis, where he has since made his home with exception of a short time passed in Eugene, where he was employed in a hotel and afterward by a dentist, being thus engaged until December, 1872, when he returned to Corvallis. He then entered the service of Henry Warrior, a merchant of Corvallis, with whom he remained until May, 1881, when, with the capital he had acquired through his own efforts, he engaged in the grocery business as the senior member of the firm of A. Hodes & Company. In 1888 he purchased his partner's interest and has since continued alone in the business. He has a fine store on Main street in the center of the city in which he carries a full line of staple and fancy groceries. The store is characterized by neatness and cleanliness and is most attractive in its appearance, so that it has a liberal patronage.

In Corvallis Mr. Hodes was united in marriage to Miss Louise Bamberger, who was born in San Francisco, and is a daughter of Adam Bamberger, who came from Alsace, France, to the Pacific coast and was one of the early settlers of San Francisco. Later he engaged in the baking business in Corvallis and he now resides in Portland. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Hodes were born four children: Clemens and Carl G., who are with their father in the store; and Frances and Earl, at home.

Mr. Hodes is now serving for the third year as a member of the city council, and is on the fire and water committee. For a number of years he was a member of the fire department, belonging to the Big Six Engine Company. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of the Maccabees and politically is a Democrat. He is a very progressive and enterprising man, is liberal in matters of citizenship and endorses every movement for the welfare of Corvallis and gives to public measures for the general good his hearty co-operation.

MILTON S. WOODCOCK. A man's reputation is the property of the world. The laws of nature have forbidden isolation. Every human being submits to the controlling influence of others, or as a master spirit wields a power either for good or evil on the masses of mankind. There can be no impropriety in justly scanning the acts of any man as they affect his public and business relations. If he is honest and eminent in his chosen field of labor investigation will brighten his fame and point the path that others may follow with like success. From among the ranks of quiet, persevering yet prominent citizens—prominent on account of what he has done in commercial circles—there is no one more deserving of mention in a volume of this character than Milton S. Woodcock, who is ex-mayor of Corvallis and president of the First National Bank.

Hon. Milton S. Woodcock is a native of Wisconsin and has been a resident of Oregon since 1853. He was born in Wisconsin, near Greenfield, eight miles from Milwaukee, May 9, 1849, and is a son of Martin Woodcock a native of New York. The paternal grandfather, William Woodcock, removed from New York to Wisconsin, settling near Milwaukee at a pioneer epoch in the development of that state. The father of Milton S. became a farmer by occupation and in 1853 brought his family across the plains with ox-teams. In the same party traveled his older brother, Horace Woodcock and his family, his younger brother, William, who was then a single man, and his sister and brother-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Dayton. Martin Woodcock brought with him his wife and only son, the subject of this review, and settled fourteen miles west of Eugene on a donation claim, where he lived for four or five years. Removing then to Monroe, Benton county, he there engaged in merchandising with his younger brother, and was associated with his older brother in the manufacture of wagons. Subsequently he took up his abode in the vicinity of Salem, Marion county, where he resided until his death, which occurred when he was fifty-nine years of age. He married Amanda J. White, a native of the Empire state, who went with her parents to Wisconsin. She still survives, and is now living near Salem. In the family were three children, these being Milton S.; Mrs. Stannus, of Idaho; and Mrs. Savage, who is living near Salem.

Milton S. Woodcock, the eldest and the only son, was but a small lad when brought by his parents to the northwest. He is indebted to the public school system for the educational privileges he received in his youth. In his boyhood he was employed in his father's store, early becoming familiar with mercantile methods. In 1869 he began general merchandising on his own account in Monroe, conducting his business with a fair degree of success until 1874, when he sold his store there and sought a broader field of labor in Corvallis. In the meantime he had taken up the study of law under the direction of Colonel Kelsay and after completing his preliminary reading he was admitted to the bar in Salem in 1875. Mr. Woodcock then began the practice of his chosen profession in Corvallis and has since been identified with the legal profession, although many other interests have also claimed his attention. He was for a time engaged in the general hardware and implement business as a member of the firm of Woodcock & Baldwin, this association being maintained for fourteen years. In 1887 he established a private bank under the name of the Benton County Bank, which was opened for business in June, 1887. In 1890 he organized the First National Bank with a capital stock of $150,000 which was incorporated and from the beginning Mr. Woodcock has served as its president. After a time he disposed of his hardware business in order to devote his entire attention to his banking interests. Prosperity has come to him as the natural consequence of industry and close application, and his splendid success bears testimony to his mature judgment in business affairs. Whatever he has undertaken he has accomplished. He was not yet twenty years of age when he began merchandising on his own account, and he had a capital of less than $1,000, but he agreed to pay for the stock of goods which he purchased within a year. He worked hard, in fact, unremittingly, and through his business career, as at the outset he has fully met every obligation. Mr. Woodcock is a self-made man and, in a country where merit must win, Mr. Woodcock has achieved success. Wealth may secure a start, but it cannot maintain one in a position where brains and executive ability are required, and Mr. Woodcock did not have wealth to aid him in the beginning of his business career. His reliance has been placed on the more substantial qualities of perseverance, untiring enterprise, resolute purpose and commendable zeal, and withal his actions have been guided by an honesty of purpose. He is a true type of western progress and enterprise, the leading spirit which has produced the phenomenal growth of Oregon. His energy, prudent business methods and sagacity have all combined to make him one of the foremost business men of the great northwest.

Mr. Woodcock was married in Corvallis to Miss Emma J. Simpson, who was born in Philadelphia, Pa., a daughter of the Rev. Anthony Simpson, a native of Manchester, England, and on crossing the Atlantic took up his abode in Philadelphia. He was educated for the Presbyterian ministry and became an active factor in the work of that denomination. At the time of the Civil war he served as a chaplain, being sent into Virginia by the Young Men's Christian Association. In 1865 he came to Oregon by way of Panama, accompanied by his wife and four children. They sailed on the old boat Golden Rule, which was wrecked in the Caribbean sea in June, 1865. The ship went down but the passengers all escaped, and ten days later they were taken by a United States man-of-war to Aspinwall and on to Panama, where the Simpson family took passage on the steamer America for San Francisco. At the latter place they boarded the vessel Brother Jonathan, for Portland and safely reached their destination, but on its return trip that vessel was also wrecked. Rev. Simpson lived in Albany for some time, and afterward went to Olympia, Wash., acting as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church there for two years. In 1867 he removed to Corvallis to accept the pastorate of the church here and later he removed to a farm in Benton county upon which he afterward continued agricultural pursuits for some time. He also continued his ministerial work, and while there it was through his efforts that the First Presbyterian Church at Independence was built, and he served as pastor of this congregation for many years. He later returned to Philadelphia, Pa., where he died soon afterward. He was a man of marked influence, most zealous in his labors for the church and his efforts were productive of great good among his fellow-men. In his social relations he was a Mason. Mr. Simpson was united in marriage in early manhood to Miss Helen Crawford, who was born in County Antrim, Ireland, and was of Scotch-Irish lineage. She died in Albany, Ore. In their family were four children, of whom three are living: John H., who is a hardware merchant in Corvallis; Emma, the wife of M. S. Woodcock, of Corvallis; and George, of Seattle, Wash.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Woodcock have been born three children: A. R., who is a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College, is an ornithologist and stands at the head of that science in the state of Oregon; C. H. is connected with the First National Bank of Corvallis; and E. M. is the youngest of the family.

In his political views Mr. Woodcock is an earnest Republican and wields a wide influence in the councils of his party. In 1901 he was elected mayor of the city and his administration was one that gave entire satisfaction to the public because it was business-like, progressive and beneficial. A very prominent Mason, he was initiated into the order in Monroe Lodge No. 49, and is now connected with Corvallis Lodge No. 14. He likewise belongs to Ferguson Chapter, R. A. M., of Corvallis, of which he is the past high priest and he holds membership in Oregon Council of Corvallis, of which he is a past officer and is the past grand master of the Grand Council of Oregon. He is also a member of the

Joshua J. Walton

Order of High Priesthood and he and his wife are connected with the Eastern Star. Mr. Woodcock was the organizer of the Eastern Star lodge in Corvallis and served as its first worthy patron, acting in that capacity for several years. He is also identified with the State Pioneer Association and the American Bankers' Association. He is a man of enterprise, positive character, indomitable energy, strict integrity and liberal views, and has been fully identified with the growth and prosperity of the state of his adoption. He has persevered in the pursuit of a persistent purpose and gained a most satisfactory reward. He is a man of fine personal appearance, and his kindness, sympathy and generosity beam forth in his eye and are substantially manifest in his actions. His life is exemplary in many respects and he has the esteem of his friends and the confidence of those who have had business relations with him.

JUDGE JOSHUA J. WALTON. In the annals of Lane county no man occupies a more honorable and eminent position than Judge Joshua J. Walton, of Eugene. A man of undoubted integrity, superior ability and judgment, energetic and public-spirited, he has been an important factor in the upbuilding of the city in which he resides, uniformly advocating and working for the supremacy of those plans and measures which shall be of perpetual benefit to the community. In the establishment of the University of Oregon at Eugene, he was one of the prime movers, working hard to secure the necessary funds for its location there, and giving with an unstinting hand from his own private purse towards its erection. A son of Joshua J. Walton, he was born April 6, 1838, in Rushville, Ind. Of English ancestry, he is descended from one of three brothers who emigrated from England to America in colonial days, and settled in New England. His paternal grandfather, Capt. Thomas Walton, a resident of Connecticut, sailed the seas as master of his vessel, and while on one of his voyages was lost at sea with all his crew.

A native of Wethersfield, Conn., J. J. Walton, the elder, there grew to manhood, and learned the shoemaker's trade. Emigrating from New England to Indiana, he was there engaged in mercantile pursuits for a few years. In 1839 he removed to Illinois, locating near Springfield, and subsequently lived in St. Louis, Mo., and in Keosauqua, Iowa. In the spring of 1849 he again took up his march westward, coming with his family to Fremont, Cal., thence to Yreka, where he spent the winter. Locating in the Rogue river valley in the spring, he took up a donation claim near Ashland, on Wagner creek, being one of the original pioneers of that vicinity. Erecting a small log house, he commenced the improvement of a farm, in addition being engaged in packing and freighting from Scottsburg and the Willamette valley to Yreka, Cal. In 1853 he and his son, J. J., assisted in building the blockhouse at Fort Wagner, and were on guard there for nearly six months. On leaving the fort, he disposed of his ranch, and moved to Green valley, on the Umpqua river, where he carried on general farming and stock-raising for five years. Locating in Eugene City in 1858, he opened a general merchandise store which he managed several years. The following three years he and his son, J. J. Walton, were employed in mining, being at the Salmon river mines the first year, at Boise mines, near Idaho City, the second year, and at the Oyhee mines the third year. Returning then to Eugene, he was employed as a clerk until his retirement from active pursuits. He attained a venerable age, dying in Eugene at the age of four score and four years, in 1896. He had the distinction of voting for the constitutions of three states, of Iowa in 1846, of California in 1850, and of Oregon in 1858.

J. J. Walton married Ann M. Shockley, of Rushville, Ind. She was born near Flemingsburg, Ky., the birthplace of her father, William Shockley, who removed from Kentucky to Rushville, and there spent his declining years. She survived her husband, dying at the age of eighty-three years in 1901. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of their union nine children were born, namely: Mrs. Harriet E. Wilson, who died in Washington; Joshua, the special subject of this sketch; Mrs. Phebe Hughes, residing at Creswell, Ore; Mrs. Mary E. Coleman, of Coburg, Ore; C. Wesley, a resident of Spokane, Wash.; Amanda J., wife of St. John Skinner, of Wardner, Idaho; Ira D., of Springfield, Ore.; Henry E., who died at Salem Ore.; and Mrs. Lula Cole, of Spokane, Wash.

After living in Indiana, Illinois, Missouri and Iowa, Joshua J. Walton crossed the plains with his parents when a boy of eleven years, going with ox-teams to California in 1849, following the trail up the Platte river, and coming by way of Salt Lake, where the jaded cattle were exchanged for fresh ones. Thence they proceeded down the Humboldt, across the desert to Truckee, and on to Fremont, Cal., being from April until October making the trip. In 1851 they moved to Yreka, in the spring of 1852 to the Rogue river valley, and in the fall of the following year he came with the remainder of the family to Green valley, Ore., and subsequently assisted his father in packing and freighting between Oregon and California, and helped build Fort Wagner, as previously mentioned. Upon coming with the family to Eugene, in 1858, he attended the old Columbia college until the building was burned. Completing his education at Union University, under Professor Cornelius, he was afterwards engaged with his father in various mining enterprises, at the Salmon river mines, in 1862, making considerable money, but being unsuccessful at Boise Basin in the summer of 1863, and at the Oyhee mines in 1864. While at home, in the intervals of mining, he read law with Judge Riley E. Stratton, and after his admission to the bar, in 1863, began the practice of his profession in Eugene, where he has since continued most successfully, sometimes being in partnership with others, and sometimes alone. In 1868 he was elected county judge and served four years. In 1875 he was appointed to the office by Governor Grover and in 1876 was elected to the office for a term of four years. Judge Walton also served as deputy district attorney four years, and has been United States commissioner since his first appointment, in 1884, by Judge Deady, having been reappointed by Judge Bellinger.

Taking a keen interest in educational matters, Judge Walton was one of the five men present at the meeting held in the old schoolhouse, in July, 1872, to consult in regard to plans for having a university located in Eugene, the others present being B. F. Dorris, the late John M. Thompson, the late John C. Arnold, and the late S. H. Spencer. The first thought of these gentlemen had simply been to have a higher grade school established here, but on Mr. Thompson's proposition to try and secure the university for this place, the meeting adjourned until some future time in order that more definite action might be taken. Subsequently the Union University Association was organized for the purpose of securing the incorporation of a university, Judge Walton being elected one of the directors, and secretary of the board. Drafting a bill, he presented it to the state legislature, offering the grounds, and buildings worth $50,000, if the state would locate the university in Eugene. The bill passed, and the association was given until the fall of 1874 to secure a site, and complete the building. The first bill provided that $30,000 should be raised by county taxes, the citizens of Eugene to contribute the remaining $20,000. Some of the taxpayers were dissatisfied and having threatened to enjoin the collection of the $30,000 the matter was presented to the county court, where every objection was heard, Judge Walton representing the interests of the Union University Association, while J. M. Thompson, president of the association, was county judge. Fearing that the tax, if raised, would involve the county in a heavy debt, the order was revoked by the county commissioners, and Judge Thompson resigned as president of the association, being succeeded by Judge Walton, T. G. Hendricks being elected secretary. After meeting many discouragements, the association, largely through the strenuous efforts of its president, raised the entire $50,000 by subscription, and after the building was completed the deed was made out, and accepted by the state. Although the brave promoters of the university had a hard struggle in its establishment and building, they now take great pride and pleasure in the result of their labors.

In April, 1873, the board of regents was organized with Judge Matthew P. Deady as president, and Judge Walton, who was one of the three regents elected by the Union University Association, as secretary of the board, a position to which he has been continuously re-elected ever since. During the first thirteen years of the university's existence the judge served as both regent and secretary, but has since that time acted as secretary only.

Judge J. J. Walton was married, first, in Eugene, to Elizabeth Gale, who was born near Galesburg, Ill. She died in 1873, leaving three children, namely: Ada Osie, who was graduated from the University of Oregon, and is now living in Seattle, Wash.; Clara D. died in Eugene; and Hattie E., a trained nurse at the General Hospital in Seattle, Wash. The judge was married a second time in 1876, in Eugene, to Miss Emma Fisher, a native of Richmond, Ind., and a daughter of Robert Fisher, who spent his last years in Minnesota. The only child of Judge and Mrs. Walton, Pauline E. Walton, is attending the University of Oregon, being a member of the class of 1904. Judge Walton owns considerable property in Eugene, having erected the Walton block, which is 46x60 feet, two stories in height, and having a fine farm of four acres, lying on Mill street, between Eighth and Ninth streets. This he devotes to black walnuts and fruits of various kinds, having sixty different kinds of trees in his orchards.

Politically Judge Walton is a staunch Democrat, and has filled many public offices of trust and responsibility, including those of councilman and school director, at the present time being a member of the city school board. He was formerly a member of the county central committee, which he served as chairman, and of the state central and congressional committees. Fraternally, he is prominently connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being past noble grand of Eugene Lodge, with which he united in 1861; past grand master and past grand representative of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, which he represented at the Sovereign Grand Lodge, in Baltimore, in 1878 and in 1879; a member, and past chief patriarch, of the Encampment; and since 1864, has belonged to the Grand Encampment, which he represented at the meeting of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, which met in Milwaukee, Wis., in 1893, and in Chattanooga, Tenn., in 1894. He is also a past master workman of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, which he represented at the Grand Lodge twice. He is also a member of the State Historical Society. He takes a deep interest in religious affairs, and is a valued member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he has been one of the trustees for many years, for a long while serving as chairman of the board. For a number of years he was also superintendent of the Sunday school.

HUGH HERRON. In Hugh Herron the agricultural community around Bruce has a practical and thorough farmer, and a substantial and helpful citizen. Like the majority of his countrymen who have crossed the water, he has been pleased to look on the happy side of things in his adopted land, and in consequence has met with a warm reception in return, and realized generous financial returns from labor invested. Born in County Down, Ireland, in September, 1839, he was reared on a small Irish farm from which little profit could be derived, the family maintenance being principally dependent upon the trade occupation of the father, who was a weaver of fine linen. The elder Herron married Mary Cleland, who also was born in Ireland, and who, after the death of her husband in 1849, wisely concluded that the old country held little of prospect for her eight children. Accordingly, she secured passage for her family in a sailing vessel in 1850, locating in Mahoning county, Ohio, from where she later removed to Illinois. Here she lived to be sixty-five years old, an honored, well loved mother, who had the courage of her own convictions, and the strength of will and endurance to carry them to execution. Of her children, David is in Illinois; William is a farmer in Missouri; Sarah also is in Illinois; Jane is in Missouri; and Hugh, the youngest is in Oregon.

Little is recalled by Hugh Herron of the trip across the ocean in the slow-moving sailer, for he was but eleven years of age at the time, and that was many years ago. Needless to say he had to start out to make his own living at as early an age as possible, and when fourteen began to work on the surrounding farms by the month.

In 1862 he started across the plains with a mule team, and on the way found little difficulty of any kind, the Indians by that time having become used to the homeseeking paleface. Arriving in Benton county he rented a farm for three or four years, and then purchased a place of two hundred and fifteen acres five miles northwest of Monroe, and which constitutes a portion of the old Harlow Bundy donation claim. Immediately preceding this purchase he had married, in 1867, Nicy Winn, a native of Tennessee who crossed the plains with her brothers in 1865.

To his first land Mr. Herron has added from time to time, and now owns eight hundred acres, half of which are under cultivation. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, and makes a specialty of Durham cattle. Everything around his farm indicates the careful and painstaking agriculturist, the thrifty and resourceful husbandman. Residence, barns, outhouses, and implements are in accord with progressive ideas, and are intended to facilitate labor and add to the satisfaction of existence. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Herron is one of his party's most enthusiastic advocates, and his appreciation of the principles and issues of Democracy have met with generous response from his fellow townsmen. He has held various minor offices of a local nature, and has been commissioner of Benton county for some time. He is popular and influential, and his advice and practical assistance lend worth to any proposed public enterprise. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Herron: William E. is in Washington; Elizabeth is deceased; Robert lives and farms near his father; Clayton is at home; Margaret is living at home; and Hattie is the wife of C. Bushnell of Washington. Mr. Herron is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which organization he has been associated since his young manhood.

LEE MOXOM TRAVIS. With thirty years behind him L. M. Travis has made for himself a record of will, courage and purposeful living that has written his name above the heads of many older men and set his feet firmly on the ladder of success. He is a rising young attorney, successful in his profession and in business enterprises, clear, logical and convincing in thought and expression, the developed resources of a native ability, having spent several years in preparation for the work which he has chosen for his vocation. That he will succeed in the years yet to come none who know him doubt, and it has been his fortune to become well known through his connection with various political movements wherein he has taken a very active part, being nominated in June, 1902.

by the Democratic convention as candidate for state senator. Though defeated, he made a splendid showing, running much ahead of the remainder of the ticket, in a county which had always given a thousand Republican majority, lacking but two hundred and seventy votes of success. In the first congressional convention in 1903, in Albany, he placed A. E. Reames in nomination for member of congress, and he was afterward nominated by the party.

Not only a success himself, L. M. Travis has the example of his father before him to spur him to greater efforts to support the honor of a family which has certainly deserved the commendation of fellow-citizens. The family came originally from New York state, the father, Gould J. Travis, having been born in Poughkeepsie, while the grandfather, Alexander Travis, was a farmer in Dutchess county. He was a patriot in the war of 1812. G. J. Travis was educated in a theological seminary of Rochester, N. Y., from which he was in time graduated, and became a minister in the Baptist Church. In pursuit of this vocation he traveled over many states, preaching in New York, Michigan, Iowa, the Dakotas, Nebraska, California, and finally in Oregon where his last days were passed. A patriot, true and earnest, as was his father, he served as chaplain, with the rank of captain, in the Forty-fourth New York Volunteer Infantry, in the Civil war, after which he returned to his chosen lifework. He came to California in 1884, settling in San Diego, and four years later he came to Oregon, locating at Eugene, where for three years he served as pastor of the Baptist Church. He then felt impelled to retire from the active life which had so long engrossed his attention, and thus lived until his death in 1893. He was a Republican in politics, and fraternally belonged to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and was a Knight Templar in the Masonic order. He was also a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. He married Ella Ford, who was born in Hornellsville, N. Y., the daughter of Lyman Ford, a farmer in that state. She is still living and now makes her home in Eugene, the mother of three sons and two daughters, all of whom are living.

The eldest of his father's children, L. M. Travis was born in Hornellsville, N. Y., June 20, 1874, and with his parents he removed to various states in his youth. His education was, however, in no wise neglected, for he kept up with his studies, attending both public and high schools. He was fourteen years old when he became a resident of Eugene, Lane county, and in 1890 he entered the preparatory department of the University of Oregon, becoming a freshman in 1893. His graduation occurred in 1897, with the degree of B. A. He has acted as one of the representatives of his college in the famous oratorical contest of the schools of the state in 1896, and stood second in the state. He was also prominent in athletics, being manager of the football team in 1896, and manager of the track team in the following year.

In 1898 this son and grandson of patriots responded to the call of the nation and the name of L. H. Travis was enrolled as a member of Company C, Second Oregon Regiment, and later accepted the work laid out for the regiment, going to the Philippine islands. It was not his fortune, however, to serve in that distant land, for he was taken dangerously ill in Cavite with typhoid fever. When able he was granted a furlough and sent home on the hospital ship Rio Janeiro, and he was mustered out but a few days before the mustering out of the entire regiment. The year previous to his enlistment he had begun the study of law in Eugene, and in 1899 he was admitted to the bar and at once began practice. In the fall of the same year he entered the department of law of the University of Michigan in the senior class and in 1900 was graduated with the degree of L.L. B. Again locating in Eugene he began a practice which he has since continued, being interrupted only for the political movements with which Mr. Travis is so heartily in sympathy.

Mr. Travis is a charter member of the Commercial Club, and fraternally he is a Mason, having been made a member in Eugene Lodge No. 11, there acting as junior warden, and also belongs to Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M. In addition to this he is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Order of Eagles, in which he is worthy president, and Woodmen of the World.

WILLIAM T. COCHRAN. Among the native-born citizens of Linn county notable for their ability and worth stands William T. Cochran, whose birth occurred on the farm which he now owns and occupies, May, 6, 1851. During his more than half century of life in this vicinity, he has won for himself an enviable reputation as an honest man and a good citizen, and as one who has contributed his full quota toward the advancement and development of one of the finest agricultural regions in this section of Oregon.

William Cochran, the father of William T., was born in Kentucky, November 20, 1813. Removing as a young man to Missouri, he married Polly Johnson, who was born September 6, 1813. In the spring of 1847, he left Missouri, starting across the plains with his wife and seven children, bringing his family and his household effects in two wagons drawn by ox-teams. Taking up a donation claim in Linn county, he cleared and improved a farm, on which he resided until his death, which occurred at the home of his daughter, Mahala F., wife of Thomas Turner, August 17, 1901. Two more children were born in their pioneer home, one being William T., as stated above, the other a daughter, Delilah, who died in childhood. One son, Nelson J., now residing in Brownsville, was born in Missouri. The first Mrs. Cochran's death occurred on the home farm April 12, 1854. For a second wife Mr. Cochran married Cynthia, widow of Rev. William Sperry, a pioneer minister of the Baptist Church and father of Rev. Carpus Sperry. After her death he married Mrs. Kerns, who died a few years after her marriage. His last wife was the widow of Henry Warren, and is also deceased.

William Cochran's success in life may be estimated by a statement of the fact that one time he was the heaviest taxpayer in the county. He was one of the organizers of the Brownsville Woolen Mills, and for many years was the heaviest stockholder in the concern.

Reared on the home farm, William T. Cochran obtained his early knowledge of books in the district school, subsequently completing his education at the Oregon Agricultural College in Corvallis. After leaving college he carried on the home farm for a few years, but in 1878 and 1879 was engaged in the drug business at Brownsville. Coming into possession of the homestead, which is located about one and three-fourths miles from Brownsville, Mr. Cochran has nine hundred and thirteen acres of land all in one body, constituting one of the most valuable and attractive farms in the locality. He carries on general farming on an extensive scale, raising cattle and horses, and keeping a choice dairy of thirty cows. He deals in stock, buying and selling cattle, and among his horses is an imported stallion of the Clydesdale breed, and also one of trotting stock.

In 1881 Mr. Cochran married Lucy J. Philpott, daughter of William J. Philpott. She died June 25, 1888, leaving two children, namely: Ethel, who is studying music at Portland, Ore.; and W. Earl, living at home. On March 9, 1890, Mr. Cochran married a second time, Sarah Swank, daughter of James Swank, and of this marriage three children have been born, namely: Leroy T., Mabel F., and Frederick W. Fraternally Mr. Cochran belongs to Brownsville Lodge No. 36, A. F. & A. M., of which he is past master, and of the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Baptist Church, in which he is an active worker, and for a number of years has been superintendent of the Sunday School.

