ALFRED WILSON. Few men are more familiar with western history than Alfred Wilson. What to most of the present generation is a matter of reading is to him a matter of memory. He has been a participant in many of the advances connected with early travel over the plains and with the settlement of the west, and is thus very familiar with life upon the great stretches of country that lie between the Mississippi valley and the ocean. He served in the Mexican war, and is among the few survivors to-day of that struggle. He bore his part in the work of improvement and development as the tide of emigration steadily flowed westward, and to-day he is one of the respected, honored and successful agriculturists of Yamhill county, where he owns a valuable tract of land of thirteen hundred and sixty acres.

Alfred Wilson was born in Tennessee, April 2, 1826, and two years later his parents removed to Howard county, Mo., where he was reared upon a farm. There he became acquainted with Kit Carson and there sprung up between them a friendship which existed until the death of the latter. In 1846, with the noted explorer, hunter and guide, he went to the Rocky Mountains on horseback, starting from Fort Leavenworth. He made this trip in the hope of benefiting his health, and afterward he traveled with Kit Carson, piloting people across the country. Often he slept with Mr. Carson under the same blanket and shared with him in all the experiences, encounters and hardships which went to make up the life history of that famous man. Mr. Wilson has killed many a bear with his hunting knife, thus coming into close contact with the animals. With Mr. Carson he acted as pilot to Stevenson, a trader who went from St. Louis to New Mexico. Mr. Wilson was engaged to drive a six-mule team across the plains, starting from Mann's Fort on the Arkansas river. After being out five days they were attacked by the Indians, and at that time Mr. Wilson killed his first red man, a Comanche. He narrowly escaped death, for five arrows penetrated his clothing. Five days later there was another attack by the Indians, but day after day some progress was made, until finally the party reached the last mountain, when he left the train and returned.

In 1848 Mr. Wilson enlisted for service in the Mexican war as a teamster, and after reaching the land of the Montezumas he enlisted as a scout in advance of the army, or, as they were called, a ranger. He was at the battle and in the siege of Santa Cruz, Mexico, where the troops surrounded the town, and for six days they subsisted upon one meal a day. Mr. Wilson was one of those chosen to throw bombs into the town, and did his full share in winning American victories there. After the close of the Mexican war he returned northward and several times crossed the plains, making a trip in 1849 and another in 1850. In the latter year he was captain of a company that came to Oregon with an ox-team, journeying from Fort Hall westward. He and his brother also came along to Oregon and on the trip killed three Indians. They proceeded to the vicinity of McMinnville, and Mr. Wilson put in a crop for Dr. Sutton, operating the latter's land on shares for a year.

In the summer of 1851 he secured a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres where Riley Fendall now resides. In the fall of that year he was crippled while in the woods by a man hitting him back of the knee with an ax. The injury proved so serious that for eighteen months he was unable to engage in any labor. About that time news came that emigrants crossing the plains were in a starving condition, and Mr. Wilson then busied himself in taking up a collection wherewith to secure provisions to take to the travelers. He raised nearly $800 for that purpose, and it may well be supposed that he was hailed with gratitude as a benefactor to those who were suffering great hardships for lack of food as they journeyed westward. At another time Mr. Wilson suffered a second accident, having a leg broken by the falling of his horse when near McMinnville. However, his life altogether has been a prosperous one and has been filled with many incidents which have made his history eventful, and left to him many pleasant memories. In 1852 he secured a donation claim where he is now living, becoming the owner of three hundred and twenty acres in this way. He has made all of the improvements upon the property, and substantial buildings now stand as monuments to his enterprise, while well tilled fields indicate his careful supervision. As the years have passed he has added to his property until he now has thirteen hundred and sixty acres of land in one body. He is largely engaged in raising horses upon his ranch, and has some very fine animals which bring a good price in the markets.

Mr. Wilson has been twice married. In 1854 he wedded Miss Mary Sailing, and unto them were born ten children, eight of whom are now living: Melissa, wife of Ira Stephens; Lovina, wife of John Lady; Minnie, wife of Leander Lady; Lilly, wife of George Ball; Meluda, wife of James Le Masters; Lucinda, wife of William Bridwell; Edward Nazzard; and Col. Harley Murphy Wilson. Mrs. Wilson died in 1890, and in 1894 Mr. Wilson was again married, his second union being with Miss Rebecca Bryan. In his political views he is a Republican, having supported the party since its organization. His life history, if written in detail, would furnish more thrilling chapters than are usually found upon the pages of fiction. He knows what it is to endure hardships, incident to a journey across the plains before the advent of railroads. He also knows what it is to fear the skulking foe and to meet him in battle in the methods of warfare employed by the red men. He has also been a participant in his nation's battles, and he has likewise performed the no less important work of reclaiming a wild district for the purposes of civilization, that nature may yield of its rich resources for the support of men.

JAMES P. WILSON. Not far from Wells Station is the two-hundred-acre farm of James P. Wilson, a man who stands high in the estimation of his fellow-men, and who has materially advanced farming interests in this county. Born in Kentucky, near the Virginia line, September 15, 1823, he was seven years of age when his parents took him to Vermilion county, Ill., where he helped to improve a crude farm, and worked hard from morning until night. At the age of fourteen, in 1837, he accompanied an older brother to Iowa, and near Keokuk, took up government land in the wilderness. The land was wild and partially timbered, and the desolation was increased by the absence of other settlers, few having as yet arrived to assist in the development of a very promising stretch of country.

The Wilson boys succeeded in Iowa, and James P. took unto himself a wife who was Theresa Kilgore, an interesting girl living in the neighborhood. Of this union one child was born—a son, named Albert. His wife dying, Mr. Wilson later married Mrs. Lucy Rowe, who bore him three children—Rebecca, Robert and Edward W. Robert still lives on the home place, with his family, consisting of his wife, who was Miss Lillie Dixon, and their three interesting children, Clement, Ray and Vera. By her first marriage Mrs. Wilson had one son, Ira Rowe, who is still living.

With his wife Mr. Wilson crossed the plains to California with ox-teams in 1852, and after five months of comparatively pleasant association with other home and fortune seekers arrived in Sacramento City, where he followed gardening for a couple of years. He then took up three hundred and twenty acres of land in Sacramento valley, remained thereon until 1867, and then came to Benton county, Ore. After living on a farm near Philomath for a couple of years he bought a farm near the Mountain View schoolhouse, consisting of three hundred and sixty acres, and upon which he made his home for some years. He then bought his present farm near Wells Station, where he is engaging in general farming and stock-raising. Ever since his first ambitious voting days he has been a stanch defender of the Democratic party, and in his present neighborhood has served as school director and road supervisor. He is a member of the Evangelical Church, and in his daily life conveys the impression of moral strength and uprightness attributed to the followers of that denomination. A successful farmer and genial man, Mr. Wilson commands the respect and good will of all who know him.

WILLIAM CREES. Occupying a position of prominence among the respected and highly esteemed citizens of Corvallis is the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this sketch. A man of progressive enterprise and much force of character, possessing excellent judgment and good business ability, Mr. Crees has met with undoubted success both in his agricultural labors and in his investments, by judicious toil and wise economy accumulating a handsome property. For a quarter of a century or more, he lived and labored on the farm which he still owns, but of more recent years he has rented his homestead property, and he and his good wife are living at ease in their comfortable home in the city of Corvallis.

Of excellent German ancestry, Mr. Crees was born January 2, 1836, in Allegheny county, Pa., about fourteen miles below Pittsburg, a son of John Crees, Jr. His grandfather, John Crees, Sr., was born and educated in Germany. Leaving the fatherland when a boy of sixteen years, he came alone to New York city. He remained in New York state a few years, serving an apprenticeship at the millwright's trade, then purchased a mill in Berks county, Pa., where he lived for awhile. Disposing of his property there he removed, in 1802, to Allegheny county, crossing the river at Fort Pitt on a ferry boat, and from that time until his death, at an advanced age, was profitably engaged in general farming. He became an extensive landholder, and bequeathed to each of his children, five sons and one daughter, a farm.

John Crees, Jr., was born in 1785 in Penn's Valley, Berks county, Pa., but spent the larger part of his life in Allegheny county, being engaged in agricultural pursuits. He married Mary Gunsollis, who was born in Allegheny county, a daughter of Samuel Gunsollis, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and a prosperous farmer, who spent his declining years in Mercer county, Pa. Of the eleven children born of their union, one son and three daughters survive, William, being the only one residing in the extreme western part of the Union.

Gleaning his early education in the district schools of his native place, and working hard on the farm from boyhood, William Crees remained on the parental homestead until thirty-five years old, from the age of sixteen years having sole management of the farm of two hundred acres. Coming to the Willamette Valley in 1871, he located in Benton county, buying a farm of two hundred and twenty acres, about one and one-half miles northwest of Corvallis. This he has improved, and brought to a very high state of cultivation, until it is now known as one of the most desirable and attractive estates in the county. For many years he made a specialty of butter-making, being a leader in that industry, and of cutting hay for market, raising large quantities of the latter. He used modern machinery in manufacturing butter, in 1873 introducing into the state the first endless chain dog-power for churning, later bringing in the Cooley automatic creamer, in which the cream is raised while immersed in water, thus preventing contamination from anything in the atmosphere. Mrs. Crees proved herself an able coadjutor by formulating a method of her own for mixing and working the butter, and ere long had won for herself an enviable reputation as a butter-maker, the president of the Oregon Agricultural College, B. L. Arnold, when he tested it, pronouncing it the best country butter he had ever seen. Making ninety pounds of butter a week, Mr. Crees sold it at his own price, thus ruling the market. He subsequently sold his milk, supplying Corvallis. In addition to dairying, and raising hay, he made fruit-raising somewhat a specialty, having excellent orchards on his farm. The past few years he has rented his farm and now lives, as before mentioned, in the city.

Mr. Crees married first, Miss Catherine Trimmer, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died in that state, leaving five children, namely: Harris W., a farmer in Washington; Mrs. Sarah Ellen Mays, of Elk City, Ore.; Mrs. Clarissa Irene Young, of Oregon City; Mrs. Celesta J. Scrafford, of Corvallis; and Mrs. Kate C. Gragg, of Corvallis. He married for his second wife, Sarah J. Brooks, of Pennsylvania, who came to Oregon with Mr. Crees, but only lived two months after reaching this place. His third marriage took place in Allegheny, Pa., April 10, 1873, with Mrs. Louisa (Blair) Rishaberger, daughter of Frederick and Augusta (Owelder) Blair, both of whom were born in Germany, and died in Pittsburg, Pa. Mrs. Crees' first husband, John Rishaberger, a native of Pennsylvania, was in business for many years in Allegheny City, but on account of ill health moved to a farm in Alliance, Ohio, where his death occurred six months later. To Mr. and Mrs. Crees has been born one child, Gussie B., now the wife of M. E. Grausbeck, of Portland, Ore.

Mr. Crees takes an active interest in public affairs, and is now serving his second term as a member of the city council. He was formerly a Republican in his political affiliations, voting for Abraham Lincoln in 1860 and 1864, but is now a Prohibitionist, and a member of the State Temperance Alliance, and Mrs. Crees belongs to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

ARTHUR C. MILLER. Among the men who have quickly risen to a financial prominence is Arthur C. Miller, who has been numbered as a citizen of Oregon only since 1879, through industry, perseverance and business judgment having acquired a handsome fortune since that date. In addition to his farming interests, which may well be considered to take considerable of his time, as he now has one thousand acres in his home place, he is active in several business enterprises, being part owner of a store at King's Valley, and since 1902 having a one-third interest in a $10,000 mercantile establishment at Airlie, Polk county.

Arthur C. Miller was born in Chickasaw county, Iowa, September 10, 1857, and in 1865 his parents returned to their native place of Schuyler county, N. Y., and he remained with them there until his twenty-first birthday. After working for a short time on a farm he decided to try his fortunes in the west and in 1879 he came to Oregon, and at once became employed in farming in King's valley. After four years he rented land and became independent in his work, this proving so successful that in a few years he was enabled to purchase a farm of eighty-six acres, out of which has grown his present affluence. He has also three hundred and twenty acres of timber land, and now holds a contract to take out three million feet of lumber. Among his interests is the raising of Percheron horses. In 1892 he bought out the Chambers Brothers, a mercantile establishment in King's Valley, and after two years in which he conducted the business alone he took in, as a partner, W. S. Alcorn. Since 1892 he has served as postmaster.

In 1883 Mr. Miller married Miss Hettie Allen, and they are now the parents of three children, Curtis, Paul and Algy. In his political convictions Mr. Miller casts his vote with the Republican party.

JAMES LYMAN LOMBARD. In his younger days James L. Lombard learned three distinct trades, to any one of which he might be applying himself at the present time with reasonable assurance of laying by a little each year. Instead, his ambition has led him into broader channels, and he is today one of the most successful and prosperous contractors in the city of Eugene. With his advancement in the business world have come the social and other prerogatives of wealth, including one of the fine homes of the city, and distinction and prominence in the fraternal organizations of the county. Around him on all sides are evidences of his participation in the upbuilding of the city, for as a contracting plasterer he has done the work on Science Hall, one of the university buildings, Chrisman, McClung, Eugene Loan and Savings bank, and Gross Hotel buildings, besides scores of the largest and finest residences in the city and surrounding country. His own residence at 227 West Eighth street is a model of comfort and modern elegance, and is besides the center of an unstinted and genial hospitality. At one time Mr. Lombard owned two hundred and forty acres of land seven miles south of the city, on fifteen of which he raised large quantities of fruit, and derived a substantial income from its shipment. Later, the stress of business necessitated the sale of the fruit ranch, but the little property contributed greatly to his health and enjoyment, and its cultivation is recalled as one of the most congenial and satisfactory efforts of his life.

Patriot sires and model dames were included in the early family of which Mr. Lombard is a member, and his maternal great-grandfather Hobbs slept on his knapsack for a pillow upon many of the battlefields of the Revolutionary war. His paternal great-grandfather made his home for some time at Cape Cod, where Cornelius Lombard, the paternal grandfather, was born. Cornelius Lombard settled at Bangor, Me., at a very early day, drawn there by the opportunities for lumbering, which at that time were not exceeded in any part of the United States. His son, James A. Lombard, the father of James L., was born at Bradford, near Bangor, and not only followed his father's example as a lumberman, but branched out into general building and contracting in Boston, Mass., removing at a later day to Fall River, the same state, where he died at the comparatively early age of fifty-one years. He married Martha Hobbs, who was born in Bradford, Me., her father and grandfather both being natives of the northern state. Mrs. Lombard survives her husband, and is making her home in Otter Tail county, Minn.

The eldest of the three children living in his father's family, James L. Lombard was born in Bradford, Me., October 15, 1858, and was educated principally in the public schools of Boston, finishing at the high school of Fall River. At the age of sixteen he began work which eventually led up to his present trade of a plasterer. In 1879 he located in Sioux City, Iowa, and learned the stone mason's trade, at which he worked for about nine years, in connection with contract plastering. In 1888 he came west to Eugene, Ore., stepping at once into a fair business, and advancing as his ability and business sagacity began to be appreciated. With him to the west came the wife whom he had married in Battle Creek, Iowa, and who was formerly Sarah E. Bowser, a native of Argyle, Wis. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lombard, Naomi I., James B., Richard S., Grace, Sarah, Belle, Harry, Ruth and Christine, and all make their home with their parents. Mrs. Lombard died in October, 1897.

Politically Mr. Lombard is devoted to Republican principles, but has never actively participated in the affairs of his party. He is a member of the Commercial Club, and active in promoting social and other undertakings in the city. While in Danbury, Iowa, he became a member of the Danbury Masonic Lodge, and is now identified with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M., Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, K. T.; the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; the Foresters; Eagles; Woodmen of the World; and Modern Woodmen of America. Mr. Lombard is one of the progressive and enthusiastic men who are bound to inspire others with a keen relish of life, and who look instinctively on the bright side of things. Success carries with him because it enjoys his company, and because it feels that it has been fairly won, and is estimated at its correct valuation.

SOLOMON KING. A history of the substantial men of Benton county were sadly incomplete without due mention of Solomon King, who has been a resident of Oregon since his twelfth year, and who has in the meantime been identified with its business, political and agricultural upbuilding. Distinguishing features have characterized the western career of this honored citizen, chief among which is the fact that he has served as sheriff of Benton county for a longer time than has any other man who has held the office. Born in Madison county, Ohio, near Columbus, February 26, 1833, he is a son of Naham King, who was born in New York state, and there married Serepta Norton.

Naham King was a man of resource, and withal was an interesting personality, achieving success in the greater part of his undertakings. Soon after his marriage he removed with horse teams from New York state to Ohio, where he settled on a farm, and from where he enlisted in the war of 1812. At a later period he moved from Madison to Franklin county, Ohio, and from there to Carroll county, Mo., in 1841. His farm was a fertile one, well improved and profitable, and he made money through the sale of general farm commodities. Eight children were born into his family, and these were educated to the best of his ability, and in time some of them married and had homes of their own. There was a strong community of interest existing between the various members of this large family, and all relied upon the superior judgment of Naham King, whose strength of character and success inspired confidence. It was not surprising therefore that when the father made up his mind to cross the plains all of the children should accompany him, share in his enthusiasm, and aid him by every means in their power. In 1845 the family band started out as well equipped as any which undertook the hazardous venture, having five wagons with from three to five yoke of oxen each, and thirty-five head of fine Durham cattle. The entire party consisted of sixty-five wagons, under command of Captain Tevalt and Stephen Meeks, and they were more than six months on the way. From Boise City they went by what was known as the Meeks cut-off, and in consequence lost their way and had to retrace their steps a long way. This unnecessary delay entailed severe hardship in more ways than one, for they ran short of provisions, and wearied their cattle exceedingly. From The Dalles the party came down to the Cascade Falls on a raft, and here transpired the first real sorrow in the family, for John King, the oldest son in the family, together with his wife and two children, died on this trip down the Columbia on a raft of pine logs. The rest of the band came from the falls to Linton by boat, the cattle being driven over the trail, and on to Washington county. All wintered on Gale creek, near Forest Grove, and in the spring of 1846 Naham King went on a tour of investigation, finally settling in the valley in Benton county which has ever since borne his name, and of which he was the first settler. This valley is six miles long and from a mile to a mile and a half wide, and is all open and fertile land, and here Mr. King took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres, while his son-in-law, Lucius Norton, took up a similar amount, and another son-in-law, Rowland Chambers, took up the same amount. Two of the sons later took up six hundred and forty acres each, and Stephen, one of the sons, and Mr. Chambers, put up a grist mill.

In the spring of 1849 Mr. King moved to Portland for a year, and then settled on a claim of six hundred and forty acres near Wren's Station, where he lived until his death in 1857, at the age of seventy-three years. He became prominent in political and other affairs, and helped to elect the first senator to congress. His wife, who survived him until 1863, dying at the age of seventy, was the mother of fourteen children. Of these, John died coming down the Columbia; Stephen, who helped to erect the grist mill and served throughout the Cayuse war, died in November, 1854; Isaac died in the fall of 1866; Amos N. died in Portland in 1902, having been interested for many years in a tannery, and also in building and contracting; Solomon; Rhoda married Eli Summers and lives in Heppner, Ore.; Lydia married John Williams of Portland; Abigail married B. Fuller, now deceased; Eliza married Rowland Chambers; and Hope married Lucian Norton. The other children died young.

Twelve years old when his father and the rest of the family crossed the plains, Solomon made himself useful during the trip by driving his brother-in-law's ox-team for more than half the way, and in other ways contributed to the comfort of the homeseekers as only a young, strong and enthusiastic boy is capable of doing. When he first arrived in King's valley there was no sign of a schoolhouse, and when plans were finally made for the education of the rising generation he helped to hew the logs and put in the slab benches. He himself imbibed some knowledge at this primitive educational center, but for the greater part was dependent on his own resources for his practical all-around education. He worked hard to improve the land and place it on a paying basis, and when twenty-one years of age had saved enough money, and had bright enough prospects to justify him in taking a wife in the person of Maria King. Thereafter he assumed the management of his father's farm until 1872, and then moved to Corvallis, where he engaged in the livery business for fourteen years. While there he became greatly interested in politics, and was elected sheriff of Benton county on the Republican ticket in 1876, being successively re-elected five times, and serving in all ten years, the longest time any incumbent has held that office.

His term as sheriff expiring, Mr. King soon after bought a farm near where the college is now located, and lived thereon until 1891. He then came to his present farm one and a half miles from Corvallis, where he has prospered exceedingly, and added to his original purchase. Until recently he owned a thousand acres of land, but the greater part of this has been divided among his children. His money has been made with Short-horn cattle and general farming, and he has also conducted a very successful dairy business for several years. Of the six children born to himself and wife, Annie is the deceased wife of W. B. Kinder, the latter living near Lebanon; Eli married Miss Tomkins and lives on the home farm; William G. married Alice Bird and runs a sawmill at Burns, Ore.; Abraham married C. Bussey and lives near Corvallis; and Scott is with his father. Mr. King is well known fraternally, and is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Of unquestioned integrity, great common sense in all of his dealings, and of indefatigable energy, Mr. King commands the respect and good will of all who know him, and is richly deserving of the financial success which has come his way.

THOMAS J. PHILPOTT. On an average sized farm in middle Missouri William J. Philpott farmed for many years, having settled there after removing from his native state of Virginia, where he was born February 22, 1822. When a young man he married Sarah Darby, and with her crossed the plains to Oregon in 1851, his outfit consisting of four yoke of oxen, plenty of clothing and provisions, and several milch cows. On the way he was attacked by Indians, some of his cattle were stolen, and one of his party was killed. Otherwise his trip to the west was uneventful, and he arrived at his destination in this county with sufficient means to start life under favorable conditions. He took up a claim two miles north of Holley, where he farmed for many years, and where his son, Thomas J., was born June 14, 1854. The elder Mr. Philpott finally retired from active life, and his death occurred in Oakville in December, 1900.

Reared on his father's farm, and educated in the public schools, Thomas J. Philpott developed habits of thrift and industry, and considerable sagacity as a business manager. He remained at home until twenty-eight years of age, and then moved to the A. R. Breeden donation claim, of which he now owns two hundred and sixty-six acres, under a high state of cultivation. He is engaged principally in stock-raising, and upon his fertile meadows graze Short-horns, Durhams, Cotswold and Merino sheep, and fine horses. He understands and likes stock, and makes it a rule to have only the best on his farm. His general improvements are in accord with modern ideas of farming and stock-rearing, his home is comfortable and commodious, and he is to be congratulated upon the many evidences of good management to be found upon his paying and valuable farm.

Through his marriage, in 1882, with Sarah R. Rice, a native of Linn county, six children have been born into the family of Mr. Philpott: Tracy, Cleveland, Justin, Vera, Franklin and Landis. As a Democrat Mr. Philpott has been quite active in the county, although he has never worked for office, holding with credit, however, those of school director and road supervisor. He is a member of the Grange at Halsey, has been treasurer of the same for some time, and in his religious inclinations is identified with the Christian Church. Mr. Philpott is a scientific and successful farmer and stock-raiser, broad minded and liberal promoter of the general well being of his neighborhood, and a man in whom his friends and associates place the most implicit confidence.

WILLIAM PRESTON. The harness, saddlery, paints and oils establishment of Preston & Hales has a reputation in keeping with the high character of the men directing its management. William Preston, the senior member of the firm, who is a Mason of high degree, and one of the prominent men of Eugene, is a practical harness-maker, having fortified himself with the trade when he first started to make his own living. His life has practically been spent in handling leather goods, and no better judge of fine workmanship is known in the state. The present headquarters of the firm are in the building which was erected in 1902, and constructed with particular reference to the manufacture of harness and saddles, and to the handling of a complete assortment of paints, oils, and glass. The ground dimensions are 30x114 feet, and two floors are occupied by the company, which caters to a large trade by no means local in extent.

Born in Picton, Prince Edward county, Ontario, Canada, in 1844. Mr. Preston is the youngest of the five children born to his parents, George and Isabella (Beatty) Preston, farmers by occupation, and both of whom died in Ontario. George Preston came from Ireland as a young man, and after living for a short time in New York City proceeded to Ontario, with his wife, locating on a farm. William remained at home until about twenty years old, in the meantime, at the age of seventeen, serving an apprenticeship to a harnessmaker in Picton. In the fall of 1864 he went to Oswego, N. Y., and worked at his trade, and in 1868 invested his earnings in transportation to California by way of Panama. At Calusa, Cal., he worked at his trade for three years, and in April, 1871, made his way to Oregon, and worked as a journeyman for a couple of years. Feeling amply qualified to conduct an independent harness business he bought out Sam Ashley's harness shop on East Ninth street, but later sold out and bought a harness shop in partnership with L. T. Bragg on Willamette street, north of where he is located at present. A year later he bought his partner's interest and continued alone for five years, at the end of that time taking C. H. Hales into the business under the firm name of Preston & Hales.

In Eugene Mr. Preston married for his first wife, Iola Bristow, daughter of W. W. Bristow, one of the pioneers of Oregon. Mrs. Preston, who was born in Lane county, died not long after her marriage, leaving a daughter, Etta V., now the wife of Emerson L. Fisher of Eugene. For a second wife Mr. Preston married Miss Emma C. Hunsacker, also born in Lane county, and daughter of Daniel Hunsacker, a retired pioneer of the state living in Eugene. Three children have been born of this second marriage, Vera, who died in infancy, and Donald and Guerold are living. Mr. Preston's activities have extended to political life, and he has always maintained the interests of the Republican party. For six years he served as councilman of Eugene, and has been a member of the school board for three years. He is prominent fraternally, and is a member and past master of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; Eugene Chapter No. 11, Royal Arch Masons; Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, of which he is past eminent commander; and ex-officer of the Grand Commandery of Oregon; also a member of the Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is a man of broad sympathies, intense public spiritedness, and may be counted on to further financially and otherwise, all efforts for the general improvement of the city.

MRS. SAMANTHA ANN HUDDLESTON. The early days of territorial development and the birth and growth of a statehood is often recalled to the present generation by Mrs. S. A. Huddleston, one of the old members of the society of Lane county, her home having been in the vicinity of Eugene since 1847. She came as a child to the west, settling here when the primitive conditions which prevailed entailed the greatest hardships and privations upon the pioneers, and with but a vague promise of the future which awaited the country to give them courage and cheer amidst their efforts. Passing years have brought the changes which required great faith to foresee, and her home is now among the affluent ones of the state of Oregon as it exists today.

There is more than a passing interest attached to those sturdy products of the middle west and a deep and absorbing pleasure in going over the events of their lives. Mrs. Huddleston was in maidenhood Samantha Ann Davis, the daughter of Benjamin Davis, who was a native of Ohio. He was a tailor by trade, and when a young man he removed to Plymouth, Ind., and in 1847 outfitted with ox-teams and wagons and prepared to bring his family into the west. The trip occupied six months and was full of the dangers and hardships incident to the life of the early travelers. They came by the southern route, the only firearm which the father had being an old flintlock gun, and though they arrived safely in Oregon, September, 1847, two years later it was impossible to come by that passage. With his wife and six children he located on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres two miles from the present site of Eugene, though at that time there was no city in the vicinity and the subject of this sketch rode on horseback in this region when the grass grew to the pony's back. Their first year in the west was one of untold hardships, for they were penniless, with the exception of seventy-five cents which the father had. They built a log house for a temporary shelter and though wheat sold at $5 per bushel, they lived on boiled wheat, served without salt or milk. The first soda was made from ashes, and the first soap from balsam drawn by the mother from the fir trees and made with lye, and vinegar was produced from the Oregon grape until they began to use the crab-apple. Salt-rising bread was another of their homely products. The first dress which Mrs. Huddleston had made for her in her western home was from an old wagon cover, washed, and dyed with alder bark, and the first dress purchased being English calico and costing seventy-five cents a yard. Wild animals of all kinds roamed the country, and made hunting a common and much-enjoyed sport.

As the finances of Mr. Davis increased, the second year in Oregon finding him among the wheat-growers, which brought them an income, he added a frame addition to his log house, the first of the kind in Lane county, and the frame house which finally took its place was also the first of its kind. This latter is still standing, a landmark of those early times. All the provisions of the family were brought from Vancouver, Wash., at that time their nearest mercantile point. Mr. Davis became a successful man in the country, accumulating property which he proceeded to improve, and taking a strong and active interest in all that concerned the welfare of the growing state. He had the confidence and esteem of all his fellow-citizens, who respected him for the many sterling qualities which distinguished his character and made him valuable as a member of their community. His death occurred upon his claim in 1856, at the age of forty-nine years. He had married Catherine Slater, a native of Pennsylvania, whose father died in Ohio, at the advanced age of one hundred and two years. The mother made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Huddleston, until her death at the age of eighty-seven years, in 1897. Besides Mrs. Huddleston, she was the mother of the following children: Lemuel E., located in Yaquina Bay, Ore.; Iantha Jane, who became the wife of F. Castleman, and died in Portland; Lycurgus, located on a part of the old claim; William Lewis, in Summit, Ore.; Caroline, who became the wife of Edward Davis and died in California; and Melancthon M., in the steam-boat business at Yaquina.

Mrs. Huddleston was educated in a subscription school in Yamhill county in her girlhood, her marriage to James Huddleston occurring in Lane county, in 1853. Mr. Huddleston was born in West Virginia and was left an orphan at a very early age, after which he made his home with an uncle, who resided on a farm. When about twenty-three years old, in 1851, he crossed the plains with ox-teams and the next spring engaged in placer mining in California. After a short time he returned to the Willamette valley, and engaged in the mercantile business in Eugene in partnership with A. P. Ankeney, this store being the first in Lane county. The building utilized for the purpose was a shed, or "lean-to," belonging to the house of E. Skinner. Later they erected a store building at the point where the bridge now enters the city and still later built at the corner of Ninth and Oak streets a frame structure which was considered at that time to be exceedingly large. For a time the two men were connected in this business, and then Mr. Huddleston became sole proprietor. When Mr. Huddleston first came to Eugene he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres which is now a part of the land upon which the city is situated, only one hundred and sixty acres being left in the estate. He made his home upon this farm, engaging in agricultural pursuits in connection with his mercantile interests until he disposed of the latter in 1856 and devoted his energies to the improvement and cultivation of his farm. His death occurred November 27, 1891. Politically he was a Democrat and had served his party for one term as county treasurer. Fraternally he was an Odd Fellow and a member of the Encampment.

Since her husband's death Mrs. Huddleston has laid out an addition to the city of Eugene, in the spring of 1903 apportioning thirty acres on the west side to city lots. She has one son, Henry C. Huddleston, a native of Eugene, who was formerly in business here, but now combines his interests with those of his mother. He is, like his father, of Democratic convictions.

JOHN C. CHURCH. Long associated with the commercial activity of Eugene, Lane county, John C. Church is not forgotten in business circles, though several years have passed since he came to his death through a fall from the top of the electric light building. Not only an important factor in the business world, Mr. Church also stood high as a man of integrity and earnestness of purpose, the esteem given to an honorable and upright citizen being his throughout his residence in Eugene. Previous to his removal to the west he was located in various states of the middle west, where he served as a soldier in the Civil war.

Mr. Church was born in Genesee county, N. Y., June 22, 1834, and was left an orphan at a very early age. His father having been a farmer, he was more or less trained in agricultural pursuits, and especially so in those frugal and industrious habits which foretell success in life. Coming toward the west, he first located in Tiffin, Seneca county, Ohio, where he remained until 1852, when he crossed the plains to California and engaged in mining for the ensuing six years. Satisfied with his returns, he went back to Ohio, traveling by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and after a brief period in that state he removed to Iowa, where he engaged in clerking in a mercantile establishment. At the breaking out of the Civil war he enlisted in the Second Iowa Regiment of cavalry and served for four years, during which time he became orderly sergeant of Company C, and was afterward promoted to the rank of second lieutenant. Soon after the close of the war he removed to Macon, Mo., where he engaged as a clerk in a hardware establishment, where he remained until 1872, when he came to Eugene, Ore. In connection with J. F. Robinson he established a hardware store, the firm name being Robinson & Church, and together they built up a large and lucrative business, which was successfully continued for many years. Disposing of his interests to Brown & Griffin, he engaged in the electric light business with Mr. Robinson, the concern being known as the Eugene Electric Light Company, of which Mr. Church became president. When the building was nearing completion Mr. Church came to his tragic death, the date being August 3, 1897.

In politics Mr. Church was a Republican, and was active in the work of establishing the principles of this party in his adopted city. For one term he served as county judge of Lane county, and was a member of the city council for two years. He was a member of J. W. Geary Post, G. A. R., and fraternally he was an Odd Fellow and a Mason of the Knights Templar degree.

The marriage of Mr. Church occurred in Macon, Mo., November 16, 1869, and united him with Adaline Greene. She was born in Richmond county, Ky., the youngest of seven children born to her parents, H. M. and Adeline (Campbell) Greene, both of whom also owed their nativity to the state of Kentucky. The father of the former came from Ireland and settled there, bringing with him the traits of an English, Scotch and Irish ancestry. Mrs. Church's father was a farmer, and became a resident of Macon county, Mo., where he died. All of the children of that family are now living, though the only one in Oregon is Mrs. Church, who was reared in Missouri and received her education in the public schools and Huntsville College. She has the following children: Lee W., chief engineer of the Lane County Electric Light Company; Earl H., a graduate of the University of Oregon, and served in the Philippine Islands under General Summers in the Second Oregon Regiment; Erminie E., and Curtis H. Since her husband's death Mrs. Church has made her home in Eugene, where she owns considerable property.

ROBERT CALLISON. In the neighborhood where he has grown old in the service of agriculture and general advancement, Robert Callison is universally associated with the wife who has traveled the uphill road with him, and whose economy, bravery and unflinching sympathy have never wandered or forsaken him. At present retired from active life, these pioneers of 1848, these Kentuckians so far from the surroundings of their birth and childhood, are one of the most delightful and interesting couples to be found in Lane county. The oldest married people in this part of Oregon, their minds are stored with valuable facts personally noted during their long residence here, and their wit in conversation might well be envied by the rising generation.

A hard struggle for existence characterized the youth of Mr. Callison, who was born in Adair county, Ky., June 5, 1818. His parents dying when he was a small boy, he started away from home to make his own living at the age of fifteen, his first work bringing him in $6 a month and board. In 1833 he made his way overland with teams to Illinois, accompanied by his uncle and family, and inspired in his journey by the fact that four brothers had preceded him to Illinois. He lived and worked with his uncle and brothers until his marriage, December 5, 1839, with Polly Bristow, who was born in Kentucky, October 28, 1820, her father, Elijah Bristow, having been born in the Old Dominion state in 1786. The Bristows emigrated to Illinois in 1827, and Elijah came overland to California in 1845, then to Oregon, his family following in 1848. All of the members took up claims in Lane county, and the father lived to be eighty-five, and the mother eighty-three years of age. A brother of Mrs. Callison taught the first school in Lane county. The family became identified with political, church and social advancement. Elijah Bristow was a soldier in the war of 1812. In his family were fifteen children, two besides Mrs. Callison being alive at the present time.

After his marriage Mr. Callison located on a farm in McDonough county, Ill., remaining there and prospering for nine years. His outfit for crossing the plains in 1848 consisted of a wagon with two yoke of oxen, and one of cows to furnish milk during the journey. Fearlessly they joined the band of fifty wagons which ventured forth into the practically unknown, and, overcome with weariness each night, pitched their tent only to face the incessant march of the following day. It is not remembered that anything out of the ordinary happened on this mission to the west, and at the end of seven months the various members of the cavalcade dispersed to their respective claims, Mr. and Mrs. Callison coming directly to Lane county, and settling on a claim of a section of land on what is now known as Pleasant Hill. Several years later they bought their present farm of six hundred and forty acres, comprising the W. W. Bristow donation claim, made the extensive improvements which have increased its value from year to year, and which now forms one of the most modern and productive properties in Lane county. As early settlers on their farm Mr. and Mrs. Callison had but two neighbors, and their long drives over the new country revealed few signs of activity, agricultural or otherwise. Long since they have deeded their large farm to their only son, Josiah T., and their daughter, Lucetta, widow of W. H. Baughman, their respective portions. This venerable couple have two granddaughters, ten grandsons and thirteen great grandchildren. Mr. and Mrs. Callison live on one hundred and twenty-five acres which they reserved for their home.

A large share of the influence of this worthy family is due to the uprightness of their lives, and to their participation in church and educational advancement. Mrs. Callison was thirteen and her husband fifteen years of age when they joined the Christian Church, and their allegiance has never wandered from the denomination thus early espoused. They, and the father of Mrs. Callison, were the chief promoters of the Christian Church on Pleasant Hill, and they are two of the three charter members of the church which have survived the changes of all these years. A Republican in politics, Mr. Callison cast his first vote for the first President Harrison, and though working at times for the recognition of his friends, he himself has never desired to hold office. Broad-minded, generous, practical and well abreast of the times in which he lives, Mr. Callison commands the best thought of his neighbors and friends, his life work placing him among the foremost of the noble band whose courage and nobility have accomplished the redemption of Oregon.

MRS. ROSALIA BAUSCH. Floriculture and women seem such a natural combination that one scarcely requires a practical demonstration of their ability in this direction. In no other country in the world have women given the subject such profound and serious consideration, or have so well succeeded in carrying out ambitious projects of catering to large and exacting trades, in direct competition with men of larger means and infinitely greater resources. The greatest opportunities of the kind are by no means confined to our sister state of California, for one has but to call attention to such successful florists as Mrs. Rosalia Bausch of Eugene, in substantiation of Oregon's claim of supremacy. Mrs. Bausch has by far the largest floral establishment in the town, and its conduct has been and still is characterized by shrewdness, tact, and good judgment.

Mrs. Bausch possesses the home-loving and practical traits of the typical women of her native land, Germany, where she was born at Wieselburg, on the Danube, in Bavaria, and where her father, Joseph Auman, was a well known blacksmith. The latter married Monica Kuchler. In the Fatherland eight children were born into his family, all of whom he brought to America in 1854, Mrs. Bausch being at that time thirteen years old. Settling in Manitowoc, Wis., Mr. Bausch worked at his trade until retiring from active life, his death occurring at the age of seventy-seven years. Prior to coming to America Mrs. Bausch had received a practical education in the Gymnasium at Regen, and no member of the family was more delighted than she when the family boarded the sailer Beta, at Bremen, and spent six weeks of storm and calm ere they landed at Baltimore, Md. Stopping at Pittsburg and Chicago on the way to Wisconsin, she completed her education in the latter city and grew into a graceful and attractive woman, making many friends among her schoolmates and members of the German colony. August 5, 1856, she was united in marriage with Peter Zimmer, a native of Dolheim, Luxemburg, Germany, and who was engaged in building and contracting in Manitowoc, Wis. Mr. Zimmer died in Dakota. His wife afterward went to St. Paul, Minn., and in 1876 came to San Francisco with friends.

Soon after her arrival in the west, in April, 1876, she was united in marriage with Peter Bausch, a native of Bayford, Luxemburg, Germany, who in his youth learned the shoemaker's trade in the neighborhood of his home. He was more than an ordinarily fine workman when he came to America in 1876, eighteen years of practical experience in the finest shops in Paris having fitted him for the most delicate and artistic work in his line. He settled first in Albany, Ore., and in the fall of the same year took up his residence in Eugene, where he engaged at his trade for two years before retiring from active life. His death, September 17, 1894, left a void in the hearts of many friends who had been attracted to him in the west, for he was a genial and kindly man, large of heart and gentle in his judgment of humanity at large. Politically he was a Democrat, and in religion was a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

In taking up the burden of life after the death of her second husband, Mrs. Bausch displayed a great deal of courage and determination, for she had little to depend on for immediate support, and had never qualified for earning her own living. In 1893 she started a florist and greenhouse enterprise, which from the first grew apace and encouraged her with more than expected returns. A natural lover of flowers, she studied the nature and peculiarities of the blooms which developed under her watchful care, growing more and more familiar with the many members of her interesting family. At present her greenhouse measures 16 x 40 feet, and in the summer time she has outside gardens of roses and other flowers. She supplies the largest trade in Eugene, and her collection includes many rare and fine specimens of the florist's art, including orchids of many varieties. A comfortable home is owned and occupied by Mrs. Bausch at 118 West Seventh street. With every thought for their ultimate welfare, she has reared three of her five children, all of whom were born of the first marriage. Of these, Mary is the wife of Frank Kading of Penn. N. Dak., while John and Frank are living in Eugene, the latter a master carpenter. Mrs. Bausch is a member of the Rebekahs and of the Catholic Church.

JOSEPH W. STEWART. In Lane county are to be found many thorough-going, keen-sighted business men who have achieved success in life through their own tact, sound judgment, and persistent determination. Prominent among this number is Joseph W. Stewart, of Springfield, who, in his long and prosperous career, has accumulated a sufficiency of this world's goods to enable him to pass his remaining years in ease, surrounded by not only the comforts but the luxuries of life. A man of honest worth, ever ready to support all enterprises conducive to the best interests of his town and county, he has gained in a marked degree the respect and confidence of his fellow-men, and is held in high esteem in the community. A son of the late Elias Stewart, he was born September 13, 1835, in Macoupin county, Ill. His grandfather, Brison Stewart, was born and reared in Virginia, but subsequently moved to Tennessee, thence to Illinois, and in 1839 settled in Missouri, where he passed the remainder of his years. He was a tiller of the soil, and as a pioneer assisted in breaking the land in three of the states above mentioned. He enlisted as a soldier in the closing years of the war of 1812, but was never called into active service.

The oldest of a family of eight children, six of whom grew to years of maturity, Joseph W. Stewart received his early education in the district schools of Missouri. Coming to Lane county in 1852, he assisted his father in the labors incidental to life in a new and uncivilized region, remaining at home until 1862. Going then to the mines of Boise, Idaho, he met with success in his search for the golden ore, returning home in 1863 with $1,200 in gold. For a few months thereafter he was employed as a clerk in a store at Eugene. On November 5, 1863, he moved to Springfield, Ore., where, in partnership with his brother, John Stewart, and Mier Rosenblatt, he embarked in business as a general merchant. In 1865 Mr. Stewart and his brother bought out the interest of the remaining partner of the firm and conducted a successful mercantile business until 1873, when the partnership was dissolved. Taking the store, Mr. Stewart continued its management alone until March 26, 1902, when he sold out to T. G. Chandler, and has since lived retired from active pursuits. Mr. Stewart has large property interests to look after, owning considerable real estate, a large part of which is in town lots. He has twenty-two acres in one body adjoining Eugene on the southwest, which he has named in honor of his father, the Elias Stewart addition, twenty acres of it being platted. He is also owner of three blocks on Cottage Hill, in Eugene, and in the city of Springfield has a fine residence, two store buildings, and other property, including twelve city lots. He manages his own real estate interests and conducts an extensive business besides in loaning money.

In 1864, near Eugene, Mr. Stewart married Julia Walker, who was born in Greene county, Mo. She died August 16, 1874, aged twenty-seven years, leaving two children, namely: Henry, who is telegraph operator and station agent for the Southern Pacific Railway Company at Comstock; and Hattie, wife of A. O. Wheeler, an engineer, residing at Portland, Ore. On December 2, 1875, Mr. Stewart married Elizabeth Evans, who was born in Baltimore, Md., but, being left an orphan when young, came to Oregon, in 1874, to live with her brother. Mr. and Mrs. Stewart have three children, namely: James E., a butcher in Springfield; Mary Ethel, wife of J. L. Clark, postmaster at Springfield; and Harry M., who is assistant postmaster. Politically Mr. Stewart is a staunch supporter of the principles of the Democratic party. He has filled many positions of public trust and responsibility, having been postmaster at Springfield for eight years, serving through President Hayes' administration and during the first term of President Cleveland; he was school director a number of years; was a member of the city council several terms; and at the present time is serving most efficiently as city treasurer.

L. W. BROWN, M. D. A profound and ever-increasing knowledge of medicine and surgery, more than ordinary penetration into possible business chances, and the requisite executive ability, as well as a public spirit wide enough to cover all phases of life and activity, have conspired to make the career of Dr. L. W. Brown a notable one in Eugene. Today he is unquestionably the most in demand of any who follow his calling in Lane county, and he is the oldest in Eugene to subscribe to the principle of similia similibus curantur. Preceded by twenty years of practical professional experience in Philadelphia, he came to Eugene in 1887, and, liking the people and country, has since made this his home. He is especially devoted to surgery, and some of his most satisfactory results have been accomplished along this line, his success creating a demand for his services throughout southern Oregon.

Of substantial farming stock, Dr. Brown was born in Lorain county, Ohio, February 2, 1844, the fourth of the seven children born to Lewis and Mary (Henninger) Brown, natives respectively of Prussia and Ohio. Lewis Brown came to America as a young man, and settled in Lorain county, where he farmed continuously until his death in 1851, when his son L. W. was seven years old. The death of his wife had occurred the year before. The orphan children were kept together during their early years on the Lorain county farm in Ohio, and when L. W. Brown was still young he went to Cleveland and became a clerk in a drug store. While there he became interested in medicine, and after two years in the store, began to study with Dr. S. R. Beckworth, professor of surgery in the Homœopathic Medical College. Having completed his tuition under this capable guide he entered the New York Homœopathic Medical College, being graduated therefrom in the spring of 1864. The Civil war then approaching its end, he became post-surgeon of the General Hospital No. 7, of Louisville, Ky., with the rank of captain, served his time, and, returning to Philadelphia, entered upon the practice which covered the long period of twenty years.

In enumerating the business enterprises which have profited by the co-operation of Dr. Brown, mention should be made of the Eugene Theatre Company, of which he is a director and the vice president, and which has recently completed a $30,000 opera house. He is a director in the LeRoy Mining Company, operating in the Bohemia mining district, and manufacturing steam machinery for mining and development. He has stock in a number of prominent mines, and, taken all in all, is a most successful mining promoter. Dr. Brown was pension examiner for five years, or until the obligations of an extensive practice obliged him to curtail outside responsibilities. He is examiner for the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of the Maccabees, and the Lions. Since his first voting days he has been in favor of Republican principles, and in many ways has furthered the local interests of his party. While still living in Pennsylvania, Dr. Brown married Isabelle Lotridge, who was born in La Crosse, Wis., and died in Philadelphia in 1878, leaving two children: Isabelle J., a graduate of the University of Oregon, now the wife of Prof. R. H. Dearborn of the University of Oregon; and Leonard G., also educated at the University of Oregon, a graduate of pharmacy, and at present secretary and treasurer of the Erie Copper Mining Company of Salt Lake City, Utah.

FRED FISK. The office of sheriff of Lane county has never been more ably maintained than by its present incumbent, Fred Fisk, whose broad education and earnest intelligence peculiarly qualify him to hold a position where judgment as well as action is required in the discharge of duties. Mr. Fisk was born in Fisk, Adair county, Iowa, December 10, 1873, the son of Judge A. H. Fisk, a native of Northfield, Vt. The latter was the son of Henry Fisk, also a native of Vermont, who became an early settler of Adair county and passed the remainder of his life there as a farmer. A. H. Fisk engaged in business in that county as a stockman and farmer, making his home in the town of Fisk, which received its name from his own. He was a prominent and influential man there, serving as a member of the board of supervisors, but he left his well grounded interests to find a home among the interesting conditions of the state of Oregon. He first located in Lane county, engaging in the mercantile business in Eugene, where in 1892 he was elected county judge for four years, after which he retired from public duties and so remained until his death December 2, 1901. Politically he was a Democrat and fraternally he was a Royal Arch Mason. He married Elizabeth Emerson, a native of Vermont.

Fred Fisk was reared in Iowa and educated in the public schools of that state. He was fifteen years old when the family removed to Eugene, and he at once entered the high school, from which he was graduated in 1891, for a short time thereafter serving as a clerk. Eager to win in an educational race for which he had special ability, he entered the University of Oregon, and in 1897 was graduated with the degree of A. B. In the same year he won the state oratorical contest and also the inter-state oratorical contest, open to the states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho. Upon leaving the university Mr. Fisk went back to Iowa and passed the years of 1897-98, and on his return to Oregon was appointed, September 1, 1898, deputy sheriff under Sheriff W. W. Withers, his principal duty being the charge of the office. He continued in this position until the unfortunate death of the sheriff, February 7, 1903, when he was appointed by the county commissioners as sheriff of the county. He took charge of affairs at once, his ability being promptly demonstrated by the able manner in which he took up the work so suddenly laid down. As a Democrat, Mr. Fisk has upheld the interests of the party in such a way as to prove the depths of the loyalty with which he adheres to the principles advocated.

Mr. Fisk is also interested in real estate in this part of the state, being the owner of timber lands in Lane county. In his fraternal relations he was made a Mason in Eugene Lodge No. 11 and is now a Royal Arch Mason. He also belongs to the Knights of Pythias and Woodmen of the World. He is an active member of the Alumni Association of the University of Oregon, and a member of the Commercial Club.

PROF. GEORGE COOTE. It is well-nigh impossible to overestimate the great progress that has been made in scientific agriculture during the past half century, more especially that made since the establishment by congress in each of the states and territories of an agricultural experiment station. In order that the highest possible results shall be obtained in each of these stations, it is necessary that the staff of instructors must be composed of men of ability and education, whose preliminary training shall have especially fitted them for the work in hand. Noteworthy in the faculty of the Oregon Agricultural College is Prof. George Coote, who is at the head of the floricultural and gardening department, also having supervision of the vegetable department at the experiment station.

A native of England, and the descendant of an old and respected family, Professor Coote was born, February 28, 1842, in Bromley, Kent county. His father a life-long resident of England, was successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits, the occupation by which his ancestors lived and thrived, for many years. He married Martha Keeble, who was born in County Essex, England, and died in her native land. Three children were born of their union, two of whom are living, George, the subject of this brief sketch, being the only one to cross the Atlantic, and settle in a newer country.

Brought up on the home farm, and educated in the national schools, George Coote remained with his parents until sixteen years old, when he entered the employ of Mr. Jack, a noted florist and gardener, with whom he served an apprenticeship of four years, at Langley Park, Beckenham, County Kent. After working as a gardener for three ensuing years, he had the entire charge of laying out seven acres of private grounds, arranging the landscape in an artistic manner, subsequently having charge of the grounds from 1864 until 1868. Assuming then the management of a large estate in Down, County Kent, he became a neighbor of Darwin, with whom he formed an intimate acquaintance, and oftentimes helped him in his work, and aided him in the various experiments in the fertilizing of orchids, and in the development of plants. Becoming interested in the Pacific coast through a friend, T. E. Hogg, who was connected with the Corvallis & Eastern Railway Company, Mr. Coote emigrated to America in 1877, coming under the auspices of a London company to take charge of seventy thousand acres of land apportioned to Oregon in 1862, the interest arising from the proceeds of said land being devoted to the instruction of the industrial classes in such branches of learning as relate to agriculture and the mechanical arts. The company failing a few years later, Mr. Coote purchased land west of Corvallis, and was there engaged in general farming for five years, later being located at Yaquina bay.

Accepting, in 1888, the appointment as assistant professor of horticulture at the Oregon Agricultural College, then just opened, he laid out the college grounds, erected the greenhouses, and subsequently filled the chair of horticulture. A year later he was made superintendent of grounds, a position which he ably filled for three years, when he accepted his present position as professor of floriculture and gardening. The professor is a recognized authority on all questions pertaining to horticulture, floriculture, vegetable and landscape gardening, through his wide experience in these branches gaining wisdom and knowledge of great value to himself and his students.

Professor Coote married, at St. George's Church, Beckenham, England, Miss Mary Ann Harvey, who was born in Ipswich, County Suffolk, England, and they have two children, namely: Annie, wife of W. Butler, of Santa Barbara, Cal.; and Edith, wife of Prof. E. F. Pernot, of Corvallis. Politically Professor Coote is a Democrat, and fraternally is a member of Corvallis Grange No. 242, in which he is now serving his second term as master. He is an active member of the Episcopal Church, of which he was for a number of years lay reader, senior warden, and vestryman.

HENRY E. PARRISH. On the farm which is now his home, Henry E. Parrish was born January 18, 1848. In Oregon, a date so remote, while not indicating anything beyond a man in his prime, carries with it an impression of primitive and pioneer conditions, which was certainly the case, although the grandfather, E. E. Parrish, and the father, Gamaliel Parrish, were already well established in the state, they having crossed the plains in 1844. The grandfather removed at a very early day from his home in the east to Ohio, where Gamaliel was born, and where he reared several other children, all of whom, except one son, accompanied him to Oregon. He was both a physician and minister of the gospel, and in Oregon settled on a claim near Jefferson, Marion county, in what was known as Parrish Gap.

Gamaliel Parrish remained at home until 1847, and then took up a section of land near Plainview, a portion of which comprises the farm of Henry Parrish. He went to the mines of California in 1849, making the trip to and fro by water, and bringing home with him much more money than he had hoped to make in the mines. Before settling on his farm, February 25, 1847, he married Miss Lydia M. Peterson, and the young couple settled down to housekeeping in a little round-log house with one room, and here made themselves as comfortable as possible for some years, eventually replacing the log house with one of more modern construction. The wife died on the farm May 14, 1876, and was survived by her husband until November 12, 1884. Henry E. is the oldest of their three children, and Sarah E., the only daughter in the family, is the widow of Alpheus Frum, while Granville E. lives in Yakima, Wash.

Henry E. Parrish remained with his father until his twenty-eighth year, and in the meantime had acquired a practical education in the public schools, receiving from his father a thorough agricultural training. Somewhat weary of the monotony of farming life, he went to Lebanon in 1884 and conducted the St. Charles Hotel for eighteen months, afterward managing a restaurant with fair results for a couple of years in the same city. For a year he lived on a farm in Benton county, and for a year and a half operated a farm near Plainview. He then returned to the old homestead, where he has since lived, and where he owns two hundred and fifty-six acres of the original claim. He is engaged in general farming, stock-raising and dairying, and on his property has made many improvements in addition to those made by his father in the early days. July 26, 1876, Mr. Parrish married Miss Emma Bates, who was born in Marshall county, Iowa, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1864. Arnie J., the only child born into the Parrish home, died in 1896, at the age of six years. Mr. Parrish is a Republican in politics, though never seeking official recognition, and with his wife is a member of the Baptist Church. He is honorable and upright in all of his dealings, and in his neighborhood is regarded as a very successful and public-spirited citizen.

CHARLES PATTISON. Ten miles south of Albany is the sixty-five-acre farm of Charles Pattison, who, in his younger and more rugged days tilled many acres of land in this fertile valley. Mr. Pattison belongs to that class of successful men who have worked out their own destiny, and who, at no stage of his career, has received material financial or other aid. His father, William, a native of Ireland, was born in 1798, and at a very youthful age was left an orphan. Thereafter he went to live with his paternal relatives, with whom he came to America in 1803, settling on a farm in South Carolina. In 1818 the entire family removed to the state of Illinois, William remaining with his friends until his marriage with Mary Mumford, a native of South Carolina. Eventually he became a farmer in Randolph county, where his son, Charles, was born December 24, 1833, and where he remained until the spring of 1849. The father was ambitious of better things, and, having outfitted with ox-teams and wagons, started across the plains with his wife and children, experiencing on the way but little trouble with the Indians. They were on the road about nine months, and in the late fall reached Multnomah county, Ore., where they spent the first winter on a farm. In March, 1850, Mr. Pattison moved to Oregon City, where he followed laboring until the fall, when he took up his residence in Cowlitz county, Wash., on a section of land. This continued to be his home for eighteen months, and, not being pleased with the location, he moved near Olympia, in the Puget Sound region. Eight or nine years later he moved to Lane county, Ore., where he bought four hundred acres of land, and where his death occurred at the age of seventy-five years. He was survived by his wife until her eighty-second year, her death occurring at the home of her son, Charles, with whom her last years were spent. William Pattison was a man of strong character and much natural ability, and in the early days served faithfully in the Yakima war for three months. He was a member and active worker in the United Presbyterian Church, which he joined as a young man, and was ever afterward devoted to its interests.

The children of William Pattison numbered six, and all were reared on the home farm, starting out at comparatively early ages to earn their own living. Charles chose blacksmithing as a means of livelihood, but never plied his trade to any extent. At the age of twenty-eight he took up an adjoining claim to the old homestead, and made that his home until 1880, when he bought his present farm of sixty-five acres in the Oakville vicinity, ten miles southwest of Albany. He is interested in general farming and stock, and has found his occupation both congenial and remunerative. At no time in his life has Mr. Pattison taken more than a passive interest in politics, but is ranged on the side of Prohibition. Armilda, the first wife of Mr. Pattison, who died in 1877, bore him four children, three of whom are living: Mrs. Ida Morris, who lives in Washington; Mrs. Agnes Shough, living in Albany; and Mrs. Anna Barton lives at the paternal home. For a second wife Mr. Pattison married Sarah Redford, a native of Missouri, of which union there have been born three children: Nellie, of Portland; Alice, at home; and John W., assisting his father with the home farm. Like his father, Mr. Pattison served in the Yakima Indian war for three months, during 1855-6, and he recalls many thrilling experiences with the red men in the early days. He also is a member of the United Presbyterian Church. Upright and honorable in all his dealings, practical and public-spirited, Mr. Pattison commands in large measure the respect of the community in which he lives, and towards the improvements of which he has so earnestly striven.

EDWARD ERNEST UPMEYER. A many-sided ability and the faculty of not only recognizing but creating opportunities, has enabled Edward Ernest Upmeyer to lead a life of more than ordinary interest and usefulness. In fact there are few important enterprises in and around Harrisburg which have not been influenced by his judgment or promoted by his practical assistance. At present retired from active participation in the interests which are still conducted under his name, Mr. Upmeyer has amassed a fortune in stock-raising, land speculating, saw-milling, and other lines of enterprise, and in his rise is an inspiring example of the man who builds upon the sure foundation of practical business judgment and fair dealing.

Inheriting strong and reliable characteristics of his Teutonic ancestors, Mr. Upmeyer was born in Baltimore, Md., October 28, 1842, his father, Ernest, having settled in the Maryland city upon his arrival from Prussia in 1835. A carpenter by trade, the elder Upmeyer found ready employment during his active life, and, being a master workman, commanded good wages. His removal with his family to St. Louis, Mo., in 1846, resulted in a change for the better, but his death, which occurred two years later, in 1848, cut short a career still promising, although he had reached the half century mark. With him from Prussia came his wife, Sophia (Holstein) Upmeyer, and four of their children, five more being born in the United States. The parents were devoted to each other and to their home. The mother also died in 1848, six weeks after the death of her husband.

After his parents' death, when he was five years old, Edward Ernest went to live with a cousin at Trenton, Ill., and remained there until the spring of 1868. He then started out to farm on his own responsibility, and in 1869 married, in Louisville, Ky., Liza Jane Bain, who was born in Manchester, England, and came to the United States with her friends at the age of eighteen years. Locating in Louisville, Ky., Miss Bain taught in the public schools of that city for twelve years, or until her marriage. The young people settled near Lawrence, Kans., and afterward removed to Hutchinson, the same state, at the end of a year taking up their residence in Salina county. Here Mr. Upmeyer owned and managed a threshing machine for three years, then with his gains went to Bear Valley, Colo., the following year locating on a rented farm near Harrisburg, Ore. His actual start in life Mr. Upmeyer dates from 1885, when he bought two hundred and eighty acres of land two miles east of Harrisburg, but still made his home on the rented farm, which comprised about a thousand acres. He began to buy, sell and raise stock on a large scale, and to a greater extent than the average newcomer succeeded from the first, increasing his business from month to month, until at the end of two years he stepped down and out, his efforts having netted him a tidy little sum.

Locating in Harrisburg in 1888, he purchased a warehouse and stored wheat and oats for three years, and in 1890 purchased a saw-mill in the town, which he conducted successfully for twelve years. In 1894 he became one of the promoters of the Harrisburg Water Power Canal, was the first president of the company, and eventually became the sole owner of the concern. Saw-mill and canal were in a flourishing condition in 1902, when Mr. Upmeyer had an opportunity to dispose of both advantageously, which he did to Booth & Kelley Lumber Company. Needless to say, the margin from these transactions was sufficient to insure him a life of ease and independence, a consummation fully earned by his years of devotion to the best tenets of business. In the meantime, in 1901, he had added to his landed possessions, and at the present time he has five hundred acres within two miles of Harrisburg, besides a farm of three hundred and twenty acres of timber land on the Siuslaw river.

The Republican party in Linn county has profited by the substantial support of Mr. Upmeyer, who has been mayor of Harrisburg for one term, has been a member of the council many times, and for nine years has endeavored to promote educational excellence in the community as a member of the school board. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Since early manhood he has been a member and active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which his wife also belonged. Mrs. Upmeyer was an invalid for the last six years of her life, and notwithstanding the unceasing efforts of her husband in her behalf, her death occurred March 19, 1903. No children being born to Mr. and Mrs. Upmeyer, they adopted Dena Holt, who is now the wife of E. J. Nixon, a farmer near Harrisburg. A. B. Hulett, a general merchant of Island City, also owes his training from thirteen years of age to these large-hearted people, who gave him a home and a practical education, and started him out in life. Mr. Upmeyer has an abiding confidence in the slow and sure ways of making a living, and anything on the speculative order has never appealed to his judgment. His advancement has been steady, and dictated by sober thought and practical common sense, and has met with the approval of conservative and painstaking associates in the business world. Mr. Upmeyer is one of the organizers and president of the Klamath Lake Navigation Company, which are operating both freight and passenger boats on the Klamath Lakes in southeastern Oregon.

ALFRED R. LOCKE. Among the well known early settlers of Benton county who have contributed to its agricultural upbuilding is that to which Alfred R. Locke belongs, himself a native son of the county, and born on the farm which is still his home, November 10, 1850. Upon the increasingly fertile acres redeemed from the wilderness by his father he was reared to a life of toil and usefulness, but though encouraged in industry, and in the development of his abilities as a whole, fine opportunities were his, also, especially in the line of education. He was a student at the public schools for many years, which training was supplemented by a course at that excellent educational center, the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis.

After his father's death in 1873 Alfred R. and Alonzo, his brother, assumed control of the old donation claim, and amicably managed the same together for about six years. Alfred then bought out his brother's interest, and has since conducted the whole independently and with great success. He owns two hundred and twenty-seven acres, and carries on general farming and stock-raising, and also has a large dairy business. Located five miles north of Corvallis, on the Independence road, the farm is admirably adapted for all kinds of farming, and has accommodations for a large number of stock.

May 30, 1876, Mr. Locke married Maryetta Williams, who was born in Missouri, and whose father died when she was a child. The meeting between the young people occurred when Mr. Locke was making a visit in Missouri, and almost immediately they came to the west, locating on the old donation claim, where the young wife received a warm welcome from her husband's people. Three sons have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Locke, of whom Horace is at Corvallis, Ore., while Walter and Otto are living with their father. Mr. Locke is a Democrat in politics, but has never desired to enter the ranks of office-seekers. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He is a bright and enterprising man, well posted on current events, and above all else is in touch with the agricultural advancement in his neighborhood.

ROBERT A. SMITH. The untiring industry of Robert A. Smith has gained him the possession of a farm of ninety-eight acres three miles from Corvallis, where he has a pleasant home, and most congenial occupation. He has been a farmer for many years, and during that time has kept abreast of the times, and improved his property with everything calculated to facilitate a general farming and stock-raising industry. In western Canada, where he was born May 17, 1837, Mr. Smith was reared on his father's farm, but in his youth had few educational advantages. That he has more than made up for this deficiency argues his appreciation of knowledge as a whole, for he is today a well informed man, and an interesting observer of the people and happenings around him.

Starting out to make his own living at the age of nineteen, Mr. Smith worked on farms by the month for several years, and upon coming to the United States settled near Aurora, Ill., where the breaking out of the Civil war found him saving money through farm labor. Responding to his adopted country's call he enlisted in Company B, One Hundred and Fifty-sixth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and was sent south guarding government property, serving in this capacity until the close of the war. After the restoration of peace he went to the pineries of Wisconsin, and from the lumber camps to Dallas county, Iowa, where he found employment on a farm. A short time afterward he bought a farm, and married Mrs. Janet Wheeler, widow of James Wheeler, and daughter of Alexander McTaggart, the latter of whom was born in Scotland and died in Iowa. Mrs. Wheeler had two children, of whom James A. is living with his step-father. Two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Smith, of whom Etta is a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, and Robena is a graduate of the State Normal of Monmouth.

In 1874 Mr. Smith left Iowa and came to Benton county, Ore., living for two years in the town of Corvallis, but not liking it as well as he thought he should, returned then to Iowa. In 1889 he returned to the coast, convinced by his experience that after all this was one of the garden spots of the country. This time he located three miles from Corvallis, which is his present farm, and to which he has devoted the best years of his life. He is a quiet, unassuming man, and averse to office-holding or participation in public affairs. He is a Republican in politics. Upright and honorable in all of his dealings, Mr. Smith has the esteem of his neighbors and associates, and his farm and himself are a distinct credit to a thriving community of agriculturists.

A. W. PATTERSON, M. D. That giving, not living, is the more important part of life, has been demonstrated in the career of Dr. A. W. Patterson, one of the pioneer physicians of Oregon, and a worthy representative of one of the noble and unselfish professions that have helped to lift the world to a higher plane in its physical, social and moral status. In his many ministrations in the early days of the country he came in contact with those whose character was to form the foundation of the western commonwealth, and with all conditions that tried the souls of pioneers and proved their worth; and not until a retrospective glance is taken can one realize his forceful personality as an individual and his consecrated effort toward the upbuilding of the state and the advancement of western civilization. It is well to pause in the march of progress and review the lives of such men, for they are a constant inspiration toward higher living, and an example which the younger generation can make no mistake in following.

The grandfather of Dr. Patterson, John by name, was born in Scotland, came to America in the eighteenth century, and became a soldier under Washington in the Revolutionary war, while in service receiving a slight wound. He died during the war, while the army was wintering in New Jersey. His son, Andrew, was born in Bucks county, Pa., and was reared to manhood in that locality. He became apprenticed to a manufacturer of spinning wheels, and after serving his time became connected with a carpenter and cabinetmaker. He continued in this business for many years and later in life engaged in farming in Armstrong county, where his death occurred in 1832, at the age of sixty-one years. Moral and upright, he lived the righteous life of a member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife was formerly Jane Lindsay, a native of Shippensburg, Pa., who had been left an orphan at an early age. She was reared by an uncle who was in business in Jamaica, N. Y., and was known as Jamaica Lindsay. Mrs. Patterson died in Butler county, Pa., the mother of eleven children, of whom five sons and three daughters attained maturity.

The youngest son and the only one now in Oregon is Dr. A. W. Patterson, who was born in Armstrong county, Pa., October 4, 1814, and reared upon his father's farm. His education was received in Bassingham Academy and the Western University of Pennsylvania, at Pittsburg. Upon the completion of his studies he took up the study of medicine under the tutelage of Dr. Joseph Gazam, and later went to Philadelphia and entered Pennsylvania College of Medicine, then a new school started by a part of the faculty of Jefferson Medical College. Previous to his graduation in March, 1841, with the degree of M. D., he had practiced for one year in what is now Pittsburg, as his first course of lectures had been taken in 1839. After his graduation he located in Greenfield, Ind., and practiced for a time, and then returned to Pittsburg, and after practicing there for some time he began to travel through the west as a representative of a surgical instrument manufacturer. In April, 1852, he became one of a party of five to start on horseback for the more remote west, the first part of the journey being in company with an emigrant train, which, however, they soon left in the rear, arriving at The Dalles August 28, being among the first emigrants of that year. With the good judgment which has uniformly distinguished the business ventures of Dr. Patterson, he took up a donation claim one mile west of Eugene, Lane county, the fulfillment of his expectations being in 1853, when the county seat was located in that city.

Turning his attention to public service, Dr. Patterson became a government surveyor, and was also awarded the contract by the county commissioner to survey the plot of Eugene. In 1854 he undertook the work of laying out the town, forty acres of which was donated by Char-nel Mulligan and a like number of acres by Eugene Skinner, Eighth street forming the division line. The work was a success, and met with the commendation of those most interested, and he felt encouraged to continue his surveying, which he did for a couple of years in both Oregon and Washington. At the breaking out of the Rogue River Indian war he was selected to raise a company, but declined to do so, suggesting instead Captain Buoy, who had served in the Black Hawk war, his own inclinations leading him to prefer an appointment as a physician. Receiving no call, however, in that line, he agreed to accept the first lieutenantcy in the company, which reached the battle ground on the evening of the third day of the battle of Hungry Hill. He there met the commissary-general, Dr. Joseph Grew, who asked him to accept the position of surgeon. Notwithstanding the fact that he could not offer his resignation until the following day, Dr. Patterson went to work immediately dressing the wounds of the men, and the next morning after having resigned his commission as lieutenant he was commissioned and appointed by General Grew as surgeon, in which position he remained until April 15, 1856, when he resigned. During the Rogue River campaign the service was exceedingly strenuous and told upon the strength of even the doctor's rugged constitution, and as recruits were needed he was appointed to return to Eugene to secure enlistments, which he immediately did. In the spring of 1857 he took a contract to survey six townships in Lane county, during which service he was much in demand, as he was one of the very few physicians in the country. Upon the appointment of a new surveyor, General Chapman being the man selected, Dr. Patterson was offered the position of chief clerk, which he accepted and ably maintained until a change of office, when, having secured a contract to survey five townships between The Dalles and the John Day river, he took up surveying once more. In the spring of 1862 he began the practice of medicine in Eugene and continued faithful to the interests of his profession for thirty-three years, in 1897 seeking a retirement much needed after a life of such arduous labor. Several years previous to his retirement he had confined his practice to office consultation.

In the various public movements which were vital to the growth of the country, Dr. Patterson has ever fulfilled his part as a loyal and intelligent citizen. In the early educational enterprises he exercised a strong influence, for four terms serving in his county as superintendent of schools, and also as school director, a monument reared to the memory of his services being the Patterson School, which was named in his honor. In connection with Samuel Simpson he was engaged for some time in getting up a series of school books to be used in the schools of the Pacific coast. They wrote five Pacific coast series, which were used for a number of years, and also wrote three readers and one speller, which were published by Bancroft & Co., of San Francisco. As a Democrat he served one term in the territorial legislature in 1855, and as state senator from 1870 to 1874. With all these public interests he has not neglected the cultivation and improvement of a part of the land which forms his adopted county, being one of the early hop-growers. His ranch near the city was washed away, and he then bought what is now Patterson's Island and started a yard. Of a farm of seventy acres he devoted forty to the cultivation of hops. This land is universally conceded to be the best in the world for the growth of this plant. He has also spared no pains in his work, having sent to England for the first hop roots, securing the English varieties.

In 1847 Dr. Patterson was married in Pittsburg, Pa., to Miss Elizabeth Sovern, the daughter of Rev. Levi Sovern of Pittsburg. She died in 1848 with her only child, and both were buried in the same grave.

In Eugene, July 4, 1859, Dr. Patterson was married to Amanda C. Olinger, a native of Iowa, and the eldest of six daughters and two sons, of whom four daughters and one son are now living, born into the family of her parents. Her father, Abraham Olinger, was born in Dayton, Ohio, the son of John Olinger, and as a farmer he removed to Iowa, from which state he crossed the plains in 1843 with ox-teams. He was in the first train of emigrants to the Willamette valley, which they reached after a journey of nine months. He first located in Yamhill county, where he engaged in farming for three years, when he removed to the Waldo hills, in Marion county, settling two and a half miles from Daniel Waldo's place and becoming a sturdy and reliable citizen. He engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, which occurred in that location. His wife was Rachel Stout, born in Missouri, the daughter of Ephraim Stout, who crossed the plains in 1843 and died in 1852. Mrs. Patterson was reared in Oregon and educated in the public schools, and attended Willamette University for a short time. She is the mother of four daughters and one son, all of whom are living, of whom Augusta is the wife of Mr.

Karlstrom, of Point Terrace, Ore.; Anna is the wife of Mr. Potter, of Eugene. She is a graduate of the University of Oregon in the class of 1885. Ida is a graduate of the University of Oregon in the class of 1886, and is now principal of the Patterson school; Clyde Llewellyn is a student at the conservatory of music in Ithaca, N. Y.; and Harriet is a graduate of the University of Oregon in the class of 1903. The home of this pioneer family is now located at No. 387 East Eleventh street, where a beautiful residence has been erected. Dr. Patterson is a member of the State Medical Society. He was made a Mason while in the eastern states, and now belongs to Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M. In religion he is a member of the Unitarian Church.

WILLIAM S. HURST. The history of every city of progress always includes the biographies of certain of its enterprising citizens who have been prominent in forwarding the growth and development of the place and by their exertions have mounted the ladder of success to an enviable position. To this class of citizens we must include the name of W. S. Hurst, who is the head of the commission house of W. S. Hurst & Co., of Aurora, Ore.

The firm of W. S. Hurst & Co. was established in 1893, and began business in a small way. In 1902, Harvey A. Hinkle, one of the most expert hop-buyers on the western coast, was admitted as a partner. Besides the main commission house in Aurora, the firm has now three branch houses, at Aurora, Hubbard and Canby. In addition, agents are employed at every point where car-load lots can be obtained or handled. The firm handles all kinds of grain and produce, but makes a specialty of buying and selling hops, potatoes and onions. They pay the highest market prices, and liberal advances are made on consignments. Their produce is marketed in Alaska, California, Texas and all western points. The business, which was small in the beginning, now aggregates from $60,000 to $100,000 annually.

William S. Hurst was born in Wasco county, Ore., October 5, 1863, and he is a son of John Daniel and Helen (Corlburg) Hurst, the former a native of Rheinstadt, Germany, and the latter of Sweden. When thirteen years old his father crossed the ocean with a brother and located in New York, later coming on to Oregon. He and his wife reared a family which consisted of four sons and one daughter, the eldest of whom was William S., the subject of this biography.

While still a lad he found employment in the flouring mill owned by his father and uncle. His common school education was broadened by a thorough course in the Portland Business College, at Portland, Ore., from which he was graduated in 1883. The year following his graduation he went to Aurora and entered into partnership with his father in the milling business, purchasing at that time a third interest in the Aurora Mills. In 1893, as mentioned, he established the commission house, besides which he handles both fire and life insurance in Aurora and surrounding country.

In 1890 Mr. Hurst was united in marriage with Amelia M. Ritter, of Clackamas county, Ore. Her father was John Ritter, and was born in Austria. Upon coming to this country he located first in Pennsylvania, later in Missouri, and finally settled permanently in Clackamas county, Ore. He is now retired, a highly respected citizen of Marion county. To Mr. and Mrs. Hurst have been born one son, Reginald W., and one daughter, Ruth D., both of whom are at home. The family favor the Presbyterian Church in their religious worship.

The foregoing record of Mr. Hurst offers a splendid example of what may be accomplished by one who allows no obstacle to impede his advancement. In addition to his individual business interests, Mr. Hurst has won and retained the confidence of the people, and has filled various offices of public trust. He has served as justice of the peace in Aurora four terms, as school director, and as notary public; and he has been active in politics. Fraternally he is a valued member of the A. F. & A. M., the K. of P., the I. O. O. F., the A. O. U. W., and the W. O. W.

ABSALOM C. WOODCOCK. The highest tenets of legal science find expression in the large professional practice of A. C. Woodcock, one of the most courteous and energetic members of the Lane county bar. In his rise from obscurity and comparative poverty Mr. Woodcock presents an example of perseverance and determination which may well serve as an example to whomsoever rebels at the limitations which shut in his youthful horizon. Starting in to make his own living at the age of thirteen, he demonstrated innate ability and faithfulness, for at a time when farm labor was poorly rewarded he was able to command $20 a month and board. He is the fourth of eleven children born to W. D. and Alizina (Cornelius) Woodcock. The chief cause of the family's financial stress lay in the fact that his father died in 1870, leaving his large family dependent upon the output of the donation claim on the Molalla upon which he had settled in 1845.

W. D. Woodcock was a native son of Illinois, but was reared and educated in Missouri. He possessed grit and determination, for he started across the plains in 1845, an undertaking hazardous in the extreme, and holding out but one chance in a thousand of ever reaching his goal. Fellow travelers in the ox-train with him were Absalom Cornelius and his family, one member being a daughter, Alizina, whose youthful charms seriously impressed themselves upon the hopeful and ambitious young homeseeker. At the parting of the ways in Oregon Mr. Cornelius settled on a claim near Turner, Marion county, but his daughter soon after became mistress of the farm on the Molalla, and thus yet another of the innumerable romances begun around the campfires and on the dreary march across the plains, was brought to a happy termination. Mr. Woodcock died at the age of fifty-two, and his wife survived him until 1889. Besides Absalom Cornelius, who was born on the Molalla farm July 23, 1859, there are living at the present time seven other of the eleven children: W. D. is a blacksmith in Lake county, Ore.; W. S. is a stockman in Wasco county; T. P. is a large commission man of Weiser, Idaho; Newton and Jasper are twins, the former living in Weiser, Idaho, and the latter in Wasco county, Ore.; Keziah is the wife of E. B. Ramsby of Lake county, Ore.; and Ada is the wife of W. H. Harriman of Wasco county, Ore.

A. C. Woodcock was eleven years of age when his father died, and at thirteen he began to work on the farm of William Barlow, one of the best known of the early pioneers. He saved everything possible out of his wages of $20 a month, and at the end of a year went into a butchering and stock business at The Dalles with his brother, T. P. While thus employed he made up for a somewhat defective education by attending the public schools during the winter time, and in 1879 entered the sub-freshman class of the University of Oregon at Eugene, from which he was graduated in 1885 with the degree of B. S. Afterward he was appointed a tutor in the university, and at the same time took up the classical course, being graduated therefrom in 1887 with the degree of A. B. In the meantime he had become interested in the study of law, and after preliminary training under Dolph, Mallory, Bellinger & Simon of Portland he was admitted to the bar in October, 1887. In partnership with George S. Washburn he began practice in Eugene, continuing alone after the death of his old friend, and in May, 1903, inaugurated a partnership with L. T. Harris, under the firm name of Woodcock & Harris. The firm is engaged in a general practice of law, in addition to which they are attorneys for the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company, and other representative firms of the county.

A stanch Republican, Mr. Woodcock has been prominently identified with party affairs in the town and county, has served as chairman of the county central committee, and has been a member of the state committee, and of the state board of equalization. He is a member of the State Bar Association, of the Eugene Commercial Club, and of the native sons. Fraternally he is connected with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; the Royal Arch Masons; the Commandery; the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; and the Knights of Pythias. Mr. Woodcock is held in high esteem by all who have the honor of knowing him, and to those familiar with his advancement his outlook is an unusually gratifying one, fully warranted by recognized capability, deserved popularity, and thorough adaptation to the requirements and amenities of his profession.

WILLIAM ANGUS McPHERSON. The history of Oregon is indelibly stamped with the personality of those men who came when the country was a wilderness and gave to the making of a state the best part of their lives, in the various avenues which go to make up the daily routine of life, exerting strength and intellectual effort toward general advancement. A self-evident fact is the potent influence exerted by the newspapers of the country, and it was through this medium that the voice of William Angus McPherson spoke for the uplifting of mankind in the pioneer days now fast passing into history, and though he, too, is of the past, his influence still lives and ever makes for the betterment of the state which he made his home as a pioneer of 1852.

William Angus McPherson was born in Chatham county, N. C., February 22, 1828, the son of William and Margaret W. (McDonald) McPherson, and when a small boy he was brought to Iowa by his parents and reared to manhood near Keokuk. In 1850 he became interested in the possibilities of the west, and the same year came to Oregon and spent the winter near Jefferson, Marion county, and in the spring of the following year went overland to California. During this journey he encountered the Indians in southern Oregon, but was successful in making his way to the mines of the Golden state, where he mined during the summer and met with success. In the fall of 1851 he returned to Iowa via the isthmus and spent that winter in his old home. His father having died in 1849, just prior to the first trip across the plains, Mr. McPherson found himself the principal support of the family, and his interest in Oregon being no less because of his success in California, he decided to locate permanently in the former territory. In company with his mother, brother-in-law and the two little children of the latter, he crossed the plains in the spring of 1852 and upon his arrival bought the right to two hundred and fifty acres of land located in Linn county, near Jefferson, and at once engaged in farming.

October 7, 1852, Mr. McPherson married Nancy Jane Fenn, who was born in Pike county, Ill., May 17, 1840. She was the daughter of John Fenn, who, in 1847, brought his family across the plains by ox-teams, and after a six months' journey over the Cascade route they arrived in Oregon City, Ore., where three weeks were passed before attempting to locate permanently. In Oregon City Mr. Fenn married Elizabeth Jory, a sister of his first wife, Mary Jory, who had died a year before the trip was made to the west. But a little later in the fall the family went down the Willamette and Columbia rivers in a canoe manned by eight Indians, and located near William Hobson's donation claim on Clatsop plains. In the spring of 1849 the family removed to Marion county, and the father left them with the Jorys in Salem and went to California by water, and mined for a short time. He met with success and about Christmas of the same year he returned to Oregon, and in the following spring bought the improvements on a donation claim in Linn county, located six miles north of Albany, and it was in that location that Mrs. McPherson grew to womanhood. After marriage Mr. McPherson and his wife took up their residence on his farm before mentioned, where they lived until 1858 and then removed to a farm near Scio, same county, and passed the ensuing five years. It was in 1864 that Mr. McPherson took up newspaper work, locating in Albany, where he was the editor of the Albany Journal, and was connected therewith until 1866, when he was elected state printer on the Republican ticket. Until the expiration of his service as state printer he lived in Salem, and from that city he removed to McMinnville and started The Blade, and after two years again located in Linn county, in 1871, engaging for a short time in farming. After a short period of newspaper work in Albany he was compelled, through failing health, to change his place of residence, and on locating in Roseburg, Douglas county, in 1873, he became the editor and proprietor of the Plaindealer, in the publication of which he continued successfully for several years. From Roseburg he went to Ashland, and was there associated with Oliver Applegate in editing the Ashland Tidings, a paper which had been established by Mr. McPherson and William Sutton. In 1878 Mr. McPherson withdrew, and after three years spent in Jacksonville in the newspaper work, he went to Portland and was there connected on various papers, among them being the Oregonian and Vindicator. His death occurred in that city, in the midst of a still busy career, January 28, 1891.

With the passing away of Mr. McPherson the work with which he had been connected for so many years lost a man of no small ability, and one who put forth his best efforts to broaden and uplift the spirit and standard of this western state. He was a loyal, patriotic citizen, who never wavered in his allegiance to his native land, and at the time of Civil warfare he was earnest and faithful in his endeavors to keep public opinion in sympathy with the government. While in Salem he edited a paper known as the Unionist, which was strongly anti-slavery, and voiced the principles which he endorsed. Politically he was a Republican, and had been one throughout his entire life. In religion both himself and wife were members of the Presbyterian Church, and for the greater part of his life he was connected fraternally with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Three weeks previous to his death Mr. McPherson voiced the thoughts which took possession of him as he viewed the grandeur of the accomplishments of the quarter century and more since he first cast his lot with the Oregon pioneers, in a poem entitled "Portland Heights," which is filled with beautiful thoughts and strongly descriptive of the changes which the years have brought, and speaks eloquently of the talent which he gave to the western cause.

PORTLAND HEIGHTS.

'Tis forty years since first I stood Upon these heights; 'twas bright spring time.
 Glade, forest, river, lake and wood
 Were vocal only with the chime
 Of nature's melody; the birds
 Chanted their matin songs while borne Upon the zephyr's wings that stirred
 The sweet aroma of the morn.
 Like incense from a censer cast,
 There came the rich perfume of lands
 Where perennial summers last
 And crystal waters lave the sands
 Of limpid lakes.

Lone, solitude, primeval stood Portress at the opening dawn,
 And gladsome nature seemed to brood
 O'er pleasing phantasies, all drawn From out the mystic realms where dwell
 The muses, on Bœotia's hight,
 And streams of music ever swell,
 Where scenes celestial greet the sight,
 The pheasant drummed his monotone,
 Deep within the forest shades,
 While the plumed grouse sat perched alone,
 And antlered deer, o'er verdant glades
 Wandered with stately grace.

The mountains reared their lofty hights,
 Just as they now appear; old Hood,

In pride, proclaimed her regal rights,
 As like a sentinel she stood Athwart Aurora's brow. But come,
 And, with me, nearer view, a scene
 Of sombre hue; a dreary zone
 Of wilderness; no glittering sheen
 Of sunlight, no radiant ray E'er shone within its shades. Deep, dark
 And fathomless it seemed; bright day
 Recoiled upon itself; the lark
 Soared high above the gloom.

The river coursed its widening way
 On to the moonmad sea; its tide
 Flowed on unvexed, nor stop, nor stay Delayed its onward flow. There plied
 No busy steamers then, to wake
 The echoes of its fir-clad shores,
 No rumbling train to rudely shake
 The pulseless solitude. No oars
 The silvery wavelets cleft, save when
 The Indian, in his light canoe
 Glided the waters o'er to fen
 Or glade, his timid game to woo
 With crafty wiles.

From where I sat there was no sign
 Of human habitation viewed,
 Save where a rude and homely line
 Of cabins reared their walls, unhewed,
 Along the river's shaded bank;
 There the brave pioneer had spread
 His tent, 'neath the balm trees' dense, dark Canopy, where erstwhile no tread
 Nor sound disturbed the quietude
 But the wolf's long howl, or the fierce Warwhoop, when the savage, in rude
 And bloody strife, remorseless, pierce
 Each other to the heart.

Behold what changes time hath wrought!
 The birds, the timid deer have fled,
 And in some mountain glen have sought
 A safe retreat from sportsmen, led Thither, joyous, in the noisy chase.
 Felled is the forest, and where sang
 The feathered warblers not one trace
 Is seen or heard. Silent the twang
 Of bowstring—gone the dusky race
 That ruled, with undisputed sway,
 This empire—boundless, dreary space,
 Where last the radiant light of day
 Bids earth goodnight.

Transformed are all things, and I gaze,
 Bewildered and perplexed with dread,
 Upon the scene; one glittering maze
 O'ercomes me, and I seem to tread
 Upon enchanted ground. The past
 Recedes, a panoramic view, Fleeting as Orpheus, to the vast,
 Illimitable sea, to strew
 Its piteous pageants on the shore
 Of bleak forgetfulness. A change, Mysterious, wondrous, has o'er Landscape, stream and mountain range
 Its mantle cast.

A city, proud in wealth and power,
 Rises like fabled Phoenix, o'er
 The ashes of the past. Dome, tower
 And minaret rear heavenward more

Than thrice ten thousand gilded spires
 To mark the onward march of art, Science—religion's sacred fires
 Illume an ever busy mart,
 Where commerce spreads her purpling wing
 And thronging thousands westward pour,
 One living tide, and hither bring Trophies to deck the golden shore
 Of sunset sea.

Thus have I sang, in numbers rude,
 Of buried years, when buoyant youth
 And high resolve bright flowers strewed
 Along ambition's path; and truth,
 And hope, best boons to mortals given,
 Guided my wayward steps and led Me onward, upward to a haven
 Of blissful rest. But time has fled, Unstrung my lyre, my task is o'er.
 Proud city of the west, all hail!
 And all hail to friends who never more Shall greet me, as I homeward sail,
 On life's tempestuous sea.

AUGUSTUS J. F. VITUS. For various and well founded reasons the Vitus family commands the attention of people in Lane county. First and foremost it supplies the comforting assurance that obstacles, however great, are by no means insurmountable, and that good judgment, perseverance, and plenty of common sense are excellent aids in accomplishing one's desires. The law of heredity, however much it may be questioned by later day science, is convincingly emphasized in this instance, for Augustus J. F. Vitus, the founder of the family in the far northwest, has handed down his fine traits of character, his strong will and unflinching rectitude, to several sons who represent collectively and individually the backbone and sinews of the commonwealth.

Born in Prussia, Germany, April 5, 1828, Mr. Vitus comes from farming stock, although his family was represented among the trades and industries of the Fatherland. According to custom, he ceased to be dependent upon the support of his parents after his fourteenth year, at which time he began to work in the silk mills of Prussia, and was thus employed until coming to America in 1852. At this time he was twenty-four years old, strong of frame and clear of mind, and filled with great enthusiasm for the land to which so many of his friends had emigrated. The sailing vessel successfully weathered calms and storms, landing in New York at the end of five weeks. Mr. Vitus looked around for work, and not finding it in the silk mills, identified himself with a tannery near Dunkirk, N. Y., remaining there during the winter, and the following spring making his way to Philadelphia. Here he entered the woolen mills and learned the trade of weaver, removing in 1865 to Springfield, Ill., where he was similarly employed. In 1872 he removed to Caldwell county, Mo., where he purchased one hundred and eighty-one acres of land, and contemplated spending many years in its improvement. His hopes were doomed to disappointment, for drought interfered with the maturing of the crops, and he not only lost them all, but was obliged to sacrifice his farm upon which he had intended to pay a large installment that year.

In the face of this first setback in America Mr. Vitus decided to come to the far west with his family, and arrived in Oregon in the spring of 1878. With his sons he found employment on farms surrounding the town, and in the spring of 1879 rented a farm with his sons in Lane county. This venture proved even more disastrous than the last, for after renting for one year the strugglers found themselves in debt about $4,000. Mr. Vitus decided after five years of renting to purchase a farm, and for this he was obliged to go in debt $12,000. This fact alone would discourage the average man who had already experienced hard luck, but father and sons bravely put their shoulders to the wheel, paid off the indebtedness, and established themselves as men possessing business judgment of a high order, and more than average perseverance. Thus has the father transplanted to the larger opportunities of the states the reliable and always welcome Teutonic traits, admittedly as strong and upbuilding as any that come to us from foreign shores.

Broad-minded and liberal in all of his tendencies, Mr. Vitus makes no exception of politics, and though inclined towards the Republican party believes in voting for the man best qualified to serve the public good. For a time he served as postmaster of Junction City. Through his marriage with Minnie Behren in 1851, eight children have been born into his family, the five sons who are reflecting great credit upon his teaching and example, and three daughters. The sons are mentioned elsewhere in this work, and the daughters, Rosa and Mary, are the wives respectively of F. H. Miller and Benjamin Frank Andrews. Although a comparatively old man, Mr. Vitus is still in heart, mind, and physical activity the equal of many men twenty years his junior.

JOSEPH PIRONI. The popular manager of the Henry Weinhard ice plant and beer depot at Eugene is indebted for his success to many years of faithful and efficient service, during which time he has worked his way from a comparatively humble to a very responsible position. Possessing the adaptiveness of the Latin race from which he springs, augmented by a practical home and business training in the staid and conservative town of Herstelle, Westphalia, north-western Germany, where he was born May 26, 1857, Joseph Pironi came to America in 1875, at the age of seventeen, well equipped for whatever chance might have in store for him. His paternal grandfather, Joseph Pironi, was born almost within the shadow of Vesuvius, near Naples, Italy, and came of a family long associated with that beautiful and historic region. As a boy he learned the tinsmith's trade, and for years traveled through his vineclad, olivegrown and resplendent country, now visiting an inland town, and now a picturesque aggregation of highly colored houses basking in the sunshine, on a hill lapped by the blue Mediterranean. In time he made his way to the north, settling in the less romantic kingdom of Westphalia, Germany, where he worked at his trade until retiring a few years before his death. In Herstelle, Westphalia, his son, Henry, the father of the subject of this review, was born, and in his youth also learned the tinsmith's trade. He married a native daughter of Westphalia, Regina Wustefeld, whose father, John Wustefeld, devoted his active life as a captain on the boats plying on the Weser river. Henry Pironi is now living retired in Herstelle, Germany, but the wife who bore him three sons and three daughters has long been deceased.

Joseph Pironi in common with the custom of the country, began to earn his own living at the age of fourteen, at which time he was apprenticed for three years as clerk in a large wholesale and retail commission house. Having completed his time of service he clerked in another concern for a year, and after arriving in America in 1875, located in Baltimore, where he hoped to find employment along the line for which he was amply qualified. Failing in his intention, he did not spend any time in bemoaning his fate, but at once applied himself to learning the baker's and confectioner's trade, following the same until coming to Oregon in 1879. Encouraged by the outlook in Corvallis after working in a bakery for a year, he contracted a partnership with August Hodes, in a bakery and grocery business, under the firm name of Hodes & Company, conducting the same until disposing of his interest in 1888.

In Portland Mr. Pironi entered the employ of T. Leebe, an old-time and well known baker of the city. After two years, he became identified in the capacity of shipping clerk with the company whose interests he now represents. After eight years of close application in the various departments in which he was called upon to serve, his worth received substantial recognition through his appointment to his present position as manager of the ice plant and beer depot, in November, 1899. The firm's ice factory has a daily capacity of seven tons, and the depot has enormous storing capacity, sufficient to supply a trade not only local, but extending into Douglas county. A retail and wholesale business is carried on, and under the present management the business has greatly increased, system and orderliness being apparent to all.

The first marriage of Mr. Pironi occurred in Corvallis, to Josephine Dubille, a native of Canada, but reared and educated in Portland. Four children were born of this union, of whom Leo, the oldest child and only son is employed in the carshops of the Southern Pacific Railroad at Portland, while Gertrude, Aileen and Marie are living at home. For a second wife Mr. Pironi married a native daughter of Portland, Mary Shelland, and one child, Henry Paul, is the result of this union. Fraternaly Mr. Pironi is connected with the Sons of Hermann, of Portland, in which he has served as president and secretary; and he is also identified with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Eagles, of Eugene. He has made many friends since coming to Eugene, and is rightfully regarded as an important part of its social and business structure.

JAMES CYRUS SABIN. Many years of practical experience with stock of all kinds has qualified James Cyrus Sabin for the successful conduct of his business. He has been associated with stock for practically his entire business life, and is able to place a correct value upon different grades of stock. A speculative spirit has also led him into other lines of profit, notably country and town properties, in the disposal of which he has invariably realized his monetary expectations. Much of his country land is rented out, as are also his town lots and a business block on the main street of Harrisburg, Ore. In 1900 he purchased a farm of eighty acres three miles northeast of this town, upon which he has sixty head of cattle and three hundred sheep, and to which he retires at times to get away from his many business responsibilities.

Born in Medina county, Ohio, August 16, 1847, Mr. Sabin is a son of Orson, and grandson of Charles Sabin, the latter of whom was born in the east and was the founder of the family in Medina county. At one time the grandfather owned and operated a farm in New York state, where his son Orson was born and reared. In Ohio Orson farmed and learned the carpenter's trade, and in 1868 removed to Berrien county, Mich., where he combined farming and carpentering with considerable success. In March, 1846, he married Ellen Brown, a native of Wayne county, Mich., who died in Medina county, Ohio, leaving two sons, of whom James Cyrus is the oldest. Orson Sabin died in November, 1863, at the age of thirty-nine.

Educated in the public schools of Michigan and Ohio, James Cyrus Sabin was reared on his father's farms, and welcomed the outbreak of the Civil war as an opportunity in which to gratify his love of adventure. His youth and home duties prevented his enlistment at the beginning of the strife, but when seventeen years old, in February, 1865, he enlisted in Company C, First Michigan Cavalry, and became a soldier in the Army of the Potomac. His company was consolidated with the Fifth, Sixth and Seventh Michigan Cavalry and sent to protect the mail route against the Sioux Indians, and on this campaign Mr. Sabin was detailed as a teamster in the quartermaster's department. After being discharged from the service December 7, 1865, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., he returned to Michigan, and turned his attention to logging in the northern part of the state. He also speculated in stock and lumber, and with considerable success to his credit decided to join the forces who were profiting by the superior opportunities in the northwest.

Arriving in Portland February 22, 1877, he spent a week in looking around, and then visited Salem, Dallas and Albany, in the latter town becoming associated in business for a short time with J. B. Roberts. He was variously employed for twenty-three months, and in 1878 returned to his old home in Michigan, remaining there until June of the following year. Again in Oregon, he spent the summer in herding sheep in the eastern part of the state, and in the fall came to Harrisburg and worked on farms for a couple of years. Since coming here in 1881 he has taken a prominent part in the advancement of the town, and established a home immediately after his marriage, October 2, 1881, with Mrs. Emma (Scott) White, who was born in Iowa, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1853. Her father, Samuel R. Scott, was born near St. Charles, Ohio, and from there moved to Iowa, remaining there until outfitting with ox-teams for the long journey over the plains. He spent the first winter in the west in Salem, and in the spring went to the mines of Josephine county, remaining there until 1873. Returning to Salem, he engaged in flour milling and afterward farming, and now lives retired in Harrisburg, spending a portion of each year with his son-in-law, Mr. Sabin. Clyde E., the oldest child and only son born to Mr. and Mrs. Sabin is living in Portland, and the daughter, Ethel H., is living with her parents. Mr. Sabin cast his first presidential vote for a Republican candidate, and has since given that party his unswerving allegiance. At present he is a member of the city council, an office to which he has given many terms of service. For the second time he is serving as master workman of Harrisburg Lodge No. 39, A. O. U. W. With his wife and children he is a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Sabin is a typical representative of western enterprise and thrift, and his undertakings have been characterized by conscientious dealings and upright and reliable business principles.

ROBERT McMURPHEY. The architect of his own fortunes, a man of action, possessing broad and charitable views, and aiding every well considered movement for the advancement of education, morality and the general well-being of the community, Robert McMurphey, president of the Willamette Valley Woolen Manufacturing Company, is one of the most enterprising and forceful of the citizens of Eugene. He is one of the younger generation of business men of Lane county, having been born in Pierce county, Wis., February 16, 1866. From a noble Scotch ancestry he has inherited the thrift and reliability which have proven the foundation of his success. Mr. McMurphey represents the sixth generation of his family in America. The family was founded in this country by Robert McMurphey, who came from the north of Ireland in colonial days, and arrived in New York with but sixpence in his pocket. His descendants lived principally in the state of Delaware, where George Washington McMurphey, father of the subject of this review, was born. He was the seventh son in a large family, and Robert McMurphey is the seventh son in his family, which consisted of thirteen children. The early life of G. W. McMurphey was spent in Delaware, where he was engaged in farming and milling. In young manhood he removed to Pierce county, Wis., where he purchased land from the Indians and inaugurated a farming interest in the wilderness. His marriage with Maria A. Rice in 1848 was the first wedding ceremony performed in Wisconsin territory. The Rice family located in Wisconsin in 1846, removing thence from Boston, Mass., where Mrs. McMurphey was born. Her father, James R. Rice, was also a native of that city. Mr. McMurphey resided on his farm fifty-five years, or until attaining the age of eighty-two years, and has but recently effected the sale of the property. He is now a resident of Prescott, Wis.

Equipped with a high school education and subsequent training received at the St. Paul (Minn.) Business College, Robert McMurphey began his independent career as a clerk in a Wisconsin office of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha Railroad Company, subsequently becoming a clerk in the office of the general passenger agent of the Great Northern Railroad Company at St. Paul. Being appointed private secretary to the superintendent of the Northern Pacific Railroad at Livingston, Mont., he remained there until 1889, when he removed to Portland, Ore., as private secretary for George H. Andrews, secretary of the Oregon & California Railroad Company. July 31, 1893, he was united in marriage with Alberta Shelton, a native of Salem, Ore., and the only daughter of Dr. T. W. Shelton, a prominent physician of Salem, who later was identified with business and professional affairs in Eugene. Dr. Shelton was the founder and first president of the Eugene Water Company, and by reason of an active and well appointed life accumulated a fortune. Upon his death in 1893 his son-in-law, Mr. McMurphey, removed to Eugene to look after his varied interests, and assumed the management of the water works, improving and enlarging their capacity, with which enterprise he is still connected.

In December, 1901, Mr. McMurphey incorporated the Willamette Valley Woolen Manufacturing Company, of which he has since been president and general manager. For the furtherance of the business the present modern and finely equipped mills were erected in that year for the manufacture of cloth and woolen goods in general, native Oregon wool being utilized. The plant is a four-set mill, is operated by water power, and gives employment to about eighty persons. For the sale of the output of the mills the concern has established branches in San Francisco, Chicago and Philadelphia, and the blankets, robes, flannels and other cloths manufactured find their way to foreign markets, as well as to the principal cities of the United States.

Attractive personal characteristics have placed Mr. McMurphey in touch with the most exclusive social life of Oregon, and among his personal friends are many men of great prominence in political, industrial and fraternal circles. He was one of the organizers, the first vice president and the second president of the Eugene Commercial Club, and still fills the latter office with dignity and satisfaction. Fraternally he is connected with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; Oregon Consistory No. 1, of Portland; the Knights of Pythias, in which he is past chancellor; the Ancient Order of United Workmen; the Modern Woodmen of America; the Woodmen of the World; the Independent Order of Red Men, and the Knights of Maccabees. In politics he is a Republican. He is a member of the Congregational Church, in which he serves as trustee. Five children have been born to him and his wife, named as follows in the order of their birth: Lois Alberta, Robert Shelton, Adah Antoinette, Elsie Mearle and George Winthrop.

Though a comparatively young man, Mr. McMurphey wields a wide and powerful influence among the business men of the Willamette valley. Perhaps the foundation of his strength among his fellowmen is the high public spirit he has always exhibited. In all those movements which have for their aim the elevation of the moral tone of the community or the advancement of the material interests in other departments of life, educational, social, religious, commercial and industrial, he has taken an active interest, always exhibiting an unselfish spirit. By men of discriminating intelligence he has come to be regarded as a high-minded man of affairs, whose chief aim is an honorable business success and the elevation of the city of Eugene to the highest rank among the cities of the northwest which it is possible to attain.

CLARENCE FREDERICK SOMERS Practical and businesslike in all his methods and dealings, C. F. Somers has combined with these sturdy qualities an enterprising spirit which well fits him for citizenship in a comparatively new country. He makes his home in Eugene, Lane county, and since the fall of 1902 has acted as president of the Eugene Planing Mill Company, of which he was one of the organizers. The vice president is P. J. Olsen, the secretary and treasurer being P. Lorenzen. They have erected a new mill on Lawrence street, the dimensions of which are 44x80 feet, and have equipped it with all modern machinery, including a thirty-horsepower steam engine and a dry kiln, where they turn out all kinds of planing-mill stock.

There were six children born in the Somers family, five of whom are now living, the second being C. F. Somers, who was born in St. Johnsbury, Vt., April 14, 1851. His father was Frederick A. Somers, a native of Barnet, Vt., and though a stonecutter by trade he followed farming throughout the principal part of his life. In 1853 he removed to Lombard, Ill., and later located in Doniphan, Neb., where his death occurred. He married Sarah E. Hardy, a native of Bangor, Me., born in 1828, the daughter of Capt. Charles Hardy, who followed the sea for a livelihood and was thereby lost. Mrs. Somers is now living in Doniphan, Neb. C. F. Somers was reared in Illinois on his father's farm, and interspersed his home duties with an attendance at the district school. He remained at home until attaining his majority, when he became an apprentice at the carpenter's trade, in Woodstock, Ill., where he served for two years. From that city he settled in Rockford, of the same state, and engaged in the prosecution of his trade until December, 1877, when he removed to Doniphan, Neb. There he became the owner of eighty acres of railroad land which he proceeded to improve, at the same time engaging in contracting and building in that city. Becoming dissatisfied with the existing conditions of Doniphan, he decided to remove to the west, and in 1890 he located in Baker City, Ore., where he was employed for eleven months in a planing mill, and in 1891 he located in Portland and followed his trade until the fall of 1892. He then purchased nine and a half acres of land four miles west of the city of Eugene and engaged in contracting and building here, which he continued successfully until the fall of 1902, when he withdrew from that employment to enter upon his present work. This business is rapidly becoming one of the principal industries of Eugene and is adding very materially to the business prestige and future growth of the city.

In Rockford, Ill., Mr. Somers was married to Miss Elizabeth Elwick a native of that state, and their two children are Daisy and Dorilla. In religion Mr. Somers is a member of the Christian Church, in which he officiates as a deacon, and in politics he has always been a staunch and earnest Republican. Personally, he is a man of many fine qualities and is liberal and enterprising as a citizen, worthy to be named among the representative men of Eugene.

MRS. EMALINE WALLIS. Enjoying the affection and esteem of a younger generation while occupying the position of honor which belongs to her as a pioneer, Mrs. Emaline Wallis is one of the connecting links between the early days and the present affluence and prosperity of Oregon, living and faithfully laboring in the one, which service has given her the right to ease in the present.

Mrs. Wallis was in maidenhood Emaline Lindley, born in Nashville, Tenn., the daughter of Jonathan Lindley, of South Carolina, where her grandfather, also Jonathan Lindley, was a planter. The father was a farmer and became a stock-raiser in Tennessee, when he removed to Cedar county, Mo., where his death occurred at the age of fifty-five years. His wife was formerly Clara Ann Terry, a native of Georgia. She died at the age of eighty years, at the home of Mrs. Wallis, having crossed the plains with her in 1852. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Lindley, seven attained maturity and two are now living, Mrs. Wallis being the only one in Oregon. She was reared in Missouri from her seventh year, and received her education in a little log schoolhouse, where the distribution of knowledge was conducted in a primitive way. February 18, 1847, she married Matthew Wallis, who was born in North Carolina and had come to Missouri when quite a young man, where he became a farmer and stock-raiser. In 1852 this family outfitted with ox-teams, two wagons, some loose cattle and necessary supplies and set out upon the journey which meant so much in those early days. They left Missouri April 15 and arrived at Foster's, September 13, the trip having been made over the old Barlow route, during which they had encountered the Indians at Snake river, when the further progress of the party was disputed. They succeeded, however, in making their escape, and this was their most serious trouble during the journey.

On their arrival in Oregon, Mr. Wallis took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located two and a half miles west of Eugene, Lane county, and there erected a hewed log house which is still standing as a type of the early habitations of the country. Into the improvement and cultivation of this farm, both Mr. and Mrs. Wallis put the strength and energy of their young lives, making that their home for many years. In 1873 they removed to the city of Eugene, but still conducted their farming interests, adding to their property by continued purchase until the estate numbers besides the original claim over a thousand acres, which is now utilized as a modern stock farm and also in the cultivation of grain, this property being rented at present. A handsome residence was built in Eugene, and there Mr. Wallis died July 17, 1895. He was a member of the Christian Church in which he officiated as deacon. In politics he was a Democrat.

Since the death of her husband Mrs. Wallis continues to reside in Eugene. Of her family of six children Clara married John Duncan and resides near Dayton, Wash.; Alice became the wife of John Welch, of Portland; Margaret married Rufus Edmunson, of Eugene; Webster is a farmer located near Dayton, Wash.; M. Sneed is a clerk in the sheriff's office in this county; and Harris L. is a farmer of Eugene. Mrs. Wallis is a member of the Christian Church and a Democrat. Through the membership of her husband with the Royal Arch Masons she belongs to the Eastern Star.

FRANCIS FELLER. One who desires to know the extent of the farming possibilities of Marion county need look no further than the splendidly equipped farm of Francis Feller, which stretches out over eight hundred and sixty acres in extent, and is located four miles from Butteville. This property is well tiled and ditched, has modern barns and outhouses, and its fences are kept in good shape by a painstaking and orderly owner. Until 1884 he carried on general farming and stock-raising exclusively, but that year he put out twelve acres in hops, and since then from time to time has increased his acreage of that product, until at present the hop pickers have to wander over seventy acres. This is probably the largest hop enterprise in the county.

Until his fourteenth year Francis Feller was reared on a farm in Lorraine, a province which at that time belonged to France, but which was ceded to Germany in 1871, where he was born July 28, 1840, and where his father was extensively engaged as a horticulturist, and more especially a grower of grapes for wine-making. In 1855 the ancestral property was disposed of and the family embarked for America in a sailing vessel, forty days later moving slowly into the great harbor of New York City. At Galena, Ill., the father bought a farm, and two years later, in 1857, Francis Feller came to Oregon with Peter Feller, of whom he borrowed the money for transportation via the isthmian route. From Portland he came to Butteville, June 6, 1857, and in the vicinity of the town found work on the farm of William Case. For the following few years he tried his luck in the mines of Idaho, and upon returning to Oregon felt dissatisfied, so again visited the mines in 1863. This time he remained for a year and a half, and was so successful that upon his return he was able to purchase for cash a farm of four hundred and twenty acres, the same being now occupied by Jacob M. Miller. He remained on this farm and made many improvements, but finally disposed of it in 1875, and purchased the eight hundred and sixty acres upon which he now lives, and which is located four miles from Butteville.

March 12, 1865, Mr. Feller was united in marriage with Miss Reuamah Whitney, of which union there were born nine children, the order of their birth being as follows: James P., a farmer near Butteville; William, a resident of British Columbia; Alfred and Charles, living on the home farm; Elizabeth, wife of Clarence Beringer, of Benton county, Ore.; Nellie, wife of Clarence Scheurer of Portland; Hattie; Annie; and Ida. The faithful mother of this large family died October 1, 1892, at the age of forty-five years. January 8, 1895, Mr. Feller married Ida Garrett, who was born in Clackamas county, a daughter of Thomas Garrett, who crossed the plains in 1852 from Missouri and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Marquam. One daughter, Ivy, was born of the second union of Mr. Feller.

Although his large farm is a wearing responsibility, Mr. Feller finds ample time to interest himself in political and other matters in his county, and although he has been defeated in his candidacy for the legislature and as county commissioner, his showing has been a good one, considering that his political faith is contrary to his Republican environment. His liberal and progressive ideas of farming have resulted in a keen interest in the welfare of his fellow agriculturists, and in this connection he was one of the organizers of the Farmers' Fire Insurance Company, has been president for three years, and is still a director. He is also one of the organizers and chief promoters of the Hop Growers' Fire Insurance Company, and has been a director therein for many years. For more than twenty years he has been identified with the Masonic fraternity, and is now a member of the Cham-poeg Lodge No. 27, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and Multnomah Chapter, of Salem. He is also a member of Protection Lodge No. 2, Ancient Order of United Workmen, of Salem. Mr. Feller bears an enviable reputation in the vicinity of Hubbard, and in fact is known throughout the length and breadth of Marion county as one of its substantial and thoroughly reliable citizens.

WALTER T. WILES. The term "captains of industry" is a familiar one of the day and has arisen from the conditions existing in the world when business activity has replaced the records of war and conquest in the world's history. The men who awaken public attention and regard are those who control the large commercial, industrial and financial interests or manage the professional labors. Each city has its representatives who have worthily won this title, and in Corvallis Walter T. Wiles is a representative of this class. He is today the cashier of the First National Bank of Corvallis, a man of keen discrimination in business, of sound judgment and unflagging industry.

Born in Benton county, near Wells, June 17, 1860, he is the fourth in a family of seven children whose parents were John and Martha Ann (Hughart) Wiles, respected and honored pioneer settlers of Oregon, who are represented elsewhere in this work. His childhood days were passed on the old homestead and his early education was acquired in the public schools. Subsequently he entered the Oregon Agricultural College and later he was engaged in farming and stock-raising until May, 1887, when he was appointed by President Cleveland to the position of inspector of customs under Q. A.

Brooks, collector for the district of Puget Sound, Wash., the custom house being at Port Townsend, that state. Mr. Wiles remained in charge of his duties for some time and then resigned in order to return to Oregon and take charge of the home farm. Later he entered the pharmacy of Foshay & Mason at Albany, Ore., and in due time became prescription clerk. In 1890 he resigned that position and returned to Corvallis, where he became one of the incorporators of the First National Bank. He was elected a member of the board of directors and assistant cashier and later he was also chosen to the position of vice president of the bank, holding the two positions until November, 1895, when, upon the death of W. T. Peet, the cashier, Mr. Wiles was elected his successor and since that time has filled the responsible position which he now occupies. The success achieved and the high standing of the First National Bank are due in no small degree to his ability as a bank official. His affable manner, courteous treatment of the clients of the institution, his straightforward dealing and his accuracy in all transactions with the public—these inspire the greatest confidence, and thus in association with other officers in the institution, he has placed the bank upon the substantial plane which it now occupies, ranking it among the most reliable banks of the entire state. Mr. Wiles is also largely interested in farming, and owns a part of the old family homestead near Wells. This is a well improved place in which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of the Aberdeen Polled Angus cattle.

On October 8, 1890, in Linn county, Ore., was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Wiles and Miss Mary Brandon, a native of that county and a daughter of Alexander Brandon, who was born in Madison county, Ind. Her paternal grandfather, Moses Brandon, was a native of Pennsylvania and when a young man removed to Madison county, Ind., where he married a Kentucky lady. Subsequently he took up his abode in Minnesota, where his remaining days were passed. Alexander Brandon crossed the plains to the Willamette valley when a young man, the year of his emigration being 1851. Here he married Mrs. Armina (Whipple) Andrews, who was born near Meadville, in Crawford county, Pa., a daughter of Albert Whipple, also a native of the Keystone state. She first married Harrison Andrews and removed to Ashtabula county, Ohio. About 1863 Mr. and Mrs. Andrews started for the northwest by way of the Panama route, but a few days after leaving Panama Mr. Andrews died. His widow then continued her way to Oregon and in the year 1865 she gave her hand in marriage to Mr.

Brandon. By her marriage with Mr. Andrews she became the mother of one son, C. L. Andrews, who is now chief deputy collector of customs in Skagway, Alaska. Mr. and Mrs. Brandon still reside upon the old donation claim at Plainview, Linn county, Ore., which Mr. Brandon took up as a home when he came to the northwest as a pioneer settler. Five children were born of their marriage, namely: Mrs. B. Whealdon, of Idaho; Mrs. Wiles; Alfred, who is living on the old homestead; Mrs. O. G. Chamberlain, of Athena, Ore.; and Anna, who resides at home. Mrs. Wiles was educated in Albany College, and is a most estimable lady. Unto our subject and his wife has been born but one daughter, a lovely and affectionate child named Frances Alberta. Mr. Wiles belongs to the Ancient Order of the United Workmen and to Corvallis Cabin of the Native Sons, of which he is the treasurer. Although his time is largely taken up by extensive and important business interests, he never neglects his duty as a Christian and is a useful and active member of the First Baptist Church of Corvallis. He is now serving on its board of trustees and during the building of the house of worship and for several years afterward he served as clerk of the board. He has also been very active in Sunday school work. In politics he is a Democrat where national issues and questions are involved, but at local elections does not consider himself bound by party ties. His unswerving purpose, his unquestioned fidelity, his unflinching honesty and his unchanging will have commanded the highest respect of all, and there is in Corvallis no one held in warmer esteem than this native son of Oregon.

CHARLES O. PETERSON. Few of the thousands of people who take advantage of the product known as excelsior, in the loose meshes of which can be transported in perfect safety to the uttermost parts of the earth the most costly or fragile articles, realize to what extent its manufacture is a money-making and employment proposition. A visit to the factory and warehouses of the plant of C. O. Peterson and W. J. Royse at Eugene, would convince the most casual observer that he is in the midst of a live, substantial, and far-reaching business, based upon sound commercial principles, and contributing to an enormous outstanding trade. Especially would one gain a complete understanding of the business were one accompanied on the tour of inspection by Mr. Peterson, the junior member of the firm, whose many years of practical experience in this line qualify him to speak authoritatively. The plant has a few protected patents not known to others similarly equipped, besides the most modern machinery, ten machines being operated the year around. The exclusive machinery facilitates the manufacture of the product, the capacity being ten tons per day of twenty-four hours. This output of course necessitates a large amount of wood that must be kept on hand, and from two thousand and five hundred to six thousand cords are continually in process of seasoning, the latter an absolute necessity in this department of manufacture. Balmwood alone is used to make the thin shavings, and the banks of the Willamette yield up many trees in the course of a year. Once finished, the product is pressed into bales of one hundred and forty pounds each, average weight, and shipped to different parts of Oregon, California, Washington and Utah. The two large buildings at the corner of Sixth and High streets are supplemented by warehouses holding many tons, and the whole enterprise is adequately protected from fire by the best hydrant and fire system known in the west. From sixty to seventy-five hands are employed to cut wood for the mill, about five months of the year, and many more are required for the operation of the plant.

Mr. Peterson, who embodies in his make-up the push, energy and force of the successful western business man, is a native of Iowa, and was born near Lansing, December 20, 1868. Nine years later, about 1877, he accompanied his parents to Lacerter, Wash., where his father died, and where he was left to support himself at the age of twelve years. He had much to be thankful for, however, as he was strong-limbed and stout-hearted. For two years he worked on a farm for his clothes and board and the privilege of attending school for a few months, and two years also he spent on a farm in Benton county, Ore. At the age of sixteen he arrived in Portland, and after various attempts at employment began working for Henry Nicholi of the Portland Excelsior Mill, remaining there for about two years. He seemed to take naturally to the work, advanced rapidly, and was promoted even further after entering the Willamette Falls Excelsior Works at Oregon City. Here he became foreman of the mill, but his work was interrupted by the death of his mother and the necessity of temporarily withdrawing to settle the estate. Afterward, he went to Lebanon and engaged in the excelsior manufacturing business for himself, purchasing an interest in the concern of O'Neill Brothers, which operated under the name of O'Neill Brothers & Peterson for six years. While thus employed Mr. Royse, his present partner, purchased the O'Neill interests and in this manner the business was continued in Lebanon until September, 1899. Owing to superior facilities for conducting the business it was removed to Eugene, and the present mill and warehouses erected.

In Oregon City Mr. Peterson married Hannah Stuart, a native of Iowa, and whose father, Joel A. Stuart, a builder by occupation and now living retired in Seattle, Ore., came to Oregon with his family in 1868. Albert and Myma, the two children born to Mr. and Mrs. Peterson, are living at home. Mr. Peterson has taken an active interest in Democratic politics, and for two terms was a member of the town of Lebanon council. He is a member and past officer in the Knights of the Maccabees.

JAMES M. STAFFORD. A member of the legislature in 1887, and again in 1889, James M. Stafford has also served Lane county in many other official capacities, elected thereto by his fellow Republican townsmen. Under public observation he has proven himself possessed of clear judgment, and disinterested devotion to the public welfare, at the same time enjoying the satisfaction of having been elected without canvassing, or any solicitation of votes. A resident of Oregon since his tenth year, he was reared on the farm which is still his home, and which was taken up by his parents, William and Priscilla J. (Ramsey) Stafford, in 1852. The parents were born and married in Indiana, and at an early day removed to Atchison county, Mo., where their son, James M., was born May 18, 1842. Missouri continued to be the home of the Staffords until 1852, when the father outfitted with three wagons, eleven yoke of oxen, fifteen cows and three horses, out of which he had, at the end of his journey, fourteen steers two cows and two horses. From May until November the train moved slowly over the plains, the travelers leading for the most part an uneventful existence, and meeting with little resistance from Indians, weather or illness. In the fall the father took the three hundred and twenty acres above referred to, and in November erected a one-room log cabin, about 18x18 feet in ground dimensions. Fortunately the land was mostly prairie, and more easy to cultivate than the heavily timbered properties. Success attended his efforts, and in 1866 he sold out and moved to a farm near Halsey, Linn county, still later moving to Umatilla county in order to engage in extensive wheat-raising. In 1888 he took up his residence in Tacoma, Wash., and died there June 30 of that year at the age of seventy-four years. For the last three years of her life his wife lived with her son, James M., her death occurring January 23, 1903, at the age of eighty four years. Since 1853 she had been a member of the Christian Church, during which year she joined the church with her husband, both working zealously thereafter for the promotion of the cause of truth and morality.

The first departure from accustomed grooves in the life of James M. Stafford was when he went to Idaho, and with the rough and daring element in search of fortunes in the mines experienced a decided change from the quiet farming existence. Fourteen months sufficed to convince him of the dignity and usefulness of the life he had left behind, and returning to it, he has never ceased to pay it the homage of a sincere, practical and industrious devotion. In 1866 he bought four hundred acres of his father's farm, and October 25, 1866, married and brought to the old home, Sarah Hardman, daughter of Samuel and Mary (Backus) Hardman. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Stafford eleven children were born: Of these Marion F. is the oldest; Lina F. is the wife of Findley Lena; Clara M. is the wife of John Haines of Eugene; Geneva M. is the wife of Thomas Seavey; Laura V.; Pearl; Fred J. died at the age of fourteen years; Walter; William G.; Edgar L.; and Esther B.

At the present time Mr. Stafford owns five hundred acres of land in the Mohawk valley, seven miles northeast of Springfield, and carries on principally stock-raising, having large numbers of Shorthorn cattle. In addition to his political services he was prominent in the Mohawk Grange during its existence, serving as master, and in many ways promoted the best interests of the association, and for many years was master of the Pomona Grange. Mr. Stafford enjoys the prestige arising from a successful career, and from the possession of those personal attributes which win and retain friends, and inspire confidence in those with whom he is associated.

JESSE H. SMITH. A busy, energetic and capable life has been that of Jesse H. Smith, who has long been a resident of Lane county, his home being in the vicinity of Natron. He was born in Polk county, Mo., February 20, 1837, and came here in 1849 with his parents, for a more detailed account of whom refer to the sketch of William F. Smith, the oldest son of the family, given on another page of this work. The duty of this young emigrant while on the trip was to guard the cattle, and after his arrival in Oregon he lived the life of a pioneer's son in his father's home until 1854, when he helped to build the first courthouse in Eugene, there being only four other men detailed on the work. In 1856 he went to the mines in southern Oregon and located with others on Grave creek, where he took out a half cupful of gold every day, but after nine days they were driven out by the Indians. Returning to his father's farm he remained there until the death of the latter, in the meantime purchasing a farm of three hundred and thirty-three acres, where he lived for a year. This property he sold and invested the proceeds in the farm which he now occupies, at the present time owning seven hundred acres of land, it having been reduced from twelve hundred by the distribution of a large amount to his children. Throughout his life he has carried on general farming and stock-raising, and has also been largely interested in the dairy business.

The marriage of Mr. Smith occurred in 1856, and united him with Miss Mary Grigsby, and of the five children born to them Sadie is the wife of John Laird, of Garfield, Whitman county, Wash.; Emma is the wife of James Wallace, in this vicinity; Cora is the wife of Newton Lindley, also in this vicinity; Walter is a merchant in Natron; and John died at the age of twenty-one years. In his political relations Mr. Smith has always been a stanch Republican, and through the influence of this party his son Walter was made postmaster at Natron. In religious views the family are all in accord, their membership being in the Christian Church.

ALBERT S. WALKER. The advancement and prosperity of the thriving little city of Springfield, Lane county, Ore., is largely due to the progressive and energetic captains of industry, who early perceived its advantages as a business center and have been influential in developing its resources. Prominent among these is Albert S. Walker, now one of its foremost citizens and a prosperous real estate dealer and insurance agent. A native of Missouri, he was born January 11, 1846, in Greene county, a son of the late William Walker, an Oregon pioneer.

William Walker was born in Georgia, but spent a large part of his earlier life in Chattanooga, Tenn. Going to Greene county, Mo., in 1843, he lived there four years, working as a millwright and a cabinetmaker. Coming across the plains in an ox-team train in 1853, he located first in Lane county, Ore., taking up three hundred and sixty acres of land near Creswell, where he lived four years. Removing to Eugene in 1857, he established himself in mercantile pursuits, dealing in drugs and general merchandise until 1861. Investing then in land near Eugene, he carried on ranching ten years in that location, and then, in 1871, purchased a farm at Pleasant Hill, where he pursued his independent vocation until his retirement. He attained a good old age, dying at Springfield, Ore., in 1881, at the age of seventy-eight years. One of the representative pioneers of this section of the state, he rendered material assistance in developing one of the best counties in Oregon, and was an important factor in advancing its educational, moral and political status. In his younger days he was a Whig, and afterward affiliated with the Republican party, and was in hearty sympathy with the Abolitionists. He married Mary Shields, who was born in Georgia, and died, at the age of seventy-six years, in Eugene, Ore. Of the nine children that blessed their union, Albert S. was the only son.

Having been but seven years of age when he came with his parents to Lane county, Albert S. Walker obtained the rudiments of his education in the common schools, afterwards attending the old Columbia College, at Eugene, for two years, finally graduating therefrom. Assuming charge of the farm which his father owned in the vicinity of Eugene, he conducted it from 1862 until 1881, being successful as a farmer. Locating then in Springfield, Mr. Walker established himself as a blacksmith, winning a large and lucrative patronage in this vicinity. Since retiring from his trade in the spring of 1903, Mr. Walker has been actively engaged in the real estate and insurance business, in which he is meeting with encouraging success, handling both farm and town property. He has acquired a good share of this world's goods, and owns a well improved ranch of forty acres, lying about three miles southeast of Springfield.

Mr. Walker married, in Polk county, Ore., in 1868, Miss Sarah L. Higgins, who was born in Massachusetts. Her father, the late Seldon Higgins, also a native of Massachusetts, was a dyer by trade, and worked for a number of years in the mills of Woburn, Mass. Leaving his native state in 1851, he came with his family by train to the Missouri river, and then across the plains with ox-teams, to Oregon. Locating in Polk county, he purchased three hundred and sixty acres of land in Spring Valley, and was there engaged in general farming until his death, at a venerable age, in 1898. In common with the other pioneers of his county, he labored with untiring energy to develop a farm from the wild country in which he had settled, and was successful in his efforts. Mr. and Mrs. Walker are the parents of eight children, all living at home, namely: Herbert E., William F., Mary B., Ralph Gladstone, Jessie May, Grace, Ida and Joy. A man of broad and liberal views, alive to the important needs of the day, Mr. Walker has been influential in educational and political circles, and besides serving ten years as school director has the distinction of having served in 1891 as the first mayor of Springfield. He has likewise served as councilman, and is one of the leading Republicans of the city. For twenty-two years he has been identified with the independent Order of Odd Fellows, being a charter member and past noble grand of the subordinate lodge, and a member of the encampment. He also belongs to the fraternal order of Woodmen of the World. He is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a trustee, and also the superintendent of its Sunday School.

BRUNO C. VITUS. The road to success, with its innumerable windings, furnishes a never-ending theme to the old and young, the latter because they desire, and the former because their own course still charms with its gain, or endears with its sorrow and misfortune. Each succeeds in his own way, yet certain underlying principles light the careers of the truly successful. These same principles lead more often through hard and disappointing ways, as many right in our own midst might testify, and were one to select an example of the truth of the saying it were impossible to find a better than that furnished by a whole family, banded together and working for their mutual benefit, and that one in Lane county. The family referred to is that of Augustus J. F. Vitus, himself one of the most prominent of the pioneers, and the father of sons who would scorn the idea of failure in life.

Bruno C. Vitus, the second child of the five sons and three daughters of Augustus J. F. Vitus, was born in Dunkirk, N. Y., December 17, 1852, and his removal to Philadelphia, Pa., followed not many months later. He was twelve years old when the family located in Springfield, Ill., where he attended school for nine years, and then accompanied his parents to Breckenridge, Mo., in 1873. Long years before, the sons and father had established a sort of co-operative existence, inspired by peculiarly strong family ties, and the harmonious blending of dispositions and aspirations. They had not been successful in Missouri, and when they arrived in Oregon in 1878 the family assets consisted of thirty-two dollars and a wonderful amount of determination. A cook-stove was purchased for thirty dollars, some tinware for the remaining two dollars, and a sack of flour was purchased on credit. It was necessary for all hands to start out at once to earn money for the necessities of life, and father and sons succeeded in finding work on the surrounding farms during the first summer. That fall they rented a farm, and went in debt for a considerable amount, the following year blasting their expectations, owing to rust on the wheat. They were obliged to borrow $4,000, paying fifteen per cent interest, and the drain of such an expenditure, even with the most favorable crops, can be imagined, but hardly appreciated. Nevertheless, this difficulty was overcome by pluck and perseverance, and in time the sum of $25,000 was paid in full on the farm. After getting started this was comparatively easy, and they often made as high as $13,000 a year on grain and stock. For sixteen years father and four sons worked together on the six hundred and ninety-five acres, their name standing for all that was reliable and substantial in business, and fine and honorable in character.

In 1894 Mr. Vitus left the home farm and with his earnings bought his present farm of three hundred and twenty-seven acres two and a half miles northeast of Springfield. This by no means represents the whole of his investments, for he owns fifty lots in an addition to the city of Eugene on the south and has other property scattered over the county. For his first wife Mr. Vitus married, in 1894, Theresa Kimmel, who lived only six years after her marriage. The present Mrs. Vitus was formerly Dorothy Blume, daughter of John F. and Henrietta (Kriese) Blume, who was married in 1900, and who is the mother of two children, Maurice Bruno and Cosima Dorothy. The Vitus home is a pleasant and hospitable one, surrounded by well kept lawns, and outhouses and fences of modern and substantial make. The farm is all valley land, and Mr. Vitus devotes the greater part to stock and hog raising. He is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Eugene Lodge of Elks. Personally and from a business standpoint, Mr. Vitus exerts a wide influence in Lane county, his reputation resting upon his own individual efforts, rather than upon any dignity and honor cast by his capable and prominent father. He is broad-minded, enterprising and public-spirited, fostering education, morality and integrity.

AUGUSTUS J. F. VITUS, JR. Yet another of the sons who are helping to maintain a standard established by an earnest and capable pioneer is Augustus J. F. Vitus, Jr., the namesake of his sire, and in many respects the counterpart of the older man. Mention having been made elsewhere of the ambitious man who brought his family to Oregon in 1878, and who has given to his adopted state sons of whom she may well be proud, it is necessary only to say that in his home he enforced obedience, and reared his children to improve and use the faculties with which they had been endowed. Augustus J. F., Jr., was born near Springfield, Ill., August 8, 1867, and was therefore eleven years of age when he came to this state.

After coming to the west Mr. Vitus completed the education begun in the public schools of the middle west, and with his brothers and father conducted their large stock-raising and milling business. He then identified himself with his brother, Robert, leaving his other brothers and father sole possessors of the former enterprise. The two brothers own about a thousand acres of land, six hundred of which are given up to grain cultivation, and the balance to stock and general farming. No more enterprising or successful young men are contributing to the upbuilding of this section, nor are any more enthusiastic in their praise of the state which has given them an assured income, as well as a pleasant home and genial friends. Mr. Vitus was happily married to Laura Westrope, the ceremony having taken place November 19, 1902. From her native Sonoma county, Cal., Mrs. Vitus seems to have brought a disposition and character tinged with the brightness and cheerfulness always expected of the daughters of California. This young couple are well educated and progressive, alert to the happenings in the outside world, and by no means confining themselves to the borders of their farm. Both are members and workers in the Baptist Church, and Mr. Vitus is a stanch Republican, although he is never troubled with official longings, and would in all probability refuse tendered offices. He has many friends in the neighborhood and county, and is destined to take an important part in the development of agriculture and stock-raising.

JAMES M. SPORES. One of the largest family gatherings which came to Oregon in 1847 was that gotten together by Jacob C. Spores, the founder of an honored name and a large farming and ferrying interest in Lane county. His son, James M., to perpetuate whose memory this sketch is written, and whose death on his farm near Springfield, February 22, 1900, caused widespread regret, was born while his parents were living in Winnebago county, Ill., May 19, 1835. In 1846 the family removed to Missouri, and in the spring of 1847 carried out the object which had inspired their emigration, the making of a home among the crude but promising conditions of the northwest. Jacob C. Spores reared a large family, some of whom married young and had children of their own, all living around the old folks, or on nearby farms. These helped to swell the number of the party with western aspirations, and all lent a helping hand in the extensive preparations required for the overland jaunt. Many horses and cattle accompanied the expedition, and in due time, and with the usual number of unpleasant occurrences, the west was reached, holding out to the industrious and resourceful pioneers varied and giant possibilities.

The grandfather settled on a farm near Coburg, and the town afterward springing up on a portion of his land, he was the very first thus to identify his fortunes with the now prosperous locality. At that time a man by the name of Eugene Skinner occupied the townsite of Eugene. Jacob C. Spores set about making himself comfortable in his new surroundings, and on his section of land erected a log cabin near where the bridge has since been built. He regarded the river from the standpoint of utility, and, knowing that many must pass and repass before much had been accomplished in the way of upbuilding the neighborhood, he started a ferry across, which was as useful as it was novel and enterprising. He was the architect and builder of the ferry-boat, making it out of rough timber, a strong but unwieldy structure, calculated to weather the stress and storms of a long and varied career. The boat was not erected too soon, for during 1848-9 hundreds of miners passed that way on their way to California, and all were glad to avail themselves of the easy transportation, thus swelling the receipts from this pioneer water-craft, and giving the ferryman a good start in life. With the advent of the bridge the boatman's occupation disappeared, and something of the pathetic surrounds the thought of the modern innovation, for many years had passed since the cumbersome craft first glided over the water, and many memories had been stored up in the mind of the ferryman. It was necessarily a part of his life, and as such was hard to part with. He continued to make his home on the old place for the remainder of his life, both himself and wife living to an advanced age.

While James M. Spores was driving an ox-team across the plains for his father he dreamed many dreams, and fortunately was able to realize more than does the average dreamer in this world of chance. A turning point in his life was his marriage, March 27, 1853, with Mary C. Thomas, member of one of the pioneer families of Oregon, and a native of Calhoun county, Mich., where she was born in 1832. Her parents, Jonathan and Jeanette (Simons) Thomas, were born in New York state, moved soon after to Michigan, and from there went to Illinois in 1836. In Winnebago county the father took up government land, and, in the spring of 1852, crossed the plains with seven yoke of oxen, three cows and a mare, his family at that time consisting of his wife and five children, of whom Mrs. Spores is the oldest. Louisa, the second daughter, married Frank Powers; Samuel lives near Coburg; Almira married John H. Milliron, and lives on the McKenzie place, and John lives on the home place near Coburg. The family were nine months in accomplishing the journey to Oregon, and their trip was characterized by all of the horror and dread of that great cholera year. At the end of the trip Mr. Thomas found that he had just two oxen and the mare with which to start life in the west, all of the other stock having died on the way. The following spring he took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Coburg, and here the remainder of his life was spent, his death occurring in 1876, at the age of seventy-seven years.

Shortly after his marriage Mr. J. M. Spores moved near the farm now occupied by his widow, and worked in the sawmill for a time, afterward returning to his father's farm and assisting him with the ferry-boat. In June, 1857, he located on the farm where his last days were spent, and which at the time consisted of one hundred and sixty acres. Practical and progressive, he utilized the most advanced ideas in further improving his farm, additional land being required as his interests increased in variety and extent, and in time he accumulated nearly one thousand acres. The farm is unrivalled for location, being five miles northeast of Springfield, on the McKenzie river, and in the Mohawk valley. Mr. Spores was sufficiently public-spirited to appreciate the duty of every able-bodied citizen from a political standpoint, and he gladly gave his services towards maintaining a high standard of excellence in county government. He was county commissioner for two terms, and served on the jury for sixteen years continuously. From early manhood he gave his moral and financial support to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and he was fraternally connected with the United Workmen. Since his death, his widow has continued to reside on the home place, and, assisted by her sons, expects to carry out the plans so well laid by her popular and highly respected husband. A large family was born to Mr. and Mrs. Spores, the oldest daughter, Arminda, being the wife of Thomas Jenkins, and living on the home place; John married Emma Drury, and lives near his wife's mother; George married Josie Clark; Mary S. is the wife of George Smith, of Coburg; Samuel lives in eastern Oregon; Irene is the wife of John Reneger, of this vicinity; Frank married Belle Barrett, and lives near his mother; Charles is engaged in mining at Nome, Alaska; Daniel married Kate Drury, and Leila lives in Portland. Mr. Spores was a man of leading characteristics, and he not only succeeded from a financial standpoint, but made many and true friends, leaving to those bearing his name the heritage of a nobly-lived and well-directed life.

HON. JAMES L. COLLINS. Prominent among the representative men of Polk county is Hon. James L. Collins, known not alone as one whose name was among the first to be identified with the American settlements in Oregon, but rather for his intimate relations with the permanent history of our commonwealth. Beginning in pioneer days, in the midst of undeveloped resources and a rude civilization, he gave himself wholly to the western cause, faithful in the pursuit of duty, whether in camp or field, as a soldier in defense of the settlers or a citizen in the material upbuilding of the country; through the changes of time and progression he has advanced his own interests and those of his adopted state by lifting himself to a position of exceptional prominence among the many who are entitled to the esteem and admiration of the present generation. The interest which attaches to the pioneers of Oregon is not inspired by curiosity, but rather by that affection which centers about the lives and deeds of those who blazed the trail for the westward march of progress. Before touching upon the life of Judge Collins we will give a brief outline of the ancestry to which he owes those characteristics which have enabled him to become a power among many hampering conditions. His maternal grandfather was a descendant of Thomas Wyatt, a man well known in the history of England through his opposition to the marriage of Queen Mary to Philip of Spain, and who was beheaded by her orders for his participation in the rebellion which occurred about 1554. Sir Henry Wyatt, the father of Thomas Wyatt, was a member of the privy council or Henry the Eighth. His maternal grandmother, Elizabeth Sea, was descended from the Duke of Argyll, while his father's mother was Jane Eddings, the representative of an old Virginia family. Smith Collins, the father of Judge Collins, was born in Orange county, Va., in 1804, the son of George and the grandson of William, both of whom were natives of the same location. The latter was an intimate friend of General Washington and served under him in the Revolutionary war. He was a Virginia planter and died in the Old Dominion. George Collins moved to Montgomery county, Mo., and later by a division of this county he found himself located in the new county of Warren, near Warrenton, where he owned a large tract of land on Barracks creek, and was engaged extensively in the culture of tobacco and corn. He served in the war of 1812, and died in Missouri in 1845.

Smith Collins was a boy of ten years when the British burned the city of Washington, and he heard the cannonading and saw the conflagration. His home remained in Virginia for many years, and at the age of eighteen he learned the tanner's trade at Port Republic, that state. On the completion of his apprenticeship he went to Fayetteville, N. C., where he worked as a journeyman for a Mr. Prince, and later removed to Cheraw Hill, S. C., and became foreman for H. G. Nelson. In 1827 he located in Missouri, where his father had previously settled, both being pioneers in this state of the middle west. He brought with him a little mare for which he was offered forty acres of land now in the heart of the city of St. Louis, which was then only a little french village with the greater part of the land about covered with black-jack. When the Collins family left the state, nineteen years later, St. Louis had become an important city of the south, with flourishing markets and substantial business houses. On his arrival in Missouri Mr. Collins became superintendent of the Stevenson tannery in St. Charles county, where he remained until 1829, when he opened a tanyard and shop near his father's home on Barracks creek. He was married the same year and shortly afterward his father-in-law, Douglas Wyatt, gave his daughter forty acres of land located on Chariton creek, where Mr. Collins subsequently established a tannery and conducted the same in connection with farming.

In 1846 Mr. Collins outfitted for the trip across the plains, having decided to become a pioneer of the northwest. Besides ten yoke of oxen he brought with him valuable loose cattle and horses upon a trip made memorable by innumerable hardships and dangers. They crossed the Kansas river, thence followed the Republican fork, and the Platte river, by Ft. Laramie, and on to the Black Hills. They were not molested by the Indians until they reached the Humboldt valley, in Nevada, but from there on they encountered considerable difficulties. One week was consumed in passing through the Umpqua canon, a distance of twelve miles, as they were compelled to bridge over the rocks, follow the streams, etc. Upon their arrival at the present site of Eugene City, they found but one house, that having been built by Eugene Skinner, but with no occupants. Here the subject of this sketch remained with the wagons and exhausted stock during the winter, while the rest of the family proceeded on pack-horses, to the settlements on the Luckiamute river, about sixty miles further north.

In the spring of 1847 Mr. Collins took up a donation claim located between the Luckiamute and Soap creek, in Polk county, and entered at once upon the work of reclaiming the land from its wilderness state. The stock which he had brought with him to Oregon he turned upon the open range. By energy, perseverance and management he acquired a large amount of property, in later years trading stock for land in the southern part of Polk county, which he retained until the time of his death. Mr. Collins had brought with him to Oregon several hundred dollars' worth of leather, the first brought into the state, and on his claim he established a small tannery which he conducted for several years. Mr. King, the first settler of King's valley employed him to finish some leather which he had previously tanned, but could not curry and finish.

Mr. Collins was married in 1829 to Miss Eliza Emily Wyatt, who was born near Mount Sterling, Ky., in 1812. She was a daughter of Douglas Wyatt, a native of Kentucky and pioneer of Warren county, Mo. Twelve children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Collins, namely: Jane E., who became the wife of M. M. Neeley, and died in Oregon; James Layton, the subject of this review; Francis M., of Dallas; George Smith, who was killed at the age of six years while crossing the plains; Eliza Melvina, of Dallas, the widow of William P. Shaw; Douglas Wyatt, of Klickitat county, Wash.; William Wallace, of Polk county; David Crockett, who was drowned in Forest creek in 1875; Alexander H., of Dallas; Emily A., who became the wife of Richard Wells, and died in Polk county; Mary I., the wife of Elvin Carter of Klickitat county, Wash.; and A. S., of Prineville, Ore. The eight children first mentioned were born in Missouri and accompanied their parents to Oregon, while the last four were born in Polk county. Mr. Collins died in 1872.

James Layton Collins was born in Warren county, Mo., May 9, 1833, and shortly before his thirteenth birthday he was en route for Oregon, a member of the first company that ever came by way of the Klamath lakes, and across the Siskiyou, Umpqua and Calapooia mountains into the Willamette valley. He was often detailed to drive the foremost team that broke down the thick sage brush upon the trackless waste and was thus in the van of danger and difficulty throughout the greater part of the trip. On October 10, the party arrived in the Willamette valley at the present site of Eugene City. There a great many of the hardships and perils of pioneer life fell upon the shoulders of Judge Collins, then a mere lad, the necessity of providing game in sufficient quantity for the support of himself and two sick companions, enforcing him to shoulder his gun, and with its breech breaking the ice in the sloughs and streams, wade through them in order to reach good hunting grounds on the other shore. In the spring of the following year he settled with his parents in Polk county where he helped to erect and improve their pioneer home. For several years he remained at home, assisting in the general work of the farm. During this period he followed out his natural inclinations and began to devote every spare moment to study; not being able to procure lights, he pursued his studies by the glow of the pitchwood fire in the rude fireplace, the foundation for knowledge having been laid in the subscription schools of his native state. After a few years, when the family could manage to get along without his assistance, he became a student in the old Oregon Institution at Salem, then conducted by Professor Hoyt, and which has since become Willamette University. Being under the necessity of working for his maintenance while attending school, he was first employed by Father Waller. Professor Hoyt soon recognized the intellectual qualities of the ambitious lad, and employed him to cut wood and to work in the campus garden, for these services paying him twenty-five cents per hour. He occupied a room in the upper story of the college building, and for two years put in many hours of hard labor daily, and soon became proficient in Greek and other branches.

In 1853 Judge Collins went to the mines of northern California, where he remained until the fall of 1855, when he returned to Oregon. The legislature being in session, he secured a position as reporter for the Democrat-Standard, and continued as such until the close of the session, during which the capital was removed from Corvallis to Salem. A few days before the adjournment of the legislature Capt. B. F. Burch organized Company B of the recruiting battalion of the first regiment of Oregon Mounted Volunteers, for service in the Yakima Indian war. Judge Collins at once enlisted, and after the adjournment of the assembly he joined the troops in the field on the Columbia river and participated in the hardships and perils which followed. He was with Col. Thomas R. Cornelius throughout his famous "horse-meat campaign," when the volunteers pursued the Indians for two months, being often reduced to the necessity of subsisting upon the horses captured from or abandoned by the Indians in their flight. He also took an active and honorable part in the battle of the Simcoe, which won for him the respect of his officers and the confidence and esteem of all his comrades in arms.

After the close of hostilities Judge Collins returned to Polk county and engaged in teaching school, at the same time continuing his studies. He had previously studied law under Hon. B. F. Harding and Hon. L. F. Grover while a resident of Salem, and in 1859 he made application for admission to the bar. Judge Wilson, then District Attorney, wrote the motion for his admission, a committee was appointed, consisting of Judges J. G. Wilson, George H. Williams and Ben Hayden, to examine him, and he was admitted November 19, of the same year. During the session of 1864 and the special session of 1865 he was chief clerk of the house of representatives. In 1869 he was appointed by Gov. Geo. L. Woods county judge of Polk county, and the same year was appointed by Judge Deady to the office of United States commissioner, which he has held up to the present time. He has served as deputy prosecuting attorney for several years and has been attorney for the state in managing the school fund of Polk county for the past fifteen years. In politics the judge is a Republican, though he had been a Democrat until the breaking out of the Civil war. At that time he abandoned that party and as a member of the state convention at Eugene City aided in organizing the Republican party for its first effective campaign in Oregon. He has also served as chairman of the county central committee, and was a member of the state central committee and has served as a member of the Dallas city council. As county superintendent of schools for two years he was active in the promotion of educational matters, being instrumental in the organization of Dallas College, and takes great interest in all movements pertaining to the general welfare of the community. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and served as trustee.

The marriage of Judge Collins occurred in Polk county in 1861, Miss Mary Whiteaker becoming his wife. She was born in De Kalb county, Ill., in 1846, the daughter of Benjamin Whiteaker, who was one of the pioneers of Polk county in 1847, and a relative of John Whiteaker, the first governor of Oregon. Mrs. Collins died in 1864, leaving one daughter, Nellie, who is a graduate of La Creole Academy, the state normal school at Monmouth, and the New York state normal college at Oswego, N. Y. She is now critic in the state normal school at Madison, S. D., which position she has occupied for the past ten years. On January 1, 1867, Judge Collins married for his second wife Miss Mary E. Kimes, a native of De Kalb county, Mo., and a daughter of Lewis Ray Kimes, who started with his family for Oregon in 1852 and was drowned while attempting to cross the Missouri river. His widow continued her journey to Oregon, locating in Yamhill county, where was born her son, Lewis Ray Kimes, now a prominent farmer of Polk county. To Judge and Mrs. Collins were born ten children, namely: Ray Smith, deceased; Edgar Layton, of Kalamazoo, Wash.; Mary, wife of Prof. E. E. Watts, of Washington county, Ore.; Ednelle, a teacher in the public schools of Dallas; Ben David, deceased; Ora; Frank Wyatt, a mechanical engineer in the Union Iron Works of San Fran-

In 1859 Judge Collins opened an office in Independence, but since 1860 has been continuously engaged in the practice of law in Dallas. By his contemporaries he is regarded as an able lawyer, a safe counselor, a strong pleader, well grounded in the principles of his chosen profession, and equipped with unexcelled ability to apply them correctly to the case in hand. A young attorney once cast reflections upon the integrity of Judge Collins. Governor Gibbs replied: "He is a man who may safely be trusted with uncounted gold." An attempt was once made to throw out of court a case in which Judge Collins was the attorney. Judge Boise, who presided, said: "Judge Collins has practiced before me, and has uniformly appeared with the best papers ever presented in my court." The motion was overruled.

This brief outline of the life record of Judge Collins illustrates what careful and thorough preparation, determination and perseverance, supplemented by a righteous ambition to attain a position of responsibility and honor, will accomplish. Many a young man of the present generation, or of generations yet to come, doubtless will find in the story of his life much that will prove an incentive to earnest and conscientious effort, and without these qualifications no man may hope to make a success of his elected vocation, regardless of the extent of his mental attainments.

GEORGE EBERHARD. To his appreciation of the dignity and usefulness of an agricultural life George Eberhard owes his finely improved farm in Marion county, and the competence which enables his family to enjoy the comforts and many of the luxuries of life. As long ago as 1860 his good judgment suggested the purchase of the three hundred and twenty acres which have been his home, and whereas at that time only sixty acres were cleared, his industry has completed the clearing of one hundred and fifty acres in all. All kinds of grain and general produce attain maturity upon the well tilled acres each year, and fine stock graze in contentment under the summer sun. This land is a portion of the old Peter Burke donation claim, and cost the present owner but $1,200. That its value has increased many fold in the meantime is apparent to all who visit this hospitable home, and note the progressive methods employed by the tactful, resourceful and diligent owner.

The state of Ohio has contributed many native sons to the upbuilding of Oregon, and to this class Mr. Eberhard belongs, he having been born near Bucyrus, Crawford county, November 25, 1832. When he was four years of age his parents removed to St. Joseph county, Mich., where he grew to manhood on a farm, and was educated principally in the public schools. As time went on he realized the limitations by which he was surrounded on the Michigan farm and wisely determined to strike out for himself, although in a strange land and with but scant available resources. Accordingly, in 1855, when about twenty-two years of age, he set forth for San Francisco by way of Panama. Arriving at his destination, he went at once to the mines in Eldorado county. Altogether he spent about five years in California, alternating between mining and ranching, and in 1859 came to Oregon, locating in Marion county.

In January, 1866, Mr. Eberhard was united in marriage with Louise Jones, and of the six children born to this union three are living: Barbara, the wife of Mr. Austin; John P.; and George A. David L., Benjamin F. and Walter are deceased. Mr. Eberhard is a Democrat in politics, and has held the offices of school director and supervisor for many years. Fraternally he is a member of the Grange.

CHARLES P. FULLERTON. The romance-tinged history of the early days in Oregon were sadly incomplete without due mention of the career of that pioneer of pioneers, C. P. Fullerton, at present living in retirement in Corvallis. That the mention of a name in the owner's locality calls up instinctively the dominating characteristics which his friends of many years have carefully observed is invariably true, and in Mr. Fullerton's case the keynote of his influence would seem to be an absolute and unquestioned integrity. With this admirable trait for a foundation, he has traveled the weary years since 1846, accomplishing substantially and conservatively, and in such way that his position has never been swayed by passing events. Born in Troy, Lincoln county, Mo., September 1, 1830, he comes of Revolutionary stock, for his grandfather, Arannah, left his home near Pembroke, Mass., and stacked his musket on Revolutionary battlefields. He served from September 28, 1777, to November 1, 1780, enlisting as a private and being mustered out as sergeant. On the Massachusetts farm Rufus, the father of C. P. Fullerton, was born, and from his native state removed to Missouri in 1823 or 1824. He was a merchant and farmer, and died in his adopted state in 1842. His last years were spent alone, for his wife, Janet (Pringle) Fullerton, died in 1836, leaving three children, of whom

C. P. is the only one living. Mrs. Fullerton was a native of Connecticut, and with her father, Norman Pringle, removed to Warren county, Mo., in 1820, locating on a large farm at what is now Hickory Grove. One of her sons, L. B., came to Oregon in 1851, and died some years later in Salem.

Left an orphan at the age of about eleven, Mr. Fullerton was reared on a farm in Missouri, and when fifteen years of age had a chance to come to the coast with his uncle, V. K. Pringle. Starting out with ox-teams and provisions April 20, 1846, he drove nearly all the way across, and on the way encountered some sorry experiences. He happened to be in the Applegate cut-off, and, in company with others similarly placed, nearly starved to death. The party reached Salem December 25, 1846, and the Fullertons spent the winter in the town, the uncle settling on a farm near Aumsville, Marion county, the following spring. C. P. lived with his relative for a year, but much to his disappointment there was no school for him to attend, and consequently his western education has been entirely of his own getting. Soon after reaching the west he became familiar with the dangers as well as advantages of the wilderness country, for duty compelled him to enlist in the Cayuse war during 1847-8, first as a private in Capt. W. P. Pugh's company, and later in the company of William Martin. Having completed his two enlistments he returned to his home, and in April, 1849, started across the mountains to California, where he hoped to make a fortune in the gold mines. His expectations were evidently not realized, for during September, 1849, he started back across the mountains, fully resolved to henceforth rely upon more certain, even if slower, means of livelihood.

In 1851 Mr. Fullerton took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres south of Salem, which he improved, and to which he added until he possessed four hundred and eighty-two acres. He engaged principally in grain and stock-raising, his farm being located four miles south of Salem. Success rewarded his efforts to clear his land and make it profitable, and he became prominent in his locality, promoting its all-around interests, especially along educational lines. Realizing his own want of opportunity upon arriving in the far west, he saw to it that the youth of the rising generation had better chances, and assisted in establishing the first school in his district. He was an officer of the school board up to the time of selling his farm and removing to Alsea, Benton county, in 1887. Here Mr. Fullerton bought six hundred and forty acres of land, upon which he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and where he made his home until disposing of the same in 1901.

December 31, of that year, he located in Corvallis, and the following year built one of the attractive residences of the town, and which is surrounded by fifteen acres of land.

Through his marriage in Yamhill county, in 1854, with Cornelia M. Lady, a native of Tennessee, and daughter of William G. Lady, a Yamhill pioneer of 1854, eleven children have been born: Lucy T., now Mrs. C. J. Bradner, of Seattle; Walter, engaged in the stock business in Crook county; Mark, a graduate of the Willamette University, and an attorney at law, in Olympia, and member of the supreme bench of Washington; David, engaged in mining in Alaska; Finley, living on a part of the Alsea ranch; Rufus, a merchant in Kennewick, Wash.; Nellie C., now Mrs. D. H. Glass, of Oregon City, and an educator by occupation; Juliet at home; Lucian, in Crook county, Ore.; Josephine, a teacher in Corvallis; and Charles, Jr., attending the Oregon Agricultural College. A Republican in politics, Mr. Fullerton has never had any desire for public office, but at one time did serve as justice of the peace at Alsea. In religion he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In the estimation of his many friends in Corvallis and throughout the county, Mr. Fullerton is representative of the highest western citizenship; strong of character, upright in motive and act, and genial in manner, he commands the respect and esteem of all who have ever been associated with him.

ADOLPH F. PETERSON. Many of the handsomest residences, the most modern and practical public buildings, and the most ambitious architectural accomplishments in general in Corvallis are due to the skill and artistic appreciation of Adolph F. Peterson, one of the foremost builders and contractors in Benton county. The armory of the Oregon Agricultural College, and the court houses of Wheeler, Gilliam and Sherman counties may be mentioned as fair samples of his excellent and substantial construction. Since coming here Mr. Peterson has found his way into the front rank of the business community, and his very successful career may be taken as typical of the best and most progressive class of Swedish-Americans.

In Minnesota, whither have settled so many of his countrymen, Mr. Peterson was born at Mound Prairie, Washington county, August 8, 1858, his father, John F., being one of the very earliest settlers of that section of the north. John F. Peterson was born in Smaalán, southeastern Sweden, and when about fourteen years of age was apprenticed to a crown tailor of Stockholm. In his native land he married Katrina Harden, a native of Stockholm, and member of a prominent Swedish family, and three children were born to this union in the old country. With his wife and children Mr. Peterson came to America at an early day, and in New York city was swindled out of considerable money by his supposed friends. In this way the savings of many years were lost, and it was with difficulty that he succeeded in getting his family to St. Paul, Minn. The northern metropolis at that time consisted of a few small log cabins occupied by some French settlers and Indians, and the new arrival was probably as ignorant as they of the teeming industry and giant enterprises which would one day have their birth upon his farm of one hundred and sixty acres. Had he foreseen, he would probably have held his land until it increased in value, but as it was he saw nothing beyond rather barren and not particularly profitable acres fit for certain kinds of grain and general produce. So he disposed of his land and removed to Sauk Center, where he engaged in farming until the Sioux Indian outbreak in 1861-2. Thus surrounded by danger, his family were obliged to make their escape with ox-teams to St. Cloud, and from there to St. Paul, where they remained until peace was restored. In the meantime the father had taken up the defense of the settlers, and was serving as a scout under General Sibley, his oldest son standing valiantly by his side, and assisting in every way in his power to break the sway of the murderous red men. Father and son participated in the battle of New Ulm, and assisted in the capture and subsequent hanging of thirty-eight of the ring-leaders among the Indians. Not content with his service in the north, Mr. Peterson then enlisted for the Civil war, then at its height, in Company G, Seventh Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, which company was composed of Swedish and German citizens. With the rest of his comrades he went south, fought bravely upon many a field of battle, and finally died of exposure and deprivation in Little Rock, Ark. That his valor was appreciated, and that his sad end touched a sympathetic chord in at least one heart, was proven when a comrade-in-arms walked three hundred miles to inform the widow of his untimely and tragic death. This faithful wife, who had braved the dangers and trials of the early pioneer days in the north, finally died in St. Paul, mourned by her large family of children, nine in all, of whom Adolph F. is the eighth. One of the sons, John by name, is engaged in the real estate business at Grant's Pass, Ore., and served as assistant surgeon during the rebellion; and Victor distinguished himself as a second lieutenant during the Civil war.

In St. Paul Adolph F. Peterson received his education in the public schools, but quit during the junior year at the high school to apprentice to a carpenter. In the meantime his brother had come to Oregon and engaged in the sawmill business on Yaquina bay, and in 1875 Adolph joined him, and unsuccessfully engaged in saw-milling. But success came to him when he became foreman of construction on the United States jetties at the mouth of the Columbia river. His superior, J. S. Polhemus, gave him the most superior recommendations when he left his service at the expiration of eight years. During his service for the government Mr. Peterson married Etella Thompson, a native of Corvallis, and daughter of R. M. Thompson, a man of great prominence in this part of the county, having succeeded as postmaster, merchant and agriculturist. Mr. Thompson was foremost in public affairs in Corvallis, and was an active worker in the Republican party. More extended mention of this early settler may be found elsewhere in this work.

Owing to the precarious state of his wife's health Mr. Peterson removed to Los Angeles, Cal., where he built and contracted for a couple of years, after which he returned to Corvallis, and has since made this his home. Three children have been born into his family, Ileen, Raymond George and Agnes Reka. He is a Republican in politics, and though often urged to accept office, has steadfastly refused all honor of an official nature. He is fraternally popular and well known, and is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Artisans, the Knights of Pythias, and the Degree of Honor. He is well adapted to his chosen calling, to which he brings an astute mind, a clear conception and a versatility which finds expression in delightful, harmonious and practical effects.

JUDGE VIRGIL E. WATTERS, who is now serving upon the county bench, dates his residence in Oregon from 1877 and in Benton county from 1884. He was born in Holton, Jackson county, Kans., in 1863. His paternal grandfather, Dr. James Watters, was a representative of an old New England family of Scotch-Irish descent. Leaving the east he settled in Indiana and afterward removed to Wassonville, Iowa, where he engaged in the practice of medicine. In 1857 he removed to what is now the city of Holton, Kans., where he spent his remaining days, dying in 1891, when more than ninety years of age. Thomas G. Watters, the father of the judge, was born in Rockville, Ind., and reared in Iowa, and later became one of the pioneers of Kansas, taking a very active part in its early development. He arrived in that state in 1857, settling first in Lawrence, and later took up his abode upon the prairies of Jackson county, where Holton now stands. He was actively interested in the border troubles and being a warm friend of the cause of freedom, his home became a station on the famous underground railroad. He entertained John Brown on his last trip over that section of the country. He became one of the founders of the city of Holton, and was there engaged in the jewelry business for a number of years. For several terms he served as sheriff of Jackson county and at the time of the Civil war he joined a Kansas regiment and did duty at the front. In 1877 he brought his family to Oregon, settling in Ashland, where he again engaged in the jewelry business until 1879. In that year he removed to East Portland, where he continued in the same line of trade in what is now Grand avenue. In 1880 he became a resident of Hillsboro, where he conducted a jewelry store up to the time of his death, which occurred March 4, 1885. He belonged to the Knights of Pythias fraternity and to the Baptist Church, and in early life he gave his political support to the Republican party, but at the time Greeley made the race for president he joined the Democracy and was afterward one of its advocates. He married Climena Bevens, who was born in Indiana, and who went with her parents to Iowa at a very early day. The Bevens family was of English descent and was represented in the patriot army during the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Watters survived her husband for several years and died in Oakland, Cal., in 1893. She was the mother of twelve children, six of whom reached years of maturity and became residents of Oregon, but all now are living in California with the exception of the judge.

Judge Watters of this review was the third in his father's family and was born in Holton, Kans., August 8, 1863. There he attended school until 1877, when the family removed to Ashland, Ore. There he went to work on the Ashland Tidings, edited by Captain Applegate, a distinguished officer of the Modoc war. The judge learned the printer's trade and afterward acted as a compositor on the Lakeview Examiner until 1879, when he went to East Portland. There he worked on the Evening Telegram until the fall of 1880, when he came to Hillsboro, where he joined his father in the jewelry business, continuing in that line until the spring of 1884. At the latter date Judge Watters removed to Yaquina Bay district and was engaged in the jewelry business there until 1885, when he was appointed postmaster of Yaquina. In fact, he established the office and was the first postmaster, his appointment being made by President Cleveland. In 1892 he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for the position of county recorder of conveyances and was elected by a majority of one hundred and thirteen. During the legislative session of 1893 the county was divided, Summit being made the line, and in 1894 Judge Watters was re-elected to the office of county recorder for Benton county by a majority of sixty-eight, serving in that capacity until July, 1896. He was then nominated for county clerk on the Democratic ticket and was elected by the very large and flattering majority of five hundred and twenty-six. Again he was chosen to the office in 1898, and for a third term in 1900, and thus he served until July 7, 1902. In that year he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for the office of county judge and was elected by a majority of thirty-four for a term of four years, entering upon the duties of the position July 7, 1902.

The judge was married in Washington county, Ore., to Miss Dora A. Wiley, who was born there. Her mother, who bore the maiden name of Jane Baldra, was the first white woman born in Oregon, her birth having occurred on Tualatin plains, August 1, 1840. Her father was an Englishman who came to this section of the country from Hudson Bay in 1839. Judge and Mrs. Watters now have three living children: Ethel Jane, Alice Marie and Thomas Virgil. Their second daughter, Minnie, died at the age of four years.

The judge is an Ancient Odd Fellow and is a past officer in both the lodge and encampment. He was made a Mason in Corvallis and is a past master of the lodge. He is also past master workman of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which position he served for two terms, and he is now grand overseer of the grand lodge of Oregon of that organization. Judge Watters was converted to the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Corvallis, and for several years he has been president of its board of trustees, is president of its board of stewards and is superintendent of the Sunday school. He is actively interested in everything that pertains to municipal reform and the enforcement of law, and his influence is felt on the side of improvement and right and advancement. For some years he was active in the fire department of Corvallis and his energies have been directed along many lines contributing to the general good. During his early boyhood his father met with financial reverses in Kansas so that the youth of our subject was one of hardship. During his boyhood he did much toward the support of the family and after his father's death he conducted the business and took care of the younger members of the household. Later he sent his mother to California for her health. He holds friendship inviolable and regards a public office as a public trust.

EPHRAIM LOONEY SMITH. Among the reliable, substantial and prosperous citizens of Lane county there is probably no one who stands higher in the estimation of his fellow-men than Ephraim L. Smith, of Springfield. A man of active enterprise and practical ability he has been intimately associated with the agricultural prosperity of this part of the state, and has contributed in a large measure towards its development and advancement. For two years he has been a resident of Springfield, and in the meantime has effected upon the property which he owns in this vicinity improvements that in their character speak in a forcible manner of his skill, wise management and cultivated tastes. A son of John Smith, he was born in Polk county, Mo., November 24, 1840.

Spending the larger part of his life in Polk county, Mo., John Smith removed from there to Oregon, crossing the plains with an ox-team train in 1849. Locating in Lane county, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres about ten miles southeast of Eugene, and having improved a productive ranch, was there engaged in general farming until his death, at the early age of forty-four years. He married Mary Looney, who was born in Alabama, and died, while yet a young woman, in Missouri. Four sons were born of their union, Ephraim L. being the youngest.

After receiving a limited education in the common schools of Missouri, Ephraim L. Smith came with his parents to Oregon, and attended the district schools of Lane county during the winter terms, assisting his father in the farm labors during seed time and harvest. At the age of seventeen years he began an apprenticeship at the blacksmith's trade, living with his cousin, Clint Looney, and later with Henry Hill near Lorain. Establishing a blacksmith's shop in Eugene, Ore., in 1859, he was there employed at his trade two years. Upon his return to the donation claim which his father took up from the government, Mr. Smith turned his attention to agriculture, and was there profitably engaged in general farming and stock-raising until 1901. He still owns this estate, which is one of the finest in its appointments and improvements of any in the vicinity. On it are three residences, one being a commodious house of thirteen rooms, the others being conveniently arranged, but smaller. He has also good barns and out buildings, and a railway station, store and blacksmith shop are on the farm. He is especially interested in stock-raising, having a fine herd of one hundred cattle, Durhams and Shorthorns, and a choice lot of Poland-China hogs. In 1901 Mr. Smith removed to Springfield, buying one of the finest residences in town, and has since made his home here. In 1902 he purchased one hundred acres of land adjoining the town, it being a well improved place, with a two-story, modern house, and all the necessary buildings for successful farming and fruit-raising. He is a large landowner, his acreage, including his farms and town property, aggregating over eleven hundred and thirty-three acres.

Mr. Smith was married, in Vancouver, Wash., February 14, 1866, to Sarah E. Taylor, who was born in 1851, while her parents were en route across the plains. Her father, David M. Taylor, a native of Iowa, came to Oregon with his family in 1851, and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Harrisburg, and lived there until 1860. Going then to San Buena Ventura, Cal., he there spent his remaining years and died October 31, 1895. Eleven children were born of this union of Mr. and Mrs. Smith, namely: Mrs. Anna Hansacker, deceased; Franklin, deceased; Lulu, wife of Augustus Sundermann, of Pilot Rock, Ore.; Jennie, deceased; Hattie, wife of Clifford Powers, of Cottage Grove; Dollie and Ollie, twins; Bertie F.; Myrtle, deceased; Etta; and Fay. In his political views, Mr. Smith is a decided Republican, and has served as road supervisor, and as school director. He is public spirited and liberal, ever ready to contribute toward beneficial enterprises, and is a valued member of the Christian Church of Thurston.

GEORGE H. MURCH. The record of a man who has risen to a position of influence and honor in the community possesses much of inspiration to the general public, and as an example for members of the rising generation is certainly of inestimable value. That prosperity is the portion of those not afraid of hard work is one of the most forceful lessons derived from the careers of men like George H. Murch, who has not failed to realize that fortunes, like Rome, are not built in a day, and that sooner or later honest and well directed effort is bound to win recognition. In tracing the career of this honored farmer of Lane county one comes across many useful lessons, and the following facts in regard to him are gladly submitted:

Mr. Murch was born near Jay, Essex county, N. Y., February 21, 1817, but notwithstanding his age enjoys reasonable health, the result of his unflinching good humor and many public interests. At the age of sixteen he left his father's farm and began to earn his own living in a nail factory, and in 1838 he removed to Hamilton county, Ohio, and for a time worked on a near-by canal for a few months. In 1840 he took up government land in Platt county, Mo., and while tilling that became interested in the travelers who were passing his way on the overland trip to the west. With a friend, John Jones, he made arrangements to follow the westward emigration in 1846, and, arriving at Bridges, visited some friends there until October of the same year. Four men comprised the party which came from Bridges down the Snake river, and they traveled with horses as far as The Dalles. Two Indians brought them down the Columbia river in a canoe, and Mr. Murch stayed for a time in Oregon City, soon after going to Washington county, near Hillsboro. For a few months he worked for J. S. Griffen, and in the spring of 1847 went to The Dalles in a canoe, and there joined the First Oregon Regiment of mounted riflemen, for service in the Cayuse war. During the summer he served in various parts of Oregon, participating in two battles at Wells Springs, with headquarters later at Whitman's Station, to protect the emigrants as they came from the east.

Following his Indian fighting experience Mr. Murch settled on land near Hubbard, Marion county, and in the spring of 1849 he went to California on a sailing vessel with some companions, each man taking his own provisions. He proved an exceptional rather than average miner, for upon returning to Oregon on another sailing vessel in the fall of 1849, after a six weeks' trip, he brought with him the encouraging sum of $4,000. Investing $800 of this money in a freighting boat, he ran it between Oregon City and Portland. He was successful beyond expectation, and cleared in all $7,000. Next he engaged in a general merchandise business in Oregon City with Ben Simpson for a couple of years, and then moved his goods to Corvallis, remaining there for a couple of years. His goods were next taken to Winchester, southern Oregon, and in the meantime, in 1854, he had taken up three hundred and twenty acres of land three miles east of Coburg, upon which he settled after finishing up his mercantile business. Sixteen years on this farm accomplished large results, and a valuable farm was developed out of a practically useless property. Locating in Coburg, in 1870, Mr. Murch has since made this his home, with the exception of five years spent in Eugene to educate his children. From time to time he has added to his farm, and at present owns two thousand five hundred acres of land. His property has been devoted principally to stock-raising, and his improvements and general appointments are up-to-date and superior.

The first wife of Mr. Murch, who was formerly Barbara A. Cooper, whom he married in 1854, died in 1859, leaving a son, Horace, now mining in Idaho, an older child having died in infancy. October 26, 1863, Mr. Murch married Mrs. Mary E. Stone, widow of Edwin Stone, and daughter of Robert Henderson, the latter of whom was born in Kentucky, and settled first on a farm in the state of Missouri. Mrs. Murch came to the west with her parents in 1846, and was nearly nine months crossing the plains. They came via the Applegate cutoff and suffered great deprivations, running short of provisions, and having great trouble with the Indians. Mr. Henderson went to Yamhill county in the spring of 1847, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Amity, where he died in 1890, at the age of eighty-two years. He left his claim during the gold excitement in 1849 and made a few thousand dollars in the mines of California. By her first marriage Mrs. Murch had one daughter, Mary, wife of Thomas N. Strong, a prominent attorney of Portland. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Murch, of whom Lucy D. is the wife of F. D. Chamberlin, an attorney of Portland; Philura E. is a teacher of French at the Ann Wright Seminary of Tacoma, Wash.; Jessie E. is a teacher in the public schools of Portland; Herbert E. is now teaching in Yale College; and four children, George, Arthur, Welden and Edward, died within ten days of each other of diphtheria. Mr. Murch has invariably fostered progress in his neighborhood, and has been the friend of education, morality and uprightness. That he appreciates intellectual training is evidenced by the superior advantages which he has given his children, all of whom have realized his ambitious hopes for them. He enjoys the confidence of all with whom he has been associated in whatever capacity, and no pioneer of the early days has more disinterestedly or faithfully contributed to the upbuilding of a prosperous region.

ROBERT A. JAYNE, M. D., of Springfield, Lane county, was born in Washington, Iowa, January 27, 1859, the son of Daniel and the grandson of Timothy Jayne, both natives of Pennsylvania, from which state the grandfather served as captain in the Revolutionary war. The father came as far west as Iowa in 1855, locating in Washington county, where he engaged in the prosecution of his trade of stonemason. At the breaking out of the Civil war he enlisted in Company H, Twenty-fifth Iowa Infantry, and later became a corporal, his company forming a part of General Grant's army. He died at Napoleon, Ark., in April, 1862, at the age of sixty-two years. His wife was in maidenhood Martha Ann Young, born in Kentucky, and died in Shedd, Ore., in 1902, when seventy-eight years old. She was the daughter of Alexander Young, also a native of Kentucky, and who, after a residence in Indiana, moved to Washington county, Iowa, in 1849, and took a large claim where he farmed until his death at the age of eighty-three years. Of the two sons born to Mr. and Mrs. Jayne, Dr. Jayne was the older, and his preliminary education was received in the common schools of his native state. In 1882 he entered the Washington Academy, which he attended two and a half years. He then accepted a position as clerk in a store, where he remained until the fall of 1888. Having accumulated sufficient means for his immediate needs he once more took up his studies, entering the medical department of the University of Iowa, from which he was graduated three years later with the degree of M. D. He came at once to Oregon, and located at Shedd, where he remained until November, 1902, when he moved to Springfield, where he is now engaged in general practice.

The marriage of Dr. Jayne occurred in Milwaukee, Wis., on July 2, 1895, and united him with Hattie Watkins, a native of that state, and their two children are Earl A. and Robert Wyeth. In fraternal affiliations the doctor belongs to the Woodmen of the World; Modern Woodmen of America and Knights of the Macabees, being medical examiner for each of them. In politics he casts his ballot with the Republican party, and is active in his efforts for the advancement of the principles which he endorses. For one term, 1896-97, he served as coroner of Linn county.

MARION WALLACE. Both in the industrial and agricultural lines of work has Marion Wallace contributed his share toward the development of Oregon and her supremacy as a state, now being located in Natron, Lane county. He is the son of James A. Wallace, who was born in 1821, and emigrated to the northwest in 1852, crossing the plains with ox-teams and one pony, nearly all of which perished upon the journey. In the then embryo state the father then took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres and made that his home until his death. His wife was formerly Irene E. Daniels, and she died in 1900, the mother of six children, who are as follows: W. D.; Marion of this review; J. C.; Mary E.; Lucy A.; and Emma.

Marion Wallace was born in Warren county, Ill., in the city of Monmouth, January 1, 1848, and was four years old when the journey was made across the plains. Since that time he has been a constant resident of Lane county, reared to manhood upon the paternal farm and trained to an agricultural life. He remained at home until 1875, engaged in farming with his father, when he married Nancy M. Vaughan and located upon another portion of the home place, where he continued successfully following agricultural pursuits until 1893. At that date he located in Natron and opened a blacksmith shop, combined with which work he also repairs wagons, and conducts a feed-chopper. He now owns two hundred acres of land in addition to his interests in the town of Natron. In politics he adheres to the principles advocated by the Republican party, but has never cared to hold office. He is a member of the Order of Lions. The children which have blessed the union of himself and wife are as follows: Myron L.; Clara May, wife of Levi Castleman; Marion G. and Melvin W., who are twins; James A.; Daniel W.; Nannie E.; and Georgia M.

JAMES C. BRATTAIN. The example of a successful, prominent and more than ordinarily endowed father is an heritage to be appreciated and emulated. The faculty for so doing is apparent in the lives of James C. and F. M. Brattain, sons of that honored pioneer, Paul Brattain, around whom centers much of interest and importance in the early history of Lane county. At present occupying the donation claim taken up by their sire in 1852, these two, the youngest in a family of ten children, are fulfilling the expectations warranted by their early training and character inheritance, taking a foremost part in politics and social life, and maintaining a standard as progressive farmers not excelled in any part of the Willamette valley. In addition to the home place of one hundred and sixty acres, the brothers own jointly a stock farm of a section on the McKenzie river, and three hundred and twenty acres on Fall creek both of which places are given over to extensive stock-raising. Both men are in touch with the progress in all parts of the world, are well informed on current events, and to an exceptional degree enjoy the confidence of an enlightened and exacting agricultural community.

Paul Brattain was born in North Carolina, December 30, 1801, and at an early age went to Tennessee, at the age of sixteen making his way overland and by river to Hancock and Morgan counties, Ill., where his forceful personal characteristics were first recognized and approved. Taking up a large tract of land, he entered the arena of politics, and in time was elected to the constitutional convention of Illinois, where his opinions were valued and noted. He married Elizabeth Carter, who encouraged and applauded his success, and who lived to share and sympathize with the joys as well as the shadows of his life. He left his home to participate in the Black Hawk war, and about 1838 moved to Van Buren county, Iowa, where his son, James C., was born November 14, 1844. Taking up government land near Birmingham, he continued his political career as a member of the constitutional convention of Iowa, and at a later period became treasurer of the board of public improvements at Des Moines. This board had to do principally with river improvements, and at times large sums of money were left in the hands of the treasurer. To the intense chagrin of all concerned, the safe of the board was broken open during Mr. Brattain's administration, and several thousand dollars taken out.

In the spring of 1852 Mr. Brattain followed the example of two of his children who had come to the west in 1849 and 1850, and outfitted with four wagons, fourteen yoke of oxen, and one mule team, his wife and eight children being members of the party. It is not recalled that anything out of the ordinary marred the progress of the overland journey, and in fairly good condition the travelers spent the first winter near Peoria, locating on the donation claim now occupied by the two sons, the following spring. Here, as heretofore, Mr. Brattain caused his influence to be felt, and aside from various political offices of note, he served as county clerk from 1854 to 1859, and was finally a member of the constitutional convention of Oregon, making the third state in which he had helped to frame the laws. This was a record of which he was justly proud, for it is given to few men to be thus honored in three distinct parts of the country. Before the war he was devoted to the Democracy, but the wail of the southern slaves seemed to ring in his ears, and moved him to espouse the cause of the north. His death occurred August 29, 1882, at the age of four score and one years. With his wife he was a member of the Baptist Church, towards the support of which he generously contributed. John, the oldest of his ten children was a pioneer merchant of Baker City, Ore., and died there in 1893; Thomas J. is a stockman of Lake county, Oregon; Elizabeth, who married James Elbert, died July 29, 1902, in Lane county; Alfred is a rancher on the McKenzie river; William C. is a resident of Spokane, Wash.; Mary lives on the home place; Martha married Robert Hadley and died in 1868; Amelia A. is the wife of J. F. Smith, a rancher of Jasper, Lane county; Francis M., living on the home place with his brothers, and was a member of the legislature of 1899.

WILLIAM O. ZEIGLER. Actively identified with many of the leading interests of Eugene is William O. Zeigler, an esteemed and respected citizen, who is widely known to the traveling public as proprietor of the Hoffman House, one of the best equipped hotels of Lane county. Well educated, enterprising and progressive, he is meeting with unquestioned success in his present occupation, and is numbered among the representative men of the city, alike in business, educational and political circles. A son of Richard Zeigler, he was born in Lodi, Wis., October 7, 1851. His grandfather, Christian Zeigler, was a life-long resident of Pennsylvania, his home farm being near Carlisle.

Born and reared near Carlisle, Pa., Richard Zeigler located in Indiana when a young man, and resided there until after his marriage. Going then to Wisconsin, he carried on farming near Lodi for nine years, and then returned to Indiana, settling in Lafayette, Tippecanoe county, where he was employed as a tiller of the soil for a number of years. On retiring from active pursuits, in 1892, he came to Oregon, and has since been a resident of Eugene, and is living retired at the age of seventy-six years. He is held in respect as a man of Christian character, and is a member of the United Brethren Church. He married Deborah Osburn, who was born in Chambersburg, Ind., in 1830. She is the daughter of the Rev. David Osburn, a minister of the Christian Church, who was born in New York state, and died in Lodi, Wis. Of the seven children, five sons and two daughters born of their union, all are living with the exception of one son.

The oldest child of the parental household, W. O. Zeigler was reared as a farmer's son, living in Lodi, Wis., until nine years old, and afterwards on the home farm in Indiana. On leaving the district school he attended Roanoke Academy two years, after which he was engaged in teaching a number of terms. In order to better fit himself for his professional labors, he then completed the scientific course at the Otterbein University, in Ohio. Subsequently locating in Tippecanoe county, Ind., he taught school near his old home, and at the same time owned and managed a farm of considerable size. In 1889 Mr. Zeigler migrated to Arlington, Gilliam county, Ore., where he taught school until appointed by President Harrison postmaster of that city, a position that he retained four years. As a teacher he was very popular and successful, both in Indiana and Oregon, his professional career covering a period of fifteen years.

Coming to Eugene, Lane county, in 1893, Mr. Zeigler made an entire change of occupation, opening a bakery and confectionery store on Willamette street, where he was in business three years. Purchasing the Hotel Eugene in 1896, he conducted it most successfully until 1899, when he became proprietor of the Hoffman House, which is located opposite the First National Bank. Under his able management this house stands second to none in the county as a place of public entertainment, and he is recognized by its numerous patrons as one of the most genial and popular of hosts. Mr. Zeigler also owns a farm of sixteen and three-fourths acres, lying four miles northwest of Eugene, and this he devotes entirely to the culture of fruits of various kinds, raising and canning all the cherries, apples, pears, and prunes used in his hotel.

While a resident of Tippecanoe county, Ind., Mr. Zeigler married Miss Jennie Thompson, a native of Illinois, and they have two children, namely: Zella and Wilma. In politics Mr. Zeigler is an uncompromising Republican, and served as a member of the county committee. While living in Arlington, he served as justice of the peace, and, in 1902, was elected a member of the school board of Eugene for a term of five years, during which time important work is to be done, the board having erected at a cost of $35,000 a new high school building, which is an ornament to the community as well as a practical benefit. He is connected with several fraternal orders, including the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; the American Order of United Workmen; and the Woodmen of the World. He is a prominent member of the United Brethren Church, the secretary of its board of trustees, and was formerly superintendent of its Sunday school.

GEORGE CLINTON THOMPSON. A very genial and popular purveyor to the public of Brownsville is George Clinton Thompson, engaged in a general merchandise business under the firm name of G. C. Thompson & Son. Mr. Thompson is a native of the Hoosier state, and was born near Elkhart, Ind., September 11, 1851. His paternal grandfather, William, was born in the state of Pennsylvania, and served throughout the war of 1812, afterward removing to Charleston, still later making his home in the pioneer wilderness of Illinois, where his death occurred early in 1830.

Enoch Thompson, the father of George Clinton, was born in Charlestown, S. C., March 12, 1808, and was a sturdy little lad of seven when his father moved across country to Illinois in 1815. He helped to clear the farm in Adams county, and eventually learned the trade of carpenter and joiner, at which he was working when the Black Hawk war broke out. After serving with distinction in that conflict he farmed and built with moderate success, and in 1832 moved to Chicago, Ill., where he found more ready demand for his skill. August 27, 1833, he married Mary A. Kinzie, who was born in Virginia, as was also her father, and the next year, in 1834, the young people removed to Galena, Ill. The lead mines excitement was then at its height, and he profited to some extent by this opportunity, remaining in Galena until removing to Elkhart, Ind., in 1848. As heretofore, he worked at his trade as carpenter and joiner, and while in the Indiana town George Clinton was born, the seventh in the family of nine children. In 1852 Mr. Thompson moved to Adel, Iowa, and for ten years worked at his trade, in 1862 disposing of his interests and crossing the plains with his family to California. Two years later, in 1864, he came across the mountains to Oregon, locating on a farm near Albany, where he lived for a couple of years. In 1866 he came to Brownsville and engaged in the furniture business, and was thus occupied almost up to the time of his death, July 18, 1883, at the age of seventy-six years. He was fairly successful from a financial standpoint, and by nature a mechanic, accurate and painstaking and very skillful. He was a Democrat, and though not an office seeker, served four terms as justice of the peace.

Following the example of his father, George Clinton Thompson learned a trade in his youth, but instead of that of carpenter and joiner he turned his attention to house-painting, and papering. In 1882 he began clerking in a general merchandise store, at the same time keeping his eyes open, and mastering every detail of the business. Out of his comparatively moderate earnings he saved money sufficient to purchase, in 1894, the grocery store of F. McRa, to which he added from time to time, and finally converted into the well equipped general merchandise store owned and managed by him at the present time. He carries a complete line of general commodities required in a thrifty community, and pays particular attention to the individual requests of his customers, ordering such necessities as they desire, and treating all with the greatest courtesy and consideration.

In Brownsville Mr. Thompson married, November 20, 1873, Clara Looney, a native of Lane county, Ore., who has become the mother of five children, two of whom are living. Walter E. Thompson is in the general merchandise store with his father, and Frank H. is at home. The latter is deserving of special mention as a courageous private in the Spanish-American war, and as one of those who underwent the deprivations and dangers in the Philippines, where he was shot through the nose and lost his right eye at the famous battle of Malabon. Mr. Thompson is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Affable, conscientious, and possessing excellent business ability, he commands the respect of the business community, and the good will and esteem of a host of friends.

ALBERT D. HALL. The third generation of the Hall family in Oregon is ably represented by A. D. Hall, one of the progressive and very successful agriculturists of the vicinity of Willard. He was born on the old Benjamin F. Hall donation claim near Woodburn, September 6, 1857, a son of Benjamin F. and Mary Ann (Johnson) Hall, natives respectively of Missouri and Illinois, the former born at Liberty, Mo., October 19, 1826. His mother was born in Tazewell county, Ill., July 2, 1829.

James E. Hall, the founder of the family in the northwest, and the grandfather of A. D., was born in Virginia in 1798, and by trade was a stonemason. He was reared on a farm and educated in the early subscription schools. In his native state he married Cynthia Grooms, who was born in the Old Dominion state in 1804. At a very early date these young people removed by horse teams to Missouri, the journey being a long and tiresome one, but they finally found a fertile farm in the wilderness of Clay county, where they made a home and lived in comparative comfort until crossing the plains to Oregon in the spring of 1845. In the spring of 1846 they settled at Champoeg, Marion county, where the grandfather took up a donation claim, upon which he lived for many years. He was one of the familiar figures in his neighborhood, a good farmer, excellent man, and the personification of industry and frugality. During the latter years of his life his wife and himself lived with their children, he attaining the age of eighty, and she the age of ninety-four years. They raised a family of nine children, to whom they gave every advantage in their power, and whom they taught to lead upright and worthy lives.

Benjamin F. Hall crossed the plains with his parents in 1845, and assisted in clearing the pioneer farm near Champoeg. In 1848 he went to California, where he prospected and mined with indifferent success for a few months. Returning to Oregon he took up a claim near Woodburn. In 1853 he married Mary Ann Johnson, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1851, her father, Rev. Neill Johnson, being one of the pioneer and best-known ministers in Oregon. Mr. Hall has up to the present time lived on his original farm, where he has since engaged in general farming and stock-raising. From his first voting days he has been a Republican, and has taken a keen interest in the undertakings of his party in this state. The following children have been born to himself and wife: A. D.; Sophrona, wife of G. W. McLaughlin, of Buena Vista, Ore.; Elmer N., of Buena Vista; Edwin T., of Salem; William W., of Salem; Charles C., of Woodburn; Edith E., the wife of John Haller, of Woodburn; and James J., of Woodburn.

The youth of A. D. Hall was uneventfully passed on his father's farm, but after his marriage in 1886 with Julia S. Smith, a native of Columbia, Mo., and a daughter of Jacob Smith, he located on a farm near Woodburn, which continued to be his home for about fifteen years. He then bought his present home of two hundred and two acres in the Waldo Hills, twelve miles east of Salem, where he has more than realized his expectations as a general farmer and stock-raiser. For the past fourteen or fifteen years he has interested himself extensively in Jersey cattle, and for many years has derived additional income from the management of a threshing-machine during the harvest season. Mr. and Mrs. Hall are the parents of six children: Hubert N., Annie M., Agnes S., Oren, Alice, (deceased), and Alma F. Mr. Hall is affiliated with the Republican party, and has several social connections, among them being the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he has held all of the chairs, and the Grange at Macleay. In religion he is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and contributes liberally towards its general support. Mr. Hall is a broad-minded and well informed agriculturist, and keeps abreast of the times on all topics which appeal to wide-awake and progressive members of the community.

HON. W. H. HOBSON. The family of which Hon. W. H. Hobson of Stayton is a representative was established on the Pacific coast in 1847, and since 1848 has been closely identified with Oregon. His father, Hadley Hobson, was born in the state of North Carolina September 6, 1811, and was the son of a brick manufacturer. In his youth he learned the brickmaking business under the direction of his father, and was also apprenticed to a mason. Until he reached the age of twenty-four years he remained at home and worked at his trades with his father. Fortified with an abundance of practical experience, he then went to Missouri, locating in Jackson county, where he worked at his trade of brickmaking with his brother, who had preceded him there. Eventually they entered into a partnership for the purpose of conducting a contracting business, in which their efforts met with success. They erected some of the important buildings of that county and vicinity, including the historic Chapel Hill Seminary, located in Lafayette county, Mo. While a resident of Missouri he married Emily S. Speinhauer, a native of South Carolina, whose parents came to the United States from Germany about 1812.

With his wife and children, and his brothers, George and Alfred, Mr. Hobson crossed the plains in 1847, with an outfit of ox-teams and wagons, bound for Oregon. During the journey they encountered many experiences of an interesting and not always agreeable nature. At times they were subjected to many hardships. It had been their original intention to go to Oregon, but they lost their way and entered California by mistake. Determined to make the best of the situation, Mr. Hobson at once engaged in gold-mining in that state, to which work he applied himself until the fall of 1848, when, with his family, he started for Oregon by way of the Pacific, arriving at the mouth of the Columbia river after a journey of five weeks. Coming to Marion county he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres a mile north of the site of Stayton, all of which was wild land, densely covered with timber for the greater part, and the home of game hitherto undisturbed, except by the roving Indian. In a little clearing this hardy and determined pioneer erected a round-log house containing one room. It will surprise people unaccustomed to the hardships of the early days to know that there was not a nail in the entire house. There were puncheon floors, and all the finishings were of the most crude nature; but the place was a paradise to the little family so far from their old home and so pitiable in their utter loneliness. Their neighbors were remote and their resources most meagre, but they managed to make themselves comfortable and to transform their wilderness home into a semblance of order, peace and comfort.

Soon after seeing his family well established in their home, accompanied by William Waldo, Henry Smith, Rufus Smith and Frederick Taylor, Mr. Hobson returned to the mining district of California, succeeded in gathering enough gold to pay a goodly percentage of the cost of his claim, and returned home. Soon he was free from debt, and from that time forward his possessions increased. From time to time he added to his original claim until he owned about fifteen hundred acres of land, most of which was very fertile and easily cultivated after the removal of the timber. He engaged in cattle and sheep raising and general farming on a large scale, and he took an active part in the general improvement of his county, aiding in the building of good roads, the erection of schools and the promotion of all worthy enterprises. He was a man of sterling traits of character, inherited principally from Quaker ancestry, in the principles of whose religion he was thoroughly and conscientiously schooled in his youth. The ten children in his family were as follows: Mary Ann, the widow of John Barker, of Heppner, Ore.; W. H.; George and Francis M., deceased; Lemuel, a rancher near Mehama; Amanda, wife of Dr. John Parker, of Salinas, Cal.; Emily and Amelia, twins, the former of whom is deceased, and the latter the wife of Eugene Warner, of Ukiah, Cal.; Jeanette, of San Jose, Cal.; and Hadley, a rancher residing near Mill City, Ore. The noble mother of this large family of children lived to the age of eighty and one-half years, her death occurring at San Jose, Cal., in February, 1894.

Hon. W. H. Hobson, lawyer, merchant and distinguished public citizen, was barely two years of age when his parents brought him to Oregon, and he grew to early manhood on the claim upon which he spent many years in hard labor. When the duties of home permitted he attended the school conducted in the little log cabin in the neighborhood, his first and best remembered teacher being Samuel Denny. By the time he had reached his twentieth year the town of Sublimity had been founded. Thither he repaired as the nearest and most promising center of activity, and conducted the store owned by his father for a time. Subsequently, in Aumsville, he managed the business of Simpson, Hunt & Co., and then went to Sublimity and started a small grocery store. Upon the expiration of a year he located in Stayton, where he engaged in the grocery business until 1871. From that time until 1874 he enjoyed a general trade at Stayton in partnership with Uriah Whitner. After disposing of this store he and his former partner bought another in Aumsville. After disposing of this in 1876 the partners built the Gardner grist-mill at Stayton, and in connection therewith operated a general store. Mr. Whitney withdrew from the association in 1883, after many years of amicable and satisfactory business, and thereafter Mr. Hobson took as his partners Messrs. Shaw and Simms. The building was afterward enlarged to meet the demands of an increasing trade. In 1888 the partners and Lee Brown went to Mill City and organized the Santiam Lumber Company, in connection with which they built a large saw-mill and engaged in a flourishing business. In keeping with the demands of that somewhat isolated section they started a general store and logging railway, and their combined energies resulted in the establishment of a very remunerative industry. In 1898 these combined interests were disposed of to the Curtis Lumber Company, after which Mr. Hobson returned to Stayton and resumed the conduct of his merchandising business. In 1897 he sold out and established a dry goods business at Salem, continuing the same for four years. Subsequently he started a similar enterprise at Stayton, which concern he still owns and manages.

Mr. Hobson's first marriage united him with Ella Gibson, who was a native of Marion county, Ore., and a daughter of Hon. Guyan Gibson. She died January 10, 1878, leaving a daughter, Pearl, now the wife of E. C. Peery, of Scio, Ore. December 12, 1880, he married Annie Thomas, who was born in East Portland, the daughter of Mrs. Arminda Thomas, of Stayton, Ore. She is the mother of two children, Alta and Everett.

A staunch supporter of Republican principles, Mr. Hobson has been prominently before the public for several years as a promoter of his party's interests, and has held important offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen and the citizens of the county. In 1894 he was the nominee of his party for the state senate, was elected, and upon the expiration of his term was re-elected joint senator for Linn and Marion counties, both terms of service giving the greatest satisfaction to all interested. During the first session he was a member of the committees on claims, commerce, navigation and federal relations.

Fraternally Mr. Hobson is a member of Santiam Lodge No. 25, A. F. & A. M., of Stayton, of which he is past master. In the Grand Lodge he has filled nearly all the offices, including that of Grand Master in 1897-98. He is a member of Multnomah Chapter No. 1, R. A. M., and De Molay Commandery, No. 5. He is also a member of Stayton Lodge No. 64, I. O. O. F., and has passed all the chairs in the grand lodge.

Mr. Hobson has well interpreted and acted upon the possibilities at hand in the great northwest, and his various commercial enterprises have contributed, beyond the possibility of estimating, to the general upbuilding of the localities in which he has operated. He is a man of strict integrity. No question as to the motives which have actuated him in any of his undertakings has ever arisen. In his public life he has always aimed to conserve the best interests of his constituents and the state at large. Probity, broad-mindedness, liberality of views, good fellowship, and a sincere and unselfish desire to assist in the promotion of all enterprises looking to the betterment of the public welfare, are the most pronounced traits in his character, as understood by those who know him best. The record of his life, both public and private, has been above reproach. The outline of the principal events in his career presented here shows how closely he has been identified with the rise and progress of the state of Oregon, and forms, in itself, an interesting chapter in the annals of the northwest.

HENRY AMBLER. Although buying and selling town property and farms is a means of livelihood with Henry Ambler, and a very remunerative business, he is at the same time a promoter of all-around county interests to a greater extent than perhaps any other man in Philomath. His enthusiastic advocacy of the climate, resources, and general advantages of Benton county have led him to noticeable achievement in peopling vacant but productive farms, in placing men in fortune-making positions upon stock-raising properties on main-traveled roads, and in establishing homes in quiet nooks within the jurisdiction of the town. People who would otherwise not have settled here have found the assistance of this prominent real estate, insurance and loan merchant so valuable and convincing that they are now a part of the great commonwealth of Benton county, one of the garden spots of Oregon.

In appearance and personality Mr. Ambler suggests the prosperous Englishman, whose mind and abilities have expanded under the genial welcome of his adopted country. He was born in Yorkshire, the most northern and largest county of England, August 2, 1858, his father, Thomas, having been born in the same locality, in 1836. The family name was a very familiar one in Yorkshire for several generations, and was bolstered up by the notable achievements of some of its members, principally the paternal grandfather, Timothy, who was a large paper manufacturer, and amassed quite a fortune in that way. His business was conducted under the firm name of Timothy Ambler & Sons, and he probably knew as much about paper as any man in the north of England. He was a man of high moral character, and died in the faith of the English State or Episcopal Church, at the age of seventy years. Thomas Ambler was trained in paper manufacturing, and after the death of his father undertook the management of the business, with his brother James. He died in 1872, while yet a young man, leaving his wife, formerly Susanna Illingworth, a native also of Yorkshire, and two children, a son and daughter, the latter, Emily, being married and a resident of Leeds, England.

After graduating from the grammar school in Yorkshire, Henry Ambler engaged in the wholesale paper business in Keighley, England, and, in 1881, crossed the ocean to the United States. Near Sedalia, Mo., he engaged in farming for about eight years, and, in 1890, came to Oregon, locating on a ranch in the Waldo hills, Marion county. Here he engaged in fruit-raising and general ranching, his principal source of revenue being prunes. Two years later, in 1892, he located near Philomath and raised fruit upon a forty-acre ranch, which he afterward sold at a profit, and turned his attention to the real estate business. The town had need of so wise and discriminating a judge of its various properties, and he at once stepped into a waiting opportunity, as much the community's as his own.

One year before coming to America Mr. Ambler married Georgia Phillips Graves, a native of Middlesex, England, and daughter of Christopher Graves, member of a firm of large ship-builders and owners, engaged with the Australian trade. The business of Phillips & Graves is still one of the substantial enterprises of Middlesex, the firm offices being located at San Dunstons House, Shepperton, London. With his wife, Mr. Ambler is a member of the Episcopal Church.

ROBERT PATTISON. An example of energy and perseverance is presented in the career of Robert Pattison, who has risen to prominence as an agriculturist in Lane county, and is the owner of four hundred and thirty acres of land three and a half miles north of Eugene. This is all cultivated land and valuable, and since acquiring it the owner has turned it to good account, engaging in general farming, stock-raising and dairying. Born in Randolph county, Ill., January 13, 1828, Mr. Pattison is descended from an Irish family long identified with that northern portion of the island known as County Antrim. His father, William, was born in this sea bordering county, with its mountains and bogs. When he was just seven years of age his mother brought him to America, his father's death having occurred in the meantime. Locating in South Carolina, the youth grew to manhood, and gained a fair education in the public schools, also a general knowledge of farming and stock-raising. About 1820 he started for Illinois, and in Randolph county bought a farm, locating thereon with his wife, Mary (Montfort) Pattison; who was born near Columbia, South Carolina, about 1800. The gold fever which agitated the country in 1849 found Mr. Pattison as amenable to its influence as any tiller of the soil in his neighborhood. He soon sold his farm and invested the money in an outfit to cross the plains. Six children had in the meantime been born into his family, and with these and his wife he left home April 4, 1849, arriving at The Dalles, November 3, of the same year. The trip was an exceedingly hard one, deprivation, illness and Indian disturbances rendering the life of the travelers a constant vigil. The family had twelve yoke of oxen when they hopefully turned their faces towards the boundless plains, but at the end of the trip all of their cattle were dead. A raft furnished the means of transportation down the Columbia river to Vancouver, and the first winter was spent in that town, the family moving the following spring to the Puget Sound region, Wash. Locating in Thurston county, Mr. Pattison engaged in general farming and lumbering, and in 1858 removed to a farm on the Mackenzie river, Lane county, Ore., where he died at the age of seventy-eight years. He was survived by his wife, who went to live with her son, Charles, in Linn county, and there died at the age of seventy-six years. Of the nine children, eight of whom were sons, Robert and Charles alone survive, the latter being a resident of Oakville, Linn county.

Robert Pattison had received a common school education in Illinois and Washington, and he came to Lane county before his parents died, purchasing a farm of one hundred acres on the Mackenzie river. Three years later he sold out and bought his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, three and a half miles northeast of Eugene, to which he has added by subsequent purchase, and now has four hundred and thirty acres in Lane county. He married in 1859 Isabella Eakin, who was born in Ireland in July, 1830, and came to Oregon from Illinois in 1869. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Pattison, of whom W. T. lives on a farm across the river from Eugene; George is deceased; John is living on the home farm; Maggie is the wife of Mark F. Fleming, of Irving; and Belle is at home. Mr. Pattison cast his first vote for James G. Birney in 1849, and has since been a Republican in politics. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church at Eugene, and was one of the first to join at the organization of the church in 1861. He is connected with the Grange, and is popular in his social, church and business connections.

HON. WILLIAM A. JOLLY. To the person who closely applies himself to any occupation which he has chosen as his life calling there can come only good results—success and a high place in the esteem of those among whom his lot is cast. Mr. Jolly is no exception to this rule, for it has been by industry and strict attention to agricultural pursuits only that he has attained to the position that he now enjoys. He owns two hundred and thirty acres adjoining Philomath, which was formerly a part of the Abbey donation claim, and here he carries on genral farming and stock-raising. In addition to his farm he also owns his home place of forty acres, located within the corporate limits of Philomath.

William A. Jolly was born in Ripley county, Ind., March 22, 1851, being one of four children born to his parents, who were farmers by occupation. He can scarcely remember his father, as the latter died when William A. was a child four years old, and when he was ten years old his mother, too, was taken from him. After this last bereavement he was taken into the home of an uncle in Brown county, Ohio, making his home with this relative until he reached the age of twenty-one, in the meantime receiving valuable instruction in the public schools of the vicinity. Upon reaching man's estate, however, he started out in life on his own account, his first venture being his removal to Carroll county, Mo., where he followed farming for four years. Not content with the results of his efforts there, and hearing of the possibilities which awaited the energetic young man in the west, he came hither in 1875, settling in Benton county, at what was then called "Dusty," but has since been changed to the more euphonious name of Bellfountain. After remaining there for about nine years he came to his present farm near Philomath, and at once began the improvement and cultivation of the property which he then purchased, and that his time and efforts have been well expended needs but a glance to decide. Subsequently he purchased his residence in the village of Philomath, where he now resides, and which is conceded to be one of the most commodious in the vicinity.

In the year 1876 was celebrated the marriage of William A. Jolly and Miss Nancy Porter, the latter a native of Oregon. Two children blessed this marriage, one of whom died in infancy, while Mary G. is at home with her parents. Mr. Jolly's fitness for public office was recognized when, in 1898, his fellow-citizens elected him to the office of mayor of Philomath, which office he filled for two terms. At present he is a member of the town council and is also serving efficiently as a member of the school board and as county commissioner. Fraternal affairs claim a portion of Mr. Jolly's attention, as is seen by his membership in the organization known as the Woodmen of the World. The family are identified with the Baptist Church, of which Mr. Jolly is serving as trustee. He is also a member of the board of trustees of Philomath College, and at the present time is president of the board. Politically, he upholds the tenets of the Republican party. A popular man, esteemed for his integrity and nobleness of purpose, Mr. Jolly ranks among the best citizens of Philomath, toward whose upbuilding he takes an interested part.

JACOB WHITAKER. That well-remembered pioneer, Jacob Whitaker, Sr., a typical German, who brought his enthusiasm and reliability to the western coast and made his home among the agricultural possibilities of Benton county, left the heritage of a good name and honorable career to his children, and besides accumulated sufficient means to give them a start in life. Of these children who are maintaining the prestige of their sire, his namesake, Jacob, occupies a worthy place in the community, and as a resident of a portion of the old Whitaker donation claim has long since established a reputation as a consistent and successful farmer and stock-raiser.

Born in Richland county, Ohio, September 16, 1837, the younger Jacob was reared on a farm, and received such education as came within reach of his childhood years in the early subscription schools. With the rest of the family he came to Oregon in 1853, his mother having died in the meantime, leaving to the care of his father four children, of whom he was the oldest, and at that time sixteen years of age. Starting out with four to do future credit to the family name, there were but three when the little party, consisting of six wagons, reached Oregon, one having succumbed to disease on the plains. The father located on the donation claim ten miles from Corvallis, now occupied by his sons, John and Jacob, and there followed his trade of stonemason and brickmason, adding to these means of livelihood the trade of carpenter. He died in Corvallis, June 9, 1883, honored by all who knew him, a member of the Catholic Church, and a man of high moral character.

The portion of the old homestead occupied by the present Jacob Whitaker consists of two hundred and sixty-seven acres, eighty of which are under cultivation. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, and has a well-equipped farm, fitted with modern buildings and implements, and in every way adapted to the ideas of a progressive and purposeful farmer. He took possession of his farm directly after his marriage, in 1864, with Nancy Housley, who was born in Ohio, and at present has about completed a new house, built after modern designs, in which his family will have all of the conveniences of the city and the advantages of the country. Of his five children, Eva is the wife of Clifton Gould, of Corvallis; John and Fannie are at home; Alice is the wife of Carl Porter, of Corvallis, and Nellie is the wife of J. D. Campbell, of Independence, Mr. Whitaker is independent in politics, and has never worked for either his own or his friends' election to office. Like his father and brothers, he is a devoted member of the Roman Catholic Church. A very public-spirited and affable man, he commands the respect of all with whom he has to do, and exerts an influence in keeping with his practical and helpful personal characteristics.

JUDSON WEED. Although not one of the older commercial enterprises of Philomath, the grocery business of Judson Weed has become an important factor in maintaining the business integrity of the town, representing as it does the business stability and practical ideas of one of its most honored citizens. Born in Jackson county, Ohio, April 14, 1847, Mr. Weed is a son of Gilbert and Abigail (Patton) Weed, the latter of whom was born in Greenbrier county, W. Va. On the paternal side Mr. Weed claims a worthy ancestor in his grandfather, William, a soldier in the war of 1812, and for a portion of the service in the quartermaster's department. The grandfather was born in the state of Connecticut, and at a very early day located in New York, where his son, Gilbert, was born August 20, 1804. The family removed to Gallia county, Ohio, about 1813, and here he died at the age of eighty-four years.

In Gallia county, Ohio, Gilbert Weed was reared on a farm, and in time learned the stonemason's trade, and also that of the bricklayer. In 1836 he removed to Jackson county, Ohio, where he combined his trades with farming, and where he died in 1888. His wife's father, William Patton, was born in New York state, and as a young man removed to Virginia, locating in Greenbrier county. He was a farmer during his entire active life, and his career was dignified by worthy military service, directed for the greater part against the Indians. Although his father was fairly successful in life, it became necessary for Judson Weed to provide for himself at a comparatively early age, the farm in Jackson county being hardly adequate for the supporting of sixteen children, twelve sons and four daughters. The tenth of this large family, Judson, worked hard on the home farm, but during the winter time attended the district schools, where he studied arduously, as became a youth who early appreciated the advantages of a practical education. That he might enjoy further advantages as a student, he began to work out on the farms surrounding that of his father, and while thus employed the Civil war broke out, throwing the country into a state of turmoil and uncertainty. He continued to work until 1864, and then enlisted in Company I, One Hundred and Seventy-second Ohio Infantry, serving four months as a private. After his discharge at Gallipolis, Ohio, he resumed his work on the farm, and continued to save money for his education. During 1868-'69-'70 he attended the normal school at Lebanon, Ohio, and thereafter engaged in teaching until 1875.

After coming to Oregon, in the latter part of 1875, Mr. Weed combined teaching and farming in Columbus county, his farm consisting of one hundred and sixty acres, which he greatly improved and rendered a valuable property. He still owns this farm, and rented it out in 1898, when he came to Philomath to engage in the grocery business. In Columbus county he was prominent in the general affairs of his neighborhood, and was so successful as an educator that he was elected county superintendent of schools in 1878, serving for one term, or two years. He also became much interested in Republican politics, was elected county assessor in 1886, serving for one term; and, in 1888, was elected to the legislature, and re-elected in 1892. While in the legislature he was chairman of the committee on counties. Further honor awaited him in 1894, when he was elected county clerk, and re-elected in 1896, serving up to 1898.

Since coming to Philomath Mr. Weed has continued his interest in politics, and has not only been mayor of the town for one term, but has served on the school board, and as a member of the council for two terms. In Columbia county, Ore., he married Emma Van Blaracom, who was born in Minnesota, and who is the mother of three children: Oscar, taking the scientific course at the Philomath College; Gertrude, taking the same course at the college, and Ethel, attending the public schools. In religion Mr. Weed is identified with the Evangelical Association of North America, at Vernonia, Ore.

THOMAS K. FAWCETT. The ambitious men of the younger generation, who are destined to carry on the work begun by their sires in the very early days of Oregon, have a worthy representative in Thomas K. Fawcett, formerly engaged in extensive mining operations, but at present elaborating plans for a large stock-raising enterprise on his farm, two miles west of Bellfountain. A native son of Oregon, he was born at the Myrtle Creek mines, Douglas county, July 26, 1874, a son of George N. Fawcett, of Portland, residing at No. 353 Grant street.

Completing his education in the public schools of Portland at the age of sixteen, Thomas K. started out in the world on his own responsibility, naturally drawn to the mining business, which had surrounded his earliest and later years. Success did not come as readily as anticipated, for he tried his luck in Oregon, Idaho, Montana and Colorado, before striking the rich claim in Baker county, this state, which netted him a handsome fortune. After operating the claim for a couple of years he disposed of it at a profit and bought other claims in the neighborhood, remaining thereabouts until 1902, and meeting with varying success. He then decided to turn his attention to stock-raising, and bought his present farm of seven hundred and sixty-one acres on the old Corvallis road, and which constitutes a portion of the Samuel Haptonstall, Charles McCoy and Martin L. Charles donation claims. Two hundred acres of his property are under cultivation, and a new residence is in process of construction which promises to be one of the most commodious and comfortable in the county. This home is destined to become one of the centers of hospitality in the neighborhood, for both Mr. and Mrs. Fawcett are possessed of tact and cordiality, and have the faculty of making and retaining friends. Mrs. Fawcett was formerly Anna C. Kelly, and she was born at Coos Bay, Ore., being a member of a prominent family of that section. One son has been born of this union, Tolbert K.

When the Spanish-American war broke out Mr. Fawcett was one of the first among his friends to enlist for service in the Philippines, and as a private in Company G, Second Oregon Infantry, he served fifteen months, and participated in twenty-six engagements, including the battles of Malabon, Pasig and Malinta. For meritorious action he was advanced to the rank of sergeant, and for a part of the service had charge of the military train. While in the orient he made a practical study of the people and prevailing conditions, and upon his return interested his friends with accounts of his observations. Mr. Fawcett follows the family tradition and is a staunch Republican, but has never taken an active interest in office-seeking or holding. He is identified with several of the social organizations in which the county abounds, and is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World.

ROBERT L. HENKLE. One-half mile east of Philomath is located the farm owned and operated by Robert L. Henkle, whose fine, up-to-date property at once attracts the notice of the passer-by. His acreage comprises one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he makes a specialty of general farming and stock-raising, sheep claiming the most of his attention. Mr. Henkle was born October 30, 1849, in Lee county, Iowa, the son of Zebadiah Henkle, who was born in old Virginia October 26, 1807. With his parents he removed to Illinois, and later to Iowa. For his life companion he married Miss Mary Wilson, a native of Kentucky, the young couple making their home in Iowa until 1866, when, by ox and horse teams, they came across the plains, landing in California about four months from the day of starting. The following year, 1867, they came to Benton county, Ore., purchasing three hundred and twenty acres located two and one-half miles south of Philomath, there residing until his death, at the age of sixty-six years. His widow continued to live on the place for several years, but later removed to Independence, Polk county, making her home with her youngest daughter until her death, when seventy-seven years old.

Twelve children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Henkle, three of whom are now deceased, and the names and residences of those living are as follows: Abraham, a resident of Philomath; George, of Corvallis; Mary, the wife of Samuel Davis, of Philomath; Eli, of Independence; Sarah, the wife of A. Nelson, of Independence; Etta, who became the wife of W. H. Walker, also of Independence; Robert L.; Amos, a farmer residing north of Philomath, and James, of Prineville. While a resident of Iowa the father served as county commissioner for several years, and was justice of the peace a great many years. Politically, he took an active interest in the welfare of the Democratic party, and in the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member from early manhood, he could always be depended upon to co-operate in all measures which tended toward the betterment of mankind. In this, too, he had the support of his wife, who had been a member of the church from the age of fifteen years.

Robert L. Henkle was about seventeen years old when his parents removed from Iowa and made their home in the west. His district school education was supplemented by a course in the college at Philomath, after completing which he returned home, remaining with his parents until his twenty-third year. From 1871 until 1874 he worked for the neighboring farmers, and in the year last mentioned was united in marriage with Miss Cynthia Newton, a native of Oregon. Their first home was about one and one-half miles south of Philomath, but three years later they moved to a farm located just east of town, which was the family home for the next fourteen years. Their next purchase was a tract of three hundred and twenty-two acres, formerly a part of the Eliza Liggitt donation claim, one-half mile east of Philomath. Here he owned two hundred and fifty acres, all under cultivation, twelve acres being devoted to hops, but has recently sold all but one hundred and sixty-two acres. In addition to carrying on general farming he devotes considerable attention to stock-raising, making a specialty of raising fine grades of sheep.

Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs.

Henkle, of whom the eldest, Ora, is a resident of Portland. The other children are at home with their parents and are named as follows: Roy, Chester, Ada, Mamie, Herman and Esther. Fraternally, Mr. Henkle affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and politically is a staunch Democrat.

JOSEPH PARK. For many years the late Joseph Park was prominently identified with the agricultural and mercantile interests of Philomath, and in his death, which occurred December 22, 1902, Benton county lost a valuable and highly esteemed citizen. A man of sterling integrity and sturdy worth, his life record was a praiseworthy one, and his memory will long be cherished by the many who were bound to him by ties of kinship or friendship. One of a family of nine children, he was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, December 12, 1812.

Acquiring his education in the pioneer schools of Ohio, Joseph Park remained with his parents until he was sixteen years of age. Beginning, then, the battle of life for himself, he found his first occupation in boating, and for a number of years run flatboats down the Wabash, Ohio and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans, in the meantime making his home in Indiana. In 1852, joining a company of emigrants westward bound, he came with a train of ox teams across the plains to Sacramento, Cal., during the trip of three months having no serious trouble with the Indians. Coming from California to Oregon by water, Mr. Park settled in Benton county, purchasing a farm on Muddy creek, about ten miles south of Corvallis. After living there eight years, he returned to Indiana, going by way of the Isthmus, and on Christmas day, 1861, took unto himself a wife. In the spring of 1862, accompanied by his bride, he again came west, traveling by ox-team train to Nevada, where he was engaged in farming and mining for two years. Continuing his journey toward the west, in 1864, he settled in Oregon, on the land which he had previously bought, and lived on it until 1869. Locating then in Topeka, Kans., Mr. Park was there employed in mercantile business for sixteen years. In 1885 he again came to Oregon. Purchasing five hundred and thirty acres of land about six miles southwest of Philomath, he made substantial improvements on the place, and brought a large part of the land into a highly productive condition. In 1890, with characteristic enterprise, he established a store of general merchandise in Philomath, the business being conducted by his sons under the firm name of Park Brothers. Taking up his residence in Philomath, he lived there until 1902, when he returned to his home farm, on which his death occurred, December 22, 1902, as previously stated.

On December 25, 1861, Mr. Park married, in Indiana, Mary A. Curtis, who was born in that state in January, 1839. She survives him, and with the assistance of her son, William, is successfully conducting the homestead farm. Mr. and Mrs. Park became the parents of four children, namely: William, Joseph A., a child that died in infancy, and Harriet E. A strong Republican in politics, Mr. Park always took a warm interest in the welfare of his adopted town and county, and watched with genuine pride its gradual evolution from a wild country to a superb agricultural region, whose well cultivated and well stocked ranches indicated its general prosperity. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for twenty-one years served as chorister.

William Park, the eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Park, married Edith Conner, a native of Oregon, and they have five children, namely: Lawrence, Joseph, Mary, Vivian and Theodore. William Park resides on the parental homestead, where he is carrying on general farming and stock-raising in a successful manner. He is a Republican in politics, and a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Joseph A. Park, the second son, resides near Corvallis, and is numbered among the prosperous and esteemed citizens of that locality. He married Alice Conner, an Oregonian by birth, and they are the parents of four children, namely: Charlie, Ada, Ida and Winnifred.

JOSIAH H. HERRON. Among the influential young farmers of Benton county none suggest careers of greater promise than Josiah H. Herron, owner of a farm of three hundred and twenty acres of land, one hundred of which are under cultivation. Mr. Herron comes of one of the prominent pioneer families of this county, and necessarily feels a great interest in his immediate surroundings, for he was born in the house which is now his home, September 13, 1870. His father, Robert Herron, an Irishman, lived to be fifty-five years of age, and served in the Rogue river war. His wife, formerly Mary W. Neil, married for her second husband, James Barclay, whom she survives, and whose farm of three hundred and forty acres she is still occupying.

Like all of the children in this well regulated home, Josiah H. was taught the value of industry, and schooled in every department of farming. At the district school he received a practical education, and remained under the paternal roof until his marriage with Lettie Edwards, who was born in Lane county, and whose father crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1853, settling in Benton and afterward removing to Lane county. While engaging in general farming and stock-raising Mr. Herron devotes twenty-five of his three hundred and twenty acres of land to fruit, principally prunes, and for the latter he has erected a dryer, sufficiently large for public drying. His farm is modern in its appointments, and fertile in soil, being well adapted to a variety of interests. That the fortunate owner appreciates this fact is evident to all who visit him in the midst of his activities, and note the neat and painstaking appearance of residence, barns and fences.

Like his brother and father, Mr. Herron is a Democrat, and, though one of the youngest farmers in his neighborhood, has been elected to the school board, serving also as school clerk. He is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World, at the lodge of which he is a genial and always welcome visitor. Mr. Herron is popular, enterprising, and very affable, enters heartily into the general undertakings of his neighborhood, and appreciates his position and responsibilities as a member of a growing and cosmopolitan community.

JOHN A. BUCHANAN. But a few years ago Benton county was called upon to give up by death one of the most honored members of the community, a man who commanded the respect and esteem of all with whom he came in contact, by his high moral character and the many sterling qualities which have made him a much-beloved citizen in his adopted state. He was the son of a Scotch emigrant who brought his family to the United States from England, where he had settled some years previous, and where John A. Buchanan was born. In 1854 he accompanied his brother, Robert L., to Oregon, the latter having made a previous trip. This brother now resides south of Corvallis. With the strength of character inherited from his Scotch ancestors John A. Buchanan soon found a place for himself in this growing west. After nine years in the mines in Idaho he selected agricultural pursuits for his life occupation, and with industry and perseverance through the pioneer years of this state he labored to become recognized as a successful farmer, in the process of which he acquired the title to many acres of valuable land. At his death he owned eight hundred and forty acres, a part of which was the old Proctor donation claim, and upon which he put the best and most substantial of improvements until now it represents one of the most valuable pieces of property in this section of the country. Mr. Buchanan engaged principally in general farming, being, however, much interested in wheat-raising, in which he was very successful. Not always a farmer, he owed considerable of his success to a fortunate venture in the Idaho mines, and also to other business interests. At the time of his death, which occurred very suddenly May 3, 1900, while he was engaged with the performance of some trivial duty, he was serving as county commissioner in the interests of the Republican party, of which he was a staunch adherent. He was a member of the United Brethren Church. The last resting place of this honorable pioneer is in Bellfountain Cemetery.

The marriage of Mr. Buchanan occurred January 15, 1873, in Douglas county, and united him with the daughter of a pioneer family, Miss Ruth Gardner, who was born in Illinois. Her father, Isaac M. Gardner, was a native of Baltimore, Md., who removed to Ohio at an early day, later following this up with a venture into the Prairie state. In 1853 he crossed the plains with his wife and three children, and after seven months of slow plodding of the patient oxen they descended from the Cascade mountains into the Willamette Valley, settling at Siulaw, where for seven years Mr. Gardner engaged in farming. Removing at this time to a farm on Elk creek, near Drain, Douglas county, he continued in this occupation, making his home at the present time in this location, being now eighty-four years of age. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for many years. His wife, known in maidenhood as Hannah Krewson, was born in Ohio and died in Douglas county, Ore., in 1891. Of the eleven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Gardner eight attained maturity, of whom six are now living. They are as follows: Ruth, the widow of John A. Buchanan; Susan, now Mrs. M. N. Ensley of Drain; Lucy, Mrs. Jacob Sawyer of Elkton; Emma, still a member of her father's home; Henry, a farmer near Drain; and Isaac, now a retired farmer of Drain.

When first married Mrs. Buchanan and her husband lived on his farm, which was located ten miles south of Corvallis, but since his death she has removed to Corvallis, making this city her home since 1901, on account of the educational advantages for her children, of whom there are seven living. The eldest of her children, J. Fred, is engaged in farming on three hundred and twenty acres of land in this county; Alice, a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College, is the wife of R. C. Herron, of Bruce, Benton county; Ernest is occupied in the stock business in Douglas county; Edith died at the age of seventeen years while attending the Oregon Agricultural College; the remaining children, Claude, Mildred, Carrie and Lizzie, are all at home, the former being a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College, and the three younger are attending the public schools. Mrs. Buchanan looks after the interests of the home farm, upon which the family spend the summer months. Like her father, she is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, her political convictions running parallel with those of her late husband.

JOSEPH GRAY. The labors which have resulted in the present high state of development noticeable in Benton county have been largely participated in by Mr. Gray, who is one of the prominent farmers and stock-raisers of the county. A native of Scotland, born June 30, 1828, his early life was not unlike that of many another youth of his acquaintance in the home land, but at eighteen years of age he determined to learn a trade and begin life in earnest. Choosing the carpenter's trade as the most congenial to his tastes, he at once set about to master it in all its details, and thereafter followed it in his native land until 1850, or until he was twenty-two years of age. It was in the year last mentioned that he first ventured from the scenes with which he had hitherto been familiar, going to Australia, and for four years was engaged at his trade in Melbourne.

The year 1851 was memorable in Australian history as the one in which gold was discovered in that country, and it is not surprising that Mr. Gray became enthusiastic in searching for the yellow dust as did so many thousands of others equally ambitious. After following the life of the miner for about six years he returned to his native land to visit friends and relatives, remaining but a short time, however, for in October of the same year, 1860, he landed in California. The following year he came to Oregon, settling in Benton county, where for four years he carried on farming upon rented land. At the expiration of this time, in 1865, he removed to his present farm of three hundred and thirty acres in the vicinity of Philomath, which he had purchased in 1862, and here he carries on general farming and raises stock, meeting with good returns for the care and labor bestowed.

It was while a resident of Melbourne, Australia, that Mr. Gray was united in marriage with Miss Annie Murray, a native of Scotland. Two children were born to this worthy couple, the eldest of whom, Isabelle, is a teacher in one of the public schools of Fresno, Cal.; and Alexander M. is interested with his father in the conduct of the home farm. Religiously the family are identified with the Presbyterian Church, to whose maintenance they contribute, and they may always be found in the forefront of all measures tending to benefit mankind or upbuild the community.

ABRAM N. LOCKE. The name of Abram N. Locke is worthy of mention among the early pioneers of Oregon, for at the youthful age of five years he crossed the plains with his parents and became an inhabitant of the country where primitive conditions reigned supreme, and in the passing years he has added his aims and ambitions to the upbuilding influences that have made the greatness and prosperity of this commonwealth.

The birth of Abram N. Locke occurred near Keytesville, Chariton county, Mo., September 1, 1842, his parents being A. N. and Harriett Sinett, natives respectively of Mississippi and Ohio. When a young man the father settled in Missouri, and there engaged in farming, remaining until 1847, when he was induced to undertake the journey into the west for the sake of the opportunities offered in the rich and productive lands, the times giving promise of rapid settlement. With his wife and four children he joined an ox train bound for the new settlements over the southern route of the old Oregon and California trail, coming by way of Canonville and Rogue river, and after six months spent in traveling he arrived at his destination. He at once took up a donation land claim of five hundred and fifty-four acres five miles north of Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., and in the years which followed he never had reason to regret his choice of a location. He continued to improve the land until his farm became one of the most valuable in the county. He remained in this location until his death, not too interested in his farming to take an active part in the affairs of his community at a time when men of worth and ability were most to be desired. Religiously he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and politically he was a Democrat, holding through this influence several important positions, among them being that of probate judge, in which he continued for six years; deputy sheriff for two years; and sheriff for a like period. Actively interested in all that pertained to the welfare or material growth of his adopted county, Mr. Locke gave liberally of his means toward every public movement, one of his donations being an acre of land to be devoted to the use of a cemetery, which was called by the name of the donor, and is now one of the finest burial grounds in this part of the county. The donation was made in 1855. His wife also died upon the old homestead. Besides our subject, the other children of this pioneer family are as follows: Thomas, who died in Oregon; William, residing on a part of the old homestead; Alonzo, a resident of Linn county, Ore.; Alfred, also on a part of the home farm; Laura, deceased; and Jennie, located in Seattle, Wash., is the wife of Samuel Boreland.

The boyhood of Abram N. Locke was spent upon his father's farm, and interspersed with his usual home duties was an attendance of the public school, his first remembrance of the educational advantages of Oregon being of a little log house where the children of the pioneer settlers gathered for their share in the distribution of knowledge. Later he engaged with his father in farming, where he remained for three years; after attaining his majority, or nearly so, he went in 1862 on a prospecting trip to the mines located near Boise City, Idaho, and the next year, in company with his father and brother William, he took pack trains to that city and for some time was engaged in packing in the mines, from which labor he realized a considerable amount. On returning to Oregon he became the possessor of a part of the home place, which he has since continued to own, farming upon it for the principal part of the time. Four years of the time since his purchase he was engaged in the cattle business in Crook county, Ore., after which he sold his interests there and returned to Benton county. He now owns one hundred and ninety acres of the original claim, upon which he has built a residence and made many other improvements, following the example of his father in his endeavor to make a successful farmer and a good citizen. His specialty in agriculture is the cultivation of grain, most of his land lying in a rich and productive valley. He also owns two handsome residences in Corvallis, to one of which he retired in 1898, where with five acres of land he occupies his time and takes a well earned rest from the active duties of life, enjoying and appreciating the changes which have come within his range of vision, one of the greatest being the absence from the hills and forests of the wild animals which he hunted in his boyhood days.

In Chariton county, Mo., Mr. Locke was united in marriage with Miss Annie Sinnett, a native of that state. Adhering to the convictions of his father, Mr. Locke is Democratic in his political affiliations, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Fraternally he belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen, having attained the Degree of Honor.

NELSON P. CRUME. The Brownsville flouring mills, owned and managed by Nelson P. Crume since 1901, is one of the substantial enterprises of the town, and one which is destined to continually enlarge its business. This prophecy is based upon the excellent quality of the flour produced, and which finds a ready market all along the coast. Since coming under the present management the old mills have been completely overhauled, new and modern machinery introduced, and a capacity of fifty barrels a day attained to. The power is water, and the visitor to the white interior finds a hive of industry, wherein the greatest system and order prevail.

In Daviess county, Mo., where he was born December 9, 1856, Mr. Crume was reared on the farm of his father, George W. Crume, who had settled there after leaving his native state of Illinois. The father left his home interests to serve in the Civil war, and became a martyr to the cause of the Union. Enlisting as a private in the Twenty-third Missouri Volunteer Infantry, in 1861, he took part in several of the first battles of the war, but died at Alton of camp fever, contracted while exposed to the rigors of the service, in 1863. His wife, formerly Malinda C. Thompson, was born in Kentucky, and some months after the death of her husband, married Lot S. Harris. The latter brought his wife and her children across the plains in 1864, locating on a claim near Scio, which he improved and lived upon until his death, in 1900. He is survived by his wife, who lives with her son, Quincy, near Carlton.

The oldest of the three sons born to his parents, Nelson P. Crume, was educated in the public schools, and entered the Oregon Agricultural College, at Corvallis, in 1875. In 1882 he engaged in farming near Brownsville, purchasing one hundred acres of land, which he sold in 1890, and thereafter engaged in a general merchandise business at Shedd's. Eleven years later he sold out and purchased the mills, to the management of which he has since devoted his energies. A native daughter of this vicinity, Sarah Harrison, became the wife of Mr. Crume, since his coming to Brownsville, her father, Robert Harrison, born in Lincolnshire, England, having come to the United States at an early day. Mr. Harrison located first in Michigan, from which state he crossed the plains in 1853 and settled on his present farm four miles northwest of Brownsville. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Crume: George W., on the home place; Van A., deceased; Nellie; Bessie; Iris; and Sarah. Politically Mr. Crume is a Prohibitionist, and he is at present serving his first term in the council. He is fraternally connected with the Blue Lodge No. 36, Free and Accepted Masons, of Brownsville, and the Woodmen of the World. A man of high moral character and unswerving integrity, he finds a religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is a trustee, and towards the support and upbuilding of which he has liberally contributed both time and money for many years.

LEMUEL DUNCAN SCARBROUGH, M. D. The work which Dr. L. D. Scarbrough has done in the community in which he has made his home for a lengthy period has been varied in nature, but in no instance has its quality suffered, as thoroughness has been the doctor's watchword in all lines of business which he has cared to take up. He was born in White Plains, Ala., June 14, 1851, the son of a farmer of North Carolina, and the descendant of Scotch and English ancestry. The father, Lemuel, lived to the age of fifty-two years, while the mother, Nancy P. (McRae) Scarbrough, attained the age of eighty-five years. Of the twelve children born to his parents all attained maturity and the youngest was Lemuel D., of this review, his preliminary education being received in the public schools in the vicinity of his home. Afterward he attended Oxford College, in the town of Oxford, in his native state, and at the age of twenty-one took up the study of medicine under the instruction of Dr. Benjamin S. Evans, of White Plains, graduating from Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., in 1875, being one of the first class to graduate from that institution. For a year following his graduation he practiced medicine in Alabama, at the end of which time he came to Oregon and located at Creswell, Lane county, in which vicinity he has since remained, becoming one of the prominent and successful men of the section. Besides carrying on his profession he has been extensively engaged in general fruit farming, owning a ranch of two hundred acres, fifty-five acres of bearing prune and apple trees, one hundred and twenty acres of a hundred and forty-four-acre farm just set to fruit, and twenty-three acres adjoining Creswell upon which he has built a comfortable cottage, a substantial barn and other improvements, and has also a fruit dryer, the capacity of which is from five to six hundred bushels. In addition to this he has been engaged since 1882 in the general merchandise business in this town.

Dr. Scarbrough was first married in 1878 to Emma Redford, a native of Oregon, and of the three children born to them Marvin M. is a student in the medical department of Yale University; Eba E. is at home, and the youngest died in infancy. Miss Clara Cochran, who was born in Cottage Grove, Lane county, became his second wife, and their five children, all of whom are at home, are named in order of birth as follows: Emerson, Carlisle, Dewey, Nancy G. and Crystal. In politics a Democrat, Dr. Scarbrough has always taken an interested part in the local affairs of his party and through this influence has held various minor offices in the vicinity. For twelve years he has acted as postmaster of Creswell. Fraternally he belongs to the Masonic order, in which he has passed all the chairs, and is also identified with the Woodmen of the World, having held all the offices in this order, and in which he also acts as examining physician. The Independent Order of Odd Fellows also profits by his membership.

JOHN MORLEY. Closely identified with the farming interests of Marion county is John Morley, who is pleasantly located about three miles northeast of Silverton, where he is prosperously engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. He is numbered among the veteran farmers of the county who have labored with unceasing toil in their chosen vocation, and are now enjoying comfortable competencies, acquired chiefly by their own efforts. Of good old Virginia stock, he was born May 9, 1823, in Jackson county, Ohio, a son of Moses Morley.

Moses Morley, a native of Virginia, born about 1788, removed with his parents, when a small boy, to Ohio, where he lived until after his marriage to Catherine Wadkins, a native of Maryland, and the birth of several of his children. In 1850, although then past the prime of manhood, he made an overland trip to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and settled near Sublimity, Marion county. Two years later he sent for his wife, who crossed the plains to join him, but their reunion was of brief duration, his death occurring the same year, in 1852. His widow spent her remaining days with their son, John, the subject of this sketch, passing away at the advanced age of eighty-three years. She was the mother of thirteen children, John Morley being the only survivor of the family.

Obtaining his early education in the district schools, and remaining on the old home farm in Ohio until twenty-one years of age, John Morley then left the parental roof and began the battle of life for himself, working for wages the first three years thereafter. In 1847, following the tide of immigration westward, he and two boys by the name of Darst started for Oregon, crossing the plains with an ox-team, and being four months on the road. They crossed the Missouri river at St. Joseph May 5, and reached the Willamette valley September 5. Becoming a pioneer of Marion county, he took up a claim near Sublimity, about three miles from the town, and after his marriage settled to housekeeping on property still nearer that place, living there about eight years. Removing to Silverton in 1862, Mr. Morley turned his attention to the milling business, operating a grist-mill there for eight years. In 1871 he bought a farm nearly three miles northeast of Silverton, after which he purchased the farm which he now owns and occupies. He has one hundred and forty-six acres of land, which he devotes to stock-raising and general farming, twelve acres being planted to hops.

September 20, 1855, Mr. Morley was united in marriage with Senah E. Jones, who was born in Missouri, and from that state crossed the plains in 1852, accompanying her parents, Lewis and Polly Ann (McAlpin) Jones. She passed to the higher life in 1886. To Mrs. Morley sixteen children were born, namely: George W., who lives near Silverton; Jerome, living at home; Levi, deceased; Nettie, wife of Philip Hicks, residing southwest of Silverton; Joshua M., of Silverton; Mary Catharine, wife of John C. Warnock, residing near Silverton; Laura Alice, wife of William S. Jack, of Silverton; Charles, residing near Silverton; Effie, wife of John Hicks; Iva B., at home; Rosa, wife of Howard C. Whitlock; Ella, wife of Dennis C. McCleary; John L.; Roy; Rachel, and Ruth.

JEREMIAH E. HENKLE. In a beautiful home in Philomath, erected in 1883, Jeremiah E. Henkle is living a practically retired life, the fortunate possessor of large property interests in town and county, and of the unbounded good will of his fellow townsmen. A resident of Oregon since his tenth year, he represents one of the pioneer families of the state, while not far distant, on a farm of three hundred and sixty acres, four miles west of the town, there is living his father, Ichabod, the possessor of a good name in this northwestern country. Ichabod Henkle is ninety-three years of age, is feeble in health, and as the result of a stroke of paralysis four years ago, is deprived of the gift of speech. Enshrouded thus in the shadows of life, and approaching that bourne whence no traveler ever returns, he can contemplate serenely his life-work, interspersed as it has been with more than ordinary accomplishment. He was born in Pendleton county, W. Va., October 10, 1810, and, when very young, removed with his parents to Fayette county, Ohio, in 1839 locating on a farm in Lee county, Iowa. In 1849 he settled on a farm in Appanoose county, Iowa, and there lived with his family, working with his father, Jacob, who was born in West Virginia, and who moved to Ohio, and from there to Iowa with his wife and children. Jacob and his son, Ichabod, were the prime movers in the proposed emigration across the plains in 1853, and Jacob located on the farm where Ichabod is still dreaming his dreams, and waiting. Jacob lived to be seventy-seven years old, his death occurring in 1875. Ichabod developed the true western spirit, was full of push and energy and resource, and saw many ways of promoting the well-being of his adopted state. He was one of the original incorporators of the Corvallis, Oregon & Yaquina Bay Wagon Road Company, and was a director in the Willamette Valley Coast Railroad, predecessor of the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company. He married Mary A. King, who was born in Delaware, and who bore him three children, two sons and a daughter, of whom Jeremiah and Jessie only are living, the former being the second child.

At a very early age Jeremiah E. Henkle started in to perform his share of work on the farm, attending as opportunity offered the public schools of his neighborhood. In 1867 he engaged in working a saw-mill on the old farm, and in 1872 came to Philomath, where he was enrolled as one of the first students of the college of this town. However, scarcity of funds prevented his attending the college for more than one term, and an opportunity presenting itself to engage in business, he started a general merchandise enterprise in partnership with J. L. Shipley. Mr. Shipley dying in 1877, Mr. Henkle was left to manage the business alone, which he did uninterruptedly until 1891, when he sold his business and has since been on the retired list. In the meantime his interests had accumulated, and among other things he had purchased eight hundred acres of land, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising, eventually placing thirty acres of his land under hops. He still owns the Henkle saw-mill on the south fork of the Mary river, with its surrounding two hundred acres, all of which is rented to his brother. He also owns a farm of four hundred and fifty acres near the town, as well as the store in which the postoffice is located, and a half block adjoining, with its three or four buildings.

Many interesting events have occurred in the career of Mr. Henkle, who is above all else public-spirited, and ever on the alert for opportunity. In 1859, with his father, Ichabod, he made a trip down the Yaquina river to the bay, a most exciting and interesting voyage, for they had to cut their way at every turn. In 1863 they undertook the same journey in a skiff, and, in 1867, Jeremiah went by himself over the same route in a steambot, noting as he went the great changes which had come over the region in the meantime. In 1864 he enlisted for the Indian service in Company A, First Oregon Volunteers, and for a year was located at the Vancouver barracks. For a month the regiment was stationed at Fort Yamhill, and then went across the river country after Indians, remaining there for about nine months. He was discharged from the service June 30, 1866, and has always retained in his possession the gun and other equipment which constituted his war regalia. In 1880 he was chosen one of the receivers to make the first trip of ten miles down the Oregon & Pacific Railroad, and to receive the first ten miles that was completed from Toledo to Yaquina City—John Minto, of Marion county, and Robert Cohorn, of Lane county, being the other receivers. A Republican in politics, he has taken an active interest in his party's undertakings in this county, has served as councilman for ten years, and was postmaster of Philomath for twelve years. It will thus be seen that he has been intimately connected with pioneer as well as later enterprises, and has contributed his share towards their up-building.

In Philomath, Mr. Henkle was united in marriage with Lizzie Mason, daughter of George Mason, a native of Illinois, and who crossed the plains in 1853. Locating on a claim on Mary's river, Mr. Mason lived there for many years, but finally moved into the town, where he died at an advanced age. His daughter, Mrs. Henkle, died here in 1876, leaving a son, Otis C., who is now a hardware merchant of Dayton, Wash. In 1878 Mr. Henkle married Nancy A. Hunt, who was born in Oak county, Iowa, February 18, 1859, and whose father, Benjamin J., was born in Fleming county, Ky., November 16, 1821. The Hunts moved to near Des Moines, Iowa, in 1847, and, in 1869, crossed the plains with mule teams, making the trip to Washington territory in three months. Locating on a farm in the territory Mr. Hunt founded the town of Huntsville, and also started that educational institution known as the Huntsville Seminary, located in Columbia county. In 1900 he removed to Dayton, Wash., where he is living in retirement. He married Margaret Field, born in White county, Ill., and who also is living. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Henkle, Rodell and Beulah, both of whom are living with their parents. Mr. Henkle is a member of the United Brethren Church, the liberal branch, and his wife is active in missionary and Women's Christian Temperance Union work. Mr. Henkle is one of the solid and substantial upbuilders of this part of the state, and while traveling his way has cemented many friendships of a lasting and beautiful nature. He is one of those western noblemen to whom the coast country owes a great debt of gratitude, and whom it will ever honor for his character and undertakings.

SEYMOUR CHIPMAN. A widely known and prominent citizen of Corvallis and a veteran of the late Civil war, the brief life record of Seymour Chipman affords an excellent example for young men just entering the field of business activity, well illustrating the virtue of patriotism and showing the success to be attained by industry, enterprise and thrift. The representative of an old New England family, he was born June 30, 1833, in Essex, Chittenden county, Vt., a son of John Chipman. On the paternal side he comes of English ancestry, his great grandfather, Jonathan Chipman, having been born and bred in England, where he learned the hatter's trade. Subsequently emigrating to this country, he purchased land in Essex, Vt., and by strenuous labor cleared a homestead from the wilderness.

Thomas Chipman, the grandfather of Seymour Chipman, spent his entire life in Essex, Vt., being industriously engaged in farming pursuits. During the war of 1812 he offered his services to his country, and at the memorable battle of Plattsburg was captain of one of the companies in a prominent regiment. He took an active part in town affairs, and was a leading member of the Baptist Church.

John Chipman was born in Essex, Vt., in 1798, and there spent the first half of his long life. Coming into possession of a part of the ancestral homestead, he carried on general farming, and also worked at the carpenter's trade. Removing with his family to Illinois in 1843, he lived near Rockford for nine years, then took up his residence six miles north of Belvidere. In 1852 he migrated to Iowa, locating in Clayton county, near Strawberry Point, where he owned and operated a saw-mill and a grist-mill. Later, in company with his son, Seymour Chipman, he settled in Pocahontas county, Iowa, and lived there until his death, at the age of eighty-four years. His wife, whose maiden name was Harriet Hoadley, was born in Vermont, a daughter of Thomas Hoadley. Mr. Hoadley, who was of Welsh descent, was born and reared in Vermont. In 1843 he removed to Illinois, but after living in the Prairie state a few years he returned to his old home in Vermont, and there spent the remainder of his life, dying at the advanced age of ninety-seven years. Three boys and four girls were born of the union of John and Harriet (Hoadley) Chipman, and with the exception of two daughters all are now living. All of the sons served in the late Civil war, LaFayette, now a resident of Pocahontas county, Iowa, having served in the First Minnesota Heavy Artillery, while Horace, who resides in Calhoun county, Iowa, served in the Second Minnesota Infantry. The mother died at a venerable age in Minnesota.

Seymour Chipman, the oldest son of the parental household, was a lad of ten years when he accompanied his parents to Illinois, making the long trip from Vermont by horse-teams. After completing his early education in the district schools he assisted his father in improving a farm, and during the harvest seasons was employed in threshing. Removing to Clayton county, Iowa, in 1852, he was at first engaged in milling as proprietor of a saw-mill and a grist-mill, and subsequently operated a carding-mill and a woolen-mill. On August 11, 1862, Mr. Chipman enlisted in Company B, Twenty-first Iowa Infantry, and on being mustered into service at Dubuque, Iowa, was elected fifer of the regiment. He took an active part in many important engagements, among the more notable being the battle at Port Gibson, on May 1, 1863, and the siege of Vicksburg, which was concluded by the capitulation of that city on July 4, 1863. The following month Mr. Seymour was taken seriously ill, and, on his return to the army, was transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps, with which he was actively identified until the close of the conflict, serving in the commissary department at Camp McClelland, Davenport, Iowa. On June 28, 1865, he was mustered out of service and returned home.

Establishing himself in business as a blacksmith and carriage manufacturer at Strawberry Point, Mr. Chipman remained there successfully employed until 1881. Going then to Gilmore City, Iowa, he was there engaged in agricultural pursuits for four or more years, after which he embarked in the hotel business, which he carried on until 1890. Coming then to Oregon, Mr. Chipman located first near Forest Grove, where he purchased a claim, on which he resided about two years. In 1893 he settled at his present home in Corvallis, where he has since exerted a marked influence in advancing the various enterprises inaugurated to develop its resources and promote its prosperity. During his active career he has accumulated a competency, being the owner of much valuable property in different parts of Oregon and of a good farm in Greenwood county, Kansas.

On August 14, 1853, at Strawberry Point, Iowa, Mr. Chipman married Prudence Maxson, who was born in Clark county, Ohio, which was likewise the birthplace of her father, Ephraim Maxson, and the lifelong residence of her grandfather, Jesse Maxson. Ephraim Maxson, a farmer by occupation, removed from Ohio to Indiana, thence to Michigan, and finally to Iowa, locating on a farm in Clayton county, where he resided until his death, at the age of fifty-three years. He married Mary Smith, whose father, Peter Smith, died in Michigan. Ten children blessed their union, three of whom are now living. One son, David Maxson, who in the Civil war was a member of the regiment to which Mr. Chipman belonged, died while in the service of his country. Another son, Christian Maxson, is now a merchant in Edgewood, Iowa. Mr. and Mrs. Chipman are the parents of five children, namely: Mrs. Eva Moyer, of Gilmore City, Iowa; Charles, of Corvallis; Clarence, proprietor of a restaurant and bakery in Corvallis; Mrs. Lillian Theresa Simpson, of Portland, Ore.; and Vidella, wife of F. L. Miller, of Corvallis.

On August 14, 1903, Mr. and Mrs. Chipman celebrated their golden wedding. Mr. Chipman met his friends at the door and received them with a hearty handshake and word of welcome. They passed into the parlor, where Mrs. Chipman, as active and light of heart as a girl of sixteen, expressed her pleasure at their presence. Here all registered, and, after partaking of the contents of the punch bowl, presided over by Mrs. Clarence Chipman, passed out onto the lawn where they were served with lunch. Mr. and Mrs. Chipman were the recipients of many handsome presents. The Mystic Shriners presented him and his wife with a beautiful loving cup. Upon it was inscribed the names of the donors, S. L. Kline, H. W. Hall, W. E. Yates, S. L. Hayes, Rev. MacLean, S. N. Wilkins, T. H. Crawford, Captain Harding and J. B. Horner. The presentation speech was made by Mr. Crawford. Mr. and Mrs. Chipman made fitting response and each Noble drank to their health from the loving cup.

Politically Mr. Chipman is a staunch Republican, and while living in Iowa served sixteen years as justice of the peace, and was mayor of Gilmore City at the time of his removal to Oregon. Fraternally he was made a Mason at Strawberry Point, Iowa, in 1862, and is past master of Strawberry Point Lodge, F. & A. M.; and past high priest of Ferguson Chapter, No. 5, R. A. M., of Corvallis, of which he is treasurer; he is a member of Corvallis Lodge, F. & A. M., of which he is past master; a member and thrice illustrious master of Oregon Council, No. 2, R. & S. M.; is deputy Grand Master of the Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters of Oregon; and a member of Albany Commandery, K. T., while in June, 1903, he became a member of the Mystic Shrine of Oregon. He is a member, and past commander, of Ellsworth Post, G. A. R., and in 1902 was junior vice commander of the Department of Oregon. Mrs. Chipman is a prominent member of the W. R. C., of which she is an ex-president and of the W. C. T. U.

JAMES C. REED. As an energetic farmer, James C. Reed has passed the years since he came to the west, and prosperity has smiled upon him in his patient, uncomplaining toil, and blessed him with an abundance as a reward for a well spent life. He makes his home upon the land which first became his property, in the early munificence of Oregon's fields, but each passing year has found him able to increase the number of acres until he now has a farm of nine hundred acres, all in one body, upon which is carried on general farming and stock-raising.

Born October 11, 1828, James C. Reed is a native of Knox county, Tenn., where his father was engaged as a farmer, that being the life to which he was reared. He had, however, taken up the saddlery trade and later added that of millwright. In Tennessee he married Elizabeth England, also a native of that state, who died in 1840. Two years later the father removed to Missouri. Four children had been born to them, of whom one other besides James C., is located in the west, George being located in Dilley, Washington county, Ore. The father died when about forty-five years old. After the death of his mother James C. Reed left home, thus early assuming the burden of self-support, but fortunately finding a home with an uncle, with whom he remained until attaining his majority, their home being also changed to Missouri soon after he became a member of the household. In the winter of 1849 he followed logging and rafting along the Mississippi river, and two years later was married, the home of himself and wife being in Missouri until 1853. With the courage and energy of their pioneer forefathers the young people then made the six-months trip to Oregon, the mode of conveyance being the slow-plodding oxen, and upon their safe arrival Mr. Reed took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty-five acres located in Lane county, ten miles south of Eugene and three miles north of Creswell. The passing years have justified the choice of location, for through the now improved and finely cultivated farm extends the Southern Pacific Railroad, which speaks so eloquently of the changes which time has brought to the pioneer settlers. Two hundred acres of this property is now in active cultivation, this and all the improvements which have kept pace with the changes going on being the result of the practical and well directed efforts of the worthy possessor.

The wife who shared the trials and troubles of the early life and now enjoys the prosperity, was formerly Miss ANN E. Dillard, a native of Tennessee. She was the daughter of Samuel Dillard, of Kentucky, born there May 12, 1810, and in Tennessee he married Elizabeth Julian, whose birth occurred October 5, 1806. They made their home in that state until 1837, when they removed to Missouri. In addition to the farming interests in which he had always gained a livelihood, Mr. Dillard was a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and it was both the desire to better his worldly condition and to carry the gospel into the new lands that led to their emigration in 1853, the entire family crossing the plains with ox-teams and settling in the vicinity of Lane county. This continued to be the home of the family until the death of the parents, the father living to be eighty-one years old and the mother fifty-two. Of the five children who were born to them four are now living, namely: Rufus, of Washington; William, also of Washington; Sarah, who became the wife of Robert Cochran, and is located near Cottage Grove, and Ann Reed. In politics Mr. Dillard was a Democrat, and fraternally he was associated with the Masonic order. To Mr. and Mrs. Reed were born the following children: Samuel D., who is at home with his parents; William P., deceased; Robert H., of Harrisburg; George D., also at home; Emma, now Mrs. George Jordan, of Washington; Joseph A., located west of Eugene; Lena, deceased; and one who died in infancy. Mr. Reed is a Democrat in his political convictions and through the influence of this party has held various minor offices in this vicinity.

JOHN M. MOYER. Persistent and painstaking effort, augmented by strong and forceful personal characteristics, have won for John M. Moyer a substantial place among the pioneer manufacturers and farmers of Linn county. Like the majority who came to the coast in the early days, he was not burdened with superfluous belongings or the wherewithal to purchase the same, and started out empty-handed to hew out his own destiny. His earliest childhood was spent in Schuylkill county, Pa., where he was born August 21, 1829, a son of Gabriel and grandson of Daniel Moyer, the latter of whom was born in the east and died at a very early day in Ohio. Gabriel was born in Pennsylvania, and his wife, Hannah Andrews, was of the same state, her death occurring in Ohio in 1888. A farmer and cooper by occupation, Mr. Moyer moved to Trumbull county, Ohio, about 1830, later settling on a farm of ninety-one acres of timber land in Mahoning county. A still later place of residence was in Medina county, Ohio, where his death occurred in 1848, after many years of successful farming and work at his trade as a cooper. Of his fifteen children, eight of whom were sons, John M. is the third.

Of necessity the early education of John Moyer was limited, yet on the Pennsylvania and Ohio farms he gleaned a great deal of practical information, above all else learning the invaluable lessons of industry and economy. In 1848 he learned the carpenter's trade, and while working thereat became interested in the accounts of rich lands and still richer mines which came from the coast. With G. F. Colbert he began to prepare for the long trip, and the arrangements showed his desire to profit by the experiences of those who had gone before. Instead of ox-teams the partners bought a wagon, three horses and plenty of provisions and grain for their horses; and succeeded in reaching their destination at Foster's at the end of three months, a remarkably rapid journey, considering the drawbacks which they met on their way. After a couple of weeks on the Clackamas river as the guests of Mr. Arthur, they sold their outfit and started for the Calapooia river, meeting there another genial and hospitable host in the person of Elias L. Walters. Mr. Moyer was pleased with the location and remained for some time, and afterward worked at his trade at what was then called Calapooia postoffice, but which is now known as Brownsville. Almost his first undertaking was to build a house for H. L. Brown, whose daughter, Elizabeth, he married, June 4, 1857. Mr. Brown, after whom Brownsville was named, was born in the east, and crossed the plains to Oregon in 1846. He was a man of leading characteristics, and became very prominent in the little locality, where he conducted the first store, a general merchandise establishment, being the busiest center of activity in the locality. He was a Democrat in politics, and took a prominent part in his party's affairs in Linn county, serving as justice of the peace for many years, and as a member of the legislature for two terms. A man of fine principles and great energy, he was genial, approachable and humane.

Purchasing a herd of cattle in 1855, Mr. Moyer started for the mines of California the following year, but he returned soon after with illusions dispelled, and with an abiding confidence in slower but surer means of livelihood. In 1857 he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land, soon added sixty more, and began to clear his property, living the while in the most primitive manner. His trade proved useful at this stage of his career, for he soon made a comfortable home for primitive housekeeping. The following spring the town of Brownsville was laid out by James Blakeley and others, and Mr. Moyer purchased a few lots, built a house, and removed his family there, soon thereafter engaging at his trade. During the Florence gold excitement in Idaho in 1862, he thought he saw an opportunity for making money rapidly by packing across the mountains. The severity of the weather, and the deep snows which impeded the progress of his wagons had not been taken into account, and he became footsore from the almost interminable journeys, and almost lost his sight from the constant glare of the snow. Some weeks later he returned to Brownsville weary at heart and the loser by $800. Recovering his health and spirits Mr. Moyer worked at his trade until 1863, when he bought the Brownsville Planing Mills, formerly owned by William Linville, and which he fitted with modern machinery, and worked into a paying and extensive business. These mills passed into the hands of his son in 1875, and to the present time are one of the busy enterprises of the town. In 1861 he became interested in the Brownsville Woolen Mills, known then as the Linn Woolen Mill, which he also rebuilt, and which burned down the following year. In 1875 this mill was involved in litigation, and was sold at auction and passed into the hands of Mr. Moyer, who forthwith organized a stock company, and started the Brownsville Woolen Mills upon a successful career. He was president up to his retirement in 1889, and during his administration the mill extended its sphere of usefulness and sent its commodities into every part of the north and west. After its sale in 1889, Mr. Moyer still continued as its president and a large stockholder, resigning from the position in 1896. In 1889 he purchased stock in the Portland store on the corner of First and Alder streets. The Brownsville mill was 66x150 feet ground dimensions, was equipped with the most modern machinery, and turned out tweeds, cassimeres, flannels and blankets. In 1888 Mr. Moyer extended his field of usefulness to banking, becoming one of the incorporators of the Bank of Brownsville, of which he was president for many years. In 1890 he organized the Bank of Woodburn, of which he was active vice president for some years.

Independent in political affiliations, Mr. Moyer was the first mayor of Brownsville, and has served for many years as school director. It is but fitting that so early and ambitious a settler should actively participate in its general upbuilding, and this he has done uninterruptedly ever since coming here. In 1881 he planned and built one of the truly beautiful and commodious residences in the town, which he still occupies, and which has ever been the scene of hospitality and good fellowship. Of his six children, four are deceased, while Edward D. is a resident of Portland, and H. Breckenridge is running the saw-mill near town. Thus is mentioned all too briefly a man whose far-sighted judgment, shrewd business ability, and unquestioned integrity has been of signal and lasting use in a progressive and appreciative community.

ELIAS KEENEY. May 10, 1846, Elias Keeney left Holt county, Mo., with ox-teams, and, after crossing the plains in about the average time, arrived at his destination three miles east of Brownsville, September 14; of the same year. This early pioneer, who represents the prosperous and successful agriculturist of the west, came to this state with almost no money, his worldly possessions consisting of the clothes he wore. An impression of his life and of his use of opportunity among strangers among whom he came without resources, is best gained by visiting his well equipped and modern farm three miles west of Brownsville. This property became his home a year after coming to Oregon, in 1849, and consists of six hundred and forty acres. Many changes have taken place during these fifty-six years of residence, and from a wilderness in the woods Mr. Keeney has developed a paying and valuable property, and one which has been a source of great satisfaction to its enterprising owner.

A native of Ray county, Mo., Mr. Keeney was born December 18, 1828, his father, John, and mother, Mary Ramsey (Buckhaultler) Keeney, being natives of Tennessee. The parents were early settlers in Ray county, where the father engaged in farming and stock-raising in pre-empted land, and there reared his eight sons and one daughter. He removed to Holt county, Mo., in 1842, but did not long survive his change of location, for his death occurred on his farm in 1845. He was survived by his wife, who came to Oregon on the second trip made by her son, in 1851, and died near Brownsville at the age of eighty-nine years. Among her children were twins, Elias and Ely, who began life upon very unequal footings, for Elias was unusually small, while Ely weighed eleven pounds. As time went on Elias showed the better and stronger constitution, and at the present time is not only much the heavier, but is the largest and strongest in the family.

Owing to the extremely wild conditions in Holt county, Mo., Elias received a limited education, for the schoolhouse was remote and the home duties arduous. To his quiet neighborhood came the cheering news of gold and fertile lands in the west, and though crossing the plains in 1846 was as yet a most hazardous and unusual undertaking, he cheerfully confronted the undertaking, although he had practically nothing with which to start life in the far west. Once established upon the farm which he now owns, he returned to Missouri in 1850, and there married Margaret Jane Hyatt, who died in Oregon in 1861, leaving four children. Of these, Ely is a resident of Phoenix, Ariz.; Rebecca is deceased; Emma is the wife of James McHargue; and John.

The year of his marriage Mr. Keeney again started over the plains, bringing with him his wife, his mother, and all of the children with the exception of one brother and two sisters. Settling on his claim, he lived there until 1891, and then moved into Eugene to educate his children. In 1900 he went back to the farm, and in 1901 located in Brownsville, purchasing a little property on the south side, where he has erected a comfortable home. Some time after the death of his wife he had married Lucinda Van Winkle, who was born in Tennessee, and who died in Oregon. Nine children were born of this union, the order of their birth being as follows: George W., deceased; Rhoda, the wife of James Vaughn, a farmer of Halsey, Ore.; James M., of east Oregon; Edward Elias, deceased; Homer J., of Portland; Clarky, deceased; Roy J.; Ilena J., an educator in Shaniko, Wasco county; and one child, who died in infancy. The third marriage of Mr. Keeney, which occurred in 1887, was with Mrs. Matilda Noffsinger, who was born in Missouri, as was also her father, Hiram Lee, a native of Cape Girardeau county. Mr. Noffsinger farmed for many years in Missouri, and crossed the plains in 1863, locating near Cottage Grove, Lane county, where he bought land, and where he died in 1883, at the age of eighty-seven years. Four of his children are living: Martin H.; W. N., of Montana; Thomas H., of Los Angeles, Cal.; and Ida M., an educator of Eugene, Ore. Mr. Keeney is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he is an officer, and towards the support of which he is a liberal contributor. He is unquestionably the friend of education, and during his residence on the farm served for many years as school director. He has also served the Republican party as road supervisor for two years, but has never sought official positions or worked for other interests than those of his friends. He has been an interested spectator of the development of his section from a wilderness to the present agricultural and commercial prestige, and has contributed his share towards its larger and better growth. In the early days he had many experiences of a more or less unpleasant nature with the Indians, and in the war of 1848 enlisted in Company C, Fourth Regiment, as a private, under command of Captain Maxon. During this war he participated in the battles of De Chutes river, Wells Springs and Two Cannon, the latter conflict lasting three days. He was discharged in Oregon City, and thereafter returned to his ranch. He also served in the Rogue river war as a private, and well remembers the great conflict known as the Battle of the Meadows.

WILLIAM McLEOD. As his name implies, William McLeod is a Scotchman, with a faculty for making the most of every opportunity. He has engaged in several lines of activity since coming to the west and north. At present conducting a tannery business in Brownsville, he finds his occupation both successful and congenial, possibly for the reason that he is thoroughly conversant with it, and has inaugurated some new departures from the general line of tanning. He makes a specialty of saddle and skirting leather, and handles about one thousand hides a year. Since 1894 his business has been located in Kirk's addition, and his commodities have found a ready market in all of the coast towns, as well as in some of the cities of the east.

For many years the McLeod family was well known in Invernesshire, a maritime and highland county in Scotland, the largest in the kingdom, and extending across the island from sea to sea. Mountainous, rugged, and well wooded, it is a pastoral county, cattle, sheep, and wool being the principal sources of revenue. Trade is facilitated by the Caledonian canal, extending the whole length of the shire, and the farmers or stockmen fortunate enough to dwell within its boundaries as a rule are prosperous and fairly content. Donald McLeod, the father of William, was no exception, and for twenty years of his life he roamed over the rich lands of Inverness, buying cattle for a stockman of wealth and influence. He was not unmindful of opportunities beyond the sea, however, and, leaving behind the associations of his ancestors, he came to America in 1837, locating in Ontario, Canada, where he engaged in farming. The same year, in October, his son William was born, and was reared to an industrious life, attending the common schools of the county. The paternal farm consisted of one hundred acres of land, and here the father lived and prospered, and here his death occurred in 1855, at the age of sixty-seven years. The mother, formerly, Sybella Forbes, also born in Scotland, died in Canada, leaving two sons and two daughters, two children having died in infancy.

Four years after the death of his father, in 1859, William, then nineteen years of age, came to California, having heard glowing reports of the mining chances on the coast. In Placer county he engaged in gold mining for a couple of years, and in 1861 went to the Puget Sound country, later still making his way to the mines at Orofino, Idaho. In 1862 he located on Sauvies Island, in the Columbia river, and turned his attention to tobacco raising, a venture not entirely satisfactory, for we find him in Portland in 1864, engaged in getting out wharf timber and boat material. In 1866 Mr. McLeod came to Brownsville and engaged in the tannery business with A. E. Ellis, and after a year the entire business was owned by him, and independently conducted until 1877. He then went to Golden-dale, Klickitat county, Wash., and farmed and conducted a tannery, and in the spring of 1882 returned to Brownsville, where he re-purchased the tannery he owned before and conducted it for three years in partnership with a well known man of the town. In 1894 he sold out to his partner, and the same year built his present place of business, in the conduct of which he has so well succeeded.

In Brownsville, Mr. McLeod married Leah A. Riggs, born in Missouri, and who came across the plains with her mother in 1864, shortly after the death of her father, John Riggs. The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McLeod: Mrs. Lizzie Roberts, deceased; Katie, deceased; and John and Florence, at home. Mr. McLeod is a Republican in political preference, and has been a member of the city council. He is prominent in the Methodist Episcopal Church, is a class leader, and contributes generously towards the support of the church. He is still interested in mines and owns considerable stock in the Calapooia Mill & Mining Company. Possessing excellent business judgment, tact and consideration for all whom he employs, and possessing unswerving integrity, he holds an enviable position in the business and social world of Brownsville.

THOMAS H. COOPER. In all save the accident of birth Thomas H. Cooper is a northwesterner, for he was just one year old when his family moved to Oregon, and his life since then has been passed within the boundaries of his adopted state. Born near St. Joseph, Mo., January 9, 1851, he is a son of James Cooper, who was born in Virginia, and who removed with his parents from Virginia to Indiana, and from there to Missouri at a very early day. Here James married Sena A. Evans, and in the spring of 1852 left behind him the familiar surroundings and started across the vast expanse of plains intervening between Missouri and the coast, with his family and a large emigration train. He had two yoke of oxen and two cows, and ere the journey was completed was obliged to use the cows for completing the journey, the oxen having given out under the severe strain. Arriving after six months at Oregon City, they spent the first winter on a farm in the vicinity, and for a bushel of wheat Mr. Cooper was obliged to work six days. In the spring of 1853 they went as far south as Eugene, looking around for a desirable place to settle, and finally located near Sublimity, Marion county, for two years. In 1855 they came to Benton county and took up three hundred and twenty acres of land in Kings Valley, where the father erected a small cabin, and the family lived in it until 1860. He then moved two miles west of Philomath, where he purchased eight hundred acres of land and engaged in dairying and the stock business. This property was disposed of in 1869, and he bought three hundred and twenty acres two and a half miles from Corvallis, where his death occurred November 27, 1891, at the age of sixty-seven years and eight months. He is survived by his wife, who is still living on the farm, and who is the mother of six children, of whom Thomas H. is the oldest; Nancy A. is the deceased wife of Morris Allen; Francis Marion is deceased; George W. lives in Benton county; Mary F. is the wife of Russell Lowell, and lives with her mother; and Robert is deceased.

Thomas H. Cooper was reared on the farm and received his education in the public schools. October 10, 1875, he married Mary L. Scott, daughter of Prior Scott, of Benton county, and herself a native daughter of that county. Soon after his marriage he settled on his present farm, and has been so successful that he has added thereto and now has four hundred and eighty acres. He is engaged principally in the dairy business, and is at present milking twenty-five cows, a number of which are Jerseys. A Republican in politics, he has held various important offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen, and was elected to the legislature of 1895. Four children have been born to this successful couple, of whom Lewis E. is deceased; Minnie E. is the wife of E. J. Newton, of Benton county, and they have one daughter, Gladys; Fred R. is living at home; and George E. is also at home. Mr. and Mrs. Cooper are members of the Congregational Church, and are respected and honored members of the community in which they live.

BRADFORD S. BONNEY. A typical pioneer of the very early days is Bradford S. Bonney, owner of a fine farm of four hundred and twenty-two acres adjoining Woodburn, upon which he has lived continuously since 1849. More than any other of whom we have immediate knowledge, Mr. Bonney lives close to the heart of nature, and his association with the early days of Oregon has permitted that rare and fascinating interest in all that pertains to sportsmanship, for which this state has been justly famous. A resident of Oregon since his fifteenth year, Mr. Bonney was born near Sandusky, Ohio, August 30, 1825, a son of Truman and Plena (Townsend) Bonney, and grandson of Geris Bonney, the latter of whom was a farmer in Ohio, having moved there from his native state of Vermont. The grandfather was one of the heroes of '76, and for seven weary years lived in tent on the field, fighting in all the great battles of the war for independence.

Truman Bonney was born on his father's farm in Vermont, April 24, 1796, and as a young man accompanied his parents to Ohio, where he lived on a farm for many years. As a youth he learned the cooper and tanner's trades, which he followed at different stages of his career, in Fulton county, Ill., where he removed in 1833. His farm of two hundred acres was located twelve miles north of Lewiston, and here he prospered exceedingly. Notwithstanding his success, however, he became dissatisfied with his lot and exhibited the energy inherited from his ancestors. He was one of the first in his neighborhood to think about emigrating to the Pacific coast. In 1845 he had perfected his arrangements for the momentous trip, which were carried through without any particular mishap. Arriving in Sacramento City, Cal., in the fall of 1845, he remained until 1846, when he came to Oregon and took up six hundred and forty acres of land on French Prairie, Marion county. His death occurred in 1867 in Waconda, Ore. In early life he was a Whig, but later became a Republican, upon the organization of the party. His life was peculiar in some respects, for he never saw a railroad in his travels, being invariably ahead of them. He accumulated what was considered a large property in those days, and thus he was able to give his large family, consisting of seven daughters and six sons, a comfortable home. Of the children reared in the pioneer home, Hannah, who is deceased, became the wife of John Sherwood; George W. is living in Columbia Falls, Mont.; Mary A. is now Mrs. C. O. Boynton; Bradford S. is the subject of this article; Alvia is deceased; Sarah A. is the wife of E. Boynton; Miriam is the wife of F. Hibbler, of Santa Rosa, Cal.; Trumann is deceased; Lydia, formerly wife of Eli C. Cooley, now wife of A. Wood, of Woodburn; Laura, deceased, was married to James Strong; Charles R. is a resident of Portland; Wisewell is deceased; and Reuben, born in Oregon, is now in the saddle and harness business in Portland, Ore.

As may be imagined, at that early day Mr. Bonney had but limited educational advantages in Illinois. After coming to California and Oregon he was too busy framing his future to spend much time attending school. His present broad, general information is therefore all the more creditable, for it suggests a practical application in later years. The farm upon which he now lives was in its natural state with one-third heavily timbered in '49, but at present he has about three hundred acres under cultivation. In the early days as now his chief diversion was hunting and fishing, and many interesting stories he can tell of the time when game could be sighted from his cabin door, and when one always had a gun at hand. His record included ten deer in a day, when game was most plentiful. He killed eleven elk during his lifetime. Bear abounded in the region, and many were the skins which he brought in from a chase. At the present time his admiration for nature and her chances is as keen as ever, and he takes frequent trips to the mountains and rivers, coming back invariably well laden and well content. So earnest has been Mr. Bonney in cultivating his land that he has had little time for politics, especially as he is independent, and in voting is guided solely by the personal qualifications of applicants. He is a member and elder in the Christian Church, and has been active in promoting the spiritual welfare of that organization.

The first wife of Mr. Bonney, to whom he was married in 1848, was Alzina C. Dimick, a native also of Ohio, born April 2, 1832, and whose father, A. P. Dimick, was born in the state of Vermont. From Ohio Mr. Dimick went to Boone county, Ill., where he resided for about twelve years, then came to Oregon in 1847, crossing the plains with ox teams, and locating on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, where he died at the age of seventy-eight years. He was quite a politician, and a stanch Republican, filling the office of justice of the peace for the greater part of his life. Ten children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bonney, four sons and five daughters being alive at the present time. Of these, Augustus A. is living in Hood River, eastern Oregon; George F. is a farmer, three miles east of Woodburn; Sarah Ellen is the wife of B. F. Hall, of Salem, Ore.; Carrie M. is now Mrs. Young, of Woodburn; Charles T. lives in Woodburn; John Milton Wisewell also lives there; Esther P. is the wife of Elmer Hall, of Buena Vista; Laura is the wife of Allen Shaw, of Woodburn; and Ina D., the youngest daughter, also lives in Woodburn. After living together forty-nine years the wife and mother died April 2, 1897. The second marriage of Mr. Bonney was solemnized in Woodburn December 4, 1898, with Mrs. Agnes Fisher, who was born in Cable county, W. Va., and whose father, Capt. James Flanagan Fisher, was born in Clarksburg, W. Va. Captain Fisher was eight years captain on the Ohio river boats between Pittsburg and New Orleans, and he was afterward pilot for the same length of time. Because of contagious disease he was taken to the pest house in Louisville, where, in a fit of delirium, occasioned by high fever, he jumped out of the window and killed himself. Mrs. Fisher had five children by her former husband, of whom all are living. In spite of advancing age Mr. Bonney retains to a remarkable degree his interest in the things around him, and his faculties are not perceptibly impaired. His life has been cast in honorable and industrious mold, and his efforts have rounded to the credit of his adopted state. Mr. Bonney has thirty-nine grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

JOHN W. BLAND. When five years of age John W. Bland became a resident of Oregon, being brought here at that age by his parents, Moses and Martha (Needham) Bland, who were pioneers in 1851. For a more complete record of their lives refer to the sketch of George H. Bland, which appears upon another page of this work. John W. Bland was born May 4, 1846, in Bartholomew county, Ind., but was reared upon his father's donation claim in Linn county, Ore., remaining upon this farm near Lebanon until he had attained manhood, learning many practical lessons in agriculture under the direction of his father. He also learned the carpenter trade, and early began to work at this, which he continued at intervals for many years. He finally located upon the farm where he now lives, near Lebanon, upon the Sodaville road, the dwelling being about three-quarters of a mile from the city. There are one hundred and ninety acres in the place, upon which he is engaged in carrying on general farming, stock-raising and dairying, in all of which he has been successful.

September 28, 1865, before he was twenty years old, Mr. Bland was united in marriage with Elizabeth J. Powell, and the children born to them are as follows: Lillie, deceased, who married first Dexter Harris and afterward Charles Blodgett; Mareda P., who married Miss Laura Cornett, and who lives in Linn county; Wesley, also a resident of Linn county; Saloma, the wife of Homer Osbourne, of Linn county; Carrie the wife of William Calkins; Lucy, who died in Linn county; Charles and Mae, at home. In his political relations Mr. Bland affiliates with the Republican party, and, like his father, is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fraternally, he is a member of Lebanon Lodge,

No. 47, I. O. O. F., having belonged to this order for twenty-four years. Mr. Bland has always been interested in all public movements, and especially along educational lines, in the interest of the latter acting as a member of the school board and trustee of the Santiam Academy, which position he held for several years.

THOMAS JEFFERSON MUNKERS. A worthy representative of a family of Oregon pioneers is found in Thomas Jefferson Munkers, a native son of the great northwest, in which he has proven himself so important a factor, through the display of business sagacity and quick decision taking a position of prominence in the affairs of Scio, Linn county. He, with others, established in 1892, a banking business in this city, and as the holder of considerable stock he became the president of the institution, and remained so for three years. In 1895 he sold his interest in the business, but in 1902 he bought it back, then converting the bank into a private institution, which is now known as the bank of T. J. Munkers & Co., with individual resources to the amount of $50,000.

The records of the ancestry of the Munkers family have been preserved for many years, the grandfather, Benjamin, having been born in Georgia, September 17, 1799, and was reared in the state of Tennessee, where he became a farmer. In 1814 he removed to Jackson county, Mo., and from that state he crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1846, via the Platt river. Five months from the beginning witnessed the end of the journey and Mr. Munkers then took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he remained until 1871, when he came to his son's home, near Scio, where his death occurred at the age of eighty-five years. He was an old school Baptist, and politically was a Democrat. As a man who had met with success throughout the course of a long life Mr. Munkers was firmly fixed in his ideas and convictions, believing in no half-way measures in one's plans or beliefs. His son, Preston, the father of our Mr. Munkers, was born in Jackson county, Mo., November 28, 1820, and came with his father to Oregon and located on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres adjoining Scio on the north, and lived there until his death, at the age of sixty-nine years and eleven months. Inheriting a progressive spirit he became the owner of eight hundred acres of land, having met with the same success which had characterized the efforts of his father. With a religious and thoughtful temperament, heightened by a physical frame where weakness had early set its seal, Mr. Munkers combined an earnest and helpful spirit which was manifested in many acts of public kindness, and the fulfillment of the duties of a citizen. His death was a loss to the community. He married Nancy Jane Crank, a native of Missouri, having been born there July 18, 1830, and dying here April 25, 1858, when only twenty-eight years old. She was the mother of three sons and two daughters, of whom Mary Susan was born April 15, 1847, and died April 21, 1866; Amanda Melvina was born December 16, 1849, and died August 18, 1866; John Riley was born April 28, 1851, and died May 7, of the same year; William Madison was born March 24, 1853, and died December 9, 1871, in California; the youngest of the children being Thomas Jefferson, of this review.

Thomas Jefferson Munkers was born on his father's claim, one-half mile north of Scio, Linn county, Ore., July 24, 1855, and was there reared to manhood. He attended the common school in the vicinity of his home, but the means for acquiring knowledge in those early times being necessarily limited, he has since acquired his wide fund of information through intelligent contact with the world, and through the medium of well directed lines of reading. When seventeen years of age he engaged in farming upon twenty-five acres of land, which he rented. On account of ill health he went to western Oregon in 1873, and passed much of the time in hunting until his return home in the following year. At that period he took charge of his father's farm, and has since conducted it, now owning eight hundred and five acres, devoted entirely to stock-raising, cattle and sheep forming the greater part of the stock. In addition to his banking interests he is manager of this large and productive farm.

In Washington county, Ore., Mr. Munkers was married to Miss Louise O. McNamer, who was born near Forest Grove, Washington county. She is now the mother of four daughters, namely Sylvia J.; Winnifred A.; Inez C.; and Opal L., all of whom are at home. As a Democrat, interested in the progress of his city and community, Mr. Munkers has often been called upon to serve in various public offices, among these being that of mayor, which he has ably filled for three years. He is a member of the county central committee, and almost every year acts as delegate to the county convention. He was at one time nominated for county commissioner, but on account of his many absorbing duties he refused to accept. For two terms he served as road supervisor, and as school director for more than ten years. In 1900 Mr. Munkers donated the land which is now occupied by the flax mill of this city. Fraternally Mr. Munkers has passed all the chairs of the Blue Lodge of Masons, and has also passed all the chairs of the Knights of Pythias. In religion he follows in the steps of his ancestors, being a member of the Missionary Baptist Church, in which he officiates as trustee.

JUSTUS E. HAMMOND. The substantial and well-to-do citizens of Silverton are well represented by Mr. Hammond, who holds an assured position in business, social and political circles, and at the present time is faithfully serving as recorder of the city of Silverton. He is a man of excellent ability and sound judgment, and the architect of his own fortunes in the highest sense implied by the term, gaining success in life by his own exertions.

In old colonial days two brothers surnamed Hammond migrated from their Massachusetts home to the British provinces, locating in Nova Scotia, one of them being the great-grandfather of Justus E. Hammond, on the paternal side. In Nova Scotia, in the town of Cornwallis, lived three brothers, Judah, Simon and Lothrop Hammond, the latter being Mr. Hammond's grandfather, who was born in the year 1765. He was a man of deep religious convictions, a minister of the Baptist denomination, and died in 1849, in the town of Andover, New Brunswick, preaching to his little flock from the pulpit of his church in the morning and dying in the afternoon of that day. George Franklin Hammond, father of Justus E., was born at Kingsclear, New Brunswick, June 2, 1821. In early life he settled in Andover, New Brunswick, where he was engaged in farming and blacksmithing until his death, in 1879, at a comparatively early age. He married Joanna Wright, who was born in New Brunswick, a daughter of Deacon Justus Earl Wright, a successful lumberman and farmer, and a deacon of the Baptist Church. Seven children blessed their union, two sons and five daughters.

Justus E. Hammond, the third child of his parents, was born February 16, 1849, in Andover, Victoria county, New Brunswick. He spent his early life on the parental homestead, becoming familiar with the various branches of agriculture and obtaining the rudiments of his education in the district school. At the age of nineteen years he began the battle of life on his own account, going westward to Maine, where he was employed in the lumber camps for awhile. Proceeding still farther westward in 1871, he located in Benona, Mich., accepting a position as head sawyer in a lumber mill, of which he was afterward the manager. Returning to New Brunswick in 1876, he visited his friends there for a month, then crossed the continent to Washington, settling near the Sound. Not particularly pleased with the country, however, Mr. Hammond came from there to Oregon the following spring, 1877, and became a resident of Silverton, August 1, of that year, where he has since remained. During the first few ensuing years he worked at various employments, including dairy ranching. In 1888 he bought a drug store which he managed with excellent success for twelve years, when, on account of impaired health, he sold out that business, and has since lived retired from active pursuits until accepting the office of city recorder. During his business career he found time to take up the study of law, which he has continued to the present time.

On August 27, 1890, Mr. Hammond married, in Silverton, Josephine Bodimer, who was born in 1866, in Baden, Germany, but came to this country with her parents when about a year old. She died January 9, 1902, leaving three children, namely: Anna, Josephine and Brock. Mr. Hammond is a member of Silverton Lodge No. 45, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and is an earnest supporter of the principles of the Republican party, although he takes no conspicuous part in politics. A man of sterling integrity, he enjoys in a high degree the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens.

JOHN D. ARTHURS. From 1865 until 1879 the blacksmith shop of the Arthurs Brothers was one of the chief centers of activity in Brownsville, Ore. All things considered, as much trade came to them as fell to the lot of any other business in the town, its rise from a very small business being steady and substantial, and based upon the excellent work which was done, thus not only maintaining its earlier but adding to its more recent patronage. A stroke of paralysis in 1901 practically ended the business career of the senior partner, John D. Arthurs, although he had ostensibly retired from active participation in its affairs in 1897, intending to devote his remaining years to his immediate home circle.

Not the least encouraging item of interest in the life of Mr. Arthurs is the fact that he arrived in Oregon with the small sum of twenty-five cents, with which to begin his business career. He had crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1863, taking four months and a half to encompass the same distance which he thirty-three years later traveled over in three and a half days, surrounded by every luxury known to modern transportation. He had dreamed of a fortune easily made in the mines of California, but this dream seems not to have been realized, for he soon after found employment in Stockton and then in Visalia, Cal., coming from the latter town to Jacksonville, Ore. Through a friend of his brother, Jerry Martin, he succeeded in finding help, and after six weeks set off for Brownsville, a distance of more than two hundred miles, accomplishing the distance in six days and a half. In 1865 he started the blacksmith shop with his brother, both men being experts in their line.

Mr. Arthurs became known for his unswerving integrity, and for the courtesy and consideration which entered into all of his business relations. Many years before his retirement from business he had won the sincere esteem of the entire community, and his retirement, and subsequent severe illness, have called forth many expressions of regret and good will.

A southerner by birth and early training, Mr. Arthurs was born near Murfreesboro, Tenn., December 10, 1841, and comes of English paternal and Irish maternal ancestry. His paternal great-grandfather came from England and settled in North Carolina, where his father, Joseph, was born, and whence he removed, at the age of fifteen to near Nashville, Tenn. He married near Murfreesboro, Sarah Bingham, who was born in Tennessee, and died at the age of forty-five years, after rearing five sons and four daughters, of whom John D. was the third child. The maternal great-grandfather, Bingham, came from Ireland at an early day, presumably settling in Tennessee, where William, the maternal grandfather, was born, reared, and where he married and died. Joseph Arthurs served in the Seminole war under General Marion, and he removed to Missouri in 1842, remaining there until enlisting in the "last-call" regiment in Missouri in 1864. His Civil war experience though brief, was nevertheless fatal, for he contracted smallpox during the service, and died in an isolation hospital far from friends or family, in March, 1864.

After locating in Brownsville, Ore., Mr. Arthurs married Sarah Williams, who was born in Rock Island, Ill., June 15, 1844, and who is the daughter of C. A. Williams, one of the pioneers of 1845. Mr. Williams was born in New York state, but became a very early settler of the farming district around Kalamazoo, Mich., whence he removed to near Rock Island, Ill. Here he became interested in the tales which reached him from the far west, and in 1845 disposed of his interests and with his family crossed the plains to Amity, Yamhill county, Ore. Here he took up a donation claim which proved unsatisfactory, and which he sold in 1846 and took up a claim of a section on the Luckiamute river. To him is given the credit of starting the first sawmill on the Luckiamute, and of improving practically the first claim. In 1850 he removed to near Wells Station, Benton county, and in 1860 traded his land for a farm consisting of a section located west of Brownsville, Linn county, where his land for a farm consisting of a section accomplished much good in his life, and lived to be seventy-one years, seven months and fifteen days old. His wife, formerly Mary Barber, was born in Pennsylvania, and died after the removal of the family to Brownsville. Mr. Arthurs was variously identified with affairs in Brownsville, and in the earlier days held several local offices, including that of councilman for two terms and school director for several years. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Rebekahs, and his genial manner ever made him a welcome visitor at these lodges. Mr. Arthurs had a pleasant home in Brownsville, and his years of industry resulted in the acquisition of a liberal competence. He died at his home April 5, 1903, and was laid to rest in the Odd Fellows cemetery, mourned by a large circle of friends and missed by those who knew him best. The Odd Fellows lodge performed the last sad rite over the remains of their brother. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Arthurs were born two children: Ione W., the wife of James M. Smith, of Little Rock, Wash.; and Warren C., of Brownsville.

GEORGE H. BLAND. A well located and substantially established farmer in the neighborhood of Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., is George H. Bland, who is intelligently engaged in the cultivation of his farm of one hundred and eighty-five acres. Mr. Bland is the son of Moses and Martha Bland, pioneers of 1851. The former left his home in Jennings county, Ind., to which state he had removed in a comparatively early day, and started across the plains in February, 1851, with five yoke of oxen, one cow and a mare, the stock with which to furnish the bountiful acres which were promised him beyond the Rockies. In September, 1851, he arrived safely with his family in Linn county, in which section he remained until his death in September, 1873, at the age of fifty-four years. He first located on a donation claim of three hundred and five acres one and a half miles west of Lebanon, but later sold this and removed to another farm near Lebanon, where he spent the remainder of his days. Besides the effort which Mr. Bland made to advance the interests of his family, he took great interest in the church work of the community, being an active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife was formerly Miss Martha Needham, and of this union three children were born, namely: George H., of this review, born in Bartholomew county, Ind., November 9, 1840; Samantha, the wife of A. J. Powell, of Lebanon; and John W., located near this city. The mother died in July, 1895, aged eighty-seven years.

George H. Bland was eleven years old when the journey was made into the west, and it was in the common schools of Oregon that the greater part of his education was received. Upon attaining manhood he entered heartily into the work of farming. He has been married twice, his first wife being Barbara A. Leedy, the ceremony performed in May, 1862. One child was born of this union, William A., now located in Colorado. Mrs. Bland died in December, 1864, and in January, 1866, Mr. Bland married Clara M. Powell, and the four children born to them are: Matilda O., who is the wife of John Miler; Minnie L., the wife of Marion Needham; Samantha R., the wife of D. W. Lawrence; and Clara P., at home. Mrs. Bland died in April, 1897. Like his father, Mr. Bland is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he has served as a class leader for many years. Interested in all public and educational movements, he has served on the school board in his vicinity. Fraternally Mr. Bland is prominent among the Odd Fellows, being a member of Lebanon Lodge No. 47, which he has represented in the Grand Lodge at several different times.

SAMUEL HENRY HORTON. The lessons which one gleans from the life of Samuel Henry Horton are forceful and practical ones, and are entirely destitute of the glamour which surrounds the success of many men in the northwest. Nothing but a hard hand-to-hand struggle with a not over-indulgent fate has brought him where he is, a representative of the brain and brawn and untiring perseverance of the working noblemen of the coast. To-day his sons are among the prominent lumber merchants of Lane county, and he, himself, is living in comfort in Corvallis, after many years' association with crude, pioneer and developing forces in the middle north and north-western sections of the country.

It is supposed that the emigrating Horton ancestor settled in New Jersey, at least the paternal grandfather, Samuel H., a blacksmith by trade, was born there in Sussex county, and in time removed with his family to the vicinity of London, Ontario, Canada. His two brothers, Ezra and John, remained in New Jersey. With Samuel H. to Canada went his son, Peter, the father of Samuel Henry, who also was born in Sussex county, and who in time learned the blacksmith trade in the little shop on the paternal farm, twenty miles south of London. Peter married Elizabeth Ramsey, a native of Canada, and whose grandfather, Henry, was a farmer and large land-owner in Ontario. In the little home near the blacksmith shop Samuel Henry was born April 5, 1834, the sixth of the three sons and five daughters in his father's family, and of whom two sons and one daughter are living. Of the sons who served their country in the Civil war, Thomas E. D. served in the Ninth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry and died in Eastport, Miss.; Peter Horton removed to the states in 1846, when his son Samuel was twelve years old, settling six miles from Rockford, Winnebago county, Ill., where he began to vote at the end of the first year, and where he died at an advanced age.

What schooling Samuel Henry Horton received up to his twelfth year was gained in the seclusion of his home on the Canadian farm, for the district as yet boasted of no means of educating its youth. He was strong of limb and stout of heart when the family pulled up stakes in Canada and started out with ox-teams for Illinois, and after arriving in the wilderness of Winnebago county it was well that he had a rugged constitution. It befell him to assist in breaking the hard and unyielding Illinois prairie, which he accomplished with eight yoke of oxen, and after many weary hours of toil with his father and brothers. At the age of eighteen he began to hire out to the surrounding farmers, and about this time became interested in a threshing venture, which he conducted for some years. Threshing, as then conducted, was decidedly primitive, horses being the motive power. Threshing must have proved rather profitable, however, for February 20, 1854, he married, in Rockford, Ill., Agnes C. Fertile, a native of St. Lawrence, Ont., and daughter of Louis Fertile, a native of Paris, France. Mr. Fertile was a ship carpenter by trade, and was orphaned in early life, being compelled to earn his living when very young. After coming to the United States he served in the war of 1812, and subsequently lived in Oswego and Rockford, Ill., where he died at an advanced age. He married Julia Derosha, born in Ontario, and daughter of Stephen Derosha, of French descent. Of this union there were born fourteen children, ten daughters and four sons, of whom two daughters and one son are deceased. Three of the sons served in the Civil war, and of these Louis C. became a sergeant in the Ninth Minnesota Infantry; William was a soldier in the Third Minnesota, and Charles died from freezing, in the campaign against the Kola Indians. The year after his marriage, in 1855, Mr. Horton removed to Rochester, Minn., where he entered one hundred and sixty acres of land, which he improved, and where he managed to make a fair living. He became well known in his community, and was prospering beyond his expectations, when the breaking out of the Civil war turned men's thoughts from occupations, however peaceful, into channels of carnage and destruction.

In 1862 Mr. Horton enlisted as a private in Company F, Ninth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in at Fort Snelling. The first fifteen months he was engaged in the Indian campaign along the frontier, and was then sent south to Missouri, remaining there during 1863-4. He next participated in the Sturgis raid, as duty sergeant, and was detailed to act as quartermaster sergeant. Everything was captured by the enemy but a mule which Mr. Horton managed to save, and three men who made their escape owing to his assistance, among whom was Captain M. J. Daniels, of Riverside, Cal. Retreating to Memphis, Tenn., he participated in the battle of Tupelo, Miss., and in various skirmishes in different parts of that state, and afterward went after Price in Missouri. Getting back to St. Louis, the regiment was sent to Nashville, Tenn., and in time participated in the famous battle of that town. Owing to wounds received in the right arm, right side and through the back, Mr. Horton was laid up in the hospital until June 13, 1865, when he returned home, after being mustered out in Louisville, Ky.

After the war Mr. Horton engaged in the ice business in Rochester, Minn., for four years, and in this town was born his oldest son, Henry L., the first white child born in that vicinity, and who is now forty-eight years old. In the meantime he had become interested in surveying, and as an expert in his line was selected to go to North Dakota to locate a colony, which he succeeded in doing in the northwestern part of the state. Pleased with the locality, he moved there himself, and soon after discovered coal on the Cheyenne, which he proceeded to develop until he had spent about all of his money in that way. Thereafter he turned his attention to freighting for the government, from Breckenridge, but soon returned to Minneapolis in the hope of retrieving his depleted finances. For three years he engaged in pickling tripe and pigs' feet, and, in 1875, came to Oregon, locating in Harrisburg, Linn county, where he engaged in the butchering business for three years. In 1879 he came to Benton county, and settled on a farm six miles west of Monroe, where he built a water saw-mill on Napoleon creek. This crude mill proved the foundation of the large lumbering business in which his sons are now engaged, and in which Mr. Horton himself made a small fortune. The primitive mill was later transformed into a modern steam mill with a capacity of ten thousand feet of lumber per day. As success came to him he added to his land, and in time had a farm of one hundred and twenty acres, one of one hundred and sixty acres, and one of eighty acres, making in all three hundred and sixty acres. He finally sold his saw-mills and lumber business to his sons, but up to this day retains possession of his ranch, which is rented to responsible parties.

In September, 1902, Mr. Horton moved into Corvallis, where he intends spending the balance of his life. Although advanced in years, and after accomplishing more hard work than falls to the lot of the average or even exceptionally busy man, he is still hale and hearty, and the personification of western enterprise. He is an expert mason and carpenter, and during his residence in Benton county has built some of the finest and largest bridges in the county. He is a Republican in politics, and though devoted to the best interests of his party, has never been officially connected therewith. Fraternally, he is identified with the Masons, and with the Ellsworth Post, G. A. R., of Corvallis. Of the four sons and five daughters born to this honored pioneer and his wife, Henry L. is a farmer and engineer in Benton county; Everett Jerome is a lumber merchant in this county; Belle is now Mrs. Enbody of Spokane, Wash.; Julia is now Mrs. Robson, of Walla Walla; Agnes is Mrs. Kelly, of Spokane, Wash.; Samuel is a lumber manufacturer of Benton county; Adelaide E. is Mrs. Conrad Gerhard; John is a lumber merchant, of this county, and Alice is Mrs. Hauck, of Gold Hill, Ore. Everett, Samuel and John comprise the firm of Horton Brothers Lumber Company, large lumber manufacturers, with mills sixteen miles west of Monroe Junction.

ELIJAH SKIPTON. The venerable and at the same time successful farmers of Benton county include Elijah Skipton, whose hand has not lost its cunning, or whose judgment has not been impaired by long usage. Since coming to Oregon, first in 1853, many acres of land have been tilled by him, and many harvests gathered into his commodious barns, there to await their utilization as food for man or beast. Even at the present time were Mr. Skipton unable to make his living as a farmer he could turn his attention to coopering with reasonable assurance of success, for he learned this trade in Iowa. He was born November 17, 1831, in Monroe county, Ohio. From the age of seventeen he has looked out for himself, and nothing of any practical value has come to him that has not been earned by his own industry. A fair common school education was acquired during the winter months of his childhood, but it may be said that he has learned far more from practical experience and keen observation than he ever did from books.

In 1851 Mr. Skipton removed to Iowa, and, in 1853, crossed the plains in an ox-train, being six months on the way. After six months of investigation in Oregon he went to California, and for three years mined and prospected with varying success. Returning to Iowa in 1856 he married Mary Marshall, a native of Ohio, and thereafter farmed for six years, or until returning to Oregon, in 1865. This time he thought to improve upon his former traveling equipment, and chose horses and mules rather than oxen, a change which soon demonstrated its advisability. As before, he got through without any serious mishap, and the first winter in Oregon stopped near Philomath, the following spring purchasing one hundred and seventy acres of the James Chism donation claim, two miles south of Philomath. From time to time he added to his land, for he was successful in his adopted state, and at one time owned six hundred acres. This large property has been divided among his children, and at present he owns but one hundred and ninety-one acres. He has twenty acres in a prune orchard, but otherwise his farm is devoted to general farming and stock-raising. A fair sized two-story frame dwelling makes a comfortable home for his family, and his barns and outbuildings, agricultural implements and fences bespeak the careful, progressive and painstaking agriculturist.

A staunch advocate of Democracy, Mr. Skipton has been prominently before the public as an office-holder, having held many positions of trust and responsibility in his county. For two years he served as county commissioner, for nine years as county assessor. Seven children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Isabelle is the wife of Professor Horner, of Corvallis; Rufus is farming in this vicinity; Frank is a resident of Albany; Otis lives near this place; Virtue is deceased, as is also Columbia and Archie. Mr. Skipton has made the most of his opportunities in this northwestern country, and while doing so has won the respect and good will of a host of friends and associates.

SCHULTZ BROTHERS. No two men living in Albany today are more closely connected with its substantial growth than the Schultz Brothers, owners and managers of one of the best meat markets and packing concerns this side of Portland in the Willamette valley. In the make-up of these two men are the social and economic traits which render the firm so admirable an adjunct to any community, and whose conservatism and practicability temper the enthusiasm of less cautious men. However, inheritance rather than birth is responsible for the characteristics noted in the present instance, for both the brothers owe patriotic allegiance to this country, Pennsylvania being their native state.

Herman R. Schultz, the senior member of the firm, was born in Pittston, Luzerne county, Pa., November 4, 1859, his father, Rudolph, having settled there when he came to America in 1851. Rudolph Schultz was born on his father's estate (Middle Gulmkau) county of Dantzig, West

Prussia, Germany, and came to the United States at the age of twenty, equipped with a college education and considerable knowledge of business. With his brother-in-law, Mr. Sturmer, he engaged in a grocery and meat market business at Pittston, Pa. About 1878 Mr. Schultz removed to Beverly, W. Va., and engaged in the hotel business, afterward taking up his residence in Omaha, Neb., where he again engaged in the meat business, then removed to Albany, Ore., in 1889 and went into the real estate business. He is now living retired in Albany, and having been born May 30, 1831, is past seventy years of age. He is a Republican in politics and is fraternally an Odd Fellow. His wife, Annetta (Himmen) Schultz, came with her father from Germany and located in Pittston, where her father died. Mrs. Schultz died in March, 1902, in Albany, Ore. The second of the five children in his father's family, Herman R. has a sister living in Albany, while his brother William is engaged in the meat business in Woodburn; his sister, Louise, is now Mrs. Goff of West Virginia; and his brother Frederick is his partner in business. From boyhood up Herman worked at the butcher's trade and at the age of eighteen moved with his father to West Virginia and worked in the hotel for four years. At the age of twenty-two he went to Fort Worth, Tex., but not liking it there came west to Omaha in 1884, and ran a meat market until 1889. He then came to Albany, Ore., and became interested in the real estate business, and among other accomplishments connected therewith laid out the Schultz addition, covering ten acres. In 1891 he became identified with his brother Frederick in their present meat market and packing business, bought this market, and has enlarged and improved it, introducing modern machinery for grinding and preparing meats. The firm has its slaughter house west of the town, and pack bacon and ham, selling at wholesale as well as retail, and it fortunately has at its head two men who thoroughly understand their business, and are conscientious and fair in dealing with their constantly increasing trade.

The extent of Mr. Schultz's responsibilities is by no means confined to his meat business, for there is scarcely an advance made in the general upbuilding of the town in which he is not in some way connected. His success has enabled him also to proceed independently, as evinced by his building the Albany Opera House in 1902. This place of entertainment would do credit to much larger and older communities, and by experts is pronounced the finest in the valley outside of Portland. The building is 50x100 feet, ground dimensions, and has a seating capacity of eight hundred. Modern in construction and suitable in every way to the purpose for which it was intended the stage is of such size that almost anything outside of grand opera can be produced properly. Mr. Schultz is otherwise a property owner in Albany, and a part of his property has been made through the transference of town and city lands. He is fraternally popular, and is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Woodmen of the World. He married in Omaha, Neb., Belle Daniels, who was born in West Virginia, and who is the mother of three children, Irvin, Mabel and Neta.

Frederick Schultz, junior partner in the firm of Schultz Brothers, was born in Pittston, Luzerne county, Pa., April 2, 1866, and with his father afterward removed to West Virginia and Omaha, in both of which towns he was interested in business with his father and brother. Like his brother partner, he early learned the butcher's trade, and for years profited by the business sagacity and ability of his capable and very successful father. In 1889 Mr. Schultz came to Albany and engaged in the meat business with his brother, William, the latter of whom sold his interest to Herman Schultz in 1891, since which Frederick and Herman have amicably and very successfully conducted their affairs.

In Albany Mr. Schultz married Lucy Gann, who was born in Illinois, and of which union there have been born four children: Earl, Louis, Anna and Helen, the last two being twins. Like his brother, Mr. Schultz is a Republican, and is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Woodmen of the World. A shrewd and practical business man, and a genial and large hearted companion, Mr. Schultz has many friends in Albany who predict a career of unusual financial success.

ERHARD WOLFARD. One of the most venerable and honored of the retired citizens of Silverton is E. Wolfard, formerly an extensive agriculturist of Marion county, and actively identified with its most substantial upbuilding. Mr. Wolfard was born in Alsace, December 22, 1818, and was just ten years of age when his parents came to the United States. His father followed the art of weaving for many years in France, but after coming to America engaged exclusively in farming. The family were sixty-four days on the water, the sailing vessel meeting with many storms and delaying calms. They settled in Stark county, Ohio, near Canton, and there lived between the years of 1828 and 1833. Their next home was in Scioto county, Ohio, where the mother died in 1835, and the father married a second time. He died at the age of sixty-eight years.

From the public schools E. Wolfard stepped into a carpenter's apprenticeship, and at the same time learned to be a blacksmith. These combined trades he followed for many years in Ohio, in which state, September 14, 1839, he married Aramatha Shope, a native of Ohio, and with whom he continued to live in Scioto county until 1853. He then outfitted and started across the plains with ox-teams, being six months on the way, and having a fairly pleasant journey. The Indians were not particularly troublesome, nor were the ranks of the little party disturbed by cholera or other serious illness. The family settled about five miles south of Silverton, where Mr. Wolfard bought a squatter's right, which he afterward proved up, and upon which he instituted many fine improvements. On his farm he had a little blacksmith and wagon shop, which he conducted for many years with fair success until moving into Silverton in 1887. For a short time in this town, he engaged in a mercantile business with his son, John, and then bought the ten acres of land comprising his present home, just outside the corporation of Silverton. He erected on his land a modern and comfortable dwelling and other buildings, and is pleasantly located and apparently enjoying the evening of a useful and worthy life. He still owns three hundred and sixteen acres of his original claim, which nets him a handsome income each year.

In politics Mr. Wolfard is a Republican, and has served as a school director for many years. Since 1849 he has been identified with the Masons, having been initiated into the order in Western Sun Lodge No. 91, at Wheelersburg, Ohio, and is now a member of Silverton Lodge No. 45, A. F. & A. M. Twelve children have been born to himself and wife, of whom the following are living: John M., who married Kate McCalpin, and is now a resident of Silverton; Mary, living with her parents; Amelia, wife of R. W. Carey, of Salem, the parents of three children; Geneva A., wife of Timothy D. Allen, residing in this vicinity; Charles D., who married Sarah Ann Small, the daughter of Isaac Small, of Turner, a pioneer of 1854, and with his family of nine children is living near Silverton; Eda, wife of John H. Riches, of Marion county. Mrs. Wolfard died July 13, 1866, aged forty-one years, five months and seven days. Mr. Wolfard has realized many of his expectations since coming to this country, and the land of his adoption has benefited by his public-spirit and worthy undertakings.

EDWARD BUXTON. As one of the keen, enterprising manufacturers of Corvallis, and a citizen of sterling worth and character, Mr. Buxton is well deserving of honorable mention in this biographical work. As junior member of the firm of Sheasgreen & Buxton, he is actively identified with one of the largest and best known manufacturing establishments of the kind in Benton county, and indirectly connected with the building interests of all parts of the country, the products of the Central Planing Mills and Box Factory, the plant of this firm, being shipped to all sections of the United States, although more especially used in Oregon and the near-by states.

A native of Washington county, Ore., Edward Buxton was born July 28, 1850, in Forest Grove, a son of the late Henry Buxton. His Grandfather Buxton, who was born and reared in Yorkshire, England, was employed by the Hudson Bay Company to come to Manitoba with the first colony sent over, the ship in which he emigrated being frozen in Hudson Bay throughout the winter. Arriving in Manitoba, he operated a grist mill near Winnipeg until 1841, when he came to Oregon, settling on Tualatin Plains, taking up land, which he improved. Later he began farming about a mile west of Forest Grove, still later locating in Forest Grove, where he resided until his death, at the age of seventy-six years.

Born in Manitoba, Canada, Henry Buxton lived there until twelve years old, when he came with his parents to Oregon, coming with ox carts as far as the Rocky Mountains, when the country became so rough that the oxen and few horses had to be packed with the goods and many of the party were forced to walk a part of the remaining journey. He assisted his father in clearing a homestead, and on reaching man's estate began farming on his own account, buying a right and having it recorded. Continuing in his chosen vocation, he met with both profit and pleasure in his work, carrying on general farming near Forest Grove throughout his life. He married Rosanna Wooley, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Jacob Wooley, who crossed the plains in 1845 with his family, and settled on a farm in Tualatin, Ore., where he spent his remaining days. Of the twelve children born of their union, Edward is the oldest child of the six boys and one girl now living. The father and mother both died in Forest Grove several years ago.

Reared on the home farm, Edward Buxton remained beneath the parental roof until seventeen years old, completing his early education at the Tualatin Academy. Having an aptitude for mechanical pursuits he learned the carpenter's trade in Forest Grove, and was there engaged as a carpenter and builder until 1878. The ensuing two years he was employed in the planing mill owned by Adams & Jones, in McMinville, going from there to Portland, Ore., where he remained successfully engaged as a contractor and builder for ten years. Returning to Forest Grove in 1890, he operated a planing mill there for five years, then located in Corvallis as a contractor and builder. In 1899 Mr. Buxton purchased the interest of James Gray in the Central Planing Mill and Box Factory, as mentioned in the sketch of F. P. Sheasgreen, on another page of this volume, becoming junior member of one of the most enterprising firms of Benton county, and has since carried on a thriving business.

Mr. Buxton married, while living in Forest Grove, Elizabeth Roderick, a native of Illinois, and into their household four children have been born, namely: George H., a machinist in the Portland Iron Works; Daisy A., wife of George O. Sloan, proprietor of the Forest Grove Hotel; Harry E., a carpenter in Corvallis; and Minnie, a nurse in the Good Samaritan Hospital, at Portland, Ore. Politically Mr. Buxton is a firm believer in the Republican party, supporting it by all the means within his power, and while a resident of Forest Grove served as city recorder two terms. Fraternally he is a member of Holbrook Lodge, No. 30, A. F. & A. M., of Forest Grove; and of the Eastern Star Chapter, of Corvallis. He is also a member of the Native Sons of Oregon.

ROBERT O. LOGGAN, M. D. A very prominent man in medical circles and one who has well earned his position among his professional associates is Dr. Robert O. Loggan, since 1889 a resident of Oregon, previous to that date being known in the Mississippi valley. His birth occurred in Polk county, Iowa, June 23, 1854, his father being Robert Loggan, of Scotch-Irish descent, a native of Ohio, born in that state October 25, 1820. In addition to the life of a farmer, to which he had been reared, the father devoted his time and attention as much as possible to ministerial work, being a member of the United Brethren Church. When but twenty years of age he removed to Indiana and located twelve miles south of Terre Haute, where he engaged in farming and religious work. In 1853 he settled in Polk county, Iowa, eighteen miles northwest of Des Moines, on government land, and continued his double vocation, for many years being elder of the church in his locality. In 1886 he retired from the active cares of life, and after traveling through the country, occasionally preaching, for a couple of years, made his home in Philomath until his death, August 16, 1903. He was a Republican in his political principles and was always a strong abolitionist.

The wife who shared the early pioneer life of Mr. Loggan was in maidenhood Miss Katherine Pickard, born in Vigo county, Ind., the daughter of John A. Pickard, a native of Georgia. In 1817 he removed to Indiana and settled in Vigo county, where he successfully engaged in farming and carpenter work, and where he died in 1863, at the age of eighty-three years, having acquired quite a competency. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Loggan were nine in number, being four sons and five daughters, all of whom are living except two. Mrs. Loggan died July 29, 1903, nearly eighty-four years of age.

The fifth of his father's family was Robert O. Loggan, and until twenty-one years of age he remained at home, interspersing his duties with attendance at the public schools. Upon attaining his majority he entered Lane University, located at Le Compton, Kans., and continued his studies from the fall of 1875 until 1881, when he graduated with the degree of B. S. In 1892 the same college conferred upon him the honorary degree of M. S. Upon leaving college he began teaching school with a view to studying medicine when financially able. In the fall of 1884 he entered the Eclectic Medical Institute, of Cincinnati, Ohio, from which he was graduated in 1886. Settling in Cuba, Republic county, Kans., he soon built up a lucrative practice, remaining, however, but three years before coming to Oregon, where his success has been but the outgrowth of the energy and intelligence displayed throughout the entire business life of Dr. Loggan. In addition to a general practice he has become largely interested in the political and social life of the city of Philomath. For three years he has served as mayor, and has been a member of the council for a like number of years; he has served as school director for eight years, and is at present chairman of the school board, and is also on the county central committee.

Dr. Loggan was married in Le Compton to Ellen M. Ferris, a native of Indiana, and the daughter of John Ferris, who was born on board the vessel on which his parents were crossing the Atlantic ocean. He was a farmer and spent the last twenty-five years of his life in Le Compton, dying there in 1901. He had served as justice of the peace for many years before his death. Of the union of Dr. and Mrs. Loggan has been born one child, Charles F., who still makes his home with his parents, and is now taking a business course in the college of this city. In his fraternal associations Dr. Loggan is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the Rebekahs; and Woodmen of the World, having served as examining physician for the last order. In his profession Dr. Loggan has attained considerable success since coming to the west, having served from 1898 to 1901 on the board of pension examiners of this county, and at present he holds the position of secretary of the State Eclectic Medical Association, and is a prominent member of the National Eclectic Medical Association.

CHARLES H. NEWTH, M. D. With that perseverance and dogged determination for which his countrymen are famed, Charles H. Newth has worked out a well directed destiny in the United States, and aside from prosecuting a successful medical and surgical practice in Philomath, has engaged in other occupations of merit in different parts of the country. In his native county of Wiltshire, England, where he was born January 22, 1857, he received that practical early training accorded the average youth in the inland counties, and by substantial and correct living laid the foundation for the good health which has ever been an aid to his progress. His father, Alfred Bethel Newth, was born in Gloucestershire, western England, August 2, 1823, and from his native county removed to Wiltshire, where he farmed and prospered, and where his death occurred at the age of seventy-four years. He was the son of Charles Newth, also born in England, and like himself a farmer by occupation. Alfred Newth died about ten years after the death of his wife, formerly Mary Ann Adkins, who was born in Oxfordshire, another inland English county, May 6, 1827.

The second child and oldest son in the family of two sons and three daughters, Charles Newth was educated in the common schools of England, and in 1872, when fifteen years of age, his uneventful life was broadened by a rare opportunity. With some cousins he came to the United States, brimful of that enthusiasm and expectancy which finds its mature expression in the successful careers of the noble adopted sons of the western slope. Like the majority, his was an humble beginning, for he secured employment in the meat market of his relatives at Harvard, Neb., thus saving a little money, and gaining a start in the new country. After a year he went to work on a farm in the vicinity of Lincoln, Neb., and in 1874 engaged as clerk for Dr. W. H. Dunning, of Waverly, Neb. This position gave him his real start in life, for while with the doctor he studied medicine, and intended to forthwith complete his course at some well known college. However, his plans were temporarily postponed owing to the illness of his father, on account of which he returned to England, and while there clerked in a drug store at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, for a year.

Returning to America in 1878, Mr. Newth located in Rooks county, Kans., and homesteaded a claim near Stockton, which he turned to various uses. In time he opened a drug store and postoffice, and, after his native town in England, called the aggregation of interests Minety. His affairs in Kansas prospering, he traded some of his cattle for an eighth interest in the town site of Nicodemus, Graham county, Kans., and this property is still in his possession. In 1886 he carried out his determination to complete his medical studies and entered the Ensworth Medical College at St. Joseph, Mo., from which he was duly graduated in 1889. Thereafter he engaged in practice in Nicodemus until 1891, in which year he migrated to the west, locating in Vernonia, Columbia county, Ore. In 1898 he abandoned a lucrative practice in the northern town and came to Philomath, which has since been his home, and where he has built up a large and remunerative practice.

With him from Rooks county, Kans., Dr. Newth brought his wife, formerly Mabel A. Woodward, a native of Iowa, and who died in Philomath in 1902, at the age of forty-three years. Three children were born of this union, Charles W., Winnifred, and Fay. For his second wife Dr. Newth married, in October, 1902, Amanda Ruble, also born in Iowa. Dr. Newth is a Republican in political affiliation, and is at present a member of the city council and pension examiner. He is examining physician for the Ancient Order United Workmen and the Modern Woodmen of America, and Degree of Honor. In religion he is associated with the liberal branch of the United Brethren Church. Skillful in diagnosis and treatment, Dr. Newth commands the confidence of the community of Philomath, his public-spirited interest in the general affairs of the town increasing his popularity, and adding to his prestige as one of the foremost citizens of the county.

JOSEPH DIMMICK. As a pioneer to the western state Joseph Dimmick was like many others, having attained a good age before he ventured into a new land and new conditions, among which he must hew out a pathway for himself and the children for whom he must also win a competence. He was born in Connecticut early in the nineteenth century, and when quite young he accompanied his parents to the state of Ohio, where he remained for many years.

On attaining manhood Mr. Dimmick married Comfort Dean, a native of Virginia, and they lived in Ohio until 1828, when they removed to Illinois, and there remained for twenty-four years, in 1852 being tempted to change their location by the glowing narrations of the brilliant opportunities to be found beyond the Rocky mountains. Breaking the ties and associations of many pleasant and profitable years they prepared for the journey across the plains, making the same by means of ox-teams. Beyond the events incident to a trip of this nature in the early days they met with no mishap and arrived safely at their destination, the state of Oregon, the broad, rich lands, rather than the wealth of gold, having attracted them from the comparative affluence of the middle west. Mr. Dimmick at once took up a donation claim, located fourteen miles south of Corvallis, and which William Porter now owns. He here engaged in general farming and remained until his death, both himself and wife living to be over fifty years old.

Of the children born to them Joseph and Benjamin are twins, the former now located in Oakland, Cal., and the latter in Grant's Pass, Josephine county, Ore.; John and Samuel are in Spokane, Wash.; Athie is now Mrs. Starr, of California; Elizabeth is Mrs. Starr, of Benton county; Mary is in eastern Oregon, and Lucinda is now Mrs. Campbell, of Grant's Pass.

THOMAS D. REEVES. One of the very earliest pioneers in Benton county, Ore., was Thomas D. Reeves, who took up what is claimed to be the first donation claim of land so taken in the county. It is located fifteen miles southwest of Corvallis, and two miles east of Bellfountain, and consists of six hundred and forty acres. The property is variously occupied at the present date, a part of it having passed into the hands of other parties, James E. Edwards now owning the piece upon which Mr. Reeves first made his home.

Mr. Reeves was born in Ohio, March 6, 1814, his father being a tanner by trade, to which life the son was reared. He remained at home in Ohio until 1843, at that date preparing to take the long and hazardous journey across the plains. His outfit consisted of the usual articles necessary for the trip, the patient, trusty oxen being used to draw the wagons. It was fortunate that they met with no trouble from the Indians, for they were called upon to endure every sort and description of hardship and privation before the end of the journey was reached. After several months the party arrived in Oregon and Mr. Reeves first took up a donation claim on Tualatin plains, Washington county, leaving it shortly, however, to come into Benton county and take up the claim previously mentioned.

In 1846 Mr. Reeves married Nancy Lloyd, who crossed the plains in 1845, and settled in this vicinity, and on this property they continued to make their home up to the time of their deaths with the exception of four or five years, he living to be seventy-two and she to be thirty-three. Of the children born to them Eliza is now the wife of William Barclay, of this vicinity; Louisa is in Dayton, Wash.; and Anna is the wife of Edwin N. Starr. Mr. Reeves carried on general farming and stock-raising, and though interested in his work always found time to take an active part in the affairs of the community. He was always interested in politics, being a staunch Democrat, and was also very philanthropical, giving freely of means which became his through the years of effort, giving to churches and schools and to anyone in need who called upon him for assistance. He was a justly popular man, an enviable place in the esteem of the people of this county being his, and his death was a loss felt by many.

SAMUEL R. CLAYPOOL. More than ordinary mention is due the family of which Samuel R. Claypool is a typical representative, for although this honored pioneer has lived in retirement since November, 1902, both himself and his father have materially impressed their business sagacity and sterling worth upon the development of Linn county. Those fearless men who faced unknown dangers and pressed forward in spite of Indian attacks, inclement weather and dire illness, with a singleness of purpose but dimly understood in these days of selfish ease, will ever receive the credit for planting the germs of modern civilization on the western slope. In 1846 the Claypool family were living near St. Joseph, Mo., whither they had removed from Hendricks county, Ind., where Samuel R. had been born August 28, 1836. The father, who reared a family of eleven children, was called David, after a remote ancestor, and his birth occurred in Virginia in 1797. His father, Reuben, born in the eastern part of the country, was of Irish descent, and died after establishing his family in Virginia. David Claypool left Virginia in 1818, and with his brother located in Hendricks county, Ind., and in 1841 David moved to Andrew county, Mo., on the farm near St. Joseph, bringing with him his wife, Nancy (Rooker) Claypool, who was born in Tennessee, and died on the home place in Oregon in 1861, at the age of fifty-nine years. John Rooker, the maternal grandfather, was born in London, England, and came to the United States long before the colonies revolted against English tyranny. During the Revolutionary war he served as a butcher in the commissary department, and his death occurred in Indiana at an advanced age. David Claypool was an ambitious man, and the prospects of life in the far west appealed to him with irresistible force. So firmly convinced was he of the wisdom of his decision that he sold his farm in Andrew county, and with his family and entire worldly possessions prepared to cross the plains in 1846. The present town of Marquam occupies his first donation claim in the state, but he failed to prove up on this property, and in January, 1848, he took up a claim at the forks of the Santiam river. Lonely and isolated from neighbors or signs of civilization, he cleared his land, but never fully realized its fertility or resourcefulness, for his death occurred in 1857, eleven years after his emigration, at the age of sixty-one years. He was a Democrat in politics and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in his general life fulfilled the definition of pioneer, as understood by those who experienced the years of trials and deprivation.

Ten years of age when he came to Oregon, Samuel R. Claypool had few educational advantages in the early days, principally for the reason that there were few schools in his neighborhood, and also because so large a family necessitated active effort on the part of all its members. Thus it happened that he worked early and late during harvest time, and even during the bleak winters arose early and looked after the stock, performing such tasks as made the life of pioneer boys at best hard and unsatisfactory. The gold fields of California offered a diversion in 1856, and after mining with moderate success at Yreka, Siskiyou county, for a couple of years, he returned to Oregon and settled on a farm near his father. After the death of the latter he purchased a portion of the old homestead, but sold out in 1865 and removed to a farm five miles north of Lebanon. Here he owned three hundred and twenty acres, and for thirty-seven years, or until 1902, he tilled his land and raised varied crops, meeting with ready sales, and accumulating a competency. After disposing of his farm Mr. Claypool purchased his present home in Lebanon, consisting of fifteen acres, and just large enough to keep him from a monotonous leisure. The little home, with its trees, its flowers and genial air of comfort, is presided over by the wife of Mr. Claypool, whom he married at the forks of the Santiam river, and who was formerly America Crabtree of Missouri. Isaac Crabtree, the father of Mrs. Claypool, was born in the Old Dominion, and in 1853 started across the plains with his family, intending to settle in Oregon. Grim death overcame him on the western desert, and he was laid to rest in a grave bordering on Green river. Afterward his grief-stricken family pursued their lonely way, and carried out the plans of the father and husband, locating near Mount Angel, Marion county. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Claypool, Callie is the wife of Edison Young, a farmer of Linn county; Annie is living at home; Mary is the wife of John Griggs of this vicinity; and Vida is the wife of James Munsey of this county.

Eminently public-spirited, Mr. Claypool has contributed both time and money when demand has been made upon his generosity, and education, morality, and good government have been materially fostered by his support. His political allegiance has been with the Democratic party, and his many public offices have included that of member of the state legislature in 1902, during which session he served on the committees of health, morals and military affairs. He was elected county commissioner in 1886, and for practically his entire active life he has been either a director or clerk of the school board. Nor has the career of Mr. Claypool been devoid of the excitement and danger incident to the early days, for he served in the Indian war of 1856 as a member of Company D, Second Regiment, under command of Col. Thomas Cornelius, and for one hundred and six days fought against the Indians. From the early to the later days his life has been marked by sincere devotion to whatever duty came his way, his actions being invariably governed by high principle, and the utmost consideration for the rights of others.

AMERICUS TAYLOR McCALLY. Although a recent recruit to the mercantile ranks of Halsey, Americus Taylor McCally has already established a paying business, and in connection therewith is building up a satisfactory insurance business, representing the Glenn Falls and German American companies. Preceded by several years of agricultural and general experience he came here in 1900, his genial manner and ability to adapt himself to new conditions materially contributing to his start in this cosmopolitan community. With him Mr. McCally brought a host of southern traditions, for his ancestors labored long and faithfully on cotton plantations, establishing themselves in the state of Tennessee. Near Knoxville he was born March 5, 1848, his father being a native of the same state, as is also his mother, formerly Clementine Humphreys. Americus was five years of age when his parents came to Oregon in 1853, the family having spent the previous winter in Missouri, as did so many of the early Oregon emigrants. After a comparatively agreeable journey they arrived in Linn county, where the father took up three hundred and sixty acres of land and engaged in stock-raising for six years. The family fortunes were shifted near Lebanon in 1858, and this continued to be the home until 1896, when the father and mother removed to near Nez Perces, Idaho, where they have since lived. They are making their home with a son, J. M., and the father has attained to seventy-seven years.

The oldest of the seven sons and four daughters born to his parents, Americus McCally was educated in the public schools of Oregon, and soon after arriving in this state began to take his part in clearing and improving the farm. From 1871 to 1873 he engaged in clerking in Scio, Ore., and in 1878 bought three hundred and sixty-five acres of land in the fork of the Santiam river and operated the same, engaged in general farming. In 1886 he engaged in a general merchandise business in Jordan, Linn county, and in 1894 settled on a farm near Lebanon, purchasing one hundred and eighty acres. In 1898 he removed to Albany, and, after one year in the grocery business, entered upon his present combined interests as merchant and insurance agent.

Through his marriage in Linn county with Nancy E. Bryant, five children have been born to Mr. McCally, of whom R. A. is living in eastern Oregon; I. G. is clerking in his father's store; Cora E. is engaged in educational work and is living at home; and Claude and Vena are living at home. Mr. McCally has decided views on all public questions, and has especially made his influence felt as a Prohibitionist. His executive ability has resulted in various positions of honor being tendered him, among them being that of school director, road supervisor and clerk for many years. With his family he finds a religious home in the Christian Church, and its charities and general support are materially benefited by his generous contributions. Tactful and considerate, and with due appreciation of the rights and duties of the up-to-date merchant and business man, Mr. McCally commands the respect and good will of all who know him.

DAVID MYERS. One of the best known and most honored of the retired men of Scio is David Myers, a pioneer of 1858, and formerly engaged in carpentering, sawmilling, mining, and farming. In his long business career Mr. Myers adhered to the principles of conservatism and reliability, and it thus happens that many years were consumed in steadily but surely increasing his competency. At the present time he owns five hundred and twenty acres of land, three miles east of Scio, one hundred and sixty acres of timber land six miles east of the town, and eighty acres near Yaquina Bay, Lincoln county.

The Myers family was established in Medina county, Ohio, by Daniel Myers, the paternal grandfather of David, who was presumably born in Pennsylvania, married there, and reared a large family. Among his children was Gabriel, the father of David, who was born in Lehigh county, Pa., and there married Hannah Andrews, a native of the Quaker state, and who died in Wayne county, Ohio, at the age of eighty-five years. Gabriel Myers located on a farm in Trumbull county, Ohio, about 1828, and there engaged in coopering, a trade learned in his youth in Pennsylvania, and adhered to nearly all of his active life. After removing to Medina county, Ohio, in 1845, he farmed and worked at his trade to some extent, but died after several years of retirement at the age of sixty-three years.

The fifth in a family of fifteen children, eight of whom were sons, David Myers worked very hard in his boyhood days, and naturally found little time for recreation or education. In fact his present knowledge partakes rather of the practical and observative kind, the kind that men acquire while forging to the front, independent of any material help on the part of others. He was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, February 16, 1834, and was therefore twenty years of age when he came west to California in 1854, making the journey by way of the Isthmus of Panama. He was moderately successful in the placer mines at Greenwood, Eldorado county, and in 1858 transferred his mining interests to the Sound country in Washington. In November, 1858, he located in Portland, Ore., and worked at the carpenter trade, the same year removing to Marion county, where he managed a sawmill near Stayton, on the north Santiam. At the end of a year he began to devote his summers to carpentering and his winters to the sawmill, and in 1862 located on a farm of two hundred and eighty acres three miles east of Scio, Linn county, where he farmed and worked at his trade. In 1883 he removed to Scio and engaged in the lumber business, operating in connection therewith a planing and sawmill, from which he derived a substantial income until disposing of the same in 1895. In the meantime his health had caused him serious worry and apprehension, and upon locating in Scio he built a fine two-story frame residence, and surrounded himself and family with the comforts and many of the luxuries of life. The farming property is leased to responsible parties, but Mr. Myers often visits it to look after the repairs. He is constantly under the doctor's care, but otherwise retains the faculties which have accomplished his success, and manages to get considerable enjoyment out of life.

The wife of Mr. Myers, who was formerly Mary P. McDonald, a native of Andrew county, Mo., died in Oregon in 1883, at the age of forty-two years, leaving twelve children: Jefferson D. lives in Portland, Ore.; Nathaniel Clay and Ida are deceased; Laura B. lives in Portland, and is engaged as teacher in the public school; Eva Adella is living at home; Mary is a trained nurse of Portland; Maud and Myrtle, twins, the former a teacher in Salem, and the latter living at home; Elizabeth Dora and Flora, twins, are nurses in the North Pacific Sanatorium of Portland; Edward D., and Lola Hannah, are at home. The family of Mr. Myers is increased by the presence of his grand-daughter, Fay Lorraine. Politically Mr. Myers was a Democrat for many years, but at present is independent. He has never entered especially into the political undertakings of his neighborhood, but has served as county commissioner from 1884 until 1886. He is fraternally a popular and welcome member of Scio Lodge No. 39, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. The history of Linn county would be incomplete without more than passing mention of this popular and influential citizen, and those who are struggling against severe obstacles on the way to success may find in his life many lessons worthy of emulation.

HENRY G. EVERETT. The success of H. G. Everett as a hardware and agricultural implement merchant can hardly be ascribed to the fact that he has no competitors in business in Lebanon, for so well conducted and necessary an adjunct to the town and country well-being must needs hold its own in any community, however large or advanced. Equipped with several years of business experience Mr. Everett came to Lebanon in 1891, and bought a half interest in the hardware business of Neil S. Dagleish, with whom he has since been associated. Under the combined management of these two competent and resourceful men the enterprise has grown apace, and the stock now carried is valued at $20,000. As the population of the town increased, and the surrounding farmers advanced in their methods of conducting their affairs, various commodities have been added to the regulation stock, including agricultural implements, carpets and wall paper, paints, oils, window glass and minor builders' materials.

The founder of the family in America came from England and located in Massachusetts. David Allen Everett, the paternal grandfather of Henry G., was born in Vermont, while his parents were on their way from Massachusetts to Clinton county, N. Y. There Mr. Everett acquired a homestead which consisted of two hundred and fifty acres, a large farm for New York state, which is still in the possession of the family, and is now occupied by Harvey Everett, the father of Henry G., who is seventy-five years old, and who was born in the house which is still his home. At present retired, he has for years been one of the successful farmers of his county, and on a large scale has conducted an apiary, which is still a source of substantial revenue. For many years he has been practically alone; for his wife, formerly Margaret Green, a native of New York, died at the age of fifty-five, leaving three sons and one daughter. John Green, the father of Mrs. Everett, was also of English descent, and is supposed to have been born in New York state. He was a farmer by occupation, and lived to an advanced age on the farm to the improvement of which he devoted the best years of his life.

The oldest of the children in his father's family, Henry G. Everett worked hard on the paternal farm, in consequence of which his education was limited. However, the deficiency was not perceptible a few years later, for like the majority of boys with an eye for business, he learned more from observation than books, and having a keen appreciation of the practical and useful in life, learned his lessons from everyday contact with his fellow-men. Leaving the farm, he started a grocery business in Peru, N. Y., in 1885, taking as his partner a schoolmate reared in his own neighborhood, and with whom he continued in amicable partnership until 1888. Disposing of his store, he went to California in 1890, and the following year took passage on a north-bound steamer for Portland, from which city he came direct to Lebanon. Since coming here Mr. Everett has married Lulu Westfall, a native of Baker City, Ore., and who became the mother of Eleanor, who is living at home with her parents. Mr. Everett is a Democrat in politics, and has been a member of the city council several terms. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America.

EDWARD C. PEERY. The drug business of Edward C. Peery, while deriving a certain advantage from being the only concern of the kind in Scio, bases its successful operations upon actual merit, and has the reputation of being one of the well managed enterprises in the valley. Mr. Peery, who is popular both in the business and social life of his adopted city, is a native son of Oregon, and was born on a farm four miles south of Dayton, Yamhill county, May 3, 1875. His father, Hiram Peery, a native of Daviess county, Mo., crossed the plains with his parents in 1863, at the time being fifteen years of age. The family equipment consisted of the time-honored ox-teams and prairie schooners, and after a six-months' trip the home-seekers arrived in safety at Jordan, in Linn county, where the parents took up a farm, upon which Hiram remained until eighteen years of age. He then went to the mines of Idaho and had fair success as a miner, returning to Oregon at the age of twenty-one. In Yamhill county he located a claim near Dayton, but afterward sold it and took up another near McMinnville, where, at the age of fifty-five, he is still living. His father, Hiram Wilson Peery, was born in Virginia, and before locating in Missouri lived in Kentucky, his death occurring on the farm near Dayton, Yamhill county, Ore. On the maternal side Edward C. is connected with the Kimsey family, who were early represented in Oregon, locating on a claim in Yamhill county, where his mother, Mary Jane Kimsey, was born. Alvis Kimsey, her father, owned a farm of six hundred and forty acres near Dayton, where his death occurred at the age of forty-five years. There were six children born to Mrs. Peery, of whom three were sons.

After leaving the public schools of Yamhill county, Edward C. began to earn an independent livelihood as a clerk in a drug store, at Sodaville, and with the money thus earned he entered Mineral Springs College, at Sodaville, in 1892, graduating therefrom in 1896, with the degree of B. S. For the following four years he engaged in educational work in this state, three years as principal of the Moro High School of Sherman county, and during this time, from 1896, he was a partner in the drug business of Peery & Peery, at Scio. In 1902 he became sole owner and manager of the store, having registered under the law of 1892. He carries all stock required in a first-class drug business, as well as stationery, and a complete line of toilet articles.

In Albany, Ore., August 15, 1898, Mr. Peery married Pearl Hobson, who was born in Marion county, and educated in the public schools of her neighborhood. One child has been born of this union, Edris Ione, a daughter. Mr. Peery is fraternally connected with the Knights of the Maccabees and the Knights of Pythias. He is a Democrat in politics, and has served as clerk and trustee on the school board, and as justice of the peace for one term. Mr. Peery is prominent socially in Scio, and is the leader of the band of the city, which he organized April 15, 1903. This very popular and entertaining adjunct to the pleasure-giving opportunities enjoyed by the citizens is composed of fourteen pieces, and is a combination of brass and reed instruments. Under the efficient training of its director and general manager it has attained to a high state of cultivation, and renders the most popular and most classical of selections. Mr. Peery has the admirable and strong characteristics which go to make up the honored and progressive northwestern citizen, and his business and himself are appreciated by the citizens of his community.

COL. JOHN M. POORMAN. One of the representative men of Marion county is Col. John M. Poorman, cashier of and a chief stockholder in the Bank of Woodburn, and one of the men upon whose shoulders rests a large share of the financial welfare of the city. The family of which he is a representative member was founded in America by his paternal grandfather, Hoffman Poorman, who came from Wurtemberg, Germany, settled in New York, and removed thence to Pennsylvania, in both of which states he engaged in farming.

His son, John M., Sr., father of Colonel Poorman, was born in Chambersburg, Pa., and in his youth was apprenticed to a tanner. Later he farmed in Fairfield county, Ohio, and Sangamon county, Ill. In the latter state he became a prominent farmer, and owned a section of fine land. He devoted his land principally to stock-raising, raising fine horses and Durham cattle, and during his active life handled thousands of dollars' worth of blooded stock. For some years he was connected with the quartermaster's department of the United States army, during the Civil war, and purchased horses for the government. His later years were spent in retirement. To the end of his life he was a devoted admirer of fine horses, possessing the keenest appreciation of the beauty and usefulness of this noble animal. In Lancaster, Ohio, he married Martha S. Bush, who was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, and of the seven children born to them, two sons and four daughters grew to maturity, the subject of this review being the youngest son. John M. Poorman, Sr., died at the age of seventy-five years. To the end of his life Mr. Poorman recalled his associations with Abraham Lincoln as one of the pleasantest features of his career, for his farm in Sangamon county was but ten miles from Springfield, the home of Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Poorman belonged to the same hand-ball team as did the martyred president, and was variously associated with him in the social and business enterprises which entered into their respective lives.

After completing his education in the common schools and the Wesleyan University at Bloomington, Ill., Colonel Poorman, who was born in Sangamon county, April 20, 1854, continued to live with his father until emigrating to California in 1874. There he found employment with the Central Pacific Railroad Company at Sacramento for three years. In 1877 he came to Oregon and secured a position as conductor for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, in time his runs including all the various divisions of the road. Having become interested in pharmacy while living in Illinois, and discovering an opening in Woodburn for a first-class drug store, he established what ultimately proved to be one of the finest of its kind in the Willamette valley. So impressed did he become with the business opportunities afforded by that locality that upon the expiration of two years he established the Bank of Woodburn, of which he has since been cashier. He likewise erected the structure in which the bank is located. This bank ranks as one of the solid financial institutions of the Willamette valley.

Nor have Colonel Poorman's efforts been confined to the drug and banking business. The cause of education has profited by his staunch support, he having served as school clerk and director for several years. As a Republican he has held to the best tenets of his party, has been active in local affairs, and has served as a member of the state central committee. In 1900 he was elected to represent his district in the lower house of the Oregon state legislature by a large majority, and during the term of his service looked well to the interests of his constituents. He is prominently identified with Hermes Lodge No. 56, Knights of Pythias, and in Masonry is a past master of Woodburn Lodge No. 106, A. F. & A. M.; past high priest of Woodburn Royal Arch Chapter No. 29, De Molay Commandery No. 5 of Salem, Ore.; a thirty-second degree Mason in Consistory of Scottish Rite of Portland, and Al Kader Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. of Portland, Ore.

In July, 1903, the National Guard of Oregon was reorganized to conform with "the Dick bill," placing the National Guard on the same basis as the United States army, and he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Third Infantry, the only regiment in the state, receiving the unanimous vote of the regiment. He is also a member of French Prairie Camp No. 47, W. O. W., and of Mt. Hood Division No. 91, Order of Railway Conductors, in which he has served as secretary for nine years. This division is the largest in the northwest, and the mother order.

As a soldier during the Spanish-American war, Colonel Poorman proved himself a gallant, brave and most determined defender of the flag. Upon its organization he was elected captain of Company H, Second Regiment, Oregon National Guard, and was subsequently chosen lieutenant-colonel of the same regiment. At the outbreak of the war Company H of Woodburn and Company E of Hubbard were merged into Company M, which was mustered into the service May 15, 1898, at which time Lieutenant-Colonel Poorman was appointed captain by Governor Lord. This company will go down in history as one of the bravest that sailed from western shores, their enthusiasm increased, no doubt, by their admiration and loyalty to their genial commander. Company M participated in the battles of Pasig, Malabon, Polo, Marilao, Tay Tay, Morong and others of equal importance, and its captain was one of two bearing the same rank, who was officially complimented by Major Goodale for gallantry and meritorious service. After the war Captain Poorman was elected Lieutenant-Colonel of the Fourth Regiment, Oregon National Guard.

On October 30, 1879, Colonel Poorman was united in marriage with Miss Lida McMillen, who was born in Multnomah county, Ore., December 25, 1859, a daughter of B. F. McMillen, who is reviewed at length in another part of this volume. Four sons have been born to Colonel and Mrs. Poorman, one of whom, Tracy Chandler, accompanied his father to the Philippines. Forrest Winfred is a student in the Willamette University, Fred, a student and Kenneth, still at home.

Colonel Poorman possesses the fundamental traits of character which have ever been regarded as bulwarks of communities. Forceful, though unostentatious, extending the hand of good-fellowship to all, and entertaining malice towards none, he represents the typical citizen of the great northwest.

THOMAS MONTEITH. The name Monteith is one which the residents of Albany, Linn county, will always remember as that of several of the first men of the city, whose broad liberality, enterprise and business ability were the foundation upon which a large part of the place was built. The western half of the city was laid out entirely by Walter and Thomas Monteith, the land having been the donation claim of the former. Many of the public buildings of the city also owe to Thomas Monteith a grateful remembrance, since he donated the land which they occupy. Among them are Albany College, of which one brother was trustee for many years and another, the Rev. William Monteith, acted as president for some time; and also nearly all the churches of the city. The public spirit which animated this family has truly left its impress upon the community, and the effort which they directed along these lines has certainly met with a reward in the industrial, commercial and social life in the city they assisted so materially in creating.

The Monteith family was founded in America by Archibald Monteith, a native of Scotland, from which country he emigrated with his wife, formerly Mary McLain, and settled in New York state as a farmer. Of their family of ten children several found homes in the territory of the far northwest, added to those already named being George and John, both of whom died in Albany. William Monteith died in Idaho, and Walter, who was born in 1816, died in Albany June 11, 1876. The latter came to Oregon in 1847, and located a claim of three hundred and twenty acres. He was in every way a man of affairs up to the time of his death, taking a prominent part in all public movements, a leader in every business enterprise. He also served his adopted state as a soldier in the Cayuse war. He is survived by his wife and two sons.

Thomas Monteith was born near Broadalbin, Fulton county, N. Y., April 23, 1824, and remained there until he had entered his teens, when he went to Illinois and resided until 1847. In that year he joined his brother Walter, and the two crossed the plains with ox-teams, settling in Linn county. He was later attracted to the gold fields of California. After spending a short time there he returned to Oregon and assisted in laying out the western part of Albany, the name given to the city being in memory of the one by that name in their native state. The interest of the two brothers continued parallel in a milling and merchant business under the style of Monteith Bros. They built the Magnolia mill, in the operation of which they were also financially interested. The Albany City Mills were also built by Mr. Monteith, and were conducted by him for some years, after which he again followed the mercantile business. A few years before his death, which occurred July 21, 1889, at the age of sixty-five years, he retired from the active cares of life. He had earnestly labored for the upbuilding of the city, giving freely of his time, money and strength, which has certainly been appreciated by his fellow-townsmen. As a Republican, stanch and earnest, he gave every aid to the advancement of the principles which he considered for the best interests of the community, in municipal government serving as mayor for one term, and also as city councilman. As a sturdy and faithful pioneer he did active duty in the Cayuse war. In his fraternal relations he affiliated with the Masons and Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

The marriage of Mr. Monteith occurred near Oskaloosa, Iowa, June 29, 1854, and united him with Christine Maria Dunbar, a native of Providence, Ind. She was the daughter of Col. Butler Dunbar, who was born in Connecticut, and as a young man settled in Indiana, becoming a useful pioneer of the state. He later removed to Iowa, locating in Mahaska county, from which section he joined the troops which served in the Black Hawk war, holding the commission of colonel. He married Sarah A. Heaton, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Iowa. She was the mother of eight children, seven of whom are now living, Mrs. Monteith being the only one located in Oregon. She was the fourth of the children, and was reared in Iowa, where she received her education in the common schools. After her marriage she came to Oregon via the isthmus, from New York city, taking the steamer George L. Law, to Panama, and from there to San Francisco on the steamer John L. Stevens. In December, 1854, she arrived in her new home, which was then an embryo town, and she has since watched a city spring up in the wilderness. She now has four children living, of whom Archibald is located in Portland, engaged in insurance work; Charlotte A. is the wife of J. V. Pipe, of Albany; Thomas resides in Portland; and Christine A. is the wife of W. H. Keading, of Oskaloosa, Iowa. One child, Montrose D., died in Albany at the age of twenty-four years. Mrs. Monteith is identified with the auxiliaries of the orders to which her husband belonged, being a member of the Rebekahs, and a charter member of the Eastern Star. She is a member of the First Presbyterian Church.

ABNER R. HALL. Adjoining Lebanon is a little property of five acres under a high state of cultivation, where various marketable products are raised in the season, and where the owner, Abner R. Hall, spends a peaceful and congenial life. Mr. Hall has some stock, and to facilitate his general farming rents forty-eight acres of land, a large part of which is heavily timbered.

Mr. Hall's wife was formerly Theresa Whited, a native of Des Moines, Iowa, who came to Oregon with her parents in 1874. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Hall, Estella, Elva and Alice, the three youngest, are living at home; Hattie, the oldest daughter, is now Mrs. Michael Kelly, of Jefferson, Ore., and Walter is engaged in ranching in eastern Oregon.

Near Milan, Sullivan county, Mo., Thomas Hall, the father, owned and managed a farm for many years, and here was born his son, Abner R., April 27, 1859. Thomas Hall was born in Kentucky, and after attaining his majority moved to Missouri, where he ran a grist-mill in connection with farming, having learned the millwright's trade in his youth. In 1860 he took his family to Kansas, and afterward lived in both Nebraska and Illinois. From the latter state he crossed the plains to Oregon with ox-teams during 1875-6. Abner R. Hall was then sixteen years of age, and the second of the six children born to his mother, Hattie (Inman) Hall, a native of New England, and now living in Jackson county, Ore., aged sixty-eight years. On the way across the plains Mr. Hall halted his oxen at Boise City, Idaho, and added to his depleted finances by burning charcoal. The next year he came to Oregon, locating on a claim near Brownsville, where he engaged in stock-raising for several years. The last years of his life were saddened by sickness, but he was a fairly successful man, and bore an honored name in the community. His son Abner lived with him on the home farm until 1887, and then farmed independently near Lebanon, taking up his residence adjoining the town, in 1894. He is a capable farmer and progressive man, devoted to his family, his friends and his adopted state. In politics he is a Republican.

WILL E. CHANDLER has been a factor in the business life of Lebanon since his arrival there in 1894. The Chandler family is doubly identified with the growth of the town, and the name has become synonymous with fair dealing and progressive methods. Mrs. Chandler who, before her marriage in Lebanon was Clara Read, has a well stocked dry-goods, grocery and general furnishings store, which is not wanting in generous patronage from both the town and surrounding country. With true appreciation of the needs of her sex, she makes a specialty of accessories of the toilet.

Mr. Chandler, who started a tinning and plumbing enterprise when he first located in Lebanon, and who has since derived a substantial income from this source, has of late transferred his business partially to others, in order to devote the greater part of his time to buying and shipping country produce. He is one of the successful younger business men of the town. He was born in Franklin county, Ill., January 18, 1866. His father, Samuel L. Chandler, a native of Kentucky, removed at an early day to Franklin county, where he owned and managed a farm, and later ran an agricultural implement business in Carbondale, Jackson county. At the present time he is sixty years of age, and is living retired at the home of his son, Audy L., in Champaign, Ill. His wife, Mary (Tate) Chandler, was born in Franklin county, and died in Illinois, after rearing four sons and two daughters, of whom Will E. is the third. He received a practical education in the public schools, and gained a fair knowledge of business in his father's implement store. When twenty-two years of age he came to Portland, and for several years lived at Salem and other towns in the Willamette valley, finally locating in Lebanon in 1894:

A Republican in political preference, Mr. Chandler has been prominently before the public of Linn county for several years, and served as deputy sheriff of the county under James A. McFerrin. He has been a member of the city council one term, and has held other local offices. Fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Knights of the Maccabees, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Independent Order of Foresters. In all of these orders he is active, and he takes a keen interest in other social organizations. A shrewd and capable buyer, Mr. Chandler is also a considerate and conscientious one, and the farmers who dispose of their products to him are invariably sure of treatment consistent with sound and reliable business ethics.

EDWIN N. STARR. As a successful farmer Edwin N. Starr is giving his energies and talents toward a cultivation of the broad lands of the state of Oregon, now occupying a part of the old Reeves donation claim, a link between the days of pioneer hardships and the present affluence. Mr. Starr is a native son of the west, his father having been one of the many men who came into the wilderness and by earnestness of purpose laid the foundation for the commonwealth which has arisen on the western slope.

The father, George M. Starr, was born in Logan county, Ohio, February 18, 1812, and at a very early date removed with his parents to Illinois. There the father died at seventy years of age, and the mother when George M. was but twelve years old, the two being of Irish and English descent. On completing his education in the public schools of Olney, Ill., Mr. Starr learned the tinner's trade from his father, and followed the same for forty years, at that time deciding to remove to the west. In 1852 he started with the customary ox-team for the journey across the plains, the only trouble experienced with the Indians being a hand-to-hand encounter with three of them, in which Mr. Starr came off victor. He was traveling in Captain Bentley's train, which, after six months, arrived safely in Oregon, when he left the company and came directly to Benton county and located near Bellfountain, where he remained for one winter. In the spring of 1853 he went to California and followed mining and prospecting for a year, and on again going north he settled in Monroe and engaged in the general merchandise business in partnership with a man named Bellknap, the firm name being Starr & Bellknap. This was the first establishment of the kind in the town and it was continued for several years, when Mr. Starr removed to Idaho after about six years' residence in Monroe. In the course of a few years he returned to the vicinity of Monroe and spent the remainder of his life in and near the town. He lived to the age of seventy-five years. In February, 1854, he married Elizabeth Dimmick, who was born in Illinois in 1838, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1852, a fuller record of whose life is to be found in the sketch of her father, Joseph Dimmick, which appears on another page of this work. Besides Edwin N. Starr they had the following children: Georgiana, the wife of I. Bray, of Lane county; Sarah, the wife of O. V. Hurt, of Corvallis; Oscar and Clarence, both located in Corvallis; Bert, of Portland; and Samuel, of Seattle, Wash. Mr. Starr was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and had been since boyhood. As a citizen of the community he had served in several minor offices, among them being that of justice of the peace. When quite young he served as a bugler under General Price in the Mexican war, being in the three principal battles of this war. Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Starr has made her home with her children, now living with Edwin N. Starr, of this review.

Edwin N. Starr was born in Monroe, Ore., July 1, 1856, and was there reared to young manhood. He attended the district schools and remained at home until he was eighteen years old, when he started out to make his own way in the world. He followed his early training and worked as a farm hand for some time, his first venture on his own responsibility being on a claim which he had taken up in Lincoln county. He remained there for eight years, at the close of that period coming to the place which he now occupies, previously mentioned as a part of the Reeves donation claim. Through energy and perseverance Mr. Starr has made many improvements, in fact, all of those which now make the farm most valuable. He has excellent buildings of all kinds, good commodious barns and out-buildings, and a comfortable dwelling. Out of two hundred and sixty acres he is now cultivating one hundred and thirty, following the methods of his father in carrying on general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Short-horn cattle.

The marriage of Mr. Starr occurred March 23, 1879, and united him with Anna Reeves, who was born on the place where she now makes her home, the daughter of a pioneer, Thomas D. Reeves, a sketch of whose life appears elsewhere in this work. Mr. and Mrs. Starr have three children, named in order of birth as follows: Claude I., Grace E. and Tracy, all of whom are still at home with their parents. Politically Mr. Starr is a Democrat and has served in the interest of this party in the capacity of road supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World. With a good record of energetic, persevering labor for his past years, Mr. Starr has made for himself a place in the community, bearing his part in all efforts to improve the conditions of his native state, and winning thereby the esteem of his fellow-citizens.

BURTIS W. JOHNSON, who is now serving a second term as postmaster of Corvallis, having filled the position continuously since January, 1898, was born in Ulysses, Potter county, Pa., August 30, 1866, a son of Hon. F. M. and Celia (Burtis) Johnson. The father was born in New York, of an old New England family. The paternal grandfather was a shipbuilder and removed from Connecticut to the Empire state. Hon. F. M. Johnson became an attorney and practiced law for a number of years in Pennsylvania. Removing to the west he became a resident of Michigan and served with the Third Michigan Cavalry in the Civil war. Later he went to Nebraska, settling in Tekamah, Burt county, where he practiced his profession, being widely recognized as a leading member of the bar of that locality. He also exerted a wide influence in public affairs and twice represented his district in the general assembly, leaving the impress of his individuality upon the legislation enacted during that period. In 1876 he was chairman of the Republican state central committee and continued an active factor in Nebraska politics until 1879, when he came to Oregon, locating in Corvallis. Here he practiced law until 1899, when he removed to Portland, where he is now engaged in the insurance business. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and a man of forceful individuality, whose labors have benefited every community with which he has been connected. His wife was born in Pennsylvania of one of the old families of that state and her death occurred in Nebraska. They were the parents of two children, the younger being May, now Mrs. Weigel, of Prineville.

Having completed his literary education by a high school course Burtis W. Johnson in 1884 entered the employ of the Oregon & Pacific Railroad Company, as a member of the surveying corps engaged in locating the road. He was afterward with the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company in the Walla Walla country, making the survey along the north bank of the Columbia river to Ainsworth. Subsequently Mr. Johnson entered his father's office, in charge of the insurance business, and in 1894 he entered the journalistic field, purchasing the Corvallis Gazette, of which he became the editor as well as proprietor. It was the Republican organ of Benton county and he continued its publication until 1898 when he sold it. In the meantime he had enlarged the paper to an eight column folio, weekly. When he purchased it, the paper was on the decline, but he built up a large circulation, established a good job department, and, at the cost of much hard labor, made the Gazette, one of the best journals published in this part of the state. In the meantime Mr. Johnson had done another important work for Oregon. In the fall of 1891 he had arranged a Benton county exhibit for the exposition in Portland, where it attracted much attention and was highly commended, so much so that C. H. Dodd, then president of the board of immigration, urged Mr. Johnson to take the management and superintendence of the car "Oregon-on-Wheels," which toured the United States in order to make Oregon and her possibilities known throughout the country. For some time Mr. Johnson hesitated, but was finally prevailed upon to accept the position and the result was that a very successful trip was made and its object was attained. The car was filled with exhibits of Oregon's products of different varieties, including fruits, grains, minerals and woods. The trip covered fifteen thousand miles, Mr. Johnson starting in 1891 and returning in 1892. He traveled all over different railroads through the principal districts of the east and the trip was a pleasant one, at the same time proving of value to the state.

In Corvallis Mr. Johnson was united in marriage to Miss Lillian Hamilton, who was born in Minnesota and was educated in the Oregon Agricultural College. They are members of the Presbyterian Church and Mr. Johnson holds membership relations with the Knights of Pythias, being a past chancellor in the lodge and a member of the finance committee of the grand lodge. In politics he has always been a stalwart Republican, and in October, 1897, he was appointed by President McKinley to the position of postmaster of Corvallis, although there were eight applicants for the position. In January, 1898, he entered upon the duties of the office, and on June 30, 1902, he was reappointed without opposition by President Roosevelt. He is one of the leading young men of Corvallis, his life typifying the progressive spirit which has been the dominating element in the upbuilding and rapid development of the northwest.

IRA F. M. BUTLER. In comparative good health there is living in the town of Monmouth a venerable and honored citizen aged nearly ninety-three years, whose personal characteristics, accomplishments, and whole-souled public spiritedness may well serve as an inspiration to the youth of today who is handicapped at the outset of his life by the absence of influence or material resources. Ira F. M. Butler is a pioneer of pioneers, not only because he is an early settler, but because of the extent of his services in connection with the upbuilding of Polk county. Long before the Revolutionary war his emigrating ancestor came from England, settling among the colonies in the midst of which was fermented the compelling spirit of independence. The paternal great-grandfather, Peter, was born in England. Coming to America he located in Barren county, Ky., in 1710, and died there in 1816, at the age of one hundred and six years. The paternal grandfather, John, was born in Virginia, removed with his father to Barren county, Ky., and died near Fairfield, Wayne county, Ill., at the age of seventy-five.

Peter Butler, the father of Ira F. M., was born in Pulaski county, Ky., March 9, 1789, and in his native state married Rachel Murphy, a native of east Tennessee, and whose father, John Murphy, was born in the same state, and passed his last years in Warren county, Ky. Mr. Butler in time located in Barren county, where was born, May 20, 1812, his son, Ira F. M., the first of a family of ten children, among whom were seven sons and three daughters. Contemporary with his son's birth, Mr. Butler shouldered his musket and served in the war of 1812 as major in General Wayne's regiment, thereafter continuing to farm in his native state until his removal to Illinois in 1829. In Warren county, Ill., he bought a farm, the interests of which he gladly entrusted to the care of others while he served in the Black Hawk war, in which momentous struggle he won the rank of major. He became prominent in political and general affairs in Illinois, served in both the legislature and state senate, and was the first sheriff of Warren county. In the meantime he listened enthusiastically to the glowing reports of returned travelers from the west, and in 1853 outfitted with mule teams and wagons, and brought his family to Oregon. He was four months on the way, and, contrary to the experience of most of the early emigrants, had a pleasant and safe journey. Arriving in Polk county, he bought a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of land near Monmouth, where his death occurred in 1856.

In his youth Ira F. M. Butler had meager educational chances, and he early appreciated what he was missing in that direction. Accordingly, he set about studying by himself during his leisure moments on the farm, and he was one of those who learn much from observation, and from contact with his fellow-men. He developed early aptitude for public service, for he was deputy sheriff under his father, and filled the position of sheriff of Warren county, Ill., in 1838. For seven years he was circuit clerk in Warren county under Stephen A. Douglas, in the meantime making his home in the town of Monmouth, Ill. With his father he planned the trip across the plains, and upon arriving at his destination in Oregon he settled on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near his father on the Luckiamute. This property he sold in 1856, and bought land two miles southwest of Monmouth, consisting of six hundred and eighty acres. In 1856-7 he helped to lay out the town of Monmouth, and, upon being appointed one of a committee of five to give the infant project a name, called it after the thriving community in which he lived and labored in Illinois.

In his determination to be an upbuilding factor of Monmouth, Mr. Butler has traversed many avenues of activity, in all of which he has been successful. As a staunch Democrat, he has repeated his Illinois political services, creditably and ably representing his community in the legislature during the sessions of 1856, 1858, and 1862, in 1858, serving as speaker of the house. From 1878 to 1882 he was judge of Polk county, and until within a few years has been justice of the peace since his arrival in the west. From time to time he has been interested in surveying in the county, and was county surveyor for one term. For eighteen years he lived on the large farm which he still owns, and during that time engaged in general farming and stock-raising, many improvements being added to his enterprise as his harvests increased in size, and large financial gains rewarded his arduous labors. From the primitive log house of the early settler he moved into more commodious quarters, and finally, in 1873, took up his permanent residence in a pleasantly located home in Monmouth. Since 1882 he has lived in comparative retirement, having won the esteem and appreciation of a large circle of friends and associates. A member of the Christian church, he was one of the founders of the Christian College at Monmouth, and for many years was president of its board of trustees, resigning only when the institution was merged into the State Normal School. His financial ability and integrity found vent as one of the organizers of the Polk county bank at Monmouth, of which he was for years one of the largest stockholders. He is a member of Grange No. 258.

For fifty-three years Mr. Butler enjoyed an ideal married life with the wife whom he married in Illinois, November 5, 1835, and who was formerly Mary Ann Davidson, a native of Kentucky, and daughter of Elijah Davidson, born in North Carolina. November 5, 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Butler celebrated their golden wedding, and the love of friends and relatives found expression in numerous gifts, and in the showering of innumerable good wishes. Three years later, in June, 1888, the faithful wife and mother passed beyond the ken of those to whom she had been a comfort in life, and in the memory of all who knew her she is recalled as possessing many lovable and endearing traits of character. Her father removed from North Carolina to Illinois, and from there came to Oregon in 1850, locating on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Monmouth, where he attained to the age of four score years. Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Butler, Newton H. is deceased; Paradine is deceased; Asa D. is a fruit grower in Napa, Cal.; Cyrus is deceased; as are also Mary E. and A. P. Two daughters, Margaret and Alice, live with their father. Thus is told the life story of an industrious and capable pioneer of this great commonwealth, who is as great in the sterling qualities which bring success as is the state in opportunities of soil and climate.

WILLIAM A. CRISELL. Three miles east of Butteville and five miles northwest of Aurora on the Willamette river, is the two hundred and seventy-five acre farm of William A. Crisell, occupied by him since 1868, and one hundred and fifty acres of which are cleared. Fifty acres of this farm consists of beaver-dam land, thrown up by those wonderful little members of the animal world who have served as examples of industry for centuries past. There is an old hop-yard of twenty acres, and a new hop-yard of forty acres, the latter planted in 1902, making in all sixty acres of hops to be garnered by harvesters in the fall. Mr. Crisell is not only an excellent agriculturist, but he has a wide knowledge of mining, to which he has devoted many years of his life. He was born in St. Genevieve county, Mo., in February, 1833, and was reared on a farm, attending the public schools as opportunity offered. His father dying when the son was seventeen years of age, he determined to leave home and carve out his future in the west, two years later, in 1852, making preparation for the long journey. With three companions he purchased an outfit of five yoke of oxen, one wagon, and two saddle horses, all of which they finally succeeded in bringing over the plains. They were four months making the journey from Missouri to California, and once arrived, Mr. Crisell turned his attention to mining and prospecting in Eldorado county for about ten years. Thereafter he spent a number of years mining in Idaho, Washington and other mining centers, and eventually bought an interest in a four-yoke ox-team with which he engaged in freighting between The Dalles and the mining districts for three years.

In 1868 he came to Oregon and settled on his present farm. The following year, September 10, 1869, he was united in marriage with Nancy Bird, who was born in Clackamas county in 1849, a daughter of William and Harriett Bird. The union of Mr. Crisell and Nancy Bird has been blessed with three sons: Allen A., Millard N., and Robert. The sons are all farmers, and the two youngest are working with their father. Mr. Crisell is a Democrat in politics, and fraternally is associated with the Grange. He is upright and industrious, and richly deserves the success which has come to him. In all the undertakings of his community which are calculated to elevate the moral and intellectual standard of the people he has exhibited a keen and unselfish interest. Those who have had the opportunity to gain a knowledge of his character freely accord him a position among the thoroughly representative farmers of Marion county—a man whose earnest efforts toward the enlightenment of those with whom he comes in contact in his daily life are highly appreciated. It is with genuine pleasure that the editors of this publication make a permanent record of the high esteem in which Mr. Crisell is held by his fellow-citizens; and in the years to come the three manly sons in his family unquestionably will review with great pride and satisfaction the history of his career, which has afforded them a source of inspiration in their efforts toward attaining an equally conspicuous position among the leading agriculturists of the Willamette valley.

MATHIAS COOLEY. Social and political position in the United States is not dependent on titles or long lines of family ancestry, but is based on a man's own achievements. The subject of this writing owes his success to his individual efforts, and began the battle of life at the early age of fourteen years. From a humble beginning, he has risen to a place of success and honor, an esteemed resident of his community. Mr. Cooley is now living a retired life on his farm three miles north of Silverton, Marion county, and has the distinction of being one of the pioneer settlers of that section. His life has been an eventful one and he has followed a variety of vocations, being also largely instrumental in the upbuilding of his community.

Mr. Cooley was born in Platte county, Mo., August 26, 1837, and is a son of Cornelius and Dolly (White) Cooley, the latter a native of Missouri. Cornelius Cooley was a Kentuckian by birth. He settled in Missouri when a young man, and it was there his marriage took place. Four sons were born to him and his wife. When Mathias was but seven years old, the father died, and, as he had requested, the lad was placed in the care of a family named Wilson. In 1845 the Wilsons crossed the plains to the far west and many incidents of the long and perilous journey are still fresh in the mind of Mr. Cooley. Upon leaving Council Bluffs, Iowa, the emigrants' train consisted of one hundred wagons, and it required about eight months to make the journey to Oregon. Owing to the scarcity of food, the suffering was intense. For two weeks they lived on dried salmon skins, which they obtained by trading with the Indians, having barely enough of this poor food to sustain life. They first settled at The Dalles, and Mr. Wilson was so nearly starved that he overtaxed his stomach and died the morning following his arrival at that place. His widow settled on the Tualatin plains near Hillsboro, Washington county, and some time afterward married David Hill, who located in Oregon in 1840. He took up a donation claim where Hillsboro now stands, and gave half of the town site. He died about 1850, and his widow continued to reside upon the same farm until her death, having previously espoused a third husband, whose name was Whelock Simmons.

Mathias Cooley was the recipient of but a meager education, which was obtained in the district schools. When he attained the age of fourteen, he started out to make his own way in the world, working by the month as farm hand until he reached his majority. At the age of twenty-two years, he entered a wagon shop as an apprentice, and completely mastered the double trade of wagonmaker and carpenter. Later he went into business for himself in Wauconda, and it was there that his marriage took place. Four or five years later the family removed to Gervais, and about four years afterward Mr. Cooley purchased the farm which is still his home. This farm consists of one hundred and sixty acres of land, and upon it general farming and stock-raising was carried on until Mr. Cooley's retirement.

December 23, 1868, Mr. Cooley was joined in matrimony with Willimina Smith, daughter of John W. and Matilda (Elliott) Smith. Mrs. Cooley was born in Wayne county, Ohio, crossed the plains with her family in 1854, and settled in Polk county, Ore. Nine children were born of this union; namely, Cornelius J.; M. G.; Mrs. Lillian Urdan, of Portland; Matilda M., of Portland; Sampson J., of Portland; Bird Bell; Jennie J.; Wallace B.; and Willis. They have a very pleasant and attractive home, which is beautifully located. The residence is conveniently built, the out-buildings substantial, and the surrounding ground well kept.

Mr. Cooley is a loyal and earnest Republican and has done a great deal of active service for his party. All the members of his family are more or less musically inclined and the fame of Cooley's orchestra is known throughout that section. Mr. Cooley himself was at one time one of the leading violinists in the far west.

WILLIAM WILSON is an enterprising and highly respected citizen of Yamhill county who owns a nice farm on the beautiful Willamette river near Dundee. He also has mining interests, being one of the owners of a gold mine in the Cascade mountains, having a ledge on Wilson creek. The development and progress of the coast country is a matter which has long been to him of deep interest and he has done everything in his power to promote its upbuilding. His residence in Oregon dates from 1876. He was born in Oakland county, Mich., September 29, 1837, and is a son of George and Harriet (Soper) Wilson. The father was born in Lincolnshire, England, and came to the United States in 1812. Espousing the cause of his adopted country in the second war with England, he did garrison duty during the period of hostilities, but was never called into active service. He was then but eighteen years of age. He located in Genesee county, N. Y., where he followed farming for a long period and then removed to Oakland county, Mich., where he entered a claim of one hundred and sixty acres. After the war with the Indians in that state he sold a part of his land, but devoted his attention to the cultivation of the remainder, and he died in Oakland county when seventy-five years of age. His wife, who was a native of Greece, Genesee county, N. Y., died in Michigan at the age of seventy years. Unto this worthy couple were born six children, two sons and four daughters, of whom five reached years of maturity, William being the second in order of birth.

To the public school system of his native state William Wilson is indebted for the educational privileges which he received and upon the home farm he obtained practical training in agricultural work. When twenty years of age he began earning his own living at farm work and at logging, and after the beginning of the Civil war he enlisted for service in the United States army as a member of Company A, Third Wisconsin Cavalry. The company was afterward reorganized as Company K, and Mr. Wilson served in the southwest part of Missouri, Arkansas and Texas, under Generals Curtis and Blount. He participated in the battles of Little Blue, Lexington, Mo., and Fayetteville, Ark. He then marched back to Missouri, living on only one-fourth rations for a time. He was in the service for over two years and was mustered out at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Mr. Wilson then returned to his home in Wisconsin and in 1866 he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land in Steele county, Minn., of which he fenced thirty or forty acres and then sold the property. Removing to Michigan, he remained there until the fall of 1867, when he went to Dallas county, Iowa, and purchased one hundred acres of land for which he paid $3 per acre. After twenty years he sold this for $20 per acre, thus realizing a good return from his investment. In 1873 he purchased one hundred and sixty acres for $16 per acre in the same county, but after three years he disposed of this and in 1876 went to California. Subsequently he took up his abode in Seattle, Wash., where he engaged in logging and then came to Oregon, but after a year spent in this state he returned to California. A few months later, however, he once more came to Oregon and has resided here continuously since. In 1881 he purchased one hundred acres of land for $10 per acre on the banks of the Willamette river. Only a very small part of this had been improved at the time, but he now has fifty acres under cultivation. He carries on general farming and he also has eleven acres planted to hops.

In Wisconsin in 1862 occurred the marriage of Mr. Wilson and Miss Viola Kennedy, who was born in Hillsdale county, Mich., a daughter of J. B. Kennedy, who was a native of New York and a farmer by occupation. He removed with his parents to Michigan, afterward became a resident of Wisconsin, thence sought a home in the northwest and after residing in Oregon for a time he went to San Diego, Cal., where he died at the age of sixty-nine years. During the greater part of his business career he had carried on agricultural pursuits but in his last years he lived retired. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Emily Belden, was born in Massachusetts, February 28, 1829, and they were married in Michigan. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Wilson have been born five children, three sons and two daughters: Joseph, who is engaged in farming in Greer county, Okla.; William and Warren, who are engaged in the railway business in eastern Oregon; and Emily and Zetta, at home.

Mr. Wilson was converted by the Salvation Army, with which he is now connected, and in his political affiliations he is a Republican. He owns a nice residence on the banks of the river a mile and a quarter southeast of Dundee and his farm is a valuable property, forming one of the attractive features of the landscape.

JOHN MOSER. Among the large landholders and extensive stock raisers and dealers who are represented in this volume, mention may well be made of John Moser, whose finely-improved and well-kept homestead about five miles east of Silverton bears strong evidence of the thrift and enterprise which first established it, and by which it has since been carried on. In common with those of his day and generation, he suffered the hardships of frontier life, but by the aid of strong hands, a courageous heart, and a never-failing energy, he has been able to cope successfully with all difficulties that have beset him, and in the past years of faithful toil has accumulated a comfortable competency.

Born August 20, 1827, in Owen county, Ind., John Moser is a son of Joseph Moser, one of the early settlers of Marion county. Joseph Moser, a native of North Carolina, accompanied his parents to Ohio when he was a small child, and later lived in Indiana for several years. In 1844 he removed with his wife and children to Missouri, where he remained about eight years. In 1852 he joined a party westward bound, and for six months journeyed by ox-team before he reached Marion county, the objective point of his destination. Taking up a claim about six miles from Silverton, between Butte creek and the Abiqua, he was engaged in general farming there and in that vicinity until his death, at the age of about three score and ten years. He married, while living in Indiana, Isabelle Dunnigan, who was born in Kentucky, and died in Marion county, Ore., at the age of seventy-eight years. Ten children blessed their union, namely: Lucinda, deceased; John; Mary, widow of John Hartman, living near Silverton; Tobias, deceased; Solomon, residing in eastern Oregon; Joseph, a resident of Washington; Elizabeth, widow of John Whitlock, of Silverton; Harriet, wife of John Stanton, of Clackamas county; Alonzo, of Oregon City; and William, of the Waldo Hills.

After completing his studies in the district schools of Indiana, John Moser removed with his parents to Missouri, where he subsequently learned the wagonmaker's trade, which he followed for a few years. In 1852 he crossed the plains with an ox-team, coming to Oregon with the train that his parents accompanied, and settled in the Waldo Hills, on a half section of land, about two and one-half miles south of Silverton. Two years later he removed with his family to Lane county, where he resided two years. In 1855 he worked a few months at mining and farming in Jackson county, Ore. In 1856 Mr. Moser purchased the farm where he now lives, and where he has since resided. It contained at that time six hundred and forty acres of land, which was in its original wildness. Nothing daunted, however, he began the herculean task of clearing it, and by wise forethought and intense application redeemed a good homestead property, which he has improved by the erection of substantial buildings, and equipped with the necessary machinery for its cultivation. In carrying on his work he pays attention to general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty in the latter branch of his industry of Norman horses and Hereford cattle. One of his sons owns a portion of the original estate, but he still has in his own possession five hundred and sixty acres of it.

February 18, 1847, Mr. Moser married Sarah A. Petree, who was born March 29, 1830, in Franklin county, Ind., and died January 8, 1900, on the homestead. Of the children that blessed their union the following is the record: Joseph H., a resident of Silverton; Isaiah, a resident of Washington county; Margaret E., wife of Isaac Hinkle; Minerva, wife of William Pendell, of Washington; Dr. John F., deceased; Mary, wife of Zack Davenport, living on the home farm; Sarah, Icebella, both deceased; Falista, wife of Henry Grazer; Lemuel, living in California; Isabelle, wife of Hiram Hartley; and Stoneman, residing on a portion of the homestead. Mr. Moser is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in his political affiliations is a Democrat.

HENRY MCGUIRE. Far from peaceful or uneventful has been the career of Henry McGuire, one of the large land owners and successful farmers of Yamhill county, and one of the bravest and most experienced Indian fighters which this country has produced. His fighting capacity is not surprising when it is known that remote McGuire ancestors prided themselves upon their prowess on the field of battle, and in all their relations to life were fashioned rather on the martial order. At any rate, they stood out fearlessly in any emergency however great and were also men of large business ability and unswerving integrity. Most authentic records trace the family history to McGuire Island, Fermanagh, Ireland, whence some bearing the name found their way to France. James and Hurley, however, remained in Ireland and became the greatest grain merchants of that picturesque old town of Limerick.

A native of Roscommon town and county, Ireland, Henry McGuire was born October 4, 1846, his father, William, being a native of the same county. William McGuire was a large stock-buyer and seller in his early days, but afterward lived in Limerick, where he bought and sold enormous quantities of grain, and was both an exporter and importer. He was an uneducated man, but possessed remarkable financial ability, and died in Belfast in 1900, leaving a comfortable competency to his family. His father, Hurley McGuire, was also born in Roscommon, and by occupation was a farmer and trader, in time becoming one of the wealthiest men in his section. In 1798 he fought against the English, and although the balance of the family found a refuge in France, he and his brother James remained behind, much to the surprise of their friends, who were unaware of the fact until some years later. William McGuire married Mary Green, born in County Galway, and whose father, James, a merchant tailor, died in Roscommon. Mrs. McGuire was the mother of three sons and three daughters: George, deceased, was a judge in Wayne county, Mich.; Mary Ann is living in Michigan; Agnes died in Belfast, Ireland; James is a resident of Portland; Annie is in Belfast, Ireland; and Henry, subject of this sketch.

A spirit of rebellion characterized the early youth of Mr. McGuire, which was perhaps typical of his future career. At the age of fourteen he unceremoniously took leave of his family and went to Liverpool, where his surplus energy was expended in teaching boxing, and in giving boxing exhibitions. This kind of life was destined for interruption, for his family saw to it that he returned to his home and applied himself to attendance at the common school. In 1862 he engaged as a clerk on the Midland & Great Western Railway in the construction department, and was later a clerk in the mail department of Roscommon. At the time of the Fenian raid in 1865 he came to the United States, and from New York City went to Lowell, Mass., and then back to New York City. Here he enlisted in the United States army, and as a member of Company D was sent to a military training school. Having successfully stood the examination he was offered a commission, but refused, and was then ordered with a band of recruits under General Lord to Angel Island, Marin county, Cal. As a member of Company G, Thirty-Second United States Infantry, he went to Arizona, there meeting with an accident while attempting to regain an escaping prisoner, in which he was thrown down a cliff. In Arizona he volunteered to carry the mail from Goodman to Apache Pass, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles, the entire trip going and coming taking usually a week. Mr. McGuire gained a great reputation in Arizona for nerve and fearlessness, and his name was known throughout the entire territory. His regiment was finally consolidated with Company G of the Twenty-First regiment, but soon after Mr. McGuire was discharged therefrom, owing to a case of sunstroke while on a forced march. Although one of the most capable and fearless men in his company, he steadily refused promotion, preferring to remain in the ranks. Following close upon his disabling sunstroke Mr. McGuire located in Portland and found employment at teaming in the brickyards of that city. Nevertheless, he still continued to have an interest in matters military, and in 1872 distinguished himself by drawing the medal offered by the governor of the state for the best-drilled man in Oregon. In 1873 he volunteered to fight the Modock Indians, but the services of the company were not accepted owing to the governor's refusal to allow them to leave the state.

In 1874 Mr. McGuire married in Portland, Mrs. Rosana (Jones) Twohill, a native of Indiana, and whose father, William Jones, was born in Kentucky, and moved from there to Indiana, finally crossing the plains to Oregon in 1847. Mr. Jones settled on the William and Nancy (Jones) donation claim in Yamhill county, where himself and wife farmed six hundred and forty acres, and where they died at an advanced age. After his marriage Mr. McGuire settled on his wife's farm, and he subsequently bought out two of the Jones heirs, adding still more to his land until at present he owns ninety-one acres one and a half miles northwest of Newberg. This was long before the town of Newberg was founded and the McGuires have been interested spectators of its rise. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. McGuire, William is a perfect specimen of physical development, and is unusually strong; then there are Henry, James, George, Robert, and Josephine. The children are all living at home, and all are receiving the best education which it is possible for their parents to give them. Mr. McGuire is a Democrat in politics, and in religion is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

GEORGE W. KLUM. For more than half a century George W. Klum occupied a section of land in Linn county, and during that time effected a great and creditable change in property exceedingly wild and unpromising when he first took possession. Like all of the very early settlers he had obstacles to overcome ere encouragement or profit were in sight, and the timbered condition of the land necessitated years of arduous and exhausting toil. He belongs to that noble band of men who thought no labor too severe or trying to accomplish their purpose in a home-seeking time, and was one of those who took the initiative, making their start across the plains before the journey had become either usual or safe. For several years of his life he lived at Rushville, Rush county, Ind., where he was born May 8, 1825, his parents afterward removing to Illinois and from there to Louisa county, Iowa, where they lived on a farm until crossing the plains with their two sons and two daughters.

In the meantime, in the spring of 1847, George W. Klum had been united in marriage with Jane Nye, a native of Louisa county, Iowa, and soon after joined with the family in their emigration to the west, taking six months to accomplish the journey. Nothing out of the ordinary happened to this little band of courageous people, and they reached their destination in this county in fairly good health and spirits. In the fall of 1847 Mr. Klum paved the way for future success by locating on a section of wild land, to the improvement of which he at once applied himself with all of the enthusiasm and hope of his twenty-four years. His first home was in a little hewed log house of one room, but this his brave wife converted into one of comfort, making the best of her limited facilities for housekeeping. Game was abundant in those days, and the gun of Mr. Klum brought down many a deer and other game that frequented the timber. As the ground yielded of its richness, and a market appeared for the products of the settlers, advantages came to the little family, and a larger house supplanted the log one of long ago. Children were added to the cares of the mother, five sons and six daughters, and all were taught the value of industry and the benefit of upright, honorable lives. Surely, in 1902, Mr. Klum had earned the right to lessen his labors somewhat, and to leave to younger and stronger shoulders the work of harvesting and improving. At this time he moved into Sodaville, where he has since lived in a comfortable and hospitable little home, and is identified with the larger life of the community. He is widely known as an upholder of the principles of Masonry, of which noble organization he has been a member for more than fifty-five years. He was the first active sheriff of Linn county, serving as a deputy under Jason Wheeler, who was incapacitated from labor by reason of ill health. He had practically nothing when he came to Oregon in 1847, but at present he is one of the substantial men of a thrifty community.

CHARLES K. SPAULDING is one of the most prominent representatives of extensive timber interests in the Willamette valley or the state of Oregon and belongs to that class of business men who, while promoting individual prosperity, also contribute largely to the upbuilding and improvement of the localities with which they are connected. Mr. Spaulding is a native of Leavenworth, Kans., born January 28, 1865. His father, Erastus Spaulding, was born in Milford, N. H., August 14, 1832, and received rather limited educational privileges. He pursued his studies in the common schools until sixteen years of age, when he began work as a farm hand. In his youth he also learned the blacksmith's trade, which he followed for seven years in Westboro, Mass. In 1858 he sought a home in the west that he might enjoy the better business opportunities of new sections of the country, taking up his abode in Leavenworth, Kans. He was a staunch Abolitionist and as this was the period which immediately preceded the Civil war, when public feeling ran very high in Kansas, he gave the weight of his influence to the Abolition movement and fearlessly defended his honest convictions. He followed blacksmithing and also worked at the mason's trade and engaged in teaming, but during the last six years of his business career he conducted a saw-mill and met with a merited degree of success in the enterprise. Cutting a large amount of lumber, he sold this to the government at Ft. Leavenworth during war times. He never enlisted regularly in the army, but was twice drafted and on each occasion sent a substitute. He resided in the Sunflower state during the time of the raids made by Quantrell and his lawless band of bushwhackers, and relates many interesting incidents of occurrences of those times. In 1872 he determined to seek his home on the Pacific coast and made his way to San Francisco, Cal., where he joined his brother in the conduct of the Excelsior manufacturing plant. He afterward built the second fruit-dryer in the state and was engaged in business in that line in Sonoma. In connection with a partner, William Plumber, he invented what was afterward known as the Plumber dryer, and began the manufacture of that device, but because of the great failure in the fruit crop of California they removed from the Golden state to Oregon in the year 1874, locating in Portland, where they established their plant for the manufacture of fruit dryers, and the output found a ready sale upon the market. Three years passed in this way, and then Mr. Spaulding disposed of his interest in the business and purchased a farm near Pleasantdale, in Yamhill county, Ore. This comprised one hundred and thirty acres of well improved land, and on disposing of his manufacturing interests he took up his abode upon his farm, which he continued to cultivate and improve until 1896. In that year he came to Newberg, where he has since lived retired in the enjoyment of a well-earned rest, but he still retains possession of the farm, and the rental of the property brings to him a desirable income.

Erastus Spaulding was united in marriage to Elizabeth Kent, who was born in Canada and is now living with her husband in Newberg. They had three children, of whom one died in infancy, but two sons reached mature years. Frank Spaulding, the brother of our subject, however, is now deceased.

In the common schools of Portland Charles K. Spaulding pursued his education, having been brought to the Pacific coast when only about nine years of age. He continued his studies until he had gained a good knowledge to serve as the foundation upon which to rear the superstructure of a successful career. When nineteen years of age he became connected with the logging business, which he has since followed, beginning operations in that line near Dayton, Ore. He had little capital when he embarked in business, the entire sum probably amounting to about $1,000, but he possessed strong resolution and determined energy, and these stood him in stead of greater capital. The splendid forest districts of the state have made Oregon a lucrative field for logging and kindred interests and Mr. Spaulding decided to engage in this line of industrial activity. After two years he came to Newberg, Ore., continued in the same business, and in 1890 he went to Washington, where he established a sawmill, operating it for one year. At the end of that time, however, he sold his mill and returned to Newberg, where he organized the Charles K. Spaulding Logging Company, of which he is the president and in which he owns a large interest. This business was incorporated in 1897 with a paid-up capital of $30,000, and the present capital is $150,000, a fact which indicates the almost marvelous increase of the business. The company owns a sawmill in Newberg, turning out fifty thousand feet of lumber per day, and also has ten thousand acres of timberland whereon a number of crews of men are employed in getting out the timber. These number altogether one hundred and twenty-five workmen, and the property of the company also includes two large river steamboats. They handle about forty million feet of logs per year, supplying various extensive lumber manufacturing companies situated along the Willamette river. The business has reached mammoth proportions and the successful control of this important and profitable enterprise is largely the work of Mr. Spaulding. He is a man of excellent business ability, of keen sagacity, and recognizes quickly every opportunity in the line of his chosen pursuit. He is also a director in the Bank of Newberg, and aside from his timberlands he owns five hundred acres of land ten miles from Newberg, Ore., constituting a splendid ranch on which he raises grain and stock. In Newberg he owns a beautiful residence.

In Dayton, Ore., was celebrated the marriage of Charles K. Spaulding and Miss Lorah Seese, who was born in Benton, Ind., a daughter of E. Seese, who was a resident of Dayton, Ore. He came to this state at a very early day and conducted a lumber yard at McMinnville, while a portion of his time was also given to the supervision of a ranch. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Spaulding have been born four children: Walter, Beulah, Clifford and Ila. In his political affiliations Mr. Spaulding is a stalwart Republican, and for two terms he served as city councilman. To him there has come the attainment of a distinguished position in connection with the great material industries of the state, and his efforts have been so discerningly directed along well defined lines that he seems to have realized at any one point of progress the full measure of his possibilities for accomplishment at that point. A man of distinct and forceful individuality, of broad mentality and most mature judgment, he has left and is leaving his impress upon the industrial world. For years he has been an important factor in the development of the natural resources of the state, in the upbuilding and in the promotion of the enterprises which add not alone to his individual prosperity, but also advance the general welfare and prosperity of the city in which he makes his home.

JOHN A. CONSER. The family to which John A. Conser belongs was very prominent in the early days of Oregon, becoming not only a power in the agricultural world, but being represented in the first territorial legislature, and in the jurisprudence of Marion county. The founder of the family in the northwest was Jacob Conser, the father of John A., and of nine other children who grew to maturity, eight sons and two daughters. This early pioneer was born in Center county, Pa., of poor parents, who followed the old and often convenient custom of binding out their children at an early age. This was the fate of Jacob, who rebelled at his bondage, and without bidding farewell to his family or master, left his native state and by devious ways arrived in Illinois. Here he finished his trade and added to it the trade of millwright, proving that he was industrious and ambitious. In time he ran a saw-mill and otherwise engaged in business in Illinois, and in 1848, with his wife and children, made arrangements to cross the plains to Oregon. Besides household possessions with which to start a home in the far west he had a wagon with several yoke of oxen, two cows and two steers. A calamity befell him at the Platte river, where he lost his oxen in a stampede, and was obliged to complete the greater part of his journey with the two steers and two cows. Fortunately he had slight difficulty with the Indians, and his family escaped the physical disorders which made the passage of many of the emigrants so distressful. Arriving in Linn county Mr. Conser purchased another man's right near Scio, remained thereon until 1849, and then took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Jefferson, Marion county. He also bought the same amount of land, thus making a farm of six hundred and forty acres. In 1853 he started a saw-mill near Jefferson, and this proved so successful that he erected a flour and grist-mill in 1858, running the grist-mill for several years. He became prominent in politics, and was elected to the first territorial legislature, and was again elected in 1855-6. He served his county with rare good judgment, possessing those reliable and fundamentally strong traits of character of which the state had particular need at that time. In the early days he was judge of Marion county, and held many other positions of trust to which his Democratic supporters elected him. The Masonic order profited by his membership for many years, and he took many of the higher degrees. He was a man of sterling personal worth, unquestioned integrity and large capacity for industry. His farm was devoted to general farming and stock-raising, and his far-sightedness recognized the advantages of modern improvements, including good buildings, fences and implements. In 1885 he moved into Eugene to get away from the worry and responsibility of business, and in retirement his death occurred in 1894, at the age of seventy-five years. He was of a social nature, enjoying a good story or a joke, even at his own expense.

Seven years of age when he came to Oregon, John A. Conser was reared on the farm near Jefferson, and naturally became interested in his father's grist-mill, entering the same in a humble capacity, where he worked for some years. When his father moved to the farm near Jefferson he accompanied him, and has ever since resided on this fine property. In all he owns six hundred and twenty-nine acres of land, nearly all in the valley, located at Miller station, and six miles from Albany. No finer agricultural property is to be found in the county, nor has any at its head a more thoroughly practical and resourceful farmer. Prosperity, orderliness, economy, and, above all, system, are the things which most impress the visitor to this pleasant home in one of the garden spots of Oregon.

Mr. Conser was married September 27, 1874, to Miss Jane Jones, a native of Marion county, Ore., the daughter of Lewis Jones, who came to Oregon in 1852 from Tennessee. He was a farmer, following that occupation until a short time before his death, which occurred at Oakland, Ore., at about seventy-five years of age.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Conser: Lester Carl, born on the homestead in Linn county, is married to Iva Meeker, daughter of William Meeker, of Linn county, having one son, and lives on the paternal farm; and Rocky, also born on the Linn county farm.

MELVIN MARTIN EDWARDS, who is the owner of a valuable farming property in Yamhill county and has been a resident of Oregon since 1880, was born in Sangamon county, Ill., on the site of Springfield, April 29, 1832. His paternal grandfather, William Edwards, was a native of New York, whence he went to Charleston, S. C., on a trading expedition, but he lost his money in that venture and moved to North Carolina, where he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Justus. He then went to Overton county, Tenn., and afterward to Illinois, where he eventually retired from business cares. He died in the latter state in 1839 and his wife passed away in 1851. Among their children was Amos Edwards, the father of our subject, who was born in North Carolina and was but two years of age when his parents removed to Overton county, Tenn. When a young man he went to Illinois, settling on the present site of the city of Springfield. He helped survey the land and was active in pioneer development of that part of the state. When he and Abraham Lincoln were young men there was a strong friendship formed between them and they were companions in many of the sports and pleasures of youth. Mr. Edwards remained a resident of Illinois until about a month prior to his death, when he went to Iowa, passing away near Cumberland, that state, August 20, 1876. His wife bore the maiden name of Nancy Hash, and was born in Sparta, Tenn., a daughter of John Hash, who belonged to one of the old and prominent southern families who lived upon plantations and owned large numbers of slaves. At an early day Mr. Hash moved to Illinois, where he died in 1830.

Melvin Martin Edwards is the eldest of a family of five sons and two daughters, and was educated in the subscription schools, but his advantages in that direction were rather limited. In 1855 he began farming on his own account and also followed basket-making in Fulton county, Ill. In 1861 he removed to Iowa, becoming one of the pioneer settlers of Cass county, where he purchased two hundred and twenty acres of land, continuing its cultivation with success until 1880. On September 20 of that year, he arrived in Oregon and took up his abode at Dundee, renting the place which is now his home. There was no town here at that time, however, and the country all about was wild and unimproved. Mr. Edwards did not make a permanent location here, but roamed over different parts of the country for a time, and in 1901 he returned to Dundee, where he is now located. He has been engaged in railroad construction, employed in every department of the work, including that of teaming. Mr. Edwards now owns four acres of land at his present home in Dundee and he also has a stock and dairy ranch of one hundred and sixty acres at San Lake, Tillamook county. This is partially improved and returns him a good income. He also has a block of lots in the city.

On June 19, 1855, in Fulton county, Ill., Mr. Edwards wedded Miss Mary E. Bartles, who was born in that county, a daughter of Frederick Bartles, who was born in Bath, Me., and was a distiller and miller. In later years, however, he followed farming. About 1832 he sought a home in what was then the frontier of Illinois and in 1866 he went to Iowa, settling upon a tract of land which continued to be his home until his death on August 10, 1870. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Edwards have been born twelve children, of whom three died in infancy. Those still living are: Melvin J., a resident of Tillamook county, Ore.; Nancy M., the wife of A. S. Lane, of Newberg, Ore.; James William, at home; Henry Grant, who is living in Polk county; U. Schuyler, of Dundee; Roy, of Grass Valley, Ore.; John Sherman, who is serving as city marshal of Dundee; and Maude D., the wife of Roy Robertson of Dundee. One daughter, Rosa, passed away at the age of twenty-six years.

While in Iowa Mr. Edwards was a member of the state militia, and upon its organization in 1861 he became fourth sergeant, but saw little active service. In politics he has ever been a stalwart Republican and while in Iowa he served as school director, as county sheriff and as constable. He has also been school director and constable in Oregon and has ever been interested in the progress and advancement of this state during the twenty-three years of his residence here. He is now practically living a retired life at his home in Dundee.

ALBERT HERREN, the popular agent of the Portland Flouring Mills Company and Oregon Railway & Navigation Company at Independence, has been a resident of this thriving little town since 1895, and during these years has been buying wheat of the surrounding farmers to ship to Portland. He is probably as good a judge of this commodity as any man in the county, and his enormous purchases for the firm which he represents have had much to do with stimulating wheat-growing in this section. A native son of Oregon, Mr. Herren was born four miles east of Salem, Marion county, February 4, 1853, and is the third of five sons and one daughter. His father, William J. Herren, was born at Greensburg, Ind., and when a small boy removed with his parents to Missouri, from which state in 1845 he came across the plains to Oregon. It is not known that his long journey was characterized by any particular adventure or interest. He traded a horse and his labor for a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Salem. This he improved to some extent, and in 1887 located in the town of Salem, where he engaged in the warehouse business. He bought hops and wheat on an extensive scale and was thus engaged up to the time of his death in April, 1891, at the age of sixty-five years. His wife, Evelyn (Hall) Herren, who survives him, was born in Missouri, and is a daughter of James Hall, a pioneer of 1845, who died on his ranch near Butteville, Marion county.

The education of the public schools fitted Mr. Herren for a general business career, and at the age of seventeen he embarked in a stock-raising enterprise with his brother, David, in eastern Oregon. In the fall of 1876 he sold out his land and stock and located in Salem, soon after taking charge of his father's ranch in that vicinity, and until 1890 engaged extensively in the cattle business on the paternal farm. For a time he was freight agent at Salem, and in 1892 became associated as foreman with the Willamette Valley Milling Company. Following this in 1895 he engaged in his present business as agent for two well-established Portland firms. The family of Mr. Herren consists of his wife, formerly Mary E. Smith, and two children, Carl and Lela. Mrs. Herren was born on a farm near Turner, Ore., and is a daughter of Simeon Smith, who crossed the plains in 1845. Mr. Smith located on an unimproved farm near Turner, and in those early pioneer days contributed his share towards the development of his section, his death occurring in 1879. Mr. Herren is a Democrat in national politics, but aside from casting his vote has never identified himself with the political undertakings of his neighborhood. He is an excellent business man, and a public-spirited, substantial citizen.

WILLIAM EVEREST. An interestingly checkered career has been that of William Everest, born many thousand miles from the spot where he now makes his home, his father being Richard Everest, who was born in Kent county, England, March 8, 1798. In 1836 his father emigrated to the United States, coming by way of Quebec, Canada, and locating at Newark, Ohio, where he drove a dray wagon. In 1840 he removed to Washington county, Iowa, investing in land advantageously located on a small stream called Crooked creek, within one and a half mile of Washington, the county seat. Subsequently he tried his fortunes in the west, crossing the plains in 1847 to Oregon, where he took up a donation claim just east of the town of Newberg. This claim contained six hundred and forty acres, and into the improvement of it he put the strength of his years, undiminished by the wandering life he had led. Here at the age of eighty-four he passed away. The mother of William Everest was Miss Jane Cole, also of English extraction, having been born in Kent county, England, where her marriage to Richard Everest occurred. At the age of eighty-two years she died in this faraway land which, however, their efforts had made home. Twelve children were born to them, the youngest of whom was William.

This son was born in Kent county, England, August 30, 1836. His trip across the plains was made at the age of eleven years, and at thirteen he accompanied his father to California prospecting for gold, along the American river, where the gold was first discovered at Sutter's mill. When the two returned, they took back with them $3,000, the result of three months' work. Up to the time he was twenty-one years old he worked on his father's large farm, taking a quarter section of the claim and farming it. In 1861-62 he was engaged in mining in Boise Basin, Idaho, following this up with a trip to Cariboo, British Columbia, where he worked in the mines in 1863. In 1884 during the mining excitement at Cœur d'Alene, he passed three months in the vicinity, gaining from the time spent there some substantial fruits.

Since that time Mr. Everest has been industriously employed in farming on a part of the old donation claim that belonged to his father. He has made a great success of this work, taking as much interest in it as in the more exciting experiences in mine and camp, it being his boast that more camp-fires have been lighted by his hand than by that of any other man in the state. Upon his property he has built a homelike little cottage back about one hundred and fifty yards from the main road leading into Newberg. Another of his improvements has been the setting out of fifteen acres to many kinds of fruit and English walnuts, and he takes great pleasure in showing guests through this Oregon bower of plenty. The gentle wife who shares this quiet-tude was Miss Josie Acheson, whom he married in 1892, the children of this union being Marguerite Bell and Maud, both at home. In her church affiliations Mrs. Everest is of the Presbyterian faith, while her husband was christened in the Church of England. She was a native of Magnolia, Rock county, Wis., her father, Alexander Acheson, having gone with his parents from Newburgh, Orange county, N. Y., to settle in Wisconsin at an early day. In 1899 he also emigrated, going to Oregon and locating at Springbrook, where he bought a farm of twenty-five acres. This he sold and removed to Newberg, then to Tacoma, Wash., November 4, 1902, in which latter place he expects to make his home.

Mr. Everest is independent in politics, giving his vote to the man rather than the party. Among the objects of interest in Mr. Everest's possession is a copy of the tenth paper that was printed on the Pacific coast, called the Oregon City Spectator.

JOHN H. MORAN. As one who shouldered the responsibilities of life when but twelve years of age, and who by his own energy has worked his way upward to an honored place in the world, John H. Moran of Monmouth is eminently deserving of mention in a history of this character. Today he is carrying on a real estate business which grew from a small, unpretentious beginning in 1890, until he now has two offices, the office in Monmouth being a branch of the main office in Independence. Private affairs have not consumed all of the time and abilities which Mr. Moran has at his disposal, however, as will be seen by a short reference to his public life: His nomination and election to the highest office within the gift of the citizens of Monmouth shows the confidence which they placed in him as a public official, and his term as mayor, from 1892 to 1894, was characterized by honesty and fair dealing. From 1894 to 1898 he served as deputy sheriff under H. B. Plummer, and is now filling the office of district constable, to which position he was elected in 1894, and is still creditably filling the office, having been elected to the foregoing offices on the Republican ticket.

John H. Moran was born December 24, 1849, in Essex county, N. Y., whither his parents, Martin and Elizabeth (Fitzmurse) Moran, had located upon coming to the United States from Ireland, their native land, in 1846. The father was a farmer by occupation, and he lost no time in finding a suitable location for carrying on his chosen work. After a residence of six years on his New York farm he moved to northwestern Missouri in 1852, and for ten years carried on farming operations there. In 1862, with his wife and six children, he started across the plains, with Oregon as his destination, but he was not spared to realize his hopes of life in the west. When they reached the Green River, Wyo., the Cheyenne Indians attacked their train, causing havoc among the cattle which they were taking to their new home in the west. While Mr. Moran was endeavoring to regain his lost property the Indians leveled the fatal arrow that left the little party without a leader, and the date of this sad event, July 18, 1862, is one never to be forgotten by the bereaved family. He was buried on the west fork of the Green river, where stands Mt. Moran. It was with heavy hearts that the remnant of the party resumed the journey, but finally they reached their destination, and locating on a farm in Polk county, near Monmouth, engaged in farming. Mrs. Moran was familiar with life on a farm, as it was amid such surroundings that her early life had been passed on her father's farm in Ireland. She came to this country with her parents prior to her marriage, the family locating in New York state, where her father died about 1897.

As has been said, when John H. Moran was but twelve years of age he found the responsibilities of a much older person resting upon his young shoulders. The death of the father had left John as the eldest of the family to bear the great responsibility which naturally fell to him. He successfully conducted the home farm, carrying on general farming and stock-raising until, by carefully saving his earnings, he was enabled to purchase a place of his own. When twenty-one years of age he changed his occupation and surroundings, and coming to Monmouth, engaged in the real estate business in a small way, but which has steadily grown until he now manages two offices, doing an immense business in the handling of all kinds of property, a specialty being made of farm lands. Mr. Moran enjoys his prosperity alone, as he has never married; and resides in the family home on the corner of Clay and Warren streets. His interest in fraternal societies is limited to the Blue Lodge and Chapter of the Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, in which he is serving as past master. H. C. Moran, a brother of John H., resides in Salem, Ore., where he is extensively engaged in buying and selling stock.

IRA C. POWELL. The representative of a prominent pioneer family of Oregon, Ira C. Powell, cashier of the Polk County Bank at Monmouth, was born in Linn county, Ore., November 26, 1865, and is a son of Franklin

W H Davis

S. and Louise J. (Peeler) Powell, a grandson of John A. Powell, and great-grandson of Joseph Powell, the latter a soldier in the war of 1812. Of the father and grandfather extended mention will be found in the sketch of Franklin S. Powell, although it is fitting to say that the original emigration of the family to the west was due to the ambition of the grandsire, John A., one of the most earnest and forceful of the early ministers of the Christian Church in the west. A man weighing two hundred and twenty pounds, this early preacher had a brain and heart in keeping with his physical proportions, and his influence upon his time and place cannot be over-estimated. Franklin S. Powell was in the prime of a vigorous young manhood when he came across the plains with his parents in 1851. He now lives in the summer on his large farm, and in the winter in the town of Monmouth. He occupies an enviable position in the community. He is one of the chief upbuilders of the Christian College, and has contributed much time and means to making of this a fitting institution for educating the youth of the land.

Ira C. Powell is the seventh of the eight children born to his parents, of whom five sons and one daughter are living. He was educated in the public schools and at Monmouth College, from which latter institution he was graduated in 1887, with the degree of B. S. Beginning with 1890, he became cashier of the Polk County Bank, capitalized for $30,000, and which is one of the solid financial institutions of this and surrounding counties. He is the general manager of the bank, and its entire supervision is under his watchful eye. Aside from this responsibility, he is treasurer of the State Normal School of Monmouth, and is often called upon to lead in important projects for the general improvement of the town and county. A staunch Republican, Mr. Powell is very active in political affairs in the town, and served as mayor thereof during 1899 and 1900. In Monmouth in 1894 he was united in marriage with Lena Butler, a native of this town, and daughter of Douglas Butler, of California, who crossed the plains to Oregon in 1852. Two sons are the result of this union. Mr. Powell is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of which he is past noble grand, and the Dallas Encampment, and in religion is a member of the Christian Church.

WILLIAM HENRY DAVIS, M. D. Especial interest attaches to the name and work of Dr. W. H. Davis of Albany, not only because he is one of the best known and most successful practitioners of the Willamette valley, but by reason of the fact that he comes of a pioneer family distinguished on account of its numerous devotees to the science of medicine and surgery. He is a native son of Oregon, having been born in Silverton, Marion county, October 27, 1860, a son of Dr. Platt A. and Sopha (Wolf) Davis, who crossed the plains in 1852. His father practiced his profession with great success in Marion county for half a century, and at the time of his death, April 7, 1902, at the age of seventy-seven years, was probably the oldest physician in Oregon, as well as one of the most widely beloved. (See sketch of the life of Dr. Platt A. Davis, which appears elsewhere in this work.)

After receiving his elementary training in the public schools of Silverton, W. H. Davis entered Willamette University, where he continued his classical studies for one year. The year following he devoted to a course in the University of Oregon at Eugene. In 1881 he entered the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine with the class of 1883. In April of that year he began practice in Harrisburg under the guidance of his uncle, Dr. H. A. Davis, and there remained for six years. In 1889 he located in Albany, where he has since been continuously engaged in his professional labors. His work has been attended by remarkable success. It has been evident since the beginning of his career that he inherited much of the rare ability and love for the science exhibited by his father. Not content with the splendid foundation of scientific knowledge with which he was equipped upon the inauguration of his life's work, he has been a constant student, and has taken advantage of every opportunity for broadening his knowledge and developing his powers. In 1898 he took a post graduate course in the New York Post-Graduate Medical School, and is now contemplating further special work in this direction. Dr. Davis is engaged in an extensive general practice. He is chief surgeon for the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad Company, and is identified with the Oregon State Medical Society.

A Republican in politics, Dr. Davis has found the time to interest himself to a considerable extent in the local undertakings of his party, and as its candidate was elected mayor of Albany in 1899. He is now serving his second term in that office. Fraternally he is identified with St. John's Lodge No. 62, A. F. & A. M., of Albany, in which he is past master; Bailey Chapter, R. A. M., of Albany; Commandery No. 4, K. T., of Albany; and with the Knights of Pythias and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

The marriage of Dr. Davis occurred April 24,

1888, and united him with Dora Brown, a step-daughter of Dr. J. F. Hendrex, a practicing physician of Harrisburg, Linn county, Ore.

During the years of his practice in Albany, Dr. Davis has become recognized by his professional contemporaries as one of the most highly qualified and successful practitioners in the Willamette valley. He is endowed with splendid personal characteristics, with finely developed mental powers and with entirely harmonious attributes. Genial, cultured, gentle, and possessed of a disposition which prompts him to take advantage of many opportunities which appeal to the humanitarian, he is the ideal physician. In his views of public affairs he is broad and liberal, with a public spirit which arises to every occasion which makes a demand upon it. In all his relations with his fellow men he appears to be actuated by high and unselfish motives, and may always be depended upon to assist in the promotion of those enterprises which are calculated to advance the best interests of the community. His position in the esteem of the citizens of Linn county is secure. It is with pleasure that those responsible for the publication of this work make a permanent record of these facts, which for the greater part simply reflect the opinions of those who have watched his career during the years of his residence in Albany.

WILLIAM HENRY PARRISH, M. D.

Perhaps no professional calling so aptly illustrates the swift advance of science during the past quarter of a century as that of medicine, and this particular science has no abler representative among its workers than Dr. Parrish, of Monmouth, Ore. He is broad in his views, progressive in his methods, and is constantly adding to his medical knowledge by earnest, systematic study.

Of English ancestry, being the descendant of one of five brothers that emigrated from England to Canada at an early day, Dr. Parrish was born, February 22, 1848, at Cottage Grove, Chicago, Ill. His father, John Gould Parrish, was born at Farmersville, Canada West, July 1, 1805. Coming to the States in 1841, he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land at Cottage Grove, Chicago, Ill., and was there engaged in farming several years, working also as a stone mason and as a blacksmith. In 1849, seized with the gold fever, he started for California, being captain of his division of the long train then crossing the plains with ox-teams. At Council Bluffs, Iowa, hearing of the fertility of the beautiful valley of the Willamette, in Oregon, he changed his mind, deciding then to come to this state. Arriving at The Dalles October 11, 1850, he secured work as a mason being employed by Lieutenant Lindsey, agent for the government, to do the masonry on the barracks at Mill Creek, receiving $5.00 per day for his labor. Leaving there on April 15, 1851, he went, via the Barlow road, to Portland, Ore., thence to Oregon City, where he was employed in ironing the steamer Canemah, then in process of construction. The following autumn, he went to Dayton, Ore., and was there engaged in the hotel business for six months. In 1852, purchasing a section of land four and one-half miles south of Dayton, he was there employed in farming for a number of years. In 1858 he bought the Weston farm, two and one-half miles from Dayton Center, and there resided until his death, November 10, 1876. He was a Quaker in his religious belief, and a philanthropist. He married Margaret Herrington, who was born July 29, 1806, in Canada, and died, June 29, 1882, at Salem, Ore., their union being solemnized March 9, 1823, at Farmersville, Canada West. She was educated in her native town, and during the first fifteen years of her residence in Oregon practiced medicine most successfully. Of the sixteen children born of their marriage, Dr. Parrish is the only survivor.

Coming to Oregon with his parents when a small child, William H. Parrish acquired his rudimentary education in the district schools, but obtained his first knowledge of medicine from his mother, who was a homeopathist. He subsequently continued his studies with Dr. L. L. Rowland, of Salem, at the end of two years, in 1882, entering the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated in 1889, with the degree of M. D. Beginning the practice of his profession at Turner, Ore., he remained there until 1892, when he located in Salem. On March 5, 1896, the doctor came to Monmouth, where he has built up an extensive and lucrative practice, being well and widely known as a physician of skill and experience. Still aiming to perfect himself in his professional knowledge, he continued his studies in 1901, at Chicago, Ill., being graduated as an osteopathist, afterward taking a course in suggestive therapeutics at Parkers Institute, Chicago. Dr. Parrish makes a specialty of treating chronic diseases and consumption, doing a large mail order business in all parts of the Union.

While living on the home farm from the age of sixteen years until twenty-one, Dr. Parrish made use of his mechanical and inventive ability by inventing a combined header and thresher, getting out eleven patents, which he sold to L. U. Shippe & Co., of Stockton, Cal. He was nearly fourteen years in completing his inventions, and spent $31,000. The machines now in use in the northwest are based on his patents. He has taken a course of study in chemistry, mineralogy and assaying, and has given considerable time to the study of mining. He has an interest in different mines, including one at Cripple Creek, Col., one at Verde Grande, Mex., and three in the Thunder Mountain district of Idaho, being a stockholder in the Crown Gold Mining Company.

On July 26, 1874, in Polk county, Ore., Dr. Parrish married Sarah Angeline Alderman, who was born April 4, 1859, near Monmouth, Ore., a daughter of Orlando Alderman. Her father was born in Ohio, but in early manhood removed to Oregon, coming here as a pioneer in 1847, and locating in Gervais, where he carried on general farming until retiring from active pursuits. He is now a resident of Polk county. Five children were born of the union of Dr. and Mrs. Parrish, namely: Ignatius Loyola, born July 25, 1876, died October 27, 1879; Lilla Velveta, born October 7, 1878, is the wife of I. H. Van Winkle, an attorney of Salem; Lilly Daisy, born October 4, 1881, died February 18, 1893; Effie May, born February 7, 1884, died February 15, 1893; and Lady Winnifred, born March 22, 1895, is a pupil in the State Normal School, at Monmouth. Politically Dr. Parrish is a Republican, and fraternally he is a member of the I. O. O. F., and the I. O. F. A. He is a Spiritualist in belief, but attends the Friends Church, while Mrs Parrish belongs to the Christian Church.

FRANCIS A. PATTERSON a well known and highly esteemed resident of Independence, and a representative of the stock-raising and farming interests of the state, as well as a prominent factor in the political and legislative affairs of Oregon, was born November 1, 1835, in St. Clair county, Ill. His great-grandfather came from Scotland to the new world, locating in North Carolina, where his death occurred. His grandfather, Greenberry Patterson, was born in North Carolina and followed the shoemaker's trade in that state and later in Illinois, where he also carried on farming. His death occurred in St. Clair county, Ill., in 1852.

Herbert Patterson, his son, and the father of Francis A., of this review, was born in North Carolina, and with his parents moved to St. Clair county, Ill. In 1848 he conducted a general merchandise store in Freeburg, Ill., and in 1851 removed to Lebanon, where he engaged in the hotel business. In 1852 he crossed the plains with ox-teams, accompanied by his family. The journey occupied six months, starting April 1st and reaching Placerville, Cal., the last of September, 1852. At this place he entered the mines and achieved a fair degree of success. In 1858 he came to Oregon, locating in Hillsboro, Washington county, where he engaged in the general mercantile business, and there his death occurred in 1886, at the age of seventy-seven years. His wife was before her marriage Jane McClintock, a native of Kentucky, and died in Oregon at the age of eighty-three years. Her father, Joseph McClintock, was a resident of Kentucky, later of Illinois, and conducted a tannery in St. Clair county, at which place his death occurred. Unto Herbert and Jane (McClintock) Patterson were born five children, four sons and one daughter.

Francis A. Patterson was the third child in his father's family. His early education was acquired in the common schools of Illinois and in McKinley College. In 1852 he crossed the plains with his father and entered the mines of California. In 1857 he located in Benton county, Ore., and there engaged in farming. In 1861 he removed to Washington county, but returned the same year to Benton county. In 1862 he removed to Polk county, locating near Rickreall, where he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land. In 1881 he sold this farm and moved to Independence, purchasing a tract of three hundred and twenty acres of land adjoining the city, and laid out two additions known as Patterson's addition and Patterson's second addition to Independence, situated on the west side of the city. He has a farm of sixty acres two and one-half miles south of Independence, where he raises large numbers of sheep and goats. He owns a nice residence in Independence, which he has rebuilt and remodeled, making it a commodious and pleasant home, in which he is now living retired, enjoying the results of a life well spent.

Mr. Patterson was elected to the lower house of the Oregon state legislature for the terms of 1880 and 1882, and was appointed by the speaker of the house as chairman of a committee to receive President Hayes and wife, on their visit to Oregon. During this period he took an active and important part in the legislation which was enacted in the state, and his stanch support of every measure intended for the good of the people, won for him the hearty approval of his constituents. Mr. Patterson was united in marriage in Kings Valley, Benton county, Ore., in 1859, to Caroline Tatum, who was born in Missouri. Her father, Richard Tatum, a native of Tennessee, was a blacksmith by trade. He removed to Illinois and later to Cedar county, Mo. In 1853 he removed to Oregon, locating at Buena Vista, and later removed to Kings Valley, settling on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. Subsequently selling this farm he removed to Rickreall, Ore., where he died at the age of sixty-seven years, having been actively engaged in farming for many years. Unto Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Patterson have been born ten children: Isaac L., collector of customs, of Portland, Ore.; Henry R., who is acting as weigher in the appraiser's office at Portland; George S., who is engaged in mining in Sumpter, Ore.; Frank S., who is proprietor of a hotel at Fassell, Gilliam county, Ore.; William H., who is engaged in the wholesale and retail cigar and tobacco business in North Yakima, Ore.; Pink C., now with W. P. Fuller & Co., of Portland; Narcis, a clerk in a general merchandise store of Leavenworth, Wash.; Allen D., an employe of the Southern Pacific Railroad office at Portland; Dr. D. C. P., who is a clerk in a drug store at Cottage Grove, Ore.; and Maude L., who received her education in the State Normal school of Monmouth, and is now teaching in North Yakima.

Mr. Patterson is a member of the Blue Lodge and Royal Arch Chapter and De Molay Commandery No. 5, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. In politics he is an active Republican and has served as school director in most of the places where he has resided. He was the promoter of the Independence & Monmouth Railway, was its president for three years and held equal shares with the ten original stockholders. Mr. Patterson has been connected inseparably with the growth and progress of the great state of Oregon since he first took up his residence within her borders, and his efforts have resulted both advantageously to him personally and to the state.

CHARLES MATTISON. Among the many farmers of Polk county who have won rich returns from the soil through the cultivation of hops is Charles Mattison, who was born in Oswego, N. Y., June 7, 1848, the son of Isaac and the grandson of Alfred Mattison, both of the state of New York. The grandfather was a farmer who departed but once from his chosen life work, and that was in response to the call of his country in time of need, and after serving in the war of 1812 he returned to his farm, the state which gave him birth ultimately receiving his lifeless form. His son, Isaac, the father of Charles Mattison, was born in Oswego county, and in addition to his education along agricultural lines learned the trade of a cooper. In 1865 he broke away from old associations and sought a home in the state of Michigan, locating in Montcalm county, where he bought one hundred and sixty acres of land upon which he engaged in farming. After seventeen years, he again decided to make a change, since a better opportunity was held out to him from the extreme western lands. It was in 1882 that he came to Oregon, settling in Marion county, but in the vicinity of Independence, Polk county, making another purchase of one hundred and sixty acres upon which he remained for some time engaged in the cultivation of the land, later removing to Independence, where he now makes his home, having arrived at the ripe age of eighty years, and feels the pleasure of inactivity worthily earned. His wife was formerly Miss Lovina Parker, a Canadian, whose father, Charles, was a native farmer of that country, and though spending some time in New York eventually settled in Independence where his death occurred. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Mattison were as follows: Charles, of this review; William, of Astoria, Ore.; Henry, a farmer near Independence; and Richard, of Dallas.

Reared among the progressive conditions of New York state, it was the privilege of Charles Mattison to attend the public schools, thereby gaining a good foundation for the building of his future plans, while under his father's instruction he acquired a no less important education along the lines of judgment and management in the practical affairs of life. Accompanying his father's family to Michigan in 1865, he entered the lumbering camps of that state the following year where he worked for wages until 1874, at that time becoming interested in agricultural pursuits. This latter business he continued until 1880 in the same state, but with the prospect which the west afforded for an ambitious farmer, he made the trip to Oregon and here, with the exercise of his usual good judgment he selected for his purchase a farm of one hundred and forty acres, located in Marion county. Upon this farm he remained until the fall of 1902, the profits of his business being a credit to his management and industry. He has recently purchased property in Independence, where he now makes his home.

In Michigan occurred the marriage of Mr. Mattison to Miss Elnora Wilson, a native of New York, whose father had emigrated to the former state, and engaged in farming up to the time of his death. The marriage has been blessed by the birth of five children, of whom Lovina, the eldest, is now the wife of W. W. Perry, of Independence; the remaining four children, Jessie, William J., Grover and Bertha being still with their parents. Fraternal Mr. Mattison is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In his political affiliation he has departed from the faith in which he was reared, that of the Republican party, and is now independent in his views.

LAWRENCE S. PERKINS. The well equipped drug store of Lawrence S. Perkins in Monmouth pursues the even tenor of its way minus competition, for it is the only place in the town where a full line of drugs may be purchased. This advantage, however, does not influence the genial proprietor in the conduct of his business, for he has an up to date and reliable enterprise, similar to those in larger and older centers of activity. Besides a general supply of patent and general drugs he carries a stock of stationery and small notions, his thoughtful appreciation of the needs of his many patrons resulting in a continually increasing trade.

Mr. Perkins comes from farming ancestors, and he himself gained his first impressions of life from early rising and a by no means indolent life on the farm in Keokuk county, eastern Iowa, where he was born July 6, 1862. His father, Hiram P. Perkins, was born in Vermont, and from his native state removed to Ohio, locating near Mount Vernon. In 1850 he settled on a farm in Keokuk county, Iowa, and after living there for seventeen years located in Benton county, Mo., in 1867. Although possessing but a small farm of thirty acres, he did fairly well, but was not destined to long enjoy the advantages of his adopted state, for his death occurred soon after reaching there at the age of sixty-one. He had married Annise Runnels, a native of Vermont, and whose father, Samuel, was also born in the east. Samuel Runnels was an early settler of Iowa, his death occurring at the age of sixty-one on the farm in Iowa to which he came in 1853. Of the four sons born into the Perkins home all had rugged constitutions, and all were endowed with ability and progressiveness.

The youngest of his father's family, the druggist of Monmouth attended the public schools with his brothers in Iowa, Missouri and Oregon, and at the age of fourteen embarked upon a career of self-support. For some time he worked on various farms in his neighborhood, and after coming to Oregon in 1885 embarked immediately in the drug business in which he is still engaged. In Yamhill county, this state, he was united in marriage with Emma Parsons, a native of Yamhill county. Mr. Perkins is a Republican in political affiliation, and is fraternally identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. Thus is told all too briefly the life-story so far of one of the vast army of the northwest who started out in life with physical rather than financial assets, and who, from brain and muscle and common sense have worked out their career along useful and creditable lines.

ABRAM SAMUEL LOCKE is one of the most prominent druggists of Independence, and the success which he has achieved in his chosen calling is due to his determined energy and his close application to business. He is a native of Oregon, having been born two and one-half miles from Independence, August 6, 1858. His father, Harrison P. Locke, was born near Cumberland Gap, Va., October 12, 1812, and in an early day removed to Missouri, settling in Chariton county. In 1845 he crossed the plains to Oregon and afterwards was in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, on the Columbia river. In 1849 he went to California and entered the mines. In 1850 he returned to Oregon and in 1852 took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres of land. In 1881 he removed to Independence, Ore.; and there his death occurred in 1883. He was a successful business man and ever commanded the respect of all who knew him. His wife, whose maiden name was Malissa P. Hardison, was born in Springfield, Ill., and still survives her husband. They were the parents of fourteen children, eight boys and six girls, A. S. Locke of this review being the fourth in order of birth. The mother of this family is now the wife of James Masterson, who is living retired in Independence.

A. S. Locke was educated in the common schools of Independence. In 1889 he bought out a drug business in this city and in 1891 became a registered druggist. In 1892 he sold his business and removed to San Diego, Cal., on account of his wife's health. In 1894 he returned to Independence and the same year purchased a stock of groceries. On November 6, 1896, he bought a drug business and has been successfully conducting the same since. He carries a full and complete line of staple and fancy articles and the neat and attractive appearance of his store has won for him the reputation of being one of the best druggists in this city. Mr. Locke was married in Independence in 1881, to Susan Mary Alexander, who was born in Missouri and who crossed the plains with her parents in 1865. Her father, James Alexander, was born in Kentucky, and is now living retired in this city. His active years were spent in the occupation of farming, in which line of work he was very successful and became well-to-do.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Locke has been blessed with one son, Oliver Perle, aged sixteen years, who is still at home with his parents. Mr. Locke is a member of the First Baptist Church of Independence. In his political views he is a Democrat. He is a prominent member of the Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, being past master of the Blue Lodge, a member of the Royal Arch Chapter, and Oregon Consistory No. 1, of Portland Scottish Rite and Al Kader Temple N. M. S. In the Independent Order of Odd Fellows he is noble grand, and belongs to the Woodmen of the World, and to the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is now acting as school director and is president of the city council. He has an elegant two-story, ten-room residence on Fifth street which is constructed in a modern and beautiful style of architecture. Mr. Locke is a popular and public spirited gentleman who has at heart the best interests of the community in which he lives, and the high regard of his friends and associates.

OLIF NELSON. Like many of the sons of other lands who have come to settle in the Willamette valley Mr. Nelson was drawn to the far west by the hope of broader opportunities for advancement, and in this respect he has not been disappointed, but on the other hand success has attended his efforts and he is now enabled to live in retirement, enjoying to the fullest extent the competency which his years of steady application to business have made possible. As has been intimated, Mr. Nelson is of foreign birth, and was born in Dalarna, Sweden, July 27, 1829, a son of Henry and Ann Nelson, both of whom were also born in the same city. With his wife and five children, three daughters and two sons, the father emigrated to the United States in 1846, locating in Henry county, Ill., but he was not spared long to enjoy his new home, for his death followed shortly after his arrival.

At the time of the removal of the family to America Olif was a lad of eighteen years of age. It was well for him that while in his native land he made the most of the opportunities in an educational way, for on account of the death of his father it became necessary for him to turn his attention towards earning his own living, rather than seeking more extended book learning. He apprenticed himself to learn the harness-maker's trade in Lafayette, Ill., and later went to Chicago, Ill., where he found employment in a retail boot and shoe establishment on Ohio street, remaining there for ten years. Going to San Francisco in 1864 he continued to follow the retail boot and shoe business for seven years, when he again changed his location, and with this came a change of vocation also. Going to Wahkiakum county, Wash., in 1871, he took up one hundred and sixty acres of government land, to the cultivation and improvement of which he at once bent all his energy. After residing there for twenty-two years he decided to make another change of location, and the year 1893 marks his advent in Monmouth, Ore., where he hopes to spend the rest of his days. He bought a farm of ten acres one mile northeast of Independence, but three years later sold the tract and went to Chicago, Ill., to visit the scenes of his younger days, also traveling over the east and north, and among other states visited Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri. After one year of rest and travel he returned to his home in Monmouth, perfectly contented with his surroundings, and with no wish that they might be otherwise.

While a resident of Chicago, Ill., Mr. Nelson and Miss Charlotte Larson were united in marriage in July, 1848. Mrs. Nelson was a native of Sweden and came to America with her parents, locating in Chicago, Ill., where her father, Andrew Larson, was engaged in the manufacture of soda. Both mother and father died in Chicago. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Nelson, George, who is interested in salmon fishing in Astoria, Ore., and Ella, a graduate of the state normal school, who is at home with her father, dutifully caring for his comfort in his declining years. Politically Mr. Nelson is independent, and fraternally is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

WILLIAM R. JONES was born near Gaston, Yamhill county, September 5, 1849. His family, therefore, antedates those of the gold-seekers of 1849, and was established here in 1847 by Fielding Jones, his father, who was born in the state of Kentucky. The elder Jones married, in Indiana, Elizabeth Freack, and of this union there have been born three children, two older than William R., Susan, deceased, and Mary, the wife of James Cooley, of Marion county, Ore. In 1847 Mr. Jones outfitted and with his wife and two children, crossed the plains, experiencing on the way many of the dangers and deprivations of that early mode of travel, and finding in the new country very many discouragements before settling down to a successful agricultural life. With the advent of the son William, in 1849, the home became one of desolation and grief, for three days after his birth the devoted mother died, and the father was left alone with his children in the strange northern country. He went to California and engaged in placer mining with varied success. He later came back to Oregon and began farming, to which occupation he devoted his later years, on property one mile south of Hubbard. He died July 30, 1903, aged eighty-six years.

The little motherless William was taken to the home of Andrew Schuck, in the neighborhood, and at the age of four years went to live with his father, who, in the meantime, had married again, this time to Martha Killin. At the age of fourteen he went to live with his brother-in-law, James Cooley, and in February, 1865, enlisted in Company B, First Oregon Volunteer Infantry, for a year's service. From Vancouver, Wash., he was sent to Camp Lyons, it being the mission of his regiment to establish a fort at that place. During the service he saw a great deal of Indian warfare, and had many narrow escapes, his adventures being confined principally to the battles of eastern Oregon. He was wounded July 9, 1865, in a battle on the forks of the Malheur. After his military experiences he returned to Marion county and worked in a saw-mill for about four months, and November 8, 1874, married Susan A. Cooley, daughter of Christopher C. Cooley, a native of Christian county, Ky., who was born August 6, 1809, and died November 14, 1885, and his wife, who was born in Tennessee, March 20, 1811, and died August 21, 1880. The parents of Mr. Cooley moved from Kentucky to Howard county, Mo., in 1812, and there remained until taking up their residence in Clay county, of the same state, in 1824. He entered unimproved land in both counties of Missouri, and while improving it participated in the struggles with the Mormons and Indians, which characterized those early days. In 1845, with his wife and six children, he crossed the plains to Oregon in a party led by Joe Meeks, which party was the first to try the "Meeks' cut," which at first proved not much of a saving of time or energy. The little band was lost for some time, and only after extreme hardship and deprivation arrived at The Dalles. Here more trouble confronted them, and the women and children were sent down the river in the canoes of the Indians, while the men went over the mountains with the cattle. Arriving in the Willamette valley in the fall of 1845, Mr. Cooley took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres on the French prairie, and there spent his remaining years. Of the eight children born to Mr. Cooley and wife, James H. was born in 1835, died in 1837; Robert F. lives near Woodburn on a portion of the old home place; Martha L., born February 22, 1839, died November 17, 1902, was the wife of F. S. Mattison, of Turner, Ore.; Helen M., born February 1, 1841, is the wife of Judge W. C. Hubbard; Mary I., born October 15, 1844, now deceased, was married to Andrew Melvin, of Woodburn; Andrew J., born February 20, 1848, is a resident of Portland; Susan A., born July 13, 1851, is the wife of the subject of this article; Julia A., born July 20, 1853, and is the wife of John Uetz, of Ashland.

After his marriage Mr. Jones located on a farm on the French prairie, and after four years removed to Clackamas county, where he lived for six years. In 1898 he purchased the farm where he now lives, and which consists of ninety-seven acres, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Two children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Roy A., born September 4, 1875, is living in Marion county, is married and has one daughter, Lola May; and Clarence, born February 20, 1878, is living with his parents. Mr. Jones is a Republican in politics, and has taken an active part in political affairs in his county. As a staunch advocate of education he has materially advanced the cause as a member of the school board, and he has also served acceptably as road supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of the Silverton Lodge, Knights of Pythias. Mr. Jones enjoys an enviable reputation in his neighborhood, his integrity, public-spiritedness and general worth appealing to the consideration and esteem of hosts of friends and well wishers.

DAVID JOHNSTON. Among the remaining pioneers representing the very early days of Oregon is David Johnston, who, though crippled and aged, has still not come to useless days.

The father of David Johnston, John, was also the son of a pioneer, his birth occurring in the western part of Tennessee before the eighteenth century had drawn to a close. He was raised to the life of a farmer, but on attaining manhood he decided to return to the eastern states to gain his livelihood, and acting upon that idea he settled in Orange county, N. C., where he spent the remaining years of his life. His death occurred there at the age of eighty-four years. He married Nancy Roach, a native of North Carolina, and she, too, departed this life at the age of eighty-four years, and in the same location as her husband. Of the thirteen children born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnston, eight sons and five daughters, David Johnston was the third, his birth occurring in Orange county, N. C., December 12, 1815. Following in the steps of his father, he became a farmer after his education in the common schools of North Carolina was completed, at twenty-one engaging in the work for himself in his native state, but in 1837 removing to the state of his father's birth, settling near Nashville, Tenn. In 1844 Mr. Johnston decided upon making another change, and gathering his worldly goods together he started for Oregon, driving the slow-plodding, patient oxen across the wide plains and many hills that lay between him and the promising coast country. The trip was a rare one for that time, having no horrors of famine or marauding Indians to mar the enjoyment of the scenery and the exhilarating mountain air. After six months of travel the party arrived in Polk county, Ore., and Mr. Johnston took advantage of the liberal offer of the government and settled upon a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. The many years that have passed since that time have witnessed great changes, the wild land being successfully converted into a valuable and fruitful farm. Mr. Johnston has since sought a home in Independence, purchasing a residence five miles south of Independence, Ore., in which to pass the evening of his life, while the large farm is leased and managed by his grandson, Fred Hooper.

With Mr. Johnston on the trip across the continent came his devoted wife, whom he married in Orange county, N. C. She was formerly Arrominto Thorp, a native of Kentucky. Mrs. Johnston's death occurred in the western home. She was the mother of three children, of whom Richard is a sheep rancher at Colfax, Wash.; Angeline makes her home in Colfax, Wash., the widow of William Tetherow; and William is now deceased. Mr. Johnston was married again to Loretta Webb, who bore him one child: Anne, who married Frank Hooper. She died in Independence.

Mr. Johnston is a member of the Christian Church. Politically he follows his father's early training and casts his ballot with the Democratic party, his father having been a life-long Democrat.

MARTIN V. KOONTZ. Prominent among the captains of industry who have helped to place Linn county upon its present substantial footing is Martin V. Koontz, owner and manager of a paying general merchandise store in Halsey, established in 1876. During the intervening years no man in the town has taken a keener or more practical interest in its upbuilding, especially as regards municipal government, he having assisted in framing the ordinances, and in protecting them as treasurer of the town for twelve years.

The rise of Mr. Koontz from comparative poverty to his present position should furnish encouragement to younger men who possess in any measure the characteristics and abilities which have been his stock in trade. Born in Gallia county, Ohio, May 29, 1837, he comes of an old Virginia family, established in Ohio by his paternal grandfather, Martin, a native of the Old Dominion state. The grandfather was a general contractor and bridge-builder in the very early days of Gallia county, and followed his occupation until the loss of a leg compelled retirement from active life. He removed to Iowa in 1843, and to Oregon in 1852, finally locating in Vancouver, Wash., where he died in the spring of 1853, at the age of seventy years. His son, John, the father of Martin V., was born in Gallia county, and was trained for the medical profession, which he practiced for some years. His removal to Wapello county, Iowa, in 1841, placed him among the very first settlers of that region, and he practiced medicine and farmed there until his death in 1850 at the age of forty-one years. His wife, formerly Elizabeth Wood, was born in Virginia, and shortly after the death of her husband crossed the plains to Oregon, locating on a claim of one hundred and sixty acres in Linn county. Her second husband was J. B. Stinson, who crossed the plains in the early days and died in Polk county. She was the mother of five children, three sons and two daughters. Her death occurred at the home of her daughter in Harrisburg.