HON. EDWARD MARION CROISAN. The life history of the Hon. Edward Marion Croisan, now serving in the Oregon state senate from Salem, forms an interesting chapter in the annals of Oregon. His career has been closely interwoven with the progress of the state during the past score of years, and at the present time he is recognized as one of the most thoroughly representative men of affairs in the Willamette valley, whose future preferment for high public honors lies practically within his own control.

Senator Croisan is a native son of Oregon, his birth having occurred upon the old homestead in Marion county, three miles southwest of Salem, March 27, 1855. His father, Henry Croisan, was born in Munich, Bavaria, but came of French ancestry, the name being originally Croissant, meaning "growing." There were three brothers of the name who, at the time of the Huguenot massacre in France, fled to Germany. At the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes representatives of the family again were compelled to flee for safety, making their way across the Franco-German frontier in their night clothing. These were the grandfather and grandmother of the father of Senator Croisan, all of whom settled in Bavaria, where they might enjoy their religious privileges unmolested.

Senator Croisan's grandfather came to the United States in 1839, landing at New Orleans. It had been his intention to locate somewhere in the west, but while coming up the Mississippi river he was taken ill with yellow fever and was buried along the banks of the "father of waters." Henry Croisan had remained in Germany in order to settle up some business, after the completion of which he crossed the Atlantic to the new world. Not long after his arrival he took up his abode in Illinois, the family settling at Peru, that state, in 1839. Henry Croisan had acquired a good education in Munich. In Illinois he followed farming until 1846, when, attracted by the opportunities of the west, he started across the plains, traveling in a wagon drawn by ox-teams. He secured his outfit at Independence, Mo., and joined Capt. Rice Dunbar, who commanded a wagon train. They came through the Applegate cut-off, suffering many trials and hardships, and were continually on the alert for fear of attacks by the Indians. At Tulare lake they had a battle with the Indians, three of the company being shot and two of the number afterward dying from the effects of their wounds. Starvation also stared them in the face, for their supply of provisions gave out, and it seemed as if they must meet death in this way. Upon this trip, however, Henry Croisan met his future wife, who was a member of Captain Dunbar's company, and they were married near Ogden in 1846. At the same time Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Savage, now of Summit, Benton county, Ore., were also joined in wedlock. It will thus be seen that there were some pleasant occasions as well as hardships connected with the trip.

By the time the party reached Rogue river the supply of provisions had become exhausted, and in the month of December Henry Croisan and Jesse Boone were selected to make their way to Oregon City in order to purchase flour for the party. This was a trip attended by great danger, for the Indians of southern Oregon were at that time so hostile that death at their hands was to be feared at any time. Both the men slept with their horses' reins in their hands, knowing that the approach of their savage enemies would startle the horses and thus awaken the men. They traveled almost night and day, and finally returned in safety, although, when on their way back with their load of flour, and but one day's journey from the camp upon Rogue river, they came upon a band of Indians who were seated upon the bluffs and blockading their way. Boone said, "They will kill us," and advised that the two turn back and pursue a different course. But Mr. Croisan replied, "We must put on a bold front and proceed; for if we turn back we will be killed anyhow." He therefore started in the lead with his gun lying across his arm ready for immediate action, but the Indians, seeing that the men were apparently fearless, moved out of their way and did not molest them. After passing the Indians, darkness soon came upon them and they lost their way. They wandered around, believing that the camp must be very near, and late at night they heard the bells upon the animals of their own camp. With this sound as a guide they reached their destination in safety, though thoroughly exhausted. They had obtained from Dr. McLaughlin all the flour they needed, and were hailed with every manifestation of joy by the party for whose succor they had made this dangerous and memorable trip. Upon leaving the Rogue river, the party left their cooking utensils, wagons and other supplies which they thought they might possibly get along without. A few months later, in 1847, Mr. Croisan returned to the site of the camp with an ox-team, but all that he found there was a couple of wagons, the rest of the articles having been carried away. His friend and companion, Jesse Boone, with whom he made the trip for the flour, was a distant relation of Daniel Boone, and afterwards established Boone's Ferry, on the Willamette river.

It would be impossible, in a work of this nature, to give a detailed account of the pioneer experiences endured by the Croisans and others who lived in Oregon as early as 1846. Every day brought with it new and trying experiences, and slow progress was made toward the ultimate destination. While they were slowly and laboriously proceeding northward, Mr. Goff formed a small party of Polk county settlers and drove out some beef cattle for the relief of the company, which finally arrived in the Willamette valley in February, 1847.

Henry Croisan took up some land and engaged in farming near Buena Vista for a year, but in the spring of 1849 he started overland for California, where for a time he was successfully engaged in placer mining in the Feather river district. Early in 1850 he returned to Oregon, and on March 2 of that year secured a donation claim three miles southwest of the site of Salem, where he established his home and reared his family. There he spent the remainder of his life, a full quarter century, passing away September 14, 1875, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

Mr. Croisan's wife, who bore the maiden name of Mary A. Hall, was born in Illinois. She is one of the brave pioneer women yet remaining to tell the tale of the early days in Oregon. Her father, Reason B. Hall, who was born in Kentucky, removed to Illinois in early manhood and followed farming near Peru. In 1846 he started for Oregon as a member of the same party which included the Croisan family, and upon reaching the territory settled upon a donation claim on the present site of Buena Vista. He laid out the town, and named it after the city of Buena Vista, Mexico, which he had visited while serving in the American army during the war with Mexico. In his new Oregon home he spent the remainder of his life, his death occurring in the town which he had founded. Mrs. Croisan, his daughter, who is now seventy-three years of age, is no less deserving of prominent and honorable mention in the annals of Oregon than is her husband, for the pioneer women bore fully as important a part in the early development of the country as did their husbands and fathers, although their work was of a more quiet nature.

Unto Henry and Mary (Hall) Croisan were born six children, namely: Mrs. Martha A. Wilson, who is now living near Peru, Ill.; George H., a farmer living upon a part of the old homestead; Mrs. Caroline Bushnell of Salem; Edward M., the subject of this review; Henrietta, who died in childhood; and Clara E. Farmer of Salem.

Edward M. Croisan was reared amid the wild scenes of frontier life upon the homestead of his father. The earlier days were a period of hardship, to a considerable extent, but as the country became more thickly populated and the work of progress and improvement was carried on, conditions gradually improved. He attended the public schools of Salem until well along toward manhood, when he took up the work upon the farm. Here he remained until twenty-eight years of age, carrying on the work in company with his brother until his entry into official life. In the summer of 1892 he established himself in business in Salem as a dealer in agricultural implements, and conducted the business successfully until May, 1900, when he sold his store to F. A. Wiggins in order to give his attention in a more undivided manner to the cultivation of hops, an industry which he is carrying on at the present time with success. His ranch in Marion county consists of three hundred and seven acres, on which he also carries on general farming and stock-raising to some extent. But he makes a specialty of the cultivation of hops, which in recent years has grown to be a very important and profitable industry in Oregon. In 1902 he erected the large Capital Stables in Salem, which he leases. He has built a fine residence on Church street, and is largely interested in real estate in Salem and vicinity, while his wife also has large landed interests in Polk and Marion counties. Mr. Croisan is likewise a representative of financial interests, being the vice president of and a director in the Capital National Bank. Fraternally he occupies a high place in Masonry. He is a member of Salem Lodge No. 4, A. F. & A. M., of Multnomah Chapter No. 2, of De Molay Commandery No. 5, K. T., of Salem, and of Al Kader Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, of Portland. He is also identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Modern Woodmen of America, and with Daniel Waldo Cabin, Native Sons of Oregon, of which he is financial secretary.

Mr. Croisan was married in Salem in 1886 to Miss Ella S. McNary, who was born at The Dalles and is a daughter of A. W. McNary, who came to Oregon in 1845. She was educated in the Sacred Heart Academy of Salem, from which she was graduated in 1882. She became the mother of one daughter, Helen S. Croisan. The greatest blow that ever befell the household was the loss of this daughter, who died at the age of sixteen months. Mrs. Croisan is a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Salem, and is widely and favorably known in the social circles of the capital city.

Senator Croisan's political record has been one which has not only reflected great credit upon him as a broad-minded and public-spirited citizen, placing him in a distinguished position among his fellow-men, but also one which has been so well considered in its every feature as to add honor and prestige to his constituency. For four years—from 1884 to 1888—he served as deputy sheriff of Marion county under John W. Minto. In 1888 he was nominated for the office of sheriff by the Republicans of the county and elected. Upon the expiration of his two-year term he was re-elected by a largely increased majority, and retired from office in July, 1892, with the entire confidence, good will and approval of the citizens of the county. He was chairman of the Republican county central committee in 1894, was a member of the state central committee in 1896 and of the executive committee of the state committee in 1897. Governor Lord appointed him superintendent of the State Reform School in 1897, a position he filled with distinct credit until 1899. Further political honors were conferred upon him in 1902, when he was elected to represent his district in the Oregon state senate, his majority being about seven hundred votes.

Although reared in the faith of Democracy, Senator Croisan has been an advocate of Republican principles since attaining manhood, and is now recognized as one of the most potential leaders of his party in the state. He commands the respect and confidence of thoughtful men of both great political parties, the leaders of the opposition recognizing his loyalty, devotion to what he believes to be right, and his deep interest in the welfare of his community and the state at large. In matters of business he possesses sound judgment, powers of keen discrimination, and unflagging enterprise—qualities which have enabled him to work his way upward until he is an influential factor in business circles. He puts forth every effort in his power to advance the material upbuilding, the social and the intellectual progress of the state and its political status. Moreover, he is a man of such pleasing personal qualities that the circle of his friends is almost co-extensive with the circle of his acquaintances. Not only because of his connection with one of the oldest and most highly honored pioneer families of Oregon, but also because of his personal worth and his efforts in behalf of the commonwealth, is he entitled to distinctive representation in this volume.

THOMAS C. MACKEY, M. D. The life of Dr. Thomas C. Mackey has been characterized by a sturdy faithfulness to his duty, the good Scotch blood which is his by right of lineage giving him the courage to act in the face of disaster or temporary ruin, and it was this, coupled with a love for that section of the country wherein his people had become residents, that made him take up arms for the cause of the south, in September 1861. Passing from the common schools to private tutor, and thence to the University of Virginia, he studied classics until 1861, when his studies were cheerfully put aside at the call of duty. He served in the Confederate Hospital service until he was mustered out at Greensboro, N. C., April 14, 1865. He had previously studied medicine under a preceptor, and had attended lectures at Philadelphia and the University of Virginia, and he was given the degree of M. D. in 1864.

The first of the name of Mackey to come from their home in Scotland was John, the grandfather, who came to the United States in 1814. In his native country he was a linen manufacturer in Perth, the business which he then established continuing to the present day. On settling on this side of the water he first engaged in farming, and during the latter part of his life he became extensively connected with the tobacco interests of the state of Virginia. He met with extremely gratifying results in his work, some of the largest warehouses in Richmond belonging to him. His death occurred at the age of sixty-nine years, upon his plantation in Albemarle county. His son, Cyrus, the father of Dr. Mackey, was born in Virginia, and like his father first interested himself in agriculture, combining it with the business of stock-raising on the large plantation which he owned, and dealing in fine stock. For twenty years of his life he was connected with government positions, being postoffice inspector. He died on his plantation when seventy-two years old, after a very successful career. His property was directly in the path of the many Virginia campaigns, and he suffered heavily. The wife of Mr. Mackey was in maidenhood Elizabeth Caldwell, a native of Virginia, and the daughter of Richard Caldwell, who came from Scotland at an early day, and located upon a plantation in Virginia, where his death occurred at an advanced age. Mrs. Mackey died in 1848, when thirty-nine years old. She was the mother of two sons and one daughter, the only one of whom is now living being Thomas C., who was born in Albemarle county, May 14, 1842, the youngest of his father's family.

Upon the return of Dr. Mackey from the days and nights of hospital service he began the practice of medicine in his own neighborhood, continuing there until 1872, when he decided to change his location to the western states, believing there would be a better and broader opportunity there than in the war-ruined section, and he therefore became a resident of California, locating in 1872 in Healdsburg, where he engaged in general practice until 1875, after which he removed to the northwest, and has since made this section his home. In the last-named year he took charge of the Marine Hospital at Coos bay, and after a creditable maintenance of this position for five years he was transferred to Ft. Umpqua, receiving the appointment of state health officer from Governor Fair. This position he held for twelve years, and at the close of this period of faithful service he removed to Albany, Linn county, and engaged in general practice for one year, but not satisfied with the location he then became a resident of Harrisburg, where he has since resided, enjoying the same success in his work here that has characterized his faithful and persevering efforts throughout his entire professional career. He is now the only resident physician of Harrisburg, a position which has been his for nearly a decade. Also successful in the accumulation of property, Dr. Mackey is now the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of timberland located in Linn county.

The marriage of Mr. Mackey united him with Ada May Sacry, a native of California, and one daughter, Edna, now adds to the happiness of the home. In his fraternal relations Dr. Mackey occupies several prominent positions, being a master Mason; in the Ancient Order of United Workmen having served for fifteen months as grandmaster; and in the Artisans he holds the degree of honor. In religion he is a member of the First Baptist Church, and politically is a Democrat, through the influence of this party being given the appointment of postmaster at Gardner, Ore., under Cleveland's first administration and held the office for six years.

LEWIS P. SWAN. The flouring mill of Lewis P. Swan at Champoeg is a credit to the little town of which it is an integral part, and its output of sixty barrels of flour a day finds a ready market in Woodburn and other towns. Mr. Swan is a practical miller of many years experience, his first memories in connection therewith dating back into his childhood, and to his native land of Sweden, where he was born July 8, 1845. In the neighborhood of his Swedish home his father owned and operated a mill for many years, this being his life's chief occupation. Naturally the son followed in his footsteps, and from his sire learned the business, becoming in time an expert in his line.

W. F. Smith

Equipped with the knowledge of a paying trade, Mr. Swan emigrated to America in 1869, and for a few months worked in Chicago. He then removed to Lansing, Iowa, and two years later to La Crosse, Wis., where he engaged in flour manufacturing for about eighteen years. Going to Vernon county, Wis., for sixteen years he operated a mill at Coom Valley, becoming prominent in the affairs of his neighborhood, and identifying himself with all efforts at improving his adopted locality. Desiring a change of surroundings, he disposed of his mill about 1889, and, coming to Oregon, bought a mill near Cham-poeg on Mill Creek. In 1890 the mill was washed away by the swollen stream, and the same year was replaced by the present mill, which is equipped with modern roller machinery, and is netting its owner a handsome income. Understanding as he does every detail of modern and scientific milling, Mr. Swan is destined to take an important part in the milling enterprises of this county, and will doubtless in time greatly increase his capacity. He is possessed of shrewd business ability and strict integrity, and during his residence here has won the confidence of the business and social world.

In 1875 Mr. Swan was united in marriage with Sina Neprud, of which union there have been born five children: Augustus, Annie, Amanda, Lawrence and Eva. From a political standpoint Mr. Swan is not a party man, but believes rather in voting for the candidate best qualified to serve the public welfare. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Knights of the Maccabees, and in religion is a member of the Lutheran Church.

WILLIAM F. SMITH. As an agriculturist William F. Smith has assisted in the development of the resources of Lane county. At the time of the emigration he was old enough to appreciate the difficulties and dangers which lay in the path of western progress undertaken by those hardy men of the middle west, principally, though all states and nations have contributed a large quota of intellect and practical ideas to which the commonwealth owes her growth.

The father of Mr. Smith, John, was born in Kentucky, in 1815, and there married Martha Looney, born in 1817, and by this marriage he had five children, namely: William F., of this review, who was born in Missouri, October 25, 1835; Jesse H., whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work; Alfred R., located near Coburg; E. Looney, whose sketch also appears elsewhere in this work; and John C. died in 1844. After the death of his first wife the father married her sister, Nancy, and they had one child, Margaret J., now deceased. The family were living in the state of Missouri at that time and in the spring of 1849 they crossed the plains with two wagons, six yoke of oxen and one horse. Upon arriving in Oregon they located near Jefferson, Marion county, where they spent the first winter. In 1850 they put in a crop in Marion county and in the fall of the year they removed to Lane county, where they took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres five miles southeast of Springfield, along the Willamette river, their first shelter being a round-log house of one room. The elder man did not live to see the fruit of the heroism of the early pioneers, as his death occurred April 4, 1859.

Soon after coming to Oregon William F. Smith went to live with John H. Bellinger, who was located near Jefferson, and he remained with him until the death of his father, when he went back to the old home place and has never left it since. In 1874 he married Mrs. Mary S. Powers, the widow of Thaddeus, and the daughter of C. J. Hills. She was born near Pleasant Hill, Lane county, Ore., April 3, 1852, her father being a native of Syracuse, N. Y., who located first in Wisconsin and in 1847 crossed the plains to this state and became a resident of Lane county, in the vicinity of Jasper station. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Smith of whom Lena is the wife of James Taliafero, located on a part of this farm; Loretta and Charles B. are at home and Pearl is deceased. Mr. Smith now owns three hundred and seventeen acres of his father's donation claim and a ranch of two hundred and fifteen acres. He is engaged in carrying on general farming and stock-raising. In politics a Republican, he has served in various minor offices in the interests of his party, for eleven years acting as school director and for fourteen as school clerk, delegate to the county convention once, and was road supervisor for two terms. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was one of the organizers of the Lane County Pioneer Society.

JOHN L. JOHNSON. A resident of Oregon for more than a half century, John L. Johnson has contributed no small share to the prosperity which is now apparent on every hand in this great and growing state. That the life history of this worthy pioneer will be of interest to our readers we have no doubt, for the residents of Marion county are not unmindful of or ungrateful to those who have laid the foundation of success here, through their untiring and well directed efforts.

Tazewell county, Ill., is the birthplace of Mr.

Johnson, the date of his birth being November 15, 1830. His father, Neill Johnson, was a native of North Carolina, born September 7, 1802. When a child his parents removed to Kentucky, where they resided until he was a young man, when they removed to Illinois, making that state their home. In the latter state Neill Johnson was married, in 1828, to Esther Roelofson, a native of Kentucky, and for twenty years, or until 1848, they remained in Illinois. Mr. Johnson had taken up the work of the ministry in early manhood, and the privilege of preaching the gospel was to him a sacred mission. In 1848 he brought his family to Henry county, Iowa, residing there until 1851, at which time they removed to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams, the journey consuming six months. Although they lost some stock through the depredations of the Indians, their lives were not endangered, and they met with no serious encounters.

Arriving in Marion county Mr. Johnson purchased a squatter's claim about one mile southeast of Woodburn, consisting of three hundred and twenty acres of land, which is now owned by P. L. Kennedy. The Johnson family resided upon this place for about twelve years, when they removed to east Oregon. Mr. Johnson followed the ministry all his life, and was a man of the deepest Christian spirit and principles, whom nothing could shake from his firm faith in the immortality of the soul and the divine teachings of Christianity. He became prominent in the upbuilding, morally and spiritually, of eastern Oregon. As an indication of his high standing among the people, he was elected probate judge of Baker county, the first who ever sat upon the probate bench in that county. The family remained in eastern Oregon until 1865, when they removed to McMinnville, Yamhill county, where the father passed away at the age of eighty-seven, and the mother at the age of sixty-six years. Twelve children were born unto them, those surviving being as follows: Mary A., the wife of B. F. Hall, of Woodburn; Sarah, the wife of P. J. Jack, of Gresham, Ore; Anderson F., a resident of Multnomah county, Ore.; Joel H., of Portland; and J. L., of this review. The father of this family led a life of usefulness to others. As pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church his efforts were untiring in behalf of the spiritual welfare of his flock. He established the first nursery in Oregon, and was a Republican in his political affiliations. He was an intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln.

J. L. Johnson spent the days of his boyhood and youth at home, receiving his education in the district schools. Upon reaching maturity he was married to Viletta Kennedy, who was born in Pike county, Ill., in 1842, and in 1853 came with her parents to Oregon. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Johnson took up their home on part of an old donation claim, where they resided for three years. At the end of that time they settled in Grande Ronde valley, making their home in this fertile region for three years, when they returned to Marion county, and lived in several places before finally settling on their present place of abode two miles east of Woodburn. Mr. Johnson's farm of fifty acres is well cultivated, and is one of the best improved farms of the neighborhood, owing all its improvements to Mr. Johnson, who has made a specialty of agriculture and well knows how to conduct a farm in all its details. He has a fine five-acre orchard planted in winter apples of the best grade and quality to be produced. In politics Mr. Johnson is a Republican, like his father. He is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in which he has served as elder for over sixty years. By their marriage Mr. Johnson and his wife became the parents of but one child, Iona, now deceased. They have two adopted children, Olive, now the wife of D. J. Wilcox, of Palouse, Wash., and Florence, at home.

Mr. Johnson has ever been known as a man who takes a deep and abiding interest in the welfare of his community, and he has never missed an opportunity to advance the interests of the state in matters of education and moral and temporal growth. He has served as justice of the peace in Lane county, also as school clerk and director and road supervisor. As a young man he enlisted in 1856 in Company K, Washington Territory Mounted Volunteers under the command of Captain Goff, serving under Governor Stevens. He served for six months, being mustered in at Portland, and was first sent to The Dalles. He encountered no serious engagements, and on being mustered out returned to his home, where he resumed the peaceful vocation of his youth, agriculture.

It is easy to read the character of the man, through a long life spent in usefulness and in doing what he has considered to be right and just. It may seem a small thing to say of a man, "He has always done his duty," but when we remember that the path of duty is not always the easiest one to tread, that there are temptations on every hand to draw a man from the straight and narrow way, we must admire and honor those who have never faltered or turned back but have kept persevering through all difficulties. Such a man is J. L. Johnson, and his name does credit to this record.

JOSEPH J. RYAN. In that undulating country known as Norfolk, England, washed by the North Sea, and containing an abundance of game which renders it the huntsman's paradise. Joseph J. Ryan was born March 9, 1851, and was reared on a farm for many years in the possession of his English ancestors. On this staid English farm, with the slight chances for advancement it offered, owing to the peculiar land laws prevailing in the country, the youth dreamed of broader opportunities beyond the borders of English supremacy. Accordingly, he welcomed with delight the opportunity which came when he was sixteen to engage as a seaman on a merchant vessel plying between Liverpool and London. Eventually he found his way on board vessels engaged in trade with the Orient, and in this capacity visited the ports of India and China, even coming as far as Vancouver, Wash. Four years he followed the uncertain yet fascinating life upon the deep, and in 1871 determined to henceforth identify his fortunes with the land. The same year he found his way to Oregon, and in Butteville engaged in a general mercantile business from 1872 to 1876. In 1876 he settled upon a Marion county farm, and after occupying it until 1883 returned to the store, at the same time keeping the farm of two hundred and eighty-two acres in his possession.

For twenty-seven years Mr. Ryan has been identified with mercantile affairs in Butteville, and to say that he is the arbiter in this line in the town is no exaggeration. Besides conducting his store he returns occasionally to his farm, where he finds relaxation from business worries, and which nets him a handsome income. General farming and stock-raising have been engaged in extensively, and formerly twenty acres were devoted to hops, although at present there are but ten acres.

December 24, 1876, Mr. Ryan was united in marriage with Mary Feller, daughter of Peter Feller, one of the foremost pioneers of Marion county. Mr. Feller was born March 6, 1822, in Lorraine, then a French province, now belonging to Germany, and came to the United States in 1847, landing after a twenty-six-days voyage in New Orleans, from which town he went up the Mississippi river to Galena, Ill. The following year he married a sailing companion, Annie Notum, also born in Lorraine, and of this union there were born two children in the state of Illinois. Mr. Feller came to Oregon alone in 1853, his object being to select a home for his family more in keeping with his ambitions in the new world. In 1857 he returned and brought his wife and children to join him on a farm in Marion county, where he spent the remainder of his life, firm in the assurance of profound esteem on the part of all with whom he was associated in the west. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ryan: William, Josie, James and Lizzie. Mr. Ryan is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Presbyterian Church. He is a broad-minded and enterprising citizen, and has contributed materially to the upbuilding of this prosperous little town.

LORENZO HARVEY LASSELL. The present mayor of Harrisburg, Lorenzo Harvey Lassell, is numbered among the prominent and influential citizens of the community, through the many qualities which make him a useful factor in the growth and upbuilding of the western state. His position as mayor has been creditably maintained for four years, previous to which he served in the city council for many terms, using his influence to advance the cause of the Republican party, of which he is a faithful adherent. In addition to his connection with municipal affairs Mr. Lassell has given substantial aid to the advancement of the commercial interests of the city through his connection with the mercantile business of Harrisburg.

The birth of Mr. Lassell occurred in Plattsburg, Clinton county, N. Y., April 28, 1838, the son of Harris Lassell, a native of Vermont who had settled as a young man in the Empire state, where he engaged in getting out marble slabs in Dekalb, St. Lawrence county. In 1832 he removed to Plattsburg, and there followed the life of a saw-mill operator, until his last removal in 1854, which left him a permanent resident of Decatur, Green county, Wis., where he engaged in farming until his death at the age of eighty-two years. His wife was in maidenhood Lydia Fisk, a native of New Jersey, and who became a resident of New York state with her parents. She died in Wisconsin when seventy-eight years old, the mother of three sons and three daughters, of whom Lorenzo Harvey Lassell is the fourth child. Mr. Lassell was given every advantage in securing a good education in his youth. After attending the common schools he took the preparatory course at the college at Beloit, Wis., after which, in 1859, he came to California with his brothers, Luther and William, and with them he located at Placerville and engaged in mining. Quite a number of years following were spent in this line of work, his success being sufficient to warrant a continuance. He passed the winter of 1862 in Oregon, and following this he located in the Boise Basin, Idaho, engaging in mining, the winters of 1863-64-65 being passed in Marion county. In the last named year he made the trip back to Wisconsin, and while in the middle west he visited Kansas and later engaged in the lumber business in Iowa, in which he remained until 1889, since which date he has been a resident of Oregon. For the first six months he located in Portland, after which he engaged until 1902 in the conduct of a sawmill at Harrisburg, in which he owned a one-third interest. This mill was burned and rebuilt in 1896. He shortly after closed out his milling interests and purchased with his sons the merchandise establishment in Harrisburg. Mr. Lassell has met with entire success in all his efforts and has accumulated quite a large fortune, owning among other pieces of property seven lots in the city of Portland, and five at University Park. He has also built a handsome residence in this city, well located and commodious, the whole occupying an entire block of twelve lots, and adding greatly to the appearance of the town, and does credit to the judgment of its prosperous owner.