The oldest in his father's family, Martin V. Koontz was obliged to leave school at the age of twelve, and devote himself entirely to farm work. At the age of fifteen he accompanied his mother across the plains. What might otherwise have been a pleasant journey was marred by the depredations of the Indians, who encircled their camp one night on the banks of the Platte river and took away six of their seven horses. For the rest of the way to Oregon Martin was obliged to walk, and it was a weary youth that finally reached his destination in Vancouver, Wash. He attended the Santiam Academy for a period of six months, finally qualifying as a teacher. For nine months he taught the little country school, and in 1858 removed to eastern Oregon and engaged in logging near The Dalles, for J. H. Mosier. In 1859 he took up farming, and in 1860 went to the mining district on the Frazer river, returning to his farm and remaining there until 1865. He then went to west Montana and engaged in a general merchandise business and trading with the Indians and travelers during 1867-8, freighting from Umatilla to Silver City, Idaho.

In 1869 Mr. Koontz came to Linn county, via San Francisco, locating in Halsey, where in 1871 he began as a clerk for Jacob Thompson, a general merchant. In 1876 he started his present mercantile business, and now carries a stock valued at $15,000. In addition, he buys and sells large quantities of grain, and for storing the same pending its sale he has two large warehouses in the town. Mr. Koontz married in Halsey, Mary Conkwright, who was born in the state of Michigan, and is the mother of two children, Clyde H., in his father's store; and Edith, living with her parents. Mr. Koontz is energetic and progressive, and as a merchant, city treasurer, and politician, has won the confidence of the community for which he has painstakingly labored for many years. Few advancements have been suggested or carried to a successful finish which have not received his hearty support, and in many instances he has taken the initiative, and inspired in others an enthusiasm equal to his own.

THOMAS SCOTT. Scott's Mills, named for their promoters, Robert Hall and Thomas Scott, are familiar to the residents of Marion county, and constitute a landmark of importance. Built by Robert H. Scott about 1866, the mills were jointly conducted by the brothers until 1892, when Thomas Scott became the sole owner, and has since had their entire management. The most modern machinery forms the equipment of the mills, the capacity of which is sixty barrels per day, the entire wheat crop of the district being used in the consumption. At one time the brothers were very extensively identified with lumbering, and for carrying on their business owned two thousand acres of timber land. Both became prominent in the general affairs of their neighborhood, and were accounted among the most substantial and reliable of its upbuilders.

Of sturdy Scotch ancestry, the brothers were natives of Bamff's Mills, Roxburyshire, Scotland, Thomas Scott being born December 8, 1840. He was the son of John Scott, the remainder of whose family consisted of Robert H. Adam, a resident of Manitoba; John, located in upper Canada; James, deceased, as a soldier in the English army for twenty-one years having served in the Crimean war and Indian mutiny; Jane, a resident of Scotland; and Betsy, now Mrs. Marshall, also of Scotland. These children profited by educational opportunities as their circumstances permitted. Thomas Scott was educated in the public schools, and in his youth saw a great deal of milling in his native land. At the age of fifteen he started out to make his own living, serving an apprenticeship of three years in a grist mill, receiving in return for long hours and hard work about $30 for the first year. An unfortunate accident in the mills resulted in enforced inactivity for a year or so, but after recovering he went to work with renewed energy, following his trade until coming to America in 1866. He at once became identified with the mills erected here by his brother, and which at the present time are among the modern and well equipped grist mills of the valley. Mr. Scott has a fine and paying business, and while catering to an extensive and permanent trade has made hosts of friends, and laid by a competency for himself. He is a self-educated and self-made man, his success the result of his own efforts, and in the pursuit of his labors he has won the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens. In political affiliation he is a Democrat, and though never desirous of official recognition he has several times been elected to office, serving as postmaster for about eight years, justice of the peace, and is at present acting as notary public. In all matters of public enterprise he has been a prominent factor and liberal contributor. Mr. Scott is alone in the enjoyment of his prosperity, for he has never married.

PHILIP M. KIRKLAND. One of the honored pioneer families of Oregon has a capable and typical representative in Philip M. Kirkland, a progressive business man of Independence, engaged in managing his drug store, and in the extensive buying and selling of hops. His father, J. W. Kirkland, of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this work, set his children an example of fortitude and industry which is not only appreciated but emulated. The son was born in Monroe county, Mo., May 6, 1854, the third in a family of four sons. He was ten years of age when he crossed the plains with his parents, and from 1864 to 1869 lived with the family in Helena, Mont. After removing to Oregon in 1869 he lived on the paternal farm, and in 1879 removed to eastern Oregon, where he engaged extensively in the stock and grain business, purchasing land from time to time till he became the owner of one thousand one hundred acres. He also was interested in a drug enterprise at Athena, Umatilla county, Ore., for four years.

Mr. Kirkland came to Independence and bought the brick building in which his drug store is now located, and, profiting by his former experience, and utilizing his best knowledge as to the requirements along his line, fitted out as fine a store as may be found in Polk county, and which is the largest of its kind in the county. The great hop industry centering around Independence has furnished an opportunity for Mr. Kirkland, and he has entered heartily into the promotion of this important enterprise. Last year he handled about ten thousand bales of the product at an average price of twenty-five cents per pound.

In Independence Mr. Kirkland owns a modern cottage fitted with up-to-date conveniences. In 1882 he married Emma J. Turner, who was born in Illinois, and who died in Independence in 1901 at the age of forty-four years. Mrs. Kirkland was a daughter of Samuel Turner, a native of Maine, and who in early life removed to Illinois. From there he came to Montana, in 1869, and locating in eastern Oregon in 1878, where he engaged in farming, his death occurring in 1901, at the age of eighty-five years. Mrs. Kirkland left to the care of her husband one son, Frank M., who is living at home. Mr. Kirkland is a Democrat in politics, although he entertains very liberal ideas on political questions, believing in voting for the man best qualified to serve the community interests. He is fraternally connected with Lyon Lodge No. 29, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, of which he is past master, the Independence Chapter Royal Arch Masons and worthy patron of the order of the Eastern Star; also the Woodmen of the World. Mr. Kirkland has the esteem of all who are associated with him in whatsoever capacity, and his many virtues are generally acknowledged.

ALBERT I. CRANDALL. One of the younger generation of successful business men of Lebanon is Albert I. Crandall, for several years identified with building interests there, and since 1900 the owner and manager of the Lebanon planing mill. He comes of a family well represented in the business of that town, for his father, John N. Crandall, has been engaged in building and contracting there since 1891. John Crandall was born in Ohio, September 13, 1836, and when quite young removed to Van Buren county, Iowa, where he worked at his trade of carpentering, and also managed his farm. In Iowa he married Charlotte Jane Brown, a native of Iowa. They resided on their farm until 1877, when they removed to Smith Center, Kans. This continued to be their home until 1891, the father in the meantime working at his trade with considerable success. He has succeeded well in Lebanon, and some of the finest work in his line in the town has been done by him. At present Mr. Crandall is sixty-six years old, while his wife is two years his junior. Their married life has been harmonious and happy, and their children have proved a credit to the practical training and wholesome occupations to which they were reared.

Albert I. Crandall was born in Van Buren county, Iowa, October 19, 1868, and was educated in the public schools. As a small boy he learned a great deal about tools and woodwork. Working constantly with his father, he became a practical builder, and at the age of twenty-three, when he came to Oregon, settled down to active work at his trade. Working with his father and brother Lewis until 1900, he purchased the Lebanon planing mill, which is turning out large quantities of general building materials. April 12, 1899, Mr. Crandall married Nettie Amos, a native of Oregon, of which union there has been born a daughter, Hilda A.

lican party, in the ranks of which he has held numerous offices. He is a member of the county central committee, and has served as deputy county recorder and assessor. The spirit of fair play and personal integrity which this rising young politician brings to the interests of his party, pre-supposes a continuation of his popularity. Add to this his standing as a business man, and his adopted town has cause to regard as fortunate the association of himself and family with the city of Lebanon.

MARION PALMER. The son of an early settler in Oregon, Marion Palmer was born April 1, 1855, upon his father's donation claim, known at that time as Lone Butte Hill, the land comprising it being that west of which the town of Mt. Angel now stands. The college of Mt. Angel stands near the spot where he first saw the light. His father, John Henry Palmer, was born November 2, 1818, in the state of Kentucky, but removed early with his parents to Lincoln county, Mo., and the years of his early manhood were principally spent in the latter state. After his school days were over he learned the blacksmith's trade, which he carried on in conjunction with his farming, remaining at home with his parents until his marriage with Catherine Graves, a native of Virginia. In 1853 he brought his family to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox-teams and being about six months on the journey. On reaching their destination, he bought a squatter's right to a donation claim located in Marion county, four and one-half miles north of Silverton, this being the scene of the birth of Marion Palmer of this review.

Mr. Palmer at once began to put improvements on the place, which at that time was principally wild land, but with the touch of civilization soon blossomed into the beautiful country that now delights the eye of the traveler. Though necessarily much engrossed with his farming, Mr. Palmer still found time to respond to the demand made upon him by his Democratic brethren, serving for several years as justice of the peace and in other local offices. He was a liberal contributor toward all church movements, though not a member. He died in 1894 in his seventy-seventh year, his widow still surviving him, making her home in Lebanon, Linn county, where she removed soon after her husband's death. Twelve children were born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Palmer, being named in the order of their birth as follows: George W., of Washington; Nixon, who was killed in South Africa by the natives while prospecting for gold; Lucy J., widow of Frank Mad-dock of Washington; Clarissa, deceased;

Henry, L., of Washington; Marion, of this review; Brunette, the wife of Monroe Cleaver, of Lebanon, Ore.; Martha, deceased; Thomas, located in the vicinity of the old home; Edwin, of Portland; Herbert, deceased; and Constantine B., of Kansas.

Marion Palmer received his education in the district schools of Oregon, engaging with his father in farming until his marriage March 5, 1874, with Miss Josephine Porter, a native of Marion county, and a daughter of Stephen Porter. Mr. Porter was born in Illinois, removed with his parents to Missouri in young manhood and in 1848 brought his family with him to Oregon. They located on a donation claim which now forms part of the site of the village of Stayton. Ten years later he removed to the farm now occupied by Marion Palmer, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died in 1890. His widow still survives him at the age of eighty-eight years. Mr. Porter was a staunch Republican, and served many years as justice of the peace.

Mr. and Mrs. Palmer took up their married life near the old home, where they remained for about six years, removing at the end of that period to eastern Oregon. In a short time they returned to Marion county, too firmly attached to the home of their childhood to care to go far away to make another. They are now settled upon a farm two and a half miles northwest of Silverton, containing two hundred and sixty-three acres. One hundred and fifty acres are under cultivation, twenty-seven acres of which are devoted to hops. Mr. Palmer is also interested in the raising of stock, and particularly Short-horn cattle, the latter having been a source of considerable profit. The appearance of the farm is greatly enhanced by the excellent buildings which Mr. Palmer has added to it since he took possession. The home has been enriched by the birth of four children, of whom Stephen Ernest is located in the vicinity, the three daughters, Susan Pearl, Clarissa Lillian and Winona Marion, being still at home with their parents. Like his father, Mr. Palmer has taken a strong interest in the events of the day, and being a staunch Democrat he has held several positions through this influence—clerk of the school district, constable, and other offices. He is associated fraternally with the Woodmen of the World.

ROBERT ANDERSON RAMPY. An interesting and successful career has been that of Robert Anderson Rampy, who now makes his home in Harrisburg, Linn county, where most of his active life has been passed, and to whom much of the commercial activity of the city is due. Through failing health Mr. Rampy has several times withdrawn from active business, but the consciousness of his own ability, the strength of purpose which has animated his entire life has invariably brought him back to add to his success and prestige before retiring permanently. Faithfulness has been the watchword and motto of Mr. Rampy, not only in business but in all the avenues of life, preserving the friendships of youth as carefully as his business interests are guarded. A splendid illustration of this is embodied in his journey into the northwest. He was commissioned to drive a wagon for A. J. Wigle, a friend of his boyhood days, and who is now located on a farm eight miles northeast of this city, and from the home of Mr. Wigle's father he drove the team until he brought them to the home of the latter's uncle in Oregon City, their friendship having withstood the strains of those strenuous times and lasting even to this day.

Mr. Rampy was not forced to come west to better himself financially, as he was the son of a successful man of the middle west. His father, Phillip Nicholas Rampy, a native of South Carolina, came in 1824 to Illinois, being then twenty-one years old, his own pluck and energy representing the capital from which he hoped to make a fortune before he should be called upon to lay down the burdens of life. He located first at Kaskaskia, thence removed to Carlton, De Kalb county, in 1828, in the first location serving in the employ of the state land office and in the latter engaging in the general merchandise business. Mr. Rampy also enjoyed much prominence in public life, being an old-line whig and a politician of more than ordinary ability, having improved his native talents through wide and well-directed reading, his education having been entirely acquired through his own efforts. He served one term each as clerk and recorder of the county, and for eight years was postmaster of Carlton. In 1841 he removed to Payson, Adams county, Ill., where he continued his merchandise interests, and in 1849 he became a resident of Liberty, where he taught school for one term, after which he practically retired. He had left behind him, in each place where he had made his home, a record for his shrewd business judgment and the practical manner in which he handled his affairs. He had acquired a splendid business education and was an expert accountant. His death occurred in Carlton at the age of sixty-four years. He married Mary Catherine Davis, also a native of South Carolina, and a distant relative of Jefferson Davis, and her death occurred in 1840, in the same location where her husband later died.

Of the three sons and one daughter born to his parents, Robert Anderson Rampy was the third child, and was born in Carlton, Ill., July 22, 1832, receiving his education almost entirely in the common schools of his native state. When twenty years old Mr. Rampy felt impelled to try his fortunes among the changing scenes of the west, and accordingly he joined a train bound for Oregon, starting in April, 1852, driving the wagon of his friend, A. J. Wigle. There were about sixteen wagons in the train and about seventy-five people, and during the trip over the old Oregon trail, via the Platte river, four were taken ill and died with the cholera, which was so prevalent that year, but Mr. Rampy came through safely, September 22 finding him in Oregon City. He first found employment in a logging camp, hauling to the old sawmill on the Clackamas river, and undergoing many hardships and privations, exposure implanting the seeds of disease which resulted shortly in a siege of illness. For several years Mr. Rampy traveled up and down the Pacific coast, the spirit of adventure fed with the excitement and oftentime peril of those journeys. In 1855 he decided to locate permanently, then taking up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres five miles east of Harrisburg, Linn county, upon which he spent the ensuing three years. In 1858 he removed to the city and engaged in business, at which he continued intermittently for ten years, spending the principal part of the summers in the mines. After the year 1863 he quit the mines entirely and devoted his time to his other business interests, remaining so engaged until 1870. The next year found him a student in the Portland Business College, where he took a course best calculated to aid him in his ambitions, and when he graduated he returned to Harrisburg and became the owner of a drug store which he conducted profitably for several years. A part of that time he was also engaged in handling grain. In 1881 he met with what to many business men would have meant financial ruin in the loss of this business by fire, but undismayed by such misfortune he again embarked in the business. In 1882 he was forced to put business aside and seek a renewal of health in the eastern states, traveling through New York and Pennsylvania in his efforts to recover from the effects of nervous prostration, which made a total blank of six years of his life. In 1888, however, he was so far recovered as to return to his chosen field of operations, and here he then established the Harrisburg Bank, in the handsome brick building which he had erected on the corner of Second and Smith streets in 1887. From January 18, 1888, he conducted the bank until 1892, when he was once more forced to retire on account of ill health. Again opening the bank in 1898, he closed up the business finally July 1, 1901. Having withdrawn from business interests, Mr. Rampy now spends his time looking after his stock raised upon his farm of one hundred and sixty acres three miles northeast of this city. In addition to this property he also owns ten town lots and his residence, which occupies three lots.

Mr. Rampy was married in Lane county, Ore., in 1866, to Miss Sarah E. Johnson, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1853 and located in that county. Of the five children born to them Cecil Orilda is the only one now living, the others being as follows: Phillip Nicholas; Robert Franklin; Walter Millard and Clyde Rockwell, the third son, especially, having made for himself in the brief eighteen years of his life a record of manliness and Christian living which has never been forgotten in his birthplace, Harrisburg, where his death occurred January 18, 1893. Mr. Rampy is a staunch Republican in politics, and has served in various offices, among them being city treasurer for two terms and as a member of the city council many times. Not only anxious to build up for himself a successful and substantial position among the scenes of his adopted state, but with his best efforts directed toward the betterment of the general conditions of the community, Mr. Rampy has exercised no little influence along these lines. As a patriot he enlisted in the Rogue river war in 1855, serving three months as a private, and the summer following acting as steward in the quartermaster's department of the carpenter's mess in the building of the government barracks.

JAMES L. ARNOLD. By far the larger number of the residents of the west have come here from the eastern states, and from foreign countries as well, but in Mr. Arnold we find a native son of the west, his birth occurring in Linn county, near Brownsville, April 2, 1857. His parents, Isaac and Precelia Arnold, were natives of the middle west, coming from Ohio and Illinois respectively. Prior to their removal to Oregon they had resided in Iowa, but in 1852, with ox-teams and wagons, they began the six-months journey which was to bring them to Oregon, where greater opportunities awaited them. Purchasing a farm near Brownsville, the parents made this their home for about seven years, or until their son was about two years old, when they removed to a farm adjacent to the village of Scio.

James L. Arnold passed his boyhood and youth upon his father's farm, and attended the district school during the short term when it was in session. His marriage, January 6, 1881, united him with Nancy D. Miller, and for two years they made their home on rented land near Scio. At the end of that time he felt himself in a position to purchase a farm, and invested in a tract of one hundred and thirty-one acres located two and one-half miles west of the village of Scio. By careful management Mr. Arnold was enabled from time to time to extend the limits of his farm by the purchase of adjoining land, and he now has three hundred and thirty acres all in one body and well located. His efforts in the line of improvements have not been without results, as one who is familiar with its appearance at the time he assumed control can see at a glance. In addition to general farming and stock-raising Mr. Arnold finds considerable profit in the dairy business. Besides the farm upon which he resides Mr. Arnold also owns sixty-six acres of his father's old home place four miles east of Scio.

Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Arnold, to whom they have given the names of Marion I. C. and Ethel L. G. Private affairs have not consumed all of Mr. Arnold's time and thought, for as road supervisor and as a member of the school board he has given his services for a number of years. He united with the Baptist Church June 24, 1875, at Providence, and later united with Scio Baptist Church, was elected church deacon by that body and served as such, and as superintendent of the Sunday school he wielded an influence which was far-reaching in its scope, his fitness for the office and his tact in handling children, to say nothing of his love for doing good, making this success inevitable. Politically he gives his vote to the Republican candidates. In his business dealings Mr. Arnold has been very successful, the just reward of upright dealing and faithfulness to duty, and his popularity among his fellow-citizens is of a deep and lasting nature.

ELIZABETH GOAN. The business enterprises of Lebanon are by no means confined exclusively to the control of men, for there, as elsewhere in the northwest, women have either adopted a practical means of livelihood, or with rare tact and adaptability have stepped into vacancies not originally intended for them. Such a one is Mrs. Elizabeth Goan, who, since the death of her husband, August 8, 1895, has conducted a large and paying undertaking enterprise. The early life of Mrs. Goan was passed near Martinsburg, Pa., where her birth occurred December 11, 1842. Formerly Elizabeth Gibson, her family was established in Pennsylvania by her paternal grandfather, Hugh Gibson, who was born in Ohio, and with six of his brothers settled in the Quaker state at a very early day. His son, John H., the father of Mrs. Goan, was born on the paternal farm near Martinsburg, April 24, 1816, and in early life learned the carpenter's trade, to which he devoted several years of his life. He married Sarah Rogers, who traced her ancestry to Scotland, but who was born in the north of Ireland, whither had settled her father in the days of religious persecution. She came to America with her father, Andrew, who was a stanch Presbyterian, as have been the members of the family since earliest recollection. After his marriage Mr. Gibson gave up his trade and settled on a farm in Pennsylvania, where unexpected good fortune came to him in the shape of the discovery of oil wells on his land, which he developed with large profit, and became a man of means and influence. He died in 1883, firm in the faith of the Presbyterian Church, in which he had been an active worker, and had for years filled the position of Sunday school superintendent. He was a man of pronounced characteristics, very determined in his manner, and not easily swerved from his point of view. Nine children were reared in a rigorous moral, mental and industrial atmosphere, of whom Mrs. Goan is the third.

With her brothers and sisters Mrs. Goan attended the public schools in Pennsylvania, and after completing her education continued to live at home. A son of the family having removed to Oregon and located on a farm near Lebanon, she and a sister joined him in the spring of 1884, and the same year occurred her marriage with Emanuel Goan, a neighbor of the Gibson family in Pennsylvania, and an old schoolmate of the children. Mr. Goan was born in Armstrong county, Pa., June 8, 1836. Being left practically alone in the world at an early age, he apprenticed to a carpenter after the death of his mother, and devoted his entire life to work of which his trade was the foundation. In 1857 he located on a farm near Oakland, Cal., where he became an extensive wheat raiser. In 1878 Mr. Goan came to Oregon, and after a season of farming near La Comb, on the Farren Ridge, took up his residence in Lebanon, and started an undertaking establishment. This was the beginning of a successful business career, and in his undertaking business he found his knowledge of cabinet-making all-important. He also manufactured furniture, and in time branched out even further and became interested in a hardware business. The success of these three enterprises encouraged him to try yet another western enterprise, and he built and operated a planing mill at Lebanon with satisfactory results. From time to time he invested his earnings in real estate, and he became active in social and other undertakings in the community. He had the traits of character which command attention and win respect, and at the time of his death, August 8, 1895, the general verdict was that a loyal citizen and high-minded pioneer had passed to his rest, leaving behind him a record of which any man might be proud. He was a Republican in politics, and a member of the United Brethren Church.

Mrs. Goan has one daughter, Viola Dale, who is at present taking the English course at the Albany College. The mother is ambitious for her daughter's future, and it is her intention to supply every advantage suggested by her talents and capacity for advancement. Notwithstanding her arduous responsibilities, Mrs. Goan finds time to enjoy society in a general way, and takes a keen interest in the Presbyterian Church, contributing generously towards its charities and general support.

JOHN EDWARD DRUCKS. A prominent mill owner of Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., is John Edward Drucks, who located in that city September 6, 1899, and became the proprietor of his present property, which he has since overhauled, putting in new and modern machinery, and now, with water as the motive power, he turns out one hundred barrels of flour per day. He has a large trade, California especially receiving much of his product. He also owns a large warehouse and buys all the grain which comes into the city.

The father of John E. Drucks, Frank Drucks, was born in Austria, November 2, 1822, came to the United States in 1856, locating with his family at Manitowoc, Wis., where he followed his trade of cooper for one year and a half, after which he removed to a farm which he had purchased there. In 1876 he came west, passing through Oregon and settling five miles east of Vancouver, Wash., where he bought Hexter's flour mill, a remainder of the old Hudson Bay possessions. For five years he conducted this business with considerable profit, after which he located in Portland and engaged in the grocery business until 1902. In that year he retired from the active cares of life, and coming to Lebanon, he now makes his home with his son, a sturdy product of a sturdy age and nation. Mr. Drucks married Rosa Wartz, a native of the location in which he first saw the light of day. She died on the farm near Vancouver in 1887, at the age of fifty-six years.

Of the eleven children, nine sons and two daughters, born to his parents, of whom five are now living, John Edward Drucks is the fourth. He was born in Manitowoc, Wis., October 24, 1857, and received his education in the common schools of his native state. He was nineteen years of age when his parents settled in Oregon, and he soon took charge of his father's mill in Washington. In 1879 he assumed the same position in the Star Mills of McMinnville, Ore., where he remained until 1884. In that year he entered the flour business in Sheridan, Ore., where he bought a mill, and in 1885 he located for a short time in Portland. He then carried his milling interests into Washington, there becoming the owner of a mill at La Camas, which he conducted for two years. At the expiration of this period he located in San Francisco, Cal., there assuming charge of a flour mill until 1888, when he returned to Oregon and purchased a half interest in a hotel at Medford. The next year he leased the property and removed to Portland, where he engaged in the real estate and brokerage business. In 1894 he returned to California and spent one year in Los Angeles, after which he again located in Portland and continued his former occupation until his return to the milling business at Lebanon in 1899.

The marriage of Mr. Drucks occurred in McMinnville, Ore., in 1881, Anna Sax, a native of Portland, becoming his wife. Of the three children born to them, two of whom are living, Edward S., who was born in McMinnville in 1883, is studying medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in San Francisco; Lenora, also born in that city, makes her home with her parents; Zeda, who was born in Medford, Ore., in 1888, died at Vancouver, Wash., at the age of three years and four months. Mr. Drucks has become the owner of a fine residence in Lebanon, in addition to which he owns ninety-four and a half acres of land near Troutdale, and sixteen acres near Portland. In his fraternal relations Mr. Drucks is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, and politically is a Republican. He is at present serving as city councilman, having always taken an active and intelligent interest in municipal affairs. He belongs to the Roman Catholic Church.

ALPHEUS MILLER WILSON. Interested in both industrial and municipal affairs of the city Alpheus Miller Wilson holds a prominent place in Lebanon, Linn county, adding to the importance of the former through his connection with one of the leading livery stables, and in the service of the latter acting as mayor of the city. A staunch Republican, he has been chosen to fill his present office for a term of two years. His anxiety to make his administration one of prosperity to all has won for him many friends even among his political opponents.

Alpheus Miller Wilson was born near Burlington, Iowa, October 10, 1849, the son of George Washington and Mary Ann (Moore) Wilson, the former born in Virginia and the latter in Pennsylvania, the daughter of Samuel Moore, also a native of that state. The father removed to Iowa in 1848 and crossed the plains in 1852, locating first near Dallas, where he bought the squatter's right to one hundred and sixty acres of land, upon which he engaged in farming. In 1860 he came to Linn county, and locating near Lebanon, combined the interest of stock-raising with that of farming, becoming the owner of considerable property. He now makes his home near Sodaville, Ore., and is eighty-seven years old. Of the six sons and six daughters which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson nine are now living, and the second child and oldest son is the subject of this review. He was but three years old when the trip was made to Oregon, so he has practically passed his whole life in Oregon. He received a rather limited education in the common schools of the state, the greater part of his information having come to him through observation. When sixteen years old he became an employe on the farm, and as his means increased he felt justified in making a purchase of land, which consisted of seventy-six acres, located near Lebanon. He remained upon this property until 1897, when he came to the city of Lebanon and engaged in the livery business, also purchasing a half interest in a drayage business.

The wife who shares the pleasant little home which Mr. Wilson has bought in the city, was formerly Mrs. Ellen Jane Gilson, a native of Michigan, and whom he married in this city. Two children have been born to them, Mary Ellen and Albert Francis, both of whom are at home with their parents. Always popular in his party Mr. Wilson served for fifteen years as school director while living on his farm, and for two terms as road supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

J. P. WALLACE, M. D. A more than ordinary appreciation of the possibilities of medical and surgical science, augmented by superior elementary training and continuous research entitles Dr. Wallace to the enviable place which he occupies in the professional life of Linn county. Dr. Wallace was born in Andersonville, Anderson county, Tenn., July 24, 1852, of Scotch ancestry. His paternal grandfather, James, was born in Virginia, and eventually became a planter in Anderson county, where he died in 1877, while his father, Brice, born in Anderson county, followed a similar occupation during his active life. The father was a strong Union sympathizer during the Civil war. In 1877 he removed to Oregon, settling on a farm near Lebanon, where he engaged in farming for many years. At present he is retired from active life and is living with his children. He is a Royal Arch Mason. A Democrat in politics, he served as treasurer of Linn county for one term. With his wife, Nancy J. (Hall) Wallace, he attends the Baptist Church. Mrs. Wallace died near Albany in 1886 at the age of fifty-five years. The Hall family are of English ancestry, the members of which settled first in North Carolina, where Obadiah Hall, the father of Mrs. Wallace, was born. He was a planter in Tennessee, and died there at an advanced age, firm in the faith of the Baptist Church.

The impressions most vividly recalled by Dr. Wallace of his childhood in the south are those centered around the period of the Civil war, when his neighborhood was ravaged by the soldiers, and life became hazardous. During that time the schools were suspended and his education was retarded. After the war he continued his studies at Jacksboro, Tenn., and afterward engaged in teaching for a couple of terms in a local academy. Following close upon his teaching he studied medicine with Dr. Charles D. Russell of Jacksboro, and after a couple of years entered the medical department of the University of Tennessee, from which he was graduated with first honors in the class of 1880. His scholarship was distinguished by brilliancy and exceptional merit, in recognition of which he received the Paul F. Eve and two other gold medals. With this creditable start in life the doctor engaged in practice in Anderson, Tenn., and four years later, in 1884, located in his present home in Albany, Ore. In order to keep pace with the progress in the profession as understood by the most advanced minds in the country he took a post-graduate course in the New York Post-Graduate Medical School, in 1890.

That Dr. Wallace has been successful beyond the average practitioner is evidenced by his large land holdings in city and county, and these investments indicate also his faith in the future of his adopted state. He is the owner of the postoffice building in Albany, has built up residence and business property, and owns a farm of four hundred and forty acres in Linn county. While living in Knoxville, Tenn., he was united in marriage with Alice Tullock, born in Campbell county, Tenn., and was educated at the Jacksboro Academy. One child has been born of this union, Russell, now attending the Albany College, in the class of 1904. Dr. Wallace is a member of the State Medical Society and from a professional standpoint has held many positions of trust in the community, including membership on the pension board, a position he held for ten or twelve years, when he resigned. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World, and socially with the Alco Club. The doctor is possessed of strong personal characteristics, which render him extremely popular with all classes of people. Genial and optimistic, he is an ideal practitioner, understanding fully the saving grace of tact, humor, and consideration.

WILLIAM M. ALLEN. Living retired in Halsey is a man who has been connected in a most interesting and substantial manner with the early history of this section, and who used to ride over this prairie when scarcely a human habitation indicated the presence of white men. While various avenues of activity have been invaded by him with equally good results, his life in the west has been devoted chiefly to buying and selling cattle and lands. He consequently possesses great familiarity with all parts of the county, and is an expert judge of stock. William M. Allen is a pioneer of 1852, and was twenty-two years of age when he crossed the plains with his parents. He was born in Madison, Ill., July 27, 1830, his father, Alfred, and his mother, Sarah (Jackson) Allen, being natives respectively of Kentucky and North Carolina. On the maternal side he comes from a family which has furnished a president of the United States, his mother, who lived between 1767 and 1845, being a cousin of General Andrew Jackson, seventh president of the country. From his native state Alfred Allen moved to Indiana, and from there to Illinois at an early day, where he married, and from where he set out on the westward journey in the spring of 1852. Locating in Mohawk, Lane county, Ore., he took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, sold the same in 1858 and went to The Dalles, Washington county. In 1862 he located in Linn county, Ore., and bought four hundred acres of land on the Muddy river, just about the time they were building the railroad through here. His was one of the first houses in the locality and he became one of the best known men hereabouts, evincing at all times a keen interest in the development of farming and other enterprises. His last years were spent in retirement, he and his wife traveling their well worn way in harmony and peace, and, as seemed consistent with their united lives, both died in 1875, the wife three days before her husband.

The fifth of the four sons and two daughters in his father's family, William M. was educated in the public schools of Illinois, and after coming west, took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Mohawk, Lane county, not far from his father's claim. In 1861 he bought land in Klickitat county, Wash., and the following year bought and took a drove of cattle to British Columbia, disposed of the same, and afterward came direct to Linn county. Purchasing a half section of land near Halsey, he raised stock thereon until 1864, then sold it, and followed the occupation of buying and selling stock, driving herds to Washington and eastern Oregon, and supplying markets all over the state. For about ten years he has been retired from active life, having accumulated a competency, a considerable portion of which he loans out. He also owns two ranches in Linn county, aggregating five hundred acres of land.

The marriage of Mr. Allen partook of the romance which has characterized his somewhat adventurous and roving life, for, owing to parental opposition, he deliberately ran away with Emma Zulliforde, daughter of William Zulliforde, and sought the services of Justice of the Peace Paul Clover in the foothills of the Cascade mountains. Mr. Zulliforde lived for many years in Illinois, where his daughter was born, and from where he crossed the plains in 1852, locating on the ranch near Mohawk where his death occurred. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Allen, of whom Arra, the oldest daughter, is the wife of Monroe Miller, a farmer of this vicinity; Benjamin F., Jr., lives at Grant's Pass, Ore.; W. A. is on his father's farm; and Lena is at home.

Mr. Allen was the first commissioner of Crook county, Ore., elected by the people, and he has further promoted the interests of Republicanism in this section, serving both as school director and clerk, and as a member of the city council for many terms. He is a broad-minded and progressive man, inspiring the greatest confidence in all with whom he has to do, and representing in the measure of his solid success the best type of northwestern manhood.

PETER K. JOHNSON was born in the central part of Norway, July 24, 1838, the descendant of a line of farmers, his father also following this occupation in conjunction with the carpenter's trade. After his education in the district schools was completed, the son took up the trade of his father, which he followed for several years in Norway. In 1864 he married Miss Sarah Anderson, also a native of that country, and there the young couple began their married life. After two years they decided to try their fortunes in the faraway western land, of which they had heard so much, and accordingly set sail for the United States in 1866. Upon their arrival they went at once to Illinois. After two years they removed to Clinton Junction, Wis., just across the state line from their former residence, where they passed the ensuing five years, Mr. Johnson working at his trade in Chicago the principal part of the time.

In 1873 they ventured still farther west, coming with hopeful hearts to Oregon, where soon after his arrival Mr. Johnson purchased the farm upon which they now make their home. This farm is located one and a half miles south of Mount Angel. The first piece of land bought contained eighty-six acres, but with the profits of his industry and management he has been enabled to add to the original purchase until he now owns one hundred and twenty acres. Upon this farm Mr. Johnson himself has made all the improvements, including a modern house and good buildings of all kinds, which are the best in the neighborhood. He has also built a double-kiln hop house and storehouse, having twenty-two acres devoted to the cultivation of hops, from which was produced in 1902 twenty thousand pounds. These he disposed of at a uniform price of twenty-six and a half cents per pound. Seventy acres of his farm are under cultivation. In addition to this he continued to work at his trade from the time of his arrival in Oregon to 1890, thus adding greatly to his income. A large family has blessed his marriage, the children being as follows: John, of Portland; Andrew, deceased; Frank, of Portland; Edward, residing near Brooks; Anna, wife of C. Esson, of The Dalles; Albert, of Portland; Allen, at home; and Sherman, who is attending Portland Dental College. Mr. Johnson has served on the school board and as road supervisor. He has always taken an active part in political matters, being a strong adherent of the policy advocated by the Republican party. Having the courage of his convictions, he has exercised no little influence in the affairs of his neighborhood.

The mother of Mr. Johnson having died in Norway in 1863, his father came seven years later to the land that held his son's family, settling first in Wisconsin, but later going to Minnesota to pass the remainder of his days. There he died at the age of seventy-nine years.

THEOBALD KIRSCH. Like all other land in this vicinity the farm belonging to Theobald Kirsch was once a wilderness of unfurrowed fields and unfelled forests, where it now blossoms with harvests and gratifies the eye with the attractive, modern buildings that have been erected upon it. These changes are due to the indefatigable energy and management of its thrifty owner, who, animated by proper pride as well as self-interest, has become noted throughout the neighborhood as one of the best farmers of which it boasts. The greatest credit is due Mr. Kirsch for the praiseworthy efforts that have brought him success, for he started in life with nothing to help him even to the first round of the ladder but his own manliness and determination to make something out of his life. That he has succeeded is established beyond a doubt, the broad acres of his farm testifying to the affluence that has come to him in the evening of life.

Theobald Kirsch was born August 10, 1841, in Lorraine, in what was then French territory, but in 1871 passed to Germany, and came to the United States with his parents in 1855, settling in New York, where his father worked at general labor for a few years. At the end of this time enough money had been accumulated to warrant moving into the farming region of Sanduskȳ county, Ohio, where they bought land upon which they lived until 1870. While in this location Theobald arrived at his twenty-first year, and following his inclinations he enlisted in Company H, Seventy-second Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He was mustered into service at Columbus in October, 1862, and went at once with the regiment to Memphis, where they did guard duty for some time. Later he was in the memorable siege of Vicksburg. In the battle of Guntown he was taken prisoner, being sent to Andersonville, where he was confined until the close of the war. This was a period of ten months, after which he was sent to Jacksonville, Fla., and from there to Annapolis, Md., thence to Camp Chase near Columbus, Ohio, where he was mustered out of service, having served two years and nine months. Returning to his home near Fremont, Ohio, he remained there for a short time, preceding his parents to Wisconsin by four years, their removal there being made in 1870. The old people later passed away in that state, the father at the age of eighty years, March 1, 1886, the mother dying May 4, 1882, at seventy-two years of age. They were the parents of five children, four of whom are now living, Theobald being the only one in Oregon.

In 1888 Mr. Kirsch came to this county and bought one hundred and ninety-five acres of land, which now forms a part of his home. To that purchase he has added until he now owns four hundred and thirty acres, two hundred and seventy-five acres of which are under cultivation. He has fifty-seven acres devoted to hops, from which was produced last year forty thousand pounds. He now rents this part of his farm. By his union in 1866 to Miss Tracy Von Hatten, born January 8, 1849, in Pittsburg, Pa., he became the father of eleven children, six of whom are now living. The second of the children, Rosa, is the only one who is not at home, she having become the wife of H. Butch, of British Columbia, where they have five children. The remaining children are as follows: Joseph, who is married and on the home place; John, Henry, Frank and Frona, all unmarried; Mary, deceased, was married to John Camp, and had a son; Lena, deceased, was married to Martin Preuneg, and had two children; Annie, Annie (the second child bearing the name), and George, all died in early childhood. Politically Mr. Kirsch is a Democrat and served at one time as road supervisor. The family are members of the Catholic Church.

ALBERT G. PRILL, M. D. A physician of Scio, Linn county, Ore., whose future gives promise of an advancement to a high degree of excellence and success in his chosen profession, Dr. Albert G. Prill was born May 5, 1869, in Springville, N. Y., where his father, John Prill, a native of Germany, located many years ago and engaged in farming. Success is a native element in the character of this family, for with nothing to encourage John Prill to believe in the successful future which was before him he began in a strange land and among strange surroundings, and became one of the noticeably successful men of that section of the state, now owning seven hundred and fifty acres of land. He makes his home in Springville, living retired at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife was formerly Mary Tardell, also a native of the Fatherland, and who crossed the ocean with him, anxious to help in the labor for a home and competency. As she shared his labor she now enjoys the rest, being seventy-three years old.

Of their six children, three of whom are living, Albert G. Prill is the youngest. He was given a good education, after attending the common schools completing in the high school of Springville, from which he was graduated in 1886. Intent on entering upon the profession he had chosen he became a student in the medical department of Buffalo University in 1887, and after an attendance of three years he was graduated with the degree of M. D. In the same year, 1890, he came to Oregon, and locating in Salem, engaged in a general practice of medicine. After nine months in that location he removed to Sodaville, Linn county, and remained successfully engaged there until 1896. At that date he came to Scio and has since remained in this location. Not content with the knowledge of medicine gained in his first years in the study, Dr. Prill has since devoted much time to research in his efforts to advance in the profession. In 1898 he was graduated from the National Institute of Pharmacy, of Chicago, Ill., and took a three-months course in electro-therapeutics in Lima, Ohio. In 1900 he attended the New York Clinical School of Medicine, taking a course in surgery, and especially devoting his thought to the amelioration of the ills of womankind. His advance in his profession has been very noticeable, and is certainly appreciated by those among whom he labors.

Dr. Prill was married in Springville, N. Y., in 1889, to Anna C. Satterlee Bates, a native of that state, and the two children born of the union are now deceased, one having died in infancy, and Ariel V. in early childhood. In his fraternal relations Dr. Prill is exceedingly active, being a member of Scio Lodge No. 39, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons; Leonidas Lodge No. 36, Knights of Pythias; Dierdorff Lodge No. 54, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Stewart No. 51, Encampment; Knights of the Maccabees; Modern Woodmen of America; Ancient Order of United Workmen; and Order of Pendo. He is active in all of these, having passed all the chairs with the exception of those of the Masons. He is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and politically casts his vote with the Republican party. In the interests of the public he acts as health officer of the city. Dr. Prill owns considerable property in the city, in addition to the handsome little cottage and three acres of land about it. He purchased his office of Dr. E. O. Hyde.

One of the most engrossing interests of Dr. Prill is that of ornithology, of which he is a profound student, and in his study he has collected many and interesting specimens, now owning one of the finest private collections of birds in the state. Never content with anything less than the best in whatever line his interests are directed, much is expected of such a man as Dr. Prill in the advancement of all worthy enterprises, and through him, as a citizen, the future holds fulfillment for the promises of a strong, earnest and honest manhood.

EVALINE SHELTON. At present living retired in the town of Jordan, Mrs. Evaline Shelton has seen a great deal of pioneer life in the west, and has been in close touch with its agricultural development, as have been the wives of all the pioneers. Born in the vicinity of Nashville, Tenn., November 1, 1827, she is a daughter of Edward Jones, a native of South Carolina, who in early life removed to Tennessee. Later, Mr. Jones lived on farms in Illinois and Wisconsin, his last years being spent in Andrew county, Mo., where he died at the age of seventy-five years. He was a farmer by occupation, was fairly successful, and was devoted to the Democratic party.

On her father's farm in Andrew county, Mo., Mrs. Shelton met and married her husband, William Shelton, who was born in Virginia, August 15, 1820. Before locating in Andrew county, Mr. Shelton lived in Jackson county, Mo., and after his marriage went to housekeeping on his own farm, near that of the Sheltons. Believing that the west held superior opportunities for agriculturists, he sold his farm in 1853, and outfitted with ox-teams and prairie schooners, taking with him several head of loose cattle. He was not the first of his family to seek the far west, as in 1847 his father, Herman Shelton, who was born in Virginia, settled on a section of land five miles east of Scio, where he died at the age of seventy-seven years. He was a Democrat in politics, and a member and active worker in the Baptist Church.

In the party of William Shelton was his mother-in-law, Mary (Louder) Jones, who, however, less strong than her companions, succumbed to an attack of cholera and died in Tygh valley, eastern Oregon. The party proceeded after this sad happening much depressed in spirits, and finally arrived in Linn county, where Mr. Shelton took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres ten miles east of Scio. This he improved and lived upon, and made into a valuable and productive property, and here his death occurred July 4, 1902. Like his father he was a Democrat, and was a staunch supporter of the Baptist Church. His wife remained on the farm until October, 1902, and then removed to Scio, and later, October 1, 1903, to Jordan, having earned the right to rest for the remainder of her life. Of her eight children, three are living, these being Lucilla, the wife of Henry Phillips, of Jordan, Ore.; Andrew J., a conductor on the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad; and Mary, who is now Mrs. Pruitt, of Baker City, Ore.

Mention is due Lee Shelton, brother-in-law of Mrs. Shelton, who is farming in Linn county in a small way, and is a man of fine personal characteristics. He also was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains with his father in 1847, thereafter helping him in the improvement of his farm.

JACOB M. STARK, mayor of the city of Independence, is one of the most highly respected citizens of the place, as well as the proprietor of its only hotel. He is, to use the expressive western term, a "hustler," and while winning success in the hotel business he is also known as a speculator, whose winnings in this line have been of no small amount. He was born in Washington county, Ky., May 15, 1845. His father, Benjamin Stark, was also a native of the Bluegrass state, and in 1848 removed to Polk county, Ill., making his home near Golconda, where he followed farming and died in 1850. In his agricultural pursuits he achieved success. In politics he was a Whig. His death occurred from cholera, at the age of fifty-one years. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Fannie Phelps, was born in Indianapolis, Ind., and also died of cholera in 1850, as did two sons and one daughter, there being at the time a terrible epidemic of that dread disease. In this family there were eleven children, five boys and six girls, J. M. Stark being the tenth child, and he and one sister are the only surviving children. At the age of five years he was thrown upon his own resources. He received no educational privileges, but after drifting here and there for a time he finally, in 1855, found a home with William Claupet, of Jacksonville, Ill., who gave him his first instruction in work. When about sixteen years of age, in response to his country's call, on the 8th of August, 1861, he enlisted with Company A, Fifteenth Illinois Cavalry, and marched to the front. In 1862 he received an honorable discharge on account of illness and disability. He crossed the plains in the same year, going as far as the present boundaries of Idaho, but very soon returned to Montana. In the fall of 1863 he began freighting by teams from Salt Lake to Virginia City, Montana, continuing until 1867, when he went to the vicinity of Springfield, Ill., and afterward joined a brother and sister who were at Pawnee, Ill. Here he connected himself with the Wabash Railroad Company in construction work, remaining with the company for eighteen years.

During his residence at Pawnee he conducted a general merchandise business and built the Pawnee Stub Railway, which runs from Pawnee due west, eleven miles to Albany, and is connected with the Chicago & Alton Railway. He sold his interest in the stub railway on March 13, 1890, to the original stockholders. Besides his many other interests he established a paper called the Pawnee Enterprise. In 1891 he suffered considerable loss by fire and decided to remove to Oregon. He located at Independence, purchased the Little Palace Hotel property of the Rev. J. R. N. Bell, and successfully engaged in the hotel business. In 1900 he bought a saw-mill business and sold it in December, 1902, to F. A. Douty, of Independence. In 1900 he also purchased the Cottage Hotel and made it his place of residence. Mr. Stark was married at Eagleville, Mo., to Miss Georgia A. Blankenship, who was born near Vandalia, Ill. Her father, Lewis Blankenship, was a native of Illinois, and a farmer by occupation. He removed to Missouri in 1883, and in 1893 located near Independence, Ore. His wife having passed away, he makes his home with his daughter, Mrs. Stark. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Stark were born seven children, four of whom are now living: Lola, a graduate of Mt. Angel College; Inez and John L., twins, and Aliene.

During the present year Mr. Stark bought the merchandise stock of F. A. Douty and moved the stock to Fall City, Polk county, where he conducts a large store. Mr. Stark is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and is a stanch Republican, always interested in the welfare of his party. He was elected mayor in 1903. As chief executive of the city, Mr. Stark is winning the encomiums of all. He stands firmly on the side of law and order. His success in life has been achieved through his own efforts and well does he deserve to be classed among the most progressive and enterprising men of Oregon.

HENRY K. LUGGER. Talent, it has been said, can be mastered by man, while genius is the master of man. This is true to a certain extent, for it is the exception to find the man of genius a success in a business way, and a power in the industrial life of a community. It is this which distinguishes Mr. Lugger, the present superintendent of the Albany waterworks, for his fine and accurate knowledge of all mechanism has called forth an admiration which has given him credit for more than ordinary ability. The position which he now holds was accepted in June, 1902, and even in this brief period of time he has won a position of prominence and esteem in the business life of the city, in keeping with the effort he has put forth toward the advancement of his work.

The birth of Henry K. Lugger occurred in Westphalia, Germany, his father, Frederick, being also a native of that locality. The latter was a stonemason by trade. In 1860 he brought his family to America, on a sailing vessel, and located in New Orleans, La., where he engaged as a contractor and mason until his death. He married Sophia Mueller, also a native of Westphalia, and her death also occurred in New Orleans. Of the three sons and one daughter born to them all attained maturity, of whom three sons are now living. The youngest of this family, and the only one who located on the Pacific coast, was Henry K. Lugger. He was born April 30, 1858, and in New Orleans attended a private school until he was fourteen years old, when he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a machinist. For three years he worked in ship and railroad shops in the city, after which he went to Galveston, Tex., where during the day he worked at his trade and at night attended school, his earnestness of purpose and determination enabling him to make the sacrifice for the sake of future gain. Later he worked at the trade of carpenter in Galveston, after which, in 1881, he removed to Dennison, Ohio, and soon after to Delaware of the same state, where he engaged as a machinist, in the latter city remaining for seven years. In 1889 Mr. Lugger came to Oregon, locating in Yaquina Bay, as foreman of the car department in the shops of the old Oregon Pacific, and later occupying the same position for the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad. It was from the position of general foreman of the shops that Mr. Lugger resigned in 1899 to engage in the mercantile business in the same city, the firm being known as Lugger & Pruett. After eighteen months he removed to Baker City and bought an interest in the Blue Mountain Iron Works, this firm being Gilbert & Lugger. After a year's time he sold out to Mr. Gilbert, and coming to Albany he accepted his present position, in which he has charge of the water supply. In addition to this work, Mr. Lugger is also experienced as a draughtsman and does much of that work.

Mr. Lugger was married to Miss Anna Healy, a native of Delaware, Ohio, where the ceremony was performed. Three daughters have been born to them, namely: Theresa, Catherine and Wilhelmina, the first named being a student of Albany College. In his fraternal relations Mr. Lugger is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of Albany, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In politics he is a Republican, believing that the principles of this party are best calculated to advance the prosperity of the country, but in local affairs he measures the man as well as the principles and casts his vote for the man whose administration is governed by patriotism and principle. While at Yaquina Bay Mr. Lugger served as president of the school board for several years, and took a very active part in the work necessary to secure good schools.

JACOB M. MILLER. Since May, 1875, Jacob M. Miller has identified his fortunes with Marion county, Ore.. That he has succeeded as an agriculturist is evidenced by the fact that he is the owner of a finely improved farm of three hundred acres on the French Prairie, about two hundred acres of which are under cultivation. Although practically retired at the present time, Mr. Miller still maintains an interest in his farm, its buildings, implements, and crops, and he is the intelligent and mature adviser of his son, John H., to whom he has turned over the greater part of the responsibility.

At the age of fifteen years, Mr. Miller left Baden, Germany, where he was born February 24, 1832, and, accompanied by his parents, sailed for the distant shores of America. After thirty days upon the ocean the stanch craft cast anchor in New York harbor, the passengers departing inland in various directions, as inclination dictated. The Miller family settled on a farm near Utica, N. Y., and after remaining there for twelve years removed to Jo Daviess county, Ill., the father having in the meantime turned over his business to his sons. In Illinois Jacob

M., and his brother John bought a farm of four hundred and twenty acres, a large farm for the middle west, and lived thereon together until the brother became sole possessor of the property in 1876, and Jacob M. came west in search of larger opportunities. Of his brother-in-law, Francis Feller, he purchased four hundred and twenty acres on French prairie, four miles from Butteville, in time disposing of all but the three hundred acres which he now owns.

September 23, 1864, Mr. Miller was united in marriage with Elizabeth Feller, sister of Francis Feller, and of this union there have been born eight children: Mary is the wife of Charles Lemky, assessor of Marion county, and a resident of Salem; Carrie is the wife of William Scollard, a farmer and hop-raiser near Gervais; Lizzie is the wife of Andrew Walker, of Milwaukee, Ore.; Fred is helping to manage his father's farm; William is a hop-grower near Woodburn; John H. is managing the home farm; Edward is a resident of Portland; and Minnie is at home.

For many years Mr. Miller has been a staunch upholder of Democracy. He has filled the offices of school director and road supervisor. He is held in high esteem by those who have been associated with him for years, and he has the good will of a host of warm friends, who appreciate his many fine traits of character.

CAPT. JAMES BLAKELY. In the lives of the founders of the northwest we find peculiarly effective illustrations of those qualities which prepare the way for public prosperity and happiness. James Blakely is one of those who has bravely borne his part in the formation epoch of this country, and few there are who are more intelligently or interestingly reminiscent of the days which tried the fibre of men, and either made or ruined them with its parallel hope and discouragement. Out of this period Mr. Blakely has emerged strengthened and hopeful, the possessor of a comfortable home earned by the sweat of his brow. An evening spent with this cheery, early settler would convince the most skeptical that the way of the pioneer is thorny, although often an adventurous and exciting one, and that he who wins success without money or influence must needs be the possessor of more than ordinary courage and sagacity.

This pioneer of 1846 was born in Knox county, Tenn., November 26, 1812, and in spite of the fact that ninety-one years have passed over his head, still has youthful sympathies, and a heart attuned to the joy and expectancy of life. The point of a joke is never lost in the meshes of his wary brain, nor are his exceedingly humorous accounts of the early days without interest to his hearers. His service in the Indian wars of the west in 1856 rounds out the third generation of his family to shoulder arms in defense of this country, the first to thus bring honor upon the name being his paternal grandfather, Charles Blakely, who came to America from Ireland as a small boy, locating with his parents in the Old Dominion. The oppressed colonists found in him a ready defender, and he slept and fought in the tents and battlefields of the Revolutionary war. After the war the soldier removed to Tennessee, and died on his farm in Knox county at the age of four score years. His son, Joseph, was born on this old Tennessee farm, and, emulating the martial spirit of his sire, took part in the less famous and lengthy war of 1812. Aside from this his life was spent in Knox county, Tenn., until 1838, in which year he moved to a farm in Platte county, Mo., and engaged in farming and stock-raising. His death took place in Nodaway county, Mo., at the age of seventy-four. His wife, formerly Jensia Browning, was a native daughter of Knox county, Tenn., her father, James Browning, having been born in North Carolina. The maternal family was distinguished for the longevity of its members, and Mrs. Blakely exceeded her husband in the length of her useful life.

The third of the six sons and six daughters born to his parents, James Blakely worked hard on the home farm, and at irregular intervals attended the remotely located schoolhouse with its puncheon floors and greased paper windows. He grew up a bare-footed boy, but with splendid health, and a superabundance of spirits and vitality. His father profited by his services until he was twenty-two years old, and at that time he hired out to a nearby farmer, as the numerous children at home could easily perform all needed work on the home place. With the courage of the youthful and inexperienced he married early in life, his choice falling on a native daughter of Jefferson county, Tenn., and whose name was Sarah Dick. She was born November 24, 1815, and was three years the junior of her husband. Her death occurred June 14, 1888, at the age of seventy-four years. After his marriage, Mr. Blakely rented a piece of land near the home place, and in 1838 came overland with his father and the rest of the family to Missouri, taking up a government farm of one hundred and sixty acres. This did not prove particularly profitable, so he soon sold out and leased a place for a couple of years.

To this quiet inland farm came news of awakening possibilities in the far west, and to Mr. Blakely this seemed the opportunity for which he had been looking so long. It did not take him long to purchase oxen and otherwise equip for the long journey, and even though emigration to the west was as yet in its infancy he bravely set forth, armed and provisioned against any emergency that might arise. Arriving in this county after a comparatively peaceful and pleasant journey, he took up a donation claim upon a portion of which Brownsville is now located, and built a little one-room house in the wilderness. He soon observed the mercantile chances which would abound as the country should become better settled, and even the Indians in the neighborhood offered a trade by no means to be despised by an ambitious storekeeper. In this connection he was warmly assisted by his uncle, Hugh L. Brown, who, was one of the sincerest friends, and practically life-long helpmate, which have brightened the existence of Mr. Blakely. Out of extreme appreciation for the character and abilities of his friend, Mr. Blakely named Brownsville in his honor, and with him started up a general store, which became the headquarters for trade and sociability in the neighborhood. These early days contained material for a highly interesting book of narrative, and it is upon this adventurous epoch that Mr. Blakely draws most freely for the entertainment which his friends so much enjoy today. The Indian war coming on, he naturally took a part in the effort to insure protection to settlers and their possessions, and, enlisting in Company D, Second Oregon Regiment he served as captain in the Rogue river campaign, being mustered out at the end of three months, on July 4, 1856.

In connection with his farm Mr. Blakely took a prominent part in the early upbuilding of Brownsville, and later on aided by his mature judgment the more ambitious projects of the citizens. In partnership with another man he built the first flour mill in the town, and he was one of the chief promoters of the Woolen Mills of Brownsville, for many years being a stock owner therein. The greater part of his success has come from stock-raising, in which he has engaged nearly all his life, and from his farm innumerable heads of fine cattle, horses, and hogs have reached the markets. Generous to a fault, Mr. Blakely has retained but a small portion of his large property for his own use, the balance having either been sold or given to his children. In a comfortable and homelike little cottage he is watching the setting sun of a fine and honorable life, surrounded by the love of his children, and the good will of a host of friends. With him lives his grandson, James Blakely Cooley.

Mr. Blakely has subscribed to the principles of the Democratic party during his entire voting life, and after coming to the west took quite a prominent part in local affairs. For two terms he was a member of the city council of Brownsville, and for many years he served as school director and road supervisor. He is fraternally connected with the Masons. Of the twelve children born to Mr. and Mrs. Blakely, Eleanor, the oldest child and daughter is the wife of Kennedy Montgomery, a stockman and rancher of Crook county, Ore.; Catherine, widow of Jeremiah Lewis; William, a farmer of Pendleton, Ore., and ex-sheriff of Pendleton county; Harriet, the wife of G. C. Cooley, a merchant of Brownsville; Henry, a retired farmer of this place; Caroline, deceased; Margaret, the widow of Mr. Smith, and a resident of Montana; James, a stock-raiser of the Willow valley; George, engaged in the drug business at The Dalles, and county judge of Wasco county; Joseph, the chief of police of Pendleton, Ore.; Sarah, the wife of Henry McFarlin, a farmer near Brownsville; and a daughter deceased in infancy. Mr. Blakely has certainly been one of the thrifty and resourceful upbuilders of this county, but who, after all, can best tell his story in his own strangely interesting manner.

WILLIAM WATSON PERCIVAL. The son of a successful pioneer, William Watson Percival has forcibly demonstrated his ability to maintain the honorable name of the family in his relations to the development of Oregon, and has won a place for himself among her prominent citizens by his broad-mindedness and earnest activity in the promotion of all movements tending toward the advancement of national or local affairs. His father, William Percival, was born in England, but came to the United States at the age of six years with his parents, who settled in Ohio, but soon after removed to Sheridan county, Mo. This state was one which early responded to the splendid opportunities held out by the west, and William Percival caught the spirit of unrest that made so many wanderers in those days. In 1852 he crossed the plains with ox-teams, locating first in Yamhill county, Ore., where he passed the first winter. Later he came to Polk county and bought a donation claim of three hundred and ninety acres, near Monmouth. Upon this farm he lived until 1877, when he removed to Monmouth, there living retired until his death in 1892, at the age of eighty-two years. He left behind him the record of a worthy life, of strong deeds for the upbuilding of a new country, and an earnest, practical cultivation of the opportunities that lay nearest to hand. In Missouri he married Miss Zelrilda Mulkey, a native of that state. She crossed the plains with her husband, her father, Johnson Mulkey, having removed here some years before. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Percival, Mrs. J. L. Riggs lives in Salem; M. F., in Monmouth; Mrs. M. M. Fryer, in Independence; Mrs. E. L. Ford is deceased; William Watson, of this review, makes his home in Independence; R. M., of Warner, Idaho; and Emma, who is now deceased.

William Watson Percival was born in Polk county, Ore., November 26, 1857. After his education in the common schools was completed he was given the added advantages of a course in the Christian College of Monmouth, which he faithfully improved. At the age of eighteen years he engaged in farming. In 1887 he became interested in live stock, shipping to all points of the state. From a modest beginning he has now grown to be one of the most extensive stockmen of this section of the country and bears the reputation of a stockbuyer who thoroughly understands his business and makes every move in the work count to his credit. He spares no pains or expense to make the best of his opportunities. In addition to his cattle interests, Mr. Percival owns considerable real estate, a farm of sixty-two acres, twenty-five of which are devoted to hop cultivation, being leased at present. His home in Independence is a handsome little cottage at the corner of Sixth and C streets.

On January 9, 1882, he married Miss Ida M. D'Lashmutt, who was a native of Yamhill county, Ore., and a daughter of E. L. D'Lashmutt. Of the three children born to them, Maude D. is now deceased, Pearl and Carl being still with their parents. Mr. Percival is a firm adherent of the principles of the Republican party, and with his strong personality has exercised no little influence in the affairs of the community. He has twice served as a member of the city council, and has also been chairman of the county central committee as well as a member of the state central committee. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

NICHOLAS SPRENGER. Among the substantial and worthy pioneers of Linn county none more thoroughly realized the advantages which they found in the west than did Nicholas Sprenger, merchant, millwright, stock-raiser, and farmer, and one of the organizers of the first Masonic Lodge in Linn county. On the small farm in Germany where he was born November 8, 1802, Mr. Sprenger experienced that discontent with his surroundings which led him, as a boy of seventeen, to leave his family and friends and embark upon life in a county across the sea, of which he knew naught but by hearsay. In a sailing vessel he reached New York, remained there a short time, and then made his way to Pennsylvania, where he engaged in the merchandise business. In Philadelphia he met and married Maria Bird, and soon after removed to Morgan county, Ohio, where he learned the millwright's trade, and afterward applied himself to grist and woolen milling.

A large family of children came to gladden the Sprenger home in Ohio, and the milling and merchandising yielded a fair income; yet the same spirit of ambition which had rebelled at the limitations of the little German farm saw further than millwrighting in Ohio, and, in 1852, the father outfitted with ox-teams for crossing the plains. Many provisions were required for feeding so large a family for six months, and an adequate supply of clothing increased the load to be hauled by the plodding oxen. Few adventures out of the ordinary disturbed the tranquillity of the travelers, the Indians being fairly peaceful, and the weather all that could be desired. Nevertheless, the family pursued their way drearily, after burying one of the daughters, Abigail, who died of cholera. They arrived at Oregon City about October 24, 1852, where the mother and children spent the winter. The father, anxious to locate on a desirable claim, spent his winter looking for fertile land, and selected a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, mostly prairie lands, one and a half miles north of Shedd's. Here he erected a hewed log house, which still stands, brought his family there with the first breath of spring, and settled down to conquer the obstacles which impeded the progress of all the settlers.

In Oregon Mr. Sprenger devoted his entire time to farming, his useful trade being relegated to the past in the middle west. As time went on he prospered exceedingly, taking a prominent part in the affairs of his township, and exerting his influence for progress and good government. He was prominent in the Masonic order, and as long as he lived took an active interest in Corinthian Lodge, A. F. & A. M., of Albany, of which he was one of the organizers. He also assisted in the organization of the pioneer Masonic lodge at Oregon City. He was always prominent in church and Sunday-school work, and for many years was a class leader, expounding the scriptures with intelligence and enthusiasm. He was equally interested in educational matters, and not only worked to increase the number of schools, but saw to it that an excellent standard of instruction was maintained. He was a Republican in politics, but never sought official recognition. Good old biblical names were given his three oldest sons, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, all of whom are deceased, as is also Charles. Nicholas B. lives in Albany, Ore.; Henry B. and

Thomas live on the old homestead; Mary Ann is deceased; Maria is the wife of Capt. John W. Cochran, of Hubbard; Sarah is the widow of Major J. J. Fisher, of Oakland, Cal., a veteran of the Civil war. Mr. Sprenger was a large-hearted and humane man, generous to those less fortunate than himself, and willing at all times to promote enterprises and plans calculated to improve the neighborhood in which he made his home. His death occurred on the homestead November 8, 1871. The death of his wife occurred at Hubbard in July, 1884.

STEWART MATEER. The city of Eugene is one of those prosperous and promising places which can afford to offer a hearty welcome to the stranger within her gates, confident that his mission will be of mutual benefit, and that close contact with her manifold money-making and social advantages will win him to the ranks of her most enthusiastic advocates and promoters. Stewart Mateer came here in February, 1901, with years of farming and mercantile experience behind him. He purchased a residence, and established himself as a partner with T. H. Garrett, in well equipped real estate offices at 584 Willamette street. Both Mr. Mateer and Mr. Garrett come from South Dakota, and are primarily representing lands in the northern middle state, having ample facilities for either buying or selling. In addition, they are dealing in Eugene and Willamette Valley property, farm, timber, or residence, and they also represent several reliable fire insurance companies, including the Caledonia Insurance Company of Scotland.

Mr. Mateer comes of a family possessing large landed estates around Belfast, Ireland. Both his father, Thomas, and his grandfather, Alexander, were born in Belfast, and the grandfather especially was very well to do. Thomas Mateer married in Pittsburg, Pa., Sarah J. McMasters, a native of Belfast, and daughter of William McMasters, who early came to America and bought a large tract of land at Reeds Landing, Wabasha county, Minn. He was a shoemaker by trade, but retired from active life soon after coming to America. Thomas Mateer came to the United States as a young man, and for a time was proprietor of the Eagle Hotel at Pittsburg, Pa. While there he became interested in the discovery of gold on the coast, and in 1849 came to California by way of Panama, and engaged in mining in the Sacramento Valley for three years. Returning to the east the same way in 1852, he located in Wabasha county, Minn., bought new land and improved it, and became a successful farmer. In 1883 he removed to South Dakota, and near Pierre, Sully county, stocked a large farm upon which he lived until his retirement to Monroe, Jasper county, Iowa, his present home. He is eighty-three years of age. His wife died October 3, 1894.

In his younger days Stewart Mateer worked hard on the paternal farm where he was born January 8, 1864. In 1883 he accompanied the family from Wabasha county, Minn., to Sully county, South Dakota, where he in time became an independent land owner, and engaged in stock-raising on a large scale. He had the advantages of the public schools of Minnesota, and in spite of irregularities and interruptions, managed to secure a practical business education. In 1898 he sold his farm and engaged in a mercantile business at Okobojo, Sully county, S. Dak., and at the same time served as postmaster under President McKinley. Resigning from the postmastership in December, 1900, he made arrangements to represent the vast aggregate of available lands in South Dakota in the far west, and in February, 1901, established his business in Eugene, Ore., as the most likely center of activity. He has taken a keen interest in the organization of the Eugene Real Estate Exchange, is a charter member thereof, was the first secretary, and is now serving as its treasurer. He is a staunch believer in Republican principles, and takes a hearty interest in local and state affairs. Various fraternal organizations profit by his membership, among them the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, of which he is consul, the Women of Woodcraft, and the Royal Neighbors. The wife of Mr. Mateer was formerly Alice Brownlee, and the marriage occurred in Okobojo, S. Dak. Miss Brownlee was educated in Scotland, although she was born in Charleston, Ill. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Mateer, Ruth Marian.

CHESTER G. COAD, postmaster of Dallas, also ex-county clerk and ex-banker, and one of the most prominent and influential members of pioneer families in Polk county, was born in this county, July 27, 1861, and is the second of the five children born to Samuel and Henrietta (Gilliam) Coad. The Gilliam family, numerously represented in Oregon, and established here by that well remembered pioneer and soldier, General Cornelius Gilliam, whose tragic death threw a pall over military and civilian ranks in the state, is mentioned elsewhere in this work, while Samuel Coad, now retired in Dallas after many years of varied activity, and equal success as an agriculturist, druggist, builder, Indian fighter, and real estate dealer, is also given separate mention.

The success of his father placed in the way of Chester G. Coad advantages not enjoyed by the average farm-reared youth, yet in the main he has been the architect of his own fortunes. After leaving the public schools of Dallas he entered La Creole Academy, which institution he left at the age of twenty to learn surveying under deputy United States surveyor W. P. Wright. He was engaged in this pursuit when elected county clerk on the Republican ticket in 1888. His service in the latter capacity was eminently satisfactory, and in 1890 he was re-elected by a large majority. Upon the completion of his second term in 1892 he became cashier of the Dallas City Bank, and resigned in 1895 to assume the management of the Rickreall Mills, a position maintained until 1899. This position was also resigned because of his appointment to the position of assistant sergeant-of-arms in the United States senate, which he held during the sessions of 1899, 1900 and 1901.

March 4, 1901, Mr. Coad was appointed postmaster of Dallas by President McKinley, and took the oath of office April 1, 1901. He married in Dallas Jennie Rowell, who was born on the trip to Oregon in 1862, the daughter of C. G. Rowell, a retired citizen of Dallas. Four children have been born of this union, Claudia, Pauline, Genevieve, and Dorris. Mr. Coad is a member of the Native Sons of Oregon, and is fraternally connected with the Friendship Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F., of which he is past noble grand; the Encampment, of which he is past chief patriarch, and the Woodmen of the World. Affable in manner, of acknowledged business and political probity, Mr. Coad has won the esteem of all with whom he has had to do, and particularly of his numerous friends and associates in the thriving community of Dallas.

FRANK PATRICK SHEASGREEN. Standing high among the wide-awake and progressive business men of Corvallis is Mr. Sheasgreen, who is actively identified with the manufacturing interests of the city as one of the proprietors of the Central Planing Mills and Box Factory. In his extensive operations, lumber of the best grade only is used, it being brought here from the Cascades by rail, and after passing through the mills or factory is shipped in large quantities to all parts of the Union, including the north, south, east and west.

Mr. Sheasgreen was born April 11, 1854, at Newcastle, New Brunswick, being the youngest of a family of fourteen children, all of whom grew to years of maturity. His father, Edward Sheasgreen, a native of Donegal, Ireland, learned the shoemaker's trade when a boy, but after his emigration to Newcastle was engaged in agricultural pursuits in that place until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Ann Collier, was born and reared in Dublin, Ireland, removing from there with her parents to New Brunswick prior to her marriage.

Brought up on the home farm, and receiving the advantages of a good public school education, Frank P. Sheasgreen remained with his parents until becoming of age. In 1875, deeming the prospects for improving his financial condition much better in the west, he went to Minneapolis, Minn., where he secured employment with the Red River Lumber Company, in the mill managed by T. B. Walker, and while thus engaged learned the trade of a millwright. Four years later, continuing with the same company, he assumed charge of a planing mill in Crookston, Minn., remaining there until 1889. Becoming then associated with the Michigan Lumber Company, he came as shipping agent to Vancouver, with headquarters at Portland, Ore. After the fire in 1890, he located in Corvallis, entering the employ of Max Friendly, and after assisting him as a millwright in repairing his mill, he was made superintendent first of the planing mill, and later of the whole plant. After the failure of Mr. Friendly, he was employed in Newberg, by the assignee, N. T. Peet, in looking after the interests there of his former employer. Returning to Corvallis in 1892, Mr. Sheasgreen, in partnership with Neal Newhouse, purchased the old Hurd mill, and its site, rebuilt it, and for five years operated a planing mill and box factory. In 1897 James Gray, of Minnesota, purchased the interest of the junior partner of the Central Planing Mills, the following year the firm name being Sheasgreen & Gray. Mr. Gray then disposed of his interest to Edward Buxton, the present junior member of the firm of Sheasgreen & Buxton, which has since carried on a profitable business in mill work of all kinds, including the manufacture of doors, windows, mouldings, screens, tables, etc., their plant being one of the finest and best-equipped in this section of the country.

In Stillwater, Minn., in September, 1882, Mr. Sheasgreen married Miss Mary Buckley, who was born in Newcastle, New Brunswick, and of their union eight children have been born, namely: Harriet, employed in the Times office, at Corvallis; Laurretta; Walter, yard agent for the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad Company, at Blodgett; Mabel; Ernest; Adelaide; Burnetta; and Carmel. Mr. Sheasgreen takes an active interest in all things pertaining to the welfare of the public, never shirking responsible duties, and giving generously both his time and his money toward the establishment of enterprise having for its object the betterment of the community. For the past six years he has been connected with the city fire department, serving as foreman for one year, and as chief since 1899.

Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is past master workman, and which he has represented at the grand lodge three different times; of the Benton County Citizens' League; and of the Pacific Coast Association of Fire Chiefs. Politically he is a stanch Democrat, and in religion is a Catholic, both he and his wife being members of St. Mary's Church.

GEN. FRANK REISNER. Personal characteristics of a high order, a thorough knowledge of a useful trade, patriotism, political sagacity, integrity and a clear understanding of the rights and prerogatives of citizenship, have conspired to make the career of Frank Reisner of paramount importance in the community of Eugene. Like that universally beloved hero, John Halifax, General Reisner knew all about the tanning business while his playmates still acknowledged allegiance to their teachers, for in Frankenhausen, where he was born June 24, 1839, his father, John Reisner, was a well known tanner for many years. The mother dying in her native land, the ambitious father brought his two sons and daughter to America in 1851, making the voyage in a sailing vessel and meeting with the extremes of calm and storm which usually attended the long and tiresome journey between Europe and American shores. Ten miles east of Indianapolis, Ind., the elder Reisner purchased a tannery, and conducted it with the success of former years up to the time of his death.

Educated in the public schools to a limited extent in both his native and adopted land, Frank Reisner served a regular tanner apprenticeship when sixteen years of age, and at the end of the required three years worked at his trade in various places in Indiana. An uneventful existence was interrupted by the outbreak of the Civil war, and the demand for the services of all able-bodied men. Leaving his trade at Columbus, Ind., he enlisted April 21, 1861, in Company K, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in for three years. At a later period he veteranized, having served in all four years and five months. Participating in the battles of Rich Mountain, W. Va., Winchester, Cold Harbor, the siege of Petersburg, Fort Fisher and Wilmington, he was wounded at the first siege of Petersburg, June 15, 1864, by a shell piercing his right groin, and was temporarily confined to the hospital. Nevertheless, he managed to keep with his regiment, of which he was orderly sergeant, and remained in Goldsburg until September, 1865. He was then ordered to Indianapolis, and was discharged from the service September 20, 1865.

After his war experience General Reisner worked at his trade in Indianapolis, and at the same time sought to make up for a somewhat defective education by attending night school at the Bryant & Stratton Business College. At a later period he built and managed a tannery at Taylorsville, Ind., and in 1869 removed to La Grange, Iowa, and engaged in farming and stock-raising for three years. Returning to Indianapolis, he worked at his trade for a couple of years, and in 1877 went to California with the expectation of making that state his permanent home. At the end of a year he returned to La Grange, disposed of his interests there, and came to Douglas county, Ore., in 1879. Successful as a stock-raiser, he remained on a farm until 1880, and then came to Eugene, where he was employed by Haines & Company, tanners, for about five years. During this time he did all of the finishing for the firm, and would have remained longer had not rheumatism incapacitated him for that kind of work. In order to escape the dampness and general disagreeableness of the tannery, he started a grocery store on Willamette street, conducting it for several years, and then sold out to become the bookkeeper and cashier for the Ax Billy department store, with which concern he remained for nine years.

From his first voting days General Reisner has considered it not only the privilege but the duty of every citizen to participate in the political undertakings of his neighborhood. In past years his special fitness has resulted in his election to local offices of importance. In 1892 he was elected county treasurer as the nominee of the Republican party, serving one term of two years. In 1902 he was elected city treasurer of Eugene, and re-elected in 1903. In July, 1902, he was appointed deputy county treasurer under George F. Craw, but the entire duty of the office has devolved upon his own shoulders, owing to the continued illness of his superior. In 1902 he was also elected clerk of school district No. 4, and thus at the present time his political responsibility is a large and varied one. Fraternally General Reisner enjoys a just popularity, and is associated with various orders in which the town and county abounds. At Taylorsville, Ind., he was past master of the Masonic lodge, and is now a member of Eugene Lodge, No. 11, A. F. & A. M., and Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M. He is also connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having been formerly a member of the Danville (Ind.) lodge; and of the Knights of Pythias, coming here from the Indianapolis lodge. For the past three years he has been commander of J. W. Geary Post No. 7, G. A. R., and in 1897 was elected department commander of the Oregon Department, Grand Army of the Republic, with the rank of general. This important command was sustained by Mr. Reisner with dignity and great satisfaction for one term, his personal popularity, wide knowledge of army affairs, and prominent connection with the Civil war entitling him to the grateful appreciation of his brother veterans. In his capacity of commander, General Reisner tendered the services of the Grand Army of the Republic in the absence of the militia, at the breaking out of the Spanish-American war, and in return received a letter of approval from Governor Lord, and also letters from his comrades all over the state expressing their willingness to serve at a moment's notice. It was declared that within twenty-four hours almost the entire combined army of veterans could have been gotten together for service. Some of the comrades, in their enthusiasm to be of service, responded to the appeal with telegraphic communication, one and all commending the tact and forethought of their genial and highly honored commander.

The marriage of General Reisner was celebrated while he was home on a furlough, January 15, 1864, at Columbus, Ind., and united him with Clementine McGill, who was born in Bartholomew county, Ind. Of this union there is one living child, Nellie, the wife of George Price, of Springfield, Ore. General Reisner is a member of the Lutheran Church. He is socially popular, and commands the universal esteem of all who know him.

CHARLES C. HUFF. As one of the men who have risen in the world solely on his own merits, Charles C. Huff is entitled to the credit universally conceded men of this character. He has one of the really fine and valuable farms in Benton county, located three miles southwest of Corvallis, and constituting a part of the old Bithers donation claim. His improvements are of the best, residence, barns, outhouses and implements conforming to modern and progressive ideas of agricultural science and rural home-making. General farming, stock-raising and dairying combine to furnish a congenial and profitable enterprise, Jersey cattle being raised in large numbers for their rich milk, and other stock contributing to a considerable stock business.

As early as 1830 the parents of Mr. Huff came from Germany and settled in Ohio, from where they removed to Marshall county, Ind., where he was born September 5, 1852. He was given a practical training on the home farm, and developed a strong constitution while performing the tasks which to his boyish mind seemed hard and exacting. As opportunity offered he attended the public schools in the winter time, and gained considerable experience through the sale of the various commodities grown on the Indiana farm. After his marriage with Mary E. Larkin he farmed independently for a time, and in 1880 came to Oregon, soon after purchasing a farm in Polk county, which he improved and lived upon until 1892. Disposing of his farm he bought his present farm of one hundred and forty-one acres, which has since been his home, and where he achieved signal success. Four children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Lulu Grace is engaged in educational work at Brownsville; Lucian Claude is at home; J. Floyd is at home; as is also Mabel F. Mr. Huff has taken a keen interest in local politics ever since his first voting days, and has ever adhered to the principles of the Democratic party. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World. Well informed on current events, in touch with the progress made in his line of occupation in different centers of activity, Mr. Huff is one of the honored and influential members of the community around Corvallis, and to an enviable extent enjoys the good will and friendship of his fellow agriculturists.

UEL L. FRAZER. The pride which all thriving and growing communities feel in their capable and cultured young men extends in large measure to Uel L. Frazer, a prominent hardware merchant, of Independence. Aside from considerations of a personal nature, Mr. Frazer is entitled to mention because of his association with one of the pioneer families of Yamhill and Polk counties, and because he is a native son of Oregon, having been born near Bethel, Polk county, February 18, 1871. His father, Lucien B. Frazer, was born at Versailles, Ky., and at twenty-one years of age, in 1852, crossed the plains with ox teams, locating with his brother, George, at Willamina, Yamhill county. Here he bought a large claim upon which he engaged in stock-raising, an occupation to which he devoted the greater part of his life. He finally sold his original claim and bought land on Salt Creek, Polk county, still later locating on a farm near Bethel, Polk county, where he secured a large tract and engaged in general farming and dealing in various kinds of fine stock. At the time of his death in 1900 he was sixty-seven years old, and was survived by his wife, formerly Elizabeth A. Campbell, a native of Iowa, and who is living in Independence. In the Campbells another pioneer family is represented, for James A. Campbell came west in 1853, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and locating on a claim near Salt Creek, where the balance of his life was spent in successful farming and stock-raising.

The eighth in a family of thirteen children, six sons and seven daughters, the successful hardware merchant of Independence was educated primarily in the public schools, afterward attending the State Normal, at Monmouth, from which he was graduated in 1892, with the degree of B. S. D. The same year he engaged in the hardware business in Monmouth, and in 1896 disposed of his business and engaged in school teaching in McCoy. In 1898 he removed to Independence and engaged as a clerk in a hardware store, and in 1901, with his partner, L. Rice, bought out the store of which he has since been manager. They carry a general line of hardware, and have a stock valued at about $10,000. Possessed of shrewd financial ability, and having a keen knowledge of human nature and its requirements, Mr. Frazer has also tact and consideration, traits which materially advance his interests.

In the fall of 1897 Mr. Frazer was united in marriage with Minnie M. Bunn, a native of the vicinity of North Yamhill, and daughter of John M. Bunn, born in the same section of the state. Mr. Bunn has materially contributed to the agricultural upbuilding of Yamhill county, where he owns a large property; and is successful as a general farmer and stock-raiser. Mr. Frazer is popular socially as well as commercially, and is active as a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World. He is a Republican in politics, and active in local affairs, having at two different times been a delegate to conventions. He is enterprising, public-spirited and honorable, and as such commands the appreciation and encouragement of the community.

WILLIAM T. HOFFMAN. Carrying on an extensive business as one of the largest grain buyers and dealers in Polk county, is Mr. Hoffman, of Monmouth, president of the Oregon Milling and Warehouse Company. A man of unlimited energy and ambition, he has been an important factor in developing the agricultural resources of this part of the state, attracting favorable attention to the quality and quantity of the grain here raised, and helping to place it in the most remunerative markets.

A son of the late Dr. Charles Hoffman, he was born July 26, 1869, at Grant, Grayson county, Va. He comes of German ancestry, his paternal grandfather having been an officer in the Prussian army. Charles Hoffman was born in Hanover, Germany, and there reared and educated. At the age of seventeen years, while attending a German university, he was forced to leave the institution on account of a student rebellion against the King of Prussia, and emigrated at once to the United States. Having received the degree of M. D. at a German university, he served as surgeon in the Mexican war, afterward filling the same office in the Confederate army. He traveled extensively throughout the Union, visiting most of the states, finally settling permanently in Grant, Va., where his death occurred, in 1897, at the age of seventy-six years. Dr. Hoffman married Sarah Grubb, who was born in Grant, Va., a daughter of William Grubb, a pioneer settler of Grayson county, and one of its most thriving farmers. Five children were born of their union, and of these one daughter has died, and three sons and one daughter survive.

After receiving his diploma from the Grant High School, in his native town, William T. Hoffman entered Glasgow College, at Glasgow, Ky., and was graduated therefrom, in July, 1888, with the degree of B. S. The following spring he started in life on his own account, on March 20, 1889, beginning work in an Idaho mine. A year later he came to Oregon, settling at first in the southern part of the state, where he was employed in a saw-mill for two years. Removing to Monmouth in 1892, Mr. Hoffman attended the State Normal School for a year, when, in 1893, he was graduated with the degree of B. S. D. The ensuing two years he taught school in Amity, Ore., being successful as a teacher. In 1895, in company with E. B. Jamison, he engaged in business as a grain dealer at Airlie, commencing on a modest scale, but as business increased the firm was merged into the Oregon Milling and Warehouse Company, Mr. Hoffman being made president, and Mr. Jamison secretary and treasurer. Additional room being needed, a new warehouse was built at Monmouth in 1896, and put in charge of Mr. Hoffman, the flour mills at Independence being under the management of Mr. Jamison. This company has built up a most profitable manufacturing and mercantile business, amounting to $100,000 per annum. Although Mr. Hoffman spent a large part of the years of 1900 and 1901 in Nome, Alaska, where he has an interest in the Holyoke mines, he has always retained his position with the company and has been an important factor in advancing its interests.

On March 11, 1902, at Oregon City, Mr. Hoffman married Miss M. E. Baker. Her father, the late Frank Baker, was born in Virginia, near Abingdon, and during the Civil war was a soldier in the Union Army. Subsequently moving westward, he located first in Missouri, living there until 1870, when he came to Oregon City, where he was successfully engaged in farming pursuits until his death. Mr. Hoffman is a warm advocate of the principles of the Republican party, which he supports by voice and vote, and is active in public affairs, at the present time being city recorder. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World.

JAMES REID SMITH. A thriving business man of Corvallis, and one of the leading hardware merchants, Mr. Smith is a fine representative of the self-made men of Benton county, who have steadily and surely climbed the ladder of success, winning by their own efforts places of importance in financial, fraternal and political circles. Commencing in life with moderate means, he has labored with persistent industry, and by superior management, prudence and shrewd foresight has established a large and constantly increasing business, one of the finest in the city, where he is familiarly known and much esteemed.

A native of Ontario, Mr. Smith was born July 8, 1858, in Waterdown, Wentworth county, a son of William Smith. His father was born in Ireland, but emigrated to Waterdown, Ont., where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Margaret Reid, was a native of the north of Ireland and a daughter of James Reid, who came from Ireland to America at an early day and located in Ontario, where he improved a farm, on which he spent his remaining days. Nine children were born of their union, six of whom grew to years of maturity, and five are now living, James Reid being the only one to settle in the United States.

After completing his studies at the district school, James R. Smith served an apprenticeship of three years at the tinsmith's trade in Waterdown, going from there to Port Sarnia, afterwards crossing the river into Michigan and settling, in 1880, at Winnipeg, Manitoba, where he worked at his trade four years. Coming to Oregon in 1884, he spent a short time in Portland, then went to British Columbia. In the fall of that year he returned to Oregon and began work as a tinsmith in Albany. The following spring he located in Corvallis, embarking in the hardware business, at the same time continuing his trade, for two years. Selling out his stock in 1888, Mr. Smith was employed as a tinsmith for two years in Corvallis, and then in Fairhaven, Wash., for a year. In 1891, returning to Corvallis, he bought out J. D. Clark and again established himself in the mercantile business, becoming head of the firm of J. R. Smith & Co., a position that he has since occupied. This firm carries on an extensive plumbing and tinsmithing business, and has an excellent trade in stoves, tinware and agricultural implements of all kinds, including Plano binders, the Deer & Coulton farming tools, Old Hickory wagons, and, in fact, everything necessary to stock a farm carried on with the latest and best improved machinery, his highest endeavor being to please his numerous patrons.

Mr. Smith married in Corvallis Miss Ollie Smith, who was born of pioneer parents in southern Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have one child, Grace Smith. Politically Mr. Smith supports the principles of the Republican party, being active in its ranks, and has been for a number of terms one of the county committee and of the county central committee. He was elected as councilman for a period of ten years, but resigned before the expiration of the term. As street commissioner he rendered the city valuable service, the sewer being put in operation while he was serving in that office. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order United Workmen.

FRANCIS L. HOLMES. One of the productive farms for which Benton county is famous is owned and operated by Francis L. Holmes, who came to Oregon in 1886, and who since that time has been deeply interested in the state's welfare and has aided in no small measure in her upbuilding. In addition to carrying on general farming and stock-raising on his tract of three hundred and eighty acres, he also owns three hundred and twenty acres of land which is heavily timbered.

It was in Sullivan county, N. Y., near Monticello, that Francis L. Holmes first saw the light of day, the day of his birth being April 17, 1840. Such advantages as the locality afforded for an education were not allowed to pass him by, and he diligently improved every opportunity, so that about 1866 he felt qualified to teach school. His first experience in this capacity was in Canada, where he remained two years, after which he returned to his former home in New York state, where he also followed the teacher's profession until 1868, when he again went to Canada, this time, however, with a different object in view. Purchasing a tract of timber land, he at once began clearing and improving it, and during the eighteen years in which he made his home there he transformed the wild, unimproved tract into a habitable farm.

The marriage of Mr. Holmes in 1870 united him with Miss Margaret Switzer, and five children have been born to their marriage, whom they have named as follows: Albert E., Bennett, Frederick W., Jessie F., and Ida A., deceased. Mr. Holmes' qualifications to serve on the school board have not been overlooked, and in calling him to the office of director the citizens have made no mistake, as his many years of good work in that capacity will testify. He has also been overseer of roads for several years, and is a member of the Grange. Politically he does not support either of the great organizations merely for the party's sake, voting rather for the man than the party. The family are identified with the Presbyterian Church, toward the maintenance of which they assist materially.

JOHNSON M. PORTER, who is manager of the electric light plant of Corvallis, was born in Lane county, Ore., October 24, 1859, a son of John A. Porter, a native of Springfield, Ohio. The grandfather, Ebenezer Porter, was a painter by trade and not only followed that pursuit in Springfield but also conducted a hotel there, and his death occurred in that city. He married a Miss Poe, whose father was one of the heroes of the Revolutionary war. John A. Porter also learned the painter's trade, which he followed for some years in the east, and then, in 1849, attracted by the discovery of gold on the Pacific coast, he joined an emigrant train which crossed the plains in search of the valuable metal. He did not remain long, however, in California, but came the same year to Oregon and was engaged in general merchandising in Forest Grove. Later he took up his abode in Lane county and engaged in the manufacture of lumber at Lancaster. About 1863 he removed to Corvallis, where he followed the painting business throughout the remainder of his active business career. His death occurred here in 1870, and the community mourned the loss of a valued citizen. Mr. Porter had served in the Cayuse Indian war under Colonel Cornelius. He had a brother, Robert, who was also one of the pioneer settlers of Oregon, coming here at the same time, and Robert Porter spent his last days in Washington county, this state. The mother of Mr. Porter bore the maiden name of Missouri Mulkey. She was born in Johnson county of the state whose name she bore, and was a daughter of Johnson Mulkey, a native of Kentucky, who removed thence to Missouri. In 1845 he crossed the plains to Oregon and obtained a donation claim in Benton county. The following year he retraced his steps to the Missouri valley, and in 1847 brought his family on the long overland trip to the northwest. By reason of his knowledge of the road he was made commander of a party which was known as the Mulkey train. He then located with his family on the donation claim, where he engaged in stock-raising, and at one time engaged in the raising of cattle in eastern Oregon. In fact, he was one of the most prominent stockmen and farmers of the Willamette valley, and his landed possessions comprised several thousand acres in Benton county, extending over a distance of several miles. He drove cattle to Lewiston, Ore., and on one of these trips, made in 1862, was so badly frozen that his death resulted. He passed away at The Dalles, and was there buried. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Porter were two children, J. M. and Otis, the latter a resident of Denver, Colo.

Johnson M. Porter was reared in Corvallis and obtained his education in the public schools and the old Agricultural College. In 1881 he went to Pomeroy, Wash., where he was engaged in the hardware and implement business as a member of the firm of Mulkey Brothers & Porter. He was there successfully connected with the trade until 1885, when he disposed of his interests and returned to Corvallis. Here in 1889, in connection with L. L. Hurd, he established the electric light plant, obtaining a charter and then building the works, which have since been rebuilt and improved. In February, 1890, the business was incorporated under the name of the Corvallis Electric Light & Power Company, and Mr. Porter has since been its manager.

In Albany, this state, on July 8, 1885, Mr. Porter was united in marriage to Miss Flora Rumbaugh, who was born in VanWert county, Ohio. Her father, William Rumbaugh, was a native of Pennsylvania, whence he removed to VanWert county, and in 1873 he came to Oregon, settling in Albany, where he became a large land owner. He was also county commissioner for several terms, and was a prominent and influential resident of his community. He married Elizabeth Stratton, who was born in Ohio and was descended from an old New England family. His death occurred in Albany in 1896, and his wife passed away in 1898. They were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in their family were six children, three sons and three daughters, all of whom reached years of maturity and are living in Oregon. Mrs. Porter was the third of the family and was educated in Albany College. By her marriage she has become the mother of one son, Fred J. Mr. Porter served as police judge of Corvallis for seven years, and socially he is identified with the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias lodge, and in the latter is a past chancellor. His entire life having been passed in Oregon, he is widely known and many of those who have been acquainted with him from his boyhood are numbered among his staunchest friends.

JOHN B. CORNETT. In perusing a record of the career of John B. Cornett we find an excellent example for young men just embarking in the active field of life, of what may be accomplished by a poor man, but one who is honest, prudent and industrious. His advantages in early life were limited indeed, and as he was one of ten children which comprised the family, his services were essential in the conduct of the home farm. His birth occurred in Howard county, Mo., August 12, 1832, and until seventeen years of age he remained at home with his parents, who were farmers in the latter state. The reports of gold found in California had invaded the quiet precincts of this Missouri farm and in 1850 we find John B., the youngest son, bound for that Eldorado in the west. His journey across the plains was devoid of any serious trouble with the Indians, and in due season he reached California. His first field of endeavor was in Eldorado county, where for the succeeding fourteen years he followed mining and prospecting.

It was in the year 1865 that Mr. Cornett first set foot on Oregon soil, coming direct to Linn county, where he purchased a tract of two hundred and thirty acres of rich land one and one-half miles east of Shedd's, which had formerly formed a part of the Savage donation claim. In 1871 he formed domestic ties and was united in marriage with Miss Sarah J. Savage, who had crossed the plains in the year 1851. One son, John B., was born to this couple, who is a stockman in Crook county, Ore., is married and has two children living, Marcia Allen and John Anthony.

All the improvements which are to be seen today upon Mr. Cornett's farm are the work of his own hands, as when he assumed control of the property it was in its primeval condition. Now the place is embellished with a well appointed residence, and outbuildings adapted for various uses have been erected. One hundred acres have been cleared and are under cultivation, and in carrying on general farming and stock-raising Mr. Cornett is meeting with good success. Mr. and Mrs. Cornett are members of the Baptist Church, and politically Mr. Cornett is a Prohibitionist.

JAMES L. HOWARD. At present living retired in a delightful home on the outskirts of Albany, that his children may have better educational advantages than were forthcoming on his farm in Yamhill county, James L. Howard is substantially anchored in the good will and esteem of an appreciative community, which regards him as representative of the self-made and successful agriculturists of the state. In fashioning his career Mr. Howard has surely derived inspiration from an enviable ancestry, many of whom in the early days of the history of the country held positions of honor and trust for the government. His father was a soldier under General Jackson in the war of 1812, and he, as well as his forefathers, was a farmer by occupation, priding himself upon his spirit of progress and ability to succeed in the world. For many years he lived on a farm in Tennessee, where James L. was born May 12, 1838, and when the latter was a mere child he was taken by his parents to Iowa, then very much of a wilderness, and reared to maturity with the nine other children in the family. Besides James, two other of the children are living, and of these, Charles is a resident of Washington, and Virginia is the wife of Mr. Birks, of McMinnville, Ore.

For several years after his marriage with Rachel L. Gillespie, James L. Howard lived on the paternal ranch, assuming the management of the same for his parents. Wishing to profit by the superior agricultural opportunities of the northwest, he arranged his affairs accordingly, and in the spring of 1864 crossed the plains with ox-teams, on the way encountering comparatively little trouble with the Indians. The party was on the road about five months, taking up their abode on a farm near McMinnville, where they lived for three years, and in 1867 moving to California, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising for twelve years. About this time he became somewhat dissatisfied with the west, and, returning to Iowa, remained there three or four years. Like the majority who have once lived on the coast, he longed to return, but instead of California, he settled in Oregon, purchasing the farm in Yamhill county upon which he lived until moving to his present home in 1902. He still owns the Yamhill county farm, and it is no exaggeration to say that it is one of the finest pieces of property in the county. Its soil has responded generously to the untiring industry of its owner, and many fine improvements have marked his progress from year to year. The two hundred and seventy-two acres were devoted principally to stock-raising and many fine specimens of horses, cattle and sheep found their way from his farm to the stock markets of the county.

The home of Mr. Howard near Albany consists of ten acres, under fine cultivation, and devoted to fruit-raising. The grounds, resplendent in shrubs and flowers and beautiful trees, and the fine, large rural dwelling, constitute one of the truly delightful and homelike places in this county. The greater part of Mr. Howard's life in the state has been passed in Yamhill county, and it was there that his political services were noticeable, where he held about all of the minor offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen. Always a stanch Democrat, he is nevertheless liberal in his tendencies, and believes in voting for principle rather than party. He is a member and active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church, his wife and children being members of the same organization. Some of his children are far away from home, Frank, the oldest son, being in the Palouse country; C. N. is in California; J. A. is in Albany; R. P. is in Yamhill county; Edward also is in Yamhill county; Willie is deceased; and Ernest and Ella are at home.

ADAM WILHELM, SR. Were one asking for the name of a man who more than any other represents the vital and substantial element of Monroe, the answer would unanimously be Adam Wilhelm, as enterprising and resourceful a Teuton as ever came from the Rhine country. True, he was but two years of age when his parents brought him to America in 1848, his birth occurring December 10, 1846, but through all of the trials of pioneership, the effort to surmount business and other obstacles, the traits of character which have contributed to the solidity of the German empire have remained with him, and in transplanted soil have met with the success due unquestioned merit and adaptive ability.

Leaving the sailing vessel in New York the Wilhelm family proceeded to Wisconsin, and there lived on a farm, in connection with the management of which the father ran a hotel for several years. Their son, Adam, the only one living of their two children, having started for the west in 1873 and sent back favorable reports of his adopted state, they joined him in 1880, settling at Monroe, Ore., where the father lived to be seventy-seven and the mother seventy-four years of age. Adam was reared on the Wisconsin farm, and married Elizabeth Miller, who was born in France, and with her engaged in independent farming for three years. Arriving in Portland in 1873 they remained there for a couple of months, afterwards visiting Corvallis, and January 1, 1874, came to Monroe and engaged in the saloon business, at the same time conducting a general merchandise store. This was about the beginning of the practical industry of the town, and his enterprises paid fairly well and put him on a creditable business footing in the community. In 1896 he became interested in milling, erected a mill here, and later put up one at Junction City and Harrisburg, the latter one of the finest in the state of Oregon. In time his milling interests assumed very large proportions, and he built warehouses in each town to house his commodities. As his sons have accomplished their majority he has taken them in business, and the firm of Wilhelm & Sons, general merchants and millers, have an enviable reputation for large business capacity and diversified usefulness. By far the largest merchants in Benton county, their store requires six large rooms, and they are contemplating the immediate erection of a building sufficiently large to contain all their goods under one roof.

The headquarters of the milling business of Wilhelm & Sons is located at Monroe, and they handle about all of the grain raised in Benton county. The firm own about four thousand acres of land, and are extensive raisers of high-grade stock, this department of their activity being conducted with the same thoroughness which characterizes their grain and mercantile ventures. There seems to be no limit to their capacity for managing successfully important money-making concerns in the west, and their aim seems to be continual enlargement of whatever they have already undertaken. With the exception of nine dwellings in Monroe, Mr. Wilhelm owns every house and building in the place, and no undertaking of any magnitude is ever carried to a successful finish without his earnest co-operation and practical assistance. Alert and watchful, he has stepped fearlessly and successfully into many waiting niches in the northwest, and has furnished a surprising example of what may be accomplished by sheer force of determination, and without any practical help. It is well known that Mr. Wilhelm started out in life with meager assets, none of which were convertible into ready cash, and that his present large holdings are evolved from a continuous and unremitting attention to business. Of the nine children born to himself and wife, Adam, Matt and Burnett are in business with their father, and all give promise of attaining to their sire's business sagacity and resourcefulness. George is living at home, Lawrence is in Lebanon, Ore., and Mary is also at home. Mr. Wilhelm is a Democrat in politics, and has been postmaster for many years, holding also all of the other local offices within the gift of his fellow townsmen. With his family he is a member of the Roman Catholic Church. He is a man of rugged integrity, kindly and sympathetic manner, and throughout his busy career he has been able to inspire others with faith in and co-operation with his many interests. The central and most influential figure in his community he is withal modest and unostentatious, taking his honors with that calm philosophy for which his countrymen are famous, and expecting to always succeed in all his undertakings.

HUGH BURNS GEARIN. Along the east bank of the Willamette river in Marion county is an enormous farming enterprise which well may be the envy of the smaller agriculturists of the Pacific northwest. It is a model estate, one of the largest and most scientifically developed in the entire Willamette valley, and is owned and operated by Hugh B. Gearin, one of the best-known pioneers of Oregon. It contains sixteen hundred acres of land, fourteen hundred of which are in one body. About eight hundred acres are under cultivation, the remainder being left for the most part in its primeval state of dense forest, out of which has come so much of the prosperity of Oregon. Its location is two miles from Champoeg and three miles from St. Paul, one of the most desirable situations, for commercial purposes, in the state—a fact that apparently is appreciated by the owner in his disposition of the vast property. The mind that is able to master all the details necessary to the operation of such a tract of farming land with a success proportionate to its extent is well worthy of a more careful analysis than naturally is accorded the average farm operator.

Hugh B. Gearin was born near Fort Wayne, Ind., October 9, 1849, a son of John and Ellen (Burns) Gearin. His father, who was the founder of the family in the northwest, was born in County Kerry, Ireland, in 1808. In his youth he learned the trade of shoemaker, at which he was employed for some years in his native land. In Ireland he married and in the early thirties brought his wife to America. Locating near Fort Wayne, Ind., he abandoned his trade and engaged in farming. In that state his wife died soon after their location there, and he afterward was married to Ellen Burns, also a native of Ireland, whose death occurred in Oregon in 1888.

With an outfit consisting of four yoke of oxen and the necessary outfit, John Gearin and his family started across the plains in 1851, arriving in Marion county after a journey consuming about six months. In the autumn of that year he purchased of a Frenchman named Guardupuis the title to a claim which is now included in the property owned by his son, paying the comparatively small sum of five hundred dollars to secure the title. The property consisted of a half-section, the greater part of which was under heavy timber. Here this earnest pioneer erected a small log house and at once settled down to the laborious undertaking of making a comfortable home and fortune for his family. How well his ambitions were realized may be imagined when it is stated that at the time of his death, in January, 1893, he was the owner of one thousand acres of rich land skirting the river. His operations consisted of general farming and stock-raising, and during his long term of residence in Marion county his name was associated with all that was honorable and of good report. He was a member of the Roman Catholic Church, a firm friend of good schools and good roads, and took an important part in all movements toward the general upbuilding of his community. He and his wife were survived by two sons: Hugh B., and John M., who has become one of the acknowledged leaders of the bar of Portland.

Hugh B. Gearin was educated in the public schools and at the Seminary at Oregon City. He was reared to work upon the farm, and in time mastered all the details of this business under the direction of his father. For many years he operated the farm in partnership with the elder Gearin, succeeding to the ownership and management upon the death of the latter ten years ago. He has increased his possessions during the period of his control of the property, and has taken advantage of every possible modern improvement for facilitating labor, engaging in the work scientifically. It evidently has been his ambition—and a most praiseworthy one—to convert his estate into the most attractive and productive in the Willamette valley, and in this effort he is succeeding beyond the most sanguine expectations of his young manhood.

October 27, 1881, Mr. Gearin was united in marriage with Mary C. Murphy, a native of Marion county, and a daughter of Andrew and Elizabeth (Cosgrove) Murphy. The Murphy family were pioneers of the early fifties, and Hugh Cosgrove, Mrs. Gearin's grandfather, settled near by in 1847.

Mr. and Mrs. Gearin have become the parents of eight children: Fred M., John A., Irene G., Basil H., Marcella E., Marie L., Cornelius Dewey and Harold J. Fred and John are students in Mount Angel College, and it is the intention of their father to give all the children the best possible educational advantages.

Mr. Gearin is a liberal-minded and progressive farmer, and his splendid property, his fine personal characteristics and his desire to co-operate conscientiously with the best element of the community in the betterment of the conditions and environments which surround him, insure him the continued regard of all with whom he is associated. The traditions and history connected with the life of his father unquestionably have been a source of great inspiration to him in his undertakings, and his children will be fortified in the beginning of their careers not only with a similar inspiring example, but with the added prestige of a literary education which their forefathers found it almost impossible to obtain in the earlier days of the commonwealth.

HON. PETER PARKER PALMER. The youth of today, rebelling in the midst of thickly crowding opportunities, but faintly realizes the difference between his own and the obstacles which hedged in the farmer lad in the central states during the middle of the last century. The very act of reaching the west, towards which all youthful and ambitious hearts turned in those days, entailed an amount of self-sacrifice and suffering before which the stoutest heart quails at the present time. Yet those boys, many of whom are now old men and towers of strength in their respective communities in the west, evinced Spartan courage in carrying their plans to completion, and with clear, far-seeing eyes prophesied, and worked, and realized beyond their fondest expectations. Such a one is Hon. Peter Parker Palmer, who arrived in Oregon in 1850 with very limited means, footsore and weary from his painfully long journey across the plains, but who has since drawn liberally upon the resources of his adopted state, and is now spending his declining years in retirement in Eugene.

Mr. Palmer, who is ex-representative, ex-inspector of customs, ex-farmer, and ex-merchant, spent the first years of his life near Georgetown, Sussex county, Del., where he was born October 5, 1826. His grandfather, John Palmer, of Scotch descent, is known to have been born in Delaware, and his father, Woolsey H. Palmer, also a native of Delaware, fired with ancestral fervor, played his fife in the war of 1812, at the time being twelve years of age. The fifer was the joy of the regiment, and was often carried on the shoulders of those who carried arms and risked their lives in the heat of battle. He was reared on the Delaware farm, and married Edith Goslee, a native daughter of Delaware, who bore him eleven children, of whom Peter is the third in order of birth and the only one to emigrate to the west. Until his twentieth year Peter had about three months schooling each year, and he afterward taught school in his native state for about a year. In 1847 he removed to Illinois and clerked in a store in Alton until 1850. During the spring of that year he started across the plains with a company of fortune seekers, intending to go to California. Instead, after arriving at Soda Springs the plans of the company were changed, and they came to Oregon. The journey was not unpleasant, although beset with dangers on every hand. The Indians, while not molesting them personally, relieved them of considerable of their stock, and few in the party had anything with which to start life in the west. Mr. Palmer secured work in a shingle mill, and afterwards learned the carpenter's trade, and had occasion to rejoice that the pay of the carpenters was $12 a day, for he was obliged to pay $14 a week for board, the price of commodities generally being in proportion.

In February, 1851, Mr. Palmer joined a party of gold-seekers, and with wagons, five yoke of oxen, and twenty-five hundred pounds of provisions, crossed the mountains to California. During the summer the party mined at Yreka, Cal., and in the fall of 1851 returned to Portland with at least some money to show for their pains. Mr. Palmer stopped overnight in Portland and went on to Douglas county, which he had investigated before, and been well pleased with its prospects. At Garden Bottom, below Winchester, he took up a claim of half a section, which he retained about four years, at the same time teaching school in the neighborhood. He also supplemented his comparatively limited education by attending the Umpqua Academy for a term. In Wilbur, Ore., he married Mary Slocum, who was born in Kentucky, and came to Oregon in 1852, and with whom he started a farming enterprise near the town. He afterward moved to a farm near Elkton, and still later near Gardner, where he was appointed inspector of customs during the Civil war, and held that position for nine years. During this time he also conducted a general merchandise business. After disposing of his various interests he purchased the Scottsburg donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. In connection with stock-raising he conducted a hotel and merchandise business in Scottsburg, his hostelry being known as the Palmer House, where travelers were well received, and found ample refreshment for the inner man. In 1900 he disposed of the store and hotel and farm at Scottsburg, and located in Eugene, where he has since lived in comparative retirement.

In his younger days Mr. Palmer had a strong leaning towards the Republican party, but of late years has zealously advocated the Prohibition platform. In 1886 he was nominated for the legislature on the Prohibition ticket, and also on the Republican, and elected by a large majority, serving his district with credit and satisfaction. While in the legislature he succeeded in passing the Prohibition amendment, and in other ways forwarded the best interests of the people of Douglas county. For a year he served as county school superintendent in Umpqua county, and about that time he served four terms as justice of the peace. The wife, who died in February, 1903, bore him eleven children: William E., deceased, was married and operated a sawmill in Drains, Ore., and was killed by a falling tree. He left two children, Edward and Ethel; Minnie and Percy died in early life; Albert C. is engaged in mining in Alaska; Elmer C. is employed by the Southern Pacific Railway at Ashland, Ore.; Elsey E. is living in southern California; Alcyone, the widow of Captain James Hill, resides in Oakland; Edith became the wife of Capt. Fred Earl and lives in Gardner, Ore.; Gussie, the wife of Dr. W. L. Cheshire, lives in Eugene; Annie, the wife of Capt. Frank Perry, lives in San Francisco; Mamie, Mrs. Francis Schlegel, resides in Portland.

PETER BASHAW. Few soldiers during the Civil war have paid more dearly for their devotion to a noble cause than has Peter Bashaw, a retired resident of Newberg, and who permanently lost the precious boon of health in the camp and field of the Union army. For the success which has come to him Mr. Bashaw owes naught save to an innate determination to make the best of discouraging conditions, in the face of which he has reared an interesting family and established a happy and comfortable home.

The establishment of the Bashaw family is interestingly interwoven with the early history of the country, the emigrating ancestor being the paternal grandfather, who was born in France, and, sharing a kindred interest in the colonies with La Fayette, accompanied that illustrious soldier on his unselfish mission to the states. From a money standpoint a millionaire, he went to Canada after his return to France, and bought large landed estates in the northern part of the country. From the first he espoused the cause of the United States, and as he had aided them in securing independence from English rule, so he helped them also in securing the boundary line east of the St. Lawrence river. His efforts were detected by a spy of the British government, who forthwith reported his misdemeanor, in consequence of which his northern lands were confiscated by the English. While hiding from the British after the disclosure of his part in the boundary question, he was attacked by a bear, a portion of his leg torn away, and he was smuggled into the United States by friends, who concealed him between layers of straw on a wagon.

It is presumed that this adventurous forefather brought up eventually in Vermont, for here his son, Louis, the father of Peter, was reared, and eventually succeeded to a farm. In 1849 Louis located in New York state, where he bought a farm on the highway between Bangor and Nicholville, which was a large farm for New York state, consisting of seventy-five acres. In 1868 he took his family to Pepin county, Wis., where he bought eighty acres of land, upon which his death occurred at the age of seventy-eight years. His last years were spent in comparative retirement, his health having been impaired during a two-years service with the Green Bay boys during the war. He married Mary Terrior, who was born near the Vermont line in Canada, and who died in Pepin county, Wis., in 1901. She was the mother of six sons and five daughters, all of whom attained maturity, Peter being the fifth.

The necessity for early assisting with the family support interfered sadly with the education of Peter Bashaw, although in later years, when physical work was denied him, he diligently applied himself to overcome this deficiency, and became a well informed man. He was born in North Allen, Vt., October 1, 1842, and accompanied his parents to New York state, where he was living when the call to arms agitated the little agricultural community. Forthwith he enlisted in Company I, Sixtieth New York Volunteer Infantry, and, connected with the army of the Potomac, participated in several important battles of the war. At the battle of the first Bull Run he was shot through the cords of the right leg, and though receiving the best of surgical and medical service in the hospitals of New York City and Washington, suffered intensely from the wound for almost two years after his discharge in New York City. His system was also seriously undermined by typhoid fever contracted in the service, and for many months he was compelled to walk on crutches. The little place left him by his father was sold to his brother in order to secure funds for medical treatment, and he was thus enabled to secure some benefit.

In 1886 Mr. Bashaw engaged in buying sheep, and after two years thus employed, managed to save a little money. With his brother and father he went to Wisconsin, where he continued to buy sheep, and though his health was very unsatisfactory, he felt justified in coming to Oregon in 1898, hoping much from a change of climate and surroundings. In Newberg he invested in town property, including the Owens cottage and hotel, and also bought the comfortable home in which his family are housed. Although he failed to receive the $100 bounty which should have come to him after the war, he receives a pension of $24 per month. The marriage of Mr. Bashaw and Josephine Manor occurred in Pepin county, Wis. Nine children have been born of the union, the order of their birth being as follows: Oris, living in Wisconsin; Delphine, the wife of Bert Lopian, a farmer of Dundee, Ore.; Lillie, the wife of William Martin, of Wisconsin; Arthur, living in Newberg; Mary, the wife of Si. Hammock, of Newberg; Rosa, now Mrs. Jesse Smith of Newberg; Annie Bell, Lena and Vernie, living at home. Mr. Bashaw is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. In political affiliation he is a Republican. In the family of Mr. Bashaw lives the mother of Mrs. Bashaw, who was born in Vermont, and before her marriage to John Manor was Amelia Bland. Mrs. Manor is eighty years of age.

JOHN W. PUGH. A very youthful pioneer of Oregon was John W. Pugh, who became a resident of this state at the age of one year. Upon attaining manhood he was satisfied to locate permanently among the scenes of his childhood, establishing himself on the farm which he now owns and occupies, two hundred and eighty-five acres, one and a half miles south of Shedd's, putting upon it all improvements, which make it one of the finest farms in the vicinity. He is now carrying on general farming and dairying, for the latter having twenty-six Jersey milch cows. Industry and energy, governed by intelligent thought, number him among the successful agriculturists of this notably successful section of the country. Mr. Pugh is not alone interested in agricultural pursuits, but has bent every effort toward the advancement of the interests of the community, through a wise administration of public affairs. He is active in the prosecution of church interests, as class leader, trustee and steward, and for nearly twenty-five years superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Methodist Episcopal Church, exerting a broad and helpful influence. The position of Mr. Pugh has been won through qualities which have given him the esteem and confidence of his neighbors and made him many friends.

The father of Mr. Pugh, Francis A., was born April 6, 1821, in Kentucky, from which state he removed with his parents to Illinois, where, as a farmer, his father gained a livelihood. The death of the elder man occurred there, caused by a stroke of lightning, after which the mother returned to her people in Kentucky, and the son was left alone. Later he removed to Iowa and there married Ruth Jessup, a native of Indiana, and in 1846 they started across the plains with ox-teams. The Platte river was reached in safety. From there two-wheeled wagons drawn by oxen was to have been the mode of travel, but there the Indians stampeded their cattle, which left them in a very uncomfortable, not to say dangerous, predicament. After much trouble they reached Whitman Station and there secured pack horses with which to continue the interrupted journey. One man had been killed, a Mr. Trimble. The remainder of the journey, however, was made in safety, six months after the time of starting finding them in Washington county, Ore. There Mr. Pugh took up a claim upon which they lived for about four years, in the spring of 1850 coming to Linn county, where he became the owner of six hundred and forty acres of land located one and one-half miles southwest of Shedd's, which remained the home of the family for twenty-eight years. In 1878 they removed to a farm near Athena, Umatilla county, and in 1881 they located near Spokane, Wash., where he carried on general farming and stock-raising, making a very extensive business of the latter. Six years after the death of his wife in 1895, at the age of seventy-two years,

Mr. Pugh removed to Spokane and there makes his home at the present time retired from active life. A very useful and practical life has been that of Mr. Pugh, his interest in political, educational and religious movements contributing no small part to the advancement of civilization in the pioneer lands, being a pioneer of both Oregon and Washington. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and one of its staunch and earnest supporters. Of the children born to himself and wife the eldest is John W., who was born June 18, 1845, in Henry county, Iowa; the remainder of the family being Melissa J., now Mrs. W. M. Stafford, of Washington; Felix M., of Spokane; Francis K., also of Spokane; and Sarah G., now Mrs. James Froome, of Waitsburg, Wash.

The education of John W. Pugh was received in the district schools of Oregon near his home, which he attended until his marriage in 1865 with Frances E. Thompson, a native of Missouri, whose parents crossed the plains in 1852 and settled in Linn county. He then removed to the farm which he now occupies, passing the intervening years in earnest, faithful work. The two children born of this union are Mary E., the wife of S. C. Caldwell, of Albany, and George B., of Brownsville. Mrs. Pugh died in 1870 and later Mr. Pugh married Nancy E. Walker, who had crossed the plains with her parents in 1852 from her native state of Arkansas. Their nine children are as follows: Estella, the wife of H. B. Taylor, of Seattle; Ernest G., of Seattle; Nellie J., wife of H. B. Satchwell, of Newberg, Ore.; Charles A., in Linn county; and Lura, Harvey G., Edith J. and John McKinley, all at home; and Effie, deceased. Mr. Pugh was again left alone in 1898 by the death of his wife.

As a Republican in politics Mr. Pugh served one term as county commissioner, always taking an interest in party work, and in his fraternal relations is a member of Oak Plain Grange and Woodmen of the World, which latter he was the first man in Linn county to join, having been a member in Corvallis.

HENRY L. BENTS. Though for some time a teacher in the schools of Oregon, Henry L. Bents has returned to the land upon which he was reared and to the pursuit of agriculture, for which his early training fitted him. He is the youngest of the three brothers of the Bents family, whose sketches appear in this work, the sketch of Fred Bents giving the history of the parents and of the removal from Switzerland in 1854 to a settlement on the Kansas farm, which was lost through a defective title, and the consequent trip to Oregon, where the father bought the land which the brothers now possess.

The birth of Henry L. Bents occurred near Kickapoo, Kans., February 28, 1862, the removal to Oregon taking place the next year. Upon the farm which his father bought he was reared, his early training being along agricultural lines, though his early-displayed love of books led his father to give him the benefit of all the schools within reach, giving him a course in the Oregon State Agricultural College at Corvallis after his studies at Butteville were completed. At the age of eighteen years he began teaching in the public schools, and being an exceptionally fine penman he added much to his income by private classes in this branch.

Upon the marriage of Mr. Bents, December 25, 1887, to Miss Agnes A. Smith, a native of Oregon and the daughter of John F. Smith, he gave up his position in the public schools. Returning to the home place, he settled upon the share which belonged to him, and with the same energy and thoroughness which had characterized his efforts at teaching commenced the improvement of the farm. He has since built a handsome house, barns, etc., which add much to the general appearance, in addition to the well cultivated fields which testify to his success as a farmer. He is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, though making a specialty of hop-growing, having been connected with his brothers in this latter business since 1881. In the last named year the Bents brothers began the cultivation of hops on five acres of land, and they now have seventy acres devoted to that product, from which they realize handsome profits. Henry L. is also engaged in hop-buying on an extensive scale. The location of Mr. Bents' farm is two and a half miles southeast of Butteville and about three miles from Aurora.

Through his personal integrity and the many years' experience in which he has conclusively proved his ability to cope with the adversities of the world, Mr. Bents has won a wide popularity, and his place in the community is an honorable one. For the past eight years he has served as secretary of the Hop-Growers' Fire Relief Association, and also fills that position in the Farmers' Fire Relief Association of Butteville, Ore., the territory of both associations including the entire Willamette valley, Mr. Bents having held the latter position for six years. At the present time these associations carry a business aggregating about $2,000,000. In fraternal orders he is prominent, being a member of Champoege Lodge No. 27, A. F. & A. M., of Butteville, and of Multnomah Chapter No. 2, of Salem, Ore. He also belongs to Butteville Tent No. 22, Knights of the Maccabees. Politically he is not a party man, reserving the right to cast his vote for the candidate whose election he thinks will be productive of most good for the country.

In his married life Mr. Bents has been blessed by three children: Leita May, Velma Ione, and an infant son.

ALFRED P. OLIVER, one of the prominent business men of Newberg, was born in Franklin county, Vt., in the town of Sheldon, June 20, 1858. The family became identified with the Green Mountain state through the emigration thither of D. R. Oliver, the father of Alfred, who was born in New York, but died in Vermont at the age of seventy-three years. He was a man dependent solely upon his own ability to grasp and utilize opportunities, left an orphan at the age of four years, and, though reared by an uncle, was early brought into contact with the serious and responsible side of life. In his young manhood he married Annie B. Marsh, a native of Sheldon, Vt., whose father, Philo Marsh, was born on a farm in Franklin county, Vt. Mr. Marsh engaged in farming during his entire active life, a vocation which netted him a comfortable and even affluent living, for he died at the age of seventy-five a comparatively wealthy man. The two sons and only children born to D. R. Oliver have inherited their father's enterprise and thrift, and of these, Charles A. is a wealthy and influential farmer of Sheldon, Vt.

Following upon his high school graduation, his thorough training as an agriculturist, and some practical business experience, Alfred P. Oliver removed to Michigan at the age of twenty-three, and for a year engaged as chief clerk for a steamship company. Returning to the east, he worked in a sewing machine factory in Massachusetts for a couple of years, and then in Minnesota engaged in the real estate business for a year. Following the tide of emigration to Dakota he had a more or less satisfactory business career, and after another sojourn in Minnesota came to Oregon with J. C. Colcord, a former friend in Massachusetts, and a record of whose life may be found elsewhere in this work. After the first winter in Portland Mr. Oliver came to Newberg, bought a farm in partnership with his friend, and later engaged in the real estate business until 1890. A practical innovation is credited to Mr. Oliver, that of utilizing grub-oak, in which the state abounds, for ax handles. He is at present secretary and treasurer of a company incorporated for $30,000, which is manufacturing ax handles, and in which he owns over one-half and the controlling interest. It is demonstrated that grub-oak, formerly used almost exclusively for firewood, makes a much finer and more durable handle than the eastern hickory. This discovery has resulted in the starting of a large manufactory which is not only able to supply its share of coast trade, but can keep two men representing its wares on the road.

Mr. Oliver is also interested in mining, and in the Yamhill Coal & Oil Company, of which he is one of the chief promoters. The prospects for this company are very bright, and the principals entertain great expectations in connection therewith. A farm of six hundred acres in the vicinity of Newberg is one of the valued possessions of Mr. Oliver, and he also owns considerable town property, including a large business block. He is foremost among all projects for the general improvement of his adopted locality, and bears in the community an enviable reputation for integrity and progressiveness.

JOSEPH M. ATKINSON. To students of scientific dairying the Spring Hill farm, owned by Joseph M. and Samuel W. Atkinson, offers superior opportunities for observation and research. Not only is this enterprise one of the finest in the state of Oregon, but if compared with those of Switzerland, Holland, or any of the old established dairying centers, would undoubtedly be found to possess the combined excellencies of all, improved by American ingenuity and enterprise. The fact that in no department of farming is there opportunity for greater care, good judgment, and business sagacity, than in that of dairying and stock-raising, is fully appreciated by the Atkinson Brothers, who have long since passed the experimental stage, and placed their business upon a solid and paying footing.

The Spring Hill farm consists of three hundred and thirty acres, one hundred of which have been placed under the plow, and the balance supplies pasturage for seventy-two head of cattle, comprising Jersey and other high grade cattle, and Mr. Atkinson sells large numbers of blooded stock all over the northwest. A comfortable income is derived from the sale of Poland-China hogs and bronze turkeys. The dairy barn, designed for that special use by the owners, and containing many innovations heretofore unthought of, is 80x60 feet in dimensions. Three driveways run through the barn, and it has a capacity of one hundred and fifty tons of hay, also a silo of one hundred and twenty-five tons capacity. The sewerage, ventilation, heating, and general arrangements are as complete as thorough students of dairying and stock-raising can make them, and the plans were perfected only after years of study along dairying lines. In connection with their farm the Atkinson Brothers maintain a creamery in Newberg, under the management of Samuel Atkinson, the partner of Joseph. The brothers buy up all the milk available from the farmers in the vicinity, and market their products in the city of Portland.

The early history of men successful in worthwhile walks of life are not only interesting, but profitable to those of like ambitions. Joseph M. Atkinson comes from sterling farming stock, and was born near St. Joe, Mo., February 21, 1870. His father, Robert, was born in Ireland, and after emigrating to the United States settled in Missouri with his parents, he being at that time but seven years of age. He became an extensive farmer and stock-raiser in the Old Bullion state, and in 1870 sold his farm and came to Oregon, settling first two miles west of where his son now lives. He bought five hundred acres of land, which he partially improved, and upon which he lived for three years, in the meantime disposing of three hundred acres of his land. He finally bought five hundred acres, a portion of which constitutes the Spring Hill farm. Before his death in 1891, at the age of sixty-five, he had sold two hundred acres of his property. While still living in Missouri he married Elizabeth Clemmons, a native of Missouri, and who died in Oregon in 1894, at the age of sixty-four years. Mrs. Atkinson was a daughter of Anthony Clemmons, a native of England, and a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Clemmons was also a farmer, and a very sweet singer, and he lived to the good old age of four score and four years. Twelve children were born to Robert Atkinson and his wife, one of whom died in infancy.

Joseph M. Atkinson was the sixth of the seven sons born to his parents, and he received his education in the public schools and at the Willamette Business College, graduating from the latter at the end of the two-years course. In 1888 he engaged in the hotel business in Astoria, Ore., for a couple of years, and in 1891 came to Newberg and took charge of the paternal farm. Eventually Joseph M. and Samuel bought out the other heirs, and now own three hundred and thirty acres of as fine farm property as can be found anywhere in the state. In Newberg Mr. Atkinson was united in marriage with Ranna E. Carter, a native of Vancouver, Wash., and daughter of W. R. Carter, born in Iowa, and who came to Oregon when a young man, settling on the farm adjoining that of the Atkinsons. One child, Mabel, has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson is a Democrat in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Woodmen of the World. His sterling worth as a citizen, his unsurpassed knowledge of dairying and stock-raising, and his public-spiritedness on all occasions calling for co-operation in worthy causes, make him an interesting and substantial addition to the agricultural and business interests of Yamhill county.

JAMES M. WRIGHT, for many years associated with important business interests in Newberg, was born in Clinton, Ill., December 24, 1840, a son of William and Leah (Harp) Wright, and grandson of Thomas Wright. Thomas Wright was born in North Carolina, where had settled his ancestors many years before, and he in time moved to South Carolina, and from there to Kentucky. He became one of the very early settlers of Illinois, settling in that state as early as 1818, and there improving a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. He was a very successful farmer and had the true pioneer thrift and industry. He died at the age of eighty-four years.

William Wright, the father of James M., was born after his father's removal to South Carolina, and was eight years of age when the family fortunes were shifted to the Illinois prairie farm. In time he became a large land owner in Illinois and a man of prominence in the community. Although a farmer all his life, he was never too absorbed in personal affairs to take notice of the demands upon his time and ability from outside sources, and he filled many positions of trust and responsibility. Always interested in politics, he served for a couple of years as county judge, and was a great promoter of the anti-slavery movement. In fact, he was a warm personal friend of the great emancipator, and to the end of his days it was a pleasure to recall that he had swung the ax in company with Abraham Lincoln, and participated in the making of the now historical rails. During the Black Hawk war he served in Lincoln's company and was otherwise in close touch with one of the greatest characters that America has ever known. He died on his Illinois farm at the age of eighty-two years, having been preceded several years by his wife, who was born in East Tennessee, a daughter of Tyra Harp, born in Tennessee, and an early settler on government land in DeWitt county. Of the six sons and four daughters in this family, James M. is the second.

At the age of twenty-one, September 10, 1861, James M. Wright enlisted for the Civil war in Company L, Fourth Illinois Cavalry, and at once began service under General Grant in the western campaign. He participated in the battles of Fort Henry, Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, Shiloh, Corinth, Hollow Springs and many others, and won the rank of corporal during the service. How narrowly he escaped death may be judged when it is known that two horses were shot under him, one at Shiloh, and one at Pittsburg Landing. He was discharged from the service at La Grange, Tenn., and forthwith returned to Illinois, where he was born, reared, and educated. His father having presented him with a farm, he lived thereon for several years, and was also engaged in the real estate business in Champaign, Ill., for five years, with the firm of McKinley & Co. This firm did a large business, and was one of the best known concerns in the county. Mr. Wright also gained further business experience as a general merchant near Danville, Ill., a venture no less successful than were his real estate transactions.

In the meantime Mr. Wright had disposed of his farm in Illinois, and as he had long appreciated the superior advantages of the west, in 1888 he decided to practically avail himself of them. Locating in Newberg, he at once became interested in the real estate business, and since that time much valuable town and country property has passed through his hands. In 1890 Mr. Wright organized the Yamhill Land Company, incorporated for $20,000, of which he was president and manager, and which started out under the most auspicious circumstances. Owing to the general depression of hard times this business went the way of many others of equally promising aspect, and closed up with a loss to the promoter of about $50,000.

Mr. Wright has erected a pleasant residence on the outskirts of Newberg, where he lives with his wife, Elizabeth A. (Keever) Wright, who was born in Indiana, March 25, 1845, and whose father, John Keever, was born in Ohio. Mr. Keever emigrated to Indiana at an early day, and from there removed to DeWitt county, Ill., but finally died in Indiana. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wright, of whom Oliver C. lives in Sumpter, Ore.; John K. lives in La Grande; and Mervia is at home; Erva, Ira J., and William W. are deceased. Mr. Wright is a Republican in politics, and has been justice of the peace for twenty-five or thirty years. He is a member of the Friends Church.

WILLIAM C. COOLEY. Interested in both political and business enterprises, the present mayor of Brownsville, William C. Cooley, is a man of prominence, through the exercise of keen, business judgment and quick decision adding greatly to the financial prestige of the town. He has always been active in local political movements, and has been twice called upon to serve as mayor of the city of Brownsville by the Democratic party, having previously been a member of the city council for several terms, and a member of the county central committee, in addition to which he has been prominent in the business circles of the city.

The father of Mr. Cooley, George Cooley, was born near Richmond, Va., July, 1831, and at an early date came with his mother and the remainder of the family as far west as Missouri, where he engaged in farming near Lonejack, occasionally acting as clerk in a general merchandise establishment. In 1853 he crossed the plains and located near Cottage Grove, Lane county, Ore., taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, and the next year he came to Brownsville, leaving his mother and younger members of the family upon the farm, and engaged as a clerk in a general merchandise store in this city, his remuneration to be $200 for the first two years, or at the rate of $100 per year. He has since remained in Brownsville, with the exception of a year when he was incapacitated for work on account of a broken leg. On recovering he again sought work in the store, remaining for a short time, after which he sold goods on a commission basis, and later engaged with W. J. Linville, now of San Bernardino, Cal. Some time after Mr. Cooley became a partner in the business Mr. Linville sold his interest to James H. Washburn, and for the ensuing twenty-one years Mr. Cooley remained in this connection, at the close of that time J. D. Irvine taking Mr. Washburn's place. In November, 1894, the entire financial interest became vested in the Cooley family, the father owning three-fourths and the son, William C., the remainder. The father also owns one hundred acres of land adjoining the city. He now makes his home in Brownsville, practically retired, still giving, however, a little time to his business interests. In his youth he married Harriet Blakely, a native of Tennessee, and daughter of James Blakeley, also of that state, and who gave up his farming and stock-raising interests in the middle west to cross the plains early in the '40s, and settle in Oregon, now making his home in Brownsville, at the age of ninety-two years. To Mr. and Mrs. Cooley were born six children, two sons and four daughters, the oldest of whom is William Currin, who was born December 5, 1859, in Oregon.

In addition to his preliminary education, received in the common schools of Oregon, William C. Cooley attended the private subscription school of this city. Until 1885 Mr. Cooley remained upon the farm, working for his father, at that time being compelled to act as clerk in the store on account of his father again breaking his leg, the same accident occurring four times. Since that time he has preferred a commercial life and has remained here, making an entire success of the venture, being now business manager of the establishment. The stock is valued at $9,000, this business being the largest of its kind in the city. In addition to his commercial interests Mr. Cooley owns thirty acres located near the city, twenty-six acres of which is devoted to the cultivation of hops. The ceremony which united Mr. Cooley with Callie Sawyer, of Tennessee, was performed in Brownsville, and of the marriage two children have been born, Arthur Carl, a graduate of the Albany Business College, being bookkeeper in a general merchandise establishment at Pendleton, Ore., and Etta Fay, at home with her parents, and is studying music. Fraternally Mr. Cooley is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, and in religion belongs to the Presbyterian Church. Being always interested in educational movements, Mr. Cooley has served for some time as school clerk and director.

JOHN M. WATERS. More than passing interest is attached to the career of John M. Waters, a pioneer who came to California in 1849, and from the precarious occupation of mining stepped into the more stable lines of activity represented on the coast, becoming in time one of the most substantial and reliable of the up-builders of Linn county. Born on the banks of Lake Erie, in Ashtabula county, Ohio, January 21, 1833, his ancestors were among the early settlers of Rochester, N. Y., and are credited with building the first flouring mill of that city. His parents, William and Rachel (Cox) Waters, were born in Rochester, and some years after their marriage located on a farm bordering on the shores of Lake Erie, in Ashtabula county. In 1838 they removed to Indiana, settling on a farm in Warrick county, near Booneville. In 1847 they located on a farm sixteen miles west of Burlington, Henry county, Iowa, and here the mother, who had reared a family of ten sons and one daughter, died, leaving many friends to mourn her loss.

The news of gold in the west penetrated the quiet agricultural region in which dwelt the Waters family in Iowa, and John M., then sixteen years old, gladly joined his brother and Edward Ford in formulating plans to cross the plains. They had one wagon and an ox team, and the train with which they started was composed of twenty-two wagons. All proved good travelers, and the distance between St. Joseph, Mo., and Sacramento, Cal., was covered in the short space of one hundred and five days. Probably no member of the party journeyed westward under more trying circumstances than did John Waters, for early in the journey he broke his leg, which must have received good treatment, for after the third day he was enabled to do his share of walking on improvised crutches. These three boon companions had many trying and many pleasant experiences in the early mining days, but success attended their efforts in a moderate degree, although the accident prevented John M. Waters from doing any actual mining around Hangtown. All had a hand, however, in discovering the big bar on the Cosmers river, which find afterward yielded thousands to its promoters. Although somewhat disabled John found driving a team between Sacramento and Hangtown comparatively easy work, and this he did for two months, returning then to the mines, where he built the first cabin at Mud Springs in the fall of 1849. Grief invaded this little primitive camp during the cold of the winter, for William Waters died, leaving his brother disconsolate among crude and dismal surroundings. Arousing his courage with the coming of spring, he bought a team of horses and went to the mines at Reddings diggings, where he engaged in teaming and eventually made his way to San Francisco.

Arriving in Portland via steamer in the winter of 1853, Mr. Waters came to Linn county and upon his donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres built his home and afterwards helped build the first house in the town of Harrisburg. During 1858 he conducted a farm in Josephine county, and then returned to Harrisburg, where he purchased an interest in an old mill with Jack Hall. For nineteen years this mill ground the greater part of the grain for the surrounding farmers, becoming the most prominent center of activity in that section of the county. Mr. Hall stepped out of the business in 1862, his brother-in-law, Asa A. McCulley, purchasing his stock, and continuing the enterprise as before. In 1877 Mr. Waters sold his interest in the mill and transferred his business ability to the Brownsville Flour Mill, increased the capacity by substituting a new process, and afterward disposed of the same to the Brownsville Woolen Mill. In 1890 Mr. Waters became interested in constructing a one-hundred-barrel mill in Seattle, Wash., but not having sufficient capital to run it, the company was obliged to close down. Since returning to Brownsville he has lived retired, having established an unexcelled reputation as a miller, and acquired a very comfortable competence.

In the days of his dawning prosperity near Harrisburg, Mr. Waters married Ellen Moore, of Tennessee, and seven children have been born of the union, three of whom are living: Mary Jane, the wife of Mr. Morelock, of Gold Hill, Ore.; Rachel Ann, now Mrs. Cartwright, of Boise City, Idaho; and John Hamilton, of Emmett, Idaho. Considerable prominence of a political nature has resulted from Mr. Waters' association with the Republican party, to which he has owned allegiance ever since the formation of the party. He has been a member of the town council for many terms, was mayor one term, and served as county commissioner for four years, between 1892 and 1896. His service has been absolutely devoid of any effort to advance personal interests at the expense of the community. He is well known and popular in fraternal circles, being identified with the Masonic fraternity, Blue Lodge, Royal Arch Chapter and Albany Commandery, Knights Templar, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. With his wife he worships at the Baptist Church, towards the support of which he is a liberal and always gracious contributor. Mr. Waters represents the best of the pioneer element of this community, his claims to recognition resting upon solid and substantial traits of character, and upon equally meritorious business success.

FRANCIS TILDEN KEYES. Like the links of an unbroken chain leading back across the years is the memory of one of the old settlers of Yamhill county, Ore., as with a continent between, he remembers and speaks of those who lived in the time of his youth, and before. Back in New York state the people of his name were born, living their lives peacefully in the midst of the plentitude of the Empire state until a pioneer was born into the family in the person of the old settler of Yamhill county. The grandfather, Elijah Keyes, of Irish descent, was a merchant tailor by trade; his son, Marquis De Lafayette, was born in Bloomfield, N. Y., February 10, 1797. The principal part of his life was spent in the double business of tilling the soil and conducting a general merchandise store in Conesus, Livingston county. In 1860 he met reverses in his business, and during the remaining years of his life he made his home with his children. He died in Livingston county at the age of ninety years, leaving many to mourn the loss of a good and upright man. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which he had served as deacon for many years.

His wife was Sarah Chappell, born in Massachusetts, the daughter of Edgcomb Chappell, also a native of that state. He was a farmer, and history records him as one of the many farmers of New England who left their plows in the furrow and used their horses to ride to the defense of the country they loved and served. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, doing his duty without thought of reward, save in the success of the cause for which he fought. He was interested in all that gave promise of ultimate good for his native land and it was his honor to be one of the founders of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, giving largely to the support of this institution. Mr. Chappell died in Lima, N. Y.

The union of Marquis De Lafayette Keyes and Sarah Chappell was blessed by the birth of ten children, six sons and four daughters, the sixth child and fifth son being Francis Tilden, born in Livingston county, N. Y., November 30, 1830. In the common schools of New York, Francis T. received a very fair education as learning was estimated in those early days, and at the age of sixteen he secured employment on a farm, where he worked for some years. With a spirit of restlessness certainly not inherited from his immediate ancestors he left New York, April 20, 1853, en route for California by way of Nicaragua, reaching San Francisco May 21 of the same year. In common with the greater part of the population of the west, he tried mining for about two months, succeeding but indifferently. After this period, leaving for Oregon, he located at Independence, Polk county, where he went to work as a farm hand. Two years later, in 1855, he went to Yamhill county, beginning the purchases of land that formed a part of his early planning for the home he expected to make in the west. He bought first one hundred and sixty acres one mile north of Dundee, following this with another of the same amount, also twenty-seven and a half acres. Meeting with nothing but prosperity, it became an easy matter to add to his already broad acres, and at one time he owned nine hundred acres, the greater part of which, however, he soon converted into money. From 1855 he had been more or less engaged in milling, running the mill located near his home for eight years, being chief miller. After the misfortune of losing his mill by fire, he superintended the Chehalem mill near Newberg for two years, and since that time has been engaged in farming.

Mr. Keyes is a Republican in his political affiliations and during several years past has very often been the choice of the people for various offices that are at the disposal of his party, being constable and road supervisor at one time. He has always been interested in all school questions and duties, serving intelligently as school director in his community for some time. He was later appointed a judge of election, having served in that capacity for twelve years, and as clerk six years.

Mr. Keyes married Miss Mary Corzine, who died May 11, 1887. She was a native of Little Rock, Ark., born July 24, 1841. Her father and mother had emigrated from Arkansas in 1843, settling in Salem, Ore., where the mother died in 1849. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Keyes were, in order of birth: Laura, now Mrs. J. D. Hardwick, of Salem, Ore.; George Lincoln, who met with a sad fate, being burned to death; Cornelia, now Mrs. Nicholas Wall, of Dundee, whose husband is a farmer; Frank, living on the home place; Clara, who became Mrs. Edwards, and is now deceased; Grace, wife of Joseph Etwiler, who is engaged in farming near Newberg; May, wife of Elmer McCleery, engaged in farming near Salem. Mr. Keyes now makes his home with the son who is his namesake.

JOSEPH H. TEMPLETON. The donation claim upon which William Templeton located in 1847 is now owned by his sons, of whom Joseph is one of the most ambitious and successful of men. He was born in Holt county, Mo., February 17, 1842. William Templeton, his father, was born in Rockbridge county, Va., October 15, 1809, and at an early day moved with his parents to Henry county, Ind. Here he married Elizabeth M. Ramsey, of which union there were born thirteen children, eleven of whom came across the plains with their parents in 1847 from Holt county, Mo., where they then lived. Two wagons with four yoke of oxen each, a few cows, and plenty of provisions were gathered together for the expedition, the start being made in the early morning. The elder Templeton took up a section of land three miles east of Brownsville, and erected the little log cabin in which the family started housekeeping in the wilds of Oregon, their neighbors remote, and their immediate prospects not particularly encouraging. The father had some strong young sons to help him clear and cultivate his land, and soon there was in working order a little family community, harmoniously working against great odds for the right to enjoy some of the comforts of life in future. The year after his arrival the father tried mining in California for a short time, making his way there by pack horses over the mountains, and returning by steamer from San Francisco to Portland. He was not successful as a miner, and was glad to return to the slower but far more reliable occupation of tilling the soil. His death occurred on his home farm, January 19, 1882, and those left behind mourned a faithful husband, devoted father, and worthy man. His wife survived until May 8, 1898, she having been born February 13, 1812. Both of these people were prominent in their neighborhood, and exerted an influence for good at home, in the church, and in a social way. Both were devoted members of the Presbyterian Church at Brownsville, and helped to organize it, giving generously of their time and means for its continued upbuilding. Mr. Templeton was a staunch Republican, and in the early days served as justice of the peace.

Five years of age when he came to Oregon, Joseph H. Templeton was reared and early taught to make himself useful around the home farm, for it was the policy of the parents to train the children to habits of thrift and industry, and no drones invaded the family circle. As a young man he met and became interested in a young neighbor, Emma Hudelson, and the result of this association culminated in marriage, December 13, 1883. With his wife, Mr. Templeton settled on one hundred and eighty-two acres of the paternal claim, and the industry and good management of the husband, and the help and sympathy of the wife have brought about more than expected good fortune. General farming and stock-raising are engaged in, and ever since 1876 a large hop-yard has been an adjunct to the farm. Mr. Templeton is greatly interested in the cause of education, and has exerted a progressive influence as a member of the school board for five years. He is also a member of the Presbyterian Church, and, like his father, is active in its charities and general maintenance. To Mr. and Mrs. Templeton were born two children: Leighton F.; and Raymond D. The wife of Mr. Templeton died October 2, 1892. She was a devout member of the Presbyterian Church, a devoted wife and a kind and loving mother. She was buried in the McHargue Cemetery near Brownsville. She was born April 20, 1862, in Henry county, Ind., where she lived until a short time before her marriage.

GREENBURY SPLAWN. One of the finest stock farms along the Calapooia river in Linn county is that owned by Greenbury Splawn, who represents one of the early pioneer families of this state, and who was three years of age when he came here in 1850 from Holt county, Mo., where Mr. Splawn was born June 19, 1847. Moses Splawn and his wife, Ann (Riggs) Splawn, natives respectively of Missouri and Kentucky, were married in the former state, and for many years lived there on a farm in Holt county. Several children were born into their family, and the father finally determined to investigate the truth of the glowing reports which came to him from the west. Accordingly, he sold his farm, and with the money outfitted to cross the plains in the spring of 1850, purchasing two wagons, each having three yoke of oxen, and taking with him one cow to supply milk for the travelers. All went well at first, and the Indians were not very troublesome, but the dreaded cholera invaded the ranks of the party. The father and oldest son, John, the two mainstays of the wife and younger children, succumbed to the disease, leaving the rest to complete the journey alone. Fortunately there was remaining one son about nineteen years of age, and he drove the oxen the rest of the way, and cared for his heart-broken mother and fatherless brothers and sisters. Arriving in Linn county, Ore., the wife and son took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Holley on the Calipooia, which farm is still in the possession of the family, a portion being occupied by Greenbury Splawn. Here the mother lived to the good old age of eighty-six years, and during her many years in the west she doubtless viewed with pride her splendid property along the river bank, stocked with high-grade cattle, and with its productive soil yielding abundant harvests.

Reared as are the average farmer lads of the country, Greenbury Splawn was above all else industrious and conscientious, and was so well versed in general agriculture that he assumed the entire management of the farm upon attaining his majority. With the exception of two years spent in farming in Lane county, he has since made the old home his own abode, and has not only successfully operated the land left by his mother, but has added thereto, and now owns five hundred and fifteen acres. He is engaged in general stock-raising and farming, making a specialty of Shorthorn cattle. One hundred and twenty-five acres are under cultivation and the rest devoted to pasturage.

In establishing a reputation as one of the foremost farmers in his neighborhood, Mr. Splawn has had the assistance of a capable and sympathetic wife, whom he married March 28, 1869, and who was formerly Amanda E. Matlock. Seven children have come to gladden his home, the order of their birth being as follows: John T.; Nora; Effie and Etta, twins; Frank; Jesse M.; and Ida; all at home. Mr. Splawn is a Democrat in politics, but he has never striven for political preferment. He is progressive and public-spirited, and bears an enviable record for good farming and fair dealing.

ASHER F. HAMILTON. The mercantile business of Asher F. Hamilton of Holley, though a comparatively new undertaking, would seem destined for many years of success, judging from the patronage accorded it during its three years of existence. His father, Silas Hamilton, was engaged in farming near Waukegan, Ill., when Asher F. was born. Silas Hamilton was born in Genesee county, N. Y., was reared on a farm, and as a young man went alone to Illinois, where he lived for several years, married Anne Ferry, a native of Massachusetts, and then locating in Berlin, Greenlake county, Wis., afterward started the store which gave him his first start in life. He moved to Wisconsin when Asher F. was a small boy, and late in life came to Holley, Ore., where his death occurred September 17, 1894, at the age of seventy-six years.

As a boy A. F. Hamilton worked in his father's store, and in time went to Chicago and took a course at a commercial college. An opportunity to come west in 1866 with Colonel Sawyer was readily taken up, and he crossed the plains with his employer with ox-teams, remaining with him for a year in his California home. He then returned via the Isthmus to his home in Wisconsin, engaged with his father in the mercantile business, and again came to California in 1870. Two years later he went again to Wisconsin, returning to the west in 1873, and settling permanently in Oregon. In Linn county he became interested in farming, but soon abandoned it for a general merchandise business in Sweet Home. Six years later he again resumed farming for two years. He then established a general merchandise business in Holley, four years later returning to the farm, but since the fall of 1900 has conducted his store in Holley.

March 2, 1873, Mr. Hamilton married Mary E. Crane, daughter of James Elliott and Rachel (Fike) Crane. Mrs. Hamilton was born in Sacramento, Cal., and was reared in the middle west. She is the mother of eight children: Olive Lulu, wife of Cyrus V. Barr, of Sweet Home, Ore.; Fannie Rachel, wife of W. R. Mealey of Foster, Ore.; Charles Asher, married and living with his parents; William Silas, of Altoona, Wash.; Ruth May; Jennie Mabel; Bessie Pearl; and James Harley. Mr. Hamilton is a Prohibitionist in politics, and has been postmaster of Holley during all the years of his residence there. He has served on the school board both as trustee and clerk, but is not a politician, caring little for offices in general. With his wife and family he is a member of the Advent Christian Church of Sweet Home. In all of his undertakings in the west Mr. Hamilton has been successful, and has won a reputation for fair dealing and progress, as well as for tact, kindness and geniality.

FRANCIS MALONE. As one of the pioneers who came to Oregon without capital, and upon the foundation of grit and determination accumulated a competence through a correct understanding of the chances by which he was surrounded, Francis Malone is entitled to mention among the forerunners of civilization in the northwest. His earliest years were spent on a farm near Lone Jack, Tenn., where he was born October 9, 1834, and whence he removed with his parents at the age of six years to Cass county, Mo. Monotonous and uneventful, his life was passed on a farm until the spring of 1852, when he joined a caravan bound for the undeveloped west, of which he had heard much from returning travelers. For nearly six months he tramped beside the slowly plodding oxen, glad of the falling darkness which permitted rest for his weary feet. With the dawn the party was up and doing, and he helped to feed and yoke the oxen, and to do such other things as were required of a man working his way across the plains.

The first winter in Linn county Mr. Malone split rails for a living, and in the spring of 1853 went to the mines in southern Oregon, returning at the end of a year to Linn county. He then took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Holley, where he kept bachelor quarters for a couple of years. October 15, 1858, he was united in marriage with Ellen Splawn, daughter of Moses Splawn.

In 1863 Mr. Malone removed to the farm now occupied by his wife and children, and which, at the time of his death, October 15, 1890, contained eighteen hundred acres in one body. This enormous farm speaks volumes for the enterprise and good business management of the owner, for it is unincumbered and valuable land, two miles of it being in the bottoms. He inaugurated many fine improvements, built extensively, and engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Frugal and industrious, honorable and thrifty, he saved more than he spent, and thus always kept ahead financially. The great farm is now occupied by his wife and children, among the latter being Nancy, who is the wife of Murray Barrett; Thomas J. married Eliza A. Weddle; Lizzie, who is the wife of Perry McQuinn; Sarah, deceased, was the wife of Jerry Keeney; Ida is the wife of P. L. Robinet; and Clara. Mr. Malone served in the Indian war of 1855-6, and for three months fought the red men on the upper Columbia and in the Walla Walla country. He was a man who made many friends as he went through life, and what is better, retained them for many years. He contributed not a little to the upbuilding of the county in which he lived, and at all times maintained the best possible agricultural standard. His widow has recently been awarded a pension on account of Mr. Malone's service in the Indian war.

JAMES AGEE. It was the fortune of James Agee to be born very near the city of St. Joseph, Mo., from which town the emigrants were taking their way into the new lands of the west, and it was therefore a matter of no wonder that the parents early joined the westward trend of civilization. He was born in Dekalb county, Mo., July 17, 1844, the son of Isaac and Cordelia (Thornton) Agee. In the spring of 1852 the father gathered together his worldly wealth, and with his wife and eleven children he crossed the plains with two wagons drawn by ox-teams, and several head of cattle and oxen, with which to begin the work of farming in their new home. The journey was ended safely and the first location decided upon was in Yamhill county, between Sheridan and McMinnville, where Mr. Agee took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres. This was the last home of the head of the family, for there he remained until his death in 1901, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. He had proven himself a sturdy pioneer of the new land, giving his strength and intelligence toward the cultivation of the broad acres of the state, and his influence toward the western growth. Two of his sons, William and Wilson, proved valiant soldiers in the Cayuse war.

James Agee was eight years old when the journey across the plains was made and he remained at home until he was twenty years old, when he began to work for his brother. Three years later he went to Walla Walla, Wash., and remained for one year, when he returned to Yamhill county and bought a farm of four hundred acres, and there spent the ensuing ten years of his life. At the expiration of this period he made another purchase of land, embodying six hundred and eighty-six acres, upon which he lived for sixteen years, leaving then and locating near Sodaville, in Linn county, principally on account of ill health. He has since made this his home, now owning forty-six acres adjoining McMinnville, and on his farm of four hundred acres being engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

The first marriage of Mr. Agee took place in 1869 and united him with Miss Fannie Murray, by whom he had ten children, the three now living being as follows: Rufus P., Wilber and Isaac Newton. His second wife was Mrs. May Murray, the widow of Charles Murray. Mr. and Mrs. Agee have one child, Hubert J. In politics Mr. Agee is a Democrat, and fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of McMinnville, and also belongs to McMinnville Lodge No. 43, A. F. & A. M.

ROBERT R. TEMPLETON. Although born in Holt county, Mo., October 3, 1846, Robert R. Templeton owes his early training, start in life, and subsequent success to the environment in Oregon to which his parents brought him when a little more than a year old. His entire active life has been spent in the country, in farming, stock-raising, trapping and hunting, and since July, 1900, he has lived on his present farm of three hundred and seventeen acres, fifteen of which are devoted to hops. Mr. Templeton's father, William, was born in Virginia, and his mother, Elizabeth (Ramsey) Templeton, was born in Pennsylvania. The parents moved at an early day to Holt county, Mo., and lived on a farm there until crossing the plains to Oregon in 1847. The family party was a large one, for there were eleven children, and the preparations for sheltering and feeding all during the long journey were necessarily extensive. They had two wagons, many pairs of oxen, a few cows and one horse, but when they got to Tygh Valley, just before crossing the mountains, they discarded one of the wagons and came the rest of the way with the other. Mr. Templeton located a claim of six hundred and forty acres three miles east of Brownsville, along the Calapooya river, the greater part of which was fertile and productive, and waited but the industry of man to convert it into a source of great profit. This industry Mr. Templeton possessed in great measure, and he was also a good manager and practical business man.

Robert R. grew to manhood on the Linn county farm, and when old enough to go to school received his elementary education in a little log school house. At the age of twenty-one he went to eastern Oregon and engaged for a year in trapping and hunting, bringing back with him some particularly fine pelts, and gaining material for some exceedingly interesting stories of bear and other large game of that region. Returning, he spent a year and a half in Tacoma, Wash., and then bought a farm with his brother, William, and conducted the same for a year. This farm was located near Halsey and after disposing of it Mr. Templeton engaged in the stock business at Pinesville for about nine years, returning then and settling on a part of his father's farm.

In 1882 Mr. Templeton was united in marriage with Ollie Montgomery, of which union there have been born five children: Bessie, Ada, Clyde, John and Andrew. The last three named children are deceased. Mr. Templeton's present farm is a portion of the old homestead of which he took possession in July, 1900, as heretofore stated. He has made many fine improvements, and in his manner of conducting his property is abreast of the times, having the latest of agricultural implements. Mr. Templeton has taken an intelligent interest in Republican politics, serving as a member of the school board, for many years. Both himself and wife are active members in the Presbyterian Church, and he has been an elder in the church four years. No man in this community bears a better reputation or one more in accord with a wide-awake and progressive agricultural region.

JOHN OSBURN. One of the thrifty and thriving farmers of Polk county is John Osburn, a well-known citizen of Independence, a town which is fortunate in having been settled by a remarkably enterprising, industrious and intelligent class of people. A man of upright principles and good business ability, he has won well deserved success through his own energetic efforts and wisely directed toil, and while advancing his own interests has given material assistance in developing the resources of his town and county. John Osburn was born in Orange county, Ind., August 25, 1831, and acquired his early education in the old log schoolhouse which constituted the entire educational equipment of that region. Reared to habits of diligence, he commenced when quite young to assist in the care of the home farm, remaining with his parents until 1850. Ambitious then to enlarge his field of operations, he joined an emigrant train of three wagons bound for Oregon, paying $100 for his fare. During the six months that he was on the way, he walked the greater part of the distance, driving one of the teams. Settling first in Oregon City, he remained there until the spring of 1851, when he proceeded to Salem. In March, 1852, he went to southern Oregon to engage in mining on Jackson Creek, in Jacksonville. Soon after he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres on Little Butte, and was engaged in stock-raising and mining for several years, being quite prosperous in both branches of industry. Also, in company with P. P. Prim, he did considerable prospecting in that section of the state. At intervals during his residence there serious trouble with the Indians arose, and Mr. Osburn took an active part in some of the engagements of those years, serving from August 8, 1853, until November 1, 1853, under Capt. J. F. Miller, in the Rogue River war. Subsequently, in the Rogue River war of 1855 and 1856, he served for eight months as second lieutenant of Company G, under Capt. Miles F. Alcorn.

Disposing of his ranch on the Little Butte in 1863, Mr. Osburn went to Idaho, where, for two years he was employed in mining operations at Florence City and Idaho City. Meeting with but little success there, he left Idaho in 1865, coming to Polk county, Ore., to look after his present farm, or at least one hundred and seventy-four acres of it, which he had received in exchange for a band of bronchos, trading while on the way to Idaho. The land was wild prairie, and this he has since transformed into a finely cultivated, rich and productive farm, adding all the improvements since he came here. He has also bought adjoining land, his estate now containing two hundred and fifty acres of land, which is devoted to general farming, stock-raising and dairying.

In 1867, in Benton county, Ore., Mr. Osburn married Harriet Martin, who was born in Iowa in 1846. Her father, Jacob Martin, was among the pioneer settlers of Benton county, removing there with his family in 1847. Mr. and Mrs. Osburn have five children, namely: Orange, a resident of Salem, Ore.; Mrs. Estella Barker, of Baker City, Ore.; Ernest, living in Alaska; R. D.; and Lettie Huntley, at home. Mr. Osburn is a member of Oak Grove Grange, and has rendered his town excellent service as road supervisor, school clerk, and school director. In politics he is a staunch Republican, uniformly casting his vote in support of the principles of that party.

JOHN HOWARD REES. A genial, hearty, whole-souled man is John Howard Rees, who came to Oregon in the spring of 1880. His father, James Rees, was born in Greene county, Tenn., in 1813, and at seventeen years of age, in 1830, he and his father, William Rees, a native of Virginia, joined an emigrating train to Illinois, locating in Vermilion county, where they bought one hundred and sixty acres of land, and here the elder Rees died. Here James married Miss Jemima Dillon, also from Greene county, Tenn., having emigrated in the same train as her husband. Eight children blessed this union, three sons and five daughters, one of whom died in infancy. John H. was the seventh child, born January 29, 1859, in Vermilion county. At her home in the latter county the mother passed away when sixty-six years old, and the bereaved husband went west to pass the remainder of his days with the son, who had settled at Springbrook, Yamhill county, Ore. Here the father died at the age of seventy-five.

The education that Mr. Rees had received in the common schools of Illinois and the academy of his native county stood him in good stead, as he used the knowledge thus gained to teach in the public schools, thereby acquiring sufficient means to help him in his western venture. Upon his arrival in Oregon he purchased a farm situated three-quarters of a mile west of Springbrook, containing one hundred acres, twenty acres of which he has put out in fruit, the remainder being utilized for general farming with the exception of thirty acres, which is fine pasture land for grazing purposes, as he owns ten cows and carries on quite a scientific dairy business in conjunction with his farming. He has invested in a cream separator, thereby saving the expense and trouble of carrying his milk to a creamery. This business is very profitable and carried on in the manner in which Mr. Rees prosecutes it, is very pleasant, adding not a little to his income and presenting a pretty pastoral scene with the broad, green meadows and sleek, well kept cattle.

Mr. Rees was married in Portland to Miss

Lucy Hoskins, who had been a resident of Vermilion Grove, Ill., at the time her husband had made his home there, and four children born to them are: Algernon F., deceased; Ralph W.; Victor E.; and Florence; all those living being at home. Mrs. Rees' father was George Hoskins, a native of North Carolina, who came to Indiana and Illinois, dividing his years pretty equally between the two places, until he finally settled permanently in Vermilion Grove, Ill., where he is now living a retired life.

Mr. Rees is very active in public life, lending himself to every movement that has for its end the upbuilding of his country or the benefit of his fellow-men. He is a member of the Friends Church, and is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World. A Republican as to his political inclinations, he has served as constable, and at the present time is a trustee of the Pacific College at Newberg and clerk of the school board, which latter position he has held for fourteen years. He is one of the oldest settlers of the later emigration in this community, and he does honor to the state which he has helped to develop.

RUFUS C. CROSBY. The Crosby family is undoubtedly of English origin. The name is first mentioned in England under the reign of King John, in 1204. The ancestral history in America can be traced back to Samuel Crosby, who came from London, England, to the new world and settled at Charlestown, Mass., in 1635. Phinias Crosby, the great-grandfather of our subject, was usually known as "Parson," being a minister of the Congregational Church. He was born in Hanover, N. H., and always resided in New England. Isaac Crosby, the grandfather, was born in New Fane, Vt., and in 1820 he went to Massachusetts. He married a Miss Fair, who died when his son, Isaac Newton, the father of our subject, was but a year old. The latter was born in Milford, Mass., July 10, 1824, and for many years resided in that place. At various times he devoted his energies to farming and general merchandising and to the coal business, and was long recognized as a leading business man of his native town. He is also a self-made man, for from an early age he depended upon his own resources. He is now living a retired life in Woonsocket, R. I. In public office he has also been quite prominent and has served as assessor and in other town offices. He married Maria Farman Howard, who was born in Bethel, Me., in November, 1824. She is descended from the Howards who lived at Howards Grove in Massachusetts. Her great-grandfather was Phinias Howard, and the genealogical history of the family is to be found in the Newberry library of Chicago. In 1809 there was a marriage celebrated between a member of the Howard family and the Dustan family, of which Mrs. Rufus C. Crosby is a representative.

The subject of this review is the eldest of six children, five sons and a daughter, born unto his parents. Of this number the daughter and two sons are yet living. He obtained his literary education in the public schools and afterward pursued a commercial course in Eaton College in Boston, whence he graduated in 1868. He then entered upon his business career in the capacity of a bookkeeper in the employ of a lumber merchant of Milford, Mass., in 1873. In 1880 he removed to Providence, R. I., and purchased a third interest in the business of A. B. Rice & Company, lumber merchants, with whom he was associated for two years. On the expiration of that period he disposed of his interests on the Atlantic coast and removed to Duluth, Minn., from which place he traveled for a lumber firm for a year. Then going to North Dakota, he purchased railway land, becoming the owner of one hundred and sixty acres, to the cultivation of which he gave his attention for two or three years. The year 1886 witnessed his arrival in Portland, Ore., where he took charge of the lumber business of the firm of Park & Lacey, with whom he was connected for two or three years. He was then a stockholder in the Oregon & California Lumber Company to the extent of $10,000, and after two or three years' connection with that corporation he came to Dundee and made investment in a prune orchard. The cultivation of prunes has become one of the important industrial interests of the northwest. He has fifty acres of land here, of which twenty acres are devoted to that fruit, and upon his place he has a dryer and all equipments for caring for his prunes and preparing them for shipment. Recently he has erected a fine residence and large substantial barn in Dundee. His home is built in modern style of architecture and is one of the most attractive places of the town. Mr. Crosby has always been a lover of fine horses and always keeps a number of excellent specimens. He also has a number of fine carriages and takes great delight in driving over the country.

In Milford, Mass., occurred the marriage of Mr. Crosby and Mrs. Sarah M. (Dustan) Blakeslee, who was born in Spartansburg, Pa., a daughter of John H. Dustan, who was a native of New Hampshire and a lineal descendant of Hannah Dustan, who figures in the history of the country. John H. Dustan engaged in business as a millwright in Boston and afterward removed to Pennsylvania, where he lived for many years, but in 1892 he came to Oregon, settling in Portland, where he is now engaged in the dairy business. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Crosby were born two children, but they lost their daughter, Madeline, who died in 1891, at the age of nine years. The son, John Newton, is now a freshman in the Hills Military School at Portland. Mrs. Crosby had one child by her first marriage, Ida Lelle, who is now the wife of Dr. A. P. Watson, of Portland.

Mr. Crosby belongs to the Royal Arcanum, being a charter member of Oregon Council, which was organized in Portland in 1892. In politics he is a most earnest Republican, who keeps well informed on the issues and questions of the day, and does everything in his power to promote the growth and insure the success of his party. His fine home in Dundee and his prune farm are the visible evidences of his life of industry and carefully directed labor. The west with its pulsating industrial life is continually drawing to it men of business capacity who come from the older east and find in the opportunities of this section of the country the business advantages which they seek. This Mr. Crosby has done and in his work here he is meeting with well-merited prosperity.

CHARLES F. MOORE. One of the most reliable and popular of the pioneer business men of Newberg is Charles F. Moore, engaged for the greater part of his active life in the drug business, and at present the owner and manager of one of the best equipped drug stores in Yamhill county. Mr. Moore comes from sturdy and enterprising farmer stock, and was born near New Providence, Hardin county, Iowa, September 27, 1857, the ninth of the seven daughters and five sons born to Alfred Moore, a native of Iowa. The elder Moore removed from Indiana to the vicinity of New Providence, Iowa, and there engaged in farming on one hundred and sixty acres of land until his removal to Oregon, in 1877. For a time he lived at Eugene and Woodburn, removing then to Dayton, and from there to Newberg, where he has since been retired. He is a broad-minded and liberal man, in touch with happenings the world over, and greatly interested in the cause of education, which he has done his utmost to promote.

A common school education and practical home training were the equipments with which Charles F. Moore started out to make his own living. With his brother, Dr. J. B., a practicing physician, he engaged in the drug business, serving an apprenticeship of three years, and thoroughly learning every department of the business. In 1890 he bought out his brother, who now resides in Oregon City, and has since conducted it independently and with gratifying success.

The wife of Mr. Moore was formerly Mary E. Patty, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of Charles W. Patty, a local minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Indiana. Of the children born of this union two are living: Pearl C. and Paul. Mr. Moore is a Republican in political affiliation, and has been postmaster of Newberg for six years, and councilman for two terms. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. In religion he is a member of the Society of Friends.

HENRY J. MINTHORN, M. D. For twenty years Henry J. Minthorn has been a resident of Oregon and at the present time is engaged in the practice of medicine in Newberg. He was born in Ontario, Canada, April 26, 1846. His paternal grandfather, John Minthorn, was a native of New York and removed to Canada, where he followed the occupation of farming and spent his remaining days. His son, Theodore Minthorn, was born in Ontario, in 1816, and he, too, carried on agricultural pursuits throughout his active business career. In 1856 he came to the United States, locating in Cedar county, Iowa, where he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land and engaged in farming, devoting his energies to the further cultivation and improvement of his property until his death, which occurred in 1865. His wife bore the maiden name of Mary Wesley and was born in Ontario, Canada, her father being Henry Wesley, a native of Pennsylvania. He was also a farmer by occupation and removed from the Keystone state to the Dominion, where he lived until called to the home beyond.

Dr. Minthorn of this review was the third child and eldest son in a family of two sons and five daughters. He obtained a common school education and then entered the Western College in Lynn county, Iowa, at the age of fifteen years. A year later he became a student in the Iowa State University, where he remained for a year, and when seventeen years of age he engaged in teaching school for one term, after which he again spent a year in the State University. In 1865, while still a student, he joined a company of college boys enlisting in the United States army as a member of Company D, Forty-fourth Iowa Volunteer Infantry. The regiment was assigned to the department of the Mississippi, with the Seventeenth Army Corps, under Gen. A. J. Smith and Colonel Henderson, and in November, 1865, Dr. Minthorn received an honorable discharge.

When the country no longer needed his services he returned to Iowa and again spent a short period in the State University, after which he entered upon educational work. He spent the year 1866 as a teacher in Polk county, and in 1867 secured a position in the schools of Cedar county, Iowa, where he remained for two years, when in 1869 he went to Michigan, where he followed his chosen pursuit for a year. He was afterward a teacher in Tennessee for three years and then, having determined to prepare for the practice of medicine, he entered the Miami Medical College, of Cincinnati, Ohio, where he remained for a year. In 1873 he became a student in the medical department of the Iowa State University, in which he was graduated on March 4, 1874, with the degree of M. D. After practicing for three years in Cedar county, Iowa, he entered the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, Pa., and the degree of M. D. was again conferred upon him at his graduation with the class of 1877. Through the two succeeding years he practiced with success in Cedar county, Iowa, and then entered the government service in the Indian department as agency physician of the Ponco agency, serving in that capacity for three years. In February, 1882, he was sent to Oregon to take charge of the Indian school at Forest Grove and in October, 1884, he was transferred to the Chilocco Indian School in Oklahoma territory, where he remained until September, 1885, acting as superintendent at that place. Again coming to Oregon, he located in Newberg, and took charge of the Friends Pacific Academy, which is now the Pacific College. For three years he was connected with that institution, serving as its superintendent, and in 1888 he removed to Salem, Ore., becoming an active factor in business affairs of that city as president of the Oregon Land Company and of the Salem Street Railway Company. After six years, however, he returned to Iowa in 1894, locating in Muscatine county, where he successfully engaged in the practice of medicine, served as county physician and also conducted the Muscatine Sanitarium. In 1896 Dr. Minthorn suffered an attack of lung fever and because of this he left Iowa and made his way to William Duncan's Mission, at Metlakatla, Alaska, where he continued for two years in the practice of his profession.

Mr. Shelley

In 1898 Dr. Minthorn again came to Oregon and entered a farm on Prune Ridge near Scott's Mills. He there lived for a year, going thence to Hot Lake, Ore., where he remained for two years and in connection with B. S. Cook he purchased the hot springs, erected a new hotel and bath-house and conducted a sanitarium, where they are located. This venture proved a prosperous one, and the sanitarium was not only conducted with success during two years, but at the end of that time was sold at a good profit. In 1901 the doctor went to California and pursued a course of study in the medical department of the Southern California University. He had taken a course on the diseases of children in the Post-Graduate Medical College in 1895, and in March, 1902, he came to Newberg, where he has since lived. After two months he went to Newport and built the Newport Beach ocean-water baths, returning then to Newberg and renting the office in which he is now located. He still, however, owns the baths at Newport Beach, which is a fine summer resort.

Dr. Minthorn was married in Iowa to Miss Laura E. Miles, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Benjamin Miles, native of North Carolina, who followed the occupation of farming and was superintendent of an Indian school in the Osage Agency of the Indian Territory. Subsequently he removed to Iowa, where he was superintendent of White's Institute for many years. In 1886 he came to Oregon, where he embarked in farming, while at the time of his death he was also president of the Newberg bank. The home of Dr. and Mrs. Minthorn has been blessed with two children: Gertrude, who is now a student in the junior class of the Newberg College; and Mary, who is a member of the freshman class in the same institution. The family are members of the Friends Church, and the doctor is a stalwart Republican. He has served as postmaster at different times and places, and also filled other local offices, and during President Cleveland's first administration he was appointed special agent for the allotment of lands to the Indians, acting in that capacity for four years, during which time he allotted the lands of the Warm Springs Agency, in Oregon.

Dr. Minthorn has a wide acquaintance throughout this state and possesses many excellent qualities of heart and mind which have commended for him the good will and confidence of those with whom he has been associated. He has been successful in his business affairs and his labors, too, have been of benefit to his fellow-men. He was especially loyal as a representative of the government in dealing with the Indians, and in every relation in which he has been found he has ever been faithful and reliable.

HON. JAMES MONROE SHELLEY, of whose life we propose to give a few salient facts interesting alike to his many friends and neighbors in Eugene, Ore., his present residence, is a mill-owner in that section and at the present writing is a prominent member of the legislature of Oregon. He is a splendid example of what a man may do by his own efforts when he has the brain and energy to improve opportunities. Mr. Shelley was born near Fairfield, Iowa, May 22, 1843, is a son of Michael and Sena (Mays) Shelley and grandson of George D. Shelley.

George D. Shelley removed from Kentucky to Jefferson county, Iowa, and engaged in agricultural pursuits. About 1852 he started to cross the plains with his family, but his health gave way and at the crossing of the Snake river he died from the effects of the hardships of the journey. His wife proceeded to the Willamette valley, and her death took place at Pleasant Hill, Ore.

Michael Shelley, the father of James M. Shelley, was a Kentuckian by birth, but accompanied his parents to Iowa, and with his father farmed in Jefferson county. In 1848, in company with his wife and six children, he crossed the great plains with ox-teams to the far west, the trip consuming six months. About the middle of September, he arrived in Lane county, Ore., coming by the Barlow route. Having friends who had previously located at Pleasant Hill, the family pursued their course thither, and took up a donation claim, amounting to six hundred and forty acres. This claim was partly bottom land and partly hill land, and was surveyed by himself in a crude way by compass and sun.

Mr. Shelley built a rail house to shelter his family, and this was replaced a little later by a more substantial log house. The following year (1849), he and others were smitten with the "gold fever" and determined to go to California, but they became discouraged at Scottsburg and returned to their claims. In 1857 he went north to Monmouth, Polk county, and was so well pleased with that location that in 1861 he sold his farm in Lane county and bought a farm near Independence. This farm contained two hundred and thirty acres, and there Mr. Shelley followed farming until 1868. During that year he traded his farm for cattle in Yakima county, Wash., but this turned out to be a poor investment, as the first winter was so severe that he lost nearly all. A few years later he returned to the Willamette valley. He almost reached the four-score years allotted to man. His demise took place in October, 1894, at the home of his eldest daughter, Mrs. Sitton, near McMinnville, Ore. He was a modest, unassuming man and did much real good in his vicinity. He was for many years a member of the Christian Church, and assisted in organizing the first Christian Church at Pleasant Hill. He had previously lost his wife, she having died in 1861. This esteemed couple had a family of nine children, as follows: Mrs. Mary Sitton, of Yamhill county; Henry, who died in 1861; Ransom, who was accidentally killed in 1865 by the fall of a log from a house that was being built; J. M., the subject of this writing; Troy, who resides in Hood River valley and is engaged in horticulture; Roswell, a merchant at Hood river; Ellen E., now Mrs. John Summerville, of Edmonton, province of Alberta, Canada; R. L., who resides in Montesano, Wash.; and Mrs.

Walter Huston, residing near Harrisburg, Ore. Hon. J. M. Shelley was but five years old when his parents crossed the plains to the Pacific slope. He was reared in the Willamette valley, his primary education being received in district schools. Later he took an advanced course in the Christian College at Monmouth, which he attended until eighteen years of age. Leaving school, he assisted his father on the farm until he reached his majority, and then engaged in merchandising. His career in mercantile life commenced in 1864, when he clerked for a short time at Independence, Ore. The same year he enlisted in the Union army as a member of Company A, First Regiment, Oregon Volunteer Infantry, being mustered into service at Salem, December 19, of the same year. His regiment was sent to Vancouver over winter and was then sent back to Yamhill county. Mr. Shelley rose to the grade of orderly sergeant. In the fall of 1865, the regiment crossed the new Santiam road over the Cascades and established Camp Pope, Crook county. May 24 of the following year Mr. Shelley left on a furlough. Returning by way of The Dalles he rejoined his company and was mustered out of service at Ft. Yamhill June 30, 1866. Returning home he re-engaged in clerking for several years at Independence, and in 1871 embarked in business at Harrisburg, having purchased an interest in the general merchandise establishment of Smith, Brasfield & Co. In 1878 a branch store was established at Junction City with Mr. Shelley in charge, and he continued to be associated with that firm until 1879. In 1880 he was nominated and elected sheriff of Lane county, located at Eugene, and made an efficient public officer for that term. After a brief period again spent in clerking, in 1885, he accepted a position as traveling salesman in Oregon and Washington for Portland firms, and continued in that line of work for several years. In May, 1897, he purchased an interest in the Eugene Mill & Elevator Company, and his interests are still identified with that mill, which has been changed to Williams & Shelley, each partner owning a half interest. The firm carries on a large and successful business. Their mill at Eugene has a capacity of fifty barrels per day and is run by water power. They have a large elevator in proximity to the mill and another at Coburg, and are among the most extensive grain buyers in that section.

Mr. Shelley has been married twice. His first wedding took place in 1874, when he was united with Lydia A. Baxter, a Missourian by birth. Some years later, Mr. Shelley was called upon to mourn the loss of his wife, who died at Eugene in 1884, leaving two children, Maud E., now a trained nurse in Portland; and Walter J., a resident of Eugene. On January 26, 1898, he was joined in marriage with Mrs. Nancy (Johnson) Applegate. A short review of Mrs. Shelley's life is given in the following sketch. Mr. Shelley has distinguished himself not only as an excellent business man, but as a public-spirited citizen, and for him nothing is more pleasant than the performance of some useful service for the community. He is blessed with exceptional talents and so takes a high place in society and politics. In his religious belief he is an influential member of the Christian Church, which he joined more than forty years ago, and is a member of the board of deacons. Fraternally, he is allied with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Post No. 7, Grand Army of the Republic, having served in official capacities in each.

In 1902 Mr. Shelley was nominated on the Republican ticket and elected to the state legislature by a majority of six hundred and fifty votes. He was chosen chairman of the labor and industry committee, and was appointed a member of the ways and means committee. He has accomplished much good since his election, and has secured the passage of several important bills. He is the author of the Warehouse bill, which became a law after a hard fight, and secured the passage of a bill extending the Australian ballot law to cities of two thousand population, and has secured the passage of other bills equally important. Mr. Shelley is a member of the State Pioneer Association and the State Historical Society. He has placed himself in the first rank of the representative men of his section and his record as a public servant is above reproach.

MRS. NANCY J. SHELLEY. This estimable lady is the beloved wife of Hon. J. M. Shelley, of Eugene, Ore., and is one of the most cultured and refined ladies in that vicinity. Her maiden name was Nancy Johnson, the daughter of Melchi and Delila (Ware) Johnson, and granddaughter of Samuel and Sarah (Rowland) Johnson.

The Johnson family originally came from Kentucky, where Melchi Johnson was born in Warren county, April 17, 1807. In early manhood he left his native state, and, journeying westward, settled for a time in Missouri, but later came to Oregon, where he settled permanently, in 1847. He crossed the plains by ox-team. He first went to McMinnsville in Yamhill county, but soon afterward settled near Amity in the same county and followed agricultural pursuits there for an unbroken period of forty years. Late in life he removed to Yoncalla, Douglas county, where the last five years of his life were spent. His death took place July 14, 1875, at the age of sixty-eight years.

Mrs. Shelley's mother was a native of Tennessee, and her birth took place in Maury county, March 10, 1820. On December 28, 1834, while still in her fifteenth year, she was united in marriage with Melchi Johnson. She was a daughter of William and Elizabeth (Goodman) Ware, her father being an extensive planter in Tennessee. Mrs. Johnson survived her husband many years and reached the age of eighty years, and died in Douglas county, Ore., in 1900. Both she and her husband were members of the Christian Church. Of the ten children born to them, nine grew to maturity. Two sons and three daughters are still living.

Mrs. Shelley was born near McMinnsville, Yamhill county, Ore., April 26, 1850, and is the next to the youngest daughter of her parents. She was reared in her native place and educated in Bethel College in Polk county. January 17, 1869, she was united in marriage with Capt. Albert Applegate, who is deceased. Seven children blessed their union. They are: Mercy, now Mrs. Dudley Holland, of Boise City, Idaho; Nellie, now Mrs. Arthur Pence, of Oakland, Ore.; J. Grant, engineer on the Southern Pacific Railroad; Charles F., a stockman at Yoncalla; Lulu B., Lucy I. and Albert D. reside with their mother in Eugene. Capt. Albert Applegate was born December 6, 1843, at the old mission at Salem, Ore., and was the son of Charles Applegate, whose sketch is also found in this history. Captain Applegate was reared in Douglas county, and for a number of years was engaged in stock-raising and farming in Yoncalla. He was well known throughout that section of the state and gained considerable prominence as a successful stockman. He enlisted in Company K, First Regiment Oregon Volunteers, infantry, and was commissioned first lieutenant of his company, serving valiantly until the close of the Civil war. He was esteemed as a good citizen and his death was deplored. He died at his home in Yoncalla, March 19, 1888.

Ten years after the death of Captain Applegate, his widow contracted a second matrimonial alliance, becoming the wife of Hon. J. M. Shelley, of Eugene, Ore. Mrs. Shelley is prominently identified with a number of social organizations, and the family unite in worshipping at the Christian Church. She is a member of the Lewis & Clark Ladies Club of Eugene and affiliates with the Eastern Star; Women of Woodcraft; Rebekahs and Native Daughters of Oregon. She is both a popular and useful member of society and has many amiable qualities of heart and mind.

WILLIAM A. TAYLOR. Upon the site of the present modern country home of William A. Taylor stood formerly the little log house of two rooms erected by his pioneer father, William Taylor, and in which he, the son, was born January 5, 1854. In all directions may be seen evidences of the handiwork of this rugged forerunner of civilization, who traversed the plains in 1845, fearlessly braving dangers before which the stoutest of hearts might well quail.

William Taylor was born in Virginia, but was reared on a farm in Franklin county, Mo., whither he was taken by his parents when two years of age. When a young man he married Mary A. Smith, daughter of James Smith, and forthwith went to farming on his own responsibility, two children being born to him in Missouri. In the spring of 1845 he prepared to cross the plains, having heard much of the opportunities awaiting the industrious in the direction of the western sea. On the journey he was accompanied by his wife and two children, his father-in-law, Mr. Smith, and the latter's family, and no particular incident is recorded as interfering with the peace or safety of the hopeful travelers. Mr. Smith brought quite a drove of cattle with him, and the trip was accomplished in six months. At once Mr. Taylor located on a farm now occupied by his son, and which at that time comprised six hundred and forty acres of rich timber land, seven miles east of Salem. With his own hands he hewed the logs for the little two-room cabin, and prepared to make those entrusted to his care as comfortable as possible. He was not a man to idly wait for success to come his way, but was rather filled with that vitality and good judgment which impel the best effort. In those days he was strong and wonderfully enthusiastic, and one of his chief pleasures was shouldering a gun and going forth in search of game, in which the district abounded. As time went by his own immediate interests were allied with those of the whole neighborhood, and he was a stanch advocate of good roads, good schools, and good politics. Roads in particular he believed necessary to the furtherance of all improvements, and he himself took an active part in laying them out and keeping them in order. Although not an office-seeker, he took a keen interest in Republican affairs, but was by no means slavish in his devotion to any one party. In time his land yielded abundant harvests, and cattle grazed in large numbers upon his fertile meadows. He was one of the most thrifty and prosperous of the early settlers, and all regarded him as a man to respect and follow. From 1845 until his death, March 11, 1897, at the age of seventy-eight, he lived on the same farm, two years more than half a century being spent among the same surroundings. His first wife dying July 17, 1854, he afterward married Matilda Oswald, of which union there were born six children of whom Horace J. and Amos live at Macleay; Bertha is the wife of James Woodruff of Portland; Josie is the wife of Robert Craig; Alta is the wife of Augustus Bond of The Dalles; and Elden is living with his mother. Of the first marriage were born the following children: Sarah, the deceased wife of Thomas Jefferson, of Singleton, Douglas county, Ore.; Mary A., widow of Thomas Baker of Oakland, Ore.; Margaret is the wife of J. Howard Morton, of Douglas county, Ore.; Marion lives in Marion county, Ore.; Andrew J. lives in Mill City, Ore.; George died in 1877; and William A., the subject of this review.

His mother dying when he was six weeks old, William A. Taylor was reared by his older sisters, and later by his step-mother. On the farm which is now his home almost his entire life has been spent. December 19, 1875, he was married to Rosa Hughes, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of John and Hannah Hughes, thereafter continuing to live on the old farm, the management of which he undertook for a couple of years. Hoping to benefit by an entire change he removed to Umatilla county, Ore., and engaged in the sheep-raising business on Willow creek, living the while in a primitive log house of one room. The sheep business not proving very profitable, he sold his ranch and returned to the old homestead, soon after purchasing of his father the one hundred and sixty acres which has since been his home. Of the eight children which have gladdened this prosperous western couple, Walter is a turnkey at the state penitentiary; Ada is the wife of Oral Jerman, a farmer of Howell's Prairie. The other members of the family are Virgil, Earl, Edith, Myrtle, Fay and Alfred.

Mr. Taylor is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and his property is as well equipped and improved as any in the county. He is practical and thrifty, having learned from his father the fundamental principles of successful agriculture. A Republican in politics, he takes an active interest in the welfare of his party, but aside from his service as a member of the school board, he has neither sought nor held political office. His interest in the cause of education, however, is very keen, and he has devoted no inconsiderable portion of his time to the promotion of that cause in his district. Remembering his own comparatively crude opportunities in this direction—his education having been obtained in the little schoolhouse which stood on the site of the present town of Macleay—he has earnestly striven to improve the educational opportunities of the present generation. Those who know him best have learned to appreciate his breadth of mind and splendid judgment. His integrity, his unselfishness, and his sincere desire to promote all worthy causes have never been brought into question.

JOHN SCHALLER. The blacksmith shop of John Schaller is one of the busiest centers of activity in the town of Willamina, and the genial and successful proprietor is one of its enterprising and popular citizens. Mr. Schaller is one of the many sons of Switzerland who have transferred their allegiance to this side of the water, and like his countrymen in their own picturesque land, possessed thrift, economy and enterprise. He was born in Canton Bern, Switzerland, August 4, 1854, and until his sixteenth year lived with his parents, who were farmers and stock-raisers by occupation.

Arriving on American shores in 1870, Mr. Schaller settled with his parents in Bluffton, Allen county, Ohio, and there lived for six years, as in the old country, engaging in farming. In 1876 he crossed the plains to Jackson county, Ore., where he began working at the blacksmith trade, and after completing his apprenticeship located in Howell Prairie, Marion county, for a year. He then lived for a couple of years in Salem, and for two years at the Grande Ronde Reservation, where he worked for the government. Mr. Schaller had by this time saved quite a little money, and with it started his present business in Willamina, a decision justified by his past and present success. Also he is engaged in making wagons, and for the past ten years has increased his revenue by handling farm implements.

The family of Mr. Schaller consists of his wife, who was formerly Josephine Pool, and five children, Ernest, Charles, Frank, Roy and Grace. Mr. Schaller is a Democrat in politics, and a staunch supporter of his party. His fitness for office has been recognized by his fellow townsmen, who have elected him to the positions of road supervisor and school director.

PAUL FUNDMAN. The mercantile prestige of Willamina is being maintained in most creditable manner by the Paul Fundman Company, purveyors to the town and county of groceries, boots and shoes, hardware, flour and feed. This busy mercantile establishment is managed according to the most approved business methods, and the excellent quality of goods, tact and consideration on the part of the owner, and general air of progressiveness and obligingness, ensure to these worthy people a continuation of their present gratifying success.

Paul Fundman, head of the company bearing his name, and one of the best known men of this vicinity, is a native of Switzerland, and was born January 10, 1864. He continued to live in his native land until about eighteen years of age, emigrating to America in the fall of 1882, and locating at Gervais, Ore., and remaining for one year. He was educated in the public schools of his native land, and at Engelburg College, being thus qualified beyond the average youth for the responsibilities of life. For four years in Oregon Mr. Fundman was identified with the Grande Ronde Indian School, and he thereafter lived on a ranch in Polk county for four years. For the following year he returned to the Indian school, and then engaged in the mercantile business in Willamina in which he has since been engaged. For a number of years he was in partnership with Mr. Kershaw, but the present firm name is already of long standing.

In 1893 Mr. Fundman married Eva Gentry, and one child has been born of this union, Pauline. Mr. Fundman is a Democrat in politics, and for some time was postmaster of Willamina. He is a broad minded and liberal gentleman, and has to the fullest extent the confidence of all who know him.

MATHEW ACHESON. As an example of what may be accomplished by perseverance and industry, regardless of early set-backs or want of opportunity, Mathew Acheson is entitled to special mention among the prosperous farmers and developers of Linn county. Educationally, morally, and agriculturally, he takes foremost rank among the native sons of Muskingum county, Ohio, where he was born January 17, 1834, and where the early part of his life was passed. With his family he removed to the state of Iowa in 1856, and, his father dying within a year, he went, in 1857, to Monroe county, Iowa, where he engaged in educational work. There he was married, in 1860, to Lucinda Crawford, a native of Pennsylvania. In the fall of 1864 he removed to Washington county, Iowa, and farmed for three or four years, and afterward engaged in mercantile business in Ainsworth, Iowa, continuing the same until 1872.

Leaving Ainsworth, Iowa, Mr. Acheson came to Oregon, and in Linn county purchased the right to one hundred and sixty acres of land three and a half miles northwest of Shedd, where he lives at the present time, and where he owns two hundred and twenty acres. From the standpoint of products raised he has one of the most diversified farms in the county, fifteen acres being under orchard, of which ten acres are prunes and the balance pears, apples and cherries. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, and has most complete and modern facilities for the prosecution of his many departments. A large frame building, adequate barns and out-houses, good fences and the finest of agricultural implements, complete an equipment which almost any farmer, however ambitious, might envy.

A dryer of seventy bushels' capacity is taxed to its utmost during the busy season.

Aside from the formality of casting his vote Mr. Acheson has never identified himself with politics. He has always taken an active interest in educational work, and he is one of the foremost promoters of the United Presbyterian Church, of which he has been an elder for many years. George S. and Jennie B. (Acheson) Gaff, of Albany, the two oldest of the children in the Acheson home, were born in Iowa and accompanied their parents across the plains. Bertha, Dawson, Wilbur B. and Mathew H. are all graduates of Albany College; John L. is a graduate of Princeton University, N. J.; Irvin Ray is living with his father, and two children, who died, were born in Oregon. Mr. Acheson represents the solid and substantial in work and citizenship, and the county has reason to be proud of his successful and meritorious career.

FRANK JAMES COAD. That typical and substantial pioneer, Samuel Coad, has richly endowed this part of the state, not only from the standpoint of his own achievements, but because he has transmitted to his sons those fundamental characteristics everywhere regarded as upbuilding and reliable. Integrity is a human attribute which no one has ever questioned in those bearing the name of Coad, and Frank James Coad, owner and proprietor of a flourishing sash and door factory and planing mills at Dallas, possesses to an unusual degree this desirable trait. He was born on his father's farm on the Pèedee branch of the Luckiamute river, May 2, 1859, and was reared principally in Dallas, where his father conducted a drug store for many years, and where he is now living retired. Like his brother, C. G., another prominent citizen of Dallas, and the present postmaster, he was educated in the public schools, and at La Creole Academy, after which he spent the winter of '78-9 in Prineville, Ore., in the drug business. Returning to Dallas, he worked at the carpenter's and builder's trade for a year, and thereafter engaged in the livery business with D. N. Burns, under the firm name of Burns & Coad, for eighteen months. After disposing of the livery he was employed for a year in the bridge department of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, at the time they had a lease on the old narrow gauge road.

In 1883 Mr. Coad went into partnership with D. J. Riley in purchasing the old sash and door factory of J. M. Campbell, which at that time was a very small shop built in the old style in the eastern part of the town, and having a six-horse water-power. This plant they improved and fitted with modern machinery, and were so successful in their work that a new plant followed in 1885, located at the end of Mill street, and on an enlarged scale of one hundred and twenty-five horse-power. The plant has all modern machinery, and is run by both water and steam power, sash, doors, mouldings, and various builders' materials being turned out in large quantities. In the meantime the partners engaged in building and contracting in Dallas and vicinity, until 1895, when each department had assumed such large proportions it was deemed advisable to dissolve partnership, Mr. Riley thereafter devoting himself to contracting, and Mr. Coad to the management of the milling interests.

In Dallas, in 1883, Mr. Coad married Jennie Lyons, who was born in Missouri, and who is the mother of one child, Hallie F. For his little family Mr. Coad has built one of the finest and most commodious residences in Dallas, where hospitality is dispensed unstintingly, and the utmost good fellowship prevails. He has availed himself of other avenues of profit in the vicinity of the town, and has been especially successful as a raiser of Angora goats on a small ranch three miles north of Dallas. He has also been interested in prune culture. As a Republican he has taken an active interest in local affairs, and served one term as a member of the Dallas city council. Mr. Coad was one of the organizers of the Dallas volunteer fire department, as a charter member of the Terror Engine Company, of which he was foreman for several years. He selected the name "Terror" for the company. Mr. Coad is a member of the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce, of the Polk County Mohair Association, the Native Sons of Oregon, and the Muscovites of Portland. Both himself and wife are identified with the Rebekas, and he is a member and past noble grand of Friendship Lodge No. 6, I. O. O. F.; Encampment No. 20, of which he is past chief patriarch, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JACKSON A. BILYEU. With the exception of the first year of his existence, which was spent in Crawford county, Mo., where he was born February 12, 1851, Jackson A. Bilyeu has been a resident of Oregon throughout his entire life, having crossed the plains in 1852, his parents, George W. and Jane (Reed) Bilyeu, seeking then a new home in the wilderness of the northwest. The father and mother were natives respectively of Tennessee and Missouri, to which latter state the father had removed at an early date, becoming a farmer in Crawford county, where he remained until 1852. With the customary ox-teams the family started across the plains, coming by way of the Platte river, over the old Barlow route, and after a journey of six months and ten days the father brought his wife and children into the wide acres of Oregon. He first located ten miles east of Scio, taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres along the banks of the Thomas creek, and engaged at once in farming. Some time after he bought three hundred and twenty acres, and in that location he passed the thirty-five most active years of his life. At the close of that period he removed to Jordan valley, and became the owner of a grist mill there, which business he conducted for ten years. In 1890 he once more changed his residence, locating then in Scio, Linn county, where he died February 6, 1898, at the age of eighty-one years. Mrs. Bilyeu, now eighty-two years old, makes her home with a daughter near Halsey.

Of the eight sons and seven daughters born to his parents Jackson A. Bilyeu is the sixth child. He was trained to an industrious life upon the paternal farm, becoming versed in the different lines of agriculture followed by his father, and also receiving a mental training in the common school in the vicinity of his home. In 1875, when he was twenty-four years old, Mr. Bilyeu engaged in farming for himself, soon making a purchase of one hundred and sixty acres of land, located four miles southwest of Scio, upon which he remained until 1879. In the last-named year he came to Scio and entered into the business life of this city, engaging in the livery and hotel business for several years, after which, in 1883, he again became interested in agricultural pursuits, and thereafter for several years, he bought and sold land, his business sagacity enabling him to do this with profit. He first purchased near Scio two hundred and fourteen acres, and after selling it, in 1895 bought a farm of three hundred and fifty acres five miles east of the city. This was disposed of in 1898, and he has since confined his operations to the city. He is now retired from the laborious duties of a farmer, but still finds much to occupy his time and attention, for, being popular with the Democratic party, of which he is an adherent, he is often called upon to serve in some official capacity. He is at present city marshal, and has also held the positions of deputy sheriff, for six years, constable several terms, councilman many times, and also acts as school director at the present time. In addition to loaning money he acts as president of the Scio Creamery Company, keeping well in touch with the commercial and industrial life of the city, owning property here to the extent of a brick business block and two residences.

Mr. Bilyeu was married in Linn county, to Arena J. Terry, a native of that county, and the children born to them are six in number, and are as follows: C. C.; Maud, at home; Nellie, the wife of Lee Gunsaul, of Lebanon, Ore.; Pearl, deceased, wife of F. Z. Jones; Eva and Nita, both of whom are at home. Fraternally Mr. Bilyeu affiliates with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Knights of Pythias, and religiously is a member of the Baptist Church.

JOHN LARKIN. Few farmers have applied themselves to their chosen occupation more conscientiously than has John Larkin, to whom his fields and meadows and implements and stock afford an unending source of interest and study. Since coming to his present farm near Brownsville in 1887 he has duplicated the success experienced in other parts of the state, and in general farming and stock-raising has realized his expectations to an unusual degree. Mr. Larkin is a native son of Huntingdon county, Pa., and was born June 6, 1829. In 1832 his parents moved to Clark county, Ohio, and in 1843 went to Iowa, where the father bought land in Henry county. This farm and household were not unlike the average in the middle west, and, judging from the lives of the children who were trained there, industry and integrity were accounted virtues to be cultivated and never lost.

John Larkin worked hard in his youth, accumulating useful experience while following the plow and harrow, and as occasion offered studiously applying himself at the district school. March 10, 1853, he married Abigail Ritchie, a native of Warren county, Ill., and in 1862 sought to better his prospects by removal to the west. In the meantime Mr. Larkin had prospered in farming, and not liking the idea of taking the long overland journey, he came by way of the Isthmus of Panama to San Francisco, and from there to Portland on another steamer. Near Brownsville, Ore., he rented a farm for six years, saved his money, and managed to gain quite a financial start. With the proceeds of his farming he bought a farm near Albany, lived thereon four years, and after selling out bought a hundred and sixty acres six miles northeast of Brownsville. For ten years Mr. Larkin farmed and raised stock, was very successful, and after that enjoyed a pleasurable relaxation by traveling around the west. During six summers he drove with a team and wagon through Oregon and Washington, in this independent and unconventional manner seeing far more of the points of interest than is possible to the palace car tourist. It was his lasting satisfaction to meet many delightful and interesting people, and to be received with the greatest courtesy by all with whom he had to do. These summers of travel stand forth in his mind with singular clearness and furnish the pleasantest recollections of his life. Since living on his present farm he has taken an active interest in politics, having from early youth espoused the cause of the Republican party. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in his every-day life lives up to its highest tenets. Mr. Larkin has the good will and confidence of his many neighbors and friends, and his life work is not so absorbing but that he is hospitably and charitably inclined.

ZIM HINSHAW. On the banks of the Luckiamute, in one of the finest locations in Falls City, Zim Hinshaw has erected a modern residence which would be a credit to any city in the state. Here he is enjoying a partial respite from a very strenuous life, although engaged in the real estate business, and in overlooking a variety of personal interests. A native son of Oregon, he was born on the old claim on Mill creek, Douglas precinct, March 28, 1851, and his entire life has been spent in this county. His father, Isaac, was born in the state of Ohio, removed therefrom to Indiana, and crossed the plains to Oregon in 1845. His journey was accomplished with the time-honored ox-teams, and consumed the greater part of seven months. Locating in Kings valley he took up a donation claim, but sold the squatter's right and came to Mill creek, near Sheridan, where he took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres. In time he proved up on his land, cleared a considerable part, and died there in 1873, at the age of sixty-seven years. He was a man of great force of character, and some peculiarities, one of which was a decided reluctance to owe any man. He had a great memory, and was a well known politician, although he never went further than a general support of Democracy, steadfastly declining to hold office. His father, Elias, was a farmer before him, and lived and died in the east. Isaac was twice married, and was the father of fifteen children, three being born of the first union. Of the twelve children in the last family, and born to Melissa (Buell) Hinshaw, Zim is the oldest. Mrs. Hinshaw was born in Iowa, a daughter of Elias Buell, who crossed the plains in 1847, settling on Mill creek, Polk county. He was a millwright by trade, and ran a saw and grist mill on Mill creek for many years.

In his youth Zim Hinshaw had but scant opportunity for acquiring an education, for the farm demanded the care of all of the children who were old enough to work on it. He lived at home until 1883, and that summer bought a quarter interest in the mill, which he afterward conducted for seven years. Then he sold and bought a farm of ninety-five acres two miles north of the old mill, where he farmed for about six years. This venture proved a losing one, for he put much of his land in hops, and lost all that he had and five hundred dollars more. In 1896 he took a homestead on the Siletz river in Polk county, and farmed on the one hundred and sixty acres until February, 1902. He then sold his farm and came to Falls City, where he has since engaged in the real estate business. In the meantime he has invested heavily in town and country property, and among other desirable possessions owns the Falls City Hotel, which he rents; and the Falls City Saw Mill site, with its forty-foot falls, and horse-power of three hundred and fifty-six. He also built a two-story building, in which is a barber shop on the lower floor and his own office on the upper, and he owns quite a number of town lots, and has built a jewelry store 16x30 feet, ground dimensions. His efforts in the state of his birth have therefore been of the practical and substantial kind, and have resulted in large financial returns.

In Ballston, Polk county, Ore., Mr. Hinshaw married Mahala E. Syron, a native of the town, and daughter of Peter Syron. Mr. Syron is one of the pioneer blacksmiths of that town, and came to Oregon in 1852. Besides following his trade in Ballston he has overseen the management of a large farm near by, although his seventy-seven years entitle him to rest from active life at the present time. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hinshaw, of whom William is a stock and hay-raiser of Rock creek, Polk county; Mittie M. is the wife of A. G. Stewart, a stock-rancher of the vicinity of Gaston, Ore.; Peter was accidentally shot while out hunting, January 4, 1902, and his death resulted; Alta is living at home; and Charles also is living with his parents. Mr. Hinshaw is independent in politics, and is at present a member of the city council. He is fraternally identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Falls City; Sheridan Lodge No. 64, A. F. & A. M.; and Knights of the Maccabees of Falls City. With his family, he is a member of the Baptist Church.

ROBERT VITUS. The city wayfarer, weary of the nervous strain incident to extensive business operations, and longing to step into an atmosphere of rest and homely usefulness, would realize his desires through a visit to the farm owned by Robert Vitus and his brother August. These enterprising and highly successful men own an ideal stock and grain farm of one thousand acres three miles northeast of Springfield, which, for general appointments, for scientific and modern management and excellence, has few equals in this part of Oregon. The work of plowing and preparing for the seed six hundred acres of land can scarcely be appreciated by the average farmer, yet this is the amount devoted to small grains on the Vitus farm, the rest being used for a large stock-raising enterprise. None but the finest of stock reach the markets from this farm, and here in their best development may be found registered Cotswold sheep, full-blooded Aberdeen Angus cattle and Poland-China hogs. One sheep alone yielded twenty-one pounds of wool. The brothers entertain the greatest liking for their chosen occupation, and to them their fine animals offer a field of study of which they have never neglected to avail themselves. Both are competent judges of fine stock, are men of high character and more than ordinary ability, and their association with this county has been productive of a raised standard along agricultural and stock-raising lines.

Robert Vitus was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 19, 1861, and in his younger days had the advantages of the public schools of Springfield, Ill., and Missouri. With his father and brother he came to Oregon in 1878, and the three carried on business until 1900, when a division was made of their large property, the brothers thereafter continuing alone. May 5, 1898, Mr. Vitus was united in marriage with Mary Kimmel, daughter of Peter Kimmel. He and his wife died in Germany, their native land. Three children have been added to the family, Robert August, John and Arthur Wilhelm. In politics Mr. Vitus is a Republican, but he has no political aspirations. The friend of education and advancement, his work and character command the honest admiration of all who know him, and the circle of his friends and well-wishers is a large one.

tinually. He also carries on general farming, and in 1893-94-95 engaged in the manufacture of cheese.

The birth of Mr. Douglas occurred in Henry county, Iowa, December 1, 1854. He was the son of Thomas Douglas, who was an own cousin of Stephen A. Douglas, while his mother, Lucinda Hanks, was an own cousin of Abraham Lincoln. When S. M. Douglas was ten years old his parents crossed the plains with ox-teams, and after a journey of five months they arrived safely in California. The father located in Marysville, where his son remained until he was nineteen years old, and then with his father engaged in ranching, continuing in this line of endeavor for seven years. While so engaged he began the work of shearing sheep, etc., and after twelve years of this life he bought his father's ranch in Humboldt county, making that his home for five years, when, in 1887, he came to Oregon and bought his present farm. He first bought seven hundred and eleven acres located two miles east of Springfield, and now has nine hundred and fifty-two acres along the Willamette river, six hundred and forty of which is valley land, and rich in the fine grass of this region. He purchased this farm from Stephen Edwards and J. Goodman with the intention of entering the dairy business, and his faith in the value of the location has been justified with the passing years.

Mr. Douglas was married in September, 1889, to Miss Florence Dale, of Humboldt county, Cal., and the representative of an old and distinguished family. They have one daughter, Sadie, who is now twelve years old. The family home is in Eugene, at the corner of Fifth and Jefferson streets. In his political relations Mr. Douglas is an adherent of the principles of the Democratic party and held the office of school director several years.

SAMUEL M. DOUGLAS. For proof of the statement that Samuel M. Douglas has one of the finest dairy farms in this part of the country one has only to seek out his farm, which lies along the Willamette river in Lane county, not far from Springfield and Eugene. He has spared neither time nor expense in placing his business on a substantial and reliable footing and his reward has come in the success which he has achieved and the reputation he has won as one of the progressive farmers of the Willamette valley. The milk for his dairy is furnished from Jersey cows, which until recently numbered one hundred, although he is reducing them con-

BERT ELLSWORTH EMERICK, A. M., B. D. A man of exceptional ability and of the highest character, refined and scholarly in his tastes, Prof. Bert E. Emerick is eminently qualified for the important position he is now filling as president of Philomath College, which is controlled by the liberal faction of the United Brethren Church. This institution, located in Philomath, Benton county, was founded in 1865 by the Church of United Brethren in Christ, its aim being to place within the reach of every earnest young man and woman the advantages to be obtained by a thorough knowledge of the higher branches of learning, combining a Christian training with the intellectual. A son of the late Warren Emerick, Bert E. Emerick was born near Sumner, Lawrence county, Ill., July 7, 1869.

Warren Emerick, a native of New York state, was engaged in the crude oil business in West Virginia as a young man, but afterwards removed to Marquette county, Wis., where he worked as a tiller of the soil for a few years. Removing to Lawrence county, Ill., in 1865, he bought two hundred acres of land near Sumner, and was there successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1894. Dividing his estate in that year, he settled in Boise City, Idaho, where he was engaged in business with a brother until his death, in 1897, at the age of sixty-seven years. His wife, whose maiden name was Marcella Warner, was born in the east, and died in 1874, in Lawrence county, Ill., aged thirty-three years. They were the parents of ten children, of whom six sons and three daughters grew to years of maturity, Bert Ellsworth being the eighth child in succession of birth.

Graduating from the Sumner, Ill., high school in 1887, Mr. Emerick subsequently taught school two years. In 1888 he attended the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio. He studied at the American Institute of Phrenology, taking a course that has since proved very beneficial to him in many ways, after which he entered college at Westfield, Ill., from the collegiate department of which he was graduated in 1895, receiving the degree of A. B. During one of his summer vacations, that of 1893, Mr. Emerick studied for three months at Moody's Bible Institute.

Coming to Oregon in 1895 he accepted the position of President of Philomath College, in Philomath. From 1897 until 1899 he was pastor of the United Brethren Church in Philomath, at the same time being one of the faculty connected with the college. Desirous of continuing his studies, he then went to Dayton, Ohio, where he took a course in theology, in 1902 being graduated from the Union Biblical Seminary with the degree of B. D. Thus further equipped for his work, Mr. Emerick returned to Philomath, and was immediately elected to his former position as president of Philomath College, and teacher of languages and ethics.

On October 15, 1895, Professor Emerick married Sadie M. Armentrout, who came to Oregon in 1895. She was born in Edgar county, Ill., near the town of Paris, January 22, 1867. Her father, William H. Armentrout, a native of Indiana, removed to Vermilion county, Ill., when a young man and there worked as a plasterer and contractor for many years. He is now a resident of Westfield, Ill. Professor and Mrs. Emerick have two children, namely: Zanana and Francis. Professor Emerick is a strong Prohibitionist in politics, and an active worker in party ranks.

Philomath College has now, in 1903, one hundred and three pupils enrolled, the number of students increasing each year. During its earlier years of existence its usefulness was somewhat hampered by an indebtedness, but since freed from that encumbrance, in 1901, various needed improvements have been made, and the scope of its work visibly enlarged. With a superior normal course, classical, scientific and philosophical courses, pupils may be fitted in this institution for any desired position in life. The library, gymnasium, laboratory and museum are well equipped, and made of practical use to each pupil. There are two literary societies, the Philophronean for the young men, and the Zetegathean for the young women, and in addition there are various Christian societies for the benefit of both sexes, and a Bible Normal Union, for those desirous of making special preparation for Christian work. The Board of Trustees is composed of men interested in advancing the educational interests of the county and the state, and the faculty and instructors are men and women of broad culture and talent, keenly alive to the physical, mental and moral needs of the young men and women with whom they are brought in contact. Thus equipped this college is destined to become a strong force in the great northwest, elevating the standard of education and of morals.

ELIAS STEWART. Claiming just distinction among the fearless and self-sacrificing men who stepped boldly out of the peace and tranquillity of a settled eastern community, Elias Stewart, who was born in Virginia September 11, 1814, was rated as one of those who joined the innumerable caravan in 1852, and left the impress of his strong personality upon agricultural and other affairs in Lane county. Of an old Tennessee family long identified with farming and stock-raising around Knoxville, he spent his earliest years on the farm of his father, Brison Stewart, the latter of whom established the family in Missouri at an early day. The elder Stewart spent the remainder of his life on a large Missouri farm, and after his death his son Elias maintained his excellent reputation as a farmer and a man, in time becoming prominently connected with the region around Bolivar, Polk county, Mo.

In Illinois Mr. Stewart married Eliza England, who was born in Tennessee, a daughter of John England, also a native of Tennessee. He then removed to Polk county, Mo., and in 1849 moved to near Knoxville, Marion county, Iowa, and from there, in 1849, started across the plains to California. Arriving in St. Joseph, Mo., later than he expected, and dreading a winter on the western prairies, he tarried in the Missouri town, and engaged in teaming. May 2, 1852, he carried out his western project, and with two wagons, four yoke of oxen to each wagon, his wife and six children, again set forth, this time full of renewed hope in the future, and with grim determination to succeed. Partially his plans were doomed to disappointment, for at the North Platte river, about forty miles west of Fort Laramie, his wife was stricken with cholera, and died. Making a coffin from a wagon board, they paid heed to her last request, that they bury her deep. Disconsolate, the father pursued his way via the Barlow route, arriving at Foster's, in Clackamas county, Ore., August 30, 1852. Not satisfied with the prospects near by, he continued his way to the forks of the Willamette river in Lane county, and there took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres, the land being as yet a stranger to plow or harrow. The building ability of the new arrival soon found expression in a plank house, and the hitherto barren prairie farm was started on an era of usefulness through the persuasive powers of a curry plow with a wooden mold-board. In 1855 Mr. Stewart traded his partially improved farm with C. Muligan for two hundred and fifty acres of land adjoining Eugene on the southwest, subsequent additions increasing the size to two hundred and eighty acres, a portion of which is now embodied in Stewart's addition to Eugene, on the west.

Earnest and industrious, and possessed of shrewd business ability, Mr. Stewart made a decided success of his life in the west, and for his painstaking efforts he left at the time of his death, April 24, 1898, a valuable and finely improved farm. He was honorable and upright in all of his dealings, and by no means confined his efforts to the limits of his large property. Education, morality and good government were stimulated by his support, and his aid was invariably forthcoming for enterprises which had for their object the betterment of the community. Of the children who were left motherless on the plains, Joseph W. lives in Springfield, Lane county, Ore.; John is a farmer of Lane county; Linnie Jane, deceased, was the wife of Mr. P. C. Nolan; Mary M. is the wife of A. O. Stevens, of Eugene; Martha A. is the wife of T. G. Hendricks; and Elizabeth is the wife of Joseph Lucky, of Eugene.

LOUIS E. BEAN. As a fine representative of the native-born citizens of Lane county, and a descendant of one of the prominent pioneers of this section of the state, Louis E. Bean, a rising young attorney of Eugene, is well worthy of honorable notice in this biographical volume. He was born November 21, 1867, in Lane county, Ore., a son of Obadiah Roberts Bean. His grandfather, Robert Bean, was born and reared in Kentucky, but in early life became a pioneer settler of Clay county, Mo.; where he was engaged in tilling the soil until his death. He reared a large family of children, several of whom came to Oregon as early settlers, namely: Obadiah R., the father of Louis E.; Riley, who crossed the plains in 1845, died in Seattle, Wash.; Napoleon died at McMinnville, Ore.; David died in Portland, Ore.; Robert is a resident of Siskiyou county, Cal.; and Mrs. Susan F. Morris, of Eugene, Ore.

A native of Liberty, Clay county, Mo., Obadiah R. Bean was born February 2, 1832, and there reared to agricultural pursuits. In 1850 he made the journey across the plains with ox-teams to California, where he was engaged in mining for a year. Not pleased with the financial results of his labors, he came to Oregon in 1851, locating first in the Willamette valley, then in the Chehalem valley, in Yamhill county, where he was engaged in farming. In 1854 he settled in Lane county, living first at Grand Prairie and then on a farm about three miles from Junction City. In 1879 he purchased a farm lying near Eugene, but subsequently disposed of that property and went to Mapleton, locating at the head of the tide, on the Siuslaw river, where he bought an improved Indian place, on which he was successfully engaged in general farming until his death, in 1890. He was a man of enterprise and influence, taking an active part in political, fraternal and religious matters, serving one term as county commissioner, belonging to the Masonic order, and being a member of the Christian Church. On October 21, 1853, in Yamhill county, Obadiah R. Bean married Julia A. Sharp, who was born near Newmarket, Harrison county, Ohio, a daughter of John Sharp. Her grandfather, Peter Sharp, was a native of New Jersey, but removed to Ohio as a pioneer farmer, and there spent the remainder of his life. John Sharp, born in New Jersey, settled in Pennsylvania as a young man, but subsequently lived in Ohio for a few years. In 1849 he started for Oregon, but on reaching Missouri purchased a farm in Jackson county, and resided there three years. On May 5, 1852, with his wife and seven children, six boys and one girl, he started with ox-teams across the plains, taking the Barlow route. Although he was hampered by sickness on the journey, was unfortunate enough to lose one of his teams, and was snowbound for a time, he arrived safely in Oregon City on November 1, 1852. Spending the first winter in the Chehalem valley, he took up a ranch in Washington county in the spring, but the land proved worthless, and he located on a farm at Grand Prairie, Lane county, in the fall of 1853. Subsequently selling out there he removed to Latham, Lane county, where he lived retired until his death, at the age of eighty-one years. He served as county commissioner one term. Mr. Sharp married Cornelia A. Hesser, who was born in Virginia, and died, at the age of eighty years, in Oregon. Seven children blessed their union, namely: Joseph Sharp, a retired farmer, living at Latham, Ore.; Julia A., now Mrs. O. R. Bean, who resides with her son, Louis E. Bean, in Eugene; Addis, a resident of Idaho; John, a farmer, living near Ellensburg, Wash.; James, a horticulturist in Saticoy, Cal.; Jolly, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Walla Walla, Wash.; and Lewis, an attorney in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Obadiah R. Bean became the parents of eleven children, namely: Robert S., judge of the supreme court of Oregon; James R., an express messenger on the Northern Pacific Railroad, running out from Portland; John W., a prominent physician of Tacoma, Wash.; Mrs. Emma A. Lucax, of Aberdeen, Wash.; Joseph H., died in Bakersfield, Cal., in 1897; Edward A., bookkeeper for O. W. Hurd, at Florence, Ore.; Louis E., the subject of this sketch; Frederick C., living on the homestead at Mapleton; Mary died when a year old; Chester O., a contractor at Aberdeen, Wash.; and Estelle A., living at home.

Brought up on a farm in Lane county, Louis E. Bean attended first the district school, then the University of Oregon, subsequently taking a business course at Holmes' Business College, in Portland. The following three years he was connected with the United States Fish Commission, having charge of the Mapleton Hatchery Station, on the Siuslaw river. While thus employed he studied law, and after his admission to the bar, in 1898, began the practice of his profession at Eugene. Subsequently accepting the position of receiving clerk at the United States land office in Roseburg, Mr. Bean remained there until January, 1902, when he resigned his position. Since that time he has been actively engaged as a lawyer in Eugene, making a specialty of land and mining law, and has built up a large practice in this line, becoming an authority on all questions concerning land titles and deals.

Fraternally Mr. Bean is a member of Spencer Butte Lodge, No. 9, I. O. O. F.; of the Royal Arcanum; and Helmet Lodge, No. 33, Knights of Pythias. Politically he supports the principles of the Republican party.

MILTON T. AWBREY. The experiences which have been a part of the life of M. T. Awbrey have helped to form the character which has distinguished him as a citizen of this community. For a quarter of a century he has been located in Eugene, Lane county, but preceding that his years were full of changes and vicissitudes. He now looks back to the time when Oregon was a wilderness and there was but a promise of what should come after years of unremitting toil and effort on the part of those who bore the burdens for the sake of the reward. Mr. Awbrey has his reward in his own and the country's prosperity, and his declining years are filled with the peace which comes of work well done.

M. T. Awbrey was the second of his father's family of twelve children, nine of whom attained maturity and four of whom are now living. He was born in Ray county, Mo., October 24, 1830, his father being Dr. Thomas Nolan Awbrey. The latter was a native of Virginia, and while a resident of that state served in the war of 1812. Upon deciding to emigrate to some western state, he first settled in Indiana, after which he removed to Ray county, Mo., and with the practice of medicine combined the interests of a stock business. Being a strong and influential Republican, the leaders of that party induced him to become a candidate for the state legislature, in which he served one term. At the breaking out of the Mexican war he offered his services at once, his patriotism being as strong as when he first took up arms for the country. Upon the declaration of peace Dr. Awbrey located in Polk county, Iowa, near the city of Des Moines, where he continued his combined interests, and in 1850 he crossed the plains to Oregon. His first winter here was spent in Clackamas county. In 1852 he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in the forks of the Willamette river in Lane county, upon which he put valuable improvements, while engaged in the pioneer practice of medicine and surgery. The usefulness of his life was impaired at a comparatively early age, for he was stricken with paralysis and for twenty years remained an invalid. He died at the age of eighty-three years, his force of character and personality having won for him a position of prominence in the affairs of the state. For one term he represented his party in the state legislature of Oregon. Fraternally he was a Mason. He married Amelia Ann Grubbe, a native of Virginia, who died in Oregon in 1900, at the age of ninety-one years.

Reared to manhood in Missouri, M. T. Awbrey received a rather limited education in the primitive schools of the state, attending for three months each year a pioneer log schoolhouse. He was only seventeen years old at the time of the breaking out of the Mexican war, but the martial spirit was a part of his inheritance, and when his father and older brother, Marshall C., the latter of whom now lives in Crook county, Ore., and has since seen much fighting in the Indian wars here, decided to enlist, he also became a member of the same company. As members of Gilpin's Battalion they were sent after the Indians in Mexico and Texas, and had several severe encounters with the savages. They endured much exposure, Mr. Awbrey and two others sleeping out in the snow, as they had to guard a herd of cattle which furnished them beef. Fourteen months were passed in the service, and on his discharge he located with his parents in Iowa. He remained at home until he crossed the plains in 1850, driving a four-horse team, while his father had two wagons, a carriage and some loose stock. The journey occupied six months, and was made over the old Barlow route, their safe arrival occurring October 9, 1850, at Foster. He spent his first winter in Oregon City and Portland, variously employed. In 1851 he came to Lane county. From this place he went by pack-train to the mines of California, where he engaged in placer mining. This employment was continued for one year, with fair returns, after which he came back over the mountains and located a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres seven miles northwest of Eugene. This was all wild land, which he proceeded to cultivate and improve, and make into a comfortable home. Six years later he sold it and became the owner of a three hundred and forty-six acre farm near Irving, upon which he engaged in the cultivation of grain principally. In 1862 he went to the Salmon river and a year later took a pack-train to Cariboo, British Columbia, in which venture he met with considerable success. In 1878 he removed to Eugene, and has since made that city his home. A brother of Mr. Awbrey's, Thomas J., now located in Texas, has also been identified with the early history of the state, taking part in the Indian wars, and being seriously wounded in the Rogue river war.

Mr. Awbrey was married in Lane county, August 31, 1856, to Frances Baker. She was born in Pike county, Ill., and was fourteen years old when she came to Oregon with her parents, in 1853. Her father and grandfather, both bearing the name of Thomas, were natives of Virginia, and the elder man became an early settler of Kentucky, from which state the son emigrated to Illinois and with ox-teams crossed the plains in 1853. Mr. Baker settled in Lane county, near Irving, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, which he improved and farmed until he died, in 1856. His wife was Elizabeth Robison, also a native of Virginia, and she died in Oregon in 1876. She was the mother of eleven children, ten of whom came to Oregon and three of whom are now living. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Awbrey are six in number, of whom Oren C. is a dentist in Philadelphia; Don Thomas, living in Cottage Grove; Clara B., wife of John Withrow, of Eugene; Etna E., a farmer on the old home place; Violet M., wife of W. J. Coppernoll, of Eugene; and Annie De Rene is still at home. Mrs. Awbrey is a member of the Baptist Church, and Mr. Awbrey adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party.

FRED LEROY KENT. One of the trite sayings of today is that the farmer of the future will live more by his head than his hands, and that with proper education he will make his work far more profitable and enjoyable. Specialists in every branch pertaining to farm life are wisely directing the education of the young, and through the influence of the land grant act of 1862 each state is assured a College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts. The college since established in Oregon, at Corvallis, is well equipped, and its corps of instructors is composed of men and women amply fitted for the positions they hold. At the head of the dairying department of the Oregon Agricultural College, is Professor Kent, who is also associate professor of agriculture and dairying.

The lineal descendant of one of three brothers who emigrated from old England to New England in colonial days, Professor Kent was born, June 25, 1868, at Ellenburg Center, N. Y. His grandfather was a farmer in Clinton county, N. Y., for many years, living the greater part of the time in Ellenburg Center, where his son, S. L. Kent, the professor's father, was born and brought up. S. L. Kent took part in the Civil war, serving as a corporal in the Seventeenth New York Infantry. A farmer by birth and breeding, he engaged in agricultural labor in his native state until 1869, when he removed to Calhoun county, Iowa, where, buying a farm of four hundred and eighty acres, near Manson, he has since been prosperously engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He is quite prominent in public affairs, being now a county commissioner. He is a Republican in politics, a member of the G. A. R., and belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Fannie M. Bishop, who was born in Clinton county, N. Y., a daughter of Thomas Bishop, a life-long resident of New York, and the descendant of a New England family. Of the children born of their union, five survive, Fred Leroy, the oldest of these five boys, being the only one to come to the Pacific coast.

Acquiring his rudimentary education in the district schools of Manson, Iowa, he subsequently attended Taylor Academy, in the same town, after which he taught school three terms. Using the money thus earned to advance his education, he, in March, 1890, entered the Iowa State Agricultural College, at Ames, through which he worked his way by hard labor, acting as bookkeeper for the institution while there, and teaching school in Calhoun county during his vacations. Receiving the degree of B. Agr. in November, 1893, he remained with the college as dairy instructor until 1895. Accepting then the position of instructor in dairying, since changed to that of professor of agriculture, at the Oregon Agricultural College, an office created in 1895, he came to Corvallis, and has since filled this chair with great credit to himself, and to the eminent satisfaction of all concerned. Under his supervision, the department of which he has charge has become one of the most important in the college, dairying at the experiment station being reduced to an exact science. He is widely known throughout Oregon, taking an active part in local and state institutes, likewise being called upon frequently to do institute work in the adjoining state of Washington, and at the Creamery Operators' Association held in San Francisco, Cal., December 26 and 27, 1902, read a most interesting and instructive paper on the Use of the Acid Test in Butter-Making.

Politically Professor Kent is a sound Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Corvallis Grange, No. 242; of the State Dairymen's Association, of which he has been secretary since 1896; and of Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, A. F. & A. M.

PROF. EMILE FRANCIS PERNOT. In the curriculum of studies at the Oregon Agricultural College, at Corvallis, no branch of learning is deemed of more importance to the students and to the general public, than that of bacteriology, and no member of the teaching force of that well known institution is better fitted for his particular line of work than Prof. E. F. Pernot, who is now filling the chair of that especial science in the college.

Coming from French ancestors on both sides of the house, Emile F. Pernot was born, August 30, 1859, in New York City. His father, A. D. Pernot, was born at Montbeliard, France, a son of Francois Pernot, an expert machinist, who emigrated to this country, and died in New York City. A. D. Pernot also excelled as a machinist, servicing an apprenticeship in one of the best shops in France. After coming to this country he made practical use of his inventive genius, inventing a machine for turning the shanks on sewing machine needles, and he was also the inventor of machines for making the other parts of the needle, which he was the first to successfully manufacture, making the first needles for Elias Howe, inventor of the sewing machine. He also had the distinction of being the first to invent machines in Europe for rifling cannons. About 1866 he removed to Bowling Green, Wood county, Ohio, where he engaged in general farming until about a year prior to his death, which occurred in New York City. He married Emily Boissard, a native of France, and she is now residing in Corvallis, Ore. Of the children born of their union five grew to years of maturity, one of whom, Lucy, died in 1901. Those now living are as follows: Eugene, a horticulturist, living near Corvallis; Charles, a horticulturist, residing in Corvallis; Emile F., the subject of this sketch; and H. S. Pernot, M. D., who was graduated from Cincinnati Medical College, and from Bellevue Hospital, N. Y., and is now one of the leading physicians of Corvallis.

Removing with his parents to Bowling Green, Ohio, when about seven years old, Emile F. Pernot acquired the rudiments of his education in its public schools, remaining there until seventeen years of age. Going then to Philadelphia in search of work, he subsequently studied bacteriology under Dr. Pearson, an eminent authority in that science. Returning home on a visit some time after, during the early development of the oil interests in Ohio, he was stricken with the oil fever, and, in company with his brother Charles, was one of the pioneers in developing the oil resources of the Black Swamp, in Wood county, meeting with great success. Leasing and operating the first well sunk in that region, 600 barrels per day of oil was the output, and in the second well the daily output was 3,000 barrels.

On account of ill health, Mr. Pernot came to Oregon in 1889, locating in Corvallis as a photographer, and a member of the firm of Pernot Brothers, his brother Eugene being his partner. In 1890 Mr. Pernot was appointed photographer and engraver at the Oregon Agricultural College, and in 1896 was made professor of bacteriology, a position that he still holds. The office of state bacteriologist being created by the state legislature, Professor Pernot was appointed to the position, for a term of four years, by Governor Geer, and he is also serving as bacteriologist at the experiment station of the college. The professor spent two years in Washington, D. C., in the bureau of animal industry, department of agriculture. Particularly interested in his work, the professor prepares reports and issues bulletins, and is highly spoken of by John R. Mohler, chief of the pathological division, in his reports to headquarters.

Professor Pernot married, in Corvallis, Miss Edith Coote, daughter of Prof. George Coote, one of the faculty of the Oregon Agricultural College, and they have two children, namely: Aimee and Mabel. The professor is a Democrat in politics, has been a Knight of Pythias for several years, and is a member of the Episcopal Church, in which he is serving as junior warden.

SILAS L. SHEDD. Among the early educators of Oregon is to be named S. L. Shedd, who for about ten years after his arrival in this state, taught in the public schools, adding to the income so acquired by also engaging in farming. That his years of perseverance and industry were not unavailing is evidenced by the fact that he is now numbered among the substantial financial people of this community, making one in a long list of men who came to the west empty-handed and amassed a fortune through a right and wise use of the multifold opportunities here presented. Mr. and Mrs. Shedd now make their home in Corvallis, the latter also being a very old settler, having lived in this one house since 1859.

The ancestors of S. L. Shedd were natives of New Hampshire, the grandfather, Silas, of English descent, engaging in farming in that state, where his death occurred. The father, William Shedd, was born in New Hampshire, and was there reared to the same life which had occupied the years of his father. On attaining manhood he married Abigail Wallace, a native of the same state, and a daughter of Jonas Wallace, who was also a farmer. In 1870 they removed to Oneida, Knox county, Ill., where the father died in 1875, while the mother passed away in 1894 in McLean county. The children born to them were nine in number, seven of whom are still living, being given in order of birth as follows: Mary Emmeline, now Mrs. Graves, of Evanston, Ill.; S. L., of this review; William W., a farmer in Fairbury, Ill.; Herman, who was killed in the Civil war, being wounded in the battle of Fair Oaks as a member of the Second New Hampshire Regiment; Wallace, a farmer in Rensselaer, Ind.; Spaulding, also in that location; Edwin N., a miner of Lewiston, Cal.; and John G., a member of the firm of Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago.

S. L. Shedd was born in Greenfield, N. H., September 12, 1832, and was reared in that state, receiving through the medium of the common schools a good education which he began to practically utilize at the age of eighteen years, engaging then as a teacher. In 1857 he came to Illinois and in connection with his work as a pedagogue he improved a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. He left the middle west, coming by horse-team to Oregon in 1862, over the old Oregon trail, the journey occupying the months from April 30 to September 7. On arriving in Corvallis he at once sought employment as a teacher, continuing for about ten years, and carrying on agricultural pursuits at the same time. His principal occupation now, however, is the handling of real estate and the loaning of money.

The marriage of Mr. Shedd occurred November 12, 1865, in Corvallis, uniting him with Mrs. Precious (Starr) Caton, a native of Licking county, Ohio. She was the daughter of the Rev. J. W. Starr, who was born in Allegany county, Md., the son of James. Her father early removed to Licking county, Ohio, where he engaged in farming, in 1839 settling in Van Buren county, Iowa, and from there emigrating in 1848 to Oregon, bringing his wife, three daughters and four sons. He located near Bell-fountain, Benton county, where he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he remained until his death in his seventy-fifth year. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, giving much material aid in the establishment of a congregation at this place. Mr. Starr had been married twice, his second wife being Eliza A. Lucas, a native of Montgomery county, Md., and a daughter of Amos, who died in that state. Mrs. Starr died in Oregon at the age of eighty-three years. The children born of the first union of Mr. Starr are as follows: Nancy, now Mrs. Belknap, of Reading, Cal.; James M. died in Iowa; John W. came to Oregon in 1853 and resides in Junction, Ore.; P. M. was a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and died in Brownsville, Linn county, Ore.; Moses F., a soldier in an Ohio regiment during the Civil war, was taken prisoner at the battle of Fitchburg, sent to Andersonville prison stockade, and there endured the agonies of slow starvation until his death. Of the second union nine children were born, eight of whom are now living, the eldest being Precious, now Mrs. Shedd; Matilda J., now deceased; Samuel Emery, located in eastern Oregon; Milton L., on the old homestead; L. H., in Albany; Eliza, now Mrs. Burlingame, of Yamhill county; S. C., near the old home; A. P., on the old home; and Mary Emmeline, now Mrs. Thorp, also in the vicinity of her childhood's home. Mrs. Shedd was reared in Iowa, receiving her education in a pioneer log school-house, and in 1848 she made the memorable trip across the plains by ox-teams and two wagons, starting April 12, over the old Barlow trail.

They came by Ft. Hall and Laramie, landing in Oregon September 23 of the same year in which they started, being among the first immigrants to reach Oregon after the Cayuse war. The first husband of Mrs. Shedd was J. H. Caton, a native of Missouri, and a representative of the Kentucky family by that name, who came to Oregon in 1843 in company with the Applegates, Whitman and Nesmith. He took up a donation claim near Bellfountain, and in 1859 he bought property in Corvallis, to which city he removed. He died in eastern Oregon in 1863 while there looking after his cattle interests. Mrs. Shedd and the two living children still own the three hundred and twenty acres embodied in the donation claim. Mrs. Shedd has had six children, four of whom attained maturity: Sabina D. and J. W. died in this city; Ida M. is Mrs. Fortson, of Sacramento, Cal.; and J. L. is on the old donation claim.

Mr. Shedd was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in 1871, in which he has served as past officer. He is also a member of the Rebekahs, and the Corvallis Grange, in which he is ex-master. His wife is a member of the Rebekahs and has acted as past officer, and also belongs to the Coffee Club, and to the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Shedd is a Republican politically. Several interesting trips have been made back east by Mr. and Mrs. Shedd, her first being in 1856 in company with Mr. Caton, going via Panama and returning the same way the next year. In 1878 Mr. Shedd took the trip, visiting the scenes of his birth and childhood, and in 1893 the two enjoyed the pleasure of considerable time spent at the World's Fair at Chicago.

WILLIAM A. BUCHANAN is now serving his fourth term as county treasurer of Benton county, a fact which stands in incontrovertible evidence of his efficiency in the office, his promptness in the discharge of his duties and his loyalty to the trust reposed in him. He is one of the native sons of Benton county, his birth having occurred about ten miles south of Corvallis, on the 18th of October, 1858. He is a son of Robert L. Buchanan, who was born in England of Scotch descent. The paternal grandfather, Andrew, was a native of Scotland, and with his wife came to America from England with his son Robert L. He followed farming throughout almost his entire life, and died in Benton county, Ore. Robert L. Buchanan was reared as a farmer lad, but afterward learned the dry goods business. Coming to the United States he landed in New York City, where he was connected with the dry goods trade until after the discovery of gold in California, when, in 1849, he joined the argonauts who went to the Pacific coast in search of the golden fleece. He was engaged in mining in California until 1853, when he made an overland trip to Oregon, settling in Benton county, where he secured a claim which he afterward sold. He then purchased a farm, upon a part of which he still resides. In 1855 he returned to England, and was married in that country to Miss Jane Galbraith, a native of that land. She is still living with her husband in this county, and they are now numbered among the honored pioneer settlers. After his marriage he brought his bride, his parents, two brothers and two sisters to the new world. He continued to reside upon his farm, giving to it his care and attention, and in the work of improvement and progress he has been a leader and is now the owner of a valuable property. He belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church South and is accounted one of the prosperous and leading agriculturists of this section of Oregon. Unto him and his wife were born the following named: Mary, who is living in Benton county; Mrs. Jane Currin, of Corvallis; Mrs. Katie Veach, of Lane county, Ore.; William, of this review; Andrew, who is living in New York City, where he is engaged in the drug business; Robert, who died about thirteen years ago in Benton county; John, of Benton county, and Arthur, who is living on the old homestead.

William A. Buchanan obtained his early education in the district schools and afterward spent two years as a student in the Agricultural College of Corvallis. He then went to work upon the home farm, where he remained for a year, after which he was married and engaged in farming on his own account, six miles southwest of this city. He there carried on agricultural pursuits for six years. After he had lived there for five years he lost his right arm by the bursting of a wood-saw. For a year longer he remained upon the farm, and then removed to Linn county, where he continued farming for two years, but he found that his efforts were much hampered by the loss of his right arm, and he determined to abandon agricultural pursuits. Therefore, on October 7, 1892, he took up his abode in Corvallis, where for a few years he operated a small dairy. In 1894 he was nominated on the Democratic ticket to fill the office of county treasurer, but was defeated by fifty-one votes. In July, 1894, he was appointed deputy county recorder and served in that position until 1896, when, in June, he was again nominated by the Democratic party for the position of county treasurer and was elected by a majority of eighteen. In July he entered upon the duties of the office, and, in 1898, he was renominated and elected by an increased majority of eighty. In 1900 he was again the party's candidate, and this time was given a majority of two hundred and eighty. At the fourth election, in 1902, he received a majority of two hundred and forty. His official service is most commendable, for he has ever been found methodical and accurate in the discharge of his duties, fully meeting the trust reposed in him in every particular. He is now also serving as school clerk of his district, having filled the office continuously since March, 1896, with the exception of two years.

In Linn county, Ore., Mr. Buchanan was united in marriage to Miss Nettie Willbanks, who was born in Mississippi, a daughter of W. J. Willbanks, now a retired farmer residing in Corvallis. Mr. Buchanan is connected with the Woodmen of the World, and he belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in which he takes a very active part, doing all in his power to promote the cause of Christianity. He is now serving as one of the trustees of the church. Mr. Buchanan deserves great credit for what he has accomplished. After losing his right arm he had to learn to write with his left hand, and says it was the hardest thing which he ever tried to do, but he finally mastered the task to which he set himself, and now is a fine penman, using the Spencerian system. He is well liked and very popular and the circle of his friends is almost co-extensive with the circle of his acquaintance.

JUDGE HARRISON RITTENHOUSE KINCAID. Prominent among the citizens of Eugene, Lane county, Judge H. R. Kincaid is named as a representative of all that is substantial and progressive in the community, and is given the credit which belongs to one who has been named among the pioneers of a state. He is, and forty years has been, identified with the Oregon State Journal, the oldest weekly newspaper in Oregon owned by one party, and in addition to the duties which the management of this paper entails, has taken an active part in all public affairs, in connection with the advancement of his own prosperity aiding in that of the general community, and indeed making his influence felt throughout the entire state. What he is, and what he has done, have become matters which properly belong to the history of the early days, since through his own, and like efforts of others, has come the greatness of Oregon.

The Kincaid family is of Scotch-Irish ancestry, the first American representative locating in Virginia, where the grandfather, Francis, was born, and from which state he brought his family to Madison county, Ind. As a pioneer he became a farmer in that state. His son, Thomas Kincaid, the father of the Judge, was born in Greenbrier county, Va., and was seventeen years old when he went with his father to Indiana. In addition to his training as a farmer he learned the trade of a blacksmith, the two forming his means of livelihood throughout his entire life. A beautiful talent which brightened his life and added pleasure to the lives of all with whom he came in contact, was his musical ability, the instrument which he learned to play being the violin. Being a progressive and active man he took great interest in the movements of the day, local and national, and while a resident of Indiana he became captain of a company of state militia. He also performed every duty which came to him as a citizen, upholding the interests of the Republican party, of which he was an adherent; a strong Abolitionist, his convictions lay with the principles which dictated the course of action followed by this party, and when the Whigs were merged with the Republicans he remained with them, and was a Republican throughout his life. Inheriting the pioneer spirit which had distinguished his ancestors, he early anticipated becoming a part of some newer, western state, deciding first to locate in Texas. While en route to that state he met, in St. Louis, a friend who advised him rather to settle in Iowa, whereupon he located in Appanoose county, that state, and spent the winter, the rigors of which added to his previous desire to reside in Texas. In April, 1845, he set out once more for the south, but in Van Buren county he met so many who were returning that he became discouraged, and located instead in St. Francis, Ark., where he passed the winter. After a short sojourn in Memphis he returned to Madison county, Ind., and remained in his old home until 1853. In that year he brought his family across the plains and settled on a farm three miles southeast of Eugene, Lane county, Ore., thus becoming a pioneer of this western state. He made his home upon that farm until he became an inmate of his son's home, where he died in 1865, at the age of sixty-five years. He married Nancy Chodrick, a native of Butler county, Ohio, and the daughter of Peter Chodrick, who settled in Indiana and made his home in that state for the remainder of his life. Mrs. Kincaid now makes her home in Eugene, at the age of eighty-seven years.

Of the seven children born to his parents. Judge Kincaid is the oldest, and one of two who are still living. He was born in Madison county, Ind., January 3, 1836, and was reared on his father's farm, his education being derived from an attendance at the district school in the vicinity of his home. He was but seventeen years old when he became a pioneer, as a member of his father's family crossing the plains with ox-teams, one of which he drove from Indiana to the Willamette valley. The trip was fraught with the usual trials and dangers. Leaving Indiana in February they crossed the Mississippi river on the ice, from the city of Burlington journeying across Iowa to the Missouri river, which they crossed at a point nine miles below Omaha. Their journey was interrupted for a time, while they waited for the grass to grow to furnish provender for their stock, when they once more set out, taking the Barlow route for Oregon. Not a house occupied the present site of Omaha, nor did they see any on the way, the first signs of habitation being at Foster, twelve miles from Oregon City, where they arrived September 29, 1853, reaching Lane county October 11. Judge Kincaid remained at home for about two years, during which time he assisted in the improvement and cultivation of his father's farm during the winters, while the summers found him employed by Isaac and Elias Briggs in digging a mill race at what is now Springfield. In 1855 he bought a pony and miner's outfit and set out for the Rogue river mines. In the placer mines on Althouse creek the Indians became troublesome, and, taking the miners unawares, killed several before the others saw the necessity of preparing for warfare. They put up a fort in that location and for several weeks were compelled to live on the defensive. Seeing no further chance for mining, Judge Kincaid and his partner started for Crescent City, Cal., where they remained until spring, earning their livelihood by chopping cord-wood and splitting rails. In the spring of 1856 Judge Kincaid went on the steamer Goliath as a steerage passenger to San Francisco, where he was engaged for a few weeks in erecting a plank fence in the city. He then went by steamer to Sacramento, walked from there to Folsom City, and was soon at work in the mines on the American river, near Auburn, where he remained until the water dried up. Locating then in Marysville, he worked in the stables of an express company, after which he found employment with Matthew Sparks, upon his ranch on Bear river. Mr. Sparks afterward sold his property and Judge Kincaid went with him to Colusa county, and was there engaged in the making of rails for his employer. The following summer he engaged in freighting in the mountains. It was the same year that he decided to return to Oregon, and leaving his outfit, valued at about $500, for which he never received any return, he went to San Francisco, and embarked for Portland. From the latter city he journeyed to Corvallis, and from there walked to Eugene, practically again at the beginning of his career.

The first work which Judge Kincaid did in Oregon was cutting logs, which he hauled to the mill-race, and had them sawed on shares, using the lumber to build his house, he having purchased six acres of land in the southern part of Eugene before going to California. As another means of livelihood he also burned charcoal and sold it to the blacksmiths in Eugene. Having accumulated a small amount of money he decided to attend school for one winter. In Columbia College he was a member of a class which boasted many eminent men, among them being C. H. Miller, now Joaquin Miller; the late Judge Watson; John Miller, D. D. S.; a brother of Joaquin Miller; Joseph D. Matlock; Judge J. J. Walton and Jefferson Blevins. At that time B. J. Pengra was conducting the People's Press, and the year being 1860, when the entire Union was shaken with the questions which were then assailing it, much was written on the subject. The Herald, a Democratic paper, and strong for secession, published many articles written by President Ryan, of Columbia College, all appearing under the pen name of Vindex. After much persuasion on the part of friends, Judge Kincaid was induced to answer them through Mr. Pengra's paper, four articles appearing under the name of Anti-Vindex. President Ryan ascribed the articles to Mr. Pengra, and in an assault attempted to kill him, after which he escaped to Virginia and entered the Confederate army. The affair broke up Columbia College. This was the beginning of the newspaper career of Judge Kincaid, the next summer finding him on the staff of the People's Press, the leading Republican paper of the state. Pengra was nominated for presidential elector, and while engaged in campaigning left the judge to learn printing. The press work and nearly all of the writing was done by Judge Kincaid during the campaign of 1860. A short time afterward he gave up this work and for two summers was engaged in packing to Canon City, after which he again became identified with editorial work. For a short time he worked on the State Republican, the Union Crusader, and Copperhead Killer, the latter edited by A. C. Edmunds, who wrote principally upon religious subjects, while the judge wrote upon political issues. A year later the judge and Joel Ware bought this paper, and changed the name to the Oregon State Journal. Beginning March 12, 1864, the two were associated for one year, when Mr. Ware sold out to Judge Kincaid, who has since successfully and ably managed the affairs of the paper, holding the tone to the highest possible standard.

Politically, no man has exercised more influence than Judge Kincaid, for he has proven himself one of the strong and reliable men of his party, and as such has won the commendation of leaders. He has always been a staunch Republican, and in 1896 joined the ranks of the Silver Republicans, in entire sympathy with whom he has since remained. When the Republican state convention met in Portland, April 7, 1870, all the nominations were made speedily and by acclamation—except that for state printer, for which Henry L. Pittock, of the Oregonian, Henry Denlinger, of the Oregon Statesman, and D. M. C. Gault were active candidates. The friends of Judge Kincaid, who was then a clerk in the United States Senate, three thousand miles away, and was not a candidate, used his name. Judge Kincaid was nominated on the fifth ballot, which stood as follows: Kincaid, 109; Denlinger, 76; Pettock, 11. The nomination was then made unanimous and Judge Kincaid returned from Washington to conduct the campaign. In 1894 he was elected secretary of state on the Republican ticket, serving from January, 1895, to January, 1899. In 1898 the same position was virtually his, but he could not endorse the gold standard platform, and could not accept the nomination on that basis; he cast his lot with the Silver Republican ticket, and was defeated, though he led the ticket. In 1900 he was nominated on the Citizens' ticket for county judge, and overcame a majority of five hundred votes, taking the oath of office in July, 1900, for a term of four years. For eleven years, from 1868 to 1879, Judge Kincaid was in Washington, D. C., where he acted as a clerk in the United States Senate; he was first in the finance room, later in the executive room, and then in the enrolling room, after which he was indexing clerk until 1879, when a change in the political situation at Washington made it more profitable for him to return to Eugene, again assuming charge of his paper, for which he had written letters and editorials throughout the entire time. This paper is an eight-page quarto, published weekly, and at different times he has been interested in conducting a daily. In addition to the interests above mentioned, the judge has always taken a lively interest in the agricultural pursuits of the country, devoting three hundred and twenty acres of the old donation claim to stock-raising. He is also interested in mining.

The marriage of Judge Kincaid occurred in Macomb county, Mich., September 29, 1873, and united him with Miss Augusta Lockwood, a native of that locality. Her brother, C. M. Lockwood, was for many years identified with the interests of Oregon, having conducted the stage line between The Dalles and Salt Lake City for some time. His death occurred in Michigan. The one child born to Judge and Mrs. Kincaid is named Webster Lockwood. Among the societies with which Judge Kincaid is connected are the State Pioneer Association, the Oregon Historical Society, the Commercial Club of Eugene, and for some time he belonged to the Illihee Club of Salem and the Mulptopur Club of Portland. The life of Judge Kincaid has been one that is noticeable even among the many who have proven potent factors in the upbuilding of the west, and to no man is greater credit due for the stanch support which he has given toward the promotion of all worthy movements. He is today numbered among the representative citizens of Oregon, and as such is given a place among the records of her past.

EDMUND WALLER HARTLEY, one of the representative farmers of Marion county, occupies one of the most picturesquely located country homes within the limits of the county, where he and his family dispense a generous hospitality to friend and stranger alike. His farm, which is located seven miles east of Salem, consists of four hundred acres, most of which is under a high state of cultivation. The original tract, upon which he located in 1865, consisted of three hundred and twenty acres of the most fertile and productive land in the county. Mr. Hartley has also indicated his faith in the future of Oregon by purchasing real estate in Salem.

Mr. Hartley was born in Hardin county, Ky., February 6, 1825, and is a son of Joseph and Polly (Singleton) Hartley. There he was reared on his father's large farm. When the family removed to Jefferson county, Ill., in 1841, he accompanied them, helping to found a new home in a desolate and sparsely inhabited prairie region. In the spring of 1865 he started across the plains with his family, his outfit consisting of three wagons, one drawn by four horses and the other two by oxen. The journey consumed about six months. With rare judgment he located at once upon the farm which has since been a source of pride to him, and which is providing him with a comfortable income. All the improvements upon the property are entirely due to his energy and progressive spirit, and he is regarded as one of the most successful farmers in the county.

Mr. Hartley was united in marriage with Ann Eliza Whitlow, December 29, 1847. She is a native of Laurel county, Ky., where she was born October 22, 1829. Of this union twelve children have been born. In the order of their birth they are as follows: M. Jane, single, living at home; Emily D., wife of J. L. Cline, of Portland, Ore.; Charles L., farming eight miles south of Salem; Joseph T., deceased; Elenora S., wife of Levi S. Brower, living near Mill City; Letitia M., deceased; Hiram A., living seven miles southeast of Silverton; Edgar, of Salem; Amanda I., wife of G. D. Bowen, who lives near Silverton; Ida May, and M. Maggie, at home, and an infant, deceased.

Mr. Hartley is an enthusiastic advocate of the best possible educational advantages for the children of the present generation, and for some time has served with fidelity as a member of the school board. He is a member of the old school Baptist Church, and contributes generously of his means towards its support and in behalf of its charities. He is deservedly honored for his business ability and integrity, as well as for his many estimable personal characteristics. In politics he has always been a Democrat.

GUS A. HURLEY. The real estate, law and insurance business of Cooper & Hurley, though established but two years ago, has the distinction of being the only enterprise of its kind in Independence, and has already worked up a trade in keeping with the high character and unquestioned ability of the men directing its affairs. The financial, commercial and agricultural opportunities of Polk county contribute to the principal business of the firm, and it is their intention to boom these important departments, and thus enhance the value of lands whose sale has been placed in their hands. At their well equipped offices on the east side of Main street, information is forthcoming regarding almost all of the inducements held out to home-seekers. Loans are also negotiated, property rented and collections made.

Gus A. Hurley, of the firm of Cooper & Hurley, is a native son of Oregon, and was born at La Fayette, Yamhill county, June 14, 1877. His father, Andrew, from whom he inherited a liking for law, was born in the state of Maine, and was one of the sterling western pioneers whose successful career was of his own fashioning. He removed at an early day to Oshkosh, Wis., and finally became interested in the steamboat business on the Mississippi river, becoming in time an officer on the boats. After crossing the plains in the early '50's, he located at Salem and engaged as a plasterer and mason, in the meantime spending his spare moments in mastering the intricacies of legal science. About 1873 he began to practice his profession, and was thus engaged up to the time of his death in 1895, at the age of fifty-six years. He was an active Republican, and, as indicated by his various interests, a man of marked ability and indefatigable energy. He married Almira Smith, who was born in Yamhill county, and is the mother of two children, of whom Gus A. is the oldest. Almira Smith was a daughter of Sidney Smith, without doubt one of the very first to cross the plains to Oregon, for he came with a delegation of home-seekers as early as 1839, locating in the Chehalem valley, where he died at an advanced age.

From the public schools Gus A. Hurley entered the state normal school at Monmouth, from which he was graduated in 1896, and thereafter he studied law under W. H. Holmes, of Salem, Ore. He was admitted to the bar June 12, 1899, and conducted a general law practice until associating himself with Mr. Cooper, under the firm name of Cooper & Hurley. He has a profound knowledge of law and general business, his occupation embracing more lines of activity than falls to the lot of the average legal practitioner. He is interested in the building up of Independence, and is secretary of the Independence Improvement Company. He is also fraternally inclined, and is identified with the Masons, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Although one of the youngest, he is also one of the most promising of the professional and business men of this county, and his friends and associates predict for him a career of more than ordinary usefulness.

LINUS W. HARGER. When the town of Newberg was but a scattering array of houses Linus W. Harger proved an inspiration to various lines of activity. He came to the locality in 1872, and, foreseeing the need of such a structure, erected the first warehouse in the town in 1875, a departure appreciated to the full by the surrounding farmers, who flocked thither with their products. About the same time Mr. Harger invested in three hundred and twenty-three acres of land, which has since been his home, and where he has extensively cultivated grain, raised stock, and grown fruit. He has been very successful from a business standpoint, and in his private character has won the esteem of all with whom he has been associated.

This honored Oregonian pioneer was born in Hampden county, Mass., November 9, 1833, and comes of a family long identified with the pilgrim state. His paternal grandfather, David, was born there, and during the war of 1812 left his forge and anvil in a paying little blacksmith shop to serve the interests of a stricken country. His son, Leander, the father of Linus, was also born in Massachusetts, and lived for the greater part of his life near West Granville. In later life he removed to East Bridgewater, Mass., and died there at the age of eighty years. He married Marcia Coe, who was born in Massachusetts March 26, 1803, and who is now living at the old home in East Bridgewater, aged one hundred years. Her father, Seth, was born in Massachusetts, and came from ancestors long residents of the snug little country of Wales.

The oldest son and second child born in his father's family, Linus W. Harger was educated in the public schools and at a Massachusetts Academy, and at the age of eighteen engaged in the butchering business for a year. Afterward he served an apprenticeship to a carpenter, and was then engaged in building and contracting until his thirty-ninth year. In 1854 he came to Oregon via Panama and San Francisco, and after three years' residence in Washington county, worked at his trade in different parts of the valley, being engaged by the government at Fort Dalles for about a year. The following two years were spent in travel throughout the middle west, where Mr. Harger looked for a desirable permanent locality, but found none to compare with the state of Oregon. Via the plains he returned in 1860, again settling in Washington county, where he bought a hundred and eighty acres of land, which he improved, and in connection with the management of which he also engaged in building and contracting for four years. Mr. Harger then became identified with the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and as a traveling builder was thus engaged until 1872. Having in the meantime sold his home in Washington county, he located on his present farm in Yamhill county, with the substantial development of which he has since been connected. Aside from building the warehouse which furnished an impetus to trade in general at Newberg, Mr. Harger has been identified with general affairs in his locality, his sound business judgment, sterling integrity and caution making his advice invaluable upon all matters affecting the welfare of his fellow-townsmen.

In Oregon City, Ore., Mr. Harger was united in marriage with Harriett Pambrun, a native of Washington, and whose father, Peter C. Pambrun, was born in France. Mr. Pambrun was a man of leading characteristics, and besides having an enviable European war record took an active part in the advancement of affairs in the extreme northwest. At the great battle of Waterloo, he was a non-commissioned officer, and was wounded and taken prisoner. After being released he became identified with the Hudson Bay Company in British North America, and there had charge of two ports. He was one of the best known pioneers of that region, and his work in connection with the Hudson Bay Company was in every way creditable, his management of their trading posts being characterized by business shrewdness and unquestioned integrity. Mr. Pambrun was killed by a horse falling with him while out with a party of friends in search of coyotes. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Harger: Helen M., Emerite, Theresa Ruth and Catherine, the wife of F. D. Kinney, a farmer near Newberg. Mr. Harger is a Democrat in political affiliation, and is fraternally a charter member of the Masonic lodge at Newberg. With his family he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

ZACHARIAH J. IMUS was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, July 20, 1849, his father being a native of New York, born in April, 1824. In his youth, and in truth up to the time of his death, the elder Mr. Imus enjoyed moving from place to place, going when a very young man to Michigan, where he remained but a short time, soon returning to Coshocton county, Ohio. Here he built up a little home, leaving it, however, for Illinois, settling in Peoria county. Proceeding to Iowa in 1855, he bought land in Ringgold county, where he acquired quite a reputation for land-trading. At this time the war was being waged in the southern states, and it was evident that it was not near its close. Mr. Imus had not enlisted earlier on account of his family, who were dependent on him, but now, seeing his duty, he left his home, joining Company I, Twenty-ninth Iowa Infantry, in the spring of 1862, going at once to the front. His fighting days were soon numbered, however, for he contracted a disease that brought him to the hospital, and there he remained for a year before he was mustered out of service in 1865. His death occurred the same year, when he was in his forty-fifth year.

The mother was, in maidenhood, Miss Matilda Reed, a native of Maine, and after her husband's death she went to Missouri, where she lived at the time of her death. Eight children were born of this union, the eldest of whom was Zachariah. A year after his father left for the front this lad of fifteen took up the burden of life, making his own way from this time on. For several years he remained near his mother, helping her from the meager results of his work. At twenty-two years of age he left Iowa, settling in Osborne county, Kans., where he engaged in farming. He homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres, putting upon the claim the necessary improvements, but in 1881 he left that state, coming to Oregon. Here he bought fifty-two acres near Dundee, Yamhill county, the principal part of the ground being used for the cultivation of hops. The land adjacent to the town, about four and a half acres, was in grass. For ten years this property remained in his possession, but having interested himself in the politics of his adopted city, he soon found other duties that demanded his attention, so sold his hop-farm in 1901. Through Republican influence, he received the appointment of postmaster, November 6, 1898, and has since served as school director, school clerk and road supervisor.

Mr. Imus was married in Osborne county, Kans., to Miss Hannah Hughes, who was born in White county, Ind. Her father, John Hughes, was a native of Philadelphia, Pa., and during his residence in that city engaged in the manufacture of shoes. In his later life he tried farming, locating in Indiana. He then moved to Nemaha county, Neb., where for three years he ran a hotel in Pawnee City. His next move was into Kansas, where he bought three hundred and twenty acres, and in 1880 came to Oregon, dying here in 1881. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Imus are, in order of birth, Gertrude, James Elmer, Francis, deceased, Lena, Alvin, deceased, Blanche, Rhoda and Ralph. Gertrude is engaged in teaching.

RICHARD B. LINVILLE, one of the honored residents of Newberg, was born in Clay county, Mo., October 17, 1835, and prior to coming to Oregon in 1891 had an extended business and political career in different parts of the middle west. His grandfather, Richard Linville, was born in North Carolina, and settled in Missouri, and in 1846 crossed the plains with ox-teams. On the way his wife was drowned in fording a stream, and alone and disconsolate he pursued his way west, settling in either Polk or Benton counties, where he was successful as a farmer and stock-raiser. John Linville, the father of Richard B., was born in North Carolina, and removed with his father to Missouri. Besides engaging in farming he also preached in the pulpit of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, and during his comparatively brief life accomplished much good in the world. In later years he was an invalid, and his death occurred in Missouri when his son Richard was eight years of age. His wife, Nancy Jameson, was born in Virginia and died in St. Louis, Mo., leaving five sons and one daughter, of whom Richard B. is the fourth.

At the age of nineteen Mr. Linville graduated from the high school, and entered an academy in Missouri. He was reared to farming, and led a practically uneventful life up to the breaking out of the Civil war. In September, 1861, he enlisted in Company H, of the Fifth Missouri Cavalry, attained to the rank of sergeant major, and after serving for one year obtained permission to organize a company for a new regiment. September 30, 1862, he was commissioned captain of Company E, Thirty-fifth Missouri Infantry, which he organized, and was discharged from the service May 13, 1865. For the greater part he was engaged in bushwhacking in Missouri and Arkansas, and was wounded in the right side, the ball still remaining in that part of his anatomy. His left side did not escape the attentions of the enemy, but the ball failed to reach a vital spot, owing to the fact that he carried a newspaper in his pocket.

In 1866, in Andrew county, Mo., Mr. Linville entered upon his first political responsibility, when he was elected surveyor of the county, and served for two years. He was afterward elected county treasurer and served one term. For the following two years he engaged in the hardware business in Hopkins, Mo., and here, in 1872, was elected surveyor of Nodaway county, serving one term. In 1879 he removed to Kansas, and at Ness City, Ness county, engaged in a general merchandise business for twelve years. This stage of his career Mr. Linville recalls as a very prosperous one, he happening there during a business "boom," and when men with ability and common sense were appreciated at their true value. Here also he entered the political arena, and was elected probate judge of Nodaway county in 1878, serving for one term.

In 1891 Mr. Linville became identified with Oregon, locating at Mount Tabor, where he engaged in farming on a small scale. In 1897 he removed to Yamhill county, and bought ten acres of land near Newberg, where he conducted a fruit ranch with considerable success, but disposed of this property in 1901. He then invested in a large stock of general commodities and has since engaged in general merchandise business with continued success. Mr. Linville was married while living in Missouri to Emma Richardson, a native of that state, and who died in Missouri in 1874, leaving four children: Henry R., a graduate of the University of Kansas, and of Harvard University, where he received the degree of A. B. the first year, that of A. M. the second year, and Ph. D. the third year, and who is at present a teacher of biology in a boys' high school in New York City; Minnie, who is the wife of F. G. Shown, a farmer of Grant county, Ore.; Preston, who is deceased; and Julia, who is the wife of D. Connell of the vicinity of Portland. For a second wife Mr. Linville married, in Kansas, Mrs. Annie M. Jarrett, whose father, Ely Harmon, was born in the state of Pennsylvania. Mr. Harmon removed from Pennsylvania to Kansas in 1879, locating in Ness county, where he farmed for many years, but is now living retired. One child has been born to Mr. Linville and his present wife: Richard B., Jr., who is living with his parents. Mr. Linville has been a staunch Republican ever since his voting days, and he is fraternally connected with the Masons and the Grand Army of the Republic.

HENRY F. HOLLENBECK. As a partner in the largest real estate firm in Eugene, H. F. Hollenbeck occupies a position in the community commensurate with his varied and extensive business experience, and his recognized capacity for painstaking and conscientious work. From a worthy Teutonic ancestry he derives the conservatism and thrift which proceeds slowly but surely to its goal, undisturbed by distractions however alluring or promising. He was born on a farm twelve miles from Madison, Jefferson county, Ind., July 31, 1862, his grandfather, Henry Hollenbeck, having established the family in Scott county, the same state, after his emigration from Germany in the early pioneer days. Enoch R. Hollenbeck, the father of H. F., was born on the Scott county farm, and in early life selected the mason's trade as a means of livelihood. This, combined with general farming, constituted the labor of his active years, and his ability in both directions brought him fair returns from a financial standpoint. As a young man he removed to Jefferson county, Ind., and afterward lived four years in Seymour, Ind., removing to Lincoln, Neb., in 1882. He came to Eugene, Ore., in 1887, and was soon engaged in a paying contracting business, doing the masonry work for the reservoir and many public buildings, and establishing a reputation for thoroughness and substantiality, so essential to the trade which he dignified with his labor and high character. Through his marriage with Elizabeth Maden, who was born in east Tennessee and died in Eugene, Ore., nine children were born, eight of whom are living, H. F. being the second in order of birth. William R., the oldest son, is a druggist in Florence, Ore.; James W. is a business man of Moro, Ore.; May is the wife of George Tucker, of Oakland, Cal.; Florence married John Jenkins of Lane county; Flora, now deceased, became the wife of Mr. R. E. Bristow, of Eugene; Charles and Louis are residents of Los Angeles, Cal.; and Maggie is now the wife of R. S. Smith. During his boyhood days in Indiana H. F. Hollenbeck learned the trade of plasterer, and at the age of sixteen began to work regularly with his father, the two trades combining most advantageously. He accompanied his father to Lincoln, Neb., where success awaited them, and they secured some of the largest contracts in the city, both on private residences and public buildings. After coming to Eugene the son worked at his trade for a year, and then engaged as a clerk in various mercantile establishments for three years, afterward engaging as a partner with C. T. Wandell in Eugene, in the management of the New York Racket Store. Two years later he started a piano and organ business, continuing the same until 1897. He then went to New York City that his wife might perfect her musical education. In 1899 Mr. Hollenbeck returned to Eugene, and after acting in the capacity of yard manager of the planing mill operated by his brother-in-law, Mr. George Midgley, managed the Eugene Hotel for a couple of years. In 1902 he became a partner of C. S. Farrow in the real estate business, and now handles some of the most valuable town and country property in Lane county.

In common with the rest of the community, Mr. Hollenbeck is justly proud of his wife, who is said to be one of the finest musicians on the coast, and is now in charge of the Musical Department of the University of Oregon. Mrs. Hollenbeck was formerly Rose M. Midgley, and was born in Springfield, Mo. She was educated at the University of Oregon, making a specialty of music, and later studied for a year under Prof. Epstein of St. Louis. Mrs. Hollenbeck had the advantage of further training under S. P. Mills, Sharwenka, and Gertitoski, of New York, and afterward entered the National Conservatory of Music, finishing her eastern training under Josef. No greater recommendations were required for this lady than her enviable position with the university, or the appreciation which is unstintingly shown her by all true lovers of music on the coast. Faultless technique, beautiful expression, and wonderful tone effects, characterize her interpretation of the world's greatest masterpieces, and added to these is that capacity for infinite painstaking which is the greatest joy of the harmony loving mind and heart. Mr. and Mrs. Hollenbeck are members of the Christian church. Mr. Hollenbeck is a member of the Eugene Real Estate Exchange, and is fraternally identified with the Woodmen of the World.

VAN DORN McFARLAND. Thirty years of building and contracting in Eugene have established the reputation of Van Dorn McFarland as one of the foremost in his line in Lane county. To his chosen work Mr. McFarland brings an experience dating from the time when, as an energetic but very youthful devotee of hammer and chisel, he used to search the woods for material to fashion picture frames and other articles comparatively easy of construction. These embryonic undertakings back in Belmont county, Ohio, happened half a century ago, and the youth who was fascinated by the possibilities of putting boards together, and spurred on by his natural mechanical ingenuity, was sixteen years old, having been born in Belmont county, February 23, 1837.

As the name indicates, Mr. McFarland is of Scotch ancestry, and he inherits that combination of dogged perseverance and adaptiveness which make of the best of his countrymen substantial and practical successes. His father and grandfather, both named William, were born in the state of Pennsylvania, the former in Redstone, and both became very early settlers of Belmont county, Ohio. The grandfather was a farmer during his active life, and embellished his career with lengthy service during the war of 1812. His death occurred on his farm in Belmont county, at an advanced age, his son, William, also a farmer, living to the age of sixty-three. The younger William married Lucinda Sutton, who also died in Ohio, and two of whose six children are living, Van Dorn being the youngest, and the only one in Oregon. From the farm Van Dorn McFarland stepped into a carpenter apprenticeship, having worked with tools on his own responsibility ever since he could remember, and gained a great liking for the work. About 1863 he removed to Savannah, Ill., and worked on the old Western Union Railroad, and later helped to build every station on the line of the Sabula, Ackley & Dakota Railroad for seventy miles out of Sabula, Iowa. While thus employed as foreman of a large building force, he was located principally along the Wapso river, Iowa, a very unhealthy district, with the result that foreman and crew contracted malarial fever, and all were glad when the large contract was completed. Mr. McFarland himself, after looking around for a place to recuperate, decided upon Eugene, Ore., intending to return east when his cure had been effected. A year in the city not only restored him to health, but inspired him with a wholesome and emphatic appreciation of Eugene as a building and business center. Accordingly, he engaged in his old occupation of building and contracting with such good results that he decided to make this his permanent home. This was in 1873, and ever since he has lived there, in the meantime putting up hundreds of houses and public buildings, contributing much to the upbuilding of the city. He superintended the construction of the Masonic Temple Building, of the John Klemm, Chrisman, and Matlock buildings, and scores of the best and most artistic residences in the city. He is skilled in every detail of his interesting work, and is known not only in the immediate city, but throughout the county. As relaxation from business cares, he superintends the work on his farm of seventy-three acres three and a half miles north of Eugene, taking great interest in the improvement of his property.

Fraternally Mr. McFarland is one of the popular men in Lane county. While a resident of Ohio he was a member of Belmont Lodge No. 16, F. & A. M., was later identified with the Savannah Lodge, and is now a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M. He was made a Royal Arch Mason in Eugene, and is a member of Eugene Chapter No. 10, and is a member of the Ivanhoe Commandery, No. 2, K. T. Formerly he was identified with the Council of Corvallis, Ore., but demitted and joined the council of Albany. Mr. McFarland was a charter, but now demitted, member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of the Degree of Honor, and the Eastern Star. He was a charter member of the first Knights of Pythias Lodge in Eugene, but when the lodge became defunct he withdrew from the order and has never joined the lodge of the present day. In political affiliation Mr. McFarland is a Republican. He is a genial and interesting man, devoted to his calling, and invariably in favor of progress. He believes in the gospel of industry, of fair dealing and uprightness, maintains a name above reproach, and worthy of all honor.

JOSEPH McBEE. A very popular and resourceful man was William McBee, who came to Benton county in 1852 and established the family whose very worthy representative is Joseph McBee, a successful farmer near Corvallis. Born in Ohio in 1801, the father moved to Missouri with his parents when he was a boy, and was there reared on a farm, securing such education at the public schools as the times and his arduous home duties permitted. After his marriage with Elizabeth Milligan, of Ohio, he moved onto another farm, where he prospered, but at the same time desired to further improve his condition. The result of his discontent was that he sold his land in 1852, when he started across the plains with ox-teams, accompanied by his wife and children and his mother. On the way the mother died of cholera, but otherwise the journey was an uneventful one, and the homeseekers arrived at their destination less discouraged than most emigrants in the early days. The first winter being spent in Marion county, they settled the next spring on a claim seven miles south of Corvallis, Benton county, which claim is still in the possession of his heirs. Mr. McBee made many improvements on his farm, and in its management exercised business judgment and the greatest frugality. He had an interesting personality, and succeeded in making friends with all with whom he came in contact. Somewhat of a politician, he took a keen interest in the local undertakings of his party, although he never aspired to office. Nine children were born to himself and wife, of whom W. H. is a farmer near Corvallis; David lives in Smithville; and Joseph is the subject of this sketch.

Trained to farming on the paternal ranch, Joseph McBee remained at home until he was twenty-one, and then went to the gold fields on the Salmon river. After mining and prospecting for a short time he returned to Benton county and took up farming, and in 1875 married Fannie Irwin, who was born in Corvallis, and with whom he went to housekeeping on a claim eight miles southeast of Corvallis. In 1879 he bought two hundred and seventy-three acres of land constituting a portion of the old J. Gage donation claim, and where he is engaged in stock-raising and general farming. He is a Republican in politics, and has been a school director for many years. Mrs. McBee, who was a daughter of Richard and Louisa Irwin, the former of whom is deceased, crossed the plains with her parents in 1850, and was reared in Oregon. She was the mother of the following children: Richard C.; Joseph E.; Lela; Leora; Lizzie; Georgia; Ida; and Willie, deceased in infancy. Mrs. McBee died at the home farm May 31, 1903, a devoted wife and a kind and loving mother. Mr. McBee is prominent in his locality, has a fine farm and fine Durham cattle, and in all his undertakings evidences thrifty and progressive ideas.

CHARLES W. WASHBURNE. Occupying a position of importance in the business circles of Junction City, Lane county, Charles W. Washburne is rounding out a well spent life, the dominant influence of which has been the incidents of a pioneer effort among the primitive conditions of early Oregon. Mr. Washburne came to Oregon in 1853, and to no other man is greater credit due for the rapid and substantial upbuilding of Lane county; strong in his own integrity, his ambitions and purpose in life, he has given the benefit of all these to the advancement of Oregon, and in the evening of his days enjoys both his own prosperity and that of his adopted state.

The birth of this honorable pioneer occurred in Gallia county, Ohio, September 13, 1824. He was the son of Robert Washburne, who, like his father, Charles Washburne, was a native of Virginia, where he met his death by an attack from the Indians while cutting timber for fuel a short distance from the fort, which was the protection of the settlers during the Revolutionary war. Charles Washburne was a pioneer farmer of Virginia and his descendants followed his example by becoming pioneers of the western states. His two sons were Isaac and Robert, the latter moving to Gallia county, Ohio, in 1820, and there engaged in farming until 1827, when he located in Illinois, on a farm eight miles west of Springfield. He continued in that location for a number of years, participation in the Black Hawk war being an event in life during the time. In 1834 he removed to Iowa, making his home in that state throughout the remainder of his life. Eleven miles west of Burlington he entered land and engaged in farming until his death in 1840, meeting with the success which always attends persevering effort. He became a prominent man in his new surroundings and fulfilled his duty as a citizen. Politically he was a Democrat. A reminder of the Washburne family lies in the name of a branch of Cedar Creek, which is known as Washburne creek, in memory of this Iowa pioneer. The wife of Mr. Washburne was in maidenhood, Eva Roy, who was born in Virginia and died in Illinois, in 1839, being at the time en route to Ohio on a visit to friends. She is buried near Decatur, Ill.

Of the four sons and five daughters which were born to his parents, Charles W. Washburne is the youngest and the only one now living. He received his education in the common schools in the vicinity of his home, where he remained during the lifetime of his parents, taking upon himself the management of a farm when he was but sixteen years old. At the time of the gold excitement in 1849, he set out for California and was soon mining on the south bank of the Sacramento river. After two years of success he returned to Iowa via the Isthmus of Panama, and after his marriage came to Oregon in 1853, crossing the plains with ox-teams. During this journey his oldest child, Ruth Ellen, was born near Chimney Rock. After six months of travel the train reached Oregon safely, and Mr. Washburne at once located a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, one and one-half miles southwest of Junction City. For twenty years he made this his home, and lost no time nor spared no effort to reclaim the land from its barren condition. In 1873 he purchased of T. A. Milliorn one hundred and sixty acres adjoining the site of Junction City and there engaged in farming and milling, in which he met with the same success which has characterized his agricultural pursuits, and in 1891 he purchased the old flour mills at Springfield, Lane county, putting in a complete roller process, with a capacity of one hundred and sixty barrels per day. This mill was for some time conducted by Byron and William, the sons of Mr. Washburne, and the property is now owned by himself and his son Byron. One of the most notable achievements of the business ventures of Mr. Washburne was the part which he took in the organization of the Junction City Hotel Company, becoming vice president and a member of its board of directors, remaining in that capacity up to the present time. In 1893, in company with George Pickett and others, he bought the Commercial Bank, a private institution of Junction City, at a cost of $50,000, and he became one of the principals in the organization of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, in which he and his sons now own the controlling interest, Mr. Washburne being a director, and his son, W. C., acting as cashier. This is the only bank in the northern part of Lane county.

Mr. Washburne has met with success in all his efforts. His landed property represents a large amount of money. Besides owning business and residence property in Junction City, he owns four thousand acres of valley land in Lane county, the principal part of which is tillable. Two hundred acres of this adjoins the city, and Mr. Washburne acts as manager of his farming interests, which is principally that of stock-raising, having at present three hundred cattle, horses, sheep and hogs. That which represents the success of Mr. Washburne is the outgrowth of energy, perseverance and determination, for his entire fortune, when he commenced life in the Willamette valley, consisted of thirteen oxen, one horse, six cows, and the farm of one hundred and sixty acres.

Not alone has Mr. Washburne achieved success, for his wife was to him a veritable helpmeet, bravely bearing her share in the trials and troubles which fell to their lot as pioneers. Before her marriage in Iowa, she was Catherine Amanda Stansbury, born in Indiana, the daughter of John Stansbury. He was a native of Maryland and moved to Iowa, where he remained until 1850, when he spent some time in California. After a successful period in the west, he returned to the Mississippi valley, and died in Nebraska, where he had made his home the latter part of his life. Mrs. Washburne died in Junction City April 4, 1894, at the age of fifty-six years. She was the mother of seven daughters and four sons, of whom five sons are deceased, two having died in infancy, namely: Thomas Albert and Chester Douglas. George S., deceased, was a graduate of the State University, a first-class practical lawyer in Eugene, also serving one term as county judge. Those living are Ruth Ella, who is now the wife of John Wortman, of Portland; Eva G. is the wife of R. P. Hill, of Colfax, Wash.; Byron A. is located in Springfield; W. C. is cashier and manager of the bank and hotel company, and is also mayor of Junction City; Emma is Mrs. W. E. Butler of this city; Bertha Kate is the wife of E. U. Lee, of Eugene; Fred W. and Letitia S. are still at home.

In his political convictions Mr. Washburne has always been a staunch Republican, and his was one of the votes which helped make Abraham Lincoln president of the United States. The ability of Mr. Washburne to maintain the responsibilities of public office being so manifest, he has often been called upon to serve his party in various positions, in 1872 upholding the principles of the Republican constituency in the state legislature for one term. During his period of service he was instrumental in locating the state university at Eugene, and also in laying the foundation of the state capitol in Salem, acting as well on various committees. He has always been active in local politics and wields no little influence in political circles in the county and state.

The pioneer days are gone, and there is little left to recall those times of trial and privation; but to the younger generation there is still the living link as represented by the few who remain, while recollection forms a great part of the lives of the latter, as they pass their declining days in the sunshine of Oregon's prosperity. The little log cabin which was once the home of Mr. Washburne has been replaced by a handsome residence, and modern improvements have taken the place of the crude implements and primitive surroundings of those early times. When first a resident of Oregon Mr. Washburne would drive to Brownsville, with his well trained ox-teams, hauling his grain to mill. The trip consumed a week, and on one occasion he drove all night in order to hurry back to his wife and little daughter, left alone in the wilderness of the country. No bridges spanned the streams. The favorite mode of travel was on horseback, and many happy visits were made to friends in various sections of the country, with Mr. Washburne in the saddle, his little daughter before him, and his wife behind. No one, who has known Mr. Washburne and listened to his descriptions of the early days, can fail to have some idea, however faint, of that life which laid the foundation for the western commonwealth, and in so doing built up that character which is the nation's stronghold, in times of peace or war.

WILEY WINKEL. Of Wiley Winkel and his wife it may be said that they have lived longer on one farm than have any of the neighbors in Benton county. Genial and hospitable, they are also among the most popular of the early settlers and have continuously striven to add their quota to the general improvement of their locality. Mr. Winkel was twenty years of age when he crossed the plains with his parents in 1848, having been born in Madison county, Ala., July 6, 1828. His father, Isaac, was born in Kentucky in 1802, and was of German descent. At a very early day he removed to Alabama, and there married Martha Bragg, a native of Alabama, with whom he moved shortly afterward to Missouri. In 1848 he outfitted with ox-teams and wagons and crossed the plains in the train of Captain Miller, and on the way encountered no serious opposition from the Indians, nor was there serious illness among the homeseekers. Mr. Winkel came direct to Benton county, where he took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres ten miles south of Corvallis, on the old territorial road, which is now occupied by his son, but upon which he himself lived for about a year. Next he located on a farm one mile north of Corvallis, which he improved and lived upon until his death in 1874, having been preceded by his wife in 1865. Seven children were born to this couple, of whom the following are living: Wiley; Gillian A., wife of G. Fisher, of Lane county; Martha, the widow of Mack Porter, of Benton county; and Missouri, the widow of John Baker, of Junction City.

Wiley Winkel remained at home and aided his father with the management of the farm for a year after coming to Oregon, and when the older man moved onto his other farm the son proved up on the original claim. In 1851 he married Pamela Grimsley, who was born in Illinois in 1834, and who crossed the plains with her family in 1847. The young people went to housekeeping on their present farm, which consists of seven hundred acres in one body, three hundred of which are under cultivation. He has since carried on general farming and stock-raising, and has proved himself one of the very capable and resourceful men of the country. His interests have been by no means confined to his immediate neighborhood, but have embraced the political, educational and moral well-being of the county community. He has been especially interested in the undertakings of the Democratic party, in the principles and issues of which he has unbounded faith. An important factor in his success has been the unfailing sympathy and help of his wife, who is a daughter of John Grimsley, who was born in Tennessee, and in Kentucky married Mary Scott. Soon afterward he moved to Illinois, and thence to Iowa, and after crossing the plains in 1847 settled on a claim three miles south of Philomath in the foot-hills. Four children were born to himself and wife, of whom Mrs. Winkel is the oldest; Alameda is the widow of J. Morris, of Big Bend; Malinda is the widow of M. Winkel, of Harrisburg; and Mary E. is the wife of A. Palmer, of Arlington, Ore. Mr. Grimsley farmed successfully until a few years before his death, at the age of ninety-four years, he having moved into the town of Corvallis, where his wife also died at the age of eighty-four years. He was a soldier in the Black Hawk war, and was one of the first settlers of Benton county. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Winkel, the order of their birth being as follows: Fannie, deceased; Lawrence, a resident of Junction; Effie, the wife of R. Irvin, near Corvallis; Robert M., deceased; Bellvaria, wife of R. Logan, of Linn county, Ore.; Isaac N., farming a part of the home place; John G., also on a portion of the home place; Percy C., living at home; and Eugene, who died in infancy. To all who appreciate manly and substantial traits of character, and the value in their midst of conservative and painstaking thought, the wish is sincere that Mr. and Mrs. Winkel may have many years yet of successful life, and may be long spared to represent the substantial and influential element in their county.

JOHN JOHNSTON. Fifty-one years, with their changing scenes and conditions, have passed over the head of John Johnston since he first settled on the farm where he now makes his home, the location being in Marion county, Ore., five miles west of Woodburn. He was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1828, and came to the United States in 1835, with his parents, Thomas and Hannah Johnston. The trip was made on a sailing vessel and occupied six weeks. Upon their arrival in New York City they journeyed at once to St. Louis, Mo., where the father engaged in the commission business.

The education of Mr. Johnston was received in private schools in St. Louis. He remained at home until he was fifteen years old, when he went to work with his brother at Beardstown, Ill., in a flour-mill. In 1850, in company with two friends, Horace Hill and Dan Riddle, he bought four yoke of oxen, wagon and other necessary equipments, and started from Independence, Mo., bound for the great northwest. The journey lasted from April to August, at the close of which the young emigrants located in Marion county, Ore. The first year of his residence here Mr. Johnston conducted McKay's Mission Mill, the next finding him in Yreka, Cal., having traveled by pack-horses from Oregon to the latter state, where he spent a short time in mining and prospecting. Though meeting with gratifying success he preferred life in the state in which he had made his home on first coming to the west. Returning to Oregon in the fall of the same year he passed a part of the summer of 1852 in running a mill on the Santiam river, giving it up to buy, in partnership with William H. West, the right of Mathew McCormick to four hundred and ninety acres of land located in Marion county. There was a little log cabin on the claim, wherein the two men, both being bachelors, kept house for four years. At the end of that time Mr. Johnston married Miss Mary Kennedy, who was born in 1842, and from that day to the present their home has been made upon this farm.

Of the children which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Johnston, Ellen, the eldest, is the wife of K. Manning, of Portland; Annie is the wife of Charles Henkle, also of Portland; Thomas is located in Forest Grove; Robert is in Astoria; Agnes is in Spokane; William is in Sherwood; John is a hop-grower of Marion county; Joseph and Charles both make their home with their parents; Eliza is in Portland; and Cecilia lives at home.

Mr. Johnston now owns five hundred and thirty-five acres of land, three hundred and fifty of which is cultivated and pasture land, upon which he is carrying on general farming and stock-raising. Politically he is an adherent of the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party, and through this influence has served in various offices in his community. For a period of twenty years he has served as clerk of the school board, and also as road supervisor for a considerable length of time, his personal worth being evidenced in the discharge of the duties which have fallen to his lot as a citizen of this great commonwealth.

CHARLES BECKE, JR. The agricultural interests of Marion county are well represented by him whose name introduces this review, and it is with pleasure that we present to our readers a brief outline of the qualities and characteristics of Mr. Becke. The province of this history is not so much to enter into the small details of a man's life, as to show forth to the world something of the governing principles which have led to his success. We do not any of us need to be told that the farming class of any country is really its bone and sinew, and that those who cultivate the soil contribute the first and most essential source of wealth in all lands. It is to this class that Mr. Becke belongs, being the owner of a valuable farm of one hundred and ninety-three acres, devoted to general farming, twelve acres being planted to hops, for which he finds a ready sale on the market. The farm is well cultivated and has many improvements upon it, indicating the careful supervision of the owner.

Mr. Becke was born in the German colony, in Bethel, Shelby county, Mo., February 20, 1854, and is a son of Charles Becke, who was born in Hanover, Germany, in 1820. In 1846 he left his native land, sailing for America, and on arriving in this country he took up his abode in Shelby county, Mo., where he was married to Johanna Keil. He remained in Missouri with the Bethel colony until 1867, when he brought his family across the plains and mountains, making his way to the Aurora colony, east of the present site of Aurora. Six months were consumed in making this journey, and the family of course were weary and glad to find a permanent place of abode. They remained in the Aurora colony until there was a division of property, in 1875, Mr. Becke receiving as his share the farm of one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he yet makes his home.

Charles Becke, Jr., was but thirteen years of age when his parents came to Oregon, and in the common schools of this state he received his education. He was one of a family of eleven children, five of whom are now living: Charles, the subject of this sketch; Louisa, the wife of Joseph Erbsland, of Marion county; Henry, who lives upon his father's farm; Sarah, the wife of George Gooding, a resident of Marion county; and Edward, who resides in Aurora.

At the age of twenty-five years, Mr. Becke began work for himself on a farm, following this by engaging in carpenter work for the Southern Pacific Railroad and elsewhere. For three years he acted as a clerk in the store of John Giesy. He was persevering and industrious, and these virtues always bring their reward, so that in 1881 he had saved enough money to purchase his present farm. He was not satisfied that his land should remain unimproved, but set about to transform it into a valuable farm property which he has succeeded in doing and it now annually returns to him a good income and does credit to his industry and care. Three years after the purchase of his home, he took a bride to preside over it, the lady of his choice being Miss Anna Giesy, daughter of John Giesy, the ceremony being performed January 23, 1884. They have three living children: Aurelia Louisa, Ursula Amelia and Alterius Charles. Mr. Becke is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, having maintained fraternal relations with these organizations for a number of years. He is a firm believer in the principles of the Republican party and always defends what he believes to be right, whether it relates to his own personal actions or to the issues which involve the nation's honor.

GEN. THOMAS JONES THORP. Though nearly a half century has passed away since the dark cloud of threatened disruption appeared on the country's horizon, and in the interval many events have conspired to make common the interests of the then warring sections, there is still a lasting lesson of patriotism and a strengthening of national love in the perusal of the lives of men who offered themselves as sacrifices for a principle the advocacy of which meant a fratricidal struggle, fearful in its intensity and saddening in the result when viewed through the desolated homes and ruined fields. The army which pitted its strength against Lee's soldiers was not called forth from impulse; principle and patriotism dominated the actions of these men, foreshadowing the future greatness of our united country.

A representative of the men of this epoch is Gen. Thomas Jones Thorp, a review of whose life, though brilliant in action and teeming with events, would still be incomplete without its companion sketch—a record of the woman who cast in her fortunes with his in the maelstrom of public upheaval, giving herself with patriotic ardor to every movement that meant service to her country. United as General Thorp and his wife were in the face of the gathering storm and at the head of the mustering forces, the record of their lives is so closely interwoven that that of one is not complete without that of the other. Mrs. Thorp was in maidenhood Mandana Coleman Major, her birth occurring in Allegany county, N. Y., January 25, 1843, being the daughter of Col. John Major, also a native of that county, and the granddaughter of Stephen Major. The latter was born in the northern part of Ireland of Scottish parentage, and as a young man he came to New York and settled in Karr valley, where he engaged as a merchant tailor, through the practice of his inherited thrift amassing a fortune before his death. Her father, John Major, was a colonel of the state militia and a large land-owner, and he married Serena Rathbone, a native of New York and a descendant of Major Moses Van Campen, a patriot of the Revolution. Colonel Major died in the state of his birth.

Mrs. Thorp was reared under the careful training of a devoted mother, learning housewifely arts in addition to the splendid education received in Alfred University, and, though but seventeen when the storm-cloud began to gather darkly, her inheritance of patriotism and national love responded to the situation, and no mass meeting was complete without her presence and the singing of a national song in her unusually beautiful voice, which helped no little in enlistment. At the close of the first peninsular campaign, when more troops were required to face Lee's advance into the north, President Lincoln called upon the governor of New York to raise and equip two regiments, and this young patriot offered her voice in song once more, the soldiers of the One Hundred and Thirtieth and One Hundred and Thirty-sixth carrying into battle the memory of her unselfish efforts, which inspired many to bear with patience and fortitude the trials of a soldier's life. The ceremony which united her with her husband in the holy bonds of matrimony was performed at a crucial period of the war and in a most picturesque manner; it took place at Portage, on the banks of the Genesee river, in the hollow square formed by the soldiers of the One Hundred and Thirtieth Regiment, in which Thomas P. Thorp had just been assigned the position of lieutenant-colonel, and was performed by the Rev. Dr. Joel Wakeman, a chaplain of a company also of that regiment. After her marriage Mrs. Thorp proved herself worthy to be called a patriot and to be the wife of a soldier. She followed the regiment throughout its entire service, rendering devoted service in the ranks with the many other noble women of that period who sacrificed all that they held dear to minister to the needs of the sick and wounded in camp and hospital. She joined the regiment of her adoption and remained with it during the siege of Suffolk, Va., enduring with calm heroism the dangers and privations, cheering and encouraging the lonely, homesick soldiers, to whom the sight of a woman's pitying face recalled the one waiting and watching for their return. Never in the course of the weary months and the increasing perils did Mrs. Thorp suggest to her husband that as he had been several times wounded and a prisoner of war he could consistently leave the service, but cheered him in camp and field until the time of peace, when they rode side by side in the Grand Review at Washington in the Second Brigade, First Division of the Cavalry Corps of the Army of the Potomac, her decoration the full eagle, his the star above the eagle.

Gen. Thomas Jones Thorp was born in Allegany county, N. Y., in 1837, the son of Montgomery Thorp, who was born in the state of Connecticut and died in Michigan, having engaged all his life in farming and milling. Of this family, General Thorp is not alone in his illustrious record, another brother serving in the army, being the late Capt. Alexander K. Thorp, who was killed in the great cavalry charge at Winchester, Va., September 19, 1864. Senator Simeon M. Thorp, another brother, was also killed during the Civil war, coming to his death in 1863 through the sacking of Lawrence, Kans., by the Confederate forces. At the breaking out of the Civil war Thomas Jones Thorp was attending the preparatory department of Alfred University, intending to enter Union College and continue his studies, but with the ardor of patriotism he at once enlisted, receiving on the field his diploma in the class of 1861. In response to President Lincoln's call, he enrolled as a private in a company organized in his native county, which was finally assigned to the Eighty-fifth New York Regiment of Infantry in the Army of the Potomac, and during the first Peninsular campaign he won honorable distinction as a captain at the battle of Fair Oaks, where he was slightly wounded. At the close of the Seven-Days battle his record won him the commendation of Governor Morgan of New York, who selected him to fill the position of lieutenant-colonel of the One Hundred and Thirtieth Regiment. The colonel of this regiment had been selected from the regular army, the choice falling upon General Gibbs, who in becoming brigadier-general left a vacancy for Captain Thorp. This regiment bore a reputation of containing more than ordinary ability, being composed of the flower of the native-born yeomanry of the counties of Allegany and Wyoming, men of erudition and talent, from all professions, and to hold a commission in this regiment naturally gave a man credit for possessing unusual ability and courage, which Colonel Thorp in no wise lacked, for, though crippled from the wound received in the summer, he was out on crutches in September drilling the troops. After the battle of Gettysburg this regiment was transferred to the cavalry corps by an order from the war department, and was thereafter known as the First New York Dragoons.

During the war General Thorp rendered honorable service in every camp of the Army of the Potomac, participating in sixty-four engagements, and was absent from the battlefields only when disabled by wounds or for a short period in which he was a prisoner of war after the battle of the Wilderness, during which time he won a place in the memory of sixteen hundred Union prisoners for the words of cheer and encouragement which he spoke to them on the anniversary of the national birthday. He had been taken prisoner at Trevilian Station, after being severely wounded, and was sent to Macon, Ga., but, undaunted by the privations and sufferings which might be his in a southern prison, he delivered on the Fourth of July an oration commemorative of the day, filled with eloquence stirred to life by the years in which he had sacrificed himself for his country. The stirring events of his brief sojourn in a southern prison were detailed in the north, leading up to the following article, which gave to the public a proper estimate of the worth of Colonel Thorp. We quote herewith: "This outburst of patriotic sentiment uttered in the very heart of the Confederacy, and in the very mouth of the cannon guarding the prisoners, was treated by the prison commander as insubordination, but it was characteristic of Colonel Thorp, who in the night jumped from the train going from Savannah to Charleston in his effort to rejoin his command in front of Richmond. The sterling qualities which prompted thousands of heroic defenders of the Union and constitutional liberty to stand to the front is also a trait with Colonel Thorp." The promotion of Colonel Thorp followed close upon this event.

At the conclusion of hostilities General Thorp became interested in educational work, being called to an important educational institution in Buffalo, N. Y., by the eminent Dr. Thomas Lothrop, then superintendent of public instruction in that city. After several years he turned his attention to the subject of applied mechanics, and received several important patents for invention from the government, being located in Chicago, Ill., having previously been a resident of Cadillac, Mich., where he was interested in the manufacture of lumber. While living in the latter city he served two terms as county clerk, his wife assisting him as deputy clerk and also acting as register of deeds. In February, 1892, having sold out his interests in Chicago, he located in Forest Grove, Ore., many of his interests being in the west, having conducted a sheep ranch for five years located on Little creek, just out of Flagstaff, Ariz., and adjoining the Navajo reservation. For several years he served as principal of various schools in the state, among them being Forest Grove, Woodlawn, Portland, and others. In 1899 he located in Corvallis, Ore., where he now makes his home, looking after his varied interests.

General Thorp is now a prominent man in military circles, being a member of the Loyal Legion and the Grand Army of the Republic. Mrs. Thorp also keeps up her old associations, being a member of the Woman's Relief Corps, and is now identified with Ellsworth No. 7, representing in 1897 the state of Oregon to the National Convention of the Woman's Relief Corps at Buffalo, and again in 1902 being a delegate to Washington, D. C. She is also prominent in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Both the General and Mrs. Thorp are members of the Presbyterian Church, and stanch Republicans politically. Of the four children which blessed this union, Simeon died in Michigan; Annie became Mrs. Sunderland and died in Buffalo; Bessie Mabel and Montgomery are still at home with their parents. The daughter at home has received a fine education through the medium of Pacific University of Forest Grove.

JOHN W. FOSTER. More and more the agriculturist is bringing to bear upon his occupation those practical innovations which tend to facilitate labor and increase the joy of living, and in this regard he is leagues ahead of his weary predecessor, whose interminable hours incapa-cited him for a correct appreciation of his gains, and gave him at best but an occasional glimpse into the more leisurely and congenial walks of life. In illustration of the former state of being, one need go no further than many of the farmers and stock-raisers in Benton county, universally conceded to be one of the most fertile parts of the state. Among these, John W. Foster occupies a prominent place, not only because of personal characteristics of a high order, but because he has one of the most beautiful homes and is one of the most extensive stock-raisers in the county. In the foothills of the coast range, overlooking a serene valley, is this ideal rural home, surrounded by two thousand, three hundred acres of land, many acres of which are under cultivation, and the greater part of which is devoted to stock-raising. On this same farm Mr. Foster was born May 1, 1859, and during all these years it has been his home, no matter how far he has wandered in quest of diversion or business.

John Foster, father of John W., was born in Ohio, March 3, 1822, and in 1834 removed with his parents to Missouri. In 1845 the whole family started across the plains with ox-teams, and though emigration was as yet a novel and rare experience, they encountered little difficulty with the Indians, although some of their cattle passed into their keeping. Six months of travel brought the party to the Tualatin plains, where they spent the winter, the following spring removing to the claim eight miles southwest of Corvallis, where the parents died at an advanced age. John the older did not settle on the claim with his parents, but rather came direct to the claim twelve miles south of Corvallis where his son now lives, and soon after carried to completion a little romance begun on the plains, and which resulted in two hearts deciding to join their life fortunes. Mary Lloyd was an interesting girl on the way to Oregon with her parents, but she did not long survive her marriage, dying while still a young woman. To her husband's care she left three children, Nancy, the oldest, being the widow of James Long of Montana; William is deceased; and Jasper T. lives in Prinesville. In time Mr. Foster married Elizabeth Buchanan, who was born in England, and came to Oregon in 1856, and whose father is mentioned at length in another part of this work. Three children were born also of this union: Henrietta is the wife of Charles Lee of Corvallis; Emma is deceased; and John W. is living on the old claim.

John Foster prospered exceedingly, and in all his business and other undertakings maintained that high standard which is the truest indication of good sense and progressiveness. He made many improvements on his farm, and became one of the most extensive breeders and manipulators of stock interests in Benton county; shrewd and sagacious, he availed himself of apparent opportunities and created new ones, and had the interest of his neighbors and friends at heart. Genial and obliging, he found outstretched hands and welcoming hearts wherever he went, and thus his death at the age of seventy-seven was sadly mourned. From time to time he had added to his land, and finally owned twenty-two hundred acres. Besides his farm he left other property and large money interests, all of which indicated his masterful grasp of chances that came to him. In 1884 he moved to Corvallis, where the remainder of his life was spent in comparative retirement.

After his parents moved from the old place John W. Foster was left in charge, a responsibility which he was abundantly able to assume because of his superior training on the farm, and a practical education acquired in the public schools, at Bishop Scott's Academy and at the Portland Business College. He married Laura Alexander, who was born in California, and who is the mother of one child, Ada E. Mr. Foster is an extensive raiser of stock, making a specialty of Durham cattle, and he also conducts general farming enterprises. He is practical and scientific, and has never allowed himself to get into grooves, or rely upon the customs and methods adopted by those engaged in similar occupations. He is a thinker, reasoner and philosopher, and while rejoicing in the good fortune which fate and his own industry have brought him, has kept pace with the times along general lines, and is a most companionable and interesting man. He has traveled a great deal for pleasure and information, and is one of the most influential and popular farmers in Benton county.

JOHN WILSON GILMOUR, retired, now residing at Silverton, Marion county, was born in Lincoln county, Ky., September 13, 1813, and is a son of George and Polly (Hickman) Gilmour. His father, a native of Kentucky, was a son of James Gilmour, who was born in Ireland and was brought to America in his youth by his parents, who settled in Virginia. George Gilmour was a friend of Daniel Boone, the famous pioneer of Kentucky, who made his home near that of the Gilmour family. Polly Hickman's maternal grandfather, named Wilson, was a member of the famous band of free-lances under command of Francis Marion, and participated in the historic battle of Eutaw Springs.

August 29, 1833, John W. Gilmour married Jane Alexander Bronaugh, and two months later settled in Hancock county, Ill. In 1851 he started across the plains for Oregon with his wife and eight children. Six months later the family arrived in what is now Washington county, locating temporarily near Hillsboro. The following year they removed to Linn county, where Mr. Gilmour followed his trade of blacksmith and incidentally engaged in farming. At his shop, four miles west of Lebanon, he made many of the first plows used in Linn county. He became a man of considerable influence in the community, and for four years served as justice of the peace. Soon after locating in Linn county the Rogue River Indian war broke out, and for nine months he served as captain of a wagon-train for the government.

Mr. Gilmour's wife was a daughter of Taliferro and Jane (Gilmour) Bronaugh, representatives of old families of Kentucky. Mrs. Gilmour died December 9, 1885. To Mr. Gilmour and wife were born ten children, namely: Mary Jane, deceased; Lucy Eleanor, deceased wife of Andrew Linebarger; William, deceased; John, residing in Ellenburg, Wash.; George, deceased; James Alexander, residing in Washington; Nancy Elizabeth, wife of Thomas W. Davenport of Silverton; George Robert, a farmer, residing near Silverton; Martha Ann, wife of Nathan Kirkendall, of Olympia, Wash.; and Sarah, deceased wife of La Fayette Cassidy.

The members of the Gilmour family inherit a rare degree of artistic ability, their paternal ancestors having been gifted as musicians, and the Bronaugh family having exhibited considerable literary talent. This pioneer family has become well known throughout the northwest, and its representatives are respected and admired for the many fine traits in their character.

RICHARD IRWIN. In Richard Irwin, the founder of a worthy and influential family in Oregon, and the accumulator of a fortune through his own untiring zeal, the northwest had one of those old-time merchants who thoroughly understood his business and made money where the majority would have failed. Shrewd and sagacious, he stepped into mining and other localities where there was a demand for his goods, did a thriving business, and disposed of them at just the right time, and always with appreciable profit. With a foundation of good will and good morals, and with personal characteristics which make a man popular and of use in the world, it is not surprising that his life was typical of the best in old-time mercantile ventures.

Born in Ireland, June 11, 1813, Mr. Irwin lost his father when he was a child, and years afterward came to America with his mother and sisters, locating in New York state in 1832. Having learned the mercantile business in his native land, he was not slow in finding employment in his adopted country, and in time became identified as manager with a concern which sent him to Ohio with a stock of goods. Not finding the new locality satisfactory for store-keeping, he went to Iowa, and there engaged for many years in a general merchandise business. In 1850, in St. Louis, he was united in marriage with Louise Kompp, who was born in Germany, and whose home was then in Iowa. Her people crossed the plains in 1853, settling in Benton county, where the father lived to be seventy-five and the mother eighty years of age. Soon after his marriage Mr. Irwin perfected plans for crossing the plains, and outfitted with horse instead of ox teams, having three teams to each of the two wagons, and besides had a carriage and some loose stock. They joined the Jerome Gossage train, and were six months on the way, experiencing little trouble with the Indians. Nevertheless their ranks were lessened by the cholera so prevalent during 1850, with which disease Mr. Irwin was thrice afflicted, while his wife was the victim of one attack of the dread disorder. Arriving in Portland, Mr. Irwin conducted a small store there during the first winter, and in the spring of 1851 came to Corvallis, where he started a store of the same kind. The same fall he took up six hundred and forty acres of land on the territorial road, which land is still owned and occupied by his wife and children. To his farm he moved his store, and while conducting it there for ten years made money rapidly and was an important man in his neighborhood. After disposing of this store he farmed for some time, and in 1864 opened a mercantile business in Portland, shortly afterward removing his stock to east Oregon during the gold excitement. With the subsiding of the craze he sold out and returned to his farm, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising almost up to the time of his death, at the age of eighty-two years and some months. He had large numbers of Shorthorn cattle, the sale of which netted him a large yearly income. Since his death his widow has undertaken the management of the farm, and has proved herself an excellent business woman and far-sighted manager. The home is all that a rural residence should be, and the barns, out-houses and general improvements indicate the progressive and intelligent agriculturist. Of the five children born into the family, Frances is the wife of Joseph McBee, a farmer of this locality; Elizabeth is deceased; James is living at home; Richard is a farmer near Corvallis; and one child died in infancy. Mr. Irwin was a genial and public-spirited man, and everything of an up-building and progressive nature in his neighborhood was sure of his approval and substantial help. For many years he was postmaster of his neighborhood, and he held other important offices, invariably discharging his duties with credit to himself and satisfaction to all concerned. He possessed a fund of common sense, without which success counts for naught, and many a man has been helped on a discouraging way by his cheerful council and material help.

L. N. RONEY. With the passage of many years there will still be standing the evidence of the substantial and material labor which L. N. Roney has contributed to the growth of the city of Eugene and Lane county. As a contractor and builder he has had charge of the erection of many buildings, public and private, which add to the financial and commercial prestige of the community. Among his most important work has been the erection of the Lane county court house, the two McClung buildings, the First National Bank, the Lane County Bank, the Loan & Savings Bank, the Hoffman House, Hotel Smeede, the addition to the Christman building, the Episcopal, Christian and Methodist Episcopal Churches, the Eugene Opera House, and many others of note, including many of the most attractive private residences in the city. His first engagement in Lane county was the assistance he gave in the construction of the bridge across the Willamette river at Eugene. In the successful completion of every enterprise Mr. Roney has won the confidence of the people of the community, and in the fulfillment of every moral obligation has gained their esteem.

L. N. Roney was born in Auglaize county, Ohio, September 2, 1853, the eleventh child in his father's family of twelve children, eight of whom are now living. His parents were Thomas, a native of New Jersey, and Caroline H. (Levering) Roney, a native of Pennsylvania and a representative of the old family of Leverings of Maryland. Thomas Roney settled in Ohio in 1832. His occupation had been that of a weaver, but in Ohio he engaged in farming. In 1878 he came to Oregon and located in Lost Valley, where his death occurred in 1885, at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife died at the home of L. N. Roney in 1897, at the age of eighty-four years. Of this large family of children, four brothers served in the Civil war—Henry and William in the Eleventh Ohio Regiment, and John and Charles in the short service.

In the region of Wapakoneta, Ohio, the scene of his birth, L. N. Roney was reared, the opportunity for educational advancement being so limited that he attended school but little, his wide knowledge of current events and general fund of information being the result of observation in later years. When fourteen years of age he devoted all his energies to farm work, the home farm consisting of one hundred acres which, at the present time, has seven gas wells upon it. When he was seventeen years of age his father removed to Gallatin, Daviess county, Mo. There he remained at work until he was nineteen years old, when he began an apprenticeship at the carpenter's trade, at which he continued for three years. In 1876 he located in Oregon, having been induced to come west by an aunt, Mrs. Williams, who had crossed the plains in 1853, and was then living in Lane county. He at once began bridge carpentering for A. S. Miller & Sons, finding work in the states of Oregon and Washington until 1882. He then began contracting and building in Lane county, and has since built every bridge in Lane county, also operating in other counties, where he has met with uniform success.

In Boise City, Idaho, June 5, 1889, Mr. Roney was united in marriage with Mrs. Orilla G. (Baker) Humphrey. She was born in Salem, Ore., the daughter of Capt. John Baker, one of the early and successful pioneers of Oregon, who now makes his home in Salem.

In his political affiliations Mr. Roney is a Republican. He was the presiding officer of the first Young Men's Republican Club organized in Eugene, has been an influential delegate to several county conventions, and for several terms has served as city councilman from the third ward. He was made a Mason in Missouri in 1874. He is now a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., in which he is past master; is past high priest in Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; in 1897 was grand high priest of the grand chapter of Oregon; is a member of Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, K. T., of Eugene, in which he served as eminent commander in 1892; and is now deputy grand commander of the grand commandery of Oregon, having been elected to that office in September, 1902, and re-elected in September, 1903. He is also associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Eagles, and is a charter member of the Eugene Commercial Club. Mr. Roney is a man of high public spirit, and may always be depended upon to assist in the furtherance of all well considered projects which have for their end the promotion of the best interests of Eugene.

ALFRED E. MOORE. Not all of the interesting homes of Oregon are set down in the midst of broad acres. There are some who prefer rather the modest acres whose every nook can receive the owner's personal attention. To this latter type of home belongs that of Alfred E. Moore, which, when he first purchased the land, was a wild, uncultivated spot, with timber and small brush marring its promise. Today it stands a clean, well-kept farm of twenty acres in the highest form of cultivation, ten acres being in fruit—prunes, apples, etc.—while the rest yields an abundance of farm products, with the added beauty of handsome buildings, giving evidence of the thrift of its owner.

Alfred E. Moore was born in Hardin county, Iowa, December 31, 1858, and was the sixth in order of birth in a family of ten children. He received his education in the common schools of Iowa, attending also the academy located in New Providence, Iowa. At rather a youthful age he secured employment on a farm, where he remained until he was twenty years old. Leaving home at this time he came to Oregon, where he followed up this occupation at Eugene, Lane county. The next year, however, he left Eugene and passed through Woodburn, West Union and Dayton, stopping at each for some time, eager to know the advantages of each, as a possible location for his future home. When he reached Newberg he went no farther, believing that he had at last found that for which he was in search. Here he bought forty acres of land, a little wilderness, and truly it was wonderful faith that could look through that tangle and picture the fair future of that location. He soon sold twenty acres, wisely deciding that a half well done was worth the whole half done. With ceaseless energy he prosecuted the work of his property, cutting roads where they would give easy access, hewing out the trees and grubbing brush until he could see the light from east to west. Truly this little farm presents a fair picture.

Mr. Moore and his brother, C. F., built the first home-made evaporator built in Yamhill county, at Dayton, and two years later Mr. Moore and Mr. Snodgrass built the first commercial evaporator at Newberg.

Mr. Moore married Miss Lizzie Woodward, October 8, 1890, and two children now share the home: Lester and Marion. Mrs. Moore was born in Indiana. Her father, Benjamin, was a native of North Carolina, and at an early day moved to Indiana, settling in Morgan county, where he died. The daughter had gone west to live with a brother in Oregon and it was in this way that she met Mr. Moore. In the Society of Friends Mr. Moore finds his church home, and fraternally is connected with the Woodmen of the World. In his political affiliation he is a Republican. For further information regarding the parents of Mr. Moore, refer to the sketch of C. F. Moore upon another page of this work.

GEORGE WILL. Numbered among the self-educated, self-made and successful farmers of Marion county is George Will, owner of a finely improved farm near Aurora, and formerly identified with the little colony whose tenure of life was completed in 1884. A native of St. Louis, Mo., Mr. Will was born December 21, 1839, and comes of staunch Teutonic ancestry. His father, John Will, was born in Bavaria, Germany, and in his native country owned quite a large country property, which he disposed of in order to come to America, in 1839. With his hard-earned German thalers he bought a farm near Muscatine, Iowa, but, not liking the locality particularly, disposed of it in 1843 and took up land in the Bethel Colony, Shelby county, Mo. Here his death occurred at an advanced age, and he left to his children a fair-sized property, and the heritage of a good name.

At the age of sixteen George Will left the farm of his father and learned the hatter's trade, and at the same time worked in the woolen mills of the Bethel Colony. In August, 1861, at the age of twenty-two, he enlisted in Capt. Henry Will's company, Seventieth Regiment, Missouri Militia, and entered active service as bugler in that company in January, 1863, where he remained until March 10, of the same year, when he was mustered out, and again joined the colonists, who were, at that time, agitating the subject of establishing a branch in the far west, Aurora, Ore., being eventually selected as a desirable site. Hither repaired several bands of pilgrims at different times, but the principal train to start across the plains outfitted in 1863, and consisted of forty wagons and eighty men, besides numerous women and children. The men were heavily armed and prepared for any emergency, and Mr. Will, who was one of the travelers, does not recall any serious disturbances, or any particular suffering from Indian attacks, illness or severe weather. After six months the party reached Aurora, and the members dispersed to select their farms, and start their respective industries.

Locating in Aurora, where his knowledge of woolen mills was an advantage to him, Mr. Will was made foreman of the woolen mills started up by the colony. This position was maintained with credit until the disbanding of the colony, in 1884, at which time every man received his share of land and general profits.

Mr. Will, very early in life, evinced decided taste in music, and became a member of a brass band at nine years of age. After coming to Aurora he joined the celebrated Aurora Brass Band, first playing a French horn, and later the E flat cornet, which connection he maintained until forty years of age.

In 1884 he settled upon the farm where he now lives, and which consists of two hundred and seventy-five acres, devoted to general farming and stock-raising, and to hops, of which there are ten acres at present. To much of his success in life Mr. Will attributes the sympathy and help of a good wife, to whom he was married in 1870, and who was formerly Elizabeth Link. Mrs. Will came across the plains with her parents in 1867, locating in the colony of which her father became a prominent member. Three children have been born into the Will household, of whom Edward H. is assisting his father on the farm; Clara is the wife of Frank Siegler, of Aurora, and Elmer G. is living at home.

Mr. Will is a Republican in politics, but has never taken any particular interest in the political undertakings of his neighborhood, his farm duties taking up the greater part of his time. In spite of early disadvantages as to education, he is a very well-informed man, having become a great reader as the years have gone by. He is staunch in his approval of good schools and practical educational training, and has seen to it that his children have profited by all of the advantages he could give them. He is well known as an upright and enterprising member of the farming community around Aurora, and his Jersey cattle are among the finest, and his farm among the best improved in the neighborhood.

EDWARD F. LAMSON. The name of Lamson is not only substantially identified with the present prosperity of Oregon, but in the old pioneer days was represented in judicial, legislative and agricultural departments of activity. The farm upon which Edward F. Lamson is conducting extensive general and stock-raising enterprises, and upon which he was born September 19, 1850, was taken up by his father, Jeremiah, in 1848, and has since been a prized possession of the family.

Jeremiah Lamson, the establisher of the family in Oregon, was born in Massachusetts in January, 1812, and as a young man located in Burlington, Iowa, where he erected the first store in the town, and thereafter was foremost in its many avenues of usefulness. In 1847 he perfected plans for crossing the plains, and with thirteen yoke of oxen and three wagons well filled with provisions, spent seven months in reaching the desired destination in Oregon. He had little trouble with the Indians, and suffered little from ill health, the journey being a very fortunate and favorable one. In the spring of '48 he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres on the Willamina river, near the town of that name, and there farmed and raised stock almost up to the time of his death in 1888. He took a prominent part in political and other affairs in his adopted state, and from the beginning of its establishment was identified with the Republican party. He was a member of the first senate of Oregon, and was several times a member of the legislature, serving also four years as county judge. In his young days he married Helen Hawks, who bore him four children: R. H., a resident of Portland; H. W., a rancher of Crook county; Dora, the wife of Dr. W. Everett of Tacoma, Wash.; and Edward F. The latter died on the old homestead in October, 1888.

Through his youth Mr. Lamson lived on the donation claim where he was born, and at the age of nineteen took entire charge of its affairs. In 1872 he was united in marriage with Helen Bergess, of which union there have been born three sons, Roy, Guy and Rex. In addition to the four hundred and eighty acres comprising the home farm Mr. Lamson farms other lands, making in all twenty-one hundred acres, and he is engaged principally in stock-raising, to which his tract of one thousand acres of bottom land is well adapted. The stock includes sheep and Hereford cattle, and Mr. Lamson is one of the best informed men on stock matters in this county. He has filled many positions of trust in the community, and as a Republican politician was elected to the legislature in 1898, and again in 1900. President Harrison appointed him Indian agent of the Grand Ronde reservation, and he creditably maintained that position four years. The many sterling qualities of Mr. Lamson have won him many friends in Oregon, and he has ever had the sincere respect and liking of all who have been associated with him.

MRS. MARY W. BARCLAY. Scattered over different parts of Oregon are farms directly under the management of women well schooled in the science of agriculture, whose lives have been passed in taking observations of the methods of others, even while they themselves were not then called upon to exercise their abilities. Such an one is Mrs. Mary W. Barclay, owner of a farm of four hundred acres, twelve miles south of Corvallis, and herself one of the most popular and prominent women in the community. Mrs. Barclay was born in Mahoning county, Ohio, in 1841, her father, James Neill, having settled there after coming from Ireland at a very early day. Mr. Neill was a young man at the time of his emigration, and spent some time in Ohio before marrying Mary Stewart, who bore him nine children, and who died in Ohio. At a later period he removed to Illinois, where his death occurred on a farm, to the management of which he devoted several years of his life.

Mrs. Barclay was reared on the home farm and educated in the public schools, and her first husband was Robert Herron, a native son of Ireland. Mr. Herron first met his future wife when he stopped in Ohio on his way from Ireland to Oregon in 1851, the remainder of his journey being by way of the Isthmus and San Francisco. Five miles northeast of Monroe, Ore., he took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, and in 1861 returned to Ohio and married Miss Neill, then just twenty years of age. Together the young people returned to the western ranch and spent their lives together until the death of Mr. Herron, at the age of fifty-five years. He was a prominent man in his neighborhood, and to an otherwise meritorious life added a daring service in the Rogue River war. Six children were born of this union, of whom James lives near his mother; Cleland is deceased; Jane is the wife of W. T. Hewitt of California; Josiah lives on the old donation claim; John W. lives in Washington; and Laura M., residing on the home place.

After her husband's death Mrs. Herron lived on the old place, successfully managed it, and in time became the wife of Mr. James Barclay. Mr. Barclay was born in the state of Missouri, and in 1851 crossed the plains to Oregon, meeting with no unusual adventures on the way, and arriving at his destination in good health and spirits. At once he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, twelve miles south of Corvallis, and here brought his wife and farmed and raised stock up to the time of his death in 1892. Too much cannot be said of the exemplary life of Mr. Barclay, who was an ambitious, well educated and very popular man, adaptable and successful in all his undertakings. As a veteran of the Mexican war, he drew a pension from the government, and he was also a soldier in the Cayuse war. He was a Democrat in politics, but never took an active interest in office-holding. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Barclay, Ross, Leah, and Gertrude, all of whom are living with their mother. Mrs. Barclay still owns four hundred acres of the two donation claims, and has one of the finest rural homes in this county. Her barns and out-buildings and improvements suggest the up-to-date and prosperous land owner, and no one who entertained an appreciation of the manifold advantages of country life could desire a better place in which to pass their declining years.

WILLIAM A. POTTER. A pioneer, earnest, energetic and forceful, William A. Potter spent many years in the upbuilding of the western civilization before retiring to a quiet life, now making his home in Irving, Lane county.

He came to Oregon in 1851, and since then has been principally interested in the agricultural life of the country. This representative of a Pennsylvania family is the descendant of German ancestry and originally spelled the name Pothour. David Pothour was born on the banks of the Juniata river, in Pennsylvania, in 1781, and in Ohio married Anna McCreary, who was born of Irish ancestry. Their son, William A., of this review, was born near the town of Hubbard, Trumbull county, Ohio, February 7, 1825, into which state the father had removed and there engaged as a farmer. He spent the extraordinarily long period of seventy-five years in one location in that state, where his death occurred at the age of ninety-six years. They had been blessed with the birth of nine children, of whom William A. was the fifth. His early education was received in the common schools of the state where he was born, attending a little log school-house for his share in the distribution of knowledge. Upon attaining manhood he engaged in the occupation in which his father had gained a livelihood, and in 1845 he started out into the world to seek his own living. That year he located in Grant county, Wis., in the southwest corner of the state, where he engaged in lead mining for a period of six years. In 1851 he outfitted with three yoke of oxen and started for Oregon in company with a train of sixteen wagons. Six months was consumed in the journey, which was ended without any particular incident outside of those which naturally accompanied such a trip. Upon his arrival in the west he spent the first winter in Milwaukee, Clackamas county. He then took to surveying, and helped survey in various parts of the Willamette valley. In 1853 he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres located in Lane county one half mile west of Irving, and there put up the first house which the prairie lands of this county had known. In the same year Mr. Potter, with a party, started for the Umpqua mines, but before reaching there they heard the Indians were causing the prospectors considerable trouble, so the party changed their course and finally went to the mines at Yreka, Cal., where he mined for little over a year, but not realizing his hopes he returned to Lane county in 1854 and that ended his search after the hidden treasures of the earth. In a few years he sold his right for $500 and took another claim of a like number of acres, one and a half miles north of the same town, to which he then removed and took up farming and stock-raising. This also was disposed of later, and for several years he spent his time in various locations of the county, always, however, engaging in farming. In the fall of 1901 he came to Irving to make his home upon a modest little piece of two acres, which affords him occupation for his time. At the present time he is the owner of a farm of seventy-four acres one and a half miles southeast of Eugene, which is utilized as a stock-ranch.

In 1855 Mr. Potter married Louisa C. Zumwalt, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains in 1847, and the following children have blessed their union: Clara Jane, wife of B. F. Bond, of Irving; Lewis H., of Eugene; E. O., also of Eugene; Mary E., wife of Thomas Gray, of Irving; U. Grant, deceased; and Anna, wife of R. S. Poole, of Junction City. Democratic in his political views, Mr. Potter has ably filled different school offices. Fraternaly he affiliates with Spencer Butte Lodge No. 9, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a member of the United Brethren Church, also of Eugene.

WILLIAM WYATT. At the age of eighty-seven years William Wyatt may well contemplate his lifework with serenity and satisfaction, for his plans have been well and substantially laid, and have not been miscarried by errors in judgment or by want of executive ability. In his way of looking at things and in his conservative and rather slow rise to prominence in the community he has proved the typical Englishman, a by no means strange fact, for he was born in Birmingham, England, March 24, 1816, and received his earliest training under English born parents. The family came to America in 1836, after a voyage of six weeks in a sailing vessel, and located at Norfolk, Va. They also lived in New York state, and at Newburg, on the Hudson, William found employment in a nursery, and also in the powder mills. In Newburg he got quite a start in life, saved some money, and married, April 19, 1838, Mary Theodosia End, who was born in London, England, March 31, 1823 and came to America with her parents in 1836, locating in Newburg.

Soon after his marriage Mr. Wyatt removed to Columbus, Ill., and after a year settled in Henderson county, the same state, reaching there in the fall of 1839. He was fairly successful as a farmer, but was not so well pleased with the locality but what the tidings he heard of the fertility and resource of the west aroused his interest and caused him to view the matter from a practical standpoint. He was one of the first in his neighborhood to actually make the start to the west, and he sold out his property in 1847, and on April 25 made the start with his wife and three children. He had four yoke of oxen and a well stocked wagon, and by all accounts had a fairly pleasant and uneventful journey, arriving in Oregon in October, 1847. In 1850 he located on the farm which has since been his home, built a small log cabin with one room, and started in to clear his land, and prepare it for crops. With little money, but with a stout heart and willing hands, he made the most of decidedly crude conditions, and in time his labor was rewarded with success. To his original claim he added as he secured the money necessary, until he owned three thousand and nine hundred acres of land, which he has since divided among his children. When one contemplates the vast amount of work accomplished by this zealous pioneer and the calculation, planning and economy practiced ere he had even a small competence, one is filled with admiration for his strength of character, wisdom and perseverance.

Although his own educational chances were limited, Mr. Wyatt has ever been a staunch advocate of education, and his children have profited by all that he could do for them in this direction. Six sons and five daughters have been born into his family, the order of their birth being as follows: William, deceased in Illinois; Eliza A., the wife of A. J. Williams, of Benton county, Ore.; Ezra, deceased; Martha E., deceased; John, a farmer near Corvallis; Cynthia A., the deceased wife of J. G. Springer, and who died in March, 1902; William A., deceased when young; Virginia C., who died at the age of nine years; M. Eva, living at home; Samuel T., a farmer near Corvallis; and Franklin, living near the old homestead. Mr. Wyatt has not only been a power in the agricultural world of this county, but he has exerted a vital moral influence among those with whom he has had to do. In 1858 he became a convert to the United Brethren Church at a camp meeting at Mary's River church and later became a member of the church at Bethel. He has worked for the advancement of the church during all of these years, and not only holds theories but practices the wholesome lessons which he has learned from his church and bible. His wife is a member of the same church, and both work together, and contribute generously of their means. Mr. Wyatt has been a trustee of Philomath College for over thirty years, and has taken a keen interest in this institution. More than ten years since there was a golden wedding at his comfortable and hospitable home, and scores of friends assembled to extend their best wishes to the venerable couple, whose lives have taught many lessons of humanity and kindness and goodness.

JOHN RICKARD. No little credit is due John Rickard for his success in life, for he started out when only a boy of twelve years to make his own way, and has not, since that time, been dependent on other efforts than his own, and is now one of the strongest men financially in this community of Benton county. His home is one of the handsomest in the vicinity, evidencing the result of his years of self-denial and toil.

The birth of John Rickard occurred in England, December 31, 1832, his parents being Richard and Rachel Rickard, both natives of the same country. The father having died, Mrs. Rickard married again and came to the United States in 1846, and settled in Brown county, Ill., where her death occurred. On finding it necessary to make his own way, Mr. Rickard began by hiring out to the farmers in the neighborhood, where he engaged in farm work by the month, continuing in Illinois until 1852, when he crossed the plains by ox-teams. The journey occupied five months, and was ended without any molestation from the Indians. On reaching Oregon, he stopped for a short time in Clackamas county, from there going to Josephine county, where he engaged in mining and prospecting for a short time. Not entirely satisfied with his prospects in the south, he ventured into Benton county and engaged in work with a surveyor, and in the summer of 1853 he started a brick manufactory near Corvallis, the first brickyard in Benton county. A short time afterward he engaged in freighting out of Portland, in which he remained for about three years, at the close of that period, in 1856, finding a lucrative business in stock-raising near Corvallis. In 1862 he bought a farm situated four miles south of Corvallis, where he remained until 1896, when he bought the farm adjoining, known as the Thomas Norris donation claim, and there he resided until October, 1903, when he removed to Corvallis, where he is now living retired. He also owns other farms, located principally in the valley, which bring the number of acres up to thirty-two hundred and fifty, making him one of the largest land owners in the vicinity.

Mr. Rickard was first united in marriage with Laura Callaway, who was born in Missouri, and of the union two children have been born, George B., located near Philomath, and John Roy, who lives on the home place. His second wife was Ella Riley, a native of Illinois. The home farm is now conducted by Mr. Rickard's two sons. In politics Mr. Rickard is independent of party restrictions, voting for the man whose administration he believes will be most productive of good for the greatest number.

JOHN WHITAKER. General farming and stock-raising as conducted by John Whitaker amounts to an exact science, carefully studied and constantly improved upon. Old-time methods or machinery find no place on this model farm, but rather every department represented has reached the highest perfection possible under the management of an astute and far-sighted mind, trained by practical experience to avoid whatever is superfluous or non-practical. Benton county has no more familiar name enrolled among its early settlers than that of Whitaker, and invariably it suggests the substantial and reliable in character and attainment. John Whitaker was born in Sandusky county, Ohio, May 13, 1843, a son of Jacob and Mary Ephrenia (Wiederkehr) Whitaker, natives of Germany, and the former born February 2, 1808.

Special mention is due Jacob Whitaker, the founder of the family in America and Oregon, for he possessed leading and strong characteristics, and indelibly impressed his worth upon all who knew him. He was a stonemason and bricklayer by trade in his native land, and soon after his marriage came to the United States, settling in Richland county, Ohio. At a later period he removed to Sandusky county, where he farmed until 1853, and then sold his land and prepared to emigrate to the northwest. The train in which he brought his four children to the coast consisted of but six wagons, and they were on the way about seven months. They found the Indians peacefully inclined, nor was cholera or other physical disorder prevalent among the little party. However, one of the children was left behind in a little wayside grave upon the plains, a calamity doubly sorrowful to the father, who had buried his wife in Ohio in 1846, and who had since felt that he was almost alone in the world. Coming direct to Benton county, Mr. Whitaker took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres ten miles south of Corvallis, and just east of the territorial road, where he engaged in farming, carpentering and mason work until a few years before his death, June 9, 1883. His many-sided work took him into many parts of the county, and he came to know about all the people of importance within its borders. He was a good workman and a conscientious man and citizen, and won hosts of friends during his residence in the west. He was a member of the Catholic Church, and for many years served as a member of the school board.

Ten years of age when the trip was made across the plains, John Whitaker was reared on the old donation claim, and educated in the district schools. After his marriage with Mary E. Zierolf, a native of Ohio, and who came to Oregon in 1869, he came to his present farm, ten miles south of Corvallis, and which constitutes a part of the old Whitaker donation claim. Of the seven hundred acres all in one body, three hundred and twenty are under cultivation, and he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, having some of the finest stock in the state of Oregon. In fact, he has the only registered Oxford Down sheep in the state. His Shorthorns are also registered, and are raised in large numbers. Forty-five acres are under hops, and a large proportion of the land given over to grain-raising. The residence is a modern one, and the barns are such as delight the heart of a thrifty and ambitious landsman. Mr. Whitaker has been clerk of the school board for twenty-four years and during that time has materially advanced the cause of education in Benton county. He is a very popular, very successful, and very genial man, winning praise because of his aptitude and his unquestioned public-spiritedness. To Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker seven children have been born, all of whom are living: Peter; Frank, at home; Casper, of Washington; Agnes, now Mrs. J. N. McFadden, of Benton county; Margaret, wife of Roy Rickard, of this county; John O. and Mary Maude, at home. All were born on the home place.

HON. CHARLES S. MOORE. To the energetic nature and strong mentality of such men as Charles S. Moore, state treasurer of Oregon, is due the success and ever-increasing prosperity of the Republican party in this state, and in the hands of this class of citizens there is every assurance that the best interests and welfare of the party will be conserved, resulting in a successful culmination of the highest ambitions and expectations entertained by its adherents. Given to the prosecution of active measures in political affairs and possessing the earnest purpose of placing their party beyond the pale of possible diminution of power, the Republican leaders in Oregon are ever advancing, carrying everything before them in their irresistible onward march. Certainly one of the most potent factors in the success of the Republican movement in Oregon is Hon. Charles S. Moore, who throughout his life has been a loyal citizen, imbued with patriotism and fearless in defense of his honest convictions.

Mr. Moore is a native of Marion county, Ore., born near Mount Angel, January 8, 1857. His father, William S. Moore, was born in Belleville, Ill., while the grandparents were natives of Georgia and belong to old southern families. In 1848 William S. Moore made the long overland journey to Oregon with his mother, two sisters and stepfather, S. Welch, the family settling on French Prairie. The father of Charles S. Moore was a millwright by trade and followed that pursuit in Oregon, Washington and Idaho. He was married at Pacific City, Pacific county, Wash., in 1854, and afterward located near Mount Angel, Marion county, Ore., securing a tract of land upon which he followed farming in addition to working at his trade. He assisted in building mills at many points in Oregon, including Portland, Salem, Oregon City, Albany, The Dalles and at Klamath Falls, where for ten years he was engaged in the operation of a sawmill. At the expiration of that period he returned to Portland, where he lived retired until his death, which occurred in June, 1899. He had served as county treasurer of Marion county for two years and for four years was county judge of Klamath county, Ore. He wedded Octavia Meldrum, who was born in Illinois, a daughter of John Meldrum and a sister of John W. and Henry Meldrum, of Oregon City. When a maiden of nine summers Mrs. Octavia Moore crossed the plains to Oregon City, this being in the year 1845. It was a very early epoch in the development of the northwest and she has therefore been a witness of the greater part of the growth and progress of this section of the country. She is now living in Portland. By her marriage she became the mother of seven children; Rufus S., who is a lumber merchant of Klamath Falls; Charles S., of this review; Mrs. Estella O. Bellinger, of Clarke county, Wash.; Mrs. Frankie M. Hammond, of Klamath Falls; Bertha and Etta E., who are living in Portland; and Lulu, who died at the age of seven years.

When Charles S. Moore was about five years of age the family removed to Oregon City and two years later came to Salem, where for ten years he pursued his education in the public schools. He then spent two years in Willamette University, and in 1874 took up his abode at Klamath Agency. During the first year he was in the employ of the government on the Klamath Indian reservation, and afterward became clerk for the post trader at Fort Klamath, serving in that capacity for two years. In connection with his father and George Nurse he built the sawmill at Klamath Falls in 1877, but after a year he accepted a clerkship in a store at that place, and in 1886 he purchased an interest in the business under the firm name of Reames, Martin & Co., Mr. Moore becoming manager of the large and ever-increasing business, continuing until elected state treasurer. As the years have passed his business interests have grown to extensive proportions. He has always been interested in lumber manufacturing and in this line of industrial activity is now associated with his brother in the ownership of the plant at Klamath Falls, which is conducted under the firm name and style of C. S. & R. S. Moore. This mill has a capacity of twenty thousand feet of lumber per day and is operated by water power. Mr. Moore is also interested in lands, both grazing and timber, and his investments have been judiciously made, connecting him with important business enterprises which yield an excellent financial return. Upon his selection to the office of state treasurer he resigned his position as manager of the store at Klamath Falls, disposing of his interest in the business.

Mr. Moore was married in 1884, at Klamath Falls, to Miss Mary Langell, who was born in Jacksonville, Ore., a daughter of Hon. Nathaniel Langell, who came to this state from Ohio about 1850 and took up his abode in Jacksonville. He is now a resident of Medford and has been quite prominent in public affairs, serving in 1872 and again in 1897 as a member of the state legislature. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Moore have been born two sons, Charles L. and John M.

Mr. Moore is a member of the Commercial Club, of Portland, and Illihee Club of Salem, and is also prominent in Masonic circles, having been made a Mason in Klamath Lodge, No. 77, A. F. & A. M., in 1894. He is also a member of Oregon Consistory No. 1, A. & A. S. R., and is likewise connected with Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., and a charter member of the United Workmen of Klamath Falls, of which he is past master. From the time he attained his majority down to the present he has taken an active part in political affairs and has labored earnestly and effectively for the welfare of his party. While in Klamath Falls he served as school director and was a member of and president of the board of trustees of Klamath Falls. He served as county judge of Klamath county from July, 1894, until July, 1898. He has exerted a marked influence in the councils of his party and for ten years was a member of the Republican state central committee, while for twelve years or more he was chairman of the county central committee. At the state convention held in April, 1896, in Portland, he was a member of the platform committee and with seven others out of thirty-two members of the committee made a minority report to place a gold standard plank in the state platform. As early as 1892 the silver question had become one of prominence in Oregon, and Mr. Moore recognized that it must be met. He gave to the subject earnest thought and consideration and decided that there was but one safe, sound and enlightened system of finance for the country and that was by the adoption of the gold standard. In 1896 he was elected a delegate to the national Republican convention in St. Louis and there gave his support to William McKinley. In that convention he was a member of the platform committee. In 1898 he was nominated on the Republican ticket in the convention at Astoria for the office of state treasurer and was elected by a plurality of ninety-nine hundred and seventy-seven. He took the office in January, 1899, succeeding Hon. Phil Metschan, and in 1902 at the Republican convention he was re-nominated by acclamation, and was re-elected by an increased majority of fifteen thousand nine hundred and twelve, to serve until January, 1907. No higher endorsement of his faithful service during the first term could be given. He is widely recognized as one of the political leaders of the northwest, and his life record forms an integral part of the history of the state.

EDWARD HOLLOWAY. Preceded by twenty-one years of varied experience in different parts of the northwest, Edward Holloway came to Brownsville in 1902, purchased valuable town and country property, and has since engaged in the real estate and stock business. He owns about eight hundred acres of land in Linn county, all of which is leased out, while he is buying, selling and breeding Clydesdale horses and Spanish jacks. He is also conducting a model dairy, sending to market the finest of creamery butter. In turning his attention to this line of industry Mr. Holloway is acting upon the inspirations received in his youth, which was fostered during his boyhood days in Lincolnshire, England, where he was born May 15, 1857. As a child he was familiar with Shorthorn cattle of great weight and noble lineage, with sheep famous for their size and the quality of their wool, and horses whose splendid proportions have made them marketable in all the large cities of the world. As a member of one of the old families of the eastern portion of England, he was trained to model farming, his father, William, being one of the best known farmers and stock men of his neighborhood. The elder Holloway owned a large tract of land, bought, sold and raised fine stock for many years, taking part also in the general improvement of the country. He was an agitator of good roads, as are the majority of country gentlemen, hence the unrivalled excellence of the English country highways. His death occurred in February, 1872, at the age of forty-eight years. His father, John, had been a farmer before him, having been born, reared and married in Lincolnshire. William Holloway married Mary Jane Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Donnington, a large land owner and stock-raiser of Lincolnshire, now deceased. Mrs. Holloway, who is still living in England, is the mother of eleven children, six sons and five daughters, Edward being the fourth child.

Upon emigrating to America in 1871, Edward Holloway, then sixteen years of age, joined his brother on the old Jeff Davis farm in Mississippi, at Davis Mills, which his brother was then managing, and where the younger lad gained a fair idea of American agricultural methods. In 1875 the latter left his brother and went to Texas, and in Red River county bought a general merchandise business, two years later disposing of the same, and engaging in farming in Gonzales county. In 1877 he went to Rosebud Landing, on the Missouri river, with a bunch of cattle for the Indians, and the following year made his way to a farm in the La Moyle valley, Nev. From Walla Walla, Wash., which he reached in 1880, he went the following year to eastern Oregon, located on a farm in Umatilla county, and devoted the greater part of four thousand acres to wheat-raising. This proved a very successful venture, and when he sold out he was a financial gainer by several thousand dollars. In 1896 Mr. Holloway located on a farm near Currinsville, Clackamas county, Ore., and conducted a general merchandise store, and the following year bought a home containing ten acres at Mount Tabor. In 1899 he invested in considerable property in the Sunnyside addition, Portland, disposing of the same in 1902 to come to Brownsville.

In eastern Oregon Mr. Holloway married Gertrude Elizabeth Sayer, daughter of Robert Sayer, who, at the time of her birth, was engaged in farming in Nebraska. The father was born in Norfolk, England, and at an early day crossed the sea and located in Chicago, Ill., and, after engaging in the real estate business for some time, moved to Nebraska. In 1901 Mr. Holloway and his wife visited the former's old home in England, where he became much interested in fine stock. On his return he purchased two thoroughbred Clydesdale stallions and one French Coach stallion. The Clydesdales have both since died, but he is now the owner of a fine English Shire and the only thoroughbred saddle stallion in the state. At present Mr. Sayer is living on a large farm in eastern Oregon. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Holloway, of whom Walter Lee is deceased; Daphna May, Roberta and Georgia are living at home. Bertram Peacock has been adopted by these large-hearted people, and is being given the same educational and other advantages enjoyed by the Holloway children. As a staunch Republican Mr. Holloway has upheld the interests of his party in the west, although he was formerly a Democrat, experiencing a change of heart when the silver question became an issue. Years ago he served as school director and clerk for many terms, and he has also attended many conventions, both state and county. He is a man of broad and liberal ideas, and his wanderings in different parts of this northwestern country, his diverse participation in its many industries, has resulted in his becoming an enthusiastic advocate of its innumerable advantages as a home-making center.

MRS. CHARLOTTE E. PENGRA. In manner, character and attainment, Mrs. Charlotte E. Pengra represents a family of distinguished ancestry, around whom tradition clings persistently and fondly, and in whose make-up there is a justifiable and inspiring pride. This pioneer of 1853, whose home in Springfield is the center of culture and social prominence in the town, was born at Panton, Vt., May 1, 1827, and is a daughter of Rev. John and Aseneth (Campbell) Stearns, natives respectively of New Hampshire and Vermont. The paternal grandfather, Ebenezer Stearns, was also born in New Hampshire, and during the Revolutionary war he was captured by the Tories, in return for his devotion to the Colonial cause. He lived until July 1, 1823, and represented the fifth generation of his family in America, the emigrating forefather having been one Isaac Stearns, who came from Nayland Parish, Suffolk county, England, in the ship Arabella in 1630, locating at Watertown, near Mount Auburn, Mass. Fellow-passengers with him in the sailing vessel were such well known historical personages as Governor Winthrop and Richard Saltonstall. He was the progenitor of an American family as old as any in the state of New Hampshire, and which is represented in many states of the union. While his father was stacking his musket on the battlefields of the war of 1776, young John Stearns (born April 26, 1778) was taken by his mother to Vermont on horseback, and there spent the early part of his life. Soon after his marriage in 1830 he was converted and called to the Baptist ministry, his first charge being in Vermont and later was pastor of the Elizabethtown church, Elizabethtown, N. Y., where he preached the gospel for nine years. In 1817 he was transferred to Sardinia, Brown county, Ohio, and traveled several years as state missionary. Sorrow came to him after his removal to Illinois, through the death of his wife at the age of sixty-six years, in 1850. With the help of David E., his oldest son, also Rev. M. N., Rev. S. E., and Avery O., an attorney, he outfitted with ox and horse teams for crossing the plains, and after arriving at the Rogue river country, settled on a claim near Phoenix, where his death occurred at the age of ninety-three years, in 1871. That he was a man of remarkable vitality and great will power may be imagined, when it is known that he preached almost continuously up to the time of his final illness, and at the age of eighty was able to occupy a pulpit at Eugene. Of his twelve children eleven attained maturity, seven of them being sons, only two of whom are living, Mrs. Pengra being the eleventh child.

Mrs. Pengra was educated in the common schools of New York and Ohio, and in 1841 entered Hampton Falls Academy, of which her older brother was the preceptor. After an academical training of two years she then engaged in educational work, studying at the same time. Moving to Illinois in 1848, in 1849 she was married to B. J. Pengra, in Winnebago county, Ill. Mr. Pengra was born in Genessee county, N. Y., February 14, 1823, and after his father's death removed with his mother to Erie county, Pa., remaining there until after her death. From Illinois he crossed the plains in 1853 locating on a claim seven miles east of Springfield, Ore., where he farmed and raised stock for several years. A man of broad education and journalistic ability, he established the first Republican newspaper in the state of Oregon at Eugene in 1860, and which was known as the Oregon State Journal. He was a presidential elector at the time of Abraham Lincoln's election in 1860 and served as surveyor-general during the administration of that martyred president. In 1866 Mr. Pengra moved to the site of Springfield, and with two partners, Stratton and Underwood, purchased the town site of Springfield. He was one of the pioneer developers of the town, opening flour and saw-mills, and purchasing surrounding farm-lands on a large scale. After a number of years of successful operating he bought a large stock ranch where he remained several years, and died at the home of his son near Coburg, Ore., September 18, 1903, at the age of eighty years. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Pengra, of whom Stella M. is the wife of George W. Larson, of Reading, Cal.; Avery W. died in infancy; Ella V. is the widow of James Walker, of Hazeldale, Lane county, Ore.; W. J. and G. B., twins, the former living near Coburg, Ore., and the latter died at the age of ten years; Bell, the wife of S. T. Black, a farmer of Grass Valley, Sherman county, eastern Oregon; and Anna, the wife of Rev. C. M. Hill, pastor of the Baptist Church at Oakland, Cal. Mrs. Pengra has contributed to local papers and is a woman of superior culture and refinement. She is prominent in the Baptist Church, is a teacher of the bible class in the Sunday school, and has always given generously to church and charitable organizations. She is living on the old family homestead, in Springfield, which has been the family home since 1866.

WESLEY HINTON. The pioneers who came to this northwestern country before the inducement of gold created discontent with the less-exciting means of livelihood are deserving of special credit for the heroic feat of crossing the plains. Their object must have been to establish homes under the most favorable possible conditions, and as the home is the foundation of the country, none could gainsay the nobility and disinterestedness of their motives. The year 1846 witnessed many departures from peaceful but not over-productive farms in the east, but at best the occasion of setting out must have been a rare one, and not frequent in any one neighborhood. Rumors of fertile lands and moving caravans reached the uneventful farming locality of Gasconade county, Mo., where lived R. B. Hinton and his wife Elizabeth (Brammel) Hinton, with their large family of children, among whom was Wesley, born January 10, 1837, and destined to become one of the large agriculturists of Benton county. The father was born in Missouri, but his wife was a native of Virginia, and they had lived together for many years on the Gasconade county farm. Notwithstanding that they were wedded to their surroundings, they gladly set forth into the unknown regions of the plains in 1846, turning their oxen's faces towards the western sea, and away from all with which they were familiar. Fortunately the little party escaped many of the terrible adventures which befell some of the early emigrants, and arrived at their destination in Oregon little the worse for their six months on the road. They came by the old Barlow route and spent the first winter near McMinnville, Yamhill county, in the spring of 1847, taking up a claim of six hundred and forty acres seventeen miles south of Corvallis. This land now lies just at the edge of Monroe, in a prosperous agricultural district, but at that time it was accustomed only to the tramp of Indian feet, and to the occupancy of bear and other game in which the country abounded. Mr. Hinton built a little log cabin of one room in which the family lived for some months, but as his land yielded of its richness he was able to provide them with more modern quarters. He was an energetic and very industrious man, more than ordinarily intelligent, and the crude locality had need of his good judgment in helping to organize its local government. He took an active part in politics, was postmaster for many years, and held all of the local offices in his neighborhood. For one term also he represented his district in the state legislature. His wife dying about 1860, he continued to live on his claim for some years, but his last days were spent at the home of his son. Wesley is the oldest of the thirteen children, and the next child living is Martha, widow of John Burnett, of Corvallis; Thompson D. lives on a farm four miles north of Corvallis; Columbus lives in Seattle; Nancy is the wife of Harry Ran, of Junction City; Malvina is the wife of H. Furgeson, of Heppner, Ore.; and Emma is the wife of Alexander Lamb, of Elmira, Ore.

The Yakima war of 1855 was the first happening of importance that broke the monotony of Wesley Hinton's youth, and he gladly enlisted in Company I, under command of Captain Munson, and was mustered in at Portland. They were first sent to The Dalles, and later to Walla Walla, Wash., where transpired the famous battle of Walla Walla, lasting over a period of four days. The company wintered at Walla Walla, and were mustered out in Corvallis in 1856, after five months of service. Returning to his home, Mr. Hinton continued to farm, and December 16, 1848, was united in marriage with Sarah Hinton, who was born December 16, 1848, thereafter settling on a part of Mr. Hinton's father's old donation claim. He owns four hundred acres of land, and devotes it principally to stock-raising, Durham cattle, Cotswold sheep and Angora goats bringing in large yearly returns. He has a very nice home just at the outskirts of Monroe, and thus has all of the advantages of the town as well as country. He is public-spirited and enterprising, and his practical interest in the life and work of others renders him a popular and useful acquisition to a thriving agricultural community. A Democrat in politics, he has always promoted party interests in the county, but has never cared for official honors. As a member of the Masonic fraternity he has passed all of the chairs. With his family he is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hinton, Esther, the wife of C. Rawls, who lives with Mr. and Mrs. Hinton.

RILEY SHELTON. The family name which heads this review is one that has become well known through the identification of those who bear it with many of the important movements and enterprises which have given to Oregon her prestige among the states of the west. Riley Shelton is a native son, his father being the late Hon. Harvey Shelton, whose life left such a record of service and well doing that he still lives in the hearts of those who came to know him best in the pioneer days. Riley Shelton is now engaged in the real estate business in Scio, Linn county, and having spent the greater part of his life in this vicinity he has come to be known and honored for the many good qualities which have made him a desirable citizen of any community.

The father, Hon. Harvey Shelton, was born in Patrick county, Va., October 16, 1822, from which state he removed with his parents to Jackson county, Mo., and later to Buchanan county, of the same state, passing altogether about fifteen years in that section. In the spring of 1847 they joined the tide of emigration which was settling so strongly toward the west, and which was more noticeable in the state of Missouri than in any other of the middle western states, and with ox-teams, crossed the plains to Oregon. Harvey Shelton at once took up a donation claim on Crabtree creek, five miles southeast of Scio, Linn county, which he owned up to the time of his death, August 21, 1893. In his religious convictions Mr. Shelton was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church, having become such at the age of eighteen years, and consistently retained membership throughout his entire life, carrying into his every-day practice the principles which he honestly strove to follow. As both a patriot and politician he served his state in the Cayuse war, participating in the hardships and dangers which the pioneers were called upon to endure, and during the years of 1872, '74, '80 and '84 he faithfully served not only the Democratic party, with which his convictions lay, but also the people at large, who looked to men of honesty of purpose for the furthering of their interests, as a member of the house of representatives. Fraternally he was a member of Scio Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, being a charter member of the organization, and had always taken a lively and active interest in the Grange and Farmers Alliance.

In 1852 Mr. Shelton was united in marriage with Miss Caroline Thomas, who was born in Jackson county, Mo., November 18, 1832, and who, while still a child, removed with her parents to Texas. After their return in 1845 to her native state they made that their home until 1851, when they crossed the plains to Oregon. Her father took up a claim near Scio, and August 4, 1852, she became the wife of Harvey Shelton. They resided on their farm until 1884, when they became residents of the town of Scio, where her death occurred December 14, 1901, at the age of sixty-nine years. She also was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church, and had faithfully served as a Christian throughout her entire life. She was a pioneer of the character which constitutes the foundation for the greatness of nations. She was the mother of nine children, seven of whom are now living, named in order of birth as follows: Mary C., the wife of Q. E. Crume, of Yamhill county; Riley, of this review; Henry L., of Scio; George L., of Ashland, Ore.; Melvin H., of Arlington, Ore.; Isabelle, the wife of Frank Yarbrough, of Ashland; and Enoch C., of Scio.

The oldest son now living of this family is Riley Shelton, who was born five miles southeast of Scio, Linn county, upon his father's claim, February 4, 1858, and was there reared to manhood, receiving his education from the best sources in this part of the state, after completing the common schools, entering Albany College in 1878, where he remained two years. In 1881 he began to seek a livelihood on his own resources, engaging then as employing agent for the Farmer's Warehouse Company, of Jefferson, Marion county, Ore., and a year later returning to Scio, where he became connected in a mercantile establishment with J. C. Johnson, the latter of whom now makes his home in Marion county. In 1885 Mr. Shelton retired from active life, and so remained until 1886, when he again became connected with the general merchandise business with H. A. Johnson, the brother of his former partner, and for two years the new firm enjoyed a successful era of custom, though Mr. Shelton had the misfortune to lose about $10,000 by furnishing goods to one of the sub-contractors who was engaged in building the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad. Following his withdrawal from the mercantile life in 1888 he engaged in the real estate business, which has since lucratively occupied his time. He now handles both city and country property.

The marriage of Mr. Shelton occurred in Scio in 1882, Miss Florence D. E. Montgomery becoming his wife. She was born in Oregon, the daughter of Alexander Montgomery, a native of Illinois, his emigration to Oregon having been made in an early day, via the Isthmus of Panama. He first located in Jackson county, where he engaged in mining, and at a later date he became a merchant in Scio, and still later a stock-dealer and farmer in Linn county, in the last-named business being especially successful. He now makes his home near Shedd, Ore., still interested in farming. Of the two children born to Mr. and Mrs. Shelton, Oborn Clyde died March 9, 1903, at the age of eighteen years, seven months and three days, and Audie Wave makes her home with her parents. In his political relations a Democrat, Mr. Shelton has served in many important positions in the interests of his party. He has acted as city recorder for two terms, mayor one term, school clerk for six years, and director for one term. As justice of the peace he has served three terms and as councilman three terms, both of which positions he is now creditably occupying. He has also acted as notary public, and during Cleveland's administration he held the position of postmaster from 1894. Broad-minded and public-spirited in every way, with keen intelligence and judgment to guide his actions, the official life of Riley Shelton has been a credit to the people who have given him their vote, for he has faithfully upheld their interests and the welfare of the city and community. Fraternally he affiliates with the Odd Fellows, and is a member of the Rebekahs, having passed the chairs therein, and is also active as a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He belongs to the Missionary Baptist Church, in which he officiates as trustee.

VERY REV. FATHER THOMAS, prior of Mount Angel, was born at St. Gall, Switzerland, September 18, 1865, and came to the United States in October, 1888. Having qualified in the classics at the Benedictine monasteries of Einsiedeln and Engleberg, Switzerland, he took up and finished philosophy and theology after coming to Mount Angel, and subsequently became a teacher of languages and classics in his Alma Mater. He was ordained to the brotherhood August 6, 1893, was made a director of the college, and later a director of the seminary and July 11, 1901, was elected prior.

The early history of the religious organization over which Father Thomas has been called to preside is mentioned at length in another part of this work, and in connection with the life of Rev. Adelheim Odermatt, the founder of Mount Angel. Since assuming his present responsibility Father Thomas has added what is known as the New College, and which bids fair to be one of the most useful adjuncts to the church in Oregon. This addition to the Mount Angel priory is situated on Mount Angel Butte, a small mountain commanding a splendid view of the surrounding country. The building was started May 10, 1902, and is 210x70 feet, ground dimensions, with a central building five stories in height, and wings on either side of four stories each. The new college was opened September 15, 1903. The old college and monastery is built on the summit of the butte, and the winding path that leads up to it has fourteen stations, each containing a picture of Christ during His crucifixion. The view at the top commands Mounts Hood, Jefferson and Adams, also the Cascade range and the state capitol at Salem, as well as the beautiful French Prairie, one of the most fertile agricultural sections of Oregon.

With the college is connected a printing establishment which turns out three periodicals, of which the St. Joseph Blatt, a weekly German paper, has a circulation of eleven thousand copies; the German monthly, called Armen Seelen Freund, has a circulation of nine thousand; and the English monthly, Mount Angel Magazine, has a circulation of six thousand. The New College is of dark gray stone, and is most imposing from an architectural standpoint. The membership of the college has increased from one hundred to one hundred and sixty-five during the present administration, and it is supposed that the new building will permit of an attendance of two hundred and forty. Its estimated cost is about $80,000. In connection with the college there is a separate building 120x60 feet, ground dimensions, which will be used for a gymnasium.

In 1903 a stone structure, a seminary wing, was added to the building, 88x50 feet dimensions, four stories and basement, containing a dining hall accommodating two hundred and seventy people and comfortable quarters for forty seminarians, besides a novitiate for candidates to the Benedictine Order, monastery library for ten thousand volumes, and private rooms for philosophers and theologians, and the chapel has been re-arranged, the present building used for the sanctuary, and an auditorium added. By the time this book is completed, Mount Angel will have taken on a new dignity, and will have advanced from a priory to an abbey.

WILLIAM FAULL. As "great oaks from little acorns grow" so character comes up from the seed sown in the days of hardships and trials, which does not bend or daunt the brave heart, nor dim the eyes of hope. Upon such a character fell the early burdens of William Faull, one of the most prominent men of Dallas, Ore. Growing into manhood without the guidance of a father, whose care he scarcely remembered to have ever had, he formed his own ideas of manliness and success and his subsequent life has proven them unusually happy ones.

His father, Richard Faull, a native of Cornwall, England, emigrated to America with his family in 1847, settling near Hazel Green, in Grant county, Wis., where he engaged in lead mining. But not experiencing from his work the desired returns, he decided to try his fortunes in the mines of California. Sailing from New York in 1851, he reached Panama, and crossing the isthmus, took passage for San Francisco, which city he was destined never to see, for he died on board the ship, leaving the loved ones back in the Wisconsin country alone. The mother, Elizabeth (Rodgers) Faull, also of Cornwall, England, continued to live in that state for some time, with her six children about her. Later in life she removed to Lemars, Iowa, where she remained up to the time of her death in 1893.

William was the fourth of the six children, and was born September 19, 1847, near Benton, LaFayette county, Wis. His education was obtained in the district schools, under very great difficulties, as he was compelled to help in the support of the family at the age of ten years, receiving for his work ten and fifteen cents per day. As he advanced in years his wages increased proportionately, and at thirteen he was making $6 per month and later being the proud recipient of $15 for the same length of time. During the war, he received very good returns for his work, as men were scarce. When twenty years old he took up his father's occupation, that of coal and lead mining, remaining at it for four years, when he removed to Plymouth county, Iowa, where he took up a homestead claim of eighty acres. After nine years of improving and farming this property, Mr. Faull followed the example of his father which had ended so disastrously but which has been productive of such good results in his case. Coming west in 1880, he settled in Polk county, Ore., where he carried on farming for four years. At the close of this time, he bought the store of J. B. Chambers in Dallas, and with F. E. Chambers as a partner, he commenced his mercantile life. For one year the two remained together, then Mr. Chambers retired, H. B. Cospers taking his place. This partnership continued for another year, when Mr. Faull bought out the other's interest, taking entire control of the business. With only a small stock at the beginning, he has added to it until it has increased in value ten times over, having put up in 1892, a large, brick building, 34x112 feet, and two stories in height. The first floor is devoted to a hardware stock and house furnishings, the second, to farming implements, being also a tin-shop. His business unquestionably leads the hardware interests in Polk county. In 1892 he also built a warehouse for agricultural implements, the building being 35x65 feet.

In 1875 Mr. Faull was married in Wisconsin to Miss M. J. Kinney, born in Lake George, N. Y. Though very much interested in his business he has still found time to be active in politics, being a very strong Republican and a firm advocate of the tariff reform. Fraternally, he is a member of Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., and Ainsworth Lodge No. 17, R. A. M.

BAZZEL W. COOPER. When fourteen years of age Bazzel W. Cooper made the journey into the west, the memory of which is indelibly impressed upon his mind, he being then old enough to appreciate the trials and dangers, and withal the pleasurable excitement, of such a trip. He was born in Indiana, October 3, 1833, and while still very young his parents removed to Illinois and located near Rushville, Schuyler county, where they made their home until 1847. In that year his father, Samuel Cooper, outfitted with four wagons with four yoke of oxen each, and with his family of six sons and two daughters, he started across the plains in the spring, and seven months later they arrived at The Dalles, Ore. From that city they came down the river on rafts to Oregon City, Clackamas county, in which county they spent their first winter in the west. In the spring of 1848 Mr.

Cooper came to Linn county and located a donation claim one and one-half miles from the Santiam river, three miles from Lebanon, consisting of six hundred and forty acres of land, upon which he erected for the shelter of his family, a hewed log house. In the spring of 1849 he went with pack horses to the gold fields of California, where he remained for a few months. The death of Mr. Cooper occurred in 1883, when he was seventy-seven years of age. He was a member of the Baptist Church.

At the age of eighteen years Bazzel W. Cooper decided upon independent action for himself, and going to California he combined the interests of mining and disposing of cattle which he drove from Oregon into the southern state. He continued this latter occupation for two years, meeting with a success which is evidenced by the property which he now owns in Linn county. In 1855 he removed to the farm upon which he now lives, and which is located eleven miles south of Albany. He owns six hundred acres altogether, one hundred and seventy-nine acres being a part of his father's original claim, and that where he now lives is what he himself took up. He is now lucratively engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

The marriage of Mr. Cooper occurred in 1855, and united him with Miss Sarah Humphreys, and the four children who have blessed their union, James Franklin, Thomas B., Josephine, the wife of Richard Anderson, and Samuel C., are all located in the neighborhood of their father's farm. In his political affiliation Mr. Cooper adheres to the principles of the Democratic party, and through this influence has served as county commissioner of Linn county for four years. Fraternally he has been a Mason for over twenty-five years and a member of the Lebanon Lodge, and also belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen at Albany.

REV. P. PLACIDUS, O. S. B. Not the least of the agencies that have assisted materially in the development of a new country has been the priesthood of all denominations, but especially those of the Catholic Church. Their names have always been written high in the annals of a new country, as they are among the first to offer themselves to a worthy cause, and there is every indication that their good work will go on, the brightest and best among their faith offered for a life of self-sacrifice.

One of the most finely educated men of the west, who has given his talents and energies to this cause, devoting his life to this service with the good cheer and courage which characterizes his every action, is Rev. P. Placidus, O. S. B., who was born in Saxony, Germany, June 8, 1868. He spent the years of his childhood in that country and in Switzerland, in the latter studying in the motherhouse of the Benedictine Fathers. In 1882 he came to the United States, going at once to Mt. Angel College, and and remained there for nine years, at the close of which he was ordained. The ensuing year he spent in Washington, completing his education in the Catholic University of America.

In 1893 Father Placidus was assigned to Mt. Angel College, and after eight years he took charge of the parish of Mt. Angel, which had been established in 1881 by Father Odermat, under Archbishop Seghers. At that time the parish was very small, and it was only the sublime faith that goes hand in hand with the work of such men that could predict a future for it like that which he has realized. There are now one hundred and sixty families belonging to the parish, and their liberality has lately been shown by the instalment in the church of a new altar, said to be the finest in the state. The church itself is a frame structure, well built and is pleasantly located on College street, near the center of the city.

The duties of Father Placidus are numerous and arduous but he gives to the discharge of each that earnestness and faithfulness which have brought to him his merited success thus early in life. In the Mt. Angel College he is a teacher of physics, chemistry, and instrumental music, the latter duty being an exceedingly pleasant one, as his talent for music is exceptional, and he is never so happy as when an avenue is opened by which he can give it expression. He organized the Mt. Angel band, which has twenty instruments, and now serves as director, also taking an interest in the choral and dramatic societies. He is spiritual director of the Catholic Order of Foresters and the Society of St. Joseph, and it was chiefly through his efforts that the building of the latter was completed in 1901. Father Placidus has been instrumental in bringing about many improvements in this western city, and his efforts have been highly appreciated by fellow-citizens, his splendid personality bringing to his side many staunch friends and true adherents.

HERMAN W. BARR, doctor of optics, is well known as a leading optician and jeweler of Salem, as a man of good business ability, as a citizen of worth, and a gentleman who in social life commands good will and confidence. A number of years ago he established his present business and has since been a factor in this line of trade, so that to-day he is enjoying enviable prosperity as the direct result of keen enterprise and discrimination in business affairs. A native of DeWitt, Clinton county, Iowa, he was born July 3, 1869, and comes of German ancestry. His father, John G. Barr, was born in the black forests of Baden, Germany, and in early life learned the trade of clock and watch-making and was engaged in the manufacture of the cuckoo and "grandfather" clocks. Attracted by the opportunities of the new world he came to the United States when seventeen years of age, first locating in Wheeling, W. Va. He afterward removed to Wapakoneta, Ohio, where he established a jewelry store in 1853. Two years later he went to DeWitt, Iowa, where he was in business for thirty years and was the oldest jeweler of Clinton county. In 1885 he came to Salem, where he opened a jewelry store, and here he died September 13, 1899, at the age of sixty-seven years. In his business career he ever sustained an unassailable reputation because of the honorable policy which he inaugurated, and his perseverance and well-directed labor were the means of bringing to him a gratifying competence. He married Miss Louisa Margaret Stenger, who was born in Germany, a daughter of Sebastian Stenger, who was a miller by trade, and on coming from the fatherland to the new world took up his abode in Ohio, where he spent his remaining days. His daughter, Mrs. Barr, is still living at the age of sixty-seven years. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Barr were thirteen children, of whom ten, seven sons and three daughters, are yet living, and three of the sons are jewelers, having thus followed in the business footsteps of their father. The family record is as follows: M. Teresa Schoettle is practicing osteopathy in Salem and is represented on another page of this work; John H. is a jewelry manufacturer of Kansas City, Mo.; Mrs. Carrie F. Petzel is a resident of Salem; Theodore M. is a tinner and plumber of Salem; Herman W. is the subject of this review; George J. is connected with his brother Theodore in business; Frank J. is a graduate of the American School of Osteopathy in Kirksville, Mo., and is now practicing in Salem; Leo C. is connected with the Barr jewelry store of this city; Raymond is a priest of the Benedictine Order at Mount Angel; and Annie M. is also a graduated osteopathist and is engaged in practice in this city.

Herman W. Barr spent the first sixteen years of his life in the state of his nativity and pursued his education in St. Ambrose College in Davenport, Iowa, until the removal of the family to Oregon in 1885. Here he entered the public schools. In 1886 he became interested in the jewelry business and under the direction of his father became familiar with the trade in its various departments. In 1890 he went to Kansas City, Mo., and completed the trade under the direction of his brother and after about a year he again joined his father in Salem. In 1893, however, he once more went to Kansas City, working at the jewelry business with his brother and later he was with his father until he went to Chicago, Ill., to pursue a course in the Chicago Ophthalmic College. He was graduated from that institution in 1898 with the degree of Doctor of Optics and later completed a course in the South Bend College of Optics. He has studied broadly and deeply in order to master the principles of the profession and he is to-day one of the most skilled opticians of the northwest. In 1899, upon his father's death, he became manager of the Barr Jewelry Store and since that time has largely increased the business, and in order to meet the growing demands of the trade has doubled the stock. The business is twofold what it was when he assumed control of the store and the optical business has increased five hundred per cent. This certainly speaks well for the management, enterprise and progressive methods of Mr. Barr, who is a farsighted, wideawake business man, carrying forward to successful completion whatever he undertakes and brooking no obstacles that can be overcome by honorable effort.

In this city was celebrated the marriage of Herman W. Barr and Miss Winifred O. Fennell, who was born in Kansas and they have one child, John G. In social circles of this city they are widely and favorably known and the hospitality of their own home makes it a favorite resort with their many friends. Mr. Barr is connected with the Greater Salem Commercial Club and is serving on some of its important committees. He is also a member of St. Joseph's Catholic Church. With a nature that could never content itself with mediocrity he has labored for advance in the line of his profession and with equal ardor he took up the work of managing the Barr store and conducting the business which was established by his father. The consensus of public opinion accords him a prominent place in the ranks of Salem's leading business men of marked ability and strong purpose.

HON. WILLIAM GALLOWAY. The Galloway family came from Scotland, the first of the name to cross the ocean having been the great-grandfather of William Galloway. Next in line of descent was William, a Virginian by birth, a soldier in the Revolutionary war and a planter by occupation. The father, Charles, was also born in the Old Dominion, and removed to Illinois, from there to Missouri, thence to Iowa county, Wis., where he worked in the lead mines and followed farming. He served in the Black Hawk war under Governor Dodge. In 1852, accompanied by his wife and eight children, he crossed the plains from Wisconsin, the journey with ox-teams consuming seven months. During the course of this journey one child died on the plains and a brother-in-law, Capt. J. R. Wiley, died of cholera on the Platte river.

On making settlement in Yamhill county, Ore., Charles Galloway selected a donation claim near Amity, and on this farm he made his home and engaged in its improvement. Politically he was an old-time Democrat. His death occurred in September of 1884, and during the same month his wife, Mary, also passed away. She was a native of Ireland, and daughter of Terrence Heeney, for years a resident of New York City, where he died. In the family of Charles Galloway there were eleven children, all but two of whom attained mature years. Three sons and three daughters are now living, William being the youngest of the sons. He was born near Dodgeville, Wis., June 10, 1845, and accompanied the family to Oregon in 1852, after which he attended the public schools and Willamette University. In 1868 he was graduated from the latter institution with the degree of B. S. Following his school course he taught in Yamhill county several years and then began the study of law, later engaging in farming. Since 1892 he has been interested in horticulture, owning an eighty-acre orchard near McMinnville.

The marriage of Mr. Galloway, in Yamhill county, united him with Emma Baker, of Revolutionary ancestry, who was born in Dodge county, Wis., December 28, 1851. After the death of her father, Varranus Baker, her mother and family accompanied her uncle, Thomas M. Bennett, across the plains to Oregon in 1865. She is an active member of the Order of Rebekas and the Woman's Relief Corps, having been department president of the latter organization in 1901-2, and was also a member of the National Executive Board. Their family consists of three children: Zilpha V., who has been for seven years a clerk in the Oregon City Land Office; Charles V., a graduate of the University of Oregon and at present the youngest member of the state legislature; and Francis V., a freshman in the State University.

The Democratic party has had one of its staunch upholders in William Galloway, and he in turn has been honored by it in being selected to occupy positions of trust and honor. In 1874 he was elected to the lower house of the legislature and four years later he was again elected to that position, where he served as chairman of the committee on ways and means; again in 1880 he was elected to the same office. During all of these terms he was earnest in the support of all measures for the benefit of the people and the development of the state, which it was his pride to see growing into one of the important commonwealths of our nation. From 1890 to 1894 he served as judge of Yamhill county. At the expiration of the term he was the candidate on the Democratic ticket for the office of governor, his opponents being Lord, Republican; and Pierce, Populist. Under President Cleveland, in February of 1896, he was appointed receiver of the United States land office at Oregon City, in which he has served under three presidents. On his retirement from office, July 16, 1902, he turned his attention to the practice of law in Oregon City, although he still maintains his legal residence at McMinnville, Yamhill county. The district of which he had charge, as receiver, comprises the counties of Linn, Benton, Lincoln, Tillamook, Polk, Marion, Clackamas, Yamhill, Columbia, Clatsop and Multnomah. He has been admitted to practice in the state and federal courts. Mr. Galloway has ever taken an active part in agriculture; is a life member of the Oregon Horticultural Society being a director for many years, and serving as a member of the State Board of Agriculture from its organization until 1897, having served as president of the board for three terms. He is a life member of the Oregon Historical Society and president of the Oregon Pioneer Association. The subject of this sketch has ever taken a great interest in the welfare of our dependent soldiers; took an active interest in the creating of the Soldiers' Home at Roseberg and served two terms as member of the board, reluctantly declining reappointment owing to other official duties. He is an enthusiastic Odd Fellow and a member of the United Artisans.

HENRY L. HAGEY, a native son of Oregon, was born August 8, 1855, of eastern parents, his father, Levi Hagey, having come from Iowa in 1847, locating near Dundee, this state. Here he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres and quickly proved his right to be numbered among the men who were to give to Oregon her statehood, by hewing out a pathway through her dense forests and spreading out like an unrolled map, the broad meadows and fertile fields. On this farm he engaged extensively in the raising of poultry, having in his great barnyards the most valuable fowls, and finding in the city of Portland a ready market for his produce. Mr. Hagey is now living in McMinnville, being retired from the active cares of life. His wife, Elizabeth Hagey, who shared the trials and dangers and loneliness of his early life, was also of eastern birth, having come with him on that long, hard journey across the plains, proving herself a loyal helpmeet and a brave pioneer. In their western home she passed away, leaving husband and nine children, four sons and five daughters, Henry L. being next to the youngest.

In the common schools of Oregon he received a limited education, attending but little, being prevented by the many difficulties attendant upon the educational efforts of the early settlers. He had been well and easily educated, however, in that which lay nearest at hand and he became, under his father's instruction, another of the successful farmers of Oregon. Through his own efforts he bought fifty-eight acres of land, following this purchase with a later one of sixty-five. In addition to this his father gave him fifty-eight acres, making a large farm which he has well improved and cultivated, carrying on at present general farming. Mr. Hagey married a daughter of Oregon, Miss Bertha A. Brutcher, her father being Sebastian Brutcher, a native of Germany who emigrated many years before, settling on a farm in this state. Mrs. Hagey's death occurred in 1899.

Mr. Hagey interests himself in public affairs, being a Democrat as to his political inclinations, and though not aspiring to political honors, still does his duty as a member of his community, serving at the present time as road supervisor. He is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World.

HYNSON SMYTH. Among those who have enriched the prospects of Oregon, and established a lien upon the gratitude of later comers to Lane county is Hynson Smyth, a resume of whose life must necessarily interest not only the well-to-do, but those who are traveling the up-hill and sometimes discouraging path of life. In the rather hard and exacting days of his youth it is doubtful if this honored pioneer saw so far ahead as his present prosperous condition, and there must be a world of satisfaction in the fact that his five hundred acres of prairie and eight hundred acres of mountain land are his because he has never been afraid to work, and never resorted to other than legitimate and upright methods of conducting his affairs.

Of southern ancestry, Mr. Smyth was born in Highland county, Ohio, December 26, 1827, his father, Thomas, having been born in Virginia in 1791, and his mother, Hannah (Comegys) in the same state in 1798. The parents were married in Virginia in 1815 and the following year moved to Highland county, Ohio, which continued to be their home until 1832. Their next home was in St. Charles county, Mo., where the father rented a farm, and passed the remainder of his life, dying in 1833, and his wife died forty-eight hours later. These old people were most happily mated, their married life proving an unusually happy one, and it seemed eminently fitting that when one died the other should so soon follow. They were the parents of four daughters and three sons, Hynson being next to the youngest. George C., another son, came to Oregon in 1853, bringing with him his wife and family of six children, and settling on a claim in Lane county. While in the Stein mountains in 1878, himself and oldest son were killed by the Indians, leaving two disconsolate families to mourn the loss of a devoted father and promising son.

Six years old when his father died, Hynson went to live with an uncle until he was twelve years old. He then spent three years in the Indian territory (now Kansas). In 1846 he went to Grant county. By this time he was a well developed and rugged youth. He then went back to Missouri and in 1850 made the trip across the plains from Lincoln county, Mo., and met with no serious trouble with the Indians. In partnership with Alexander Stewart he bought a wagon and three yoke of oxen, and succeeded in accomplishing the long distance in about six months. After spending the fall in Portland Mr. Smyth moved to Polk county and raised a large crop of grain, which he cut with a cradle and tramped out with horses. This primitive but nevertheless successful undertaking netted him quite a sum of money, and that fall he went to Missouri via the Isthmus of Panama, sailing from San Francisco, and spending forty-eight days on the water before reaching Central America. By water he reached New Orleans after another long trip, and from there came on to Missouri, up the Mississippi river. January 13, 1853 he was united in marriage with Martha Cranshaw. He then rented a farm for one year in Lincoln county and in the spring of 1854 again started across the plains, this time with a four-horse team. The team proving not as reliable as oxen, Mr. Smyth purchased two yoke of oxen, the stronger animals bearing the strain of continuous travel with more fortitude. Being perfectly familiar with the country, Mr. Smyth was not at a loss to know where to locate, so came at once to his present farm of three hundred and twenty acres, having added to that from time to time until he now owns thirteen hundred acres. Stock-raising and farming have been conducted on a large scale, Mr. Smyth giving preference to the latter department of farm activity, in which he has been unusually successful. His improvements are modern, his home, barns, outhouses and fences in good condition, and over all is an appearance of solidity and prosperity not surpassed by any who have lent their brain and heart and ability to the upbuilding of this section. Mr. Smyth is a Democrat in politics, and in religion is a member of the Christian Church. Of the eight children born into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Smyth, Susan A. is the wife of Milton Robinson; Margaret is the wife of H. B. Dunlap; George N., Nancy and Hannah are deceased; Thomas J. is at home; William H., of Lake Creek; and Martha E. is deceased. All the children grew to years of maturity. Mr. Smyth is one of the very substantial and reliable men of Lane county, and none more than he deserves the respect and confidence of a thriving and prosperous county.

BERNHARD GROTH. Among the families of Dundee, Ore., there is one that knows no relatives within a distance of many thousand miles, being emigrants from Germany, leaving all but their immediate loved ones in that faraway land. One of the finest homes and several of the most important industries of Dundee are now represented by this family, and the uninterrupted good fortune that has attended them in their new life has made these years very happy ones.

Bernhard Groth was born September 21, 1855, in Hamburg, Germany, the son and grandson of two Fritz Groths, the grandfather being a sea-captain, who after many years spent in this life met his death by the wrecking of his ship on the Isle of St. Thomas. The second Fritz, his son, was also born in Hamburg, Germany, and lived there for the sixty-six years of his life, a tanner by trade, ending his years at the age of sixty-six years, a fairly rich man. His wife was Johanna, born in Hamburg, and living at the present time in that city. Five children were born to them, three sons and two daughters, the oldest being Bernhard.

Bernhard Groth received his education in the common schools of Germany and at a youthful age he was apprenticed to a machinist to learn that trade. For several years thereafter he worked for the government in the shipyards of Hamburg and Kiel, giving this up in 1882 to seek new employment in the United States. On arriving, he went at once with his family to Wisconsin, locating near Ashland, where he took up a homestead claim, putting upon it the necessary improvements. For ten years he held the position of engineer in a saw-mill, putting to profit the early years of preparation in the fatherland. In 1892, however, with ambition greater than his opportunity, he decided to try his fortunes among the limitless advantages of the west. On arriving in Oregon, Mr. Groth located at Dundee, investing in a small place of only three and a half acres, intending to strike out for better profit than those to be found in farming. Upon this land he erected several buildings, one to be used for prune-drying, another as a hardware store, and in conjunction with this he runs a smithy and tinning shop, and his home is an honor to Dundee. He takes a very prominent part in the affairs of his adopted city, accepting at the hands of his Democratic brethren various offices, being at one time a member of the city council, and at present holding the position of city treasurer. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World, and religiously he is a member of the Lutheran Church.

Mr. Groth was married in Germany to Miss Sophia Bock, who was also a native of that country, her father, Karl Bock, being a successful farmer who passed all the years of his life there. To Mr. and Mrs. Groth were born ten children, whose names in order of birth are as follows: Fritz, Karl, Bernhard, Reinhard, Paul, Claus, Martha, Mrs. A. Parrott of Dundee, Ella, Sophia and Hans.

WERNER BREYMAN. It was a heroic band of pioneers who came to Oregon when this state was yet a wilderness, and, establishing their homes in the wild region, undertook the task of making the plain productive, of developing the rich mineral resources of the state, of utilizing its forests and establishing commercial and industrial enterprises. Among those who arrived and settled in Yamhill county, in 1850, was Werner Breyman, who was born and grew to young manhood in Bockenem, Hanover, Germany. His father, Fritz Breyman, a lieutenant in the Hanoverian army, fought under Wellington and was wounded in the famous battle of Waterloo, receiving a medal in after years for his valorous services.

In 1846 Werner Breyman came to America with a sister and brother, who were the first of the name to cross the Atlantic. He took up his abode in Milwaukee, Wis., where he was employed as a clerk until 1850, when, attracted by the discovery of gold upon the Pacific coast, he started for this portion of the country, traveling with horse and mule teams, accompanied by five young men. Mr. Breyman went to St. Louis, there purchased provisions and proceeded by boat to St. Joseph, Mo., where he remained for four weeks, awaiting the arrival of his comrades. On May 3, 1850, at that point they crossed the Missouri river, proceeded up the Platte river, and thence westward, intending to spend the winter in Oregon and proceed in the spring to California. At Fort Hall they decided to leave their wagons and pack what they could across the mountains, leaving the balance, in order to make better time; but instead of finding this course a help, it proved to be a hindrance, for they ran out of provisions and were almost starved. They could get neither flour nor bacon at Fort Boise—in fact, could obtain nothing there save dried salmon skin, and on that they lived for two weeks. While en route they were twice attacked by the Indians, but managed to drive them away, and on October 6 they arrived in Oregon—and it was in March that Mr. Breyman left his Wisconsin home.

Locating at Lafayette he began working there for wages. In 1851 he established the Lafayette House, continuing in the hotel business for a year. In 1852 he opened a general merchandise store in Lafayette, conducting it for ten years. He later became proprietor, also, of the first store in Amity, and his brother, Eugene, who came to Oregon in 1855, across the Isthmus, became his partner in 1856. The firm name of Breyman Brothers was assumed at Amity. In 1864 both stores were disposed of, and the brothers, under the firm style of Breyman Brothers, began business as general merchants in Salem. They built "The White Corner" building, and called their store the White Corner Store. In 1874 they added to the original building, and have since made other improvements. There now stands on the site a fine two-story structure, 42x90 feet, which is still owned by Breyman Brothers. They sold their stock, however, in 1881, and since that time Werner Breyman has been engaged in the loan and similar business. Many years ago, when much of the land of the state was in its wild condition, he purchased large tracts, improved it and engaged in farming and stock-raising. He made it valuable property, and is still the owner of eight hundred and thirty-five acres near Lafayette, Yamhill county. He also owns farms in Marion county, and he and his brother purchased and laid out the Rosedale addition to Salem, of seventy acres. They also own several other additions, including an addition, Plainfield to Portland, Ore., and one known as Boise Addition to Portland, Ore. Their investments have been carefully and wisely made, and as the land has increased in value, owing to improvement and to the rapid development of the state, the brothers have realized from their property excellent financial returns.

Werner Breyman was married in Lafayette, Ore., to Miss Isabella Watt, a native of Missouri, and a daughter of John Watt, who came to Oregon in 1848 and located a donation claim, including the present site of Amity. His son, Joseph Watt, established the Salem Woolen mills. Mr. and Mrs. Breyman passed through the early hard times in Oregon and have reared a large family. Owing to the careful management of Mrs. Breyman in matters of the household, and the enterprise of Mr. Breyman in the business world, their united efforts have resulted in the acquirement of a handsome property, numbering them among the substantial citizens of Salem. In 1896 they made a trip to Europe, visiting many points of modern and historic interest there, and also paying a visit to his old home town. They went to Italy, Switzerland, Austria, France, the Netherlands and Great Britain, and after a six-months trip abroad, returned by way of London to America. Of their children John and Carl died in childhood, and Othelia and Jennie are also deceased. The three surviving members of the family are Anna, the wife of Rudolph Prael, of Portland; Elva, the wife of William Brown, of Salem, and Ada, the wife of William Eldredge, who is in the commissary department of the United States army at Manila.

Since the organization of the Republican party Mr. Breyman has been one of its strong advocates. For one term he served in the Salem city council, while for eight years he was county treasurer of Yamhill county, having been elected to that office without his solicitation. He was made a Mason in Lafayette Lodge, A. F. & A. M., in 1853, and is now affiliated with Salem Lodge No. 4. He also holds membership in the Oregon Pioneer Association, the Oregon Historical Society, and is the vice-president of the Illihee Club. His long residence and the character and extent of his business interests have made him widely known, while the essential elements of his character are such as to have won him the favor and friendship of many with whom he has been brought in contact.

JOHN B. DAVID is a contractor and surveyor whose labors in the northwest have resulted largely in the benefit and development of this portion of the country. There is no other agency so potent in opening up a region and advancing its industrial and commercial prosperity as railroad building. Railroads have been the means of bringing to communities commodities not produced there, and of placing the productions of the locality upon the markets of the world. This is the basis of all business activity and the railroad builders certainly are deserving of the recognition of the public for what they have accomplished.

Mr. David has been a resident of Oregon since 1867 and is a native of the Mississippi valley, his birth having occurred in Richland county, Ill., September 5, 1841. His father, Alexander F. David, was born in Center county, Pa., and became connected with general mercantile interests in that state. When a young man, however, he removed to Richland county, Ill., and in 1847 took up his abode in Winnebago, Oshkosh county, Wis. There he engaged in general merchandising, becoming an active factor in the business life of his community. He also rendered to his county valuable service in the position of sheriff, and when the country needed the aid of her loyal citizens he offered his services in 1862 and became captain of Company B, Third Wisconsin Cavalry, under Colonel Hobart. The regiment was assigned to the army of the Missouri and Mr. David proved a loyal officer, inspiring his men to deeds of valor by his own bravery. Following the war he came to the northwest, settling in Clark county, Wash., in 1867. He purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land, ten miles west of Vancouver, and there carried on agricultural pursuits until his death. He married Rebecca Galesbey, a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Aaron Galesbey, who was also born in Kentucky and owned a plantation about six miles from Frankfort. He died at the age of seventy-nine years. Unto Mr. and Mrs. David were born seven sons and two daughters.

John B. David, the eldest of the family, began his education in the public schools and afterward attended Lawrence University of Wisconsin. He, too, was numbered among the defenders of the Union during the dark days of the Civil war, enlisting in Company E, Second Wisconsin Infantry, in which he became first duty sergeant. This regiment was assigned to the army of the Potomac and he participated in the first battle of Bull Run, in the bloody battle of Antietam and in the engagements at Fredericksburg, Second Bull Run, Manassas, Gettysburg, South Mountain, Gainesville, Blackburn Ford and others. He never missed a roll call until captured at Gettysburg. He was then taken to the Belle Island prison, was afterward two or three months in Andersonville, the whole period of his incarceration covering seventeen months and twenty days. Mr. David had not yet attained his majority when he joined the army, but for three years he valiantly aided his country, never failing in the performance of his duty, whether it led him to the lonely picket line or to the firing line. In April, 1864, at Madison, Wis., he was honorably discharged and then returned to his home.

After two years Mr. David came to Oregon, locating in Oregon City in 1867. Here he entered the employ of the government as a surveyor, and in the same year was engaged in the construction of the Portland railroad. He was also the builder of the Oregon Northern Railroad from Pendleton to Huntington, Ore., and took the contract for the construction of the Palmer cut-off in Washington. He has also done much important work of a similar character, and he took and executed the contract for the building of a dike for the United States government at the mouth of the Columbia river. Mr. David has a thorough understanding of the great scientific principles which underlie such constructive work, and the labors executed by him and those whom he has employed have given excellent satisfaction, for he stands high as a representative of this great department of business. In 1880 he purchased three hundred and forty-seven acres of valuable land, of which one hundred and sixty acres are under cultivation and the remainder is devoted to pasturage or is covered with timber. His farm is pleasantly and conveniently located two miles north of Spring Brook, Ore., and it is called "David's on the Mountain." It commands a wonderful panoramic view of the valley and the mountains, and is itself situated on the mountain side overlooking the beautiful Chehalem valley. As the roads wind around, making a gradual ascent, the eye looks upon the lovely scenery which cannot be surpassed for diversity, beauty and grandeur.

Mr. David was married in Oregon City to Miss Juliet Saffarrans, who was born there and is a daughter of Dr. Henry Saffarrans, a native of Kentucky, who removed with his parents to Howard county, Mo., and was there educated. He prepared for the practice of medicine, was graduated with the degree of M. D., and in 1844 came to Oregon. He located as Indian agent at The Dalles and was there at the time of the Whitman Massacre, but with his family he made his escape upon a flat-boat down the river to Portland and thence traveled to southern Oregon, but on account of the hostility of the Indians in that portion of the state he returned to Oregon City, where he entered upon the practice of medicine, which he followed with success in that place for ten or twelve years, at the end of which time his life's labors were closed in death. He was not only a skilled physician, but was also a prominent and influential man in his community, and wielded a wide influence in public affairs. The home of Mr. and Mrs. David has been blessed with five children: Laurena Mabel; Hallie V., the wife of Frank E. Hobson, a mining engineer of Sumpter, Ore.; Melvin Henry and Roy Lee, who are managing their father's farm, and which they have developed into a very fine place, and where they have recently opened up a good dairy business; and Onie Isabella.

Mr. David belongs to Multnomah Lodge No. 1, F. & A. M., at Oregon City, and is one of the leading representatives of the Republican party in this locality. He frequently serves as a delegate to county, state and national conventions, and was a delegate to the national Republican convention in Cincinnati when Rutherford B. Hayes was nominated for the presidency. Mr. David is a man of fine physique, being six feet and two inches in height and well proportioned. He has a face denoting strong character and manly purpose, and during the thirty-six years of his residence in Oregon his labors have been directed towards securing the greatest good to the greatest number.

WILLIAM HENRY DOWNING. That satisfaction which a man feels who can stand outside his doorway and calmly survey a sweeping tract of land, knowing that its cultivation and disposition are entirely within his control, and that upon its good or bad management depends his subsequent welfare and that of his family, must often occur to William Henry Downing, who is managing two farms in Marion county, aggregating in all between eight and nine hundred acres. This fine property is located two and a half miles from Sublimity, and its fertile acres are devoted to general farming in the main, and to extensive stock-raising, Cotswold sheep bringing in the largest yearly revenue. That a great deal can be accomplished on so large an acreage is self-evident, and that Mr. Downing taxes to the utmost the possibilities of the land, getting the best possible results out of it, is acknowledged by all who are familiar with his shrewd business judgment and practical farming methods.

As a barefooted boy Mr. Downing trudged around the farm upon which he now lives, and during the long winter evenings he used to sit around the fire in the near-by house, where he was born May 7, 1858. More fortunate than most of the youth of his neighborhood, he was not only able to complete his education in the public schools, but at the age of eighteen entered Willamette University, remaining for three years. At the age of twenty-one he purchased a farm of eighty acres adjoining the old homestead, and to this he added at a later period one hundred acres, in time bringing his property under a high state of cultivation. He built a fine home, had ample general improvements, modern implements, and all things prized by the enterprising and progressive agriculturist, and remained on his farm until 1892. About this time he thought he would like a change of occupation, so moved into Salem and engaged in the real estate business for about four years. During the last two years of his residence there he conducted the Club livery stable, but disposed of it on returning to the home farm in 1897, thereafter assuming charge of the two properties.

January 20, 1881, Mr. Downing married Henrietta McKinney, of which union there were born two children, Ilene Bernice, deceased at the age of eighteen months, and Elmer, now a student at a private school in Salem. Mrs. Downing died February 20, 1884, and June 30, 1886, Mr.

Downing married Delia H. Bower. Two children were born of this union, Mabel Maud and George Preston. February 17, 1900, his second wife was taken from him by death, and March 11, 1903, he was united in marriage with Miss Augusta Newton, of Salem, and the daughter of Nathan Newton, now residing in Seattle, Wash.

Politically Mr. Downing is a Democrat, but aside from the formality of casting his vote he has never identified himself with local or other political undertakings, though he has always done his duty as a citizen by acting as school clerk for three years, previous to which he had served as school director for many years. Fraternally he is a welcome visitor at several lodges in which the county abounds, among them being Santiam Lodge No. 25, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Stayton; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, at Salem; Woodmen of the World, of Salem, of which lodge he is a charter member; Modern Woodmen of America, at Salem; and the Grange at Macleay. In all of these lodges he has held high office. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church organized October 18, 1900, in this locality, he being one of the organizers, and is clerk and treasurer of the society which worships in the Rock Point schoolhouse. As a loyal and patriotic citizen he served for three years in Company A, Second Regiment Oregon National Guard, located at Whiteaker, and was discharged as corporal. Progressive and enterprising, Mr. Downing is a native son of whom his country is justly proud. He is possessed of strict integrity, a genial and agreeable personality, and devotion to friends and interests at hand, and one can readily understand his extreme popularity in the neighborhood.

F. M. LEWIS. A worthy representative of a pioneer family whose strong, earnest living has done much for the early growth and upbuilding of this western state is F. M. Lewis, who was born in Polk county, Ore., upon the location of his present home, this being a part of the old donation claim taken up by his father in 1846. The day upon which he first saw the light of life was February 5, 1847, and he was one of a family of twelve children, whose parents were David R. Lewis, born near Louisville, Franklin county, Ky., in 1813, and Mary (Redden) Lewis, also a native of that state, born in 1812. For more information concerning this family refer to the sketch of David W. Lewis, the brother of Mr. Lewis of this review.

The early education of F. M. Lewis was received in a log schoolhouse, located upon the present site of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Lewisville, and when his school days were over he engaged in farming with his father. In 1859, when twelve years old, he went into a logging camp, working for his father in his sawmill, which was located in township 9, range 6 west. He continued at this work for six years, and at that time sold his interest and returned to agricultural pursuits, now owning one hundred and seventy acres, eighty acres of which are under cultivation, this land being a part of the old donation claim, which he took upon the division of the land. He carries on general farming and the raising of goats and sheep, having registered Angora goats and Cotswold sheep, and meeting with gratifying success in this occupation.

The marriage ceremony which united the fortunes of F. M. Lewis and Flora McLeod, was performed in 1869. She is a native of Oregon, having been born May 13, 1850, near Forest Grove, Washington county, where her father, Donald McLeod, had taken up a donation land claim. He had come west in the interests of the Hudson Bay Company, and had been engaged on the Columbia river. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis are the parents of one child, Orpha Icadean, who is now the wife of Henry Mattison, located near Independence. Both himself and wife are supporters of the Christian Church at Monmouth. Politically Mr. Lewis adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party. He has served as school director for several years.

RICHARD J. GRANT is recalled as a man of more than ordinary ability and resourcefulness, of great capacity for painstaking and indefatigable industry. From a comparatively small beginning he started to farm and raise stock, and at the time of his death, April 24, 1891, he left an unincumbered estate of five hundred acres. A native of La Fayette county, Mo., he was born December 26, 1825, a son of Richard Grant, who was born in Tennessee, and died in Daviess county, Mo., in 1857, at the age of sixty-five years. He had eleven children in his family, several of whom were born in Tennessee, and he took his family to La Fayette county, Mo., at a very early day.

In his youth Mr. Grant had the training at home and in the public schools of the average country-reared boy, and he married, May 17, 1846, Sarah J. Williams, who survives him, and is living on the home farm in Benton county, Ore. Miss Williams was born in Kentucky, December 2, 1826, where her father, John A. Williams, owned a large farm in Morgan county, and where he was born January 25, 1805. Mr. Williams died on a farm bordering on the Luckiamute river in Polk county, Ore., in 1885. His wife, formerly Nancy B. Jameson, was born in Montgomery county, Ky., March 5, 1806, and died December 5, 1860, on the Columbia slough in Multnomah county, Ore. Twelve children were born of this union, eight of whom were daughters, Mrs. Grant being the third child. The latter grew to womanhood on the farm in Daviess county, and there met her future husband, whose father's farm was ten miles distant from her home. After the marriage the young people lived with the parents of Mr. Grant, and in 1852 made preparation to cross the plains, making the start April 24, and arriving at The Dalles, October 23, of the same year. At first they had fourteen yoke of oxen, but the hardships of the overland trip caused all but two yoke to succumb. Three light-hearted children had been added to the family in Daviess county, Mo., and were members of the home-seeking party, but Nancy Melvina, five months and ten days old, died on Snake river August 22, and was left in a little wayside grave.

In the fall that he arrived in the west Mr. Grant took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, the same comprising a portion of the property now occupied by his widow, and proceeded to improve and cultivate it. He took a prominent part in political and other affairs of his county, and was elected to the legislature from Polk county on the Democratic ticket in 1868, '70-'78, holding also nearly all the local offices of his township. He was a member of Mono Grange, of Lewisville, and was otherwise identified with social and business concerns in his county. Of his five hundred acres of land, his widow owns three hundred and twenty acres, while the balance is owned by his son, James. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Grant, of whom Mary Ellen, born August 27, 1847, is the wife of T. O. Bevens, of this vicinity; Nancy M., born March 12, 1849, died on the plains; David A., born January 16, 1851, is deceased, James M., born December 24, 1852, lives with his mother and manages the farm; and Gilbert M., born October 27, 1859, is deceased. To an exceptional degree Mr. Grant enjoyed the confidence of his associates in Polk county, and in all ways he contributed to the stability and well-being of the fertile region he had chosen as the scene of his life's work.

DAVID W. LEWIS. Prominent both as a representative of two sturdy pioneers of the early days and for his own success in the industrial and farming circles of Polk county, David W. Lewis occupies an enviable place in the esteem of the citizens of this section of the county. The name descended to him from a pioneer father has been perpetuated in its use to designate the town of Lewisville, old settlers recalling the days when no town was known, and when the two Lewises, father and grandfather of David W., occupied the east and west sides of the main road passing through the place, each holding and planning to improve a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres.

The grandfather, John Lewis, was born in Virginia, and on attaining manhood he made his home in Kentucky, where David R., the father of David W. Lewis, was born. David R. there married Mary Redden, also a native of that state, and in 1845, both families outfitted for the trip across the plains, joining with their ox-teams the emigrant train, under the command of Captain English. Six months of the year was taken up by the journey, and on reaching Oregon, the heads of both families took up claims after passing the first winter in Polk county. The claims were located on the road which now runs north and south through Lewisville, the grandfather on the west side and the father on the east. They at once moved their families on the respective claims and engaged in farming, and there the elder Mr. Lewis died in 1851, having been a resident of the west but six years. His son then bought the adjoining claim. In the early life upon his farm he sawed lumber in the hills, a part of which was brought to the present location of Lewisville and used in the erection of the first house in that town. His death occurred in 1895, in Salem, and his wife died in 1897, on the home place. There were five hundred acres left of the original land owned by Mr. Lewis.

Of the twelve children born to his parents, four sons and eight daughters, David W. was the fifth, and was born in Franklin county, Mo., January 8, 1845, in the same year being taken from his home in the Mississippi valley to the new home which was to be made among the primitive surroundings of the Pacific slope. His early education was received in the little log schoolhouse near Lewisville, and when the course was completed he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a blacksmith. In the year 1866 he went to California and engaged in the prosecution of his trade in Bakerville, Salina county, but returned in 1868 to Polk county, and opened up the same business in Lewisville, where he continued successfully for ten years. At the close of that period he received from his father his present farm, to which he at once removed and prepared to engage once more in the work to which he had early been trained. He now owns two hundred and forty acres, one hundred of which is timberland. He carries on general farming and goat-raising, having from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty head at all times.

The marriage of Mr. Lewis occurred in 1870, and united him with Susan Williams, who was born in Polk county, Ore., November 6, 1854. She was the daughter of J. J. Williams, a resident of Dallas, having crossed the plains in 1846 and located near Airlie. They are now the parents of the following children: Ida, now the wife of L. R. Grant, of Lewisville; Nevada, the wife of D. A. Madison, of Dallas; Claude, at home; Josie, the wife of John Brinkley, of Boise City; James L., of Pendleton, Ore.; Percy, of Salem; Leota, at home. Politically Mr. Lewis is a Democrat. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church at Monmouth.

WILLIAM BARCLAY, the father of Mrs. Andrew Rickard, was born in Missouri in 1805, his parents having settled there at a very early day. As the name indicates, the ancestors were Scotch, and in fact the father and mother of William were both born in Scotland, locating first in North Carolina, after immigrating to the United States.

As a young man William Barclay followed surveying and school teaching, having profited by a common school education. He remained at home until his marriage to Mary Ann Brown, a native of Tennessee, and thereafter located on a farm, where he lived for several years. Of an ambitious nature, and not entirely satisfied with his surroundings, he sold his farm and made arrangements to settle in the far west, purchasing the necessary oxen and wagons. All went well until arriving at South Platte, Col., where Mrs. Barclay sickened and died of cholera, leaving seven children to the care of her sorrowing husband. Leaving the best friend they had in the world in a lonely wayside grave, the party proceeded on their way, and without any further misfortune arrived at their destination in Yamhill county. In the spring of 1851 Mr. Barclay came to Benton county and took up a donation claim of a half section twelve and a half miles south of Corvallis, where he farmed with considerable success until his death, at the age of eighty-three years. His original purchase by no means constituted his entire land holdings, for as his farming and stock-raising interests enlarged more land was required, and he left a large and well equipped estate to his heirs.

A Democrat in politics, Mr. Barclay never worked for his own advancement, although he served as justice of the peace for several years, and also was a member of the school board. He was liberal in his tendencies, very progressive in his manner of thought, and possessed a world of tactful consideration for those with whom he had to deal. Naturally he was popular and influential, and in his life work represented the best to be gotten out of farming. Of the children born to himself and wife, Robert S. is in Lincoln county; Mary E. is the widow of A. Rickard; James, a farmer in Alsea county; Margaret, the wife of Thomas Hinton, of this vicinity; Winnie, the wife of William Levaugh, of Linn county; and William, on the old homestead.

IRVING E. GLEASON. The year 1851 marked the advent of Irving E. Gleason in the state of Oregon, and here his life from that time forward has been spent, not idly or indifferently, however, but with the determination to win a foothold in this new western country. He was born in Ripley county, Ind., November 10, 1834, the son of Parson Gleason, who was born in Connecticut in 1799. The latter's parents were farmers by occupation and their son assisted them in the care of the home farm until reaching his twenty-first year, when he went to Indiana. It was in the latter state that he married Mrs. Bevins, whose maiden name was Mary Ann Smith, a native of Vermont. A few years later the grandparents also went to Indiana, whither their son had gone, but before long they again changed their location, going to Minnesota, and it was there they spent the remainder of their lives, both living to be over eighty years of age.

Parson Gleason remained a resident of Indiana until 1851, when he outfitted for the trip to Oregon. The journey lasted four months, and as compared with the majority of the expeditions made at that time was a very peaceful one, the Indians giving them no trouble whatever. It was near Needy, Clackamas county, that the travelers made settlement, Mr. Gleason taking up a donation claim upon which he and his wife spent four years, and the remainder of their lives was passed on another farm which they purchased in the same county. Mr. Gleason himself living to reach the advanced age of ninety years and six months, and his wife living to be eighty-five years of age. Throughout their lives they had followed general farming and dairying. Of their six children, three are deceased, and those living besides Irvin E. are Aaron B. and Amos S., both of whom are residents of Hubbard, Ore.

At the time of the removal of the parents to Oregon, Irving E. Gleason was seventeen years of age, and in the meantime had acquired a good education in the district schools of Indiana. He remained at home with his parents until he enlisted in Company C, First Oregon Mounted Volunteers for service in the Yakima war in 1855, being mustered in at Portland. After a service of forty-two days, during which time he participated in one severe fight with the Indians, at Yakima, he was mustered out near The Dalles, and, returning home, remained with his parents and helped them in carrying on the farm until his twenty-first year. At this age, however, he assumed entire charge of his father's donation claim, and a few years later, in 1859, was united in marriage with Miss Melissa Coy, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains to California in 1850, coming to Oregon in 1851. The first two years of their married life the young people made their home on the old home place, but at that time they removed to Marion county, making that their home until 1865. After a residence of two years in Yamhill county they moved back to Marion county, remaining until 1887, when they went to Philomath, where for two years Mr. Gleason carried on a general store. Farming was more agreeable to his taste, however, and upon retiring from mercantile life he bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres eight and one-half miles from Philomath in a southerly direction, and not far from Fern, and here is to be seen one of the finest rural residences in the vicinity. Besides the two-story frame residence, the place is embellished with other good buildings, being up-to-date in every respect. Since his first purchase of one hundred and sixty acres in Benton county he has purchased other land from time to time, and now has four hundred and thirty acres of timber land. Mr. Gleason's son conducts a steam sawmill on his father's farm, doing considerable business in this department.

Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Gleason, the three eldest of whom, Ira I., Mary A. and Marietta, are deceased, as is also Parson, who was next to the youngest, and who was named for his grandfather. Mary Ellen became the wife of John C. Perrin and resides in Bellfountain; Isora Eva is the wife of A. Mercer, and they reside in Monroe; Ulysses S. is at home. For six years Mr. Gleason served as justice of the peace in Clackamas and Marion counties. Politically he votes for the candidates of the Republican party, and in religious matters affiliates with the United Brethren Church. Mr. Gleason manifests a keen interest in the public welfare, and may be counted upon to take his part in every worthy enterprise promulgated in the neighborhood.

JESSE BROWN. Ten miles south of Corvallis is the farm of Jesse Brown, a model of agricultural neatness, and the former playground of that well known member of racing society, Pathmark, whose pedigree is of the best, and whose record is 2:11 $\frac{1}{4}$. Other valuable and reputable thoroughbreds have reached maturity under the watchful eye of Mr. Brown, who appreciates the fine points of a horse as well as anyone in the business, and who also has a warm place in his heart for this best friend of man. Other than horses profit by the comfort and care to be found on the Brown farm, for the owner has a variety of stock, much of it registered and very valuable. General farming is engaged in on an extensive scale, and the majority of the two hundred and fifty acres comprising the farm are under cultivation. Fertile and conveniently located, this has been the home of the family since 1882, and the genial and successful manager and owner has in the meantime acquired an enviable reputation as farmer, stock-raiser and all-around substantial member of the community.

At a very early day G. W. Brown, the father of Jesse, moved from Bourbon county, Ky., where he was born April 28, 1817, to Pike county, Mo., where his parents settled on a farm upon which he grew to maturity, and where he was educated in the public schools. In time he married Martha A. Todd, also a native of Bourbon county, and who was born in 1822. A number of children were born in Missouri, among them Jesse, the date of whose birth was December 7, 1843. The parents sold their farm in Pike county and prepared to cross the plains in 1850, outfitted with ox-teams and wagons, and with every care for the welfare of the homeseekers. However, they were destined to wait for provisions and otherwise suffer the deprivations of the long jaunt, but the government came happily to the rescue, and supplied the necessities of life. They were seven months on the way, most of the family having to walk the entire way, which delay probably accounted for their unfortunate condition. Mr. Brown took up a donation claim twelve miles north of Corvallis, on Soap creek, where the father died at the age of seventy-six, the mother having preceded him at the age of forty-six. The following of their twelve children are living: Elizabeth, the widow of James Jones, of Polk county; C. J., of Benton county; Jesse; Walter, of Linn county; Frank and Joseph, of Polk county; and Lee, of Wells station.

After a youth spent in hard work on the paternal farm, Jesse Brown started out on his own responsibility, and located on a farm on Soap creek. To this new home went the wife whom he married January 25, 1866, when he was twenty-three years old, and who was formerly Effie E. Modie, born in Missouri, February 25, 1850. The young people lived on the creek farm for about three years, and then went to southern Oregon, where Mr. Brown engaged in stock-raising with but moderate success for about a year. In 1882 he came to his present farm, as heretofore stated, and has since made this his home, and the field of his successful and varied operations. The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown: Walter A., of Denver, Col.; Milton, of Texas; Frank, living on the home farm; Dolly, at home; Ella; Ida; Gertrude; and Adelia. Mr. Brown is a Democrat in politics, but has never devoted any time to hunting for office. He is a quiet, unostentatious man, fond of his home and loyal to his friends, and never wearies of improving the conditions among which his lot is cast.

JAMES ADDISON BUSHNELL. Prosperity has followed closely the operations of James A. Bushnell, the result of honest, patient and earnest effort toward the fulfillment of the promise which is the heritage of all men born in this bountiful land, but comes only to those who seek it with an undivided attention. With the exception of but a few months Mr. Bushnell has been a resident of Oregon since 1852. He located first near Junction City, where he remained for many years, when in 1875 he removed into the city and has since been a citizen of inestimable worth, taking an active part in many movements calculated to advance the best interests of the city. Among the more important movements with which he has been connected was the building of the Junction City Hotel, he being now the president of the company, whose property is valued at $28,000. He is serving as president of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, a private institution, with a capital of $50,000 and surplus of $3,000; he built the Junction City Water Works at a cost of $3,000, and now owns them; and also owns four hundred and fifty acres of farming land located along the river, this being now rented.

James A. Bushnell was born in Cattaraugus county, N. Y., July 27, 1826, his father being Daniel Bushnell, a native of Middlesex county, Conn. After his marriage he located, in 1810, in New York, as a pioneer farmer of Cattaraugus county, and later he removed to Pennsylvania. Two years afterward he became a resident of Ohio, continuing his agricultural pursuits in Ash-tabula county. He died in 1844 in Harrison county, Ohio. He was the descendant of an old Connecticut family, his father, who was born there, also following the employment of a farmer. His wife was formerly Ursula Pratt, a native of Saybrook, Conn., and the daughter of Ozias Pratt, a native of the same state. He was a seafaring man and also conducted a farm, and his death occurred there at quite an advanced age. He was of English extraction. Of the six sons and three daughters born to Mr. and Mrs. Bushnell, the sixth child was James A. He remained at home with his parents until attaining his majority, when he learned the cooper's trade, working in Hannibal, Mo. In 1849 he married and settled on a farm in Adair county, Mo., where he remained three years, at the expiration of this time deciding to join the westward movement with the hope of bettering the condition of his family. Three young men, Timothy Halstead, Alexander Nesbit and Mr. Bushnell, set out for Oregon in the spring of the year, with ox-teams, and on arriving at their destination they went on down to California, spending the first winter in Shasta county, where they engaged in mining. The success of Mr. Bushnell was only moderate, so he decided to return to his home in Missouri. He set sail from San Francisco July 4, 1853, and reached the Missouri valley only to find the home empty and the family gone to meet him in Oregon. He thereupon returned to Oregon via the Isthmus and in Springfield, Lane county, he was once more reunited with his loved ones. Mr. Bushnell then took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located six miles south of Junction City, upon which he remained until 1868, when he bought another farm of eight hundred acres on the west side of the Willamette river, the greater part of this land being still in his possession. In 1875 Mr. Bushnell built a warehouse at Junction City, and entered extensively into the grain business. This he has since continued to carry on, handling the greater part of the grain which came into the city.

The wife of Mr. Bushnell was formerly Elizabeth C. Adkins, a native of Adair county, Mo., the ceremony which united them being performed in Adair county. She died in Junction City, in 1868, the mother of eight children, the two living being Lucy J., now the wife of William M. Pitney, a farmer in this vicinity, and Helen V., wife of C. J. Ehrman, of Menan, Idaho. Mr. Bushnell was married the second time to Mrs. Sarah E. Page, a native of Indiana, and the two children are Henry C., of Junction City, and Myrtle G., at home with her parents. As a Prohibitionist and active for the interests of his party Mr. Bushnell has served for two terms as mayor of Junction City, and as a member of the council for many terms. He has also been the nominee of the Prohibition party for county judge and representative in the state legislature. Always interested in educational movements, he has served as school director many years, and has contributed generously toward all school enterprises. He was one of the founders of the Eugene Divinity School, and is now acting as president of its board of regents. The institution is supported by the Christian Church, whose tenets are the religious belief of Mr. Bushnell, in his own congregation acting as elder, and it was largely through his efforts that a church building was erected in Junction City. For five years he has been a member of the Oregon Christian Missionary Convention, and during the past four years has served as vice president of that body. To this, as to all other worthy objects, Mr. Bushnell gives liberally, and a debt of gratitude is owed him by those who would have their city and community one of the first in this section, as to financial and moral supremacy.

ANDREW RICKARD. By his many friends and associates in Benton county Andrew Rickard is recalled as a very popular and successful man, and one who must have surveyed his sixty-three years of existence with a great deal of satisfaction. The farm now occupied by his widow, three miles southeast of Monroe, and which was occupied by him from 1860 to the time of his death, in 1893, is a constant reminder of his practical and businesslike methods, and of the shrewd common sense which was the keynote to a self-made and thoroughly worthy character.

On his father's farm in North Carolina, where he was born August 15, 1830, Mr. Rickard was reared among the usual southern surroundings, and remained at home until his twenty-third year. An opportunity offering to go the far west, he joined a party bound for Oregon with ox-teams and prairie schooners, and on the way fortunately escaped serious trouble with the Indians, cholera or mountain fever, or severe deprivation incident to pioneer travel. His first experience with land was decidedly unsatisfactory, for after taking up a claim twelve miles south of Corvallis, Ore., and improving it to some extent, the government claimed and redeemed it, and he was no better off than when he arrived from the east. In 1855 he made his way to Josephine county, this state, and followed mining and prospecting for five years, returning afterward to Benton county, where, in 1861, he married Mary E. Barclay, a native of Missouri, and daughter of William Barclay, mention of whom is made elsewhere in this work. The year previous to his marriage Mr. Rickard had purchased one hundred and sixty acres of the farm now owned by his heirs, three miles southeast of Monroe, and with his wife he settled thereon, beginning at once to transform it into a valuable and productive property. From time to time he added to his land, and the farm at present is composed of four hundred and ten acres. Mrs. Rickard has proved a good manager since her husband's death, and in this is ably assisted by her son, Frank, one of the bright and promising members of a thriving agricultural community.

Besides Frank, who is the seventh of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Rickard, there is the eldest son, William, a farmer in Benton county; Sarah E., the wife of John Conger, of Lane county; Eliza J., the wife of James Traftzer, of Linn county; Nellie, the wife of William Drisco, of Lane county; Lucy, the wife of R. H. Hewitt, of this vicinity; George, living near his mother; and Anna, the wife of George Waldron, of Lane county. Mr. Rickard was a stanch Democrat in political affiliation, and took a keen interest in the political undertakings of his neighborhood. More offices than he cared to fill were tendered him, but he served acceptably as school director and road supervisor. He exerted a moral and progressive influence in the community, and was particularly devoted to advancing the interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was a member from earliest youth.

GRANT ADELBERT COVELL, M. E. In the college curriculum of today, no branch of learning is of more consequence than that pertaining to the mechanical arts, and that the science may be of the highest practical benefit to the student, it is absolutely necessary that the head of the department of mechanics shall possess a master mind and intellect. In Prof. Grant A. Covell the Oregon Agricultural College has secured a person worthy in every respect to fill the position which he there holds as professor of mechanics and mechanical engineering, his superior talents and scholarly attainments eminently qualifying him for his important work.

The descendant of one of the earlier New England families, Grant A. Covell was born August 30, 1862, in Bradford county, Pa., a son of Albert Covell. His grandfather, William Covell, was born at Plattsburg, N. Y., but when a young lad removed with his parents to Pennsylvania, and there spent his remaining years, being a pioneer farmer of Bradford county. Albert Covell has been a life-long resident of Bradford county, Pa., where he is carrying on general farming, including dairying and bee-keeping, with excellent financial results. He is the owner of several valuable farms, and resides near the village of Bigpond. He is a man of prominence, and is actively identified with the Masonic order. He married Lavina Alfred, who was born in Tioga county, Pa., of New England ancestors, and six children have been born of their union, five of whom survive, Grant Adelbert, the special subject of this sketch, being the first-born, and the only son.

Beginning his studies at the district school, Grant A. Covell remained beneath the parental roof-tree until seventeen years of age, when he became a pupil at the high school in Troy, Pa., from which he was graduated in 1883. Entering Cornell University soon after, he completed the required course of study in four years, receiving his degree of M. E. in 1887, afterward remaining there a year as instructor in the machine shop. The following year he went to the University of Minnesota as an instructor, taking the chair of mechanics and mechanical engineering while Professor Barr was away on leave of absence, at the end of the year being offered a position as instructor under Professor Barr. Before the opening of the term in September, 1889, however, Professor Covell received his appointment to the chair of mechanics and mechanical engineering at the Oregon Agricultural College, and has since held the position. Under his wise supervision this department has had a phenomenal growth. The mechanical building in process of construction when he came here, is now used as the blacksmith shop and power house. With the means at his command, he fitted it up as best he could. As time went on additions were made, and the shops were fairly well equipped. In 1899 the old building burned, and the following year, 1900, Mechanical Hall was built, a magnificent structure, with finely equipped machine shops on the first floor, where are also various recitation rooms, and Professor Covell's office. In addition to having charge of mechanical engineering, the professor likewise supervises electrical engineering in the college.

Professor Covell married in Corvallis, Mary Spencer, who was born in England, but came to this country when young, and was educated in Ohio, at the Grand River Institute. Four children have been born of their union, namely: Spencer; Walter; Margaret; and Kenneth. Politically the professor is a Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Corvallis Lodge No. 14, F. & A. M., of which he is past master; and of the Sigma Psi Society at Cornell University. Mrs. Covell is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

ALFRED M. WITHAM. Continuously since the fall of 1849 A. M. Witham has lived on his present farm two miles from Corvallis, which originally consisted of six hundred and forty acres, but has since been enlarged to one thousand acres. Here he has carried on farming and stock-raising all of these years, and has reared noble and able-bodied sons to follow in his footsteps, and to share with him the possession of his broad and valuable acres. The farm is all in one body, and is among the valuable properties of Benton county.

Mr. Witham is one of the very venerable residents of this community, having been born near Liberty, Union county, Ind., September 18, 1821. He was reared on a farm and allowed such educational chances as those early times afforded, and in 1835 removed with his parents to Porter county, of the same state, where he married, in 1842, Rosanna Allen. In 1847 he prepared to cross the plains with two wagons each having three yoke of oxen, and four loose cows, and came by way of Fort Hall, his brother, William, also being a member of the party. In October, 1847, he landed in Corvallis, and spent the winter in an empty cabin found on a claim four miles south of Corvallis. In the spring of 1848 he located a claim two miles from Philomath and erected a log cabin, made fences, and cleared a portion of the land, but was dissatisfied, so in the spring of 1849 came to his present farm. When he had first come to the county in 1849 this property had a small log house of one room and ten acres plowed, but when he took possession there were some improvements and three hundred acres cleared. In the fall of 1849 he went to California with John Onby and mined on the middle fork of the American river, and when he came back in the fall brought $1,100 with him. This money went towards improvements on his land, and paved the way for his future large operations. At one time he owned eleven hundred acres, but now has a thousand, and this comprises all but fifty of the original claim. Thirteen children have been born into his family, and all have been reared to habits of thrift and industry. Eight attained maturity. Of these, Oliver lives on a farm four miles north of Corvallis; Mary is the wife of D. M. Bradley of Everett, Wash.; Charles lives on a farm near Monroe, Benton county; Fannie is the wife of D. Baker of Seattle, Wash.; Henry lives on the home place; Edward is living on part of the home place; Elvin is also helping to work the home farm; and Olive is the wife of J. W. Alkire of Mount Vernon, Wash. Mr. Witham is a Republican in politics, and was active in the early days of the state. In 1861-62 he was a member of the legislature, and was re-elected in 1868 and 1874. While serving he represented his constituents with great credit and satisfaction, placing their needs and aspirations before the body with convincing intelligence. For more than thirty-three years he has been a member of the Masonic order. He is highly respected by all who have ever been associated with him, and though now approaching the twilight of life takes an active interest in the success of his sons, and in all the interests of his home. ♦

SAMUEL N. HOWARD. Among the sons of Indiana who have made their way to Oregon and have materially added to its development, is Samuel N. Howard, representing the second generation of his family in the west, and the owner of a farm of three hundred acres three miles north of Eugene. The namesake of his father, who was born in Virginia, August

4, 1792, Mr. Howard is of English descent, and possesses many of the sterling characteristics of his worthy ancestors. The father, Samuel Howard, was a farmer during his entire active life, and as a young man removed to Ohio, and there married Charlotte Yates, who was born in Ohio, of German descent. The family subsequently removed to Henry county, Ind., where the father bought a large farm, and where Samuel N., was born October 26, 1839. Three years later the family moved to Grundy county, Mo., and after two years moved to Polk county, near Des Moines, Iowa, where they lived until 1853. The father was ambitious, notwithstanding the fact that he had long since passed the half century mark, and in this he was seconded by his children, of whom there were eight, Samuel N. being the fourth, and at that time twelve years of age. Outfitting with nine yoke of oxen and three wagons, the party started for Oregon and was six months on the way, and at the end of their journey were the proud possessors of three yoke of oxen and one cow, two of their wagons having been lost by the way-side. The party was under command of Rev. George Koger, and the travelers had little to record of a disagreeable nature, the Indians having kept to themselves, and the weather having been fairly pleasant. Samuel Howard took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Junction City. His removal to the west was well timed and wise as was demonstrated in the following years, when his crops multiplied, and success came to him. Engaging in a large general farming enterprise, he was obliged to have more than his original purchase of land, and at the time of his death, in May, 1872, owned seven hundred and ten acres.

At the age of fourteen Samuel N. began to work for wages, and early recognition of his ability as a wage earner greatly encouraged him to do his best. Practical and thrifty, he saved his money and studied whenever opportunity offered, for attendance at the public schools for so busy a boy was at best irregular. He knew that whatever he accomplished in life would be due to his own energy, and he applied himself to becoming a first class farmer, and broad-minded citizen. In the fall of 1861 he went to Wasco county, eastern Oregon, and engaged in a stock business for about six years, during that time continuing to save his money, and lay by for a rainy day. Returning to Lane county, in 1868, he took a drove of cattle across the mountains to California, remained a year, and then permanently took up his residence in Lane county, north of Irving.

In 1872 Mr. Howard bought three hundred and twenty acres of land one mile north of Irving, where he lived and conducted general farming for six years, and then moved to his present farm, three miles north of Eugene. There are few farms in the neighborhood more to be desired than this, for the owner has bent every energy to produce the best possible results. He has twenty-five acres of hops, and forty-five acres of fruit, prunes and cherries predominating, to the extent of forty-five hundred trees. The residence on his farm is large and commodious, the barns modern and large enough for grain and stock, and the general improvements are in keeping with an up-to-date farming enterprise. A large share of Mr. Howard's success he attributes to the assistance of a capable and helpful wife, who is a native daughter of Oregon. She was born in Marion county, April 14, 1856. Mrs. Howard was before her marriage Cinderella Kays, daughter of John and Frances Kays, and she is the mother of six children of whom Emmett, the oldest son, lives on an adjoining farm, while DeWitt C., Dolph, Bessie, Jessie, and Nellie, are living at home. Mr. Howard has subscribed to Republican principles from the first of his voting days, and he has held the offices of school director and road supervisor. He has led a busy life, and while amassing a competence has never overlooked fair dealing, or consideration for the rights and prerogatives of others.

CORNELIUS B. STARR. As one of the substantial residents of the vicinity of Monroe, Benton county, Mr. Starr occupies an enviable place in the estimation of his fellow-citizens. Coming to the state when a youth of fifteen years, his life from that time forward has been passed under Oregon skies, and that it has been well and worthily spent a perusal of this short life history will prove.

Cornelius B. Starr was born in Belmont county, Ohio, August 11, 1838, but has no recollection of his birthplace, as his parents moved to Iowa when he was only six months old. Moses Starr, his father, was born June 22, 1787, in old Virginia, but in an early day and when quite a young man moved to Ohio, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. In his wife, who was Elizabeth Calhoun, also a native of the Old Dominion, he had a wise counselor and true companion, whose nobility of character was proverbial. From 1839 until 1853 the parental home was in Iowa, the father following general farming and also acting in the capacity of sales agent, as his farm duties permitted. The year 1853 was a memorable one to the Starr family, as it was April 4 of that year that they started on the long and perilous journey across the plains, ox and horse-teams furnishing the motive power. When they reached The Dalles the father was taken ill, and soon after reaching Clackamas county his death occurred. Saddened and bereaved though she was, the mother courageously took his place at the head of the little band and led them on to their destination, and in Benton county, one and one-half miles northwest of Monroe, took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres. With true pioneer instinct she set about to bring order out of chaos, and her success was exemplified in the fine improvements which from time to time were made upon the tract. Her ability as a physician was of an unusual order, and many a sickroom was brightened and cheered by her presence. Of the twelve children born to her, five sons were ministers of the gospel, in this respect following in the footsteps of their father, who was a local preacher and class-leader. Another son, Samuel F., became the first sheriff of Benton county. Mary J. became the wife of James Campbell of Lane county; Milton C. resides in the vicinity of Monroe; Elizabeth A. is the widow of Jesse Hawley and resides in Grass Valley; and Martin L. resides in Washington. At the time of the father's death he was sixty-six years of age, and the mother seventy-nine at her demise.

Until twenty-four years of age, Cornelius Starr remained at home, dutifully assisting his mother in the care and maintenance of the farm. At this age, however, he started out in a new line of endeavor, and in freighting goods to Jacksonville met with considerable success. The Civil war had been in progress for some time, and when no longer able to resist the call for volunteers, he laid aside personal considerations and enlisted as a member of Company A, First Oregon Infantry, and November 30, 1864, was mustered in at Salem. From Vancouver, the first field of action, the regiment went to Fort Yamhill, and from there to eastern Oregon, thence went into camp. After a service of nineteen months he was mustered out at Fort Yamhill, from there returning to his home and resuming the peaceful life of the farmer.

The marriage of Cornelius B. Starr and Miss Mary A. Howard was solemnized November 21, 1869. She was a native of Illinois and crossed the plains with her parents in 1852. Mrs. Starr is a daughter of Pontius P. and Sarah (Grimm) Howard. The father was born in Wisconsin, and came to Oregon in 1852. He now resides in Washington, where he has lived for the past twenty years. He was in the Civil war. The mother died May 17, 1901. She was the mother of nine children, seven of whom are still living: Albert of Washington; Alpheus of Benton county; Mary A., now Mrs. Starr; Adelia, Mrs. Joseph Baird; Oren, of Cottage Grove; Sarah E., now Mrs. George Ludwig; Maria, resides in Monroe. On a claim adjoining the home of Mrs. Starr's parents the young people began house-keeping, making it their home for the following eleven years. From there they went to Corvallis, where Mr. Starr was engaged in the livery business for four years. After a period of six months spent in southern Oregon, he settled on the tract of seven hundred and fifty acres which now forms his home place. The place is embellished with a commodious residence and convenient barns and out-houses and, all in all, is one of the model estates in the country roundabout. While he carries on general farming to a certain extent, Mr. Starr is more particularly interested in stock-raising, his ranch being stocked with Shorthorn and Polled Angus cattle. Four children blessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Starr, as follows: John H., a resident of Junction City, and has one child, Loris B.; Sylva J., Artie B., and Mamie C., the three latter at home with their parents. The family are identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which Mr. Starr is serving as trustee. Politically he upholds the tenets and candidates of the Republican party.

LEVI P. TALLMAN. A youth developed in a practical and kindly home atmosphere, a young manhood tried by the deprivation and danger of a Civil war service, and later years rounded out in useful occupations in the far northwest, is the life story of Levi P. Tallman, now living on a little fruit farm of thirty acres two miles north of Eugene. A pleasant recollection to Mr. Tallman is the fact that he is indebted solely to his own efforts for his start and subsequent success in life, and he is a staunch advocate of industry and uprightness, aids which have been the principal factors in his advancement. Born in Huron county, Ohio, July 17, 1845, he is a son of Timothy W. and Harriett (Palmer) Tallman, natives of New York state. The parents were married in their native state, and soon afterward removed to Huron county, Ohio, where the father farmed and worked at his trades as shoemaker and carpenter. He removed with his family to Kent county, Mich., in 1853, after a time settling in Grand Rapids where he was earnestly and successfully plying his trade at the time of his death at the age of seventy-seven years.

Attaining maturity on the Kent county farm, Levi P. Tallman had acquired a common school education and a thorough knowledge of farming. The Civil war found him anxious and ready to enlist as a private on September 3, 1864, and he became a member of Battery D, First Michigan Light Artillery, under Lieutenant Pickett, and was sent to Tennessee to join the command of General Van Cleave. He was not privileged to participate in many of the important battles of the war owing to the lateness of the enlistment, but he was at Stone River, and afterward did garrison duty up to the time of his discharge, July 4, 1865, at Murfreesboro, Tenn. His service was marred by illness which necessitated detention in Hospital No. 2, for three months, after which he returned to Michigan, and remained there until October 20, 1866.

While in the service Mr. Tallman met many who had ambitions centering in the west, and the continuation of a farming existence in Michigan convinced him that he, too, might profit by the chances held out to ambitious and deserving young men. Boarding a steamer at New York he came to the coast by the way of Panama and San Francisco, taking twenty-three days for the trip, and remaining in San Jose, Cal., for eleven years farming and fruit-raising. Coming to Portland and later to Eugene in the fall of 1877 he engaged in saw-milling for three years on Long Tom creek, just west of the town. In 1873 he married Mary J. Lake, who died February 26, 1880, leaving two children, of whom Lillian is a nurse in Oakland, Cal., and Lewis A. is in Dawson City, Alaska. In 1886 Mr. Tallman was united in marriage with Mary E. P. Phillips, a native of Tama county, Iowa. He lived at Hale's Station for six years, and in 1886 moved onto a claim of one hundred and sixty acres on the Siuslaw river, where he kept a stage house and public inn, and carried on quite extensive farming operations. He had three hundred and sixty acres of land, raised considerable stock, and prospered exceedingly in his combined occupations. In the spring of 1903 he sold his interests to Eli Bangs, of Eugene, and bought his present farm of thirty acres two miles north of the town. He is engaged in small farming and fruit-raising, and is most pleasantly located, being surrounded with modern aids for the carrying on of his work, and occupying a comfortable and hospitable home. Mr. Tallman subscribes himself to Democratic principles and issues, and many local offices have been honored by his services, among them that of school director and school clerk. He has served for twenty-four years as postmaster in different parts of Lane county, a position which argues both popularity and efficient service. Fraternaly he is connected with the Lodge No. 139, I. O. O. F., at Mapleton, Ore.

DRURY R. HODGES. Prominent among those to whom Benton county owes her agricultural prosperity is Drury R. Hodges, a venerable and highly honored retired resident of Wells Station, and a pioneer of 1847. Mr. Hodges is one of the many natives of Shelby county, Ind., who have settled in Oregon, and his birth occurred September 8, 1825. When nine years of age he removed with his parents to Allen county, Ohio, where he lived until 1839, and then moved to Platte county, Mo., settling on a farm of large dimensions.

In 1846 an escape from a rather monotonous farming life presented itself to Mr. Hodges, who was in that year engaged as a teamster to haul provisions in a freighting train to the soldiers in Mexico. He had many adventures while on this expedition, and an opportunity to study the people and sights of the southern and then turbulent adjoining country. Returning to the paternal farm in Missouri he remained there six months, and April 27, 1847, married Mahala B. Fickle, who was born in LaFayette county, Mo., in August, 1828, and with whom he took a rather unique wedding journey. The month after the wedding the young people carried out a long-thought-of project and crossed the plains with ox-teams, Monroe Hodges, the father of Drury, as well as three brothers and two sisters, accompanying them. Two hired men, two wagons with four ox-teams to each, and four cows, completed quite an imposing cavalcade, and the little party came across with few experiences of an unpleasant nature. They were the usual length of time on the way, arriving in Benton county in October, where Monroe Hodges took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which they all settled. The son erected a little hewed-log house of one room, which in time had a more imposing successor, but which served as a starting place for quite extensive agricultural and stock-raising operations. About four hundred and fifty acres of the property was open land, a distinct advantage over many of the farms of the early settlers, the greater part of which was heavily timbered. The father lived long to enjoy his prosperity, his death occurring at the age of eighty-eight years.