Mr. Lassell was married in Wisconsin in June, 1874, to Emma Lyman, who was born near Whitewater, that state. Her father was Dwight Lyman, a native of New York, who after his removal to Wisconsin became a farmer, and in later years loaned the money which had been the fruit of his years of earnest effort. He died in Brodhead, Wis., in 1878. Of the three children which blessed this union Lyman G., the eldest and Robert B., the youngest, are connected with the mercantile interests of their father. The one daughter, Anna M., is now deceased. In his fraternal relations Mr. Lassell is prominent among the Masons belonging to Blue Lodge, Royal Arch chapter and Knights Templars.

GREAR STORTS. During the year 1902 Grear Storts gathered forty thousand pounds of hops from thirty acres of land, in addition to which he derived a substantial income from various other products which mature upon his well improved farm. Though not one of the very large farms of Marion county, containing but seventy-three acres, all of it has been placed under cultivation, forty acres having been cleared by the former owner. Located three and a half miles east of Woodburn, and comprising a portion of the Major Magoon donation claim, the operation of this farm has brought prosperity to Mr. Storts, who has reason to congratulate himself upon his wise choice of a home.

A native of Washington county, Ohio, Mr. Storts was born March 2, 1847, and was reared on the farm of his parents, both of whom came from farmer stock, and devoted all of their lives to this means of livelihood. As the Ohio farm was not a large one, and as there were ten children to feed and clothe, the children were early taught to depend upon themselves, and were thoroughly drilled in agriculture and general business. Grear remained with his parents until his twenty-fourth year, and then made his way to Nebraska, where he farmed in Holt county, and where he married Emma Carpenter, a native of Marietta, Ohio. Directly after his marriage he took his wife to Marion county, S. D., where they took up land, and lived for about eight years. Not realizing their expectations in the northern state they returned to Nebraska and lived for eight years, and in 1888 came to Oregon, settling in Clackamas county. After four years they removed to the present Stort's farm, to the improvement of which the enterprising and practical owner is devoting all of his attention. Two interesting children contribute to the happiness and hope of their parents, Katie M. and Ray C. Mr. Storts is a Democrat in politics, but has never shown any inclination to enter the uncertain field of official life. He is successful and popular, and is appreciated for his honesty of purpose and breadth of mind.

GEN. MARTIN VAN BUREN BROWN. Nearly a quarter of a century has passed away since the death of Gen. Martin Van Buren Brown, but he is still remembered as one of the men most closely identified with the early history of Oregon. A strong, earnest and forceful personality was his, and it was through his excellent newspaper work that he impressed this personality upon the growth of his adopted state in the brief sixteen years which he passed within her borders, and through his association with the Oregon press that he is best remembered and his efforts appreciated. Beyond the fact that he was an able and forceful writer in his chosen work, General Brown was a patriot and faithful to the country which gave him citizenship, responding to the first call of President Lincoln in the time of the country's need and serving until incapacitated, when he was honorably discharged and returned to the work for which he was eminently fitted.

In Winchester, Ind., March 15, 1843, occurred the birth of Martin V. Brown, shortly after which event his parents removed to Oskaloosa, Iowa. Early introduced to the practical duties of life, as a lad of twelve years he was apprenticed to learn the work of a printer, in the office of the Oskaloosa Herald, remaining therewith for several years. Desiring to broaden his education with experience, he left Oskaloosa, and for some time after was identified with various papers of the middle west, among them being the St. Louis Republican and Democrat, the Memphis Avalanche, Louisville Courier and Quincy Whig. It was after his return to the Oskaloosa Herald that a call for volunteers was made by the president, and, in company with many others of the printing office force, this lad of eighteen enlisted for service, his name appearing sixth upon the volunteer roll in Mahaska county. He became a member of Company H, Third Iowa Regiment, and served in all the early Missouri campaigns of the first year; after about nine months he was honorably discharged from the army on account of failing health. His father and two brothers likewise enlisted for service in the Union army and served faithfully until the close of the war or until removed by death.

Returning to Iowa, General Brown made that his home for some time, after his recovery to health becoming city editor and business manager of the Albia Union, in which work he continued profitably for some time. After his marriage, March 28, 1865, to Miss Henrietta Stewart, he started, May 2, for Oregon, in company with the family of his father-in-law, Dr. W. Q. Stewart, arriving at The Dalles October 2, of the same year. During his first winter in the west General Brown made his home in Portland, and, being an expert printer, he found no difficulty in obtaining employment in that city, being engaged on the Oregonian and various other papers until August of the following year, when he went to Albany and was there associated with M. H. Abbott, in the purchase and publication of the State Rights Democrat. Up to within a few months of his death the work of this paper continued to engross his attention, and his able pen was ever wielded in the effort to advance and elevate the civilization of the west, and fulfill the law of duty. His death occurred at the age of thirty-eight years, August 3, 1881, passing away at Lower Soda Springs, Ore., from which place his body was conveyed to Albany for interment.

In politics General Brown was a Democrat and was always active in the work of promoting the principles of his party, and as a strong man of his party was often called upon to serve in positions of trust and responsibility. He was elected in 1874 state printer, and two years later was made a delegate to the national Democratic convention which nominated Samuel J. Tilden for president, and was at one time chairman of the Democratic state central committee. Commissioned by Governor Grover brigadier general of the Oregon State Militia, he commanded the troops in the campaign against the Bannock Indians in 1877, the settlers of Grant and Wasco county having cause for grateful remembrance of him for his efficient service. As a resident of Albany he exerted every influence in his power to promote the general welfare of the city and was universally recognized as a man faithful to duty, earnest and energetic in the discharge of the work which became his as a public officer, and he was chosen at different times to represent the interests of the city as mayor, recorder and councilman. He was a charter member of the old Albany Engine Company No. 1, and for many years was its president, his last term ending in June, 1881. Fraternally he was identified with Corinthian Lodge No. 17, A. F. & A. M., was also a Royal Arch Mason and a Knight Templar, and had united with Willamette Lodge, A. O. U. W., soon after its organization in Albany. The first named order had charge of the funeral services of General Brown, the imposing ceremonies being conducted by Past Grand Commander R. F. Earhart.

WILLIAM W. WITHERS. In the faithful discharge of his duty as sheriff of Lane county, William W. Withers was mortally wounded at seven o'clock, Thursday evening, February 5, 1903, his death following Saturday morning, at half past eleven o'clock. In reply to a telegram from the sheriff of Jackson county Mr. Withers had gone to arrest L. E. Lyons, a horse-thief, who had broken jail, and the man wanted discharged his weapon and the shot took effect in the windpipe of the sheriff. Mr. Withers was a man universally respected and much beloved by those who knew him best, for the many noble qualities which distinguished him among his associates, and though only forty-five years old he had made for himself a record of worldly success and moral triumph that numbered him among the first men of the county.

J. E. P. Withers, the father of William W., and the pioneer of the family, was born in Jessamine county, Ky., of Scotch ancestry, and early removed with his parents to Illinois, locating near Springfield, where he was left an orphan. He then went to Missouri and in 1851 brought stock across the plains to Oregon, first settling in Benton county, and later removing to Lookingglass valley, Douglas county. There he engaged as a stockman, but remained but a comparatively short time until locating on a farm near Eugene, Lane county, here combining his interests with agricultural pursuits. He now makes his home on a farm near Thurston, Lane county. He served one term in the state legislature. He married Margaret Gillespie, a native of Missouri, and she is now living at the age of sixty-eight years, while Mr. Withers is seventy-two. The father of Mrs. Withers was the Rev. Jacob Gillespie, a pioneer of 1852, and a minister in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, which he founded in Eugene. With the practical ideas of the ministers of early times he combined farming with his preaching, thus making the support of a church an easy matter for the people in moderate circumstances. He died in Eugene at the age of eighty-five years. Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Withers, Mary is the eldest and is the wife of William Van Duyn of Eugene; Mabel is the wife of A. G. Bogart, of Eugene; William W., of this review, was born in Benton county, Ore., January 31, 1858; Alice is the wife of J. H. Hawley of Lane county; Price is located in Harney City, Ore.; Anna is the wife of W. T. Emery, of Coles valley, Douglas county; Emma is the wife of N. L. Cornelius, of Helena, Mont.; and Jessie is the wife of W. W. Edmiston, of Thurston, Ore.

William W. Withers was reared in Looking-glass valley, Douglas county, and was still a youth when his parents removed to Lane county. His educational advantages consisted of the district school and an attendance at the University of Oregon, after which he engaged in farming and stock-raising near Thurston, his last ranch, located five miles east of Springfield, consisting of seven hundred acres. In 1898 he was elected sheriff of the county on the Democratic and Populist ticket, his majority being but twenty-five votes. That he met with the popular favor is indicated by the fact that, at his re-election in 1900 his majority was eight hundred, and his election to a third term was by a majority of one thousand and twenty-one. Earnest and conscientious in his work, he carried his principles into public offices, and, unlike many, kept them with him, and applied them to his daily life. Upon his election in 1898 he had removed with his family to Eugene, there to assume the office. His remains now rest in the Masonic cemetery, the highest honors having been accorded him in burial as a citizen. Fraternally he was a member of Knights of the Maccabees; Knights of Pythias; Woodmen of the World; Elks, and Native Sons. In his religious views he belonged to the Christian Church.

Mr. Withers was married, December 18, 1884, to Miss Viola Comegys, who was born near Springfield, Lane county, the daughter of Presley Comegys, a sketch of whose life appears elsewhere. She was reared in this vicinity and educated in the University of Oregon. The one son born of their union is Frank. She still owns and conducts the ranch which belonged to her husband, and like him is a member of the Christian Church.

MATTHEW COOPER GILL. An early settler and one who has been identified with much of the progress of Scio, Linn county, is Matthew Cooper Gill, who was born in Giles county, Tenn., January 23, 1842, the son of Samuel H. and Millie (Usery) Gill. The parents were both of southern birth, the father a native of Tennessee and the mother of Georgia. In the fall of 1856 the elder man located as a farmer in Appanoose county, Iowa, and later settled in Kansas, from which state, after the death of his wife near New Albany, he removed to Missouri with his children, and there remained until his death at a ripe old age.

The fourth of six sons and six daughters which were born in the family of his father, Matthew Cooper Gill early acquired the self-reliance and independence of the youth of those early days, and after the completion of his education in the common schools of Tennessee and a brief period with his parents in the state of Iowa, he started with ox-teams for the west. Six months of the year 1864 was consumed in this journey, which must certainly have left a strong impression on the mind of Mr. Gill, on account of the various dangers and hardships which he then experienced, the principal difficulty being the Indians. Near Deer Creek Station, on the Platte river, they were attacked by the Indians, who succeeded in stealing some of the stock, in the defense of which three men were killed and Mr. Gill received a wound in the arm from an arrow. On his arrival in Oregon Mr. Gill located first on Mill Creek, spending the winter there, and in 1865 he came direct to Scio, Linn county, and has since been a resident of the town, with the exception of two years which he spent in eastern Washington for the benefit of his wife's health. The blacksmith shop which he then bought remained in his possession for twenty consecutive years, and, with his trade of tinner, he was able to build up a good business. That it was lucrative is indicated by the fact that he was justified in establishing a hardware business in 1889, which though small in the beginning, has now grown to very remunerative proportions. He now owns his own home here, and though having disposed of a half interest in the hardware business, it is still retained in the family, his son, William Franklin Gill, being the partner. March 16, 1903, the Mercantile and Produce Company of Oregon was incorporated with Mr. Gill and his son as stockholders with houses at Grant's Pass, Cottage Grove and Scio.

Mr. Gill was married in Linn county to Miss Nancy Elizabeth Howell, who was born on Howell Prairie, Ore., in 1848. She was the daughter of William B. Howell, a pioneer of 1843, and for whom the location of his daughter's birth was named. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Gill are as follows: William Franklin, who, in addition to his hardware interests, is postmaster of Scio; Lillie May, the wife of Ross Hibler, of Scio; Ralph W., also of Scio; Roy R., of Portland, in the employ of Honeyman Hardware Company; Grace A., a teacher in the schools of Washington; Archie Laffin, deceased; John G., a student in the Dental

School of Portland; Imogene, at home; Mary and Mark, both deceased. Fraternally Mr. Gill is a member of the blue lodge and chapter of the Masonic order; Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church, in which he officiates as an elder. In addition to his business interests of the city, Mr. Gill has always been active in the municipal government, as a Republican serving as mayor of the city for one term, as councilman for many years, and as school director for one term. He has always proven his interest in public welfare by his disinterested and broad-minded action, and as a man of integrity and capability the community depends upon him to help sustain the honor and prosperity of their city.

JOSEPH R. KEEBLER. Now retired from the active cares of life Joseph R. Keebler makes his home in Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., near which city over a quarter of a century of his life has been passed, his energy, industry and perseverance given to an intelligent cultivation of the soil. He came to Oregon in 1875 and has since resided in this state, becoming a sturdy and trustworthy citizen of the western commonwealth, and in connection with his accumulation of a competency he has fulfilled the duties that have come to him as a member of the community in which he made his home.

The Keebler family came originally from the Middle Atlantic states, the grandfather, James, having been born in Virginia, from which state he removed to Tennessee, and died there while engaged in farming. The father of Mr. Keebler, another James, was born in Tennessee, and in 1849 he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and located in California, where he became connected with a stage line between Sacramento and Placerville, which was then called by the significant name of Hangtown. He drove a stage for some time over this route, his last trip being made in the year 1852, when he drove in at the end of the line and some time later was found dead on a mound of hay near, cholera having claimed him for its victim. His wife, formerly Katherine Crouch, a native of east Tennessee, was again married, after the death of her first husband, and then removed to Illinois in 1856, from which state she crossed to California in 1861. She later made her home in Oregon, where her death occurred. Her second husband, Allen Range, is also deceased.

Of the two sons and one daughter born to his parents, Joseph R. Keebler was the eldest, and was born in east Tennessee, May 14, 1840, where he lived until he reached the age of fourteen years. During these years of childhood he attended the common schools of his native state, gleaning what little knowledge he could under the adverse conditions of those early times. On going to Illinois he found employment on a farm until 1871, and at that date he crossed the plains to California and located in Yolo county. After four years spent as a farmer in that location Mr. Keebler came north to Oregon, and with the proceeds of his previous years of labor he bought two hundred and fifty acres of land one mile north of Lebanon, Linn county. Later he parted with a portion of this purchase, and at the present time owns but one hundred and sixty acres, which he rents. In September, 1902, he removed to Lebanon, and has since made this his home.

The marriage of Mr. Keebler occurred in Illinois, Lucinda Melvin, a native of that state, becoming his wife. Her death occurred in Oregon. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Keebler, John Allen is now deceased; James V. is located upon the home farm; Elbert E. is also in this county; Katie is the wife of S. G. Keefhaver, of Linn county, Ore.; William Henry is deceased; Anna is the wife of D. Hildreth, living in this county; Bell is the wife of Frank Lutz, of Linn county; Myrtle is Mrs. Frank Parrish, of Linn county; Mary Narcissus is deceased; Joseph Benjamin is located in this county; and T. E. is engaged in logging in Washington. In his fraternal relations Mr. Keebler is a master Mason, and also belongs to the F. O. R. Politically he is a Democrat and has served as road supervisor and school director.

ANDREW V. LANE. Although several years have elapsed since Andrew V. Lane went from the scenes of his activities in Lake county, he is still recalled by those who survive him, and who met him at the home, in the church, or in public life, as the embodiment of virile manhood. Born in Vermilion county, Ill., December 5, 1852, Mr. Lane was a son of Horace and Margaret (Barner) Lane, natives of Ohio. The parents were married in the Buckeye state, and from there removed at an early day to Vermilion county, Ill. The year after Andrew's birth, in 1853, the parents crossed the plains, the father taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres upon the present site of Rowland Station. Here he succeeded fairly well as a farmer and stockman, and reared his family in comparative comfort, giving his children such advantages as were in his power. His wife dying in Colfax, Wash., in 1885, he continued for a time to live on the home farm; but his last days were spent at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Joel Huston, where his death occurred in October, 1896.

Andrew V. was the third of the children born to his parents, and his youth was uneventfully passed on the home farm. Although he attended the public school with comparative regularity, he learned more from observation than books, and in later life especially, kept abreast of the times, becoming a well informed man on current events. In 1868 he left the home place and went to Big Valley, Cal., where he engaged in stock-raising until 1873, and then moved to Silver Lake, Ore., and dealt in stock until his death, which occurred December 13, 1896. His wife, formerly Martha Small, was born in Lane county, February 23, 1857, a daughter of George Small, the latter born in Tennessee, January 6, 1802, and who died in California, March 13, 1862. Mr. Small was a farmer during his entire active life, and crossed the plains with the emigrants of 1853, locating in Lane county on three hundred and twenty acres of land adjoining Cottage Grove. Here he farmed until removing his family to California in 1860. His wife, Malinda (Hinch) Small, was born in Cape Girardeau county, Mo., August 25, 1813, and died at Cottage Grove, Ore., March 13, 1893, leaving five children, of whom Mrs. Lane is the youngest.

Mr. Lane was a very successful man, and attained to great prominence in the community which he adorned with his exemplary character and well directed industry. He was a stock man in every sense of the word, and understood more about his occupation than the average man thus interested. He was a Democrat in politics, and though never seeking office, consented to fill unimportant local offices, as well as that of commissioner of Lake county for six years, or from 1890 to 1896. After his death his widow continued to live on the old place until 1899, and then moved onto her present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, four and a half miles east of Harrisburg. She is the owner of a stock ranch of seventeen hundred acres in Lake county, the proceeds from which net her a handsome yearly income. In her general farming industry she is assisted by her second son, William G., her oldest son James H., residing in Salem; while her youngest daughter, Bernice, is also living at home.

FRANKLIN A. LINK. An industrious and well-to-do agriculturist of Polk county, Franklin A. Link is proprietor of a fine homestead, located two and one-half miles southwest of Lewisville, which in regard to its appointments and improvements compares favorably with any in the neighborhood. The neatness and orderly appearance of the property manifest to the most casual observer, the thrift and care of the owner, all show conclusively that he has a thorough knowledge of his business and exercises good judgment in its management. A German by birth, he was born in Bavaria, October 23, 1832, on the paternal side being of French extraction, his Grandfather Link, who came into Germany during the reign of Napoleon, having at that time changed his original name of De Linn to Link to avoid trouble with the French.

George Link, father of Franklin A., was born in Bavaria, Germany, in 1798, and while living in the fatherland was extensively engaged in farming. Emigrating to America in 1846 with his family, he had a stormy voyage of fifty-two days before reaching New York. Locating first in Wheeling, W. Va., he lived there two years, then spent eight years on a farm in Washington county, Pa. Removing to Iowa in 1856, he purchased land in Dubuque county, and was there successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, in November, 1878. He was a skilful farmer, a trustworthy citizen, and a man of strict integrity, in every way worthy of the respect accorded him by his neighbors and friends. He married Mary A. Linbach, who was born in the Rhine valley, Germany, and died, in July, 1878, in Dubuque county, Iowa, aged seventy-three years, her birth having occurred in 1805. Of their family of three sons and two daughters, Franklin A., the subject of this sketch, was the third child.

Acquiring his early education in Germany, Franklin A. Link came to this country with his parents in 1846, and a few years later studied for three months at an academy in Pennsylvania. While living in Wheeling, W. Va., he served an apprenticeship of two and one-half years at the tailor's trade, afterwards going to Pennsylvania, where he assisted his father in farming until 1856. In June of that year, he emigrated to Ohio, and for ten years was engaged in farm work in Belmont county, in the meantime taking unto himself a wife. Removing with his family to Missouri in 1866, he carried on general farming in Bates county ten years. Following the march of civilization westward, he came to Oregon in 1876, settling with his family in Polk county. Renting the farm of Benjamin Hayden, in Independence, he managed it for seven years, subsequently renting the farm of Pierce Riggs for nine years. In 1891 Mr. Link purchased his present farm of five hundred and fifteen acres, lying about two and one-half miles southwest of Lewisville, and, moving on it in 1896, has since resided here. He has made various and substantial improvements on the place, and is extensively engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He makes a specialty of breeding and raising goats and sheep, having thoroughbred, registered Angora goats, keeping about one hundred and forty in his herd, and has an equally large herd of Cotswold sheep.

In Washington county, Pa., in 1856, Mr. Link married Margaret Craig, who was born in that county. She died in Harrison county, Ohio, in 1862, leaving two sons, Harrington R., deceased, and George C., of Allegheny county, Pa. Mr. Link married again in 1864, Mary L. Frazier, who was born in Belmont county, Ohio, in March, 1844. Mr. and Mrs. Link are the parents of five children, namely: Margaret, wife of Manley Martin, of Independence, Ore.; Mary E., living at home; Lizzie M., a twin sister of Mary E., is the wife of Andrew Hannam, who lives near Pedee, Ore.; Homer, at home; and Nellie, at home. In his political views Mr. Link is independent, using his own best judgment in casting his ballot, instead of blindly following any political leader, or giving an unqualified adherence to any party. While living in Ohio, Missouri and Oregon, he was road supervisor, serving in that capacity twelve years in all, and since 1896 has been school clerk in District No. 39. Fraternally he belongs to Independence Lodge, A. F. & A. M.

JEDEDIAH WHEELER. When his day's work is over and he sits down to enjoy the peace and happiness of his home, the reflections of Jedediah Wheeler must be tinged with satisfaction. The prominence which is his in Lane county is of the solid and well founded kind, painstakingly and laboriously acquired, as is also the competence which placed him among the financial successes of his neighborhood. The boy wrestling with limitations might well draw encouragement from the upward path of this honored pioneer, for his life-story is that of the poor boy who had to look within rather than without for his help in time of need. His father dying when he was two years old, his mother joined the great majority when he was twenty, and the home in Illinois, where he was born January 30, 1832, was thus sadly uprooted, the five children being thrown upon their own resources, the subject of this review being the youngest.

Beginning with his tenth year, Mr. Wheeler found employment in a house as a servant in Illinois, and when he was fifteen he made his way to within fifty miles east of St. Louis, where he worked in a sawmilling and logging camp and a grist mill. This occupation opened up a possibility in a tavern, to the management of which he finally succeeded, and in 1850 he started in to serve an apprenticeship to a carpenter and cabinetmaker. To his youthful mind, to master a trade was the personification of independence, and with this feeling of certainty regarding the future, he crossed the plains in 1853 as a driver of an ox-team, spending about six months on the way. In the Sacramento valley he made his living at teaming for a few months during the winter, and in the spring of 1854 went to the mines, where he labored for a time with alternate success and failure. Having heard of the possibilities of Oregon, and not having made a success of his mining venture, and desiring to reach that state, he walked the entire distance of three hundred and fifty miles. In Eugene he worked at his trade as carpenter for about five years. In 1859 he was united in marriage with Amanda E. Walker, a native daughter of Oregon, with whom he established a home, purchased with his earnings as a carpenter. In 1864 he disposed of his city property for a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, twelve miles east of Eugene, which comprised the whole of the Pingree donation claim, where he lived a couple of years and then sold it. Again in Eugene, he started and conducted a tinshop for a year, and then bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres on the Coast Fork, where he lived until 1889. Following his farming experience, Mr. Wheeler settled in Pleasant Hill and engaged in a general merchandise business for ten years, identifying himself with political and other means of advancement and becoming an important factor in business circles. The old appreciation of farming and the quiet and peace of country life re-asserting itself, he disposed of his store in 1899 and bought the one hundred and fourteen acres of land on Pleasant Hill which is now his home, and where he is engaged in general farming.

Since young manhood a Whig, and later a supporter of the Republican party, Mr. Wheeler has been variously honored by his fellow-townsmen at different stages of his career, having served with equal satisfaction as postmaster, deputy sheriff, constable of Eugene, and for many years school director. His first wife dying in 1880, he married the following year Elizabeth Davis, a native of Indiana. By the first marriage there were eight children, of whom five survive, Allie E., Halvor C. and William L., living in the vicinity of Pleasant Hill, while Lester A. is a resident of California, and Walter B. lives in Coburg. Emma J. married Edgar C. Baxter, both now deceased. During his lifetime Mr. Wheeler has laid up a store of useful and interesting information, has cultivated the graces of honesty and fair dealing, and has made many true and tried friends in the places which he has called home. Mr. Wheeler and his family are members of the Christian Church at Pleasant Hill.

WILLIAM FIRMAN HENDRICSON, a retired agriculturist of Albany, has spent a long and busy life, actively engaged the greater part of the time in tilling the soil. Emigrating from Pleasant Grove, Iowa, in 1845, he took up land near Albany, where he had much pioneer work to perform, contributing his part toward the development of this fine agricultural region. When he came to Oregon the red man roamed the country at will, wild animals were plentiful, not infrequently making their appearance near the humble cabins of the newcomers. There being no near-by markets the family provisions were usually supplied from the products of the land, or obtained by gun or rod. In the wonderful and rapid changes of conditions that have since taken place he has been a gratified observer and participant.

A son of John Henricson, he was born January 26, 1824, in Lewis county, Ky., a descendant of English ancestry, his paternal grandfather, Daniel Hendricson, having been born in England, although he died in Kentucky, on a homestead which he had cleared from the wilderness. John Hendricson, a life-long farmer of Kentucky, died in 1824, and his wife, whose maiden name was Agnes Wilson, died eight years later.

Knowing nothing of a father's care, and being left motherless when but eight years of age, W. F. Hendricson had a lonely childhood. At the age of twelve years he left his old Kentucky home, going to Rush county, Ind., and later to Yorktown, Ind. In 1840 he removed to Pleasant Grove, Iowa, and five years later drove across the plains to Oregon, coming with the Hackleman train of ox-teams by way of the Tualitin plains. He took up land on the Santiam river, and soon after, in 1847, returned to Iowa, crossing the plains with pack animals, calculating to return to Oregon early in 1848, but failing to do this he lost his claim. In 1850 he made another journey across the plains with ox-teams, locating in California, where he was engaged in mining for a year. Returning then to Iowa by way of the Isthmus, Mr. Hendricson staid but a short time, when, in 1852, he started with his family and all his worldly effects for Oregon, coming via the Barlow route, with ox-teams, and being from March until August 9, en route. Taking up a donation claim six miles south of Albany, he cleared a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, adding substantial improvements, and was there engaged in general farming and stock-raising until 1887. He met with most satisfactory results from his labors, his industrious toil bringing him good returns. Renting his farm, he has since resided in Albany, where he is held in high respect as a man of honest integrity and worth.

Mr. Hendricson married first, in Iowa, in 1848, Sarah Jackson, who was born in Rushville, Ind.,

January 29, 1827, a daughter of Omar Jackson, a native of Virginia, who was first engaged as a tiller of the soil in Indiana, and afterwards in Iowa. Mrs. Hendricson died at Albany, Ore., October 23, 1891. She was a woman of exemplary character, widely known and esteemed, and a member of the Christian Church. Seven children were born of their union, namely: Leona, the wife of John Huston, of Albany; Lavinia, who died in Albany; Morvin, residing in Oregon, near The Dalles; Omar P., who was deputy sheriff at Colfax, Wash.; Mary, who became Mrs. Bellshaw, living in St. Paul; Frank, who died in Albany; and Willie, a painter in Lebanon, Ore.

On July 18, 1893, Mr. Hendricson married Mrs. Mary E. Fronk, who was born in Goshen, Orange county, N. Y., a daughter of Alexander S. Brown, and granddaughter of Thomas Brown. Alexander S. Brown, who spent his earlier life in Orange county, N. Y., was a shoe dealer first in Goshen, and then in Mechanicstown. In 1845 he removed to Elkhorn, Wis., where he continued his former business. He was elected judge of the county court of Walworth county and served for a few years. In 1853, accompanied by his wife and four children, he came across the plains to California, Mrs. Hendricson, then a girl of fourteen years, driving one of the ox-teams during the trip of six months. Settling in Yuba City, he was engaged in the hotel business there a year, then purchased a ranch in Sutter county, on which he resided until his death, at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife, whose maiden name was Mary Brundage, was born in Orange county, N. Y., a daughter of Gilbert Brundage, and died in 1859, in Sutter county, Cal., aged fifty-nine years. Of the four children, two sons and two daughters, born of their marriage, Mary E., now Mrs. Hendricson, is the only survivor. Mary E. Brown was educated in the public schools of Wisconsin and California. In 1853 she married, at Yuba City, Cal., John M. Fronk, a native of Vincennes, Ind. As a young man, Mr. Fronk was a boatman on the Ohio river. Emigrating to California in 1850, he established a ferry across the Feather river. In 1871 he took charge of Love's Hotel, in Portland, Ore., and managed it six months. He subsequently conducted the St. Charles Hotel in Albany, Ore., for a time, and went afterwards to Eugene, Ore., where he conducted the St. Charles Hotel until 1884, then engaged in farming in Lane county for a few years. Returning from there to Eugene, he resided there until his death, November 30, 1890, at the age of sixty-four years and ten months. He was a Republican in politics, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and had taken the Knight Templar degree of Masonry. Of the nine children born of the union of Mr.

and Mrs. Fronk, four grew to years of maturity, namely: C. K. Fronk, agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at Albany; Margaret, wife of Alan J. Goodman, of Independence, Ore.; Henry E., of Albany; and Edwin A., who is in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

Mrs. Hendricson is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Hendricson is a member, and one of the deacons, of the Christian Church. Politically he is an uncompromising Republican.

THOMAS FRANKLIN MILLER. The successful sheep-raisers in Linn county include Thomas Franklin Miller, who owns considerable valuable property in Lebanon, and has a ranch of one hundred acres one mile south of the town. Mr. Miller comes of an old southern family represented for many years in Virginia, where he was born in Rockingham county, June 21, 1835. His father, Thomas Miller, and his mother, Anna (Spotts) Miller, were also natives of Virginia. Thomas Miller was the only child born to his parents. He located in Saline county, Mo., in 1839, and while living on a tract of land comprising seven hundred acres, engaged in brick-making quite extensively. He was a very successful man, prominent and influential, and left a valuable property to his heirs at the time of his death in December, 1870, at the age of sixty-nine years. His wife survived him and died in Waverly, Mo., leaving two sons and three daughters, of whom Thomas F. is the youngest.

At the time of his father's death Thomas F. Miller assumed entire management of the large Missouri farm which had been willed him by his sire, and retained possession of it until 1880. He then came to Oregon and located near Scio, where he bought two hundred and seventy acres of land, remaining there until disposing of it in 1899. His next purchase was a farm of one hundred and eighty-six acres two and a half miles south of Lebanon, which he sold in 1902, and took up his residence in the town. His home property consists of five acres, under a high state of cultivation, and he has an attractive cottage, surrounded by shrubs, trees and flowering plants. On his farm of one hundred acres a mile from town he is extensively engaged in raising sheep, making a specialty of the Cotswold breed, many of his animals being registered.

The first marriage of Mr. Miller occurred in Missouri, and was with Sarah E. Yager, who was born in Missouri, and died there, leaving three children: Ella, the wife of L. J. Wiltfong of Washington; L. Edwin, a resident of Scio; and Cora, the wife of Grant Hawley of Grass Valley, eastern Oregon. For a second wife he married a native of Muskingum county, Ohio, born near Zanesville, May 18, 1847. Riley Bratton, the father of Mrs. Miller, was of Scotch ancestry, and was born in Guernsey county, Ohio. He crossed the plains to California in the spring of 1850, but returned and settled with his family in Iowa in 1851, taking up a homestead near Oskaloosa, whence he moved to Linn county, near Brownsville, in 1867. Mr. Bratton was a farmer and a potter by trade, and came to Oregon in 1881, living for a time with his son-in-law, but eventually settling on a homestead in western Oregon, where he died at the age of seventy-two years. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Miller, Howard lives in Franklin county, Wash., and Roland is at home, Walter E. and Lester being deceased.

A Republican in politics, Mr. Miller has held a number of offices in the places where he has lived, principally in eastern Oregon and Missouri, in both of which places he served as notary public, road supervisor and school director. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, having earned the right thereto by a service of three years and one month in the Civil war, for which he enlisted in Company F, Seventh Regular Cavalry, serving in the western department under Col. John F. Phillips, of Kansas City. For injuries sustained while in the service Mr. Miller draws a pension. He is a whole-souled and generous man, agreeable to meet, sincere and loyal to friends and trusts imposed, and of unquestioned integrity.

JOSEPH ERBSLAND. The vicinity of Aurora is well adapted for general farming, hop-growing and other agricultural pursuits, and to those who assiduously apply themselves to this vocation, success is assured. One of the most prosperous men in this line of activity is Joseph Erbsland, who has a fine farm near Aurora, devoted to the above named industries. To say that Mr. Erbsland's farm is well conducted, improved and cultivated is but simple truth. The progressive owner has brought about this state of affairs through his own industry and enterprise.

The history of Joseph Erbsland does not differ in many respects from that of the most of our substantial western men, who, born in eastern and central states, seek homes farther away from the close touch of civilization, knowing that the tide of empire westward winds its way, and that the best chances are for the one who arrives first. Mr. Erbsland is a native of Indiana, having been born in Jennings county, that state, near North Vernon, October 11, 1850, receiving his education in the common schools of the neighborhood and living upon a farm, thus becoming acquainted in early youth with the work of tilling the soil. At the age of nineteen he began working at the stone cutter's trade, following this occupation until 1887, when he came to Oregon and began working on a farm in Marion county. He saved enough to purchase a farm of his own, which he did soon after his marriage in January, 1890, with Miss Louisa Beck, a daughter of Charles Beck. On the home farm Mr. Erbsland has made improvements which render it very valuable and make it one of the attractive and prosperous-looking places of the vicinity. He has seven acres planted in hops, and the raising of this herb proves a great source of income. There are few farms in Marion county that yield a better return for the care and labor bestowed upon them than does that of Mr. Erbsland, and he may well look upon his fields with pride, knowing that through his well directed efforts has come the success which he enjoys. Fraternally he is a member of Aurora Lodge, Ancient Order of United Workmen, while in politics he affiliates with the Democracy. A consistent and earnest member of the Lutheran church, Mr. Erbsland in his own life follows the teachings of his religion. He is a substantial, well balanced and thoroughly up-to-date, plain, every-day farmer, one who does credit to his county and who has the good will of all who know him.

HON. J. A. RICHARDSON, M. D., the oldest practicing physician of Salem, and former member of the state legislature, was born in Adams county, Ill., November 15, 1840, and is of English and Scotch-Irish descent. His paternal grandfather, George, a native of Pennsylvania, came to Illinois in 1793, settling at Kaskaskia, the first capital of Illinois territory. He was a trapper, hunter and Indian fighter, and is believed to have served in the Revolutionary war. At any rate, he took an active part in scattering the Indian forces around Kaskaskia directly after the war of Independence, and was present at Horner's defeat. He served also in the war of 1812, and soon after settled on the American bottoms, five miles from East St. Louis. Here he farmed for many years, but was finally drowned, while trying to ford a stream in Greene county, Ill. John Belcher, who came with the Lewis and Clark expedition as far as the Mandan country and in the following spring was returned to St. Louis with dispatches and a report of the expedition to that point, and who was killed at the battle of the Narrows, near the present site of Quincy, Ill., during the war of 1812, was a cousin of Dr. Richardson's father, John G. Richardson, and held a lieutenant's commission in the army at the time of his death.

John G. Richardson, the father of the doctor, was born on his father's farm near East St. Louis, and he, also, served in the war of 1812. Soon afterward he removed to Greene county, Ill., and from there to Adams county, and in 1851 brought his wife and children to Oregon, settling on a donation claim near Scio, Linn county, where he died in 1871. He married Orpha Thompson, who was born in South Carolina, and who removed as a child with her parents to Illinois. Mrs. Richardson, who died in 1866, was the mother of nine sons and one daughter, the order of their birth being as follows: Thomas J., who came to Oregon in 1853 and died at Jefferson; William Winston, who came west in 1851 and died in Scio, in 1901; George W., who also came west in 1851 and who died in Salem, in 1883; Lewis Clark, who came to Oregon in 1847 and died in 1869; Elijah T., who came to California in 1849, to Oregon in 1856, and is now living in Spokane, Wash.; Obediah W., who came to California in 1849, to Oregon in 1858, and lives at present in Sherman county, Ore.; John W., who came west in 1851 and is near Scio; Andrew J., a pioneer of 1851, and now living at Stayton, Ore.; James Asher, the subject of this sketch; and Rebecca, who married James Enos and died near Scio, in 1881.

Although but ten years of age when he came with his family to Oregon Dr. Richardson vividly recalls the many incidents which enlivened the long journey across the plains. Much of his time was devoted to helping to drive the loose horses and cows. They crossed the Missouri river at Council Bluffs, but owing to the swollen condition of the Elkhorn river they were detained for over a month. At Goose creek, near the Snake river, they were attacked by Indians. The fight lasted until after dark and was resumed in the morning. About ten o'clock they succeeded in making their escape through front and rear guards, taking with them their wagons, twenty-one in number. The train came down the Columbia river in a body, and the Richardsons settled on their claim in the fall of 1851. The doctor was educated in the district schools near his father's claim, at Bethel College, in Polk county, then the leading college in the state, and Lebanon Academy, which he attended for a year. For several years he engaged in educational work and during a part of that time studied medicine under the direction of Dr. Ballard, of Lebanon. In 1864 he entered the Toland Medical College, of San Francisco, now the medical department of the University of the Pacific, and after graduating in 1866 engaged in practice at Amity, Yamhill county, Ore., for about a year. Thereafter he lived and practiced in McMinnville, and in 1869 entered the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, of New York City, from which he was graduated in 1870. The same year he returned to Oregon and located in Salem, where he practiced successfully until going to The Dalles, in 1879. In 1887 he took a post-graduate course in the New York Post-Graduate School, returning then to Salem, which has since been his home. The doctor has never allowed himself to get behind the times in his profession, in proof of which he returned to New York City in 1895 for an additional post-graduate course.

Aside from a general medical and surgical practice Dr. Richardson has filled many positions of trust and responsibility in the community. As early as 1872 he became identified with the medical department of the Willamette University, filling the chairs of obstetrics, diseases of women, hygiene and materia medica up to the time when the school was removed to Portland. When the school was again located in Salem he was appointed to the chair of diseases of children. For about twelve years he served as a member of the pension board; has been connected professionally with the Oregon Insane Asylum for three years; with the Oregon State Penitentiary; with the Oregon Reform School for nine years; as well as with the Blind and Deaf schools. He is a member of the County Medical Society, a charter member of the State Medical Society, of the Historical Society and the Pioneer Association.

Much of Dr. Richardson's prominence is due to his exceptional political service, he being a staunch exponent of Republicanism, and at all times incorruptible and broad-minded when in office. He was a member of the state senate from 1872 to 1876, was mayor of Salem for one term, and is an ex-member of the state central committee and the county committee. Fraternally he is one of the best known men of the county, being formerly identified with Amity Lodge No. 20, A. F. & A. M., of Amity; Union Lodge No. 46, of which he was master; Pacific Lodge of Salem, of which he was master; and Wasco Lodge at The Dalles, of which he is past master. He is also associated with The Dalles Chapter, R. A. M., of which he was high priest for one term; De Molay Commandery No. 5; Oregon Consistory No. 1; the Eastern Star, of which he organized the Second Chapter in Oregon at McMinnville.

In Salem, Ore., Dr. Richardson married Fannie Boyd, who was born in Yamhill county, Ore., in 1852, the daughter of John and Lodowska (Adams) Boyd, her parents having arrived in the state in the early forties. Two children have been born to the doctor and his wife, of whom Frankie is a graduate of the law department of Willamette Valley; and Boyd is a graduate of the medical department of the same university, and is now with the hospital staff in Manila. Dr. Richardson is a splendid example of the substantial and well balanced physician who is also the man of affairs, and vitally interested in the moving world around him. To no one in the county is the medical profession more indebted for the maintenance of sound and practical theories, or for that spirit of humanity, tolerance and kindness which the world at large has come to associate with its foremost disciples of Æsculapius.

JAMES W. MILLER. The prosperous owner of four hundred and seventeen acres, one hundred and sixty of which comprise a part of the old donation claim taken up by his father in October, 1850, James W. Miller is one of the enterprising farmers of Linn county, now engaging in general farming and stock-raising, meeting with the returns which follow persevering and intelligent industry. Through the efforts of himself and a family of exceptional ability Mr. Miller has contributed in no small measure to the growth of this part of the Willamette valley in which he makes his home, his position of prominence being the result of praiseworthy ambition along the lines of state advancement.

James W. Miller was born in Bridgeport, Nova Scotia, August 17, 1833, the son of Malcolm Miller, for a fuller account of whose life refer to the sketch of Gabriel Miller, which appears elsewhere in this work. When ten years old he removed with his parents to Pennsylvania, and after seven years' residence in that state, the family crossed the plains in the spring of 1850, landing in Linn county safely after the long and trying journey. In December, 1851, he went with his father and brothers George and Andrew to California with pack animals, and there worked in the mines for the ensuing winter. In the fall following this he began to conduct a pack-train from Portland to the Yreka mines, at which work he continued until the spring of 1853, when he went to the Coos Bay country and there opened up cove mines. He afterward began buying and selling cattle, which he drove through from Linn county into southern Oregon and California, reaping returns that justified a continuance in the work until 1859. Still interested in mining Mr. Miller went in 1862 to the Salmon river mines in Idaho, but after a few months he returned to Linn county, and has since that time devoted his energies entirely to farming and stock-raising.

The marriage of Mr. Miller occurred January 25, 1874, and united him with Mrs. Rosa A. Baker, a daughter of Peter S. Brenner, who came to Oregon in 1853 from La Fayette, Ind., and bought Dr. Warren's right to a donation claim near Scio, where he died in 1899. The children of this union are as follows: Malcolm B., located on an adjoining farm; J. W., Jr., who, after securing an education in Monmouth, has devoted his talents to instruction in the school room for the past six years; Kate B., also educated in that city, has become a teacher; Rosa L., also a teacher; and Nona P. Mr. Miller is a member of the Presbyterian Church, religiously, and though not a politician, in his public life he has always demonstrated his willingness to aid in the government of the community to the best of his ability by serving in various offices.

HON. SYLVESTER PENNOYER. One of the most forceful and earnest men to be named in connection with the early history of Oregon is the Hon. Sylvester Pennoyer, whose term of office as governor of the state was characteristic of the qualities which distinguished this pioneer. He was born in Groton, Tompkins county, N. Y., July 6, 1831, the son of Justus Powers and Elizabeth (Howland) Pennoyer, both of whom were representatives of fine eastern families which transmitted to their descendants the good characteristics of natives of several European countries. Justus Powers Pennoyer was one of the largest farmers in Groton and one of the foremost men of the town in all public enterprises, and at one time he represented his county in the New York assembly, though he was not at all a politician in the common acceptance of the term.

The boyhood of Mr. Pennoyer was much like that of any other farm-bred youth, consisting of alternate work and school, until he had attained a sufficient age to become a student of Homer Academy, New York, where he took a full course of study. Later he attended the Dane Law School, Harvard University, from which he received his diploma in the summer of 1854. The following year he left his home and came west, arriving in Portland, Ore., about the 10th of July, 1855. Shortly after his arrival in the state he engaged in teaching in the public schools, in which occupation he remained for five or six years. It was about the year 1862 that Mr. Pennoyer became interested in the lumber business in Portland, this remaining the subject of his business activity throughout the greater part of his life. With his intellectual capacity he naturally became connected with the papers of the west, from 1868 to the year 1871 serving for the greater part of the time as editor of the Oregon Herald. He became well and favorably known as a political writer of the day; though his articles were always forcible and pungent they seldom aroused animosity, both on account of the infusion of a warm humor and the entire absence of any manifestation of malice in all his writings. Though a strong Democrat and always active in the promotion of the principles which he espoused, he neither sought nor cared for political recognition, and it was not until 1886 that his name was brought up as that of a candidate for public office. He was then nominated for governor of the state on the Democratic ticket, the action being entirely without effort on his part, as he declined to do more than to promise to accept the nomination if given him. He had become a very prominent man in the state, however, through his espousal of the cause of the Anti-Chinese party, the agitation of which question had recently caused bitter feeling. Following his nomination Mr. Pennoyer canvassed the state with that determination and energy characteristic of him in all his efforts, whether personal or public, and in his speeches proved a logical and forceful advocate. His inaugural address was faultless as a literary production, though it aroused much sharp criticism on account of the position which the governor took in regard to the right of the courts to nullify a law of the state. During his administration he maintained the same direct, positive manner in dealing with whatever came under discussion and won recognition as a man fearless and determined in the maintenance of his principles.

The marriage of Mr. Pennoyer occurred in 1856, and united him with Mrs. Mary A. Allen, by whom he had five children, two of whom are still living.

LA FAYETTE GROVER. The name which heads this review is one that is widely known throughout the state of Oregon, and the man who bears it is one honored in the early history of the northwest. In all early political movements, progressive in their trend, he was officially connected and gave substantial aid, rising successively, step by step, until he attained the position of fourth governor of Oregon.

He was born in Bethel, Me., November 29, 1823, of ancestry on both sides distinguished in the early history of Massachusetts. His education was received in the Classical Academy at Bethel and in Bowdoin College, after which he studied law in Philadelphia, under the instruction of the late Asa I. Fish. He was admitted to the bar in March, 1850, shortly after which event he put aside his bright prospects in the east and went to California, arriving in July, 1851, and in the next month reached Portland via the old steamer Columbia. He at once proceeded to Salem, where he established himself as a lawyer. He was shortly appointed clerk of the First Judicial district, from which office he resigned to become a law partner of Benjamin F. Harding, afterwards United States district attorney, secretary of the territory of Oregon and United States senator. In 1852 Mr. Grover was elected prosecuting attorney of the second judicial district, and the year following was elected and served as a member of the territorial legislature for three terms, the last two terms being a representative from Marion county. In 1857 he was chosen a member of the state constitutional convention and was elected first congressman for Oregon in 1858, taking his seat February 15, 1859.

On his return to Oregon Mr. Grover devoted his time to professional and business pursuits, besides a practice of his profession in partnership with Hon. Joseph S. Smith and Judge W. W. Page, taking an active part in various enterprises. In 1856 he took an active part in the organization of the Willamette Woolen Manufacturing Company, at Salem, and four years later became a one-third owner of all the mills and water-power of the city, and during his management of the company's interest the Salem Flouring Mills were completed and became an industrial success of the valley. In 1866 he presided over the Democratic state convention of that year, and by the convention was elected chairman of the Democratic state central committee, which position he held for four years. At the close of that period he was elected governor of Oregon on the Democratic ticket, and was re-elected and served until 1877, when he resigned to accept the position of United States senator, to which he had been elected. He served in the senate until 1883, when he retired permanently from public and professional life and devoted his time to private affairs.

Mr. Grover was married, in 1865, to Miss Elizabeth Carter, daughter of Thomas Carter, well known as an early resident of Portland, and they have one son, John Cuvier Grover.

HENRY STEWART. Since the latter part of the '80s Henry Stewart has been known around Albany as an enterprising and successful dairyman-farmer. He came to the state in 1885, engaged at various occupations in Albany for a couple of years, for two years conducted a small ranch near the city and finally settled upon his present farm, four and a half miles southwest of Albany. He has one hundred acres of land, a large part of it in pasture, and his general improvements are modern and consistent with an ideal dairying enterprise.

Born in Ashe county, N. C., February 9, 1860, Mr. Stewart is a son of Jackson and Hila (Francis) Stewart, natives of North Carolina, and the former born in Surrey county, N. C., February 29, 1819. Jackson Stewart was formerly a farmer, who left his large southern property to enlist in the Civil war, during which service he contracted an illness which has since resulted in total blindness. He was a member of the Home Guard, and was never afterward able to work as well as before the fortunes of war left him with weakened faculties. Many years ago his wife died at the age of sixty-four, and he, himself, is eighty-four, a philosopher in his affliction, and inclined to view the world after better fashion than it has treated him. Thirteen children have been born into his family, and of this large number the following are living: Casper, of Eugene; Eli, of Albany; John, of North Carolina; Jacob, also of North Carolina; Margaret, Newell, Henry, Lowry and Lular.

At the age of twenty-one Henry Stewart left the old farm in North Carolina and went to Virginia, where he followed farming for a couple of years. For a year, also, he farmed in Nebraska, but not being particularly well pleased with the middle west came to the coast and settled in Albany in 1885. With him came his wife, who was formerly Celia V. Testerman, a native of Virginia, and who is now the mother of five children, the order of their birth being as follows: Maggie E., Ella L., Dent F., Roy C. and Dora B. While not an office-seeker, Mr. Stewart is a staunch upholder of Republicanism, and has served for one term on the school board. He is fraternally connected with the Knights of the Maccabees. As a farmer and promoter of the wellbeing of Linn county, Mr. Stewart takes high rank, and he has many friends in the county. His dairy products have reached the highest standard of excellence, and he has as high grade Jersey cattle as will be found in Linn county.

GILBERT L. WORKINGER. Enviably prominent in Linn county has followed as the result of many years of agricultural and other activity on the part of Gilbert L. Workinger, whose ninety-acre farm, though a comparatively small one, is one of the finest in this vicinity. Located four miles northwest of Shedd's, and fourteen miles southwest of Albany, it is a part of the old Jacob Miller donation claim, and is indebted to its present owner for the greater part of its improvements. A fine modern dwelling and unquestionably the largest and finest barn in the neighborhood, as well as the most modern of agricultural implements, facilitate the carrying on of as scientific and practical a general farming enterprise as may be found in this county. A model dairy contributes a considerable share of the income from this splendidly developed farm.

That congenial work means successful work is undoubtedly the secret of Mr. Workinger's success, for he expresses the greatest enthusiasm for the free and beautiful life of the country, and for the infinite possibilities of the soil and climate to be found in this fertile region. As far back as is known, his ancestors were tillers of the soil in the state of Pennsylvania, where his birth occurred September 5, 1862. His father was a carpenter and millwright by trade, as well as a farmer, and, until the time of his death, at the age of forty-six, he combined these occupations with moderate success. He was survived for many years by his wife, who lived to be seventy-nine, and who reared a family of eleven children. Like his brothers and sisters, Gilbert L. attended the public schools irregularly, but there were many mouths to feed, and the children were obliged to support themselves as early as possible. He started away from home at the age of eleven, and for the following five years worked as a farm hand in his native county of Indiana, receiving as compensation for services his clothes and board and schooling. His five years ended, he continued with his employer for nine months, and for the latter period received the—to him—large sum of $60.

At the age of seventeen Mr. Workinger went to Johnstown, Pa., and was employed in the Cambria Iron Works for a couple of years, and when nineteen went to Kansas and worked on a farm for about two years. His path then led to Montana, where he found employment in a hardware store until the fall of 1884, when he returned to Pennsylvania, and farmed until 1885. In his native state he married Jennie N. Gibson, born in the Quaker state, and with whom he came to Oregon in the spring of 1886. At that time he purchased his present farm, and has since devoted his energies to improving it, and to making a name for himself among the most honored and influential citizens of this county. He is the only one of his family who has come to the west, and his exertions here have certainly reflected credit upon those responsible for his training in the east. There is not a man hereabouts who is more universally commended, both for accomplishment and character, or one who more nearly typifies the representative northwestern farmer. He is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the United Brethren Church. In his family have been born six children, the order of their birth being as follows: Tillie Margaret, Clata Mae, George William, Gilbert Frank, Edith Jane and Gerald Lowry.