While living on the old donation claim Drury Hodges gained a competence, and made many fine improvements. Many years of devotion to the farm warranted his retirement from active life in 1892, and he has since lived in Wells, surrounded by many friends, and the good will of all who know him. Eleven children were born to him on the old claim, nine of whom are living: Catherine is the wife of Cam Vanderpool of Benton county; Mary E. is the widow of Robert Hughey; Caroline is the wife of Amos Holman of The Dalles; Robert is living on the home farm; Georgie is the wife of Ben Davis of Tacoma; Commodore P. is on the home farm; Jackson is a doctor of dental surgery at Albany; Marcus is on the home place; and Florence is the wife of Sumner Reed of Tacoma. Mr. Hodges and his sons still own the entire donation claim which nets them a comfortable yearly income, besides providing employment for three of the sons. Mr. Hodges is an old time Jackson Democrat, but has never held other than minor offices, preferring to devote all of his time to his farm and home circle. For more than thirty years he has been a member of the Masons, and his religious home is with the Baptist Church. Honorable in all of his dealings, successful and optimistic, Mr. Hodges is an example of what may be accomplished by perseverance and devotion to duty, by truth to friends, and kindness and consideration in his family.

JOHN WILES. It is an important public duty to honor and perpetuate as far as possible the memory of an eminent citizen, one who by his blameless and honorable life and successful career reflected credit not only upon the county in which he made his home, but upon the state. Through such memorials as this at hand, the character of his services are kept in remembrance and the importance of those services acknowledged. His example in whatever field his work may have been done thus stands as an object lesson to those who come after him, and though dead he still speaks. Long after all recollection of his personality shall have faded from the minds of men, the less perishable record may tell the story of his life and commend his example for imitation. No man was ever more respected in Benton county or ever more fully enjoyed the confidence of the people than John Wiles, who was one of the pioneers of this portion of the state, having resided in Benton county for nearly fifty-five years at the time of his demise.

Mr. Wiles was born in Surrey county, N. C., on August 17, 1822, and there remained the first eight years of his life, after which he accompanied his parents on their removal to Henry county, Ind. He was twenty years of age when the family removed to Missouri, settling in Andrew county. There his father died and he was forced upon his own resources. After a year or two he gave his share of the family inheritance to his mother and the other members of the family, while he started west in the hope of gaining a fortune in the country rich in promise, and yet whose resources were as then undeveloped. It was in the year 1847 that Mr. Wiles came to Oregon. He arranged with Frank Writsman to drive an ox-team, and in this way he made the long and arduous journey over the plains to the Sunset state. He was then in very limited financial circumstances and for several months after his arrival he continued to work for Mr. Writsman, receiving a salary of twelve dollars per month. Thus he gained his start, but his was a nature that could never content itself with mediocrity or with a small measure of success if greater prosperity could be obtained through energy and honorable effort. In the year 1848, following the discovery of gold in California, he was attracted to that state and spent the summer of that year in the mines, but returned to Benton county in the succeeding winter. When spring again came, however, he once more went to the gold regions, but in the autumn returned to Benton county, where he resided then continuously up to the time of his demise. The county was to be congratulated upon gaining a citizen of such worth and capability. He took a deep interest in public measures and withal he was practical in the aid which he rendered to general progress and improvement.

In 1851 Mr. Wiles was married, and resolutely undertook the work of providing a home for his bride. They located upon a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres which was joined on the south by the donation claim of Joseph T. Hughart. From time to time he added to that property and he never sold an acre of land unless it was to square off a tract. With characteristic energy he began transforming the wild land into productive fields and also to engage in stock-raising, which business he carried on successfully up to the time of his death. He made a specialty of Shorthorn and Polled Angus cattle and owned some very fine specimens of stock. He made his start in life by what he accumulated in the mines. He met with a fair degree of success in his search for gold in California and upon his return he invested this in the best grades of cattle that could be secured at that time. To this little herd he added as his means would permit and as the years passed he became one of the most extensive and prosperous stock-dealers of his community. He added to his land until his possessions in that direction were very extensive. He made splendid improvements upon his farm by adding good buildings, modern equipments and for many years was recognized as one of the leading representatives of agricultural interests in his portion of the state. In the later years of his life he became a director in the First National Bank of Corvallis and he was a punctual attendant at all of the meetings of the board of directors and did all in his power to promote the success of that financial institution.

On June 8, 1851, Mr. Wiles was united in marriage to Miss Martha Ann Hughart, who then resided on Soap creek with her father,

Joseph Hughart, who was born in Kentucky, February 9, 1804, and removed from that state to Calloway county, Mo., in 1828. Mrs. Wiles was born in Calloway county, May 3, 1833, and in 1836 the family removed from the place of her nativity to Buchanan county, Mo., where she lived until 1845, when her parents with their family crossed the plains to Oregon, making the trip by ox-teams in the St. Clair company commanded by Wayman St. Clair, the father of Mrs. J. R. Bryson. After reaching Oregon the Hughart family settled at Philomath and while living there Mrs. Hughart died, leaving Mrs. Wiles, at the age of thirteen years, to care for a family of five children, one of whom was then an infant. Two years later her sister, Mrs. Greenberry Smith, died, leaving an infant child to the care of Mrs. Wiles, but she nobly took up the task which fell to her lot and made a home for the children of her father's family and also the child of her deceased sister up to the time of her marriage. When the family had crossed the plains they removed to the old homestead near Wells, Benton county, and there Mrs. Wiles resided continuously until 1885, when she became a resident of Corvallis. When she arrived in Benton county the entire district was almost an unbroken wilderness inhabited by the native Indians. The Hugharts and the family of J. C. Avery were among the few families then living in the Willamette valley. The heavy household duties which early devolved upon her largely deprived her of the opportunities for enjoying educational and social advantages, but she possessed naturally a broad mind and was a woman of rare qualifications, being possessed of keen business ideas and exceptional financial ability. She and her sister, Mrs. Greenberry Smith, in their childhood days endured many hardships and trials incident to pioneer life and were not a few times exposed to the dangers of such an existence, but they proved themselves worthy to be classed among the honored pioneer women who have done no less than the husbands, brothers and fathers in laying the foundation for this great state. She had marked influence, and her life was one of exceptional usefulness, characterized by self-sacrifice from early girlhood until she passed to the home prepared for the righteous. She was ever unselfish and always regarded the welfare and happiness of those around her before she gave attention to her own wants. She found her greatest happiness in ministering to others and realized the truth that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Wiles were born the following children: Mary Josephine, now the wife of W. A. Wells of Corvallis; Mrs. Bridget Ann Brinkley, who died near Airlie, Polk county,

F. L. Chambers

Ore.; Eliza J., the wife of Thomas Kirkpatrick, of San Francisco; Walter T., who is represented on another page of this book; Edward F., a farmer and stockman of Wells, Ore.; Jessie Ellen, who died at the age of nine years; and Mrs. Lucy G. Yates, of Corvallis. For many years the mother of this family suffered from ill health, but she bore her sufferings uncomplainingly and in her last days she was surrounded by her entire family, constituting her husband and five children, who did everything in their power to alleviate her suffering and pain. She realized, however, that the end was near, and had no dread of the future. Her entire life was an exemplification of Christian faith and she knew that a better home awaited her in the land beyond. She also requested that each of her children should meet her there, that the family chain should be unbroken, without the loss of a single link. Her life was indeed an eventful one for many experiences such as fall to the lot of few women, her cares and responsibilities in youth early developed her beyond her years and made her ever considerate of others. Her friends found her faithful, her family knew her as a devoted and loving wife and mother and the church a faithful Christian. "Her children rise up and call her blessed," and all who knew her revere her memory. Mrs. Wiles passed away November 11, 1895, and Mr. Wiles survived for almost seven years. After his wife's death he spent much of his time in the home of his son Edward, at the homestead, while during his last illness and death he lived with his son, Walter, in Corvallis, making short visits in the homes of his other children from time to time.

B. F. Irvine, editor and proprietor of the Corvallis Times, paid him the following tribute: "Through youth and age, the life of John Wiles shines with many a virtue. He was all he pretended to be and more. He breathed evil against no man. His tongue uttered kind words, or no words at all. He was just even to the extent of giving more than was due to satisfy the other party to the bargain. He was sincere and steadfast in his devotion to truth, to friends, to the state and to God. Quietly, calmly and honorably he wended his way through that labyrinth of acts that constitute a lifework and with that nicety of justice and kindness that it is said, he never made a foe. With an ambition only to be good and useful to himself, his people and his state, and, wholly free from the shams, insincerities and deceits that often infect human nature, he rounded out a life of quiet beauty that delighted all who came in contact with it. It was a gentle, unostentatious, peaceful career. It was a career so full of quiet kindness that it inspires men with a desire to live a life like it. And, if all men lived like he lived, what a place of gentleness, amiability and beauty this world would be!"

A further beautiful tribute to his memory was paid by W. A. Wells, whom he knew long and intimately, and who said:

"Such men as he was are, unfortunately, too scarce in this world of ours. Such men cannot be spared without exciting the deepest regrets and the saddest reflections. Our friend was one by whose deeds and services the world is made better for his having lived in it. He leaves a memory behind him that can be most fondly cherished. His life was one of usefulness, honesty, integrity and true morality. His aim was to discharge every duty that devolved upon him, to aid his fellowmen as far as circumstances would allow, and to do injury to none. His life was one of good motives and good deeds. His conduct was squared by the highest principles of right, of justice and of truth. He was a kind, indulgent husband, an affectionate, loving parent; a warm, devoted friend, amiable in his intercourse with his fellowmen; respectful of the rights and feelings of others and attentive to all who had claims upon him. He hesitated not to do that which he considered was right and his duty to perform; he was honest and faithful to his trusts. He was a lover of his race, he emphatically led a good life. He has now passed from our sight, replete with honor, replete with manliness—bearing with him our fondest and kindest memories, our highest esteem and admiration. One who leads such a life as our friend has led, has no need to fear death, nor what may possibly follow after it. One who faithfully discharges his duty according to the sphere in life he occupies has no need to recoil at leaving this state of existence.

"If his notions have been governed by the principles of right and justice towards his fellowman, he neither fears to meet him in life nor part with him at the hour of death. He dreads no angry being, no vindictive personage, from whom to expect vengeance and wrath. He is perfectly willing to meet the consequence of a well spent life. Such was our departed friend, honest John Wiles. Adieu, my honored friend."

FRANK L. CHAMBERS. That success in mercantile life is within the reach of every young man who earnestly strives to win it, is the belief of Frank L. Chambers, one of the best known and most prosperous merchants in the Willamette valley. While inherited tendencies, influence and friendly intercession have created an advantage for this upbuilder of Eugene, these aids were unable to continue him in his line of promotion had he not possessed the substantial merit, together with a character which counted no effort too great, nor sacrifice too dear in fulfilling his duties and obligations. A keen appreciation of truthfulness and integrity and a desire to establish credit, have undoubtedly figured prominently in his calculations, and are so firmly rooted in his nature that no better guide for those who seek success is known in this community.

Many years ago Manlove Chambers, the paternal grandfather of Frank L., left his home in New England after a meritorious service in the war of 1812, and became a merchant in Logan county, Ohio, later continuing his chosen occupation in Quincy, Ohio, where he died at an advanced age. His son, James B., the father of Frank L., followed in his business footsteps, and after clerking in stores in Iowa and Missouri, returned to his native Logan county, Ohio, where he started a general merchandise business in Quincy. Afterward he removed to Sedalia and Mound City, Mo., engaging in a merchandise business in both towns, and living in the latter place until coming to Oregon, in 1884. His son, Frank L., was born in Oregon, Holt county, Mo., November 8, 1865, and was therefore nineteen years of age when the family fortunes were shifted to the west. He had received a practical common school education, and the year previous had graduated from the State Normal School at Strasburg, Mo. Beginning with his sixteenth year he clerked in his father's store in Mound City, Mo., and after settling with the family in Dallas, Ore., he clerked for three years in the hardware store started by his father. In 1885 he had saved sufficient money to purchase an interest in the business, and the following year William Faull bought out the elder Chambers, the son disposing of his share in the business to the new partner in 1887. Removing to Eugene in April, 1887, father and son started a hardware store on Willamette street, conducted the same together until August 1, 1890, when the son became sole owner of the enterprise, continuing to manage it alone until January 1, 1902, when his brother, Fred E., became his partner. J. B. Chambers lived in retirement in Eugene from 1890 until his death, in 1902, and is survived by his wife formerly Martha Nies, who was born in Peoria, Ill., the daughter of Jonathan Nies, a merchant tailor, who followed his trade in Iowa, Missouri and Illinois, and who died at Point Townsend, Wash., three years after coming west, in 1886. Mrs. Chambers has the satisfaction of knowing that her three sons have realized her expectations as far as the success of their lives is concerned, her youngest and oldest being prominent merchants, and her second son, Charles N., an attorney, employed by the

In August, 1890, Frank L. Chambers located near his present store, and in 1896 built the large double store in which is conducted the largest business of the kind in the town, and the largest in the valley outside of Portland. His store has a frontage of fifty feet, a depth of three hundred and twenty feet to Olive street, with an L one hundred feet long. Thirty-two thousand feet of floor space is ample for a complete display of hardware of all kinds, and besides, there is a furniture department, requiring 50x80 feet. The stock includes all kinds of hardware, tools, nails, iron, steel, cutlery, builders' hardware, mechanics' tools, blacksmith supplies and agricultural implements, the latter including Bain wagons, buggies and carts, Oliver chilled and steel plows, harrows and cultivators, besides Deering harvesters and Pitts threshers. The firm also carry the Crescent bicycles. Located opposite the Smeede Hotel, no better place could be found, or one more accessible to the general country and city trade. Necessarily this large store gives employment to many people, among whom there is a feeling of co-operation and good fellowship reflecting credit upon the management, and materially enlarging the business. That the interests of Mr. Chambers are by no means self-centered is evident to all who are familiar with his life. There is no public enterprise of merit but may be reasonably certain of his hearty approval and co-operation. He is known as one of the substantial props of the banking system of Lane county, being a director of the First National bank of Eugene, and one of the organizers and a director of the First National Bank at Cottage Grove. He is a director in the Valley Improvement company, engaged in operating a ditch for irrigating from the Hood river, in Wasco county, Ore.; is part owner with T. G. Hendricks in the McKenzie Water Power Company, which proposes to develop a five thousand horse-power for that town; and is a member of the firm of Midgley & Chambers, owners of the canal from the Willamette, which furnishes water power for Eugene. He is the president and one of the organizers of the Eugene Theater Company, which organization is now building a $30,000 opera house.

In company with D. Bristow, president of the First National Bank of Cottage Grove, Mr. Chambers has perfected plans for the organization of a banking company to be known as the Chambers-Bristow Banking Company, which, on January 1, 1904, will inaugurate a private banking business in Eugene. This concern will occupy the building now occupied by the Lane County Bank.

A Republican in politics, it is not surprising that Mr. Chambers has had little time for official service. He is fraternally popular, and is identified with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. and A. M.; the Royal Arch Masons, of this town; Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2; the Consistory No. 1, of Portland; and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is a charter member of the Commercial Club of Eugene, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. For fifteen years Mr. Chambers has been a member of the Oregon National Guard, and is now quartermaster of the Fourth Regiment. None of whom we have knowledge are more typical of the vital, moving, substantial and versatile spirit of the western slope than this successful merchant. Mr. Chambers was united in marriage, July 29, 1891, with Ida, daughter of Thomas G. Hendricks, who was born in Eugene, was graduated from the University of Oregon, and died, April 9, 1900, leaving a daughter, Mary.

JOHN HARRIS. During his many years of residence in the northwest John Harris was one of the most popular and successful farmers in Benton county. Coming here in June, 1852, he had little in the way of influence or money to start him on the upward path, yet at the time of his death in May, 1890, he left a well improved farm of six hundred acres, and quite a large bank account. That energy and resource were required to bring about this change no one doubts, and in the estimation of his many friends Mr. Harris was the master par excellence of these admirable characteristics. His remote ancestors were undoubtedly tillers of the soil, yet his immediate connections had to do with military affairs in Europe, his father being attached for many years to the English army. Attaining to the rank of captain, the elder Harris participated in many of the historic battles of his time, and was captain of a regiment at the battle of Waterloo, June 18, 1815. While stationed in Ireland his son John was born, October 12, 1828, and the father was afterward stationed in England, where both himself and wife passed their last days.

In his youth John Harris learned the turner's trade, and followed the same for a few years in England, coming to the United States in 1850. He came immediately to California, by way of the Horn, seven months being taken up on the trip. Two years later came his wife, formerly Jane Buchanan, whom he had married in St. John's Church, Liverpool, March 12, 1848. Arriving in California, Mr. Harris mined and prospected until 1852, and then came alone to Oregon, his intention being to investigate the prospects of a permanent residence. He was favorably impressed with the climate and general inducements, and forthwith purchased a squatter's right to Uncle Billie Bragg's claim of three hundred and twenty acres seven miles southwest of Corvallis. The following year his wife joined him in the new home, and together they started housekeeping under crude but very promising circumstances. From time to time he added to his land, and finally had six hundred acres, a large part of which was under cultivation. His improvements were the best known at that time, and he made money at general farming and stock-raising, having always fine Durham cattle, and the best of other stock. He took a great interest in politics, although it is not recalled that he desired or worked for official recognition. He was the first master of Grange No. 52, and did much towards furthering the interests of that organization. He died in 1890 at the age of sixty-one, and was survived by his wife until she was seventy-two years old.

The old Harris farm is now occupied by the only child and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harris, Mary, who is the wife of W. F. Whitby, the latter being manager of the property. Mr. Whitby is an important factor in his neighborhood in Benton county, and is a man of leading characteristics. He was born in Canada in November, 1859, and came to Oregon in 1878. A practical and scientific farmer, he has introduced many innovations on the old place, and it is now one of the best equipped and most modern properties in the county. He is a Republican in politics, and takes a keen interest in local affairs both political, agricultural and social. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Degree of Honor, and the Grange. Mrs. Whitby, who is the fortunate heiress of her father's large property, is very prominent in local undertakings, and exerts a special influence in the Grange. She held the position of Pomona of the State Grange for six years, and has been secretary of Grange No. 52 for twenty-one years. At the present time and for the past two years she has been master of the Grange in her home district, through her advocacy of its extension has become known throughout this part of the state. Mrs. Whitby is a cultured and very interesting woman, and has scores of friends in Benton and the surrounding counties. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and not only regularly attends the service, but contributes generously towards the support of the organization. She is the devoted and always sympathetic and helpful mother of three children: Isabella H., John Harris and Harold R., all born on the home farm in Benton county.

ALVA C. WHITE. Although comparatively speaking a newcomer to Benton county, Alva C. White has already made many steadfast friends.

his capacity in this regard being characteristic of the typical frontiersman, whose familiarity with the boundless plains, strange and out-of-the-way places of the west, and human nature, animated by the best as well as the opposite motives, has broadened his sympathies, taught him a fearless adherence to truth and honesty, and given him a breeziness of manner at once attractive, convincing and sincere. A large and powerfully built man, with strong personal characteristics, Mr. White has been able to weather the deprivation, danger and adventure incident to a cattle experience covering many years, in the following of which he has gained a reputation second to none on the coast.

Claiming distinct ancestral advantages on both sides of his family, Mr. White was born on a farm near Warren, Trumbull county, Ohio, July 17, 1847, his father, Uriah B. White, being a native of Norfolk, Conn., and his mother, Mary (Warren) White, having been born in Tarrytown, N. Y. The Warren family was distinguished during the Revolutionary war through the valiant services of Gen. Joseph Warren, the hero of the battle of Bunker Hill, and a physician of high standing. Uriah B. White possessed leading characteristics, and as a millwright and bridge builder gained a far-reaching reputation. At a very early day he settled on the western reserve, where he engaged in farming and bridge-building, and in 1857 removed to Iowa, where he built the first bridge over the river at Des Moines. His family joining him in 1858, he continued to build bridges in the Iowa city, and at the same time became identified with many of its leading and developing enterprises. With his partner, Dr. N. P. Turner, he secured the charter for the first street railway in the town, which he started in 1867, and managed with great success for several years. The last years of his life were spent in retirement, and his death occurred at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife also died in Iowa, leaving nine children.

The oldest in his father's family, Alva C. White attended a select school in both Ohio and Iowa, and at the age of seventeen became identified with the border career which has made up the greater part of his life. Employed by a freighter to drive a team of six mules to Salt Lake City, he remained in that locality and interested himself in the cattle business, going later to Denver, Colo., then to Black Hawk, where he was employed by the Black Hawk Mining Company. In 1866 he returned to Denver and the Missouri river, making his way on horseback to Des Moines, where he operated a sawmill for a couple of years. On a small scale he took up the cattle business in Iowa, became deeper and deeper involved, and soon was feeding and shipping enormous numbers yearly. In 1872 he went to Wyoming and helped to ship the first car load of cattle from that state, the following year engaging in cattle ranching on a range forty miles northeast of Cheyenne. During 1874 he shipped horses and mules to California, and in 1876 made considerable money shipping hogs to San Francisco. He afterward disposed of this business and engaged in buying, feeding and selling cattle throughout Wyoming and Colorado, shipping large numbers to Iowa for feeding, and also shipping fat stock to the city of Chicago. In 1895 he went to eastern Oregon for cattle, and these also were shipped to Iowa, mostly to Dallas county. He has been shipping stock into Chicago about ten or twelve times a year, with unabating success for the last twenty years. No name among stock men is better known than his, identified as it is with the finest and fattest cattle to be had anywhere.

In 1901 Mr. White located in Corvallis, and at once engaged in the stock business on a ranch of three hundred and twenty acres near Blodgett. He is contemplating making this his permanent home, the location being favorable to an oversight of his many interests, one of the chief of which is mining. Contemporary with his early cattle experiences was his purchase of mining claims in different parts of the west, many of which have yielded him large returns on the investment. At present he owns mining interests in eastern Oregon, and still retains two of the claims which he bought in the early days of Cripple Creek, and which are located adjacent to the Stratton mines. His knowledge of mining is extensive, and has seemed to go hand in hand with that of cattle, although Mr. White has made the larger part of his fortune in the latter business. He is probably as well qualified as anyone to speak of the great cattle industry of the west, his own personal interests having been interwoven with its rapid growth for more years than the average man cares to devote to a roving life.

Through his marriage with Mary Clegg, a native of Des Moines, Iowa, Mr. White not only found a cultivated and sympathetic wife long identified with educational work, but became associated with one of the prominent and very early families of that part of Iowa. Abraham Clegg, the father of Mrs. White, was born in England, at Butterworth Hall, and came of a fine old English family which dated its ancestry back many generations, and in honor of which Clegg Hall, and many small towns, were named. Abraham Clegg came to America in 1846 and settled in New England, where he married, and from where he removed to Illinois, in 1848. His family joining him in 1851, he removed the same year to Polk county, Iowa, and there purchased two hundred and sixty acres of land, half of which is now within the limits of the city of Des Moines. At the time of purchase the town contained less than three hundred inhabitants, and gave little promise of its present stability and size. The Clegg farm was an ideal one, undulating prairies and gentle hills producing a landscape of exceeding beauty and harmony. Fine timber abounded by the acre, and when the plow turned up the rich productive soil, fine harvests were unailing. Desiring to substantiate for himself the reports of larger opportunities in the west, Mr. Clegg crossed the plains to California with ox-teams in 1859, and in 1862 returned to his home via the Isthmus of Panama. This was the beginning of extended travel between Iowa and California and Oregon, he having visited the latter country as early as 1869. In the meantime he has made several trips across the plains, and for the last twelve years has made his home in Eldorado county, southern California, a most interesting and intelligent man, reminiscent of the byways and highways of this western country, and of the early pioneer days of Iowa. Away back in New Hampshire he married Ann Nuttall, who was born in Nuttall, England, and who died in Des Moines, leaving four children. Of these, Xerx is living on the old home in Iowa; Mary is the wife of Mr. White; and George and Edward are living near the old home in Iowa. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. White, of whom Mary died in 1895 at the age of eight years, and Georgie is living with her parents. Mr. White is a Republican in politics, and fraternally is associated with the Pioneer Lodge No. 22, F. & A. M., of Des Moines. With his wife he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Thus is told all too briefly the life-story of one of the class of men whose fearless daring and hardihood have developed one of the greatest industries known to the west, and which could never be carried forward on so large a scale in any other country in the world.

PROF. T. J. RISLEY. The cause of education has few better friends in Oregon than is found in Prof. T. J. Risley, one of the successful educators of the state. He has a thorough appreciation of the value of a systematic training in the practical branches of knowledge, and his influence has ever been used for the elevation of the standard of education wherever his services have been given. Born in Clay county, Ill., December 24, 1866, Professor Risley is a son of J. M. Risley, a native of New Jersey, who later settled in Clay county, Ill., and still later removed to Iowa, locating in Blairstown, Benton county. He was subsequently interested in farming and cattle raising in Marion county, Kans., but finally, in 1875, located in Benton county, Ore., where he purchased a farm and at once began its cultivation and improvement. His death occurred in eastern Washington. The wife of J. M. Risley was in maidenhood Miss Malinda Israel, a native of the Hoosier state. She is now residing in Palouse, Wash. The paternal family comprised nine children, of whom T. J. was the third in order of birth, and nearly all of his brothers and sisters were interested in educational work.

Reared upon his father's farm in early life, Professor Risley interspersed attendance at the district school with assisting in the conduct of the home farm, and later attended Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis. After spending one winter in the State Normal at Monmouth, he began his lifework as an instructor at the time being twenty-two years of age. For the past twelve years he has been engaged at his profession in his old district in Benton county and elsewhere, and wherever he has labored, all unite in a hearty endorsement of his ability as an instructor of a superior order. His interest in education is the keener from the fact that no fortuitous circumstances made his educational path an easy one, but on the other hand it was necessary for him to work his own way through school and college. About one mile from Albany Professor Risley owns a farm of fifty-six acres of the old claim which his father took up when he came to the state. In addition to carrying on general farming and stock-raising, Professor Risley is giving no little attention to horticulture and gardening, and is meeting with success in his endeavors. In order to keep in touch with the latest ideas in agriculture he has allied himself with the Fairmount Grange, of which he is at present serving as chaplain. Politically he is a Republican, stanch and true, and in religion is a member of the Baptist Church of Albany. In 1902 he was nominated for county assessor, but did not win the election, and is now serving as a member of the county central committee. Fraternally he is identified with the Woodmen of the World.

In Benton county Professor Risley was united in marriage with Miss Maggie Hayden, a native daughter of the state, her birth occurring in Benton county. Two children have blessed the marriage of Professor and Mrs. Risley, to whom they have given the names of Wave and Hayden.

JAMES H. STEWART. Among the pioneers of 1851 are to be numbered the members of the Stewart family, nearly all of whom had attained maturity at the time of their removal to the west, leaving pleasant homes to aid in the growing civilization and to benefit by the limitless advantages offered in the new land. Today the Stewart family is represented by but few of those who experienced the trials and privations of that long and dangerous journey, no direct members of the family being now living, James H. Stewart, the remaining brother, having died August 6, 1899, leaving to bear his name a widow and five children.

The father of James H. Stewart, George Washington Stewart, was born in Scotland, settling at an early date in Virginia from whence he removed to Indiana, rearing his family principally in that state, though he later made his home in Missouri. While a resident of the Northwest Territory he participated in the Black Hawk war, which resulted in freeing that section of country from the depredations of the Indians. James H. Stewart was born in Fountain county, Ind., June 19, 1825, and on attaining manhood he engaged in farming in Holt county, Mo., marrying, March 11, 1845, Miss Louisa J. Thornton. Her birth occurred August 9, 1821, in Clark county, Ohio, near Springfield, she being the daughter of John and the granddaughter of Coats Thornton. The latter was a native of England, and on coming to the United States he settled in Virginia, where he reared his family, his son John being born in that state. Later he removed to Ohio from which state John went to Tippecanoe county, Ind., and engaged in the prosecution of his trade, which was that of a brickmason. At the age of nineteen years he served in the war of 1812, being with Hull at Detroit. On removing to Missouri he located first in St. Clair county, and later in Holt county, having married Rebecca Robinson, a native of Kentucky, and daughter of Richard, whose residence was divided between the states of Pennsylvania, Kentucky and Ohio, his death occurring in Missouri, where his wife also died three days later.

James H. Stewart was reared in Indiana, in which state he remained until 1842, when he removed to Missouri, where he engaged in farming. Being located in the state from which so many emigrants were being constantly given to increase the population of the western lands, and through which so many emigrants passed, it was but natural that he, too, should become imbued with the idea of opportunities beyond the Rockies. Gathering together his worldly goods, consisting of two wagons, ten yoke of cattle, and much loose stock, all standard bred and very valuable, they started April 22, 1851, for Oregon over the old Oregon trail. They were constantly harassed on their journey by the Indians, who attacked them on Bear river, principally with the intent to steal the stock. During the attack Mr. Stewart was wounded in the hip, but succeeded in shooting the Indian that attacked him. One of their number, a Mr. Black, was killed during the trouble, and one blooded mare was stolen; later, however, the mare was recovered from a man who had purchased her of the Indians. Upon their arrival here, September 22, 1851, Mr. Stewart took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, located two miles north of Corvallis, Benton county, upon which the family remained for many years. In spite of the floods of 1861 which washed away all of his stock with the exception of two heifers and one filly, Mr. Stewart succeeded in building up a modern farm, well equipped and well stocked, being now a very valuable property which Mrs. Stewart still owns. Some time before the death of Mr. Stewart they removed to Corvallis, where they lived a life retired from the active duties which had so long and so successfully occupied them. Politically he and his wife were in accord, both being Republicans. Personally, Mr. Stewart was a man of rare worth and nobility of character, his religion being a consistent belief in the Golden Rule. During his pioneer days in Oregon he made many friends, and when fortune favored him with a comfortable competency, won by his untiring efforts, he held his place in the esteem of the older generations, with an added place in that of the new. His death was a loss to the entire community.

Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Stewart, Marcellus died in infancy; Henrietta is now Mrs. Randall, of Corvallis, with whom Mrs. Stewart makes her home; Mahala is Mrs. John Stewart of Corvallis; Jehil is a resident of Salem; Melissa is the wife of W. H. McMahan of Corvallis; and La Fayette makes his home in Corvallis. The three last named were born in Oregon. Mrs. Stewart is a member of the Methodist Church. She has five children living, six grandchildren, and two great grandchildren. The brothers and sisters of Mrs. James H. Stewart, who crossed the plain in 1851, were John, Mary, Rebecca and James, of whom the three first-named died in Washington, and the latter in Eugene, Ore.

WILLIAM GROVES. With one of the most interesting periods of our country's history—that of the mining excitement of the west—William Groves was actively identified. When the Pacific coast was largely settled by men who had come to the west to gain fortunes rapidly, when towns were but collections of miners' shanties and tents, before the era of legislation and of law, and before the introduction of the comforts of civilization here, he began his search for the precious metal and for more than half a century has lived upon the coast, making his home at the present time in Corvallis.

Mr. Groves is a native of Virginia, his birth having occurred near Batt, January 13, 1832, and when he was two years old his parents removed to Ohio. His father, Michael Groves, was also a native of Virginia and a farmer by occupation. In 1834 he removed to Ohio, settling first in Pickaway county, and later he carried on farming near Batavia, that state, where he died in 1887. He was united in marriage with Eliza Young, who was also born in the Old Dominion and died in the Buckeye state. In their family were seven children, of whom five are living. William is the eldest and the only one that came to the coast. He had two brothers who were in the Civil war.

William Groves was reared in Ohio and attended a subscription school held in a log building. A few days before the twenty-first anniversary of his birth—January 13, 1852—he started for California, going to New York City and then on the steamer Aspinwall sailing for Panama. He crossed the Isthmus and then again embarked for San Francisco, where he arrived forty-five days after leaving New York. He rushed to the mining district on the Yuba river, near Nevada City, where he was engaged in placer mining, and in 1853 went over the mountains by pack train, through Jackson county, Ore., to Crescent City, Cal. Later he returned to Indian creek, California, thence went up the Klamath river and was mining on the Scott river until 1855. He was subsequently in the midst of the Orofino excitement, was at Florence and then in the Boise Basin of Idaho, prospecting and mining until 1864, when he came to the Willamette valley, establishing his home in Corvallis.

Here Mr. Groves built a carding mill and woolen factory on Oak creek, a mile and a half from the town, and while conducting his industrial interests he also engaged in farming. He carried on the carding business from 1865 until 1885 and then became connected with the water-works company of Corvallis. He has been associated with it from almost its inception and has been largely instrumental in the upbuilding of the system, which is now a credit to the city. He is acting superintendent of the plant, which has a capacity for pumping a million and a half gallons of water per day with a tank capacity of sixty thousand gallons. There is a pressure of thirty-five pounds in the tower, and it is seventy-five feet to the bottom of the tank. The pressure can be increased to one hundred pounds. In addition to his labors in this connection, Mr. Groves is still interested in farming and stock-raising.

In Corvallis Mr. Groves was united in marriage to Miss Emma Horning, a native of Missouri, who came to Corvallis in 1850 with her parents. Her father, Fred A. Horning, was born near Berlin, Germany, a son of George G. Horning, who settled in Missouri, where he followed farming. F. A. Horning was a confectioner and followed his trade in Westport, Jackson county, Mo. In 1850 he brought his wife and their daughter to Oregon, making his way overland with an ox-train, being on the road from the first of May until the first of September. He started for California, but changing his plans came to the Sunset state. Settling near Corvallis he secured three hundred and twenty acres of land, now constituting one of the finest farms in Benton county, and thereon he carried forward the work of cultivation and development until his death in 1891. His wife bore the maiden name of Mary Johnson and was a daughter of Charles Johnson, who was born in Tennessee and came with his father to Missouri at an early age, where he lived till May, 1850, when he came to Oregon, bringing his wife and eight children, five sons and three daughters. His wife and one daughter died on the plains while en route to Oregon. His oldest son, John W., was the first president of the State University, which position he held for eighteen years, when he resigned on account of failing health. Charles Johnson settled on three hundred and twenty acres of land, most of which is now included within the College farm. Mr. Horning was much interested in raising the money for the establishment of the college and did much for the furtherance of the movement. His wife died in May, 1868. Mr. Johnson, the great-grandfather of Mrs. Groves, once owned two thousand acres of land on and adjacent to the site of Kansas City, Mo. In the Horning family were eleven children: Emma, now Mrs. Groves; L. F., who is engaged in farming near Grangeville, Idaho; J. Robert, a stockman of Lake county, this state; Mrs. Cynthia Krape, of Portland; Thomas H., of Toledo, Ore.; Charles, who is engaged in ranching in eastern Washington; George, a farmer of Benton county; E. B., a grocer of Corvallis; Alice, who is dean of the women's department of the State Agricultural College at Mesilla Park, N. M.; Jennie, the wife of C. D. Thompson, of Hood River; and Fred, who was educated in Corvallis College and is now in Nevada.

The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Groves was celebrated September 24, 1864, and has been blessed with four children: Lillie May; Jessie, the wife of Professor Kittredge, of Weston, Ore.; Frank W., who has charge of the general storehouse at the Puget Sound navy yard; and Edna, who is a teacher. All are graduates of the Oregon Agricultural College.

In public affairs Mr. Groves has long been prominent and several times has been called to offices of public honor and trust. He served for nine years as city treasurer and for one term as county treasurer. He was made a Mason in Corvallis Lodge No. 14, F. & A. M., of which he is a past master; he belongs to the Royal Arch Chapter and is a charter member of the council, while both he and his wife are charter members of the Order of Eastern Star. Mrs. Groves is also a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In his political views Mr. Groves has always been a Republican and his active cooperation in many measures for the general good indicates his progressive nature and public spirit.

WILL G. GILSTRAP. The editor of the Eugene Register is not only one of the most commanding figures in western journalism, but also one of the most cosmopolitan of men. Since 1892 he has conducted in all its details the most prosperous, and in many respects the most substantial and enterprising newspaper in Lane county, never for an instant losing control of its policy, always the initiator, always the leader. As is well known, his paper is the mouthpiece of the Republican party in this section, and the proprietor has a genius for politics. A brilliant and forceful writer, he has humor, business sagacity, a penetrating style as a paragrapher, untiring energy and amazing enterprise and keenness in the collection of news. As an exponent of moderate, conservative, and well balanced journalism, and of the courtesy which more than aught else indicates an adherence to the worldwide mission of the press, the Eugene Register is deserving of the respect and attention which it commands even among its opponents.

That Mr. Gilstrap spent many years of his life on a farm has certainly been in his favor, and is undoubtedly responsible for the nearness to nature so apparent in his sympathies. He was born on his father's farm near Pleasanton, Kans., November 4, 1865, and the drudgery of the harvest field was varied by attendance at the district school. In 1882 he was graduated from the Pleasanton high school, and during 1883-84 attended the Fort Scott Normal College, where terminated his preliminary search for knowledge. His first business experience was acquired as a clerk in a large lumber concern, a position which he relinquished upon removing to Colfax, Wash., in 1888. In the spring of 1889 he moved to Oakesdale, Wash., and established the Oakesdale Sun, in 1890 increasing his responsibility by starting the Alliance Advocate, which was later disposed of to the Farmer's Alliance, and used by the latter organization as its official organ. Mr. Gilstrap came to Oregon in 1892, soon afterward succeeding to the editorship of the Eugene Register, a daily and weekly publication, easily ranking as one of the leading Republican newspapers in the state. A feature of the paper is that it is connected with the largest job printing plant in Lane county.

In Oakesdale, Wash., Mr. Gilstrap was married, October 16, 1891, to Lillian May Finch, who was born in Umatilla county, Ore., a daughter of S. E. Finch. Two children have been born of this union, Cosby Lucile, aged eleven, and Louis Frederick, aged two years. Mr. Gilstrap is a member and trustee of the Eugene Commercial Club, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, the Knights of the Maccabees, and the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

MARY A. GARLINGHOUSE. A picturesque windmill, flapping its skeleton arms in the breeze, and further indicating its presence by the inevitable dirge which accompanies its industry, would seem to beckon travelers along the highway to an inspection of the finely improved Garlinghouse farm over which it is called to preside from its elevated vantage ground. Had this time-honored and very ancient device eyes with which to see, it might view eight hundred and eight acres of land, given over to wheat and other grains, fruit, acres of corn, all the general commodities with which farmers have to do, and extensive stock-raising operations. One of the most valuable properties in Benton county, it is also one of the best equipped, and it would seem that no improvement evolved by the ingenuity of man, had been omitted from its working equipment.

This model farm has been the property of Mrs. Mary Garlinghouse since 1852, and is now managed by her second husband, William Garlinghouse, who is one of the successful and popular men in Benton county. Mrs. Garlinghouse was born in Kentucky, her parents having been farmers in that state for many years. The family moved to Illinois, at an early day, where the daughter married William Coyle, with whom she continued to live in Illinois until 1849. The young couple then started across the plains with ox-teams, were on the road the usual length of time, and arrived in good health and spirits at their destination in Oregon. In Multnomah county they spent the first winter, and in 1852 came to Benton county and took up six hundred and forty acres of land one mile northeast of Monroe. Mr. Coyle prospered in the west, made many improvements on his farm, and availed himself of all the suggestions then known to agriculturists. He died at the age of fifty-eight, leaving his widow sole owner of the large farm, upon which she has since lived. One child was born of this union, Malinda F., the widow of L. J. Starr, who is living with her mother.

In time Mrs. Coyle married William Garlinghouse, who was born in Ohio, and who crossed the plains in 1862, settling in Benton county. At present the farm consists of eight hundred acres, with fine improvements. Mr. Garlinghouse is the present postmaster of Monroe, and has served several years as a member of the school board. One ought certainly to mention his extensive knowledge of the horse, of which he is a keen and persistent admirer. The noble animal has no stancher friend anywhere, or one who can more eloquently sound his praises. Mrs. Garlinghouse is a typical pioneer woman of the west, strong and resourceful, and capable of winning and retaining the friendship of many. There are no more genial or hospitable people in the neighborhood, for their latch-key is always down and their larder is a tempting one.

M. SVARVERUD. Eugene has a number of adopted sons claiming Norseland ancestry, but none who stand higher in the public esteem, or are more thoroughly identified with the substantial business life of the city than M. Svarverud, senior partner and manager of the Eugene Real Estate & Investment Company.

Mr. Svarverud was eleven years old when he left his ancestral home near Christiania, Norway, where he was born December 11, 1855, and where he had received irregular training at the public schools. He was accompanied by his father, Andrias P., and his mother Eline (Peterslkken) Svarverud, the latter a daughter of Peter Peterslkken, a farmer near Christiania, and a land owner. The paternal family were moderate land owners, and Peter, the grandfather of M. Svarverud had a farm of large size and remarkable fertility. On both sides of the family the members were strict adherents of the Lutheran Church. Arriving in America on a sailing vessel in 1866, Andrias Svarverud located in Fillmore county, Minn., bought a good-sized farm, and lived there until moving to Ransom county, N. Dak., in 1881. In 1893 Mr. Svarverud retired from active life and moved to Eugene, Ore., and died here in June, 1902, at the age of eighty-three years. He is survived by the wife who shared his rising fortunes, and who is now seventy-four years of age.

The oldest of the six children born to his parents, and one of the four now living, M. Svarverud was reared on the Minnesota farm, accompanied the family to North Dakota, and at the age of twenty-one years homesteaded a claim near Fort Ransom. He was one of the first in that region to engage in wheat-raising, and his venture proved successful, netting him sufficient money to engage in a practical business enterprise. He came to Eugene in 1889 and started a hardware and implement store on the corner of West Eighth and Olive streets, and later on moved to Willamette street, where he built up a large business under the firm name of M. Svarverud & Company. The firm were so successful that they started a branch store at Harrisburg, and later one of the same kind at Independence, operating all three under the same firm name. The Cleveland administration brought the large general and branch houses to a crisis in 1893, the general depression affecting them to such an extent that they were obliged to sell out in order to pay their liabilities. With commendable courage Mr. Svarverud weathered this storm and kept hope burning in his heart, and in 1894 started the business since known as the Eugene Real Estate & Investment Company, which was organized in 1897 with R. McMurphy, C. M. Densmore and W. A. Wood as Mr. Svarverud's partners. The firm handle town and country properties, including residence and timber. Many fine properties have passed through their hands, and many important transactions have been carried to a successful finish. This partnership continued for about eighteen months, at which time Messrs. McMurphy and Wood withdrew, the business being continued by the other two gentlemen until 1900, when Mr. Densmore withdrew, and the business was continued for a year by Mr. Svarverud, when George Fisher purchased an interest, and in April, 1903, was succeeded by W. W. Calkins.

Mr. Svarverud's public spirit has found outlet in many avenues of activity in the city, and his sympathies have invariably turned towards the benevolent and charitable as worthy of his personal attention and financial assistance. He is a Republican in politics, but has never taken a more than nominal interest in local affairs. Fraternally he is one of the best known men in Eugene and Lane county, and at present enjoys the distinction of being grand marshal of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, I. O. O. F., as well as past noble grand of the Eugene lodge. He is a member of the Encampment, the Woodmen of the World, and the Knights of the Maccabees. One of the first to agitate the subject of the Eugene Real Estate Exchange, he has been president of the exchange since its organization, and has been the leading and most influential member in promoting its well-being.

In Ransom county, N. Dak., Mr. Svarverud married Georgiana Marsh, a native of Milwaukee, Wis., and daughter of George Marsh, an early settler of Barnes county, N. Dak. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Svarverud: Franklin Evander; Leland Wray; George Martin; Jesse Lawrence, and Frederick Carlton.

The old-time expression, that "his word is as good as his bond," applies to Mr. Svarverud, for no man in the community is more readily accorded honor and confidence and good will, nor have any a more firmly established reputation for loyalty to business and general community interests.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN KNISELY. Occupying a conspicuous position among the prominent educators of the northwest, Prof. A. L. Knisely is recognized as a man of rare ability and talent. As one of the staff of instructors at the Oregon Agricultural College, being professor of chemistry, he is faithfully performing his part in making this school one of the leading institutions of the kind in the Union, his labors in this direction being duly appreciated by the board of regents, the faculty, the students, and the patrons of the college. Finely educated, and especially prepared for the work in which he is engaged, he is very successful as a teacher, and is favorably known as an expert chemist at the department of agriculture, in Washington, D. C.

A son of A. J. Knisely, Abraham L. Knisely was born in Chicago, Ill., February 19, 1865. His grandfather, Christian Knisely, was born and reared in Meadville, Pa., where he learned the cabinetmaker's trade, which he subsequently followed for awhile in Dayton, Ohio, later removing to Chicago, Ill., where he spent his last years. A. J. Knisely was born in Meadville, Pa., and was there reared and educated. Subsequently taking up his residence in Chicago, Ill., he was there engaged as a brick manufacturer for a number of years. Removing then to Benton Harbor, Mich., he has since devoted his attention to horticultural pursuits, having a fine fruit farm of twenty acres. He is a member of the Berrien County Horticultural Society, and its secretary. He married Rebecca Hastings Sampson, who was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, of New England ancestors, and a daughter of William Sampson, formerly a manufacturer of pottery in that city, later a stockholder in the South Branch Dock Company, at Chicago. His death occurred in Cincinnati, where he had resided for many years. Of the children born of their union, two sons and one daughter are living.

Obtaining his elementary education in the graded schools of Chicago, Abraham L. Knisely went with his parents to Benton Harbor in 1876, and after attending the district school for awhile entered the high school, from which he received his diploma in 1884. The following year he spent on the home farm, then attended the Collegiate Institute, being graduated from there in 1886. Becoming interested in chemistry, Mr. Knisely took a four-years course at the University of Michigan, from which he was graduated with the class of 1891, receiving the degree of B. S. Subsequently doing post-graduate work in the same university, he had the degree of M. S. in chemistry conferred upon him. After receiving his diploma, in 1891, he went to Geneva, N. Y., as assistant chemist at the experiment station, and after receiving the master's degree continued there as assistant chemist, also having charge of the dairy products. In 1895 he was given a year's leave of absence to attend Cornell University, where he did post-graduate work in agricultural chemistry and horticulture. Resigning his position in Geneva, he subsequently continued his work at Cornell, being employed, also, as assistant chemist in the College of Agriculture. Since July, 1900, Mr. Knisely has filled the chair of chemistry at the Oregon Agricultural College, and has been chief chemist at the experiment station. Although he has been here a comparatively short time, he is already well known in scientific circles, and takes an active part in institute work all over the state.

At Battle Creek, Mich., Professor Knisely married Miss Blanche Briggs, who was born at Albion, Mich., and was graduated from the University of Michigan, in 1890, with the degree of B. L. Two children have been born of their union, Margaret Gould and Malcolm Briggs. In politics the professor is a sound Republican.

ARTHUR BURTON CORDLEY. A man of high intellectual attainments, an earnest worker, especially devoted to the interests of the scientific department, of which he has charge, Professor Cordley is considered an authority on zoology and entomology, and by his constant and conscientious labor, both in his classes and at the experiment station, has won for himself an enviable reputation, and gained an honored position among the able instructors of the Oregon Agricultural College, with which he is connected. Energetic and ambitious, he has built up the department of which he is now at the head from its foundation, making it one of the most useful in the college, and one of the most popular. Active in local enterprises, he has done much toward advancing the interests of Corvallis, and is everywhere held in high esteem, his integrity as a man, and his loyalty as a citizen being unquestioned.

A son of the late Charles Cordley, Prof. Arthur B. Cordley was born February 11, 1864, at Pinckney, Livingston county, Mich., which was also the birthplace of his father. His paternal grandfather, James Cordley, was born, reared and married in England. Emigrating to America, in 1833, he settled in Michigan, taking up land in Livingston county, near Hamburg Junction, and there improved a homestead, on which he spent his remaining years. Charles Cordley spent his entire life in Michigan, succeeding to the ownership of his parental acres, and being engaged in agricultural pursuits most successfully. His wife, whose maiden name was Esther Hicks, was a life-long resident of Michigan, although she was of Pennsylvania ancestry, her parents having been natives of that state. Of the three children born of their union, Arthur B., the only son, is the only one to come to the Pacific coast, the two daughters still residing in Michigan.

Laying the foundation for his education in the district school, Arthur B. Cordley labored hard during his vacations on the home farm, continuing his agricultural labors until nineteen years of age, when he entered upon his professional career, teaching in a public school for two years. Becoming a student at the Michigan State Agricultural College, in Lansing, in the spring of 1885, he was graduated from that institution with the degree of B. S. in 1888. Remaining there the ensuing two years, first as instructor in zoology, and later as assistant entomologist, he then accepted a position in the University of Vermont, at Burlington, becoming instructor in zoology in the College of Agriculture, and assistant entomologist at the experiment station. In May, 1891, Professor Cordley went to Washington, D. C., as assistant entomologist in the United States Department of Agriculture, remaining there until 1893. Returning then to Michigan, he spent two years on the home farm, leaving it in 1895 to take up his present work as professor of zoology and entomology at the Oregon Agricultural College, being, also, entomologist and plant pathologist at the experiment station. An earnest student, the professor is continually adding to his scientific knowledge, in 1899 taking a graduate course for that purpose at Cornell University. In 1900 he was honored by his alma mater, which conferred upon him the degree of M. S. He has a wide reputation in scientific and literary circles, being a member of the American Association of Economic Entomologists, a branch of the American Association for Advancement of Science.

At Brookings, S. D., Professor Cordley married Miss Mary McLouth, a native of Ypsilanti, Mich., a daughter of Prof. Lewis McLouth, Ph. D., for many years one of the faculty of the Michigan State Normal School, later president of the State Agricultural College of South Dakota, but now a resident of Springfield, Mass., where he organized, and still has charge, of the Intercollegiate Branch of the Home Correspondence School. Professor and Mrs. Cordley have one child, Dorothea. Professor Cordley is a Republican in politics, a member of the Congregational Church, and belongs to the W. of W., and to Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, F. & A. M.

JAMES WITHYCOMBE. Comprehending and heeding the advice of Sidney Smith, who said, "Whatever you are from nature, keep to it; never desert your own line of talent, and you will succeed," Mr. Withycombe has unquestionably chosen his scientific occupation with great wisdom, and in his earnest studies has become complete master of the particular science in which he is at present interested. Conversant with the various branches of general farming from his earliest youth, he has never missed an opportunity to gain knowledge of anything connected with farm life, and is, therefore, especially fitted for his present position as director of the experiment station of the Oregon Agricultural College.

Of English birth and parentage, Mr. Withycombe was born March 21, 1854, near Plymouth, England, which was the birthplace, also, of his father, Thomas Withycombe, and the life-long residence of his grandfather, Henry Withycombe, a successful farmer and stock-raiser. Thomas Withycombe emigrated to this country with his family in 1871, and located in Washington county, Ore., buying a part of the Horace Lindsay donation claim, near Farmington, where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits for several years. On retiring from active labor, he removed to North Yamhill, where he spent his last years. He married Mary Ann Spurr, who was born near Plymouth, England, a daughter of Joseph Spurr, an extensive and prosperous sheep-breeder. Of their union five children were born, namely: John; Thomas; James; Mrs. Mary Burton, of North Yamhill, Ore.; and Philip, a tile and brick manufacturer at North Yamhill. The mother died on the home farm, near Farmington.

James Withycombe received his rudimentary education in the public schools of his native town, afterwards taking a course of study in the grammar school at Tavistock, England. Coming to Oregon when seventeen years of age, he assisted in the care of the home farm, at the same time becoming interested in stock-raising, and studying veterinary surgery, which he subsequently practiced successfully a number of years in Portland, Ore. In 1889 he was appointed, by the domestic annual commission, state veterinary of Oregon, a position that he filled most satisfactorily for nine years. During that time he also had charge of a farm in Washington county, near Hillsboro, owning a half section of land, which is still in his possession. In addition to general farming, he paid especial attention to raising stock, including standard-bred horses, Shorthorn cattle, Shropshire and Cotswold sheep and Berkshire swine, realizing excellent results. In the fall of 1898 Mr. Withycombe gave up farming to accept the position of vice director of the experiment station at the Oregon Agricultural College, with which he is still connected officially, having been director of the experiment station since his appointment to the position, in July, 1902. In 1899 this institution conferred upon him the degree of M. Agr., to which he is worthily entitled. In the department of the college to which he is attached, Dr. Withycombe is attracting much attention, interesting the pupils in practical agriculture and horticulture, proving in a clear manner the necessity for a scientific training in these branches if the highest possible success is to be attained. He is widely known in connection with the dairy and farmers' institutes throughout the state, and has a large acquaintance with the leading agriculturists. With them his great ambition is to have Oregon reach the place to which she is justly entitled among the rich agricultural states of the Union. He is a charter member of Farmington Grange, of Washington county, but at present holds membership with Corvallis Grange. For two years he was president of the North Pacific Wool Growers' Association.

Dr. Withycombe married, in Washington county, Ore., Miss Isabel Carpenter, a native of Farmington. Four children have been born of their union, namely: Harry, who entered the University of Illinois with the class of 1903; Thomas Robert, a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College, in the class of 1901; Mabel, a graduate of the same class as Thomas R.; and Earle. The doctor is a strong Republican in politics, and at the convention held in Albany was among the first to advocate the name of T. H. Tongue for member of congress. He is a member of the Christian Church, with which he united in 1874, and in which he has filled different offices.

MRS. SARAH E. MOORE. The Ancient Order of United Workmen of the state of Oregon has reason to be proud of Mrs. Sarah E. Moore, a prominent organizer of the Degree of Honor of that lodge and a woman whose noble qualities have all been enlisted in the cause she espoused. She was born in Alabama, the daughter of H. L. Wilkins, and the youngest of the children which blessed the union of her parents. In 1877 her father came to Corvallis, Ore., bringing his family to a new home among the newer opportunities of the west, and, then but a young girl, Mrs. Moore continued her studies in the public schools of this city. Deember 27, 1881, she was united in marriage with Medford Moore, thus allying her fortunes with those of a pioneer family of Oregon. Mr. Moore was born in Lebanon, Linn county, Ore., in 1854, the son of John W., a native of Missouri, who emigrated to the west in 1848 and settled in Linn county, where he engaged in farming. His life is more or less interwoven with the events that formed the history of the early days of Oregon, serving with many other pioneers in the Rogue river war. He is now retired from the active cares of life and makes his home in Walla Walla, Wash. Of the five children born to himself and wife only three are now living. The second of the children was Medford, and after a childhood upon his father's farm he completed his education in the Oregon Agricultural College. At the age of eighteen years he went to South America in company with his two brothers, John and Frank, and settling in Argentine Republic, they remained there farming for three years. Some time after the death of his brother, Frank, in that country, Medford returned to Oregon and engaged in farming in Benton county, near Wells, for five years, removing at the close of that period to Prineville, Crook county, where he became interested in stock-raising. Two years later he ran a stage in eastern Oregon for several years; then, during Cleveland's administration he was appointed postmaster of Prineville, a position he held from 1893 to 1897. After a period in the harness business in Prineville he was interested in a drug store. In the affairs of the city he was always actively interested, at the time of his death, July 9, 1902, holding the position of city treasurer. Fraternally he was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being past officer in the Prineville lodge; the Rebekahs; Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he was past master workman; and the Degree of Honor. Politically Mr. Moore was a Democrat.

While in her home in eastern Oregon Mrs. Moore was district deputy of the Degree of Honor of the A. O. U. W., and also field worker, in which positions she has worked all over the state of Oregon. She has established fourteen lodges of the Degree of Honor, and now has her membership with the Degree of Honor of Corvallis, where she removed in August, after the death of her husband, for the better educational advantages offered her son, Guy, who is now a student of the Oregon Agricultural College, of the class of 1904, and Gladys will graduate in the high school, class of 1904. Guy Moore, in his sophomore year, won the prize offered by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in an oratorical contest, and in February, 1903, he won through a contest the right to represent his college in the state oratorical contest, in the former winning the gold medal and a cash prize of $15, his unusual ability placing him high in scholarly attainments, while in the state contest he won third place, the title of his oration being "Oliver Cromwell, the Man of Action." Mrs. Moore is also a member of the Eastern Star and Rebekahs, in the latter holding the position of vice grand. Politically she holds opinions in accord with those of her husband, though not content to be a follower, for she believes firmly in woman's suffrage and looks forward with confidence to the day when women of intelligence and judgment shall be allowed to do their duty to the country which gives them a home, side by side with the man of the same attainments.

ROBERT McCAUSTLAND. As a pioneer of the state of Wisconsin, as a courageous soldier during the Civil war, as a farmer for many years in Benton county, Ore., and as a retired and helpful citizen of Corvallis, Robert McCaustland is entitled to mention among the native sons of Ireland who have found in the land beyond the seas a home and abundant opportunity.

Supposedly during the times of religious persecution in Scotland the paternal grandfather McCaustland left his native land and settled in the mountainous County Tyrone, Ireland. Here was born his son, Daniel, the father of Robert, and who became a farmer and linen manufacturer. The linen industry was conducted on a rather small scale, and was confined to the finer grades of flax cloth, in which the elder McCaustland excelled. He never left his native land, nor did his wife, who also was of Scotch descent, before her marriage Elizabeth McFadden, whose father, Samuel, came from Scotland to County Tyrone. Of the nine children in the family all grew to maturity, and three are living, Robert, born in County Tyrone, June 1, 1830, being one of the oldest. Three of the sons, James, Thomas and Robert served in the Civil war.

As a boy in County Tyrone Robert McCaustland attended the national school irregularly, and from his father learned the trade of linen-weaving. He was ambitious and resourceful, and the limitations of his countrymen seemed to his buoyant spirits inexpressibly sad and depressing. Accordingly he made arrangements to come to America when he had reached nineteen years of age, and January 7, 1850, embarked on the sailer Harold at Glasgow. After a voyage of eight weeks and four days the harbor of New York loomed against the horizon, and filled the hearts of the homeseekers with great joy and thankfulness. For about a year Robert remained in New York and worked at whatever he could find to do, and then went to Philadelphia, Pa., where he found employment in a feed store for about five years. In the winter of 1855 he removed to Adams county, Wis., twenty-two miles from Kilbourn City. Here he engaged in general farming for twenty-six years, and during the first years in the pineries experienced all of the deprivations incident to pioneer life. His neighbors were few and far between, and the numberless trees shut in his little habitation, and loneliness reigned supreme. Industry accomplished much, however, and patches of cleared ground widened into acres of tillable land, and harvests rewarded the autumn expectations.

The breaking out of the Civil war found Mr. McCaustland in a fairly prosperous condition, an important member of his agricultural community. In November, 1864, he volunteered in Company C, Fourteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in at Madison, Wis., afterward joining his regiment at Eastport, Miss. He served up and down in Mississippi and Alabama, and at the battle of Fort Spanish was wounded in the left hand March 28, 1865, by a shell, and was incapacitated for further service. After three months in the hospital he was mustered out in July, 1865, and thereupon returned to his home and farm in Wisconsin. November 14, 1879, he was united in marriage with Mrs. Mary Hay, who was born in Northumberland, England, a daughter of John Cowing, a native of the same part of England. Her grandfather, George Cowing, was a farmer in Northumberland, and her father brought his family to America in 1849, locating in Dane county, Wis. He afterward removed to Adams county, Wis., but finally lived in retirement in Jackson county, Minn., where his death occurred, as did also that of his wife, Elizabeth (Davidson) Cowing, a native of Rutledge, England. Eight children were born into the Cowing family, seven of whom are living. One of the sons, John, served in the Civil war in the Forty-ninth Wisconsin. Mrs. McCaustland was reared in Wisconsin, and for her first husband married Murray Hay, who was born in Herkimer county, N. Y., and afterward became a merchant in Easton, Wis. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Hay, Marion is a merchant in Wilbur, Wash.; Libbie is now Mrs. Cadwell, of Minnesota; Jennie is Mrs. Alexander, of Wilbur, Wash.; and Edward is a merchant in Wilbur and also manager of the Big Bend Land Company.

In 1881 Mr. McCaustland sold his farm in Wisconsin and located in Plymouth county, Iowa, where he lived until 1889, when he disposed of his farm and came to Oregon, locating on a farm in the vicinity of Hubbard, at the same time purchasing five acres in the town. He farmed successfully in Marion county and built two residences in Hubbard, both of which are rented, as is also his farm. In 1896 he came to Corvallis and bought a pleasant home where he continued to live comparatively retired from active business life, until November, 1903, when he and his wife removed to Wilbur, Wash., where they intend to take up their permanent residence. His first presidential vote was cast for a Republican candidate, and until about eight years ago he upheld the principles and issues of his chosen party. He then became a student of social and economic conditions, with the result that he is now a firm believer in Socialism. The only son and child born to Mr. and Mrs. McCaustland, James C., is a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural College, class of 1900, and is at present engaged in the mercantile and real estate business with his brothers in Wilbur.

GEORGE BRELSFORD KEADY. Officially connected with the Oregon Agricultural College, Mr. Keady has entire charge of the printing department of the college and experiment station. Familiar with the art preservative from his youth, he learned the printer's trade from his father, becoming expert in every department, from the lowest in the office to the highest, and has made this his life work.

A native of Pennsylvania, Mr. Keady was born, November 23, 1847, in Washington, the birthplace of his father, W. F. Keady, who was of sturdy Scotch ancestry. W. F. Keady was an editor by profession, for several years of his earlier life having charge of the Brownsville (Pa.) Clipper. Removing, in 1852, with his family to Illinois, he made the journey overland, walking all the way. Locating in Iroquois county, he had charge of the Middleport Press, now published at Watseka, Ill., under the name of the Iroquois Times. Going then to Kankakee, Ill., he bought an interest in the Kankakee Gazette, which he edited until purchasing the old Kankakee Journal, which he edited and published, in company with his son, George B. Keady, until 1880. Following the march of civilization westward in that year, he took up his residence in Olympia, Wash., and served as first county clerk of Thurston county after Washington's admission to the Union. There he spent his last years, dying at a good old age. His wife, whose maiden name was Martha Patton, was born in Pennsylvania, and died in Illinois. Of the five children born of their union, three are living, one of the sons, W. P., a resident of Portland, Ore., being interested in the Oregon Water Power and Railway Company, and in mining.

Brought up in Illinois from the age of five years, George B. Keady attended the public schools until fifteen years of age, when he offered his services to his country. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, One Hundred and Thirteenth Illinois Infantry, being mustered in at Chicago as a private, but later being made drummer of the company. Joining the Army of the Tennessee with his regiment, he was present at many of the more important engagements of the war, including those at Vicksburg, Arkansas Post, Guntown and the Tallahatchie and Bolivar raids. Subsequently, while stationed at Memphis, Tenn., he assisted in guarding the Twin Bridges when Forrest made his raid on that city. At the expiration of his term of enlistment he was mustered out of service, at Memphis, on June 20, 1865.

Returning home, Mr. Keady attended school a year, then entered the employ of his father, working on the Middleport Press, and then on the Kankakee Gazette, learning the printer's trade. Subsequently forming a copartnership with his father, he bought the Kankakee Journal, and changed its name to the Kankakee Times, which was then run as a weekly paper, but is now published daily. Selling out in 1884, Mr. Keady went to Omaha, Neb., where he was associated with the Gibson Miller Printing Company until 1888. Coming then to Portland, Ore., he worked at his trade for the Lewis-Dryden Printing Company until offered, by Frank Baker, a position in the state printing office, where he remained several years. Leaving the position in 1897, Mr. Keady accepted his present office as manager of the printing department at the Oregon Agricultural College, his office and plant being finely located in Mechanical Hall, one of the handsomest and most imposing buildings on the campus. The plant has recently been much enlarged and improved, being equipped with the latest and most approved machinery, and furnished with both steam and electrical power.

While living in Kankakee, Ill., Mr. Keady married Miss Mary Wright, who was born in Indiana. Politically Mr. Keady is a Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, F. & A. M., and for many years belonged to Whipple Post, G. A. R., of Kankakee, Ill. Mrs. Keady is a member of the Episcopal Church and the Eastern Star, of Corvallis.

PETER RICKARD. One of the ideal farming properties of Benton county is that owned and managed by Peter Rickard, located ten miles southwest of Corvallis, and five hundred acres in extent. Three hundred and fifty acres of this property are under cultivation, and the fortunate owner carries on general farming and stock-raising, in both of which occupations he has been unusually successful. This farm has one of the finest rural residences in the county, and the barn is one that would delight the heart of a thrifty farmer who yearly stores away hundreds of tons of hay and bushels of grain, and winters large numbers of fine stock. Mr. Rickard sees the pleasant side of farming, and philosophically adapts himself to the strenuous and less agreeable phases of country life. He has the means to conduct his affairs after the most approved and modern methods, and to surround himself and family with the luxuries as well as necessities of life.

The people of Benton county are wont to associate success with the name of Rickard, and in no sense have their expectations fallen short of realization. John Rickard, the father of Peter, and the founder of the family in Oregon, is living on a tract of land nine hundred acres in extent, on the old Territorial road, a portion of his property being in Benton, and the balance just across the line in Lane county. He was born in North Carolina, November 7, 1827, his father, Peter, being a native of the same state. Peter Rickard was reared on a southern plantation, and as a youth learned the blacksmith trade, which he followed for many years. He married Susan Kepeey, a native daughter of North Carolina, with whom and his children he removed to Indiana in 1835, where his death occurred at the age of sixty-eight years. He was survived by his wife, who died at the home of her son, John, in Oregon, at the age of seventy-nine years. John Rickard was seven years old when he went overland with his family to Indiana, and he lived in the Hoosier state until crossing the plains in 1853. He came here with practically nothing, and his vast estate is wholly the result of his indefatigable perseverance and good management. He has taken an active interest in the upbuilding of his adopted locality, is a Democrat in politics, and has served on the school board for eighteen years.

Peter Rickard, the namesake of his grandfather, was reared on his father's large farm, and was educated at the public schools and Corvallis College. After his marriage with Clarinda Fiechter, a native of this county, he went to live on a farm on Muddy creek, seven miles south of Philomath, and after three years bought three hundred and twenty acres of his present farm, which constitutes a portion of the old James Foster donation claim. Five children have been born into his family, of whom Thella B., Mark, Leatha and Vena are at home, and Luke, the third child in the family, is deceased. Mr.

Rickard is a Democrat in politics, as was his father, and he has been prominent in political affairs in the county. His special fitness for office has been recognized by his fellow townsmen, who have elected him sheriff for two terms, and made him commissioner four years. He is fraternally a welcome visitor at the Masonic and Knights of Pythias lodges, and other social organizations in the county profit by his helpful association. Upright in all of his dealings, generous in his contributions to all worthy charities, and humane in his sympathies, he is a typical representative of the cultured and broad-minded agriculturist of the western slope.

JACOB M. CURRIER. An early pioneer of Inavale, and one of its most respected citizens, Jacob M. Currier has been a resident of this section of the state for upwards of half a century, and in that time has well performed his part in promoting the advancement and development of one of the finest agricultural regions of Benton county. A hard-working, persevering man, possessing shrewd common sense, observing and thinking for himself, he toiled as a young man with determined energy, and his labors have been crowned with success. By dint of industry and good management he has acquired a magnificent estate, and is now one of the most extensive and well-to-do agriculturists of his community. Coming from substantial New England ancestry, he was born February 12, 1827, in Orleans county, Vt. In 1844 his parents, Jacob and Mary (Smith) Currier, removed to Missouri, where the father took up land, and in addition to improving a farm, worked at the carpenter's and stonemason's trade. Both parents died at the age of fifty-seven years. Of the nine children born of their union, but three survive, namely: Mrs. Elizabeth Foster, of Lake county, wife of James Foster; Lorena, wife of John White, of New York; and Jacob M.

Going with his parents to Missouri in 1844, Jacob M. Currier remained there two years. In 1846, accompanied by two sisters, one of whom was married, he came across the plains with ox-teams, the only means of travel and transportation in those days, ere the country was spanned by its present network of railways. The journey required seven months, and one man of the train was killed en route by the Indians. Spending the first winter on the present site of the city of Dallas, in Polk county, Mr. Currier enlisted the next year in the United States service, joining Capt. John Owens' company in the regiment organized December 31, 1847, in East Portland, by Colonel Gilliam. Taking an active part in the Cayuse war, he was in the engagement at Deschutes, on the Columbia river, and at the battle of Wells Spring. Going then to the old Whitman station, where the massacre had taken place, he helped to bury the dead. At the end of six months he received his honorable discharge at Oregon City.

Returning to Benton county, Mr. Currier remained here a short time, in the fall of 1848 going to California, where he was engaged in prospecting and mining until the spring of 1849, when he again took up his residence in Benton county. In 1850 he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, lying about ten miles southwest of Corvallis, in reality buying a squatter's right to the place, and proved up on the same. Marrying very soon afterward, he and his bride began housekeeping in a cabin made of hewed logs. Endowed with true pioneer grit this young couple toiled incessantly, and by their united efforts improved a productive farm. The log house was in course of time replaced by a substantial dwelling house, which still stands, and is in a good state of preservation. Barns and other buildings necessary for successfully carrying on his work were erected, more land was purchased, and in the pursuit of his chosen occupation Mr. Currier has amassed a competency. Of his large farm of one thousand, five hundred and sixty acres, he has eight hundred acres in a good state of cultivation, and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising with excellent pecuniary results.

On August 25, 1850, Mr. Currier married Mariah Foster, who was born in Ohio, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1845. Further history of the Foster family may be found elsewhere in this volume in connection with the sketch of John W. Foster. Four children were born of that union, namely: William A., living in California; Lorena, wife of John Belknap, of California; Manly C., a resident of Lake county, Ore.; and Anna, deceased. Mrs. Mariah (Foster) Currier died on the home farm in 1859. Mr. Currier subsequently married Miss Helena S. Buchanan, who came to Oregon with her parents in 1856. An extended history of the Buchanan family may be found on another page of this biographical work in connection with the sketch of William Buchanan. Mr. and Mrs. Currier became the parents of four children, namely: Elizabeth, who lives at home; John B., deceased; Sarah, living at home; and Evaline, wife of R. W. Scott, who has charge of the old Currier homestead. Politically Mr. Currier was formerly a strong Democrat, but is now classed among the Independents, voting for such measures as he deems most beneficial to the community regardless of party restrictions. While Oregon was yet a territory he served as county commissioner of Benton county, and has held various offices of minor importance. Now, and for the past twenty years, he has been agricultural reporter for the county of Benton. Fraternally he is a member and past master, of Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, F. & A. M.

Richard W. Scott, Mr. Currier's son-in-law, was born in Clackamas county, Ore., near Milwaukie, in 1873. Marrying Miss Evaline Currier in 1900, he has since had charge of the old home farm, which he is managing most successfully, carrying on general farming on an extensive scale. A young man of energy and progress, possessing good executive and business ability, he is meeting with good results in his labors, and is sure to succeed in any and all of his undertakings. He is a member of the local Grange, and a Republican in his political views.

CHRISTOPHER TRACER. In the extreme southeastern portion of Benton county, three miles from the thriving city of Monroe, is to be seen one of the most flourishing, up-to-date farms for which the county is famous. Though comparatively a newcomer to this immediate vicinity, Mr. Tracer has every reason to feel satisfied with the results for the time and effort he has expended in bringing about present conditions. The tract was formerly a part of the old Lawrence donation claim, and at the time Mr. Tracer purchased it was in a wild condition, but as a result of his indefatigable efforts there are today two hundred and fifty acres of his half section in a fine state of cultivation, and here he carries on general farming and stock-raising.

Christopher Tracer is a native of Indiana, born in Warrick county, January 14, 1858, the son of Michael and Margaret (Kinneer) Tracer, the former a native of Germany and the latter a native of the Hoosier state, where her entire life was passed. The father was born in 1837, and while still a child came to America with his parents, who settled in Indiana, there making their permanent home. Until his marriage, which united him with Miss Margaret Kinneer, Michael remained at home, giving his father the benefit of his services. Seven children were born of this marriage, of whom Christopher is the sixth in order of birth, and with the exception of his brother, Ferd, who is a resident of Junction City, Lane county, Ore., all still reside in their native state, Indiana. After the death of his first wife, which occurred in 1868, Mr. Tracer was united with Mrs. Sarah Travser. Three children were born of this union, whose names and residences are as follows: Henry is a resident of Smithfield, Lane county, Ore.; Samuel makes his home in eastern Oregon; and Kinder lives in the vicinity of Monroe. Until 1872 the family home was in Indiana, but in that year the father brought a portion of the family to Oregon, settling in Benton county, in the vicinity of Bruce. Twenty years later, Mrs. Tracer died, after which Mr. Tracer made his home with his son Christopher, who in the meantime had married and settled in a home of his own. Here the father continued to live until his death in August, 1901, at the age of sixty-three years, having been a helpless invalid for the last seven years of his life.

A marriage ceremony performed October 5, 1880, united the destinies of Christopher Tracer and Julia A. Rickard, the latter a daughter of John Rickard. For three years thereafter the young people made their home in the vicinity of Junction City, Lane county, and after a residence of two years near Bruce, Benton county, they finally took up their abode on the old Rickard homestead, and for the following fifteen years that was the scene of their labors. Their residence on their present farm of three hundred and twenty acres dates from 1900, and if past success is any index of future prosperity it is safe to predict that they will remain indefinitely in their present location. The children born of this marriage were four in number, the eldest of whom, Aaron, is deceased, while the others, Letha Mae, Roy and John, are at home with their parents. Educational matters have a friend and co-worker in Mr. Tracer, and in the capacity of school clerk he is doing all that lies in his power to elevate the standard of education in his vicinity. His religious interests are centered in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, with which his family is also identified. Politically Mr. Tracer is a Democrat, and fraternally he holds membership with the Woodmen of the World.

GIDEON C. MILLETT. Were one inclined to doubt the reliability of glowing stock-raising accounts in Lane county, that doubt would be removed by inspection of the large farm of Gideon C. Millett, one of the most extensive and successful stockmen around Junction City. After talking with this energetic and practical stock-raiser one becomes inspired with his enthusiasm, and his faith in the superiority of Poland-China hogs, Shorthorn cattle and Shropshire sheep, having been the largest breeder of thoroughbreds in Lane county. It is to the wise selection of these two standard breeds that he owes his surprising good fortune, many years of experience having convinced him that for all-around purposes they are the most to be desired. Until recently Mr. Millett owned sixteen hundred acres of land, but has lately relieved himself of an enormous responsibility by disposing of some of it. The farm was purchased on the installment plan, and has much more than paid for itself, the owner estimating that he has put at least $65,000 into it. This is an unusually creditable showing, for at the start of his career he was practically without money or influence, and has accomplished it all through the exercise of strong and forceful intelligence. In 1902 he handled sixteen hundred Poland-China hogs and as many Shorthorn cattle.

In his youth Mr. Millett would have had a precarious existence had not a prosperous farmer in Iowa adopted him after the death of his mother. He was two years old when this catastrophe overcame him, having been born in Waterloo, Iowa, March 9, 1868. When he was five years old Mr. R. Millett, his foster-father, brought his family to Benton county, Ore., remained there until 1875, and then moved to Junction City, where the lad attended the public schools for a couple of years. Mr. Millett (the elder) purchased the farm now owned by the younger man in 1881, and which at the time consisted of five hundred acres. When Gideon C. was twenty-three years old he took possession of this farm, made arrangements to pay according to the terms of a contract, and one of the satisfactions of his life is that he has been able to meet this obligation fairly, and with satisfaction to all concerned. He has taken an active part in promoting education, good roads, and general improvements in Lane county, and has always identified himself with Republican politics. Possessed of tact, geniality and other social traits, he is a welcome visitor at the Independent Order of Odd Fellows' lodge, representing the same at the state grand lodge in 1900. Mr. Millett is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Rebekahs. He is now perfecting plans to retire from active participation in business and will probably make his home in Eugene. He is the second largest stockholder in the Junction City Hotel Company, of which he is a director, besides owning other property of considerable value. Mr. Millett lives one mile east of Junction City, and in the community is regarded as a man in whom honor, sound business judgment, and unquestioned success are happily blended.

JACOB SHILLING. Not far from the village of Munkers, Linn county, may be seen the well cultivated farm of Jacob Shilling, a tract of one hundred and forty-two acres, formerly a part of the old Riley Thorp donation claim. His residence here dates from the year 1873, since which time he has carried on general farming, although of late he has resigned the more arduous work to younger hands, his son doing the practical work, although he still superintends the same. One hundred and fifteen acres are under cultivation, the balance in grubs and an orchard.

A native of Wayne county, Ohio, born September 16, 1835, Jacob Shilling is a son of Jacob and Margaret (Falgon) Shilling, both natives of the Keystone state, the former born in Franklin county, July 11, 1801, and the latter in Mercer county, in 1804. The father was of German descent, the first of the family to emigrate to this country, coming with a colony and making settlement in Pennsylvania. Growing to manhood in the latter state, he subsequently removed to Ohio, but did not go alone, as in the meantime he had married Miss Margaret Falgon, who, as his wife, accompanied him. After engaging in agriculture in Wayne county, that state, for a few years, in 1839 the parents removed to Putnam county, Ind., which was the scene of the family life for the following twelve years. It was in the latter state, in 1851, that the father's death occurred, and the same year the mother removed with her children to Marion county, Iowa. She survived her husband twenty-seven years, passing away in Iowa in 1878.

There were ten children in the family, seven sons and three daughters, and after the father's death the support of the mother and younger children devolved upon the older ones. Jacob was the sixth in order of birth, and at his father's death was about sixteen years of age. His early education was received in the common schools of Indiana and Iowa, but, as early in life it became necessary for him to seek means of self support, he chose the carpenter's trade as promising the most satisfactory remuneration, and at once began to learn it in all its details. In 1860 he was united in marriage with Miss Mary E. Burch, a native of Kentucky, born near Glasgow, February 23, 1841. Five children blessed this marriage, as follows: Sophronia, wife of J. T. Funk, of Munkers; Robert, who died in infancy; C. C., a resident of Heppner, Ore.; Hezekiah, at home; and Alfred, also a resident of Heppner.

After his marriage Mr. Shilling abandoned work at his trade and purchased a farm in Marion county, Iowa, which he tilled until the year 1871, which, as previously stated, marked his advent in the far west. From Tehama, Cal., which was his first stopping place upon reaching the west, he went by team to Benton county, Ore., but two years later came to Linn county. Pleased with the outlook, he felt sufficient confidence in the future of the county to make it his permanent residence, and forthwith purchased the farm on which he now resides. In all local affairs he takes an intelligent interest, and gives his support to the Democratic party. His services in a public capacity have been made manifest in his work as road supervisor and as school director. He affiliates with the First Day Adventists.

DAVID CHARLES ROSE. One of the most enterprising, energetic and prosperous business men of Corvallis is D. C. Rose, a well known cigar manufacturer, who has been identified with the manufacturing interests of this city for upwards of a score of years. Although of foreign birth, Mr. Rose has as great love for his adopted country and its institutions as for the Fatherland, and in the time of its great peril, during the strenuous times of the Civil war, he fought with the same zeal that fired the patriotism of its native-born citizens.

A native of Wurtemberg, Germany, Mr. Rose was born about three miles from the city of Stuttgart, in 1842. His father, the late David Rose, emigrated, in 1847, from Wurtemberg to the United States, with his family. He sailed to Galveston, intending to locate in Texas, but finding the country too new, he proceeded to New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers to Kentucky, settling in Campbell county, and buying a ranch near Newport, on which he resided until his death, prior to the war. Of his union with Anna M. Schindelin, who died in Kentucky, seven children were born, of whom three survive, one being a resident of Kentucky, and the other two of Oregon, D. C. living in Corvallis, and E. W. in Chitwood.

With but limited school advantages, D. C. Rose was reared on the home plantation near Newport, living there until fifteen years old, when he went to Newport, where he remained until the breaking out of the Civil war. Early in 1861 he joined Taylor's Guards, later enlisting in the Fourth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry for a term of three months, during which time he was on guard duty most of the entire period. After being mustered out of service, Mr. Rose enlisted in the Fifty-second Ohio Infantry, but as that regiment did not fill up he joined the Seventy-first Ohio Infantry as a private, and with his companions was sent to Paducah, Ky., to join Sherman's army, thence going up the Tennessee river to Pittsburg Landing, at which battle he was shot through the right leg, the ball entering just below the knee. Being incapacitated for further duty for a time, he was sent home on a furlough, and being anxious for something to do, he then began learning the trade of a cigarmaker. Being subsequently ordered to report at Camp Dennison, Ohio, he was from there sent to a camp near Columbus, where the officer in charge recommended that he be discharged on account of his wound. Completing his trade in December, 1863, Mr. Rose worked at it in Newport for awhile, and then with a friend went to New York city, where his companion soon enlisted as a musician in the band of the Eighteenth regulars, leaving him alone. He, therefore, in 1864, enlisted in the One Hundred and Sixth New York Volunteer Infantry, receiving a bounty of $700, but the examining surgeon rejected him; he tried again, that time being accepted, but losing $200 of his bounty, it costing him that sum to get in. With his regiment he went to Winchester, thence to the front at Petersburg, where the peak of his cap was shot off, down through Richmond, and on to Appomattox, being present at the surrender of Lee. He afterwards took part in the grand review at Washington, D. C., and received his honorable discharge at Ogdensburg, N. Y., July 5, 1865.

Returning to Newport, Ky., he remained until 1866, when he removed to Lawrenceburg, Ind. Two years later Mr. Rose located in Kansas City, Mo., going from there to Ellsworth county, Kans., where he was engaged in general farming northeast of the town of Ellsworth for twelve years, working also a part of the time at his trade, in Salina. Disposing of his farm and stock in the fall of 1882, he came to Oregon, establishing himself at his trade in Portland, at the same time owning a farm in Cornelius, which he sold in a few months at an advantage. In January, 1883, Mr. Rose transferred his residence and business to Corvallis, where he has since been engaged in the manufacture of cigars, for a time having had his brother, E. W. Rose, as a partner. He aims to make good cigars only, among his brands that are most popular being the "Battle Ship Oregon," "Speckled Trout," "Victor Dewey," "Nickle Leader" and "Up to Date."

Mr. Rose has invested to some extent in real estate, owning a small farm of twenty-five acres, on which is a fine orchard of cherry, pear and prune trees, which yield good crops each season. Politically he is a zealous advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and is now serving his second term as a member of the city council. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of Pythias; to the Ellsworth Post, No. 19, G. A. R.; and is one of the board of trustees of the Oregon Fire Relief Association.

While living in Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. Rose formed the acquaintance of Miss Loretta M. Berry, to whom he was united in marriage soon after the close of the war, their nuptials being celebrated at Hartwick, Vt., in September, 1865. She was born in New Hampshire, and died, at Corvallis, March 2, 1894, leaving five children, namely: Oliver, a machinist in Portland, Ore.; Lottie E., of Portland; George C., a farmer, in Condon, Ore.; Edward, in partnership with his father, is junior member of the firm of D. C. Ross & Son, at Corvallis; and Daisy A. Mr. Rose married for his second wife Mrs. Georgia (Berry) Stevens, of Corvallis, who was born in New Hampshire, a sister of his first wife.

DANIEL WILLIAM PRICHARD. When Daniel William Prichard undertook to learn the carpenter's trade under Eben Jones in Judson, Minn., more than a quarter of a century ago, he supposedly did not aspire to becoming one of the most expert woodwork instructors on the Pacific coast. Yet such he is today, and as head of the woodwork department of the Oregon Agricultural College, at Corvallis, he moulded the abilities and stimulated the aspirations of many hundred pupils, the membership of the class having increased from thirty, which constituted the class in 1894, to about a hundred in 1903, when he severed his connection with the college by resigning on September 1.

As his name implies, Mr. Prichard is of Welsh extraction, and his father, R. E., is the founder of the family in America. The elder Prichard was born in Carmarfon, Wales, and in his native land learned the tailor's trade. Coming to America at an early day, he located at Turin, N. Y., where he plied his trade, and where his son, Daniel William, was born October 5, 1856. In 1862 he removed to Waukesha, Wis., but, not finding a profitable trade, located the following year in Blue Earth county, Minn., where he engaged in farming for a time, but is now living at Sioux Falls, S. D. His wife, formerly Margaret Williams, was also born in Wales, a daughter of Daniel Williams, who emigrated to America and located on a farm in New York state. Mrs. Prichard, who died in South Dakota, was the mother of five sons and one daughter, all of whom are living, the talented instructor of Corvallis being the second child. One of the sons, Rev. E. R. Prichard, is pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Aberdeen, Wash.

For the greater part of his youth Daniel Prichard lived on the Minnesota farm, and at the same time attended the public schools of his neighborhood. At the age of eighteen he apprenticed to Eben Jones as heretofore stated, and in 1880 left a fair business in Judson, Minn., and took up his residence in South Dakota, thereafter contracting and building in Howard, Miner county. He also homesteaded a claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Howard, and while living there combined farming and building with considerable profit. In 1891 he sold his land and came to Oregon, locating in Corvallis, where he worked at his trade until appointed to the position of head of the department of woodwork in the Oregon Agricultural College. The department is amply equipped for practical work in the large mechanics' hall, and as an adjunct to one of the greatest developing enterprises of the state of Oregon is unsurpassed.

The Prichard household consists of Mrs. Prichard, formerly Jennie Jones, a native of New York state, and seven children. Of the children, Minerva, the oldest daughter, is the wife of Mr. Ward, of Oregon City; Everett is a student at the Oregon Agricultural College; Mary; Llewellyn; Ella; Ennis; and Edwin. Personally, Mr. Prichard is popular in Corvallis and is fraternally associated with the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, and the Lions. He is a Republican in politics, and finds a religious home in the Presbyterian Church, of which he is a deacon.

MINER M. SWICK. Following upon a career of particular merit as a builder and contractor, lumber merchant and cattle-dealer, Miner M. Swick is engaged in extensive farming enterprises on the old Stewart donation claim, he being a son-in-law of that well known and well remembered pioneer, John Stewart. Mr. Swick was born in Hillsdale, Mich., a son of Miner M. and Louise Swick, the former being a native of Seneca county, N. Y.; and grandson of a soldier who was wounded and died in the war of 1812.

Miner Swick was a very early settler in Hillsdale, Mich., near which town he owned and operated a farm with considerable success. He was an ambitious man, and, convinced of the larger opportunities of the far west, outfitted for crossing the plains in 1853. On this long and perilous journey he was accompanied by his wife and four boys, and he arrived in Oregon City September 29, 1853. For three years he lived on the French prairie, or rather made that the headquarters for his family, for he himself spent about eighteen months in the mines in California. Returning at the end of that time he brought with him $1,800, not a bad showing; and with this he bought a farm near Dayton, which continued to be his home for the remainder of his life. His wife, Louise (Latourette) Swick, was born in Tompkins county, N. Y., a daughter of David Latourette, who came from France and practiced his art of weaving in Tompkins county, N. Y. Mrs. Swick died on the old Oregon home, leaving behind her the four boys with whom she had crossed the plains. Of these, Tunis is engaged in the sheep business in Grant county; Miner is the manager of the Stewart farm; Lyman is engaged in mining in Grant county; and Benjamin F. is a practicing physician of Dayton.

In his youth Miner M. Swick learned the carpenter's trade, and, beginning with 1857, contracted and built for many years in Corvallis. He then engaged in a planing-mill business, manufacturing sash, doors and other builders' supplies, and in 1872 located in eastern Oregon, where he engaged in the cattle business for twelve years. Returning to Corvallis he assumed charge of the broad acres left the heirs of John Stewart, and in the managing of which he is showing a keen knowledge of progressive and scientific farming. Mr. Swick possesses fine business ability, and has personal characteristics which inspire confidence, and retain indefinitely the regard and good will of many friends.

JUDGE JOHN BURNETT. Prominent among those who for many years sustained the prestige of bench and bar in Oregon was Judge John Burnett, a pioneer of '49, and a resident of Corvallis for nearly half a century. This very capable practitioner was born in Pike county, Mo., July 4, 1831, and at an early age lost his father, Capt. Frank Burnett, for many years engaged in the steamboat business on the Mississippi river. Captain Burnett was born in Kentucky, as was also his wife, Jane Johnson, the latter of whom died in Illinois.

The youth of Judge Burnett was characterized by a hard struggle for existence, for in the absence of his father the family support fell largely on his shoulders. He was the second of a large family of children, and he lived for years on the family farm, engaging then as a clerk in a store and on different steamboats. As may be imagined, his education was acquired under difficulties, for work absorbed his entire attention, and little time remained even for slight recreation. Fortunately he was ambitious and studious, and with his earnings was finally enabled to attend not only the public schools, but to take a course at an academy. In 1849 he came to the coast by way of the plains, and a year later returned east via Panama, the following year again visiting California, where he prospected and mined. In 1858 he had occasion to bring a drove of horses across the mountains to the Willamette valley, and after disposing of them looked around him a bit and was most favorably impressed with the people and country. Having determined to remain, he engaged in the butchering business in Corvallis, and while thus employed improved his spare time in studying law, a consummation long desired and ardently planned for. His guides in the first principles of law were Judge Thayer and Colonel Kelsay, and he was admitted to the bar in 1860, thereafter devoting his life not only to an increasing practice, but to the satisfactory filling of many important responsibilities.

In 1865 Judge Burnett was elected a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket, and beginning with 1870 he served for four years as judge of Benton county, in 1874 being elected associate justice of the supreme court of the state. His term as judge having expired in 1876, he again resumed practice, and two years later was elected state senator from Benton county, and served as chairman of the judiciary committee in the senate. In 1882 he was appointed judge of the second judicial district by Governor Thayer, to fill out the unexpired term of Judge Watson. In May, 1891, he was elected mayor of Corvallis, serving for two terms, and he was again elected to the same position in October, 1899, serving for two years. As chief executive he evinced the same regard for the best interests of his fellow townsmen as characterized his attitude towards his clients in private practice, and his services were invariably accompanied by reforms and practical improvements.

As relaxation from professional and public cares Judge Burnett engaged in general farming and horticulture, and the farm upon which he expended so much care and study, and where he beguiled so many pleasant hours, is still owned by his wife. It consists of one hundred and ten acres, under fine cultivation, twenty-five acres of which are devoted to prune culture. Although a large and splendidly proportioned man, strong and healthy apparently, the judge readily succumbed to heart disease, superinduced by an attack of grip, his death occurring March 1, 1901. He was genial and pleasant in manner, was approachable to all, and was particularly devoted to his family. As a jurist his rulings were equitable and just, and were rarely questioned, it being universally felt that wisdom, common sense and a profound knowledge of law dictated his every decision.

June 12, 1859, Judge Burnett married Martha Hinton, who was born in Missouri, September 28, 1838, and is a daughter of Hon. Roland B. Hinton, a native of Franklin county, Mo. The paternal grandfather, Clayton B. Hinton, the emigrating member of the family, located in Oregon, married Sarah Richardson, a native of Kentucky, and thereafter engaged in farming in Franklin county, Mo., of which he was an early settler. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and in 1852 crossed the plains with ox-teams, locating on a donation claim in Benton county, Ore., where he died in 1855. His son, Hon. Roland B. Hinton, was also a farmer in Franklin county, Mo., and he preceded his father across the plains in 1846, being accompanied by his wife, formerly Elizabeth Brammel, born on the James river, Virginia, a daughter of Thomas Brammel, who located in Franklin county, Mo., and died on a farm there. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hinton in Missouri, and these were numbered among the little party that sought a home in the far northwest, and were willing to brave danger and deprivation to accomplish their mission. They were six months on the way, from April to October, and after a year spent in Yamhill county, Ore., they located on a claim eighteen miles south of Corvallis in Benton county, where Mr. Hinton built a little blacksmith shop, and combined blacksmithing and farming. Here he resided until 1869, when he located in the vicinity of Newport, where, after a short time, he was obliged to give up farming owing to impaired eyesight. For the remainder of his life he lived with his son, in time becoming totally blind, a great affliction for so ambitious a man, and one so thoroughly interested in the happenings of the outside world. In a way he was quite a politician, and unswervingly devoted to the Democratic party, many positions of trust and responsibility coming to him. For a term he represented his county in the legislature, and he was postmaster of Starr's Point for many years, the office now being Monroe.

Mrs. Burnett was educated in Benton county, primarily in the little log school-house near her home, which employed a teacher for three months during the winter season. Since her husband's death she has continued to reside in this city, where she owns the beautiful home, and also the fine and substantial business block erected by her husband.

She is a member of the Congregational Church, and is a member of the Eastern Star and the Pioneer Association. Mrs. Burnett is the mother of five children, the order of their birth being as follows: Emma Alice, the deceased wife of Mr. H. W. Keese, who left two children, Archie and John Burnett Keese; Ida B., wife of Thomas Callahan, who is a graduate of the Agricultural College, and is now a teacher of English; Martha, the wife of R. H. Huston, a hardware merchant of Corvallis, and the mother of one child, Helen; Brady F., a graduate of the Agricultural College, a member of the bar, and at present clerk in the census department at Washington, D. C. Brady F. Burnett served in the Spanish-American war, and was in the Philippines in Company M, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry, being wounded at the battle of Malabon, March 25, 1899. After recovering he left the hospital and joined his regiment, remaining with it until the general mustering out. Bruce Burnett, the youngest son in the family, is engaged in farming in southern Oregon. Mrs. Burnett is a woman of great refinement, and her many sterling and amiable characteristics have endeared her to a host of friends.

J. H. WILSON is engaged in the practice of law in Corvallis. He was born August 31, 1863, in the city which is still his home, and is a son of Bushrod and Priscilla Wilson, whose sketch is given elsewhere. He obtained his education in the public schools, where he pursued his studies for a few years and then spent a year in the old Corvallis College. He is, however, largely a self-educated man and while he is today regarded as a gentleman of scholarly attainments and broad intellectuality, he owes this reputation to what he has accomplished for himself. In early life he entered the civil engineering department of the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company and was connected with the construction department until the road was completed, covering a period of about five years. He then entered the office of the county clerk, serving as deputy under his father for six years. From his boyhood he was interested in the study of law and he read to a greater or less extent while engaged in railroad work and in his clerical duties in the office of county clerk, his reading being directed by Colonel Kelsay. As the years passed, his knowledge of the principles of jurisprudence was thus broadened and, having been admitted to the bar about October, 1892, he began practice in Corvallis, where he has since maintained his law office. A distinctively representative clientele is now accorded him, and he has been connected with much of the important litigation tried in the courts of his district during the past decade.

Mr. Wilson was married in Corvallis to Miss Effie M. Handy, who was born in Afton, N. Y. Her mother died in the Empire state, but the father, Arden K. Handy, removed with the family to Oregon and died in this state in 1898. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson now have two small children. Mr. Wilson was made a Mason in Corvallis Lodge, No. 14, F. & A. M., of which he is now a past master. He is also a past high priest of Ferguson Chapter, No. 5, R. A. M., and is connected with the Eastern Star, Woodmen of the World, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In politics he has always been a Republican and he is a member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he served as elder for twelve years. He prepares his cases with great fairness and precision, has a mind strongly analytical and in argument he is forceful, his deductions following in logical sequence.

THOMAS HENRY CRAWFORD, A. M., has been actively identified with the educational interests of this section of Oregon for fully four decades, and has taken pleasure in witnessing and assisting the development of our school system from the time when the three "R's" were its only essentials until the present high plane of instruction has been reached. Obtaining his knowledge of the higher branches of learning in Oregon, he has since been associated with some of its more important schools and universities as a teacher, and is now connected with the Oregon Agricultural College as head of the department of commerce, and with its official management as clerk and purchasing agent.

Of substantial Scotch-Irish ancestry, Professor Crawford was born June 24, 1840, at Clarksburg, Ind., a son of the late Dr. Robert H. Crawford. His grandfather, Andrew Crawford, was born in Londonderry, Ireland, a son of Robert Crawford, who emigrated from Londonderry to America in 1770, settling in South Carolina. Andrew, then but a year old, was there reared to agricultural pursuits, and when becoming of age, located, as a farmer, in Abbeville District. Robert H. Crawford, the professor's father, was born in South Carolina, in 1808, and there acquired his early education. He subsequently attended Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio, later being graduated, in 1837, from the Ohio Medical College, at Cincinnati, with the degree of M. D. The ensuing fifteen years he practiced medicine at Clarksburg, Ind., removing from there in 1852 to Oregon, bringing with him his wife and four children, crossing the plains with ox-teams, from St. Joseph, Mo., following the old overland trail, and being seven months on the road. Locating in Linn county, he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres at the foothills, and there improved a good estate, at the same time practicing medicine. Disposing of his farm in 1870, Dr. Crawford settled in Brownsville, where he continued the practice of his profession until his death, at the age of eighty-two years, in 1890. He was very prominent in public and religious matters, serving as state senator from Linn county from 1866 until 1874, and being one of the prime movers in uniting the Associated Presbyterians and the members of the Associate Reform Church into one religious denomination, the organization being called the United Presbyterian Church. The meeting at which this organization was completed, was held, about 1854, near the home of Dr. Crawford, his father-in-law, Thomas Henry, being one of the elders at that time. Dr. Crawford married Elizabeth M. Henry, a native of Kentucky, and a daughter of Thomas Henry, who removed from Pennsylvania to Jessamine, Ky., thence to Rush county, Ind., where he engaged in farming for a number of years. In 1852, in the company of which Dr. Crawford was captain, Mr. Henry came to Linn county, Ore., with his family, where he carried on farming until his death, in 1865, aged seventy-seven years. Mrs. Henry, whose maiden name was Margaret Scott, survived him, dying in 1870, aged eighty years. Mrs. Crawford died in 1897, aged eighty-two years. Of the union of Dr. and Mrs. Crawford, five children were born, namely: Thomas Henry; Andrew, who died in 1859; Robert, a prominent horseman, died in 1900, at San Francisco, Cal., while on his way home from the Philippine Islands, where he had been on government service; Mrs. Lizzie Smith, of Portland, Ore.; and Mrs. Monrovia Starr, of Benton county.

Coming with his parents to Oregon in 1852, Thomas H. Crawford here continued his studies in the district school, later, in 1859, entering Willamette University, at Salem, where he worked his way through college, being graduated in 1863, with the degree of A. B. Beginning his professional career in Sublimity, Ore., he taught there three years, being afterward principal of the public schools in Salem eighteen months. Going then to the Portland Academy and Female Seminary, he was professor of mathematics for two and one-half years, and then principal of what is now the Atkinson school until 1872. The following four years he was professor of natural science at the Willamette University. Returning to Portland, he served as principal of the old Central school one year, then as city superintendent of schools for eleven years, after which he had charge of the Park school as principal for six years. From 1894 until 1896, Professor Crawford was principal of the Woodstock schools, and was then connected with the old Portland University for a short time, leaving there in 1897, when he was appointed clerk and purchasing agent at the Oregon Agricultural College, and later took charge of the literary commerce course.

Professor Crawford married first, at Salem, Ore., in July, 1864, Emily B. Crandall, a native of Wisconsin, who came to Oregon with her parents in 1852, and settled near Silverton. She died in August, 1882. Four children were born of their union, three of whom, Maude, Merton and Pearl, died in Salem in 1875, while the youngest child, Ruby, is now the wife of Henry McConnell, of Salem, and has one child, Ruth McConnell. At Portland, in 1891, Professor Crawford married for his second wife, Miss Eva Grounds, who was born in Oregon, a daughter of Capt. Brazil Grounds, who removed from his native state, North Carolina, to Illinois, thence, in 1845, to Oregon, becoming captain of a steamboat on the Columbia river.

Professor Crawford is prominently identified with several fraternal organizations, belonging to Willamette Lodge No. 1, F. & A. M., of which he is past master; to Portland Chapter, No. 3, R. A. M.; to Oregon Commandery No.

1, K. T.; to Al Kader Temple, N. M. S.; to Has-salo Lodge, I. O. O. F.; to Ellison Encampment, I. O. O. F., No. 1, of Portland; and is a past grand representative for Oregon, having represented his state grand lodge at the sovereign Grand Lodge at Indianapolis, Ind., in 1875. He is also a member of the state and county teachers' association; and is a member of the State Pioneer Association; and of the State Historical Association. Politically he is a staunch supporter of the Republican party.

JOHN RICKARD. No introduction is necessary to place the career of John Rickard before the people of Benton county, for his name has been a household word for many years, and carries with it an idea of substantiality and worth. Tracing his ancestry back to the very early days of North Carolina, his family was honored by the noble life of his paternal grandfather, who espoused the cause of the down-trodden colonies, and followed the fortunes of the father of his country on most of the great battlefields of the Revolution. His father, Peter, a native of North Carolina, was reared on a plantation, and in his youth learned the blacksmith's trade, to which he devoted many years of his life. He married Susan Kepley, a native daughter of North Carolina, and in 1835 took his family to Indiana, where the remaining years of his life were spent. Five of the ten children born into his family are living, Casper and Peter being natives of Junction City, while Crissie is the widow of Henry Beck of Smithfield, and Bettie is the wife of John Beck of Indiana. Peter Rickard was sixty-eight years of age at the time of his death, and was survived by his wife, who subsequently removed from Indiana to Oregon, and died at the home of her son, John, at the age of seventy-nine years.

While Peter Rickard was still living in North Carolina, his son, John, was born November 7, 1827, and was seven years of age when the overland journey was made to Indiana. As opportunity afforded he attended the little log school-house in the neighborhood of his father's farm, and remained at home until his marriage with Susanna Kime, a native daughter of the Hoosier state. Continuing to farm until 1853, he outfitted for crossing the plains in the regulation way, and it is not recorded that he met with any unusual experiences while wending his way towards the setting sun. The first winter in Oregon was spent near Eugene, Lane county, and in the spring of 1854 he came to Benton county and took up a donation claim of two hundred and ninety acres twelve miles south of Corvallis, on the old Territorial road. It is pleasant to note the ease with which he adapted himself to the crude conditions then existing in the county, and how he slowly but surely worked his way to the front among the successful and influential upbuilders of his district. His entire tract consists of nine hundred acres, two hundred and forty of which are over in Lane county, but not separated from the original purchase. That the improvements are modern, the home and surroundings in accord with progressive ideas, goes without saying, and indeed the Rickard farm is one of the finest and most valuable in Benton county. Many years of experience have taught Mr. Rickard the most practical methods of conducting his general farming and stock-raising, and that his methods are successful is apparent to all who visit his home and accept his hospitality.

A Democrat in political affiliation, Mr. Rickard has been a school director for the past eighteen years, and has materially advanced the cause of education in his neighborhood during that time. He is a member, a regular attendant, and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and since joining the organization as a young man has contributed many hundreds of dollars towards its support. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons. Delphi, the oldest of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Rickard, died on the way across the plains; Peter is a farmer in Benton county; Julian is the wife of Christopher Tracer of Monroe; Michael is engaged in farming in Linn county; Catherine is the wife of John Stearns of Linn county; John H. is a farmer of Linn county; Bertha is the wife of Rube Taylor of the vicinity of Bruce; James, Daniel and Mary B. are deceased. Mr. Rickard is a remarkably upright and sincere man, of strong character and purpose, and of exceptionally fine mental and physical fiber.

MARGARET COMSTOCK SNELL, M. D. Deeply interested in all branches of domestic science and hygiene, Dr. Snell is doing a much-needed work, through her teachings and lectures, in bringing to public notice the fact that much of the sickness and general ill health prevailing throughout the country is largely due to the use of improperly prepared food, illy ventilated living apartments, and unsanitary conditions of the dwelling houses, and their environments. By instructing the present generation as to methods to be used in bettering these conditions, the doctor bases her hope for succeeding generations of a people whose physical and mental status shall be far improved, and the average years of life on earth be greatly increased. Since 1889 she has been connected with the Oregon Agricultural College, holding the chair of household science and hygiene since its establishment.

Of English ancestry, Margaret C. Snell was born near Livingston, N. Y., a daughter of Richard Snell, and a granddaughter of William Snell, who emigrated from England to America with his family, and settled in Pennsylvania, where he spent his remaining days. Richard Snell left Yorkshire, England, his birthplace, when a boy of six years, coming with his parents to the United States. Learning the trade of a civil engineer when a young man, he worked at it first in Canada, afterward assisting in the survey of the Erie canal. Subsequently changing his occupation, he was engaged in farming for a while in New York state, going from there to Ontario, where he continued in the lumber business three years. Removing then to Iowa, he took up land near Oskaloosa, where he improved a good farm. On retiring from active pursuits, he located in Oakland, Cal., living there until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Margaret Comstock, was born in Adrian, Mich., and died in New York state, when a comparatively young woman, having borne her husband eight children.

Receiving her early education in her native state, Margaret C. Snell, on removing to Iowa, entered Center Grove Academy, after which she spent several years at Grinnell College, in Grinnell, Iowa. From 1872 until 1875 she taught school in Iowa City, going from there to Benicia, Cal., where three of her sisters had then opened Snell Seminary, in which she was a teacher for three years. The enterprising and energetic sisters, in 1878, bought property in Oakland, Cal., and having established a seminary there, she continued with them a number of years. The seminary, which has lost none of its former prestige, is now located at Berkeley, Cal. In 1883 Miss Snell, who had previously read medicine, entered the Boston University Medical School, from which she was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1886. Returning to Oakland, Cal., she practiced medicine there for a year, but being imbued with the idea that the higher and broader function of medical lore was to teach people how to keep well, rather than to cure disease, Dr. Snell gladly accepted the call to the Oregon Agricultural College, in 1888, and came here in 1889, when she opened the department of domestic science and hygiene, of which she has since had full charge. Enterprising and progressive in her methods, she is never afraid to adopt new ideas, keeping abreast with the foremost hygienists of the day, rendering her particular department one of the most useful and efficient in the institution. Beginning with forty pupils, she has met with great success in her labors, and has now one hundred and fifty students under her charge. In addition to teaching, she is widely known as a lecturer throughout the state, her talks on domestic science being interesting and instructive to all.

Politically Dr. Snell is a Republican, and fraternally she belongs to the Grange. She also belongs to the Corvallis Improvement Society, and is a member of the Episcopal Church.

DAVID G. MCFARLAND. The town of Cottage Grove, Lane county, Ore., has cause to know the name of David G. McFarland, for it is from the donation claim of the father that the son laid out one of the first additions to the city, although previous to his death the father had laid out several city lots, about forty or forty-five acres in the heart of the city being once the property of the family of McFarlands. Four different divisions have subsequently been added, until Mr. McFarland has but two hundred and sixty acres of the original land given to him from the six hundred and forty acres which composed that taken up by James McFarland in 1853. The home farm had been divided between the two brothers, David G. and James Henry.

The father of Mr. McFarland was James, born February 13, 1807, in North Carolina, and as a young man he located in Cooper county, Mo., from which he emigrated in the spring of 1850, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and after a journey of six months arriving in Linn county. He first located in Albany, and in the spring of 1853 he came to the present site of Cottage Grove and took up a claim. Here he died in 1885, at the age of seventy-nine years. He was one of the strong men of the new land, in his political convictions following the lead of the old Whigs and becoming a staunch and active Republican. His wife was formerly Mary Jones, who was born March 18, 1811, and died in September, 1872, in this location. She was the mother of eight children, two sons and six daughters, two of the latter being now deceased.

David G. McFarland was born in Cooper county, Mo., October 23, 1846, the fifth of this family of children, and his education was received entirely in the schools of Oregon, as he was but four years old when the journey was made across the plains. He worked for his father until 1875, when the land was given to the two sons, who have since had it in their control. The two hundred and sixty acres of Mr. McFarland which adjoin the city on the north are entirely pasture land, and he is now engaged in the raising of cattle, horses, goats and sheep. He is also interested in mining ventures, owning a one-third interest in the Peek-a-boo and the Nevada, both located in the Bohemia mining district, and is also a director in the corporation which manages the Glendale Mining enterprises. As would be supposed, he is always interested in the advancement of the city, and was one of the promoters of the water system sold to the town in 1901. In addition to the property already mentioned Mr. McFarland has built a handsome residence here in the city and also owns about forty lots, which are quite valuable.

Fraternally Mr. McFarland is a member of the Masonic Blue Lodge No. 51, of Cottage Grove, and politically he follows the convictions of his father, being a strong Republican, and in the interests of his party he has served as school director.

OREGON AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

One of the wisest and most decisive educational movements in the history of our country is that which resulted in the organization of the State Agricultural College. While the Civil war was still in progress, in 1862, congress passed the Morrill act, which gave the impulse to this great educational movement. That act provided land grants for each state that would establish educational institutions according to its provisions, and, practically, all the states of the Union have availed themselves of its provisions.

Ninety thousand acres of land were apportioned to Oregon, and on October 9, 1862, the Oregon Legislative Assembly accepted the provisions of the congressional law. Six years later the legislature appointed commissioners to locate the land, and as no state college had then been established voted an annual appropriation toward supporting Corvallis College, in Benton county, a school controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church South. When, in 1885, the fund derived from the sale of the land grants became large enough to warrant it in so doing, the state obtained control of the appropriation, the church willingly relinquishing its claim upon it, a board of regents was appointed, and given full power to establish an agricultural college.

Selecting thirty-five acres of land in Corvallis, arrangements were soon made for the erection of a suitable building, and in the summer of 1887 the corner-stone of the first building of the State Agricultural College was laid by the governor. During that year, congress, by the passage of the Hatch bill, provided for the establishment in each of the states and territories of an agricultural experiment station, an annual sum of $15,000 being allowed for experiment work in Oregon. Three years afterwards, August 30, 1890, congress passed the second Morrill act providing that $15,000 should be paid to each land grant college that year, and that amount should be increased by the sum of $1,000 a year for ten years, after that time being $25,000 each year.

Finely located in the picturesque city of Corvallis, and beginning its life under the most favorable auspices, the Agricultural College of Oregon was well patronized from the first, and soon outgrew its original environments. Additional land was appropriated to its use, the grounds now comprising nearly two hundred acres, about forty acres being devoted to the campus, which is artistically laid out, and embellished with trees, shrubbery, and beautiful gardens. The grounds for military drill and athletic sports are on an adjacent tract lately added to the original campus. On the college farm of nearly one hundred and fifty acres are all the necessary buildings, tools, machinery and stock for carrying on agricultural labor after the most approved methods, giving to students practical illustrations of each branch of farming. A variety of farm crops, fruit and berries are raised, experiments being given in agriculture, floriculture and horticulture.

As the college grew, new buildings were demanded, and many have been added. The offices of the president, registrar and clerk of the college, the library, chapel, and several class-rooms are in the administration building. Near this structure is the assay building, containing laboratories that are fully equipped for the work of assaying, and studying mineralogy. Near the northwestern corner of the campus is the pharmacy building, two stories in height, with laboratories and lecture room on the first floor, and rooms for study on the second floor. The classes in physical culture, and the drill hall for the cadets, may be found in the gymnasium and armory, a large building of wood and stone, 70x120 feet. North of the administration building, is the horticultural building, adjoining which are large and well filled greenhouses, containing a large collection of choice plants.

One of the most notable buildings on the campus is Agricultural Hall, a beautiful stone structure, three stories in height, erected at a cost of $45,000. In this are a large assembly hall, laboratories and class rooms for the departments of agriculture, horticulture, botany, chemistry, zoology, entomology and bacteriology, and the offices of the director of the experiment station. In Mechanical Hall are the machine shops, printing office, the physical laboratory, several recitation rooms, and the office of the professor of mechanical engineering, these occupying the first floor. On the second floor are located the departments of art, mathematics and civil engineering. The power house, a brick building, is equipped with a forty-five horsepower engine, and two electric generators, each of two hundred light capacity, and contains, also, the blacksmith shop, with its twenty forges. The heating plant, made of brick and stone, is furnished with the most modern approved appliances for heating.

Nothing is omitted that will make student life at the college pleasant and profitable. The physical welfare of the pupils is assured by the officers, Cauthorn Hall, named in honor of Senator Thomas Cauthorn, being devoted to the use of the young men, while Alpha Hall furnishes a home for the young women connected with the institution. Both halls are well lighted and heated, and furnished with modern conveniences.

The social and intellectual life of the students is on as high a plane as that of any of its sister institutions, the social clubs, literary societies and churches of the city of Corvallis gladly welcoming members from the school, and each year a popular course of lectures, and various musical and literary entertainments are free to the pupils. Eight literary societies, four for the young men, and four for the girls, are maintained by the students, and are both enjoyable and profitable.

Admission of students to either the freshman or the sub-freshman classes is similar to that of like institutions, and admission to special students is granted under certain specified conditions. One of the great thoughts expressed in the congressional legislation that produced this college in Oregon was that its work should be applied to the industries of the people, especial reference being made to the agricultural and mechanical arts. This idea has here been broadly carried out, the students acquiring a technical and practical knowledge of each.

The college is especially to be congratulated upon its efficient corps of workers and officers. Wisely governed by a board of regents noted for the individual ability and efficiency of each of its members, it is equally fortunate in the selection of its remaining officers, its faculty, and its corps of instructors. Men and women of broad and liberal education, each teacher seems peculiarly adapted to his or her especial work. From year to year added improvements are inaugurated in each department, new methods are introduced as soon as they are proved practicable, in the line of progression this institution standing second to none in the Union.

JOHN DENNEY. A substantial and prosperous farmer, and a much-respected citizen of Albany, John Denney has for many years been industriously engaged in the prosecution of a calling upon which the support and wealth of the nation largely depends, and has met with well deserved success in his undertakings. His large farm contains as rich and productive land as can be found in this vicinity, and on it he has erected a comfortable house, good barns and outbuildings, and has supplied it with all the machinery and equipments required by a first-class, modern agriculturist. A native of Ohio, he was born September 6, 1840, in the town of Athens, where he spent the first twelve years of his life.

His father, Christian Denney, removed from Ohio to Oregon in 1852, being about six months crossing the plains, with his wife and six children, making the journey with ox-teams. He brought with him all of his stock, which consisted of ten yoke of oxen, seven cows and three horses. Coming direct to Linn county, he located in Lebanon, where his death occurred four weeks later. His widow, whose maiden name was Eliza B. Nickerson, took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of land about three miles west of Lebanon; and also bought a squatter's right. Moving upon it with her stock, she improved a considerable part of the land, placing it in a yielding condition, and there reared her children, giving them especially good educational advantages. She died at Jefferson, Ore., in 1897, aged eighty-four years. Her children, six in number, were as follows: Laura, who married William Ralston; Sarah, wife of William H. Galtia, of Albany; Owen N., deceased; John, the special subject of this sketch; Mahala, wife of Frank Pike, of Sherman county, Ore.; and Presley M., deceased. Owen N. and Presley Denney were educated at the Santiam Academy, in Lebanon, finishing at the Willamette University, and became lawyers, both being quite prominent. Owen N. served as state senator two terms, and for several years was judge of Wasco county, Ore. He was subsequently consul to China under President Hayes, serving in that capacity five years, after which he was employed by the king of Corea for a period of seven years as advisor for the Corean government. Returning to Oregon, he followed his profession in Portland until his death, in 1900. Presley M. Denney was the youngest child, and engaged in the practice of law at Portland, and in Utah. He served as prosecuting attorney on the Mountain Meadow massacre trial, and for a number of years was a member of the Utah state senate.

After completing his early education at the Santiam Academy, John Denney had charge of the home farm until 1864. Enlisting then as a private in Company F, First Oregon Infantry, he served for three years on the frontier, two years of the time being on the Snake river, in Idaho. Returning to the farm, he has resided there the greater part of the time since. In his home ranch he has five hundred and twenty acres of land, and his wife owns a smaller farm containing eighty acres. Practical and painstaking, he has his land under good cultivation, and well furnished with excellent improvements, his estate being a credit to his persevering energy and good management. In 1881 Mr. Denney received from his brother, Owen, then consul to China, twenty-six Chinese pheasants that arrived here safely out of the thirty shipped, and turned them loose near Peterson Butte, they being the first birds of the kind to be turned loose in Linn county.

In 1867 Mr. Denney married Sarah F. Kester, and they are the parents of two children, namely: Effie S. and Malcolm J. The latter is a well known physician of Portland, Ore. In politics Mr. Denney is a straightforward Republican, and for fourteen years served as school clerk. He is a member of the Universalist Church, and a promoter and supporter of everything calculated to advance the welfare of his community, intellectually, socially or morally, and is greatly esteemed for his integrity and ability.

FREDERICK G. BLUMHART. Born in Wurtemberg, Germany, March 24, 1849, Frederick G. Blumhart is the son of an architect and builder who for many years contributed his skill to the modern upbuilding of one of the oldest and most historic cities in the United States. The family came to America when he was a small lad, so small that he barely recalls the long voyage in a sailing vessel, or the subsequent settling in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., where his father continued to ply his trades. The father lived to be forty-five years old, and is survived by his wife, who today makes her home in the City of Brotherly Love, having attained to an age of seventy-six years.

That young Frederick G. was an ambitious youngster, and not amenable to control and discipline, was demonstrated when he attained his ninth year, when his family was completely upset by his disappearance from the hearthstone. The first they heard of him he was living in Maryland, where he lived until twenty-one years old. His next place of residence was in Florida, where he found employment helping to set out some of the first orange trees in the state near Enterprise, and while there he acquired a taste for landscape gardening, at which he afterward worked in New York state. Coming to Oregon when about twenty-eight years of age, he brought with him many memories of the Centennial exposition, where he had found employment for several months, and where he had picked up a great deal of useful information. In this state he worked for a couple of years on farms near Oakville, and in 1880 he came to Corvallis, Ore., and for twenty years worked at ferrying in this town. No more familiar figure is known hereabouts, or one more interestingly connected with the work-a-day life of the town.

Incidentally, while running the ferry, Mr. Blumhart had invested his savings in real estate, thus indicating his faith in the continued prosperity of this well favored locality. He also owns a farm of two hundred acres near Corvallis, upon which he has made many improvements. It will thus be seen that the ferrying business has its compensations when in the hands of capable and thrifty men, and that the surest and most satisfactory means of investment have been resorted to by the popular and successful boatman. Mr. Blumhart makes his home one and a half miles east of Corvallis, the same being presided over by the wife whom he married in 1902, and who was formerly Mrs. Sarah Peggs. By no means entirely given over to his chosen occupation, Mr. Blumhart has taken an active interest in town affairs, particularly Republican politics, and for fifteen years has been a member of the school board. He is a welcome member of the Maccabees Lodge, and is equally at home in various social and church organizations. Respected and honored by all with whom he has come in contact during his many years as a ferryman, he is to be congratulated that his lines have fallen in pleasant places, and that many earnest friends strive to brighten his pathway with kindly and sincere attentions.

JAMES BRUCE. It is doubtful if any pioneer of the great state of Oregon more emphatically represents the letter and spirit of progressiveness than does James Bruce, whose prominence as a large land owner and extensive agriculturist is subservient to his invaluable services in connection with the Rogue river war, in which memorable contest he won the rank of major by which he has since been known. A world of romance and adventure is centered in the lives of the greatest of the Indian fighters, not only because of the peculiar daring of which they gave evidence, but because of the vital importance of their mission and its bearing upon the later-day development of the west. Organized foes must furnish sufficient risks for the most venturesome, yet how much greater daring was required to deal with ambushed enemies, frenzied by the usurpation of their hunting-grounds and the destruction of that unmolested freedom which practically represented their all. A survey of Major Bruce's Indian experiences shows him to have been not only a relentless pursuer of savagery and brutality, but a kind and humanitarian adjuster of complications, for he entered into the feelings of the red men, and understood the momentous change which was sweeping them from their moorings and placing them within the circumscribed corral of civilization.

The earliest impressions of Major Bruce are traced to Harrison county, Ind., where he was born November 3, 1827, and where his father was managing a farm. His grandfather resembled him in possessing nerve and a liking for border life, for he accompanied Daniel Boone on his second expedition into Indiana, and thereafter made his home in Harrison county. James was ten years old when the family moved to Adams county, Ill., in 1837, and, his father dying soon afterward, his mother located in New Albany, and in 1875 made her home with him in Oregon, where her death occurred at the age of eight-seven. The oldest of the seven children born to his parents, and also of the four now living, James Bruce has a sister Miriam, the wife of John Sutton of Ballard, Wash.; a brother, Isaac, of Waterloo, Ore.; and a sister, Emily, the wife of William Levitt of California. Interspersed with farming James received the average education in the country school near his home, and while yet in his teens apprenticed to a blacksmith, thereafter following his trade for some time. At the age of twenty he began a border career in Texas, and for two years had ample opportunity to watch the maneuvers of the agile Apache Indians, who were constantly menacing the lives and property of the early settlers. The wonderful war tactics of these Indians were a source of constant surprise to the youth, and their ability to disappear and reappear, concentrate and move rapidly, thus giving the appearance of far greater numbers than they had, and their feat of riding concealed on one side of their horses, were impressions which sunk deep into his responsive and impressionable nature.

Returning to Quincy, Ill., in 1849, Mr. Bruce engaged for a time in the river traffic, and in the spring of 1850, tiring of the monotony following his eventful experiences in Texas, prepared to cross the plains with some of his friends. Starting out with horse-teams he found them impracticable, and soon traded his horses for oxen, with which he continued with practically few unusual experiences. After a short time spent in the mines at Placerville, Cal., he went north to Shasta county and the Reddings diggings, where he mined in distinguished company, his fellow-fortuneseekers including Hon. John Kelly, Thomas Brown and John Milligan. With these companions he made a trip to the famous Scott's bar, where he was overcome with ague, and was obliged to rely upon the thoughtful care of his friends. The journey was accomplished with ox-teams, and owing to a scarcity of provisions Mr. Bruce saw a means of adding to his own finances and at the same time improving the condition of the miners. He brought a band of cattle to the mining district and sold the beef at fifty-five cents a pound. With this money he was enabled to start up a ranching business with Dr. Robinson, which he soon afterward disposed of, and assisted in establishing Crescent City on the coast.

In 1852 Mr. Bruce came to Jacksonville, on the Rogue river, and there became interested in packing and merchandising, both of which occupations were rendered precarious by the constant uprising of the Indians, and their implacable resistance to the white man's invasion. Instances too numerous to mention of the hair-breadth escapes of this intrepid pioneer could be recounted were space only permitted for their insertion, but it is sufficient to say that he bravely came to the front in the emergency of the hour, and had his share of the hardship, deprivation and danger incident to the long drawn out campaign. In an especially hazardous venture the major was destined to realize that gratitude lives even in the hearts of bloodthirsty savages, for in 1853, while the war was well under way, with R. B. Metcalf Mr. Bruce was delegated to seek the camp of Chief Joseph, in order to secure his co-operation in calling in the marauding Indians. They found the chief encamped in a natural fortress, his tent indicated by a blue cloth, and, knowing him to be a man of peace, their desire was to reach him before their presence should be discovered by his subordinates. Such was not to be, however, for a howling, hooting mob soon convinced them that their lives were not worth a farthing, and that their doom was approaching resistlessly. At this juncture an Indian boy named Sambo, whose life Mr. Bruce had saved from infuriated miners who were stringing up Indians at Jacksonville, some time previously appeared shouting at the top of his voice that the white man should not be killed. His interference turned the thought of the mob temporarily, and in the meantime Chief Joseph appeared on the scene, albeit in an unamiable frame of mind. At first inclined to censure the moderation of his braves, he was at length led to hear the story of the white men, and finally consented to visit General Lane, upon whose suggestion the emissaries had sought the intercession of the chief. Needless to say, the boy Sambo treasured no greater gratitude in his heart than does Major Bruce today, for not only his own but his companion's life was saved, and a terrible slaughter averted.

When things had quieted down to some extent the major located on a claim near Table Rock, and in 1854 purchased of the Indians the right to cut hay in Sam's valley, he being under contract to supply the government post at Fort Lane. His gift of a horse to his old friend Chief Joseph brought him into considerable trouble, for it aroused the jealousy of Chief Zach, who called a council of war, and determined upon the killing of the horse, the burning of the hay, and the expulsion of the white men. Here again the tact and kindness of Mr. Bruce was brought into play, for he was besought by his friends among the Indians to placate the irate chief, and forthwith took his place in the midst of the deliberations, within the circle of the council. When it came his turn to show cause why action should not be taken he most eloquently led their minds and hearts into more peaceful channels, telling them that he loved them, and had come to speak to them as brothers, and as having a common father in heaven. Tactfully he referred to passages in the bible substantiating his statements, even explaining why some were white men and others colored, basing the fact upon differences in occupation, and environment, and thus preaching the kinship of the world. Needless to say, he was permitted to cut his hay and pursue his way uninterruptedly.

A different aspect of the matter in 1855 made further intercession of a peaceful nature impossible, for after Fields and Cunningham were killed in the Siskiyou mountains, Mr. Bruce formed a battalion of which he was made major, and relentlessly pursued the murderers. He took part in the battle of Hungry Hill and many other battles of an important nature, and in the history of those troublesome times the work of his men stands out in clear outlines, brave, determined, and practically useful. Peace established in the land, he came to Benton county in 1857, and on the Rogue river, north of Table Rock, took up a donation claim upon which he lived until 1862. In 1857 he married Margaret Kinney, daughter of Colonel Kinney, of Benton county, and in 1862 removed to Lewiston, where he got out timber for Fort Lapwai. For one season he engaged in the dairy business, and later manipulated stock interests, in time purchasing his present farm of three hundred and twenty acres ten and a half miles south of Corvallis on the old Territorial road. More than ordinary improvements mark the appointments of this ideal home, to which he has added and now has nine hundred acres, devoted to general farming and stock-raising. In many ways the major has taken the initiative in agricultural directions, and the first Jersey cattle in this vicinity were purchased by him in Philadelphia. Practical and resourceful, he has availed himself of all known aids to scientific farming, and his environment in beauty and productiveness is not exceeded in this part of the state.

In 1884 Major Bruce lost his first wife, and in 1886 he married Miss Elizabeth Mark, with whom, and his daughter, Sarah Catherine, he is passing his declining years. At present a member of the People's party, he has served both

Washington and Benton counties in the legislature, and he was an elector on the Douglas ticket in 1860. His reputation outside the borders of his adopted county may be judged when it is known that he was one of the judges of agricultural implements at the Philadelphia Centennial in 1876. He is a charter member of the Oregon Grange, and has actively concerned himself with its organization and maintenance. Thus is told all too briefly the life-story of one of the stalwart founders of the many-sided structure of the western slope, a man whose personal characteristics have permeated whatever surroundings he has temporarily acknowledged, and whose word and influence have been of inestimable value to the great northwest.

HON. R. S. IRWIN. The agricultural, political and general prestige established and maintained for many years by that esteemed pioneer, Richard Irwin, has in no way diminished in the hands of his son, Hon. R. S. Irwin, one of the popular and prominent agriculturists of the vicinity of Corvallis. Born on the old claim nine miles south of the city, he was reared in a practical home atmosphere, and taught the value of a good education, and uncompromising allegiance to uprightness and integrity. After leaving the public schools he took a course in the Corvallis College, and thereafter settled down to farming in earnest on the home place.

After his marriage with Effie Winkle, representative of another pioneer family, and who was born on her father's donation claim near Corvallis, Mr. Irwin continued to keep house on the old place, for five years and then bought his present farm of four hundred and seventy-five acres thirteen miles south of Corvallis, and comprising a portion of the old Slagle and Perkins donation claim. There were practically few improvements of a modern nature on the place, and the present appearance of thrift and progressiveness has been brought about through the untiring and practical efforts of the present owner. Two hundred and eighty acres are under cultivation, the land being advantageously laid out, and devoted to general farming, stock and grain raising. Mr. Irwin has one of the finest barns in his neighborhood, and his house is large and commodious, and well adapted to the cheer and genuine hospitality so characteristic of the owner and his accomplished wife.

Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Irwin, Fannie, Leanna, and Bessie, all of whom are living at home with their parents. A Democrat in political affiliation, Mr. Irwin is now serving as commissioner of Benton county, having already held many of the local offices in his township. Wide awake and enterprising, this representative of an honored pioneer name is well utilizing the opportunities by which he is surrounded, and in return for meeting in good faith all in his busy and well directed life, he has their good will and esteem, and their hope for continued financial and other good fortune.

THOMAS MILTON GATCH, M. A., PH. D. A man of scholarly attainments, keenly alive to the progressive methods of instruction in vogue today, and with the prestige on both sides of the house of a line of ancestors professionally educated, President Gatch has made his influence felt in the educational circles of the Pacific states, and has worthily contributed his full share in maintaining the high standard of the Oregon Agricultural College, with which he is officially connected as president.

The descendant of a Prussian family that emigrated to the United States in old colonial days, he comes of old Virginia stock, his paternal grandfather, Philip Gatch, and his father, Thomas Gatch, having been born and reared in Virginia. Rev. Philip Gatch was one of the first three ministers ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, and was afterwards a chaplain in the Revolutionary army, serving under Washington. Subsequently removing to Ohio, he continued his pastoral labors there, and was a member of the first constitutional convention of that state, being a delegate from Clermont county.

Thomas Gatch spent his early life in Powhatan county, Va., the place of his birth, but after removing with his parents to Ohio engaged in agricultural pursuits in Clermont county, remaining there until his death. A man of noble character and good business ability, always faithful to the trusts reposed in him, he exerted a wide influence in the management of public affairs, for several terms being a member of the Ohio state legislature, and for a number of years he was an officer in the Ohio militia, holding a commission as general. A strong believer in the religious faith in which he was reared, he was an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Lucinda E. McCormick, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Rev. Francis McCormick, a native of Virginia, who also served as a chaplain in the Revolutionary war, and afterward established the first Methodist Episcopal class west of the Alleghany mountains, settling as a minister in Ohio, where his later years were spent. Of the nine children born of their union, Thomas Milton Gatch, the special subject of this sketch, is the only survivor.

A native of Milford, Clermont county, Ohio, Thomas M. Gatch was born January 28, 1833.

and was reared on the home farm. After his graduation from the Milford high school, he entered the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio, from which he received the degree of A. B. in 1855, and the degree of A. M. in 1858. Going then to California by way of the Isthmus, Mr. Gatch was engaged in mining for a short time in Tuolumne county, but gave up the work to take the chair of mathematics and natural sciences in the University of the Pacific, at Santa Clara, a position that he held until January, 1859. Coming then to the northwest, he established a literary institute at Olympia, Wash., with which he was connected but a brief time when he was urged to become professor of Greek and Latin at the Willamette University, in Salem, Ore. A year later, on the resignation of President Hoyt, Professor Gatch was made president of the university, and continued in that position until 1865, when he resigned and returned to California to become principal of the public schools of Santa Cruz. Coming back to Oregon he served as principal of Portland Academy, at Portland, until 1870. Then, on the resignation of Rev. Nelson Rounds, D. D., in 1870, Dr. Gatch succeeded him as president of the Willamette University, taking the office for the second time. His former administration having been unusually successful and popular, he found a cordial and sincere welcome awaiting him, and on tendering his resignation, in 1879, it was after some deliberation regretfully accepted by the board of trustees.

Going then to Eugene, Dr. Gatch became professor of English literature at the University of Oregon, afterwards serving as first principal of Wasco Academy, at The Dalles, an office that he resigned to accept the presidency of the University of Washington, at Seattle. He remained in that position ten years, during which time important improvements were made, the new college building being erected, and other beneficial changes inaugurated. He next filled the chair of political science in the same university for a year, remaining until 1896, when he was elected to his present position as president of the Oregon Agricultural College. Under his judicious management this school has made great progress, meeting in a satisfactory degree the needs of the growing boys and girls of the state, and, with its finely equipped buildings, thorough and systematic methods of teaching the various branches of learning necessary to a practical understanding of agricultural and mechanical arts, and with its superior staff of teachers, this college occupies a high rank among similar institutions in the Union, and is one of which Oregon may well be proud. The college grounds comprise nearly one hundred and eighty-five acres of land, one hundred and forty-five acres of which is used for farming purposes, being improved with all the buildings, implements and stock to be found on a farm carried on after the most approved modern methods. Nine large buildings have been erected to meet the requirements of the students, each being fitted up with all the modern appliances needed.

While a resident of Santa Cruz, Dr. Gatch married Miss Orytha Bennett, who was born in Illinois, and went to California with her parents before the rush of 1849, being there in February, 1848, when, in the mill-race at Sutter's Mills, James Marshall discovered gold. Of the five children that blessed their union, three are living, the record of the family being as follows: Claud, a prominent and influential citizen of Salem, Ore., is cashier of the Ladd & Bush Bank; Claire is the wife of Laban H. Wheeler, Esq., of Seattle; Leigh and Ruth died in Seattle; and Grace, a graduate of University of Washington, is at home.

Dr. Gatch was a member of the first State Board of Examiners in Oregon, and is now a member of the present board. His ability as an educator is recognized in professional circles, and he has been honored by other institutions than his alma mater, having been given the degree of Ph. D. by the DePauw University of Indiana. Politically he is a Republican, and fraternally he is a Mason and an Odd Fellow. He was made a Mason at Santa Cruz, Cal.; was master of Salem Lodge No. 4, F. & A. M.; and received the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite Masonry at Seattle. The doctor joined Chemeketa Lodge No. 1, I. O. O. F., at Salem, Ore., and has served as grand master and grand patriarch of Oregon.

BENJAMIN F. BEEZLEY. The timber industry, which has furnished fortunes to thousands who have settled in the west, is appreciated by Benjamin F. Beezley, who, at Falls City, is engaged in locating timber, and dealing in real estate. He has made a practical study of the timber industry, has examined the forests, and knows where the best may be found, and in this way is of valuable assistance to would-be purchasers. He probably has as accurate an idea of the kind and extent of the timber lands of Oregon as any man now engaged in locating claims. So successful was he during about four years of this kind of work, that in 1902 he associated himself in business with Zimri Hinshaw, and in consequence the business increased and is becoming widely known.

Benjamin F. is not the only worthy representative of his family in Falls City, for his father, Edward E., the founder of the name in the west, is engaged in a flourishing nursery business. The father was born in the state of Illinois, and when a young man removed to Arkansas, thence to Missouri, where he married Sarah Cossairt, a native of Jay county, Ind., near the Ohio line. His son, Benjamin F., was born September 3, 1875, where he engaged in the nursery business in Hickory county. In 1888 he removed to the west and located in Whitman county, Wash., and the following year came to Polk county, Ore. Near Dallas he rented land and started a nursery business, conducting the same with fair success from 1889 to 1893, when he transferred his business to Falls City. He is still active and devoted to his chosen occupation, for which he possesses special aptitude. To some extent he ships his goods out of the state, and, altogether, conducts a fairly successful business.

The oldest of the three sons born to his parents, Benjamin F. was early in life taught self-reliance, and was given a good education that he might better succeed in his life work. His education at Dallas College was of his own provision, for, at the age of fourteen, he hired out as a farm hand, and carefully saved his earnings, that he might gain a knowledge of the higher branches. Eventually, he engaged in teaching for a year, and, in 1900, started the business in which he is still interested. He is a very intelligent and well-posted man, and it is his aim to increase his general knowledge as opportunity shall present itself. In January, 1900, he took up a homestead claim of one hundred and sixty acres on the Siletz river, which he proposed to improve and sell. Three children have been born into the family of Mr. Beezley, of whom John E. is attending the normal school at Monmouth, Ore., and Jessie is living at home.

B. F. Beezley is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally prominent, being a member of the Eastern Star, the Blue Lodge, F. & A. M.; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Grange.

McELVY WOOTEN. In McElvy Wooten, Lane county has an agriculturist identified with her pioneer and present day development, and one in whom is blended practical and progressive ideas, and extremely painstaking ways of carrying them out. From earliest youth the heir to responsibility, his mother having died when he was a child, he moved from his native state of Maryland where he was born December 11, 1827, with his father and the rest of the family to Tennessee, and from there to Missouri, where the father, James Wooten, died in 1842. The children kept together on the farm until they married or went their respective ways in life, McElvey Wooten starting out at once on a career of independence as a farm hand. He rented a farm in Missouri, but gave it up in the spring of 1850, that he might join the throngs in their search after homes and fortunes in the far west.

Under the guidance of Major Ball, Mr. Wooten crossed the plains with ox-teams, was on the road for about six months, and during that time encountered little of an unpleasant or dangerous nature. After spending the first winter in the Waldo hills in Marion county, he went in 1851 to northern California, and for a year prospected and mined with rather disheartening results. Reared to farming, he naturally returned to the occupation of his youth, being sure at least of an honest living, and of comparative immunity from entire failure. Taking up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres two miles east of Creswell, on the coast fork of the Willamette river, he started in to improve his land, and was soon comfortably located on land which held great promise, but which had hitherto known little of improvement. He found a wife and companion in Eliza Jane Bunyard, who was born in Missouri, and died on the old donation claim, having borne her husband five children. Of these, all are deceased but James, who occupies and manages the old home. For a second wife Mr. Wooten married Lucy M. Conrad, the widow of D. G. Conrad, who was a pioneer of 1852 and they had nine children, five of whom are living, one of whom is living in Lane county, the wife of T. B. Brown. Mrs. Wooten's father, A. J. Cruzan, brought her across the plains in 1853, locating on a farm in Lane county.

As his stock-raising and general farming has increased in extent, Mr. Wooten has found his land inadequate, and so has made more recent purchases, owning at present three hundred and ninety acres, sixty of which are under cultivation. He devotes much thought and study to fine stock, and some of the best which reaches local markets attained perfection while grazing in his meadows. No name in this county carries with it greater political weight than does that of Mr. Wooten, whose staunch support of Republicanism, disinterested and altogether worthy services, have ennobled opportunities which often have been turned to base account. The friend and promoter of education, he has served for many years on the school board, his own limited early chances having emphasized in his mind the necessity for a practical common school education. He is fraternally connected with the Masons, and his religious associations are with the Methodist Episcopal Church. During the Civil war Mr. Wooten was a member of the National Guard. He is foremost in all philanthropic undertakings in his community, giving liberally of his hard-earned means to further the cause of peace and happiness among all classes. His friends are many and stanch, his character is above reproach, and financial success has crowned his years of well directed industry.

HON. JOHN WHITEAKER. The position which Hon. John Whiteaker occupied in the political life of the state of Oregon was one of prominence from the formation of the commonwealth, being elected in June, 1858, as governor of the state, it being believed in Oregon that the bill for the admission of Oregon had been passed by Congress. It afterward transpired that the bill did not pass until early in 1859, and not until official information thereof was received did Mr. Whiteaker assume the duties of the governor's office, continuing to act as chief executive then until September 10, 1862, the date of the inauguration of his successor. In the years that followed before the death of this honored pioneer he was called upon many times to act in public office, the earnestness with which he adhered to strong convictions, the energy with which he prosecuted his labors, and the unflinching integrity upon which his lifework was founded winning for him to an exceptional degree the confidence of all who came to know him well throughout his long life of service. His death occurred in Eugene October 2, 1902.

The American progenitor of the Whiteaker family was the great-grandfather of Governor Whiteaker, who came from Holland before the Revolutionary war. His son James married Jemima Moore, by whom he had four children, namely: John, Sarah, David and Rachel, the first named son being born in Pennsylvania in 1786. Early in life he settled in Indiana where he married Nancy Smales, a native of Maryland, in time removing to Allen county, Ind., where his death occurred October 14, 1864, at the age of seventy-eight years and eight months. His wife passed away April 24, 1868, when about eighty-two years of age. They were the parents of the following children, all of whom were born in Dearborn county, Ind.: James, born September 8, 1812; Eliza, born September 30, 1815, and died in infancy; Douglas Livingston, born August 16, 1817; John, the special subject of this review, born May 4, 1820; and Catherine, born June 18, 1823. The early life of John Whiteaker was spent upon his father's farm in Dearborn county, Ind., his home duties being interspersed with a very brief period of schooling, six months in all. When sixteen years of age he left home and for the ensuing ten years was traveling over the western and southern states in the pursuit of a livelihood, being engaged in 1842 in Posey county, Ind., working at the carpenter's trade for a period of three years, during which time he attended school at intervals. In the spring of 1845 he went to Victoria, Knox county, Ill., where he followed his trade until the fall of 1846, when he went to Putnam county, Mo., and spent the winter. In the spring of the following year he located in Alexandria, Clark county, of the same state, and followed his trade there until July, when he returned to Putnam county and on August 22, 1847, was united in marriage with Nancy Jane Hargrave, the daughter of Thomas and Cecelia (French) Hargrave. He then purchased some tools in Lancaster and built the first home for himself and wife, where he remained working at the trade of carpenter and cabinet-maker until the spring of 1849. Attracted then by the prospects held out by the rich mines of California, Mr. Whiteaker left his wife with her parents and sought the gold fields of the western state. He mined along the American river with fair success until the summer of 1851, when he returned to Missouri and with his family set out in the following year for Oregon. Owning his own outfit he crossed the plains in company with John Partin, Thomas Jefferies and several other families from Missouri, he being elected captain of the train which came over the old Oregon trail, reaching Yamhill county October 26, 1852. In the spring of 1853 he moved south to Spencer Butte, Lane county, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres and engaged in farming. Six years later he sold his farm and purchased another near Pleasant Hill, Lane county, where he remained until 1885, engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Having been appointed by President Cleveland to the position of collector of internal revenue he then sold his farm and removed to Portland, where he resided during his incumbency of office, in 1889 making his home in Eugene, where he spent the remainder of his life.

To Mr. and Mrs. Whiteaker were born four children. Anna makes her home with her mother in Eugene; another daughter is the wife of D. W. Jarvis, of Portland; Benjamin is located in Eugene; and James Emmett is in Idaho. In his political preferment a Democrat, Mr. Whiteaker was always active in the promotion of the principles he endorsed. While residing at Pleasant Hill he was made justice of the peace, this being his first political office. In 1856 he was elected judge of the probate court of Lane county, and in the following spring was elected to the territorial legislature, following which he was elected to the highest office in the gift of the people, that of governor of the state of Oregon, serving from March 3, 1859, to September 10, 1862. After his retirement to private life he served several terms in the state legislature and senate, being chosen speaker of the former body and president of the latter, and in 1878 he was elected to the Forty-sixth United States Congress for two years. Although retired from the active cares of life after his removal to Eugene, Mr. Whiteaker ever lent his influence toward the furtherance of every and all enterprises whose end was the betterment of the city, county or state. He owned about ten blocks in the city which he laid out into lots, forming what is now known as the Whiteaker addition on the southwest. Steadfast in his adherence to principle, faithful in friendship and ever earnest in the advancement of the welfare of his adopted state, he won and retained a large circle of friends and admirers, whose loss through his death can only be partially compensated by the memory of the life which he lived.

THOMAS J. VAUGHAN. Connected as he was with the earliest history of the state, Thomas J. Vaughan, a resident of Lane county for a half century or more, is familiar with all that has gone before the greatness and prosperity of Oregon. Toward the fulfillment of developed resources he has given the enthusiastic help of youth, the steadier decision of more mature years, and in the evening of his life enjoys the peace and contentment which rewards labor well done. His name is surely enrolled among the useful pioneers of the state, and the honor accorded such is given to him by all who know him.

Mr. Vaughan was born in Wayne county, W. Va., August 13, 1830. Five years after his birth his parents removed to Illinois and located near Springfield, where they remained six months, then returning to the former state. In 1839 they moved across the river into Kentucky and remained for a period of four months, then continuing the journey west until they located in Platte county, Mo., from which state they emigrated toward the more remote lands. In 1845 the father was attracted toward the opportunities of Oregon, traveling by pack animals across the plains in the party which had an unpleasant experience in Meek's cut-off, and on his arrival in the state he went to work in a saw-mill in Salem, where he remained throughout the winter. He returned to the Mississippi valley in 1846, and found that his own family did not know him, as he had not cut his hair nor beard in the entire time. Having been favorably impressed with the outlook, he outfitted with oxen and three wagons and necessary supplies, and in the spring of 1847 started again across the plains with his wife and nine children. Just before leaving he had purchased some cows and two hundred and fifty-eight sheep, and these were the first blooded sheep brought into the state from the east, some of which were afterwards sold to Benjamin Fields, who purchased fifty head of the original flock, but Minto's history of the sheep industry of Oregon makes an error by giving Benjamin Fields the credit of importing these same sheep. During the trip which occupied the time from May 17 to September they lost all but one hundred sheep. Mr. Vaughan first located in Marion county, where the family remained for a few months, after which the father took up a donation claim in Linn county, consisting of six hundred and forty acres in the neighborhood of West Point. In August, 1848, Mr. Vaughan went to California by pack animals and mined on the American river, and while there helped to hang some men at Hangtown. He was successful in his venture and came north with $14,000 in gold. Again in 1849 he and two sons, Alexander and Thomas, went to California and mined on the Trinity, and were once more successful. Returning in the fall of the year to Oregon, he remained at home until 1851, when he again tried his fortunes in the Golden state, in that year being one of the first to discover the Yreka mines. He returned home, and the family continued to live in Linn county until 1857, when they removed to Lane county, the father purchasing three hundred and twenty-five acres near Coburg. He continued a resident of that county until his death, which occurred near Thurston, November 18, 1888, at the age of eighty years and twenty-seven days. His wife died October 12, 1901, when nearly ninety-one years old.

Thomas J. Vaughan was seventeen years old when he crossed the plains with his parents, his duty on the trip being to drive the sheep. In 1849 he accompanied his father to California, and June 5, 1850, he was married to Elizabeth S. Sampson, a native of Platte county, Mo., with whose sister and brother-in-law, Luther White, he had crossed the plains in 1847. He then moved to his father's six hundred and forty acre donation claim, where he lived seven years, when he came to his present location and purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he now carries on general farming and stock-raising. Eleven children were born to himself and wife, of whom Phoebe E. is the wife of Mr. Meyers and lives in Washington; Benjamin F. was postmaster at Heppner, Ore., and he and his wife were both drowned in the Heppner flood; Oren is a cattleman of Nevada; Olive is the wife of Henry Bollin, of Lane county; Martha is the wife of A. Simmons; Orella lives in Seattle; Mary J. is the wife of Joseph Klien, of Healdsburg, Cal.; Emma is the wife of J. W. Shumate, of Walterville, Ore.; Jeremiah is located near his father's farm; Alta G. died in 1888; and Lizzie is the wife of P. L. Barber, who is connected with the interests of Mr. Vaughan.

In politics Mr. Vaughan is a Republican, and as such has represented his party in various offices, and was a member of the state legislature in 1897 and a justice of the peace for many years. He was the first chairman of the first convention to organize the Republican party in Lane county, which was held in 1856, and he now has the minutes of that meeting in his possession. Out of forty men present he is one of three now living. In fraternal relations he has been an Odd Fellow for forty-three years, and also belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is a member of the Christian Church.

JOEL HIRLBURT. After many years of arduous toil in developing a large farm in Benton county, Ore., Joel Hirlburt is now living retired in Monroe, one of the highly honored and enterprising members of the community. His farm of three hundred acres, four miles southeast of the town, furnishes interest and relaxation whenever he chooses to visit it, but he has permanently stepped down from his former position of guide and manager, having turned the responsibility over to younger and more vigorous people. As his success as a general farmer and stock-raiser has increased from year to year he has invested in town property, and now owns some valuable lots inside the limits, which, taken in connection with his farm, make him indeed a large property-owner.

That Mr. Hirlburt should devote his energies to farming is not to be wondered at, for as far back as he can remember or has heard his forefathers engaged in the same thrifty occupation. From Athens county, Ohio, where he was born and spent his earliest years, he removed with his family to Indiana, and from there to Missouri, and there married Nancy Casteel, a native of Indiana, and with whom he went to house-keeping on a farm. To his neighborhood came many rumors of gold and fertile lands in the west, to all of which he listened with the enthusiasm of an ambitious and far-sighted man, determined to make the best of the abilities with which nature had endowed him. Disposing of his Missouri interests, he prepared to cross the plains in 1863, outfitting with ox-teams, and accomplishing his journey with little of the trouble or deprivation which made of earlier migrations hideous nightmares. The first winter in the west was spent on a farm near Salem, Marion county, and in the spring of 1854 he came to Benton county, the same fall moving to Lane county, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, on which he built a small log house and prepared to clear his land. He was fairly successful in accomplishing his purpose, but thought he could improve his conditions when, about 1872, he sold his claim and purchased his farm of three hundred acres, four miles southeast of Monroe. This also was in a comparatively crude state, and ere crops could be put in much work had to be done. On the new claim three children were reared to maturity: Lewis, deceased; Ellen; and Arrena, the wife of A. Goodman, of the vicinity of Monroe.

After the death of his wife, in 1898, Mr. Hirlburt lived on the home farm for two years, and then moved into Monroe, his principal object being the education of his grandchildren, of whom he is very fond. In no sense has he ever aspired to public recognition of any kind, and has not even taken a decided stand in politics, believing in voting for the man best qualified to serve the community welfare. He is noted for his rugged sincerity, his practical and worthy life, and those sterling traits of character which everywhere win respect and honest appreciation.

CHARLES M. CRITTENDEN. As the only real estate dealer in the promising little town of Hubbard, Charles M. Crittenden enjoys a distinct advantage, for much valuable town and country property will pass through his hands. Although but a recent addition to the business life of the town, having arrived in 1899, he has already impressed his general worth upon the public, who are inclined to cooperate with him in his efforts to spread abroad a knowledge of the many advantages of this well-favored section of the country. He is a justice of the peace, and is further interested in the social side of his adopted town as a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Knights of the Maccabees. In political affiliation he is a Republican.

A native of Martin county, Minn., Mr. Crittenden was born March 2, 1870, his father, William, having been born in New York state, May 17, 1837. The elder Crittenden removed to Michigan as a young man, and from there went to Minnesota, where he engaged at his trade as machinist. In 1869 he took up his residence in Martin county, Minn., and in 1873 went to Sioux Falls, S. D., where he took up a timber claim of one hundred and sixty acres. While working at his trade he worked this claim, and in 1887 removed to Tuscola county, Mich., where he bought a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he has since lived. His wife, Ella A. (Hackett) Crittenden, was born in Vermont, and came west with her parents as a child, settling in Minnesota. She also is living, and is the mother of six children, five sons and one daughter, of whom two died in infancy.

The oldest child in his father's family, Charles M. Crittenden was educated in the public schools, ending at the normal school of South Dakota. At the age of nineteen he began teaching school in Michigan, continuing this occupation after coming to Oregon, in different parts of Clackamas county, and in Hubbard, to which town he removed in 1899. While teaching he saw an opportunity here for a live, energetic real estate business, and inaugurated his present promising enterprise. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Crittenden, Mae L., Ruby B. and Jay, aged, respectively, nine, seven and five years. Mr. Crittenden is a man of high ideals, is well posted on current events, and is unquestionably destined for a prominent place in the up-building of his adopted town.

DARIUS G. McCLARAN. Though a comparatively new comer to his present farm, having settled thereon in 1901, Darius G. McClaran has a firmly established reputation as a general farmer and stock-raiser, the greater part of his present competence having been acquired in the latter occupation. His farm of two hundred acres is devoted almost exclusively to high-grade stock. Mr. McClaran is one of the hundreds of men who traveled long and wearily before reaching their destination in the west, and his experience and that of others leads one to wonder how many of the homeseekers of today would be willing to undergo the dangers incident to the long journey across the plains. Born in Holmes county, Ohio, March 21, 1845, he was a year old when his parents moved near Bowling Green, Ind., and from there they moved to Guthrie county, Iowa, in 1852. Here Darius developed into a strong and capable young man, attended the near-by district school for a few months each winter, and looked forward to broader opportunities than those by which he was surrounded. In 1860 he enlisted in the Northern army, under Captain Tracy, and served until receiving an honorable discharge.

Many of their neighbors having departed for the coast, the McClaran family naturally became interested in the project, and finally, in 1868, some of their number followed the example of their more ambitious friends. Besides Darius G., there were two other brothers, James and Richard, and their sister, Eliza McClaran, in the party, and they had two wagons and four yoke of oxen to each wagon, besides some loose stock. Their experiences on the plains were greatly modified from those of the earlier emigrants, the Indians having become used to the approach of pale faces, and newly settled towns and villages furnishing stopping places for procuring food and accommodations. Six months after setting out a weary and travel-stained party appeared in Forest Grove, entire strangers, and with but twenty-five cents left of their funds, but Darius secured employment with James Hines, making rails, where he remained two years. He afterward sought to win a fortune in the mines of Idaho, and after mining and prospecting for a time turned his attention to raising cattle, horses and sheep, on a ranch at Heppner, Ore. This proved so profitable and pleasant an occupation that he continued it for eighteen years, and during that time accumulated quite a little fortune, becoming prominent in politics and general affairs in his neighborhood. In 1885 he bought four hundred and eighty acres near Brownsville, Linn county, and lived thereon until coming to his present farm in 1901. Mr. McClaran is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Maccabees of Brownsville and Albany respectively. He is progressive and public-spirited, favoring all movements which have for their object the advancement of the agricultural, educational, moral or political standing of the community.

JOHN E. WYATT. The stable characteristics possessed by that fine and venerable pioneer, William Wyatt, are reproduced in some of his family of children, prominent among whom is John E., an extensive farmer and stock-raiser living two miles west of Corvallis. William Wyatt, of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this work, reared his children to an appreciation of their duty as citizens and men, educated them practically, and finally started them out upon the highway of life with large farms of their own, thus giving them an advantage over the majority of the young men of the county. John E. Wyatt has taken the gift thus presented, added to it, improved everything that he owns until it is valuable and profitable, and is conducting as successful a farming enterprise as may be found in his neighborhood. His specialty in the stock line is Cotswold sheep and Shorthorn cattle, and upon his grassy pastures may be found the most aristocratic and high-priced of these animals. The home farm consists of two hundred and sixty acres, and he also owns two hundred and seventy acres in the hills, and one hundred and sixty further in the mountains. A fine rural residence, convenient and modern barns, and up-to-date general equipments, make general farming a much less arduous task than it was a few years ago, and mark the owner as a man of ideas and progressive inclinations.

A native son of the state, Mr. Wyatt was born on his father's farm three and a half miles southwest of Corvallis, January 26, 1849, and not long afterward was taken to the Solomon King farm, later still to the St. Clair farm, upon all of which the elder Wyatt put in crops and made some improvements. In 1850 his parents located on the donation claim where he was reared, and where he attended school in the neighborhood. Afterward he studied at Philomath College, and at the age of twenty located on the farm which is now his home. In January, 1870, he married Mary M. Hinkle, daughter of Jacob Hinkle, an early settler of this county, and went to house-keeping on his claim, where he has reared seven children: Rozella, wife of A. J. Shipley, of Monmouth; Milton, at home; Lizzie, wife of Herbert Elliott, of Perrydale; Minnie, at home; and Ernest, Elbert and Edna, triplets. Like his father, Mr. Wyatt is a devoted member of the United Brethren Church, and in politics he is a Republican. For many years he has rendered signal service as road supervisor, and he has been a school director for more than twenty years. Genial, accommodating and hospitable, Mr. Wyatt is also an excellent business man and model farmer, and thus added to the social and agricultural prestige of a fertile and prosperous county.

MRS. AGNES THOMPSON. Among the honored pioneers of this section of the Willamette valley is to be named Mrs. Agnes Thompson, who gave up home and near relatives to bear an uncle and aunt company in their journey across the plains in 1852. The years have brought many changes into her life, as they have into the lives of all pioneers. With a family of children about her and many friends as an heritage of the years, Mrs. Thompson is passing into a pleasant and prosperous old age, a firm memory remaining to recall the early days of privation and dangers to the present generation of the now great and thriving commonwealth.

Mrs. Thompson was in maidenhood Agnes Nye, the descendant of a family which originally spelled the name in the French style, being of the same blood as Marshal Ney of the French army, whose loyalty to Napoleon cost him his life, though not his honor. The first of the native born Americans was John Nye, who was born in North Sewickly, Pa., and spent his life in Wayne county, Ohio, and Kosciusko county, Ind., in the latter purchasing and clearing a large tract of land, providing for each of his twelve children a large farm. John Nye was the grandfather of Agnes Nye, her father Michael, being born in Wayne county, Ohio, and removing with his father to Indiana in 1835. He was a mason and builder by trade, making his livelihood in the prosecution of this work until his death in 1848, at the age of forty-six years. He was a member of the Baptist Church, having officiated for many years as deacon. He was married twice, his first wife being Sophia Clark, who bore him two children: John, who located in Oregon in 1857 and engaged in farming in Lincoln county, serving with distinction in the Indian wars of this country; and Agnes of this review. His second marriage united him with Elizabeth Kimes, who lived to a good age, dying in Indiana in 1899. She was the mother of eight children, of whom George died in infancy in Kosciusko county, Ind.; Omar died at the age of twenty-one years in Indiana; Jasper, who served in Company A, of the Seventy-fourth Indiana Regiment, is county surveyor at Knoxville, Marion county, Iowa; Nancy is Mrs. Disher of North Dakota; Rowan is a farmer in Bourbon, Ind; Rebecca is the wife of W. S. Vanator, an architect and builder of Warsaw, Ind; Michael is located in Idaho; and Mary is the wife of Julius Magnon, of Marshall county, Ind.

Agnes Nye Thompson was born July 18, 1833, in Indiana and was reared on her father's farm which was located on the banks of the Tippecanoe river, in the near neighborhood of Warsaw. When of sufficient age to partake of the educational advantages offered in their home county she attended a school whose sessions were held in a log house, with puncheon floor and slab benches, and greased paper as a substitute for windows. Quill pens were a part of the necessary equipment of a pupil. In 1852 she joined her uncle and aunt, William and Rachel Blaine, who, with ox-teams, started March 13 for Oregon, driving from their home in Indiana. Crossing the Missouri river at Council Bluffs, in the path of the many other emigrants of that time, they entered upon the great trail of their journey, fraught with danger, privation and loneliness, their greatest suffering being caused from the ravages of the dread disease of cholera. Mrs. Thompson experienced the trials of the disease, but recovered, the only member of the family who died being Mary Ann Blaine, who was buried upon the plains. Upon the arrival of the train in Oregon they settled in Brownsville, Linn county.

January 1, 1855, Agnes Nye was united in marriage with Robert Mitchell Thompson, the ceremony being performed in Governor Moody's house. The first of the name of Thompson to settle in the United States was James Thompson, who, with his brother John, left Scotland and after a brief stay in Antrim, Ireland, settled in Pennsylvania, in the year 1735, the former locating in Juniata county, the latter in Cumberland county. Robert, the son of James, was born in this location, and Robert Mitchell likewise first saw the light of day there. In addition to the training received from his father along agricultural lines, Robert Mitchell Thompson learned the trade of a carpenter, and when a young man he went to Illinois where he engaged in work of this nature. In 1851 he crossed the plains by ox-teams, locating in Brownsville, where after several years spent in the prosecution of his trade, he entered the mercantile business. In 1856 he removed to Corvallis, Benton county, and after a brief engagement at his trade he purchased a farm one mile south of Corvallis, containing one hundred and thirty-six acres and which is now excellently improved, being still in the possession of his widow. Later he was interested in general merchandise in Corvallis, and also serving as postmaster during Grant's administration. In his early days he belonged to the Presbyterian faith, but his wife being a member of the United Evangelical Church he was won to her belief, in which he remained until his death in 1893, at the age of sixty-nine years. Politically Mr. and Mrs. Thompson were in accord, both being staunch Republicans.

Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Newton Addison is a pharmacist, located in Seattle, Wash.; Laura is the wife of James Booth, of Corvallis; Mary lives in Corvallis; Estella is the wife of A. F. Peterson; Emma also makes her home in Corvallis; George died at the age of eighteen years; John died at the age of six years; and Olive Irene is a music teacher, located in Boise City, Idaho. In addition to her country home Mrs. Thompson also owns a residence in the city. She is a prominent member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the Woman's Relief Corps.

DAVID HUGGINS. A large and well furnished rural residence, one of the finest barns of which Benton county can boast, well built fences, adequate accommodations for high-grade stock, and running water in every field, are a few of the advantages to be found on the farm of David Huggins, two and a half miles southwest of Bellfountain, and comprising a portion of the McKane donation claim. This prosperous farmer and dairyman is a native son of New York, in which state he was born April 24, 1834, and where he was reared on a farm. As a youth he learned the carpenter's trade, and thus equipped with a trade, a common school education and a practical familiarity with the possibilities of the soil, he came to California via the Isthmus of Panama in 1852, intending to make a fortune in the mines of the western slope. Fairly successful, he continued to prospect and mine for about seven years, and then located in Humboldt county, Cal., and farmed and worked at his trade. Around Eastern, on the John Day's river, he afterward mined for a couple of years, and all in all managed to make considerable headway, saving money for a rainy day.

Coming to Benton county in 1864, Mr. Huggins located on a claim near Monroe, and in 1868 enlivened his bachelor quarters by bringing home a wife, who was Sarah, daughter of Rowland Hinton, the latter of whom is mentioned at length in another part of this work. After his marriage, Mr. Huggins continued to live on his original farm until 1882, when he moved to a farm north of Monroe, and in 1889 purchased his present property. The first Mrs. Huggins died near Monroe, having reared a family of seven children, of whom William lives near Monroe; Lee is a resident of Seattle; Laura is the wife of L. Courtwright, of Harrisburg; Clara is the wife of John Jentry, of Monroe; Burk is living in eastern Oregon; Frances is the wife of William Shroder, of the vicinity of Monroe; and Claude lives in Monroe. At the time of his wife's death Mr. Huggins was following his trade in Monroe, although he still retained possession of the farm. For a second wife he married Mrs. J. L. Stevens, who was born in Michigan, and who was formerly Jeanette L. Landerking. For her first husband Miss Landerking married Mason Quick, by whom she had two children, one of whom, William A., is a conductor on the Northern Pacific Railroad, the other is deceased. By her second husband, John Stevens, she had eight children, only one of whom is now living—Mrs. Millie Aberson.

Since casting his first presidential vote Mr. Huggins has been a staunch advocate of Democracy, but has never aspired to the offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen. He is fraternally popular in the Grange and in the Fraternal Union of America, No. 264. Aside from his farming Mr. Huggins has worked at his trade to a considerable extent, and many barns in the country and residences and public buildings in Monroe and Bellfountain have had the benefit of his skill in construction. Mr. Huggins has a herd of a hundred head of Shorthorn cattle, and eighty head of high-bred goats, besides a large number of swine. At the present time his splendidly appointed farm is serving a double purpose, that of home for his family, and for the poor of Benton county. As superintendent of the county poor he has undertaken the boarding of the eleven public charges, receiving a certain sum per week. Needless to say they are comfortable and satisfied with their surroundings, and materially profit by association with so considerate and humane a host. Mr. Huggins is respected and liked by his neighbors in the county, with whom he has always maintained the most friendly and amicable relations.

RICHARD FARWELL. Though the conditions of Oregon were such, in pioneer days, that a common interest made of all men one great brotherhood, the natural tie is one which is only strengthened by the passing years. This seems especially true of the family represented by the bearer of the name which gives title to this biography, Richard Farwell being related to the family bearing the name in Chicago, founders of the mercantile house of that name, and also to Senator Farwell. The name Farwell is here known and honored among the progressive and enterprising agriculturists of Linn county, the one who led his family into the then wilderness being Richard Farwell, Sr., a pioneer of 1852.

The Farwell family are of eastern birth and lineage, the Oregon pioneer having been born in New Hampshire, March 29, 1822, the son of a physician, from whose personality the spirit of broadening capabilities must have come, as he himself became an early settler of Illinois, feeling his power strong to aid in the upbuilding of new states. Until 1848 he remained at home with his parents. In that year he married Esther N. Paugh, a native of Pennsylvania, and they went to housekeeping upon a farm where they continued a year. That being the year in which so many men hurried to California in eager hope of being one of the fortunate ones in the gold fields, Mr. Farwell became interested in the prospects and fearlessly undertook the journey across the plains with ox teams, leaving his young wife at the home of his father in Mercer county, Ill. Aside from losing a small number of cattle through the depredations of the Indians, the six months' trip was safely accomplished, and at its close he began prospecting and mining, in which he continued for three years. He then returned to Illinois, via the Isthmus of Panama, and in a very short time he was once more on the road, this time accompanied by his wife, bound then with horse and mule teams for the Northwest. They experienced no serious trouble with the Indians while enroute, the journey occupying five months. Upon their arrival they came direct to Linn county, where their home has ever since been located. Mr. Farwell at once took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, where the remainder of his life was passed, and where his death occurred November 24, 1899, in his seventy-eighth year. That his life had been one of well merited commendation no one who knew him could deny, and he boasted a large circle of friends among the citizens of Linn county. Besides making a home for himself and family, expending upon its improvement the energy, strength and efforts of a singularly forceful nature, he held helpful hands toward all public movements. Mr. Farwell was greatly interested in politics, being a Democrat, as he believed this party represented principles safeguarding the best interests of the country and of the community. He occupied creditably all the minor offices of the vicinity, and his influence was always exerted for the general welfare of the county. Fraternally he was a charter member of the Grange. Though not a member of any church, Mr. Farwell had the reputation of being one of the best men of this section of country, and the good will and esteem of his fellow townsmen was freely accorded him. As a hunter he enjoyed the forests of the Oregon which he knew in the very early days, his reputation along these lines being only equaled by that accorded him as citizen, patriot and father. Of his children, Richard C. is located in the vicinity of the old home; Mary E. is the wife of John Duncan, also of the same vicinity; Sarah W. is the wife of Walter Wright, of Eugene; Edward D. makes his home with his mother; Iva M. is the wife of Charles Farrow, of Eugene; and Hiram J. is located on a part of the old home place. Since the death of Mr. Farwell his widow has carried on the work of the farm with the assistance of her sons, the principal occupation now being general farming and stock-raising.

Richard C. Farwell received his education in the district school in the vicinity of his home, where he remained until he married Grace Matthews, a native of Albany. They now make their home three miles east of Shedd's, on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, which was once a part of the old Northup donation claim. Sixty acres are under cultivation, general farming and stock-raising claiming the activity of this descendant of a worthy pioneer. Three children, all of whom are at home, have been born to himself and wife, namely: Richard, Esther Ann and Clarence Merle. Mr. Farwell is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and politically casts his vote with the Democratic party.

Edward D. Farwell, the second son of Richard Farwell, was also educated in the district school. His marriage with Mabel R. McElroy, a native of Illinois, has proved a happy one, and he still lives with his family upon the home place, devoting his energies to the carrying on of general farming and stock-raising. He has one child, James Otis. In politics he also is a Democrat, and fraternally he belongs to the Woodmen of the World.

JESSE HOLLAND SETTLEMIER, the founder of Woodburn, and of the largest nursery enterprises in the Willamette valley, was born near Alton, Ill., February 5, 1840. George Settlemer, the father of Jesse Holland, was born at Cape Girardeau, Girardeau county, Mo., October 11, 1807, and came of a family represented for at least two hundred years in Berks and Bucks counties, Pa. His father, Adam, was born in North Carolina, and was one of the very early settlers of Girardeau county, Mo., where he enjoyed the distinction of owning the first wagon in that part of the country. His son, George, removed to the vicinity of Alton, Ill., about 1825, and there engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1849. He was a typical frontiersman, and his sturdy traits of character are recalled with pride by his many descendants. Ambitious and adventurous, he was one of the first in his neighborhood to start for the west, when gold was first discovered on the Pacific coast in 1849, and with his family of ten children crossed the plains with ox teams, meeting with the usual number of adventures on the way. This journey was ever recalled with infinite sadness, however, because his wife, Elizabeth (Ryan) Settlemer, a native of Missouri, and the partner of his early trials in the middle west, was taken with typhoid fever at the mouth of the Feather river, and after days of suffering with the disease was called to the home beyond and buried in a lonely, wayside grave. With varying success Mr. Settlemer remained for a few months in California, then came to Oregon, and in 1850 took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres on which Mount Angel is now located, where he lived until 1890. He then retired from active life, removing to Woodburn, where he lived for several years, after which he made his home with one of his daughters, living one mile east of Woodburn, where his death occurred six months later, April 26, 1896, at the age of eighty-eight and a half years.

This early settler was a strong and tireless worker, affable, upright, strictly honest, and full of fine daring and courage. He despised a lie or pretense of any kind. As became a frontiersman of the old school he was fond of hunting and was a splendid judge of horses and cattle. He was aggressively in favor of free soil, and after joining the Republican party at the first nomination of Abraham Lincoln, held sturdily to its principles and issues. Of the children born to himself and wife Adam is deceased; Mrs.

Mary Ann Allen lives in San Francisco; William F. is a farmer on Willow creek, Ore.; Henry W. lives at Tangent, Ore.; Jesse Holland is the founder of Woodburn; Alexander A. is a resident of Montana; Columbus is deceased; Martin R. lives at Mount Angel, Ore.; and George M. lives in Portland.

That the founder of Woodburn is a man of broad and liberal education is due to no early advantages in that direction. As a youth he had to work hard on the paternal farm, and so little leisure was at his disposal that attending the little school in his neighborhood was more of a recreation than duty. While imbibing this early knowledge he sat on benches made of split fir poles, and the other arrangements of the school were on a similar pioneer scale. His first independent business venture was conducted in Tangent, Linn county, Ore., where he started a nursery business in partnership with his brothers, William and Henry, the latter of whom still has charge of the enterprise. Though continuing for many years, none of the brothers succeeded in accumulating a very large amount of money in the nursery business. Mr. Settlemer severed his connection with the business directly after his marriage in 1862. He then acquired a tract of land which had been bought at sheriff's sale, being the donation claim upon a portion of which Woodburn is now located, and which consisted at that time of two hundred and fourteen acres. He had a great deal of trouble with this property because of a defective title, but finally overcame all obstacles through the medium of repurchase, having passed both the United States District Court and the Supreme Court at Washington, by which the title was set aside. To the original property he has since added, and now has about seven hundred acres distributed through Marion and Clackamas counties, Ore., and Mason county, Wash.

In time, after purchasing his first donation claim, Mr. Settlemer erected his present fine dwelling, to take the place of the little log cabin which was a part of the pioneer improvements of the early days. In 1863 he started the nurseries which have made his name famous through the entire northwestern country, and which at the present time, under the able management of his son, F. W. Settlemer, have no superior on the Pacific coast. Beginning in a small way, this nursery business increased and flourished beyond his expectations, and at present there are at least fifteen hundred thousand plants, and three hundred acres closely set with all kinds of fruit stock, and the very finest of ornamental and decorative trees and plants. From France and other centers of horticultural activity have been imported many costly and rare plants and trees, and the nurseries supply a trade covering the entire country west of the Mississippi river, including Mexico and British Columbia.

Not only did Mr. Settlemier lay out and found the town of Woodburn, but he has been lavish in donating land for many of its most worthy public enterprises. His appreciation of education has been marked throughout his entire career, and in this connection he contributed the block of ground upon which the public school building is located, and has in every way sought to elevate the standard of instruction. It is his pride that he has never voted against a school tax. His other responsibilities include the presidency of the Bank of Woodburn, one of the solid financial institutions of this county, and he is a member of the Oregon State Fair Board at the present time. Among his holdings Mr. Settlemier includes five large brick buildings in Woodburn, including the Association Building, which is a very fine and modern hall. In early days he purchased at an advantageous price a six-acre tract of land in East Portland, which has since greatly increased in value, and is now included in the best residence district of that city. He has erected thirteen cottages on other property in Portland, the rental of which supplies a substantial source of income.

Thrice married, Mr. Settlemier's first wife was Eleanor Elizabeth Cochran, who was born in Iowa in 1848, and died in Oregon in 1879. Her father, James Cochran, was born in Missouri, and died on his donation claim in Oregon in 1863. In Portland in 1880 Mr. Settlemier married Clara S. Gray, who died six weeks after her marriage. The third marriage was contracted at Howell Prairie, and united him with Mary C. Woodworth, who was born in Missouri in 1848, and came to Oregon with her parents in 1850. Her father, Franklin N. Woodworth, a native of Ohio, was a successful farmer in Marion county, Ore., his home being a stopping place for travelers en route between Salem and Silverton. Of the eight children born to Mr. Settlemier Mrs. Nettie Beggs lives in Woodburn; Mrs. Ada Jones, Mrs. Elsie Porter and Mrs. Emma Cleaveland live in Portland; Dell is the wife of S. I. Guiss, a merchant of Woodburn; F. W. has succeeded to his father's nursery business; Jessie E. Fleck is next in order of birth; her husband is the musical director of the Musical Conservatory of Utica, N. Y.; and J. H., Jr., son by the third wife, is living with his parents.

Mr. Settlemier has been a Republican all his life, but has had too many business responsibilities to care for official recognition. He is a member of the Oregon State Board of Agriculture, and has been one of the chief promoters of fairs and like enterprises calculated to stimulate an interest in home production. Of imposing and robust physical proportions, he is genial and frank, and a typical representative of the founders of western commonwealths. Mr. Settlemier possesses rare business discretion, and has seen and utilized the splendid opportunities by which he has been surrounded.

WILLIAM YERGEN. Although practically retired from active farming several years before his death, which occurred September 30, 1897, William Yergen was the improver of a large farm in Marion county, upon which he located in 1864, and which is now in the possession of several of his sons. Mr. Yergen was a native of the town of Mühlheim, Germany, and was born in 1825. When six years of age he came with his parents to America on a sailing vessel, landing in New York harbor, whence the family went overland to Belleville, St. Clair county, Ill., locating on a farm near that town. He proved an industrious and capable youth, as well as an ambitious one, and while yet young bade adieu to his family and made his way alone to St. Louis, Mo., where he applied himself to learning the brick mason's trade. Having served a long apprenticeship he worked at his trade in that city until 1852, in the meantime managing to lay up some money, through the exercise of economy and wise investment.

Though far from the paternal farm, Mr. Yergen managed to keep in touch with the rest of his family, and to his brother Augustus he communicated his desire to make the west his home. Augustus was equally enthusiastic upon the subject, as was also a brother-in-law, John Scheurer, so that all three made the needful preparations for the long journey across the plains. Without any particular adventure they arrived at The Dalles after six months on the plains, and there abandoned their wagons and came down the river to Marion county. Here Mr. Yergen took up one hundred and sixty acres of land near Aurora upon which he lived until the spring of 1864, when he gave up farming temporarily and assumed control of the brickyard at Salem operated in connection with the building of Willamette University. In the fall of 1864 he located on the farm now owned by his sons, and which consists of two hundred and fourteen acres. He took great pride in the cultivation of this property, and reared his sons to the cautious and painstaking ways which brought about his ultimate success.

The first marriage of Mr. Yergen resulted in the birth of one child, who died in infancy. His marriage March 2, 1862, with Ruth Minier, who died February 19, 1882, resulted in ten children. Of these, Cassius F., a resident of Seaside, Ore., married Helen M. Brown, and they have one son, Cassius F., Jr.; J. Frank, a hop-grower on a portion of the old claim, married Alice Hoskins, their union being blessed with two children, Walter Bruce, aged five years, and Blanche Elizabeth, aged three years; Elizabeth is the wife of I. L. Lindsay, residing in the vicinity of Hubbard; William A., living on the home place, married Orpha E. Jack, now the mother of two children, Boyd McKinley and Mabel Frances; Thurston H. is living on the home place; Emma H. died at the age of sixteen years; Benjamin lives on a farm near Newberg and married Lulu Hopkins, they having one son, Grant, aged two years; the remainder are Charles A., Ernest G., and Walter, who died in infancy. J. Frank, William, Thurston, Charles and Ernest own the home farm, which at present consists of one hundred and eighty-six acres. Of this property forty acres are under hops, and besides the sons have two other hop-yards of seventy acres each. The sons are practical and progressive farmers, and are young men of intelligence, education, and pronounced public spirit.

REV. PATTERSON C. PARKER, deceased, an Oregon pioneer of 1852, during the many years of his residence in the Willamette valley exerted a moral and religious influence which has had a most beneficent effect in moulding the character of many of the well-known citizens of Oregon. Mr. Parker was born in Tennessee in 1809. When, in young manhood, he settled in Indiana, the spot he selected for a farm was in the midst of a wilderness. He at once set about the task of improving the land and establishing a home, and in the course of time built up a large flour and lumber milling business on the White river in Jackson county, Ind. Upon the outbreak of the Mexican war he enlisted in the Third Indiana Volunteers, became first lieutenant of his company, and participated in many important engagements, including the memorable battle of Buena Vista. Upon the conclusion of the war he returned to his home in Indiana. It was not long, however, before he became dissatisfied with his environments in that state, and decided to seek for his family a new home in the Far West. In the fall of 1851 he outfitted with three wagons and ox-teams, and, accompanied by his wife, four sons and two daughters, started on the long journey westward. The winter following was spent in DeWitt county, Ill. In March, 1852, the family left DeWitt county and proceeded on their journey, crossing the Missouri river at St. Joseph, Mo., May 2. They followed the old Oregon trail from that point, proceeding down the Columbia river, and arriving at the Sandy September 15, 1852. Soon afterward Mr. Parker located in Yamhill county, where he spent one year. In 1853 he located near Oakland, Douglas county. There a large and productive ranch came into his possession, and upon it he engaged extensively in stock-raising and general farming. At the same time he exhibited a keen interest in Republican politics. For several terms he served in the Oregon state legislature, becoming the author of a vast amount of legislation which was greatly needed in those days. He also served for some time as judge of Umpqua county, which included what is now Douglas county.

During the long period of his service in the legislature and on the bench Mr. Parker exerted a strong general influence, and invariably stood as the advocate of such measures only as, in his belief, would result in benefit to the largest proportion of the people. But he was probably more widely known by reason of his earnest and persistent efforts toward the consummation of plans for the dissemination of religious thought. He was a regularly ordained minister in the United Brethren church, and preached in the same until about four years prior to his death. Chiefly through his instrumentality several churches of that denomination were organized throughout the Willamette valley and elsewhere, and these, for the most part, were substantially endowed from his ample means. Probably none of the early settlers of this section of the state who have passed away was more widely known and revered and beloved than he, for his daily life was doing good. He possessed a most unselfish spirit, and was a public benefactor and humanitarian in the highest sense of the terms.

Mr. Parker was united in marriage with Mary Scantling, a native of East Tennessee and a daughter of Samuel Scantling, who died in the latter state. Mrs. Parker died near Oakland, Ore., at the age of seventy-four years. Her husband died at Oakland, Ore., at the age of eighty-one years. They were the parents of six children, four of whom are living, as follows: Marion Parker, M. D., of Clackamas county, Ore.; Williamson Parker, a resident of California; Patterson C. Parker, a resident of Oakland, Ore., and Mrs. Elizabeth Kelly.

CHARLES L. WEBER. The experience of Charles L. Weber has been somewhat diversified in character, but it has all served to fit him for his present position, for a man who conducts a mercantile establishment cannot have too broad a view of human nature and too close an acquaintance with it, to succeed in his work. He is now engaged in conducting one of the most thoroughly equipped and well furnished stores in Creswell, Lane county, having been so employed since 1896.

Mr. Weber is of German parentage, his father, now a retired resident of Portland, having been born in the Fatherland in 1833, and as a young man crossed the ocean and sought the land of broader opportunities. He was a cabinetmaker by trade, and after landing in the United States in 1851 first settled in Wisconsin, where he combined the interests of farming with his trade. Later he removed to Minnesota, and in 1896 came to Cottage Grove, Ore., where he made his home until the fall of 1903. The mother died at the age of sixty-two, leaving a family of thirteen children, of whom Charles L. Weber was the third in order of birth, being born January 13, 1860, in Juneau county, Wis. When six years old he went to live with his grandparents, with whom he remained until he was thirteen years of age, during this period receiving his education through the medium of the district schools. On returning to the home of his father he remained for two years, when he started out into the world to make his own way, first taking up an apprenticeship with a blacksmith. He continued this employment for several years, when he located a homestead in Polk county, Minn., and at the same time engaged in the grain business, after a period of six years settling once more in the milder south to become occupied as a farmer. In 1894 he came to Oregon and settled upon a ranch in the neighborhood of Creswell, Lane county, remaining until 1896 when he became interested in his present commercial enterprise.

In 1890 Mr. Weber married Flora Ballard, a native of Minnesota, and they have six children, in order of birth as follows: William D., Clifford C., Eunice, Myrtle, Homer, and Opal, all of whom are at home. Besides his interest in the store Mr. Weber owns seven acres in his home place. In politics he is a Socialist and fraternally a member of the Woodmen of the World, Camp No. 484, and Creswell Lodge No. 112, A. F. and A. M., in the latter acting as treasurer. He is a member of Gilfrey Lodge No. 169, I. O. O. F., and Moss Circle No. 485.

THOMAS OWEN MAXWELL. An Oregon pioneer, coming here as a lad of twelve years, and a representative of one of the oldest and most respected pioneer families of this section of the state, Thomas O. Maxwell, of Springfield, is especially worthy of notice in a work of this kind. Crossing the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and the dreary plains, he came to Oregon when the country was practically in its virgin wildness, and has since been actively identified with its agricultural, mining, industrial and financial prosperity. As a man and a citizen, he has been honest and upright, and by his earnest industry, intelligence and integrity has accumulated wealth, and attained a place of distinction in political and social circles. A native of Sangamon county, Ill., he was born January 23, 1834, near Springfield, a son of the late Ludlow Maxwell, who for more than half a century was a resident of Linn county.

Born and reared in Greene county, Ohio, Ludlow Maxwell removed to Sangamon county, Ill., when a young man, and after tilling the soil in that locality for a few years settled in Des Moines county, Iowa, purchasing a farm eight miles west of Burlington, where he resided twelve years. Coming to Oregon with his family in 1847, he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and located in Linn county. Eight miles east of Albany he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, from which he improved a comfortable homestead, on which he spent the remainder of his life, dying, in 1899, at the venerable age of ninety-three years. He was always actively interested in the maintenance of churches and schools, and a strong advocate of the cause of temperance. Uniting with the Christian Church in early manhood, he continued one of its most faithful members until his death. In politics he was a Republican. His wife, whose maiden name was Delilah Marshall, was born in Ohio, and died of heart trouble on the Oregon homestead. Of the eleven children born of their union, nine grew to years of maturity, Thomas O. being the eldest child.

Coming with his parents to Oregon in 1847, Thomas O. Maxwell, although but a boy, rendered material assistance in the pioneer labor of clearing and improving the parental homestead. Going to California in 1856, he worked in the gold mines of Siskiyou county two years, being quite successful, but by subsequent speculation in gold claims lost some of his accumulations. Returning to Oregon in 1859, he operated a sawmill in Linn county six months, and the following ten years was engaged in farming, near Albany, on one hundred acres of land that came into his possession after the death of his mother. On December 24, 1864, he entered his country's service, enlisting in Company F, First Oregon Infantry, and was employed in detail duty until being mustered out, July 20, 1866, at Vancouver, Wash. Having traded his farm for property near Cottage Grove, he subsequently took up one hundred and sixty acres of land in the same vicinity, and there resided until 1886. Purchasing real estate in Springfield in the spring of 1887, Mr. Maxwell has since been successfully employed at the carpenter's trade. In his business career he has been fortunate, and in addition to his other property interests is a stockholder in the Great Western Oil and Coal Company, and in the Cascade Coal Company, two safe and substantial organizations.

Mr. Maxwell married first, in Linn county,

Ore., Ruth Powell, who was born in Menard county, Ill., and died in Linn county, Ore. She bore her husband four children, namely: one child which died in infancy; Alfred Ludlow, a farmer in Lewiston, Idaho; Amy Ann, wife of Milton Cornelius, of Pleasant Hill, Ore., and Lincoln H. In July, 1898, in Lane county, Ore., Mr. Maxwell married Marguerite Jane Harkins, who was born in Canada, and they own and occupy a cozy home, pleasantly located on the banks of the Willamette. Politically Mr. Maxwell is a Republican, and has rendered efficient service in public office, having served as school director a number of years, as councilman three terms, and for one term was mayor of Springfield. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of the Rebekahs, of the local Grange, and of the Grand Army of the Republic, and belongs to the Christian Church.

HENRY H. SMITSON. A meritorious service during the Civil war, twenty years of lumbering in the great state of Oregon, and many years of agricultural activity, are salient items of interest in the career of Henry H. Smitson, at present enjoying a well earned immunity from active participation in the busy cares of life. Born in Johnson county, Ky., October 27, 1844, Mr. Smitson is the fourth child in a family of eight children born to Mathew and Nancy (Williams) Smitson, natives of the Old Dominion. The father died when his son Henry was six years old. The mother, who died in Jackson county, Mo., in 1867, at the age of fifty years, was a descendant of an old Maine family, and was a daughter of William Williams, who removed from his native state of Maine to Maryland, later becoming one of the early settlers of Johnson county.

After an uneventful boyhood Henry H. Smitson found an outlet for his ambition in the United States Army, in which he enlisted in 1860, at the age of seventeen. With headquarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., he was employed to drive a team for the commissary department from Leavenworth to Fort Union, Mexico, and in March, 1861, he enlisted in Company D, Twenty-fifth Missouri Infantry, for service in the Civil war. At the battle of Independence he was made prisoner and held for some time, but was finally exchanged, and placed on scout duty until his re-enlistment, September 20, 1862, in Company F, Twenty-Fifth Missouri Infantry. From then until the close of the war he was in the midst of camp and field, participating in most of the history-making battles, including Vicksburg, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, Altoona, and the Atlanta campaign, finally taking part in the review at Washington, after the close of the war. Mustered out at Washington, and discharged in May, 1865, at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, Mr. Smitson located in Kansas City, Mo., and soon afterward engaged in the stone and brickmason's trade, which he followed as a means of livelihood until 1875.

Coming to Oregon by way of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads, Mr. Smitson spent some time in Portland, and then made his way to Springfield, where he has since made his home. While saw milling for twenty years, and later tilling the soil of his adopted state, he has taken a keen interest in the political and general development, holding various positions of trust and responsibility. A staunch Republican, he has had the best interests of his party at heart, his devotion being rewarded by election to the office of city marshal for thirteen consecutive years. Although practically retired, he has the oversight of his farm of eighty acres two miles south of the town, his property being well improved, and given over to stock-raising and general farming. At the meetings of the Grand Army of the Republic Mr. Smitson contributes his share of interesting reminiscence, and over many a campfire has told of experiences in camp and field, all of them tinged with the elements which make these occasions memorable.

The home life of Mr. Smitson has been a happy one, and the children which have been born into the family have proved themselves worthy of the practical training and unflinching interest by which they have been surrounded. Mrs. Smitson was formerly Mary Eaton, who was born in St. Louis and reared and married in Kansas City, Mo. Her father, Joseph Eaton, was born in the state of Tennessee, and as a young man became one of the early settlers of St. Louis, going at a later day to Jackson county, Mo., where he lived until 1870. His last days were spent at Goshen, Lane county, Ore., where he died at the age of eighty years. Four of the eleven children, John W., Mollie, Luella and Willie, are deceased, while Effie is the wife of George McCaulley, of Springfield; Jennie is at home; William is deceased; Nellie is the wife of Wallace Skeels, of Springfield, and Etta, Frank and Jesse are at home. Miss Jennie Smitson owns a grocery store, where for several years she conducted the business.

ROBERT GRIER VAN VALZAH, M. D. One of the leading physicians of Springfield, Dr. Robert G. Van Valzah, is recognized as a man of talent and culture, eminently fitted for the position he has attained in the medical circles of Lane county. A physician by breeding and heredity, his entrance into the professional ranks was but the logical result of his environment. On the paternal side his ancestors for several generations were physicians of wide reputation and marked skill. His great grandfather, Robert Van Valzah, Sr., M. D., was born and educated in New York, but early in life located in Union county, Pa., and was there engaged in the practice of medicine the greater part of his life, dying at Buffalo Roads. Robert Van Valzah, Jr., M. D., the next in line of descent, was born in Union county, Pa., and after his graduation built up a successful and lucrative practice in his native county.

Shepherd Laurie Van Valzah, father of Dr. Robert G. Van Valzah, was born and reared in Mifflinburg, Pa. Receiving the degree of M. D. at the Jefferson Medical College, at Philadelphia, he lived the greater part of his life in Union and Lycoming counties, although his death occurred in Milton, Pa. He married Mary Elizabeth Grier, a daughter of Rev. Isaac Grier, a Presbyterian minister of note who had charge of one church for over fifty years. Her real name was Madden, but having been left fatherless when a small child she took the surname of her adopted father, Rev. Isaac Grier.

The eldest son, and second child, of a family of four children was born October 8, 1863, in Boalsburg, Center county, Pa. Robert Grier Van Valzah obtained his elementary education in the public schools, afterwards entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons, at Baltimore, Md., from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D., in 1885. The following two years Dr. Van Valzah was engaged in the practice of his profession in Northumberland county, Pa., first in Montandon and then in Watsonstown. Removing to Hughesville, Pa., in 1887, he carried on a successful drug business for five years. In 1892 the doctor came to Oregon, locating in Springfield, where, with the exception of a portion of the year 1895, when he was in Milton, Pa., he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession. Well educated, skilful and careful, he has gained the confidence of the community to a marked degree, and has built up an extensive and lucrative patronage. Besides his residence, the doctor is the owner of considerable property in Springfield. He is also interested to some extent in stock-raising, keeping a limited number of Guernsey dairy stock, which he brought from the east. He also raises considerable poultry, making a specialty of White Wyandotte chickens.

At Sunbury, Pa., Dr. Van Valzah married Addie Bernice Shannon, who was born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Rev. Samuel Galbraith Shannon, also a native of that state. Her father studied theology after his marriage, was ordained as a minister of the Lutheran Church, and afterwards preached in Philadelphia for twelve years. He now resides in Norwood, a suburb of Philadelphia, and in addition to supplying different churches as occasion requires, he was for several years financial secretary of the Susquehanna University, at Selinsgrove, Pa., of which he was one of the promoters, and for a number of years one of its board of regents. He is a man of strong personality, with a special talent for church organization, and although sixty-six years of age is as vigorous and active as a man in life's prime. The doctor and Mrs. Van Valzah are the parents of three children, namely: Shannon Laurie, Robert Clark and Caryl Gerald. Politically Dr. Van Valzah is a Socialist, and fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World, and of the Artisans.

FRANCIS MARION WILKINS. With a heritage of splendid characteristics and an inspiring example and living precept in the career of his father, Francis Marion Wilkins could not well fail to make of his life a success. For a quarter of a century he has been one of the dominant forces in the commercial activity of the city of Eugene, and has exercised a potent influence in increasing the prestige and advancing the material welfare of the city.

Mr. Wilkins was born near Marquam, Clackamas county, Ore., August 10, 1848, and is the eldest of the four surviving children born to Mitchell and Permelia Ann (Allen) Wilkins, who crossed the plains from Missouri to Oregon in 1847. Both his parents now reside in Eugene. (For early history of the family the reader is referred to the review of the life of Hon. Mitchell Wilkins, which appears elsewhere in this volume.) In the fall of 1848 Francis M. Wilkins was taken by his parents to the new home they were about to establish—a donation claim taken up by the father at a point about ten miles northeast of the site of the city of Eugene. There the lad grew to manhood and was reared to agriculture and stock-raising. On account of the remoteness of his home from schools, his earlier educational advantages were somewhat limited. The nearest school, conducted in a small log building, was located three miles from his home, and this he attended until he was qualified to enter the academy at Eugene. Still eager to equip himself for a business career, he continued his studies after the close of his school days in Eugene, entering the Portland Business College. Upon the completion of his two-years course in that institution, he at once embarked upon a business career in Eugene. In 1875 he became a clerk in a drug store, remaining there for two years in the study of pharmacy. In 1878 he established a drug business for himself, locating on the east side of Willamette street near Hotel Eugene (now the Smeede), and in 1889 he purchased a lot and erected a brick building directly opposite. In the latter location he remained in business until 1899, when he sold out and retired from active life.

October 27, 1872, Mr. Wilkins was united in marriage to Miss Emma Goltra, a native of Linn county, Ore., and the daughter of Nelson Goltra, who was born in New Jersey and crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1853. He first settled at Lebanon, where, as contractor and builder, he erected the Santiam Academy in 1854. In the fall of that year he removed to Corvallis and there constructed and began the operation of a steam sawmill. In this enterprise he was engaged until 1858, when he was so injured by the explosion of a boiler that he died three weeks later. Mr. Goltra married Elizabeth Ellison, a native of Illinois, and the daughter of Aaron Ellison. After the death of Mr. Ellison in Illinois his widow came to Oregon via Cape Horn, in 1857, and a few years later died in Douglas, Morrow county, Ore. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins, namely: Maude, a graduate of the University of Oregon, now the wife of Herbert Condon, of Seattle, secretary and clerk of the State University of Washington; Frank, who is connected with the Equitable Life Insurance Company at Seattle, Wash.; Nina, a student in the University of Oregon; Lucia and Gladys.

In politics Mr. Wilkins is a Republican, and though he has never aspired to public office, he is at present serving in the city council from the Fourth ward. In his fraternal relations he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Encampment connected therewith, in both of which he is a past officer, and with the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he is serving on the official board. He is also a member of the Eugene Commercial Club. He was one of the organizers of the Native Sons of Oregon, and for many years served as president of Skinner's Cabin in that order. In addition to the many business interests which have engrossed his attention, one of his most praiseworthy acts was the assistance he rendered in the organization of the Eugene Water Company and the construction of the first waterworks, of which he was a director for many years. In the line of his trade he has been for many years a member of the Oregon State Pharmacists' Association, and was sent by that organization as a delegate to the meeting of the National Drug-gists' Association at San Francisco.

This brief review of the career of one of the best representatives of the native citizens of Oregon illustrates what may be accomplished by a young man of energy and determination in a state rich in such opportunities as give Oregon her pre-eminence among the western commonwealths. Besides the natural conditions which have contributed to make his life a success, Mr. Wilkins possesses strong personal attributes which have been potential in molding his career. He is a man of integrity of directness of purpose, and scrupulous in the extreme in his dealings with others. It has been said of both father and son: "His word is as good as his bond." He entertains liberal and broad-minded views of affairs in general, has always exhibited an admirable public spirit, and an inclination to assist in worthy enterprises aside from those in which he may have had a direct personal interest. He is one of the best types of sterling western manhood and from any viewpoint is entitled to a permanent place in the historical literature of the Willamette valley.

ANTHONY L. RONEY. The little community of Goshen, noted for its thrift and enterprise, and for the promising as well as already firmly established careers of its citizens, lays claim to no more upbuilding commercial agency in its midst than the general merchandise business of Roney Brothers, advantageously located in the town. Few residents greeted the coming of these popular merchants in 1891, and an abundant field was therefore open to them after purchasing their present store from J. W. Matlock. Enlarged from time to time, the store now presents an appearance of prosperity, being well patronized by residents in town and county who desire first-class articles at moderate prices.

Anthony L. Roney, the senior member of the firm, and a man around whom centers a great deal of popular interest, was born in Auglaize county, Ohio, October 8, 1847, and comes of an old Pennsylvania family long represented in America. His father, who was born and reared in Pennsylvania, was an expert woolen mill man. After his marriage he moved with his family to Ohio in 1834, lived in Auglaize county until 1872, and then moved to Davis county, Mo., which continued to be his home until 1878. Coming to Oregon during that year he bought a farm of one hundred and fifty-six acres near Dexter, and there engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death at the age of seventy-eight years. He was survived by his wife who eventually removed to Eugene, and died at the age of eighty-three. Mr. Roney was a staunch Republican, and at times worked for the political advancement of his friends. His twelve children received practical common school educations, and in their homes were taught the homely virtues of honesty and industry. Charles, the second son, and Henry are residents of Indianapolis; Thomas lives in Mississippi; L. Nelson resides in Eugene; Anthony L.; Charlotte, wife of Thomas Harris, resides in Missouri; and Emily, wife of Rasmus Rasmusson, is a resident of Indianapolis, Ind.

Remaining on the home farm until his marriage in March, 1881, with Clara Hunsaker, Anthony L. Roney went to housekeeping on a farm near Dexter, and for eight years engaged in farming, stock and grain-raising, with considerable success. His next venture was the mercantile business in which he is now engaged, and in which he is in partnership with his brother, L. Nelson Roney. Like his father, Mr. Roney takes an active interest in Republican politics, and for many years has been a member of the school board of Goshen. The Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees profit by his membership, and he has passed all of the chairs in the respective lodges. In connection with his store he has been post-master of Goshen for fourteen years, serving the interests of the government and his fellow-townsmen with satisfaction. Mr. Roney has a pleasant home for his small family, which consists of himself, wife and son, Raleigh C.

HON. JOHN KELLY. For many generations the family to which John Kelly, deceased, belonged was identified extensively with woolen manufacturing in Dublin, Ireland, in which city he was born May 3, 1818. Following the example of his father, he learned every detail of the business, so that when he came alone to America at the age of nineteen years he had at his command a useful and paying trade. He first located in Canada, in time becoming manager of small woolen mills, located at Montreal and Quebec, and afterward filled a similar position in a small town in Vermont. For several years thereafter he followed a seafaring life, sailing in merchantships engaged in the Atlantic trade. Tiring of the sea, he settled in Waterford, Racine county, Wis., where in partnership with George Hovey he established the Waterford Woolen Mills.

In the early forties Mr. Kelly left Wisconsin and in Missouri responded to the call for volunteers to serve in the Mexican war. Enlisting in the Third Missouri Cavalry, he at once engaged in active service, developing especial shrewdness and trustworthiness as a scout. During a comparatively short service he was called upon to perform many important missions; and though honorably discharged at Jefferson Barracks, he remained in the service, entering the Quartermaster's department. In this capacity he accompanied a regiment of cavalry across the plains in 1849, acting as wagon-master, and arriving in Oregon City in October of that year. In connection with this service he contracted to supply the regiment with beef until March, 1850.

Soon after his arrival in Oregon he entered into a partnership with three others, one of whom was Gen. Joseph Lane, purchased three hundred head of cattle, and drove them to the Rogue River valley. There General Lane, with the aid of part of the cattle and other persuasive means, succeeded in negotiating a treaty of peace with the Indians of that region, who for two years had been waging war against the white settlers. After the conclusion of the treaty Mr. Kelly and his partners continued their journey southward to Tehama county, Cal., mined with moderate success on Olney creek, and in the spring of 1851 drove the remaining cattle to a ranch in Scott valley. He soon sold his interest in the ranch, however, and returned to Oregon, taking up a donation claim near Roseburg. His previous experience in the cattle industry stood him in good stead. His property proved to be well adapted to extensive operations, and for about seventeen years he was engaged in stock-raising on a large scale. For a number of years he also conducted a cattle-driving business with Thomas Brown and Martin Angel, annually driving large herds of cattle to Scott's Bar.

In 1861 Mr. Kelly was appointed registrar of the United States land office at Roseburg, and though he nominally resigned from the office in 1866 he continued to perform the duties thereof through a deputy until the appointment of his successor in 1868.

In 1866 Mr. Kelly located in Springfield, Lane county, and became interested in a lumber and grist mill, at the same time conducting a large stock farm and a ferry across the Willamette river. From a comparatively small beginning he branched out into a large lumber contracting business with various railroad and other corporations, and soon became widely known as an extensive operator. Upon disposing of his lumber interests in 1869, he purchased a farm of four hundred acres adjoining Springfield. This property he devoted to stock-raising and general farming, and was thus engaged at the time of his appointment to the post of collector of customs in Portland in 1871. This office he filled with credit to himself and with satisfaction to the government during the second administration of President Grant and the first two years of the administration of President Hayes. Under President Arthur he was appointed one of three commissioners to accept one hundred miles of the track of the Northern Pacific railroad, and in 1890 was appointed superintendent of the Federal census for Oregon.

Upon the completion of his service in the customs, Mr. Kelly returned to his farm, which had developed into one of the finest properties in Lane county, and remained there until his removal to Eugene in 1900. In the meantime additional farming lands came into his possession, giving him in all four hundred and forty acres near Springfield, nine hundred acres on Fall creek, and fourteen hundred acres in the Mohawk valley. Much of this land was disposed of before his death, on July 15, 1902, but he left a valuable property to his family.

In LaFayette, Ore., January 30, 1853, Mr. Kelly was united in marriage with Elizabeth Parker, a native of Rockford, Ind., and a daughter of Rev. Patterson C. Parker, a pioneer of 1852. (For further family history, see sketch of Rev. P. C. Parker, which appears elsewhere in this volume.) The following children were born of the union: Mary L., wife of Henry B. Miller, United States consul at Niu Chwang, China; Theresa M., wife of L. G. Jackson, of Eugene; John F., vice president of the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company, of Eugene; Marcella S., wife of Judge Tanner, of Portland, Ore.; Abraham L.; George H., superintendent of the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company; Elizabeth P. and Katharine S., residing with their mother at No. 141 West Sixth street, Eugene, Ore.

In his fraternal relations Mr. Kelly was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Order of the Eastern Star. The death of Mr. Kelly, though he had attained the great age of eighty-four years, was a distinct loss to the citizenship of Lane county. Though retired from active participation in the affairs of the strenuous life of the day, his strong guiding hand had been but so recently felt that he naturally left a marked impress upon the trend of events. He was a man of remarkable strength of character, yet of a gracious and benevolent disposition, always desirous of accomplishing what he could for the betterment of mankind and particularly for the advancement of the highest and best interests of the home of his adoption. He left to his family a legacy of an honored name—a private, public and business record to which his descendants may refer with feelings of justifiable gratification and pride.

FRANK M. FRESH. The well-developed farm now owned by Robert Downing, in Marion county, is the birthplace of another well-known and successful citizen of this community, Frank M. Fresh, who was born July 28, 1861. John Fresh, the father of Frank Fresh, was born in the state of Kentucky, and was reared on the farm of his parents, receiving there a fair common school education. In time he started out on an independent career, locating in Missouri, whence started so many from the fertile lands beyond the Rocky mountains. At a very early day he joined a caravan bound for the northwest, and in time became one of the pioneers and upbuilders of Union county, later settling near Macleay, Marion county. Here he took up a large donation claim, improved it to a considerable extent, and died in comparatively comfortable circumstances in 1863. He married Margaret Stanton, and two children were born to him, of whom Benjamin is a farmer in Marion county.

His mother dying when he was two years old, Frank M. Fresh went with his brother Benjamin to live with his maternal grandmother Stanton, remaining on her farm until her death at the age of eighty-seven years. His grandmother treated him like a son, and was worthy of all consideration as one of the noble and pioneer women of this state. As a young man Mr. Fresh took possession of his present farm, upon which he has made many fine improvements, and is engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

January 19, 1902, he was united in marriage with Helen Isenhardt, a daughter of Lawrence Isenhardt, and a native of Silverton, Ore. Her parents died when she was a child. From a desolated home she passed into the affectionate care of her uncle Stephen, with whom she remained until her marriage. Mr. and Mrs. Fresh are members of the Christian Church, and are young people of promising and reliable traits of character. In addition to his own farm of seventy acres Mr. Fresh farms the property formerly owned by his grandmother, and thus his responsibility is a large one, which, however, he is thoroughly competent to handle. Mr. Fresh is a practical and thorough farmer, thrifty, economical, and possesses excellent business judgment.

FRED P. HURST. The electric lighting of the towns of Canby, Barlow, Hubbard, and Aurora, is due to the enterprise of Fred P. Hurst, who, with his brother, John B., a practical electrician, started the Aurora plant in September, 1902. The modern electric machine was installed at an expense of $5,000, and the water plant at an expense of $6,000. The dynamo has a sixty-five horse power, and the water plant a one hundred horse power. At present Mr. Hurst is extending his interests, and is planning to light the farming community around Aurora, and also the towns of Butteville and Gervais. In connection with the electric plant he maintains a cereal mill and feed chopper, erected at an expense of $1,000. The water from Deer and Elk creeks furnishes sufficient power for all needs, and the enterprise has proved a paying and very successful one.

Mr. Hurst is a native son of Oregon, and was born near Corvallis, August 21, 1870, the third oldest of five children born to John Daniel and Helen C. (Corlburg) Hurst, the former of whom was born in Rheinstadt, Germany, in 1834. The remaining children of the family are as follows: William S., who is now engaged in the commission business in Hubbard; John B., who is married and lives in Aurora; Flora N. deceased; and Henry H., of Aurora. Fred P. Hurst was educated in the public schools of Salem and Aurora, and from a youth became familiar with the milling business, in which his father was for many years engaged. In time he became half owner of the mill, and at the time of his father's death, in 1899, assumed entire control. A devastating fire in September, 1901, reduced the mill to ashes, the loss, however, being partly covered by an insurance of $6,000. Thereafter he started the electric light plant, of which mention has already been made, erecting the same on the site of the old mill, and on a portion of the one-hundred and seventy-eight acres comprising his home. This property was bought by Mr. Hurst after his father's death, and he lives with his mother, who was born in Sweden, in June, 1837, and who came to the United States in 1860, locating in Fairfield, Iowa. In 1863, Mrs. Hurst came across the plains, as a member of the same train in which her husband traveled, and was married soon after reaching Oregon. She is at present sixty-six years of age.

In politics Mr. Hurst is independent, and he is fraternally popular, being a member of various organizations. He is identified with the Native Sons of Oregon, Hermes Lodge No. 56, K. P.; the Rathbone Sisters; Aurora Lodge No. 21, A. O. U. W., and Nesmuck Camp No. 26, W. O. W. In religion he is a member of the First Presbyterian Church. Mr. Hurst is ambitious and progressive, and his effort to improve the general condition of Aurora and its sister towns has met with deserved support and appreciation. He is one of the foremost of the younger generation of business men in this county, and his future participation in important enterprises is assured.

CLEMENT S. FRANK. Though general efforts of a public-spirited nature have characterized the career of Clement Stoddard Frank, in Eugene, he will be longest remembered as the founder of the New York Racket Store, the first of its kind in the state, and also the first cash store in this town.

This enterprise, started by Mr. Frank in 1890, and managed by him uninterruptedly until selling out his stock in January, 1903, marks a distinct era of commercial development, and won for the owner and proprietor an enviable business reputation. For the first nine months of its existence the store was run under the firm name of Frank & Fisk, but upon the assumption of Mr. Fisk's responsibility by Perry Frank, the father of Clement S., the firm name was changed to P. Frank & Son. The present store, at 34, 36 and 38 East Ninth street, with its floor space covering 40x110 feet, and its modern furnishings, best indicate the progress made during the past few years, being a decided improvement over the original quarters, which were limited to 23x80 feet floor space. The new store, erected in 1895, is still owned by Mr. Frank, but this by no means represents the extent of his town possessions. Besides his own residence on East Ninth street, he has built and owns several residences in different parts of the city, and he is considered one of the financially strong and substantial business men of Lane county.

Mr. Frank was born in Busti, Chautauqua county, N. Y., November 8, 1847, and before coming to Eugene had acquired considerable experience. His ancestors on both sides of the family furnished incentive to well doing, ranging from commercial ability and rugged honesty on the paternal side, to religious enthusiasm, self-sacrifice, and patriotism on the maternal side. Perry Frank, the father of C. S. Frank, was born in Busti, Chautauqua county, N. Y., September 23, 1825, was a son of John and Elizabeth (Devendorf) Frank, the former of whom was born in Herkimer county, N. Y., and the latter in Germany. Elizabeth Frank used to relate many interesting happenings of the very early days in New York to her grandchildren, who never tired of hearing how she and her twin sister were captured by the Indians, and for four years held as prisoners, compelled to wander from place to place, and eat and dress as did the red men.

Her husband was a tanner, currier and shoemaker, an occupation which he taught his son, Perry, and which he followed for his entire active life, first in Herkimer and afterwards at Busti, Chautauqua county, N. Y.

Perry Frank owned a large farm in Chautauqua county, and this, combined with his tannery and shoe manufacturing, made him a very active man. In 1857 he removed to Henry county, Iowa, and after engaging in shoe manufacturing for ten years he also engaged in the grain, grocery and drug business in New London. He was very successful in his large undertaking, and when he disposed of his business and came to Eugene in 1888, he brought with him sufficient means to live in comfort for the balance of his life. He is Republican in politics, and since 1836, when he was eleven years of age, has been a member of the Baptist Church. Through his marriage with Mary E. Stoddard, in Busti, N. Y., January 6, 1847, Mr. Frank became identified with a family of exceptionally fine history, and equally excellent personal characteristics. Mrs. Frank was born in Eden, Erie county, N. Y., November, 19, 1826, a daughter of Rev. Ira C. Stoddard, who was born in Brattleboro, Vt., in 1792, and great-granddaughter of Jonathan Stoddard, who was one of General Washington's body-guards in the Revolution war. Rev. I. C. Stoddard was one of the early teachers of New York state, and although an eloquent preacher and large-hearted humanitarian, supported himself by his efforts as a farmer, refusing remuneration for his services as a minister of the gospel. He married Charlotte Joy, also a native of Brattleboro, Vt., and who was born in 1795, a daughter of Elijah H. and Elizabeth (Chase) Joy, and on the maternal side was descended from one of four brothers, William, Elijah, Lewis and Levi, who came to America on the Mayflower, and settled in Massachusetts. Rev. Ira C. Stoddard and his wife spent their last years in Busti, N. Y., whither they had removed in 1836, the grandfather dying in 1878, and the grandmother in 1886.

Mrs. Frank's brother, Rev. Ira J. Stoddard, named for his father, was a missionary to India for twenty years, and is now living retired at Pella, Iowa, being eighty-three years old. He was for many years president of the Baptist College at Pella. Two of his brothers, Jacob and Hiram, served in the Civil war, Jacob serving in the Ninth Cavalry, Company F, New York, and Hiram, who was a member of the Seventeenth New York Volunteer Infantry, was captured and held in Libby prison for nine months.

Mrs. Frank is still living, and besides Clement S., the oldest of her children, had a daughter, Arabella Larooka, who died in Iowa in 1874.

Clement S. Frank was reared in New York state until 1857, and then accompanied his parents to Iowa, he being ten years of age at the time. At the age of fourteen he began to learn the shoemaker's trade of his father, and at the same time he was busy acquiring an excellent education, studying at the public schools of New London, at the Mount Pleasant Academy, and at the Burlington Baptist College, attending the latter institution for two years. From the college class-rooms he stepped into a shoe manufacturing business in Denmark, Iowa, but soon after quit to engage in business with his father, and was thus employed until father and son contracted a partnership in the shoe, grocery, drug and grain business in New London. In 1885 he removed to near Ord, Valley county, Neb., and engaged in a stock-raising business for three and a half years, moving from there to Eugene in 1888. Like his father, Mr. Frank is a Republican, and he is further like his sire in entertaining broad and liberal views in regard to office holding. He is prominent fraternally, and, in 1878, became a member of Charity Lodge No. 56 of Odd Fellows of New London, Iowa, and in 1883 became a member of Industry Encampment No. 18 of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in 1889 became a member of Spencer Butte Lodge No. 9 of Eugene, of which he is past grand, and in 1890 a member of Whimawhala Encampment No. 6, of which he is a past chief patriarch, and is also district deputy. The Rebekas and Woodmen of the World also profit by his membership.

Edward Ray Frank, son of C. S. Frank, was born in New London, Henry county, Iowa, September 6, 1870, Edna May was born in New London, Iowa, January 19, 1874, Libert Joy Frank, son of Edward Ray Frank, was born in Eugene, Ore., October 30, 1896, making four generations of the Frank family now living in Eugene, Oregon. Mrs. C. S. Frank was formerly Mrs. Lizzie (Mueller) Machaw, a native of New York City, and the mother of one daughter by her first marriage. With his wife, Mr. Frank is a member of the Baptist Church, and is serving at the present as chairman of the board of trustees.

ALEXANDER THOMPSON, who occupies a farm of two hundred and eighty acres situated about ten miles northeast of Salem, in Marion county, comprising a portion of the old Rice Dunbar donation claim, is descended from an old New Jersey family. He was born near Mendham, N. J., on September 29, 1836, and is a son of George Harris and Tempe Leddel (McCrea) Thompson. George H. Thompson was of Scotch descent, a son of Stephen and a grandson of David Thompson, who served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war and fought with Washington at Morristown. It was the father of this Revolutionary soldier who immigrated from Scotland to America about the middle of the eighteenth century, locating in New Jersey. George H. Thompson, born in New Jersey October 9, 1803, served two terms as a member of the New Jersey state legislature, and was a man who exerted a great influence in his community. For a long period he served as a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, toward the support of which he contributed liberally of his means. His death occurred at Mendham, N. J., in 1883. He was united in marriage September 25, 1830, with Tempe Leddel McCrea, who died August 31, 1864, at the age of fifty-six years. She was a daughter of Philip McCrea, a native of New York state. The latter was a nephew of Jane McCrea, whose death at the hands of the British and the Indians of eastern New York formed one of the most exciting incidents in the colonial history of that section, and resulted in the creation of the popular sentiment and patriotic spirit which made possible the great victory at the battles of Saratoga.

Mr. Thompson received his education in the common schools of New Jersey. Upon attaining the age of twenty-two years he decided to embark upon a self-supporting career. As in the cases of thousands of other young men residing in the east in those days, the alluring tales in circulation regarding the vaunted superiority of western opportunities appealed to him strongly; and, with a determination to put his fortunes to the hazard in the region west of the Mississippi, he started for Missouri. The romance connected with life in that state was dispelled not long after his arrival there, however, and he was glad to return to the state of his nativity, where he continued to reside until 1861. In that year he started for the Pacific coast, traveling by way of the Isthmus of Panama to California. From San Francisco he went direct to Nevada, which was then attracting hordes of venturesome spirits from all parts of the world, and in that territory he was engaged in mining for a year. His experience in the mining fields of the west covered most of the period from 1861 to 1867, and included work in Montana and Idaho as well as Nevada. In the last-named year Mr. Thompson came to Oregon and purchased the farm on the west slope of the Waldo Hills, where he has since resided. At the time he purchased the property it contained three hundred and eighty acres, one hundred acres of which he ultimately sold. This farm is in a highly cultivated and very productive state, and is devoted to general farming and stock-raising. It is well equipped, and the improvements are all modern and of a substantial nature.

Mr. Thompson has been twice married. On April 26, 1871, he was united with Harriett Small, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Henderson and Elizabeth (Burnett) Small. (For history of the Small family the reader is referred to the sketch of Matthew Small.) She died April 24, 1874, leaving one daughter, Lida. October 4, 1876, Mr. Thompson was united in marriage with Adeline McAlpin, daughter of Robert and Jane (Thomas) McAlpin. She was born in Jackson county, Mo., and crossed the plains to Oregon with her parents in 1852. Of this union five children have been born, namely: Roxanna, wife of Dr. D. J. Clark, of Silverton, Ore.; Orla, wife of Arthur J. Stimpson, of Portland; George Harris, at home; Maud Ethel, at home, and James J., at home.

Ever since attaining maturity Mr. Thompson has been a staunch advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and has been actively identified with its operations in Marion county. His fitness for offices of trust and responsibility has been repeatedly recognized by the party. He was at one time a candidate for nomination to the office of sheriff of Marion county, but after an exciting triangular contest in the convention an opposing candidate was nominated. During all but the final ballot he lacked but six votes of the nomination. His interest in the cause of education is illustrated by the fact that for many years he has served continuously as school director in his district, and for most of that period he has been clerk. He is an active worker in the Congregational Church, to the maintenance and work of which he has always contributed freely of his time and money; and for ten years he has served as superintendent of the Sunday school connected with that denomination.

This necessarily brief outline of the life of Alexander Thompson conveys but a faint idea of his value as a conscientious and high-minded member of society. Throughout his entire career he has striven to be guided in his daily walks by the Golden Rule, doing no man an injustice through intention, but exhibiting on all occasions a high-minded, unselfish public spirit and a generosity of heart that will cause his name to be revered by his descendants and the future generations of the neighborhood generally. It is to such men as he that the Willamette valley of today owes a debt it can never pay, for in all his undertakings he has been actuated by motives of the highest character, helping to build a foundation upon which the future of this commonwealth will rest secure. This, at least, is the estimate placed upon his life and character by those who have known him for more than thirty-five years. It is with genuine pleasure that the publishers of this work preserve for the future generations this record of a complete life, unsullied by moral taint or personal dishonor at any period of his useful career; but, on the contrary, replete with demonstrations of a nobility of character and continuous usefulness that should inspire the young men of the present day to attain the best of which they are capable.

JAMES M. BROWN. One of the most energetic and far-sighted business men of Silverton is J. M. Brown, whose speculations have been so judiciously made that they have brought to him a splendid financial return. He has been a resident of Oregon since 1846 and has taken advantage of its splendid business opportunities as the state has grown and developed. He was born in Lincoln county, Mo., January 6, 1844, and is a son of James Brown, who was born in Kentucky, March 14, 1814. His grandfather, Bartholomew Brown, was a native of North Carolina, whence he crossed the Alleghanies into Kentucky about 1804. The father of the latter came from Wales about the middle of the eighteenth century, locating at Old Fort, N. C., where he was killed while serving in the Colonial militia. Bartholomew Brown located on the Green river in Kentucky and there engaged in farming until 1830, when he removed to Illinois, settling near Alton. After a short time, however, he went to Missouri, locating in Lincoln county, near Troy, where he died at the age of forty-eight years. A note of interest in his family is the fact that so far as is known his sons and daughters have attained a greater average of years than any other family in the United States. James Brown accompanied his parents on their removal to Missouri and was reared to manhood on their home farm. After arriving at years of maturity he wedded Lucinda Davis, who was born in Wheeling, Va. In the year 1846 they joined the emigrants who were crossing the plains to gain dominion over the northwest. After a long and tedious journey they arrived at Silverton September 14, 1846, and secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, part of which is now included within the northern limits of the present city of Silverton. Mr. Brown established the first tannery in Oregon, its site being a half mile north of Silverton. This he conducted from 1847 until 1849, when he closed out the business in order to go to the gold mines of California, where he spent three months, and then returned home with one thousand dollars. He next gave his attention to cattle-raising and general farming. He built the Eating House at a cost of two thousand dollars, which stands on the territorial road leading from Portland to California, a half mile north of Silverton. This was erected in 1850, and at the time was the leading eating house between Portland and San Francisco. Mr. Brown was a typical southern man of high principles, generous and extremely hospitable. The circle of his friends was almost co-extensive with the circle of his acquaintances and he commanded the warm esteem of all with whom he was associated. His wife died in 1872 and he passed away in March, 1887.

James M. Brown was the third in order of birth of their family of nine children, four sons and five daughters. He obtained a good business education, and when sixteen years of age he engaged in dealing in cattle and horses, and otherwise speculating in stock. In his business transactions he was ever successful, and by the time he had reached the age of twenty-three years he had accumulated five thousand dollars. He then determined to engage in general merchandising and in 1868 entered into partnership with Messrs. Davenport & Wolfard in a general mercantile and milling business, but in this he was not successful. He then turned his attention to the raising of sheep and prospered in this undertaking. He has throughout his entire life engaged in speculation to a greater or less extent. He laid out Brown's addition to Silverton in 1889, and at the same time Brown's addition A. His investments have been made with marked foresight. He recognized with wonderful clearness a good opportunity and utilized it. One of his business principles was to place a fair price upon what he had to sell, and when that amount was offered, to sell it. He forms his plans readily, is determined in their execution, and he carries forward to successful completion whatever he undertakes. He owns different tracts of land, comprising altogether about three hundred acres.

Mr. Brown was married in Portland March 27, 1873, to Miss Edna J. Eastham, who was born eight miles north of Silverton November 25, 1850, and has been a successful school teacher. Her father, William F. Eastham, was a native of Virginia, and on emigrating westward took up his abode in Macoupin county, Ill., where he carried on farming. There he was married in March, 1848, to Delilah Ann Cleaver, and in the same year he started for Oregon, in company with his wife's father, Benjamin Cleaver. After residing for about two years at Oregon City he secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres eight miles north of Silverton, and afterward sold half of this and made his home with Mr. Brown, both he and his wife dying in Silverton. He was born November 23, 1823, and died December 30, 1901. His wife was born February 15, 1831, and died January 29, 1892. Mr. Eastham was the last survivor, save one, of the jury that convicted the Indians who killed Dr. Whitman. John Lawson Eastham, father of William F., was born in the colony of Fauquier county, Va., in 1776, and died in Macoupin county, Ill., in 1862. His wife, Nancy Farrow, was born in Culpeper county, Va., in 1781, and died in Macoupin county, Ill., in 1868.

Benjamin Cleaver, Mrs. Brown's grandfather, was a son of Benjamin and Elizabeth Cleaver, and was born in Grayson county, Ky., September 6, 1803, where his wife was also born May 29, 1808. They were married there December 9, 1824. He came to Oregon in 1848, and after spending two years in Oregon City took up a donation claim on the south slope of Mount Angel, where most of the remainder of his life was spent. He served as justice of the peace for many years, and was a man of extensive influence in the early days. He died in 1892, and his wife in 1864. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Brown have been born four children: Percy L., Carl M., Florence, and Earl (a twin brother of Carl, now deceased). The eldest son was educated in Willamette University. The younger son has also been a student in that institution and they are now associated in the conduct of the Silverton Water Works. Mr. Brown's daughter was educated in Willamette University and in the Salem Business College. For over thirty years Mr. Brown was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In politics he is a stalwart Prohibitionist. He has always been an opponent of oppression or slavery in any form. He was a staunch Abolitionist during the Civil war and is now bitterly opposed to the slavery which enthralled the spirits and operations of men, known as the liquor habit. Mr. Brown practices what he preaches, for he has never taken a drink of whiskey in his life, nor does he use tobacco. His life is clean, his principles honorable, his actions manly and sincere. In the community where he has so long resided he is held in uniform regard.

JOHN P. HUMPHREYS. Among the pioneers who crossed the plains in 1852, and have since been identified with the upbuilding of this wonderful commonwealth, is John P. Humphreys, younger brother of William J. Humphreys, also a large land owner and extensive stock-raiser of this section. Mr. Humphreys is the representative of a southern family located for many years in Tennessee, in which state he was born January 2, 1832. The two brothers mentioned were among the most ambitious of a large family of children born to Thomas M. and Jane (Harrison) Humphreys. In their youth they worked hard from morning until night, taking part in the diversions afforded the youth of that neighborhood, and indulging in the dreams of future success, which make up a large part of the existence of an active and healthy boy. The Wilson sisters were born and reared in the same community, and July 21, 1852, a double wedding furnished enjoyment for a great many guests, all of whom partook of a royal feast, and had only good wishes for the happy young people. Margaret Moore Wilson became the wife of John P. Humphreys, and she and her husband made up two interesting members of the party which outfitted and crossed the plains in September, 1852, arriving in due time in Missouri, where the oncoming winter suggested a rest until the following spring. With renewed strength and spirits they started out again in the spring, and Mr. Humphreys took up a three hundred and twenty-acre claim near Scio, Linn county. A more desolate or unpromising location could hardly be conceived of at the time. However, there was an abundance of timber, and a good water supply, and it was with great hopefulness that the young man hewed logs and built himself and wife a one-room house, 16x16 feet, ground dimensions. This little house continued to be their home until 1858, when they moved upon another place, Mr. Humphreys erecting a saw-mill, which he ran with considerable success until 1861. The mill was traded that year for land in Linn county, consisting of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which they lived during the winter of 1862. The next spring they removed to the Waldo Hills, and in the fall went to Idaho, where he bought a claim.

After six months of mining in Idaho, Mr. Humphreys was convinced that he was not born to seek a fortune in the mines, and thereupon returned to Marion county, where he bought the farm in the Waldo Hills, upon which he lives. He has two hundred and two acres eleven miles east of Salem, and the improvements are all due to his enterprise and unflagging industry. A practical and scientific farmer, that he has succeeded is not to be wondered at in so enterprising and resourceful a man.

Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Humphreys: Thomas M., a mail clerk in the United States postal service, residing in Woodburn; William H., of Marion county; Mary Minerva, the wife of James Darby; John A., a resident of Springfield, Ore.; Charles L., of Marion county; Penelope Jane, wife of C. M. Cartwright, residing in the vicinity of Monroe; Oliver, who died at the age of seven, and Joseph Frank, who is managing the home farm. It was here that the latter's birth occurred, April 7, 1872. He was united in marriage, September 16, 1891, to Minnie L. King, daughter of James T. King, of Marion county, and they have four children: James Harold, Herbert Rodney, Dolfie Albert and Mary Marguerite, the latter dying at the age of nineteen months.

Like his brother, John P. Humphreys votes the Republican ticket, and he has taken an active part in local and county political undertakings, having filled a number of offices. He bears an honored name in this county, and is esteemed as one of the successful, reliable and substantial citizens.

HARVEY A. HINKLE. A good example of what steady effort, constantly directed, can in a short time accomplish, is furnished by the record of Harvey A. Hinkle, the subject of this biography, who, although young in years, is conceded to be one of the most successful hop buyers on the western coast of the United States. Mr. Hinkle is junior member of the commission house of W. S. Hurst & Co., having complete charge of the branch house located at Hubbard, Marion county.

He was born in Clackamas county, Ore., March 6, 1870, a son of John R. and Elmira (Thomas) Hinkle, and grandson of Alexander and Fannie (Hinkle) Hinkle. More extensive mention of his ancestors is given in the sketch of John Robert Hinkle, the father, and will be found elsewhere in this history.

Mr. Hinkle is the youngest of two children born to his parents. He has one sister, Eliza, wife of O. L. Darling, of Salem. He obtained the rudiments of his education in the public schools of Elliott Prairie, and in 1881 entered Willamette University at Salem, where he took a scientific course. In 1888 he began a business course in the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated February 20, 1889. Returning to Salem, he became a salesman in the mercantile establishment of Steiger Brothers, and a few months later we find him similarly associated with Preger Brothers, of Portland.

In 1890 Mr. Hinkle, in company with George M. Fry, opened a general merchandise store at Hubbard, and for three years a successful business was carried on under the firm name of Fry & Hinkle. In 1893, our subject sold his interest to Mr. Fry and began buying hops for a broker in San Francisco. This occupied his attention for a number of years, during which he made a remarkable record as a hop buyer. In 1899 he made a change and followed a similar business in connection with the Paul G. R. Horst & Lochmund Company, of Salem, who shipped to New York City. Mr. Hinkle remained in their employ until 1902, when he entered the employ of W. S. Hurst & Co., commission merchants, owning a half interest in that flourishing business, and, it is needless to say, contributes his part toward its success.

Mr. Hinkle was united in marriage with Sarah Fry, of Aurora, and they have one child, Lona. In politics Mr. Hinkle is a Republican of the most pronounced type; he has served two terms as recorder and is now a member of the city council. Aside from other business pursuits he is associated with his father in raising cattle for the market. He has hosts of friends who predict for him a brilliant future, and he is a worthy member of the Knights of Pythias; Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and Woodmen of the World.

EDWARD J. FRASIER. Conspicuously identified with the industrial and business growth and prosperity of Lane county is E. J. Frasier, who is a large property owner, and the leading real estate dealer of Eugene. A man of marked intellectual vigor and cultivated tastes, progressive in his ideas, and the possessor of rare executive ability, he holds a position of influence in the community, and is contributing his full share towards the advancement of its highest interests. He was born February 28, 1857, at Delhi, Delaware county, N. Y., which was also the birthplace of his father, Alexander Frasier. He comes of Scotch ancestry, his paternal grandparents, William and Isabelle (Shaw) Frasier, having both been born and reared in Inverness, Scotland. Emigrating to New York when young, they settled on a farm near Delhi, N. Y., and there spent the remainder of their lives, William Frasier's death occurring at the remarkable age of one hundred and three years, while his widow attained the age of ninety-five years. The grandfather served in the war of 1812, and several years later took an active part in the Anti-Rent war, when battles were fought with pitchforks.

Reared to agricultural pursuits, Alexander Frasier was engaged in general farming in Delhi, N. Y., until 1868, when he removed with his family to California, taking his wife and nine children by way of the Isthmus of Panama. Settling at Monterey, he purchased a large ranch, where he engaged in the breeding of Shorthorn cattle, until at one time he had eight thousand head. He also embarked in the dairy business on a large scale, milking eight hundred cows. In the memorable drought of 1876 and 1877, which devastated that section of the state, he lost the greater part of his stock. Coming to Salem, Ore., in 1877, he bought a small farm, and was there engaged in horticultural pursuits until his death, which occurred at the age of seventy-six years, at Tacoma, Wash., while he was there on a visit. He married Alice Jane Douglas, who was born in New York city, and died in San Francisco, Cal. Her father, Rev. James A. Douglas, was born in Inverness, Scotland. He was graduated from the University of Edinburgh, where he subsequently held a professorship until his emigration to America, when he settled in New York city as a Presbyterian minister. Nine children blessed the union of Alexander and Alice J. (Douglas) Frasier, seven of whom are still living. One son, James A., served in the Civil war as member of a company of the New York Volunteer Infantry.

The sixth child in the family, E. J. Frasier was eleven years old when he left his native town to come to California. Continuing his studies, he attended first the public schools of Monterey, then of Salinas, after which he was a pupil in the high school of Salem, Ore., and of Healds' Business College, in San Francisco, finally completing his education in the California State Normal School at San Jose. Beginning his professional career at the teacher's desk, he taught one year in Salem, Ore., and was afterwards employed in various places, including Newport, Hubbard and Howells Prairie, in Oregon. Then, spending a while in California, he taught there for a short time. Returning to Oregon, he had charge of a school in Marion for a time; but resigned his position there to enter the employ of Hubert Howe Bancroft, who was compiling a history of the Pacific coast states, and while thus engaged Mr. Frasier wrote the history of that part of the state, extending from the city of Salem to Oregon's southern boundary line, spending two years in the work. The ensuing three and one-half years he was head bookkeeper at the State Insane Asylum in Salem, serving under Dr. Carpenter and Dr. Josephi.

Locating in Eugene in 1889, Mr. Frasier organized the Lane County Land and Loan Company, a real estate and mortgage loan concern, of which he has since been secretary and manager. He has likewise been the secretary, since its organization, of the Eugene Real Estate Exchange, which he was instrumental in forming, and whose constitution and by-laws he drafted. Being appointed by Governor Lord a member of the executive committee of the board of commissioners to represent Oregon at the exposition held in Omaha, Neb., in 1898, Mr. Frasier spent about a year of his time in traveling through the state, collecting such exhibits as would best show the various resources and industries of Oregon. That he succeeded well in his arduous labors was proved by the great exhibition of Oregon's arts, industries and manufactures, and the products of its soil, mines and sea at the Omaha Exposition, every part of the state responding generously with exhibits of its special product. Mr. Frasier is an extensive land holder, owning in Lane county several farms, which he rents. He is also interested in the mines of Myrtle creek district, a mining corporation of which was capitalized at $1,500,000, and which owns two thousand one hundred acres of placer mines at Myrtle Creek, Douglas county.

In Woodland, Cal., in 1892, Mr. Frasier married Miss Jenne Stoddard Lee, a native of that town, and they have two children, namely: Brownell Dorris, and Helen Janet Gertrude. Politically Mr. Frasier is a strong advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and takes an active interest in local and national affairs. Fraternally he belongs to Olive Lodge No. 18, I. O. O. F., of Salem, in which he has held all the offices, and is a past grand representative to the Grand Lodge; is a charter member of the Valley Lodge No. 18, A. O. U. W.; and while living in Monterey, Cal., united with the Foresters. In his religious views he is a Presbyterian.

WILLIAM E. ILER. Closely connected with the events of the pioneer days in Marion county, Ore., is the life of William E. Iler, a youthful emigrant to the state of his adoption, within whose range of vision have come great changes during his residence here of over a half century. Fine houses and substantial barns have taken the place of the little log cabins and "shacks" which once constituted the conveniences of the farm; towns and cities have sprung up in the wilderness, with their churches and schools and thriving industries; and even the old fiddle, across whose strings he was wont to scrape the bow to make the music for the country dances, has been displaced by the modern orchestra; and only recollection is left to connect the trials and hardships of those early days with the present affluence.

The birth of William E. Iler occurred in Mercer county, Mo., April 10, 1845, his parents being James and Maria (Vanalsdale) Iler, both of whom were natives of the state of Ohio. From their Missouri home the father started with his family for Oregon in 1847, traveling by ox-team. Upon his arrival at The Dalles he had left but one ox and a cow, so they abandoned their wagon and came by flat boat to Oregon City, where they spent their first winter in the west. Mr. Iler was employed during this winter in transporting provisions to the soldiers stationed at The Dalles. In the spring of 1848 he settled upon a farm owned by a Mr. Hudson, which was located three miles east of Oregon City, and contained three hundred and twenty acres. There he remained but a short time, soon taking up a donation claim in the same neighborhood. After a brief experience in a logging camp he again took his family to the Hudson farm, remaining upon the same until 1851, when he took up another claim, located in the vicinity of Butteville, Marion county, consisting of six hundred and forty acres. In this location he remained until his death, in 1883, at the age of seventy-two years. His wife died in 1880, at the age of sixty-seven. Of the five children which blessed the union there is only one now living, that being William E. Iler of this review. The second child, Emma R., attained maturity and married Gustavus A. Cone, Sr. Her death occurred in 1881.

William E. Iler was five years old at the time of his father's removal to his claim, and there he grew to manhood, reared to an agricultural life. His early education was received in the common schools in the vicinity of his home, which he attended in the short intermission between the farming seasons. Owing to his father's ill health he was compelled at the age of fifteen years to take entire charge of the farm, which has never since passed from his control. He now owns one hundred and eighty acres of land, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, also being interested in the cultivation of hops, in which business he has met with gratifying success. In 1881 he first gave his attention to the cultivation of this plant, beginning operations with seven acres. In 1888 he had nearly sixty acres devoted to hops, in the year 1890 disposing of over thirty thousand pounds, these figures representing a considerable sum of money. He has at the present time but twelve acres in hops. In the stock line he is interested in Poland-China hogs.

January 10, 1870, Mr. Iler was united in marriage with Miss Lulu Stephens. Fraternally he is identified with the Masons, and is serving as treasurer of the local lodge; he is also a member of Butteville Lodge No. 59, I. O. O. F.; the Maccabees, and the Grange. Being one of the pioneer hop-growers of the Willamette valley, Mr. Iler has been deeply interested in all movements that tend toward the encouragement of the industry. He took an active part in the organization of the Hop-growers' Fire Relief Association, of which he was elected the first president, serving in this office for three years; subsequently he was elected a member of the board of trustees in the association for the protection of hop-growers in the Willamette valley. He is now serving as treasurer of the latter company, which is carrying about $700,000 of insurance. In the Farmers' Relief Fire Insurance Company he was one of the principal organizers, and is now in the directorate.

It will thus be seen, from this all too brief outline of the principal features in the career of Mr. Iler, that he has been intensely and unselfishly interested in various movements which have had for an end the safeguarding of the most important interests of the Willamette valley—for it cannot be denied that in an agricultural section the prime interests are those of the men who cultivate the fields and reap the harvests. In every way a representative of the best citizenship of the country, his name will be perpetuated in this record as that of a man whose life has not been lived in vain—who accomplished all that he could for the benefit of his fellow-men, and whose aim was always to make his career one of honor, integrity and utility. That he has accomplished the result aspired to is the outcome of his own unaided efforts, and a distinct and enduring credit to himself alone.

FREDERICK C. BEAN. The name which heads this sketch has long been associated with the cattle and land interests of Lane county, the business having passed from the father, Obediah R., to Frederick C. Bean, the subject of this sketch. The latter is a native of this great commonwealth, having been born in Lane county, four miles north of Junction City, February 10, 1869, the son of one of the very early pioneers, a review of whose life is to be found in the sketch of Louis E. Bean, of Eugene. Upon his father's farm Frederick C. Bean was reared until he was thirteen years old, when he accompanied his parents to a home near the city of Eugene, thus receiving the advantage which accrued from an attendance of the excellent schools of that city. In April, 1866, his father bought a farm in the vicinity of Mapleton, locating at the head of the tide on the Siuslaw river, and there the elder man spent the remainder of his days successfully engaged in farming, until his death, when the interests passed into the hands of the son.

After assuming the responsibility of the farm at the death of his father Frederick C. Bean continued to make this farm his home, having now three hundred and twenty acres adjoining the town of Mapleton, and a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres five miles east, but resides upon property in Mapleton. He is at the present time engaged in general farming and stock-raising upon his fine property and is also agent for Baug's stage line and conducts a sub-land-office, while he acts as United States commissioner and notary public. He was married in June, 1900, to Laura E. Coleman, who was born fifteen miles southwest of Eugene, Lane county, in 1869. They have two children, Hortense and Rupert. Through Republican influence Mr. Bean was appointed postmaster of Mapleton January 14, 1902, having served for twelve years as deputy to his mother, in the later years having assumed entire charge of the office. He also acted as school clerk. In fraternal relations Mr. Bean is prominent, being a member of the Masonic lodge at Florence; in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Mapleton, he has passed all the chairs and belongs to the Grand Lodge; and is likewise identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Florence, and the Modern Woodmen of America, of Acme.

EWING B. JAMISON. Among the more active and enterprising business men of Polk county is Mr. Jamison, who is connected with one of the leading industries of this section of the state, being secretary, treasurer, and general manager of the Oregon Milling and Warehouse company, which has warehouses at Monmouth and Airlie, and mills at Independence.

A native of Missouri, Mr. Jamison was born September 11, 1868, in Callaway county, a son of Joseph Jamison, and grandson of Ephraim Jamison, who spent the larger part of his life in Missouri. His father was born in Franklin county, Mo., in 1821, and was there reared and educated. A farmer by occupation, he met with success in his operations, and continued a resident of his native state until his death, in 1901, at the advanced age of eighty years.

J. W. Gandy

His wife, whose maiden name was Nancy R. Manpin, died on the home farm, in Missouri, in 1880. Ten children were born of their union, five sons and five daughters.

The youngest child, Ewing B. Jamison, grew to man's estate on the home farm, attending first the district schools, and later the State Normal school at Kirksville, entering in 1886 and graduating in 1889, when he received a state diploma. Mr. Jamison at once came to Oregon, locating in Yamhill county, and for five years thereafter taught school in Amity. Establishing himself as a grain dealer at Amity in 1894, he has since assisted in building up the large business with which he is now identified, and which is incorporated as the Oregon Milling and Warehouse Company, with W. T. Hoffman as president; M. Tillery, vice-president, and Mr. Jamison, secretary, treasurer and general manager. This company has three warehouses, all equipped with the latest approved machinery, and all having a good carrying capacity, the one at Independence being eighty thousand bushels, the one at Airlie forty thousand bushels, and the one at Monmouth sixty thousand bushels. In February, 1902, the company purchased the large milling plant at Independence, fitting it up with the best-known and most modern machinery, and putting in steam power. Under the supervision of Mr. Jamison one hundred barrels of flour per day are here manufactured, the sifter process being used, and the brand, "Pride of Oregon," finding ready sale throughout the Union.

At Portland, in 1893, Mr. Jamison was united in marriage with Miss Alda Pauline Lancefield, a native of Yamhill county. Mrs. Jamison was born at Amity, Ore., July 5, 1875, and is the daughter of Robert W. Lancefield, a native son, and a granddaughter of Robert James Lancefield, of Kent, England. Her mother, Sarah J. Maddox, was born in Monroe county, Mo., and crossed the plains to Oregon in 1865. Mr. and Mrs. Jamison have three children, namely: Mildred Chastain, Olga and Russell Warren. Although in business in Independence, Mr. Jamison resides at Monmouth, where he has an attractive home.

JAMES WHITFIELD GOWDY. Coming to Cottage Grove in ample time to generously aid in its progress and development, which have been carried on so rapidly and to such a remarkable degree, James W. Gowdy has been actively associated with many of its beneficial enterprises, and is numbered among the solid business men of the place. For several years he was engaged in agricultural pursuits, but is now one of the leading furniture dealers of this locality. A son of Calvin A. Gowdy, he was born June 12, 1839, in White county, near Carmi or Enfield, Ill. His grandfather, John Gowdy, spent the earlier part of his life in Tennessee, although he was, probably, a native of North Carolina. Removing from Tennessee to Illinois, he settled in White county, purchasing a farm, on which he spent his remaining years.

Removing from Tennessee, the state of his birth, to White county, Ill., Calvin A. Gowdy was engaged in agricultural pursuits, near the town of Enfield, until his death, at the age of sixty years. He married Cynthia Jane Miller, who died at a comparatively early age. She bore him seven children, five sons and two daughters, James W. being the fourth child in order of birth.

After completing his studies in the common schools of his native town, James W. Gowdy assisted on the home farm until 1857, when an uncle gave him a tract of land to care for. Purchasing forty acres of adjoining land, he carried on general farming a number of years. In 1866 he began working in a grist-mill at Enfield, Ill., and was afterwards employed in a carding-mill, in which he subsequently bought a half interest. Disposing of this property in 1874, Mr. Gowdy followed the star of empire west, arriving November 12 at the present site of Cottage Grove, which was then a wild tract of land still in its primitive condition. In 1876 he bought a half interest in three hundred and twenty acres of land lying west of the present town, and subsequently bought the remaining half. He has since made another purchase, and has now five hundred acres of fertile and well improved land in his ranch. In 1903 Mr. Gowdy platted three acres of his land, laying out Gowdy's addition to Cottage Grove, which has a most pleasant and advantageous location. He has also divided two hundred acres of his land west of town one and one-half miles into ten-acre tracts, most of which have been sold and the place is now called Gowdyville. While engaged in agricultural pursuits, Mr. Gowdy devoted himself for awhile to sheep-raising and breeding, in 1878, in company with another man, driving them to eastern Oregon to the ranges. Of recent years he has rented his farms, and devoted his attention to other industries. For four or more years he carried on a substantial livery business, giving it up in 1903 to enter into his present occupation as a furniture dealer. His first partner, U. S. Martin, sold his interest in the firm to his brother, Jesse Martin, with whom Mr. Gowdy is now associated. These gentlemen have already established a large trade in their particular line of goods, their able and systematic business methods winning them signal success. Mr. Gowdy has also valuable mining property, being interested in a group of six mining claims, the Golconda, in the Bohemia district, and is one of the directors of the company. When he came to Oregon, in 1874, Mr. Gowdy traveled over the Central Pacific railway, being on an emigrant train from Omaha to San Francisco, where he took a boat to Portland, Ore. Returning to Enfield, Ill., in 1884, he went over the Northern Pacific railroad in October, returning the following December by way of New Orleans, where he spent two weeks, thence through Texas and Arizona to his home.

Mr. Gowdy married first, in Lane county, Ore., Helen Small, who died in 1877, in eastern Oregon, where Mr. Gowdy had taken her for the benefit of her health. Mr. Gowdy later married at Cottage Grove, Mrs. Anna Jane Van Riper, a native of Iowa, and they have two children living, namely: Virgil Whitfield and Erma Bethel. A staunch Democrat in his political affiliations, Mr. Gowdy has served as school director for many years, and is now serving his second term in the city council. Fraternally he is a Mason, an Odd Fellow, a member of the Rebekas, and a Knight of Pythias. He is an active member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in which he has been an elder a number of years.

WILLIAM M. GREEN. The commercial interests of Eugene, Lane county, recognize a valuable representative in the person of W. M. Green, who has conducted a grocery business in that city since 1891. At that date Mr. Green and his father began the business in a small room two doors north of his present location, making at first but a modest showing among the other grocers of the town. Energy and close application to business have brought marked success to this comparatively young man, who is now located in a building 26x78 feet in dimensions. Mr. Green now stands high as a merchant of integrity, the evidence of which is his wide popularity.

William M. Green was born in New Auburn, Minn., August 28, 1860, his father being Jonathan U. Green, who was born near Worcester, Vt., the son of J. B. Green, also a native of Vermont, and a farmer there. The father first learned the trade of a tailor, but on locating in New Auburn, Minn., in 1857, he engaged as a merchant, continuing in that occupation until 1873, and in 1875 he became deputy collector of customs at Moorhead, Minn., and later at Pembina, N. Dak., where he remained for four years. In 1883 he returned to farming, settling in Minnesota, and in 1891 he removed to Eugene, Lane county, Ore. Here his death occurred November 9, 1896. In fraternal relations he was a Royal Arch Mason. He married Martha A. Arnold, a native of Pennsylvania, the daughter of William Arnold, also of that state, who settled as a farmer in New Auburn, Minn. Mrs. Green now makes her home in Eugene. She is the mother of eight children, five of whom are living. The oldest of this family is W. M. Green, who was reared in Minnesota, and received a rather limited education in the public schools. He remained at home until attaining his majority, meantime spending six years of the period as a clerk in Moorhead and Pembina. He then began farming, conducting a farm near the city of his birth for three years, after which he went to Fargo, N. Dak., where he spent a similar period in a clerkship. In 1891 he came to Oregon with his father, and the two opened the business which has since grown to lucrative proportions. They started at the foot of the ladder and have now reached a position not to be despised in the commercial life of the city. Mr. Green bought his mother's interest in the business in January, 1903, and now conducts it entirely alone.

In New Auburn, Minn., Mr. Green married Etta J. Kipp, who was born in Delaware county, N. Y., and their two children are Ellen M. and Robert E. As a Republican in politics, Mr. Green has taken an active part in the affairs of the city, having served for one term as a member of the council from the First ward. He is also a member of the County Republican Central Committee. Along the lines of his business he is a member of the Commercial Club. Fraternally he belongs to the Woodmen of the World, in which he acts as banker; Knights of the Maccabees; was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Pembina, N. Dak., and is now a member of the Eugene Lodge and past officer. In the Encampment he is past chief patriarch and is now Grand High Priest of the Grand Encampment of Oregon. He is also identified with the Rebekahs.

ERNEST WILLIAM FISHER. Upon a farm of five hundred acres two miles north of Corvallis, Ernest W. Fisher is conducting a successful general farming and stock-raising enterprise, being one of the very well known farmers of this locality. He came here in 1851, and with the exception of occasional wanderings into other parts of the northwest, has made this his home, and the scene of his most ambitious life effort. Mr. Fisher is of German ancestry, and his youth and early manhood were passed in the Fatherland, where he was born May 25, 1825. As was and still is the custom in European countries, he was given the opportunity to learn a trade, and was four years apprenticed to a saddler. Having completed his trade he became a journeyman saddler, traveling over the whole of his interesting country, and visiting many a picturesque and quaint old market-place.

In 1849 Mr. Fisher came to America in a sailing vessel, and after a long voyage landed in New York, where he worked for a time at his trade, and from there visited Philadelphia, St. Louis and other large cities. In 1851 he bought three yoke of oxen and a wagon and started across the plains, and after six months of varying experiences landed at Salem, where his good trade furnished him with a means of support. Becoming interested in mining he spent six months in seeking the hidden treasures of the earth, and after returning to Corvallis in the spring of 1852 began to make saddletrees, covering them with rawhide. This kind of saddle was not entirely satisfactory, and as soon as he could procure leather he began making pack-saddles, and later still manufactured quantities of harness. In 1856 he went to Jacksonville for a year, and then went to Iowa by water and the Isthmus, returning to the west in 1857. Locating in Corvallis in the fall of 1857 he purchased his present farm, but continued to live in Corvallis, working at his trade and making much money. In 1870 he abandoned his trade in favor of farming, and it would seem from his success that nature has fitted him for the successful conduct of at least two occupations.

In 1857 Mr. Fisher was united in marriage with Amelia Diller, of which union there have been born the following children: Annie; Lena; Charles; Emma; Mollie; Clara; John; and Frank, deceased. Mrs. Fisher died at Corvallis in 1901, a devoted wife and a kind and loving mother. In many ways Mr. Fisher has contributed to the well-being of his neighborhood, being always in favor of progressive and up-building enterprises. He is a Democrat in politics, but aside from casting his vote has never identified himself with local affairs of a political nature. He is well known in fraternal circles, and has been identified with the Masonic order since 1857, and has been a Royal Arch Mason for a great many years. Upright in all of his dealings, a good friend and neighbor, and a most worthy and exemplary man, Mr. Fisher is indeed an acquisition to the farming community near Corvallis.

CARROLL C. CALLAWAY. That pride which a native son feels in his surroundings, and that kinship with the soil which inspires him to do his best under any and all circumstances, finds expression in the life of Carroll C. Callaway, born on his present home farm January 18, 1869, and the owner of four hundred acres of land two and a half miles from Wells, and seven miles north of Corvallis. From William R. Callaway, his father, Carroll C. inherits sound common sense and good business judgment, for the elder Callaway made a success of his life through the exercise of these same admirable attributes, and instilled them into his children.

William R. Callaway was born in Delaware, and was eight years of age when his parents moved to Scotland county, Mo., where he was reared on a farm and educated in the public schools. He married Abigail Cecil, with whom he started housekeeping on a farm, and in 1850 crossed the plains with ox-teams, taking six months for the journey. After spending six months in the Sacramento valley he returned across the plains to Missouri, not overmuch pleased with the prospects which he had found in the west. Shortly after, however, he returned to the west with a drove of mules, disposed of them at a profit, and in due time was among the familiar surroundings of the state of Missouri. In 1855 he disposed of his interests and brought his family to California, but soon afterward came to Oregon, locating on a farm near Albany, Linn county. Two years later he sold out and came to Benton county, purchasing of Mr. Barnes the farm of six hundred and forty acres, a portion of which is still owned by his son. Here he engaged in general farming and stock-raising, was successful in his operations, and amassed quite a little competency. The last year of his life was spent in Corvallis, where his death occurred January 20, 1898, at the age of seventy. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and was popular and well liked in his neighborhood. His wife, who died in 1878, bore him fourteen children, all but one of whom attained maturity. Of the four sons and ten daughters, ten are married and have homes of their own.

The elder Callaway was a firm believer in education, although his own youth had been somewhat destitute of advantages in this direction. His children all received better educations than is accorded the average child reared on a farm, this being especially true of Carroll C., who was a studious lad, and made the most of the chances that came to him. From the public schools he passed to the training of the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, and at the age of nineteen, in 1890, took charge of the home farm, upon which he has since lived. He married, December 18, 1898, Ida Wells, daughter of J. L. Wells, of Portland, and of this union there have been born two sons, John and William. Mr. Callaway is a Democrat in political affiliation. He is not an officeseeker, but is nevertheless interested in the local undertakings of his party. Fraternally he is associated with the Artisans. Everything around the farm of Mr. Callaway suggests the progressive and thrifty land-owner and agriculturist, the man in touch with general affairs in the world, and one who desires all that is best and most enlightened in his home surroundings.

GEORGE BEAMIS. Beginning at the very bottom rung of the ladder in the state, George Beamis has advanced by slow and laborious stages to the large land ownership, having in the meantime endured about as many setbacks as fell to the lot of the average early settler. From the vicinity of St. Joseph, Mich., where he was born December 18, 1834, he removed when seven years of age with his father's family to near Muscatine, Iowa, and there lived on a farm of moderate size and productiveness, increasing his strength and usefulness by frugal living and plenty of muscular exercise. Small leisure was his, and less schooling, for there were many in the family, and all were taught to perform their share towards the general support.

To the Iowa farm came reports of gold and rich lands in the far west, and it was an ambitious youth who could let such a chance slip by him, especially when he saw little prospect of advancement in his immediate surroundings. Barefoot, and with his few worldly possessions tied in a bundle, he joined a west-bound ox-train at the Platte river, April 15, 1852, Job Long being one of the homeseekers with whom he formed a friendship during the long, six-months' journey. If Mr. Bemis had little when he started out he had even less upon arriving at his destination at Wells station, Benton county, Ore., and his diet of boiled wheat during the following winter would hardly inspire one with much hope for the future. Nothing daunted, he secured a position in the spring with Tom Reed, and after a couple of years began to work for others on the surrounding farms in Benton county, and was thus employed until 1862. Always fond of the horse, and having a peculiar influence over this dumb friend of man, he turned his attention to training horses for a livelihood, continuing in that work for several years. When the Rogue River war broke out in all its fury he was herding cattle in that country, and to subdue the Indians fought bravely with other herders in his vicinity. In November, 1864, he enlisted in Company A, First Oregon Infantry, as a private, was mustered in at Salem and sent to Vancouver, his entire service being spent there and on the Yamhill reservation. In July, 1866, he was discharged after many interesting and exciting experiences, and after gaining a keen insight into the ways of the wily and intrepid red man.

With his farm-hand work, his horse-training and herding, Mr. Beamis managed to get quite a start financially, and finally began renting land. In 1871 he put his earnings into a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, which he improved, lived upon for five years, and finally sold at a fair profit. He then purchased the farm upon which Claus Anthony lives at the present time, which he also cleared and cultivated, and sold after nine years had passed. His present farm then came into his possession, which consists of three hundred and twenty acres, and which is located ten miles north of Corvallis, and five miles from Albany. He is engaged in general farming, stock and grain-raising, and is making a success of a property which is valued in proportion as it has been worked and improved. At one time he owned the two hundred and forty acres known as the Dan Rainwater place, and which he has since given to his son.

The first marriage of Mr. Beamis occurred in 1871, and was with May Williamson, who bore him one child, Arthur, who lives in Springfield. His second marriage was with Oni Harvey, and occurred July 20, 1884, the wife being a daughter of David Harvey. Mr. Beamis is identified with the McPherson Post, G. A. R., of Albany, and is politically a believer in the principles and issues of the Republican party. An excellent farmer, honorable man, and genial friend and associate, he commands the regard and respect of his fellow-farmers in Benton county, all of whom wish him a continuation of the success which has been so fairly if dearly won.

THOMAS B. WILLIAMSON. Seekers after encouragement in an uphill struggle for existence should derive great satisfaction from a survey of the ways and means by which the Williamson family gained a footing in Benton county. Thomas B. Williamson, who is successfully working a farm of one hundred and five acres not far from Albany, while in many respects a self-made man, and one who has overcome many obstacles, has never experienced the deprivations which came to his honored sire, Philip Williamson, who proved himself the personification of endurance and perseverance.

Born in Tennessee, in 1837, Philip Williamson was a mere lad when his parents took him to Missouri, where he was reared on a farm, and in youth learned the shoemaker's trade. He married Mary Annie Holman, and while still living in Missouri several of their children were born, among them Thomas B., the date of whose birth was August 15, 1857. The first three years of the Civil war the father was a member of the state militia, and owing to the unsettled condition of the state he determined to seek more peaceful surroundings in the west. Disposing of his property and packing such things in a prairie schooner as would be required on the journey across the plains he started forth in April, 1864, with two wagons, having three yoke of oxen each. The crossing was uneventful, but, though apparently well supplied with provisions and general necessities, they found their larder diminish with great rapidity, and at the end of the trip had but one wagon and two yoke of oxen left, and but eleven dollars in money. The spirit of good fellowship which was proverbial among the early settlers was especially manifest towards the Williamson family, and they were supplied with provisions and clothes, and given quite a cheery welcome. Locating just across the river from Salem, on good hay land, Mr. Williamson moved after a year to the Hosford place, and looked after the stock of Mr. Hosford until the fall of 1868. He then came to Benton county and bought one hundred and sixty-three acres of land for $800, improved it, and lived thereon for two years. In 1870 he moved to the farm which is still the home of his widow, and which consists of three hundred and twenty acres of the old Carter donation claim. As his harvests increased and he found a ready market for grain and stock, more land was required to carry on his projects, and so ambitious was he that at one time he owned nine hundred acres of land. This was all rich valley land, and under his care and improving spirit became very valuable. In the early days he made the shoes for his wife and children, a not inconsiderable task, for there were ten children in all. Of these, John, the oldest son, lives in Albany, and is a policeman; Martha is the wife of W. D. Prettyman, of Benton county; Dan M. is a farmer of Napoleon; Jacob L. is deceased; Wiley A. is a stock-dealer of Albany; William G. is living with his mother; Emmett is a civil engineer; and Emma is deceased. Mr. Williamson was a Republican in politics, but never actively interested himself in local offices. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and it is said of him that he lived up to his religious beliefs, investing his business dealings and home life with that honor and sincerity of purpose which marks the consistent church member. At the time of his death in 1898 he was sixty-one years old, still a comparatively young man, for he possessed great vitality, and continued to interest himself in the things and people around him. His wife is seventy years of age.

When the family came to Oregon Thomas B. was a little fellow of seven, yet he distinctly recalls the camp life upon the plains, and the weary days of marching beside the tired oxen.

He helped to clear the old donation claim, and to make comfortable the large family of children, all of whom were taught to make themselves useful around the farm. At twenty-one years of age he bought of his father his present farm of one hundred and five acres, which he has modernized and equipped with needful machinery and buildings. October 12, 1884, he was united in marriage with Maggie Dwyer, who died April 10, 1902, leaving three children: Clyde E., Elmer B. and Pearl F. Mr. and Mrs. Williamson attended the Evangelical Church, towards the support of which Mr. Williamson has generously contributed for many years. Like his father, he stands well in the community, his word and his business integrity having never been questioned.

SILAS M. YORAN. A representative of an old Dutch family, Silas M. Yoran is a worthy member of the society of Oregon, wherein the citizenship of men of veracity and integrity has been so highly appreciated, since it has meant the moral upbuilding of a new statehood. To the advancement of every worthy movement he has lent a ready and able hand. He is now a resident of Eugene, Lane county, where for a number of years he has engaged in the shoe business, previously having been connected with J. M. Hodson, on the Eugene Register, which was established and operated for six years by the two men.

Mr. Yoran was born in Herkimer county, N. Y., January 26, 1835, the son of Jacob and the grandson of Jacob Yoran, both owing their nativity to the same location. The elder man was a miller by occupation, engaging in his native county in that industry, and he there married Miss Snell, whose five brothers, as well as five members of the Yoran family, took an active part in the Revolution, four of the former being left dead on the field after the battle of Oriskany. The second Jacob Yoran, the father of S. M. Yoran, succeeded to the mills and a farm of his father, located on East creek, Herkimer county, and there died at the age of seventy-six years. He married Mary Timmerman, also a native of that locality, and the daughter of John Timmerman, a farmer and a soldier of the Revolution. Both of these families trace their ancestry back to the first settlers of the state of New York, all being of Hoiland ancestry.

Of the nine children born to his parents, five of whom are now living, S. M. Yoran is the third, and the only one located upon the Pacific coast. He was reared in his native state and upon the paternal farm, interspersing home duties with an attendance at the public schools in the neighborhood of his home. When twenty years old he went to Iowa, this being 1855, the ensuing four years being passed in various locations in the state, after which he settled at Sand Springs, Delaware county, Iowa, and engaged in a mercantile business. He later resided near Monticello, Jones county, where he bought a farm and until 1883 followed his early training. While making his home in that county he served for five years as a member of the board of commissioners, and for two successive terms as a member of the state legislature. In the last-named year Mr. Yoran decided to change his location to the Pacific coast, and settled in Eugene, Lane county, Ore., where he engaged first in the warehouse business for two years, and afterward established, in partnership with J. M. Hodson, the Eugene Register. Three years after the sale of the paper he entered upon his present business, in 1893 taking up this work with his youngest son, Darwin E., who is still with him.

In Herkimer county, N. Y., in 1859, Miss Maria Markell, also a native of that locality, became the wife of Mr. Yoran, and the following children have been born to them: Elizabeth M., of Eugene; George O., of Eugene, who is colonel of the Fourth Regiment of the Oregon National Guard; William C., engaged in job printing; Darwin E., who is with his father in the shoe business; and Louise C., of Eugene. In his political affiliations a Republican, Mr. Yoran has taken every interest in western progress, both municipal and state. In 1896 he was on the Republican ticket as presidential elector, and was elected. In his fraternal relations Mr. Yoran is one of the most prominent Masons in the state, having been made a member in Monticello Lodge No. 173. He now belongs to Eugene Lodge No. 11, in which he is past master. He was made a Royal Arch Mason in Monticello and now holds membership with Eugene Chapter No. 10, in which he is past high priest. He was made a Knight Templar in Monticello Commandery No. 16, K. T., and was there past excellent commander, and is now past commander in Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2. In 1893 he was grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Oregon, and now belongs to the order of the High Priesthood. In June, 1903, he was elected grand master of the Grand Lodge of Oregon at the annual meeting of the Grand Lodge at Portland. Mr. Yoran's wife is a member of the Congregational Church.

ALDEN S. HULBURT. A very prominent and influential pioneer family of Oregon is represented by Alden S. Hulburt, owner of a one-hundred and sixty-three-acre stock and dairy farm near Albany. This neighborhood is very familiar to Mr. Hulburt, for practically his entire life has been passed within a radius of a few miles, his birth having occurred on his father's donation claim eight miles southwest of Albany, October 27, 1853.

More than passing mention is due J. F. Hulburt, the father of Alden S., who came here a poor man, but endowed with more than ordinary judgment and perseverance. A millwright by trade, he spent the first years of his life in Canada, and with his people moved to Illinois when he had attained his majority. In Illinois he married Eliza Jane Hite, a native daughter of the state, and thereafter continued to farm until 1853. Having disposed of his Illinois interests he purchased the necessary equipment for crossing the plains, and arriving at his destination in Oregon, located on the before-mentioned claim eight miles southwest of Albany. The family lived for some time in a little log house, but after the land had been partially cleared and crops began to reward the hard toil of the head of the house, a modern structure supplanted the primitive quarters. From the first Mr. Hulburt took an active interest in all local events, was particularly active as a politician, although he refused more than the minor offices of the township. His land proved fertile and profitable, and he had the judgment to wisely dispose of it at planting time. While engaging in general farming, he made a specialty of stock-raising, and besides devoted a good deal of time to buying and selling stock. He lived to be sixty-seven years old, leaving a large and valuable property to his heirs. Twelve children were born into his family, the order of their birth being as follows: Mark, living in Albany; Harlan, also of Albany; Austin and Alden, twins; Warren, a farmer near Albany; Frank, a resident of Shedd's; Harriett, living in Pendleton; Lavina, deceased; Alice, of Pendleton; Florence, living near Albany; Ida, a resident of Pendleton; and Wallace J., a farmer near Albany.

For two years after his marriage in 1878, with Emma Underhill, Alden S. Hulburt continued to live on his father's farm, and then farmed in Benton county for about four years. Next he purchased his present place of one hundred and sixty-three acres, where he has since carried on general farming and stock-raising. He has a model dairy on his farm, and makes a specialty of Jersey cattle. Thorough, practical and possessing shrewd business judgment, he makes his land count for all that it is worth, and has amassed quite a competence entirely through his own efforts. From time to time he has been before the public as an officeholder, but has always reluctantly accepted honors conferred by his fellow-townsmen. He has served acceptably as a member of the school board for many years, and for a part of that time has been clerk of the board. Fraternally he is a member of the Grange. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hulburt, of whom Lillie is the wife of A. Westcott, of Tangent; Lotta is the wife of W. Hense, of Washington; and Rollo, Lloyd and Alice A. are living at home. Mr. Hulburt has a fine farm, well fitted with barns and general improvements, and his many friends and well-wishers hope for a continuation of his substantial and well-earned prosperity.

CAPT. PLEASANT C. NOLAND. The loyalty and patriotism which Capt. Pleasant C. Noland has always shown in the time of his country's need are two of his most salient traits, and added to these he has lived a life of quiet, earnest, persevering work which has numbered him among the useful citizens of a pioneer day. When a mere lad he responded to the call for volunteers in the Mexican war and faithfully performed his duty in a company wherein he was the youngest in age, and also occupied that position in relation to the entire brigade. Since locating in Oregon he has acted the part of a patriot and a loyal citizen in the defense of his country and its incipient civilization, and deservedly won the title by which his fellow citizens now know him.

In Missouri, the middle western state that gave to the more remote west so many sturdy emigrants, Capt. Pleasant C. Noland was born September 29, 1830. His father was engaged at his trade of stonemason and also in farming in Jackson county, and was also active in politics, giving his support to the Democratic party, and winning for himself a prominent place in the affairs of his community. He engaged heartily in the Mormon war and was one of the treaty commissioners. Owing to a large family, Pleasant C. Noland being the fourth in age among ten children, the father was unable to give his son many advantages, but undaunted by the obstacles which he must face he set about the accomplishment of the task himself and received considerable knowledge from an attendance of the district school. He remained at home until he was sixteen years old when he enlisted for service in the Mexican war, first in Captain Craig's company, but on account of his age, being truthfully stated by himself, was rejected, and one week later was accepted by saying he was twenty-one years old, joining Stewart's company, at St. Joseph, Mo., in 1847. This company was detailed to guard duty on the frontier, where this lad served for eighteen months, as brave and uncomplaining as those many years his senior. "The company was mustered out at Ft. Leavenworth, and Mr. Noland, not then wearing his official title, returned to his home and spent the winter following attending the district school in the vicinity of his home. In May, 1849, from the spirit of adventure as well as the more sober reason of a thoughtful man, which he had become through his assumption of early responsibilities, young Noland started for the gold fields of California. He met with no serious trouble from the Indians, and after a journey of a little more than four months he reached his destination and immediately entered upon the life of a miner. He continued so occupied for two years and met with fair returns for his labor. In 1851 he returned to his home in Missouri, via the Isthmus of Panama, spending a like period in the more quiet and less uncertain pursuits of the middle west. In 1853 he again crossed the plains with ox-teams, taking with him his mother, Sarah M. Noland, his brothers and sisters, as he felt the west to hold much greater chances for advancement. While crossing the plains this family left the train of emigrants at Harney lake and were lost in the mountains, where they remained wandering about for forty-two days, and very nearly starved before finding their friends again. On arriving in Lane county, Ore., Mr. Noland took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres located one mile north of Creswell, bought the squatter's right and proved up on the land, and at once entered upon the improvement and cultivation of it. In the fall of 1854 Mr. Noland's mother died. In 1855 the son enlisted in Company B, Oregon Mounted Volunteers, and he was afterward elected second lieutenant for services in the Rogue River war. He served in this company a little more than five months, and took part in a number of skirmishes. In March, 1856, the company disbanded, and its re-organization was attempted and successfully completed by Captain Noland, who now secured this official title. The company, still bearing its old name, went back again into service and participated in the battle of Big Meadows and other minor engagements, remaining until July 4, 1856. At one time during a skirmish on Rogue river the captain and his men were in a tight place, being surrounded by Indians. Seeing a canoe, he succeeded in getting a load of his men across and landed among the red men and drove them back to the river through the brush, having succeeded in getting behind them through strategic movement. A day later they got among the red men again and the captain succeeded in capturing six squaws and one Indian, and from this man he secured a revolver which he kept for years. He was ably assisted by a brave boy, Benton Kent, who swam the river and secured a canoe, and in this manner the captain was able to duplicate his deed of the day previous. None of his men was wounded in either skirmish. The reason for his crossing the river was that three wounded men of another company were at the mercy of the Indians, one of the men being Clay Huston.

After his discharge Captain Noland returned home, and January 1, 1857, was united in marriage with Lenna Jane Stewart, a native of Polk county, Mo. They lived on the home place until her death, in 1873. They had two children, James E., ex-sheriff and ex-county surveyor, lives in Creswell, and George, an attorney, of Astoria. In 1879 Captain Noland married Mrs. Melissa R. Davidson, who was born in Fayette county, Ill., April 30, 1849, and was married in St. Louis, Mo., to Green C. Davidson, and with him came to Oregon in October, 1870. Mr. Davidson died in Salem, Ore., August 15, 1878, leaving two children, John C., a jeweler, of San Francisco, and Minnie, the wife of John P. Hayden, of Walla Walla, Wash. Captain Noland and wife have one child, Neva, who is still at home with her parents. The home of this worthy couple then remained upon the farm until 1893, when they located in Creswell, and upon his farm of four hundred and eighty acres the captain now carries on general farming and stock-raising, besides which property he also owns a neat dwelling, a brick building and several lots in the town. His wife is a member of the Baptist Church. Fraternaly Captain Noland is a member of the Masonic order, and in political convictions he adheres to the Democratic party, having always been active in the advancement of the principles which he endorses.

JOHN COOLEY. Born January 30, 1837, John Cooley became a pioneer of Oregon primarily through the courage and determination of his mother to find the best location for the future advancement of her sons, as with her and his brothers and sisters he crossed the plains in 1853. He was born in Virginia, where his parents had always lived, his father there engaging in farming until his death in 1843, when the mother brought her family as far west as Missouri and there located until coming to Oregon in 1853. In the district school in the vicinity of his home John Cooley received his education, and on attaining manhood he engaged in farming and stock-raising, to which his early training had inclined him. He is now employed in this latter business in partnership with his brother, Alexander, the two expending their intelligence and practical ideas in an extensive cattle business which has given them broad returns in the matter of profit.

Mr. Cooley is now living with his nephew upon a part of the old home place near Cottage Grove, Lane county, and which consists of five hundred and fifty acres of land, all in one body. This farm is the result of energetic and purposeful work, Mr. Cooley's whole life having been devoted to the cultivation of the lands which Oregon held out as inducements to the early settlers. He has found the comforts of life in the homes of his relatives. In politics he is like his brother, also of this vicinity, and whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work, casting his ballot in the interests of the Democratic party, though he has never cared to be officially identified with the movements of the party.

LEWIS WENTZ. As an infant, Lewis Wentz came to the United States from Germany in 1837, his mother desiring to improve their prospects by location on more fertile if less historic soil. They settled on a farm near Mansfield, Richland county, Ohio, where Lewis developed into a strong and capable lad, industrious withal and frugal, as had been his ancestors. At the age of fifteen he left his home and went to a farm near Cleveland, a year later entering the regular army, and serving until the close of the Civil war. As a private in the western service he was occupied principally in fighting bushwhackers in Missouri, and after the restoration of peace continued to live in Salem, Mo., for a couple of years.

From Missouri Mr. Wentz entered upon a frontier life in Nevada, where he mined and engaged in various occupations, none of which materially increased his finances. For a year he mined in the Black Hills, and then came to eastern Oregon, and mined with indifferent success for one season. Locating in Salem, he married in October, 1877, Mrs. Ann Johnston, widow of William Johnston, and daughter of Arnold Potter, the latter of whom was born in the state of New York, and became a very early settler of Illinois. In 1846 his daughter Ann started across the plains with her sister and brother-in-law, spending the first winter at Council Bluffs. Resuming their ox-team journey the following spring, they got as far as Salt Lake City, from where Ann went to live with friends on Bear river, in 1850. Afterward she made her home with friends in Fort Hall, Idaho, and in 1850 married William Johnston, with whom and her baby she came to Oregon on horseback in 1851. From the fort to Salem was a long and wearisome journey, yet the little party arrived in fair condition, and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres eight miles south of Salem, where Mr. Johnston prospered, and where his death occurred at an advanced age. Eleven children were born of this union, six sons and five daughters.

After his marriage Mr. Wentz moved to his wife's donation claim, and in 1893, tiring of farming, located in Salem for a couple of years. He then bought his present farm in Benton county, two and a half miles from Albany, where he is comfortably located, with every prospect of a continuation of his success as a practical and scientific farmer. He is fraternally identified with the Masons, and with the G. A. R. Post of Salem. Mrs. Wentz is a member of the Dunkard Church, and during her entire life in the west has proven herself courageous in time of danger and deprivation, and a tower of strength to all dependent upon her sympathy and care.

WILLIAM PEACOCK. Success comes only to the industrious and persevering in the majority of instances, and William Peacock, one of the representative agriculturists of Benton county, is thoroughly deserving of the prosperity which he is now enjoying. His experience in life has not been devoid of reverses, yet he has bravely stood the test, and with undaunted energy has adhered to the course which he originally planned. His birth occurred March 8, 1845, near Dundee, Scotland, and there it was that the first twenty-two years of his life were spent, attending school and assisting in the duties of the home as his time and strength permitted. At this age he determined to begin a business career, and as an initiation in the new line of endeavor began working in a weaving factory in Scotland. Three years later, however, we find him a passenger on a steamship bound for the shores of America, and, landing in Canada, he was variously employed for one year.

From Canada Mr. Peacock removed to Le-mont, Ill., where for six months he was employed in the stone quarries which abound there, thence going to Warren county, in the same state, where for one year he was employed as a farm hand. Gradually working his way west, we next find him conducting a farm in Coffey county, Kans., which he had not purchased, however, as he was not altogether pleased with the surroundings, and six years later he made settlement in Benton county, Ore., just across the river from Albany. During the winter and spring following his arrival in the west he engaged in chopping cord-wood, but subsequently bought a farm of seventy-two acres along the Willamette river, two miles from Albany, which he partially cleared, at the same time engaging in chopping cord-wood. After six years of arduous labor his accumulations were swept away by the high water of the year 1882, practically everything being carried away. Nothing daunted, however, that same year he came to the farm upon which he now resides, renting it for one year, thereafter purchasing it on time. The tract comprises twenty acres, twelve of which at the time of purchase were devoted to gardening vegetables, and the remainder being timber land, and he has continued this line of agriculture, meeting with good success in so doing. In all the country roundabout no finer or more commodious residence is to be seen than that owned and occupied by Mr. Peacock and his family. The premises are further embellished by a fine hothouse, where are to be seen many choice specimens of rare plants. Mr. Peacock is a taxidermist of no inferior order, and has one hundred specimens of birds and animals which he has preserved by means of taxidermy.

It was in June, 1875, soon after coming to Oregon, that Mr. Peacock and Miss Mary E. Whetstone were united in marriage. Thirteen children were born to them, but two are deceased. Mrs. Mary E. Peacock died March 18, 1901, and August 21, 1901, Mr. Peacock was married to Mrs. Olive V. Hughes, the widow of Frank Hughes. By her first marriage Mrs. Peacock had two children. In no sense of the word can Mr. Peacock be called a politician, and aside from doing his duty at the polls in voting for the best man, regardless of party, takes no interest in politics. In the capacity of school director he has been of great assistance in bringing the educational standard of his vicinity up to a high plane of excellence.

FRANK L. ARMITAGE. To Frank L. Armitage farming is a congenial and absorbing occupation, to be pursued earnestly and practically, and with one's mental faculties alert for improved methods. This singleness of purpose has accomplished great results on his farm of three hundred and twenty-five acres, for all who investigate must admit that progressiveness is apparent in every department of the farm's activity. A two-fold interest centers around this well appointed and prosperous home, for on it the present owner was born September 14, 1871, and has since passed his life here. He inherits reliable New England traits of character, and his father, George H. Armitage, was born in the state of New York January 25, 1824. The older man was reared on a farm in New York, and in 1848 took a steamer in New York city for the Isthmus of Panama, crossing which he embarked for San Francisco, intent on making his fortune in the mines. His dream was more or less rudely shaken, for he came to Lane county in 1849 and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres four miles northeast of Eugene. Crude and with no improvements whatever, this possession called for vast exertion ere harvests could be gathered or a semblance of the home element realized, and to hasten this happy consummation Mr. Armitage soon after married Sarah J. Stevens, who was born in Tennessee, and who crossed the plains in 1847. Mr. Armitage increased in prosperity as the country around him grew and settlers followed his wise example, and at the time of his death February 12, 1893, at the age of sixty-eight years, he owned a fine and valuable farm. His widow, who is the mother of ten children, lives with those who have located near the home farm, one of these, James A., living three miles east of Springfield. She also spends some time each year with her son, S. C., in Portland, and with her daughter, Mrs. Ella V. Henderson, of Colorado. Mr. Armitage was public-spirited in the extreme, was in favor of education and general advancement, and contributed generously towards churches and charitable organizations.

Like the rest of the children in his father's family, Frank L. Armitage was educated first in the public schools, and later had an opportunity of attending the University of Oregon. His life has been spent uninterruptedly among the surroundings of his boyhood days, every inch of ground being as familiar to him as the face of an old friend. He married Ada D. Calef, a native daughter of this vicinity, and has since taken an interest in church and social life, his wife and himself being considered one of the most congenial and hospitable young couples in their neighborhood. Mr. Armitage is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, but notwithstanding his very busy life manages to get a great deal of pleasure out of passing events. He is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias, and in political preferment is a Democrat.

JOHN TOMLINSON. Enterprising and successful, John Tomlinson ranks among the honored and well-to-do farmers of Benton county. Born near Pittsfield, Pike county, Ill., November 28, 1840, he was two years old when his parents moved their household possessions onto a farm in Ray county, Mo., where they remained until 1857, and then sold out and prepared to cross the plains. In the family party was the father and mother, five sons and two daughters, whose headquarters during four months were to be a great prairie schooner drawn by three yoke of oxen. The trip was made in the short space of four months, and the first stop was made at West Point, Calaveras county, Cal., where they remained for a few months.

Later the father took up land in the Calaveras valley, where both himself and wife died in 1858.

Seventeen years old when he crossed the plains, John Tomlinson was a strong and rugged youth, capable of looking out for himself in any emergency. In California he secured employment as a farm hand for Alexander Hodges, his brother-in-law, and three years later, in 1862, married Almira Gingles, a native of Mercer county, Ill., and daughter of James Gingles. James Gingles was born in Columbia county, Pa., in 1819, and in Illinois married Sarah Miller, with whom he lived on a farm in Illinois until crossing the plains in 1850. In Benton county he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and from a small beginning worked his way to a position of agricultural and political prominence in the county. A man of leading characteristics, he was selected to represent his district in the legislature in 1864, 1868 and 1876, and for about twenty years was a member of the board of county commissioners of Benton county. His first vote was for a Republican candidate, and during his entire life he was loyal to the principles of his chosen party. His death, on October 16, 1878, removed one of the foremost developers of this county, one who had taken an active interest in promoting the cause of education, and who assisted in erecting the first school in his neighborhood. He helped to organize the school system, and was one of the organizers of the Grange. From earliest manhood he had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and each Sunday found him in his pew, regardless of inclement weather or personal ill feeling. The church invariably received substantial help at his hands, and it was said of him that he was a Christian every day of the week as well as on Sunday. The wife, who died February 17, 1853, bore him four children, of whom Andrew and Henry are deceased, while Mrs. Tomlinson is the second child and Sarah is the deceased wife of Charles Spencer.

During the year following his marriage John Tomlinson lived on a rented farm in Benton county, and the following year spent on a farm in Polk county, going then to Linn county where he remained about four years. Since locating on his wife's donation claim, inherited from her father, he has been very successful, and has maintained the excellent condition of a valuable and productive property. Four sons have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Tomlinson all of whom inherit the thrift and intelligence of their parents, and are a credit to their respective communities. James L. is a successful grocer of Albany; William S. is living at home; Fred is in Albany; and A. Clyde is living with his parents. Mr. Tomlinson is a member of the Baptist Church, with which his wife has been identified since fifteen years of age. Both are highly respected members of this community, and have many friends to enjoy their hospitality and exchange with them the amenities of life.

HENRY MAXWELL. Prominent among the farmers who have helped to maintain the agricultural prestige of Lane county is Henry Maxwell, whose Scotch-Dutch ancestors have handed down to him the most desirable of their respective national traits, generally conceded to be conservatism, thrift and integrity. John Maxwell, the father of Henry, was born in Brook county, Va., in May, 1802, and died at the home of his son, Henry, January 18, 1890. His wife, Sarah J. (Hickey) Maxwell, was born in Winchester, Va., in 1813, and died at the home of her son, John, in 1885. The parents were married in Virginia, and as young and enthusiastic people moved to a wilderness farm in Platt county, Mo., soon after taking up their residence on more desirable land in Holt county, in the same state. A cooper by trade, the elder Maxwell had worked at his trade for many years in the east, and continued it in Holt county, in connection with a large general farming enterprise. Beginning with the great mining exodus across the plains in 1849, he thought much of the possibilities beyond the western mountains, and by 1852 had sold his land and perfected arrangements to cross the plains. He had two yoke of oxen, and traveled in a large party, reaching his destination in Albany at the end of six months. In the spring of 1853 he took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres seven miles southwest of Harrisburg, where he lived four years, and then moved to the ferry on the Mill river east of Irving. For twelve years he was a well known ferryman at this point, living in the meantime on a farm purchased in the vicinity, and to the improvement of which he and his sons devoted their energies. Finally he sold this farm and went to live with his children, his death and that of his wife occurring as heretofore stated.

Born while his parents were living in Holt county, Mo., March 16, 1847, Henry Maxwell was five years old when he came to Oregon, and his education was principally received in the public schools of Coburg. He continued to live with his parents until 1867, and then bought his farm of three hundred and eleven acres, of which he still owns one hundred and twenty acres. His farm is well equipped with modern implements, and he carries on general farming and some stock-raising. He married in 1867, Marv Hill, who was born in Whiteside county, Ill., December 15, 1852, a daughter of Jesse Hill, who crossed the plains in 1864. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell, Sarah is the wife of Henry Bucklem, of Ashland, Ore.; Ida is the wife of Charles Gray, of Baker City; Elizabeth is the wife of William Pearsons, of Baker City; Laura is the wife of Henry Godfrey, of Kern county, Cal.; Ada and Effie live in Baker City; and George is in business in Baker City. Mr. Maxwell is a Republican in politics, but has never entered the ranks of office-seekers. He is progressive and liberal, and in favor of all measures instituted for the improvement of his town and county. Solid and reliable, upright in all his dealings, and holding the most agreeable relations with his neighbors in the vicinity, he occupies a popular and financially strong position, honored and respected by all.

MARTIN WINGARD. His place in life, that of the most useful of all laborers, an intelligent and progressive farmer, Martin Wingard now makes his home upon the farm which he acquired in 1863, near Lorane, Lane county. He was born October 27, 1825, in Stark county, Ohio, the son of Samuel Wingard, who was also a pioneer of Oregon. The father was a native of Pennsylvania, being born in that state in 1801, and on attaining manhood he became a farmer and married in Maryland Miss Mary Bechtel, a native of that state. They settled in Ohio at a very early date, acting the part of pioneers there until their removal in 1839 to Indiana, with the spirit of their own ancestors who first settled America following unconsciously the westward trend of civilization. In 1853 they made the six-months journey across the plains with ox-teams, arriving safely in Oregon, whither the subject of this review had preceded them. Their first winter was spent in Yamhill county. In 1854 they removed to Lane county and took up a donation claim located west of Eugene, remaining there for a few years, when they came to the present location of their son, Martin, and passed the remainder of their lives, the father living to be eighty and the mother to be ninety-five years old. Besides their oldest son, two daughters of their family are now living, Ellen, who is at home, and Catherine, the wife of P. F. Davis, located in the vicinity of Lorane. After coming to the west the father carried on general farming and stock-raising, taking a moderate interest in political movements by holding several of the minor offices of the neighborhood.

In the vicinity of the home of his father, which was first in Ohio and later in Indiana, Martin Wingard received his education in the district schools and until he was twenty-six years old he remained under the parental roof. He then joined the westward movement and crossed the plains in 1851, a journey of seven months placing him in Oregon, when he located in Yamhill county for about a year. The ensuing years, up to 1863, were spent in various locations, a portion of the time in California. In 1863 he came to Lane county and bought his farm of three hundred and twenty acres which has ever since remained his home, and to the cultivation and improvement of the broad acres he has given every intelligent and practical thought. He has now four hundred acres, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising. In politics he is a Democrat and is a member of the Grange.

A worthy event in the life of Mr. Wingard was his enlistment in 1855 as a member of Company A, under the command of Captain Harris, for service in the Rogue River war, faithfully continuing for forty-six days, during which his principal engagement was at Table Rock. After serving in the defense of his adopted state he returned to his farm and has since devoted his energies to the upbuilding of the agricultural interests of the country.

HENRY MELTON. Many years of successful farming in Lane county have placed Henry Melton on a firm financial basis, and caused him to be reasonably satisfied with life in general. While many who have worked for more years than he are still struggling to acquire a competence, he has left behind him cares connected with crops, stock and improvements, and is loaning money on good security to those who are temporarily embarrassed.

Knox county, Ill., the present center of educational institutions, and agriculturally one of the garden spots of the middle west, has lent many native sons to the coast, notwithstanding its own inducements. The very early pioneer days of Knox county are inseparably associated with the Meltons, for when the wilderness was dotted by but a few straggling farm houses, and Indians outnumbered whites a hundred to one, the parents, George W. and Mary Ann (Riley) Melton, came from the east and settled on government farms with their respective families, their marriage being the first "pale-face" union in Knox county. Ten children were reared on the pioneer farm upon which this couple went to housekeeping, and their first child, a daughter, was the first white child born and reared in the county. A great deal of pioneer interest settled around the Melton home, for the parents were hospitable and kindly people, sharing their good fortune with their neighbors, and keeping their latch string out to whomsoever chanced to pass that way.

Henry Melton was born on the Knox county farm, June 8, 1839, and by reason of a practical home training and average common school education was able to look out for himself at a comparatively early age. The Civil war found him assisting with the management of the home property, and in August, 1862, he enlisted in Company E, Eighty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry, being mustered in at Galesburg, Knox county. The regiment went first to Fort Henry, and from there to Fort Donelson, Tenn., where the soldiers were placed on guard duty. Besides the battle of Fort Donelson, he participated in many skirmishes, and in all served about fourteen months, being honorably discharged in October, 1863, thereafter returning to his home and continuing his former occupation.

March 9, 1865, Mr. Melton married Ella M. Cole, a native of Cincinnati, Ohio, and continued to live in Knox county until coming to Oregon, in 1882. Miss Cole was a successful teacher for six years in Illinois. More fortunate than many, Mr. Melton had saved as well as made money, and therefore was able to start life in the west under very favorable auspices. Purchasing four hundred and sixty-nine acres of land two miles north of Creswell, his operations were of such an extent that he soon required more land, and bought one hundred and forty-four acres adjoining the village on the south. At present three hundred acres are under the plow, and besides this farm he owns twelve acres adjoining Creswell, which constitutes his present home. The farm is rented out and given over to general farming and stock-raising, and is one of the most highly improved in the county.

Possessing personal characteristics which win esteem and stamp the bearer as influential and popular, Mr. Melton is one of the pillars of the community of Creswell, where he has a host of friends and well-wishers. He is no politician, notwithstanding his staunch allegiance to the Republican party. His first wife dying in Oregon, November 16, 1886, Mr. Melton, in 1893, made a journey back to Illinois, where he was married to Katherine Brainard, a native of Oneida county, N. Y., and a daughter of Jephtha and Sarah (Van Wagennen) Brainard, and was reared in Knox county, Ill., and taught for over twenty years in the public schools. No children have been born of either union, but a son has been adopted into the family, Edward L., at present a business man of Seattle, Wash.

JOHN ZINIKER. Those thrifty and reliable traits of character which are the heritage of the children of Switzerland find illustration in the life of John Ziniker, who was born in that country, December 13, 1858, and was reared in one of the hill-side towns which have furnished themes for painters and poets for many generations. One in a family of eight children, his father made his living as a butcher, and had the typical regard for education and advancement which have made of his country one of the most enlightened and practical in the world. His limited resources necessitated the co-operation of his children as soon as they were old enough to assume responsibility, and thus it happened that John, one of the most promising of his sons, was allowed to join his uncle, Albert Ruegger, when he came to America, in 1873. The latter had just completed a two-years' service in the German army, had been present at the battle of Sedan, and contemplated his sojourn in the United States with the hopefulness of one who had led a strenuous life, and longed for more peaceful and kindly conditions.

Arriving in America, Mr. Ziniker accompanied his uncle's family to Trenton, Ohio, whence they went at the end of a year to Columbus, Neb., and farmed there for nine months. For about two years they afterward lived and farmed in Kansas, going then to Vancouver, Wash., and from there to Lane county, Ore., in 1879. Renting the place upon which he now lives, he aided his uncle in the purchase of it a few years later, and now, in partnership with his aunt, owns the entire farm of seventeen hundred acres. In 1884 Mr. Ziniker married Vrena Siegerist, a native of Switzerland, and nine children have been born of this union, the order of their birth being as follows: Rosa; Freda; Lillie, deceased; Laura; Emma; John; Lena; Albert; and Frank. Mr. Ziniker has about two hundred acres of land under cultivation, but his principal source of income is Durham cattle, which are raised in large numbers, as are also a variety of other kinds of stock. He is one of the substantial and popular men of this vicinity, is well read and takes a keen interest in general developments outside of his regular work. Like all who come from Switzerland, where education is compulsory, he appreciates the value of mental training; and it is his intention to give his children the advantages required if they are to adorn and dignify their respective stations in life. He is fraternally associated with the Woodmen of the World, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in political affiliation is a Republican.

ELIAS F. CHAPMAN. In his efforts to gain a substantial financial standing Elias F. Chapman has not neglected the duties which have been his as a citizen, through his association with the Civil war writing his name high in the annals of our country. In his business affairs he has met with a gratifying success, as a lumber merchant and manufacturer gaining a prominent place in the industrial circles of Eugene, Lane county, which has been his home since 1877.

The Chapman family came originally from Wales, the great grandfather coming from that country and settling in Connecticut, as a citizen of that state being numbered among the patriots of the Revolution. The grandfather, Joshua Chapman, was born there and in manhood removed to Indiana, locating in Kosciusko county, where he followed his trade of wheelwright. He was one of the early settlers in Iowa, locating near Des Moines in later years, his death occurring near Beatrice, Neb., aged ninety-three years. Like his father he fought for his country, his services being in the war of 1812. The father, Joshua B. Chapman, was a native of Connecticut, and became a wheelwright in New York state, going from there to Indiana and removing in 1842 to Illinois, and February 1, 1843, to Iowa, where he settled near Des Moines, in the latter location combining the work of his trade with agricultural pursuits. In 1876 he came to Eugene, Lane county, Ore., locating one and a half mile south of the city, where his death occurred. Politically he was a Republican and in religion affiliated with the Baptist Church. He married Naomi Connett, who was born in Kentucky, the daughter of Nicholas Connett, also of that state, but who spent the last years of his life in Ohio. The mother died in Oregon, having four living children, one having died in childhood, and the other in Oregon after reaching manhood.

The oldest of his father's family, Elias F. Chapman was born in Kosciusko county, Ind., February 1, 1842, the following year becoming a resident of Iowa, where he grew to manhood. Interspersed with his home duties was an attendance of the public schools at Carlisle. When of sufficient age he was apprenticed to learn the wagon and carriage maker's trade and continued so employed for two years. He also worked with his father in the sawmill business, even in his youth giving evidence of his ability along these lines, being then entrusted with the management of the hardwood lumber. At the breaking out of the Civil war he put beyond him his dreams of future success in his business and became a volunteer in Company B, Tenth Iowa Regiment, being mustered in at Iowa City, August 23, 1861. A half-brother, Ephraim Fisher, was also a member of that regiment, and was physically disabled during the war, now making his home in Iowa. Mr. Chapman was sent with his company to Cape Girardeau, Mo., where his first misfortune came in the shape of an attack of measles while in camp. The command wintered at Bird's Point, after which they saw much service, being in the battles of New Madrid, Corinth, during which engagement the concussion of the discharge of a gun in the hands of a comrade burst his right ear drum; Iuka, the second battle of Corinth, Holly Springs, Mission Ridge, Champion Hill and Black River. After the winter spent at Memphis Mr. Chapman experienced the horrors of the siege of Vicksburg, which lasted forty-seven days, and after which, about July 10, he was a member of a band of eighty men who were guarding a train of wagons after surrender, when Gen. Joseph Johnston, with a cavalry brigade, swept down upon them and took them prisoners. They were at once started on the trip to Richmond, but Sherman having possession of the railroads they were paroled. Mr. Chapman was sent to Benton Barracks, St. Louis, and six weeks later he was exchanged and sent back to active service. He veteranized at Huntsville, Ala., and took part in the battles at Decatur, Ala., and was then paroled and sent home on a thirty-day furlough, after which he returned to Kingston and participated in the Atlantic campaign, marching with Sherman to the sea, and engaging in the battles of Dallas, Buzzard's Roost, Resaca, Snake Creek, Ala., Jonesboro, and Savannah. After entering Savannah he continued north through the Carolinas with the advancing columns, passing through Columbia, S. C., where they had an engagement, then to Bentonville, etc., on the memorable journey. He was in the Grand Review at Washington and carried away with him the memory of the gratitude and admiration of those who witnessed the magnificent spectacle and realized the mighty work accomplished by those grand columns of men.

After being mustered out at Little Rock, Ark., August 15, 1865, Mr. Chapman returned to Carlisle, Iowa, and engaged as a hardware merchant of that city, and also conducted a wagon and carriage works. This was successfully continued until 1876, when he removed to Healdsburg, Cal., and engaged in the same employment. July 24, 1877, he came to Eugene. Opening a wagon and carriage works there, he remained so employed for four years, but on account of failing health, disposed of his business interests and removed to San Jose, Cal. There he engaged in the planing-mill business and operated it successfully for two and a half years, when he returned to Eugene and took up a homestead thirteen miles east of the town, where he built a mill with a capacity of eight thousand feet per day, the motive power being steam. He also improved his farm and engaged in agricultural pursuits, and continued to reside there fifteen years, when he located in Eugene, where he has since made his home. In 1902 he built a new planing-mill in Eugene, located on Willamette street which was opened for business April 1, of the same year, with his son Ellis K. as a partner. They have now a large and lucrative business, turning out all kinds of planing-mill work.

The marriage of Mr. Chapman occurred in Carlisle, Iowa, and united him with Miss Sarah Griffin, who was born in Tippecanoe county, Ind. They have one son, Ellis K., who is now in partnership with his father. In fraternal relations Mr. Chapman is prominent, having been made a Mason in Hartford, Iowa. He became a charter member of the lodge at Carlisle, Ore., and is now a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M. He is also a member of Eugene chapter No. 10, R. A. M. He was made an Odd Fellow in Carlisle and acted as noble grand, and is now identified with the lodge at Eugene. As a member of J. W. Geary Post No. 7, G. A. R., he was commander for three terms, in two of which the post gained one hundred and one members, making it the largest post in the state. He also acted as senior aid and chief of staff under Commander Gates. He also holds the position of assistant inspector on the staff of the national commander. In politics he is a staunch and loyal Republican and has always been true to the principles advocated by that party. A work which has made Mr. Chapman's name one to be remembered is his organization of the Iowa Veteran Association in Oregon for the purpose of procuring evidence for soldiers' pensions, and the bringing together the old Iowa soldiers in Oregon. Since the organization he has served as secretary for three years.

HON. GABRIEL RUSSELL CHRISMAN the chief executive of the city of Eugene, represents the broadest and best citizenship of Oregon. Inheriting sterling traits of character, and having the advantage in his youth of a superior home training, he has steadily forged to the front, overcoming obstacles, and supporting, on his way, the institutions which are the glory of the northwest. No name in Lane county carries with it greater weight, or is any nearer to the foundation upon which the municipal superstructure has been reared.

A native of Andrew county, Mo., Mr. Chrisman was born December 2, 1848, and is one of the eight children born to Hon. Campbell E. and Phoebe (Flannery) Chrisman, natives of Virginia. The older Chrisman moved from Virginia to Missouri about the year 1840, and in the latter state successfully conducted a large farm, becoming one of the prosperous and prominent men of his section. Desiring other surroundings in which to pass the remainder of his life, and being ambitious to increase his fortune, he disposed of his property in Missouri in 1851 and started across the plains with his wife and seven children. His equipment was beyond the ordinary, and precluded the possibility of want or deprivation during the long journey, which was accomplished in comparative comfort. He had several teams of oxen and a band of loose cattle, the latter serving as the foundation for his great success in the northwest. Crossing the Cascade mountains by the Barlow route, the party arrived in Lane county in October, and spent the first winter near Coburg. As an experiment, Mr. Chrisman bought property near Cañonville in the spring of 1852, but this investment proving unsatisfactory, and the death of his wife occurring there, he moved the following year to what is now Walker Station, and on the coast fork of the Willamette river took up a donation claim of a section of land. This proved to be the nucleus of large landed possessions, for he demonstrated marked sagacity in business affairs. From time to time he purchased valuable properties, and at the height of his prosperity owned several farms. Hundreds of head of stock roamed over his meadows, and large quantities of grain were harvested annually. With the proceeds of his enterprise he started a private money loaning business, and finally retired to Cottage Grove, purchased a home in the pleasant part of the town, and spent the remainder of his life there in comfort. He died there June 21, 1885, at the age of seventy-five years. He was a man possessed of a large capacity for well-doing and strong traits of character. As a Republican he took an active interest in local and state undertakings, and served one term in the Oregon state senate, during two regular and one special session. During the Civil war his sympathies were strongly on the side of the Union; and he is said to have been the first man to put up a flag in Lane county after the war. He was of a sociable and genial nature, and found relaxation and pleasure in the Masonic lodge.

As soon as he was old enough, Gabriel R. Chrisman walked from his father's farm to the school on the south fork of the Willamette. His educational opportunities were bounded by his teacher's limitations. Realizing these, as the years passed, he applied himself to every passing opportunity, learning from observation, books and contact with mankind. In time he became manager of the home farm, and at twenty-six years of age started out on his own responsibility, purchasing land in Lake county and engaging in stock-raising on a large scale. His brand—the letter C in a diamond, on the left flank—was one of the best known in that section of the country. Upon disposing of his farm and brand in 1883, he possessed over one thousand head of cattle.

Upon settling in Cottage Grove in 1883 Mr. Chrisman invested in town property, but the following year removed to his present home in Eugene. He is the possessor of one of the truly delightful homes of the city, located on the corner of Tenth and Charnelton streets, and surrounded by beautifully laid-out grounds. He still retains an interest in farming and stock-raising, having a farm of two hundred and thirty acres located three and a half miles from Junction City, and another farm of six hundred and forty acres near by.

Since early manhood Mr. Chrisman has espoused the cause of Republicanism, but for many years his political obligations began and ended with the casting of his ballot. He was elected mayor of Eugene in April, 1901, and so well did he conserve the best interests of his fellow-townsmen that he was again elected without opposition, in 1903. He has been delegate to many state and county conventions, and was at one time chairman of the Lane county Republican Central Committee. In 1886 he became one of the incorporators of the First National Bank of Eugene, and is at present a director and stock-holder. He was also one of the chief promoters of the Eugene Water Company, serving first as superintendent and afterward as president of the company. Fraternally he is associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World, and he is a charter member of the Eugene Commercial Club. In Cottage Grove, Ore., August 31, 1884, he was united in marriage with Mary B. Markley, who was born near Salem, Ore., a daughter of David Markley, a native of Virginia. The latter was one of the early settlers of California, having come to that state with his parents when he was a boy. At a later period he moved to Oregon, and at the present time makes his home at Cottage Grove. Mr. and Mrs. Chrisman have one son, Chester Russell. Mr. Chrisman has ever evinced a deep and practical interest in the welfare of the city of Eugene, and is recognized as one of her most progressive and public-spirited citizens.

BYRON A. WASHBURNE. The milling industry of Springfield, Lane county, is represented by Byron A. Washburne, a native son of Oregon, having been born near Junction City, this county, March 2, 1865. He is the seventh child in a family of six sons and five daughters born to his father, C. W. Washburne, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work, and his education was received in the common schools of his native state, being more or less limited by the many obstacles which were of a necessity a part of the early life in Oregon. His father being a mill-owner, Byron A. was trained to this life, and at the age of eighteen years he assumed charge of his father's mill at Rickreall, Polk county, where he continued with success for six years. In 1889 he returned to Junction City and remained for one year, after which he located in Springfield, since making this his home.

The mill which Mr. Washburne here purchased was immediately overhauled and is today a modern and up-to-date enterprise, and with water power the mill has a capacity of a hundred barrels per day. The flour, which he disposes of in local markets and ships to various localities, is known by the name of "Snow Ball," and the quality equals the purity of color which has won it this brand. Mr. Washburne also owns considerable property in different counties of the state, fifteen hundred acres altogether, in Lane, Gilliam, Lake and Klamath counties, a part of which is farming land, now rented, and the balance is timber. He has also bought a comfortable residence here, a two-story cottage, wherein he now makes his home.

Mr. Washburne was married in Rickreall, Polk county, to Mary Amanda Clark, who was born in Polk county, the daughter of W. E. Clark, a native of Missouri, who crossed the plains when a young man and became a pioneer of Polk county. For several years he was the only Republican in that county, and he was very active and prominent in political affairs. The two children born to Mr. and Mrs. Washburne are: Helen, aged fourteen, and Claude, aged ten years. In fraternal orders Mr. Washburne is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen; Woodmen of the World; Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has passed all the chairs, and was a delegate to the Grand Lodge in 1903; Ancient Free and Accepted Masons; and Native Sons of Oregon. Politically he is a Republican, and has always been active in the advancement of the principles endorsed by that party, serving here as a member of the city council. As vice president of the Farmers and Merchants Bank, at Junction City, he is still connected with the financial interests of that city, wherein he made his home for some time.

JAMES A. EBBERT. For forty years James A. Ebbert has been taking the steps forward that have numbered him among the successful men of Lane county. Like many others he came empty-handed to the state of Oregon and is now a large land-owner in Whitman county, Wash., and upon his farm of three hundred and twenty acres in Lane county, Ore., he has been engaged since 1859 in hog-raising, the profits of which have been greatly increased by his preparation of cured meat, in which form the public is offered his products.

Mr. Ebbert was born near Uniontown, Pa., March 25, 1831, and lived there on a farm until twenty years of age, when he went to Van Buren county, Iowa, and spent the time intervening between that and his trip to the west. In the spring of 1852 he came across the plains with four yoke of oxen, and after eighty-four days reached his destination and became a resident of Oregon. In the fall of the same year he went to the Rogue River mines for a short period, and in November he located in Portland, remaining until August, 1853. He then came to Lane county and took up a donation claim of a hundred and sixty acres near Springfield, and after a five-years' residence there he sold the farm for $1,000, and in 1859 bought his present property, which is located three and a half miles northeast of the same city. Since that time he has been extensively engaged in the raising of hogs, devoting his energies entirely to this work, and meeting with substantial returns for the intelligent effort put forth. In 1880 he began investing his money in land in Whitman county, Wash., and now owns several thousand acres in that county and one ranch of one hundred and sixty acres in Latah county, Idaho.

On December 15, 1853, Mr. Ebbert was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Brattian, who died July 29, 1902, leaving no family. In his political relations Mr. Ebbert is a life-long Republican, having cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln in 1860 at the first presidential election in Oregon, and has voted for every Republican candidate for president since that time.

ALBERT RUEGGER. The name of Albert Ruegger is associated with one of the finest and largest stock farms in Lane county, although he himself passed to the great majority in 1901, leaving behind him the legacy of a good name and honorable life. An American by adoption and preference, he was born in Switzerland, August 10, 1842, and to the last recalled with evident yearning and tenderness the days of his youth among the mountains of his picturesque native land. The farm upon which he grew to manhood must have furnished marked contrast in his mind with the one upon which he conducted his latter-day enterprise, for, shut in by snow-clad mountains, there were no far reaches for the eye to scan, and but small patches for the cattle to graze on.

While still in Switzerland Mr. Ruegger married Rosina Ammann, who was born in Switzerland, August 28, 1848. The young people continued to live in the same canton, and during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 Mr. Ruegger espoused the cause of his sister country on the north, and fought in the German army against France, serving until the battle of Sedan, which resulted in the overthrow of the third Napoleon. The next year he came to the United States with his family, living for a time in Nebraska, and then in Kansas, moving from there to Missouri. In 1875 he journeyed further west to Vancouver, Wash., and two years later came to Lane county, Ore., where the balance of his life was spent. In partnership with his nephew, John Ziniker, he bought a farm of seventeen hundred and fifty acres, and Edward Ziniker bought fifty acres of this in 1898. For a residence he built a large frame dwelling, and added barns, out-houses and general improvements, carrying on dairying, cheese-making, general farming and stock-raising. His farm became known as one of the best appointed ones in the county, and the stock which found its way to the markets from his farm was representative of the best that could be raised in Oregon. He took a keen interest in Republican politics, but being a quiet and unostentatious man, never desired or would accept office.

Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Ruegger has continued to live on the home place, which she manages with the assistance of her children, of whom Edward, Rosa, Ida, Hilda, Ernest and Pauline live at home, the oldest daughter, Emma, being the wife of Edward Ziniker. This farm is unquestionably one of the best conducted and improved in this county, and the men who have accomplished its development are deserving of the greatest credit, evincing, as they have, marked intelligence and thrift.

WILLIAM KNOTTS. None to a greater extent enjoys the confidence of his fellow-farmers around Corvallis than does William Knotts, representative of a very old family in Oregon, and who was born on the farm a portion of which he now owns, October 27, 1851. His father, William, was born in the east, and there married a Miss Barrett, who bore him one child, a daughter, Justina, now the wife of N. P. Newton, of Philomath. He married, for his second wife, Sylvia Wilsey, with whom he came to Oregon in 1847, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and circumventing every danger known to the early emigrants. The first winter in his adopted state he lived in Washington county, but the following year went to Benton county, where he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres. More fortunate than most of the early settlers, his land was mostly open prairie, and he therefore put in his first crop much more readily than did his neighbors in the timber. For the accommodation of his wife and children he erected a rude log house of one room which served all purposes of living, and had a fair start in the west at the time of his death in 1854, at the age of fifty-five years.

William Knotts was the third of the children in his father's family, and he was three years old when his sire died. Besides himself there was Margaret, who became the wife of Arthur Langell, and died in 1888; Sarah A., the wife of James Robinson, of the vicinity of Wrenn; Thomas, who died in 1866; and May, who died while a child. Because of the father's large property, and the good management which it sustained at the hands of his widow and older sons, the children were able to secure practical educations at the public schools and at Philomath College. William remained on the main farm until twenty-six years of age, and then came to the portion of the claim which is still his home, and upon which he has made many improvements. It is located three and a half miles north of Corvallis, and has been devoted principally to stock-raising, Red Polled cattle being preferred. General farming also receives attention from the successful owner of this finely improved property, and in all ways he has demonstrated a broad-minded and liberal tendency, equipping his property with the latest of modern machinery and conducting his enterprises after the most approved plans. He is the owner of three hundred and seventy-four acres of the old donation claim, and besides has one one-hundred and a one hundred and twenty acre tract in the mountains.

December 23, 1898, Mr. Knotts was united in marriage with Carrie, daughter of Joseph Woods, and of this union there have been born two children, Lizzie and Ethel. To a considerable extent Mr. Knotts has identified himself with Republican politics in his neighborhood, and his fitness for office was recognized in 1898, when he was elected commissioner of Benton county, serving four years. Mr. Knotts has a fine home, a fine family and an enviable reputation as man and farmer, and as such is a distinct credit to the farming community around Corvallis.

THEODORE O. MARTIN. To the men whom the eastern states have given toward the upbuilding of the west can be traced those qualities which have impressed themselves upon the various communities, for rather than the man of adventurous disposition it has been he who felt his ability to cope with the difficulties which attend colonization who has given the impetus to the development of resources and added the great northwest to the coterie of states. Theodore O. Martin, born in Oregon May 31, 1856, upon the donation claim which he now occupies, is the son of such a man, the double claim to Oregon's welfare being his nativity and his inheritance of the pioneer traits which numbered his father among the useful men of the northwest.

The father, Stephen O. Martin, was born March 6, 1821, in Union county, Ohio, and removed to Presque Isle, in Lake Erie, where his father, Charles Martin, had received a land grant from services in the war of 1812, from the results of which service he died, on the island. After the death of the elder man his widow removed to Laporte county, Ind., where she reared her family and remained throughout the rest of her life. She had six children, of whom Stephen O. was the second in order of birth. He made his home with his mother until his marriage, December 25, 1842, with Mary Cordelia Parsons, her birth having occurred in Oswego county, N. Y., March 10, 1824. The young people continued to live in Laporte county until 1844, when they removed to Lake county, Ind., and remained there until the spring of 1853, when they outfitted and crossed the plains with ox-teams, accomplishing a journey of six months devoid of trouble beyond the experiences incident to life on the plains in those early times. They arrived in Lane county, Ore., where the husband took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, located one-half mile north of Creswell and twelve miles south of Eugene. This remained their home until their death, that of the father occurring at the age of seventy-three years, December 1, 1894, and the mother at seventy years of age, March 23, 1894, in their busy and useful life adding to the welfare of the coming state by improving and cultivating the land which had become their home, carrying on general farming and stock-raising, while the husband also made several trips to the mines, which were not devoid of profit. Always active in politics, Mr. Martin occupied the positions of justice of the peace and postmaster, as well as other minor offices which were within the gift of the people in his community, his integrity and high moral character making him a man to be trusted. He was also active in the work of the Christian Church, of which he was a member, while his wife belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Besides Theodore O. Martin, of this review, there are two of the children living: Mrs. Marcia E. Johnson, of Creswell, and John H., who is located on a part of the home place.

The entire life of Theodore O. Martin has been spent in Oregon, where he grew to manhood among the duties of farm life, and received his education in the district schools. Early showing an aptitude for business, he opened a drug and grocery store in Creswell with a partner by the name of Thomas Belshaw, the firm name being Belshaw & Martin. This was successfully conducted for four years, at the close of which time he married and went to live on a part of the donation claim of his father, and after the death of his parents located in the old home, now carrying on general farming and stock-raising, being particularly interested in Cotswold sheep.

May 2, 1880, Margaret J. Veatch became Mr. Martin's wife. She was born in Lane county, Ore., October 29, 1859, the daughter of Sylvester E. Veatch, who was born March 27, 1831, in Enfield, White county, Ill. Mr. Veatch is a farmer by occupation. He remained in Illinois until 1853, when he started across the plains with ox-teams and traveling in company with S. B. Knox, a native of Kentucky. The first winter in the west was spent in Linn county. In the spring of 1854 he came to Lane county and took up a claim located on Mosby creek, four miles southeast of Cottage Grove, and married there Maria Elizabeth Knox, a native of Hancock county, Ill. They remained upon this claim until 1859, when they located near Cloverdale, and lived there about seven years, and then purchased Mr. Veatch's present property two miles west of Cottage Grove. Besides Mrs. T. O. Martin, who is the second child of the family, there are the following children: Isaac H. Veatch, of Creswell; Robert W., of Eugene; Lucetta, the wife of J. I. Thomas, of Cottage Grove; Curtis Sylvester, on the home place; and Dora B., the wife of John Martin, a brother of Theodore O. Martin. The mother died October 28, 1902, at the age of sixty-eight years, while the father still lives and engages in farming and stock-raising. Politically he is a Republican, and an active member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Mr. and Mrs. Martin became the parents of one child, Maud M., who died at the age of seventeen years. Mr. Martin is a Prohibitionist in politics and holds membership and is an elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

PIERSON M. McPHERSON was just a year old when his parents brought him to Portland, and thirteen years old when he came to Lane county. In the meantime he has attained to prominence as an agriculturist and promoter of the well-being of his neighborhood, living a life devoted to his farm, his family and his many friends. In Moniteau county, Mo., where he was born, September 14, 1851, his parents, J. C. and Mary E. (Scott) McPherson, were well-known farmers, who, notwithstanding that they owned a large and paying farm, were on the lookout for a chance to improve their prospects. During the winter of 1851-2 they made preparation to cross the plains in the early spring. They started out in April with two wagons, four yoke of oxen and three cows, the latter being pressed into service after leaving Fort Hall. Upon arriving in the Willamette valley they had three cows and four steers, the animals having fared well during the long and tiresome journey.

The McPherson family lived first on a three-hundred-and-twenty-acre claim near Silverton, Marion county, Ore., and in 1864 removed to near Springfield, Lane county, where the father bought one hundred and twenty acres of land, living thereon until his death, in 1886, at the age of sixty-five years. The wife, who survived him until 1902, dying at the age of seventy-one years, was the mother of thirteen children, eight of whom attained maturity. Both parents were members of the Christian Church, and Mr. McPherson contributed many hundreds of dollars towards its support. He served in the Yakima Indian war, and at all times during his life in the west promoted the cause of education and morality.

The youth of P. M. McPherson, the third child in his father's large family, was spent on the Lane county farm. July 4, 1871, he married Mary Spencer, thereafter living for a year on the James A. Ebbetts place. He then purchased ninety acres of his present farm, to which he has since added, and now owns two hundred and twenty acres, all in the valley, just outside of Springfield. In his meadows roam the finest of Jersey cattle, other stock also bringing in a substantial yearly income. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McPherson, of whom Chandos is deceased. Those living are: Seth, Walter, Vennie, Dorena, Lula, Adell and Wade. Mr. McPherson cast his first presidential vote for a Democratic president and has never had occasion to change his mind regarding party affiliations. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World, and in religion he finds a home in the Christian Church. He is a thrifty and practical farmer, entering with zest into his chosen occupation, and getting the best possible results from his fertile and conveniently located farm.

ENOCH P. COLEMAN. That stock-raising is both a congenial and paying occupation to Enoch P. Coleman is not doubted by any who are privileged to know this genial and highly honored pioneer, whose personality, family and splendidly appointed farm appeal to the trust, confidence and admiration of the community in which he makes his home. Opportunity has never been allowed to slip by Mr. Coleman without his taking a many-sided view of it, and deciding then and there whether it would pay him to embrace it. He has made some money in mining, more in the mercantile and freighting business, and still more in raising high-grade Durham and Hereford cattle. At the present time he owns three thousand acres of land four miles north of Coburg, all of which is adapted to stock, being abundantly watered by snows from the mountains and by natural springs.

Nathan G. and Mary (Henry) Coleman were born in Pennsylvania, married there, and removed to Coles county, Ill., in 1841. Their son, Enoch P., was born on their farm near Independence, March 31, 1842, and was therefore eleven years old when the family removal to the coast took place, in the spring of 1853. The father outfitted with four wagons, requiring twenty yoke of oxen, also a spring-wagon with two yoke, the latter of which was driven all the way across the plains by Enoch P. Coleman. The family possessions also included sixty head of cattle, some of which were thoroughbred Durhams, and which arrived at the end of the journey in much better condition than was expected of them. The father purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land on the old Territorial road, sixteen miles southeast of Eugene, and there engaged in farming, grain and stock-raising. So extensive were his operations that more land was eventually required, and at the time of his death, at the age of seventy-eight years, he was the owner of nearly a thousand acres. His wife, who was born in 1800, died in 1894, and, notwithstanding her extreme age, enjoyed the best of health until a short time before she died.

Enoch P. Coleman left the farm at the age of eighteen and became a clerk in a general merchandise store for a couple of years. In 1862 he started up the Columbia river with pack animals to the Caribou mining district, and with four others engaged in packing goods to the mines, a distance of sixty miles. That this was a paying venture is easily surmised, for he received thirty cents a pound for packing, and during a week's time packed many hundreds of pounds. Living was high during those times, and the cooks for the miners must have exercised their wits to economize. Flour brought as high as $1.50 a pound, beans being sold at the same exorbitant rate. This dreary region was abandoned by Mr. Coleman in 1862, his return being accomplished by way of the Frazer river, and from there by skiffs, in company with James McClaren. From Portland to Eugene was by stage route, and Mr. Coleman spent the winter in the latter town.

In the spring of 1863 Mr. Coleman went to The Dalles and worked for his brother and brother-in-law in their shop, and in the fall of 1864 returned to Eugene. In December of the same year he was united in marriage with Mary Walton, sister of Judge J. J. Walton, with whom he afterward engaged in a mercantile business for a couple of years. Disposing of his store interests, he engaged in stock-raising near Harrisburg, Linn county, for about ten years, and then came to his present farm, one of the finest and most valuable in Lane county. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Coleman, of whom Frank is deceased; Nellie, born February 8, 1868, and died in 1899, was the wife of Sylvey Stewart, of Portland; Clara is the wife of J. R. Coleman, Jr.; George is engaged in business with his father; and Henry is living on the home ranch. In 1902 Mr. Coleman added to his responsibilities by purchasing a meat market in Coburg, in which his son is interested, and which promises to be a fruitful source of income. He spends his time looking after his market and farm, and is still a very busy and prominent factor in the community. Politically he is a staunch adherent of Democracy, and among other honors conferred upon him by his constituents may be mentioned that of state senator during 1882 to 1886, and that of member of the house during 1888. At the age of twenty-two, while living at Eugene, he identified himself with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and has since acknowledged allegiance to this order.

Mr. Coleman possesses in marked degree the force, good judgment and public spirit of the typical northwestern promoter, and as such is honored and esteemed by a large following of friends and associates.

REV. WILLIAM ROBINSON. A pioneer of many years ago, and one who has long since passed away, was the Rev. William Robinson, who was born in Shelby county, Ohio, January 20, 1789, the son of a strong and hardy pioneer of that then wilderness territory. When a young man he took up the ministry in the Methodist Church, and in his native state married Susannah Cannon, who was born in Kentucky, May 19, 1793. They lived in Ohio until 1832, when they removed to Indiana and remained there for a period of five years. Upon again changing their location they settled in Platte county, Mo., and made that their home until 1847, when they outfitted for the long and dangerous journey across the plains, and with the spirit of their ancestors enrolled their names among those who were to assist in western civilization, though both husband and wife were then approaching the evening of their lives. The journey with ox-teams occupied six months, and they were mercifully spared any serious trouble with the Indians, enduring with patience and fortitude the hardships and trials incident to their new lives.

Upon reaching Oregon Mr. Robinson took up a donation claim located on Salt creek, Polk county, and this remained their home for the period of two years. In addition to his ministerial efforts he worked for the advancement of the country in the cultivation of the broad acres which gave homes to so large a number of people who came empty-handed, but eager to add their strength to the forward march. After two years Mr. Robinson removed to Oregon City, where he remained for a short time, when he returned to his claim. Soon afterward he became an inmate of the homes of his children, on account of his advancing age. His death occurred August 1, 1864, and that of his wife September 30, 1870, the two having walked faithfully side by side for many years in the performance of duty. Of the ten children which blessed their union the three now living are Richard C., who is located in Pilot Rock, Umatilla county, Ore.; Surrenea J., widow of William J. J. Scott, whose sketch is found on another page of this work; and Matilda Haas, of Arizona.

HOLLAND McCOLLUM. Born on a farm bordering on Spencer creek, ten miles southwest of Eugene, April 15, 1852, Holland McCollum was educated in a little near-by school-house, and has never wandered far or for any length of time from the old donation claim which has since come into his personal possession. He now owns two hundred acres of the old place, and besides owns the thirty-two acres four miles west of Eugene, upon which he has made his home since 1898.

Of Scotch descent, Samuel McCollum, the father of Holland, was born in Kentucky, and followed farming and stock-raising during his entire active life. In his native state he married Zilpha Callahan, also a native of the Bourbon state, and who died on the old donation claim in 1897, at the age of eighty-four years. The parents lived in Kentucky until 1850, and then crossed the plains to Oregon with ox-teams, in a train composed of fifty wagons. Captain Bailey had charge of the home and fortune-seekers, and little of incident out of the ordinary marred a pleasant and speedy journey. Mr. McCollum took up six hundred and forty acres of the claim above mentioned, and here inaugurated farming and stock-raising on a large scale, achieving success from year to year, and laying by a competence for those dependent on his care. His death occurred in 1888, at the age of seventy-eight years, and he left behind him a record of good deeds and more than average financial success. Four sons and one daughter were born into the family, Holland being the third of the children.

After the death of his father, Holland McCollum became possessor of the old place, although he had long been independent, beginning to collect wages for his work from the time he was twenty-one years old. He married at The Dalles, in 1880, Mathilda Malle, who was born in France, and who is the mother of five children, Mary, William, Henry, John and Charles. The friend of education, Mr. McCollum has given his children every advantage within his power, and has so trained them in their every-day life, that morally, physically and mentally, they are a credit to their family and themselves. As a general farmer Mr. McCollum is practical and scientific, bringing to his aid modern innovations and advanced thought, and at all times feeling a genuine pride in the dignity and utility of his calling. He is a Democrat in political affiliation, and has been a school director for many years.

FREDERICK WILLIAM A. CRAIN. Identified with a successful jewelry business at Junction City since 1890, Frederick William A. Crain has many other claims upon the consideration of his fellow-townsmen, representing as he does the highest mental culture, the broadest humanity, and the most unswerving devotion to truth and justice. Born in Tompkins county, N. Y., November 5, 1827, he was reared on a farm which abounded in memories of his patriot grandfather, Elijah, who was born in the seat of conservatism in Connecticut, and removed at a very early day to Tompkins county. This ancestor was a man of remarkably strong and active constitution, and notwithstanding the fact that he lived for seven years on tented field and within sound of the cannon's roar in the Revolutionary war, attaining to the rank of corporal, he lived to the advanced age of ninety-two years. His son, Alvin, the father of Frederick William, was born in Tompkins county, and in his youth worked in a clock factory, later taking up his residence in Erie county, Pa., where he was variously engaged, principally as a shoe manufacturer. About 1841 he removed to Wisconsin, making his home in Minneapolis, Minn., in 1857, and there engaging in contracting and building, work for which he possessed special aptitude. He also aided his son in the management of a store, and in time removed to Brownsville, Minn., whence he came to Eugene, Ore., in 1878. He lived to be seventy-six years old. Interesting also is the maternal ancestry of the popular Junction City merchant, his mother, Tamson Seaton, being a granddaughter of that Lord Seaton whose ancestral halls and proud lineage were once the pride of Scotland. William Seaton, the father of Mrs. Crain, was banished from his native Scotland because of his participation in its defense, and his property confiscated by the state. Seeking an asylum in more tolerant America, he retrieved his fortunes in Tompkins county, N. Y., and died a comparatively wealthy man.

The oldest of the four sons and three daughters born to his parents, Frederick W. A. Crain was educated primarily in the public schools of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, and at the age of seventeen contracted an illness which incapacitated him for about three years. Recovering he apprenticed to a jeweler at Baraboo, Wis., in 1848, and later, when his preceptor removed to Illinois, he accompanied him and finished his trade. Returning to Baraboo, he engaged in a jewelry business until 1855, and then changed his field of activity to Minneapolis, Minn., whence he removed to Brownsville, Minn., in 1862. In 1873 Mr. Crain came to Eugene and opened a jewelry store, continuing the same until removing to his present business and residence in Junction City. He has a complete and modern store, and the stock includes such commodities as would naturally be required in a cosmopolitan and thriving community. He has invested in real estate to the extent of owning his store, the adjoining property, and his residence property, and his attitude towards the town of his adoption is that of a citizen who appreciates her possibilities, and rejoices at her prosperity and good fortune.

In Baraboo, Wis., Mr. Crain married Mary Melissa Lowell, who was born in Ohio, September 23, 1839, and whose father, William, came early to the Buckeye state from his native state of New York. Mr. Lowell removed to Parma, Jackson county, Mich., about 1847, and there worked at the carpenter's trade, combining the same with farming for many years, his death occurring at his home near Eaton Rapids at the age of eighty-two years. Not having any children of their own, Mr. and Mrs. Crain have an adopted daughter, Annie, who makes her home with them, having been educated in the University of Oregon and the Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. Five years she devoted to teaching in Seattle, Wash. Mr. Crain has found a large field of usefulness in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for over thirty years has been a local preacher, his genial and rational optimism and implicit faith in goodness and charity, endearing him to hundreds who have been privileged to hear his voice. As a journalist he has contributed to local and other periodicals, and his poetic productions have won him sincere admiration and approbation. One production, with its eloquent plea for freedom and kindness to birds, won a prize for nicety of diction, nobility of sentiment, and correctness of construction, and another, "God Bless our Oregon," is appended herewith. Mr. Crain has been a staunch Republican for many years, and although in no sense a politician, has served as treasurer of Eugene for six years. His name is engraved on the cornerstone of the University of Oregon, among those of other promoters of this now famous institution of learning, and is also placed in the cornerstone of the Villard section of the university. Far more than the average man, Mr. Crain has touched the rim of higher success in this world, has studied continuously, and filled the storehouse of his mind with treasure from a variety of sources. No one in the community bears a more honored name, nor does any more emphatically typify the high-minded, conservative, and thoroughly reliable business man.

GOD BLESS OUR OREGON.

Oh for that spirit progressive, that brought our fathers o'er
The lofty mountain heights, where everlasting torrents pour,
To our lovely Oregon, lying nestled 'mongst the hills,
With her verdure-coated valleys and laughing little rills.

Where majestic rivers roll over beds of golden sand,
And plunging forward, rush to meet the mighty ocean
grand,
With its laden fleets of commerce, come from every clime,
To barter for the wealth we take from forest and from mine.

For Nature, with a lavish hand, here spreads its kingly store
With valleys rich in primal wealth, and hills of golden ore.
These valleys of our Oregon are rich beyond compare,
And wait to greet the toiler with more than lion's share.

While here our lordly mountains rear their crested heads on high,
And Nature lifts herself to kiss the star-emblazoned sky;
Where every hillside stands begirt with stalwart timber's wealth,
And all our coasts are blessed with wondrous cheer of wealth.

Oh for a race progressive, that we may build us here,
An empire grand from all the wealth, each freeman's heart to cheer!
God grant it be the very best on all this globe of ours,
With busy cities growing, and homes all bright with flowers.

An empire where true manliness may guard each lovely home,
And where the foul destroyer may never, never come;
And where in other lands is found the beer-house and saloon,
May the church-house point its spire to Heaven—man's greatest boon.

And may the blighting curse of rum be banished from this land;
And in its place the school-house and the college ever stand.
A goodly empire then we'll have, and our sons and daughters
Shall glean its golden wealth beside these crystal waters.

And no drones here may then be found, a curse upon the soil,
Nor may we hear upon the street the oath or drunken broil.
But grant the Orient come forth the Occident to greet,
With branch of palm within each hand, this triumph to complete.

ISAAC WILLIAM BOND. Prosperous, and on good terms with himself and the world at large, Isaac W. Bond is living a somewhat retired life on his farm of three hundred and twenty-five acres northwest of Eugene. His has been a busy existence, crowned with success because of his industry and good management, and because of strict adherence to the principles of honesty and consideration for all with whom he has had to do. Born in Shenandoah county, Virginia, December 19, 1827, he is a son of Joseph and Mary (Eeshelman) Bond, natives of Virginia, and the former of English extraction. The parents were married in the old Dominion, and there six sons and five daughters were born to them, Isaac W. being the fourth child. When he was nine years old, in 1836, the family undertook the long journey overland to Indiana, settling in Knox county, where the father died December 31, 1838, at the age of forty-eight years. After his death the family continued together for many years, or until Isaac W. and Allen Bond made arrangements to come to Oregon, in 1853.

Thousands of men now enjoying the advantages of Oregon date their start in life from the time when they buckled on their courage and started forth on the plains between them and the Pacific ocean. Thus it was with Isaac and Allen Bond, who joined a party under Vincent McClure, consisting of five wagons, they themselves having three yoke of oxen and three yoke of cows. Making the start, March 21, 1853, they crossed the Wabash river and proceeded with few discomforts until locating near the present farm of Mr. Bond, November 1, 1853. The latter was the happy possessor of one cow and one yoke of oxen at the end of his journey, and these served as a nucleus, around which he built up his present large farming industry. Mr. McClure, his brother, and Allen and Isaac Bond camped around the section corner, and afterward held these farms for themselves, being well content with the richness of the land, and desirability of the location. Mr. Bond from the wild land improved his farm into the present fine property, built a modern home to supplant the one hastily constructed, and put up modern barns, outhouses and fences. His land has yielded well of general farm produce, and at all times he has had fine cattle on his place, deriving a considerable yearly income from their sale.

So absorbed has he been in his home and church life that Mr. Bond has never taken an active interest in political undertakings, although as the friend of education he has served on the school board for twenty years, and as the friend of good roads has been a member of the board of supervisors for three terms. In 1851 he was united in marriage with Hettie McClure, daughter of the captain of the train in which Mr. Bond came to the west, and who was born in Knox county, Ind., August 19, 1835. Mrs. Bond proved an earnest and sympathetic helpmate, and in the early days of struggle and adversity in the new country stimulated the flagging and oftentimes discouraged hearts of those by whom she was surrounded. Notwithstanding the hard work which she accomplished she reared ten children to be useful men and women, impressing all with the necessity of thrift, economy, industry and integrity. At the time of her death, April 14, 1901, she left the following children to mourn her loss: V. S.; Louise, the wife of Rufus Robinson, of Walton, Lane county; Allen, living on a farm three miles from the home place; Emma, the wife of William Wheeler, of Pleasant Hill; Eliza Catherine, the wife of Halvor Wheeler, of Pleasant Hill; and Amanda, living at home; Robert B., living near his father. Joseph W., William L., Mary A., who was the wife of C. H. Withrow, are all deceased. Mr. Bond has always taken an active part in the Christian Church and was a deacon for many years.

PETER JACKSON COX. The owner of a model little farm of thirty acres located two and a half miles west of Silverton, Marion county, is P. J. Cox, a native of this state, having been born on Howell Prairie, December 27, 1846, the son of Gideon S. Cox. The father was born in Indiana in 1804, the son of a farmer, and he grew up into this life, remaining on his father's farm until his marriage with Miss Susanna Coffenberry. The young people made their home in Missouri previous to settling in Oregon. They came across the plains by ox-teams in 1846, taking the usual time of six months for the trip, and experiencing no serious trouble with the Indians while on the way. Settling in Marion county Mr. Cox took up a donation claim in Howell Prairie, trading it, however, in a short time for that upon which P. J. Cox now lives, his first possessions passing into the hands of Al Jerman. Most of the land was prairie, upon which he carried on general farming and stock-raising, and with the thrifty habits of the middle west began at once to put improvements of all kinds upon his farm. Mr. and Mrs. Cox reared quite a large family, being named in order of birth, as follows: Marsilia, wife of Wilburn King, both deceased; John T., of Salem; Jane, wife of Samuel Penter, of Macleay; Jacob, deceased; Mary, deceased, wife of Stephen Jones; Joseph, deceased; Diana, wife of Wright Foshay; Permillia, wife of Peter Bowen; Elizabeth, wife of Joshua Bowen; Tabitha, deceased; Julia Ann, widow of the late James Jerman, of this vicinity; George W.; Polk, deceased; P. J., of this review; Margeline, deceased, wife of Robert Welch, of Clackamas, Ore.; and William B., of Marshfield, Ore. The father took quite an active interest in all educational and church movements, and the general esteem in which he was held caused his death to be generally regretted in the community. He died at the age of eighty-four, his wife living to be only sixty-five.

P. J. Cox received his education in the district school near his home, remaining with his parents until his marriage with Miss Christie Hadley, a native of Canada, daughter of Isaac and Christiana (Harvey) Hadley, and who came to Oregon in 1875. The young people went to house-keeping on the place where they now live. With the passing of the years that brought the accumulation of the fruits of his industry and management Mr. Cox has improved the appearance of his home, putting up a modern house, and neat, attractive buildings for the protection of his stock and implements. His principal crop is hops, twenty acres of his farm being devoted to this cultivation. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cox, all of whom are living: Lettie, of Salem; Nellie, wife of Harlan O. White, of Salem; Roy, and Ora, still at home with their parents. Politically Mr. Cox is a Republican and has served as school director for several years. Like his father he interests himself in all church movements, being a member of the Christian Church, in which he officiates as elder.

OLNEY FRY. At the age of seventy-seven Olney Fry may view with satisfaction his well planned and well adjusted life, about two-thirds of which has been spent in the northwest, and in the pursuit of a competence for which he has worked hard and unceasingly. This honored pioneer was born in Cortland county, N. Y., December 10, 1825, and at the age of eleven moved with his parents to Knox county, Ill. In the then unsettled middle west he gained strength of body and mind while helping to develop a fertile farm, in the meantime irregularly attending the winter term of school held in a little log house in the neighborhood.

The father of Olney Fry was born in Rhode Island, as was also his wife, Salina (Bennett) Fry, and the young couple moved to New York at a very early day, settling on a farm in Cortland county. The Illinois farm was disposed of in 1849, and in the spring the whole family started across the plains with ox-teams, after many months of preparation for the momentous undertaking. They had three wagons and many ox-teams, besides loose cattle to furnish meat on the way and start life with in the far west. Upon arriving in Oregon the father bought a saw and grist mill near Howell Prairie, which, however, he sold in July, 1850, and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres in Linn county. In the course of time he gave up farming and retired to Albany, where his death occurred in 1894, at the age of ninety-two years. Four of his sons fought bravely in the Indian war of 1855-56.

When his father sold his grist mill in 1850, Olney Fry went to Salem and began working at the carpenter's trade, having completed which he moved to his father's farm in Linn county and built himself a fine house. That this work is well done is attested by the fact that it is still standing, one of the oldest landmarks in that section. Noticing the dearth of good cattle among the settlers, Mr. Fry returned to the east by way of Panama in the fall of 1852, and after buying up one hundred and fifty head of young cattle started with them across the plains, accompanied by John Davenport. They had many adventures before reaching the end of their journey, but the cattle were in fairly good condition, and few had fallen by the wayside. Again in Oregon, Mr. Fry bought his present farm and started to raise stock, an occupation which he has found both remunerative and congenial. In 1854 he married Mary Foster, and this union has proved a particularly harmonious one. For the greater part of the time since his marriage Mr. Fry has lived on his farm, although he has taken occasional trips to towns in the state, leaving his home in capable hands. He is a member of the United Presbyterian Church, and fraternally is connected with the Grange.

JOSEPH WILLIAM MORGAN, who is actively identified with the agricultural prosperity of Linn county, is pleasantly located about four miles from Shedds, where he has a choice farm, well improved, with a good house, barns and outbuildings, and everything pertaining to a first-class estate. As an energetic, successful business man, and the descendant of an honored pioneer of this part of the state, he is especially worthy of representation in this biographical work. He is among the older of the native-born citizens of the place, and now occupies the homestead where his birth occurred, August 26, 1851.

His father, Miller Morgan, was born and brought up in Ohio, and in Burlington, Iowa, married Elizabeth Helmick, a native of Germany. In the spring of 1847 he started across the plains with one wagon, and three yoke of oxen. Reaching Oregon in the fall, he spent the winter with General McCarver then settled in Polk county, where he resided for one year. In 1849, with ox-teams, he proceeded to California, where he was employed in hauling freight from Sacramento to the mining districts for a few months. As cold weather came on, he traded his oxen for five mares, returned to Linn county, Ore., and spent that winter on Oak creek, near Albany. In the spring of 1850 he traded one of his horses for a squatter's right to six hundred and forty acres of land at Peterson's butte, (now known as the Gardiner farm) and in the fall of that year traded the land back to the original owner for two Indian ponies and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres known as the Saddle Butte ranch, five hundred and fifty acres of it being valley land. On his land, which was six miles northwest of Brownsville, fourteen miles southeast of Albany, and four miles east of Shedds, he erected a log cabin in February, 1851, and at once began the improvement of a homestead. A man of indomitable resolution and perseverance, he met with good success in his untiring efforts, clearing an excellent farm whereon he resided until 1898. Removing then to Albany, he lived retired until his death, in March, 1901, aged seventy-five years. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Morgan, namely: James, residing in Lebanon, Ore.; Thomas Franklin and Orange Z., both deceased; J. W., the special subject of this sketch; Clara C., wife of George B. McClellan Thompson of Shedds; Sarah I., wife of Ezra Randolph, of Oregon City; and Lawrence O., of Shedds.

Born and reared on the parental homestead, J. W. Morgan acquired a practical education in the district schools, and under his father's training became well versed in the art and science of agriculture. For twenty or more years he lived near Shedds, but in the fall of 1902 assumed possession of the old home farm, where he has since resided. He owns three hundred acres of the paternal farm, being a portion of the donation claim which his father cleared, and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising with excellent results.

In 1876 Mr. Morgan married Ann Stimson, who was born in Iowa, daughter of Lewis and Jane (Wilson) Stimson, who located in Linn county in 1852, taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres on the Sand Ridge. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan have two children, namely: Lottie E., who was educated at Albany College, and is now teaching school; and Elza F., living at home. Politically Mr. Morgan is a Democrat, and fraternally is a member of the Twenty-five Hundred Insurance Company of Albany.

C. C. HAZLETON. People who comprise the present community of Cottage Grove little realize their indebtedness to the men who came here in the early days, and by their far-reaching achievements, their well laid and later-developed plans on the fertile farm lands, started into permanent activity an aggregation of varied interests. Royal H. Hazleton, so well known in pioneer days, so well remembered by those who lived and labored with him, belonged emphatically to the class mentioned, and none more than he typified the solid and forceful pioneer.

Born in New York in 1818, Mr. Hazleton was reared and educated there and removed to Missouri in 1837 with his parents. As a young man he married Martha Runnels, a native of Missouri, and with whom he lived peacefully on a farm until the whole country became agitated over rumors of gold on the coast. He had no faith in mining himself, but the exodus to the west suggested large opportunities in the way of general pioneer undertakings, and he joined a train bound for the other side of the Rocky Mountains in the spring of 1849. Arriving in California after a comparatively pleasant six-months journey, he remained for a time there, returned to Missouri and in 1852 outfitted to cross the plains again, this time for Oregon. He lived in Eugene for a year, in the meantime looking for a desirable place upon which to settle permanently. His choice fell upon a section of land four miles west of Cottage Grove, and he located on what soon became known as Hazleton's creek. The land being fertile, and admirable for situation, the pioneer settler soon had a semblance of activity upon it. A small house was erected, and soon afterward a barn, other needed improvements following in due order, and as the out-going produce permitted of additional expenditure. In his youth Mr. Hazleton had prepared for the future by learning the wagonmaker's and woodworker's trades, and he found abundant opportunity to use them, not only on his own, but upon the farms of the surrounding settlers. In order to utilize the timber which densely covered many acres of his property, he built a saw-mill, and later a grist-mill, also a wagonshop, in which repairing was conducted for several months in the year. Being the first shops of their kind in the neighborhood, people came from far and near to have their wheat ground and their wagons repaired, a great deal of interest being soon centered around the mills and shop. From small beginnings towns have started on their successful way, and it is not surprising people began to settle near, for Mr. Hazleton realized the profit to be gotten out of land sold in town or small farm lots, and he thus became an earnest promoter of his section. The village grew apace, and was given the name of Slabtown, which it fortunately soon outgrew, and took on a more dignified character under its new name of Cottage Grove. Not content to have merely started the town, Mr. Hazleton grew with it, in time conducted one of the first hotels of the village. In partnership with a man named Ward he built and owned Pass Creek Toll Road, which was among the first toll roads in Lane county, and which has the same upbuilding influence always to be attributed to good roads. These various enterprises netted him a large yearly income, some of which he invested in mining properties on the Salmon river. He was a successful man, and the fact that he left permanent reminders of himself in all parts of the county insures him a lasting place in its history and progress. He never took an active interest in politics other than casting his vote for the Republican party. He was a devoted member of his church, and during the course of a year he gave away more than will ever be known in unostentatious charity. His death occurred in 1886 on the home place.

Of the twelve children born into his family, Thomas P. is in business in Waitsburg, Wash.; Francis M. is a business man of Santa Cruz, Cal.; Harrison H. makes his home in Lake View, Ore.; John H. is in Baker City; J. M. lives in Pomeroy, Wash.; C. C. is a merchant of Creswell; and A. L. is in Whatcom, Wash.

C. C. Hazleton, one of the younger sons of Royal Hazelton, and who inherits the substantial traits of his sire, was born on the donation claim upon which Cottage Grove sprang into existence, June 12, 1858. His father's appreciation of a trade influenced him to thus fortify himself against future want, and he conducted a harness-shop for a short time in Cottage Grove, and later engaged in business in Oakland with his brother, J. M., giving up the same in order to identify himself with the Wells-Fargo Express Company. His reliable and industrious traits were noted by his employers, who advanced him in pay and responsibility, retaining him in their service for a long period of sixteen years. He was the first messenger between Umatilla and Pendleton, acted as agent at Hastings, Neb., San Antonio and Corpus Christi, Texas, and Albuquerque, N. M., thus enlarging his horizon by travel and contact with various people. In March, 1890, Mr. Hazleton returned from the south to Oregon and engaged in the general merchandise business in Creswell, continuing the same with much success up to the present time. He has a store supplied with the necessities in demand in the town, and in addition carries a large line of agricultural implements and shelf hardware. He is genial and cordial in his relations with his patrons, and courtesy and consideration may be regarded as among the keystones of his character. Like all successful merchants, he is public-spirited in the extreme, and gives his support to all measures instituted for the advancement of the general good.

The Hazleton home is one of the pleasant and hospitable ones in the town and is presided over by Mrs. Hazleton, who was formerly Dora C. Scott, a native daughter of Oregon, and the devoted mother of three interesting children, Danae, Hazel and Nieta. Like his father a Republican, Mr. Hazleton has never sought political preferment, but in his interest in education has found both pleasure and profit in his capacity as school director. Essentially social in disposition, he is identified fraternally with the Masons, the Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World.

ANDREW J. ZUMWALT. Faithful to his early training, Andrew J. Zumwalt has followed throughout his entire life the work which he learned under the instruction of his father, earning his livelihood in the pursuit of farming and at the same time dispensing the benefits of whatever talents wherewith he has been blessed. He has never shirked any public or private duty, but has earnestly endeavored to make himself a worthy and useful citizen of the state to which he came in early manhood.

As one of a family of eleven children, Andrew J. Zumwalt was born in St. Charles county, Mo., September 2, 1832, and a part of the experiences of boyhood was an attendance at the little log school-house in the neighborhood of his home until he gained a fair education. In the spring of 1850, in company with his father, Solomon, his mother, Nancy, and the remainder of the children, he crossed the plains with two wagons and four yoke of oxen to each, eight head of loose stock and three horses. By fall they had reached Salt Lake City, Utah, and they there spent the winter, March 9, of the following year continuing the journey into Oregon, where, in Benton county, the father took up a donation claim, where he remained a year. In 1852 he came into Lane county, and located two miles west of Eugene, where he lived until 1872, when he moved to a farm of four hundred and fifty acres, on the Mohawk, where he died in 1888, at the age of eighty-one years. Andrew J. Zumwalt also took up a donation claim in 1852, one of one hundred and sixty acres located two and a half miles west of Eugene, and this remained his home until 1859. In the last-named year he removed to Eugene and spent the ensuing two years there, when he purchased in the neighborhood of Irving a farm of a hundred and sixty acres upon which he lived until 1872. He then moved upon the farm which he now occupies and which consists of four hundred acres, where he is engaged in farming and stock-raising, being particularly interested in the latter business in Shorthorns. He also owns one hundred and twenty acres near Irving, fifty acres in the Mohawk valley, and one hundred and sixty acres at Oakesdale, Wash.

Mr. Zumwalt was first married in February, 1855, to Miss Margaret Walker, and seven children were born to them, namely: Albert M.; Samantha J.; Mary A.; John W.; E. W.; Alfred, who is deceased; and one who died in infancy. The wife died November 7, 1873, and Mr. Zumwalt married in April, 1875, Miss Missouri Brown, and their four children are named in order of birth as follows: May, Louisa, Paul and Lynn. In politics Mr. Zumwalt has been prominent and took an active part in the advancement of the Republican principles which he heartily endorsed, but of late years has been independent. He has held various minor offices in his community, among them being constable and justice of the peace, and in 1880 he was chosen to represent his party in the state legislature, where he acquitted himself ably and honorably. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and he also belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church of Irving.

ZACHARIAH TAYLOR KINTZLEY. September 15, 1890, was the date of the arrival of Z. T. Kintzley in the state of Oregon, and with the exception of one month which was passed at Arlington, eastern Oregon, has made his home in Springfield, Lane county, engaging generally in the business of painting and paperhanging. He was born in Clay county, Ind., October 16, 1847, the son of George, a native of Virginia. The latter, when a young man, went to Louisville, Ky., and engaged at work as a cabinet-maker, and later located in Indiana, where he found more lucrative employment in the flour-mill business. He first settled in Putnamville, Putnam county, where he remained until 1854, when he located in Story county, Iowa, there giving up his milling interests to engage in farming on a two-hundred-acre farm. His death occurred there in 1885. He had lived to see the country change from the pioneer conditions which prevailed when he first became a resident of that state to the city of Ames, which is the home of the state agricultural college, now located on land adjoining that which formed his property.

The youngest of his father's children Z. T. Kintzley was reared in the state of Iowa, receiving his education in the common schools. In 1863, during the Civil war, when only sixteen years old he enlisted in Company B, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, serving with the Seventh Corps in the western department of the Seventh Army Corps. He participated in many of the notable battles of that momentous struggle and was mustered out in Little Rock, Ark., March 23, 1866, and received his discharge at Davenport, Iowa. He then went back to his home, and shortly removed with his mother to Woodbury county, near Sioux City, Iowa, where he engaged in farming, after which, in 1881, he settled in Sloan City. He was there employed in the cattle business and so continued until his removal to the west nine years later, locating then in Springfield, where he now lives. Since becoming a resident here he has built a residence which he sold, afterward buying another, and at present he is engaged in putting up a two-story building which is to be used for mercantile enterprises.

The marriage of Mr. Kintzley took place in Iowa, Miss Mary C. Cain becoming his wife. She was born in Wisconsin and died here in 1900, at the age of fifty-two years. Their four children are as follows: Ida Frances, deceased; Alice, now Mrs. Bert Doane, who lives with her father; Edna Viola, deceased; and George Milton, also at home. In his fraternal relations Mr. Kintzley belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Rebekahs, and is a member of Geary Post, Grand Army of the Republic. Politically he is a Republican and in the interests of his party he has served for six years as a member of the city council and has also served as road supervisor for one term.

CHESTER SKEELS. For nearly thirty years Chester Skeels has watched, and had a part in, the growth and upbuilding of Benton county, Ore., to which locality he came from Illinois. He was born August 6, 1833, in Franklin county, Ohio, and there his earliest boyhood days were spent. When yet a small boy, however, his parents removed to Delaware county, that state, later going to Union county.

After his marriage, which occurred in the latter county in 1855, and united him with Miss Margaret Brannan, a native of Zanesville, Ohio, Mr. Skeels moved back to Delaware county, there following the tinner's trade for a short time. Not being satisfied with the latter occupation, however, he discontinued its prosecution and the same year went to Piatt county, Ill., and near Monticello, bought a tract of land which he improved and cultivated, making it his home for twenty years.

As has been previously intimated, the year 1875 marked the arrival of Mr. Skeels and his family in Oregon, and more particularly in Benton county. His farm of seventy-two acres, located one mile from the city of Albany, while not a large acreage, is so utilized and managed as to produce results which might do credit to a tract of much larger size. Mr. Skeels makes a specialty of raising fruits and vegetables, and in the raising of potatoes is especially successful, his close proximity to market being a large factor in his success.

Of the eleven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Skeels only five are living, as follows: Harvey; Hulda, the wife of N. E. Anderson; O. V., the wife of William Peacock; Alice, who became the wife of Frank Hughson; and Zua, now Mrs. William Yoder. In politics Mr. Skeels votes for the candidates of the Populist party, but has no inclination or desire to hold public office, as was proven when he refused the office of justice of the peace, to which his fellow-citizens had elected him.

WILLIAM S. LOCKE. Inseparably associated with the pioneer families who came to the coast before the incentive of gold lured men from quiet homes into uncertain speculations, is the one to which William S. Locke belongs, himself one of the prosperous farmers and stock-raisers near Corvallis. In the coming of this family to the west in 1847 was rehearsed again the struggles and privations and discouragements which tinge the early history of the plains with sadness, and make present-day travelers in luxurious palace cars gasp in astonishment at the magnitude of the sacrifice and endurance of the ox-train bands. The credit for crossing the plains at that early time can not be given to William S. Locke, for he was born in Sheridan county, Mo., August 30, 1840, and was therefore but a little lad of seven years. His father, Abraham Locke, was the instigator of the trip, and the buoyant spirit which encouraged the weary and disheartened home-seekers.

Born in the state of Virginia, Abraham Nelson Locke removed to Missouri with his parents when eighteen years of age, and there married Harriett Sinnett, who was born in Ohio. Mr. Locke's father was a very early settler of the Sunflower state, and improved several acres of land before his death. Abraham continued to live in Missouri until 1847, and then sold his interests and prepared to make his home in the far west. With two wagons and three yoke of oxen to each, and with about twenty-five head of loose cattle, he made the start, somewhat regretfully leaving behind that of which he was sure, and venturing all upon that which was uncertain and at best hard and laborious. Four children had been born into his family, but they were not old enough to be of much use, and the greater part of the work fell upon his shoulders. A great deal of trouble was experienced with the stock, which wandered away or died of disease, and the little party finally came to Meek's cut-off, that place of terrible memories, and like others similarly placed, were obliged to turn back and find another trail. Their sufferings were intense, and their continual wrestling with insufficient provisions, inclement weather, Indian cruelties and illness among their number, helped to make up an experience from which people might well beg to be delivered. Arriving in Oregon much depressed financially and otherwise, Mr. Locke spent the first winter with his family in Polk county, and in the spring he traded two yoke of oxen for Henry Fuller's claim of six hundred and forty acres. Here he erected a small log cabin and remained during the following winter, and in the spring brought his family to Polk county, leaving them there while he went to the mines of California. During the summer in California he worked in the gold mines and at teaming, returning in the fall a sadder and wiser man, and not materially bettered by his short fortune-hunting experience. He then moved his family onto the ranch where his son is now living, and where he made many improvements, as good as were known at that time. His growing success was cut short, however, in 1872, for he was thrown from a wagon by a runaway team, and soon afterward died from the effects of the wounds received. He was sixty-two years of age, and was respected and liked by all who knew him. His faithful and helpful wife survived him until May, 1897, at the time being seventy-six years old.

As early as his strength permitted William S. was taught to make himself useful around the donation claim, and he remained there until starting out as a school teacher in Lane county, in 1868. At the end of two terms he engaged in stock-raising in Lane county, and in 1877 came back to the old homestead, where he has since lived. He owns one hundred and thirty acres in the home farm, besides two hundred acres of pasture land, and a half interest in a farm of one hundred and thirty-five acres. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising and is very successful in these lines of occupation. Needless to say, he has made many improvements over those inaugurated by his father in the early days, and has a well-equipped and thoroughly modern farming property. He married, in 1868, Livonia Jenkins, daughter of Rev. Stephen Jenkins, a pioneer of 1846, and three children have been born of this union: Ida, Bertie and Franklin, the last two of whom are deceased. Mr. Locke is prominent in fraternal circles of this county, especially with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he has been a member since 1864. He is a genial and very tactful gentleman, possesses a high sense of honor and an appreciation of the rights and prerogatives of others.

JAMES PARVIN. The greater part of the growth of Oregon has not been the result of inspired action, but of slow, steady and patient building, which is found in the greatest degree in the agricultural regions, to the accomplishment of which work is due the substantial upbuilding of the state. Holding a prominent place among these men in Lane county is James Parvin, located upon his farm in the neighborhood of Dexter, and he has given liberally of his means and influence to the upbuilding of the community in which he has lived for so many years.

James Parvin has passed three score and ten years, having been born May 2, 1831, near the capital of Indiana. His father was a farmer by occupation, and the son was trained to this work while receiving his education in the district school in the vicinity of his home. His mother died when he was one year old. He went out into the world to make his own way when eighteen, and while following his early training he also learned the trade of a carpenter, his livelihood being gained for several years, however, through working as a farm-hand. In 1853 he followed the westward trend of progress and set out for Oregon, as driver of an ox-team. After a journey of seven months the destination was safely reached and Mr. Parvin at once took up a donation claim in Lane county, located on Lost creek. In 1855 he took another claim, two and a half miles south of Dexter, where he remained for four years, when he bought one hundred and sixty acres, a part of the John B. Hannah claim, and in the first location which Mr. Hannah had chosen on coming to Oregon. This has since been Mr. Parvin's home, putting into the cultivation and improvement of the broad acres a practical and intelligent management which has met with rich returns. He now has a farm of six hundred and sixty-seven acres, with a commodious frame dwelling, good barns and out-buildings of all descriptions. In addition to his farming interests, Mr. Parvin has successfully followed the trade which he learned under the difficulties of his early life, becoming a contractor of prominence, and was also engaged in the mercantile business in Dexter for eleven years, and at that time was also postmaster, and operated a threshing machine for twenty-five years.

In February, 1854, Mr. Parvin married Selena Parker, who was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, in 1834, and of the children born to them Ida, the wife of William Williams, lives in Dexter; Hosea M. is located in the vicinity of Dexter, and Jennie is at home with her parents and conducts the store at Dexter. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Parvin has held various offices in his neighborhood, never shirking the fulfillment of his duty as a citizen, as is evidenced by the active and prominent part which he has always taken in the advancement of the principles advocated by his party. He is a consistent member of the Christian Church, and gives to his religious duties the same application and energy which has made his life so much of a success.

JOSEPH M. PARKER. To any man there is a pleasure in the thought that he has built up something that is either a benefit to society in general or adds to the comfort of his own people, and the double object is fulfilled in the improvement and intelligent cultivation of a farm, for upon the work of the agriculturist depends the existence of the country at large. In Oregon, the new state which has been built by developing resources which only far-sighted vision could divine, there are many who have given their entire time to the cultivation of the broad lands and have taken their places in the ranks of farmers, and among these is Joseph M. Parker, located upon his farm which adjoins the postoffice of Dexter, Lane county, and is eighteen miles southeast of Eugene, the county-seat.

Mr. Parker was born December 19, 1834, in Coshocton county, Ohio, and was the son of James Parker. Mr. Parker received his education in the public schools of Ohio, Illinois and Oregon, and after the death of his parents, which occurred in 1847, he went to live with a brother-in-law, in Illinois, where he had gone with his parents, in 1841. Eleven years later, in 1853, they crossed the plains, a journey which occupied about six months and was remarkably free from trouble with the Indians, and after spending the first winter in Washington county, Ore., they located in Lane county. About 1858 Mr. Parker bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres in the neighborhood of Trent, upon which he made his home for four years, when he removed to Coast Fork, and passed the ensuing eight years. He then bought a farm of eight hundred acres, a part of which he still owns and into the cultivation of which he has put the effort of a number of years, building a frame house, good barns and other out-buildings which bespeak the success of its owner. He owns about three hundred acres, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising, about eighty acres being in cultivation. For about five years of the time since he has been a resident of this locality Mr. Parker was engaged in the grist-milling business.

The marriage of Mr. Parker occurred in 1858 and united him with Miss Caroline R. Rutledge, who was born in Fulton county, Ill., in 1842, and crossed the plains with her father, Blasingim Rutledge, in 1853, when they settled in Lane county. He was a farmer, stockman and merchant, and was well known in Lane county. He died in 1870, and was born in Tennessee about 1816. He was married twice, Elizabeth Hopkins, the mother of Mrs. Parker, being his first wife. She died about 1848. Mr. Rutledge was again married, Sarah Jane Markley becoming his wife, and of this family only two daughters, Mrs. Narcissa Davis and Mrs. Ida Buchanan, are living. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Parker, as follows: Cecelia, now the wife of E. B. Hunsaker, of San Francisco; Clement C., located in Lane county; Ellis R., located in Creswell; and Ferdie and Georgia, at home. In politics Mr. Parker is a Democrat and takes quite an active interest in the movements of his party, the leaders of which have come to depend upon him in his neighborhood, as he has filled all the minor offices in the vicinity, and never shirks his duty as a citizen.

JAMES PARKER. Yet another of the strong and reliable men who have made telling strokes towards the upbuilding of Lane county is James Parker, who was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, March 19, 1833, and brought his energy and well directed ambition to Oregon in 1853. When eight years old he removed with his parents to Fulton county, Ill., where his father worked at carpentering and farming, and where he died at the age of sixty-seven years. He was married twice, James being the fourth child of the second family, his mother dying at the age of forty-four years.

Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, James Parker was glad of any occupation which furnished a living, and the first work that presented itself was splitting rails, then he went to learn the carder's trade in the old fashioned carding-mill run by tread power furnished by oxen. Subsequently he learned blacksmithing and the carpenter's trade, for in those days a mechanic was supposed to be a many-sided genius, and able to turn his hand to almost anything in his line. In the early times Mr. Parker found a large field for his work and continued it for several years with good financial results. In the meantime he kept near his family, and in 1853, with his brother-in-law, John Stoops, his two sisters, Mrs. Stoops and Selena, now Mrs. James Parvin, and a brother, Joseph Parker, he crossed the plains with ox-teams. Under the able leadership of Captain Frazier the party reached their destination without any serious mishap, and Mr. Parker stopped at The Dalles about four months, the rest of the family going on to Lane county and settling on a donation claim in Lost Valley, five miles southeast of Pleasant Hill. Later Mr. Parker and his brother went to Portland and engaged at various kinds of labor, and in the fall of 1854 he came to Lane county and attended the district school while helping during his leisure on the family farm. During the Rogue River war, to which the residents were driven because of the constant depredations and want of good faith on the part of the Indians, he was employed for six months as a teamster, afterward returning to Lane county and teaching school for eighteen months.

October 1, 1857, Mr. Parker married Phoebe E. Rigdon, who was born January 8, 1840, in Fulton county, Ill., and came to Oregon in 1852 with her parents, and here married and went to housekeeping on a rented farm north of Pleasant Hill, soon afterward removing to Lost Valley, where they lived for eight years. Their next home was the old Bowen place west of Pleasant Hill, and three years later Mr. Parker bought his present farm of three hundred and twenty-one acres two miles southwest of Pleasant Hill, which comprised all of the John Littrell donation claim. All of the improvements of a modern nature have been made by the present owner, who is progressive, and whose theories of farming might well be emulated by the seeker after agricultural success. Jersey cattle, Poland China hogs and Cotswold sheep are here found in their best development, grains contribute a considerable part of the yearly income, and general farming and dairying are not omitted from the departments of activity here represented. One hundred and thirty acres are under cultivation. The residence is a comfortable and well appointed one, the barns and out-buildings large and modern, and everything in keeping with the thrifty owner.

In addition to farming Mr. Parker has been engaged in milling in Lost Valley for twelve or fifteen years. As a Democrat he has served as road supervisor and school director, also as county commissioner for a term of four years. He and his wife are members of the Pleasant Hill Grange. Eleven children have been born into his family, of whom the following are living: Luella, wife of William Bundy, of Springfield; Albert K., of Lost Valley; Hortense, the wife of W. E. Holdridge, of Yamhill county; Clarence A., of Springfield; Edith, the wife of Dr. Louis Bundy, of Medford, Ore.; John C., of Springfield; and James C., Clifton L., Guy W. and Augustus are living at home; Lucien died, aged thirty-one years. Mr. Parker is indebted solely to his own energy and perseverance for his rise in life. He has advanced slowly but surely, and in the meantime has never wavered from the essential requisites of honesty, integrity and industry.

JOHN DUNCAN. By no means an unappreciated member of the agricultural class, John Duncan is intelligently engaged in the cultivation of his farm of one hundred and thirty-six acres, located one mile north of Shedd's, Linn county, a general line of farming connected with stock-raising and dairying being his principal occupation. This farm was once a part of the old Hogue estate, and a portion of it constituted school lands, and was first occupied by Mr. Duncan in 1877, since which time he has made all the improvements which have made this one of the most valuable farms in this part of the county.

Mr. Duncan was born April 13, 1845, in Cole county, Mo., the son of Jubal and Elizabeth (Mercersmith) Duncan, natives respectively of Kentucky and Virginia. The father had removed with his parents to Missouri when a mere boy, and had remained at home until his marriage. Two years after his death, which occurred when John was only four years old, Mrs. Duncan became the wife of John Isom, a native of Virginia, with whom she lived in Missouri until 1853. At that date they outfitted with ox-teams and at the close of a six-months journey, mercifully devoid of trouble with the marauding Indians, they found themselves in Linn county, Ore., eager and ready to make a home in the then wild country. Mr. Isom at once bought the squatter's right to a claim of three hundred and twenty acres six miles east of Shedd's, on which he proved up and began the improvement necessary to make the farm of service to him. This remained the home of the family until 1878, when they removed to Albany, where Mr. Isom had become interested in industrial lines through his purchase of the Red Crown mills located in that city. Until his retirement several years later he conducted these mills, after which he made his home with his children. He lived to be seventy-five years old, becoming one of the popular men of the times through the many good qualities which distinguished his character. He was always much interested in all educational and political movements, as a Democrat, serving as county commissioner one term and justice of the peace several years. His wife still survives him and now makes her home with Mrs. Scott Ward, a daughter. Mrs. Isom was the mother of three children by her first marriage, the only son now living being John Duncan, of this review. The eldest daughter, Mrs. Sarah M. Cleek, lives in Albany. The children of the last marriage are as follows: Frances Ann, now Mrs. Ward, of Albany; Mary C., now Mrs. Skinner, of Albany; Cynthia C. Ward, of Albany; Alice, now Mrs. Pfeiffer, of Albany; David I., located on Muddy creek; Virginia L., now Mrs. Lanning, of Tacoma, Wash.; Jefferson D., on the old claim; John, of Dawson City; and Elizabeth, now Mrs. Woods, a resident of California.

The education of John Duncan was received through the medium of the district school in the neighborhood of his home in Oregon, where he remained until he had reached his twenty-first year. He then ventured out into the world for himself, in eastern Oregon following mining and prospecting for about a year, when he engaged in the stock business there. For three years he continued in that location, at the close of which time he returned to Linn county, in 1872 engaging in farming here. Five years later he entered upon the property before mentioned, and where he has met with a pleasant and prosperous return for well directed effort.

The marriage of Mr. Duncan occurred in 1877, and united him with Miss Mary Farwell, who was born in 1854 on her father's old donation claim. (A sketch of her family is found on another page of this work.) The young people went to housekeeping where they now make their home. They have been blessed with the birth of six children, all of whom are living and are named in order of birth as follows: Francis R., of Plainview, married Miss Fannie Rooker in 1902; John E., of Seattle, Wash.; Philip L., of Seattle; Charles C.; Lulu E. and Ray H., the three last named still making their home with their parents. A Democrat in politics, Mr. Duncan is doing his part in sustaining good government, now serving as road supervisor, and as school director he has been a servant of the public for a great number of years. He is a member of the Grange and officiates in the same as treasurer.

JESSE APPLIGATE. Going back to the story of this brave, sturdy pioneer of Oregon, brings to mind the scene often described in the settlement of a new country. The father going out to work, ax on his shoulder, with only primitive tools to fell the trees, yet with patience and great effort, the heavy timber was slowly cleared away, leaving the rich soil exposed. Such is the history of the Applegate family—a tale of hard-working, honest people, who knew what was right and were as firm as a rock against evil-doing. The descendants of the illustrious family are widely scattered, but wherever met they are known as worthy and eminently respectable people.

Jesse Applegate was born in Henry county, Ky., July 5, 1811, and was a son of Daniel and Rachel (Lindsay) Applegate, the former a soldier in the Revolutionary war and the latter a daughter of John Lindsay of Kentucky. The family settled near St. Louis, Mo., in 1822, and Jesse Applegate was sent to school in that city. He was assisted in getting an education by Hon. Edward Bates, then a young lawyer, from whom he obtained copying to do—in those days legal papers were copied by hand. This enabled him to assist in paying for his education, and he learned surveying. He clerked in the surveyor general's office at St. Louis and for a time was also a deputy surveyor in the field.

In 1831 he was joined in marriage with Cynthia Parker, who was a native of Tennessee. The following year they took up a land claim in St. Clair county, Mo., and Mr. Applegate farmed, surveyed, and kept a country store in that vicinity until 1843, when he crossed the plains and mountains and settled in Oregon. The first winter was spent in the old mission buildings, following which he located on Salt creek in Polk county, which was his home until 1849, when he removed to Yoncalla valley and took up a donation claim, upon which he and his wife are now buried.

Mr. Applegate had no difficulty in receiving the appointment as surveyor of donation claims and surveyed many claims throughout southern Oregon. He was also surveyor for Maj. Benjamin Alvord and assisted in locating the Oregon military wagon road. He soon became identified with every movement on foot for the public good and from that time on his life was closely interwoven with the history of the Willamette valley.

He was a member of the assembly that organized provisional government, and became one of the sureties of the Hudson Bay Company for arms to be furnished the volunteers during the Cayuse war and in addition he from his own farm gave fifteen fat cattle to feed the soldiers in the field. He was leader of the first party, who, in 1846, reached Fort Hall by way of the southern route through the Humboldt basin, which soon became an established route, and he piloted the first emigrants over it to Oregon. This route has since been known as Applegate cut-off. He surveyed the public wagon-road through the state, and was one of the pioneer surveyors of the Oregon and California Railroad. In 1856

he acted as guide for Major Kearney in a campaign against the Rogue River Indians and participated in the fight when Captain Stewart was killed. He was one of a commission of three, himself, and Messrs. Amory Holbrook and Major Rhinearson, who were sent to settle the Fort Colville difficulty in 1866. Mr. Applegate was also a member of the commission appointed to confer with the Modoc Indians and, if possible, induce them to surrender; when he heard the terms Captain Jack dictated as to the time and manner of meeting, he became convinced that the Indians intended to murder the commissioners, and he told General Canby that he would not meet Captain Jack on any such terms. Nor did he, but General Canby and Rev. Thomas did so, and were murdered. Mr. Applegate served for a number of years both as justice of the peace and as postmaster of Yoncalla, and in 1872 he went to Modoc county, Cal., and engaged in stock-raising, hoping to earn enough money to pay a great debt he had incurred as security for the secretary of state. But his hopes were not realized, and the winter of 1872, together with the Modoc war, scattered his money and took what little the state surety suit had left him. Thus, reduced in circumstances, but still undaunted, he began to work for hire at manual labor, for Jesse D. Carr, and continued in his service for several years. He then returned to Oregon, and with his small savings planted a vineyard on the side of Mt. Yoncalla and subsequently built a house there. In 1881, he lost his beloved wife and for several years thereafter he lived with his children. He died at the home of his son, Alexander, April 22, 1888, and his memory is revered by all who knew him.

Mr. Applegate and his wife had twelve children, ten of whom grew to maturity. One child died in Missouri and another was drowned in the Columbia river on the way to Oregon in November, 1843. Of their descendants there are living five children of the first generation; forty-five of the second generation; forty-seven of the third generation; and four of the fourth generation.

JAMES H. BELL was born in Ontario, October 29, 1847. His father, John, a carpenter and baker by trade, was born in Edinburg, Scotland, in 1813, and died in Oregon in 1895. Upon emigrating to Canada as a young man, he located on a large tract of government land, where he farmed and applied his trades for the balance of his life. His wife, Margaret (McCallum) Bell, was also born in Scotland, and still makes her home on the old homestead in Canada.

James H. Bell was educated in the public schools in his neighborhood. At the age of twenty-two he left home and spent a year in another part of Canada, and then went to Grand Rapids, Mich., and worked in a store for six months. The following winter was spent in Canada, and, in 1876, he came to Oregon, and found employment with the railroad company at bridge work on the Columbia river. After seven months of this kind of work he returned to Canada and sold his farm, returning to Oregon in June of 1877. He was variously employed until October, 1879, when he purchased his present farm of one hundred and fifty-five acres. He is engaged in general farming and prune-raising, and has cleared about sixty acres of his place.

In 1879, Mr. Bell was united in marriage with Sarah Willis, who was born in Ontario. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Bell are as follows: Edward E., of Portland; Vanderbilt, at home; Fred, at home; Bennett; Myrtle; Melville; Milner; and Willis C. Mr. Bell is independent in his political views, and has served as school director for fourteen years, and was school clerk for five years. Fraternaly he is identified with the Masons of McMinnville, and with the Order of Washington, of McMinnville, of which latter organization he is president.

BYRON J. PENGRA. There has recently passed away from the scenes of his early associations a man whom all of Oregon has come to know in the past fifty years, and to appreciate for the evidence of a masterly ability which had ever characterized his efforts toward the advancement of his own interests or those of his adopted state. Byron J. Pengra was born February 15, 1823, and lived to attain the age of eighty years, seven months and three days, his death occurring at the home of his son, W. J. Pengra, near Coburg, Lane county, September 18, 1903. He came to Oregon in 1853 and settled on a claim a few miles east of the present town of Springfield, Lane county, and at once became identified with the political life of the country.

Mr. Pengra was a Republican, and in 1858 was the leader and the most forcible speaker on that side of the legislative campaign, and though the whole ticket was defeated at that time,—the territory being largely Democratic—he retained his influence in the circles of his party, two years later being known as absolute dictator of the Oregon Republicans. He had been editing for about a year the People's Press at Eugene, this paper being then the Republican organ of the state, and at the time of his nomination as presidential elector he turned the paper over to Joel Ware in order that he might give his undivided attention to the exciting campaign before him. Through his influence Col. Edward D. Baker was induced to come north from California, not only to help canvass Oregon for members of the legislature and for Lincoln, but also to become candidate for United States senator. Through the division of the Democrats, the Republican electors were chosen by a small majority. Though not a member of the legislature, Mr. Pengra went to Salem, where the legislature met, and engineered the election of Colonel Baker and J. W. Nesmith to the senate by uniting the Republicans with the Douglas Democrats, and in the next campaign united the two factions under the name of Union Republican party. He carried the vote of Oregon to Washington and cast it for Lincoln and Hamlin. The appointment of surveyor-general of Oregon was given to Mr. Pengra through the influence of the senators whose election he had engineered, and this office he held for some years, being located in Eugene. Baker and Nesmith also secured for Mr. Pengra a land grant of several hundred thousand acres, from Eugene to the eastern boundary of the state, for a military wagon-road, which he intended should be used for the construction of a railroad at some future time. This was the cherished ambition of his life and to its accomplishment he gave years of energy and effort, only to fail in the end, his first defeat being through the amendment which Senator Williams made to his railroad bill in the senate, which allowed Ben Holliday to build the road through Jackson and Douglass counties instead of up the Willamette over Pengra's route. Many years later Mr. Pengra was enabled to begin the building of the road through the help of C. P. Huntington, who was then warring with Stanford for the control of the Southern Pacific, but with the settlement of the differences between those two men work was discontinued and Mr. Pengra was once more disappointed in his ambitious efforts. After that time Mr. Pengra made his home in eastern Oregon on the line of the road which had taken all of his energy and been the dream of his life. The failure to accomplish this object was one out of a life of successes, his ability and tenacity bringing about results aimed for in almost all other lines, all of which added to the growth and prosperity of the state wherein he made his home. He did much for the development of Oregon, and will long be remembered as a factor in the pioneer days of the state.

MRS. JULIA A. KIRK was born in Sangamon county, Ill., nine miles north of Springfield, September 19, 1834, and was eleven years old when she accompanied her parents across the plains. She was united in marriage with William Riley Kirk, who was born in Tennessee. His father, Alexander Kirk, had removed from Tennessee, also the state of his birth, when William Riley was but two years of age, locating first in Missouri, and following this up with a trip to Oregon in 1846. The first year of his residence in Oregon was spent in Yamhill county, the next year finding him on a donation claim near Brownsville, Linn county, the land now occupied by the southern part of the city having once been a part of his claim. His death occurred in Umatilla county, Ore., after a very successful life spent in the state of his adoption. Upon attaining manhood William Riley Kirk took up a donation claim one and a half miles east of Brownsville, where he engaged in farming until 1870, when he located in the city and became interested in general merchandise. Later he purchased a large interest in the Brownsville Woolen mills, which he served as president for many years. During the financial panic of 1893 his business suffered heavily, the total loss of his fortune being averted only by his masterly efforts to weather the storm. From that year his health gradually declined and he died September 24, 1901.

Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Kirk, Andrew J. and Nathan are engaged in farming near Brownsville; Sarah Jane makes her home with her mother; A. Lincoln lives in Brownsville; America is now the wife of D. M. Cushman, a farmer in the vicinity, and Alexander is a resident of Brownsville. Mr. Kirk was a Republican in politics, and was associated fraternally with the Odd Fellows. Both himself and wife were members of the Methodist Church.

PETER HANSEN was born in Knudsker county, Denmark, November 10, 1857, the son of Follenstein Hansen, a native of the town of Hasle, Clemensker county, of the same country. The mother was, in maidenhood, Christina M. Peterson, who died in 1899 at the age of eighty-one years, having always been a resident of her Danish home. Six children were born of their union, three daughters and three sons, of whom Peter was the fifth. The father had early learned the carpenter's trade, and until his forty-fifth year had engaged in the pursuit of this calling, but at this time he left the town for a farm, following this business up to the present time, being now eighty-five years old, and like his wife, satisfied to remain in the land of his birth.

At nineteen years of age Peter Hansen entered the regular army of Denmark, in which he served for fifteen months as a private. His father had been able to give him a good education by allowing him to attend the public schools, and also the high school for two winters. At twenty-three he left home and the next year he came to the United States, following his brother, who was located in Colorado, where he was engaged in mining. For three months the young emigrant remained there, at the close of that time coming on to Portland, Ore., where he secured employment on the dry docks. This enabled him to purchase land upon which to enter into the work for which his early training inclined him, and in 1883 he came to Eola, and in connection with his brother bought a farm near Oak Grove, upon which they remained for two years. In 1890 Mr. Hansen bought his present farm of two hundred and five acres, located near Dallas, of the same county. He has one hundred and twenty acres in active cultivation, a commodious residence, hop-house and good barns of all kinds.

Mr. Hansen married, October 23, 1902, Miss Kate Fink, the daughter of Dr. Fink, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. A Republican in his political affiliations he has been selected by that party to fill the office of school director of his district. Mr. Hansen belongs to the Lutheran Church, in which he was reared in his Danish home.

HENRY CLANFIELD. The paternal ancestors of Mr. Clanfield have for many years been natives of Berkshire, England, his grandfather being John and his father, Robert Clanfield. The latter is now living in that county, over eighty years of age. He married Miss Mary Howse, born in Oxfordshire, and she died in 1893 at the age of sixty-five years. Nine children were born to them, seven of whom are now living. Henry Clanfield was the eldest, and was born October 3, 1845, and his father being a farmer he was reared to that life. His early education was received in the public schools of England. At the age of twenty-three years he emigrated to the United States, settling in Shelby county, Ill., where he engaged in farm work, continuing in the same for four years. Coming to Oregon about 1873 he located near McMinnville, where he was employed by David Logan for two years, at the end of this time going into Marion county and renting a farm in the Waldo hills. After five years' residence on that place he came to Polk county and bought the farm which he now owns, the latter purchase containing two hundred and forty-nine acres, in addition to which he has added by purchase one hundred and ten acres, one-half mile east of his home and one hundred and forty-seven acres southwest of Dallas, at Luckiamute. One hundred and eighty acres is in active cultivation, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He has sixty-five acres devoted exclusively to hop-cultivation.

Mr. Clanfield married, in 1877, Martha Palmer, a native of Minnesota, and they now have six children living, of whom Mary Smith lives in Mill Creek; Hannah Dodson makes her home near Monmouth; George, Bert, Elizabeth and Elona are still at home with their parents. Independent in his political views, Mr. Clanfield has been elected to several offices by the vote of the best men of all beliefs, his integrity and judgment making him an able representative of the people. He has held the positions of road supervisor and school director and clerk. He adheres to the tenets of the Episcopal Church.

JAMES HENDERSON MCFARLAND. Various engaged since coming to Oregon in 1853, James Henderson McFarland has well utilized the opportunities that have come within his grasp and is today regarded as one of the large land owners and very substantial men of Lane county. Of an old southern family, he was born in Cooper county, Mo., July 4, 1845, his father, John Ward, and his mother, Lavica McFarland being natives respectively of North Carolina and Texas. John Ward McFarland was born February 20, 1809, and as a young man removed to Illinois, and from there to Cooper county, Mo., where he engaged in farming for several years. His wife dying in Cooper county, leaving to his care three sons, of whom James was the youngest, he thought to improve his prospects by emigration to the west, and accordingly invested a large share of the proceeds of the sale of his farm in oxen and other equipment for the long journey. This was in 1853, and the trip was the second undertaken by Mr. McFarland, who had driven a team across country for his brother in 1850. He reached his destination on the second trip without any particular incident, and took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres one and a half miles from Cottage Grove, where his death occurred in 1880. He married again in later life, and there were several children of this union, all of whom survived him.

Left motherless at the age of nine months, James Henderson McFarland was given into the care of his aunts, but rejoined his father ere he set out on his second journey over the plains. He helped to clear the Oregon farm, and made himself generally useful around the home place until 1862, when he took advantage of the Salmon River mine excitement in Idaho, going there and remaining on the scene for about a month. Returning home, he worked with his father, and November 11, 1865, married Sophrona Knox, born in Schuyler county, Mo., in 1847 a daughter of Samuel Barton Knox, a native of Kentucky. Mr. Knox removed to Illinois at a very early day, and upon coming overland to Oregon in 1853 located on a section of land four miles north of this place. He died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. S. E. Veatch, in 1894, at the age of eighty-five years. He was a very successful farmer and general business man, leaving quite a large estate to those dependent on his care. In 1867 the elder McFarland turned his property over to his son, he being an invalid for several years before his death.

From 1865 until 1875 Mr. McFarland varied his home work by running a threshing machine in this county, and thus became familiar with its resources, its people and its possibilities. At times he has made his home in Cottage Grove, and from 1900 until 1902 successfully owned and managed a butcher shop here. He has always been greatly interested in high-grade stock, and in the days of his greatest agricultural prosperity furnished some of the finest horses in this county. During the Civil war he was a member of Company E, Home Guard Cavalry. He is a Republican in political preference, and is a staunch friend of education, although his own chances were limited in the extreme. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McFarland, four sons and two daughters: Annie Laura is the wife of W. W. Chrisman, of the Row river, Ore.; Charles Austin living on the home farm; George Wilbur, also on the home place; William Warren, a clerk in Cottage Grove; John Franklin, engaged in the meat market business in this town; and Lillie Myrtle, living at home. Mr. McFarland is public spirited, and generously disposed towards all enterprises which have for their object the upbuilding of the community. His influence has always been exerted on the side of temperance and morality, and the time-honored association of word and bond is not misapplied in his case.

on a small scale, November, 1884, witnessing the mercantile venture of Mr. Bristow and Herbert Eakin, then purchasing the bankrupt stock of Luckey & Noland, and together the two have remained until the present day.

The father of Mr. Bristow, the Hon. William Wilshire Bristow, was born in Kentucky, July 18, 1826, but was reared in McDonough county, Ill., whither his parents removed. In the year 1848 he made the journey to Oregon with ox-teams, on his arrival locating on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres at Pleasant Hill, Lane county, and in the following year he made the trip to California in the hope of finding a fortune in the gold fields. The fall following he returned to his claim and at once began improving and cultivating it, and in the spring of 1850 or 1851 he taught the first school in the county. Always interested and active in public movements he was often called upon to fill official positions. He served as justice of the peace for many years and also as postmaster. He was a delegate to the constitutional convention in 1857 and the year following was elected one of the first state senators from Lane county, where he was an able representative for the people in assisting in the first legislative movements of the state. He was again elected to the state senate in 1870 and served until 1874. His death occurred in the latter year, when he was only forty-eight years old. One of the chief interests of the life of Mr. Bristow was the mercantile business with which he became connected in 1865 in Eugene, purchasing in that year a one-third interest with the Bristow & Company mercantile firm, which was then composed of his brother Elijah L. Bristow and T. B. Hendricks, and with this work he remained until his death. Fraternally Mr. Bristow had been a Mason for many years.

The father of this family was not the first who settled in the west as a pioneer, his own father having preceded his emigration by three years. Elijah Bristow, a native of Virginia, after his emigration to Kentucky, and thence to Illinois, followed this up with the journey across the plains in 1845 and became the first white settler of Lane county, Ore. He located at Pleasant Hill, and there took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres and built the first house of the county, which is still standing upon the land, and there his death occurred. He had been a leader in his county, giving freely of time and means in his broad-minded efforts to advance the cause of growth and civilization in this western land, being the first to donate land upon which to establish schools.

Darwin Bristow was born December 21, 1862, at Pleasant Hill, Ore., the youngest child of the three daughters and one son born to his mother, who was formerly Elizabeth Coffey, of Illinois,

DARWIN BRISTOW. The inheritance of an untarnished name is a legacy prized beyond all others, and when accompanied by these traits and characteristics which have kept the purity of the name untouched it is indeed a foundation upon which to build a lifework. Darwin Bristow has in all truth followed the standard set by his father, becoming an honored citizen of the county in which his father was a pioneer and in which Darwin Birstov was born. He is successfully engaged in the mercantile business and is also conducting a banking institution of Cottage Grove, Lane county, being now president of the bank which was incorporated in the fall of 1900 as the First National Bank of Cottage Grove. The capital stock is $25,000 with a small surplus, and this has grown from a beginning of $5,000, application to the work wherein talent was so rightfully placed bringing about these satisfactory results. The merchandise stock is valued at $25,000, and this also was commenced and who died quite young in her western home. Darwin Bristow was educated first in the common school near his home, entering the University of Oregon in 1880, graduating from the normal course in 1884 with the degree of A. B. During the vacations of summer he became a cow-boy in southeastern Oregon, enjoying a wild, free life which better fitted him for the world of books when school was once more opened. In November, 1884, as before stated, he entered upon a mercantile life, no inconsiderable knowledge having been gained through his occasional clerking for T. G. Hendricks, with whom he made his home after his father's death, Mr. Hendricks having been appointed administrator of the estate and guardian of the children. In 1892 the banking institution was established as a private affair, and from that has grown the present substantial and remunerative business which adds in no little degree to the financial prestige of the town. Mr. Bristow, in company with F. L. Chambers and others of Eugene, have formed a banking firm under the name of the Chambers-Bristow Banking Company, and during January of 1903 opened the bank at Eugene with a capital stock of $50,000. Mr. Bristow will, however, retain his business interests in Cottage Grove for an indefinite period.

Mr. Bristow was married in Cottage Grove to Mary L. Medley, a native of Iowa, and the daughter of James N. Medley, who emigrated to Oregon in 1874 and settled in Lane county, and now makes his home in Eugene. The following children have blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Bristow: Greta E.; William Wilshire; Darwin Darrel; Evelyn; Dorothy, and Helen. With the exception of Dorothy, who died in early childhood, the children are all at home. In his political relations, being a Republican, Mr. Bristow is very active, having served five terms as mayor of this city, in the city council one term, and as city treasurer two terms. He has also been a member to the state convention and of the county central committee for many years past. He is a member of the Christian Church. Fraternally Mr. Bristow is quite prominent among the Masons, having served for two terms as master of Cottage Grove Lodge No. 51, A. F. & A. M., belongs to Eugene Lodge No. 10, R. A. M., Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, at Eugene; the Mystic Shrine of Al Kader Temple, of Portland, and is a past grand patron of the Eastern Star of Oregon.

JOHN F. KELLY, vice-president of the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company of Eugene, was born on a farm near Roseburg, Douglas county, Ore., December 11, 1857, and is a son of John and Elizabeth (Parker) Kelly, both pioneers of Oregon. (For early history of the family, see sketches of John Kelly and Rev. P. C. Parker, which appear elsewhere in this volume.) His early environment was such as to stimulate and encourage ambitious tendencies, but he soon learned that while influence and friendly intercession may give to a youth of character an opportunity, it cannot so place him as to continue him in a line of promotion unless he possesses the substantial merit, together with a character which counts no effort too great nor sacrifice too dear in the fulfillment of obligations or the performance of duties. Early in life he realized that the world is moving so rapidly that a man must become a part of his work—otherwise he may expect to see another step in and do it for him. He therefore puts so much force and good cheer into his daily work that the efforts of his associates and subordinates are stimulated by his example.

The first nine years of Mr. Kelly's life were spent on the home farm. When the University of Oregon was opened to the youth of the state he was a pupil in the public schools of Springfield, Lane county. Ambitious to equip himself as fully as possible for a successful business career, he entered the university with the first class, continuing his studies in the classical department for three years. He subsequently attended the Portland Business College. Feeling satisfied that this educational foundation would prove sufficiently strong to support any structure he might elect to build upon it, he started forth to make his own way in the world. After devoting four years to the railway mail service in Oregon, he served another four years in the registry department of the Portland postoffice under Postmasters Cole and Steel. After resigning this position he went to Ashland, then the southern terminus of the Oregon & California Railroad, and engaged in the forwarding and commission business for three years with H. B. Miller & Co. At the same time he conducted a large hardware and implement business in Ashland, disposing of it just before the extension of the railroad was begun in 1885. Mr. Kelly and Mr. Miller next engaged in a lumber manufacturing business at Grant's Pass under the style of the Sugar Pine Door & Lumber Company. In this occupation Mr. Kelly felt perfectly at home, for from his earliest boyhood he had familiarized himself with the details of the lumber trade, his father being largely interested in the pineries of the state. The partners continued together for some time, and to their aid came such business men as John C. Carson, George H. Keely, H. C. Kinney and R. A. Booth, as well as many others. They purchased several mills in southern Oregon, built others, and operated them as manufactories of doors, boxes and building materials. After the incorporation of the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company in 1895, the concern purchased the property of the J. I. Jones Lumber Company at Saginaw, rebuilt and enlarged the mill, and established the main office at Eugene. In 1899 they built the mill at Wendling, on the Mohawk river, soon afterward purchased the Coburg mill, and in 1902 erected the new mill at Springfield. The Saginaw mill has a capacity of one hundred and fifty thousand feet in twenty hours; the Springfield mill has a capacity of two hundred and fifty thousand feet in twenty hours; the Wendling mill has a capacity of two hundred and fifty thousand feet in twenty hours, and the Coburg mill has a capacity of one hundred and sixty thousand feet in twenty hours. Each of the five mills owned and operated by the company in southern Oregon has a capacity of about forty thousand feet in ten hours.

The Booth-Kelly Lumber Company has purchased large areas of timber lands on the McKenzie river, owns vast tracts in Lake, Josephine and Klamath counties, and buys the entire output of the mills in Josephine county and other points along the Southern Pacific railroad. It employs more than one thousand men directly, while indirectly it gives employment to fully two thousand five hundred more. It is undoubtedly doing more to turn to practical use the unequalled timber lands of the northwest than any other human agency in Oregon. Mr. Kelly was the president of the company for seven and a half years. Since assuming the vice-presidency his former place has been taken by F. H. Buck, of Vacaville, Cal.

Individually, Mr. Kelly is a large property owner. Besides his own home in Eugene he has several farms. He keenly appreciates the advantages surrounding the residents of Eugene, and his vitalizing energy permeates other phases of the state's activity. He is one of the directors of the Roseburg Bank. In politics he is a Republican, and fraternally he is connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

Mr. Kelly is recognized as one of the most sagacious business men of Oregon. To enumerate the causes which have led to his success one must look to such homely attributes as grit, determination, industry and integrity. With these are combined inherent business ability, which has been developed by constant concentration upon the enterprises which he has helped to build up, and the success of which has placed him among the wealthiest captains of industry in the Willamette valley. Thus is an honored pioneer name more firmly rooted in the strength and great accomplishment of the state of Oregon, adding yet another link to a chain upon which obstacles and discouragements have pulled in vain, and furnishing additional proof of the world's estimation of noble personal characteristics.

Mr. Kelly was united in marriage at Newport, Ore., December 18, 1901, with Mrs. Ida (Hoflein) Patterson, a native of Lane county and a daughter of J. C. Hoflein, of Newport. Mrs. Kelly is the mother of two children by her former marriage, Lloyd H. and Flora.

HUGH S. MONTGOMERY. What is known as South Falls City has been platted and laid out by Hugh S. Montgomery, who came to Oregon in 1889, and bought six hundred acres of land, upon which he farmed for some time. One hundred and sixty acres of this land has been laid aside for the town site, and constitutes the basis of the real-estate business at present being conducted by Mr. Montgomery. The great grandfather and grandfather both emigrated from Ireland to the United States and died in the state of Pennsylvania, the latter having arrived in this country in 1806, settling in Philadelphia, although his death occurred in Greenfield. His son, John, came with him from Ireland in 1806, he having been born there December 15, 1795. In time he acquired property of his own and became one of the successful farmers of his district, his age at the time of his death being eighty-nine years. His wife, Elizabeth, was born in Susquehanna county, Pa., and her father, William Robinson, was born in Ireland. He came to America at an early day, and in Pennsylvania preached the gospel from the Baptist pulpits, he having been reared in the faith of the Free Will members of that church.

The nine children of John Montgomery were reared to industry and economy, and all had to work hard on the paternal farm. Hugh S. was no exception to the rule, although he, as well as the others, profited by educational advantages made possible by their father's success and their own application. Hugh was born in Luzerne county, Pa., April 15, 1827, and was the second oldest in the family. After completing his education in the public schools he attended Harvard Academy, and at the age of thirty engaged in independent farming in Pennsylvania. He was not so well satisfied with his native state but that he was ambitious of larger opportunities, and in 1889 he made arrangements to settle in Oregon, his choice of location resting on Falls City. His first marriage was celebrated in Pennsylvania, and was with Ellen, daughter of Isaac Griggs, who died in Pennsylvania leaving two children, of whom George is deceased; and John is a resident of Falls City. The second marriage of Mr. Montgomery was with Esther Vail, born in Pennsylvania, and daughter of John Vail, of Greenfield, Pa., and a farmer by occupation. Two children were born of this union, Richard and Hugh, both of whom died at the age of nine years. A Prohibitionist in politics, Mr. Montgomery has been a member of the town council for two terms, but has never worked for or aspired to public office. He is a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for many years has attended its services and contributed to its support.

JOHN M. MITCHELL who now makes his home in Independence, Polk county, Ore., traces his ancestry back to the Emerald Isle, his grandfather, Robert Mitchell, having emigrated to the United States early in the eighteenth century, settling in Chester, N. H. He was a sea captain and his life was spent in many lands, his death occurring far from home, among the then primitive conditions of Louisiana. His son, Robert was born in Chester, N. H., and, after a residence in Maine, he removed to Minnesota in 1864, locating at Clearwater, where he lived retired at eighty-two years of age, but returning in 1871 to Maine, he spent the remaining years of his life in the city of Leeds of that state, dying at the ripe old age of ninety-seven years. He was a carpenter and contractor and also served in the war of 1812. His wife was in maidenhood, Miss Sallie Irland, born in Skowhegan, Me., and died in that state. Five children blessed their union, and of the two sons and three daughters the youngest was John M., born in Vienna, Me., September 27, 1822.

John M. Mitchell learned the trade of his father, adding to that the cabinetmaker's trade. In 1850 he removed to Lowell, Mass., where he engaged in the manufacture of sash and doors, continuing for four years, after which he returned to his native state, and settling in Dexter, engaged in the same business. In 1857 he took the sash and door manufactory to Clearwater, Minn., and in connection with this invested in a grist mill, which yielded him fair returns until his removal to Litchfield, of the same state, where he built the first residence in that town. He made the trip to California in 1869. Locating in Cloverdale, he opened a repair shop for buggies and wagons, but in 1871 he purchased a ranch in Mendocino county, from which he returned to Cloverdale and passed another year. From Navarro Ridge, where he engaged for two years in the manufacture of shingles, he came in 1879, to Oregon, locating in Independence, Polk county, and engaged in his former business, and, except for a short time spent in a repair shop, continued in the manufacture of sash and doors until 1898, in this year disposing of the substantial factory which he and his son-in-law had erected in 1889. In 1899 Mr. Mitchell built a creamery which he now rents, having retired from the active cares of life.

In Kingfield, Me., in 1843, Mr. Mitchell was married to Miss Wealthy Otis, a native of that city, whose father, Thomas, was born in New Hampshire and reared to the life of a farmer, his death occurring in Kingfield, Me., in 1876, at the age of seventy-six years. Of the four children born of the union Lucidia is now deceased; Flora is now the wife of Clay Spurr, of San Francisco, Cal.; Walter is deceased, and Nettie is the wife of J. S. Bohannon. As a Republican Mr. Mitchell was called upon in his Minnesota home to serve as school director and road supervisor. He is identified with the Masons, being a member of the Blue Lodge and the Chapter.

ISAAC BARCLAY. Lane county, perpetuating the name and fame of Gen. Joseph Lane, the "Mariner of the West," has fulfilled the expectations of the pioneers who chose her from the variety of lands represented in Oregon, and thereafter devoted the best years of their lives to the establishment of the prestige she holds among the counties of the state. None has more interestedly and helpfully watched the association of man and nature in the onward march than Isaac Barclay, and none more hopefully turned up the first sod, and gathered his first beneficent harvest. To have accomplished much through the efforts of one's hands and brain, and minus financial or other assistance, is one of the things for which Mr. Barclay is truly grateful. He attributes much of his success to the fact that he was obliged to hew out his own fortunes, and that he had to begin to do it early in life. His childhood was spent on a farm in Fulton county, Ill., where he was born May 12, 1832, and where he laid the foundation for a strong constitution in outdoor labor. His father was moderately successful, and to an otherwise worthy life added meritorious service as a ranger in the Black Hawk war.

With a very meagre education Mr. Barclay started out to make an independent livelihood in his fourteenth year, working for the surrounding farmers in Fulton county, at whose homes he heard a great deal about the splendid chances the other side of the Rocky mountains. An unlooked-for opportunity came to him to test the truth of the glowing accounts, and as a driver of an ox-team for Samuel Smith he was enabled to reach the state of which he had heard so much. The train of which he was a member consisted only of seven wagons, yet they had comparatively little trouble, the Indians being peacefully inclined, and illness passing them by throughout their journey. However, they had a terrible experience after their provisions gave out, and for four days and nights were without food or water. Coming direct to Lane county, Mr. Barclay took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres five miles northwest of Pleasant Hill, but having no money with which to build or develop his land he went to Douglas county and engaged in general labor for about a year. Frugal and thrifty, he saved nearly all his earnings, an incentive to do so being found in a winsome maiden by the name of Sarah G. Freeman, who had crossed the plains in his party, having previously moved from her native state of New York to Illinois. Returning with his little hoard Mr. Barclay settled with zest on his claim, and soon after married the girl of his choice, and who proved helpful and courageous as the wife of a poor, but very ambitious man. To them one daughter, Flora Blanche, the wife of Z. S. Smith, on Fall creek, was born, and they have two children living, Eva Pearl and John F. The housekeeping arrangements were crude in the extreme, but sincere regard and the desire to found a real home lighted the way to better things, and after several years of hard work and economy, comforts and even luxuries were added to the home. During 1869 Mr. Barclay left his farm in the hands of his children and went to the mines of Idaho, and also farmed, but finally decided that his Lane county claim was as profitable and pleasant as any home he could hope to find in the northwest. He owns two hundred and fifty acres at the present time, forty of which are under cultivation. Skirting the Willamette, the situation is admirable, the land fertile, and well adapted to the large stock-raising aspirations of the owner. A large and comfortable house, adequate barns and out-houses, and all manner of modern agricultural improvements contribute to the peace and happiness of one of the highly honored early settlers of Lane county.

SILAS M. TITUS. An example of energy, pluck and perseverance is to be found in the life of Silas M. Titus, who came to Oregon in 1852, empty-handed, save for the courage and earnestness of purpose which had already led him to become independent, since he had made his own way in the world from the age of eleven years. He was born in Knox county, Ohio, June 6, 1828, and is the only one living of a family of twelve children born to his parents, John and Mary (Konkle) Titus, the father dying when Silas was seven years old and the mother when he was eleven. Ten of the children attained maturity, but only one found his way into the broader opportunities of a western life.

Left alone and penniless, this lad struck

bravely out into the world, undaunted by the task which lay before him, first finding employment in Numa, Ind., on a farm, while he attended school during the winters. He remained there for two years, when he went to Wapello county, Iowa, where he worked as a farm hand for four years. He then began farming on his own resources, raising a crop and feeding hogs, which he drove to Keokuk and sold. Through the glowing reports from the west, Mr. Titus was induced to cast in his lot with the pioneers of Oregon. He joined another man who was outfitting for the trip, furnishing his own provisions and one yoke of cattle, and on April 20, 1852, they left Iowa and began the journey. Beyond the events incident to life on the plains the journey was safely completed, their destination being reached October 1 of the same year. Mr. Titus had but one ox left, which he sold for $20. The day after his arrival, with his customary expedition, he entered the employ of Henderson Llewellyn, a horticulturist of Milwaukee, Ore., his remuneration to be $50 per month. For two years Mr. Titus remained in this employment, when he went to the mines in southern Oregon and worked for $4 per day and his board. In 1855 he went to Eugene, when there were only about a dozen houses there. He was then in the employ of the government, freighting provisions to the soldiers of the Rogue River war. Afterward he worked at different occupations until the spring of 1857, when he located a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres at Goshen, Lane county, which he proceeded to improve and cultivate, as it was entirely wild land. He engaged in general farming and stock-raising. In 1862 he went to the Salmon river and spent some time prospecting, July 3 of that year finding him with only $1.50. He then went to work at $4 per day, and also conducted a store at night, and when he returned to his home in Lane county, October 1, he had $850. The following year he raised another crop, and in the spring of 1864 he had $600 left. Two-thirds of this he invested in cattle and took them to the present site of La Grande, where he engaged in stock-trading for two years. Through good management and business judgment this brought him in $3,000, with which he again returned to the northwestern part of the state, the summer following engaging in teaming in Portland, after which he bought a thresher and located on his farm. In the fall he disposed of the thresher and located in Eugene, where he bought a livery stable on Ninth street, and for fourteen years conducted the same with marked success, when he engaged in the hardware business, and so continued for the ensuing two years. He then sold out and became interested in the real estate possibilities of Eugene, and with Col. J. A. Straight as a partner he laid out Glenwood Park addition, three hundred acres cut up into five and ten-acre tracts, with the exception of ten acres which were laid out into city lots. Though in this business a few days less than nine months, he cleared $4,300, and this venture closed his business career, as he then retired to private life. He owns the lot at the corner of Ninth and Wilamette streets, upon which he erected a brick building, the dimensions of which are 60x160 feet, and also owns his farm and other property.

Mr. Titus was married in Cloverdale, Ore., to Miss Georgetta Pierce, a native of Hamilton, Ohio, and the daughter of Greenberry Pierce. The latter came to Oregon in 1852, having crossed the plains to California in 1849, where he remained for a short time and then returned to Ohio. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Titus, of whom John A. is located on the home farm, and Alice is the wife of John O'Brien, of Albany. Fraternaly Mr. Titus became an Odd Fellow in 1868, and politically casts his ballot with the Democratic party.

HENRY L. MITCHEL. An orderly and hospitable home from the gateway of which has come forth worthy sons and daughters to participate in the moving events of Lane county, was that of James G. Mitchel, a pioneer of 1852, and prominent agriculturally, politically and religiously. The member of the second generation on the coast of whom special mention is here made is Henry L. Mitchel, who inherits the stable traits of his father, and who is the owner of a finely improved farm of one hundred and thirty acres on Pleasant Hill.

James G. Mitchel was born in Darke county, Ohio, in August, 1818, and at a very early day removed with some of his family to Iowa. His father followed the trade of stonemason, and the son in youth mastered the trade under his sire, working thereat at different periods of his life. He married in Iowa, in 1846, Miranda Shelly, a native of Illinois, and in 1852 sold his farm, and prepared to emigrate to the west. With his wife and children he started out under the most favorable conditions, having plenty of oxen and provisions, and being well prepared for any weather emergency. The Indians proved peaceful along their path, but illness brought sorrow to the little family, and one of the children was left in a little wayside grave. Upon taking an inventory of their possessions at the end of the journey, one ox and one cow and a limited amount of provisions were found with which to begin life in their new home. The father took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres fifteen miles southeast of Eugene, and here the parents spent the balance of their lives, the mother attaining to forty-seven, and the father to seventy-six years. No farm in the neighborhood held out such inducements for sociability and hospitality as did that of the Mitchel family, and neighbors deemed it a privilege to gather under its low ceilings and partake of the abundantly supplied larder. The mother, from earliest girlhood, took a keen interest in church work, contributing to the extent of her means towards all humanitarian and charitable opportunities which appealed to her judgment.

On this finely improved farm of the pioneer settler his son, Henry L., was born November 17, 1861, and like his brothers and sisters was educated primarily in the district schools. He has never wandered far from the scene of his birth and childhood, and now occupies a portion of the old claim, his sister, Jane, occupying the rest of the farm. He moved into his present house immediately after his marriage, in 1887, with Ellen Teeter, who was born in California and reared in Lane county, Ore. They are the parents of four children, three of whom are living: Raymond, James Gregory, and Anna L. Seventy acres of the farm of Mr. Mitchel are under cultivation, and he carries on general farming and stock-raising, devoting particular attention to the latter. The finest of Cotswold sheep and Jersey cattle roam on his meadows, and bring in a handsome profit to swell the yearly earnings. Mr. Mitchel has always favored the Democratic party, and as a staunch adherent thereto has served as a school director for several years. With his wife and children he is a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Mitchel is progressive, well posted on current events, and alert for all improvement, whether on his farm, in his family, or in the community of which he is an honored and influential member.

JOHN SHELLEY. That interest and charm which centers around familiar landmarks, and more especially those which represent the upward struggle of men who have attained to prominence, will always be felt by those who appreciate stability and personal worth. Travelers along the highway which skirts the farm of John Shelley have years ago ceased to ask regarding the author of this prosperity, for the comfortable dwelling, large barns and fine appointments have stood with but few changes for many years. The farm of three hundred and twenty acres, located twelve miles east of Eugene, has yielded its harvests continuously under the same management since 1852, the owner in the meanwhile having spent but one year away from it, and that near Walla Walla, Wash. Durham cattle, Berkshire hogs, and Cotswold sheep add to the variety of marketable products, and a general farming industry is conducted with equally good results.

Although no longer a young man Mr. Shelley has the heart and brain and purpose which belongs to youth, and he can enter heartily into the diversions and interests of those who have seen far fewer years. He was born in Macoupin county, Ill., September 7, 1827, his parents, George and Catherine (Gabbert) Shelley, having been born in Kentucky. Shortly after their marriage the parents moved to Illinois, and about 1834 changed their home to Iowa, remaining there until they located in Oregon. In 1852 the family made arrangements to cross the plains with ox-teams, and although they were singularly fortunate in not having encounters with the Indians, cholera invaded their ranks, and to this dread disorder the father succumbed on the Platte river. The family proceeded alone to Lane county, where John Shelley took up the claim which he still owns, the other members of the family living with him for a short time. The mother soon after went on to Grand Ronde, remaining there for the rest of her life. Of the thirteen children but two are living, and of these Mrs. Polly Robinson lives in Marion county.

The marriage of Mr. Shelley and Margaret Park, the latter a native of Virginia, and whose parents located also in Lane county, occurred in 1847, in Iowa. Thirteen children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Shelley, of whom the following are living: Thomas, living in Idaho; Pascal N., a resident of Lane county; Caroline, the wife of Mack Fern, of Lane county; Weston P., at home; Anna became the wife of W. P. Martin and lives at home; Leona married F. S. Winfrey and resides in Eugene; Zora, the wife of J. H. West, of Lane county; and Harry and Ira, at home. Although no politician, in the accepted meaning of that term, Mr. Shelley is interested in the Democratic party, voting, however, as a rule, for the man best qualified to serve the general good. His life has been characterized by the greatest regard for honesty and fair dealing, and his friends are numerous in the neighborhood where he makes his home.

FREDERICK WILLIAM PRENTICE, M. D. To Dr. F. W. Prentice, of Eugene, medical science is a realm of intricate and interminable avenues, lit with prophetic and alluring lamps, under which the wayfarer travels reverently, intelligently, and always with uplifted, expectant eyes. Because at a certain mile-post in his journey he is given license to use his knowledge for the benefit of others, the true scientist continues his way without note of any stopping-place, and his life, however long or well ordained, goes out with great questions still unsolved, and the illuminated ways and mysterious shadows still beckoning. Thus, this scholarly practitioner has evinced something of the spirit of the old master painters, whose indestructible masterpieces breathe an appreciation for their work far beyond any remuneration which a grateful world might tender them. When to this singleness of purpose is added a wholesome attitude towards the exigencies and comforts of latter-day life, a genial spirit, and harmonious disposition, one is constrained to believe that this town in the far northwest is reaching, through the lives of her adopted sons, the acme of advancement in a noble science.

Dr. Prentice has had the advantage of the best possible medical and surgical training, and he comes of an ancestry of which much may reasonably be expected. Authentic records trace the family history back in the fourteenth century, when those bearing the name pursued their various vocations in Suffolk, England, from which county later members removed to Essex county. Near Wivenhoe, Essex, Dr. Prentice was born July 1, 1844, his father, George Alexander Prentice, being a native of Boxstead, Essex, while his mother, Caroline (Ellis) Prentice, a daughter of Henry Ellis, was born in Suffolk. The elder Prentice came to America in 1871, and both himself and wife died on their farm in Caroline county, Md. They had ten children, eight of whom were daughters, Frederick W. being the oldest in the family, and the only one to establish a name and home in the northwest.

The successful career of his brother-in-law, Dr. Charles J. Worts, a surgeon of Essex, had much to do with fashioning the career of Dr. Prentice. After leaving the home farm and being graduated from the Royal Grammar School of Colchester, he began to study under his gifted relative. Subsequently he attended two courses of lectures at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1871 came to Toronto, Canada, the following year removing to Urbana, Champaign county, Ill. Here he engaged in a general medical and surgical practice, and at the same time filled the chairs of anatomy, physiology, pharmacy, and materia medica at the University of Illinois at Champaign. In 1877 leave of absence from the university was granted him, and he took a course at the Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery, being graduated in 1878. Returning to Urbana, he continued to practice and instruct, and finally entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia, being graduated in the class of May, 1887.

Since coming to Eugene in the fall of 1887, Dr. Prentice has continued his professional researches with unabated enthusiasm, and in 1903 took a course at the Illinois College of Electro-Therapeutics in Chicago. He is a great believer in the efficacy of electricity, and his many modern office appliances include a standard static machine with an X-ray attachment. The doctor is fortunately appreciated in his adopted town, his patrons including many families who have depended upon his services for many years, and many who unstintingly credit him with the preservation of their lives under most discouraging and often seemingly hopeless circumstances. His scholarly papers are listened to with greatest attention at the meetings of the medical societies in which the county and state abounds, and he is associated as a member with the American Medical Association, the Oregon State Medical Association, and the Lane County Medical Society. Here, as in the state of Illinois, he is a member of the United States Board of Examining Surgeons, and has served as treasurer of the same for many years. The doctor is a Republican in political affiliation, but the many demands upon his time have never permitted more than necessary participation in the affairs of his party. Formerly associated with the Urbana (Ill.) Masons, he is now a member of Eugene Lodge No 11, A. F. & A. M., and has been transferred from the Urbana Royal Arch Masons, which he joined in 1874, to the chapter in Eugene. He is a member of the Eastern Star, as is also Mrs. Prentice, whom he married in Indianapolis, Ind., in 1886, and who was formerly Mrs. Elizabeth (Burch) Fickle, of Rochester, Ind. Mrs. Prentice is a member of the Episcopal Church, and is especially active in the Fortnightly Club. The family occupy one of the pleasant and hospitable homes in Eugene, and the doctor and his wife represent the highest social and intellectual life in the northwest.

JOHN F. BREWER. Were John F. Brewer called upon to give a definition of success at once practical and to the point, he would naturally dwell upon those attributes which have been of personal use to him, and which have by long experience not been found wanting. Among these would be clearness and honesty of purpose, and the ability to grasp and use passing opportunities, however small and insignificant they might seem at the time. It is by attention to the details that he has been able to succeed; by doing all things well; and by continually striving to keep abreast of the times.

At a very early day the grandparents of Mr. Brewer removed from their native state of North Carolina to Missouri, where their son, William Brewer, the father of John F., was born in 1818. The family later moved to Pike county, Ark., settled on a farm near Murfreesboro, where the grandfather died. There were seven children in the family, of whom William was the oldest, and the responsibility thus presented was assumed by him with courage and determination. As a young man he clerked in a store, and afterward taught school, developing as time went on decided mechanical ability. Given a model, he could duplicate almost anything of a mechanical nature, and this ability proved of great use to him, although he never regularly applied himself as a mechanic. He married Margaret I. Scott, a native of Georgia, and continued to live in Arkansas until the western fever inspired him to investigate the reports to which he had listened. In 1853 he set out across the plains, accompanied by his wife and children, among whom was John F., born in Pike county, Ark., May 2, 1844. The mother of Mr. Brewer came to the west in the same train, and they were on the road about seven months, encountering on the way some unpleasant experiences. While near the Green river they were surrounded by Indians, and as a peace offering were obliged to divide their provisions and general properties, resuming the journey with a much lightened burden. Coming to Lane county, Mr. Brewer took up a claim seven miles west of Eugene, improved the same, and lived there until his death at the age of forty-two years. He took an active interest in Republican politics, held a number of minor offices, and was one of the very enthusiastic workers in the United Brethren Church, of which he was a member for many years, and class-leader in the Sunday school. The wife who survived him married a second and third time, her last husband being Judge John G. Sparks, collector of internal revenues during the administration of Abraham Lincoln, and a very prominent man of Olympia, Wash. Mrs. Sparks is still a resident of the Sound country, making her home with a daughter at Olympia; and though past four score years, still retains her mental and physical alertness. By her first marriage she had nine children, of whom the following are living: Martha A., widow of William P. Crow, of Freewater, Wash.; John F., of this review; Mary L., wife of Edward Harris, of Boistfort, Wash.; Amanda C., the wife of Eben Sherwood, of Satsop, Wash.; James H., also of Satsop; and Eva S., the wife of C. B. Mann, a druggist of Olympia, Wash.

From the public schools John F. Brewer received a part of his education, but his father's training counted for more in his life, and invariably stimulated to further research along the lines mapped out. At the present time he is an exceptionally well informed man, improving every opportunity to keep himself posted on current events, and associating with people who, like himself, appreciate the higher things of life. From his nineteenth year he has made an independent living, and in 1865 he went to the Sound country and took up a donation claim. The same year he married Elvira Axtell, member of one of the earliest families of the Sound country, whose father, Josephus Axtell, built the second house on Mound Prairie. Mrs. Brewer was born in Illinois, and crossed the plains with her family in 1852, going at once to the north, where the Indians were very troublesome, and where they were obliged to live in a fort for a couple of years for protection. Two of the sons, John C. and Thomas J. Axtell served in the Cayuse Indian war and had many thrilling experiences. The latter is deceased, and the former lives on part of the old claim. While living at Grand Mound the father served as postmaster for many years. He also served in the Indian war with his sons. He lived to be seventy-five, and his wife lived to be seventy-three years old.

Leaving the Sound country in 1883, Mr. Brewer moved to Freewater for a year, and then took up his residence on a farm near Lexington, remaining there until purchasing his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres three miles east of Goshen. He has been successful in all of his undertakings, and the high standard of excellence maintained on his present farm has been duplicated on the properties hitherto owned by him. He raises general produce and stock, his dairy being unexcelled for neatness and good management. As a Republican he has been a delegate to several county conventions. The Grange counts him and his family among its most influential members, and he is holding the secretaryship, to which he has been continuously elected for several years. Nine children have been reared in an atmosphere encouraging industry and study, and of these, the oldest son, U. Grant, is living in Klamath county; Arthur M.; Anna, the wife of John H. Clark, and William H. are in Boise City, Idaho; Ethel, the wife of Wilson Wilhelm, lives in Goshen; John H. was killed in the Philippines during the Spanish-American war; Valentine is in business in Boise City; Rachel and Lucretia are at home; and Milton died in infancy. Mr. Brewer is a worker and member of the United Brethren Church, contributing generously towards its support, as he does toward that of various organizations in which the county abounds.

HENRY CLAY HUMPHREY. Among the citizens of Eugene who were prominently identified with its upbuilding and development for many years, the name of Henry Clay Humphrey stands forth with peculiar distinction. Though always optimistic as to the future of the city, he was not a visionary, nor did his plans miscarry because of lack of foundation or stability of structure. A sagacious, prudent, practical man of business, a banker who mastered every detail of that important business, and a manager who possessed the rare faculty of securing the best services on the part of his subordinates, he identified himself with enterprises calculated to develop and place on a substantial basis the county in which he was born and passed his entire life.

George Humphrey, his father, from whom he inherited his abilities and trend of thought, was born April 1, 1807, in New York state. From there he moved to Canada, where he married Cynthia A. Bristol. At a later period of his life he resided in Illinois, and still later in Iowa, where for many years he combined farming with merchandising. In 1853 he came overland to Oregon and settled in Lane county, where he established a general store. Eventually he built up a flourishing general trade in Eugene. His children were: Albert; Emily, wife of A. G. Hovey; James, Thomas, Caroline, wife of B. H. Roach; William, Norris and Henry Clay.

Henry Clay Humphrey was born September 18, 1856, near Elmira, Lane county, Ore. His youth was spent on the home farm near Elmira. He attended the public schools of Eugene, later took a course in Columbia College, and finally was graduated from the business college at Salem, Ore., and Heald's Business College at San Francisco. His initial business experience was as a clerk in the banking and brokerage house of A. G. Hovey, of Eugene. In 1882 he organized the Lane County Bank, with which he was identified as president until disposing of his interest therein in 1893. Previous to this, however, he had evidenced his integrity and intrepid character by standing by this institution throughout the financial panic of the early months of 1893, awaiting such time as the money could be raised and the creditors paid one hundred cents on the dollar. After severing his connection with the bank, he entered upon a large shipping business, restricting his trade to hops, prunes and other dried fruits, and conducting this enterprise with marked success, up to the time of his death, which occurred November 15, 1895.

In the meantime Mr. Humphrey's ambition and energy had found vent in various enterprises of a public nature. He became one of the organizers of the Eugene Electric Light Company, in which he retained an interest for one year, and other local enterprises received his hearty encouragement and support. He was devoted to the issues and principles of the Republican party, and fraternally was connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the

In erecting the superstructure of his successful career, Mr. Humphrey was indebted in a large measure to the practical assistance rendered by a cultured and ambitious wife, Elizabeth Shaw, to whom he was married in San Francisco, Cal., April 19, 1885. She is a daughter of Angus and Elizabeth (Murchison) Shaw, both natives of Scotland, and the former born on the Isle of Skye. Mr. Shaw settled at an early day in Stark county, Ill., where Mrs. Humphrey was born, and whence he crossed the plains with his wife and children in 1863. He came with horse teams and was six months on the journey, finally settling upon a large, and at present splendidly appointed, farm near Summerville, Union county, Ore., where he is known as one of the most extensive grain raisers in that section of the state. His wife, who died in 1867, was the mother of five children, of whom Mrs. Humphrey is the only one residing in the Willamette valley. She was reared and primarily educated in Union county, and was graduated from the University of Oregon in the class of 1884 with the degree of Bachelor of Science. Mrs. Humphrey was engaged in educational work for about three years after her husband's death. Broad-minded and liberal in her tendencies, her cultured mind is occupied largely by church work, suffrage and benevolent undertakings. She has two daughters, Eda Claire and Hazel Beatrice.

In closing this brief review of the career of Henry Clay Humphrey it is but proper to state that his every-day efforts were characterized by the greatest liberality, and he enthusiastically participated in all worthy undertakings calculated to advance the industrial, moral, educational and social well-being of the community. A sane reasoner, a cautious business man, and a gentleman possessed of many admirable personal traits, he inspired the respect, confidence and good will of all with whom he was associated in whatever capacity, his opinions carrying weight because of the sincerity, earnestness and spirit of good-fellowship which dictated his every action. Cut off in the prime of his active and useful life, his death was a distinct loss to the city of Eugene, and there is no doubt that, if he had lived to prosecute the plans he had formulated, he would easily have attained a position in the commercial circles of the northwest which would have made him the peer of the most eminent men of affairs on the Pacific coast. His record is so clean, so honorable, so high-minded and unselfish, that his name is entitled to a permanent and conspicuous place in the chronicles of the builders and developers of the state of Oregon.

WILLIAM M. RENSHAW. That congenial work means successful work is demonstrated anew in the career of William M. Renshaw, the genial proprietor of the Hotel Smeede at Eugene. Of Scotch-Irish ancestry, long identified with the south, he was born in Springfield, Mo., November 7, 1850, his father, W. D. Renshaw, having settled there in 1837. The elder Renshaw, who was born near Nashville, Tenn., in 1823, had a large farm in the vicinity of Springfield, Mo., property which he disposed of after acquainting himself with the prospects in the far west. Outfitting with ox-teams and provisions he crossed the plains with his wife and two children in 1851, encompassing the intervening distance between Missouri and Portland in six months to a day. He had comparatively little trouble with the Indians, although some more courageous than others helped themselves to some of his stock. In the spring of 1852 he settled on a donation claim six miles south of Eugene, composed of three hundred and twenty acres of uncultivated land, and there built a small log house and began to prepare for such crops as could be planted on short order. He was quite successful from a financial standpoint, and was popular in his neighborhood, his death, at the age of sixty-five, which took place in 1888, being regretted by a large circle of friends and well wishers. He was a Republican from a political standpoint, and in religion was a Presbyterian. In his youth he married Mary J. Walker, born in either Georgia or Tennessee, and who removed with her parents to Greene county, Mo., before coming to Oregon. Mrs. Renshaw was born in 1828 and died in 1887. Of the eight children born into the family, Theodore M. is living in Grant's Pass; W. M. is the subject of this sketch; Hugh A. lives in Lane county; Elmer L. lives in Eugene; Samuel I. is in Virginia; Sarah L. is the wife of Charles Mayhew of Eugene; and Hattie, wife of Jefferson Gwin of Salem.

William M. Renshaw was less than a year old when he came to Oregon, and he practically remembers nothing of his former home, or the incidents leading to the family emigration. He was educated in the public schools and remained on the home farm in Linn county until nineteen years old, when he turned his attention to surveying, being employed by the government for five years to survey the public lands. He was associated as surveyor, first with J. H. McClung, then with Mr. Evans, and still later with Messrs. Perkins and General Odell. Having finished his contract for surveying he engaged in the meat market business for six years, and in 1878 removed to Grant county, eastern Oregon, and engaged for two years in the cattle business. Returning to the Willamette valley in the spring of 1880, he continued the butchering business for a couple of years, and then engaged in the liquor business for over twenty years. In September, 1902, Mr. Renshaw leased the New Smeede Hotel, and opened it to the traveling public September 24, 1902. This is the leading hotel in the city, and compares favorably with the hostleries in much larger and older cities. The proprietor is eminently fitted for the many duties which devolve upon him, and is possessed of the qualities of tact, consideration, courtesy and geniality so necessary in the make-up of the successful hotel man. The hostelry is substantially and artistically furnished, has large and airy rooms, and ample accommodation for guests.

A Republican in political affiliation, Mr. Renshaw has never been an aspirant for public office. He is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., Eugene Chapter No. 10, Royal Arch Masons; the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; and the Ancient Order United Workmen. He married, in 1878, in Eugene, Eleanor Cochran, a native of Lane county, and a daughter of James Cochran, who crossed the plains from Indiana to Oregon in 1853.

ALLBEE E. WHEELER. Allbee E. Wheeler's position at the bar and his standing in the community have been earned by conscientious effort, spurred on by ambition. In early life we find him teaching a country school, in order to earn the tuition for a higher general and professional education, and in after-life he stepped into a niche of industry in Eugene, making himself necessary as a thorough student of legal science, as the compiler of the only complete abstract books in Lane county, and as a broad-minded, public-spirited gentleman, in harmony with all that is progressive, substantial and practical.

Of old New England ancestry, Mr. Wheeler was born on a farm near Barton, Orleans county, Vt., February 17, 1856, his paternal grandparents, James and Sarah (Wilson) Wheeler, having established the family there at an early day. His maternal grandparents, Dr. Orson and Fannie (Allbee) Grow, were also well known in Orleans county, where the doctor combined medical practice with general farming for many years. Silas and Jane (Grow) Wheeler, the parents of Allbee E. Wheeler, lived on a farm in Orleans county during all of their active lives, but are now living retired in Chicago, Ill., the father being eighty-one years of age, in comparatively good health and spirits. The parents were born in New Hampshire, and Orleans county, Vt., respectively, and had four children, three of whom are living, Allbee E. being the youngest, and the only one in the state of Oregon.

At the age of thirteen years Allbee E. Wheeler left the home farm to attend the public schools of Lyndon Center, Vt., whence he entered the Free Baptist State School, known as the Lyndon Literary Institute, from which he was duly graduated in 1874. The year of his graduation he removed to La Salle county, Ill., and taught school near the city of La Salle for one term. In January, 1875, he began a four-years course of teaching near Onowa, Monona county, Iowa, during which time he married Lillia J. Herring, a native of Winnebago county, Ill., who was born at Durand. Benjamin Herring, the father of Mrs. Wheeler, served all through the Civil war, and afterward removed from Illinois near Onowa, Iowa, where he farmed until his death. Two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler, of whom Mabel F. is the wife of Prof. Charles W. Wester, of Dinuba, Cal.; and Flora J. married Archie W. Livermore of Eugene.

Mr. Wheeler was a successful educator, and by dint of strict economy was enabled to enter the law department of the University of Iowa after completing his teaching. Graduating in the class of 1881, he was admitted to the bar at the same time, and settled down to practice at Onowa, making that his home until locating in Eugene in 1888. At the beginning of his residence here he started to make his abstract books, engaging at the same time in the abstract and title business, and as heretofore mentioned, has the only complete abstract books in the county. He has a comprehensive knowledge of the theory and practice of law, is courteous and faithful to clients, attentive to business, and measures professional duty and effort by recognition of obligation and ends attainable. Mr. Wheeler is a Republican in politics, and served as councilman of Eugene for one term. He is a member of the Woodmen of the World. He is one of the organizers of the Congregational church of Eugene, and from the beginning has been one of the trustees and among the most active workers.

HERBERT GORDON. That the dogged perseverance and resourcefulness which we are wont to admire in the early pioneers of the state exists in equal measure in many of the later adopted sons, is proved in innumerable instances. It is not necessary to go outside of Eugene for illustrations of this fact, for many of the rising young business men who are forging their way to commercial prominence have been singularly and even discouragingly alone in their aspirations and accomplishments. In this class belongs Herbert Gordon, owner and manager of the largest furniture and house-furnishing establishment in the town.

Mr. Gordon is one of the many sons of Canada who have found their way to the extreme western part of the country, and pursued their various occupations with increasing success. Born near Toronto, August 5, 1873, he is the sixth of the seven children born to his parents, Thomas and Martha (Allen) Gordon, at present living retired in Eugene. Thomas Gordon came from London, England, when a child with his parents, and was reared on a farm in Ontario. In time he became a merchant near his father's home, and at the same time arose to political prominence in the neighborhood. For fourteen years he was clerk of the circuit court in county Simcoe, and afterward removed to a new and heavily timbered farm in the Northwest Territory, where he lived for three years. In 1888 he took up his residence on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres west of Eugene, and after three years of successful management moved into the town which has since been his home. His wife was born in Canada also, and is of Scotch descent. Besides Herbert, there are three other of the seven children living: William Thomas is an undertaker, and James Herbert a teamster of Eugene, and a daughter, Martha Maud, is the wife of Le Roy Milne, of Marcola, Lane county.