GEORGE W. CLINE. Among the native sons of Marion county, none are more typical of the successful and progressive northwestern farmer and stock-raiser than George W. Cline, at present owning and living on a farm formerly owned by his father. He was born on a farm near Salem, May 6, 1849, his father, George Cline, being one of the foremost of the early settlers of Oregon. The elder Cline was born in Indiana, March 5, 1799, and came of German parentage, his ancestors, as far back as is known, having been tillers of the soil in different parts of the east. He was thrice married, his last wife, formerly Jane Oliver, and the mother of George W., having been born in Ohio.

The Cline family lived an uneventful life in Indiana for many years, and in their neighborhood were known as exceptionally thrifty and successful people. George Cline was no ordinary plodding farmer, but forged his way to the front, and improved a farm that brought a good price when he decided to sell. This he did in 1846, for he had long heard glowing reports from the west, and determined to see for himself if there was any truth in them. His success in life permitted him to outfit much more completely than the average emigrant, and he not only had plenty of substantial wagons and strong oxen, but brought along a large drove of horses and cattle. The party of which his family were members had little trouble with the Indians, and were not laid low by illness, as was the case with so many during the long journey of those days. Mr. Cline started away from home with three thousand dollars, and by the time he reached The Dalles he had just twenty dollars. This decrease in his finances was largely due to his generosity, for there were many very poor people in the train, to many of whom he gave practical assistance. He spent the first winter with his family on the present site of Portland, and in the spring settled in Marion county, near Salem, purchasing a squatter's right to which he afterward proved up. The next spring he settled in Linn county, where he took up six hundred and forty-three acres adjoining Albany, where he spent the remainder of his life. At the time of his death, at the age of sixty-four, he was apparently strong and robust, and seemed to be destined for many years more of useful citizenship. In both the east and west he took an active part in local politics, in Porter county, Ind., and in Linn county, Ore., serving as sheriff of the respective counties, besides holding many local offices. He erected one of the first sawmills in the vicinity of Albany, and operated the same for some time in connection with his general farming. He was a very successful man, and he was also very honorable and reliable.

The only one living of his father's last family of five children, George W. Cline received his education in the country schools and the public schools of Albany, his father's success permitting him to devote more time to educational matters than fell to the lot of many of his neighbors. He stayed at home uninterruptedly until his marriage, in 1879, with Nellie Smith, who was born in Clackamas county, Ore., in 1863, and after the ceremony went to housekeeping on a portion of the old farm, which he has managed since his father's death, and now owns. There were comparatively few improvements here at first, but at present he has good buildings and modern facilities for conducting a practical general farming enterprise, besides one hundred acres cleared and available for general crops. He has a fine dairy in connection with the farm, and makes a specialty of Jersey cattle, standard breed. He is a director and vice president of the Albany Creamery Association, of Albany, Ore. Like his father he is an active Democrat, but as yet he has shown no disposition to leave the quiet of his home to participate in the excitement of office-getting. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Of the three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Cline, Nina M. is the wife of H. B. Cusick, of Albany, and Margaret and Charles O. are living at home. Mr. Cline is prominent in his locality, and may be counted on to further any enterprise for the betterment of his home district.

EDWARD H. HAWKINS. The name of Edward H. Hawkins is associated with a practical farming enterprise in Lane county, his farm being one of the many finely improved properties in which this locality abounds, and his methods are those which have elevated the agricultural standard to a par with that in any part of the country. When Mr. Hawkins crossed the plains in 1845 he represented the third generation of his family to journey westward at the same time, his father Zachariah, and his grandfather, Henry, looking forward with equal enthusiasm to a life under different auspices in the new country. On this journey Zachariah died ere he had reached his destination, but the grandfather, Henry Hawkins, lived to settle on a claim in Polk county, where he farmed for the remainder of his life. He was of Irish descent, and was fairly successful as a farmer and stock-raiser. Edward H. was three years old when his parents crossed the plains, having been born in Lee county, Iowa, February 17, 1842. His mother, formerly Nancy White, was born in Indiana, reared a family of two sons and three daughters, of whom Edward is the fourth child. Mrs. Hawkins died on the old homestead in Benton county in 1900. For the first winter in Oregon she lived in Polk county, and the next spring went to Benton county, where she married T. M. Reed. Mr. Reed took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and there the children were reared and educated.

At the age of sixteen Edward H. Hawkins grew weary of his life on the home farm and went to eastern Oregon, where he was engaged with stock for some time. Industrious and saving, he managed to save quite a little money, and in 1865 bought a farm nine miles east of Harrisburg, in Linn county, which he sold after three years of profitable farming. He next took up two hundred and seventy acres near Monroe, Benton county. He lived thereon until disposing of it in 1889, when he purchased four hundred acres on Spencer creek. Three years later he sold out and bought three hundred and seventy-eight acres, comprising his present farm, about three miles southwest of Eugene. For his first wife Mr. Hawkins married, in 1865, Susan Norton, who was born in Missouri, and died in 1880, leaving three children, of whom Clarence is deceased, and Clara and Clayton are at home. The second marriage of Mr. Hawkins occurred in 1882, and was with Nancy Taylor, who was born in Virginia, January 1, 1862, and who is the mother of three children, Virgil, Ruth H., and Edward Herbert. A Republican in political preference, Mr. Hawkins is liberal-minded as regards office seekers, and believes in voting rather for principle than party. At the time of his removal from Benton to Lane county, in 1889, he was obliged to resign the office of county commissioner, and in this county he has served many terms as county supervisor and school director. He is a wide-awake and progressive man, favoring all movements that have to do with the development of the resources of the locality or its improvement along educational, moral or industrial lines.

JOSEPHUS J. BEARD. The position of agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad at Tangent, Linn county, Ore., is now held by Josephus J. Beard, his continuance in the office having been from 1873, and during the intervening years he has never lost a day's time from the faithful discharge of duty. Mr. Beard was born October 13, 1844, in Vigo county, Ind., the son of Zachariah Beard, who was born in Pennsylvania, in 1804, and emigrated with his parents to Indiana, in 1808. The grandfather was a miller by trade and he built one of the first grist mills on the banks of the Wabash river, and there Zachariah took up this work and followed it until he came to Oregon in 1873. He first married Ludicy Ferguson, a native of Indiana, and they had ten children, Josephus J. Beard, of this review, being the only one now living. The mother died in 1848, after which Mr. Beard again married, and this wife died within a year, leaving him one child, who is now deceased.

Josephus J. Beard and his father came together to Oregon in 1873, the former securing the position previously mentioned, that of agent for the Southern Pacific Railroad, which he has since held. In 1874 he married Callie Spangler, a native of California, and of the children which have blessed the union, Maude M. is the wife of M. C. Jenks, in the vicinity of Tangent; M. Claude is now deceased; Harry L. is located in Chemawa, Marion county; Joseph Ivan is at home; and Roy B. is deceased. Mrs. Beard died in 1884, and for a second wife Mr. Beard married Mrs. Mary E. Morgan, and in their home the father of Mr. Beard passed away at the advanced age of eighty-one years. In his fraternal relations Mr. Beard is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and is past commander in the Knights of the Maccabees. He belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In politics Mr. Beard is a staunch Democrat and has faithfully served his party in various offices since his residence in Oregon, being for eight years justice of the peace, and for fourteen years postmaster of Tangent. Mr. Beard has certainly made a success of his life since coming west, accumulating property located in this city, taking an advanced place in the affairs of the community and interesting himself generally with all movements calculated to promote the general welfare and increase the importance of the state which so many eastern emigrants have made their own by adoption.

NICHOLAS MICKEL. Many changes of scene have come to N. Mickel, whose first recollections go back to the place where he was born, December 14, 1844, in Saxony, the son of George and Mary Mickel. He was one of seven children, six of whom are living and settled in the United States. In 1855 the family set out on the journey that was to end when they had crossed an ocean and a continent. They first settled in Du-page county, Ill., where they remained for two years, going from there by ox-team to Nicollet county, Minn., spending the ensuing twelve years in that location before continuing the journey across the continent. The reports from the west growing more favorable as the years went on, and the prospects being bright for the success of the energetic and persevering, the father once more made up his mind to go still farther. In the year 1869 the family came to Oregon, settling one and a half miles north of Mount Angel, but later removing to Polk county, where the father died in 1880, at the age of sixty-five years. His widow survived him for about twenty years, her death occurring in Gervais, Marion county, January 1, 1900, in her seventy-fifth year. Besides the subject of this sketch, the children in the family are George, of Gervais; Michael, of eastern Oregon; Agnes Inhover, of Nicollet county, Minn.; Mary Schreiber, residing near The Dalles; Lena Bowers, of Victoria, and Peter, who is now deceased.

N. Mickel received his education in the district schools of Minnesota, remaining at home with his parents until he enlisted, at seventeen years of age, in Company L, First Mounted Rangers of Minnesota. The company was mustered in at St. Peter, Nicollet county, where it was assigned to garrison duty, being principally occupied in guarding the frontier. After having served fourteen months, he was mustered out at Fort Snelling, and returning home he took up the brickmason trade, following that until he came to Oregon, via New York, the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco. Coming direct to Marion county, he bought the farm where he now lives. At that time it consisted of one hundred and sixty acres of virgin land. He now has one hundred and thirty acres under cultivation, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, being also interested in the cultivation of hops. In 1902 he produced about fifteen thousand pounds of the latter from sixteen acres. Since its purchase he has greatly improved the place by the erection of a modern house upon the location of the one in which he first went to housekeeping upon his marriage to Miss Anna Mary Koler, a native of Bavaria, born in 1842. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Mickel, of whom the eldest, Mary Ann, is the wife of F. E. Moore of Ball Butte, Mont., has one son, Ernest W.; the three remaining at home are Mary, Nicholas George, and Maggie.

Mr. Mickel has served as road supervisor and on the school board of the district in which he lives. In politics he is a Democrat. The family is identified with the Roman Catholic Church.

ALBERT BROWNELL. The Albany Nurseries constitute one of the finest and largest enterprises of the kind in the state of Oregon. In keeping with its reputation for the propagation of the fruits and flowers of a remarkably fertile region, is the career of its manager and owner, Albert Brownell, to whom is accorded well merited praise for the success which he has wrought out by his own unaided exertions. In tracing the life of Mr. Brownell it is important to note the early connection of his family with the history of America, his emigrating ancestors having followed close in the wake of that historic craft—the Mayflower—and launched their various enterprises in the midst of primitive colonial conditions. It is supposed that the family was represented in the Revolutionary war, and the paternal grandfather of Albert Brownell had the satisfaction of seeing four of his sons depart for the Civil war, only one of whom, however, returned to his family and friends. Another son, the father of Albert, was a merchant in Evans, N. Y. for the greater part of his active life, and here he married Priscilla Southwick for his first wife, who bore him six children. Of a second union there were born three children, and the second wife still survives her husband, who died at about the age of seventy. He was born in Massachusetts, and settled as a young man in New York, where he made a success of merchandising, and was an influential man in his town.

Albert Brownell was born near Buffalo, N. Y., April 24, 1854, and is one of the children of his father's first marriage, his mother dying at the age of forty-five. He was educated in the public schools and remained at home until he was of age, when he went to Iowa, and during the winter taught school, working in the harvest fields during the summer time for about five years. While there he was married, April 17, 1870, to Nettie M. Read, a native of Iowa, and thereafter continued to live in the state until removing to Missouri in the fall of 1870. Continuing to farm and teach until 1884, he came to Oregon and bought a place near Wells Station, Benton county, where he lived about four years. He then came to Albany and purchased the Cline homestead and established the Albany Nursery, conducting the same under the firm name of Hyman & Brownell until he succeeded to the entire business, of which he has since been owner and general manager. The nursery has seventy-five acres under cultivation just outside of the city limits, and, besides, Mr. Brownell has other properties in different parts of the county devoted to nursery stock. The size of the enterprise may be estimated when it is known that from fifty to seventy-five men are required in the different departments at certain seasons of the year, while from twenty to fifty are employed all the year round. Most of the improvements have been made by the present owner, who has a thorough understanding of his interesting calling, and contemplates even more extensive operations in the near future.

A Republican in political affiliation, Mr. Brownell has held most of the minor local offices in his neighborhood, and has taken an active part in promoting the best interests of his party. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and finds a religious home in the Congregational Church, in which he is a deacon. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brownell, of whom Joyce B. is the wife of Rev. H. Hopkins, of Chicago; Carl R. is deceased; Clara and Dorothy are living at home; and William S. is deceased.

Mr. Brownell is a broad-minded and cultured gentleman, genial and agreeable to meet, and sincere and earnest in the conduct of the various activities for which nature and inclination have richly endowed him.

GEORGE W. DIMICK. General farming is the occupation to which G. W. Dimick is devoting his energies. That he has achieved success in his chosen line of work is evidenced by his well cultivated farm of one hundred acres situated one and one-half miles east of Hubbard, on which he has a splendid orchard of sixty acres, nearly all of which is planted in apples. Mr. Dimick is also well known as a dealer in fine cattle, having been at one time the largest individual breeder and raiser of Short-horn and Aberdeen cattle in the state. Perhaps his work as an agriculturist has been secondary to what he has accomplished for Oregon in elevating its educational and political standard, as well as improving the country in the way of good roads and all that it means in commercial advancement, for he has faithfully served as road supervisor and as a member of the school board, and in politics he has for years been an acknowledged power. He is a member of the Democratic party, but favors prohibition, and was the organizer of the Prohibition party in the state, being chairman of the first state central committee and manager of St. John's campaign in Oregon at the time when that great Prohibition leader was making his memorable fight in the cause of temperance. Under the management of Mr. Dimick as chairman of the state central committee, the largest vote that Oregon ever cast for the Prohibition party was polled. Mr. Dimick was the first candidate for congress on that ticket, and his efforts have been of great value in cleansing and purifying the politics of Oregon. The part he has taken in political life has ever been an active and prominent one, and he is among the most influential men of the state in that respect.

G. W. Dimick was born April 28, 1837, in Boone county, Ill., and is a son of Augustus R. Dimick, who was born April 10, 1790, in Connecticut. His parents having died when he was a child, he was reared to manhood by his brother. From Connecticut he removed to New York state, thence to Ohio, and early started out in life to make his own way in the world. On leaving Ohio he took up a claim in Illinois, camping on the present site of Chicago. Before coming to Illinois he was united in marriage to Laura Pangburn, the wedding taking place in Ohio. Mr. Dimick and his family resided in Illinois until 1846, when they started for Oregon, but stopped in Missouri for the first winter. In 1847 they crossed the plains with a company under command of General Palmer. Ox-teams were used in making the journey, there being one hundred wagons in the train, which was afterward divided. The journey was made in seven months, and the party encountered no serious trouble with the Indians. On arriving in Oregon Mr. Dimick came direct to Marion county, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres one and one-half miles east of Hubbard, on a part of which the home of G. W. Dimick now stands. This land was all wild and unimproved and the father built a log house upon it for his family, residing therein until 1856, when the present dwelling was constructed. Four children were born unto himself and wife, the subject of this review being the eldest, the other living child being John B., who resides on the east half of his father's donation claim. A. R. Dimick lived to be seventy-three years of age, while his wife passed away at the age of forty-eight years. He had been married twice prior to his marriage with Miss Pangburn, and the children born of those marriages are now deceased. He served as justice of the peace for a number of years and was a prominent man in the communities in which he lived.

G. W. Dimick received his early education in the district schools near his home, and remained with his parents until his marriage, which occurred November 17, 1859, the lady of his choice being Minerva Gleason, daughter of Parson Gleason. She was born in Indiana and came to Oregon with her people in 1851. The young couple took up their abode on the old claim which had been taken up by the elder Dimick, where they have since made their home, living with the parents until the death of the latter. Six children were born unto them, of whom the following survive: G. Douglas, a resident of Washington; John A., who resides in the vicinity of Hubbard; Lottie May, of Idaho; Parson Gleason and Augustus, of Portland. His first wife dying, Mr. Dimick was married October 24, 1878, to Rhoda Gleason, a niece of his first wife, who bore him four children. Of these Walter A., now of eastern Washington, survives. June 11, 1890, he married Mrs. Sadie McCraw. Their children are Orrin R., Harrison Roy H., Ada V., Harold A., and Raymond E., all at home.

It will be seen that for nearly half a century the best energies of Mr. Dimick have been expended in Oregon. He was but ten years of age when his parents emigrated here, and from his youth up he has been interested in the growth and progress that has taken place, transforming the state from a vast wilderness into a land that can hardly be excelled for agricultural resources. During his residence in Oregon he has cleared over two hundred acres of land. In the questions and issues that have been before the people he has taken a prominent part, and his influence has been widely felt throughout the state. A man of the highest integrity, Mr. Dimick has the respect of all who know him, and in the history of the county his name will be ever regarded by posterity as that of an honored pioneer.

HIRAM HENRY STARR. The early life of Mr. Starr is interesting. His father, Jeremiah Starr, was one of the foremost and earliest settlers of the state, and was born in Virginia in 1794, as was also his father, Samuel. The latter took his family to Ohio in 1799, locating in Scioto county. Here Jeremiah Starr married Elizabeth Beavers, who bore him one daughter and one son, soon thereafter dying, and was buried in Ohio. A few years afterward Mr. Starr was again married, his second wife being Sarah Scott, by whom he became the father of five sons, Hiram Henry, of this article, being the oldest. In 1828 Jeremiah Starr settled in Vermilion county, Ill., but not liking it very well sold out, and in 1843 took up a donation claim in Wapello county. This farm also had its drawbacks, and the owner looked around for ways of improving his condition and that of his family. April 27, 1847, he started out with ox-teams and wagons to make the long journey across the plains, and without any unfortunate happenings arrived on the south bank of the Columbia, south of Vancouver, November 27, of the same year. The first winter in the strange country they spent on the Clatsop plains, at the mouth of the Columbia, and in the spring of 1848 Mr. Starr took a donation claim near Amity, Yamhill county. This was not altogether satisfactory, and in the spring of 1850 he went to Benton county, and took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres, which he improved and occupied, and which he disposed of at a profit in 1865. He then took up his abode in the Alsea valley, west of Monroe, Ore., and there lived until the death of his wife, formerly Sarah Scott, a native of Monongahela county, Va., whose father died when she was a small child. In July, 1866, shortly after burying his beloved helpmate he went to live with his daughter in Monroe, Ore., and there died at the age of ninety years. He was a man of fine personal traits and his industry and thrift resulted in a substantial property, acquired solely through his own efforts. He was strongly in favor of education and all advancement, and gave to his daughter and five sons every advantage within his power to confer.

ZILPHA AND SAMUEL McCOLLUM.

Hiram Starr was born in Ohio, December 19, 1826. With his brothers and sisters he attended the early subscription schools near the paternal farm in Illinois, where the family had located when he was two years of age. As the oldest in the family he early assisted his father in managing the farm, and was one of the most enthusiastic concerning the plans to emigrate to the west. At that time he was little past twenty, just the age to appreciate the chances by which he was to be surrounded, and he entered with zest into the preparations for the six months' journey. In 1849 he left the donation claim in Oregon and in Oregon City undertook to learn the cooper's trade, having completed which he returned to Yamhill county and, with his father, engaged in saddle manufacturing. In 1850 he engaged in the saddle business in La Fayette, but a year later gave up his business to go to the mines of California. Returning in 1855, he soon thereafter started for the mines in Colville, and this trip resulted in his enlisting in the Oregon Cavalry, and fighting against the Indians. The next year found him working at saddle making in Corvallis, Benton county.

In 1865 Mr. Starr went to the Alsea valley and took up one hundred and sixty acres of land, which proved so profitable, and was so congenially located, that he remained on it for over twenty years. He improved his land and raised general commodities and stock, and at the time of disposing of it in 1887, had made of it a valuable and paying property. His next home was on a farm near Falls City, where he prospered until 1902, and then retired from active life within the borders of the town. He is contemplating building a pleasant little home in which to spend his declining years, and where he may enjoy many of the pleasant things of life which have hitherto been debarred owing to his unflagging industry. He is a Prohibitionist in political preferment, and has served as school director and clerk for several years. In religion he is identified with the Free Methodist Church. In 1860 Mr. Starr was licensed as a local preacher and since has done much towards the spread of the gospel and is at present assisting the pastor of the Falls City church.

MCCOLLUM BROTHERS. The McCollum family is represented in Lane county by several members of a rugged and capable second generation, of which two of the best known are Perry and William, occupying a farm of one hundred and eighty acres near Eugene. William McCollum, the senior of the two, was born on the paternal farm in Kentucky in April, 1841, his father, Samuel, one of the Oregon pioneers of 1850, being a native of the same state. His mother, Zilpha Callahan, was also born in Kentucky, and died on the old donation claim in Lane county in 1897, at the age of eighty-four, her husband living to be two years older. There were five children in the family, William being the oldest of all.

A boy of nine years when the family fortunes were shifted to the west, William attended the public schools as opportunity offered, although hard work on the home farm interfered materially with both diversions and education. He remained at home until thirty years of age, and then purchased his present farm with his brother Perry, since then engaging in general farming and stock-raising. Mr. McCollum is a quiet, unassuming gentleman, loyal to his friends and interests, and heartily in touch with the work to which he is devoting his life. He is a Democrat in politics, but has never worked for or desired official recognition. Mr. McCollum is unmarried.

Perry McCollum was born after his father and older brother had crossed the plains to Oregon, January 1, 1855, and he was educated in a little log school-house on Spencer creek, being reared to an appreciation of farming and a generally industrious life. Always most congenial in their relations to each other, it seemed eminently fitting that Mr. McCollum should engage in farming in partnership with his brother William, with whom he has since lived. Mr. McCollum married, in 1897, Frances Gearhart, and one son, Frank, has been born of this union. Like his brother, he is a Democrat in political affiliation, and has served as judge of elections. Progressive and enterprising, Mr. McCollum maintains a high standard of agricultural excellence on his farm, and his improvements are modern and extensive. He enjoys the confidence and good will of the community, which regards him as one of its most worthy native sons.

ANDREW J. BLEVINS. A prominent pioneer family of 1850 is represented by Andrew J. Blevins, one of the venerable and highly honored agriculturists of Linn county. Mr. Blevins is one of the very successful farmers and agriculturists of his neighborhood, and his farm of two hundred and ten acres, a part of the old donation claim settled by his father, has every evidence of being managed by a painstaking and progressive tiller of the soil, and one who has thoroughly appreciated the possibilities of the country in which his lot has been cast. A considerable revenue is derived from the raising of Clydesdale and Percheron horses, Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep. These high-grade animals have for years been an interesting study to Mr. Blevins, who is thoroughly conversant with their good points, and possesses the best of facilities for rearing and caring for them.

The early life of Mr. Blevins was passed in Clay county, Ky., where his father, Isaac, was known as a large landowner and blacksmith. Isaac Blevins was born in Tennessee, January 12, 1799, and there learned the trade to which he devoted many years of his life, remaining in his native state until his sixteenth year. He then went to Kentucky, and there married, in 1833, Eliza Maupin, who was born in the Bourbon state January 18, 1809. Seven years after his marriage, in 1840, Mr. Blevins took his wife and children overland to Missouri, and for ten years engaged in farming with fair success. In 1850 he sold his farm and purchased the required outfit for joining an emigrant train across the plains, his son, Andrew J., being at that time fifteen years of age, and therefore of practical assistance in driving the oxen and caring for the loose stock. A great deal of this stock passed into the possession of the Indians, notwithstanding the care exercised in keeping it together. Otherwise the travelers had few adventures out of the ordinary, and reached Linn county, Ore., weary enough to appreciate almost any permanent abiding place. Mr. Blevins took up a section of land eight miles southwest of Albany, a portion of which is now occupied by his son, Andrew J., and which is located on the old Albany and Harrisburg road. In the lonely forests, with neighbors many miles remote, and with few financial or other resources at his disposal, he laboriously hewed out timber for a little log cabin, his family in the meantime continuing to live in the prairie schooner which had housed them so many nights on the plains. It may be imagined with what speed the land was prepared for crops, and how impatiently the wife and children waited for the maturing of the grain and other commodities which should furnish them the necessary food for subsistence. The father was successful, soil and climate conspiring for the comfort and even enjoyment of himself and family. He was a genial and whole-souled man, and as the district became settled, and the homes separated by fewer miles, he made many friends among his neighbors, all of whom admired his strength of character and uprightness. He took an active part in political affairs in the county, and was equally active in the church, which he attended regularly, and taught his children to do the same. He lived to be eighty-five years old. One of the cherished memories of his younger days was that he met Lewis and Clark, now famous as discoverers of Oregon. Mr. Blevins was survived by his wife until her ninety-first year. In his young days in Tennessee Mr. Blevins offered his services to General Jackson in the war of 1812, but owing to his size and age they were not accepted. Besides

Andrew J., who is the second of the five children, there was Pendleton, now of Crook county; Alfred, living in this vicinity; John, a resident of Whatcom, Wash.; and Isaac C., deceased.

As a young man Andrew J. Blevins, who was born in Clay county, Ky., December 17, 1835, followed mining in California, British Columbia and Idaho, for several years. His educational opportunities were comparatively limited, owing to the unsettled condition of the country. In 1859 he was united in marriage with Alvilda Miller, a native of Iowa, with whom he went to house-keeping in Linn county, and in 1863 settled on his present farm, a part of his father's donation claim, and has since uninterruptedly devoted himself to its cultivation. His wife, who lived to be only twenty-eight years old, left him three children, of whom Edward A. lives near his father; Mary is the wife of Asa Lewelling, of this county; and George S. is on the old homestead. Like his father, Mr. Blevins has taken an active interest in politics ever since arriving at years of discretion, and he has been a member of the Grange for many years. Like his sire, also, he has made many friends as he pursued the even tenor of a useful life, and no name in the community carries with it more of respect and good will on the part of his fellow agriculturists.

HON. ALFRED BLEVINS. As a farmer and cattle-raiser, Indian fighter, miner and state legislator, Hon. Alfred Blevins has filled an important niche in the development of Oregon, and especially of Linn county. He is a member of a prominent pioneer family of this state, and his birth occurred in Rockcastle, Trigg county, Ky., October 24, 1837, a son of Isaac Blevins, of whom extended mention is made in the sketch of his son, Andrew J. Blevins.

Educated in the district schools of his home township, Mr. Blevins early came to realize the limitations by which he was surrounded, and when twenty-one years of age left his home and came to California in search of a fortune in the mines. After a short time spent in mining and prospecting he came to the conclusion that he was not one of the elect, so turned his attention to mining and cattle-raising in Jackson county, Ore. His operations were necessarily retarded by the precarious condition of the country at that time, for the Indians were constantly harassing the white men and resenting the encroachment upon the land hitherto their sole possession. To suppress the rising rebellion, Mr. Blevins enlisted in Company C, Second Oregon Mounted Volunteers, and served for one hundred and three days, mostly on guard duty. He also served as guard for freighters between the Willamette valley and southern Oregon, but it must not be understood that he escaped active duty, for in the capacity of private he came to a full realization of the barbarous warfare of the supplanted red men.

Returning to his home ranch, Mr. Blevins took advantage of the Salmon river excitement in Idaho, and was so successful that he remained there about six years. In 1869 he returned to his old home place, and the following year, in 1870, was united in marriage with Lucina Maxie, who was born in Missouri, June 8, 1852, and with whom he went to housekeeping on a farm he purchased that fall and which is still their home, one and a half miles west of Tangent, the same being a part of the old James Cochran donation claim. The farm consists of two hundred and seventeen and a half acres, one hundred and seventy-five of which are under cultivation. The majority of the improvements are due to the enterprise and progress of the present owner, who has a comfortable dwelling, good barns, out-houses and fences, and who is extensively engaging in general farming and the raising of fine stock, principally Shorthorn cattle. Mr. Blevins possesses pronounced business ability, and for fourteen years managed the Albany Farmers Company Elevator at Tangent. Other business projects have benefited by his far-sighted judgment, and, taken all in all, his active life has been diverse, interesting, and above all useful, and productive of general excellence. A Socialist in political affiliation, he has held many minor local offices, and has twice represented his district in the state legislature. He is a member of the Grange at Tangent, and is identified with Corinthian Lodge No. 17, A. F. & A. M. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blevins, of whom Lillie died in infancy; Laura also died at the age of seventeen years; Wade H. lives in Douglas county, Ore.; Clara, Alfred, Georgia, Edna, Hattie and Glenn are at home. Mr. Blevins is one of the representative men of this county, and to an unusual extent enjoys the confidence and good will of his fellow agriculturists.

man's estate on his father's farm. Shortly after his marriage he removed to Kentucky, going from there to Indiana, thence following the emigrant's pathway to Illinois, where he resided a year. Again continuing his march towards the west, he moved with his family to Benton county, Mo., where he lived and labored a number of years. In 1847 he and one of his neighbors, with their families, came to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and being six months on the trip. They had no serious trouble on the way, but lost some of their stock, which was stolen by the Indians. After spending the first winter about nine miles south of Vancouver, David Bridgefarmer located in Yamhill county, in the spring of 1848, taking up a donation claim on the west side of Wapato lake, his land adjoining the present site of Gaston. Improving a productive ranch, he resided there until his death, at the age of sixty-eight years. A man of intelligence and ability, he became one of the leading citizens of his locality, and was active in the establishment of schools and churches, being one of the organizers of the first Methodist Episcopal Church formed in that vicinity. He married, in North Carolina, Nancy A. Hall, a native of that state. She came with him to Oregon, and died on the homestead, in Yamhill county. Of their twelve children, six are now living, namely: Christian, residing at The Dalles; Alanson, the subject of this sketch; William, of Bridgeport, Wash.; Francis M., of Washington; David McD., of Washington; and Adam S., now a resident of Seattle.

After leaving the district school, Alanson Bridgefarmer assisted in the care of the home farm until twenty-two years of age, becoming thoroughly acquainted with the various branches of agriculture. Selecting farming for his occupation, he came then to Linn county, and took up a donation claim at the forks of the Santiam river. A few years later he bought his present farm a mile southeast of Tangent, where he has for over forty years been prosperously engaged in general farming and stock-raising. During his residence here he has diligently improved his property, continually adding to its value, his beautiful homestead, with its substantial and convenient buildings, giving ample evidence of his skill as a practical farmer. He was formerly extensively engaged in the raising of fine horses, but of late years has paid less attention to that branch of industry. During the Rogue River Indian war he enlisted, in 1855, under Capt. Jonathan Keeney, who commanded Company C, and after serving on guard duty for one hundred and one days, was mustered out of service.

October 6, 1872, Mr. Bridgefarmer married Susan A. Bond, a native of Iowa, and brought her as a bride to his present homestead of one ALANSON BRIDGEFARMER. A worthy representative of an honored pioneer family of Oregon, and one of the most highly esteemed residents of Linn county, Alanson Bridgefarmer, of Tangent, for the past thirty years has been prominently identified with the development and progress of this section of the state, and, as opportunity has occurred, he has given his influence to encourage the establishment of enterprises conducive to the public welfare. A son of the late David Bridgefarmer, he was born January 13, 1832, in Warren county, Ill., of German ancestry.

A native of North Carolina, David Bridgefarmer was born in 1796, and was reared to hundred and fifty-five and one-half acres of land, and here they established their household. Mrs. Bridgefarmer died December 2, 1886, leaving five children, namely: Huldah I., wife of George Kuthe, of Jefferson; David S., living in Washington; Anna M.; Ella F.; and William A. In politics Mr. Bridgefarmer is a strong Prohibitionist. He belongs to Tangent Grange, of which he is a trustee, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Adam S. Bridgefarmer, youngest brother of Alanson, was born August 24, 1838, in Benton county, Mo. Coming to Oregon with his parents when seven years of age, he received his education in the district schools. On August 15, 1856, he enlisted in Company B, Oregon Mountain Rangers, under Capt. Hiram Wilbur and First Lieut. W. H. H. Myers, and served in the Yakima Indian war one hundred and ten days, taking an active part in several fierce skirmishes. He then remained at home until twenty-two years of age, working on the home farm, and also learned the carpenter's trade, which he has since followed, and is now a member of the Carpenter's Union. At the present time he makes his home in Seattle. He is a Prohibitionist in politics, and a member of the Salvation Army. While serving in the Yakima war he was at one time, with his comrades, surrounded by Indians, and for five days and nights was without food or water. He married Mary E. Holmes, a native of Missouri, and of their union four children were born, namely: Cora A., deceased; Sarah M. E., residing in Washington; Minnie E. M., living in Iowa; and Martha E., of Halsey, Ore.

SCOTT TAYLOR HOBART. A fine representative of the many enterprising and energetic men who are extensively engaged in farming and stock-raising in Marion county is S. T. Hobart, of Silverton, who has attained success in his independent calling by wise foresight, excellent management, and sheer persistency in one line of effort. Coming of sturdy New England ancestry, he has inherited in a marked degree those sterling qualities of heart and mind that go toward the making of a good citizen, and through his influence many projects of benefit to the general public have been successfully inaugurated and established.

A native of Illinois, S. T. Hobart was born December 26, 1845, in Hancock county, a son of Anson and Jane (Lincoln) Hobart. His father was born and reared in Vermont, living among the green hills of that state until his removal, with his parents, to the state of New York, thence to the more fertile lands of Illinois. When young he learned the trade of a blacksmith, which he followed in Illinois until 1850, when he sought the gold fields of California, crossing the plains to that far-off country with a team of horses. After working at his trade, instead of mining, on the Pacific coast for two years, he returned, via the water way, to Illinois, and, with his family, crossed the plains again, in 1853, going this time by ox-team. Going farther north than before, he located in Oregon, taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, about four miles southeast of Silverton. In 1857 he located on the farm now occupied by his son, Scott T., about a mile east of Silverton, where he cleared a homestead, on which he was prosperously engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death, in February, 1890, at the ripe old age of eighty-one years. He was married three times, his first wife, Carolina Towne, who died in Hancock county, Ill., leaving one child, a daughter, Edna R., who is the widow of R. E. Libby, of Silverton. She now resides at Tualatin, Ore. While living in Illinois he married Jane Lincoln, a native of New York state. She started with him for their new home in Oregon, but was unable to accomplish the journey, and died on the way, near La Grande, Ore. The four children born of their union were: George Washington, deceased; Charles Wilbur, who resides near Silverton; Scott T., with whom this brief sketch is principally concerned, and Josiah W., residing near Silverton. The father subsequently married, for his third wife, Loraine M. Horrell, who died in 1869.

After leaving the district school, Scott T. Hobart pursued his studies for a year in the high school at Portland, Ore., after which he taught school with much success for a number of terms. Choosing agriculture as his lifework, he settled about a mile east of Silverton on the farm he now owns and occupies, which is known as the "Hobart place," and has here made many and substantial improvements, including a neat and conveniently arranged dwelling-house, and good barn and outbuildings. Of the two hundred and thirty acres of land contained in his farm, one hundred and five acres are in a good state of cultivation, and he carries on stock-raising on an extensive scale, besides general farming, meeting with signal success in both branches of agriculture. He devotes his time principally, however, to stock-raising.

Everywhere respected and esteemed for his sterling integrity and manly traits of character, Mr. Hobart holds a place of importance in the community in which he resides, and is often called to positions of responsibility, serving as administrator of estates, or as guardian of minors, in all cases faithfully performing the duties thus devolving upon him. For six years he has been an active member of the school board, serving when the new school building was erected in Silverton, and was also one of the trustees of the Methodist Church when the new edifice was built. Fraternally, he is a member of the Independent Order of Foresters, and politically affiliates with the Republican party, for the past ten years representing his district at the Republican county conventions.

Mr. Hobart was married in Silverton, October 23, 1870, to Emeline Fletcher, who was born in Illinois, but came to Oregon with her parents, Benjamin F. and Eliza (Turner) Fletcher, when a child, crossing the plains in 1863. Mr. and Mrs. Hobart have four children, namely: Arthur F.; Meda, wife of Helmuth A. Brandt, of Silverton; Daisy A., and Edgar L.

SAMUEL LINCOLN BOND. As a merchant of Irving, Lane county, Samuel Lincoln Bond occupies a prominent and influential position in this section of the community. He is a native of this state, having been born on his father's donation claim one mile west of Irving, February 27, 1861, his father, Allen Bond, being a pioneer of 1853. He was born in Shenandoah county Va., December 5, 1833, and was taken to Indiana at the age of three years. There he married Rachel Robinson, and shortly after their marriage the young people crossed the plains with ox-teams. During the passage Mr. Bond met with the misfortune of losing his team, and was thus compelled to complete the trip with the assistance of his brother. He at once took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres upon his arrival in Lane county, Ore., and here he erected the first log cabin in the neighborhood, and remained an active citizen of this locality until 1898, when he removed to Irving and died here, October 22, 1902, his wife having passed away in 1901. He was a Republican in politics and always took an active part in the promotion of the principles which he so heartily endorsed. As a member of the state legislature he ably represented his party in 1876, and as a patriot he was a member of the home guard during the Indian troubles of the early days. His wife was a member of the Christian Church. Eleven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bond, of whom four sons and five daughters are now living.

S. Lincoln Bond was reared upon his father's farm and educated in Clear Lake, Lane county, and in Portland Business College, in the latter receiving a thorough course in business training. On returning to the farm he engaged in agricultural pursuits and carried to the work the advantages of his business training, remaining so employed until the fall of 1882, when he came to Irving and entered upon a mercantile life in partnership with his father. This partnership was continued until the death of the latter, and since then Mr. Bond has continued the work alone, having a complete line of merchandise such as usually found in a general store. He has also a lumber-yard, and deals as well in grain, hogs, etc. At the death of his father he was appointed one of the administrators of the estate and sole administrator of the firms of A. Bond & Son.

December 24, 1884, Mr. Bond was united in marriage with Miss Belle Bushnell, the daughter of G. E. Bushnell, and they have the following children: Livia, now attending the academy at Philomath, a young lady of excellent attainments, having just completed a four-years course in music; Franklin L., and Samuel C. Like his father, Mr. Bond has always been public-spirited, and takes an active interest in the affairs of the community, and as such he holds a position on the board of trustees of Philomath College, and in the United Brethren Church, of which he is a member, he is also trustee, having previously served for three years as steward.

EMIL KOPPE. The woolen mills at Brownsville, of which Emil Koppe was manager and superintendent, as well as equal partner during a part of 1902 and 1903, do a large business in weaving blankets, flannels of all kinds, cloths and robes, and employs in its various departments fifty people. The mills are run by water-power, although many improvements are being inaugurated, and modern machinery will soon replace that which is worn, but which, nevertheless, has so far proved satisfactory. The trade of the mills extends all along the coast, and the commodities sent out have the reputation of being of excellent quality. Many years of practical experience have fitted Mr. Koppe for any position in connection with the woolen industry, and he is probably as competent a judge of wool as any man engaged in the business in the west.

As his name implies, Mr. Koppe is of German descent, and was born in Saxony, southern Germany, February 16, 1860. His father, Karl, was born in the same part of the empire, and came to the United States in 1882, settling on a farm near Ashley, N. D. In 1892 he sold his land and came to Oregon, remaining, at the home of his son, Emil, until his death, in 1894, at the age of sixty-nine years. The wife, who was born in Altenburg, Germany, and was formerly Johanna Winter, died in her native land after rearing a family of seven children, five sons and two daughters. Emil, the fourth in the family, came to the United States in 1879, when nineteen years of age, and was employed in the weaving establishment of Weil & Son, of Philadelphia, Pa., four years. In 1884 he located in Brownsville, Ore., and engaged in weaving in the Brownsville Mills. In 1890, taking up his residence in Salem, he became foreman of a weaving department in the Thomas Kay Woolen Mills. Again coming to Brownsville, in 1902, he identified himself with the same concern as before, this time as superintendent and business manager.

While living in Philadelphia Mr. Koppe was united in marriage with Augusta Harzer, a native of Saxony, Germany, and she is the mother of eight children: Clara F., Paul, Lewis, Hattie, Otto, Nellie, Carl and Tilly. Mr. Koppe is a Republican in political affiliation, and is fraternally connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. With his wife and children he is a member of the Lutheran Church. He has the substantial traits, rugged integrity, and adaptability of his countrymen, and his business ability is materially promoting the wellbeing of Brownsville. In September, 1903, Mr. Koppe sold his interests in the woolen mills and retired from its management.

SAMPSON D. ADKINS. In a beautiful location, adjacent to the town of Scotts Mills, Marion county, stands a handsome modern residence, the home of S. D. Adkins, the efficient postmaster of that town, who is now serving his second term in that capacity, having formerly been a successful merchant there.

A native of Morgan county, Ky., his birth dates back to April 18, 1846. He had the misfortune to lose both parents early in life, being only six years old when his father, a miller by trade, passed to his final rest. A few years afterward his mother removed with the balance of the family to Grant county, Wis., and she died a few days after reaching their destination. After her death, young Adkins made his home with an uncle until the breaking out of the Civil war. Responding to his country's call for men, he enlisted February 9, 1862, as a private in Company B, Fifth Regiment, Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered into service at Lancaster, Wis., while yet in his sixteenth year. He served three years and four months, and was off duty only three weeks, during which time he was ill in New York City. He was sent first to Alexandria, Va., and saw a great deal of active service. He participated in all the principal battles of the army of the Potomac, besides a great many minor engagements, in all about fifty. The most prominent battles in which he took part were second Bull Run, first and second Fredericksburg, Antietam, The Wilderness, Gettysburg and Petersburg. He was honorably discharged from service and was mustered out at Madison, Wis., July 19, 1865.

Returning from the war, Mr. Adkins took up his abode with a sister in Iowa county, Wis., and about two years later went to Lyons county, Iowa, where he followed agricultural pursuits uninterruptedly until 1895, removing at that time to Scotts Mills, Ore., which has been his home ever since. Here he first engaged in mercantile business, but after a brief but prosperous career, his establishment was burned and the business was discontinued. In August, 1897, Mr. Adkins received his commission and became postmaster of Scotts Mills, and in 1901 was re-appointed to the same position, which he ably fills at the present writing.

In 1869, while a resident of Wisconsin, Mr. Adkins was united in marriage with Eliza J. Clark, a native of New York, born August 9, 1850. Fourteen children have been born to this union, as follows: S. Leonora, wife of W. F. Leeds, of Portland; Carrie L., wife of G. S. Hull, of Scotts Mills; Braman C., of Pipestone, Minn.; Gertrude M., wife of John Haugh, of Portland; Nellie, wife of William Cable, also of Portland; Guy D., of the same city; Olive, who is still at home; Arthur E., Samuel Eugene and Harry, who reside in Scotts Mills; and Margie, Bessie D. and Stella G., who also brighten the home with their presence. One son, Edwin S., died in Iowa, aged two years.

Mr. Adkins' home place contains twenty-two acres of land, adjoining the town, and he devotes a part of his time to fruit-raising. He has a fine orchard of about twenty acres, and raises many choice varieties of fruits, mostly prunes. His political views coincide with Republican doctrines, and he takes a fitting interest in affairs in his locality. Fraternally, he is a member of Butte Lodge, No 126. Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and also of Silver Encampment. He has been delegate to county and state conventions, but never an aspirant for office.

HENRY B. SPRENGER. One of the most enthusiastic admirers of Clydesdale and driving horses and fine stock, generally, in Linn county is Henry B. Sprenger, a worthy representative of a fine old pioneer family of this state, and son of Nicholas Sprenger, mentioned at length in another part of this work. Born in Morgan county, Ohio, January 12, 1850, he was two years old when his father started with his wife and children for Oregon, and he was reared on the home farm, and educated in the public schools.

May 28, 1873, Mr. Sprenger married Izzie M. Powers, daughter of William Powers, one of the pioneers of this vicinity. The young people went to housekeeping on a part of the old donation claim, where Mr. Sprenger has since engaged in stock-raising. He owns two hundred and ninety-two acres of land, two hundred and thirty-five of which are under cultivation. His enterprise and progressive spirit are apparent to all who are privileged to visit him in his pleasant home. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He owns property in Shedds, which is proof of his faith in the continued well-being of this favored part of the state.

In politics a Republican, Mr. Sprenger has come to the front as a representative man of more than ordinary usefulness, and his public spirit and absolute integrity have been apparent to those watching his administration of the offices intrusted to his care. At the present time he is serving as county commissioner, having been elected on the fusion ticket. He is prominent fraternally, and in Shedds Lodge No. 79, A. F. & A. M., has passed all of the chairs, as well as all of the chairs in the Grange, except that of treasurer. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sprenger, of whom Alida is the wife of Charles E. Powers, of Tangent; Lenna V. is deceased; Sarah L. is the wife of Charles A. Pugh, of Shedds, and Frederick J. and Harry G. are living at home. Mr. Sprenger is one of the substantial and reliable men of his township, his life and success reflecting great credit upon a community which cherishes high standards of excellence.

GEORGE W. COCHRAN. No farm in the vicinity of Albany has finer improvements, or is conducted on a more practical or scientific basis than that of George W. Cochran. Near by the comfortable and commodious house occupied by the present owner is a log house around which are clustered many memories of the old days, and which was built by James Cochran, the father of George, who established the family in the northwest in 1851.

James Cochran was born in the state of Iowa, and as a boy removed with his parents to Missouri, where he received his start in life, and lived for many years. His first wife, formerly a Miss Morris, lived but a few years after her marriage, leaving to the care of her husband two children, of whom James is in Idaho, and Paula Anna is deceased. The second wife, Ruth A. (Boggs) Cochran, was born in Virginia, and bore her husband six children. Of these, Andrew is at Arlington, Ore.; Eleanor, wife of J. H. Settlemier, of Woodburn, is deceased; Virginia died in childhood, while crossing the plains; George W. is living on a part of the old homestead; Emma K. is the wife of Lewis Simpson, of Idaho, and Pearne Alexander is a resident of Woodburn.

About 1851 James Cochran became dissatisfied with his prospects in Missouri, and, disposing of his farm, purchased the necessary outfit for bringing his wife and children across the plains. They were but a comparatively short distance from home, when George W. was born in De Kalb county, Mo., May 17, 1851, and his infancy was therefore passed in constant journeying. As the coming of a little child gladdened the hearts of the home-seeking parents, the death of another child during the journey, filled them with sadness and a sense of loss. The Indians, fortunately, caused them little trouble, but they were, nevertheless, a weary and travel-worn company, glad to rest even among the crude and uninviting conditions among which they found themselves in Oregon. The father took up a donation claim of a section six miles south of Albany, nearly all of which was prairie land. The western boundary of this claim was marked by the Calapooia creek, which cut off a small section in the northwest corner of the claim. Mr. Cochran at first erected the log house before referred to, and which is being jealously preserved by his devoted children. As he prospered on his land, and got a fair start in the new country, he built a larger and more modern house, in which he spent the balance of his life, his death occurring July 26, 1863, at the age of forty-two years. He is survived by his widow, who has since made her home principally in Woodburn.

George W. Cochran was twenty-five years of age when, on October 1, 1874, he married Eugenia K. Couch, a native of Scotland county, Mo., who crossed the plains with her parents at an early day. She is a daughter of P. Henry and Rebecca Ann (Morris) Couch, who came to Oregon from Scotland county, Mo., in 1865, locating in Harrisburg. They have resided in Linn county since that time with the exception of one year spent in Lane county. The young people went to housekeeping on a part of the old claim, and together have created as happy and comfortable a home as one would wish to see. They have two children, Ernest C. and James C., the latter at home, and both assist the father in caring for his splendidly improved and productive farm. Ernest C., the oldest son, was united in marriage in June, 1901, with Vivian Starr, daughter of Stephen C. Starr, of Tangent. They at once went to housekeeping in the first frame house erected by his grandfather, the founder of the family in Oregon. Mr. Cochran has all of the facilities for carrying on the most modern of general farming, and his dairy is equipped with all that is needful to conduct an ideal enterprise. He has a large number of Jersey cattle, besides other stock, some of it high-grade, including some fine blooded horses. He is a Democrat in politics, and is a broad-minded, liberal and popular man, contributing generously of his time and money for any cause destined for the wellbeing of the community.

JOHN ALBERT LAMBERSON, M. D. Those who blazed the western trail are pioneers well worthy of the country which they have made their own, and which gives them honor for the dangers and hardships borne in those early times. Numbered among these pioneers is Dr. John A. Lamberson, whose message has been one of welcome ministry, his life having been given over to the profession which means amelioration of the ills of suffering humanity. He is both the son and grandson of pioneers, the grandfather, Timothy Lamberson, a native of Bolivar, Ohio, having crossed the plains in 1845, and located in Oregon. The trip was made with ox-teams, and upon the arrival at their destination Mr. Lamberson took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres located on Scappoose plains, Columbia county, which was the home of the family for some years. In 1846 he went to California, where he remained for eighteen months in the pursuit of agriculture and stock-raising, at the expiration of this period returning to Oregon. Hardly had he returned when the gold excitement in the former state again attracted him, and in 1849 he made the trip to California and engaged in mining upon a tributary of the Sacramento river, where he met with a gratifying success. In 1850 he returned to his claim in Columbia county, and there built the first sawmill in the locality, a tiny cabin on Scappoose creek, from which he shipped lumber to many parts of the country. In 1859 he ventured to Sonora, Mexico, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and in 1860 he located permanently in Arizona, where he established the town of Walnut Grove. He built the first grist-mill in the place, most of it being the work of his own hands, his burrs being made from granite, his trade having been that of a stone-cutter, and the belts being made from rawhide. Connected with his milling interests he also engaged in mining and farming, the combination of lucrative work affording him quite a fortune. His death occurred in Walnut Grove, Ariz., in 1891, at the age of seventy-six years. Mr. Lamberson was a Whig, and later a strong Abolitionist. During the later years of his life he was a Republican. Possessed of a lively, energetic temperament, his real worth won for him many friends. He bore the privations and hardships of a pioneer life with an optimism characteristic of the pioneer settler of Oregon, California and Arizona. Timothy Lamberson's son, Daniel, was tortured to death by the Apache Indians near Tucson, Ariz., about 1865. His body was riddled by arrows and hanged among the chaparral. The eldest son, Samuel, the father of Dr. Lamberson, was also a native of Bolivar, Ohio. He crossed the plains with his parents in 1845, at the age of fourteen years, being old enough, however, to appreciate the trials and dangers which such a journey meant. He became a stockman and farmer in Oregon, remaining for some years upon the paternal homestead. In 1876 he disposed of this property and removed to Gilliam county, Ore., where he continued in the stock business, making his home there the remainder of his life. While preparing to join the family reunion at Condon, Gilliam county, December 24, 1901, he died of heart disease on the prairie near Condon, at the age of seventy-three years. His loss was not felt alone by the family, for his years of peaceful, kindly living had endeared him to many. He had married Mary Jane Armstrong, a native of La Harpe, Hancock county, Ill., who started across the plains with her parents in 1852. The journey was one which can never be effaced from her memory on account of the misfortunes that accompanied the party. Her mother, Mary Jane Armstrong, died of the cholera and was buried on the banks of the Platte river, and her father, John Armstrong, a native of Indiana, passed away the latter part of the year 1852, near Baker City, Ore., a victim of mountain fever. To Mr. and Mrs. Lamberson were born sixteen children, four sons and twelve daughters.