Herbert Gordon was ten years old when he came with his parents to the Northwest Territory, and while there he attended the public schools for three and a half years. In 1888 he came with the family to the farm near Eugene, and though he worked hard during the summer time, managed to complete the course at the Eugene high school. He had little money with which to start in any kind of business, and for some time the future was at best problematical and vague. Finally he bought a wood-saw on credit, and while operating it for five years not only paid off his indebtedness, but amassed quite a sum of money, with a part of which he built a residence on East Eleventh street. In 1898 his fortunes looked up considerably, when he purchased a second-hand furniture store from Mr. Cummings for $500, and after closing that out put in a new stock of furniture, starting in under favorable auspices to cater to a diminutive trade. It was not long before his progressive and upright business methods impressed themselves on the general public, and a corresponding increase of business found his quarters altogether inadequate. Accordingly, in 1900, his present store was erected, Nos. 24-6-8 East Ninth street. The building covers 40x160 feet, and has two floors and a gallery. The proprietor aims to cater to the most exclusive as well as cheaper trade, and carries a complete stock of furniture, carpets, stoves, ranges, wallpaper and paints. The store has elevator service, and patrons are met by courteous and obliging clerks, conversant with the complete stock, and able to furnish valuable suggestions as to combination and relative values. This is one of the most perfectly equipped furniture stores in this part of Oregon, and that it has been brought to its present state of excellence by so young a man argues well for his business judgment and shrewd practical sense.

Mr. Gordon is popular in business and social circles of Eugene, is a member of the Commercial Club, and of the Woodmen of the World. Politically he is identified with the Republican party, and he finds a religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In Albany, Ore., May 11, 1898, he married Henrietta Harshberger, who was born in Ohio, and who is the mother of two children, Wanda and Dora.

CHARLES S. FARROW. The pioneer who came to Oregon before the general emigration, and not only hewed his way to success through discouraging obstacles, but reared strong and reliant sons to maintain the honor of his name, and perchance add to his prestige as a manager and business man under later and more favorable circumstances, filed a twofold lien upon the gratitude of posterity. Such an one was Stephen F. Farrow, whose well known integrity and general worthiness are reflected in the lives of many of his children, more especially his son, Charles S., one of the prominent business men and most successful real estate dealers in Eugene.

The founder of the Farrow family in Oregon was born in Montgomery county, Ky., his father, Isaac, having removed there from his native state of Virginia at a very early day. The grandfather married Catherine French, of Virginia, whose great-grandfather was one of the largest land-owners in the state of Virginia, much of the property being still in the family. Isaac Farrow removed with his family from Kentucky to Illinois while that state was yet a territory, settling first in Macoupin county, and later in Jersey county, where he owned a large farm and where he died at an advanced age. His son, Stephen F. Farrow, continued to live on the paternal farm in Jersey county, and there was married, January 17, 1844, to Maria Jane Cleaver, who was born in Hardin county, Ky., October 16, 1825. Benjamin Cleaver, the father of Mrs. Farrow, as well as her grandfather, Benjamin, were born in Kentucky, and the former removed to Macoupin county in 1828, later settling in Jersey county, where his daughter attained maturity, and became established in a home of her own. Mrs. Cleaver, formerly Rachel Tompkins, was born in Kentucky, and became the mother of eleven children, many of whom married in Illinois, but all of whom accompanied their parents to the west. Thus it will be seen that the Cleaver and Farrow families constituted quite a little community of their own in Jersey county, and it seems but natural that all should have been animated by the common impulse to shift their fortunes to the far west. In the meantime a child had been born to Stephen F. Farrow and his wife. Mr. Farrow's equipment for the long journey across the plains in 1848 was small compared with that of his father-in-law. The latter had one wagon with four yoke of oxen, besides plenty of loose cattle with which to start business after reaching his destination. The family gathering left Illinois March 27, 1848, crossed the Mississippi river at Alton and the Missouri river at St. Joseph, proceeding through the Indian country via the old Oregon trail. On the Platte river in Nebraska territory, a daughter was born to Mrs. Farrow, and the little plains stranger was given the name of Virginia. All went well with the entire party during the rest of the journey, and they arrived in the Willamette valley by way of the Barlow route in September, 1848, having been about six months on the way. Benjamin Cleaver bade adieu to the train in Marion county, taking up a claim now occupied by the site of Mount Angel, but he afterward moved to Lebanon, where he bought and operated a grist-mill for the remainder of his active life. He lived to be eighty-eight years old, and died firm in the faith of the Christian Church, of which he had been a member for many years. The wife who helped him to his ample competence died in Marion county in 1866.

Stephen F. Farrow settled on a claim of six hundred and forty acres on Butte creek, Clackamas county, and made this his home for sixteen years. His first home was a one-room log house, but as his land was cleared, and harvests rewarded his arduous toil, his family profited by his good fortune, and were better housed and clothed. In 1867 the family moved to Linn county, purchasing a farm of three hundred and twenty acres near Saddle Butte, where Stephen Farrow died June 22, 1885, at the age of sixty-nine years. He was a Republican in politics, and was a member of the Baptist Church. His wife, who survives him and lives in Eugene, is, by a strange coincidence, the mother of eleven children, she herself being one of eleven. Alice and Virginia, the two older daughters, died at nine and fifteen years of age respectively; Albert A. is a stockman in Lake county, Ore.; Laura is living in Eugene; Charles S. is the real estate dealer of Eugene; Emily was the widow of Orange Z. Morgan, an extensive stockman of eastern Oregon, but is now Mrs. Nye, and resides in Eugene; William is a stockman in Lake county; Minnie is the wife of M. S. Hubble, of Eugene; Lillie is the wife of D. B. Troutman, of Tallman, Ore.; Ralph is a resident of Portland; and John is a ranchman in Lake county.

The fourth child in his father's family, Charles S. Farrow was born on the farm skirting Butte creek, Clackamas county, October 27, 1854, and was reared to hard work on the farm. He accompanied the family to Linn county, after the old farm was sold in 1867, and in both of these places attended the public schools as opportunity offered. After the death of his father the entire management of the farm fell upon his shoulders, and he engaged in farming and stock-raising, making great improvements on the property from year to year. About this time he married Iva M. Farwell, who was born near Shedd's, Linn county, a daughter of Richard Farwell, a pioneer of 1852. Of this union there have been born four children, of whom Harry D. is attending the business college in Eugene; Glenn H. and Hazel are attending the high school, and Kenneth, and all reside at home. In 1886 Mr. Farrow moved to a farm on the upper Siuslaw in Lane county, and engaged in stock-raising until coming to Eugene in 1889.

For three seasons Mr. Farrow was employed as traveling salesman in the Willamette valley for the Plano Company of Chicago, and afterward clerked for about five years. In 1900 he started the real estate business of C. S. Farrow, later incorporating under the firm name of C. S. Farrow & Company, his partner being H. F. Hollenbeck. The firm occupies an enviable place in the business world of Eugene, and though comparatively young in its activities, has already handled an enormous amount of town and country lands. Unquestionably it has one of the largest enterprises in Lane county, and has the option on all kinds of city, farm and timber lands throughout the county. It has pleasant offices at 506 Willamette street, and both men are genial and kindly in manner, attentive and considerate to purchasers, and thoroughly conversant with every phase of their occupation. Mr. Farrow is a charter member and director of the Eugene Real Estate Exchange. He is a prominent member of the Woodmen of the World and the Women of Woodcraft, and is one of the leaders in the Christian Church, of which he has been an official for twelve years, having been a member of the board of deacons for that period. Mr. Farrow is energetic and progressive, broad in his sympathies, and generous in his judgment of all with whom he comes in contact. In his personal characteristics he represents the best type of this community, and as such is honored and esteemed by a large circle of friends and business associates.

JEFFERSON D. SPENCER is carrying on an extensive wood and hay business in Eugene, thus becoming a leading factor in the commercial life of the city. He will be set down when the history of this county is written as one of the chief developers of its agricultural resources. No tiller of the soil has applied greater intelligence and practical good sense to the conduct of large agricultural projects. Keeping well abreast of that army of workers around whom centers the strength of the entire country, he has uncomplainingly struggled to the front, philosophically regarding the obstacles which confront the toilers of earth, and inspiring others with his own contagious good will and enthusiasm. His career may be taken as typical of the man who succeeds in what he sets out to do, and, having succeeded, is not only rich in this world's goods, but rich in amiable and helpful traits of character.

S. H. Spencer, the father of Jefferson D., was born in St. Charles county, Mo., and when a comparatively young man lost his first wife, who left him a son, John, who died in eastern Oregon. His second wife, Mahala Smith, was born in Missouri, and became the mother of eleven children, six of whom attained maturity and five are still living. Two of these children were born in the state of Missouri, and with these, and his wife, Mr. Spencer started across the plains in 1854, taking with him, as a nucleus for stock-raising in the west, a large band of cattle. A comparatively pleasant journey rewarded the courage of the travelers, and the father took up a claim on the Mohawk, which, however, proved most unsatisfactory. Later he removed to the claim of three hundred and twenty acres three miles northeast of Irving, which is still in the family, and where his death occurred in 1890. His cattle proved of practical worth to him in his new home, and he not only started a large stock business here, but drove a number of them to the mines during the excitement in California, receiving large prices for them, and thus getting quite a start toward competency. Daniel Taylor, his oldest son, died in Heppner in 1883; Mary is the wife of L. H. Wheeler and lives on the old place; Eliza and Jennie and J. D. live in Lane county; and S. S. is teller of the First National Bank in Eugene.

Following close upon his course at the University of Oregon, J. D. Spencer went to Alsea Bay, on the coast, and built the store in which he conducted a general merchandise business four and a half years. Selling out after experiencing fair success, he purchased a farm of four hundred and forty acres one mile west of Irving, all of which was improved land, and upon which he engaged in the grain and hay business on a large scale. Success followed him from year to year, his crops, with few exceptions, being uniformly excellent in quality and abundant in quantity. In October, 1902, Mr. Spencer purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres four miles east of Irving for $8,000, and soon after disposed of two hundred and thirty acres for $7,400, leaving for his own use ninety acres of finely improved land. With his large store of experience in dealing with hay, and a practical knowledge of the wood output of the state, he determined to retire from active farming and engage in a wholesale and retail hay and wood business in Eugene. Thus, in March following the purchase of his last farm, he bought four acres of land on Blair street, and in 1903 erected a barn 60x90 feet ground dimensions, and with forty-foot posts, the peak of the barn being fifty feet above the ground. With a capacity of four hundred cords of wood, and a hay capacity of three hundred and sixty tons, he contemplates doing a large and remunerative business.

Mr. Spencer has kept in touch with the progress of the world in general while superintending his large country interests, and is one of the well informed and practical workers in a prolific field of activity. He has found time to participate in church and social life, and actively to support the cause of Prohibition. He is a member of the United Brethren Church, and supports the charities conducted by that worthy organization. Fraternally he is a member of the Masonic Lodge. He is popular and successful, and has exerted a strong influence for morality and the practical and substantial in business life. He was married, in Portland, to Clara Bond, who was born in the vicinity of Irving, the daughter of Hon. Allen Bond, a pioneer of 1849. Mr. Bond was a farmer and merchant during his active life, was prominent in Republican politics in the west, and served in the state senate one term. His death occurred in 1902. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Spencer, Cecil Bond and Doris Rachael.

ROBERT D. HAWLEY. The name of Hawley is one that is well known in Lane county as it belongs to efficient and reliable men, who have done no little toward the making of a western state. One of these brothers, Robert D. Hawley, is located on a farm of three hundred and eighty acres a mile and a half north of Creswell, upon which he has placed all modern and up-to-date improvements in the way of a handsome dwelling, large barns and outbuildings, the whole constituting one of the finest places in this part of the county.

Mr. Hawley was born on his father's donation claim, located on the Divide, March 8, 1859, and was there reared to manhood's duties and responsibilities. For a complete account of the life of his father, Ira Hawley, refer to the sketch of George M., which appears on another page of this work. Robert D. Hawley received his education through the medium of the district school at Creswell, and when of sufficient age he took up the trade of a carpenter and followed this for several years. Upon attaining his majority he left home and went to the Palouse country, in Idaho, engaging there in the prosecution of his trade for four years, when he returned to Lane county and took up his residence on the property which he now occupies, which is a part of the I. Allen donation claim. In addition to this property he also owns one hundred and twenty acres of timber land. With the exception of three years which he spent in Creswell following his trade he has since lived here, engaged in the busy activities which are a part of intelligent farming, devoting his time to general farming, stock-raising and dairying, the milk for his dairy being supplied by Jersey cattle. He has placed upon the farm the improvements which have enhanced its general appearance and marketable value, and has under cultivation two hundred acres of land. He also owns and operates a steam threshing outfit which represents quite an outlay of money, but by his management and industry he has made it a paying investment.

The marriage of Mr. Hawley took place December 17, 1885, and united him with Miss Mary H. Hillegas, a native of Missouri, who came to Oregon in 1882, and with her parents settled in Lane county. The four children which blessed their union are at home with their parents, being named in order of birth as follows: Hattie, Roberta, Tressa and Hazel. In fraternal orders Mr. Hawley is a member of the Woodmen of the World. He is a member and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A Republican in politics, he has always taken an active part in the movements of the party, having been sent as a delegate to all but two conventions since he made his home here. He has held various minor offices of the vicinity and was once a candidate for sheriff, and is a popular man in the estimation of the public.

SAMUEL T. McFALL. A resident of Eugene, Lane county, Samuel T. McFall is engaged in looking after his property, which consists of a residence in the city and five hundred and forty acres of land located six miles west, where his two sons are employed in a general farming and stock business, raising horses, cattle, hogs, etc. Mr. McFall has been a member of Eugene society only since December, 1898, but the sterling worth of his character has already won him many friends.

The second child of his father's family, S. T. McFall was born in Iroquois county, Ill., February 14, 1836. His father, S. T. McFall, was born in Kentucky, the representative of an old Virginia family of Scotch descent. He became a farmer in Illinois and in 1843 removed to Mahaska county, Iowa, where he bought four hundred acres of land at $1.25 per acre, and built a log house for the shelter of his family, while he engaged heartily in the improvement and cultivation of his farm. His death occurred there at the age of eighty-three years. His wife was formerly Elizabeth Barbee, a native of Ross county, Ohio, and the daughter of Daniel Barbee, of Virginia. Daniel Barbee settled first in Ohio and later removed to Illinois, and thence to Mahaska county, Iowa. He was a patriot in the war of 1812. Mrs. McFall died in Iowa, the mother of seven children, four of whom are now living.

S. T. McFall was reared on his father's farm in Iowa and educated in a subscription school, remaining at home until 1859, when he started with ox-teams for Pike's Peak. From that point of interest he traveled throughout the state, visiting Central City, Black Hawk, Russell Gulch and other places, nine months being consumed in his prospecting, in which he was fairly successful. At the expiration of the time mentioned he returned to his home in Iowa, there remaining until August 18, 1862, when he became a volunteer in Company H, Thirty-sixth Iowa Regiment, being mustered in at Ottumwa. After a time spent at Benton Barracks they were sent to Memphis, and from that time on participated in many engagements, among them being Helena, Ark., Little Rock, Prairie d'Anne, Little Missouri, Ark., Camden, and others. At Mark's Mills he participated in an engagement and was there wounded, a one-ounce minie ball passing through his left shoulder and lung, which eventually caused him much suffering. At the same time he was taken prisoner two miles from the battlefield upon a farm, those wounded being left by the troops perforce. Twenty-five days later parole was secured for them by the Union army, and up to that time they had been without medical attendance and robbed of almost all their clothing. Mr. McFall was taken to a hospital at Little Rock until he was able to return home on a furlough, when he again spent some time in the hospital at Keokuk, his wound remaining open for nine months, during which time his left collar bone was removed. He was mustered out August 12, 1865, his left arm entirely useless. With his war record ended Mr. McFall then engaged in farming, becoming the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land located twenty miles from Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he became an extensive stockman, having gone to this location from Mahaska county in 1880. He tilled the land and improved it in every possible way, and brought his farm to a high state of cultivation and consequent value by the erection of fine buildings, including a handsome residence and commodious barns. In 1891 he removed to Nebraska and purchased three hundred and twenty acres of prairie land, which he proceeded to improve and cultivate while engaging in the business of a stock shipper. This property was disposed of in 1898 and it was then that Mr. McFall came to the northwest and took up his residence in Eugene, Ore., becoming the owner of extensive farming lands and bringing into the work of cultivation the same practical ideas and methods which made his success in the Mississippi valley.

March 18, 1866, Mr. McFall was married in Mahaska county, Iowa, to Miss Isabelle Skidmore, who was born in Columbus, Ohio. She was the daughter of James Skidmore, a native of Franklin county, of that state, and an early settler in Iowa, where he engaged in farming for many years. His death occurred in Kansas, near Argonia. His father, George Skidmore, was born in Kentucky and settled in Ohio as a farmer. He served in the War of 1812 and held the commission of captain in the Black Hawk war. The mother of Mrs. McFall was before marriage Eunice Hendricks, a native of Ohio, and the daughter of James Hendricks, of Kentucky, and her death also occurred in Kansas. A family of nine children was born to her, five of whom are living, and the second child is Mrs. McFall, who was reared in her native state. To Mr. and Mrs. McFall have been born four children. One son died in infancy. Of those living the two sons, Norman and Joseph, are conducting the farm, and Cora, the second child, is the wife of A. Herschel Smith, of Eugene. Mr. McFall is a staunch Republican in politics, and is always ready to lend his influence toward the advance of the principles which he considers best for the interests of the country. While in his homes in Iowa and Nebraska he served for many years as justice of the peace. He was made a Mason in Fremont, Iowa, for some time was identified with a lodge at Randolph, Neb., and now holds membership in Eugene Lodge No. 11. As a war veteran he belongs to J. W. Geary Post No. 7, of this city, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

HON. J. B. HOPKINS. A career of exceptional merit, and one from which many practical lessons may be drawn, is that of Hon. J. B. Hopkins, formerly prominently identified with lumbering and milling interests in Rice county, Minn., and since 1890 president and general manager of the Eugene (Ore.) Lumber Company. In the records of the Hopkins family in America the name of Joseph appears frequently, the first emigrant having responded to the biblical nomenclature, as did also the paternal grandfather, and the father of Hon. J. B. Hopkins. The grandfather was a trader and farmer, residing for many years in Connecticut, but who eventually became an early settler in Jefferson county, N. Y. His son, Joseph, was born in Bridgeport, Conn., was reared in Jefferson and St. Lawrence counties, N. Y., and there engaged as a farmer and educator, acquiring distinction in the latter capacity. He was one of the founders, promoters and teachers of the Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary, and was a man of public spirit and broad culture. His last years were spent in Minnesota, his wife, formerly Parmelia (Picket) Hopkins, daughter of Justus Picket, having died in St. Lawrence county, N. Y. Of the nine children born into the family, seven attained maturity, and six are living at the present time.

Educated in the public schools and at Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary, Hon. J. B. Hopkins subsequently took a course at the Albany (N. Y.) Law School, and in 1865 inaugurated a self-supporting career as an insurance agent in St. Joseph, Mo. Two years later, in 1867, he removed to Morristown, Rice county, Minn., where he bought a farm and engaged in lumbering and milling, gradually making his way to the front among the large lumber merchants of that timbered region. Nor were his exertions confined exclusively to lumbering. He also became prominent in politics, serving three terms in the state legislature. In November, 1888, Mr. Hopkins came to Oregon, spent a few months in Forest Grove, and then engaged in lumbering in Eugene. In 1890 he organized the Eugene Lumber Company, of which he has since been president, and which company built a mill of twenty-five thousand feet capacity at the north end of Mill street. This structure burned in 1900, its burning entailing a severe loss to the company, which, however, at once erected a mill of more modern construction, and with an increased capacity of five thousand. The motive power consists of one thirty-horse-power, and two forty-horse-power engines, the timber being secured from the company's tracts on the Willamette river. This company ranks high as a promoter of the splendid timber possibilities of Lane county, and as a large employer of labor materially contributes to the maintenance of the industrial wellbeing in the city and county. The president is one of the practically qualified lumbermen of which this region boasts, and added to this claim to consideration are personal characteristics of a high order, which not only inspire confidence and claim the respect of his subordinates, but retain the lasting regard and good will of a host of friends.

In St. Lawrence county, N. Y., Mr. Hopkins was united in marriage with Emma Lynd, a native of Jefferson county, N. Y., and the mother of three children, of whom Dwight B. is interested in his father's business; Harold L., a graduate of the University of Oregon, of Oberlin College, and Yale University, is a clergyman in Chicago, Ill.; and Kate is the wife of Frank H. Porter, of Halsey, Ore. Mr. Hopkins is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the Congregational church.

WILLIAM NEIS. The finest hop-yard in the Willamette valley is said to be that of William Neis, which is located near Springfield, Lane county, and consists of twenty-five acres of finely cultivated land. During some seasons he has raised four hundred bales, the largest crop in the world for the acreage, being about three thousand pounds to the acre, the fine soil so well adapted to this plant, combined with the inherited talent for this employment, uniting to bring about the best possible results.

Mr. Neis is not a native of this state, nor yet of the country wherein he has made his home for so many years, having been born in Oberlandstein, Hesse Nassau, the son of Joseph and the grandson of Phillip Neis, both natives of that location. Both followed the life of a horticulturist and had extensive vineyards, their last days being spent in the location of their birth. The mother was in maidenhood Anna Marn Hensler, born near Ems, and of her six children four are now living, the two in America being Phillip Neis of Portland, and William, of this review. The latter's birth occurred May 24, 1836. He was reared in the beautiful city of Oberlandstein, where he attended the public schools, later finishing his education in a private school in Coblenz. When fifteen and a half years old he was apprenticed as a wholesale and retail merchant in Cologne, where he remained for three years, after which he spent a year in Coblenz in steamboating and the commission business. He then entered the army, becoming a soldier in the second regiment of grenadiers and serving at various intervals for six years. His regiment was called into active service in 1859 in the war between Austria, Italy and France, and he served on the French frontier until peace was declared, when Emperor Franz Josef gave up Lombardy. He had then attained the distinction of a lieutenancy through his efficiency as a military man, and having a good education, necessary for the rank. At the close of this war Mr. Neis went to Paris and engaged in business there, and from there located in Manchester, England, where he followed the shipping business. Through the death of his mother he was recalled to his native country, after which he went to London and remained until 1869. At that date he became connected with the Franco-American Mescasche, a newspaper of New York city, with which he remained until 1871, when he started toward the broader opportunities of the western states. Locating in Chicago he engaged in the wood and willow ware business, and was making a success of his new business when the great fire of 1871, which devastated that city left him at the beginning of his career. He remained but seven months after his loss, some time after this being spent in traveling about through the country, passing a short time in New Orleans, and again in Boulder county, Colo., prospecting. In 1878 he settled in California, and was employed by his brother, who was a hop merchant in San Francisco, where he remained until 1887. Carrying his interests north Mr. Neis then located in Oregon, purchasing forty acres of land in the vicinity of Springfield, the larger part of which has since been devoted to the cultivation of hops.

Since 1899 Mr. Neis has made his home in Eugene, through his fine education and culture contributing no little to the society of this city. He is a Democrat in politics and adheres to the principles embraced in the platform of that party.

FRANCIS BERRIAN DUNN. The feeling which attaches to the names of the pioneers of Oregon is one that will outlast time and the crowding of events, for the younger generation realizes in part the unselfish manhood and the wide faith in the possibilities of the west which gave their own lives fulfillment among the present affluence and prosperity of one of the greatest commonwealths on the Pacific slope. In Eugene the name of Dunn is one remembered as that of a strong, forceful and earnest man, whose career affected no little the development of the city, and whose success contributed to that of others, as he was typical of the unselfish brotherhood of pioneers. Though long since passed away, a deep interest centers around the events of his life.

Mr. Dunn was born in Elizabeth, Ill., December 24, 1830, the third son of Jonathan and Irene (Clark) Dunn. His father was a millwright by trade and followed that occupation throughout his life. Both he and his wife died near Lawrence, Kan. The son was reared in Athens, Ill., and received his education in the district schools, and when a mere lad became a cabin boy on the Mississippi river, where he learned some of the lessons which afterward proved valuable in his life as a pioneer of a country where conditions were trying and dangerous. Following where his ambitions led him, he crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1853, and upon his safe arrival in Oregon became a clerk in Albany, Linn county, where he remained for a short time. In the fall of the same year he located in Eugene, Lane county, and that city was the scene of his business activity until the termination of his successful career. He first engaged as clerk in the establishment of Joseph Brumley, continuing there for one year, when he opened a merchandise business in Springfield. After an experience of three years he returned to Eugene and built a store and engaged in the general merchandise business, in the course of time building up a large and lucrative custom, through his practical methods and unblemished integrity winning the confidence of the people with whom he had to deal. His establishment, which was devoted to the sale of dry goods, became the first in quality, quantity and style, and that it was a successful business venture was evidenced by the amount of property which he was able to accumulate. He became the owner of a number of fine farms, to the improvement and cultivation of which he spared no effort or outlay. In the city he left a reminder of his business career in the erection of the F. B. Dunn Block, a credit to the commercial interests of Eugene. Besides his mercantile interests, Mr. Dunn devoted some time to hop and wool buying, in which operations he met with the usual success which had characterized his entire life.

In politics Mr. Dunn was a Republican and served ably and efficiently as mayor of the city for eight years, having the entire confidence of the citizens in his public administrations. Knowing and appreciating his unusual business sagacity and judgment, many came to him for advice, which he freely gave, generously eager for the success of his friends and associates. In Masonic circles he was a Knight Templar, and was prominent in the order. His death occurred July 20, 1892, and took from the city a staunch, earnest and helpful supporter, whose influence still lives and leads toward the advancement of western civilization.

By his marriage Mr. Dunn allied himself with a pioneer family of great prominence in Eugene, Miss Cecelia Christian becoming his wife, December 22, 1855. She was born in Mount Carroll, Ill., and was the daughter of Daniel R. Christian. The Christian family were represented in the state of Maryland, where, in Boonsboro, the father was born, the son of Daniel Christian, a patriot and officer in the War of 1812, and grandson of Daniel Christian, a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Daniel R. Christian early became a resident of the middle west, where he was a pioneer farmer and builder in Mount Carroll, but eager to share in the greater hardships and larger rewards of a newer country, he brought his wife and six children across the plains in 1852, the journey being made with the slow-plodding oxen. Upon their safe arrival in Oregon the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, which has since become the Christian addition to the city of Eugene, extending from Eleventh street south. His death occurred at the age of seventy-three years, and the city lost one of its most enterprising members, strong for the advancement of commercial and industrial interests, and strong in the moral life of the community, as he was an active member of the Methodist church. The wife who shared the dangers and toils of his pioneer life was in maidenhood Catherine Etnyre, a native of Maryland, and the daughter of a shoemaker, who became an early settler of Illinois. The mother also died in this location. She was the mother of the following children besides Mrs. Dunn: Samuel, located in Spokane, Wash.; Susan, widow of William Maxwell, of Springfield; Sarah, widow of A. S. Patterson, of Eugene; Etha, of Eugene; John, who was born on the plains in 1852, now living in Eugene; and William, who died in Eugene.

Mrs. Dunn was but twelve years old when she came to Oregon, and was educated principally in the public schools of this state. Since her husband's death she has made her home in Eugene. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. She is the mother of seven children, of whom Irene is the wife of C. S. Williams, of Eugene; Luella is the wife of George A. Dorris, of Springfield; Laura is the wife of Col. George O. Yorlan, of Eugene; Frank E. is a merchant of Eugene; Fred S. is a post-graduate of Harvard, having previously graduated from the University of Oregon and Harvard, and is now professor of Latin in the University of Oregon; Edna is the wife of Robert Diggles of Melones, Cal.; and Amy still makes her home with her mother.

WILLIAM H. ALEXANDER. Except as his work appeals by its substantial, practical, or artistic nature, one builder is hardly distinguished from his brother worker in the same field. To be able to give general satisfaction in a given direction, is to hold in one's hand an assured success, no matter how keen the competition, or how large or small the dimensions of one's ambition. The builder of ability understands the requirements of a discerning public, and, keeping well in advance of his time-honored calling, is rarely wanting in material upon which to exercise his skill. Eugene is not behind in being able to produce master craftsmen, men who have contributed to its fundamental growth by housing its people and industries, and establishing the harmonious aggregate for which the city is famed. Of this class of men W. H. Alexander is essentially a leader, having for the past eighteen years followed the best tenets of construction, making a specialty of artistic and conveniently arranged homes, but also putting up a number of public buildings, including the Risdon and Conser blocks. Among the residences which attest the skill of Mr. Alexander, and materially add to the architectural appearance of the city, may be mentioned those of F. E. Dunn, S. B. Eakin, T. G. Hendricks, W. T. Caro, Mrs. Sarah H. Patterson and the Schwarzschilds home.

A native son of Oregon, Mr. Alexander was born on his father's donation claim near Shedds, July 30, 1857, and is the second of the three children born to Joseph R. and Elizabeth (Nethall) Alexander, natives of Illinois and Scotland respectively. Through his marriage in Illinois Joseph R. Alexander became identified with a Scottish family of illustrious lineage, for Elizabeth (Percival) Nethall, the mother of Mrs. Joseph R. Alexander, was the daughter of a Scotch nobleman. Mr. Nethall was born and reared in England, and became a very early settler in Illinois. After his death, his wife married Joseph Hite, who came to Oregon in 1853, settling on a farm in Linn county. Previous to her marriage Mrs. Alexander went by the name of her step-father, and was known as Miss Hite. Mr. and Mrs. Alexander crossed the plains in an ox-train in 1853, and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres where Shedds Station has since been built. This land the husband improved and lived on for several years, but finally sold out and lived in Linn county, engaging in teaming between The Dalles and Grande Ronde valley until his death in 1863. For a second husband Mrs. Alexander married Charles A. Davis, a carpenter and builder who located in Eugene in 1870, and is now living retired in that city. His wife died in 1883, leaving the three children before mentioned, of whom Sarah, the oldest, deceased, was the wife of Mr. Smith, and Nellie, the youngest, is the wife of T. B. Lucky of Eugene.

Until his thirteenth year W. H. Alexander lived on the farm and attended the country schools and in 1879 accompanied his mother to Eugene, where he had the advantage of the schools of that city. From a boy he worked with tools, and found diversion in making easily constructed furniture for the house, and in doing odd jobs around the house for his mother. At the age of twenty he worked at the carpenter's trade under W. T. Campbell, an architect of Eugene, after a year being advanced to the position of foreman, which he held for two years. In 1885 he began contracting and building in Eugene, and has since made this his home, uninterruptedly carrying on a large and remunerative business. He married, in Eugene, Belle Chapman, who was born in the east, and came to Oregon as a child. Mr. Alexander is popular socially as well as prominent in the business world, and is fraternally identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank Knights of Pythias, and the Modern Woodmen of America. In political affiliation he is a Republican, but aside from the formality of casting his vote has never identified himself with party affairs. Mr. Alexander holds high place in the esteem of all who know him, and is regarded as one of the reliable and thoroughly substantial men of Eugene.

HON. JOHN HENRY McCLUNG. The position which the Hon. J. H. McClung now occupies in the city of Eugene is chiefly the result of his own resourceful and optimistic nature. Since his entrance into the affairs of Oregon he has taken an active part in many of the enterprises which have especially marked the growth of this largest city in Lane county, where he now lives in retirement. He is a pioneer of 1856, and through the many years which have passed since then he has directed his best energies to the cultivation of his own native talents, which in their fulfillment have added greatly to the financial importance of the city and county which have been his home so long.

Mr. McClung was born in Seneca county, Ohio, September 10, 1837, the son of James L. McClung, who was a native of Seneca county, N. Y. His grandfather, John McClung, was also a native of New York state, and there he died. James L. McClung became a contractor and builder and moved to Laporte county, Ind., where he engaged in the prosecution of his trade until his death, September 11, 1850, at the age of forty-three years. His widow, formerly Cynthia L. Parsons, who was born near Oswego, N. Y., afterward married Bell Jennings, of Pennsylvania, and in the fall of 1856 they came by way of the Isthmus of Panama to Oregon, settling in Eugene, where Mr. Jennings engaged in the drug business. Some time before his death, which occurred in Eugene, he retired from active life. Mr. McClung's mother died at the age of seventy-five years. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her father, R. H. Parsons, a native of New York state, and an early settler of Ohio and Indiana, where he engaged in farming, crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1853 and settled three miles west of Eugene, and three years later located in that city, where he became a merchant and justice of the peace, which positions he held until his death.

The only child of his father's family, John H. McClung spent the first eight years of his life in the state of his birth, and afterward located with his parents in Indiana, where he attended the district schools. In the summer of 1855 he went to Kansas with a government corps, in the process of surveying, carrying the chains for over six months, and the year following, when he was nineteen years old, he came to Oregon. He sailed from New York city on the steamer George Law to Aspinwall, and from that city started across the Isthmus of Panama by rail, in the course of the journey the train meeting with a terrible wreck, in which many lives were lost. Mr. McClung came through safely, however, the car in which he was a passenger coming intact through the wreck. From the western side he took passage on the Golden Age, and came via San Francisco and the Columbia river to Portland and thence to Corvallis and Junction City. From there he walked to the home of his grandfather Parsons. He bought one hundred and sixty acres of land located six miles west of Eugene, and at once entered upon the improvement and cultivation of his farm. Upon the arrival of his stepfather, Mr. Jennings, a little later, the two assumed charge of four hundred and eighty acres, and farmed for some time. Until the summer of 1858 Mr. McClung remained so occupied, when he disposed of his agricultural interests and located in Eugene. In the winter following Mr. McClung attended school in Eugene, finishing his education and in February, 1859, he and an uncle, Thomas Belshaw, bought the only drug store then in the city, that conducted by Danforth & Breyman, and engaged in business on Willamette street, near the location of the First National Bank. This partnership continued until the spring of 1862, when they sold their combined interests to Mr. Jennings. Messrs. McClung and Belshaw then went to the Salmon river mines in Idaho, traveling by pack horses to their destination; but the summer spent there was utterly without returns, and the following fall found them again in Eugene. Mr. McClung then purchased a half interest in the drug business, the firm name being Jennings & McClung, and this was continued until 1866, when Mr. Jennings was compelled, through failure of health, to locate once more upon a farm. The business was then sold, and Mr. McClung also bought a farm adjoining that of his step-father, near Creswell, and conducted this farm until the fall of 1868, when he again returned to Eugene and became a copying clerk in the office of the surveyor general, remaining so occupied until the following spring. In partnership with John W. Meldrum he then obtained a contract to survey and sectionize the land about Trout creek, and later in the fall took other contracts near Prineville. In the fall of that year he returned to Eugene. In the spring of 1870 he took a contract to survey on Squaw creek, and in 1871 he secured the same work with W. B. Pengra for Silver Lake, Lake county, this practically ending his work along these lines, with the exception of a little the next year along the Siuslaw and the McKenzie rivers.

In the fall of 1873 Mr. McClung built the residence which he now occupies, completing it in 1874. He has nearly every variety of tree and shrub which grows in Oregon, and in all particulars his home is an evidence of the culture which distinguishes its owner, adding in no small degree to the general appearance of the city. In his political relations a staunch Republican, he was elected by that party, in 1874, to the house of representatives in the state legislature, and two years later was nominated for state senator, but was defeated by Governor Whiteaker, by sixty-eight votes. In June, 1876, the Grange association became very strong in this section and Mr. McClung was elected as superintendent. In this capacity he bought the stock and started a general merchandise store in Eugene, in which he continued for seven years, and at the expressed desire of the company to dispose of its business he and A. J. Johnson bought the stock and continued the business, the firm name being McClung & Johnson. This mercantile venture was successfully continued for eight years, and at the close of that period Mr. McClung became the sole owner of the business, changing its character to that of a dry goods and clothing establishment. In 1902 he closed out the stock and retired from the active cares which had so long engrossed his attention.

In 1901 Mr. McClung built on the corner of Willamette and Seventh streets a brick building, the dimensions of which were 70x80 feet, containing three stores, and with three entrances. This is known as the McClung Building. In the year following it was supplemented by another of like character upon the corner of Willamette and Eighth streets, 55x114 feet in dimensions, containing two stores with two entrances on Willamette street, and a store in the rear. Mr. McClung has always been actively interested in municipal government and general business affairs, serving for a period of ten years as a member of the council and mayor for two years. As school director for many years he has exerted no little influence in educational matters of the city, serving in that capacity when the Patterson and Geary schools were built, and as a member of the board at the present time is interested in the building of the new high school, which is being erected (1903) at a cost of $25,000. He is a stockholder in the Eugene Water Company, and serves in that corporation as a director and treasurer. In 1894 he was once more called upon to serve in the legislature, being elected senator from Lane county by a large plurality, and served in the sessions of 1895 and 1897. He was not a candidate for re-election.

Miss Kate Henderson, a native of Pennsylvania, who crossed the plains with her parents, James H. D. and Mary E. (Fisher) Henderson, in 1852, and settled in Yamhill county, became the wife of Mr. McClung in 1863, and has borne him the following children: Jessie Benton, a graduate of the University of Oregon, and now the wife of Prof. Charles Friedel; Margaret L., wife of Dr. J. R. Wetherbee, of Portland; and Ina D., a graduate of the University of Oregon, who makes her home with her parents. Fraternally Mr. McClung was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Eugene, and is past noble grand. He also belongs to the Encampment and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is a member of the Eugene Commercial Club and the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he officiates as chairman of the board of trustees.

In the work which Mr. McClung has accomplished, no characteristic is more evident than faithfulness, returning always to that which promises him returns. This is particularly noticeable in his political life, his first vote, as a young man, being cast for Lincoln, and each successive vote following for what he deemed the advancement of the best principles of government.

SYRUS V. BARR. Among the able and progressive farmers of Linn county, the records of whose lives fill an important place in this volume, Syrus V. Barr, living near Sweet Home, occupies a position of prominence. He is a native-born citizen, and the worthy descendant of a representative pioneer of this part of the county. Since the days of his boyhood he has witnessed many changes in this locality, and has contributed his full share toward the development and growing prosperity of his native town and county, being a generous supporter of all beneficial measures. He was born March 13, 1855, on a farm which adjoins his own, it being the homestead of his father, the late Jesse Barr.

A native of Tennessee, Jesse Barr was born October 18, 1818, near Nashville. When a young man he emigrated to Iowa, and in the spring of 1853, still following the tide of emigration westward bound, he crossed the plains, coming to Oregon with his family in a wagon driven by four yoke of oxen, and driving a few cows. Spending the winter at Brownsville, he secured work in the spring of 1854 near Crawfordsville, and while there in the employ of Mr. Finley assisted in building the first saw-mill and grist-mill erected in that locality. In the spring of 1855 he purchased Mr. Darby's right to his donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of land, lying three miles north of Holley, and three miles west of Sweet Home. The only improvement on the place was a small log house built by Mr. Darby. Moving into the cabin with his family, he set to work with true pioneer grit to clear a farm. Toiling industriously and persistently, he made substantial improvements, and gradually enlarged his operations until he became one of the most successful farmers and stock-raisers of the neighborhood, continuing in his chosen occupation until his death, January 3, 1893. He was a member of the Christian Church, and of Sweet Home Grange, which he helped to organize. Politically he affiliated with the Democratic party. While living in Iowa he married Annie Kirk, who was born near Knoxville, Tenn., in 1825. She survives him, and is now living on the old homestead. Of the eleven children born of their union, five sons and six daughters, nine are now living, and all are married.

Remaining on the home farm until attaining his majority, Syrus V. Barr received such educational advantages as were afforded by the district schools, and was well trained to habits of industry and thrift by his parents. Beginning life for himself at the age of twenty-one years, he bought four hundred and thirty-six acres of land adjoining the parental farm, and has since carried on general farming with satisfactory pecuniary results. He makes a specialty of stock-raising, and has a fine lot of Shorthorn cattle, which he prefers to any other breed. The success with which he has met in his career has been wrought by persistent energy, well directed toil, and exceptional business ability on his part, and his estate, with its many improvements, is one of the best and most desirable pieces of property in the community.

In October, 1891, Mr. Barr married Miss Lulu Hamilton, daughter of Asher Hamilton, and into their household two children have been born, namely: Victor and Gertrude. Politically Mr. Barr is identified with the Democratic party, and fraternally he is a member of the Macca-bees, and of Holly Grange. Both Mr. and Mrs. Barr belong to the Christian Church.

WILLIAM J. J. SCOTT. Important among the men who have made their efforts productive of the substantial upbuilding of Oregon and the promotion of worthy and enterprising movements was William J. J. Scott, for many years well known in Lane county and various other sections, through the virtues which were his by inheritance as well as personal effort, for he came of an old colonial family who took part in the early struggles of the nation. With the death of Mr. Scott, in 1896, passed away a member of the brave and hardy band of pioneers which is slowly becoming only a recollection as time goes on and another generation takes up the work so nobly begun.

The parents of Mr. Scott were residents of Morgan county, Ill., where the father, Levi Scott, engaged in farming, and where this son was born October 15, 1824. He was left motherless at an early age, but with the self-reliance characteristic of the day he set out into the world to find a place for himself. He learned the trade of a carpenter, which he followed for some time in Illinois. Later he located in Iowa, remaining there until 1846, when he crossed the plains with ox-teams and settled in the valley which was afterward known by his name, near the Umpqua river, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. He remained in that location until 1850, when he went to Oregon City to work. There he was married and returned to his claim, where the couple went to housekeeping. This home was a log cabin of one room, having a large fireplace upon which the cooking was done. They kept travelers, and Mrs. Dersham, a daughter, has the scales upon which the gold dust was weighed, in which they received pay for their accommodation. After a period of six years Mr. Scott came to Lane county and bought a farm two miles west of Creswell, and ten years later located in Eugene, where he engaged in the mercantile business in partnership with Frank Dunn, the firm name being Scott & Dunn. After a few years he again returned to his ranch, remaining for two years, when he bought another farm in the vicinity and lived upon that a short time. Locating in Creswell for a brief period he bought the farm which is now occupied by his widow, located one-half mile west of Creswell, which he began at once to improve and cultivate. The farm is supplied with a good dwelling-house, substantial barns and other out-buildings, and the land was utilized for stock-raising, his specialty being Shorthorn-Durham cattle. After giving a farm to each of his sons, he still had left about two thousand acres, and over three hundred is still in the possession of Mrs. Scott and managed by her, with the assistance of her son, Ripley. The balance was divided by Mrs. Scott among her ten children.

Though not a member of any religious denomination, Mr. Scott was a man of strong integrity and truly Christian purposes, and held a high place in the estimation of his fellow-citizens. Politically he was a Republican, and though he never shirked responsibility as a citizen, he did not aspire to official recognition, but held the minor offices in the vicinity as a duty rather than from any desire to become identified with party movements. In educational matters he was greatly interested, and gave much time and thought to the improvement of the institutions in his community, being one of the first regents appointed for the University of Oregon, which position he filled from 1873 to 1877. But once did Mr. Scott depart from his agricultural life, and that was in 1849, when he was induced by glowing reports to make the trip to California to visit the gold fields. The death of Mr. Scott occurred September 13, 1896, in his seventy-second year.

The wife who shared a large part of the life of Mr. Scott was formerly Surrenea J. Robinson, who was born December 5, 1828, in Shelby county, Ohio, the daughter of the Rev. William Robinson, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. Of this union ten children were born, all of whom are living. Their descendants include twenty-six grandchildren and nineteen great-grandchildren. Of the children Eliza S., the wife of D. B. Trimble, lives in Condon, Ore.; Mary A., the wife of William C. Brown, lives at Lone Rock; Matilda J., the wife of R. H. Landers, lives at Methow, Wash.; William W. lives at Creswell; John R. is located in this vicinity; Rose E. married D. S. Brown and resides in Condon; Dora C., the wife of C. C. Hazleton, is in Creswell; Viola S. and Ripley F. are at home; and Lillie M., the wife of R. E. Dersham, is located near Creswell. As a relic of the eastern days of their family, they have now in their possession the original copy of the Ulster Gazette, published January 4, 1800, in which is given a full account of Washington's death, and his Memoirs.

HON. EDWIN O. POTTER, of Eugene, is one of the thoroughly representative men of the younger generation of the Willamette valley. He was born near Irving, Lane county, Ore., August 25, 1860, and is a son of William A. and Luezy (Zumwalt) Potter. The family was founded in America by a German immigrant, named Pothour, who settled in New Jersey. David Potter, grandfather of Edwin O., of this review, was born in Pennsylvania, and in young manhood settled in Ohio, where he engaged in farming. His son, William A., was reared in Ohio. While still a young man he removed to Wisconsin, from which state, in 1851, he crossed the plains by ox-train and settled in Lane county, Ore. After several years' residence in various parts of Oregon he finally located permanently at Irving, where he now lives in retirement at the age of seventy-eight years. He is a member of the United Brethren Church, and fraternally is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His wife, Luezy Zumwalt, was born in Jefferson county, Mo., the daughter of Solomon Zumwalt. The latter started for Oregon with his family in the fall of 1850, traveling with ox-teams. Upon arriving at Salt Lake City they decided to remain there through the winter. The following June they resumed the journey and came directly to Lane county, where Mr. Zumwalt took up a donation claim two miles northwest of Eugene. There he resided until his retirement from the active cares of life. His death occurred in the Mohawk valley. (For a more detailed account of this family, see sketch of William A. Potter, which appears elsewhere in this volume.)

The childhood and youth of Judge E. O. Potter were spent upon his father's farm, where he was reared to agriculture. He attended the district school in his neighborhood, and afterward entered the University of Oregon, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1887. This institution subsequently conferred upon him the Master's degree. During the last three years of his university course he taught school a part of the time, the money thus earned being applied toward the payment of his tuition fees. Upon the completion of his classical course he entered the law department of the university, and was graduated therefrom two years later—in 1890—with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. In June of the same year he was admitted to the bar of Oregon, and immediately entered upon the practice of his profession in Eugene. From 1890 to 1894 he served as deputy district attorney for Lane county. In 1896 he was elected county judge and served four years, since which time he has devoted his entire time to the practice of his profession.

Judge Potter was married in Eugene, October 16, 1890, to Emily Bristol, a native of Benton county, Ore., and a daughter of George A. and Polly (Minton) Bristol, both now deceased, the former dying in Benton county and the latter in Lane county. Mrs. Potter was a member of the same class in the University of Oregon as was her husband, and was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. They have a daughter, named Pauline.

In his fraternal relations Judge Potter is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., in which he is past master; of Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M., in which he is high priest; of the Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In the Congregational church, of which he is a member, he is serving as chairman of the board of trustees. He is a charter member of the Eugene Commercial club, and was a member of its first board of trustees. He was formerly president of the Association of the University of Oregon. As a Republican he has taken an active part in the political affairs of Lane county for several years, and at the present time is chairman of the Republican county central committee.

Though a comparatively young man, Judge Potter has come to be recognized as a man of strong influence in local affairs. He is one of the best types of the self-made men of the hour, is possessed of a strong public spirit, and is actively identified with all worthy movements which have for their end the advancement of the public welfare. Though he has applied himself closely to the duties of his chosen profession, he has shown himself to possess varied talents. He is broad-minded and liberal in his views, a man of unquestioned integrity, and his record thus far leads his friends to the conclusion that future political preferment will be dependent solely upon his own inclinations.

J. H. SIMMONS. The family of which J. H. Simmons is a representative is one of the earliest to be founded in Oregon, the family having come to this state for the purpose of making a permanent settlement in 1845. For nearly sixty years Mr. Simmons has been identified with the Willamette valley, and during that long period has been a witness of the various and romantic steps in the development of the country from a wilderness to one of the most attractive places of residence in the entire American commonwealth.

Mr. Simmons was born in Wayne county, Ind., August 12, 1842, and is a son of Samuel and Mahala (Bunch) Simmons. His father was born in Randolph county, Ind., in the year 1807, and was reared to an agricultural life. During the early years of his married life he moved to Michigan with his family, where they remained until 1836. The following nine years were spent in the states of Illinois, Iowa, Missouri and Kansas. In the latter state their home was at Leavenworth. In the spring of 1845 they joined a wagon train bound for Oregon. After a journey consuming about six months they arrived at their destination, reaching the site of the city of Portland on Christmas day. They had experienced no serious troubles with the Indians en route, but were nearly starved at one time before they could reach a point where they could replenish their depleted supplies. Mr. Simmons took his family to Washington county, remaining for a time at Forest Grove, but soon removed to what is now known as South Prairie, near Mathieu's Ferry. In the spring of 1846 the elder Simmons traded a yoke of oxen for the title to six hundred and forty acres of rich land on Howell's Prairie, in Marion county, two hundred acres of which constituted a portion of the historic Laroque farm. At that time there were but four other families living in that vicinity. Mr. Simmons and his wife continued to reside on their farm until a few years before their death, when they removed to Portland, from which city they eventually returned to their original home. There Mr. Simmons passed away at the age of eighty-two years. His wife's death occurred soon after, at the age of eighty-one years. Mr. Simmons always took a deep interest in politics as a stanch Republican; and he was also identified with all worthy educational and religious movements.

Of the children born to this estimable pioneer couple, the four eldest are deceased, namely: William, Asa, Daniel and Mahala. Those surviving are: Elizabeth, wife of Eugene Shannon; J. H., of this review; and Sylvester C., of Portland.

J. H. Simmons spent the years of his childhood on his father's farm, attending the district school in the winter season and assisting in the work on the farm during the summer. At the age of nineteen years he embarked upon an independent career, having a confidence in his own ability, which the success of past years has fully justified. Going to California in 1850, he engaged at once in mining, carrying with him to Oregon the fruits of eight years' hard labor. In 1860 he purchased with this money a farm of two hundred and forty acres, upon which he has since resided. He has eighty acres under cultivation, with one hundred and sixty acres one and a quarter miles north of Mount Angel, on the Mount Angel and Woodburn road. Upon his farm Mr. Simmons has put the most modern improvements, having a neat residence and good buildings of all kinds. He is at present engaged in general farming and stock-raising, his farm being stocked with a high class of animals.

Mr. Simmons' marriage united him with Mary Jane Hall, a native of New York state, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1850. They have been the parents of ten children, named in the order of their birth as follows: Elizabeth, wife of M. Settlemier, of Mount Angel; J. D., residing near Monitor, Marion county; Grover, who lives on Howell's Prairie; William, of Portland; L. D., of Sacramento; Redford and Frederick, both of Portland; Davis, who was killed in Tunnel No. 6; Ida, wife of Joseph Mack, who resides near Marquam; and Ola, wife of A. Johnson, of Howell's Prairie. Mrs. Simmons died in 1884, and Mr. Simmons was afterward married to Mary A. Holmes, a native of Indiana,

Mr. Simmons is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which he has been identified for thirty-five years. His record is that of a substantial, useful and honorable citizen. He does not belong to that class of men who place obstacles in the way of beneficial movements, but on the contrary does all in his power to advance the highest interests of his locality and of the county.

NORMAN L. LEE, M. D. Now a leading physician of Junction City, Lane county, Ore., Norman L. Lee came to Oregon as a boy of ten years, having been born near Mount Vernon, Ill., March 29, 1837, while his parents were en route for a settlement in Iowa. He was the third child of five sons and six daughters born to his parents, Philester Lee, a native of Ontario, N. Y., and Eliza Ann (Burge) Lee, also of that state. The family is one of splendid ancestry, on the paternal side, three brothers of the name having come from the land across the water in the middle of the seventeenth century, one finding a habitation in New England, another in the south and the other in the west. Josephus Lee, the paternal grandfather, was born in Connecticut, where as a cooper he earned his livelihood. As a patriot he served valiantly in the war of 1812. When he was about eighty-eight years of age he crossed the plains after the death of his wife, and became an inmate of his son's home in Salem, Ore., where he died past the ninety-first year of his age. His son, Philester Lee, the father of Dr. Lee, settled in Ohio, from which state he emigrated in 1837 to Iowa, locating near Keosauqua, Van Buren county, and later became a resident of Wapello county, engaging in farming. In 1847 he brought his family across the plains with ox-teams, six months of the year being occupied in the trip, and after settling them in Portland he went to the California mines at the first report of the discovery of gold. When he returned in 1849 it was with a reward for his earnest and persevering effort, and with the proceeds of the year's work he opened up a general merchandise business in Salem, Ore., which after one year he sold and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near the present site of Sodaville, Linn county, and remained in that neighborhood for the balance of his life, with the exception of only a few years. His death occurred at the age of eighty-four years, at the home of Dr. Lee in Junction City. The mother was the daughter of John Burge, a native of New York, and the representative of a Knickerbocker family. He learned the trade of blacksmith, but spent some of his early life as a teacher. In 1850 he crossed the plains from Iowa, to which state he had previously journeyed from his home in New York, and on his arrival in Oregon located on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Sodaville, Linn county, where his death occurred.

Norman L. Lee was educated primarily in the common schools of Oregon, and at the close of his school days he learned the trade of a carpenter and continued steadily in this work until he was thirty years old. In 1867 he began the study of medicine under the tutelage of Dr. George Odell, of Lebanon, Ore., and in 1870 he entered the medical department of Willamette University and was graduated the following year with the degree of M. D. Entering at once upon general practice in Junction City, Dr. Lee has made a notable success of his work since making this his home, and has taken a leading interest in all movements pertaining to the general welfare of the city. He owns a farm of two hundred and fifty acres nine miles west of the city, which is partly improved. He also owns property in Junction City where he makes his home. As a Republican in politics he finds time to aid the advancement of the principles which he endorses, having served as postmaster of Junction City during Harrison's administration, and as a member of the city council and a school director he has faithfully served the public for many years.

Dr. Lee was married in 1867 in Linn county, to Miss Amanda M. Griggs, who was born in Illinois, the daughter of A. B. Griggs, also a native of that state. In 1850 he crossed the plains to Oregon, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Albany, Linn county, where he engaged as a farmer until his death in April, 1903, at the age of seventy-seven years. The following children have blessed the union of the doctor and Mrs. Lee: Ernest U., county clerk of Lane county, located at Eugene; Claude D., a druggist at Eugene; Anna, the wife of Fred Fortmiller, of Portland, Ore.; Bret W., attending high school at Eugene; Clare A., at home; Abigail and Maud, both of whom died in infancy. One worthy act of Dr. Lee which should not be passed over in a resume of his life was his enlistment in 1863 in Company F, First Oregon Infantry, serving in the commissary department for nineteen months, principally east of the mountains. He was mustered out at Ft. Vancouver in 1865.

WILSON T. LEWIS. As a meat dealer Wilson T. Lewis has experienced several years of success in Buena Vista, Polk county, and Junction City, Lane county, where he is now located. He is an excellent business man, and his efforts have resulted in good to the communities in which he has lived, his conscientious and painstaking methods not only winning, but keeping, a large and appreciative patronage. Mr. Lewis comes of good old southern patriotic stock, his parents, John and Mary (Turner) Lewis, and his paternal grandfather, William, having been born in Kentucky. The grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812, and about 1840 removed with his family to Platte county, Mo., where he bought a large farm, and continued to live until his emigration to Oregon in 1853. He outfitted with ox-teams and prairie schooners, and his journey was comparatively free from the distressing incidents which marred the progress of earlier travelers. Locating on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Independence, Polk county, he removed to Benton county, Ore., in 1870, and died on his farm near Monroe in his eighty-seventh year.

John Lewis took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, near Independence, Polk county, and in 1870 removed to a farm of one hundred and sixty acres in Jackson county, at present making his home on a little place near Medford, where he is engaged in the nursery business. Though eighty-seven years old May 16, 1903, he is still hale and hearty, and takes as keen an interest in the products of the soil as he did in the days of his young and vigorous manhood. His father-in-law, Thomas Turner, was born in Kentucky, and at an early day removed to Indiana, where his death occurred in 1835. Mrs. Lewis, who also is living, is the mother of nine children, five of whom are sons, Wilson T. being the oldest. The children were all educated in the public schools, and all were taught the necessity and dignity of self maintenance as soon as their powers were sufficiently developed. Wilson T., as the oldest son, left home in 1864, and engaged in the butcher business at Buena Vista, in 1873 removing his business to Junction City, and continuing there until disposing of his shop in 1902. Inspired by former success he re-engaged in business in July, 1903, the loss of his shop leaving him practically no occupation, a state of affairs not particularly pleasing to so active and capable a business man.

Since coming to Junction City, Mr. Lewis has added to its architectural and homelike appearance by erecting a comfortable and commodious residence, which is presided over by his wife, formerly Cecelia Florence, who was born seven miles northeast of Portland, and who is the mother of one daughter, Leah, now the wife of R. H. Skaggs, a stationary engineer living with the Lewis family. Mr. Lewis is fraternally prominent, and is identified with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., of Eugene. He is a Democrat in political affiliation, and has served as councilman for a couple of terms. Mr. Lewis is thoroughly honorable in all of his dealings, and he takes a keen interest in all enterprises which have for their object the betterment of the community.

GEORGE O. KNOWLES. The genial and successful manager of the Meyer & Keyles general merchandise store is one of the very capable and promising business men of Mapleton, and one of the many sons of Minnesota who owe their start in life to the inspiring surroundings of a prosperous northwestern community. Born in Rice county, Minn., September 27, 1865, he comes of an old New Hampshire family, in which state his parents, Ebenezer C. and Lucinda (Atwood) Knowles, were born, reared and married. The parents removed from New Hampshire to Rice county, Minn., in 1855, locating at Hastings, where the father worked at his trade as carpenter, but afterward turned his attention to general farming near Northfield, Minn. For thirty years his intrepid honesty and practical industry redounded to the credit of the neighborhood and during that time he was elected to the state legislature on the Republican ticket, representing in an interested and helpful manner, those who had placed their confidence in him. In 1885 he sold his farm and came to Mapleton, Ore., arriving October 8, and at once purchasing some land near the town, where he farmed in a small way up to the time of his death, January 12, 1902, at the age of eighty-two years. His wife, who was born in 1822, is still living in Mapleton and she is the mother of eight children, the order of their birth being as follows: John, a resident of Cottonwood county, Minn.; Albert P., of Mapleton; Frank; Cora E., wife of W. H. Weatherson, of Florence, Ore. Four of the children are deceased. The elder Knowles was well known fraternally, and for more than forty years had been connected with the Blue Lodge, A. F. & A. M.

His father's success permitted of more than the average educational opportunities for his son, George O., who passed from the public schools of Rice county, Minn., to Carleton College, which he attended two terms. Six months were spent at the State University at Eugene, and he afterward attended the Pacific Business College at San Francisco, remaining there five months. His first business experience was acquired in a mercantile business at Seaton, where he devoted seven years to this enterprise. For three years he tempted fortune in the mines of the Bohemia district, and was more fortunate than many, and at present not only owns three claims there, but is possessor of a general merchandise store netting a handsome yearly income.

August 4, 1902, Mr. Knowles was united in marriage with Lenora B. Casterline, who was born in Minnesota in 1879, and came to Oregon in 1887, where she was reared and educated. Mr. Knowles is a Democrat in political affiliation. Fraternally he is associated with the Florence Lodge, A. F. & A. M., of which he is present worshipful master; and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

THOMAS A. MILLIORN. An unusually active and adventurous life has been that of Thomas A. Milliorn, now one of the oldest citizens of Junction City, which is built upon a part of the land which formed his donation claim, taken up in 1853, and where for many years his activities have been given for the advancement of the welfare of the city and community. An evidence of the prosperity which has followed the efforts of Mr. Milliorn since coming to Oregon lies in the property which he has accumulated, he having built the finest residence in the city, is a stockholder and director and one of the incorporators of the Farmers & Merchants Bank, owns twenty acres adjoining the town and one hundred and six included in a farm located upon the banks of the Willamette river.

Mr. Milliorn was born in Campbell county, Va., August 18, 1828, the son of John, also a native of that state and the grandson of Henry. Henry Milliorn was born in Pennsylvania and later in life he wended his way toward the southern states, settling first in Virginia, and in 1833 locating in Philadelphia, Tenn., where he died when about ninety-six years old. John Milliorn located with his father in East Tennessee, and later located in Philadelphia, thirty miles below Knoxville, Tenn. He was a wheelwright by trade and followed this work until 1843, when he removed to Jackson county, Mo., and located fourteen miles southwest of Independence in the neighborhood of Hart Grove. That remained his home for nine years, when he outfitted with ox-teams and crossed the plains to Oregon, on his arrival locating on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres one mile west of Junction City, Lane county. The last days of his life were spent in the city which he saw spring into existence in the wilderness, where he lived retired until his death in March, 1891, lacking but two months of being eighty-six years old. He was a public-spirited man and never shirked his duty, serving the public in various ways, among them being county commissioner of Lane county. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He married Mary W. Lee, who was born near Lynchburg, Va., in 1811, and who died in Lane county, Ore., in 1886. She was the daughter of Shelley Lee, also a native of Virginia, a member of one of the branches of the honored Lee family famous in the history of the Southern Confederacy. On attaining manhood Shelley Lee removed to eastern Tennessee, later to Indiana, again to Tennessee, then to Missouri, and back again to the southern state, where his death occurred at the advanced age of ninety-nine years, having all his life been engaged in farming.

Of the four sons and six daughters born to John and Mary W. Milliorn the second child and the oldest son was Thomas A. Milliorn, and in the common schools of Missouri and an academy he received his education. At eighteen years of age he engaged at the trade of a wheelwright in Kansas City, and built the wagon in which he traveled to the mines of California in 1849, oxen being the mode of conveyance. The journey was accomplished safely, though not without the harrowing experiences which invariably accompanied the pioneers in their travels. On arriving in California Mr. Milliorn engaged first in mining and later conducted a pack train from Colusa to Trinity. This he continued for two years, and in 1852 he came to Oregon, and located the claim of his father and built the cabin for him. Following this he became the owner of the claim which constituted the land upon which Junction City was afterward laid out. He later sold ninety acres to Ben Holladay, and much of the remainder was laid out into town lots, though for some time he engaged in general farming and stock-raising. After laying out the first addition of the city he followed this with another, with C. W. Washburne to help him, now known as the Milliorn & Washburne Addition. Always public-spirited, as was his father, Mr. Milliorn has done everything possible to advance the interests of the city, giving both time and means to its upbuilding. He donated land for the mills and a half of the school block is the gift of his generosity. As a Democrat he has served his party in various offices, among them being school director for one term and notary public for six years.

During the Rogue River war Mr. Milliorn was with the quartermaster department, hauling supplies to the soldiers in the south. This was continued for four or five months, and in all this time he never met with any trouble from the Indians, it having been his happy faculty to mingle with them without having to fight them. In 1862 he went, in company with his brother-in-law, E. W. Rhea, to British Columbia with cattle, continuing from May until November, and the following year, with his brother James, took forty pack animals over the same road with provisions, a distance of fourteen hundred miles. In 1864-65 he went with another brother-in-law with a pack train to Boise Basin, Idaho, and in 1884 went with eighteen men to the Coeur d'Alene mines in a skiff. Not satisfied with his share in the dangerous expeditions in the western states he was eager to try his fortunes in the Klondike, and was only dissuaded on account of his advancing age, which might impair his activity in that cold, northern land, though he is still a very active and energetic man, even at the age of seventy-five years.

The marriage of Mr. Milliorn occurred four miles east of Eugene, Lane county, in 1863, and united him with Eliza K. Awbrey, who was born near Grand-river, Daviess county, Mo., and died in January, 1877. She was the daughter of Thomas Awbrey, who, from his native place in Virginia removed to Indiana and later to Missouri, from which latter state he crossed the plains to Oregon in 1850. On his arrival he located near Eugene, Lane county, taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres. His death occurred in Junction City. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Milliorn, Nina Ann is the wife of D. C. Gore, of Springfield; one died in infancy and the remaining are Cora Lee; Frank B., and James R., deceased. Mr. Milliorn married a second time in 1878, Mary L. Hill, of Iowa, becoming his wife. She was the daughter of William Hill, who came from Iowa to California and to Oregon in 1864. He later returned to California, where his death occurred in 1885. The two children of the second marriage are Effie Gertrude and Merle H., both of whom are at home. In addition to the property before mentioned, Mr. Milliorn owns town lots, and also a timber claim of one hundred and sixty acres, located in township 15, southwest quarter, section 20, and range 6 west, and containing nine million feet of lumber. In his fraternal relations he is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., and the Royal Arch Chapter at Corvallis, Ore.

JOHN WESLEY STARR. Until January 1, 1903, one of the foremost business men of Junction City, Lane county, where he had been engaged in a general hardware establishment since 1873, John Wesley Starr now makes his home in that city, retired from the active duties of life. He has built a comfortable residence there and also owns the brick building in which his business was located, and now feels financially able to take the rest earned by his useful life of eighty-two years.

The Starr family came originally from Maryland, where the grandfather, James Starr, was born. He died in 1822 in Belmont county, Ohio, whither he had removed about the year 1800. The father, also John Wesley Starr, was born in Allegany county, Md., April 22, 1794, and with his parents he became a resident of Ohio, crossing the Alleghany mountains in wagons. In 1835 he emigrated to Iowa, which movement was followed up with the journey across the plains, which was made in 1848 with ox-teams. He first located in Benton county, Ore., taking up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres west of Monroe, and there his death occurred January 17, 1869, when nearly seventy-five years old. He was a faithful and earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and in his own locality taught the word of God. His wife was formerly Hanna McWilliams, who was born in County Down, Ireland, July 9, 1790, and at the age of four years accompanied her parents to the United States. Her father, George McWilliams, was born in the north of Ireland, and in 1794 located in Washington county, Ohio, where his death occurred. His occupation was that of a tailor.

Of the five children, four sons and one daughter, born to his parents, John Wesley Starr was the second son, and was born in Guernsey county, Ohio, August 16, 1822. He received his education in the common schools of his native state, and at the age of fifteen years was apprenticed to learn the tinner's trade in Bellefontaine, Logan county. In 1842 he went to the present location of Keosauqua, Iowa, where his father was then living, and two years later he began traveling up and down the Mississippi river in the prosecution of his trade. A permanent location was finally selected in 1846, he then becoming a resident of Pleasant View, Schuyler county, Ill., and later removing to Rushville in the same county, where he remained until 1857. In this last named year he followed his father's family to Oregon, traveling by way of the Isthmus. Upon his arrival in this state he located in Monroe, Benton county, and at once engaged at his trade. He went to Idaho in 1864, and at Boise Basin engaged in mining and also followed his trade until 1865, when he once more settled in Oregon, locating near Monroe on a farm which he operated for four years. At the end of that period he opened a hardware business in Monroe in connection with his trade, and this was continued in 1873 in Junction City, the general hardware store following soon after his settlement in this location.

Mr. Starr was married in Illinois to Mary Grigg, a native of Ohio, she having been born there March 28, 1829. She was the daughter of Thomas Grigg, who was born in New York and came to Ohio, where he married. He was a farmer by occupation. In 1839 he removed to Schuyler county, Ill., where his death occurred. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Starr, Orrin Henry was born in Beardstown, Ill., June 26, 1847, and now resides in Yoncalla, Ore.; Philo Thomas was born in Schuyler county, Ill., October 22, 1849, and is now practicing osteopathy in Albany, Ore.; Phillip was born in Schuyler county, May 9, 1852, and is now deceased; Joseph Fletcher was born in Schuyler county, Ill., August 19, 1854, and is now practicing osteopathy at Passaic, N. J.; Hannah Minerva was born May 2, 1859, in Benton county, Ore., and now lives with her parents; Charles Wesley was born in Benton county, Ore., May 12, 1866, and now resides in Eugene, Ore.; Samuel Oscar was born in Benton county, Ore., December 19, 1870; and one child died in infancy. Mr. Starr is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Rebekahs, and as a Republican in politics has taken a more or less active part in the affairs of whatever community he has made his home. In Illinois he served for two years as constable and also as postmaster, and in Monroe he held the latter office for a like term of service. For one term he was city recorder of Junction City.

JOHN W. BAKER. A well known contractor and builder of Lane county, John W. Baker is one of the leading men in his line of industry in Cottage Grove, and during the past decade has been prominently identified with its building interests, erecting many of its more important residences. He was born January 10, 1846, near Madisonville, Hopkins county, Ky., a son of C. B. Baker. He comes of excellent Virginian stock, his paternal grandfather having been born and reared in old Virginia, afterwards becoming a pioneer of Hopkins county, Ky., where he followed farming until his death.

Born in Kentucky, C. B. Baker spent the earlier years of his life in the Blue Grass region, being engaged in agricultural pursuits. In 1853, joining the train of which Capt. James Biles was the leader, he came to the northwest by way of the Natchez pass, his train being the first to cross the Cascade mountains into the Puget Sound country and the only train to come through the Natchez Pass. Locating in Thurston county, Wash., he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres lying about sixteen miles south of Olympia, and was there successfully engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death, in June, 1866, at the age of fifty-seven years. He was a man of strong force of character and individuality, and was quite influential in public affairs, serving as a member of the first two territorial legislatures of Washington, being elected on the Democratic ticket. He married Louisa Berry, who was born, lived and died, in Kentucky, her death occurring in early womanhood. She was a daughter of Henry Berry, a life-long resident of Kentucky, but further history of her family was lost while crossing the plains. She bore her husband three sons and two daughters. The daughters died in Kentucky, but all of the sons became residents of Oregon, one of them subsequently dying in Yamhill county, and one, L. H., is principal of the Lincoln school, at Salem, Ore., the other being John W., the special subject of this brief sketch.

Crossing the plains with his father in 1853, John W. Baker was educated in the district schools of Washington territory, and at the age of nineteen years began life for himself as a carpenter, going to The Dalles in 1865, and remaining there a year. Locating at Lafayette, Yamhill county, Ore., in 1866, he worked as a carpenter and joiner in that vicinity until 1894. Removing then to Lane county, Mr. Baker has since been busily employed at his trade in Cottage Grove, by his persistent energy, strict attention to business, and honorable dealings with his fellow-men becoming very successful in securing a large patronage. Enterprising, with excellent business tact and keen judgment, he has won his way through life by his own efforts, and in addition to other interests holds stock in the Bohemia mining district.

In 1868, in Yamhill county, Mr. Baker married Lucretia A. Martin, who was born in Yamhill county, August 9, 1850. Her father, Franklin Martin, a native of Missouri, was born April 15, 1827. Crossing the plains with ox-teams in 1846, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres near Lafayette, Yamhill county, Ore., and there pursued the peaceful vocation of a farmer until his death, in 1882. He was a member of the Christian Church, an earnest worker in the temperance cause, and was especially interested in the establishment of the pioneer schools of this state. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Baker nine children have been born, namely: Cora, wife of W. S. McFarland, a traveling salesman residing in Cottage Grove; Edward D., a traveling salesman, residing in Portland, Ore.; Walter L., a ranchman, living near Cottage Grove; Franklin, deceased; Clair B., a freight conductor on the Southern Pacific railway; Ralph N., a salesman in Knight's shoe store, in Portland; Ella Ruby, Allen B. and Chester H. While living in Yamhill county, Mr. Baker served as deputy sheriff in 1874 and 1875, and was journal clerk in the state senate in 1876 and 1878. In 1895, three years after locating in Cottage Grove, he was appointed justice of the peace, and in April, 1903, was appointed state game warden by Gov. George Chamberlain. Politically he is a staunch Democrat, and fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Mrs. Baker is a member of the Christian Church.

FINGAL HINDS. As is invariably the case with adaptive and versatile people, Fingal Hinds has not confined his activities to any one groove, but has rather reached out and disposed of various opportunities which have come to him. Another natural conclusion is that the speculative in business endeavor has appealed to him with more or less force, as evidenced by a resume of his life, and by his present occupation, that of dealer in mining properties and real estate at Cottage Grove. Mr. Hinds comes from financial and commercial as well as agricultural stock, and his first impressions of life and work were gained on a large sized farm in Barren county, Ky., where his birth occurred March 20, 1849.

Hiram Hinds, the father of Fingal, was born in Virginia, his family being one of the well known and highly honored ones of the Dominion state. Not lacking in interest and historical moment is the maternal family of Kidd, among the remote ancestors of which there looms the piratical figure of Captain Kidd, who lived between 1650 and 1701, and whose gory and picturesque maneuvers upon the high seas, transferred to the pages of fiction, have caused many a youth, consumed with the fires of ambition, to bitterly regret the passing of the good old days of piracy and loot and hair-raising escapades. A later and more orthodox addition to the family history was Capt. G. W. Kidd, who sought for treasure in the mines of California rather than in the holds of ships, as did his illustrious predecessor, and who, because of his change of business tactics amassed a large fortune, was well known in all of the mining localities of the western state, bore a respected name, and was not assisted to his final reward by the artificial tactics of a disapproving populace. Elvira (Kidd) Hinds was born in Tennessee, where she married Mr. Hinds and later removed to Barren county, Ky. The family fortunes were transferred to California in 1860, the journey being made across the plains in the already well established way, and a halt made in Nevada county, where the mines offered fair inducements to oncoming fortune-seekers. A banker by early training, Mr. Hinds soon made his financial influence felt in a locality as yet unorganized and in need of conservative worth, and in time assumed charge of the assay department of the Bank of Nevada county, later becoming identified in an important capacity with the Bank of Stockton. He removed to Fort Townsend, Wash., in 1887, and there died at the age of fourscore years, the possessor to the last of a fine character, generous impulses, and many friends whose kindly attentions and appreciation had illuminated his worthy and gracious life.

The seventh child of the six sons and six daughters born to his parents, Fingal Hinds received the substantial education accorded all of the children of a prosperous family, his public school training being supplemented by a three-years course at the Jesuit College at Santa Clara, Cal. His father's success placed a waiting opportunity in his way, and he entered the Bank of Stockton, first in a minor capacity, but gradually worked his way up to the position of bookkeeper, and after six years to that of assistant cashier, which latter responsibility he maintained for three years. From 1877 until 1879 he was connected as manager and one-third owner with the Golden Gate Packet Company, of San Jose, Cal., afterward associating himself with a sawmilling business at Truckee, Cal. Three years later, in 1882, he ran a hotel in Fresno for a year, and in August, 1883, removed to Tacoma, Wash., where he found employment as timekeeper and outside manager with the Tacoma Mill Company. During 1885 he arrived in the Okanogan mining district in eastern Washington; and in the meantime was joined by his brother, with whom he eventually started a wharf business at Fort Townsend, Mr. Hinds remaining in the mines and the brother superintending the wharf enterprise.

Notwithstanding the fact that he sank about all that he had in the world in the silver mines of Washington, and that he arrived in Cottage Grove in 1883 with extremely meagre assets, Mr. Hinds still continued to place his faith in mining, operating chiefly in the Bohemian district. He has since dealt extensively in real estate and mining properties, has access to claims which are bound to realize large returns, and by his intelligent and earnest appreciation of the many residence and business advantages of this county, is not only maintaining but increasing its deserving prestige. Recently he has organized the Glenwood Mining & Milling Company, incorporated for $1,000,000, and of which he is superintendent of mines. Mr. Hinds' personal possessions include valuable claims in the Bohemian district, valuable town and country property, and part interests in various enterprises here represented. Fraternally, he is a Mason. Through his marriage with Gussie Manning, a native of Toledo, Ohio, one daughter was born to Mr. Hinds, the same being now the wife of C. A. Mason, of Seattle, Wash. The present Mrs. Hinds was formerly Effie Knowlton, born in Cottage Grove, and whose father, P. D. Knowlton, an old-time miner, is now living retired. Mr. Hinds is energetic and forceful, quick to see a business advantage, but invariably scrupulous in all of his dealings. As a promoter of the mining and agricultural resources of this county he takes high rank, and a continuation of his present success is the wish of all who are personally aware of his many excellent traits of character.

GEORGE BRATTAIN. A model general farming, stock-raising and dairying enterprise is being conducted by George Brattain on the old home place located by his father, Jonathan H. Brattain, in 1849. The elder Brattain was born in the eastern part of the country in 1813, and at an early age settled with some of his brothers in Iowa. Here he married Ellen Trimble, a native daughter of Iowa, and with her settled on an average-sized middle-west farm near Fairfield, where his son, George, was born April 19, 1843. When George was three years old, in 1846, the family emigration to Oregon took place, the journey being made with ox-teams, and accomplished without any particular incident. The first winter was spent at Whitman's Station, and in the summer of 1847 Mr. Brattain arrived at Oregon City, where he worked in a saw-mill. A year later he came to Linn county, and just across the line in Benton county took up a claim, although he made his home in Linn county. In the spring of 1849 he, in company with two other men and two women, went in a little canoe down to Astoria, and from there embarked in a sailing vessel for California. During the time spent in the mines he was fairly successful, and returned to the home place richer by several hundred dollars. This money was put into a claim the following spring, which claim is the one now occupied by his son George, and located one and a half miles northeast of Peoria, and twelve miles south of Albany. Mr. Brattain was only forty-six years old at the time of his death. He became very prominent in Linn county, was a member of the constitutional convention, and also represented the county in the state legislature. In the early days he served in both the Black Hawk and Yakima wars. His wife, who died at the age of thirty-three, bore him four children, of whom Benjamin resides at Alsea, and Mary and Edward are deceased.

Until his fourteenth year George Brattain lived on the farm which is still his home, and then ventured forth to make an independent livelihood, securing the position of cook for a mule train at Fort Benton. He also engaged in mining and prospecting, and for fifteen years made his headquarters in that comparatively wild and unsettled region. Returning to the home farm he assumed the management thereof, and in 1879 married Margaret Bear, a native of Kansas, who proved herself a sympathetic and in many ways remarkable woman. Two children, Grant and Clarence, are living with their parents. Mr. Brattain is a Republican and has filled many positions of trust and responsibility in his locality, and he was at one time treasurer of Baker county, Ore. He is prominent and popular in his neighborhood, and has the happy faculty of making and retaining friends. An excellent farmer and practical business man, he is making success of his life, and is a credit to the thrifty community.

WINFIELD SCOTT CHRISMAN. As the only place of the kind in Cottage Grove, the Fashion Stables do not have to contend with competition, but it is safe to say that so admirably sustained an establishment would naturally receive a liberal patronage, no matter what its competition. W. S. Chrisman and Eli Bangs, proprietors of the stables, have a thorough understanding of their business, and are in touch with the requirements of an exclusive and exacting, as well as more cosmopolitan trade. They have all kinds of turnouts, many fine horses, and are also the proprietors of the Cottage Grove and Bohemia stage line, carrying the fast freight, United States mail and passengers.

Winfield Scott Chrisman, the senior member of the firm, and one of the prominent men of this county, was born in Andrew county, Mo., April 19, 1847, the fourth child of the six sons and two daughters born to his parents. He was four years of age when he came with the rest of the family to Oregon in 1851, and his education was received in the early subscription school near his home, he having to walk a long way through the snow and sleet of winter to a little log school-house with slab benches and few conveniences. The family located first in Linn county, and then lived a year in Douglas county, at the end of which time they removed to Lane county, in 1853, and settling on a claim five miles north of Cottage Grove, near Walker Station. In 1865 Mr. Chrisman engaged in farming and stock-raising on his own responsibility, four miles west of Creswell, having four hundred and twenty acres, and this he sold in 1873, purchasing four hundred and eighty acres east of Cottage Grove on Row river. Stock-raising netted him a substantial yearly income until 1878, when, on account of his wife's ill health, he located in Eugene and took up the hack and dray business. Three years later, in 1881, he removed to Cottage Grove and became interested in a harness business, which he operated for three years, and then sold, and, in 1884, he began buying, selling and shipping stock.

In 1890 Mr. Chrisman departed from his former occupations and sought to increase his hoard among the mines in the Bohemia district, and successfully negotiated for the purchase and sale of many valuable claims. Three years later found him managing the New York Racket store, of this place, and in 1900 he bought into his present livery business, taking as his partner Eli Bangs, of Eugene, Ore. Aside from his business property, Mr. Chrisman owns valuable residence and store property in several parts of Cottage Grove, as well as a farm of one hundred and sixty acres eleven miles east of the town. He has been prominent in political and other affairs here, and as a Republican has held about all of the offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen, including that of mayor for one term, member of the council for several terms, marshal for one term, special deputy sheriff for two terms or four years, and constable for several terms. Fraternally, he is connected with the United Artisans.

In Lane county, Mr. Chrisman married Caroline Boren, who was born in Illinois in December, 1846, and whose father, C. W. Boren, crossed the plains with his family in 1853, locating on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres four miles from Cottage Grove. Mr. Boren was fairly successful in the west as well as the east, and his death occurred while he was on a visit to his old home in Illinois. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Chrisman, of whom Wesley is on the old farm; Mattie is the wife of J. W. Kirk, of this vicinity; Clarence Bell and George Austin are deceased, and Hattie Lena is the wife of T. K. Sears, and is living with her father.

LEVI GEER. To be well known is to be appreciated in the case of Levi Geer, for he is one of those thoroughly up-to-date and enterprising men from whose well directed efforts the promises of future greatness in a community become a fulfillment. Not content with anything but the highest positions, it is a natural sequence that he is an addition to any society. He has made his business energy and judgment contribute to the advancement of all upbuilding enterprises, having made of his own life a financial success, ardently desiring to see his adopted state and community profit by his efforts. He now owns nine hundred and fifty acres of land, the improvements of which have been the result of his own efforts. In 1902 he built a modern hotel on his farm, for the use of the patrons of his springs, known as the Oregon Mineral Springs, which are widely appreciated for their medicinal properties. In the equipment of his property he has spared neither time nor expense, and the swimming pool, shower bath, and other conveniences attract many to this pleasant retreat.

The springs are highly spoken of by all who have tested their curative properties. Physicians who have analyzed the water are a unit in their decision that it is one of the most wonderful springs in this country. Located in a narrow valley on the coast fork of the Willamette, the scenery is as attractive as any on the coast, and all who have paid the place a visit are anxious to go the second time. Mr. Geer has spent a great many hundred dollars in making the improvements, and it is safe to say that when the people of Oregon and surrounding states fully realize what a benefit is to be derived from the waters of the springs, they will make it one of the most celebrated health resorts in the Pacific northwest. By the positive cures which have been effected it has been proved beyond any doubt that the use of the waters will cure ninety per cent of such diseases as stomach and kidney troubles and blood troubles of all kinds. Several leading physicians have said it was the greatest blood purifier known to the profession. The springs are within easy reach, as from Cottage Grove to the hotel is only twelve miles, the road running along the river bank most of the distance, and is in fine condition, so that the stage ride is one that can be greatly enjoyed.

Levi Geer was born in Carroll county, Ill., May 6, 1856, and is the son of Samuel Geer, now one of the prominent men of Lane county. Samuel Geer was born in 1817, and on attaining manhood followed the vocation of a farmer. He married Nancy Hill in Illinois. In 1864 they started across the plains by horse and mule teams, during the six-months journey experiencing several serious encounters with the Indians, at one time having some of their mules stolen by the savages. Upon their arrival in Oregon the father came direct to Lane county, and there purchased three hundred and twenty acres located twelve miles south of Cottage Grove, where they lived until 1881. They then located in Idaho, where the father followed farming and stock-raising until 1899, when he returned to Lane county. He is now making his home with his son, Levi Geer, his wife having died in Idaho in 1897. Soon after settling in Lane county for the first time, Samuel Geer erected a grist-mill upon the present site of London, the motive power being water, which turned the machinery by an overshot wheel thirty-two feet in diameter. About 1870 he became interested in the construction of a grist-mill at Cottage Grove, and later built one in Cornwall, Idaho. The greater part of his life in the west has been devoted to this work. He is now eighty-six years old, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Politically, he is a staunch Republican.

The greater part of the life of Levi Geer has been passed in Oregon, for he was but eight years old when he crossed the plains with his parents. He received his education in the district school and remained at home with his parents until he married. About 1880 he moved to Idaho, where he lived about ten years. Returning to Lane county, he bought the old home place at London, and has since increased the number of acres to nine hundred and fifty, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

Like his father, he also engaged in milling, his business now being known as the London Timber & Milling Company, in the promotion of which he was one of the principals. He engaged in the mercantile business in London in 1892, in partnership with John Sutherland, the firm name being Sutherland & Geer, a substantial building for the business being erected by Mr. Geer.

The first marriage of Mr. Geer united him with Miss Elizabeth Rodgers, a native of Lane county, Ore., and the one child born to them, Clara May, is now the wife of G. L. Moxley, located in the vicinity of London. After the death of his first wife he married Rosa Maude Powell, also a native of Oregon, and their two children are Joseph and Robert, both of whom are at home. In politics Mr. Geer is independent in his views, giving his vote to the man whom he considers best qualified for the position. He is a member of the Grange and the Christian Church.

ALEXANDER H. POWELL. That farming in Oregon may be pursued with financial satisfaction by those who have the combined gifts of industry and thrift, has been demonstrated in the career of Alexander H. Powell, one of the prominent agriculturists living near Cottage Grove, and owner of a four hundred and sixty acre farm. Ever since 1878 Mr. Powell has been a familiar figure in this neighborhood, his work in the field around his home, his team and wagon upon the public highway, and his well known and kindly face lighted with interest and animation in his pew in the Christian Church, have become a part of the life in a community noted for its progress, enlightenment and successful enterprises. By no means self-centered, Mr. Powell has taken an active interest in educational work, has promoted good roads and social diversions, and besides filling a number of local political offices, has given his support for many years to the Grange.

From Mason county, Ill., where he was born on his father's farm, December 8, 1834, Mr. Powell came to Oregon in 1851 as a young man just beginning to realize the possibilities of life, and here, as in Illinois, he lived on a farm, developing strength of mind and body in the harvest field. As was the case with most boys of his age, he welcomed the diversions that circumstances offered, even the Yakima war, to which the settlers were driven because of their inability to keep stock or dwell in peace in the unsettled country. In 1856 he enlisted in Company D, under Captain Suttler, and during his three months of service he had a chance to study the methods of the red men, as compared with those of the enlightened whites.

Returning to Linn county Mr. Powell bought a farm in partnership with his brother, James Henry Powell, and in 1864 married Mary Ann McKnight, who was born in Iowa and crossed the plains in 1860. Not entirely satisfied with his farm, Mr. Powell disposed of it in 1878 and bought his present farm, eight miles south of Cottage Grove, comprising a part of the old Wilson donation claim. The improvements are all due to his enterprise and progressiveness, his dwelling, barns and outhouses being both comfortable and modern. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Powell, of whom Sarah M., the oldest daughter, is the wife of Lincoln Taylor and lives in Cottage Grove; Alfred occupies a part of the home place; Clarinda B. married Henry Taylor and lives in Washington; Winona F. became the wife of Alexander Small, and lives in the vicinity of London, and Lester W. is a telegraph operator on the Southern Pacific at Turner. Mr. Powell is one of the substantial men of Lane county, and his moderate and painstaking life may well serve as an example in this age of progress to the rising generation that are to carry out the lifework of the pioneer settlers.

EUGENE P. WAITE. Following close upon a milling experience of many years, Eugene P. Waite purchased his present farm of one hundred and fifty-six acres in March, 1901, and has already established himself among the progressive and successful tillers of the soil and raisers of stock in Lane county. Born in Vernon county, Wis., December 17, 1852, he comes of an old Green Mountain state family, his father having been born in Windham county, Vt., December 8, 1827. His mother, Olive (Parker) Waite, was a native of the same place, and born October 13, 1827. Married in Vermont, the parents removed to Vernon county, Wis., in 1852, where the father farmed and logged for many years, establishing a name for himself as a competent farmer and business man. With his family he came to Lane county in 1889, took up his abode at Acme, in the Siuslaw valley, and turned his attention to milling and logging, the large possibilities of which he has since demonstrated to his entire satisfaction. Aside from Eugene, who is the oldest of the children, there is Mary, the wife of C. C. Cushman, of Acme; Arabel, the wife of H. J. Webb, of Santa Rosa, Cal.; and Anderson, living in Lowell, Mass.

Educated in the public schools of Monroe county, Wis., Eugene Waite was reared to farming and logging, and in 1878 married Addie Boring, who was born in Monroe county, Wis., August 16, 1859. Three children have been born of this union, of whom Mary is the wife of George Chamberlain, of Talent, Ore., while Warner and Wayne are living with their parents. Mr. Waite was thirty-seven years of age when he came to Eugene, and he was well equipped with business experience, possessing also great faith in the future of his adopted locality, the interests of which he at once espoused. From his twenty-fifth year he began to mill on his own responsibility, and finally became identified with the old Siuslaw Milling Company, which failed in 1899. Thereafter he continued in the mill until 1901, and then purchased his present home, to the improvement of which he intends devoting his future. Mr. Waite is not officially inclined, although he is a staunch supporter of the Republican party. The friend of education, he has served several years as a member of the school board, a part of that time as school clerk. Mr. Waite has the confidence of the community in which he lives, and where he is esteemed for his business sagacity, his good name, and his loyalty to friends and interests.

JAMES A. McLEOD. At present one of the business men of Acme, and interested in the development of his thriving little town, James A. McLeod has spent many years in logging and farming in the northwest, and has familiarized himself with its multitudinous resources. Deriving from a remotely traced Scottish ancestry the substantial traits of the land of health, plain living, and high thinking, he was born in Vaughn township, York county, eleven miles from Toronto, Canada, February 21, 1850, and was there educated in the common schools and reared on a farm. His father, James McLeod, the one who founded the family in Canada, was born in Elgin, Morayshire, one hundred and eighteen miles from Edinburgh, on the Lossie, Scotland, March 2, 1809, and came to America at an early day. He married Sarah Fisher, a native daughter of Canada, and who was born in 1818. The parents died in Canada, March 2, 1901, and 1890 respectively, after rearing a family of seven children, of whom James A. is the fifth.

Leaving his Canadian home in 1871, James A. McLeod went to Bay City, Mich., and engaged in logging for about three years, and, having become familiar with the occupation, transferred his opportunities to the Pacific coast in 1875, locating on Puget Sound in Washington for a couple of years. In 1877 he went to the logging camps along the Umpqua, and in 1879 came to the Siuslaw river and took up a donation claim of one hundred and fifty-three acres five miles east of Acme. Having few improvements at the time, he set to work to till and clear his land, and made of it a valuable and paying property. In addition to general farming and some stock-raising he realized quite an income from fishing every fall, and also to an extent engaged in lumbering. He is also county scaler for the four saw-mills on the Siuslaw river. Leaving his farm in 1901, he came to Acme, and is now one of the reliable business men of this place, taking an interest in its social and general affairs, and contributing of his time and means whenever a demand is made upon his resources. He still owns two hundred and eighty-five acres of land in the Siuslaw valley.

A Republican in political affiliation, Mr. McLeod has served as school director and road supervisor, and he is fraternally connected with the Masons of Florence. More than ordinary interest attaches to the marriage ceremony which united Mr. McLeod and Mary E. Hadsell, in 1882, for the couple were the first white people to be married on the Siuslaw river, and the first to go to housekeeping in other than an Indian wigwam. Mrs. McLeod was born in Linn county, Kans., February 16, 1863, and came to Oregon with her parents in 1875. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McLeod, Archie, May B., and Jennie V.

JAMES HEMENWAY. Among Lane county's substantial and enterprising business men, whose names are scattered throughout the pages of this volume, no one is more worthy of mention than James Hemenway, who, as a member of the Garman & Hemenway Company, is carrying on an extensive and lucrative mercantile business at Cottage Grove. A native of Ontario, Canada, he was born July 3, 1854, at Bishop's Mill, Grenville county, which was likewise the birthplace of his father, William Hemenway. He comes of English ancestry, his immigrant ancestor having come from Yorkshire, England, to Massachusetts, in 1632, settling in Framingham with his four children, two sons and two daughters. His descendants lived in Massachusetts for many generations, and many of them attained prominence in literary circles. One of his descendants, Samuel Hemenway, great grandfather of James, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. He subsequently removed to New Hampshire from Framingham, thence to Vermont, settling on Lake Champlain, where he spent his remaining years. His son, Almond, was next in line of descent. Almond Hemenway was born and educated in Framingham, Mass., and afterwards lived in New Hampshire and Vermont. After the death of his father he removed to Grenville county, Ontario, settling at Bishop's Mills, where he was for many years one of the leading builders and contractors. He married after going there, and in that town reared his children. William Hemenway lived in his native town until after his marriage. In 1854

he came to the United States, locating in Dane county, Wis., at Black Earth, where he was employed as a tiller of the soil until 1870. Removing in that year to Ottawa county, Kans., he purchased three hundred and twenty acres of land in Minneapolis, and for twenty years was numbered among the extensive and prosperous farmers and stock-raisers of that locality. Coming to Oregon in 1890, he located at Cottage Grove, where he is now living retired from active pursuits, having faithfully performed his share of labor during his seventy-one years of earthly existence. He married Katherine McCord, who was born in county Derry, Ireland, of Scotch ancestors. Her father, James McCord, was born in Scotland, but as a young man had charge of a lord's estate in Ireland. Emigrating from there to Canada, he settled at Bishop's Mills, where he became a large landholder, and a citizen of prominence, living there until his death, at the age of four-score years. He was a Presbyterian in religion, and an active member of the church.

The oldest of a family of six children, of whom three sons are living, James Hemenway was educated in the common schools of Wisconsin and Kansas. Engaging in agricultural pursuits as a young man, he carried on farming and stock-raising in Ottawa county, Kans., until 1888. Emigrating then to Oregon, Mr. Hemenway opened a livery, sale and feed stable at Cottage Grove, and managed it successfully the ensuing ten years, building up a large and profitable patronage. In 1898 he embarked in the real estate, insurance and brokerage business, continuing for a year. In 1899, he and his son, W. A. Hemenway formed a partnership with W. D. Garman, and established a mercantile business at Cottage Grove under the name of the Garman-Hemenway Company, which was incorporated with a capital of $20,000. Meeting with almost unprecedented success in its venture, this firm has now one of the best-stocked department stores in the county and is carrying on a very large business, in 1903 increasing its capital to $40,000 and establishing branch stores at Grant's Pass and Scio, W. A. Hemenway being manager of the store at Grant's Pass. Mr. Hemenway has other financial interests, also, owning "Happy Jack," an undeveloped mining claim, and having extensive mining interests in the Bohemia district. He owns business property having a frontage of thirty feet on Main street, and has erected a fine residence in Cottage Grove.

Mr. Hemenway married, in Minneapolis, Kans., Eva Comfort, a native of Ohio. Her father, William Comfort, was born in New York state, but early in life removed to Iowa, and afterward settled in Minneapolis, Kans., where he is now actively employed in farming. Mr. and Mrs. Hemenway have two children, namely: W. A., of the Garman-Hemenway Company; and Hazel, living at home. An active Republican in politics, Mr. Hemenway served as councilman seven years, and, in 1901, was elected to the state legislature for one term, while there serving as chairman of the committee on labor and industries. He is quite prominent in a number of fraternal organizations, belonging to Eugene Lodge, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; to Cottage Grove Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has passed all the chairs; to the Rebekahs; to Cottage Grove Lodge, K. of P.; and to Cottage Grove Lodge of Foresters.

MAJOR FRANK E. EDWARDS, B. M. E. Conspicuous among the residents of Benton county worthy of representation in this biographical volume is Major Frank E. Edwards, a native-born citizen, a veteran of the Spanish war, and an alumnus of the Oregon Agricultural College, with which he is now officially connected, being commandant and professor of military science and tactics, and also assistant professor of chemistry.

Born September 13, 1875, in Lane county, near Springfield, Ore., Frank E. Edwards is a son of Webley J. Edwards. He comes of substantial New England ancestry, the earliest of his progenitors of whom he has any definite knowledge having emigrated from one of the New England states to New York city, where the family owned a large tract of land. The great-grandfather, Webley Edwards, of New England birth, served as an officer in the Revolutionary army, being captain of a company. The major's grandfather, T. D. Edwards, was reared and educated in Indiana, but later removed to Ohio, where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1854. Coming then to Oregon across the plains, with ox-teams, bringing with him his family, his son, Webley J., being then an infant of six months, he located near Springfield on a donation claim in Lane county, where he cleared and improved a homestead. On retiring from active pursuits, he removed to Eugene, Ore., where his death occurred in 1895.

Webley J. Edwards was born in Ohio, but was brought up on the old home farm in Oregon, where he has since resided. A prominent farmer and stockman, he first started in business in Lane county, going from there to Lake county, where he followed ranching and general farming with signal success for three years. Returning then to the valley, he continued in his chosen vocation until his removal to Mayville, Gilliam county, his present place of residence. He married Jane Gross, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of Andrew Gross, a native of Germany, who emigrated to America, settling in Iowa, where he carried on agricultural work until 1856, when he came with his family to Lane county, Ore. He is now prosperously engaged in general farming in Brownsville, Linn county. Four children were born of their union, namely: Frank, the special subject of this sketch; Frederick, a graduate of the University of Oregon, and of the Oregon Agricultural College, is engaged in business as a stock-raiser and dealer in Gilliam county; Hubert, residing on the home farm; and Velma, living with her parents.

Brought up on the home farm, and educated in the district schools of Lane and Gilliam counties, Frank E. Edwards entered the Oregon Agricultural College in 1891, and was graduated in 1895, with the degree of B. M. E. While in his sophomore year, he was president of the Websterian Society, and in 1896, while he was taking a post-graduate course, he served as captain of a company of cadets. From 1896 until 1898, he was connected with the college as instructor in chemistry, resigning his position to enlist, as a private, in Company M, Second Oregon Infantry. Being mustered into service on July 2, 1898, he went with his regiment to San Francisco, thence to Manila, arriving there on Thanksgiving day, 1898. He was subsequently made corporal of his company, and as a part of Wheaton's Flying Brigade, on March 25, 1899, took part in the battles of Tondo and Malabon, and the following day, March 26, was severely wounded at the battle of Polo, being shot through both legs, below the thigh. He was incapacitated for further military duty, but returned, on crutches, with his company to California, then to Oregon, where he was mustered out of service on August 7, 1899. A month later, Mr. Edwards accepted the position of commandant of cadets, and professor of military science and tactics at his alma mater. In 1900 he was made instructor in chemistry, and assistant in the chemical department of the Agricultural Experiment Station. In June of that year he was appointed to the staff of Gen. Charles F. Beebe as brigade signal officer, with rank of major, an office that he filled until the reorganization, in 1903, when, on the resignation of General Beebe, he was given command of the brigade signal corps.

Major Edwards married, in Corvallis, Miss Helen Elgin, who was born in Monroe county, Ore., and was educated at the State Normal School in Monmouth, Ore. Major and Mrs. Edwards have one child, Webley Elgin Edwards. Major Edwards is a staunch Republican in his political affiliations, and an active member of the Christian Church, being one of the board of deacons and superintendent of the Sunday school connected with it. He is identified with several fraternal organizations, belonging to Corvallis Grange, No. 242; to Edward C. Young Camp of the Spanish American War Veterans, of which he is past commander; to the Knights of Pythias; and is ex-president of the Alumni Association.

ROBERT E. CAMPBELL. One of the highly treasured possessions of Robert E. Campbell is the log house which he constructed in the height of his enthusiasm for his adopted state in 1852, and which still weathers the heat of summer and the cold of winter as stanch as it did when a little household gathered beneath its timbers, and earnestly laid their plans for the future. Strange to relate, the roof, which usually has the shortest life, has never known a successor, but with its supports remains an example of handiwork which has proved substantial in the extreme, and useful beyond compare. Not far from the pioneer house, which was 17x24 feet in dimensions, and contained two rooms, is the more modern structure now occupied by Mr. Campbell, and which is one of the really fine rural homes in which a prosperous country abounds. The contrasts thus presented are borne out in the life of the owner, to whom naught has come save through the exertions of his hands and brain, and to the retention of which he owes frugality, good judgment and untiring industry. In LaFayette county, Mo., where he was born September 4, 1830, Mr. Campbell married, in 1849, Ruth Campbell, one child being born to them on the farm upon which they settled. With his cousin, Alexander Kinb, Mr. Campbell purchased a team of four yoke of oxen, and two cows, and started across the plains in a wagon, leaving home in April, and arriving in Lane county, Ore., in October, 1851. Sometime during the following winter he located a claim of three hundred and twenty acres a mile from Springfield and two miles from Eugene on the Willamette river, the following year moving to his present home where he erected the log house above mentioned. In 1876 he removed to this part of the donation claim, and with the exception of intervals spent in other parts of the state, has made this his place of residence. For nine months Mr. Campbell lived in Wasco county, and during the summer of 1854 he mined in Jackson county, this state. In 1852 he hauled goods from Portland to Springfield, and in 1859 he and his cousin built a flat-boat and took thirty-five tons of flour to Portland, receiving in payment $2.75 per barrel. His farm is mostly prairie land, and all of the improvements are due to his enterprise and progressiveness. General farming, stock and grain-raising are engaged in on an extensive scale, and in all of these departments Mr. Campbell has achieved success, having made a practical and scientific study of the occupation to which his life has been devoted.

The first wife of Mr. Campbell died in 1858, leaving two children, of whom Harvey, who crossed the plains with them in 1851, died in 1895, and Eliza is the wife of Mr. Anderson, and lives on the home place. For a second wife Mr. Campbell married in the fall of 1859, Martha Delgell, who died in 1865, her only child having died in infancy. The present Mrs. Campbell, married in 1867, was formerly Rebecca Hutchinson, and is the mother of two sons, George E. and Emmet E., both of whom live on the home place. Mr. Campbell is a Democrat, but being a quiet and unostentatious man, has never identified himself with office-seeking. Possessing shrewd business judgment, honesty of purpose, and a kindly interest in the success of his fellow agriculturists, Mr. Campbell is justly popular in his neighborhood, towards the development of which he has so earnestly striven.

OSCAR P. ADAMS. A pioneer resident of Cottage Grove, with whom one might profitably while away many a winter evening, is Oscar P. Adams, whose most emphatic recollections are centered around the very early days of Oregon, and around the mines in this and some of the surrounding states. Probably no one in this county possesses greater familiarity with the ore output of the best known mining localities throughout the west, or has more accurately gauged the agricultural and general possibilities of a well favored and very productive region. A distant relative in a family which has provided a president to the United States, and which was represented on the battlefields of the Revolution by his paternal grandfather, Mr. Adams was born in Tioga county, Pa., July 30, 1828, a son of Isaac and Sophronia Lydia (Porter) Adams, natives respectively of New York and Vermont. Isaac Adams was born December 15, 1803, and in the early '30s left his native state and went to Michigan, locating in Tecumseh, Lenawee county. This part of Michigan was a wilderness at that time, and the new arrival found no neighbors or even evidence of any previous settlers. He became prominent in his locality as it was built up and agricultural and other industries were started, and he became a member of the local militia, attaining to the rank of captain. He was a farmer all his active life, and died in his adopted state in 1873, his wife having preceded him in 1844, at the age of forty years. The Porter family was an old Vermont one, and John Porter, the father of Mrs. Adams, was a soldier in the war of 1812. Ten children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Adams, four of whom were sons, Oscar P. being the oldest. By a former marriage Mr. Adams had one son, J. C. Adams.

On the wilderness farm in Michigan, Oscar P. Adams grew to manhood, and in the public schools succeeded in getting as far as algebra, and other studies accordingly. He developed a great deal of physical strength while felling trees, and in time apprenticed to a machinist and wood-turner, trades which he applied for some years in the timber district. In this way he saved quite a little money, and $50 of this was paid to John H. Stevens for the privilege of accompanying him across the plains in 1854, but in addition he was required to perform various services during the progress of the journey. Starting out May 4, they went via the Barlow route and arrived at Foster September 6, Mr. Adams soon after finding employment in a saw-mill. After a month in the mill he made his way to the mines in Josephine county, and in 1855 enlisted for government service as head packer during the Indian war, as he had no gun with which to operate as a soldier. Thirty days sufficed for this kind of work, and during that time he made dangerous expeditions with flour from the Bear Creek mill to the quartermaster, wherever located. Again he worked in the mines of Josephine county, and for many years spent portions of each year in mining in some one of the well known regions hereabouts.

In 1858 Mr. Adams bought three hundred and twenty acres of land around and including the present site of Cottage Grove, in time disposing of the town site at $10 to $12 an acre. He still has one hundred and twenty-four acres of the original purchase left, and has engaged in farming, stock-raising and mining ever since he bought it. At present his farm is rented, although he oversees it, as he also does his several mining claims in the western part of the state, principally the Bohemia district. In the meantime he has been variously interested in business in different parts of the state, and in 1864 spent the year in Portland, where he engaged in truck-driving. In this town he married Elizabeth Saylor, who crossed the plains with her people in 1853, and who died in Cottage Grove in 1870, leaving the following daughters: Lovica Helen, now Mrs. Charles Vilas, of Portland; Mary C., the wife of Frank McFarland, and living with her father; Sophronia L., now Mrs. Charles Van Buren, of Astoria, Ore.; Theodosia L., the wife of C. F. Cathcart, of Roseburg, Ore.; and Hattie E., now Mrs. Wilbur McFarland, of Cottage Grove. The second wife of Mr. Adams was formerly Minerva Cromwell, who was born in Georgia, and who for nine years has been an invalid, suffering from a paralytic stroke. Mr. Adams has been a student all his life, and his life deductions are interesting and original in the extreme. Few men are better posted on current events, nor have many a larger fund of general useful information. He is a Republican in political preference, and finds a religious home in the Christian Church.

S. N. WILKINS. Among the prosperous business men of Benton county, Ore., who have succeeded in life mainly on account of their energy, perseverance and economy, is the subject of this biographical sketch, S. N. Wilkins, of Corvallis, who is too well known throughout Benton and adjoining counties to need an extended introduction to the readers of this volume. Mr. Wilkins is now serving his second term as county coroner of Benton county, having been elected first on the Democratic ticket and afterwards as a candidate on the Republican ticket. He is a man of much natural ability and his experience proves that he can turn his hand to almost anything and make a success of it. He has been identified with the substantial improvements of Corvallis, having built three elegant homes which have at each move been surpassed by better ones, until the present house was erected on the corner of Third and Madison streets in 1902. The first was built in 1885, and the second in 1892. The foundation of his present splendid business was formed in 1885, when he put into a corner of his paint shop a small stock of wall paper, and to this a year later added a stock of paints, to which was soon added other lines—picture-molding, artist material, and stationery. The business had now grown to an extent that compelled him to give up a very profitable business—contractor in painting and paperhanging—and devote his entire time to his store, which had grown to require larger quarters, which were supplied by E. W. Fisher, in 1889. In 1890 he formed a partnership with Bond Brothers and to the already splendid business they added a line of "New York Racket goods." After a year with this firm Mr. Wilkins sold his interest and accepted a position with The Northwest Fire Insurance Company of Portland, Ore. Beginning at the bottom of the ladder July 1, 1891, he forced his way to second in his line within a year, and in August, 1892, left his lucrative position with this company and purchased the stock and business of the late Philip Weber, and during this and the succeeding year did a business in line with the "boom times," and with many others found himself at the starting point again in 1894, but, belonging to a stock who do not readily accept defeat, rallied his forces and, in April, 1895, organized the Corvallis Furniture Company and purchased the stock of furniture and undertaking goods of the estate of J. A. Knight, where this business had been conducted for thirty-seven years, and had not been a profitable business. Mr. Wilkins, as manager and undertaker, put it on a paying basis, and in 1897 he bought the stock of undertaking goods of his only competitor—L. Welker & Co. He continued the business at the old stand where prosperity followed until 1899, when he absorbed all the stock of the Corvallis Furniture Company, the latter going out of business. In 1901 Mr. Wilkins sold his stock of furniture to J. D. Mann & Co., and moved his undertaking business to his present elegant quarters, which had just been completed, and which are situated on Madison street next to the elegant city hall, and on the same lots with his residence. In these new quarters Mr. Wilkins has office, chapel, workroom, storeroom and morgue, constructed on the latest and best sanitary plans, and it is conceded that his place is the best outside of Portland, and is several years in advance of the town. Since moving to these new quarters Mr. Wilkins devotes his entire time to his undertaking business. He has one fine funeral car and a small hearse, the latter of which was built in this town by the pioneers, L. L. Horning and J. T. Phillips, in the early seventies, and was one of the first in the valley. Mr. Wilkins believes in keeping abreast of the times in his profession. He has taken four different courses of lectures on embalming and sanitation, and is now taking a special course in anatomy at the Oregon Agricultural College, and has his plans made for a trip east, where he will complete the work begun more than eight years ago. As a funeral director, undertaker and embalmer, he ranks second to few in the state, and his place and the methods of conducting it are a source of much admiration by his friends.

The Wilkins family originally came from England, and the American branch first settled in New England, of Puritan stock. They finally became scattered, one member going south and establishing that branch to which our subject belongs. Mr. Wilkins was born near Eufaula, Barbour county, Ala., November 4, 1851, and is the fourth son of H. L. Wilkins, who was also a fourth son. His paternal grandfather, William Wilkins, was born in the state of Georgia February 5, 1785, was a pioneer of Alabama, where he reared a family of twelve children—nine sons and five daughters. In 1856, with his sons, daughters and their families, he came west and settled in the western part of this state, near Mobile, Ala., where he resided until 1870, coming with his son, H. L. Wilkins, to north Missisissippi, where he died at the advanced age of eighty-seven years.

H. L. Wilkins, the father of S. N. Wilkins, was born in Georgia April 27, 1821. He was reared in eastern Alabama, where he was married to Sarah M. Jones, May 2, 1841, and fifteen years later, with other members of his family, came to the western border of the state and settled in Choctaw county, where he resided until 1867. In 1861 he, with his eldest son, who was only eighteen years old, responded to his country's call and with the Twenty-third Alabama Regiment, saw four years of service and took part in the struggles at Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, Atlanta and many other places, and for forty-four days lay in the trenches under a tropical sun at Vicksburg, living part of the time on "mule" beef, and a short ration at that, with a tornado of shot and shell that tried men's souls and broke their constitutions, so that, when he returned from the war, he not only found his health much impaired, but his wealth had been wasted by the ravages of war. After two years enough was rescued from the wreck to enable him to take his family to the more fertile fields of north Mississippi, where he built up a comfortable home and regained much of his former losses. After a residence in Panola county, Miss., of ten years he, with his remaining family, came to Oregon to join S. N. Wilkins and other sons who had preceded him to Corvallis, Benton county. Here he spent the remaining days of his activity, being prominently identified with many substantial improvements in Corvallis. His last few years were spent in retirement, principally at Roseburg with a son, where he died January 27, 1902, at the age of eighty years. His wife had preceded him fifteen years. His life had been one of action. He not only reared a family of ten children of his own, but raised four orphan girls. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity for more than forty years, and the latch-string of his door was always on the outside for his friends and he was never known to turn a fellow-man away empty-handed, when he had the ability to help him.

In his youth S. N. Wilkins attended subscription schools for three months of the year from the age of six to ten years, when the war put a stop to schools and he, with others both older and younger, had to "scratch for a living," and at the close of the war, schools, with everything else, were demoralized, and it was 1867 before even a short three-months school could be maintained, and at the age of sixteen he began his attendance, which was kept up with the irregularity of the subscription school of an unsettled country. In 1870 he went to the far western wilds of Texas, encountering many adventures, one of which was when, on his return trip by way of Galveston, he escaped a yellow fever quarantine by just one day. Returning to Batesville, Miss., the next three years were spent in learning the carpenter's trade, and in February, 1874, he left his southern home for Oregon, where he arrived in company with the Applewhite-Davis-Willbanks party April 1, 1874. The first two years were spent at carpenter work, and on the farm when this work could not be had to do, and in 1876 he began a course in the Oregon Agricultural College which was continued through 1877. At the conclusion of this, October 9, 1878, he met and formed a matrimonial alliance with a native daughter, Miss Mary A. Moore. Mr. Moore, her father, was a native of Tennessee and drove an ox-team to Oregon in 1851. Here he was joined in marriage with Miss Rachel A. Robinette, February 15, 1852. Mr. Robinette was a native of Missouri and a pioneer of 1849, and was one of the first settlers about Lebanon, Linn county, Ore. After his marriage Mr. Moore settled on a donation claim near Lebanon, where he resided many years, transferring his residence to the vicinity of Irving, Lane county, and to Corvallis in 1870, for school privileges. Here he remained until 1888, when he moved to The Dalles, Ore., where he now resides. He is a member of the Masonic order in all its branches, and is as spry as the average man of sixty, while he is past seventy-five years of age.

In 1881 Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins went to Yakima City, where they resided for two years. During this time Mr. Wilkins served an apprenticeship under W. E. Thornton, to learn the trade of painting and paperhanging, and on his return to Corvallis in 1883 opened a shop where success crowned his efforts as above stated.

One incident in the career of this man of action occurred in 1885, when he procured the ground for a home, but, not being able to get others to build for him, nor could he leave the work that was pressing him daily, the necessity became urgent and the house of six rooms was built from basement to roof and interior all finished without taking an hour from the regular time—all the work being done before and after hours.

Mr. Wilkins is prominently identified with the fraternal and beneficiary lodges of Oregon. He is a member of the Corvallis Lodge No. 14, A. F. & A. M.; Ferguson Chapter No. 5, R. A. M.; Oregon Council No. 2, and Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T., of Albany; and Al Kader Temple of the Mystic Shrine, of Portland; all the branches of the Odd Fellows; the Woodmen of the World; the Knights of Maccabees; the Artisans; and the Independent Order of Lions. Mrs. Wilkins belongs to all the auxiliary orders —Eastern Star, Rebekahs, Ladies of the Maccabees, W. O. W. Circle, the D. of H., the Lions, and the leading social organization of the city—the Fireman's Coffee Club. Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins have two children—one daughter and one son. The daughter, Lola M., is now the wife of Albert Lee Wigle, who resides at Prineville, Crook county, Ore. Harold, the only son, now sixteen years old, is a student at the Oregon Agricultural College and a member of the Cadet Band.

HARRY F. WYNNE. A native of Oregon, and the son of one of the most prominent pioneer physicians of this state, Harry F. Wynne, of Cottage Grove, Lane county, is well worthy of representation in this biographical volume. Industrious and enterprising, he has never been content to lead a life of idleness, but as a young man developed his native mechanical talent by a constant exercise of his skill in that direction, and is now giving proof of his mercantile ability as one of the active merchants of Cottage Grove, where, in partnership with his mother, Mrs. Sarah E. Wynne, he is carrying on a substantial hardware business. He was born July 27, 1866, at Union, Ore., a son of the late Dr. Armand L. Wynne. He comes of Virginian ancestry, his paternal grandfather, John Wynne, a successful planter and a prominent member of the Quaker Church, having been a life-long resident of the Old Dominion.

Armand L. Wynne, M. D., was born in Tazewell county, Va., and there acquired his preliminary education. Deciding upon a professional career, he was graduated from the Philadelphia Medical College, in Pennsylvania, and afterwards received the degree of M. D. at the St. Louis Medical College, in St. Louis, Mo. After practicing medicine for a time in Trenton, Mo., Dr. Wynne came to Oregon, locating in Union in 1864. Two years later he removed to the Willamette valley, locating in Eugene, where he built up an extensive practice. Settling at Cottage Grove in 1870, the doctor continued the practice of his profession in this locality until his death, in October, 1882, when but fifty-five years of age. Noted for his skill and medical knowledge, he won an extensive and lucrative patronage, and was one of the leading physicians of this part of Lane county. His wife, whose maiden name of Sarah Ellen Perkins, was born in Kentucky. She survives him, and is now in business with her son, Harry F., as above stated.

After completing his studies in the public schools, Harry F. Wynne learned the trade of a steam engineer on the Northern Pacific railway, working on the road for six years. The following six years he was employed as a stationary engineer, working in different places in Washington, California and Idaho. Returning to Cottage Grove in 1895, Mr. Wynne operated a steam engine for Booth & Kelley for a while, and then assumed charge of a quartz mill in the Bohemia district, working for Hellma & Music. Returning to the employ of Booth & Kelley, he worked in the company's saw-mill, at Saginaw, Ore., until 1900. Coming to Cottage Grove with the hardware firm of Griffin & Veatch in 1900, Mr. Wynne soon after embarked in the hardware business on his own account, forming a partnership with his mother. He carries a full line of hardware, having a stock valued at $2,500, and also handles agricultural tools and implements of all descriptions, having a large trade in this line as well as in his regular line of goods.

Mr. Wynne married, in Salem, Ore., Alice Veatch, a native of LaGrande, Ore. Politically Mr. Wynne is an earnest supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, and fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World, and belongs to Cottage Grove Blue Lodge, No. 52, A. F. & A. M.

MRS. MARY A. CANAN. Among the varied biographies contained in this volume, we are pleased to give a short sketch of Mrs. Mary A. Canan, who owns and conducts in a manner above reproach, the Occidental Hotel, which is considered one of the best in Corvallis. This hotel is a large, three-story structure, with pleasant and convenient rooms. The spacious and attractive dining-hall, with well filled tables, is a delight to the guests, whose wants are anticipated by their genial hostess. An addition, 75x100 feet, three stories high, has recently been added and the place is well patronized.

Mrs. Canan has been a resident of the western coast since 1865. She was born at Culpeper Court House, Va., and is a daughter of Jesse and Mary (Redley) McKenney. Her father was of Scotch descent, was born in the vicinity of Richmond, Va., and followed hotel-keeping. Later he removed to Brown county, Ohio, settling permanently at Georgetown, where he spent his closing years. Her mother was a native of Baltimore, and died in Ohio. Four children blessed their union, three being still living. Mrs. Canan was reared in Hillsboro, Ohio, where her mother moved after the death of her husband, and it was there that Mrs. Canan was educated. She has been married twice, her first union taking place at Hillsboro, where she wedded William Glascock. The latter was a Virginian by birth and was engaged for many years in mercantile business. In 1865 he went to California, via Panama route, and located at Healdsburg, Sonoma county, where he died. Some time after the death of her husband, Mrs. Glascock became the wife of W. C. Canan, a Pennsylvanian by birth, and one of the early gold-seekers, having crossed the plains in the customary way. After this marriage, Mr. Canan engaged in the drug business at Healdsburg, and was also a local banker until 1882 when he removed to Corvallis, Ore., and purchased the Occidental Hotel. He died in 1891, aged sixty-nine years. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and in his political views he was a Republican.

Mrs. Canan has carried on the hotel business ever since the death of her husband and has met with success. She has remodeled it, and in addition owns a fine business block in Corvallis. She is a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and also belongs to the Eastern Star.

JOSEPH S. AMES. When a lad of eleven years of age, Joseph S. Ames crossed the plains to California, the trip being made in three wagons, drawn by nine yoke of oxen. The start was made April 6, 1851, and six months later they arrived at the Sierra mountains. October 6 they began the journey across the mountains, and the first winter was spent at Diamond Springs, forty miles east of Sacramento. By way of the water route they reached Portland in July, 1852, and from there proceeded to Linn county. A few months later the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Sweet Home, his farm lying one-half mile west of the present postoffice. Lowell Ames, the father of Joseph S., was a native of Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and all his life had followed farming. He passed away March 8, 1864, at his home in Sweet Home, when in his sixty-fifth year. His wife, prior to their marriage known as Miss Anna Kessler, was born in Pennsylvania, and died in Sweet Home in 1872, in her seventy-first year. Their marriage was solemnized in Ohio and shortly afterward the young people removed to Illinois, locating at first in Kane county, but finally settled in Peoria. It was from the latter place that the family took up the long march across the plains.

The parental family comprised eight children, all of whom were boys with one exception, and Joseph S., born in Kane county, Ill., January 16, 1840, was the youngest of the family. His education was received in the common schools of Illinois and as soon as years and strength permitted gave a helping hand in the farm duties. His services were given to his father until his death, when he engaged in farming on his own account and has followed this calling ever since. His fine farm of four hundred acres, which lies adjacent to the village of Sweet Home, is a model farm and is embellished with commodious and convenient buildings. The family residence is located in town. While Mr. Ames carries on general farming to a certain extent, he makes a specialty of stock-raising, and in the raising of Merino sheep has no superior in the county. As road supervisor Mr. Ames has been instrumental in bettering the condition of the roads in his district. In all local affairs he takes an intelligent interest, and in politics is a Republican. In his religious belief he is allied with the Latter Day Saints.

JOHN K. McCORMACK is a native of Dixon county, Tenn., born February 19, 1827, and, in 1831, accompanied his parents to near Jacksonville, Ill., where he was reared, educated and grew to manhood. His father's property was in a fertile section of Illinois and furnished a fair income, yet the young man saw little prospect of forging to the front with anything like the rapidity that he desired, and therefore returning travelers from the west found him a willing listener. These reports were communicated to three other young men of his neighborhood, and the party proceeded to outfit for the long journey across the plains, purchasing a wagon and four yoke of oxen, and such provisions as they could cook in their camp equipment. They were six months on the way. The first winter in Oregon Mr. McCormack found work in La Fayette, and in the spring of 1852 he went to the mines of Jacksonville, in the fall returning and taking up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres in Benton county. Here he farmed with considerable success for five years, and then moved into the Alsea valley, taking up a homestead upon which he erected a pleasant residence, good barns, out-houses and fences. In 1887 he came to his present farm, which also is highly improved, and through his industry has been rendered one of the very desirable and paying properties in the neighborhood. He is engaged in general farming, hop and stock-raising.

November 30, 1857, Mr. McCormack was united in marriage with Lucinda Mason, and their happy married life has been blessed with six children, namely: Emma, deceased; Laura, Hardy, Ira, Ella J. and Fred. Mr. McCormack enjoys the confidence and esteem of all who know him.

JOSHUA M. MARTIN. In 1901 the Eugene brick manufactory became the personal property of Joshua M. Martin, who has been identified with various interests in the northwest ever since 1883. He was born in Andrew county, Mo., July 26, 1863, his parents, Jesse B. and Julia A. (Yates) Martin, being natives of the same state, the former born in Buchanan county, January 30, 1837, and the latter born in Andrew county, June 26, 1838. The parents continued to farm in their native state until locating in Lane county, March 8, 1902, and they have since lived on a farm adjoining that of their son near Eugene, where they are retired from the active cares of life. Seven children, six of whom are sons, have been born to them, and of these, Joshua M. is the oldest. In the spring of 1883 he came to Oregon, and for seven years was the valued assistant of a farmer near Irving. Afterward he rented a farm and engaged in stock and grain-raising from 1889 until 1900, in which year he moved to Eugene, soon after purchasing the brick industry with which his name has since been connected. Aside from the ground owned for the brick manufactory, Mr. Martin is interested in his father's farm, and with him engages in a general farming industry.

In 1890 Mr. Martin was united in marriage with Laura Montgomery, who was born in Macon county, Mo., April 28, 1862, and who crossed the plains with her people in 1865. Of this union there has been born one son, Albert, now deceased. Ever since casting his first presidential vote Mr. Martin has adhered to Democratic principles, and in this capacity has served with credit as school clerk and director, and road supervisor. He is fraternally identified with the Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen of Eugene, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, or which latter organization he has passed all of the chairs.

H. W. HATCH, who is head miller of the Salem Flouring-mill Company, was born in Conneaut, Ohio, February 25, 1855, and since 1886 has been a resident of the Sunset state. His father, Alpheus Hatch, was born near Chelsea, Vt., which was also the birthplace of the grandfather, Rufus Hatch. The latter was a farmer by occupation and at an early day in the development of Ohio removed to the Buckeye state. There Rufus Hatch was reared and in course of time became extensively identified with agricultural interests and at one time he was also engaged in the milling business. In 1871 he went on a business trip to Kansas and died in Cedarville, that state. His widow, who bore the maiden name of Harriet Babbitt, was born in Pennsylvania and is a resident of Portland. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hatch: Mrs. Edith Stimson, of Portland; H. W., of this review; and A. J., who is living in Oklahoma.

Upon the home farm in Ohio H. W. Hatch spent the days of his youth and attended private schools there. Between the years 1865 and 1871

he lived in Lowell, Mich., where he attended school, and during the periods of vacation he was employed in his uncle's flouring mill, so that he early gained practical experience of the business which he has made his lifework. In 1871 he returned to the old home in Ohio, and was there apprenticed to the miller's trade in a mill having a capacity of three hundred barrels of flour per day. He occupied that position for three years and then removed to Cedarville, Smith county, Kans., where he carried on farming for two years, returning to Ohio in 1876. He there worked at the miller's trade until 1877, when he went to the oil regions of Pennsylvania and secured a position as tool dresser, acting in that capacity until 1880—the year of his removal to Mankato, Minn. Accepting a position as miller with the firm of R. D. Hubbard & Company, in their large roller mill, he there remained until 1886, when, attracted by the business opportunities of the growing northwest he came to Oregon and obtained employment in the Portland Flouring Mill. After eighteen months he was sent to Salem as head miller of the Salem Flouring Mill and has acted in this capacity continuously since the spring of 1888. He has the entire confidence of those whom he represents, and as manager of the business has made it a profitable enterprise and has largely increased its scope. In 1899 the mill was destroyed by fire, but in the fall of 1901 was rebuilt and is today fitted with the latest improved machinery and has a capacity of three hundred and fifty barrels of flour. Mr. Hatch has a thorough and practical understanding of the business in every department, including the working of the machinery and the manufacture of flour, and is thus capable of controlling the labors of those who serve under him. The output of the plant is of excellent quality and therefore finds a ready sale upon the market.

Mr. Hatch was married in Mankato, Minn., to Miss L. Wood, who was born in Lowell, Mich., and they now have one son, Harold Wood, and an adopted daughter, Murah. Mrs. Hatch is connected with the Christian Science Church and is prominent therein. Mr. Hatch gives his political support to the Republican party, and while keeping well informed on the questions and issues of the day he has never been an aspirant for office, preferring to devote his energies to his business affairs, which he capably conducts.

JOHN I. MATLOCK. The entire life of John I. Matlock has been spent upon the farm, one and a half miles from Holley, where he was born June 20, 1858. His father, William, who was born in Missouri, contracted the gold fever in 1849, and as a young man joined a party bound for the mines of California. He was fairly successful, and with his little hoard came to Oregon in 1851, locating on the farm of three hundred and twenty acres now occupied by his son. He married Nancy Shields, member of an early family here, and reared a family of ten children, four sons and six daughters. He naturally suffered from the depredations of the Indians in the early days, and as naturally joined the defense instituted for the protection of the life and property of the settlers, serving in the war for several months. His death occurred in 1875, at the age of forty-nine years, and nine of his children are living at the present time. These are: Amanda, the wife of Greenbury Splawn; Sarah A., widow of Gideon Hodson; Evaline, wife of Timothy Riggs; John I.; A. J., near Holley; Artilla, the wife of Henry H. Chance; William T.; Mary J., wife of Andrew Shanks; and Eliza P.

When his father died John I. Matlock was seventeen years old, and as the oldest son in the family the management of the farm fell upon his shoulders. His first wife, Annie (Johnson) Matlock, died in 1887, leaving one child, Minnie, now living in Albany. For a second wife he married, October 12, 1891, Olive Pendleton, who is the mother of four children: Henry; Ray, deceased; Bryan, deceased; and Vina. Mr. Matlock still owns one hundred and sixty acres of the original claim, and is engaged in stock-raising and general farming. He is a member and overseer of the Grange, and is connected with the Christian Church.

GEORGE R. MILLER. From British Columbia to Mexico, and in thirty states and territories in the Union, George R. Miller is known as a shrewd and successful horse dealer. Practically his entire business life has been spent in studying the merits of the horse, and he has become an authority on all points concerning this noble animal. Mr. Miller received his start in life while associated with the W. W. Wallace circus, and, like all concerns of the kind, it prided itself on the excellence of its thoroughbreds. Attaining the position of horse-buyer for the circus, Mr. Miller naturally came to an appreciation of the best horses, and, having acquired a high grade standard, he has never allowed it to deteriorate. Leaving the circus, he devoted several years to breaking, training, buying and selling horses, and in this capacity visited the states and territories above mentioned. He came to Oregon in 1884, and engaged in the horse business in Albany, and, in 1887, took a herd of horses back over the mountains, in order to ship them to Muncie, Ind. This trip took four months, and upon returning, Mr. Miller started an even larger business, making his headquarters on the corner of East Front and Chicago streets, Albany, where he has his office and stables. He visits points all along the coast, and inland stations from British Columbia to Mexico, wherever good horses are to be had, or are in demand. He leads a varied and interesting life, meeting people of all classes, all of whom find him a courteous, agreeable and thoroughly honorable gentleman.

Previous to his circus experience Mr. Miller had been connected with his father, Henry P. Miller, who was an extensive business man of Muncie, Ind. Father and son were born near Williamsport, Lycoming county, Pa., the latter July 7, 1854. The elder Miller was for many years engaged in the lumber business on the Susquehanna, and, in 1855, when his son was a year old, he took his family to Muncie, Ind., where he became interested in a lime manufacturing plant. Later, he turned his attention to pump manufacturing, and, in 1884, removed to Oregon. However, his devotion to the middle west led him to again take up his residence in Muncie, in 1895, and his death occurred in that city two years later. He was survived by his wife, formerly Mary Grover, also born in Lycoming county, Pa., and still living in Muncie. Nine of the ten children in the family attained maturity, and eight are living, George R. being the ninth child. The children were educated in Lycoming county and Muncie, Ind., George R. receiving a practical training in the public schools ere engaging with his father in business. He attended principally to the jobbing department, but from the first evinced a keen interest in everything pertaining to horses.

While living in Muncie Mr. Miller married Rose Leslie, who was born in Winchester, Ind., and who has accompanied her husband on many of his expeditions. The family are members of the Christian Church, in which Mr. Miller is a deacon and active worker. Fraternally he is connected with the Foresters of America.

C. H. BREWER, M. D., was born in Sioux City, Iowa, the son of Dr. Brewer, and with only a small part of his education acquired in that city. His father emigrated to Oregon, and after his location in Salem, Marion county, proceeded to build up a lucrative practice. C. H. was but twelve years of age at the time of the removal to the western state and soon after arriving here he entered upon his course of education, the scene of his early school days being Mount Angel College. Upon the completion of his course there he entered the state university at Eugene and later the medical college at Salem, where he was graduated in the class of 1898. Locating in Silvertown, Marion county, he at once commenced the practice of medicine for which he had been preparing so many years. After two years' time he came to Stayton, believing this city to be a better location for his business. In 1902 he bought the drug store which he is now conducting in a business-like manner, and from which he realizes considerable profit. In his political affiliations Dr. Brewer casts his ballot with the Republican party.

EDWARD GOINS, SR., was born December 12, 1842, in Chatham county, N. C., a son of William Goins. He comes of patriotic stock, his paternal great-grandfather having fought in the Revolutionary war. His grandfather, Edward Goins, of North Carolina, served in the war of 1812; he was a man of culture and a noted teacher and educator.

William Goins, a life-long resident of North Carolina, was a miller by occupation. He married Kissie Sinkler, who was born in North Carolina, of pure Scotch ancestry, her father, Duncan Sinkler, having emigrated from Scotland to North Carolina, where he pursued the vocation of a farmer. Thirteen children were born of their union, twelve of whom grew to years of maturity, and three are now living, Edward being the only one on the Pacific coast. The mother died in Indiana.

The third child in order of birth, Edward Goins, Sr., had very limited school advantages, but early acquired a knowledge of agriculture, and of milling, receiving instruction in both branches of industry from his father. When the Civil war broke out he enlisted for twelve months in the Confederate army, becoming a member of Company H, Thirteenth North Carolina Infantry. Just before the year of enlistment was up he was given the opportunity to re-enlist for three years, or until the war closed, and receive a bounty, or be conscripted. He naturally re-enlisted, joining the same company and the same regiment. He participated in many of the prominent battles, among others the Seven-days battles; Fair Oaks; Chancellorsville; Wilderness; South Mountain; Antietam; Gettysburg; Fredericksburg, continuing until the surrender of Lee. Returning then to North Carolina, Mr. Goins remained at home until the fall of 1865, when he went to Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he was employed in the Audenreid mines for eighteen months. Going back to his native place, he worked a year at the cooper's trade, when, becoming dissatisfied, he induced his mother to remove with her family to Brazil, Ind., where he remained three years, working in the coal mines of that region. Going from there to Burlington, Kans., Mr. Goins established himself in the milling business, for several years thereafter running a burr water-mill on the Neosho river. Starting for Oregon on April 19, 1874, he came directly to Albany, and since that time has been a resident of Linn county. At once entering the employ of Beach & Monteith, millers, he worked for that firm five years. Purchasing, in 1879, a one-third interest in the old warehouse, he remodeled it, turning it into a flour-mill, and under the name of the Red Crown Mill managed it for seven years. Disposing of his interest in the plant, he then purchased a mill in Scio, and having put in modern equipment ran it by the roller process three years, when it was burned. Mr. Goins immediately replaced it with a new mill, into which he introduced modern machinery, and for four years operated that most successfully. Selling out his interests in Scio, he returned to Albany, and for two years ran the Red Crown mill, which he leased. Then, in company with C. C. Hogue, he rented the old Magnolia mill, which he enlarged and remodeled, putting in machinery of the most approved modern manufacture, and has since carried on an extensive and lucrative business. In his plant, which has a capacity of one hundred barrels of flour daily, he manufactures a standard brand of flour, the "Magnolia," and also makes large quantities of bran and feed.

Mr. Goins married first, in Indiana, Jane Wicker, who was born in North Carolina, and died in Albany, Ore. She bore him three children, namely: Annie, who died in Albany; Samuel, a resident of Portland, Ore.; and John, who is connected with the Magnolia mills. Mr. Goins married second, in Albany, Clara Butcher, a native of Linn county, and of this union three children have been born, namely: Lizzie, deceased; Archie; and Edward, Jr. Politically he is a staunch supporter of the principles promulgated by the Republican party, and takes a keen interest in the welfare of town and county. He served as councilman in Albany until his removal to Scio, when he resigned, and while residing in that city was a member of the common council several terms. Fraternally he is a member of the A. O. U. W. He is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he is a class leader, and is also one of its board of trustees.

I. B. BEAM has been a citizen of Albany since 1875, and during all the intervening years has been engaged in the grain business. He was connected with the Magnolia mill for eighteen years, where he gradually mastered the business, and finally succeeded to the responsible position of manager. After severing his connection with the Magnolia mills in 1893, Mr. Beam engaged in his present business with G. W. Simpson, with whose efficient help a large and remunerative enterprise has been firmly established. To store their commodities, the firm have two warehouses in Albany on the railroad and river, with a combined capacity of fifty thousand bushels, and have besides erected a warehouse of thirty thousand bushels at Scio, and houses at Stayton and Aumsville, with capacities respectively of twenty-five and fifteen thousand bushels. Formerly they owned the fifteen-thousand-bushel warehouse at Shaw, but disposed of it some time since. They ship grain, potatoes and hay to San Francisco, Portland, and points all along the coast, and also fill government contracts for the Philippines. Mr. Simpson attends to the Portland part of the business, and therefore spends much of his time in the latter city.

Of German descent, the Beam family was honored by the services of the paternal grandfather of I. B. in the Revolutionary war, and this colonial soldier afterward returned to his home in New England, whence he eventually removed with his family to Ohio. This trip was undertaken overland with horse teams, and the grandfather took up government land in Knox county, near Mount Vernon, where his son, Asa, the father of I. B., was born. Asa was reared on the farm, and in his native state married Jemima Hague, who was born in Maryland, and was of German descent. Several children were born to the parents in Ohio, and, in 1850, Asa Beam disposed of his farm and took his family with teams to McLean county, Ill., locating on crude land near Hudson. Here the balance of the large family of children were born, eleven in all, nine of whom attained maturity, and two of whom are living, I. B. and Asa, the latter being a merchant in Albany.

In 1863 I. B. Beam enlisted in the Fourth Illinois Cavalry, Company G, and was mustered in at Springfield. He was attached to the Army of the Mississippi, in the fall of 1864, but was shortly discharged from the service on account of physical disability. In 1865 he went to Shelby county, and afterward to Carroll county, Mo., then returning to Illinois, where he engaged in farming until he was twenty-two. He then entered mercantile ranks as a clerk in a warehouse concern in Hudson, Ill., and, in 1875, came to Albany, Ore., which has since been his home.

In Illinois Mr. Beam was united in marriage with Emma J. Groves, who was born in McDonough county, Ill., and whose father served in an Illinois regiment during the Civil war. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Beam, of whom Orrin is a medical student in San Jose, Cal.; Delbert is clerking in Portland, Ore.; and Bessie and Lloyd are at home. Mr.

Beam is a Republican, and is a member of the McPherson Post, G. A. R., of Albany. In religion he is a Baptist.

WILLIAM BENTS was born in Kansas, February 28, 1860, the son of Henry and Anna (Bosshard) Bents, both natives of Switzerland, whose emigration to the United States took place in 1854. (For further information regarding the parents refer to the sketch of Fred Bents, the eldest son of this family, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work.) When William Bents was but three years old his father removed to Oregon, crossing the plains by ox-teams and settling in Marion county, near Butteville, where he purchased a farm from John Shyrer, who proved a friend to the emigrant family during the years in which the father was struggling for a foothold in this western land.

The education of Mr. Bents was received in the common schools of Oregon, which he attended intermittently until he commenced work for himself. He was reared on the old home place, and after his marriage, January 1, 1894, to Miss Annie M. Hopp, began housekeeping there in a modern house, having built the same in 1892. Mr. Bents now owns one-third of the original land composing the three hundred and six acres which his father purchased in 1864. Upon this property he is now engaged in general farming, in which he takes an intelligent and practical interest. In connection with his brothers, Fred and Henry L., he is interested in hop-cultivation, and like them has made an unquestionable success of the business. He has fourteen acres devoted to this plant.

Mr. Bents is a Republican and serves his country whenever called upon. At present he is road supervisor of his township.

REV. FELIX BUCHER. A commanding personality in the religious and intellectual world embraced in Benton, Lincoln, and the surrounding counties of Oregon, is Father Felix Bucher, who came as a missionary to this state in 1893, and has since devoted the resources of a cultured mind and great heart to the uplifting of the Indian, and the maintenance of peace and good will among various congregations of worshippers.

In Dillingen, a village of Bavaria, province of Schwaben and Neuburg, Germany, Father Bucher was born September 23, 1862. Augsburg, the capital of that province, which claims great antiquity, the Emperor Augustus having established a colony there as early as 12 B. C., later took a prominent place in the history of religious disturbances, and today numbers among its claims to distinction its large trade in printing, engraving and bookbinding, its splendid picture gallery, its gymnasiums and schools, and its office of the Allgemeine Zeitung, the leading journal of Germany, established there in 1796. Into this historic atmosphere, where Holbein, the elder, was born, and where he painted, and where the wines of Switzerland and Italy are sent forth into every quarter of the globe, Xavier Bucher, the father of Felix, was born, in the same village of Dillingen, and for the greater part of his active life conducted a mercantile enterprise. He was of German and French descent. His wife, Crescentia (Wachter) Bucher, was a native of Augsburg, and was the mother of seven children, three of whom are living, Father Felix being the only one in America, and the youngest in the family.

It is evident that Rev. Bucher never entertained a thought of life outside the priesthood, for at the early age of fourteen he left his home in Dillingen and took up his abode in the mother house in the Palazzo Moroni, in Rome. This old palace, occupied now by the Society of the Divine Savior, was owned three hundred years ago by Cardinal Moroni, and has since borne his name. Here Rev. Bucher was prepared for his chosen calling among the most favorable and inspiring conditions in the world, and was eventually ordained in the great church of St. John of Lateran, the mother church of the whole Catholic world, September 19, 1891. For a year after his ordination he remained in the Palazzo and then undertook the long journey to Vancouver, Wash., where he remained for a short time. From there he came to Oregon as a missionary of the church, spending one year at The Dalles as pastor of St. Peters, and the next year was located at Newport, as pastor of the church there. In connection with the latter charge he visited the Siletz Indian Mission in Lincoln county, which very worthy enterprise has been attended once or twice a year for some years by Father Crockert, of Grande Ronde, one of the most sacrificing and helpful of the early Indian workers, and who had spent forty years in trying to improve the condition of the red men. While at Newport Father Bucher became somewhat familiar with the work at this mission, and in 1897 took up his residence on the reservation, the church and parsonage of which was donated by Mother Catherine Drexel, of Philadelphia, and consecrated by Archbishop Cross. Ever since, Father Bucher has ministered to the spiritual needs of a large and increasing congregation, for the responsibilities of which he is eminently fitted, having learned the Chinook language sufficiently well to be able to converse and preach therein. He also holds services at other churches and missions, and in January, 1903, assumed charge of St. Mary's Church at Corvallis. A scholar, linguist and man of practical and humanitarian ideas, Father Bucher exerts a wonderful influence upon the lives of those by whom he is surrounded, leading them always up to greater heights, and into broader and more useful fields of activity. He is devoted to his work, to the country in which his lines are cast, and to the people who look to him as their guide in the every-day affairs of life. Surely the people of his far-off native town in Germany should be proud of its native son, who has traveled so far, so well, and so fearlessly to a splendid and resourceful destiny.

WILLIAM WILLIS OGLESBY, M. D. The president of the Golden Slipper Mining Company, Dr. W. W. Oglesby, is a man of many and rare talents, and these have led him into many pursuits wherein he has found much pleasure and considerable profit, for he unites with a singularly forceful character the temperament of a man of letters. Since his advent into the west he has found much to interest him in the mountain peaks of his adopted state, and has ascended nearly all the snow-capped peaks of the Cascade range. He was the first man who reached the crest of Mount Jefferson, ascending this mountain in 1886, having ascended Mount Hood in 1869, the Three Sisters in 1865, Diamond Peak in 1858 and Mount Shasta in 1856. While interested in climbing he has branched out into hunting and a study of the formations and growths of this wonderful land, which have added no little to his information. Dr. Oglesby is also a famous Indian fighter, having been forced to this form of war while crossing the plains in 1853, and again in the Bannock war in Umatilla county, Ore., in 1878, he served three months as captain of Company G, commanding at the battle of Willow Springs, which was the scene of the fiercest Indian fighting on the coast. With shrewd business sagacity Dr. Oglesby has also devoted much time in his rambling over the mountains to a search for that which makes the onward march of the world possible, and he has met with rare success, having been the fortunate discoverer of two remunerative mines in southern Oregon. The first was the Bohemian mines, which he discovered in 1858, but the one of which he is now president, the Golden Slipper, was discovered in 1898. This has since developed into a good paying property, the company having now a capital of $1,000,000, divided into ten million shares, of the par value of ten cents per share, fully paid up and non-assessable. The property of this corporation consists of what is known as the Golden Slipper group of mining claims, located on the eastern slope of Grouse mountain, in the Bohemia mining district, Douglas county, Ore., only a short distance from mines famous throughout that section of the country, and there is every prospect of turning out a fortune from this property. Much credit is due Dr. Oglesby for his share in the business, as with several others he succeeded in the promotion of the company.

Dr. Oglesby was the fourth son in a family of six sons and eight daughters, his birth occurring May 3, 1837, in Adams county, Ill. He was the son of William Oglesby, a native of South Carolina, who came from Virginia with his parents to the Prairie state when only a young lad. Ex-Governor Oglesby, of Illinois, was an uncle of the family. The preliminary education of Dr. Oglesby was received in the common schools of Missouri and Oregon. Anxious to gain a thorough knowledge of books he never ceased his application to his studies. In 1868 he began the study of medicine under the instruction of Dr. Johnson, of Corvallis, and in 1869 he took a course in Toltin Medical College, of San Francisco, after which he practiced his profession in California for four years, every step forward being the result of earnest, patient effort on his own part. In 1875 he came to Oregon and attended two courses of lectures in Willamette University, and two years later was graduated with the degree of M. D. He then engaged in general practice in Weston, Ore., where he remained for three years, and then located in Fossil for a period of ten years, after which he removed in 1889 to Cottage Grove. Four years later he became a resident of Junction City, Lane county, and engaged in the general practice of his profession, later becoming interested in the Golden Slipper mining proposition.

The marriage of Dr. Oglesby first united him with Sarah Jane Morrison, a native of Tennessee, and took place in Benton county, Ore. She was the daughter of Rev. J. P. Morrison, who was born in Tennessee, and after a residence in Missouri came to Oregon in 1862, locating in Benton county. Nine years later he removed to California, where his death occurred at the age of eighty-four years. Mrs. Oglesby died in Corvallis, in 1867, when still quite young, and the doctor married in 1871, a sister of his first wife, Nancy C., a native of Missouri. The one child born of the first union was Anna, who is still at home with her father. In addition to his many other interests Dr. Oglesby took up and mastered the study of telegraphy and held many positions as an operator. He has also been connected with newspaper work for about fifteen years, in Cottage Grove, and was a delegate to New Orleans and to the Pan-American Exposition for the Press Association. He has also written some verse, which certainly has shown his power with the pen. In his fraternal relations Dr. Oglesby holds a prominent place, being a member of the Blue Lodge and the Chapter, A. F. & A. M., of Eugene, Ore.; Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of Eugene; Knights of Pythias, of Junction City; Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Encampment; and is an honorary member of the Woodmen of the World, in which he acted as physician for some time. He is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Politically Dr. Oglesby has always been a staunch adherent of the principles of the Democratic party, and served as mayor of Cottage Grove for two years, and also of Junction City. He was a candidate for the state legislature in 1896, but was defeated, and in the year in which William Jennings Bryan was first candidate for the presidency he was one of the state electors.

ROBERT M. CRAWFORD was born in Belfast, Ireland, December 25, 1824, and was reared on a small tenant farm which at best could furnish but scant livelihood for the family of fifteen children. His paternal grandfather, James, was born near Glasgow, Scotland, and as a young man established the family on the farm at Crawfordsburn, near Belfast. On this same farm John Crawford, the father of Robert, was born, and he also was a farmer. John Crawford married Eliza Johnson, born in County Antrim, Ireland. At present but two of this family are living, Thomas having been killed in Albany in 1856; William died here in 1890, and John died in 1900.

Limited facilities for acquiring an education, together with scant opportunity for earning a livelihood, handicapped the early life of the Crawford children. To support himself Robert learned the miller's trade, at which he worked from 1842 until 1848, when he came to the United States, making his way from New York city overland to Lexington, Mo. Here he worked at his trade until 1849, and then joined a caravan bound for the western coast, his brother John accompanying him, and James Waddell. They came via the old California trail and were over five months on the way, finally arriving in San Francisco, where the brothers stopped with old Captain Woodward in the historic Whatcheer Hotel. Two weeks later they started for Nicolaus, Sutter county, and still later made their way to the Yuba Dam, mining at the latter place about four weeks, and going then to the Grass Valley mining district. These expeditions were not without their dangers and exciting adventures, for the Indians still resented the intrusion of the pale faces, and made their progress at best hazardous and uncertain. This was especially true when Mr. Crawford went to Humboldt Bay in March, 1850, and later to the Salmon river district and Scott's Bar. After a time he returned to Butte City, now Eureka, Cal., and engaged in both mining and merchandising, in 1851 joining his brother in Oregon City.

To Mr. Crawford is due the credit of having ground the first flour in Linn county. He purchased the mill and site of the Magnolia Mills, started and managed them for ten years, finally disposing of the property to Jim Foster. Later on he re-purchased the mill with his other brother, when Mr. Foster failed, and conducted it for many years, or until it was purchased by Colonel Hoag. Owing to ill health Mr. Crawford left this part of the country and sought a change of climate and surroundings in Boise City and Walla Walla, in both of which towns he started mills, and in the former of which he made his home for thirty years. In Idaho he was especially prominent in political affairs, and also took an active part in subduing the Indians, whose language he learned, and whose interests he studied and forwarded. He took part in three of the Rogue river wars, and was prominent in forming treaties and directly treated with the aggrieved red men.

In 1890 Mr. Crawford and his brother, William, came to Albany to take charge of their affairs, and he has since continued to be a resident of this city. He is a Democrat, and a member of the St. John Lodge No. 62, F. and A. M., and is also identified with the Bayley Chapter, R. A. M., and with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The death of his brother John fell heavily upon the heart of this honored pioneer, for John and he were associated in many of the important undertakings of their lives, and were the closest of friends and boon companions. They crossed the plains together, sitting many evenings over cheery camp-fires, and planning for the future with the enthusiasm of youth as yet untried, and therefore hopeful. They mined and milled together, and together built the canal in Albany, besides owning many large properties upon which they engaged in farming and stock-raising. Mr. Crawford is at present a very large owner of country and town land, his possessions being located mostly in Linn county in the Willamette valley, and in the heavily timbered portions of the north. True to the land of his birth, he has visited his friends in Ireland on half a dozen occasions, coming back always with renewed appreciation of the many advantages awaiting him in the northwest.

JOHN W. MCKINNEY is a native son of the west, and was born on his father's farm near Marion village, this county, December 21, 1855.

His father, William W. McKinney, was born in Missouri, and came to Oregon in the early pioneer days, thereafter establishing himself among the successful agriculturists of his vicinity. When John W. was five years of age the family fortunes were shifted to four miles east of Turner, where the father died, and where the son grew to manhood, remaining with his mother until the fall of 1879. While still on the home farm he attended the public schools and Willamette University, the latter of which he returned to several times, and finally graduated therefrom in June, 1879. For the following four years he rented the home place, and in the fall of 1883 removed to the farm upon which he still lives, bringing with him his wife, formerly Edna T. Smith, whom he married February 28, 1883. At the present time Mr. McKinney owns three hundred and twelve acres of land, upon which he has built a fine house, and fitted with all modern improvements. Since 1888 the greater part of his land has been devoted to stock-raising, Hereford cattle, Berkshire hogs, and Leicester sheep being among the most profitable stock. He has forty head of registered Hereford cattle, and all his stock is the best procurable. The farm is called the Rockwell ranch, and is located one and a half miles southwest of Turner.

No children were born of the first marriage of Mr. McKinney, his wife dying February 3, 1893. The present Mrs. McKinney, whom he married November 21, 1897, was Miss Minnie Colwell, of Salem. One child, Althea Lee, has blessed this union. Mr. McKinney enjoys an enviable reputation in Marion county, and he has many friends among the representative families that live here.

HON. H. B. NICHOLS. One of the most interesting lives to be found among the early settlers in the western states is that of the Hon. H. B. Nichols who, though in his eighty-third year, still enjoys the good health and activity of a man many years his junior. A student from his earliest youth Mr. Nichols has broadened the current of his mental attainments by close and intimate associations with the business affairs of both the eastern and western sections of the country, and through contact with many and varied nationalities he has become a keen, shrewd judge of human nature, but tempers the reading with a kindly personality which has won him many friends.

The family of H. B. Nichols is of New England birth, his father being a native of Middletown, Conn., where he died at the age of seventy-seven years. For a great many years he followed the business of hat manufacturing in Colchester, Conn., where he was very prominent in industrial circles. Henry Brainard Nichols was born January 15, 1821, in Lyme, Conn., and received his preliminary education in the public schools of that town, and at Brainard Academy, Haddam, Conn., later attending Wesleyan University in the city of his father's birth. On account of ill health he left his home when quite young and entered upon a course of traveling, taking sea voyages for twenty-two months, during which time he visited the most interesting parts of the globe, gaining most valuable knowledge from his association with the various peoples. On returning to his home he went to Iowa, in company with his brother-in-law, Dr. Dayton, intending to take up the study of medicine; but, finding the country well supplied with such professional men, he organized, instead, a select school in Muscatine, conducting the same for five years. Later in life many prominent men of the state of Iowa recalled the time when they attended the school conducted by Mr. Nichols. Having seen enough of the world to make him interested in all geographical questions, Mr. Nichols became an emigrant to help change the conditions of the western territory, in 1852 crossing the plains with ox-teams with the intention of settling in Oregon. After a journey of five months he reached his destination, and at once became a resident of Umpqua valley, later taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres about six miles west of Monroe, Benton county, where he has since made his home. In addition to his general farming and stock-raising Mr. Nichols has taught school in Oregon, commencing his pedagogical work the first winter which he spent here. Being one of the most intelligent and best informed men of the early days, he has always taken an active part in all public affairs, being often called upon in the matter of law contracts, etc. In 1857 he was a member of the constitutional convention, a member of the last territorial legislature and served one term in the state legislature, where he ably represented those who had honored him with their support. Through his early association with educational matters he has always been interested in all that pertained to the advancement of knowledge, for thirty years serving as school clerk in this vicinity. Mr. Nichols now owns twelve hundred acres of land, a part of which is rented, though he continues the management of the remainder.

While a resident of Muscatine, Iowa, Mr. Nichols married Martha Overman, a native of Ohio, and through their many years of married life she was a faithful helper toward wealth and success in the western venture. She died in 1883, leaving three children, all of whom were graduates of Willamette University. The oldest, Alfred C., is now deceased; R. J. is the librarian for the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, Ore.; and Caroline is the wife of Judson Reeves, of Salem. Fraternaly Mr. Nichols affiliates with the Grange, having helped to establish that organization in this vicinity, and was the first secretary of the same, and later served as master. Politically he is a Republican and has always been so since the formation of that party, but previously was a Whig, and gave his first presidential vote to Henry Clay, in 1844, while a student at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn. As a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Mr. Nichols has been faithful for fifty years.

GEORGE WASHINGTON PHILLIPS was born in Guilford county, N. C., October 24, 1838, the son of David and Sarah (Sullinger) Phillips, born respectively August 24 and 27, 1797, and both natives of North Carolina. In 1838 Mr. Phillips brought his family to Ray county, Mo., and there engaged in farming, until his removal in 1843 to Texas, where, near Paris, he continued to follow this occupation. Three years later he again made his home in Missouri, in Andrew county engaging in farming, and in 1852 he outfitted with ox-teams and crossed the plains via the Platte river, after six months' travel arriving safely in Salem, Ore., where he spent the first winter. In March, 1853, he came to Linn county, and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located six miles northeast of Scio, where he remained for twenty-two years. Later himself and wife made their home with G. W., of this review, where Mr. Phillips' death occurred at the age of eighty-four years. Mrs. Phillips died here in 1889, surviving her husband seven years. She was the mother of three sons and six daughters, of whom G. W. is the youngest.

G. W. Phillips was reared upon his father's farm, receiving a rather limited education in the common schools. When twenty years old he took charge of the paternal farm and conducted the same for many years. At that date there were nine hundred acres of land in the one tract on the location northeast of this place, and since that time Mr. Phillips has dealt extensively in land, owning at one time more than did any other farmer in the county. He later disposed of much of this, and coming to Scio bought a tract containing three hundred and fifty acres, but now owns but two hundred and twenty acres, this property converted into cash going into the business life of Scio. In 1894 he became the owner of the flour mills of the city, and has since furnished them with the most complete and up-to-date equipment, the mill being run by water power, the latter being entirely in the control of

Mr. Phillips. The capacity of the mill is one hundred and twenty barrels of flour per day. In 1897 he purchased considerable stock in the bank here, taking out a third interest in the business, and acted as one of the directors of the same until 1900. Mr. Phillips is also the owner of a local railroad, which runs from Scio to West Scio, a distance of three miles.

In Linn county, Ore., Mr. Phillips was united in marriage with Miss Martha Tarply, who was born in Missouri, December 13, 1841. Of their five children William Monroe is located in West Scio; Saide is the wife of George Coffey, a farmer in this vicinity; Emma is the wife of Grant Davids, of Silverton, Ore.; Ida is the wife of J. A. Warwick, and makes her home in this city, and George W. is in Salem. As a member of the Knights of the Maccabees Mr. Phillips carries a life insurance policy for $3,000. In his political convictions he was once a Democrat, but now casts his ballot with the Republican party. He has served as county commissioner for two years, and as school director and road supervisor for many terms.

PROF. WILLIAM M. MILLER. A native of Oregon, William M. Miller was born near McMinnville, Yamhill county, December 3, 1862, a son of A. M. Miller. His grandfather, the late Richard N. Miller, was born in old Virginia, but for several years resided in Cole county, Mo., where he was a citizen of influence, and for a number of terms served as sheriff of the county. Coming across the plains to Oregon in 1847, the year of the great Mormon emigration, he took up a donation claim, from which he improved a good farm. He spent one season in the California mines, and was afterwards engaged in the stock business in eastern Oregon. A man of a deeply religious nature, he was ordained as a minister in the Baptist Church after coming to this state, and for a number of years was a local preacher. He spent his last days in Marion county.

Coming to Oregon with his father when twenty-two years of age, A. M. Miller assisted in the pioneer labor of improving a homestead for two years. In 1849, on the discovery of gold in California, he went with the first wagon-train to the mines, Eugene Skinner and Colonel Lee being members of the same party. After spending three years as a miner, he returned to Oregon, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits, first in Yamhill county, then in Linn county, near Scio. Removing to Lane county in 1870, he bought the old Samuel Baughman donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, lying just above Pleasant Hill, where he improved a farm, which he managed until his death, in 1902, at the age of seventy-eight years. He was identified with the Democratic party, and was a deacon in the Baptist Church. He married Sarah Jane Hutchinson, who was born in Missouri, and came to Oregon with her aunt, Mrs. Tandy, in the Horton train, in 1850. She survives him, and resides on the home farm. Of the eleven children born of their union, ten grew to years of maturity, and eight are living, namely: Mrs. Nancy Hamilton, of Eugene; Mrs. Gertrude Wilhelm, residing near Florence, Lane county; Mrs. Belle McCall, of Silver Lake, Ore.; R. N., a stockman of Okanogan county, Wash.; William M., the special subject of this sketch; J. R., of Silver Lake, Ore.; A. T., a farmer at Pleasant Hill, Lane county; and D. J., also a farmer.

A resident of Lane county since seven years of age, William M. Miller obtained the rudiments of his education in the district schools, at the same time being well trained in the art and science of agriculture on the parental homestead. He subsequently pursued his studies at the University of Oregon for three years, and after teaching in the county schools for another three years again entered that university, this time remaining two years, giving up his studies while in the senior class to go to Montana. At the end of six months he returned to Oregon, where he resumed his professional labors, teaching first in Wasco county, then in the valley. Subsequently becoming principal of the Lonerock school, in Gilliam county, he remained there until 1892, when he accepted the principalship of the Creswell School, in Lane county. In 1898 Mr. Miller was elected county superintendent of the Lane county schools on the Democratic ticket, for a term of two years, receiving a majority of one hundred and five votes. In 1900 he was re-elected for a term of four years, receiving a majority of ninety-one of the votes cast, the majority showing his great popularity, as the Republican ticket was elected by a majority of four hundred votes.

Since assuming his present position, Mr. Miller has been constantly adding to the efficiency of the schools of the county, among other things introducing the state course of study into the schools, and a system of public school examinations into the eight grades, the papers being graded by the superintendent himself. He has now full control of one hundred and seventy-five school districts, the last legislature having, through his efforts, so changed the district boundaries that seven of the Douglas county districts are now under his supervision. In these districts there are two hundred and twenty-one teachers, for whose benefit he has established summer institutes and local meetings, holding from four to ten each year. His superintendency covers the greatest length of territory of any county in the state, being two hundred miles from one extreme to the other by the nearest traveled road, and stands No. 1 in regard to districts, although it is the third in regard to school population.

Mr. Miller married, in Eugene, Ore., Clara B. Fowler, who was born at Peters, Cal., and they have two children, namely: W. Keft and E. Maude. Fraternally Mr. Miller belongs to many of the leading organizations of this locality, being a member of Creswell Lodge, A. F. & A. M.; of Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; of the Woodmen of the World; of the Modern Woodmen of America; and of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is a prominent member of the State Teachers Association, in which he takes an intelligent interest, and belongs to the Baptist Church. Politically he is a staunch Democrat.

PHY SIMPSON is a native son of Oregon, having been born at Lewisville, Polk county, September 18, 1868. His ancestry is directly southern, his parents being natives of Arkansas, his grandparents of Tennessee, the sketch of his father, which appears elsewhere in this work, giving a detailed account of their lives. Five children of his father's family attained maturity, of whom Phy was the third, and when his school days were over he entered into the same business which had occupied his father's attention for so many years. In 1893 he bought a one-third interest in the saw-mills located at Independence, the two others comprising the firm being F. A. Douty and his brother, David Simpson, a farmer near Pedee. Their combined interests were then known as the Independence Lumbering Company. They now have two camps occupying the attention of twenty men, while Mr. Simpson alone owns between four and five thousand acres of lumber land on the Luckiamute, and his share of the equipment consists of twenty head of cattle, ten horses and a donkey engine. The output for the year is in the neighborhood of four million feet of lumber. In Airlie, Polk county, Mr. Simpson has built a handsome residence, wherein he now makes his home with his wife, a native of Polk county. The one child born to Mr. and Mrs. Simpson is Eldon. Mr. Simpson is a Democrat in his political affiliations, and fraternally belongs to the Woodmen of the World.

THOMAS B. SPRENGER. It is doubtless owing to the industrious and persevering manner with which Thomas B. Sprenger has adhered to the pursuits of agriculture that he has risen to such a substantial position in the farming affairs of Linn county. Two years after his birth, which occurred October 25, 1850, his parents, Nicholas and Maria (Bird) Sprenger, natives of Germany and Pennsylvania, respectively, removed from Morgan county, Ohio, and settled in Linn county, Ore., and from that time, which is practically his whole life, Thomas B. Sprenger has made his home continuously in this region.

Thomas B. Sprenger spent his youth much the same as do most farmers' sons, attending the district schools in the winter season and giving a helping hand in the multifarious duties that fall to the farmer's lot. Until 1875 he remained under the parental roof, but in that year he married Miss Elizabeth J. May, a native of Iowa, who, in 1865, had crossed the plains with her father, James May. The latter settled upon a farm located northeast of Peoria, which he conducted for a time, but finally abandoned it and engaged in mercantile pursuits in the village of Shedd's. The young people made their first home in the house which the elder Mr. Sprenger erected upon first coming to Oregon, but in time this rude affair was superseded by a more commodious and up-to-date residence, in which the family now reside. A fine set of outbuildings is in keeping with the other modern improvements which Mr. Sprenger has introduced since his occupancy of the present homestead. While he carries on general farming, he also carries on a dairy business, which adds no inconsiderable amount to his yearly income. The products of his dairy are supplied from a fine grade of Jersey cattle.

Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Sprenger, as follows: Zaida, who married O. L. Carey, a confectioner of Lebanon; Winnie, the wife of James Fisher, superintendent of the poor farm; Wallace, a farmer in Linn county; Mabel, the wife of R. Hoffleck, who also resides in the county; and Clayton, Arzelia, Thelma, Ethel and Thomas, the latter five of whom are still at home with their parents. Mr. Sprenger is a member of the Grange, which he is at present serving in the capacity of assistant steward. In political affairs he upholds the man rather than the party, and is thus bound to neither party.

THOMAS W. POTTER. To Thomas W. Potter is due the distinction of being the only successful superintendent of the Chemawa Indian School at Salem. At the time of his assumption of authority, in 1895, the school was in a demoralized condition, the attendance numbered but two hundred, and all semblance of system or order had disappeared during the administration of seven superintendents. At the present time the school enrollment is nearly eight hundred. To accommodate the increased attendance eight or ten buildings have been erected, and the promoters have under immediate consideration a large and modernly equipped structure to cost $25,000. All trades are taught in the institution, and the little community, with its multiplicity of interests, its air of industry, cleanliness, high moral tone, and general good fellowship, presents a spectacle of enlightened interest in the future of the red man cheering alike to the humanitarian, the statistician, and the student of sociology. Many graduates of the school are serving as teachers, housekeepers, cooks, governesses, seamstresses, bookkeepers, and kindred occupations, and many have developed sufficient means and independence to operate shops and farms of their own.

Mr. Potter was born in Ontario, Canada, December 28, 1863. From his father, who was a minister in the Methodist Church, he inherited an appreciation of education, liberality of thought, and humanitarianism, and so well did he apply himself as a student, that he had graduated at both the Hamilton Collegiate Institute and the Toronto Normal School before he was eighteen years of age. After a year of teaching in Canada he went to Texas and taught mathematics at Fort Worth University for a year, and experienced the novelty of cow-boy life on the plains of Texas and Indian territory for a couple of years. Thereafter he engaged in educational work at the Cheyenne school, and when Col. D. B. Dyer was agent of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, he received his first regular appointment as a teacher in the Cheyenne school, in 1884, and has ever since been identified with the work of bettering the condition of the Indian. After leaving the Cheyenne school he taught for a year in the Arapahoe school, from 1886 until 1887 in the Kiowa and Comanche agency; from 1887 until 1889 was sub-agent at Cantonment, Okla.; for one year a teacher at the Carlisle Indian School; for one year a teacher at Fort Totten, N. D.; and from 1893 until 1895, was superintendent and acting agent of the Eastern Cherokees, N. C.

As a relaxation from his responsibility Mr. Potter is interested in stock-raising, with which his early experience as a cow-boy made him very familiar. He is the owner of a profitable and large cattle ranch and farm in the Indian territory.

L. S. MORIN. At the base of the mountains, in the vicinity of Dayton, is the farm occupied for two years more than half a century by Mrs. Addison Darr, one of the best known women in Yamhill county. This property, well tilled, productive, and finely equipped, is necessarily associated with its original owner, L. S. Morin, than whom no more honored early settler braved the dangers of the plains in '44.

Mr. Morin, the first husband of Mrs. Darr, was born in the state of Kentucky in 1819, his father being a very prominent politician of the Blue Grass region. The latter, who died in California at the age of ninety-five years, was the father of four children, none of whom is living at the present time. The son, L. S., remained in the home in Kentucky until 1844, and that year joined a train consisting of sixty or seventy wagons, under command of Captain Ford. Mr. Morin was accompanied by his step-brother, and was equipped with provisions and ox-teams, and on the journey encountered many experiences of a decidedly unpleasant nature. However, the party arrived in safety at the end of their long trip, Mr. Morin going direct to Yamhill county, where he took up a donation claim consisting of a section of land, on what is now known as the Salem and LaFayette road, five miles north of Hopewell. Here he erected a small log cabin, and during 1847-8 was absent in the mining regions of California, returning to his claim in '49. His marriage at that time with Eleanor Chrisman was the outgrowth of a romantic attachment begun on the plains, Joel and Mary Chrisman, the parents of Mrs. Morin, being members of that band of home seekers. Mrs. Morin was born in Virginia, November 4, 1826.

Having become firmly established on the donation claim, Mr. Morin took another trip down into California, but not experiencing success, soon afterward came back and resumed general farming operations on his farm. He was not destined to long enjoy the advantages by which he was surrounded, for his death occurred in 1856, while still in the prime of his manhood and greatest usefulness. Three children were born to himself and wife, of whom Josiah and John are still living with their mother, and Laban S. is a resident of McMinnville.

After the death of her husband Mrs. Morin continued to live on the home place, and in 1860 was united in marriage with Addison Darr, who was born and reared in Ohio, and who crossed the plains in 1852. Two children were born of this union, of whom Addison is living in Dayton, and Ella is the wife of a farmer of this neighborhood. In 1888 Mr. Darr died, and since then his widow has lived on the same place, enjoying the same enviable reputation for hospitality which has characterized her whole life in Oregon. She is prominent in the Christian Church, which she joined as a young woman, and her influence has ever been exerted along educational and general improvement lines.

J. S. Morin, the oldest son in the family, and one of the prominent farmers in this county, is unmarried, and has passed his whole life with his mother. He is enterprising and progressive, and a model farmer and manager. A Democrat in politics, he has never aspired to official recognition, but has honestly cast his vote for the man rather than his political inclinations. Mr. Morin is a welcome member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he has passed all of the chairs but that of treasurer, and he is also identified with the Eastern Star.

BRUNO G. BOEDIGHEIMER, who is the proprietor of the Club stables of Salem and a most successful liveryman, was born in Ottertail county, Minn., January 15, 1867. His father, who was also named Bruno, was born on the Rhine in Germany. The grandfather, who followed building there for some time, brought the family to America when his son, Bruno, was about five years of age. He located in Medina county, Ohio, where he followed carpentering and building, and his death occurred in that state. Bruno Boedigheimer, Sr., was reared in Ohio, learned the carpenter's trade in his youth and followed that pursuit in the Buckeye state until the fall of 1866, when he removed to Minnesota, settling in Ottertail county, where he homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres of land, to which he added by purchase until his farm comprised three hundred and twenty acres. This he placed under a very high state of cultivation, became a prominent and prosperous farmer of that locality and eventually his landed possessions there aggregated one thousand acres. In 1882 he came to Oregon and for a year followed farming in Linn county, after which he purchased a farm near Stayton, there engaging in agricultural pursuits until his death, which occurred in November, 1902, when he was seventy-eight years of age. He was of the Catholic faith. His widow still resides on the old home place. She bore the maiden name of Mary Bauhaus and was born in Holland, on the German border. Her father died in the old country and when eighteen years of age Mrs. Boedigheimer came with her mother to America and was married in Medina county, Ohio. By this union there were seven sons and two daughters, of whom five sons and one daughter are yet living. The family record is as follows: Frank died in Salem, in 1901; Joseph and William follow farming in Minnesota; Simon is living at the old home in Sublimity, Ore.; Bruno is next in order of birth; John and Enos are engaged in farming at Sublimity; Aurelia is a sister in St. Mary's convent; and Julia died in Minnesota.

Farm work early became familiar to Bruno Boedigheimer. He attended the public schools until ten years of age, after which his attention was entirely occupied with the labors of the fields, as he assisted his father in the improvement of the home farm in Minnesota and afterward in Oregon. He remained under the parental roof until he attained his majority, when he started out upon an independent business career, carrying on general farming on his father's land. While residing upon the old home place he purchased one hundred and sixty acres adjoining and to the development and improvement of that place he devoted his energies with excellent success. In 1900 he purchased the Club livery stables from L. Miller, on Liberty and Ferry streets, and here has the largest barn in the city. He still superintends his farm and a part of his father's place, his business ability being manifest in the successful conduct of both departments of his business.

Mr. Boedigheimer was united in marriage in Sublimity to Miss Kate Fessler, who was born in Minnesota. They have seven children: Henry, George, Tillie, Mary, Julia, Aggie and William. In his political views Mr. Boedigheimer is an earnest Democrat, but has never had either time nor desire to seek public office, his attention being fully occupied by his business interests.

EDWIN N. SHEDD comes of an old New England family, the forefathers having been natives of New Hampshire, where his grandfather, Silas Shedd, was born of English parentage. The father, William, was also born and reared in that state, later making his home in Illinois, where several of his children now live. For further information regarding his life refer to the sketch of S. L. Shedd, which appears on another page of this work.

Edwin N. Shedd was born in Alstead, Cheshire county, N. H., March 5, 1848, and was reared on his father's farm, attending the common schools of the state until his removal in 1867 to Illinois, where, for two years, he remained in Knox county. In 1869 he decided to try his fortunes in the west, going first from his home in the middle west to New York city, where he took steamer to Panama, thence to San Francisco, landing at the last-named place in March of the same year. Determined upon the life of a miner, he at once sought work of this nature, mining in both Trinity and Humboldt county, Cal. In September of the same year he came to Corvallis, Ore., and engaged in a saw-mill, finding this employment lucrative for five years, when he changed his location to Gardiner, Douglas county, and continuing there until 1876, when he returned east to visit the Centennial Exposition. Thence he went to New Hampshire, enjoying a visit among the scenes of his childhood. On his return to California he stopped in Illinois. On his second arrival in the west he mined for a time at Weaverville, Trinity county, and later settled in Lewiston, where he engaged in prospecting and placer mining for nearly twenty-seven years, during which time he met with a gratifying success in his chosen work.

In December, 1902, he returned to Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., where his brother, S. L., makes his home, and has since continued to live with him. Fraternally Mr. Shedd belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows having been made a member November 29, 1870, of Barnum Lodge, No. 7, of which he was noble grand in 1873. He is still a member here. He also belongs to the Encampment in Albany, and to the Rebekahs. He belongs to the American Protective Association and politically is a Republican.

S. N. LILLY was born December 18, 1830, in Oneida county, N. Y., the son of a farmer, who died when S. N. was quite young. The mother later married again, and at the age of fourteen years S. N. Lilly left the home roof to make his own way in the world. With an older brother he started toward the west, stopping for about seven years in the state of Illinois, at the close of which period he came to Oregon, crossing the plains by ox-teams, six months of the year being taken up in the journey. Beyond the hardships and privations incident to life on the plains they came through without any trouble, arriving safely in Benton county, Ore., where they settled near Philomath, and there Mr. Lilly bought a farm and remained two years. At the close of that time he traded this place for one located in King's valley, making the latter his home for fifteen years, when he also traded that farm for the one where he now lives. His present possession consists of four hundred acres, two hundred and fifty acres of which are under cultivation. The land adjoins Corvallis on the south, and he is now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, being also interested in hops and fruit, forty and fifteen acres, respectively, being devoted to their cultivation.

In 1860 Mr. Lilly was united in marriage with Miss Lucinda A. Hardie, a native of Illinois, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1852, and of the union nine children were born, named in order of birth as follows: Sidi, deceased; Leslie, located in Roseburg; Ora, the wife of W. C. Corbett, of Corvallis; Clara, the wife of W. W. Hall, of Salem; Frank, located in Lagrange, Ore.; Hettie, at home; Mary, the wife of William Carver, of Minnesota; Arthur and Ruth, also at home with their father. In 1893 Mrs. Lilly died. Mr. Lilly takes an active part in politics, being an adherent of the Republican party. Fraternally he is a Mason, and he also belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

An interesting event in the life of Mr. Lilly was his enlistment under Captain Miller for services in the Cayuse war, and during his six-months service he took part in the engagement at Grande Ronde, where he suffered a wound and a broken arm. He was mustered out at The Dalles.

ARMAND L. WYNNE, M. D. During the last twenty years of his life, Dr. A. L. Wynne was connected with a medical and surgical practice in Cottage Grove which not only placed him on a par with the most eminent and learned in the profession in Lane county, but which established his right to the title of one of nature's noblemen, well planned, well developed, extremely cultured, humane and optimistic. The death of Dr. Wynne in 1883, at the age of fifty-four, and at the zenith of his power and usefulness, was a great shock to the community, the deepest regret being felt that so brilliant and forceful a man should succumb to work entailed by his supreme allegiance to a fascinating and exhaustive science.

Dr. Wynne was born in old Virginia, his father, John, being a native of the same state, and owner of a large plantation, still associated with a family which was numbered among the old aristocracy of an historic time. No less a distinguished center was the large farm in Daviess county, Mo., upon which John Wynne settled at an early day, taking with him into the practical wilderness the manners and graceful hospitality of the southern gentleman of culture and wealth. According to the light of his early and subsequent training he saw no error in maintaining a large retinue of slaves in both Virginia and Missouri, and his entire life was passed in an atmosphere suggestive of the feudal, the leisurely and the hospitable. His son, A. L., was educated in Virginia, Philadelphia and St. Louis, Mo., and from earliest childhood evinced a liking for science, anatomy and medicine. He crossed the plains in 1864, more to see the country than from motives of economy, and located first at Grande Ronde valley, engaging in a professional practice for which he had specially qualified in Philadelphia. Soon afterward he located in Cottage Grove, and that his prescriptions are still valued to the extent of being used by the drug stores in Cottage Grove argues well for his skill in diagnosis and treatment. A student always, and with a receptive, inquiring brain, he never tired of investigating the unexplored regions of medical and surgical science, with the result that few were more thoroughly in touch with every phase of the broad subject. He was well known in the social life of the county, and was identified with the Masons and Odd Fellows, and with various professional associations. In politics he was a Democrat, and his religious home was in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of which he was a member and active worker for many years.

In Grundy county, Mo., in 1863, Dr. Wynne was united in marriage with Sarah Ellen Perkins, who was born in Garrard county, Ky., February 10, 1844, a daughter of Joseph and Mary Ellen (Thomas) Perkins, natives of Kentucky. At a very early day the grandfather, Edmond Perkins, established himself on a large plantation in Kentucky, where several of his children were born, and where he attained to great prominence in his neighborhood. He owned many slaves, and prospered exceedingly, his last days being spent among the opulence and plenty of his southern home. His son, Joseph, removed to Grundy county, Mo., with his wife in 1850, and there engaged in farming for several years, or until crossing the plains in 1864. He took up a claim in Baker county, later removing to the Willamette valley, while his death occurred in Cottage Grove, at an advanced age. His daughter, Sarah Ellen, was the fourth of the two daughters and five sons born into his family, and her life was quietly passed on the home farm until her marriage with Dr. Wynne.

For thirty-four years Mrs. Wynne has lived in the same house, sacred from its association with her comrade husband, and which was the first house to be built on this side of the town. She is happy in the thought that five of her six children have been spared to bear her occasional company, the oldest of these being Harry F. Wynne, of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this work. Olivia, the oldest daughter, is the wife of Herbert Eakin, owner and proprietor of a store and banking establishment of Cottage Grove; Mabel is now Mrs. Merryman, of Spokane, Wash.; Orpah is the wife of James Benson, a druggist of Cottage Grove; Armand L. lives with his mother; and Joseph is deceased.

JOHN H. CLELEN was born in March, 1842, in Adams county, Ill., a son of Robert Clelen, an early settler and pioneer farmer in Illinois, who, with his wife and two children, in 1847, set out for the west with ox-teams, taking the old Barlow route. When the little party had nearly reached their journey's end the hopes that had buoyed them on during the previous months were saddened by the death of the wife and mother, who, when they had reached Molalla creek, was taken with measles. After burying their dead the father again took up the march, and on the forks of the Santiam river took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres of rich bottom land, which he improved, and upon which he erected a log house. The year 1849, which is famous in history as the year of the discovery of gold in California, found Mr. Clelen making his way over the mountains to the gold fields. Two years later he returned to Portland by steamer, and from there went back to his farm. The uprising of the Yakima Indians, in 1855-56, called for the assistance of all the settlers in the vicinity, and Mr. Clelen took an important part in quelling the disturbances. In 1863 he again went to the Golden state, and after remaining in Contra Costa county for a time, went to Russian River, thence to Texas, where he engaged in farming, and where his death occurred in 1871.

The parental family comprised two children, of whom William died when he reached his fifteenth year. John H. Clelen assisted his father in the management and care of the farm insofar as his strength permitted, and in the meantime gleaned a limited knowledge of the rudimentary studies in the district school. He accompanied his father on his second trip to California, in 1863, but the following year returned to Oregon, and has made his home here ever since. For two years he was employed in a saw-mill, but after his marriage settled on a farm in Linn county. Two years later, however, he established himself in the teaming business in Albany, at that time hauling goods from Portland, but later he engaged in the dray and truck business, following this for nine years. At the expiration of this time he purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty acres near Plainview, Linn county, which is now rented to tenants, as is also another farm of the same size which he owns, located near Sodaville, also in this county.

The marriage of John H. Clelen and Miss Melinda Young was celebrated in Albany, Ore., Mrs. Clelen being a native of Illinois. She was the only daughter of George W. Young, who came to Oregon in 1851 and lent his aid in the development of the state. He is still living, at the age of seventy-three years. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Clelen: Otto, who is an engineer in Albany; Benjamin, also in business here; and Edna, now Mrs. Rowlings, also a resident of Albany. The Democratic party claims Mr. Clelen as one of its adherents, and he has served as a member of the city committee.

CATHERINE A. PERKINS was born on a claim almost within sight of Cottage Grove, October 25, 1855. John Cochran, the father of Mrs. Perkins, was born in Kentucky, and from his native state removed to Missouri, from where he brought his family across the plains in 1850. In his young manhood he married Lettie Kelly, a native of Tennessee, and who bore him seven children, two of whom were sons, and five of whom accompanied their parents on the westward trip. Mr. Cochran selected Lane county as a desirable and promising farming community, and near Cottage Grove took up a donation claim of a quarter of a section, where he farmed and raised stock with considerable success. While attending court in Eugene as a jurymen, he contracted a fever from which he died in 1858, at the early age of forty-one years. The wife, who survived him, and who eventually died in Cottage Grove, married for her second husband Samuel Dillard.

Educated in the public schools of this county, Mrs. Perkins developed a charming personality, and at seventeen years of age she became engaged to M. C. Connelly, a railroad employe and a young man of excellent character and business ability. Mr. Connelly was born in Liverpool, England, and came to the United States, settling in the west, where he was engaged principally as superintendent of grading for the Oregon & California, now the Southern Pacific Railroad. His married life was short-lived, for he was killed by the explosion of giant powder on a boat while blasting rock five miles above Umattilla, on the Columbia river, in 1876, at the age of thirty-one years. At the time he had advanced to the position of superintendent of construction, and his career contained great promise. He left one son, Arthur V., who is living in Cottage Grove, but who is employed as brakeman on the Oregon & Southeastern Railroad.

In 1877 Mrs. Connelly was united in marriage with Joseph H. Perkins, a native of Missouri, and who came across the plains with his parents in 1864, settling first in Baker and afterward in Lane county. Mr. Perkins' father, Joseph D. Perkins, was born in Kentucky, and from there removed to Missouri, living there on a farm for several years, or until coming to the west. The son came into the possession of a farm, upon a portion of which the town of Cottage Grove has since been built, and where he conducted a thriving general farming business for many years, later running a dairy. Besides the town site of Cottage Grove he disposed of considerable more of his land, retaining for his personal use one hundred and fifty acres on the east. His death occurred March 4, 1902, at the age of fifty years, and he left behind him the legacy of a good name, and of a life well and profitably spent. He was a Democrat in politics, and was fraternally a member of the Masonic order. With his wife he attended the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

A few years before his death Mr. Perkins erected the commodious residence in Cottage Grove now occupied by his widow. She still owns and rents one hundred and thirty acres of the property, to the improvement of which her husband devoted his mature and most worthy energies. Two daughters contribute to the happiness of her life, of whom Neva, the oldest, is a student in the junior class at the state university at Eugene, and Leah is living at home. Mrs. Perkins still retains the vivacity and mental charm which rendered her girlhood an interesting one, and she has many friends throughout the town and county.

J. H. SAVERY was born in Floyd county, Ind., October 23, 1832, the descendant of a line of southern people. The father, G. B., was born near Lynchburg, Ky., December 24, 1804, the son of Henry and Agnes (Edwards) Savery. When a young man G. B. Savery removed to Floyd county, Ind., and there met and married a daughter of Kentucky, Catherine Sears, born October 16, 1808. Her parents had recently removed to Indiana, as presenting more opportunities than the state which they had left. From Indiana Mr. Savery took his family to Illinois, in 1838. In 1846 they again removed, seeking now a desirable location in Iowa, living in both Wapello and Jefferson counties. At length Mr. Savery gathered together his worldly goods in seven wagons drawn by seven yoke of oxen, and joined an emigrant train bound for Oregon, under the command of William Carter. The journey was begun April 23, 1853, and ended October 23, of the same year. The members of the emigrant train parted company in Perrydale, Polk county, Ore., Mr. Savery, his wife and son, J. H. Savery, of this review, going to a location a little farther north, where the father took up a donation claim consisting of three hundred and twenty acres, of which three hundred and twelve are still owned by the son. This farm was located near Ballston, a convenient market. The father and mother passed their years in this home until their death, after which it passed into the hands of their son, J. H. Savery, as he was the only child born to their union. Here Mr. Savery now lives, giving his time and thought to the painstaking cultivation of his property, one hundred and sixty acres being in active cultivation. He is at present engaged in general farming and stock-raising.

April 12, 1870, Mr. Savery married Hulda Jane Kimsey, who was born two and a half miles north of Dallas, December 14, 1851. Her father, John F. Kimsey, was a native of Alabama who crossed the plains in 1847. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Savery, all but one of whom are living. They are as follows: Ora, Ralph, John T., Henry and Tracy. Mr. Savery has served in several minor offices, having been supervisor and school director for some time. Fraternally, he is a member of the Grange of Salt Creek, in which he is past master. He is a Socialist in his political affiliations.

M. A. WADE was born March 16, 1830, near Lincolnville, Me., and his ancestors, as far back as record goes, were toilers of the sea or builders of sea craft. The paternal great-grandfather, a ship carpenter by trade, was a native of Scotland, and a sailor, and for many years came and went among the islands and shoals comprising the Scottish coast. His son, the paternal grandfather, also born in Scotland, followed in the footsteps of his sire, built many ships, and was engaged principally in foreign trade. He came to America when a comparatively young man, settled in Maine, and readily adapted himself to the marine affairs of that state. He was particularly active during the war of 1812, and though he never enlisted, possessed pronounced sympathy for the Americans, and helped them in every way in his power. He must have been somewhat of a strategist, for he resorted to the expediency of sinking an English vessel of which he was pilot, and which had on board supplies for the English soldiers in the Maine forts. He made his home for many years in Lincolnville, Me., where was born his son, Alfred, the father of M. A., September 22, 1798.

A sea-faring life seems not to have appealed to Alfred Wade, for he lived quietly in his home in Maine until twenty-one years old. He then started out to make his living by land occupations, and in his native state married Sarah Gilkey, a native of Massachusetts, and with whom he continued to live in Maine until 1858. He then brought his family to Oregon via the Isthmus of Panama, San Francisco and Portland, and settled at Parkersville, Ore., where he conducted a hotel for two years. He was quite successful, and from Parkersville removed to Salem, where he had another hotel which he conducted until a short time before his death at the age of seventy-eight years. His wife, who lived to be ninety-three years old, bore him four children, of whom Sarah G. is the widow of Mr. Minor, of Tacoma, Wash.; W. L. is living in Salem; M. A., and an infant, deceased. The parents were members of the Baptist Church.

Owing to an accident which impaired his father's usefulness, M. A. Wade was obliged to assist with the family support at a comparatively early age. At the age of fourteen he put to sea, which he followed in various capacities until twenty-two years old. He became a mate at the age of nineteen, and rapidly rose to the front. After giving up the sea he learned the trade of machinist and after serving an apprenticeship of three years conducted an excavator for several months. In 1855 he came to California via the Isthmus, and for two years followed mining and prospecting with varying results. He then came to Oregon and bought a farm of one hundred and sixty-five acres two and a half miles south-east of Gervais, to which he has since added, and now has three hundred and six acres. His farm is well improved, many acres are under cultivation, and he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Fifteen acres are devoted to hops, and in 1903 Mr. Wade raised fifteen thousand pounds.

In 1860 Mr. Wade married Jane Webb, a native of Indiana, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1847. Mrs. Wade is the mother of seven children, of whom Mary S., Ida, and Frank are living at home. Mr. Webb has always taken an active interest in Republican politics, and has held several offices of trust within the gift of his fellow-townsmen. He is interested in promoting the cause of education, and has been a member of the school board for several years. For several years he was postmaster of Parkersville.

HENRY A. SKEELS. One of the solid, progressive, and able business men of Springfield, Lane county, is Henry A. Skeels, who, although a comparatively new resident of this place, is prominently identified with its leading interests, and is conspicuous in the management of its public affairs, being at the present time mayor of this thriving little city. A native of Illinois, he was born February 16, 1849, in Iroquois county, a son of Nelson Skeels, and the descendant of a well known New England family.

Reuben Skeels, grandfather of Henry A., was born and bred in Vermont, growing to a sturdy manhood among its green hills. He served for a brief time in the war of 1812, and afterwards removed to Ohio, becoming a pioneer farmer of Columbus. Going from there to Iroquois county, Ill., in 1837, he took up a tract of land from the government, and again engaged in the pioneer labor of improving a homestead, living and laboring as a general farmer until his death, at the age of seventy-four years. Deeply religious by nature and training, he was a valued and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was one of the organizers of the church of that denomination at Onarga, Ill., in which he was the first deacon. As one of the seven men, four of them being named Skeels, that were instrumental in the establishment of this church, his name appears on its records, and the fact that the first meeting of its first congregation was held in his house is written in its annals.

Removing from Ohio, the state of his birth, to Illinois when a lad of sixteen years, Nelson Skeels subsequently lived in Iroquois county until 1865, when he removed with his family to Montana. Locating in Boulder valley, near Helena, he carried on stock-raising and dairying for five years, meeting with fair success. He was subsequently engaged in the same industry at Bozeman, Mont., until the fall of 1873, when he settled near Walla Walla, Wash., where he was employed in stock-raising and general farming for five years. In 1878 he located near Palouse, Whitman county, and there continued in his chosen vocation until his death, at the age of sixty-four years. He married Lucinda A. Fargo, who was born June 21, 1823, in West Virginia. Her father was born in Vermont, but removed to West Virginia as a young man, locating on the Conaway river, near Mount Pleasant, where he remained, a successful farmer and a citizen of prominence, until his death. He was of French ancestry, being descended from one of two brothers that came from France to America in colonial times. One brother, the ancestor of Mrs. Skeels, located in Vermont, while the other brother settled in Canada. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Skeels, seven sons and four daughters were born, and of these four sons and one daughter are now living.

The eldest child of his parents, Henry A. Skeels obtained his early education in the common schools of Illinois, afterwards assisting his father in farming and stock-raising until 1871. In that year he established himself in business as a butcher at Bozeman, Mont., being in partnership with his father, however, and continuing thus associated until the death of the father. In 1894 Mr. Skeels located at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, where he was employed in getting out timber for the mines, and also in running a general store for four years. Coming to Springfield, Ore., in 1898, he leased the old saw-mill, which he operated successfully until the fall of 1901, when he sold out to the Booth-Kelley Company. Purchasing a store of general merchandise, he managed it profitably for a year, when, in 1902, he traded it for a fruit ranch in California. This ranch, advantageously located in the Santa Clara valley, contains thirty-five acres of land, and is devoted chiefly to the raising of prunes, apricots and cherries. Mr. Skeels has likewise valuable property in Springfield, owning houses and lots, and is a man of wealth as well as of political and social position.

At Walla Walla, Wash., Mr. Skeels married Elmyra Oglesby, a native of Illinois, and they have six children living, namely: Nelson A., George W., Laura, wife of I. L. Smith; Harry A., Isaac L. and John Robert, all residents of Springfield. For two years prior to his election as mayor of the city, Mr. Skeels served as a member of the city council. In his political affiliations he is a Republican, and fraternally is a Mason.

W. O. HECKART. A leading contractor and builder of Corvallis, Benton county, is W. O. Heckart, who stands high in the estimation of the people with whom he has so long been associated, his prominent and influential position having been won through a successful prosecution of his work. He was born near Ottumwa, Wapello county, Iowa, February 5, 1860, the son of Michael Heckart, a native of Pennsylvania, his birth having occurred in the neighborhood of Harrisburg, Dauphin county. He was the representative of an old Pennsylvania family, an ancestor having settled in that state early in the eighteenth century, whose descendants served in the Revolutionary war, while the grandfather of our subject, W. O. Heckart, participated in the war of 1812. This ancestor subsequently removed from a farm in Pennsylvania to Missouri, Michael Heckart, who was then only sixteen years old, accompanying his parents to the latter state, where he grew to manhood and learned the trade of a carpenter. Subsequently, he entered land in Wapello county, Iowa, and improved and cultivated the same in conjunction with his trade, the first Presbyterian Church of Ottumwa being the work of his hands. He remained a consistent member of this faith until his death, while in politics he adhered to the principles promulgated by the Democratic party. He married Mary Mayer, who was born in Ohio and died in Iowa. Of the eleven children which blessed this union ten attained maturity and nine are now living, another son, Charles L., also a carpenter, being located in Corvallis.

W. O. Heckart was the fourth child in his father's family, and was reared in Iowa, on a farm eight miles south of Ottumwa, where he attended the public schools and acquired a common school education. He was early bred to the use of carpenter's tools, learning the trade when a mere lad. At sixteen he entered actively into the work, remaining so engaged until 1883, when he went to Holt county, Neb., and took up a tree claim and proceeded to improve it for the period of six years. In addition to the farming interests with which he was engaged during these years he also engaged in contracting and building in Holt county. In 1889 he sold his property and located in Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., where he has since remained, becoming a prominent figure in the industrial life of the place. Among the buildings which he has erected in this county are the Masonic Temple, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and Christian Church of Corvallis, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of South Corvallis; the Methodist Episcopal Church of Harrisburg; many of the largest and finest residences in this city, as well as the court house of Toledo, Lincoln county, the government hospital in the Siletz Indian Reservation, the Beckwith building in Eugene and also several residences in that city, among them being the Patterson and Kaufman residences.

Mr. Heckart was married to Miss Carrie Hawk, a native of Wapello county, Iowa, his own residence being built at the corner of Fifth and Monroe streets. In political circles Mr. Heckart has been prominent since his arrival in this locality; a strong Democrat, he has been chosen at different times to represent those of like convictions, from 1900 to 1903 serving as a member of the city council from the second ward and acting on several important committees. In 1902 he was a candidate for state senator, and though he never canvassed the county, in a district two hundred and nineteen Republican he was defeated by only one hundred and nineteen votes. Fraternally he is identified with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and religiously is a member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he officiates as elder and trustee.

JOHN CURRIN was born in Grayson county, Va., March 2, 1816, the son of a farmer who was in turn the descendant of an Irish family. The father was always active in politics and even in the midst of his agricultural pursuits found time to serve his party as member of the state legislature for eighteen years, where he was an efficient and honorable representative, and attained a wide degree of popularity. He had eight children, and died when John was about three years old, the latter, however, remaining in his home until he was twenty years old, during which time he received his education through the medium of the public schools. About that time he was appointed deputy sheriff of Carroll county, Va., and served satisfactorily for three years, when he emigrated to the state of Missouri and engaged in farming. In that state he was married and lived until 1853, when they started across the plains with ox-teams, and, after six months journey, they arrived at their destination. Coming direct to Lane county Mr. Currin took up a donation land claim of three hundred and twenty acres, located five miles east of Cottage Grove and along the banks of the Row river. A long and prosperous life has since been his and his daily duties have been those which advanced the importance of the real estate in the section chosen for his home, the excellent cultivation of a farm which now numbers eight hundred acres bespeaking his thrift and industry, and the substantial and handsome buildings being a credit to his taste. With his son, Felix, the only one of seven children now living, he is carrying on general farming and stock-raising, being particularly interested in Durham cattle.

Mrs. Currin, formerly Margaret Swift, a native of Kentucky, is still living and enjoying the prosperity which the years have brought herself and husband, though she is now eighty-four years old. Both of these honored citizens are members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and in politics Mr. Currin adheres to the principles of the Democratic party. Fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

JAMES SCOTT McMURRY is engaged in hay growing and general farming on a portion of the old claim which has been in possession of his family since 1851. Almost within sight of the lights of the city of Eugene, Mr. McMurry has the advantages of both town and country, and his every day life is passed upon one of the most fertile and well equipped farms in this vicinity. Mr. McMurry was a small child when brought to his present home, for he was born near Quincy, Adams county, Ill., July 22, 1848, and reached here in September, 1851.

Hon. Fieldin McMurry, the father of James Scott, was born in Kentucky, where his paternal grandfather, James, had settled after his emigration from Scotland. James McMurry spent his last years in Kentucky, and after his death his son Fieldin removed to Adams county, Ill., where he married Harriett Riggs, a native daughter of Illinois, whose father, Scott Riggs, was a farmer and early settler of the state. With his wife Fieldin McMurry set up housekeeping on the farm he had purchased near Quincy, and there four of their children were born, all of whom accompanied their parents across the plains in 1851. The family equipment consisted of three wagons and several ox-teams, and the journey was accomplished without any serious drawbacks to the health or convenience of the travelers. The father purchased the Culver donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, erected first a small log and later a more modern residence, his last home being just east of where the university of Oregon has since been built. He was the first treasurer of Lane county, and was also a member of the territorial legislature which met at Corvallis. Formerly a Whig, he was equally staunch as a Republican, and in his religious views adhered to the Methodist Episcopal creed. Besides James Scott, who was the fourth of his children, there were Milton, now living in Eugene; Mrs. Louisa Hubbard, Mary and Zadoc, who died in Eugene; and Emma, Mrs. Archambeau, of Portland.

Besides the country schools James Scott had the advantage of two years' attendance at the Christian College at Monmouth, and after his father's death, in 1860, he remained at home and helped his mother with the management of the farm. In 1873 he married Emma Murphy, daughter of John E. Murphy, a prominent man of Polk county, and thereafter went to house-keeping on a farm half a mile from Monmouth, Polk county, and consisting of one hundred and sixty acres. Here he engaged principally in grain farming until 1879, in which year he came into possession of his share of the old farm, located in the southwestern part. His father had sold off ten acres for the Masonic cemetery, two years before his death, but otherwise retained his property intact. Mr. McMurry has about fifty acres in hay, and the balance is devoted to grain and general farming, also to a fine fruit orchard and large garden. In 1901 he built a prune dryer at Thurston, and now derives a substantial income from drying and shipping prunes for the surrounding horticulturists.

Like his father Mr. McMurry subscribes to Republican principles, and is a member of the Christian Church, in which he has served as deacon for many years, and is also identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Eight children were born into the McMurry family, of whom the three eldest are deceased. The oldest daughter, Daisy, Mrs. Love, is making her home in Corvallis, while Ralph and Frank became soldiers in the Spanish-American war, serving in the Philippine Islands in Company C, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry. At the present time Ralph is living in Washington, but Frank is still in the Philippines. Myrtle, Nellie, Elsie, Glenn and Edna are still living on the home farm.

NATHANIEL W. WHITE. A director in the First National Bank of Cottage Grove, the owner of twelve hundred and fifty acres of land near the town, and the possessor to a gratifying extent of the confidence and good will of the community, Nathaniel W. White is firmly established in this history-making period of Lane county's supremacy, and deserves to rank among its most practical and helpful financiers and agriculturists. He was born in the house which is still his home, March 21, 1863, and with the exception of a year spent in the neighborhood, has found shelter under the same roof ever since. The name of his father, Daniel B. White, is enrolled with those of the noble pioneers of 1853, who were lost on the trackless plains, and in consequence suffered untold deprivations, reaching their destination only after running the gamut of illness, Indian outbreaks and scarcity of provisions. Daniel B. White was born in Indiana in 1815, and for some years after his marriage with Mary J. Stoms, continued to live in the Hoosier state until his removal to Iowa in 1852. His expectations in Iowa were not realized, consequently he decided to remove farther west. Owing to the trouble which he encountered in crossing the plains in 1853 he was seven months in reaching his destination and finally settled on a claim four miles south of Cottage Grove. In 1872 he suffered a stroke of paralysis, in consequence of which he soon afterward died, at the age of seventy-six. His widow is still living, at the age of eighty-one years. Besides Nathaniel W., who is the youngest of the children, J. P. lives in California, and Mrs. Phoebe J. Sharp.

The principal improvements on the White farm have been made by the present owner, Nathaniel W., who is one of the most scientific of the agriculturists in his neighborhood. Adding to the original property from time to time, he has accumulated twelve hundred and fifty acres, a large share of which is devoted to stock raising, Herefords and Durhams being the preferred breeds. He married Abbie J. Powell, a native daughter of Oregon, and has four children, Laura A., Alfred M., Inez B., and Harold W. Mr. White is a stanch Republican, and has held all of the important local offices in his district. He is fraternally a Woodman of the World, and in his religious views adheres to the doctrine of the Christian Church, in which organization he is clerk. His association with the First National Bank of Cottage Grove has continued for several years, and he is also identified with other undertakings of a business and social nature.

JAMES ISAAC JONES. A man of remarkable business energy, foresight and sagacity, James Isaac Jones, of Cottage Grove, occupies a position of eminence in the financial, agricultural, political and social life of Lane county. During his active career he has been conspicuously identified with many of the leading industries of this section of the state, and in his operations has invariably met with success. A son of C. H. Jones, he was born December 1, 1866, in Macon, Macon county, Mo., of Virginian ancestry. Isaac W. Jones, the grandfather of James Isaac, was born in Virginia, of colonial stock. Going to Tennessee as a pioneer, he worked at his trade of an iron forger until 1850, when he followed the march of civilization westward to Missouri. In Macon county, near the city of Macon, he carried on general farming until his death, at the advanced age of eighty-six years.

He died in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which he did much active work, being a local preacher.

Born in Tennessee, C. H. Jones accompanied his parents to Missouri, and with the exception of a year spent in Indiana, lived in that state until 1883. On account of failing health, he then migrated to Oregon, locating at Cottage Grove as a carpenter, and still resides here, living rather retired from active pursuits. He married Louisa Harriet Gentry, who was born in Indiana, near Bloomington, where her father, James Gentry, a farmer, was born, lived, and died. Six children were born of their union, James Isaac, the third child, being the only son.

Completing his education in the public schools of Oregon, James Isaac Jones embarked in business on his own account, in 1889, as a butcher, borrowing $50 for the purpose. At the end of two years he sold out, having paid off his indebtedness, and cleared $600 in that time. In 1891 he bought a saw-mill on the Coast Fork Willamette river, and in a short time had so enlarged his business that he had to increase the capacity of the mill from six thousand to ten thousand feet per day, later increasing it to thirty-three thousand feet per day. With characteristic enterprise he built a lumber plant at what is now Saginaw, in Lane county, thus establishing the town, which he named, and assisted in building. The mill has a capacity of sixty-five thousand feet per day, and the flume is five miles, nine hundred feet long, and one thousand six hundred and sixty feet high at the summit. The plant, which is one of the largest in the county, has planing mills and dryers connected with it. In 1898 Mr. Jones sold out his lumber interests, and later bought four hundred and twenty acres of land adjoining Cottage Grove on the southeast, the farm being known as the old Shields donation claim, and subsequently laid off the J. I. Jones addition to the town.

Embarking in enterprises of a different nature in 1899, Mr. Jones purchased three different groups of mining claims in the Bohemia district, buying a part of the Music and Oregon claim, a part of the Colorado group, and a part of the Winchester group. In 1900 he sold his share in the first three groups, but still retains the Winchester, which he is developing, obtaining a fine grade of lead ore. In his mining ventures he met with much success, and also made money in land speculations, having, in 1900, in company with J. W. Cook, of Portland, purchased ten thousand acres of railway land, and two thousand acres of school script lands, all of which he has since sold at an advantageous price. In 1901 he bought the Major Chrisman ranch of seven hundred and fifty-four acres, at Saginaw, where he is carrying on an extensive dairy and creamery business, keeping one hundred and seventy-five head of cattle. He is also the owner of four hundred and twenty acres of good timber land in Lane county. In 1900 Mr. Jones established himself in the hardware business in Cottage Grove, continuing for a year as head of the firm of Jones & Phillips.

Mr. Jones married, at Cottage Grove, Lillie Lewis, who was born in Lane county, a daughter of J. B. Lewis, a general merchant of this place. She died a year after their marriage. Mr. Jones married second, in Eugene, Ore., Gertrude H. Roberts, who was born in Iowa, the birthplace of her father, John Roberts, a farmer, who is now living retired from active pursuits, in Eugene. Four children blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Jones, namely: Oscar I., deceased; Franklin Carl; Robert Lester; and Marie. In politics Mr. Jones is a Republican. He has served as precinct commissioner, for one term was mayor of the city, and is now serving his second term as councilman. He is prominent in fraternal organizations, belonging to the Blue Lodge, of Cottage Grove; to Eugene Chapter, R. A. M.; to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; to the Knights of Pythias; and to the Artisans. He is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is steward and trustee, and superintendent of the Sunday school, having held the latter position the past four years.

GABRIEL MILLER is the son of Malcolm Miller, who was born in Scotland, and when twenty-six years old emigrated to America, settling first in Nova Scotia, where he engaged as a coal miner. In 1843 he removed to Tioga county, Pa., from which location he removed to Beardstown, Ill., and there continued as a miner. In the spring of 1850 the family made the six-months trip to Oregon with ox-teams, the first winter here being spent at Salem and the next spring finding them located upon a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres two miles north of Scio. There Mr. Miller engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death. He married Jenetta Anderson, who was born at The Shaws, Scotland, her death occurring about six years after that of her husband.

The birth of Gabriel Miller occurred in Nova Scotia, March 24, 1841, and he became a resident of the United States when only two years old, and of Oregon at the age of nine years. His education was principally received through the medium of the district schools of Linn county. When twenty years old he left home and, going to the mines of Boise City and Salmon river, he remained there for three years, after which he returned to Linn county and took a homestead, upon sixty-four acres of which he now makes his home. Mr. Miller was married twice, the result of the first union being one daughter, Anna. After the death of his first wife he married A. N. Titus, their children being Ezra, deceased; Eugene and Frank, both at home with their parents. In his political views Mr. Miller is independent.

WAGNER BROTHERS. Within the remarkably short period of twelve years Wagner Brothers, Fred and William, have built up one of the finest general repair, blacksmithing, wagon and carriagemaking, and agricultural implement enterprises in the state of Oregon. Fred J., the senior member of the firm, was born near Oshkosh, Wis., June 17, 1863, while William was born in the same place August 9, 1867.

As the name implies the brothers are of German ancestry, their father J. C., and their grandfather, Christ, having been born in Berlin, Germany. The grandfather brought his family to America, settling in Dodge county, Wis., where he engaged in farming and where he died. He had five sons, and four of them served in the Civil war, one of them giving up his life for the cause. J. C. Wagner is recalled as a many-sided genius. For many years he engaged in the merchandise business in Oshkosh, Wis., and in 1879 he removed to Kensington, Smith county, Kans., where he farmed and raised stock. After removing to Oregon, in 1889, he lived in retirement, and his death occurred in the office of his prosperous sons, March 8, 1900, of heart failure, he being at the time sixty-seven years of age. He married Mary Raisler, who also was born in Germany, a daughter of Carl Andrew Raisler, who brought his family to Wisconsin, settling on the farm upon which he died in Waupaca county. Mrs. Wagner, who is still living, is the mother of five children, and besides Fred J. and William J., the two older sons, there is a daughter, Clara, now Mrs. Reed, of Dallas; Henry A., living in Dallas; and Theodore A., superintendent of the electric light plant in Dallas.

The Wagner brothers were reared partially in Wisconsin, and were both young when the father removed to Kansas in 1879. As boys they were interested in machinery. At the age of eighteen Fred apprenticed to learn the wagon and carriagemaking trade at Kerwin, Kans., and after serving for three years formed a partnership with his brother William. This was in 1884, and they started a little shop in Germantown, Smith county, Kans., which they conducted until 1887. They then removed to Agra, Phillips county, and during the two-years residence there determined to cast in their fortunes with the far west. In order to see the country and select a suitable location, they outfitted for driving the entire way, taking their way through Nebraska, Wyoming, Idaho, and Washington, where they stayed some time in Spokane. After visiting several places in Oregon they rented a shop in Dallas in May, 1891, and inaugurated a general repair and blacksmithing business, which proved so successful that larger quarters were an imperative necessity, and by 1899 they were obliged to build. The present building is 40x60 feet in ground dimensions, and has two stories, the shop being on the first floor. The second floor is devoted to woodwork and painting and carriage-trimming. The motive power is an eight-horsepower engine. They have also a warehouse 26x44 feet, ground dimensions. A large amount of space is given up to agricultural implements, of which they carry a large variety.

Since coming to Dallas Fred J. Wagner has married Addie Elliott, a native of Canada, now the mother of one child, Vera. Mr. Wagner is a Prohibitionist in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; the Encampment; the Rebekahs; the Fraternal Union, of which he is past grand; and the United Artisans. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. William J. Wagner married Mattie McIntosh, a native of Kentucky, and they have one child, Albert. Mr. Wagner also is an Odd Fellow, and past noble grand; a member of the Encampment; the Rebekahs; and the Fraternal Union. He is a member of the Lutheran Church, and in political affiliation is a Socialist.

GEORGE T. HALL. That the man who succeeds in mercantile ranks is endowed with a variety of well developed capabilities, that he has traveled a long way in pursuit of the knowledge required for the conduct of his business, and that nine times out of ten he has adhered to the fundamental principles of good judgment and integrity, is a conclusion endorsed by world-wide students of finance. The career of George T. Hall is herewith cited in illustration of the foregoing, a career worthy and meritorious in the extreme, and one which is interwoven with the upbuilding of Eugene since 1889.

Mr. Hall comes of a family which enjoys the distinction of being one of the first to settle in northern New York, and which bent its energies to the development of the agricultural and general resources of that state. The pioneer was the paternal grandfather, Thomas Hall, who was born in New Hampshire, and who spent nearly all of his active life in Franklin county, N. Y., the exception being a few years spent in Quebec, where Truman Hall, the father of George T., was born. Truman Hall became a prominent business man of Chateaugay, N. Y., where he engaged in manufacturing wagons until a few years before his death, and where his son, George T., was born February 15, 1844. Franklin county, N. Y., was for years the home of the Child family, into which Truman Hall married, his wife, Caroline, being a native of that county, a daughter of Jacob Child, who was born in historic Pomfret, Vt., and one of the pioneers of Franklin county. Mr. Child had many claims upon the consideration of his friends and neighbors in Franklin county, not the least of which was a valiant service in the war of 1812, and a reflected glory from the life of his father, who stacked his musket upon many of the battlefields of the Revolution. The younger Child availed himself of the forest advantages of Franklin county, and from a small beginning worked up a large lumber and saw-milling business, incidentally engaging in farming, and filling political offices, among them that of provost marshal on the frontier during the war of 1812. He was of English descent, and a man of strong character and sterling worth.

Following close upon his completion of the course at Malone Academy, at Malone, Franklin county, N. Y., George T. Hall began his mercantile career as a clerk in a store, and, when he had secured the experience of five years to back him, started a merchandise store in his native town of Chateaugay, continuing therein between 1865 and 1889. During this time he became an important factor in that village, participating in its political and other undertakings, and serving for two terms as a member of its board of trustees. Desiring a change, and feeling that twenty-four years in the same line of business in the same locality had its drawbacks, he sold out and located in Eugene, Ore., in 1889, engaging in the grocery business at his present location, and under the firm name of Smith & Hall, for about three years. He then disposed of his interest to Mr. Smith, and eighteen months later started in the same place the mercantile concern of George T. Hall & Son. This store fills the requirements of a thriving and cosmopolitan community, and in its remodeled state, its modern furnishings, and exhaustive stock of general commodities, typifies the model and well managed general catering enterprise. An adjunct to the business is the largest warehouse in the town, located near the Southern Pacific Railroad tracks. The warehouse is also put to general use, and Mr. Hall derives a substantial income from wool, hop, and mohair speculations, extending his business interests also to the timber lands, of which he owns large tracts, and to the cultivation of hops, of which he owns several acres.

In Plattsburg, N. Y., Mr. Hall was united in marriage with Sarah A. Cook, who was born at Point Rush, Clinton county, N. Y., and who is the mother of two children. Of these, Carrie S., a graduate of an eastern institution, has been engaged in teaching in the public schools of Eugene for many years; and George T., Jr., a graduate of both the high school and university, is in business with his father. Becoming allied with the Masons in Chateaugay, N. Y., Mr. Hall is now a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11; the Royal Arch Chapter No. 10; the Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, Knights Templar, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. Politically he is a Republican, and is an ex-member of the state central committee. Mr. Hall brings to the conduct of his firmly established business a wide knowledge of general affairs, which finds vent in a keen interest in charitable and benevolent opportunities, and in the highest social and economic life of his city.

JAMES HOFFMAN. The life of the pioneer of this great northwest was often filled with unknown peril. In journeying thither he almost invariably traversed the intervening plain and desert with ox-teams, the slowest possible mode of locomotion, being many months on the road. Oftentimes dangers from hostile Indians, wild animals and troublesome insects were encountered, and illness overtook the weary traveler. Although a boy of but nine years when he came to Oregon, James Hoffman, one of the most prosperous residents of Eugene, and the owner of the Hoffman House, has a vivid realization of the trials and tribulations that beset the original settlers of this section of the state. A native of Sangamon county, Ill., he was born December 21, 1842, about eight miles north of the city of Springfield, a son of William Hoffman.