The oldest of his father's children, John Albert Lamberson was born in Columbia county, Ore., June 16, 1854, and received his preliminary education in the common schools of his native county. In 1872, at the age of eighteen years, he entered the academy of Prof. George W. Curtis, at Vancouver, Wash., and through application and hard work secured an excellent foundation for higher studies in the three years which he spent there. After leaving the academy he went to Arizona, where he found employment in the Hassayampa mines, where he met with a fair return for his labor. In 1876 he settled in eastern Oregon, engaging in the stock business at Fossil, remaining there for six years, three of which were spent in the study of medicine under the tutelage of Dr. W. W. Oglesby, now of Cottage Grove. At the expiration of this period in 1882, he removed to Lebanon, Linn county, and began practicing with Dr. D. W. Ballard, an old resident physician, who had been appointed in an early day by President Grant as governor of Idaho territory. Their professional interests continued together until the death of Dr. Ballard. In 1890 Dr. Lamberson became interested in the sale of cascara sagrada bark, and from a small beginning he is now under contract to collect all of that product to be found in the states of Oregon and Washington, as it is grown only in the Pacific northwest. When he first began the business there were only about twenty tons consumed annually, but the annual consumption is now two hundred tons. In addition to this business he is also interested in shipping balsam fir, principally to New York markets, having begun this in connection with Capt. George Pope, of Portland, Ore., who has since left the business entirely to the doctor. Leading up to this business was his help in promoting the establishment of the Essential Oil Company for the manufacture of cedar, hemlock and peppermint oils.

Though interested along various lines. Dr. Lamberson has never forgotten that his practice means more to him than any other work, and he has neglected no opportunity to become proficient therein. In 1891 he passed an exhaustive examination before the State Board of Medical Examiners, his clear, practical knowledge and judgment winning words of commendation from the board, accompanied by the much-valued medical certificate. He then continued his practice, and in 1900, with Dr. J. Linsey Hill, of Albany, Ore., as companion, he took a special course in surgery in the New York School of Clinical Medicine. Upon his return from New York City he worked for a month each spring under the instruction of Dr. A. E. Rockey, of St. Vincent's Hospital, Portland, Ore., and a warm friendship exists between the two men. Through intense application to his work, which has characterized every effort of Dr. Lamberson, he suffered a paralytic stroke, January 25, 1902, which has partly incapacitated him, leaving him able to attend to the office practice only.

The marriage of Dr. Lamberson occurred in Lebanon, in 1882, and united him with Mahala Mossholder, a native of Ohio, and the daughter of Joseph Mossholder, who emigrated to Oregon in 1863 and, locating in Lebanon, built the first hotel in that town. The one child born to them is Norman Vivian, who was born May 22, 1885, and is now attending Santiam Academy. Inheriting more than ordinary talent, this representative of the pioneer family of Lamberson displays it in the writing of excellent poetry, having begun its composition at the age of thirteen years. Another member of the household of Dr. Lamberson is an adopted daughter, Hazel May, who is also unusually talented, being a contralto singer of no little ability. As a Republican in politics Dr. Lamberson is very much interested in the movements of his party, local or national, and lends his best efforts toward advancing what he considers the broadest principles of government. His busy life admitting of no room for political honors, he has nevertheless given his time in various ways, serving for several terms as committeeman. In 1896 he edited a Republican paper called the Lebanon Truth, which met with success under his able management, though he discontinued the publication at the close of the political campaign of that year. Fraternally he belongs to a number of different orders, being tent physician of the Knights of the Maccabees, in which he has served as commander for eight terms. He was appointed state physician in 1899 for one term, consisting of one year. In the Woodmen of the World he is a member of Lamberson Camp, No. 507, which was named in honor of himself, and in which he serves as presiding officer; he is also associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Order of Pendo, for which he is general examiner. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Lebanon.

WILLIAM O. HUDSON. To the student of nature the nurseryman's occupation opens up fascinating vistas of investigation, and he has the added satisfaction of seeing his products sent forth to beautify and gladden the world about him. No humdrum life is his, but one fraught with never-ending interest, that interest felt while watching growth from seed to perfection, and in working always near to the heart of nature. A particularly appreciative disciple of horticulture is William O. Hudson, whose many years of practical experience with flower and shrub, fruit and vine, has entitled him to rank among the most cultured of those who plant, train and develop.

All of the active life of Mr. Hudson has been devoted to horticulture, his first interest therein having been aroused on his father's farm in Allegan county, Mich., where he was born July 28, 1846. The four other children in his father's family spent their youth as did he, in assisting with the work around the home, and in attending the public schools. As a young man he took up the nursery business, and from the beginning strove to learn all that his teachers had to tell him. At the age of twenty he started out on his own responsibility, went to Missouri, and worked in a nursery in that state for about two years. With this experience he then returned to Michigan and started the Allegan County Nursery, a venture which proved successful, and to which he devoted nineteen years of the best part of his life. In Michigan he married, December 13, 1870, Anna Donaldson, who was born in Ohio, and of which union there have been born three children: Cora L., the wife of H. H. White, of Wasco City; Albert D., of Tangent; and Florence A., of Eugene.

In 1891 Mr. Hudson disposed of the Allegan County Nursery and, having heard favorable reports of the soil possibilities of Oregon, brought his wife and children to Tangent. For three years he served as foreman of the Settlemier Nurseries, and in 1893 became identified with the Pacific Nursery Company, now owned by himself and son. Father and son have proved of great help to each other, are most congenially associated, and do one of the largest businesses in this county. They own one hundred and fifty-two acres of land, about sixty of which is under nursery cultivation. A visit to this nursery reveals many interesting sights, and the visitor is impressed with the many-sided knowledge of things that grow, as shown by the many kinds of plants, the neatness and compactness of arrangement, and the modern facilities for watering, wintering, and general care. Mr. Hudson is past master of his calling, and his plants seem to understand and appreciate his interest, and to respond with dutiful alacrity to his expectations. He is well and favorably known throughout the entire county, and his products find a ready market in the surrounding states, and in towns all along the coast. Mr. Hudson has never taken any special interest in politics, and generally votes for the man best qualified to fill the office. He is fraternally connected with the Knights of the Maccabees, and is a member and active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Albert D. Hudson, the son and partner of William O., was born in Michigan, September 17, 1874, and came to the west with his father in 1891. As a lad he became versed in the work around the nursery, and has steadily advanced to the fore, so that he is today a remarkably well informed nurseryman. He married Golden Knighten, a native daughter of Oregon, and an earnest sympathizer with her husband's business. Mr. Hudson is independent in politics, is fraternally a Knight of the Maccabees, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is a young man of great promise, and should his father retire from his present responsibility as general manager of the nurseries, he will leave the business in most capable and business like hands.

ENOCH D. SLOAN. Conspicuous among the older residents of Albany is Enoch D. Sloan, who has attained distinction as one of the brave and courageous pioneer settlers of Linn county, and is deserving of honored mention in this biographical volume as a veteran of the early Indian wars. Coming here when the country was but sparsely populated, he took up land that was in its pristine wildness, and while clearing his claim was also actively identified with the establishment of the great lumber industry of the Pacific coast by the erection of a saw-mill. At the present time he is carrying on a substantial business as a wagon and carriagemaker, his shop being located on West Second street, Albany. A son of the late William Sloan, he was born June 12, 1831, in Montgomery county, Ohio, seven miles north of the thriving city of Dayton.

A Pennsylvanian by birth, William Sloan moved to Montgomery county, Ohio, when young, and was there engaged in agricultural pursuits several years. Removing with his family to Covington, Ind., he resided there until 1853, when he came with his family to Oregon, making the journey across the dreary plains with bull-teams. He located first in the Umpqua valley, but afterwards took up land in Linn county, about eight miles from Albany, and there carried on general farming until his death. He married Mary Dunkereley, who emigrated with her parents from England, her native country, to Ohio, when a girl of ten years. Of their family nine children, eight sons and one daughter, six sons survive, three of them being residents of Oregon.

Being but a small child when his parents left Ohio, E. D. Sloan was brought up and educated in Indiana, on the home farm. Learning the carpenter's trade when eighteen years of age, he subsequently worked at that occupation until 1853, when he came with his parents to Oregon, driving five yokes of bulls all the way across the plains. Settling in Linn county soon after his arrival, he began work as a carpenter, and took up a donation claim about three miles from the village of Albany. He cleared the land, bringing a large part of it under cultivation, and erected a saw-mill on the Callapooia river. Thus well started in business, he carried on general agriculture and lumbering quite successfully for awhile. Enlisting in 1855 in Company D, First Regiment of Oregon Volunteers, he took an active part in the various engagements with the Indians of the northwest, remaining in Walla Walla county, Wash., until June, 1856, when he was honorably discharged from service.

Returning then to Linn county, Ore., Mr. Sloan resumed work at the carpenter's trade, and did considerable building, hewing the timber from the forests, and putting up houses, confining his operations as a contractor and builder to Albany and vicinity. Becoming well known as a skillful mechanic, he was for five years employed by the government, being for two years carpenter at the Warm Springs Indian reservation, and for three years at the Klamath Indian reservation. Coming back to Albany, Mr. Sloan followed his former trade until 1897, when he removed to Pendleton, where he was engaged in business with his brother for five years. Since the fall of 1902 he has resided in Albany, where he is prosperously employed as a wagon and carriage manufacturer, as previously mentioned.

Mr. Sloan married, while living near Albany, Emily Haley, who was born in Illinois, and came to Oregon with her parents in 1847. Their only child, Burr M. Sloan, is employed as a government carpenter at an Indian reservation in North Dakota. Politically Mr. Sloan is an adherent of the Democratic party, and fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and of the Indian War Veterans' Association. Mrs. Sloan is a valued member of the Congregational Church.

JOHN R. SMITH. A pioneer who has met with most gratifying returns for the days of hardships and privations which he passed when the country was new, for the dangers he faced in the unsettled wilderness, for the strength of youth which he gave to the upbuilding of the commonwealth, is J. R. Smith, the postmaster of Lebanon, Linn county, Ore. He came to Oregon in 1852, and has spent most of the intervening years within the borders of the state, where he has won more than local renown through the display of characteristics which have contributed to the country's greatness.

The father of J. R. Smith, Dr. Elijah Smith, was also a pioneer, emigrating from his native state of Ohio to Iowa in 1837, where he remained until he settled permanently on the Pacific slope. His father was John J. Smith, a native of Kentucky, who came to Ohio in an early day and located in Madison county, his land being that upon which the town of Mount Sterling was afterward built, and toward which he helped very materially. His occupation was primarily that of a millwright, though he combined the interests of farming with his trade. He owned both a saw and a gristmill. In 1838 he removed to Jefferson county, Iowa, and there engaged in farming, his death occurring there at the age of eighty-six years. Elijah Smith removed to Iowa, in 1837, and located in Jefferson county, where, with his farming, he combined the practice of medicine. He had made a special study of cancer, and it was in this line that he really made his greatest successes. He soon became well known throughout the state through his evident knowledge and practical treatment of the disease. In 1850 he crossed the plains to California, and entered the mines at Placerville, and two years later he came north and located in Oregon. He took a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in Marion county, near the town of Sublimity, and, combining farming with the practice of medicine, he soon became as thoroughly known in Oregon as he was in the middle west, people coming to him for relief from every part of the northwest. Later in life he removed to Macleay and passed a few years in retirement, where he died in 1885, at the age of eighty-six years. He had married Annie Riddle, a native of Ohio, who died in Salem, Ore., in 1880, when seventy-five years old. She was the daughter of John Riddle, who was born in Ohio, and spent the greater part of his life there, engaged in the cultivation of the soil. His death occurred in his native state.

Of the eleven children born to Dr. and Mrs. Smith, six sons and five daughters, J. R. Smith is the oldest, and was born in Madison county, Ohio, September 23, 1830, and remained at home with his parents for many years. He received his education in the primitive schools, and when about twenty years old he crossed the plains with his parents and became a resident of Placerville, Cal., where he engaged in mining, in which he enjoyed a fair degree of success. In the fall of the same year he returned to Iowa with his parents, arriving in the state which had so long been their home, in January, 1851. The next year found them again upon the plains, this time bound for the great northwest. This son soon became independent, and engaged in work in which he hoped to reap substantial returns. In the Waldo Hills, Marion county, he engaged in buying and selling cattle and following the carpenter's trade, and a few years later, through energy and industry, he was able to make a purchase of land, the first being near Sublimity, and consisted of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he remained for two years. At the close of that period he sold this property and bought two hundred acres in the same locality, upon which he engaged in farming and stock-raising, until 1865, when he became the owner of land in the neighborhood of Lebanon. Thirty years passed away while he made this place his home and many changes came to the sturdy pioneers of this one-time wilderness. In 1895 he removed to his present home, a pleasant, well improved residence on Bridge avenue, Lebanon, and with two acres of rich land to cultivate. On his first residence in the city he engaged with his son in the drug business. Mr. Smith still owns a farm in the vicinity of this place, comprising three hundred and fifty acres of land.

The marriage of Mr. Smith took place in Marion county, Ore., Ann E. Peebler, a native of Iowa, becoming his wife. The five children which blessed their union are: Mary M. is the wife of D. V. S. Reed, a professor in the high school of Heppner, Ore.; Flora M. is the wife of George N. Bolton, of Moro, Ore.; I. M. is a physician at Tillamook, Ore.; Addie is the wife of W. S. Mayberry, an educator of Milton, Ore.; and N. W. is assistant postmaster under his father. Through the influence of the Republican party, of which he is a staunch and active partisan, Mr. Smith was appointed, in 1899, postmaster at Lebanon. He has also been a delegate to various state and county conventions, and a school director for many terms. During the Rogue River war of 1855-6 he was first lieutenant in a minute company, stationed at Sublimity, but they were never called out to active service. In religion Mr. Smith is a member of the Baptist Church of Lebanon.

VALENTINE H. CALDWELL. Living on his pleasant and well appointed homestead, four miles southwest of Albany, Valentine H. Caldwell is numbered among the most extensive landholders, and successful agriculturists of Linn county. Beginning life for himself on a low rung of the ladder, his worldly capital being $7.50, he has since made diligent use of his faculties and opportunities, and has proved himself a useful and worthy citizen, well meriting the confidence and esteem in which he is held throughout the community. He is a son of John Caldwell, and was born in Kentucky. His father was born of Irish ancestors in Kentucky, but from the age of six years until his death, at the age of four score and six years, he was a resident of Missouri. He married Mary Stockton, a native of Kentucky, and she survived him, living to a very advanced age.

The oldest of a family of five children, Valentine H. Caldwell received his knowledge of books in the subscription schools of his native state, and remained beneath the paternal roof-tree until attaining his majority. In the spring of 1852 he started across the plains, driving an ox-team for his uncle, who was captain of the train. While on the way several members of the party, including his uncle, died from cholera. Arriving in Oregon, Mr. Caldwell spent a short time near Monroe, Benton county, after which he engaged in mining near Jacksonville, Jackson county. Settling then in Marion county, he took up a donation claim near Sublimity, and subsequently lived there and in that locality until 1868. Coming then to Linn county, he purchased one hundred and forty acres of land, which are now included in his present homestead. He has since made extensive purchases of land, being now the possessor of twelve hundred acres, more than one-half of which are in a good state of cultivation, being devoted to general farming and stock-raising. In the latter industry he has met with excellent success, chiefly breeding and rearing Red Durham cattle. On this homestead Mr. Caldwell has made marked improvements, having erected new buildings of modern character, his barns and outbuildings being commodious and convenient, and his farm amply supplied with the necessary tools, machinery and appliances for successfully carrying on agricultural operations.

With the exception of six years, Mr. Caldwell has been engaged in agricultural labor since coming to Oregon. During the Yakima Indian war he enlisted, in 1856, and served one hundred and six days under Captain Hardin, being on guard duty the greater part of the time. Although taking an earnest interest in public affairs, he has never been an aspirant for official honors, but has warmly supported the principles of the Prohibition party. He is identified with the Oregon Pioneer Association as a member, and belongs to the society organized by the Indian War Veterans.

In 1863 Mr. Caldwell married Sarah Grier, a native of Ohio, and into their home seventeen children have been born, namely: John H., now deceased; Mrs. Mary S. Kantz, of Roseburg, Ore.; George, residing in Portland; Seth, deceased; Jackson, living in Washington; Mrs. Nellie Hughs, of Pendleton, Ore.; Charles, of Walla Walla, Wash.; Fannie, at home; Mrs. Martha Marsh, of Odessa, Wash.; Lydia, of Roseburg; William, living near Albany; Frank and Fred, twins, living at home; Jane, at home; James; Media, at home; and Almetia, twin sister of Media, deceased. In these days when so much is said about the small families of native Americans, it is refreshing to come upon a household such as Mr. Caldwell's. Mr. Caldwell united with the Baptist Church in 1851, and has served many years as one of its deacons. Mrs. Caldwell is also a member of the same church, having joined in 1871.

WILLIAM B. HENDERSON. The sense of security and substantiality one feels when speaking with William B. Henderson is borne out in his character and attainments, and he is known today among the chief developers of the sections in which he has lived. Mr. Henderson comes of a family which came to the fore in the early emergencies of the country, its members filling many positions of trust and responsibility, and his grandfather on the paternal side serving with distinction in the war of 1812. As far back as is known his people were tillers of the soil, an occupation followed by his parents in Guernsey county, Ohio, where he himself was born, October 9, 1839. He comes of long-lived ancestry on both sides of the family, his father living to be eighty-six, and his mother eighty-eight years of age.

Mr. Henderson had eleven brothers and sisters, all of whom were reared on the Guernsey county farm, and were taught to be practical agriculturists, as well as upright and useful citizens. William B. was studious as a lad, and made the most of his opportunities at the public school in his neighborhood, eventually qualifying as a teacher, an occupation to which he devoted several years of his life. Beginning at the age of nineteen, he taught for five or six years in Ohio. His advent into a more strenuous activity began in 1862, when he joined his brother, A. C., in the necessary preparations for coming to the coast. Via the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco they finally arrived in Portland, and Mr. Henderson lived for the first three years in Polk and Marion counties, where he taught school for three years. Following this he taught for two years in Linn county. In the year 1867 he was united in marriage with N. Jane Deckard, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1853. Her parents, Anderson and Lydia Deckard, settled on a donation claim ten miles south of Albany, where they lived for the balance of their lives. After his marriage Mr. Henderson farmed for a time, and in 1870 purchased a drove of cattle and took them to Crook county, where he engaged in stock-raising for a couple of years. In 1872 he purchased a place of three hundred and forty-one acres two miles southwest of Albany, comprising a portion of the old Jarvis Briggs donation claim. Two years later he sold part of this farm, and in 1878 moved to Umatilla county, with the best development of which he was connected for about twenty years. He was one of the largest wheat raisers in the county, his last crop being ten thousand bushels. He owned three quarter-sections of land, and also extensively raised cattle, sheep and horses. He was one of the chief promoters and organizers of the town of Helix, and was instrumental in getting the postoffice there, also in laying out precincts and town-sites. At the present time he is a large property owner of Adams, Umatilla county. Although never active in politics, he held the office of justice of the peace for several years, and, taken all in all, was as prominent and progressive and forceful a man as the country had known in its history.

From Umatilla county Mr. Henderson came to Albany and bought five acres adjoining the town, where he is still living, and upon which he has made extensive improvements. He also owns two hundred and seventy-three acres near Albany, which he himself manages, and he also owns a farm of three hundred and forty-four acres in Benton county. He is extensively engaged in raising Cotswold sheep and fine cattle, and, needless to say, his farms are valuable and very productive. Since 1869 he has been comparatively alone, for his wife died that year, leaving to his care two children, of whom E. Maud is living with her father, while Guy S. until recently lived in New York city, where he gained quite a reputation as an artist and designer. He is now connected with the Holmes Business College of Portland, having charge of the penmanship and art department.

Since his seventeenth year Mr. Henderson has been a member of the Christian Church, and has ever since been active in church work, contributing generously of his means towards its maintenance and general charities. No one in this or Umatilla county bears a more enviable reputation for absolute fair dealing and personal integrity, nor has any been more successful in turning to good account the advantages by which they were surrounded in a new and strange country.

STEPHEN RIGDON. Wherever men have gone in the pursuit of wealth, no matter how remote the location, how lonely or unpromising the conditions by which they are surrounded, it invariably necessitates self-sacrifice combined with all the ennobling influences which are embodied in human make-up. Of such character was John Rigdon, father of Stephen Rigdon, the latter one of the most prominent and influential farmers of Lane county.

John Rigdon was born in Pennsylvania, October 15, 1796, and was reared on a farm, receiving his preliminary education in the district schools. As a young man he left home and started for the west, locating in Ohio, where he entered the ministry and preached in connection with farming. December 8, 1818, he married Catherine Logan, who was born in the Buckeye state June 12, 1798. They continued to live in Ohio until removing to Illinois in 1832. It was while living in Iowa, to which he removed in 1848, that he became interested in the far west, and as the numbers westward bound increased every year, he was more and more convinced that his best and broadest opportunity lay the other side of the Rockies. Starting out in March, 1852, he had rather an uneventful trip across the plains, and in Oregon settled in Polk county, remaining there about two years. Mr. Rigdon then came to Lane county and took up a claim five miles southeast of Pleasant Hill, in a place known as Rattle Snake valley, where he farmed for the remainder of his life, although his preaching took him from home for many months during the year. He was one of the organizers of the first church in this part of the county, and he was one of the first ministers in this part of the state. Those familiar with his life and work unhesitatingly credit him with accomplishing more good than did any other similarly engaged in the county, although the scope of his activity was by no means a local one. It were impossible to even estimate the number of miles traveled by this pioneer preacher in his more than ordinarily busy life, for he counted no effort too great providing some soul was benefited thereby. Probably no man of his time could lay claim to greater familiarity with both well known and out of the way places in Oregon and Washington, for he visited both states with impartial spirit, going wherever there was demand for his services, and performing them regardless of financial remuneration. Few students of the bible saw so clearly through the mazes that perplex, vex and discourage travelers on the highway of life, and his sermons were as clear and convincing as his mind and heart were bright and true. His eloquence, humanity and goodness drew to him many fine and distinguished friends, and no home in the county was better known, more eagerly sought, or more hospitable. Mr. Rigdon retired from active life a few years before his death, which occurred in March, 1859, at the age of eighty-two years, his wife living to be eighty years of age. His first wife dying June 15, 1834, Mr. Rigdon married in Illinois a Miss Laughlin, who was born in Kentucky. They had one child, who died in infancy. For a third wife he married Mary Bell, a native of Ohio, and of this union there were born several children, of whom Mrs. Phœbe Parker lives in Lane county; George lives in Union county; and Addie lives near the old place.

Stephen Rigdon was reared on the old farm in the middle west and preceded his father to the coast in 1850. He also came with ox-teams, but stopped in California after a journey of four months and a half, and remained there until 1853. He was fairly successful, and joined his people in their new home in Lane county the richer by a few hundred dollars. After a short visit he left for Marion and Clackamas counties, looking for a desirable permanent location, and in the spring of 1854 located in Lane county. The same year he was united in marriage with Zilphia Bristow, who was born in McDonough county, Ill., in 1834, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1848. The young people went to housekeeping on a part of the father-in-law's donation claim, Elijah Bristow being one of the foremost pioneers of his time and the owner of a large tract of land. He was the first white man to take up land within the limits of Lane county, and is credited with building the first house in the county. The two hundred and seventy-five acres now owned by Mr. Rigdon have been improved under his direction. His barns and out-buildings are of modern and convenient construction. He is engaged in stock-raising and small farming, and is one of the successful and prominent men of his vicinity. Bearing an honored name owing partly to the exemplary life of his father, his own character and attainments are in keeping with what one might expect from so noble and kindly a source. The elder Rigdon was a Whig of intense convictions, and his son is a Republican, the majority of the local offices in the community having fallen to his share during the recent years. Having no children of his own, he has adopted a son, Paul L. Bristow, who has lived with the family for forty-two years. This adopted son is a nephew of Mrs. Rigdon, and is married and has four children, Jeannie W., Clarence R., Lillie, and Edith. Mr. Bristow is now conducting the home farm. He was the son of E. L. Bristow, one of the pioneers of the Willamette valley and a man of literary attainments. Mrs. Rigdon died at the home where she and her husband had lived for so many years May 11, 1903, leaving behind her a multitude of friends and a void that is impossible to fill. She was one who always took the lead in charitable matters in her neighborhood.

ANDREW EDGAR WRIGHTMAN, M. D. Among the more recent arrivals in Oregon is Andrew Edgar Wrightman, of Silverton, who since September 20, 1902, has practiced his profession here. He is a young man of strong intellectuality, marked individuality and keen enterprising spirit and the future promises him success. He was born in Bowmanville, Canada, October 8, 1876, a son of John Wrightman, whose birth occurred in St. Ignace, Mich. His grandfather was a native of England and when a young man came to the United States, locating first in St. Ignace, Mich., where he engaged in the lumber business. At the time of his death his son John took the business and conducted it for some time. He subsequently removed to Canada, where he had mills on the river Trent. He was recognized as one of the leading representatives of the lumber trade of his day, owning between thirty and forty different mills, together with a large number of logging camps and employing hundreds of men. His business grew until it had reached extensive proportions, making him one of the leaders in the entire country. He was also a prominent Orangeman, and while entertaining his employes one night at one of his lumber camps five miles south of Chatham, Canada, the Catholics, who disliked him because of his connection with the Orangemen and because he would not employ them as laborers, came to the camp and with clubs and knives began fighting the employes of Mr. Wrightman. He displayed great valor in attempting to restore peace, but he and two of his men were killed and a number of others were injured. This occurred in 1879. Mr. Wrightman had also been connected with the Fenian Raid. He was a very wealthy man, whose large and important business interests had been built up through his own efforts and returned to him splendid success. At the time of his death his family were living in Chatham. In early manhood he had wedded Mary Gould, a native of Canada, who now resides in Bowmanville, Ontario. She was a distant relative of Jay Gould. Her father came to Canada at an early day from England. He was a farmer and an Indian fighter and for many years lived in Toronto, where his death ultimately occurred. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Wrightman were born two sons and five daughters.

The doctor is the youngest of the family, and acquired his early education in the public schools of his native town. When but nine years of age he went to Tidioute, Pa., where he secured a position as landscape painter in a chair manufactory. After a short time in that position he went to Jamestown, N. Y., where he was employed at his trade and then started a business of his own as a painter and landscape artist. In 1889 he removed to New York City, where he was employed in landscape painting of opera scenery for John Coe & Company. He possessed natural artistic ability and produced some very creditable work. In 1890 he took up his abode in Toronto, Canada, where he established the Toronto Portrait Company for enlarging pictures, thus instituting a business which is still in existence. In 1891 the doctor withdrew and went to Minneapolis, Minn., and in the fall of the same year he again went to Jamestown, N. Y., where he took charge of the chair manufactory business of the firm of Curtis & Page, continuing in that capacity until 1893.

In the year mentioned Dr. Wrightman became a student in Dwight L. Moody's School at Mount Hermon, Mass., where he pursued a literary course for two years and in 1895 he became a student in Oberlin College, at Oberlin, Ohio, where he pursued a theological course. He went to Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1896, and entered upon a four years' course in the Eclectic Medical Institute, and in 1899 he went to Baltimore, Md., where he pursued a special course in the medical department of Johns Hopkins University, making a specialty of the diseases of the blood and skin. He also took a special course on the diseases of women and children in Child's Hospital, and in 1901 he returned to Cincinnati, where he completed his studies in the Eclectic Medical Institute. Then locating at Mansfield, Ohio, he practiced there for four months and on September 20, 1902, he arrived in Oregon, locating at Silverton, where he has since engaged in practice with growing success. He also owns a half interest in the drug business of Lewis Johnson & Company, Mr. Johnson being his brother-in-law.

July 9, 1902, in Jamestown, N. Y., the doctor was united in marriage with Miss Helen Marie

Johnson, a daughter of J. W. Johnson, who was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, and came to the United States in 1886, at which time he established his home at Jamestown, N. Y., and there engaged in dealing in ice. He had a monopoly of the trade at that place for twenty-seven years and did a very extensive and prosperous business. He was also proprietor of the Buffalo House in that city, and he is now a well known and prosperous real estate man of Jamestown.

The doctor and his wife have already won many warm friends in the leading social circles in Silverton. He is a most pleasant, genial gentleman, popular wherever he goes. He belongs to the Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and to the Congregational Church. In his profession he is giving evidence of ability, which promises well for a successful future. Few men have talent along as many lines as has Dr. Wrightman. He not only possesses much natural artistic ability, but is a fluent and forceful writer and has considerable poetic talent. One of the beautiful little gems which he has written is "Night Thoughts," and we here give it as a specimen of his literary ability:

When the winds are sadly moaning
Thro' the trees so tall and bare,
And the moon's rays gently gleaming
Making night seem soft and fair;
Then my thoughts go slowly stealing
To the shores of long ago,
Where the sun of childhood shining Kept away all care and woe.

On the shores are loved ones standing,
Who were dear as life to me;
But they're now beyond the billows
Breaking on life's troubled sea.
Shall I know them up in Heaven
Where the gates are open wide?
Will they happily be standing
Close to my dear Savior's side?

When the angels softly singing
Fill the hills with welcome song, Shall I hear their voices ringing
Sweetly from the angel throng?
Will they, when the harps of Heaven
Send their music out afar,
Lead me by the hand so gently
Thro' the golden gates ajar?

From the wind now softly sighing
Comes a voice both clear and sweet,
And it says, "Yes, up in Heaven
You will all your loved ones greet."
Now the voice is lowly pleading
That I tread earth's path aright,
So at last I'll live in glory
Where there's no more wind of night.

DR. JOHN McLOUGHLIN. The name most early connected with the pioneer history of Oregon is that of Dr. John McLoughlin, who came to Oregon in 1823, as director for the Hudson Bay Company, acting under authority of the British government. For twenty years thereafter he was called governor of Oregon, by courtesy and authority of the company with which he was identified, the territory over which he exercised control extending from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean and from California to Alaska. It was a dangerous and lonely life, but that earnest and unfaltering courage demanded in the pioneer was fully met by the character of Dr. McLoughlin; no better man, no truer pioneer could have been chosen to prepare the way for those who were to come after and live in the prosperous conditions which to-day make of Oregon a state equal to any in the Union. It is no less a pleasure than a duty to recall the lives of such men.

Dr. John McLoughlin was born in Quebec, in 1784, and received his education in France. He was the representative of Scotch ancestry and many of the strong traits which distinguished this people made up the character of the man who proved so potent a factor in the early life of the northwest. That he was earnest in purpose, energetic in action and indomitable in will all the records of his life show, and as a mere lad he entered the service of the old North-West Fur Company and put to practical use his native characteristics. For about twenty-four years he saw much of the hardships and dangers which made up the life of the traders, and in that time he labored patiently, passing, step by step, from the lowest to the highest position that could be given him. When the object of the Northwest Fur Company was attained and they were admitted to the privileges of the Hudson Bay Company, whose name they assumed, Dr. McLoughlin came to Astoria and accepted the responsibilities of the first governor of Oregon. Beyond the official duties which the position entailed upon him the doctor put forth his most earnest efforts toward advancing the interests of the territory over which he had assumed control, and for which he foresaw a great future. He it was who first brought wheat, oats, barley, corn, potatoes and tame grass seeds to Oregon, and it was through his indefatigable efforts that to agriculture was devoted so much time and attention in those early days. Soon after coming to Astoria he moved the post to Vancouver, Wash., and in every possible way encouraged settlement, as well as meeting with success in his official capacity. Through a kindly benevolence and wide charity he endeared himself to all with whom he came in contact, winning the regard of all nationalities, although he stoutly maintained the interests of the Hudson Bay Company.

With the coming of the American pioneers into the country made habitable by Dr. McLoughlin.

conditions were changed and there came a time of trouble into the life of this truly noble man. From 1840 to 1847 he witnessed the gradual decline of his personal authority, the falling away of those who had been his staunch adherents, and the shadow of an almost universal condemnation which well nigh obscured his life of service in Oregon. His was a peculiar position. In English employ for many years, he labored zealously for the interests of his native country upon disputed territory; with the coming of the American pioneers he gave to them the humane and courteous treatment which was a part of his character, gaining inevitably the condemnation of his own government and not the friendship of the other, since he had so long been considered unfriendly to American colonization. He, therefore, stood alone. Later in life he absolved allegiance to the British government and became a citizen of the United States, but through religious opponents he lost his fortune, and at his death, in 1857, was a poor man. In religion Dr. McLoughlin was a member of the Roman Catholic Church, but was broad and liberal in his views in the matter of religious beliefs, as well as in all that pertained to his daily life among the pioneer condition of early Oregon.

CHARLIE LONG. Much attention is paid to fruit-raising in western Oregon, and the fruits are of fine quality and flavor. Apples, pears, cherries, plums, prunes, grapes, and various other fruits grow in abundance. Mr. Long, the subject of this sketch, has a delightful little farm of twenty-three acres in the vicinity of Silverton and raises fruit quite extensively. An Ohioan by birth, he was born in Washington county, March 13, 1860. He is a son of Martin S. and Martha A. (Carroll) Long.

Martin S. Long was born April 6, 1820, in Belmont county, Ohio, and was left an orphan at the tender age of three years. He was cared for, however, by a Belmont county family, with whom he lived until he attained the age of eighteen years, when he began to make his own way in the world. He went to Louisville, Ky., where he learned the trade of a ship-carpenter. During the Mexican war, he went to sea in pursuit of his chosen calling, but subsequently returned to Washington county, Ohio, where he married a Miss Pinkerton. Four children blessed this union, two being now deceased. Those living are Mrs. Susan Miller, of Harmer, Ohio, and Mrs. Mary E. Randell, of Seattle, Wash. The mother of these children died in Washington county, Ohio. Some time later, Mr. Long contracted a second matrimonial alliance in Morgan county, Ohio, where he was united with Martha A. Carroll, of Maryland. After marriage, they made their residence in Washington county, Ohio, until 1874, when they came to Oregon. They took up their abode near Gervais for about a year and a half, and then purchased a two hundred and eighty-acre farm, about two and one-half miles north of Silverton. They reared six children, as follows: Emma, of Linn county; Charlie, the subject of this biography; Clara, deceased; James C., of Polk county; Amos W., of The Dalles; and Minnie, who resides near Salem. Both parents lived to a good old age, the father being seventy-five and the mother seventy-one years of age at the time of her demise. The former was prominently connected with the Odd Fellows.

Charlie Long obtained his education in the district schools and assisted his father on the farm until he reached his majority. He then went to Walla Walla, Wash., where he spent two or three years at various occupations, and, after a brief trip through California, he spent the five years following in southern Oregon. He afterward returned to his home, where he was married and settled down on a part of the home place, where he still resides. He was united in marriage, November 5, 1892, with Frances Prouty, who was born in Nebraska, but came to Oregon in 1888. She is a daughter of Willard and Leonora (Sykes) Prouty. Mr. Long is a man of good principles and his name is respected throughout his community. In politics he is a staunch Republican.

THOMAS E. MILES. In spite of reverses which have often impeded a nevertheless successful career, T. E. Miles has firmly established himself as a business man of Scott's Mills, and was engaged in a paying and quite extensive mercantile enterprise, known as Miles & White, until 1898, when he purchased the entire interests. A devastating fire in 1897 temporarily crippled his prospects, but he has since recouped his losses, and not only owns his store and residence, the latter of which is one of the finest in the town, but is the possessor of considerable other valuable property.

Had Mr. Miles followed the teachings of his youth he would always have been a farmer, for his people reared him to this occupation on the farm in Wabash county, Ind., where he was born March 2, 1857. His father was the owner of a farm in that county, upon which he lived for some years, then removed to Wayne county and lived there until his death, at the age of seventy-two years. He is survived by his wife, aged seventy-six years, now living in Wayne county, Ind., and who is the mother of six children. Until his twenty-sixth year T. E. Miles remained on the home farm, but after his marriage, in 1883, with Sarah C. White, a native of the Hoosier state, he went to housekeeping in Dickey county, N. D., in 1883, and lived in that state until 1894, coming then to his present home in Scott's Mills.

Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Miles, of whom Walter R., the oldest son, is at college; while William L. and Mary E. are living at home. Mr. Miles is a Prohibitionist in politics, and is a member of the Society of Friends. Though never desiring official recognition, he has filled local offices, and is at present clerk of the school board, and a notary public. Fraternally he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Mr. Miles is typical of all that is honorable and reliable, traits which are not only appreciated in his business connections, but from a social standpoint render him a proper man. He is successful and well favored with this world's goods, and has many friends in the town of his adoption. June 14, 1903, he sold his mercantile business interests and invested in timber land, which he intends developing.

WASHINGTON L. COON. Both as an educator and breeder of high-grade stock, Washington L. Coon won praise because of his thoroughness, reliability and adherence to the best possible methods in his chosen occupations. He is recalled as a man of whom his adopted state had reason to be proud, and whose adaptive and pleasing personal traits won him many friends among his pupils and business associates. Born in Jefferson county, Ky., March 10, 1825, he was of English and Dutch ancestry, and came of parents who devoted their entire lives to farming. At the age of six he moved with the rest of his family to Warren county, Ill., and when eighteen years old removed to Pike county, Mo., remaining there until the spring of 1850.

After a journey covering the usual six months, Mr. Coon arrived in Oregon, September 19, 1850, and settled upon the farm now occupied by his wife, and located fifteen miles southeast of Albany on the Willamette river. Having studiously availed himself of the opportunities of the early subscription schools in Illinois and Missouri, he applied himself to teaching school in this neighborhood for several winters, working on his claim of three hundred and twenty acres in the summer. He was engaged in packing to the mines for several years; and in taking several droves of cattle to California. In 1864 he returned to Illinois, via Central America, the next year locating and teaching school in Montgomery county, Ind., for one year. He then returned to Mercer county, Ill., and taught until 1870, and also took a course in the State Normal in Illinois, gradually working his way eastward, through Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia, and returning to Washington county, Pa., where he remained for a time. Here good fortune came to him, inasmuch as he met and won Mrs. Susan A. Bane, who was born in Pittsburg, Pa., January 17, 1840, and whose father, George Speer, died when she was a child. Her mother, Margaret (Leadwith) Speer, was of Scotch descent, and was born in the state of Maryland. The marriage of Mr. Coon and Mrs. Bane occurred March 15, 1875, and the same spring they came to Oregon and began housekeeping on the claim taken up by the husband in the early days.

Mr. Coon was an extensive raiser of high-grade stock, making a specialty of fine draft horses. He was a good business manager, was thrifty and economical, and both made and saved money. From time to time extensive improvements were made on the claim, and today it is one of the best improved properties in this section. The same house built by the husband in the early days is still occupied by his wife, although modern improvements have changed its character somewhat. Mrs. Coon also owns one of the finest timber tracts on the Willamette. Mr. Coon never interested himself in politics aside from the formality of casting his vote for Republican nominees, but he was very active in the United Presbyterian Church of Oakville, of which he was one of the first members in this district. To himself and wife were born the two children who live at home, Michael S. and Sarah Margaret, the former of whom manages the farm for his mother. Mr. Coon died on his farm March 28, 1901. He was sincere in all his beliefs and a Christian from principle.

WILLIAM J. FISHER. One of the most popular and promising members of the later generation around Albany is William J. Fisher, superintendent and manager of the county poor farm, and owner and manager of a large wood-yard in Albany. Should Mr. Fisher weary of farming or general business he could turn his attention to engineering with reasonable chances of success, for in his younger days in Canada, where he was born in Ontario, October 25, 1873, he learned the trade of engineering, but has never practiced it for purposes of livelihood. John Fisher, the father of William, was also a native of Ontario, and was born May 10, 1836. In his young manhood he married Margaret Orr, a native of Ireland, and in 1892 brought his family to Linn county, Ore., settling on the farm which is still his home near Albany. He is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the United Presbyterian Church. William J. is the third of the five children, the others being Sarah J., of Canada; Jeanett, also living in Canada; James, deceased; and Robert, at home.

Educated in the public schools of Ontario and Albany, William J. left the school room to learn engineering, but continued to live at home until his marriage with Winnie Sprenger, a native of Oregon. The young people went to housekeeping on the county poor farm, of which Mr. Fisher had been appointed superintendent and manager, and where they have since lived. The poor farm comprises one hundred and twenty acres of fertile land, and has good improvements, including facilities for carrying on the kind of general farming required at such an institution. The wood-yard at Albany, started some time since, has proved a profitable source of revenue, and, taken in connection with the farm, is about all that Mr. Fisher has time to attend to. Like his father, he is a staunch supporter of the Republican party, and he is one of the most influential members of the Grange. He has an interesting household, and one in which hospitality and good fellowship abound, two bright children, Lawrence and Violet, contributing to the beauty of his home. Public-spirited to a marked degree, Mr. Fisher may be depended on to promote any wise undertaking which has for its object the improvement of the town or county, and of one thing his friends may be sure: he will advance steadily and surely to the front, his efforts being based always on the substantial and worthy.

HON. AUGUSTUS C. JENNINGS. Earnest and faithful in whatever he undertakes, with that inherent force and wide understanding which characterizes the typical American, the Hon. Augustus C. Jennings has become one of the most prominent men in Oregon during the last twenty-five years, a position won by personal application and a close adherence to those principles which constitute the loyalty and honor of manhood. He has never been found lacking in those qualities needful in party or personal friend, and he has come to be recognized as a substantial factor in affairs of state or community. He also interests himself intelligently in stock-breeding, having a thousand head of Cotswold sheep, which he puts out on shares. In the time of our country's need, as a boy of eighteen years, he gave his youth and strength in the cause of national union, and is now numbered among the veterans who claim a nation's gratitude.

The Jennings family is of English ancestry, though long associated with the progress of the western world, the father, Charles M. Jennings, being a native of Pennsylvania. Animated by the same spirit which prompted his forefathers to become citizens of the colonies, he removed to Davis county, Iowa, at an early day, being numbered among the pioneers. In connection with the improvement and cultivation of a farm, he conducted a mercantile establishment in Drakesville, Iowa, his interests remaining so identified until his death, which occurred in that location. His wife was formerly Hannah Glover, a native of New Jersey, and her death occurred in her home in Iowa. Of the eleven children who blessed this union four are now living, and of these Thomas, who served in Company B, Thirtieth Iowa Regiment, is located as a practicing physician in Drakesville, Iowa, and Joseph C. is a resident of Lane county, Ore., where he is engaged in farming; Adda is the wife of Charles W. Wilson of Moulton, Iowa.

The second youngest of the children is A. C. Jennings, his birth occurring in Drakesville, Davis county, Iowa, January 16, 1845. His boyhood years were passed in the location of his birth. While receiving a good education in the common schools of the state he gained an insight into commercial life that was of great benefit to him. He was carrying the mails between Drakesville and Centerville in 1863, when he enlisted in Company M, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, being mustered in at Davenport, Iowa. He was sent to Benton Barracks, at St. Louis, after which he participated in many engagements in Arkansas, among them being Grand Prairie. He continued in the service until the close of the war, when he was mustered out in February, 1866, then returning to his home in Iowa. After some work in his father's store and an attendance at the high school, he engaged in teaching in the public schools, and later became one of the substantial merchants of Drakesville, where he remained until 1875. His brother, Joseph C. Jennings, having located in Lane county, Ore., in 1854, Mr. Jennings decided to also settle in the west. He first rented a farm near Irving, upon which he engaged extensively in the cultivation of grain. Combining with this employment a broad political interest, he remained in that location until 1894, when he removed to Eugene.

A Republican whose loyal maintenance of principles has won him the confidence of party leaders, Mr. Jennings was chosen in 1889 to represent his district in the state legislature, and was re-elected in 1891, a large majority attesting the popularity of the candidate. During the second term it was his privilege to help elect John H. Mitchell to the United States senate. In June, 1894, Mr. Jennings was elected county clerk, and took the oath of office in July. He was re-elected to this office in 1896, and during the four years in which he served the plans for the new court house were drawn up and the building nearly completed. At five different times he has been called upon to serve as chief clerk of the house of representatives, the first being in 1887. In 1893 he was employed in the office of the secretary of state, in 1898 was chief clerk of a special session of the legislature and followed this with a similar service in the sessions of 1899, 1901 and 1903.

Mr. Jennings was married in Iowa to Miss Rhoda Burks, a native of Indiana, who died in Oregon. Of the thirteen children born to Mr. and Mrs. Jennings, eleven are now living, and all make their home with their father with the exception of the following: Mildred, wife of Samuel Flint, located near Irving; Mattie, wife of E. L. McPherson, of Eugene; Helen, the wife of C. P. Sylvester, of Eugene; Elbert, of Portland; and Hetty, the wife of J. G. Robinson, of New York. August, 1900, Mr. Jennings was again married to Mary Van Duyn, who was reared in Bloomfield, Iowa, and there married. Socially Mr. Jennings is a member of the Commercial Club, and fraternally belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is past grand; the Woodmen of the World; and J. W. Geary Post No. 7, G. A. R., of which he is past commander. He is a member of the Christian church, in which he officiates as trustee and chairman of the official board.

MRS. MARTHA BARNES. Since her ninth year the life history of Mrs. Martha Barnes has been interwoven with the changing conditions of Oregon, ranging in extent from the pioneer desolation and crudeness of '45 to the surprising development of the present time. A resident of Albany since the death of her husband in 1885, Mrs. Barnes is one of the pioneer women around whom gathers a world of good will and social prominence, and whose many fine personal characteristics bind to her indefinitely a host of worthy friends. Born on a farm near Weston, W. Va., she is the seventh of the ten children born to her parents, Henry J. and Eliza (Allen) Peterson, natives respectively of Virginia and Massachusetts. Distinction is conferred on the maternal family by the war record of Ethan Allen, the famous colonel of the Colonial army during the Revolutionary war, and the paternal side of the house has no less a worthy representative in the Rev. Peterson, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church whose era of greatest usefulness centers around the strenuous times culminating in the Civil war. Mr. Peterson led the useful and self-sacrificing life of the early clergyman, and though a southerner in character, chivalry and manner, he vigorously espoused the cause of the down-trodden slave, freeing those upon his own plantation as soon as he became convinced that slavery was wrong.

Henry J. Peterson was reared in West Virginia, and as a young man made many moves in search of a desirable location. From Indiana he removed to Medina county, Ohio, afterward to Illinois for one winter, and still later to Henry county, Iowa, his last home in the middle west. In 1845 he prepared for a journey across the plains which, in the extent of its adventure, deprivation and suffering, equaled that of any undertaken at that very early time. Five sons and five daughters had been added to his family, and for their transportation to the coast he had five wagons, each with from three to five yoke of oxen, as well as a yoke of oxen on the wagon used to transport their provisions. The Indians proved very troublesome, and constant vigilance was required on the part of the emigrants to preserve their ownership of the stock. They came by way of the ill-fated Meek's cut-off, one of the most troublesome routes presented to early emigrants to the west, and it is doubtful if any aggregation of men, women and children arrived at The Dalles at any time in the emigration days, more weary, discouraged, or hopeless. For many days and weeks food had been scarce, and towards the latter part of the journey starvation stared them in the face. One son two years old died on the Green river cut-off, and was left in a grave beside the river. The father stopped the first winter on the Tualatin plains, and in the spring of 1846 moved to Howell's Prairie, and later to Santiam. In 1848 he took up a claim at Peterson Butte, twelve miles southeast of Albany. He was a natural mechanic, and applied his ability to the construction of a home more comfortable than that of many less skilled in the art of construction, and around him established a large stock-raising enterprise, probably the most successful in his vicinity. He was influential as a politician, and was a member of the First Territorial Legislature, which convened at Oregon City. His children followed his example and took up farms of their own, many of them settling around him as neighbors, often visiting the old home, with its memories of struggle and adversity. The wife died in 1861, and the husband in 1864, both firm believers in the tenets of the Methodist Episcopal church. Asa, the oldest of their children, died in Lebanon, Ore.; William died in Albany; Marshall, a veteran of the Rogue River war, lives in eastern Oregon; Henry lives at Plainview; Granville died on the plains; Lydia, the wife of Mr. Parish, died in Linn county; Sarah is the deceased wife of Mr. Brooks of The Dalles; Laura, now Mrs. Ketcham, lives in Pomeroy, Wash.; Martha, now Mrs. Barnes; and Eliza, now Mrs. Walker of Athena, Ore.

Mrs. Barnes celebrated her ninth birthday on the plains, and after reaching Oregon lived with her parents, attending irregularly the early public schools. She learned to speak the language of the Chinook Indians, and thus was called to maintain amicable relations with these untutored neighbors. Her marriage at Peterson Butte, December 24, 1862, was one of the notable events of the neighborhood, her husband, Charles Barnes, being well and favorably known as a successful stockman. Mr. Barnes was left an orphan in his native state of New York when a boy of seventeen, and his life was uneventful until the opportunity came to cross the plains in an ox-train in 1853. He worked his way to the coast driving oxen and loose stock, and, arriving at his destination, found employment in southern Oregon and California, both as a farmer and miner. Laden with more than the ordinary returns from the mines, he came to the Willamette Valley and was married, afterward purchasing a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which he farmed five years. He added materially to his possessions, in time owning four hundred acres near Plainview. He was always an enthusiast on the subject of fine stock, and his land was invariably devoted to its raising, little attention being paid to general farming. After renting out his farm he devoted some time to driving horses over the mountains to California, and on his return located in Albany, where he engaged exclusively in the stock business. He had many fine horses and secured high prices for them, being an excellent judge of thoroughbreds, and dealing only in the best. Mr. Barnes accumulated a comfortable fortune, and at the time of his death, December 9, 1885, at the age of forty-eight, left his wife and children in good circumstances.

At 238 East Fifth street Mrs. Barnes has a new and commodious home, where is exercised unstinted hospitality, and where her friends delight to gather. She is the owner of the four-hundred-acre farm in this county, with the exception of the town site of Plainview, and she also owns another farm of one hundred and sixty acres in the same neighborhood. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, of whom but one attained maturity, Loella, now Mrs. LaForest. In political preference, Mrs. Barnes is a Republican.

JOHN W. WRITSMAN. To be the possessor of twelve hundred acres of land in one body in one of the most fertile parts of Benton county must needs carry with it a sense of security and satisfaction which the most independent might envy. Such is the good fortune of John W. Writsman, whose industry and good management has enabled him to purchase all but the six hundred and forty acres inherited from his father. That he is an excellent agriculturist, in touch with modern and scientific methods utilized in older and more stable farming communities, is apparent to all who visit him in the midst of his activity, and note his commodious residence, convenient and modern barns, and general up-to-date improvements. This farm is located two and a half miles from Wells Station, and is devoted principally to stock-raising, sheep, goats and cattle bringing a large yearly revenue.

The fifth of the seven children of Francis and Lucinda (Office) Writsman, John W. was born December 29, 1840, in Andrew county, Mo., and in 1847, when seven years of age, he crossed the plains with his parents. The father took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, erected a small log cabin for the temporary accommodation of his family, and proceeded to clear his land and put in the seed. This small cabin is still standing, and, with its infinite reminders of the peril, deprivation and loneliness of the pioneer days, is a prized possession of its owner. In those times neighbors were few and far between, provisions were often scarce, and toil from early morning until sunset precluded much of the joy or recreation of life. Francis Writsman succeeded well in his adopted state, and at his death in 1877, at the age of seventy-six years, left a large and valuable property to his heirs. The wife who shared his uphill road to prosperity survived him until 1901, being then ninety years old. Mary J., the oldest daughter in the family, is the wife of James Horn, of Grant county; Julia is the wife of Joseph Chamberlain; Susan is the widow of Mr. Perrin; Caroline is the deceased wife of Mr. Williams; John W. was the next born; Josephine is the wife of J. H. Parsons, and James lives in Los Angeles.

John W. Writsman availed himself of such educational chances as were possible in his youth, and is today a well informed and very progressive man. He bears an honored name in the community, and a continuation of his present success is the wish of all who are privileged to know him.