Born and reared in Pennsylvania, William Hoffman removed to Sangamon county, Ill., in 1832, and was there engaged in general farming for nearly twenty years. On April 1, 1851, accompanied by his wife and ten children, he started for Oregon, but, being taken ill with mountain fever, died at Big Sandy, and was buried there. His widow, whose maiden name was Martha Drake, was a native of Ohio. A woman of energy, determination and decision, she continued the journey westward with her children. The train with which she traveled consisted of six wagons, each drawn by six yoke of oxen, a fine band of horses, twenty-five mares and two stallions, and one hundred cows, four of the horses belonging to the Hoffman family. The day after the train passed Fort Hall it came in contact with the Indians, who stole seventy-five horses, and killed an old lady, Mrs. Clark, and her son, and wounded a Miss Clark and a Mr. Sperry. About fifty men of the company gave chase, following the savages over the desert for two days. Finding the enemy strongly entrenched in the valley, a skirmish ensued, but as several of the men from the train were killed in the encounter the chase was given up, and the journey continued. The party arrived in Oregon in September, 1851, with but two wagons, ten yoke of oxen, and ten head of loose cattle, the others having been lost in the Indian stampede, or through the carelessness of the train leaders, Mrs. Hoffman losing every one of her horses.

Locating with her family in Corvallis, Ore., Mrs. Hoffman engaged in the hotel business for ten years, being quite successful. Subsequently marrying L. A. Clark, she settled on a farm about twelve miles south of Corvallis, on the Long Tom. She afterward lived in Linn county ten years, then removed to Junction City, Lane county, where she resided until her death, at the age of seventy-three years. She reared ten children, namely: Mrs. Sarah Bundy, who died in Benton county, Ore.; Mrs. Jane Roberts, who died in the same county; Mrs. Mary Alfred, of Baker City, Ore.; Nancy, wife of E. M. White, of Portland; Lucy F., who married R. C. George, died in Baker county; Mrs. Martha Esterbrook, who died in Baker county; Mrs. Fannie Watkins, of Douglas county; James, the especial subject of this sketch; Henry, resident of Eugene; and Thomas, a stockman and miner, living in Baker county.

While in his ninth year, James Hoffman started for Oregon with his parents, crossing the river at Council Bluffs. Arriving in Corvallis with his widowed mother and her family in September, 1851, he attended the district school for a short time. Going with two of his brothers, in 1852, to get horses at the farm of H. C. Owens, in Lane county, he came through the present site of the city of Eugene, which at that time was a tract of wild land covered with tall grass and oak trees, the cabin and store of Eugene Skinner being hidden by the butte. From 1859 until 1873 Mr. Hoffman was successfully engaged in mining pursuits, being employed at various mines, including those at Orofino, Florence, Baker City, Boise Basin, John Day, South Boise, Idaho City, Oyhee, Clear Water, Buffalo Hump, Salmon river, Warren's Diggings, and many others, making most of the trips from mine to mine on foot, or with pack horses, occasionally having trouble with the Indians. Having invested a part of his savings in a ranch of three thousand acres, in Linn county, Mr. Hoffman returned to the valley in 1872, and embarked in business as a stock-raiser, his large farm lying about ten miles east of Harrisburg. Selling out at the end of seven years to Joseph Keel and B. Goldsmith, he bought a section of land, and for three years was engaged in farming on an extensive scale, raising large quantities of grain. Removing to Junction City in 1883, he operated his farms in Linn and Lane counties for about twelve years, and while there invested heavily in Eugene property, in 1886 building the Hoffman House, which is 40x116 feet, three stories in height. Taking up his residence in Eugene in 1895, Mr. Hoffman has since devoted his time and attention to the management of his various interests, which keeps him busily employed. He owns different farms, aggregating about one thousand acres, has a large extent of timber land, and possesses valuable property in Eugene, having in his active career accumulated much wealth, and gained a position of prominence among the respected and esteemed citizens of Lane county.

Mr. Hoffman married, in Lane county, Eugenia Milliorn, who was born in Missouri, and came with her parents to this county in 1853, locating on the present site of Junction City. Her father kept Milliorn station, on the overland stage route, for twenty or more years, it being a celebrated stopping place for travelers in pioneer days. Mr. and Mrs. Hoffman have one child only, Edith, who was graduated from the University of Oregon. Politically Mr. Hoffman is a sound Republican, and fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias, and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He takes great interest in the early history of the state, and belongs to the State Pioneers' Association and the Lane County Historical Society.

LAWRENCE T. HARRIS was born in Albany, Linn county, Ore., September 13, 1873. In his native town Lawrence Thomas Harris lived until his tenth birthday, when he removed to Eugene with his parents, receiving a preliminary training in the public schools of the two cities, after which, in 1889, he entered the University of Oregon. Four years later he was graduated from that institution with the degree of A.B. and in 1896 the degree of A.M. was conferred upon him. In the same year he was graduated from the law department with the degree of LL.B., and at once began a practice in Eugene which was successfully continued for four years. In the meantime he had grown in favor with the leaders of the Republican party, of which he is a staunch adherent, and in 1900 he was nominated by that party as one of the representatives from Lane county for the state legislature, and his election followed. While a member of this session he served on various important committees, among them being the committee on elections, of which he was chairman, ways and means committees, and others. At the expiration of his term, 1902, he was renominated and elected by an increased majority of five hundred, and in this session he was elected speaker of the house. Mr. Harris is also very prominent in local affairs, and is a member of the state Republican central committee.

Fraternally Mr. Harris affiliates with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Native Sons, Woodmen of the World, Knights of Pythias and Masons.

WILLIAM J. ROYSE. The man of affairs, the liberal, enterprising and very successful manipulator of the business forces of the northwest, is represented by W. J. Royse, senior partner of the firm of Royse & Peterson, manufacturers of excelsior at Eugene. The youth struggling with adverse circumstances, and deriving little encouragement from any source save those within himself, might find much of value from talking with this practical and self-reliant manufacturer, and perchance might thereafter find the royal road to success less obscure. From the first of his independent life Mr. Royse has not waited for opportunity, but has gone to meet it, and while catching up with it has put in his time vigorously prosecuting such work as he found to do.

Born in Hancock county, Ill., January 6, 1862, he is the son of John N. and Jane (Stevens) Royse, natives respectively of Illinois and Tennessee; and grandson of John Royse, born in Indiana, and an early settler of Hancock county, Ill. The parents are living retired at present in a pleasant home in Watsonville, Cal., and the father doubtless often thinks with pride of his honorable life, which in the early days contained much of adventure and struggle. As a young man he joined an expedition bound for the coast, crossing the plains in 1849, and three or four years later, after mining with moderate success in California, returned to his home in Illinois by way of the Isthmus of Panama. He bought a large farm, stocked and improved it, and engaged in farming for several years. As in the case with the majority who have once, temporarily even, lived under the skies of the west, and felt the freedom engendered by close proximity to the ocean and mountains, his mind reverted frequently to the days of '49, and he finally yielded to the allurements of memory and again sought the coast country. This second expedition was undertaken in 1864 with horse, rather than ox-teams, and he had the solace of the companionship of his wife and two children, of whom W. J. Royse is the eldest, and was then but two years old. For a few weeks he tarried in Los Angeles, and in 1865 went to Santa Cruz county, farmed for many years, and then retired to Watsonville, Cal.

Although reared and educated in Watsonville,

Cal., W. J. Royse went to the country for his first business experience, at the age of twenty-one occupying a farm near the city, where he engaged in beet culture on an extensive scale. At the same time he represented as agent the paper mills of O'Neill Brothers & Callahan of Santa Cruz county, but in 1890 withdrew from these combined industries, and for four years represented the same company in Oregon, coming to Lebanon to assist in the installation of their plant. He had full charge of their straw business in this state, and did not enter his present business until 1894, when he bought an interest in the excelsior mill of O'Neill Brothers & Peterson, since which time the firm has been known by the name of Royse & Peterson. The excelsior plant, minutely described in the record of the life of Mr. Peterson, is one of the stable and upbuilding agencies of Eugene, and bears the stamp of the high character of the men directing its affairs. Mr. Royse has erected a comfortable residence on the corner of Sixth and High streets, and with the assistance of his wife, formerly Ella Stroud, of Linn county, extends good fellowship and hospitality to a large circle of friends. In political affiliation Mr. Royse is a Democrat.

there at the time that General Sheridan and Captain Russell were stationed there with their troops. He was ambitious in his missionary work of ameliorating the conditions of the Indians, in whose behalf he went to Washington, D. C., in 1859, to interview the president. Through his efforts, plans for investigating the injustice often done to the red man, and means for converting them to christianity, were established, his work meeting with due appreciation. He continued his labors on the reservation until 1862, when he removed to Salem, Ore., that he might educate his children at the Willamette University, and remained a resident of that city until his death, in 1887. A man of high personal worth, deeply religious, charitable and benevolent, he was held in great respect throughout the community.

Joseph Chamberlin married Olive Warren, who was born in Covington, N. Y., and died in 1874, at Salem, Ore. She came of Revolutionary stock, being a lineal descendant of Dr. Joseph Warren, who lost his life at the battle of Bunker Hill, and a daughter, also, of one who suffered for his country, her father, Abel Warren, who fought in the war of 1812, having received a wound at the battle of Lundy's Lane that caused his death a few years later. Eight children were born of their union, namely: Martin L., late clerk of the state land board, at Salem; Mary L., wife of O. A. Waller, of Salem; Ellen Jeannette, the special subject of this sketch; Lydia, now Mrs. Crockett, of Seattle, Wash.; Sarah, now Mrs. C. B. Moores, of Oregon City; Olive, wife of Judge Belt, of Spokane, Wash.; Leonore, wife of Charles Weller, of Salem; and Julia, wife of J. L. Shultz, of Portland, Ore. All of the children were educated at Willamette University.

After receiving the degree of B. S. at the Willamette University, in 1868, Miss Chamberlin immediately began her professional career, teaching first in a private school, after which she was an instructor in the academical department of her alma mater for nine years. The following three years she taught in a public school in Portland, going from there to The Dalles Academy, where she taught for five years under Dr. Gatch, going then with him to the University of Washington, at Seattle, where she held the chair of literature for ten years. Meanwhile she spent a year abroad, in 1891-'92, perfecting herself in German in Berlin, and visiting the principal points of interest in Great Britain and on the continent, including the celebrated universities, the Alps, Coliseum, Catacombs, Vatican, etc. In 1897, Miss Chamberlin accepted a position at the State Normal School, in Monmouth, Ore., remaining there until 1899, when she came to Corvallis. Miss Chamberlin has met with undoubted

ELLEN JEANNETTE CHAMBERLIN, A. M. In the educational and literary circles of the great northwest, no name stands higher than that of Miss Chamberlin, one of the faculty of the Oregon Agricultural College, holding the position of dean of women, and, also, that of professor of German, and instructor in English. Obtaining a substantial education by years of study, and by travel in our own and foreign countries, she is highly cultured and accomplished, and fully equipped for her present high office in the institution with which she is connected.

A daughter of the late Joseph Chamberlin, Ellen J. Chamberlin was born in Romeo, Mich., of pioneer ancestry. Her father, Joseph Chamberlin, a native of Lima, N. Y., was reared on the pioneer homestead in Michigan, receiving his elementary education in the district schools, and completing it at Albion College, in Albion, Mich., subsequently being a teacher in that institution for a number of years. In 1855, being strongly impressed with the necessity of civilizing the Indian through christianity, he came as an independent missionary to Oregon, crossing the plains, and beginning his work on the Grand Ronde Reservation. Meeting with such success that he was encouraged to continue his labors in the same field, he returned, in 1856, to Michigan for his family, which he brought here in 1857, making both trips by way of Panama, and remained on that reservation five years more, being success as a teacher, and is everywhere recognized as a woman of talent and culture. She resides at the corner of Faculty Row and Apple-Bloom way, where she has erected a comfortable and conveniently arranged cottage.

THOMAS BARBRE was born April 1, 1829, in Washington county, Vt., and when six months old his mother died, and when ten he was also bereft of the care of his father. For three years following this last event he lived with his brother, and then found a comfortable home, with a kind family, where he remained until he had reached his majority, receiving his education in the subscription schools common to the day. On leaving the home which had been his for so many years Mr. Barbre came as far west as Iowa, and there engaged as a teacher for a period of two years, at the end of which time he started across the plains as the driver of an ox-team, every foot of the distance between the Mississippi valley and the northwest being traveled on foot. On his arrival in Oregon he spent about a year in Marion county, located near Salem, and in 1853 he came to Lane county and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in Lost valley and one mile south of Dexter. This has remained his home since, with the exception of two and a half years, which he spent upon a farm north of Eugene, having purchased land in that vicinity, and owning at the present time three hundred and eleven acres, seventy-five of which are under cultivation, and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising, in the latter business having a number of Hereford cattle.

Mr. Barbre and wife are the parents of the following children: Irvin, located in this vicinity; Minnie, now Mrs. Voegli, of southern Oregon; Lurilla, now Mrs. Hanna, of Baker City; Alma, now Mrs. Handsaker, of Eugene; Clyde, Mrs. Jinks, of Butte, Mont.; and Earl, at home with his parents. Mr. Barbre is a Republican, and in religion belongs to the Christian Church, in which he has always manifested great interest and activity.

JAMES T. KIRK. In 1865 James T. Kirk arrived in Oregon, having crossed the plains as captain of a train of one hundred and nine wagons. They had come via the Platt river, over the old Barlow route and across the Cascade mountains, the journey occupying six months. Upon their arrival in Oregon they scattered to various locations, anxious and hopeful of finding a home in the land which had come to be a Mecca for many of the farmers of the Mississippi valley, the spirit of restlessness probably being due to the fact that they were the sons of pioneers who had early settled in their homes and grown a part of the country which they helped to make. It was so with Mr. Kirk, for both his father and grandfather were pioneers, one east and the other a short distance west of the Mississippi river. The grandfather, James Kirk, was a native of Virginia, and at an early date he came across the mountains into Kentucky, walking with his gun on his shoulder beside the horse which carried his wife to assist him in the making of a home in the new lands of the valley. He located near Lebanon, where the remainder of his life was passed. He was a patriot as well as a pioneer in the cause of his country, having served in the Revolution. His son, Jesse Kirk, the father of James T. Kirk, was born in Kentucky, and in 1830 he left his native state and settled in Illinois, where he remained eighteen months, after which, in the latter half of 1831, he went to Randolph county, Mo. He later became a resident of Adair county, in which he spent the remainder of his life, the principal city of that county, Kirksville, being a standing monument of the influence which he exerted as its first settler. His death occurred four miles east of that city, August 31, 1846, at the age of eighty years. He married Frances Gray, a native of Tennessee, who died near Junction City October 30, 1867, the mother of five children, four sons and one daughter, of whom the oldest was James T., born near Lebanon, Ky., October 1, 1820.

His position in the family necessitating more or less attention to the wants of the other and younger members, James T. Kirk was prevented from obtaining anything but a very limited education in the primitive schools of Kentucky, and his years were well occupied for others until he was twenty years old, when he married and went to farming for himself. He located in Missouri, whither he had removed with his parents when he was only eleven years old, and there remained until 1865, when with a large number of others he sought a home in the west. In October, 1866, they located five miles southwest of Junction City, Lane county, where he bought three hundred and fifty-five acres, upon which he remained until 1876, when he came to Junction City and became the owner of forty acres in the near vicinity, where he put in a small hopyard and later gave this property to his youngest son. His farm is now rented and he is living retired, having met with very satisfactory results from his efforts in Oregon, accumulating considerable property. In addition to that already named he owns eighty acres eight miles west of Monroe, Benton county, a blacksmith shop, several lots in the business part of the city and his own residence.

Mr. Kirk was married March 2, 1841, in Missouri, to Virginia Adkins, who was born in Howard county, Mo., and died in Oregon in January, 1866. She was the daughter of James Adkins, a native of Virginia, who located in Howard county, Mo., and later removed to Adair county, near the present site of the city of Kirksville, where his death occurred. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Kirk, Jesse F. is located in this vicinity as a farmer; James C., is near Heppner, Ore.; William A. is deceased; Frances Elizabeth is also deceased; John T. died in infancy; Rev. Charles E., is in Phoenix, Ariz.; Thomas J. is also in this vicinity; and Joseph H. also died in infancy. January 1, 1868, Mr. Kirk married Nancy A. McClure, who was born in Bruceville, Ind., the daughter of William McClure, who was born in a southern state and died in Indiana, after a useful life as a farmer. No children blessed the second union, and after the death of his wife, which occurred August 9, 1900. Ida Adkins, the niece of his first wife, took charge of the household and has since cared for Mr. Kirk. As a Democrat Mr. Kirk has served for one term as a member of the city council. Fraternally he is a Master Mason, and also belongs to the Presbyterian Church.

J. I. PHILIPPI. Pursuing their calm and uneventful lives in the midst of the many-sided activity of Eugene are men content to be onlookers only, who walk with leisurely and oftentimes halting steps her busy thoroughfares, and who gladly return to the peace of quiet homes, remote from heated and surging ambitions, and the mad struggle for gold which in other days looked so alluring. To them the occasion has passed, but in going it has been well utilized by these agricultural toilers, whose present thrift argues well for an earlier appreciation of the giant opportunities which beckoned them to the coast, and caused them to stake their all on the means to accomplish the long journey. No class of citizens enjoys to greater extent the esteem of the thoughtful rising generation than those tillers of the soil, who have laid aside their worn implements, and with hearts and minds mellowed into harmony with their surroundings, carry around with them an impression of rest and peace. Among the erstwhile farmers who are now profiting by the advantages of Eugene may be mentioned J. I. Philippi, who came here in 1902, after improving some of the finest and most paying properties in Lane county.

The oldest in a family of nine children, seven of whom are living, Mr. Philippi was born in Somerset county, Pa., September 24, 1839, his parents, David and Marv (McMillan) Philippi, being natives of the same county and state, as was also his paternal grandfather, John Philippi. The grandfather McMillan came from the north of Ireland and settled in Somerset county, Pa., where he died on his farm at the age of ninety-nine years. David Philippi and his wife spent their entire married life in the east and middle west, removing to Iowa about 1857, where the husband bought a farm, and where he died in 1866. He is survived by his wife, who lives in Eugene, Ore., and who is four score and three years old. Among the heroes of the Civil war were two of the sons of David Philippi, both being members of the Thirty-second Iowa Infantry, and one of whom, John, was killed at the battle of Sabine Cross Roads. His brother, Maple, was wounded in the same memorable battle, but recovered in due time and is now living in the state of Minnesota.

In his youth J. I. Philippi had the advantages of the public schools in both Pennsylvania and Iowa, being seventeen years of age when he removed with his parents to the latter state. True, the schools were of the pioneer kind and but irregularly attended, but he was of a studious turn of mind, and instinctively grasped the importance of acquiring all possible general knowledge. At the age of twenty-one he began to clerk in a general store in Clarksville, Iowa, and finally became interested in a mercantile business of his own under the firm name of Newman & Philippi. Mr. Newman, who afterward became Mr. Philippi's father-in-law, proved a capable and thoroughly reliable man, and the partners were destined to spend many years of their business life together. The marriage of Mary Newman and Mr. Philippi occurred in 1862, and in 1869 the partners sold out their business, and crossed the plains to Oregon with horse teams. The long journey was accomplished without any serious mishaps, and was memorable because of the fact that for a part of the way they traveled with the noted Kit Carson. Mr. Philippi located a claim near Hillsboro, Washington county, for a year, and then bought and managed a tanyard with Mr. Newman for a year. In 1871 Mr. Philippi and Mr. Newman bought a farm of six hundred and forty acres five miles north of Albany, which they conducted with considerable success until 1883, when Mr. Philippi sold his interest and invested in three hundred and twenty acres near Coburg, in Lane county, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising until 1902. He was very successful, his crops being invariably large and of good quality, and his stock bringing the highest market prices. In 1902 he removed to Eugene, where he lives, having retired from active pursuits.

In 1862 Mr. Philippi was married to Miss Mary Newman, daughter of his partner, Henry Newman, who died in Linn county, Ore., in 1889. Mrs. Newman was born in Adams county, Ohio. Politically Mr. Philippi is a Democrat, but aside from assisting his office-seeking friends, has never taken a very active interest in party affairs. He is a well informed and studious man, and while on the farm invariably supplied himself and family with current literature, thus encouraging habits of thought and research in the minds of those around him. He has reared wisely and well a large family, and eight of his fourteen children are living. Of these, Henry and Barton live in Eugene; George lives at Sweet Home; Charles is a resident of Flora, Ore.; Walter lives on a farm in Linn county; Alice is now Mrs. Meyer, of Linn county; Emma is the wife of Percy Long of Eugene; and Lizzie lives with her parents. Genial in his intercourse with friends and associates, firm in his adherence to fair dealing and integrity, Mr. Philippi commands the respect and good will of all who know him.

HARVEY C. VEATCH. Throughout the length and breadth of Lane county, Harvey C. Veatch, or "Burne Veatch," as he is familiarly known, is regarded as a typical pioneer, resourceful, brave and industrious, true to his friends and to the best interests of a flourishing agricultural community. Since his retirement from active life in 1894, Cottage Grove has profited by his citizenship, and a popular store, that of Veatch & Lewis, has enabled him to enjoy a satisfactory income through his investment in its interests, which are looked after by his son, O. O. Veatch. He has erected a pleasant and commodious residence, and besides owns four other buildings, some of them rented to business firms. Incidentally Mr. Veatch loans money on real estate and other security, and takes a practical and helpful interest in the general affairs of the town.

The early ancestors of Mr. Veatch pursued their various occupations in the picturesque country of Wales, the first to emigrate to America being three brothers, Elias, Nathan and James, who settled in North Carolina and Alabama. James, the paternal great-grandfather of Harvey C., married a Miss Raynor in 1751, removed with her to North Carolina, where his death occurred in 1780. He was the father of eight children, of whom the following served in the Revolutionary war: Walter, Isaac, James, Amos and Charles. Elias, the paternal grandfather, removed at an early day to Illinois, his death occurring there in 1820. His son, Isaac, the father of Harvey C., was born in North Carolina, August 25, 1786. Isaac went to Georgia on business, and there married Mary Miller, and soon after located in Tennessee, in time joining his father in the far-off state of Illinois. Near Enfield, White county, he combined agricultural pursuits with the running of a grist-mill, applying also his trade of cabinet-maker as opportunity offered. About 1881 he came west to spend the remainder of his life with his children, and two years later, in 1882, his death occurred at the home of his son, Harvey C., at the age of ninety-three years. He was a great admirer of Abraham Lincoln, and in his religious affiliations was a Presbyterian. In his family were twelve sons and four daughters, three of whom are living at the present time, Robert M., Harvey C. and Sylvester E. Isaac Veatch served in the war of 1812, and always took an active interest in political and other undertakings of his neighborhood.

Born in White county, Ill., near Enfield, November 10, 1828, Harvey C. Veatch had about the same educational chances as had his fifteen brothers and sisters, the extent being a little log school-house with slab benches. About 1845 he removed with his parents to Davis county, Iowa, settling on a farm eight miles southwest of Bloomfield and here in 1853 an opportunity presented itself to cross the plains in an emigrant train, as driver and general helper for Samuel B. Knox, his future father-in-law. The train encountered some very annoying experiences, although the members were very careful and always maintained a strict guard day and night. At Elkhorn, Neb., the Indians stampeded the cattle, and on another occasion, while hunting on Wolf Creek, Nev., Mr. Veatch and Mr. Knox were surrounded and surprised by a large number of Indians, barely escaping with their lives. In July, 1854, Mr. Veatch located a claim of two hundred and seventy acres one and a half miles below Cottage Grove, and for forty years this continued to be his home, the field of the most successful and far-reaching effort of his life. Later, by purchase, three hundred and twenty acres of the Thos. L. Knox donation claim was added to his holdings.

The romance begun on the plains with the daughter of his friend and employer continued after the respective settlements were made in Oregon, and the wedding of Mr. Veatch and Margaret Jane Knox was solemnized December 24, 1854, near Cottage Grove. Miss Knox was born in Hancock county, Ill., July 27, 1831, a daughter of Samuel B. Knox, who was born in Kentucky in 1810. Mr. Knox was married in his native state, removed to Hancock county, Ill., at a very early day, and in 1841 located with his family in Schuyler county, Mo. He was a natural money-maker, shrewd at driving a bargain, yet generous and honorable withal, and he was just the kind of man to succeed well in the state to which he came in 1853. He brought with him considerable live stock, and at the end of the journey had one hundred cows, valued at $100 each, with which he started a stock business on his donation claim near Cottage Grove. More land was added to his original purchase, and at the time of his death, at the age of eighty-two years, he owned more than two thousand acres.

Like all of the arrivals of the early '50s, Mr. Veatch had a great deal of trouble with the Indians, so much that it was impossible to peacefully pursue his agricultural vocation. The Rogue River war coming on, he enlisted, October 20, 1855, in Company B., under Captain Laban Buoy, and participated in the battle of Cow Creek Canyon, and assisted in removing the dead from the battlefield of Hungry Hill. He saw much of the grim and grewsome warfare of the murderous red men during his three months and ten days' service, and his discharge, at Dillard Station, Douglas county, terminated an experience which it will ever be painful to recall. In his home neighborhood Mr. Veatch became prominent as a promoter of education and morality, serving for nearly twenty-two years on the school board, also as county commissioner on the Democratic ticket for one term in 1870. He was one of the founders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1855, the first of that denomination in this county, and for nearly half a century he has been an elder of the church, helping its cause financially and by personal activity. Since coming to Cottage Grove in 1894, he has been city treasurer for one term, and has with equal enthusiasm lent his mature interest to the town's educational and moral and business welfare. The store in which he has invested is managed by his son, and proves a considerable source of income, as do other enterprises which Mr. Veatch has found worthy of his investment. Eight children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Samuel P. lives in Portland, and is a passenger conductor on the Southern Pacific railroad; Oliver O. is a merchant of Cottage Grove; Rosetta is now Mrs. G. C. Miller, of Walla Walla, Wash.; Posey S. is deceased; Harriett Elizabeth is the wife of Rev. W. V. McGee, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of Long View, Tex.; Mary Sophina is the wife of Robert Mosby, of Lake View, Ore.; Eva is the wife of E. S. Halderman, a resident of this town, but a miner of the Bohemia Mining District; and Robert E. is a freight conductor on the Southern Pacific railroad.

OSCAR W. HURD. When Oscar W. Hurd came to Oregon and located on the Siuslaw river in 1883, bringing with him the first small stock of general merchandise which had ever invaded that part of the country, his customers were composed largely of Indians, and in return for his wares he received treasures dear to the heart of the red men. Yet in this crude and ill-arranged mercantile establishment, with its limited assortment of necessities, and its surrounding desolation, there was a prophecy scarcely anticipated by even the hopeful proprietor himself. That the distance traveled by this moderately endowed storekeeper has been a long one, and that exceptional abilities lurked beneath his modest exterior, has been demonstrated unmistakably during the intervening years. This merchant prince, whose operations are not exceeded in extent by anyone along the coast of Oregon, whose merchant vessels ply the waters of bay and river, whose four thousand acres of timber land are being denuded and its trees utilized in a saw-mill of his own with a capacity of fifty thousand feet per day, and whose manifold interests include the ownership and management of the Hurd Lumber & Navigation Company, the O. W. Hurd mercantile business, the Florence Drug Store, the Florence Creamery, and the O. W. Hurd Packing Company, has placed this part of Oregon under lasting obligation to his genius for organization, to his extraordinary financial acumen, and his sterling qualities as man and citizen.

The early life and training of Mr. Hurd prepared him for the world of labor into which his ambition was to lead him. Industry was one of the first requisites of the rising generation around Penobscot county, Maine, where he was born December 16, 1853, and the eight children of Philander S. and Martha (King) Hurd, were no exception to the rule. Very early ancestors had settled in the northern country on their arrival from England in 1600, and the paternal great-grandfather followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary war. The grandfather, Jonathan Hurd, a stock-drover by occupation, settled on the large farm in Maine upon which was born his son, Philander S. Hurd, and the latter still occupies this highly treasured land possession. The maternal family of King also claims English ancestry, and was established in Maine at a very early day, the grandfather, Rice King, having been born there. Mrs. Hurd was born and reared in Bradford township, and at the age of seventy is the sympathetic and helpful companion of the husband with whom she has passed so many years of her life.

The oldest in a family of five sons and three daughters, Oscar W. Hurd remained at home until attaining his majority, and in the meantime had acquired a fair common school education. He was not richly endowed with this world's goods, but he had saved his earnings, and was able to come to the west by way of the Central Pacific railroad in 1874, and to still have a little left for possible needs. At Punta Arena,

Cal., he worked his way up in a shingle factory, beginning as a filer, and ending as the manager of the concern. Later he embarked in the wholesale and retail butcher business in which he was very successful, selling his business in 1883. He came to Oregon with a stock of general merchandise, having heard of the opening on the Siuslaw river, and having made up his mind to grow up with the country. Ever since he has been a merchant, enlarging his capacity with his trade, and with this for a foundation, has branched out into a multiplicity of interests. The Mary Hall, the first steamboat on the river, was purchased and started upon its long era of usefulness by Mr. Hurd, and the whistle of this pioneer craft was the first to wake the echoes of the dense timber lands. At the present time he owns the steamer Mink, the Marguerite, and the tug boat Roscoe, launched May 15, 1903, and named after the son of the owner. Above Florence, Mr. Hurd has a creamery in operation, which has a capacity for caring for milk from five hundred cows. Another enterprise of equal importance from an employment and money-making standpoint is the O. W. Hurd Packing Company, of which he is president and sole owner, and which has a capacity of fifteen thousand cases of salmon per season. His four thousand acres of timber and river land is all in this vicinity, and the saw-mill, but recently erected in Florence, is aiding to carry on one of the most extensive logging businesses in this part of the state. No similar enterprises in the northwest are more substantially and reliably founded, or more praiseworthy maintained than the five of which Mr. Hurd is the instigator and promoter. He has given minute attention to the details of each branch of his many-sided business, and the latest in machinery and method have been adopted regardless of outlay or inconvenience. And thus Mr. Hurd enjoys the additional prestige due large and successful employers of labor, and in this respect his name is associated with the greatest system, kindness and consideration. On his journey to western success he has dealt with all classes of people, and though like all strong and forceful and influential men, enemies may have risen up in his path, it is safe to say that not a man, woman or child in this coast country regards as other than absolutely trustworthy, the name, character, or good will of this captain of industry.

Politics has played a small part in the life of Mr. Hurd. He votes the Republican ticket and upholds Republican institutions, but aside from minor local offices, such as town trustee and councilman, his time has been devoted exclusively to his business and home. His fraternal associations are with the Masons of Florence, in which organization he has attained high rank, and is a member of the grand lodge. With his wife he is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and at present is serving as its treasurer. In 1887 Mr. Hurd married, in Eugene, Lily M. Cox, who was born in January, 1862, a daughter of Capt. W. A. Cox. Captain Cox spent many years of his life on the high seas and in the coast trade, but is now retired from active service, making his home on the Pacific shore. Marguerite, Roscoe and Hester, the three children of Mr. and Mrs. Hurd, are living at home. Too much cannot be said of the worth and example of men cast in heroic mould, whether their field of activity be in the commercial, professional, industrial or religious world. Any ambitious young man might profit by the lessons taught in the life of Mr. Hurd. Sober and industrious, persevering always in the direction which his better judgment dictates, he has carved out a competency from the new but intrinsically great commonwealth of Oregon, and no one of her citizens, of which she boasts the proudest and best in the world, can excel him in stability and moral worth.

WILLIAM M. RITNEY. The first six years of the life of this honored farmer were spent in Howard county, Mo., where he was born December 19, 1848, the fourth child of the four sons and three daughters of John and Elizabeth (Wayland) Ritney, natives respectively of Knox county, Ohio, and Virginia, and the latter of whom met a tragic death. John Ritney removed with his parents from Ohio to Howard county, Mo., at a very early day, and there learned the millwright's trade, which he continued to follow as long as he remained in the middle west. In 1853 he outfitted with ox-teams and crossed the country with comparatively few happenings of an unpleasant nature. For two years he lived in Salem, and then came to Lane county and took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Junction City, which land is now occupied by his son, William M. Here he made some headway in clearing his land, but died soon after becoming established in the west, February 6, 1865, at the age of fifty-six years.

At the age of sixteen years William M. Ritney engaged in independent farming and stock-raising on his father's farm, to which he has added, until he now owns four hundred and eight acres. The farm is advantageously located near the town, so that the family have the advantages of both town and country. Mr. Ritney has always taken a keen interest in the educational advancement of the county, and between 1870 and 1880 was a teacher in the schools of the district. He has since been a member and clerk of the school board during many terms, and has held other offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen, including that of city recorder for six years. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is a welcome visitor of the lodge of that organization. Mr. Ritney has been particularly prominent in Presbyterian Church affairs, especially promoting the interests of the Sunday schools of his district, both at Eugene and Junction City. In the former city he was the foremost worker in the church for nearly thirty years, and for many years he has been superintendent of the Sunday school in Junction City, for nine years filling the position of secretary of the Sunday schools of the county.

For his first wife Mr. Ritney married, in Eugene, Josephine Goltra, who was born in Douglas county, and died in Eugene in 1877, leaving one child, Royal W., engaged in gold-mining in Baker City, Ore. The present Mrs. Ritney was formerly Lucy J. Bushnell, a native of Lane county, Ore., and who is the mother of six children.

EDWARD P. REDFORD. Among the enterprising and successful farmers to whom Lane county owes so much for her present advanced position, Edward P. Redford deserves more than passing mention. Inheriting from a thrifty and successful father an appreciation of the possibilities of his useful occupation, he has progressed, as study and research have broadened his mind and placed him in touch with the best to be obtained in his line. He was born in Barren county, Ky., August 10, 1829. His father moved his family to Missouri about 1848, this being the third state in which he had owned land, his farm in his native state, Virginia, being the largest. There were fifteen children in the family, and Edward P., who was the fourth in order of birth, led an uneventful youth, attending the district schools irregularly, and working hard during the summer season. Like many other strong and ambitious young men he was on the alert for improving his opportunities, and was willing to take great risks in order to place himself in a better position. The tales of mining and farming which reached him from the west, fell upon attentive and hopeful ears, and April 24, 1850, he started out with ox teams to seek his fortune in the far west. Arriving in California at the end of five months, he mined and prospected for a year, but was not favorably impressed with the uncertainty and rough life incident to mining, nor was he sufficiently successful to warrant a continuation of the struggle. For a time he engaged in teaming. In November, 1852, he arrived in Portland, Ore., and has since been a resident of the state.

In the spring of 1853 Mr. Redford moved to Benton county, making his home near Corvallis, until February, 1853, when he took up a donation claim in Lane county. His marriage with Sarah M. Cochran occurred January 14, 1855. Mrs. Redford was born in Missouri, and came across the plains with her parents in 1852, locating on a farm in Lane county. After his marriage Mr. Redford took up a claim three miles northeast of Cottage Grove. In 1861 he removed near Coburg, and in 1863 to his present place, three and one-half miles northeast of Cottage Grove. This farm consisted of two hundred and twenty acres, being on the angles of sections 9, 10, 15 and 16, township 20, range 3 west. At present he owns one hundred and fifty-six acres, upon which he has made all modern improvements, and carries on general farming and stock-raising. For about seventeen years he operated harvesting machines around the country, and in this way materially increased his yearly allowance, many of the settlers being unable at that time to own the necessary machinery with which to gather in their grain.

Of the first marriage of Mr. Redford nine children were born, the only survivors being John M., of Creswell; James E., of Arena; Elizabeth, Mrs. Armstrong, of California; and Ida B., Mrs. Stocks, of the vicinity of Saginaw. Mrs. Redford died February 27, 1875. For his second wife Mr. Redford married Mrs. Minerva Birch, who was born in Missouri and died in Oregon in 1897. For a third wife he married Mrs. Harriet E. Hymas, a native of Missouri. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Redford has taken an active interest in county politics, and has held all minor offices of the vicinity. He is a member and elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. During his life in the west Mr. Redford has been identified with the development of the state, and during the Rogue river war gladly left his farm to espouse the cause of the settlers against the Indians. Enlisting under Captain Buoy, in Company B, he served for three months during the latter part of 1855 and the beginning of 1856, participating in many of the important battles, and subjecting himself to great danger. Mr. Redford commands the respect and good will of all with whom he has been associated, and as an agriculturist, soldier, and citizen, has done his part in the upbuilding of his adopted state.

FRANK W. OSBURN, the cashier of the Eugene Loan & Savings Bank, is one of the strong and influential men of the city in which the greater part of his life has been spent. Since he came to Oregon at the age of thirteen his every step to progress has been watched by that pioneer and earlier element which zealously guards its prestige, and which nevertheless saw in the energetic and capable boy the promising material from which their sturdy successors were to come. That he has realized the expectations of those in a position to judge is due as much to his masterful handling of opportunity, as to the example of a practical and capable father, with whose drug business he was identified first as clerk and later as partner for many years.

Mr. Osburn was born at Saegerstown, near Meadville, Crawford county, Pa., January 24, 1853, his father, William, and his grandfather, Robert Osburn, being natives of the same state. With patriotic fervor the grandsire fought for his country in the war of 1812, and died in the state of his birth in 1863. He was of English descent. His son William followed his example and became a land owner and stockman in Pennsylvania, in which state he married Rebecca Deeter, born in the eastern part of the Quaker state, and a daughter of Michael Deeter, who was an early settler in the vicinity of Saegerstown. As the name implies, the maternal family claims German ancestry. Six children were born to William Osburn and his wife in Pennsylvania, Frank W. being the third. Ralph S., the oldest son, died in Reno, Nev.; Robert M. was living in Mexico when last heard of; Adela E. is now Mrs. Moore of San Diego, Cal.; Mrs. Agnes E. Harding is a resident of Eugene; and Mrs. Augusta McDonald lives at Grant's Pass, Ore. William Osburn brought his wife and six children to Eugene in 1866, by way of Panama, San Francisco, Portland and Albany, and for many years engaged in the drug business on Willamette street. His death occurred in 1890, and he was survived by his wife until 1895. He was a Democrat in politics, and was fraternally connected with the Masons.

After coming to Eugene, Frank W. Osburn continued the public school education begun in Saegerstown, and in 1872 left the schoolroom to enter his father's drug business, which he learned from the bottom. In 1872 he became a partner in the concern under the firm name of Osburn & Company, and after the death of his father in 1890 he took into partnership Mr. Delano, the firm name being changed to Osburn & Delano. Owing to the pressure of other business matters, Mr. Osburn disposed of his interest in the drug business to his partner in 1899. In the meantime, in 1890, he had become interested in what is now the Eugene Loan & Savings Bank, which was organized as the Bank of Oregon, and became the Eugene National Bank in 1891. Mr. Osburn was one of the organizers and directors of the original bank, became the bookkeeper in 1891, and in 1892 assumed his present position of cashier. He is also interested as director and treasurer in the Lane County Electric Company. He has been a special factor in educational advancement in Eugene, is now serving his second term on the school board, and is a member of the building committee overseeing the erection of the new high school building. Always a staunch Democrat, he served as postmaster of Eugene under Cleveland from 1886 until 1890, but is not seeking further honors of a political nature. He is past master of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. and A. M.; past high priest of Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; past eminent commander of Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, Knights Templar; a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen; and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In 1881 Mr. Osburn married in Walla Walla, Wash., Addie Bristol, born in Lane county, Ore., and daughter of George and Pauline (Minton) Bristol, well known pioneers of Oregon. Frank W. Osburn, Jr., the only son of this union, is a graduate of the Annapolis Naval Academy, class of 1902, and is now junior officer on the gunboat Vicksburg with the Asiatic squadron in China. Mrs. Osburn is a member of the Congregational church.

JOHN WILLIAM HARRIS, M. D. The sturdy qualities which distinguish the pioneer have been transmitted to the son, for since his fourteenth year John W. Harris has worked his own way in the pursuit of an education and a profession for which he felt his ability, attending the best of schools and attaining the degree which permitted him to begin the practice of medicine. He is the son of J. M. Harris, was born near Russellville, Ind., March 2, 1856, and was next to the youngest of his father's family. He lived in his native state until he was three years old, when his parents located in Illinois, near the town of Quincy, and there remained for six years, when they crossed the plains with four-horse teams. The journey occupied six months. Upon their arrival in the west the father settled six miles east of Albany, Linn county, where they remained for four years. In 1871 he located near Cottage Grove. (For a more complete account of the father's life, refer to his sketch, which appears on another page of this work.)

John W. Harris remained at home until attaining his majority, receiving his education in the public schools and Monmouth College, and beginning to teach when but seventeen years old. This occupation was continued in connection with his studies for several years, the income therefrom enabling him to continue his work. The first year in which he undertook the study of medicine he was under the tutelage of his brother, Dr. T. W. Harris of Eugene, after which he entered the medical department of the University of California, remaining one year. He then became a student in the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated in 1884 with the degree of M. D. Taking up the practice of his profession, Dr. Harris located in Cottage Grove, where he remained until 1888, when he removed to Eugene, in which city he has since been engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery. The uniform judgment which has brought him success has made him a prominent physician and has built up for him a substantial and lucrative practice. For the past eight years he has been secretary of the Lane County Medical Society, and is now serving as medical examiner for several old line insurance companies.

The marriage of Dr. Harris occurred in Cottage Grove June 6, 1877, and united him with Miss Mary R. Shortridge, a native of that city, and the daughter of James H. Shortridge, who became a farmer in that neighborhood as a pioneer of 1852. The four children who have blessed the union of Dr. and Mrs. Harris are as follows: Madison Curtis, a graduate of the University of Oregon, who is now attending Northwestern University of Chicago, class of 1904, as a student in the dental department; Edith M., wife of Louis Martin of Portland; Edna L. and George H. Mrs. Harris is a member of the Christian Church. In fraternal associations Dr. Harris is an Odd Fellow, in which lodge he is past officer, and he belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen, acting as medical examiner for that order. In politics a staunch Republican, he has often been called upon to serve in the interests of the party, for six years having acted as coroner of Lane county.

COL. GEORGE O. YORAN. As a journalist and soldier, Col. George O. Yoran constitutes a very popular and agreeable adjunct to the latter-day cosmopolitan life of Eugene. Representing one of the best-known families of this state, his immediate connections are dealt with elsewhere in this work, and perhaps furnish a key to the moulding influences of his life. Pride of birth, and an ancestry numbering among its members men who shouldered their muskets on the battlefields of the Revolutionary war, are reflected in his career. His birth occurred at Sand Spring, Delaware county, Iowa, and he was reared principally in Jones county, of the same state. After graduating from the high school of Monticello, Iowa, he applied himself to learning the printer's trade, plying the same after coming to Eugene in 1883. For a time he was associated with the West Shore Magazine in Portland, and upon returning to Eugene joined his brother, W. C. Yoran, in the publication of the Eugene Register until its sale in 1896.

Colonel Yoran's initial military experience began in 1887, when he became a member of Company C, First Regiment of Infantry, Oregon National Guards, and from the position of private was rapidly advanced to the rank of sergeant and second lieutenant. Resigning his commission in November, 1889, he was elected first lieutenant of Company C in the spring of 1890, a few months later being promoted to the captaincy of the same company, and in 1893 was elected major of the Second Regiment of Infantry, Oregon National Guards, the following year being given full command of the regiment. In 1894 he was elected and commissioned colonel of the regiment, and at the breaking out of the Spanish-American war was appointed and commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Second Regiment by Governor Lord. With his command he accompanied the regiment to the Philippine Islands, remained during the entire campaign, and after returning to the United States was honorably discharged in August, 1899. Upon the re-organization of the Oregon National Guards in May, 1900, the Fourth regiment was organized, and Colonel Yoran was elected its colonel May 15, 1900. He is a typical military man, enthusiastic in his appreciation of law and order, and entertains corresponding pride in the organizations with which he has been connected. He is a member of the Spanish-American War Veterans' Association. Fraternally he is connected with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. and A. M., of which he was master in 1903, and Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M., of which he is captain of the host. A Republican in politics, he has never aspired to official recognition. His wife, who was formerly Laura Dunn, a native of Eugene, is a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and the mother of two interesting children, George Francis and Ada Gertrude. Mrs. Yoran is a daughter of the late F. B. Dunn.

WALDO L. CHESHIRE, M. D. Oregon has her share of men of brilliant intellectual attainments and character, and among these none are more prominent than those of the medical profession, one of whom is Waldo L. Cheshire, who, though still young in years, is a man of wide experience. He is serving as president of the Lane County Medical Society, and also holds the position of medical examiner for various of the fraternal orders, and for two years he served as county coroner, from 1898 to 1900, as well as carrying on a general practice of medicine and surgery.

Dr. Cheshire was born in Umatilla county,

Ore., July 11, 1864, his father being W. P. Cheshire, a native of Tennessee, and the grandfather Edmund Cheshire, who removed to Missouri, where he died. W. P. Cheshire was reared in Missouri until he was fifteen years of age, when he crossed the plains in an ox-train in 1854, coming first to the Willamette valley, where he worked for various people and was also employed in the mines of Southern Oregon. In 1855-56 he enlisted for service in the Rogue River Indian war, and afterward returned to the valley. For a short period he was a resident of Walla Walla, Wash., and then became a farmer and stockman in Umatilla county. With the exception of a year which was spent in San Francisco, he has passed the remaining years in Lane county, engaged in farming and hop-raising, having been engaged in the latter industry for fifteen years. He now makes his home in Eugene. In his fraternal relations he is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, K. T., and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., and is a member of the Episcopal Church. He married Susan F. Baskett, a native of Lane county, Ore., and the daughter of Richard Dudley Baskett, who came with his wife across the plains and became a pioneer of the Willamette valley. He died in the spring of 1902, near Portland, his wife having died many years earlier, when she was but thirty-four years of age.

Of the six children born to his parents, Waldo L. Cheshire, the eldest, was reared in Lane county, from the age of five years. He attended the district school in an effort to gain a preliminary education, and afterward entered the University of Oregon. He withdrew from this work in his junior year, anxious to take up the study of medicine, which he did alone for two years, when he became a student at the Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1896 with the degree of M. D. He then began practicing in Oakland, Cal., where he met with fair success, and after one year he came to Eugene, and has since made this his home.

The marriage of Dr. Cheshire occurred in Douglas county, Ore., Augusta May Palmer, a native of that county, becoming his wife. Her father was the Hon. P. P. Palmer, a prominent and successful farmer of that section. Dr. Cheshire was made a Mason in Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., is a member of K. of P. Uniformed Rank; Woodmen of the World; Modern Woodmen of America; Royal Arcanum; Foresters, and United Artisans, in all of these serving as medical examiner. He is also a member of the Native Sons of Oregon. The doctor is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in politics is a Democrat. Dr. Cheshire served for several years in the Oregon National Guard, and since July, 1898, he has been special examiner for Companies A and C, Fourth Regiment, and also of the Fourth Regiment Band.

RICHARD T. A. ROBINSON. A Canadian by birth, Richard T. A. Robinson combines the good qualities which distinguish those northern-born people with the energy and open heartedness of the Oregonians, for much of his life has been spent here, and it is here that he has earned his competence. He now owns two hundred and seventeen acres located in the vicinity of Junction City, Lane county, and is busily engaged in general farming and stock-raising, in the latter work finding profit in Cotswold sheep and Poland-China hogs.

Mr. Robinson was born in Mascouche, Canada, February 16, 1869, and when only nine years old he came to Oregon with his parents, Richard A. and Jane Ann (Alexander) Robinson, who located upon the farm where the son now makes his home, and engaged in the work of cultivation and improvement. This, however, remained their home for but a short time, as the mother died the year following and the father then took his children back to New York state to find a home. They remained in the latter location until the death of the father by a stroke of lightning, August 1, 1883, and then Richard T. A. returned to Oregon to make his home with R. L. Robinson, his uncle, who had come west to the gold fields of California in the early fifties, and from that location had settled in this state, where he had since remained. From 1886 to the day of his uncle's death, May 6, 1894, he made his home with the latter, who owned a farm of eight hundred and twenty-two acres. October 24, 1894, he married Jennie M. Spencer, and they now have one child, Jennie M. A practical and intelligent farmer, Mr. Robinson has met with successful returns from his work and has added no little to the prestige of this class of men in the northwest. In religion he is a member of the United Brethren Church, and politically casts his ballot with the Democratic party.

JESSE SOVERNS. In the energetic and practical pursuit of agriculture Jesse Sovrens is putting in his years and following the early training which he received from his father, George Sovrens, one of the pioneers of 1852. The latter was born in Coshoccon county, Ohio, December 4, 1826, his father being Jesse Sovrens, a native of Virginia, but who had been taken to Ohio when quite young, there growing to manhood's estate. He married Eliza Bailey, and in 1832 they removed to Indiana and in 1837 located in Tazewell county, Ill., where they followed farming for a livelihood.

Upon attaining manhood George Soverns married Fanny Holton and in 1852 he crossed the plains with his parents, his wife and child, a journey which was long recalled by the misfortunes that followed them. The wife and child died upon the journey, and the mother met with an accident which caused her death soon after reaching Portland, and each family was thus bereft of the faithful care of the mother. The grandfather located near the present site of Junction City and the younger man sought a livelihood in whatever he found to do, cutting wood, harvesting, etc. During the Rogue River war he engaged as teamster of his company, which was under the command of Capt. J. D. Matlock. In 1856 he located permanently in Lane county, becoming the owner of four hundred and twenty-six acres in the neighborhood of Junction City, and there engaged in the cultivation of his land, and especially dealt in stock. Later he added to his property by a purchase of six hundred and forty-six acres in this county and extended his cattle interests to a considerable degree. For two years he located in Eugene on account of the excellent schools which he wished his children to attend, then spent a year again on the farm, in 1879 locating permanently in Eugene, where he lived until his death in July, 1900.

The second wife of Mr. Soverns was Mrs. Elizabeth (Blachley) Tylor, a widow with one daughter, Jane, who married Bernum S. Hyland. The three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Soverns are as follows: Jesse, of this review, who was born on the farm where he now lives, May 28, 1859; Hulda, deceased; and Fannie, wife of Albert Jackson. The respect and esteem of all who knew him was the tribute paid to the worthy life which Mr. Soverns had lived.

Jesse Soverns was reared upon his father's farm, receiving his education in the University of Oregon, after which he attended the De France & White Commercial College of Portland, his course extending over a period of three years, the wisdom of his father foreseeing the value of a good education in the prosecution of agricultural pursuits. When twenty years old he assumed charge of the home farm and October 8, 1879, was married to Evaline C. Behrens, who was also born in Lane county, and was the daughter of Lewis Behrens, and they now have two children, George L., a merchant at Prosser, Wash., and Lewis, attending the high school of Eugene. Mr. Soverns now owns five hundred and seventy-five acres, all of which is in one piece, and engages in general farming and stock-raising, Cotswold sheep being his principal interest. In politics a Republican, he has proven his loyalty to the party and has served for twenty years as school clerk of District No. 38. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and fraternally he affiliates with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, at Junction City.

ISAAC N. EDWARDS. The usefulness of a man's life is not determined by his environment, but by the character which prompts his actions and indicates his motives, and it often happens that the life of an agriculturist is more conducive to broad-minded thought than that of almost any other occupation. Especially is this true in Oregon, and one of this class is Isaac N. Edwards, a resident of Lane county, whose voice has been heard on the side of progress for many years and whose utterances have been appreciated by those who have the welfare of the state and community at heart. Though his principal interests have always lain in the cultivation of the soil, he was chosen to the state legislature for the sessions of 1902-'03 as a representative of the Republican party, the principles of which he has always supported.

The Edwards family is also represented in Oregon by the father, James E., now making his home near Monroe, Benton county, in his eighty-seventh year, his presence among the citizens a constant reminder of the pioneer days of the state, for he crossed the plains in 1853. He was born in Pennsylvania, and in Ohio married Mary Longworth, also a native of the same state, and in the spring of '53 he outfitted with two wagons and seven yoke of oxen, and with his wife and four children set out upon the journey which meant a pilgrimage like unto that of the Israelites of old. Seven months were spent upon the plains amid the trials and dangers which beset the early traveler, and at the conclusion of their journey the father located in the Alsea country, Benton county, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. Upon this property the family remained for four years, when they removed near their present location, becoming the owner of one hundred and sixty acres, and later moving to their present home near Monroe, Benton county. The mother died in 1887. Mr. Edwards is a member of the United Brethren Church, having crossed in the train which was largely composed of a colony of that faith. As a citizen he has always been influential in his neighborhood and has taken a lively interest in public affairs, the position of county commissioner of Benton county being his for fourteen years.

The birth of Isaac N. Edwards occurred in Guernsey county, Ohio, November 5, 1845, and he was thus eight years old when the journey was made to the west. He was trained to the life of a farmer under the careful supervision of his father, but almost before entering manhood he left home to become a volunteer in Company A, First Regiment of Oregon Infantry, under the command of Capt. Charles La Follett, and was detailed to Indian service in the same year (1864). He was first stationed at Vancouver and was then removed to Fort Yamhill. His company was then divided and he went with Captain La Follett and forty men to the De Chutes country, where he participated in building Camp Polk, where they remained from October, 1864, to May, 1865, when the company returned to Fort Yamhill and was mustered out of service in July, 1865. He then returned to his home and at twenty-two he married, and bought one hundred and twenty acres in Benton county, that being the home of his family for two years. On locating in Lane county he purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres two miles southeast of Junction City and engaged in practical farming for a period of sixteen years, in 1885 removing to his present property, which consists of one hundred and seventy-eight acres. Here he carries on general farming and stock-raising and lives the comfortable and pleasant life of a prosperous farmer. He still owns the farm which was his home for so many years.

The wife of Mr. Edwards was in maidenhood Mary Gilbert, daughter of L. D. and Hannah (Belknap) Gilbert, pioneers of 1847, and by their union were born the following children: Orville, deceased; Loren; Lettie, the wife of Josiah H. Herron, of Benton county; Clifford; Ernest, at home; Leona, wife of Jesse Flint; Chester and Mary, at home. In the interests of the Republican party, the principles of which he endorses, Mr. Edwards has done considerable campaigning in a local way, in which capacity his services are thoroughly appreciated. In religion he was once a member of the United Brethren Church, but in the past few years has been identified with the Methodist Episcopal faith, of which his wife is also an adherent. The church is built opposite his home, and he and his wife were the promoters of the church organization. He now serves as class leader, trustee and steward, while Mrs. Edwards is a teacher in the Sunday school.

CHARLES APPLGATE. If all the events and experiences of this pioneer could be chronicled, they would make interesting reading for the occupants of the happy homes that now dot the country which he found a wilderness and inhabited by little else than savages and wild beasts. Suffice it to say that now his labors are ended, let the thronging thousands who shall enjoy this beautiful land remember that his strong arms helped to subdue this far-western wilderness and prepared it for civilization.

Charles Applegate was one of three brothers, Charles, Lindsay and Jesse Applegate, who played such an important part in the early history of Oregon. He was born in Henry county, Ky., January 24, 1806, and died at Yoncalla, Douglas county, Ore., on August 9, 1879. When fifteen years of age Mr. Applegate moved to St. Louis county, Mo., and a number of years later, in 1829, was joined in marriage with Malinda Miller. With her and a small company of emigrants, he started for Oregon on May 15, 1843, and thus became one of the very early settlers. They settled in the Willamette valley in Polk county, and remained there until 1850, but at that date removed to the vicinity of the present city of Yoncalla, where he became an essential figure in business affairs, continuing so until his death.

Mr. Applegate was a very successful stockman, and was especially a large sheep-raiser, and thus became very wealthy. He had a beautiful home on his large ranch, and was most liberal and hospitable to the emigrants and early settlers. His doors were always open to the weary travelers and they were glad to partake of his generous hospitality, and many of the early emigrants still remember him with great kindness. His whole life was a blameless one and he accomplished much good. He and his wife reared an exceptionally large family of fifteen children.

JOHN J. SPALINGER. When John J. Spalinger stepped from the gang plank of a sailing vessel in New York in 1856, he had $1.50 in his pocket, and a wealth of hope and good will in his heart. In his native Switzerland, where he was born in 1839, he had been reared to hard work and frugal living, and his scanty hoard seemed therefore more or less familiar, and not so discouraging as it might seem to some. By working his way he managed to reach Cook county, Ill., at a time when harvests were being gathered, and there was need for strong and willing men. For a few months he worked on farms for thirteen dollars a month, and then went to Des Moines, Iowa, where he found employment in a saw-mill. From Des Moines he made his way to Council Bluffs, and after working as a laborer for six months, returned to Des Moines, remaining there a few months.

In his effort to find a desirable permanent location Mr. Spalinger visited St. Louis, and finally reached Illinois, still later moving to Jasper county, Iowa. Here he was married, in 1863, to Elizabeth Owens, with whom he went to housekeeping on a farm he had purchased, and which consisted of forty acres. To this he added from time to time, and finally accumulated a large property. In 1875 he came with his family to Oregon, and for a year lived on rented land in Linn county, soon after purchasing three hundred and twenty acres of land. Thirty acres of this land was cleared, but at present nearly two hundred acres are available for general crops. Many fine improvements have followed in the wake of large harvests, and the general appearance of the farm is characteristic of the enterprise and order of the successful owner. It is three miles west of Jefferson, and is well watered, fenced and has a comfortable house.

The first wife of Mr. Spalinger died in 1885, leaving eight children: William, deceased; George; Frank; Oscar; Edward; Emma; Callie; and Sadie, deceased. In 1895 he was united in marriage with Mrs. Fannie Smith, daughter of Marshall Dudley and Chloe (Baldwin) Carpenter. Mrs. Spalinger was born in Iowa, and has resided in Oregon since 1888. By her marriage with George Frederick Smith she had two children, Clara Dell and Jessie May, both of whom are living. In politics Mr. Spalinger is Independent, believing in voting for the man best qualified to serve the public interests. He is enterprising and progressive, and a typical representative of his resourceful nation.

SAMUEL DOKE HOLT. The conditions prevalent in Oregon in the early days, though bespeaking desolation, loneliness and danger, were such as to finely develop the character of the men who became pioneers. Empty-handed they came into the wilderness and began the upbuilding of a primitive civilization, courage, honesty and earnestness of purpose becoming the foundation of this western commonwealth; advancing steadily with the march of progress unhindered by tradition of pioneer days; working patiently and perseveringly toward a common end. It is not a matter of wonder that the present generation pauses to look upon the record of such lives as those which gave to Oregon the strength and purpose of manhood, in both youth and maturity, holding in grateful remembrance the pioneers of the state.

Occupying a prominent place among the pioneers is the name of Samuel Doke Holt, who but recently passed from the scenes of his lifelong labors. He came to Oregon in 1852 and settled in Lane county, where he was identified with agricultural and stock interests for many years, becoming a power financially and exerting a wide and lasting influence by the example of a Christian character, by which he is so well remembered today. He was born in east Tennessee, near Greenville, the son of Barrett Holt.

The father was born near Richmond, Va., and on attaining manhood removed to Tennessee and thence to Missouri. The boyhood of Samuel D. Holt was spent upon a mountainous farm in Tennessee, but when fifteen years old he settled in Andrew county, Mo., where he entered the quartermaster's department of the United States army and served throughout the Mexican war and for about a year prior thereto. In the summer of 1848 he drove eight yoke of oxen, assisting in the building of Fort Kearney on the Platte river. After the close of the war he decided to try his fortunes in the west, and accordingly crossed the plains with ox-teams, in August of the same year commencing mining operations on the middle fork of the American river. This sojourn in California proved profitable, and on his return to Missouri in January, 1851, via the Isthmus of Panama, he purchased a farm and decided to remain content in the middle west. The following year, however, he outfitted with three wagons and a number of loose stock and again crossed the plains, his destination being the great northwest. He was accompanied by his two brothers, Benjamin and James E., the former of whom died in Harrisburg, Ore., in 1900, while the latter, after many years' identification with this state, became a resident of San Jose, Cal., where he now resides.

Mr. Holt arrived in Oregon August 29, 1852, and immediately took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres in the neighborhood of West Point, Lane county, and engaged in farming and stock-raising. He met with the success which follows earnest effort and practical application of knowledge, and before the passage of many years he was numbered among the representative citizens of his community. In partnership with his brother, James E., he became the owner of about three thousand acres of land, which was devoted to an extensive cultivation of cattle and sheep. After many years a large part of this land was disposed of and the partnership of the brothers dissolved. At this time Mr. Holt owned about six hundred acres of land, known as the Joe Smith donation claim, located three miles north of Coburg. About twenty years prior to his death he removed to Eugene, from which city he superintended the management of his agricultural interests.

The marriage of Mr. Holt united him with a native daughter of the west, Miss Angeline Wilkins, who was born near West Point, Lane county, in 1849. The ceremony was performed March 10, 1868, at the home of her father, Mitchell Wilkins, a pioneer of 1847. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Holt, namely: Aileen, who died at the age of six months, and Linna. The latter, after graduating from the Eugene high school, attended the University of Oregon, from which institution she was graduated in 1891. She married Albert Gaylord, of Pasadena, Cal., in which city her death occurred in 1898.

With the death of Mr. Holt, which occurred July 19, 1901, there passed away one of the truly worthy men of Eugene. Not alone eminent in the practical demonstration of his financial ability, but occupying a place high in the esteem of his fellow-men, Mr. Holt attracted to himself that regard which is the portion of one of his moral worth. No man stood higher in Eugene and no man more deserved the esteem and confidence of his associates. A Christian beyond the mere naming, he belonged to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, having been converted when a mere lad at a camp meeting near his old home in Greenville, Tenn. In the face of many temptations incident to the wandering life he led and the trials and dangers of his pioneer venture, he remained true to his profession of faith. In the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of this city, of which his wife is also a member, he served for many years on the official board, and was one of the strong lights of the congregation, an evidence of the love which he bore those who labored for the cause being manifested in his bequest of $1,000 to be used by the board of ministerial relief. In his political convictions Mr. Holt was a Democrat, though he was never radical in his ideas or professions. In his fraternal relations he was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, while his wife belongs to the Native Daughters of Eugene. Generous to a fault, broad-minded and public-spirited, Mr. Holt always contributed to every enterprise which came within his reach, having been particularly interested in the success of the University of Oregon. Both he and his brother James gave liberally to that institution, as much as $1,500 at a time going to increase the financial standing of this college. In addition to the many acts which the world could witness, Mr. Holt lived an earnest, forceful life, whose influence will outlast the passage of time and effectually insure him a place in the hearts of the younger generation.

FRANK A. HACKLEMAN. A native of Albany, Frank A. Hackleman was born March 14, 1865. After obtaining his knowledge of books in the Albany public schools, he became familiar as a boy with the care of stock, spending much of his time with his father on the ranch. When about twenty years old he started in business for himself as a cattle raiser and dealer, at the same time making a specialty of breeding horses. For marking cattle, his father had the letter Q branded on the right side of the animal, and Mr. Hackleman uses the same letter, but brands it on the left side. In branding horses the father uses the letter H, placing it on the shoulder, and Mr. Hackleman brands H with a bar across the top on the shoulder. Their ranch, known as the Q ranch, has a fine location for grazing purposes, being situated just on the edge of the Great Desert. Mr. Hackleman's ranch consists of three hundred and twenty acres of good farming land, with an extensive range for his cattle and horses near by. In his large herd of stock, he has many high grade Shorthorn cattle, and among his horses are some of the best Clydes and Percherons to be found in this locality. He sells some to the home market, but ships the greater part of those he raises, in the year 1902 two train-loads of horses having been shipped from the Q ranch to Omaha, Neb., where good draft horses are in special demand.

Mr. Hackleman married first Martha J. Stroud, who was born and reared in Albany. At her death she left two children, Elmira and Pansey. He then married Miss Lena Cox, also a native of Albany, and they are the parents of three children, namely: Hazel, Elenore and Dorothea. Politically Mr. Hackleman is a Democrat. He resides in Albany, being numbered among its foremost citizens, but, with his family, spends the summer seasons on his pleasant ranch, where he has a beautiful country home.

MAJOR JOHNSON is a son of Philip T. Johnson, and was born January 25, 1844, in Boone county, Mo. A native of Kentucky, Philip T. Johnson became an early settler of Boone county, Mo., but subsequently removed to Sullivan county, where his last years were spent. He served in the Civil war, enlisting in 1861 in the Twenty-third Missouri Infantry, and remaining with his company until he became so crippled that he was honorably discharged on account of physical disability. He married Sarah Hazard, a daughter of Harper Hazard, an early settler of Boone county, Mo., and a prominent member of the Baptist Church. She died in Missouri. Nine children were born of their union, eight boys and one girl. Four of the sons were in the Civil war, Henry D. serving as captain of a company in a Missouri regiment; D. F., Col. R. and Major being in the regiment with their father. Another son, Albert, was a member of the Missouri state militia for a year. Three sons still survive, Col. R. and Albert, of Missouri, and Major, the special subject of this sketch.

The eighth in a family of nine children, Major Johnson was brought up on a farm, and educated in the district school. At the age of seventeen, in August, 1861, he enlisted in Company

A, Twenty-third Missouri Infantry, and was mustered in at Benton Barracks, St. Louis. In April, 1862, at the Battle of Shiloh, the colonel of his regiment was killed, and he, with many of his comrades, was captured. The following six and one-half months, Mr. Johnson was confined in different southern prisons, the last one being Libby Prison, where he remained until exchanged. After recuperating, he rejoined his regiment in Missouri, and afterwards did duty in Tennessee from the fall of 1863 until the spring of 1864. At that time, as a member of the Fourteenth Army Corps, under General Thomas, he participated in the various pitched battles and minor engagements of the Georgia campaign. In the meantime Mr. Johnson's eyes, which had seriously troubled him from the time of his captivity, grew so much worse that at the siege of Atlanta he was unable to distinguish objects. As his time of service had expired, he was there mustered out, and honorably discharged. Returning to Missouri, he placed himself under treatment, but received no help, his eyes continually growing worse, and since 1877 he has been totally blind. Notwithstanding his great affliction, Mr. Johnson has never lost courage, but has labored persistently and willingly, confining his attention to the tilling of the soil chiefly. Emigrating to Oregon in January, 1876, he located first in Independence, where his brother, Philip T. Johnson, resided. He subsequently spent a short time in Polk county, then removed to Albany in 1880, in 1881 going to Benton county, where he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land on the Lebanon hillside. Two years later he traded that farm for another, and has since acquired other landed property, owning three farms in Linn county, one very fine one being located near Peoria. Since 1899, he has been a resident of Albany, and occupies a position of prominence among its esteemed and influential citizens.

On August 13, 1865, Mr. Johnson married, in Sullivan county, Mo., Mary M. Russell, who was born in Loudoun county, Va., the birthplace of her father, Jonathan Russell. Her grandfather, James Russell, was a native of Virginia, and a soldier in the Revolutionary war, was of Irish parentage, his family having emigrated from the north of Ireland to Virginia. Jonathan Russell began life as a farmer in Virginia, but afterwards became an early settler of Sullivan county, Mo., removing there in 1857. He improved a good farm, and for a number of years served in the state militia. He married for his first wife Elizabeth Edwards, who was born in Loudoun county, Va., a daughter of Joseph Edwards, a planter. She died in Missouri, leaving five children, one of whom resides in Missouri, one in Arkansas, and three in Oregon, namely: Mary M., now Mrs. Johnson; Mrs. Emma Crosby, of Albany; and James J., of Monmouth. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are the parents of four children, namely: Mrs. Emma C. Knight, of Linn county; Mrs. Amanda M. Bain, of Linn county; James A., a barber in Albany; and Dr. John P., a dentist in Roseberg, Ore. Although not an active politician, Mr. Johnson supports the principles of the Republican party.

THOMAS COLLINSON was born in county Durham, England, in 1822, and there spent twenty years of his life. His family is a very old one in England, and is noted for the strain of longevity which encourages with the possibility of long life all who bear the name. Joshua Collinson, the father of Thomas, was a soldier in the English army, and served under Wellington at the famous battle of Waterloo. He also was born in county Durham, and lived to be more than ninety years old.

Thomas Collinson's first self-made money was the result of labor in the lead mines. In 1844 he emigrated to America, and being familiar with mining, took his way to coal mines of Pennsylvania, where he worked for about seven years. In 1851 he came west to San Francisco by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and in Grass valley, California, engaged in mining for many years, experiencing the average success which visited the seeker after wealth in the early days. In 1858 he went to the Caribou mining region on horseback, wearily riding over mountainous roads for seventy-eight days, and at his destination sunk the first hole in that now famous region. That he was fairly successful as a miner is readily believed, for upon coming to Oregon in 1860 he had the means with which to purchase two hundred and seventy-five acres of land, the same being his present farm. At that time the property had but few improvements, and the general air of prosperity prevailing at the present time is entirely due to the exertions of the present owner. A comfortable rural residence, good barns and outhouses, and modern agricultural implements facilitate a very successful and paying farming and stock-raising enterprise. Of the nine children born to Mr. Collinson and his wife, Sarah (Booth) Collinson, six are living: Thomas, Alice, Ann D., Joseph, William and Benjamin. Mr. Collinson is one of the most honored of the venerable citizens of this neighborhood.

DAVID FROMAN was five years of age when his honored father, Jacob Froman, died on the farm in Durbin county, Ind., on which farm he himself was born September 7, 1821, the youngest of the seven children born to his mother, Margaret (Dawson) Froman, and the only one living. The mother died in Illinois in 1848. She was born in Kentucky, as was also her husband, and both came from old families in the Bourbon state.

As a small lad David removed with his mother to Illinois, and in 1830 settled on a farm one and a half miles from Danville, Vermilion county, then in the heart of a vast wilderness. The surroundings were very primitive and the neighbors far apart, the mother was very poor, and with difficulty found food and clothes for her children. This mother was a Spartan, and a wonderful worker, and she taught her boys the value of industry, forcing them to perform their share towards the family maintenance. In time two of the elder sons managed the farm, which was a large and productive one, and David worked for them, eventually receiving good wages for his toil. He was in a fair way to succeed, and felt justified in sharing his prospects with another, and married, August 12, 1841, in Vermilion county, Nancy A. Henderson, a native of Coshocton county, Ohio, who came to Illinois with her parents. The young people began farming in Vermilion county, and Mr. Froman engaged also in trading in New Orleans.

For some time Mr. Froman had been suffering from an annoying bronchial trouble, and his physician advised a complete change of climate, intimating that Oregon might be beneficial. Accordingly he disposed of his interests in Vermilion county and outfitted for the long journey across the plains, departing from home March 24, 1851. They had two wagons, with four yoke of oxen to each wagon, besides some horses and loose stock. They came via the old Oregon trail, and on the way the Indians relieved them of the care of some of their horses and cows, but otherwise the journey was fairly pleasant and uneventful. Locating in Linn county, Mr. Froman took up three hundred and twenty acres of land four miles southeast of Albany, built a cabin in the midst of the timbered wildness, and began to clear in order to plant the first crops. At best this was a laborious task, but he worked diligently, and soon had wheat in the ground, and a place erected to cover his stock. With a neighbor he bought a threshing machine, the first in that locality, the object being to thresh their own grain, but they afterward sent a man out with it to thresh for the other farmers in the district. During the first year the great lumbering machine nearly paid for itself, and this, added to the sale of the general farm commodities, brought a competence to Mr. Froman, and greatly encouraged him in his adopted state.

About 1859 Mr. Froman sold his land and his interest in the threshing machine and came to live in Albany, which has since been his home. For the greater part he has engaged in the brokerage and money-lending business, and has amassed a neat little fortune in this way. He lives in a comfortable home with his wife, and is popular and much beloved by all who know him. He is a Republican politically, formerly being an old-time Whig, and he has held a number of important offices in the town, including that of mayor for two terms and councilman for several years. Fraternally he is prominent and well known, and is identified with the Corinthian Lodge, F. and A. M., of which he is past master; the Royal Arch Masons; and the Grand Lodge of Oregon, of which he is past grand warden. Mr. Froman had two brothers and a sister who came to Oregon, and of these, Thomas John and Mrs. Wilson, died in Linn county. Mrs. Froman is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Froman is charitable and public-spirited, and few efforts to improve the town have failed to receive his substantial support and co-operation. The soul of integrity, he carries with him a helpful and optimistic nature, and one which sees principally good and merit in his fellow-men.

WILLIAM C. SPENCER. The spring of 1847 witnessed the departure of many immigrants from their homes in the middle west to cast their lot amid the untried conditions beyond the Rocky mountains, and of these it is doubtful if any started forth with more glowing hopes, and greater faith in success, than William C. Spencer. Born in the farming region around St. Charles, Mo., October 1, 1823, Mr. Spencer has already lived to the biblical allotment of years, yet still finds pleasure and profit in farming and stock-raising, interests drawn around him by an inquiring mind and youthful heart. His boyhood days on the Missouri farm were crowded with duties, and he walked three and a half miles to the nearest school-house. There were fifteen children in the family, five dying at birth, nine sons and five daughters. The mother died in 1837, and the father in 1841, after which the farm was managed by the combined efforts of the children, several of whom had already attained maturity.

During the winter of 1846-7 William C. made preparations to emigrate to the far west. Starting out April 11, 1847, he drove during the entire journey, and arrived near Dayton, Ore., in October, little the worse for the days and months of strenuous activity and consequent deprivation. In the spring of 1848 William C. went to Polk county and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres four miles from Springfield on the banks of the McKenzie river, where he erected a round-log house 14x16 feet dimensions, and very crude and uninviting in every particular. Afterward, when some of the land had been cleared, and crops realized, a better house afforded shelter for his family, and he remained there in comparative comfort until 1857. Between 1857 and 1887 Mr. Spencer lived in Santa Clara county, Cal., after which he returned to the section farm on the McKenzie, and worked the same in its entirety until 1903. During the preceding year he disposed of three hundred and twenty acres, finding that with increasing age this is about all that he can attend to with any degree of satisfaction.

The year after coming to Oregon, in 1848, Mr. Spencer married Julia Scott, who died in 1865 leaving five children, of whom Mary E. is now Mrs. Cowan; Maria T. is the wife of James Carlyon, of California; and Manan, Anna E., and William H. are deceased. Mr. Spencer has lived an upright and highly useful life, and his right to a place among the most industrious and worthy of the pioneers of '47 is unquestioned.

WILLIAM W. SHORTRIDGE. Identified with the agricultural interests of Lane county William W. Shortridge has also taken a broad view of other pursuits, having served for fourteen years as postmaster of Wallace. He was born in Muscatine, Iowa, March 31, 1836, the son of Samuel B. S. Shortridge, a pioneer of 1852, who was born in Bourbon county, Ky., in 1798, a relative of Daniel Boone. At a very early age he accompanied his parents to Indiana, where they made their home for many years. He early learned the trade of a blacksmith and followed this in addition to farming. In his young manhood he married Emily A. Heath, also a native of Kentucky, and after locations in Indiana, Iowa and Illinois, they crossed the plains with ox-teams and came direct to Lane county, where he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres, located seven miles south of Cottage Grove, which he improved and cultivated until 1858, when he took up his residence with J. H. Shortridge, where he lived the balance of his life. Besides William W., of this review, he had five children, of whom James H. is a resident of Lane county, and Caroline D. became the wife of Hiram Stewart, of Goshen, the others being deceased. The mother died in Iowa. Samuel B. S. Shortridge was always active in politics and also as a member of the Church of Christ.

William W. Shortridge grew to the age of sixteen years in his home in the middle west, receiving his education in the district schools, and after the journey west he remained at home until he married and located on Coast Fork, six miles south of Cottage Grove, where he lived three years. He then removed to Pass Creek near Divide and remained for a period of two years, when he bought one hundred and sixty acres of land eleven miles south of Cottage Grove, upon which he has since made his home. The improvement and cultivation of these broad, rich acres have been the pleasure and profit of Mr. Shortridge in the passing years, and he has bent every effort toward bringing his farm to a high state of perfection. He has a comfortable home, one of the best south of Cottage Grove, and has also erected other buildings which go to improve the value and facilitate the operation of the farm. In 1883 Mr. Shortridge built a saw-mill on his place and has since conducted it with success. He now has two hundred acres of land, eighty of which are under cultivation, carrying on general farming and stock-raising. In the midst of his pursuits Mr. Shortridge, like many others, was called upon to defend his home and adopted state against the depredations of the savages in the Rogue River war, enlisting February 13, 1856, in Company A, under the command of Captain Ladshaw. During his service of four months and nineteen days he participated in the battles at Cow creek and Big Meadow, and many minor engagements. Upon his discharge he returned to his work on the farm.

The marriage of Mr. Shortridge united him with Miss Ellen Jane Kyes, a native of Illinois, and to them have been born eleven children, all of whom are now living and named in order of birth are as follows: William C.; Silas S.; Samantha J., the wife of William Brown; A. W.; Gilbert L.; Samuel P.; Emily L., the wife of Edward Adams; Lillie S. married George Sutherland; Lucy Ann married Lyman Adams; Carrie F.; and Lester A. The two last named still make their home with their parents, while the others reside in the vicinity. In political preference Mr. Shortridge is a Populist and has always taken an active part in public affairs, holding at various times the minor offices of this vicinity.

NIMROD PRICE, since 1852, has been identified with the agricultural interests of this part of the county. He was born in Jefferson county, Ky., September 8, 1822, but his parents moved from the south when their son Nimrod was a child of six years of age, settling in Indiana. After making their home in the Hoosier state for two years the family located near Danville, Vermillion county, Ill., in 1830.

Nimrod Price received his early education and training in Illinois, and soon after reaching his majority was united in marriage with Miss America Froman, October 22, 1846, marking the date of this event. The young people made their home in Illinois for about five years, and, in 1851, filled with a desire to found a home in the new west, they started on the long journey across the plains with the greater part of their belongings packed in one wagon, drawn by four yoke of oxen. Eight head of loose cattle and two horses also formed a part of their equipment. The journey began March 24, 1851, and it was not until September 11 following that they finally reached their destination in Marion county. In the spring of 1852 Mr. Price came to Linn county and took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, the same property upon which he at present makes his home. With the exception of two winters, when he was in Albany, this has been his home ever since, settling here over half a century ago, and in the meantime he has developed one of the finest farm properties in Linn county.

To Nimrod and America (Froman) Price were born twelve children, whose names and whereabouts are given as follows: Curtis resides in Jackson county, Ore.; S. Price is a resident of Crook county; Clara became the wife of Judge Charles E. Walverton, of Albany; Bruce is a stockman in Crook county; Annie is the wife of Charles C. LaFollette and resides in California; Kate, Mrs. Horace Powell, also resides in California; Clark, the youngest of the family living, has assumed charge of the home place. The children deceased are named as follows: Albertine, Sydney, John M., Russell, and Fred. In 1848, before coming to the west, Mr. Price joined the Masonic fraternity, and is now identified with the lodge at Salem of which he is the only charter member living. Mr. Price also has the distinction of being one of the seven charter members of the Masonic lodge at Albany.

ELI FRANKLIN WYATT. A native of Edgar county, Ill., Mr. Wyatt was born August 5, 1828, the old paternal farm being at present adjacent to the town of Chrisman. His father, Col. William Wyatt, was born in Ireland, and came to America with the paternal grandfather, Jasper, when he was three years old, settling in Virginia. Col. William Wyatt removed to Edgar county, Ill., about 1818, and from there enlisted in the Black Hawk war, for meritorious service receiving the rank by which he was afterward known. His death occurred in his adopted state in September, 1847, of typhoid fever. His wife, formerly Elizabeth Morgan, born in Virginia, and daughter of John Morgan of Welsh descent, survived him until eighty-four years of age. A large family of children, fourteen in number, were born to this couple, five of whom are living, Eli Franklin being the eighth in the family. Of the children, the oldest son, Shelby, is living to a truly remarkable age, and now, when one hundred and three years old, is hale and hearty and interested in all that happens on the old homestead in Shelby county, Ill. Another son, Ananias, came to California in 1853, later settled in Oregon, and finally died in Boise City, Idaho, in 1893.

The support of so large a family naturally taxed the resources of the Edgar county farm notwithstanding the fact that the boys were all trained to make themselves useful, and diligently performed their respective tasks. At the age of thirteen Eli Franklin relieved the family of his support by going to live with a brother-in-law in Green county, Wis., and after a year he made his way to the lead mines of Galena, Ill., where he worked for a couple of years. He next went to Monona county, Iowa, and while there made preparation to cross the plains to California. Getting as far as St. Joe, Mo., he was obliged to turn back, owing to illness, and thereafter went to his old home and remained there until 1853. He crossed the plains during that year with the Summervilles, starting April 9, and arriving in Oregon September 15, and bought a claim of one hundred and sixty acres four miles east of Harrisburg. The following year, in 1854, he went to California to engage in mining, but seems not to have been successful, for he soon returned and started improving his ranch. Later he visited with more success the mines of Eureka, and Shasta county, and finally located permanently on his farm, where he engaged extensively in the stock business, raising principally F. B. Shorthorns, and Cotswold and Shropshire sheep. As his enterprises grew in magnitude more land was required, and at one time he owned ten hundred and forty acres in one body. From time to time he disposed of this large holding, until he had but four hundred and forty acres left, that being disposed of in 1902. At the height of his stock-raising enterprise he had as many as two thousand sheep roaming on his meadows. He was a good manager and excellent business man, and had the good sense to realize that the best stock brought the best prices. Consequently, the finest breeds on the market were sold from the Wyatt farm, and had an unexcelled reputation throughout this and the adjoining states.

For the last twenty-five years Mr. Wyatt has spent a great deal of his time in Harrisburg, and four years in Eugene, and in 1902 he located permanently in Albany. He is enjoying life in comfort, feeling that his unceasing toil for many years entitles him to a respite from business cares. A staunch Republican in politics, he has never aspired to office, but his interest in education has led him to serve as a member of the school board. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was a trustee and one of the organizers and promoters of the church in Harrisburg. In Linn county, Ore., Mr. Wyatt married his first wife, Martha Froman, who was born in Illinois, and who bore him six children: Thomas, a graduate of the University of Oregon, and at present engaged in mining in east Oregon; J. Russell, an attorney at law in Albany; Lillie, a graduate of the University of Oregon, and now the wife of John Barns, of Portland; Rosa died in Eugene; James, living in San Francisco; and May, died in Eugene. The second marriage of Mr. Wyatt took place in Eugene in 1886, and was with Mrs. Mary (Evans) Cartwright, born in Edgar county, Ill., and daughter of William Evans, who was a farmer in Edgar county. Mr. Evans removed to Nebraska in 1854, settling six miles from Nemaha, Nemaha county, of which locality he was the first white resident. April 16, 1860, he started across the plains, arriving at his destination in Lane county, Ore., where he farmed for some years, and whence he removed to Red Bluffs, Cal., where his death occurred. He married Leah Oxshire, who was born in Tennessee, died in Oregon, and who was the mother of eleven children, nine of whom attained maturity, and three of whom are still living, all being residents of Oregon. Mrs. Wyatt was nine years of age when she crossed the plains with her parents, and she was reared on a farm, and finally married James Cartwright, who was born in Texas. Of this union there were born two children, of whom Carrie is married and lives in Tacoma, Wash.; and John E., formerly the editor of the Harrisburg Review, died in Harrisburg. To Mr. and Mrs. Wyatt has been born one child, Earl Franklin.

ROBERT VEAL. A native of Pennsylvania. Robert Veal was born December 11, 1840, in Pottsville. His father, also named Robert Veal, was born in London, England, and when a young man emigrated to this country, locating in Pottsville, Pa., where his death occurred in the summer of 1841. He married Sarah Jenkins, also a native of England, and she, too, died in Pottsville, Pa.

Reared and educated in his native town, Robert Veal attended the public schools until fifteen years old, after which he served an apprenticeship of four years at the machinist's trade. Going then to Columbus, Ohio, he worked at his trade until 1862, when he enlisted in Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-first Ohio Infantry, which was assigned to the Army of the Tennessee. He was subsequently with his regiment in Chattanooga, in the Georgia campaign, and while there was taken sick, at Atlanta, and sent home to recruit. He was afterwards transferred to the reserve corps of veterans and served with different companies until the close of the war, when he was mustered out in Indianapolis, Ind. Remaining in that city, Mr. Veal worked as a machinist for Chandler & Taylor for two years, then removed to Hendricks county, Ind., where he was engaged in the manufacture of oak, walnut and ash lumber for a number of years. Going to Kansas in 1868, he lived in Chetopa fifteen months, then returned to Hendricks county, where he remained five years. Again taking up his residence in Chetopa, Kans., in 1875, Mr. Veal was there in the employ of B. S. Edwards & Co., flour manufacturers, for nine years, being engineer and general repairer of machinery in their mills.

Emigrating to Oregon in 1884, Mr. Veal located first in Stayton, where he was engaged in the manufacture of lumber for a year. Disposing then of his mill in that place, he carried on a retail lumber business at Woodburn for six months, and then returned to Stayton. Purchasing a small chair factory from Mr. Neff, he operated it alone for a short time, and then formed a partnership with his two sons under the present firm name of R. Veal & Sons. In April, 1888, this firm transferred its business to Albany, and built a new factory, which was burned in October, 1901. With characteristic enterprise, Mr. Veal immediately rebuilt his plant, enlarging it seven-fold, and in April, 1902, the firm was again ready for business. Their factory is located on Main street, not far from their sawmill, which is specially well equipped. The main factory is 80x240 feet; their warehouse is 50x150 feet; the finishing room is 50x100 feet; and the dry kiln is 20x70 feet. The boiler-room is fitted with the latest improvements, and a blacksmith's shop forms a part of the plant. This firm manufactures from native lumber all kinds of chairs, shipping them to all the coast ports, carrying on one of the largest retail and wholesale trades of any firm in the valley. It has also its own fire protection, having a tower eighty-nine feet high, a tank with a capacity of fifteen thousand gallons, giving a pressure of forty pounds, while pipes are laid to every building, and ample hose is provided for any emergency.

On November 5, 1867, in Hendricks county, Ind., Mr. Veal married Miss Maggie Barker, who was born in Plainfield, Ind., a daughter of John Barker. The immigrant ancestor of the Barker family from which she was descended, emigrated from Holland to the United States, and settled in North Carolina prior to the Revolution. Her grandfather, Daniel Barker, left the south on account of slavery, and located with his family in Indiana, where he followed his trade of a blacksmith. John Barker was born on the homestead in North Carolina, but moved with his parents to Indiana, where he was engaged as a blacksmith, following the occupation to which he was reared. He married Mary Reagan, who was born on the Little Miami river, a daughter of Ruell Reagan, a native of South Carolina, born of Quaker parents. He was a farmer, and settled first in Ohio, subsequently removing to Indiana. Of the union of John and Mary (Reagan) Barker seven children were born, Maggie, now Mrs. Veal, being the only one now living. The mother, who came to Oregon, died in Albany. Mr. and Mrs. Veal are the parents of three children, namely: Frederick C., a prominent business man of Albany, is a member of the firm of R. Veal & Sons, and its manager; Harry Otis died, in Kansas, at the age of seven months; and Robert A. B., a member of the firm, and the bookkeeper, is an ex-councilman of Albany. Politically Mr. Veal is true to the principles of the Republican party, which he invariably supports by voice and vote. Mrs. Veal is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

JOHN Q. VAUGHAN. In 1863 John Q. Vaughan bought his present property which consists of one hundred and seventeen acres located in the neighborhood of Coburg, Lane county, and since that time he has been energetically engaged in its improvement and cultivation, eighty acres of which are cultivated. He was born in Missouri, January 30, 1840, and came to Oregon in 1847 in company with his parents, who were seeking a home among the broader opportunities of the western states. He remained with his father until 1858, when he went to the mines in the hope of finding the fortune which awaited the miner. He continued in the same mines for a year, and in 1861 he went to Idaho, still confident of his ability to succeed, and time justified the faith in himself, for after a winter spent in the neighborhood of Salmon river, during which he experienced hardships and privations which proved his courage, he returned to Oregon with $6,000 as the result of his persevering work. January, 1862, found him once more located on the home place, and there he remained until 1870, when he married and went to the farm which he had purchased seven years earlier.

The wife of Mr. Vaughan was formerly Miss Flora Canterbury, and she died in 1895, the mother of four children, of whom Wilber is located in Coburg; Oma is the wife of L. P. Protzman; Eulia is the wife of A. C. Wheeler; Strahan St. Clair, who is engaged in agricultural pursuits with Mr. Vaughan. In political convictions Mr. Vaughan adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party, and fraternally affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

MELVIN TAYLOR is now located on a little farm of sixty-six acres which is a very small part of what he once owned in various sections of the northwest, in a home in the vicinity of Coburg, Lane county, in which location he has lived since 1873.

The parents of Mr. Taylor, John and Elizabeth (Murphy) Taylor, were both natives of Virginia, and it was in that state that they were married and from which they emigrated. They first located in St. Charles county, Mo., and later removed to Franklin county, where they made their home until the spring of 1847, when they started across the plains, having three wagons, nine yoke of oxen and a few cows to carry them safely through and start them as agriculturists in that remote west, of which they had heard so much. Four children crossed with the parents on the six-months journey, and at its close the father located near Aumsville, Marion county, where he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and made that his home until he removed to Aumsville, where he died October 26, 1870, at the age of seventy-six years. His wife died in February, 1874, at the age of seventy-eight years. Of their seven sons and two daughters two are now living, George W., of Halsey, and Melvin, who was born in Franklin county, Mo., January 22, 1829.

Mr. Taylor was eighteen years of age when he came to Oregon, and he remained at home until 1852, in that year visiting the mines of Jacksonville. He was married also in that year and began farming on his place near Sublimity, the cleared land being the result of his own effort. He proceeded to improve and cultivate the land and made a nice little farm, upon which he remained for seventeen years, when he removed to Pitt valley, Shasta county, Cal., and spent a year. In 1870 he returned to Oregon and located near Harrisburg, Linn county, and in the fall of that year removed to near West Point for the period of a year. Locating in the Palouse country, Wash., in 1871, he and a son took up land and in the spring of '72 removed to Walla Walla, and in the fall of that year the family were taken north. Their stay was short, however, for, in 1873, they were back in Lane county, and Mr. Taylor bought two hundred and eighty acres located three miles from Coburg, and this remained their home for nearly a quarter of a century. In the fall of 1897 he sold out and went to British Columbia on a visit to a daughter, returning in 1898 to his present home.

The wife of Mr. Taylor was, in maidenhood, Serena McDonald, and much of their life was passed together. For twenty-four years Mr. Taylor has been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in politics he is a Democrat.

ISHAM N. HEMBREE. A meritorious service during the Civil war, the office of commissioner of Lane county worthily maintained, and agricultural and stock-raising undertakings of a practical and successful nature, have contributed to the broadening and all-around usefulness of the life of Isham N. Hembree. Mr. Hembree owns a farm of three hundred and twenty acres twelve miles northwest of Eugene, where he carries on extensive stock-raising, his improvements being modern and labor-saving, and his residences and buildings on a par with the ideas of enterprise and progress.

Mr. Hembree is a farmer by inheritance, training and preference, and because of the latter fact especially makes a success of his chosen occupation. He enjoys everything pertaining to the country, the industry, people, fresh air, and healthful living. In Dade county, Mo., where he was born August 24, 1838, his parents owned a good-sized farm, where he was trained to make himself useful, and attended the public schools during the winter season. His father dying when he was four years old, at the age of sixteen he started to earn his living on the farms of the surrounding families in Dade county, and was thus employed by the month at the breaking out of the Civil war. It is doubtful if the call to arms received such ardent response from any class of people as it did from the toilers in the fields of the country, the arduous toil from one end of the year to the other bringing in its train a longing for diversion or change, even at the risk of life. In 1861 Mr. Hembree enlisted in the Confederate army in Missouri, and in 1862 re-enlisted in the Missouri Cavalry, as a private in the Trans-Mississippi Department. Participating in the battles of Wilson Creek, Pilot Knob, Little Rock, Springfield, and many others of a momentous nature, he was wounded in his first battle, thus carrying through the remainder of his service a correct idea of the grim and terrible side of warfare. After the surrender at Shreveport, La., he continued to live in Louisiana for a couple of years, and this ended his experiences in the south, the only bright memory of that time being of the fact that he won the rank of first lieutenant of Company I, Sixth Missouri Cavalry, thus establishing his claim of valor and disinterested devotion to the cause he then deemed just.

Returning to Missouri in 1867, Mr. Hembree engaged in farming until 1872, and then came to Oregon, selecting Lane county as a fertile and promising locality. For the first five years he rented land, and with the proceeds of the enterprise saved sufficient to make a trip to Missouri in 1877, and upon his return in 1880 to purchase his present farm. The next year, in 1881, he married Tena Gibson, of which union there have been born four children: Linna S.; Louie; Eugenia; and Itha. While not a politician in the generally accepted sense, Mr. Hembree has held a few local offices, and has served as a county commissioner for a year and a half, appointed thereto to fill an unexpired term. He is essentially a religious man, and is a member and active worker in the Fern Ridge Christian Church.

AMOS WILKINS. Want of ambition, or ability to forge to the front under even trying circumstances, are failings which can never be laid at the door of Amos Wilkins. To his neighbors near Coburg, he represents the type of farmer and stock-raiser who would do credit to any community in the country, and who is just such a man as is needed to carry on the work of developing Oregon. Mr. Wilkins has the advantage of being a native son, and he was born on his father's donation claim not far from where he now lives, April 13, 1853.

Mr. Wilkins was fortunate in having educational opportunities beyond the reach of the average farm-reared youth, and after completing the training of the public schools he attended the Monmouth Normal College and De France & White Business College at Portland. An apt student, he made the most of these chances, a statement borne out in his conversation and wide range of information. Thirty-one years had passed over his head when his marriage occurred July 4, 1884, with Varian V. Babb, a native daughter of Oregon, and one of the children in the family of A. J. Babb, an early settler of this state. Soon after the ceremony the young people located on their present farm, which at that time had some improvements, since added to materially by the present owners. Two and a half miles north of Coburg, the farm consists of six hundred acres, and is devoted to high-grade stock, including Durham and Hereford cattle, thoroughbred driving horses, and Duroc hogs. Nor does this represent the extent of Mr. Wilkins' possessions in the state, for with his brother, Jasper, he has purchased a ranch of two thousand four hundred acres in Linn county, and this also is the scene of a large stock-raising industry. Like the typical stockman, wherever found, Mr. Wilkins has a warm place in his heart for a good horse, and he is perhaps one of the best judges of this noble beast to be found in the county. He has the best possible facilities for caring for his stock, and the latter being of superior grade, he necessarily commands large prices in the markets. The Wilkins' home is cheery and bright, and education and refinement are noticeable in the children, Welby M., Juanita B., and Warren. The genial head of the house is popular and successful from a business and social standpoint, and is a welcome visitor at Coburg Lodge No. 263, of the Woodmen of the World.

DR. J. F. W. SAUBERT. The river industries of Oregon, without which this state had proceeded laboriously towards an infinitely postponed prosperity, might, in their incipiency, furnish the theme for many a life-story, as they have supplied the foundation for many a fortune. The opening up of the waterways of the northwest, the rousing from singing idleness and loitering between timbered banks, to a semblance of usefulness and activity, might well be considered the first step towards anything of moment in the industrial world in the state. The Siuslaw, now a hive of industry, has its pioneer sojourners, its practical economists who turned its motive power to latter-day account, and revolutionized the wooded stillness along its course. Of these, none have arisen in time of need with surer or keener insight than Dr. J. F. W. Saubert, projector of the first saw-mill on the banks of the Siuslaw, also of the first general merchandise store, and of Acme, promising and thrifty among her sister towns of Lane county.

The traits of character which have enabled Dr. Saubert to accomplish his ends unaided are unquestionably those of the high-class German people, and which are welcomed as fundamentally strong and resourceful in any country in the world. Born in Bavaria, Germany, February 26, 1835, he comes of a long-lived family on the paternal side, his grandfather, Saubert, and his father, Carl, both born in Bavaria, living to the ages of ninety and eighty respectively. His wife dying when his son, J. F. W., was five years of age, Carl Saubert continued to farm in Bavaria until 1844, and after his marriage with Christine Glassell, brought his family to America, locating on new land in Jefferson county, Wis. Since his death in 1896, his wife has continued to live on the old place in Wisconsin. The three children in the family, of whom Dr. Saubert is the oldest, were primarily educated in the public schools. The latter received his professional training in Wisconsin and at the Chicago Homeopathic College in Chicago. He has always treasured a kindly feeling for his preceptor, Dr. Hart, of Ontario, Wis., under whose efficient and kindly guidance he laid the solid foundation for his subsequent extensive researches. Graduating at an unusually early age, and in such manner as to indicate more than average scholarship, he began to practice medicine in Wisconsin, and removed to the less tried conditions of Roseburg, Douglas county, Ore., in 1878. Without money or influence, he began in a small way to make his professional influence felt, and gradually became known as a humane, kindly and successful practitioner, maintaining the highest standards of a profession which furnished such splendid outlet for his creditable ambition. For eight years he ministered to the sick in the community, becoming a necessity in many homes, and the stanch friend and wise counsellor of those who placed their faith in him.

Regretted by a large following in Roseburg, Dr. Saubert came to the Siuslaw river, and more than any other in this section had to do with the founding of the town of Acme, which he named and promoted with his many undertakings. Purchasing a large tract of timber land he engaged in logging and lumbering, erected the first saw-mill which awoke the echoes in the timber land, and materially changed the character of the entire surrounding country. This first structure outliving its usefulness, and falling behind in the race for improvement, a new mill was erected in 1897, steam machinery being placed in it in 1901. Nothing busier or noisier dots the landscape for many miles around than this mill, which works the year around at manufacturing general mill supplies, and which has a capacity of from twenty-five to thirty-five thousand feet per day. Up the river is the mill's logging crew, which operated on different sections of the mill-owner's tract of fifteen hundred acres. As in all milling localities, the general merchandise store, with its incentive to friendly intercourse and sociability, is a necessity, and to this Dr. Saubert gave his attention when he first arrived. The mill and store and continuous practice are monuments to the untiring energy and resource of one of the most honored pioneers of Lane county, and it is not strange that his name is a household word, carrying with it an impression of rugged simplicity, substantiality and worth. In connection with the store he has served as postmaster for thirteen years, and though independent in politics, has filled also the offices of school trustee and clerk. Various fraternal organizations profit by his membership, including the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in both of which he has passed all of the chairs. He became a charter member of the Odd Fellows at Viola, Wis.

In Wisconsin Dr. Saubert was united in marriage with Anna Dejean, of which union there were born four sons, of whom George lives in Spokane, Wash., and Charles, Thomas and Frank are residents of Acme, the last two being members of the mercantile firm of M. E. Saubert & Co. A second marriage was contracted by Dr. Saubert in Roseburg in 1879, Mary Taylor being a native of Illinois, and an early comer to the state of Oregon. Four children have been born of this union, of whom Irma is the wife of Grant Earhart, of Acme, and Ray, Roy and Lloyd are living in the same town. As one of the stalwart founders of a flourishing community, as a man who has accomplished more good through his professional and humanitarian services than will ever be known, and as an example of inflexible integrity, public spiritedness and keen insight into the needs of communities, Dr. Saubert deserves to rank with the adopted sons of whom Oregon is and will continue to be proud.

JOHN SUTHERLAND. The talents of John Sutherland have been so varied in character that more than one occupation has felt the impetus of his strong and practical ideas, the fulfillment of which has benefited more than one community, for he has been a pioneer in several of the western states. He was born in Newton county, Mo., December 27, 1846, the descendant of a line of ancestry which had been prominent in the advancement of the country's interests. His grandfather was a captain of a battalion of artillery in the war of 1812, in which he served his country efficiently. His son, the father of John Sutherland, was born and reared to the life of a farmer in Dutchess county, N. Y., and remained there until attaining manhood, when he removed to Indiana. In the latter state he married Elizabeth Copple, and in 1844 they removed to Missouri, where he followed the trade of a cooper. The father lived to be sixty-four years of age while the mother died at fifty-four.

John Sutherland was one of nine children born to his parents, and he remained at home until attaining manhood. Besides the education which he received in the common schools of the state, he learned the trade of engineer, which he followed successfully for about ten years, about 1872 leaving his location in Missouri and removing to Tehama county, Cal. This was his home for a year. He then located in Modoc county, and in 1874 went to Prescott, Ariz., where he remained two years. A like period was spent in Maricopa county, of that territory. In 1878 he located in Idaho and passed the ensuing six years. While on the route back to California he stopped for a short time in Jackson county, Ore. Six years were passed in California. In 1891 he came to Brownsville, Linn county, and the same winter purchased a ranch of eighty-six acres near London, Lane county, which he still conducts. In 1898 he established the first store in this place, which he has successfully conducted since then in partnership with Mr. Geer, the firm name being Sutherland & Geer. It was through his influence that a postmaster was appointed here, which position he fills acceptably. In addition to the work which he now carries on, he has been an ordained minister in the Church of Christ for twenty years and fills the pastorate in London. In Fort Scott, Kans., he learned the trade of a wagonmaker. Having a talent for music, he cultivated it, and taught for several years.

The marriage of Mr. Sutherland occurred in 1867, and united him with Nancy J. Bowring, a native of Kentucky, a member of an efficient family, two of her brothers being school teachers and two ministers of the gospel. Twelve children have blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland, of whom Martha Alice became the wife of J. L. Henderson, and lives in California; William L. also resides in that state; Nora married L. J. Henderson, and is located in this vicinity; George F. is also in this vicinity; John A. is in California; Maggie M. married J. W. Doak and makes her home near that of her parents; Rose D., who became the wife of H. B. McBee, also lives near; Emma lives with her parents and acts as assistant postmaster, and Amanda M. E., James G., Charles H. and Bessie are also at home. In religious matters Mr. Sutherland is associated with the Church of Christ. In politics he is a Prohibitionist, through the influence of which he has served as justice of the peace and a member of the school board.

JAMES H. SHORTRIDGE. There are few self-made men who are obliged to start upon their independent careers as early as ten years of age, yet such was the case with James H. Shortridge, whose place among the state builders of the west is undisputed, and is based upon a well directed and successful life. From time immemorial an interest has centered around the blacksmith. Mr. Shortridge is a master workman, his little shop on his farm six miles south of Cottage Grove, being a very busy place. He took up his present farm in 1853, and at that time had three hundred and twenty acres.

The better to trace the career of Mr. Shortridge, it is necessary to go back to the farm in Tippecanoe county, Ind., where he was born July 18, 1831, and which had been taken up by his grandfather as government land at a very early day. With the grandparents on their overland journey to Indiana went their son, Samuel B., who was born on the home farm in Bourbon county, Ky., in 1798, and who while yet a boy was apprenticed to a blacksmith, and followed the trade in connection with farming for the greater part of his life. He was a relative of Daniel Boone, the great American explorer and colonizer, and used to hunt with his illustrious kinsman, for he was twenty-two years old before the latter's death. Mr. Shortridge married Emily A. Heath, a native of Kentucky, and from Indiana moved to Iowa, thence to Illinois. His son, James H., having preceded him to the west in 1851, he set out the following spring with ox teams, and accomplished the long distance in safety and comparative comfort. He came at once to Lane county, Ore., and took up a claim seven miles south of Cottage Grove, upon which he lived a few years, after which he made his home with his son, James H., until his death. He was quite an active politician, and was a firm believer in good schools, good roads and good local government. He took a keen interest in church affairs, and in this was seconded by the wife whom he married in his youth, and who died before he came to the west. Three of his seven children are living, James H. being the oldest. William W. lives near the old place, and Mrs. Caroline D. Stewart is a resident of Goshen.

Beginning with his tenth year James H. Shortridge worked in a nursery, and after some years returned home and learned the blacksmith trade of his father. From Millersburg, Ill., he started across the plains March 13, 1851, and five months later, after a comparatively pleasant journey, reached Lane county, Ore., and took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres six miles south of Cottage Grove. March 13, 1853, he married Amelia S. Adams, who was born in Indiana, and crossed the plains in 1852. Mrs. Shortridge entered with zest into the making of a home in the comparative wilderness, and the little house took on a semblance of genuine comfort and cheer. Naturally, Mr. Shortridge wished to make use of his trade, and erected a shop on the farm, it being the first, and for many years the only one in the neighborhood. For many years the entire ranch was used for farming and stock-raising, the genial owner responding to calls at his shop and gaining a reputation for expert workmanship. Twice fire has caused Mr. Shortridge great loss. First his barn and all its contents were destroyed, including grain, lumber and farming implements. About ten years later his home was burned, while in June, 1858, their four-year-old baby girl was burned to death. These great losses have made it necessary for Mr. Shortridge to sell a portion of his farm, so that he now owns one hundred and fifty-nine acres, eighty being under cultivation.

Republican politics have profited by the support of Mr. Shortridge, who has held many positions of trust in the community, and has invariably labored for the best interests of those who placed him in power. For several terms he served as deputy sheriff, and during a part of that time his responsibilities were arduous and exacting. He is a member of the Christian Church, supporting the same with his attendance and financial help. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Shortridge, four of whom are living: Franklin B., of California; Rosetta became the wife of J. W. Harris, of Eugene; Alice married first, J. P. Langdon, and for her second husband married John Weeden, of Nebraska; and Olive S. married first, F. M. Jones, of Portland, and after his death became the wife of S. M. Lacey, of Portland. Mr. and Mrs. Shortridge have eleven grandchildren and one great grandchild.

WILLIAM HAMILTON was born in Jefferson county, Ind., January 10, 1836, and is the fourth child of the three sons and two daughters born to Forqus and Matilda (Wood) Hamilton, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Virginia. The family was established in Pennsylvania by the paternal grandfather, who came from Ireland at a very early day. From Pennsylvania Forqus Hamilton moved to Ohio, and from there to Jefferson county, Ind., his death occurring in Jennings county, Ind. Limited educational opportunities did not dwarf the early ambitions of William Hamilton, who learned more from observation and practical experience, than do most in many years of application to books. In 1851 he crossed the plains in a caravan train bound for Oregon, and for ten years mined and prospected in Jackson and Josephine counties, in the spring of 1861 making his way to the Orofino mines in Idaho. In the fall of the same year he went to southern Oregon, but spent the winter of 1861-2 in the Salmon river basin in the mines of Florence, Idaho. In 1864 he bought pack-animals and engaged in packing from Lewiston to the Salmon river district and Elk City, and afterward to Walla Walla and the Boise Basin. In 1864 he returned from this pioneer experience to the Willamette valley, afterward visiting the mines in the summer of 1865, since which time Lane county has been his home. His first farm here bordered on Lake creek, twenty-five miles west of Junction City, and consisted of one hundred and sixty acres of land which he lost. He later took up one hundred and twenty-nine acres near his original farm, and in 1872 bought forty acres of land from the railroad company. All of this land has since been disposed of, Mr. Hamilton having lived on a portion of it until about two years ago. He then came to Junction City, and has since put in his time attending to his town property, and his mining interests in California and southern Oregon. In 1855 he enlisted in the Harris Company under Col. John Ross, and later served in the Second Oregon Regiment, participating in the battle of Hungry Hill, and in that of Cabins, with the Applegates, the latter of whom were renowned for hard and desperate fighting. He was discharged from the service in the Rogue River valley in 1866, and thereafter returned to his farm. In 1854 he was shot by an Indian while he was hunting for elk, but was fortunate enough to kill three out of the five Indians comprising the band. In political affiliation Mr. Hamilton is a Lincoln Republican, a Jeffersonian Democrat, and a silver man to the core.

JUDGE FELIX G. EBY. A native of Lane county, Judge Eby was born near Eugene, August 11, 1865, a son of David Eby. On the paternal side he comes of thrifty German stock, his grandfather, Samuel Eby, having been born, bred and educated in Germany. Emigrating to the United States, he spent his first winter in this country in Pennsylvania, working as a millwright. The following spring he moved to Illinois, where he was engaged in milling several years, and also became actively interested in the Moline Plow works. Removing from Illinois to Topeka, Kans., he engaged in milling and speculating, being very successful in his operations. He died in that city, in 1893, at the venerable age of ninety-six years.

Born near Springfield, Ill., David Eby spent a part of his early life in Kansas, where he learned the cooper's trade. Crossing the plains in 1851, he followed his trade in Astoria, Ore., for two years. Going to Portland, Ore., in 1853, he was employed in the manufacture of barrels for about six months, and was then a resident of Oregon City for a year. Locating in Linn county in 1855, he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Harrisburg, and settled with his bride on the farm which he improved, living there until 1864. Purchasing land then in Lane county, he carried on general farming for five years in that locality, in 1869 removing to eastern Oregon, where he was engaged in stock-raising two years, the present town of Prescott being located on the land that he then owned. Returning to Lane county in 1871, he carried on farming near Coburg for two years, when he sold his farm and settled in Harrisburg, where he worked for a year at his trade.

Then buying three hundred and sixty acres of land a short distance from that place, he worked as a farmer until 1885, when he purchased a ranch near Goshen, Lane county, where he resided until 1897. He disposed of his property in that year, and has since lived in different places in the valley, making his home with his children. He is an active member of the Christian Church, in which he is deacon, and since the formation of the state grange of Oregon has been chaplain of the organization. He married Elizabeth Barger, who was born in Missouri. Her father, Preston Barger, was born in one of the eastern states, probably Pennsylvania. In early manhood he lived in Illinois, removing from there to Missouri, and then, a few years after his marriage, coming to Oregon, crossing the plains in 1851. Locating in Linn county, he took up three hundred and sixty acres of land, on which he and his wife spent their remaining years, he dying at the advanced age of ninety years, and she when eighty-nine.

The eldest child of a family of four sons and three daughters, Felix G. Eby attended first the district schools of Oregon, subsequently entering the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated in 1884. From 1885 until 1888 he taught school in Linn county, being quite successful as a teacher. In 1893 he began reading law with A. C. Huff, at Woodburn, and also engaged in insurance and real estate speculations. Passing the examination of the state board of examiners in November, 1896, he began the practice of law in Woodburn, continuing there four years thereafter. Coming to Cottage Grove in May, 1900, Judge Eby formed a partnership with J. C. Johnson, and has since been actively and successfully engaged in his professional labors. He is especially interested in mining properties in the Bohemia district, having been one of the incorporators and promoters of the Le Roy Mining Company, of which he was formerly secretary and treasurer, and of the Hia-watha Mining and Milling Company, in which he is a director. Being elected city attorney in 1900, he served until the office was abolished, in 1902. Politically Judge Eby is a staunch adherent of the Republican party, supporting its principles at all times and places. Fraternally he was made a Mason, in 1890, at Gervais, Marion county, joining Fidelity Lodge No. 54, A. F. & A. M., and is now past master of his lodge. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World.

JOSEPH P. TAYLOR. A well known figure both in the earlier and later stages of Lane county development is Joseph P. Taylor, whose wise use of five hundred acres of fertile land have brought him a competence and whose enterprise and public-spiritedness have made him popular and influential. Mr. Taylor comes of an old New Jersey family, in which state he was born July 27, 1830, the same state witnessing the birth of his father, Henry W. Taylor, in September, 1808. While yet a youth the father learned the blacksmith trade, and followed the same for many years in his native state. Of a religious and humanitarian nature, he early espoused the cause of the Christian church, and almost up to the end of his life devoted a large share of his time to preaching in local pulpits. Until his marriage with Charlotte Peterson he continued to live on his father's farm, and afterward worked at his trade and farmed on his own responsibility. In 1830 he removed with his family to Philadelphia, and there and at other points in the Quaker state found employment at his trade for about three years. For eight years he lived in Highland county, Ohio, and later, while living in Missouri, he finally decided to emigrate to the far west. With ox-teams and prairie schooners he started under the most favorable circumstances, journeying day after day with little happening out of the usual, and making considerable progress. While his face was turned towards the setting sun near which was the supposed fulfillment of the hopes which had inspired his emigration, his heart was burdened by a grievous sorrow, for the cholera had invaded the ranks of the little train, and two of his children fell victims of the dread disease. Much depressed and disheartened, he continued his sorrowful way, and finally took up a claim of three hundred and twenty acres four miles south of Cottage Grove. There were no improvements on the place, but the good management and industry of the newcomer worked wonders, and he in time reaped a fair reward for his labors. In the meantime the spirit of goodness which had led him into the pulpits of the middle west prompted innumerable acts of kindness in his adopted county, and for many years he was known as one of the most zealous of early day preachers. Joseph P. is the oldest in the family of ten children, Jerry and Alexander live in the neighborhood, Mrs. Jane Garoutte resides on the old donation claim, and Mrs. Mary Frances White makes her home in Monmouth, Polk county, Ore.

With the example of his father's fine and useful life before him Joseph Taylor approached manhood with a due appreciation of his duties and responsibilities as a free American citizen. The opportunity to test his mettle was forthcoming in 1855, for the Indians had rendered unbearable the life of the settlers, and it seemed the duty of all able-bodied people to help quell the disturbance. Enlisting for service as a private, he took part in the battles of Cow Creek, Big Meadows and other battles and skirmishes, and for meritorious work was promoted to the quartermaster's department. In all he served five months, and during that time had many hair-breadth escapes and exciting adventures. After his discharge he continued to live at home until 1858, the year of his marriage with Mary A. Small, a native of Tennessee, and who crossed the plains in 1853, her people locating near the Taylor farm. Taking up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres south of Cottage Grove, he has continued to make that his home up to the present time, and to his original purchase has added and now owns more than five hundred acres. His farm has modern and practical improvements, and he raises produce, grain and stock.

It is fitting that the son of so kindly and good a father should follow in his footsteps, and in this connection Mr. Taylor fulfills popular expectations. He is fair and honorable in all of his dealings, and possessed of more than ordinary interest in, and regard for, his fellow-men. He also is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and for a great many years has been class leader and steward. Politically he is a Prohibitionist, and this idea of temperance is by no means confined to intoxicants, but permeates every phase of his life, impressing all with his sobriety. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, Lincoln is a resident of Cottage Grove; Ida C. and Rebecca are living at home; Harvey has a farm near the home place; and Lillie J. is making her home in Portland. Many positions of trust and responsibility have been tendered Mr. Taylor by his fellow-townsmen, and he has held several of the local minor offices, including that of school director for fifteen consecutive years.

CROW BROTHERS. Two brothers of a family of Oregon, prominent in agricultural circles are William N. and John Hardy Crow, both of whom are located upon the donation claim which their father, John Crow, took up in 1853, and made his home until his death. John Crow was born August 20, 1796, in the state of Kentucky, and he there learned the trades of a blacksmith and gunsmith, and also engaged in farming. When only a boy he came with his parents to Missouri, where their home remained for many years, and while living there he enlisted as a private in the Missouri Militia, for service in the War of 1812. His term of service ending after six months he returned to his home and there married, August 8, 1824, Mary Kent, who was born August 12, 1810, also a native of Kentucky. The young people made their home in Missouri until 1836, when they removed to Iowa and remained for sixteen years, outfitting in 1852 with ox-teams and necessary supplies for the long and wear-some trip across the plains. After six months they arrived safely at their destination, having mercifully been spared the depredations of the Indians. The first winter was spent in Multnomah county, and in the spring of the following year they came into Lane county and the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located eight and a half miles northwest of Cottage Grove, and there engaged in farming and the prosecution of his trades until his death, at the age of seventy-three years. He was a man interested in both political and religious matters, being a Republican and filling various of the minor offices of the vicinity, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. In the pursuit of his trade he established the first blacksmith shop in this vicinity. His wife lived to the age of ninety years, dying in February, 1901. She was the mother of twelve children, of whom the following are now living: Richard, of Siuslaw; B. F., located five miles west of Cottage Grove; William N., of this review; Lucy E., who married William Thompson, who is now deceased; John Hardy, also of this review; Laura S., became the wife of Fred W. Folson, of Junction City, and Mary A., the wife of Sanford Brown, of California.

William N. Crow was born in Iowa, April 28, 1840, and received his education in the district school in the vicinity of his home, and later attended the public school of Eugene and took a course at a commercial college in Portland, all his earlier tastes having inclined him to mental labor rather than physical. On completing his work of preparation he began to teach in the public schools of his adopted state, and continued so occupied until his marriage with Miss Lillie A. Harris, a native of Minnesota, when he went to live on a part of the paternal farm, where he put up comfortable and modern buildings and made other improvements which have enhanced the value of the property. He now owns about four hundred acres of land, with about forty-five acres under cultivation, and is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, having among his cattle the famous Shorthorns. In addition to his farming interests he has always engaged in the prosecution of the trades of blacksmith, wagon-maker and carpenter, which have added no little to his income. The first postoffice of Lorane was established in the home of Mr. Crow and he thus served as postmaster and has also filled various minor positions in the vicinity, among them being justice of the peace. Politically he casts his ballot with the Republican party, and is a member of the Grange. They have four children, all of whom are at home: Elza H.; Elmer R.; Oral E. and Pearl M.

John Hardy Crow was born in Van Buren county, Iowa, April 20, 1845, and received his education in the district and high school, the latter of Eugene, and after that he remained at home until his marriage, January 1, 1871, with Miss Martha L. Landrith, who was born January 28, 1852, in Missouri, and crossed the plains the following year with her parents, who settled in Lane county. Mr. Crow went to housekeeping on a part of the home place and has since made this his permanent residence, with the exception of five years, which he passed upon a homestead. He has here improved and cultivated the land, of which he owns one hundred and ninety-five acres and has twenty-five acres in active cultivation. He is at present engaged in the intelligent and practical interests of general farming and stock-raising, but also has time for the public affairs of the community, as he has always been active in politics, filling the minor offices and during the Civil war acting as a member of the home guard. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, in which he officiates as class leader and steward. Of the eleven children born to himself and wife the following are living and making their home with their parents: Joseph W.; George Garfield; Adelia M.; Riley T.; and Pearne J. H.

GEORGE O. WALKER. More than any other class of people in the country, the young and intelligent farmer, keen of wit, resourceful, and with a proper appreciation of the possibilities of his occupation, is depended on to maintain the financial prestige of this great country. His success or failure is the pulse upon which all departments of activity keep an anxious finger. The reports from his granaries control the making or marring of fortunes, and his every transaction carries significance to the remotest corners of the earth. How necessary, therefore, that the man who manages tracts of land and turns them to account, should be well educated, systematic, thrifty, and above all else find in his work that enjoyment and satisfaction without which labor were nearly always in vain. A fitting representative of this latter-day class of agriculturists is George O. Walker, who, profiting by the success of his sire, has turned his energies to such good account that he is one of the foremost of the stock-raisers in Lane county.

On the farm where he is still living Mr. Walker was born January 17, 1874, and he was educated in the public schools and at the Drain Normal school. Subsequently he engaged in teaching for several years, but still regarded the old claim as his home, to which he returned during the summer. After his marriage with Dollie Morningstar, a native of Illinois, Mr. Walker moved from the farm into the village which had sprung up on a portion of it, and in 1899 started a general merchandise business, continuing the same up to the present time. Although taking no particular interest in politics, Mr. Walker has held a number of local positions, and in 1900 was appointed postmaster of Walker. By no means devoted to one idea or place, Mr. Walker has branched out in business in Anlauf, Douglas county, where he has a small store, and also conducts a sawmill. These two occupations would seem to be sufficient for the average young man, however ambitious or capable, yet Mr. Walker keeps in touch with the labor of his youth, and, on his farm of five hundred acres adjoining the town, conducts a general farming and stock-raising industry. The same thoroughness which characterizes the merchant is noticeable also in the work of the farmer, for a better conducted or more modern farm it would be difficult to find in this county noted for its splendid farming properties. Mr. and Mrs. Walker have five children: Icie, Valta, Echo, Gale, and Ansel. The family are members of the Primitive Baptist church, and are socially well known and popular. Thus it will be seen that though young in years, Mr. Walker has already established himself among the substantial and permanent up-building agencies of Lane county, and as such he enjoys a prestige independent from that which is his by virtue of the foundation laid for him by his father.

GEORGE W. McREYNOLDS. A little more than a score of years has witnessed the efforts of George W. McReynolds to make for himself a substantial and honorable position in Oregon, whither he came in 1882, and that he has succeeded is evidenced by his four-hundred-acre farm, comfortable home, good outbuildings of all kinds, and his large herd of stock, in which the Shorthorns are noticeable. The greater part of his life had been spent in the middle west. While a resident of the Mississippi valley he had the opportunity of serving his country in the great struggle between the North and South, though he was then scarcely more than a youth.

A native of Davis county, Ind., George W. McReynolds was born April 18, 1843, the son of Joseph McReynolds, a blacksmith who had emigrated from his birthplace in West Virginia about 1825 and settled in Indiana. He there married Miss Sophronia Rainey and remained until 1858, when he located in Iowa and in 1865 he removed to Kansas, where his death occurred at the age of sixty-two years, while his wife lived to be eighty-five. George W. McReynolds was one of eleven children, and remained at home and received his education in the district schools of Iowa, until he arrived at manhood. In 1863 he enlisted in Company C, Eighteenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and was first sent with his company to Fort Smith, Ark., in that state giving the greater part of his service. He was a member of the Shreveport expedition and engaged in various duties until his honorable discharge at Little Rock in August, 1865, when he returned to Iowa and later followed his parents into Kansas. He married in Kansas, in 1868, and lived there for fourteen years, when he came to Oregon and bought two hundred and forty acres, which was a part of the Sheppard claim, located six miles south of Cottage Grove, Lane county. At the same time he homesteaded a hundred and sixty acres and at once began the improvement and cultivation of his large farm. He has since built his house, barns, and other buildings and has devoted his land principally to stock-raising, having one of the largest stock farms in the vicinity, though he carries on general farming also.

The wife of Mr. McReynolds was formerly Anna Lynch, a native of Indiana, and of their union have been born two children. Ernest is located in the vicinity of his father's farm, and Eva is the wife of E. S. Ellis, of Leland, Josephine county, Ore. In political preference Mr. McReynolds has always been a Republican and has taken an active interest in the advancement of the principles of his party. Faithful in the performance of his duty as a citizen he has accepted many of the minor offices of the neighborhood and filled them acceptably. As an honored soldier he is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic.

COL. CHARLES H. HOLDEN, the United States land commissioner at Florence, is a man of more than ordinarily substantial endowments, developed by years of practical experience in government and professional service. He has the reputation of being one of the most conservative students of legal science in Lane county, and though at present not practicing to any extent, wields an influence in maintaining a high standard of excellence among practitioners. A resident of Oregon since 1891, Mr. Holden arrived in the state with many honors upon his head, and a career behind him which more than justified relaxation from active life. For a time he lived in the city of Portland, Oregon's chief city, and for several years traveled extensively on the coast, visiting the garden spots of California, basking in the charm of reminiscence surrounding the historical old landmarks, and making an exhaustive study of the people and resources of the west. Arriving in Florence July 3, 1894, he stepped into renewed activity as United States land commissioner, notary public, justice of the peace, and has since identified himself with the business, professional and social life of the community. A delightful home across the river in South Florence is expressive of the character and personality of Colonel Holden, its trees and shrubbery, artistic vistas, and evident collaboration with the hospitable and beautiful and gracious things of life, speaking most eloquently of geniality and success.

In his younger days Colonel Holden became familiar with the early hours and hard work on a Kent county (Mich.) farm, to which his parents, Josiah R. and Joanna R. (Danforth) Holden, removed when he was twelve years of age. He was born in Grafton county, N. H., April 18, 1832, and at the tender age of two months his parents emigrated to the then far west. On both sides of his family he inherits longevity, for his father lived to be ninety, and his mother ninety-one years of age. In Kent county, Mich., the father engaged in his old-time occupation of farming, the advantage of large tracts of timber on his farm leading him also into lumbering and milling. Three sons and one daughter were reared on this farm, all being educated in the public schools. Charles H., the second of the children, was one of the most studious, and in boyhood days evidenced a tendency to extend his activities beyond the borders of the paternal farm. At the age of nineteen he supplemented his common school training by entering the Plainfield Academy, preparatory to graduation from Knox College, with the degree of A. B.

Admitted to the bar in 1857, the following year Colonel Holden was elected district attorney for the Grand Traverse district, then embracing five counties, which position he held until the breaking out of the Civil war, when he was one of the first in the town to interest himself in forming a company. The outgrowth of his effort in this direction was Company A, Twenty-Sixth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, of which he became first lieutenant, joining the Second army corps under General Hancock. During his service he was promoted three times for gallant and meritorious service, and at one time held the rank of lieutenant-colonel on the staff of General Canby. Colonel Holden rendered distinguished service in the Union cause, participating in the principal battles of the war, including those on the way to Gettysburg and many of the engagements before Richmond and Petersburg. When peace was restored Colonel Holden continued to live in Washington, and during 1865 and 1866 reviewed his studies at the Columbia Law School. For ten years he was subsequently connected with the treasury department in Washington, principally in the loan branch and auditor's departments. He was the last president of the last city council of Washington, D. C., receiving the gavel, and distinguishing himself by efficient parliamentary service.

Returning to Reed City, Mich., in 1879, Colonel Holden resumed the practice of law, and for twelve years was one of the foremost practitioners in that judicial circuit. His health becoming impaired, and desiring a complete change, he came to Portland, as heretofore stated, and has never regretted his decision to emigrate to the west. He is fraternally prominent, and is connected with the Blue Lodge Chapter and Knights Templar, F. & A. M., the Independent Order of Foresters and the Knights of Pythias. He is also a member of the Grand Army of the Republic of General Lyons Post No. 58, of Florence, Ore. Colonel Holden is a Republican in politics, having cast his first presidential vote for a Republican candidate. He is genial and popular, and represents in his life and character the reliable, conservative and solid business man and lawyer.

MRS. ELIZABETH JANE MOIST. While the vanguard of civilization in the west was composed primarily of men, there were very early established homes presided over by women, whose courage failed not on the plains or in the midst of the desolation and deprivation of the settler's camps, and whose high-mindedness and morality harmonized the discordant elements wrangling for supremacy and power. To this class of women belongs Mrs. Elizabeth Jane Moist, whose family traversed the plains in 1847, and who, after rearing a large family, and performing her share towards the accumulating of a competence, is living retired in Albany.

The ancestry and immediate family history of Mrs. Moist is spoken of at length in the biography of her brother, William Ralston. She was born in Rockville, Parke county, Ind., where her father, Jeremiah Ralston, owned a large farm and carried on extensive farming and stock-raising. Elizabeth Jane Ralston was eight years of age when the family moved to Burlington, Iowa. She was educated in the public schools of that state, and grew to a gracious and interesting young womanhood in a refined home atmosphere. Jeremiah Ralston was ambitious and resourceful, and was one of the first farmers in his neighborhood to seriously consider the proposition of migrating to the west. So strongly convinced was he of the desirability of such a course that he sold his farm and invested in oxen and other requirements for the perilous journey. This was in 1847, and his daughter then eighteen, was one of the most enthusiastic of the party. Six months of travel brought them to the desired destination in Lebanon, Ore., and two years later, in Lebanon, July 31, 1849, she was united in marriage with Joseph Moist, with whom she lived nearly half a century, until his death on his finely improved farm near Albany, March 13, 1893, at the age of seventy years.

Joseph Moist was born near Pittsburg, Pa., 1823, and at an early day removed to Burlington, Iowa, where he followed his trade of blacksmith. He was a brave and adventurous man, for in 1845, when the journey across the plains was a rare occurrence, and untold dangers beset the path of courageous emigrants, he set out with his partner with ox-teams and a wagon and accomplished the journey from Iowa to Oregon with comparative ease. Oregon City was then a small aggregation of houses, with few business interests to enliven its prospects, and he established a much-needed blacksmith shop, conducting the same with considerable success. In 1846 he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres three miles north of Lebanon, Linn county, and upon this he inaugurated improvements, building a dwelling and barn. He built and conducted the first blacksmith shop in Linn county in 1850. The years 1848 and 1849 he spent in the mines of California. After returning, he continued to conduct his farm and shop, although he eventually gave up the latter, devoting all of his time to farming. In 1862 he went to the mines of Lewiston, Idaho, returning somewhat richer than when he started out. His farm property yielded large returns, and between general farm produce and fine cattle and horses, his fortune increased at a greater ratio than that of the majority of the settlers. In 1877 he felt entitled to a partial rest from his labors, and so built a home in Albany, where he lived with his family during the winter season, spending his summers on the farm. Thus his remaining years were spent, and at the age of seventy, shortly before his death, he retained his faculties, and maintained his interest in the general happenings of the day. Four sons were reared to maturity on the farm, and of these Charles Franklin is a retired farmer living in Lebanon; William Frederick and John Horace are in the livery business in Lebanon and Ashland; and Jay died while a junior at Albany College, at the age of twenty.

Mr. Moist was a public-spirited and large-hearted man, and his influence for progress was felt in religious, educational and business circles of the county. He was a self-made man in every respect. He was a Democrat in political affiliation, and was fraternally associated with the Masons at Lebanon.

Since her husband's death Mrs. Moist has rented her farm and made her home in Albany. She is a devoted member of the United Presbyterian Church, and is known for her fine womanly qualities, and her ability to make and retain friends. For many years she was a member of the Eastern Star at Lebanon.

JOHN E. P. WITHERS. To liken the character of some of the pioneers of Oregon to the forest trees native to the state is in all ways appropriate, for it has become an accepted fact that the pine of the western wood furnishes the most durable lumber for the building of the ships which must breast the tumult of the deep and withstand its storms, and as citizens of an embryo state these men have in the past proven the sturdiness and strength of their manhood, many of them still remaining as parts of the great whole which gave to the Union another commonwealth. Occupying such a place in the minds of those who recall the days by actual experience is John E. P. Withers, who has withstood the storms of trial and adversity, has made his own success and helped to make that of the state, and in the evening of his days enjoys the satisfaction of accomplishment.

Mr. Withers was born in Kentucky, January 21, 1830, and when three years old his parents removed to McLean county, Ill., where he spent the intervening years until his majority. In 1851 he set out for the west, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and on his safe arrival located in the gold fields of California, where he remained for but a brief time, returning in the same winter to his Illinois home, this trip being made by water. Undaunted by his first failure to find satisfaction on the Pacific coast he again undertook the journey in 1853, and after six months reached Oregon, which was his destination, taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in the neighborhood of Corvallis, Benton county. This remained his home for six years when he went to Douglas county and engaged in the stock business for a like period. On again locating farther north he selected Lane county for his future home. He first bought a farm of one hundred and thirty acres near Eugene, where he lived until 1901, successfully engaged in general farming and stock-raising. In the last named year he traded a farm of seven hundred acres for the one which he now occupies, which consists of one hundred and seventy-five acres, in the vicinity of Springfield.

The marriage of Mr. Withers occurred in August, 1854, Miss Margaret Gillispie, of LaFayette county, Mo., becoming his wife. She had come to Oregon with her parents in 1852, and her father had purchased the right to three hundred and twenty acres of land in the neighborhood of Eugene, which he farmed in connection with his duties as a minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The family of children born to Mr. and Mrs. Withers were as follows: Mary, now Mrs. W. M. Vanduzen; Mabel, now Mrs. Bogart, of this county; William W., who was killed February 5, 1903, while performing his duty as sheriff of Lane county, and whose sketch appears elsewhere in this volume; Alice, now Mrs. Hawley, of San Diego, Cal.; Price, of Harney, Ore.; Anna, now Mrs. Emery, of Douglas county; Emma, now Mrs. Cornelian, of Helena, Mont.; and Jessie, who is Mrs. Edmonston, of Thurston, Ore. As an influential and able man of the Democratic party, Mr. Withers was elected to the state legislature in 1866, where he able represented his constituency. Both himself and wife are members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

NOAH BUOY. To the Buoy family opportunities existed but for them to improve, and that they have done so is evidenced by the active part which they have taken in every movement pertaining to the growth of the country while maintaining their own positions as pioneers and seekers after fortunes so bountifully held out in this western state. Upon many of the important documents of the state appear the names of Laban Buoy, and those of his three sons, H. N., John and James as four among the pioneers who organized the Republican party in Oregon, as well as being connected with many other prominent movements in the early history of the commonwealth.

A representative of this family is named in the person of Noah Buoy, who was born in Danville, Ill., August 22, 1837, the son of Laban, who was born in Bourbon county, Ky., October 8, 1802. The elder man was the son of a farmer and was thus early inured to habits of thrift and industry which insured his usefulness as a citizen of a new country when combined with the spirit which had animated his own sire when he left the more settled conditions of the colonial states and took up his abode in "the dark and bloody ground" famous in the annals of the middle west. He remained at home until his marriage in 1820 with Jane Blackburn, who was born on the east coast of Maryland in 1801, and shortly afterward they removed to Indiana, where he engaged in farming and the trade of a carpenter. After a residence there of a few years they located in Illinois in 1823, and during his residence in that state he served in the Black Hawk war in the capacity of scout and spy, a dangerous and important post in which he proved of invaluable service. While living in Illinois his people joined him and made that state their home until their death. For thirty years Mr. Buoy remained in the Prairie state giving his aid toward the advancement of civilization and development of resources, but April 15, 1853, he crossed the plains with horse and mule teams and reached Oregon City, August 9, of the same year. Coming on to Lane county, he bought the squatter's right to six hundred and forty acres located a half mile south of Creswell, and upon this property he devoted his time and energy in cultivation and improvement, remaining so employed until his death. Not long after his arrival in Oregon the Rogue river Indians caused the trouble which resulted again in war and Mr. Buoy was authorized to raise a company, of which he became captain, leading his men at once to the seat of war. The most serious of the engagements was at Looking Glass prairie, though he continued in the service throughout the entire war, receiving the commendation of all who appreciated the great danger and difficulty through which he passed. He was also influential in all public affairs for the spirit which animated him was thoroughly appreciated by his fellow-citizens and they felt their interests safe when in his hands. He held various of the minor offices in his neighborhood, among them being county commissioner in which he served for one term, and he it was who assisted in the organization of the Republican party. He had been a member of the Presbyterian church since boyhood. He and his wife both died at the age of seventy-four, and of the children which blessed their union the following are now living: James, located in Portland; Thomas, also of that city; Noah, of this review; William, of Jasper, Ore.; Jane Knox, of Prineville; and Evaline Carter, of Junction City.

Noah Buoy received his education in the vicinity of his father's farm where he grew to manhood, and was then allowed to attend the graded schools of Albany. When a young man he took up the trade of a brick mason, being the first man to make bricks in this county. He was only fifteen years old when he set out to make his own way in the world, and his inheritance of self-reliance and independence brought about the results which follow application and energy. After his marriage, April 15, 1863, with Susan Mary Hughes, the daughter of a blacksmith of Creswell, and who crossed the plains from her native state of Missouri as a member of the same train in which her husband traveled, he located upon a part of his father's claim and has lived all his life in this vicinity. In 1880 he removed to a farm of two hundred and twenty-six acres located two miles south of Creswell and is now engaged in the cultivation of one hundred acres which are tillable, and stock-raising, devoting much attention to Shorthorn and Hereford cattle. In addition to his farming interests he has always worked at his trade and the combined interests were productive of wide returns.

To Mr. and Mrs. Buoy have been born three children, of whom John W. is located in Harney county and George L. and Burton H. still make their home with their parents. In politics Mr. Buoy is a Republican, and takes an active part in the promotion of the principles which he endorses.

JOHN F. WALKER. The founders of towns must ever occupy a special place in the history of the world, more especially when their names are associated therewith for all time, a mutually beneficial distinction being thus conferred. The town of Walker, a thrifty and promising aggregation of interests, owes its start to that honored pioneer, John F. Walker, upon whose farm there sprang into existence the inevitable store, the blacksmith shop and postoffice which, with slight modifications, have usually served as the nucleus for thriving towns. Behind him Mr. Walker has the backing of characteristics drawn from a fine old southern ancestry, traits fostered on the paternal farm in Bedford county, Va., where he was born January 11, 1827. His father, Robert M. Walker, was also born in the Old Dominion February 6, 1804, and it is presumed that his father, the paternal great-grandfather, was either born there or established his family there at a very early day.

John F. Walker was never at a loss for companionship and sympathy in his childish enthusiasms, for he had thirteen brothers and sisters, many of whom started out to earn their own living at an early age. He was twenty when he learned the tanner's trade, which he followed for a few years. In 1847 he went to Missouri and farmed for three years. While thus employed he contracted the western fever, and in the spring of 1850 started for California with mule teams, being on the road about three months. In the latter state he tried his hand at mining, but not experiencing great success turned his attention to carpentering, of which there was great need at that time. In 1852 he came to Oregon and spent the first winter in the mines of Jackson county, the following spring taking up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres four miles southeast of Cottage Grove. This acquisition suggested the establishment of a home, and February 1, 1855, Mr. Walker married Mary J. Chrisman, who was born in Jackson county, Mo., February 16, 1839, and whose father, C. E. Chrisman, is mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mrs. Walker crossed the plains with her people in 1851, and settled in Lane county in 1853.

Under the most promising conditions Mr. and Mrs. Walker went to housekeeping on the newly acquired claim, and this continued to be their home until certain distasteful features connected with it led Mr. Walker to sell, and purchase a farm one mile east of Creswell. A year later he came into possession of the farm of five hundred and seventy acres upon which he now lives, and upon a part of which the village of Walker has since been built. This farm is four miles north of Cottage Grove, and few farms are so well improved, or unstintingly supplied with modern implements, outhouses and general aids to a large general farming and stock-raising industry. In the meantime, he has added to his land and now has about seventeen hundred acres, a fair showing for a man who started out in life with physical rather than financial assets, and who has overcome many obstacles placed in the way of his success. At present Mr. Walker is living a retired life, although he still maintains an interest in everything connected with the farm. The family live in an old-fashioned frame dwelling, large and comfortable and roomy, and to which the numerous friends are wont to repair with great frequency. Of the seven children born into the family, Mrs. Mary A. Walden lives in Washington; R. E., has a farm in this vicinity; J. W. resides in Alsea, Ore.; Mrs. Martha Wiseman makes her home in Eugene; and George O. is a merchant of Walker. A Republican since the establishment of the party, Mr. Walker has been called upon to fill many offices of trust in this county, including that of county commissioner, school director, and road supervisor. He is a deacon in the Baptist church, and has always contributed, as his means permitted, to its support. He is a kind-hearted, broad-minded, and exceedingly liberal man, in touch with current events, and interestingly reminiscent of the early days of Oregon. With his wife he is justly esteemed for interesting and fine traits of character, and in consequence is surrounded in his declining years by pleasant and harmonious associates.

JAMES CATLIN JOHNSON. The thriving city of Cottage Grove, Lane county, has a full quota of live, energetic and brainy business men, among whom is James C. Johnson, a young lawyer of talent and ability. A son of the late William Henry Johnson, he was born May 12, 1872, in Waseca county, Minn. His paternal grandfather, James C. Johnson, who was born in 1808, in New York state, was one of the earliest settlers of Chicago, Ill. Going there when the now magnificent city was but a rude hamlet, he engaged in trading, selling supplies to the Indian trading post, and to the trappers of that locality. Removing to Winnebago county, Wis., he continued as a trader for many years, becoming widely known throughout the northwestern territory. He spent his last years in Minnesota, dying at an advanced age in Waseca county.

A native of Wisconsin, William Henry Johnson went with his parents to Minnesota, and lived there until after his marriage. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, First Minnesota Infantry, and served as a bugler, holding the rank of first sergeant. After the war he was for awhile an engineer on a Mississippi river steamboat, and was subsequently a locomotive engineer. Taking up the study of law, he was admitted to the bar soon after attaining his majority, and began the practice of his profession at Duluth, Minn., continuing there until 1890. Coming then to Oregon, he continued his professional labors in Portland for a year, when, in 1891, he settled in Woodburn, Marion county, where he was in active practice until his death, in 1894, at the early age of forty-seven years. He was quite prominent in public affairs, serving in the Minnesota Legislature in 1882 and 1883, and as clerk of the court for a number of terms while a resident of Duluth, Minn. He married Elizabeth Reed, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died in Minneapolis, Minn. Her father, Walter Reed, was for many years one of the leading farmers of Waseca county, Minn., but after his retirement from active pursuits he settled in Morristown, Minn., where he spent his declining years.

The only child of his parents, James C. Johnson received his elementary education in the common schools of his native county, afterward taking a course at the Parsons' Business College in Duluth, Minn., where he was graduated in 1887. Subsequently entering his father's office, he read law under his instruction, and in June, 1895, the year following his father's death, he passed the examination of the supreme court, and began the practice of law in Woodburn, where he remained five years. Enlisting in Company M, Second Oregon United States Volunteers, Mr. Johnson went with his regiment to the Philippine Islands, where he took part in many active engagements, serving as sergeant of his company from muster-in to muster-out, and while at the front engaged in the following battles: Guam, June 21, 1898; Manila, August 13, 1898; battle of Tondo, February 23, 1899; and in the engagements in the Pasig valley between March 12, 1899, and March 20, 1899; at Malabon, March 25; at Polo, March 26; at Marilao, April 11; at Tay Tay, June 3 and June 4; at Antipolo, June 4; at Teresa, June 5; and at Morong on the same date. Serving from May 16, 1898, until August 7, 1899, Mr. Johnson was mustered out of service with a record for bravery and fidelity that he may well be proud of.

Returning to Oregon, Mr. Johnson resided in Woodburn until May, 1900, when he transferred his residence and business to Cottage Grove, where he opened a law office, and has since built up an extensive and lucrative practice in his chosen profession. Mr. Johnson has established a record for the trial of cases in the Supreme court that speaks well of his ability. He has other business interests, being one of the original incorporators of the LeRoy Mining Company, and of the Hiawatha Mining Company, of which he is now secretary and treasurer. Both of these properties are located in the Bohemian mining district.

At Woodburn, Ore., Mr. Johnson married Marguerite Ponti, who was born in Italy, and came with her parents to Watsonville, Cal., and from there to Woodburn with an older sister. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson have one child, Laura Marguerite. Mr. Johnson is an independent thinker, especially in political matters, voting with the courage of his convictions. Fraternally he is a Knight of Pythias, and a Knight of the Maccabees. In religion he is an Episcopalian. Although not an office-seeker, he served as municipal judge of Woodburn.

JERRY TAYLOR. As a reminder of his participation in the strife incident to settling this great northwestern country, and preparing the way for peaceful homes for men, women and children, Jerry Taylor, who has never quailed in the face of danger, carries upon his person, a wound that will probably trouble him to the end of his days. Too much cannot be said of the pioneers who came across the plains in the early days of Oregon's infancy, and by their dauntless courage overcame a hostile foe, and dwelt in small and uncomfortable houses, suffering isolation, and often the pangs of hunger. That the majority have proven equal to the character and physical test is the glory of the state, and none who come after are deserving of greater appreciation and honor.

Mr. Taylor is a pioneer of 1852, having crossed the plains with his father, Henry W. Taylor, and the other members of his large family. Of Henry Taylor much is said in another part of this work, but it is fitting to refer to him as one of the noblest and most helpful of the western sojourners of his time, his influence as an agriculturist, a politician, and a local preacher, equaling that of any of his contemporaries. He lived for some years in different parts of Pennsylvania, and at Pittsburg his son Jerry was born, October 13, 1832. The latter was educated primarily in the public schools, and under the training of his sire became a practical and successful farmer. On his own responsibility he took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres eight miles south of Cottage Grove, Ore. In 1854 he left his ranch and spent several months in the mines of Cali-formia. In 1855 he enlisted for service in the Rogue River war in Company B, Captain Buoy, commander, and took part in several of the terrible conflicts which marked that era of bloodshed and submission. He took an active part in the battle of Little Meadows, and at Big Bend, on Cow Creek, he received the wound from the effects of which he is still suffering. Twenty of the one hundred and twenty days' enlistment were spent in the hospital.

Returning to Lane county, Mr. Taylor attended the old Columbia college at Eugene, and for several years thereafter he was engaged in school teaching in Lane county. He had married in 1860, Rachel E. Jones, who was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains with her people in 1846. The farm owned by Mr. Taylor owes its development entirely to his energy and enterprise, and the fine improvements indicate a mind in touch with scientific and modern thought. The preferred stock is Shorthorn cattle, that asset of the conservative and cautious agriculturist, and in addition to stock-raising, grain and general farm produce contribute to a gratifying yearly income. Elizabeth A., the oldest daughter of Mr. Taylor, is the wife of Mr. Lestoe and lives in Portland; William H. is a resident of Washington; George R. lives on the home farm; Emmaranda married Alfred Powell and lives in this vicinity; and John N. is employed in the lumber camps. Mr. Taylor is a Free Thinker and in political matters casts his vote for the men whom he thinks best qualified to fill the position, regardless of party lines. He has held many of the local offices, all of which have come to him unsolicited, and has established a reputation as a promoter of peace and prosperity, as well as agricultural, political and educational excellence.

ABRAHAM HACKLEMAN. The birth of Abraham Hackleman occurred near Rushville, Ind., July 29, 1829, his parents being Abner and Elizabeth (Lines) Hackleman, the latter a native of North Carolina. The father was one of the earliest settlers of Rush county, Ind., and later was in the vanguard of emigration to Des Moines county, Iowa, where he engaged near Burlington as a farmer. In 1845 he likewise became an emigrant to Oregon, crossing the plains with the customary ox-teams, remaining, however, but one year, when he returned to Iowa by pack horses, his death occurring in the fall of the same year. Of the five children born to himself and wife, four came to Oregon, the three besides Abraham being John, who came in 1852, and died in Albany; Margaret, who is now Mrs. Culver, of Eugene, Ore.; and Mrs. Estes, of Baker City. The mother also came across the plains in 1852, and her death occurred in Baker City.

Abraham Hackleman was reared principally in Iowa, having removed there at the age of four years, and remained until he was eighteen. At that age, in the year 1847, he furnished a yoke of oxen and crossed the plains with a Mr. Burkhardt, leaving in April and taking the Barlow route over the old Oregon trail, having crossed the Missouri river at St. Joseph. After his arrival in Oregon City Mr. Hackleman came, in September of the same year, to the present site of Albany, where his father had located a donation claim. He re-located the claim and at once erected a log house, this being the first in this vicinity. The next year found him en route for the mines of California, his trip across the mountains made exciting and dangerous by many encounters with the Indians. The fall of the same year he returned to Oregon by water with substantial fruits of his short time of labor. In the spring of the next year he again made the journey south, but had the misfortune to be ill much of the time spent there, and after his return in the fall of '49, he engaged at once in farming and has since remained one of the representative farmers of the community. In 1850 he laid off seventy acres of land in the eastern part of what is now Albany, and which was known as Hackleman's first addition, following this later with three more additions, including in all more than a hundred acres, which take in the portion of the city up to Baker street and the Southern Pacific depot. In addition to his property here he owns two other farms in the valley, and also three thousand acres of land comprising a ranch east of the mountains in Crook county, which has always been devoted to the raising of horses and cattle, the land being principally useful for hay and grazing. He has sold as many as nine hundred horses in one season, a very large number even in this country of large productions.

The marriage of Mr. Hackleman occurred in Linn county, Ore., Miss Elenore Davis becoming his wife. Miss Davis crossed the plains in 1847, with her father, Truit Davis, of Missouri, who took up a donation claim two and a half miles out of the city. Mrs. Hackleman died in the Rogue river valley, while on a visit to that vicinity. She was the mother of five children, of whom Pauline is Mrs. Price, of Rogue river valley; Thurston is an attorney in Albany, and also engages in farming; Denver is a farmer located two miles out of Albany; Josephine became Mrs. Irvine and died in Albany; and Frank A. is a stockman here. Some time after the death of his wife Mr. Hackleman married in Albany Mrs. Vira (Anthrom) McKinnon, who had come from California to Oregon. In his political affiliations Mr. Hackleman belongs to the Democratic party, and through that influence he has held various offices, having been county commissioner and a member of the city council. Always active in every public movement which promised an advancement of the interests of the state or community, Mr. Hackleman has assisted in several very notable enterprises, among them being the building of the military road across the mountains, and which he has served at different times as director and president, maintaining each position creditably for several years. He was also interested in the old Oregon & Pacific Railroad, and for four years served as director of the same. Mr. Hackleman is a member of the Christian Church, and certainly lives up to the tenets of his religion in his patient and contented philosophy, which has endeared him to the hearts of many who have enjoyed his friendship.

WILLIAM H. SMALL. The well known fact that towns and cities partake, as a whole, of the characteristics of the people comprising them, finds no less emphatic expression in country communities, where distinguishing features are fewer and therefore more pronounced. As illustrating this thought it is a pleasure to call attention to the career of William H. Small, so long identified with Lane county, and whose aspirations, ambitions, hopes and example, may be taken as typical of all that is worthy and of good report. Mr. Small is a prominent man in his neighborhood, not only as a successful farmer and stock-raiser, but because he has taught people that his word, his work, and himself are thoroughly to be depended upon; that his judgment is good, and that a generous regard for the rights and prerogatives of others underlies his most ambitious undertakings.

In Pettis county, Mo., where he was born February 17, 1837, Mr. Small was reared in an atmosphere of refinement and comparative affluence, for his father, Henry Small, was a large land owner and stock-dealer, and prominent in political, educational and social life. Henry Small was born in Tennessee in 1812, and at a very early day removed with his parents to Missouri, where he was reared, educated, and finally embarked upon an independent agricultural life. In 1835 he was united in marriage with Nancy Mosby, born in Kentucky, and of this union several children were born in Missouri. William H. was thirteen years of age when the family migration to Oregon took place in 1850, and in innumerable ways he made himself useful on the long and tiresome journey. They were on the road about six months, and on the way had seventeen horses and mules stolen by the Indians. Otherwise their journey was uneventful. They settled on a claim in Linn county, near Brownsville, for a couple of years, moving then to another claim upon a portion of which Cottage Grove now stands. The father lived to be sixty-three and the mother eighty-eight years old. They were people of refinement, large of heart and strong of purpose, nobly filling their obligations in an enlightened and progressive community.

With the exception of his sister, Mrs. Susan Ann Julian, of California, William Small is the only remaining child of the six born to his parents. Of a studious turn of mind, he improved the educational chances that presented themselves by attending the district schools during the winter, devoting his summers to assisting his father around the home farm. In 1861 he married Martha Ann Cooley, and their first home was on a claim adjoining the land where London has since been built. In 1878 Mr. Small purchased his present farm of four hundred and twenty-four acres, nine miles south of Cottage Grove, upon which he has made extensive improvements, and converted into one of the best farming properties in the county. He raises Cotswold sheep, Durham cattle and Poland-China hogs, besides grain and general farm produce. He is a Democrat in politics, and has held all of the minor offices, being particularly active as a member of the school board. Fraternally he is connected with the Grange, and has done much to promote the well-being of this helpful organization. His children are John T. and Henry, living on the old place; George A., engaged in farming on the home place; Robert C., farming near his father; and Nancy C., living with her parents.

FRANKLIN J. CHAMBERS. A native son of Oregon, Franklin J. Chambers was born in King's valley, Benton county, February 15, 1853, the son of Rowland and Louisa (King) Chambers, who came to Oregon in 1845, in company with Nehemiah King. In the spring of 1846 he came to King's valley and took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he continued to make his home until his death in 1870, at the age of fifty-seven years. He married Louisa King, the daughter of Nehemiah King, and upon her death he married her sister. He was the father of the following children: Margaret Bagsley and James Chambers, both dead; Sarah, who lives at Dayton, Ore., the wife of Mr. Watson; William, who lives at Pullman, Wash.; Jackson, conducting a hotel at Canyon City, Grant county, Ore.; John located in King's valley; Franklin J., the subject of this review; Henry, in Pullman, Wash.; Ordalia, at Olex, Ore.; Samuel, in Pullman, Wash.; Lydia, the wife of H. T. Maxfield, of King's valley; Rebecca, the wife of A. B. Alexander, of Corvallis, Ore.; Julia, the wife of L. G. Price, of King's valley; and Lincoln, also of King's valley; Annie and Alice, who died several years ago. Mrs. Louisa Chambers died December 3, 1889, aged sixty-three years.

Franklin J. Chambers was reared to manhood upon the paternal farm, receiving his education through the medium of the common schools in the vicinity of his home. Following close upon his twenty-first birthday he located on the farm where he now lives, having made this his home ever since. He has been very successful in his work, and has inherited much property, now owning three hundred and fifty acres of the home farm, and altogether seven hundred and fifty-five acres in King's valley, and a stock ranch in Polk county, consisting of fourteen hundred and eighty acres, upon which he raises cattle, horses, sheep, goats, etc.

Mr. Chambers was married in 1874 to Miss Emma Maxfield and they have made this their home ever since. In his political affiliations Mr. Chambers adheres to the principles of the Republican party, and through this influence he has held the position of county commissioner for eight years. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holding membership in King's Valley Lodge, No. 44, of Corvallis, Ore., in which he has passed all the chairs but one, also belongs to the Encampment. Religiously he is a member of the United Evangelical Church.

B. S. KELSAY, one of the best known ranchers on the Pacific coast, is a native son of Oregon. His birth occurred on a farm near Creswell, Lane county, March 10, 1862, and he is the oldest of the ten children born to Burton and Euphrasia Ann (Gillis) Kelsay, natives of Wayne county, Ky., and Warren county, Mo., respectively. After many years of exceptional country activity, Burton Kelsay and his wife are living retired in Fossil, Ore., and have the satisfaction of knowing that eight of their thirteen children are living and in good circumstances, all but B. S. being residents of eastern Oregon. Burton Kelsay was born September 15, 1833, and while in his teens removed from Kentucky to Missouri, where he married the daughter of George Gillis, now deceased. At the age of nineteen, in 1853, he started across the plains with ox-teams and wagons, and after a six months trip took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres two miles southeast of Creswell. A few years later he sold this property to Mrs. Fannie Eaton, and took his family to Lake county, Cal., engaging in general farming for eight years. Kelsayville, Cal., was named in honor of his cousin. Returning to Lane county, he farmed again in the vicinity of Creswell, and in the spring of 1878 removed to Umatilla county, where he engaged in the sheep business with great success. Feeling somewhat the infirmities of approaching age, he retired to Fossil, Ore., taking with him ample means to live in comfort and even luxury for the remainder of his days.

B. S. Kelsay was four years old when the family removal to California took place, and twelve when his parents returned and placed him in the public schools of Lane county. Accompanying the family to Umatilla county he remained at home until the spring preceding his majority when he went to Sherman county with his brother, L. C., and engaged in a large sheep-raising industry. The brothers were destined for success as sheep raisers, and their brand, three perpendicular lines with the bar across the top, became a familiar one to the surrounding rangers. After a few years the brothers divided their profits, B. S. continuing on the same ranch, which is known far and near as the Jack Knife sheep ranch. At times he had as high as twenty thousand sheep at a time. In 1898 Mr. Kelsay located his family in Creswell, purchased back the old place from Mrs. Eaton, and also bought an adjoining farm, having at the present time twelve hundred acres in one body. This farm is located east of Creswell and on the banks of the Willamette river, and is devoted to cattle, sheep, Angora goat, horse and hog-raising. This is one of the finest stock farms in Lane county, being well equipped with buildings for the care of the stock, and with modern agricultural implements for general farming. In addition, Mr. Kelsay owns about four hundred and forty acres in the Sherman county ranch, and has two hundred acres in wheat.

Mr. Kelsay purchased twenty acres of land in Eugene, between Fifteenth and Seventeenth and Hilliard and High streets, and laid the same out in fifty-two lots in 1902. This addition has built up faster than any addition in the city, and is all sold at present with the exception of the two lots occupied by Mr. Kelsay. An inducement to purchasers has been a deep well dug by the promoter, operated by a gasoline engine, and with a tank capacity of thirty-six thousand gallons. For the first three years after the first purchase, owners are privileged to use the water gratis, providing they do their own piping to their homes. Needless to say, all have been glad to avail themselves of this advantage, with the result that the addition is one of the best watered and most modern in this part of the state.

In Grant county, Ore., Mr. Kelsay was united in marriage with Eliza C. Gilchrist, who was born near Scio, Ore., a daughter of William Gilchrist, a pioneer of 1850. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Kelsay: Earl, Nona, Burt, Hazel, Charles, Ethel and Una. In politics Mr. Kelsay is a staunch Republican. He is a member of the Christian Church, and is fraternally identified with the Woodmen of the World; the Woodmen Circle; and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Grass Valley.

JOSEPH G. POWELL. The science of agriculture in Lane county has been materially advanced by the efforts of Joseph G. Powell, who represents a pioneer name of dignity and distinction, and has built up a reputation of which any man might well be proud. Much may be attributed to the fact that Mr. Powell was reared in an atmosphere where the upright and honorable were fostered and encouraged. His father, Alfred Powell, was a minister of the gospel his entire active life, and in that capacity accomplished an untold amount of good in Lane county. This pioneer of 1851 was born in Ohio, July 10, 1810, and while Illinois was yet a territory, moved there with his parents, settling on a farm in Menard county, which had been the roving place of the red man. From earliest youth Alfred Powell was religiously inclined, and when about twenty years of age he entered the ministry which, combined with farming, constituted his lifework. In 1833 he married Sarah Bracken, who was born in Illinois, and of this union there were born two children, of whom James H. is deceased, and Alexander H. lives in the vicinity of Cottage Grove. His wife dying in January, 1837, Mr. Powell married for a second wife, Hannah Goble Sherell, who had removed several years before from her native state of Ohio, to Illinois. Of this union five children were born, Mrs. Lucinda J. Davis and Joseph G., the latter born June 1, 1841, being the only survivors. With his little family Rev. Powell crossed the plains in 1851, and after a six-months journey he arrived in Linn county, taking up a claim seven miles southeast of Albany. A few years before his death at the age of seventy-one he went to live with his children in Albany, his latter days being spent in peace and retirement and surrounded by loved ones. His was an interesting and self-sacrificing life, his ambition to do good leading him into remote parts of the state, and placing him in immediate touch with all phases of existence. He was not one of the solemn, religious enthusiasts, but won souls with his brightness and kindness, his happy faculty of looking on the best side of things, and his intense sympathy with the temptations and aspirations of his fellow-men. In his younger days he served in the Black Hawk war, and for meritorious service was elevated from private to the rank of a commissioned officer.

Joseph G. Powell was reared to farming, and he continued to live on the old place after his marriage to Melissa A. Ramsey in 1862. In 1887 he purchased his present farm of two hundred and sixty-two acres, eight miles south of Cottage Grove, and which is a part of the old Rogers donation claim. He has added to his farm as his interests increased, and now has three hundred and eighty-two acres. Besides general stock, he raises Merino and Southdown sheep. The improvements are modern, the dwelling large and commodious, and barns and outhouses well constructed. To Mr. Powell farming is an occupation which demands study and continual advancement, and he is to be numbered among the influential and progressive men who are helping to maintain a high standard. Nine children have been born to himself and wife, of whom Emily, the wife of Stephen Overholser, lives in Washington; Nancy Overholser lives in London, Ore.; Charles is at home; Maude married Levi Geer and lives in Lane county; Ida married Ernest McReynolds and lives at Divide, Ore.; George A. lives at home; Robert B.; Edwin W. and James H. Although never seeking office, Mr. Powell has held several of the local offices, and he is fraternally associated with the Grange, having held all of the offices in that organization. In the Christian Church, of which he has been a member since early manhood, he has always been a cheerful and earnest worker, contributing generously towards its charities and general maintenance.

ALEXANDER COOLEY. It is an easy matter to find the source of the strength of character and solidity of manhood which distinguishes Alexander Cooley, when one reflects that his mother was one of the few women who sought the west almost entirely upon her own responsibility, as none of her children had then attained maturity. Left a widow in 1843, and with a family to support, Mrs. Cooley gathered together her worldly goods and removed to Missouri as a better location than that of her Virginia home, and prepared to rear her children among the broader opportunities of the middle west. Induced at a later period to look favorably upon the advantages accruing from the long and dangerous journey which would take them over the remainder of the continent and into the great northwest, the family outfitted in 1853 and started across the plains with ox-teams. At the close of an unusually short journey, occupying but five months, they arrived safely in Lane county, Ore., and at once located on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres one mile southeast of Cottage Grove, upon which the mother died at the age of seventy-six years. This was a part of the

G. C. Cooley donation claim and its improvement and cultivation at once became the most absorbing interest for the young pioneers, and to the energy of the sons of this mother is due the greatly increased value of the property, the home site being one of the desirable ones in the vicinity, and the buildings a credit to a practical and progressive farmer.

Alexander Cooley was born in Grayson county, Va., January 10, 1835, and through the early death of his father, a farmer, he felt the necessity of assuming burdens which would not otherwise have been his. He remained with his mother throughout her residence in the middle west and the later one in Oregon, and through her management and ability he was enabled to gain a good education in the district schools in the neighborhood of their home. In 1865 he married Eliza Shields, a native of Indiana, who crossed the plains with her parents in 1851. Her death occurred in 1877, leaving a family of four children, of whom George is located in Paisley, Ore.; J. R. and Currin are both located on the home place; and Juda, the wife of V. D. White, is living in the vicinity of her childhood's home. At the present time Mr. Cooley owns two hundred and sixty acres of land and carries on general farming and the raising of Cotswold sheep, Durham cattle and other stock. As a Democrat in politics he has never taken an active interest in political movements, though he has manifested his willingness to do his duty as a citizen through the faithful discharge of duties embodied in the various minor offices of the vicinity pressed upon him, and is in all ways public-spirited and interested in the welfare of the community.

HON. ROBERT M. VEATCH. A man of inestimable worth for the good which he has accomplished in more than one avenue in a life of sixty years is the Hon. Robert M. Veatch, whose name is well known throughout the entire state, and especially in Lane county, where he has made his home since 1865. Besides taking an active and engrossing part in all public affairs of his community and state, he has had the entire care of a family of three children, having lost his wife February 28, 1885, through her attendance upon him when he had the measles while in the state legislature. With a judgment and devotion seldom found outside of maternity, the father took up the double burden of widowhood and the caring for his children, and has now given to the state two honorable sons and a daughter as citizens of the commonwealth which he himself helped to form. Every credit is due Mr. Veatch for the strong, sturdy strokes which he has given toward the upbuilding and growth of the country, for the exemplary life which he has lived as a member of the community, and the respect and esteem of all men is given him.

The Veatch family traces its lineage back to the early history of the country when three brothers, Elias, Nathan and James, came from Wales, their native land, and became settlers in Alabama and North Carolina. The last named was the great-grandfather of Robert M. Veatch, and he was here married to Miss Rayner, in 1751, and removed then to North Carolina and later to South Carolina. He died in 1780, the father of eight children, the following sons serving in the Revolutionary war: Walter, Isaac, Elias, James, Amos, and Charles. Elias was born in North Carolina and served as a private in the Revolutionary war. As a farmer he removed to Illinois in 1820 and there his death occurred. His son, Isaac, was born in North Carolina, August 25, 1786, and when a young man he went to Georgia on business and there married, and after returning to his home he decided to locate in Tennessee, which move was afterward followed by one which took them into Illinois, whither the father had settled. He located near the present site of Enfield, White county, earning his livelihood by the combined interests of farming and the running of a grist mill, and being also a cabinet-maker by trade. Late in life he came west to spend the remaining years of his life with his five sons in Oregon, making the trip about 1881 and dying in 1882 at the age of ninety-six years. In politics he was a strong Douglas man and also a great admirer of Lincoln, while in religion he was a very active member of the Presbyterian church. His wife was formerly Mary Miller, of Georgia, and she died in Davis county, Iowa, where the family passed a short time, afterward returning to Illinois.

Of twelve sons and four daughters born to his parents Robert M. Veatch was the youngest, and was born in White county, Ill., June 5, 1843. He was but two and a half years old when his mother died, and he therefore grew up without her care. He received his education in the common schools of Iowa and Missouri, his teacher in the latter state being Senator Pfeffer, of Kansas. In 1864 he made the six-months journey across the plains with ox-teams, locating in Tehama county, near Red Bluff, Cal., and the year following found him a resident of Lane county, Ore. He first made his home with a brother who lived near Cottage Grove, and in 1866 he entered the Eugene Academy, where he remained for one year, after which he spent a like period in the Willamette University, and in 1868 he entered the Oregon Agricultural College and was a member of the first class that graduated from that college, having then the degree of A.B. Mr.

Veatch then engaged in teaching, remaining for a period of seven years in a place near this city, and in 1876 he was able financially to purchase a farm of four hundred and forty acres located five miles east of Cottage Grove where he passed the ensuing nine years. In 1884 he removed to Cottage Grove in order to give his children the added advantages of the city schools, and has since made this his home. He has recently built a fine residence here.

In politics a Democrat, he has been faithful to the principles of his party and an able representative in whatever position the people have chosen to place him. These have been positions of trust and honor and their interests have been carefully guarded. Mr. Veatch has twice been a candidate for Congress, his first campaign being against Binger Hermann, when he reduced the normal Republican majority about two thousand votes. The second time he was defeated by the late Thomas Tongue, but cut down the usual Republican vote nearly four thousand. In 1872 Mr. Veatch was first a candidate for the legislature and was defeated by the very small number of seven votes. Not until 1882 did he again seek political honors, and he was then elected to the lower house, following this up with re-election in 1884, and in 1886 being chosen to occupy a seat among the senators. Four years later he was again elected to the senate, and in 1892 he was appointed to the register of the Roseburg land office, where he served four years and three months. In 1900 he was a delegate to the Kansas City Democratic convention. In local politics he is now serving his second term as mayor of the city, under which administration the city has felt the hand of official capability. A new water system has been put in and a sewerage system is shortly to follow. The water rates have been reduced to the very lowest figures for the benefit of the greater number of people, the entire municipal system now established on a paying basis, and a credit to the city which boasts such splendid government.

The various business interests which occupy his attention are the presidency of the corporation which has grown from the hardware business of his son, and the position of treasurer of the Grisley group of mines in the Bohemia district, besides which he is a member of the board of regents of the Drain Normal School, which position he has ably maintained for the past six years, always being active in educational work.

The wife of Mr. Veatch was formerly Surphina Currin, who was born in Missouri, October 4, 1845, and the marriage ceremony was performed near Cottage Grove. She was the daughter of John Currin, a native of Virginia, who came to Missouri in an early day and located in Jackson county. He crossed the plains in 1853, locating in Lane county, and he now makes his home upon his donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres five miles east of Cottage Grove. The three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Veatch are Henry H., a hardware merchant in Cottage Grove; Ermine E., at home; and John C., a student in his freshman year at the state university at Eugene. Mrs. Veatch died in Salem. In his fraternal relations Mr. Veatch is a Master Mason, and is a charter member here of the Knights of Pythias.

PHILIP E. JACKSON. Since coming to Oregon in 1890 Philip E. Jackson has become the owner of two hundred and eighty acres of land, located two and a half miles east of Mapleton, Lane county, upon which he has placed all of the improvements which have made it a valuable property. One hundred and twenty acres was embodied in a homestead, while the remainder has been acquired by purchase, the whole being now utilized in general farming and stock-raising, while he also carries on some logging. In the thirteen years of his residence here Mr. Jackson and his sons have killed nearly a hundred bears in the neighborhood of his farm, eight being shot in the fall of 1902.

In Ontario county, N. Y., Mr. Jackson was born December 23, 1840, the son of Philetus, born in that state in 1815, and Mary J. (Bel-lows) Jackson, the date of her birth being August 18, 1819. Of the two living children of this family Philip E. is the youngest child. His early education was received in the common schools of Illinois, where his parents had removed when he was a mere lad. The father engaged in farming in Cook county, where he remained until 1859, when he removed to Minnesota and took up a homestead in Brown county. In 1862 he was shot and killed by the Indians, and the burden of his own and his mother's support fell upon the shoulders of Philip. In the fall of the same year he went to Nicollet county and later located in Crawford county, Wis., where he remained until the spring of 1865. He then returned to the old place in Brown county, Minn., and made his home in Minnesota for twenty-five years. At that date he crossed the continent and located upon his present property, where he has since remained, making a comfortable home in this western state.

Mr. Jackson was married in 1868 to Mary H. Henton, born in Wisconsin in 1849, and four children were born to them, of whom Mary and Silas are deceased, and James and Andrew are at home. The mother of Mr. Jackson has always made her home with this son. In politics Mr. Jackson does not adhere strictly to the principles of any party but reserves the right to cast his vote for the man whom he thinks best fitted to fill the position, believing this to be the means toward securing good government. Public-spirited and interested in the welfare of the community he shirks no duty which becomes his as a citizen, now acting as school director for the district in the vicinity of his home. In fraternal relations he affiliates with the Masons of Florence and the Odd Fellows of Mapleton, belonging also to the auxiliaries, the Eastern Star and the Rebekahs.

ELMER E. LAWRENCE owes his nativity to the great Prairie State, having been born in Knoxville, Ill., April 4, 1862, of parents in moderate circumstances, who, when he was nine years old, removed to Ottawa, Kans., making this their home for many years. At the age of sixteen with a common school education, he entered Bodworth College and with patience and perseverance born of ambition, he worked his way through the entire curriculum, also attending the state normal. In 1886 he left Kansas, making his way direct to Oregon, going at once to Portland, where he was employed for ten years in the hotel business. In 1896 Mr. Lawrence invested the proceeds of his thrift and economy in a ranch, seven miles northwest of Sheridan, the place containing six hundred and eighty acres, where he engaged extensively in the raising of cattle, in which occupation he met with the uniform success which had attended all his previous efforts. Quite recently he sold his improved ranch and resides in Sheridan for the present, where he experiences the joys of a retired life with his little nine-year-old daughter, Mildred, and his wife, who was Miss Claudia Tawney, of Portland, whom he married January 4, 1888. Mr. Lawrence is a Republican and believes thoroughly in the principles of his party.

L. S. LOGAN was the only child born of the union of his father, Thomas J., with Phoebe Tuttle, a native of Iowa, and his birth occurred in Pleasantville, Marion county, Iowa, November 10, 1858. His father was a native of Indiana, in which state he was reared, and later removed with his parents to Marion county, Iowa. After his marriage in that state he engaged in farming for a time, and was attracted to the gold fields of California in 1862. He failed to make a fortune in the mines, and so returned to Iowa, where he once more engaged in farming. His wife having died in 1859 he made the trip across the plains again in 1862, with wagon and mule-teams, his four-year-old son accompanying him. The trip was accomplished in less than four months, and Mr. Logan first located in Umatilla county, there selling his stock to the Overland Stage Company and for a year attending the stage station. In the spring of 1863 he settled in Benton county, purchasing a farm five miles south of Corvallis, and engaged in farming until 1869, when he went to what is now Crook county, then known as Wasco, with a bunch of cattle for the Baker boys. In 1870 he traded his farm for an interest in the cattle business, establishing a ranch three miles south of Prineville, and in 1873 he removed to the southern part of that county, on a homestead establishing a ranch, where he began to deal extensively in cattle and horses. This he continued for many years, and later died on his farm near Prineville, in his sixty-eighth year. In the public affairs of the community he was always interested. Fraternally he was a Master Mason.

From the age of four years L. S. Logan was reared on his father's farm in Benton county, attending the district school in the pursuit of an education, and when twelve years old he removed to eastern Oregon in company with his father, where for many years his home continued to be. For some time he attended school in Prineville, but with a decided talent for the business which occupied his father he early became interested, and at the age of fifteen years he took charge of the stock while his father looked after the farm. To give him a better idea of the value of the work he was allowed to have a few head of cattle for his own, and he continued so successfully that he was made a partner at the age of seventeen years. In 1891 he was able financially to buy out his father's interest and from that time on has conducted the business alone. He has since become the owner of other ranches, now owning two on Hampton Buttes, known as Butte or Barbed Wire ranch, and this being in the southern part of Crook county and just on the edge of the desert he has a wide range for his stock. He also owns the old home ranch on Camp creek, a tributary of Crooked river, eleven hundred acres known as the Ninety-six ranch, as the brand which Mr. Logan has always used is the combination ninety-six, which was originally brought by the Bakers from the Cherokee nation, in Indian Territory. Mr. Logan is now dealing in cattle only, until ten years ago, however, having been one of the most extensive horse dealers in that part of Oregon, once having about three thousand head. He now has about six hundred head. In 1897 he located in Eugene and now owns two farms in the valley near Irving, one of three hundred acres and the other of three hundred and twenty, both of which are rented.

Mr. Logan was married in Prineville to Miss Minnie Maud Milliorn, born in Junction City, Lane county, Ore., the daughter of William Milliorn, a pioneer of the state. Three children were born to them, two of whom are living, namely: Otis, located on the ranch in Crook county, and Wanda. Fay is deceased. In fraternal orders Mr. Logan is quite prominent, having been made a Mason in Prineville, where he served as past master, and he now belongs to Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M. He was made a member of the chapter in this city and also a Knight Templar in Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, and belongs to Al Kader, N. M. S. In religion he is a Baptist, and politically is a Democrat.

JAMES W. McDOWELL. Many interesting events center around the family of which James W. McDowell is a member. His grandfather, William, was a man of brain and brawn and met a gallant death during the Black Hawk war, for when his body was picked up from the battlefield at Pilot House, it was found to be riddled with nine bullets. The grandfather was founder of this branch of the McDowell family in America, and he came from Scotland at an early day with six of his brothers.

David McDowell, the father of James W., was born in Beaver county, Pa., May 20, 1810, and when a young man left home and went to Ohio, where he married Malinda Marvin, a native of Brown county, Ohio, and who died August 11, 1882, at the age of sixty years. David McDowell led a varied and rather eventful life, many years of it being spent as a cook and watchman on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. When his son, James, was seven years old he moved to Walnut Hill, Marion county, Ill., and there devoted his energies to river work until 1848. In 1853 he outfitted with ox-teams and brought his family to the west starting from Illinois March 15, 1853, and arriving at Fosters, Clackamas county, September 20, 1853. The same fall he came to Linn county and located a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Plainview, but soon after traded it for a place the same size three miles northeast of Brownsville, where he made his home until 1892. He was exceedingly prosperous, utilized his property to the best possible advantage, and by frequent additions accumulated at one time eighteen hundred acres. His death occurred in Idaho in March, 1899. He had eight children, five of whom were sons. James W. McDowell was born near Aberdeen, Brown county, Ohio, September 20, 1840, and in the public schools of Illinois and Linn county received a practical education, and he was fortunate in having a father who had many business interests and who was a large employer of labor. Considerable of the fortune of the elder McDowell was made in the saw-milling business, to which his timbered land lent itself most readily. The son became interested in his father's mill near Brownsville, and, having gained a fair start, and a complete knowledge of the business, he independently erected a mill near Crawfordsville. This proved such a successful venture that he built another mill near Holly on the Calapooia, with which he was identified as manager and owner until 1892. For the following seven years Mr. McDowell lived in Brownsville, and in 1899 he purchased his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, three miles southeast of Holly. He is engaged in stock-raising and general farming, and has a farm containing many fine improvements, and modern facilities for conducting approved and up-to-date agriculture. Mr. McDowell married in Brownsville in 1878, Sarah A. Barnard, born on the Santiam river in Linn county, May 31, 1861. Four children have been born of this union, K. D., Henry, Pearl and William. Independent in politics, Mr. McDowell has never been a candidate for office, although he has acceptably served as a member of the school board for a couple of terms.

MRS. MALVINA J. HAYS. As one of the well known residents of Junction City Mrs. Malvina J. Hays enjoys the esteem of a host of friends and well wishers, and her place among the brave pioneer women who dauntlessly faced privation and danger, and by the usefulness and kindness of their lives paved the way for better things, is unchallenged. Born in Ohio, March 29, 1836, Mrs. Hays is a daughter of John and Elizabeth (Wayland) Pitney, natives respectively of Ohio and Virginia. In 1840 Mr. Pitney removed with his family to Howard county, Mo., where he followed his trade as machinist, and also engaged in the manufacture of chairs and furniture. He came to Oregon in 1853, locating on a claim near Junction City, Lane county, where he died at the age of fifty-six years. His wife survived him until sixty-four years old, her death being occasioned by a most distressing accident in a warehouse where she was caught in a pinion and crushed to death while in the act of shaking hands with a friend.

Mrs. Hays was the oldest of the four daughters and three sons born to her parents. In 1857 she was united in marriage with Andrew J. Hays, who was born in Virginia, and came to Missouri at an early day with his father, John Hays. Mr. Hays crossed the plains in 1850, and for two years engaged in mining in California, locating in Lane county in 1852. In 1857 he again visited California, but instead of mining, followed his trade of gunsmith, an occupation for which there was great need in the frontier days of the west. In 1859 he returned to Oregon and located a farm of one hundred acres near Harrisburg, farmed there until 1873, and then went to Yaquina Bay for his health, and died there in 1875. Subsequently his widow located on a farm near Junction City, where she engaged in farming until 1883, and then built the residence which she now occupies in the town. Mr. Hays was a Democrat in political affiliation, was a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Seven children were born into the Hays household, of whom the oldest son, Charles C., is living in Smithfield; Ida is the wife of William Weaver, of Portland, Ore.; John lives in Junction City; George is also a resident of this place; Della is the wife of Elmer Harrington, of Lake Creek, Ore.; Ella is the wife of Albert Weaver, of Vancouver, Wash.; and Rice is deceased. Mr. Hays participated in the Mexican war as a member of Company B, under the command of General Walton, enlisting at Lexington, Mo., and serving two years.

BENJAMIN F. KEENEY. Inseparably associated with the upbuilding of Lane county is the honorable career of Andrew J. Keeney, who, in addition to establishing a large farming enterprise near Goshen, gave to the state of his adoption children who maintain his good name, and keep in constant mind his worthy and upright life. Of these, none are more truly representative of northwestern force and enterprise than Benjamin F. Keeney, who occupies part of the original claim purchased by his sire, and where Benjamin F. was born October 14, 1865.

Andrew J. Keeney was born in Holt county, Mo., and was the son of a blacksmith who had early settled in the middle west. Remaining on the home farm until his marriage with a Miss Mulholland his life was shortly after saddened by the death of his wife, to whom he was devotedly attached. In time he married Mrs. Hannah Cooper, who bore him three sons, of whom James M. lives in Eugene, Ore.; William D. is a resident of Caldwell, Idaho; and John B. lives in Olex, Ore. For a third wife Mr. Keeney married Mrs. Amanda J. Matthews, the following children being born of this union: Mrs. Martha E. Handsaker, of Tacoma, Wash.; Benjamin F., of Goshen, Ore.; Andrew A., of Massena, N. Y.; and Thomas P., of Hong Kong, China. Mr. Keeney was ambitious and far-sighted, and was naturally impressed with the favorable reports he heard of the far west, to which he finally decided to remove his family. Crossing the plains with ox-teams, he mined for a few months in California, coming then to Oregon, his choice of residence being Lane county, at that time beginning to assert its independence as an agricultural and stock-raising section. Locating on the farm, a part of which is now owned and occupied by his son Benjamin, he laid the foundation for the present splendidly appointed farm which has become the pride of the owner and the neighborhood. To his original purchase he added from time to time, and at the time of his death, during the '90s, at the age of seventy-five years, was the owner of six hundred acres, the greater part of it valuable land. He raised large numbers of fine stock, as well as fruit, grains, hops and dairy products, amassing considerable wealth as his harvests increased in extent and variety. He was no politician, but was vitally interested in his church, to the maintenance of which he gave liberally, as he did also to all worthy local charities. His life and effort were such that his name became associated with all that was noble and of good import.

From the district schools Benjamin Keeney went to Monmouth College, where his apt mind and powers of concentration accomplished far more in a given time than does the average student. For several terms he applied his knowledge as an educator, remaining in the meantime on the home farm, where he worked in the harvest fields during the summer. After his marriage with Martha Cummings he went to house-keeping on a part of the old claim. To himself and wife were born two children, Hugh C. and Hobart S. His second marriage occurred in 1902, with Charity A. Taliafero, a native of North Carolina. It were difficult to find a more perfectly appointed farm than that purchased in the early days by the elder Keeney, his son having added those aids to modern agriculture which rob the occupation of its hard and discouraging aspect, and in their place substitute the possibility of an easily acquired competence. Poultry-raising is a department of activity to which Mr. Keeney has devoted considerable study, and is one of the best authorities on poultry to be found in the state. With practical results he has raised Barred Plymouth Rocks, this fine breed reaching its highest excellence under his scientific treatment. In this connection he is a member and secretary of the Willamette Poultry Association, with headquarters at Eugene, and member of the State Poultry Association. A staunch adherent of Republicanism, Mr. Keeney has been prominently identified with official undertakings in the county, having served as constable, justice of the peace, deputy sheriff, deputy clerk, school clerk for thirteen years, deputy assessor for eight years and notary public. He is a welcome member at numerous fraternal gatherings, including the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of the Macca-bees, and the Woodmen of the World. Possessing marked financial and executive ability, geniality of manner, and the power to transfer his ideas and enthusiasm to others with whom he is associated, Mr. Keeney is deservedly popular and influential, and a leader in all forward movements of his native county.

HON. LARK BILYEU. Now a leader of the Lane county bar and a general practitioner throughout the courts of the state, the Hon. Lark Bilyeu has attained the success which marks the members of this family since their residence in Oregon. He was born in Miller county, Mo., May 24, 1852, the son of Joseph Bilyeu, a native of Tennessee, and the descendant of an old southern family of French-Huguenot extraction. (For a more complete record of the life and character of the pioneer, refer to the life of the Hon. W. R. Bilyeu, which appears on another page of this work.) When Mr. Bilyeu was a child his parents removed to Putnam county, Mo., and after a short time there they outfitted for the trip across the plains, coming by horse-teams to Oregon in 1862. On their arrival the father first settled for a few years in Polk county, after which he located on a farm near Scio, Linn county, where Lark Bilyeu grew to the age of seventeen years, interspersing his home duties with an attendance of the public schools. When seventeen years old he entered Pacific University, devoting his time entirely to the classical course until his senior year, when he was paid the honor of being elected to the office of superintendent of public schools of Linn county. This position was ably maintained for one term, or a period of two years, during which time he was pursuing the study of law under the instruction of Judge Strahan, of Albany. At the expiration of his service in office, in 1877, he was admitted to the bar, and began practice in partnership with Judge Strahan. July 3, 1882, he established an office in Eugene and continued practice in both offices until Mr. Strahan was elected judge of the supreme court, since which he has maintained an office alone in Eugene.

In addition to the claims made upon Mr. Bilyeu's time in the practice of his profession, he has found time and energy to engage in the cultivation of fruit, having put to prunes and cherries a field of thirty acres, besides which he owns considerable timber land and a farm in the vicinity. Politically he is a Democrat, and with his keen, earnest, thoughtful mind he has proven of much benefit to his party as a representative in the state legislature, to which he was elected in 1884, and re-elected in 1886 and 1896. He was also instrumental in the passage of the bill for an appropriation of $30,000 for the erection of a hall for the University of Oregon, besides exerting much helpful influence toward the betterment of local affairs. He has also served as chairman of the Lane county Democratic central committee and has been a member of the state committee. He is now serving as councilman.

In Albany, Mr. Bilyeu was united in marriage with Margaret R. Irvine, a native of Linn county, and the daughter of Robert A. Irvine, an early settler of that county, where he engaged in farming and later served as sheriff of the county. One son, Coke, has blessed the union. In his fraternal affiliations Mr. Bilyeu is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; Eugene Chapter No. 10, Royal Arch Masons, and Ivanhoe Commandery, K. T., No. 2. He is also identified with the Knights of the Maccabees and the Royal Arcanum. He is a member of the Christian Church.

JABEZ HICKSON AKERS. When Jabez Hickson Akers came to Oregon, in 1874, he bought half a block of ground at Junction City, and has since made his home in the residence erected thereon. Until 1897 he engaged in farming on sixty-seven acres of land northwest of the city, but has since rented his land and is now living a comparatively retired life. Mr. Akers is the representative of an old New England family, established in New Jersey by his paternal great-grandfather, and in Pennsylvania by his grandfather, Uriah. His father, Jesse, was born in Pennsylvania, as was also his mother, Rachel (Hickson) Akers. On both sides of the family are memoirs and records of the very early days of the Keystone state, the Hickson family dating its residence there to the time when the settlers were obliged to build block-houses in which to live for protection. Timothy Hickson was one of the earliest emigrants, and his agricultural footsteps were followed by his descendants, many of whom to-day till the well worn farms of Pennsylvania. Jesse Akers farmed for many years in Pennsylvania, and took all his family excepting his son, J. H., to Iowa in 1865, settling in Buchanan county, but later returning to his native state, where he lived near the old home place until his death at the age of about fifty years. He was prominent in the general affairs of his neighborhood, and among other political offices held that of justice of the peace for several years. There were five children in his family, three of whom were sons, Jesse being a resident of Pennsylvania, and Timothy having died in Altoona in the summer of 1903.

The necessity for hard work in his youth interfered somewhat with the education of Jabez H. Akers, yet in after years he applied himself to making up for early deficiency, and became a well informed man. When about twenty-five years of age he engaged in independent farming in his native state, and, in 1854, located in Buchanan county, near Independence, Iowa, purchasing one hundred and sixty acres of land. In 1874, as heretofore stated, he came to this state, bringing with him his wife, whom he married in Pennsylvania, and who was formerly Beulah Wink, daughter of Jacob Wink, the latter the owner of a two-hundred-acre farm. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Akers, two of whom are living: Lucinda, wife of William Edwards, of Drain, Ore.; and Teresa, wife of George A. Young, of Snohomish, Wash. Mr. Akers is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is a man of sterling characteristics, of sound business judgment, and above all a man of whom his many friends and associates speak in the highest possible terms.

JUDGE CHARLES E. MOOR. Among the earlier members of the bench in Oregon may be mentioned Judge Charles E. Moor, who in more recent years has served in the state legislature, and who almost continuously since 1866 has lived on his present large farm near Corvallis. For the first six years of his life Judge Moor lived in Salem, N. Y., where he was born April 13, 1823, and where his father, John Moor, was also born. The elder Moor married May Davis, a native of Vermont, and settled in the Green Mountain state when his son was six years of age. Here the youth grew to manhood on a farm, and received his education in the public schools and at a neighboring academy.

Judge Moor's career of self-support began with his eighteenth year, when he entered the woolen mills, and at the end of three years found employment in the cotton mills of Lowell, Mass. In 1851 he decided to go west and seek a more rapid means of promotion, so boarded a steamer called the Empire City at New York, fellow-passengers with him being Chief Justice Nelson and Surveyor General Preston, as well as other United States officers of prominence. From the Isthmus of Panama the travelers came to San Francisco on the trial trip of the Columbus, just out of the docks, and upon reaching his destination Mr. Moor went at once to Oregon, locating in Milwaukee. From there he walked all of the distance to Oregon City, and after spending a couple of months there went up the river to Polk county. Here he engaged in school teaching at Bridgeport for several years, and in the meantime purchased a man's right to a claim of one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he lived until 1862. In 1857 he married Marjory J. Johnson, and continued to teach and farm intermittently until elected county judge in 1862. During his four years of service he lived in Dallas most of the time, and after finishing his term moved to the farm where he now lives, and which consists of three hundred acres, five miles north of Corvallis on the Southern Pacific railroad. Here he has engaged in farming and stock-raising, and has made many fine improvements, owning one of the really fine and valuable properties in Benton county.

Always a staunch Republican, Mr. Moor was elected to the legislature in 1891, and during his term of service acceptably represented his district, proving himself an astute and forceful upholder of the best interests of those who had honored him with their trust. Judge Moor has been identified with the Odd Fellows for sixty years. He is a staunch advocate of higher education, and has given his children every advantage in his power. Arthur J., the oldest son, is a rancher near Sprague, eastern Washington; John died while young; Hiram, deceased in 1902, was educated at the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, and subsequently practiced law at Stephenson, Wash.; and Percis J., the wife of George Lindeman, living on the home farm. Judge Moor is one of the substantial and highly honored members of the community of Benton county, and his participation in many of its affairs has been a highly creditable and helpful one.

FRANK KNOWLES. Although not one of the earliest settlers of Lane county, Frank Knowles possesses many pioneer characteristics, not the least of which is perseverance and industry, and can adapt himself to all circumstances. The farm of one hundred and seventy acres discernible through the trees on the opposite side of the river from Mapleton, is a fair sample of agricultural excellence as developed in this part of the county, and the genial and successful owner has every reason to be proud of his achievements. About thirty acres of river bottom land have been cleared and are under cultivation, and besides general farming and stock-raising, Mr. Knowles utilizes his heavily timbered land for logging purposes, during the winter season.

A native of the vicinity of Danborough, N. H., Mr. Knowles was born November 2, 1854, a son of E. C. and Lucinda (Atwood) Knowles, with whom he removed to Hastings, Minn., when he was three years old. Here the father employed his time in farming and the carpenter's trade, two years later removing to Rice county, Minn., where he remained until coming to Oregon in 1885. Frank Knowles was educated principally in Rice county, Minn., and with his father learned carpentering and general farming, developing into a strong and rugged youth. In 1876 he came to California, and from November, 1876, until May, 1878, lived at Chico, and worked at the carpenter's trade. At San Francisco he boarded the steamer Empire City and came to Coos Bay and from there made his way to the Siuslaw river, still later coming to his present farm which he reached June 9, 1878. Purchasing a squatter's right to an unsurveyed tract of one hundred and forty-two acres, he in time added to his land, and the present farm is the result.

Independent in politics, Mr. Knowles has been a member of the school board for three years, and road supervisor for two years. He is a member and past master of the Grange. In January, 1878, he married, in Marysville, Cal., Elizabeth B. Morton, a native of Nova Scotia, born March 1, 1856. Of this union five children are living, of whom Mabel is the wife of Joseph Slemmons and lives on a farm adjoining that of her father, while Rosa and Ruth are living at home.

SWEET BROTHERS. Three young men, of practical, clear-cut methods and forceful characteristics, are left to represent the name of Sweet, which was that of one of the early pioneers of Oregon, and for many years a resident of Lane county. The sons, Wallace G., Cecil Z. and Marion J., now own three hundred and twenty acres of land in the neighborhood of Point Terrace, Lane county, upon which they have put all the improvements and the intelligent cultivation which have placed their property in the front rank of land-owners in this section of the valley. They are now engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and also exert their energies in the fisheries during the fall of the year, and carry on some logging, all eager to finish honorably and profitably the work which their father undertook as a pioneer.

The father, Z. T. Sweet, is well remembered among the old pioneer element of the country, for he took part in many of the movements which voiced the sentiment of the citizens and advanced the cause of civilization in the west, being the first man in Lane county to raise the flag of the country, for which they were willing to undergo all the hardships and privations incident to the settlement of a new state, and he also raised the first flag in the state of Washington. Mr. Sweet was born in Pittsburg, Pa., November 2, 1815, and when a young man he started toward the western states, becoming a house-builder and contractor in Ohio. From that state he emigrated to Knox county, Ill., and there met and married Maria Stephens, who was born near Montreal, Canada, September 12, 1819, a representative of a Scotch-Irish family, a member of which served in the war of 1812 and participated in the battle of Lundy's Lane. The young people remained in Illinois until 1845, when they outfitted for the trip across the plains, having three yoke of oxen and necessary supplies. They joined a train composed of one hundred wagons and set out upon the journey which was destined to be full of danger and hardship, and fraught with the perils incident to such an undertaking. Undertaking to shorten the journey by Meek's cut-off, they passed through many perils and nearly starved to death before reaching their destination. They were six months in reaching Oregon, and only seven of the wagons remained together. The first winter in the west was spent in Oregon City and they continued to make that their home until the fall of 1848, when the father went to California and became interested in the future of that fair state. In the spring of the following year the family removed to the south and the father continued to engage in mining until the spring of 1850, when he returned to Portland, having met with gratifying success in his venture. The same year he located a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres two miles east of Eugene, Lane county, and engaged in the less strenuous life of a farmer until 1857. Disposing of his property he once more removed to California, purchasing a farm in Sonoma county, where he remained for two years, becoming a resident of Eugene at the expiration of that time, where he engaged in mercantile business. In the fall of 1859 he returned to California, and three years later returned to Oregon and went to the Salmon river mines, his family being left in the city of Eugene. After five months he went to Grande Ronde and remained for two years.

Upon again locating in Eugene Mr. Sweet remained until 1866, when he removed to Yaquina Bay, and made that the home of the family for a year, and then became residents of Davisville, Cal. In the fall of 1869 the family returned to Illinois on a visit, where they remained for five years, at the end of which time they again settled in their last home. In the fall of 1875 they returned to Eugene, and remained until in November, 1878, when Mr. Sweet took up one hundred and sixty acres of land located five miles southwest of Mapleton, of this county, upon which his death occurred, in September, 1892, the mother also dying here. Of the four sons born to them, the oldest is Wallace G., who was born in Knox county, Ill., October 14, 1843, and received his education in the public schools of Eugene; he remained with his parents throughout their life and since their death has made his home upon this place. The second son was William, the first white child born in Sacramento, Cal.; the third son is Cecil Z., who was born in Lane county, Ore., two miles east of Eugene, January 20, 1854, his education being also received in the schools of that city; the youngest son was Marion J., who was born at Petaluma, Sonoma county, Cal., in 1860, his education being received through the medium of the schools of Illinois while his parents were visiting old scenes. He affiliates with the Woodmen, holding membership with the lodge at Acme. Politically they are in accord, all staunch adherents of the principles of the Democratic party, Marion J. Sweet having served as road supervisor in the interests of the party.

ELI BANGS was born February 15, 1851, in Hillsdale county, Mich., near the city of Hillsdale, where his father, Smith Bangs had settled as a pioneer farmer. The father subsequently lived in Minnesota for a few years, and then removed to Page county, Iowa, where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death. His wife was born in New York state, and died in the fall of 1852. She bore her husband six children, five of whom are living, and one of them, H. M. Bangs, served in the Civil war as member of an Iowa regiment.

Being left motherless when but eighteen months of age, Eli Bangs was bound out to a Michigan farmer when a small boy and was forced to work hard, with no school advantages. At the age of eleven years he struck out for himself, going to Page county, where he worked on his brother's farm for three years. From 1865 until 1868, he was in the employ of freighters on the plains, running a mule train from Nebraska City to Julesburg, Colo., making several trips each year. The Indians were at that time very troublesome, but he had no serious encounter with them, although he was but two days behind the massacre at O'Fallon's Bluff. The ensuing two years he was employed in breaking prairie, under contract, in Page county, Iowa. Going to Ottawa, Franklin county, Kans., in 1870, Mr. Bangs engaged in teaming in that locality for a few years, and then drove a stage from that city to Osage City, Ia. In connection with his stage route, he subsequently started a livery, and also carried on a large business in buying and shipping horses and mules to the St. Louis and Kansas City markets.

Disposing of his interests in Ottawa in 1884, Mr. Bangs located in East Portland, Ore., where, on May 15, 1884, he opened a livery. On September 1, of that year, he moved his stock to Eugene, Ore., establishing his business in a small barn about three blocks east of his present site.

On November 1, 1884, he purchased the barn at the corner of Willamette and Ninth streets, where he remained until 1886. Buying then one-fourth of the block at the corner of Ninth and Olive streets, he erected his present large barn, 160x160 feet, and has since carried on a very extensive and lucrative business. In the busy season he keeps about one hundred horses, and employs twenty hands to assist him. His large feed and sale stable is without doubt the most commodious livery barn in the Willamette valley, if not in the state of Oregon. He is also interested in a livery business at Cottage Grove, being in partnership with Scott Chrisman as junior member of the firm of Chrisman & Bangs, which in addition to its large livery business owns and operates a stage route from Cottage Grove to the Bohemia mines, a distance of forty-five miles. Mr. Bangs also owns considerable timber land, and is proprietor of Bangs Park, which contains eighty-four acres of land, lying about one-half mile from Eugene, where he has a five-eighths-mile track, used for racing and driving purposes. He is largely engaged in buying and selling horses, dealing in draft and carriage horses, shipping them to the coast markets.

Mrs. Bangs, whose maiden name was Irene Wilson, was born in Ohio. By his first marriage, Mr. Bangs had five children, namely: Edward, who resides in Washington; Alpha, who died in Colorado; Fred, engaged in business with his father; Mrs. Addie Dullard, of Eugene; and Abraham, in business with his father. Mr. Bangs is a member of Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; of Eugene Chapter, R. A. M.; of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is active in local affairs, and has served one term as councilman, representing the second ward, being elected on the Republican ticket, which he staunchly supports by voice and vote. He is one of the leading members of the Eugene Driving Park Association.

H. WESLEY SMITH. Boasting a sire among the pioneers of the very early days of Oregon, and himself a native of this state, H. Wesley Smith has endeavored throughout his life to be a worthy citizen of the state. His father, Henry Smith, was born during a westward journey of his parents, who were traveling from Virginia to Tennessee in 1818, his first resting place in the world being a strip of green grass by the roadside among the Tennessee hills, though his later years were spent in the more prosaic places of life, growing to manhood on his father's farm, where he gained his livelihood from tilling the soil. The principal part of his young manhood was spent on a Virginia farm, and it was there he met and married Miss Susan T. Wright. In 1846 they joined an emigrant train bound for Oregon, and after several months' journey had the great misfortune to lose all their wagons through a fire started by the Indians; but, nothing daunted, they continued their way on foot, the oxen being used to convey the stores saved from the depredations of the savages. With seven months of travel across the wide, desolate plains, Mr. Smith, his wife and three children found themselves in the unsettled land that must claim so many years of labor before the fields would yield their harvests and the cities grow to consume their products. Upon the present site of the little town of Aumsville Mr. Smith took up six hundred and forty acres included in a donation claim, and here he spent the remainder of his life, his death occurring February 10, 1885, an event which left general regret in the community. As a pioneer he had been successful in cutting his route through the long distances that separated him from the goal of his ambitions; as a farmer he had improved the claim which he had made his on his arrival in Oregon and had added to the original number of acres until they amounted to thirteen hundred at the time of his death; as a citizen he thought no time spent in the service of the public lost, giving freely of all the blessings which had come into his life. He was largely instrumental in the laying out of the roads through this section of country, and to his influence and intelligent interest many of the districts owe much in the organization of the public schools. As a Republican he ably represented his party in the state legislature in 1880. In all his actions Mr. Smith was actuated by motives deeper than mere worldly desires, his attitude toward all with whom he came in contact being dictated by principles founded upon the religion which was the moving spring of his life. He was a consistent member of the Christian Church, being active in the erection of the first church of this denomination in the locality.

F. B. BELLMAN is the representative of an eastern family, his father, John, having been born in Pennsylvania, where his grandfather was a farmer, and his mother, Carrie Seeley, was a native of Utica, N. Y. The father settled in Wisconsin in 1835, where he engaged as a farmer and followed his trade of painter, the home of the family remaining for many years in that state, where the death of both father and mother occurred. Of the five children born to them four are living, the third being F. B., who was born in Washington county, Wis., November 8, 1858, and was reared to manhood in his native state. When nine years old he was sent to the public schools of Oshkosh, and when fourteen was apprenticed to learn the trade of a brick-mason, where he remained for four years, then taking up the work in various parts of the state. In the fall of 1880 he came as far west as Montana and remained there for a year, when he returned to Wisconsin and continued in the prosecution of his trade there until 1885, when he came to Eugene and has since made this his home. As a mason he has built the foundations of a large number of buildings in Eugene, among the more important being the court house; First National Bank; Eugene Loan and Savings Bank; the two McClung buildings; the armory; Risdon block; Snyder block; R. M. Day building; the Odd Fellows Hall; addition to Hotel Smeede; Preston building; Looney block; Consor block; Chesny block; Titus block; addition to the Chrisman building; opera house; Beckwith building; Chambers, Wilkins, Coleman, Hodsons, Marx, F. B. Dunn, Saunders, Frank, McClarens and Shelton buildings; mechanical hall of the University of Oregon; the county court house of Polk county; the Aken Bristow building; Kern and Veatch buildings in the grounds; and in Oakland, Ore., put up the E. J. Young building and the Mrs. Thomas Hotel, and also superintended the brick work in the new addition to the Salem Asylum, and others too numerous to mention.

The marriage of Mr. Bellman took place in Grand Rapids in 1883 and united him with Miss Nellie A. Stevens, a native of Taylor, Wis., and the daughter of Alonzo Stevens, an emigrant from the east to that state, where he engaged as a farmer, also serving his country as a soldier in the Third Wisconsin Regiment. His wife was Susan Woodhall, a native of Wisconsin, in which state her death occurred. Of the four children which blessed their union all are now living, Mrs. Bellman being the youngest. She is the mother of three children, namely: Lloyd, Frank and Lena. Mr. Bellman was made a Mason in Eugene Lodge No. 11 and has been raised to the degree of Royal Arch Mason, and also belongs to Ivanhoe Commandery No. 3. He also affiliates with the Woodmen of the World and is a charter member of the Commercial Club here. Politically he casts his ballot with the Republican party.

THOMAS W. HARRIS, M. D., of Eugene, comes of an ancient honored and distinguished southern family, which for many years has numbered among its members men of rare intelligence and personal worth. One of these is Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee, who was a cousin of Dr. Harris' father. Three brothers of this family came originally from England. One of them located in Massachusetts, and two of them sought homes in the southern states. The ancestor of the one with whom we are concerned was his grandfather, Saul Harris, who served in the Revolutionary war with the rank of captain. In colonial days he had married a woman of German extraction. Their son, John Moses Harris, was born near Stanford, Ky., April 1, 1803. With no advantages in the way of education this young man set out with a determination to obtain such knowledge as the study of books would confer upon him. He became a minister in the Christian Church in Indiana, and subsequently removed to Adams county, Ill. Thence in 1865 he crossed the plains with ox and horse-teams, taking his family to Linn county, Ore., where he continued his calling, serving as state evangelist for the Christian Church for many years. The death of this good man occurred near Eugene in 1882, when he was seventy-eight years of age. His wife was formerly Jane Wilson, a native of Kentucky. She was the daughter of Thomas Wilson, also a native of that state, who settled in Indiana as a pioneer farmer and died there. He was a descendant of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Mrs. Harris was the mother of ten children, eight of whom came to Oregon, and six of whom are living.

The third child in this family was Thomas W. Harris, who was born near Russellville, Putnam county, Ind., December 27, 1849. He resided in his native state until 1854, when he removed with his parents to Minnesota, and a year later to Adams county, Ill., where he attended the public schools. When the trip across the plains was made he did a man's work daily, though but sixteen years of age at the time, driving throughout the journey of five months. The party arrived in Portland on September 11, 1865. His father being in complete accord with his desire to obtain an education, young Harris attended the public schools of Linn county, after which he took a two-years course at Albany College. He then spent one year at the Christian College at Monmouth, Ore., following this by teaching in the schools of Linn county for two or three years. In 1869 he took up the study of medicine under the instruction of Dr. Shelton of Salem, and in 1870 entered the Ohio Medical College at Cincinnati, Ohio, from which he was graduated two years later with the degree of doctor of medicine. After three years of practice in Albany, he entered the medical department of the University of California, and in 1875 was graduated therefrom with the degree of doctor of medicine. Returning to Oregon he again engaged in practice in Albany. In 1878 he located in Eugene, entering into partnership with Dr. Shelton, with whom he remained for two and a half years, after which he disposed of his interests there and again became a resident of Albany. April 17, 1884, again found him a resident of Eugene, where he bought the practice of Dr. Shelton, the latter retiring at this time. For nearly a score of years Dr. Harris has practiced continuously in Eugene, and he now enjoys the largest clientele in Lane county.

A man of varied talents, Dr. Harris has taken great interest in various affairs other than those pertaining to his profession. For several years he has raised standard-bred horses, some fine trotters with splendid records having come from his barns. He still owns a few of these horses which he retains for his own use. He is also interested in timber lands, owning about three thousand acres. Though a strong, earnest, conscientious Republican, Dr. Harris has never sought and seldom accepted political honors. For one term he served as mayor, but declined a re-nomination. He has been chairman of the Republican county central committee, and on three different occasions he has served as chairman of the first district congressional Republican committee, still holding that position. He conducted the last campaign of Representative Thomas H. Tongue, one evidence of his work being an increase of four thousand votes in the majority of the Republican candidate. He also conducted the campaign of the Hon. Binger Hermann in 1903. Vitally interested in the commercial and industrial life of the city, he is now acting as president of the Eugene City Water Company, which is being constantly enlarged and improved to meet the increasing demand.

The marriage of Dr. Harris occurred in Polk county, Ore., October 24, 1872, and united him with Laura Catron, a native of Yamhill county, Ore., and they have two children. The eldest of these, Lawrence Thomas Harris, a practicing attorney of Eugene, was speaker of the house of representatives of the Oregon state legislature in 1903. A sketch of his life is given on another page of this work. The younger child is a daughter, Agnes. Dr. Harris is prominent in Masonic circles, and was made a member of this order in 1887. He is identified with Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.

GEORGE A. HOUCK. An extensive land owner and stockman of this section of the Willamette valley is George A. Houck, who makes his home in Eugene, Lane county, his ranch lying in both Lane and Benton counties. He is much interested in the raising of Angora goats, having the largest herd in the state, numbering sixteen hundred, of an exceptionally fine breed, having been brought from stock of Turkish and African blood. He is the principal breeder in Oregon, and has also standard bred horses, Shorthorn cattle and Cotswold sheep, as his interest in stock is exceptionally far-reaching and his desire to elevate the standard an absorbing one.

The Houck family came originally from Germany, the spelling of the name having been changed by the grandfather. The great-grandfather came to America and settled at Philadelphia with his nine sons, of whom one became a settler of Ohio, his son, George W., born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1831, being the father of the Mr. Houck of this review. He learned the trade of a shoemaker and gained a livelihood in Ohio for several years, until he was attracted, in 1852, to the gold fields of California. He made the trip west by way of the Isthmus, and upon his arrival located at Weaverville, where he engaged in mining. In 1856 he again made the journey to California, this time crossing the mountains, and finally he located in Benton county, Ore., where he became the owner of a large stock farm. About 1870 he converted everything into cattle and removed to southern Oregon, after which he sold out and returned to Ohio with his family. Though the west presented a herculean task in the clearance and cultivation of its broad fields, and the dangers and privations which were a part of the life of a pioneer, Mr. Houck was again anxious to become a citizen in the new country, so the journey was again made. He then located in Corvallis and engaged in the livery business, and became a very prominent man in the upbuilding of the city. In the days of the construction of the Oregon Pacific Railroad he did much toward the furtherance of their plans and the securing of land. About this time he also bought large tracts of land in southern Benton and northern Lane counties, principally in the native condition, and this remains in the family estate to the present time. Mr. Houck died in Monroe, Benton county, in 1895, when sixty-six years old. He served one term as county commissioner, during which the courthouse was erected. In religion he was a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Houck married Delila Young, a native of Missouri, and the daughter of Harvey Young, who was born in North Carolina. He lived in a number of the states of the Mississippi valley, after settling in Kentucky, removing to Indiana and later to Missouri, where he was one of the frontiersmen. In 1847 he started across the plains with his family, leaving St. Joe in May of that year, and not arriving on the present site of Portland until December 25, 1847. There was a very large number of ox-teams in the train, but it was badly managed, for so much time was lost that their provisions ran very low before their arrival, and in fact would have run out altogether if one of their number had not gone ahead and organized a rescue party which met them with sufficient supplies to last until they could reach the settlements in Oregon. There were only ten pounds of flour when the rescue party met them. Mr. Young had but one cow and a little wagon upon his arrival, and had met with the misfortune of having one of his children killed on the plains, being run over by a wagon. After locating in various parts of the Willamette valley Mr. Young went to eastern Oregon and thence to Montana, where he engaged as a farmer and stockman. His death occurred in that state near Bozeman, when he was over eighty years old. Mrs. Houck now resides in Gold Hill, Ore., the mother of six children, of whom three are living, namely: Jesse J., George A. and Ambrose, the first and last named being engaged as millers at Gold Hill, in which business George A. is also interested.

George A. Houck was born near Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., January, 1868, and was reared to manhood in that location. His education was received principally through the medium of the public schools of Corvallis, and when the common course was completed he was sent to Notre Dame University, in Indiana, in 1883, taking up the work and graduating in 1888, with the degree of C. E. On his return to his western home he took up the work of the various farms which constituted the property of his father, aiming to bring them to a higher state of cultivation than had hitherto been reached. He became the possessor of two thousand acres of land, then devoted principally to pasturage, and of this he has cleared and broken five hundred acres, the balance being in tame grass. He has three thousand head of stock, over half being Angora goats in which he has always taken a special interest. He has arranged his ranch into four different sections which necessitated the erection of four sets of buildings, which has necessarily enhanced the value of his property. Much of the land is adapted to the cultivation of fruit and he intends cutting it up into smaller ranches at no distant period. The land extends two miles from Monroe, while the home ranch is within a mile of that city. In addition to this land Mr. Houck also owns eleven hundred acres of timber. In 1898 he removed from his ranch and located in Eugene, where he now makes his home.

In Indiana Mr. Houck was married to Mary Sweeney, who was born in Fort Wayne, of that state, and they now have four children, named in order of birth as follows: Frances, Agnes, Edwin and James. Fraternaly Mr. Houck affiliates with the Woodmen of the World. In his political relations he is a Democrat, and in religion belongs to the Roman Catholic Church.

WILLIAM KYLE. Upon his arrival here in 1884, William Kyle started a canning industry known as the Florence Canning Company, which knew an uninterrupted era of prosperity until it was consumed by fire in 1901. Almost contemporary with the starting of the canning factory was the establishment of a general merchandise store, in which he was joined by Mr. Myer in 1887, since continuing the business with marked success. The business responsibility of the partners was increased in 1890 by the purchase of the steamers Lillian and Roberts, with which they started an ocean trade between this place and San Francisco. The boats proved so profitable that they were induced to add to their resources by building the schooner Bella, in 1897, and the boats now ply the waters with their cargoes and passengers. Yet another concern, the success of which is directly traceable to the combined efforts of these sterling business men, is the Florence Lumber Company, inaugurated in 1899, with a capacity of thirty thousand feet, and of which Messrs. Kyle and Myer are sole owners. For the conduct of their business the firm own three thousand acres of timber and river land.

Born in Scotland, May 22, 1858, William Kyle's earliest years were passed among commercial rather than agricultural surroundings, for his father, John Kyle, was a woolen manufacturer, and followed that occupation during his entire active life. The father was born in Scotland in July, 1828, and died in London in 1885, while his wife, Isabelle (Millree) Kyle, born in Scotland in 1829, died in her native land in 1870. William, who was the fourth of the nine children, boarded an English vessel called Glasgow, bound for the south seas and San Francisco. In this trip he touched at New Zealand and Australia, and eventually arrived at San Francisco. Starting out again on another vessel as cabin boy, he arrived at Astoria, Ore., when he was fifteen years old, and for the following three years interested himself in fishing for the people of that town, and he gradually worked his way in land ventures, eventually succeeding to a position with the Seaside Packing Company, with which he was identified four years, a part of the time as general manager. Severing his connection with this enterprise he went to the Umpqua district and conducted the Gardiner Packing Company's plant for two years, then disposing of his interest and coming to Florence in 1884 as heretofore stated.

Mr. Kyle has been a staunch supporter of the Republican party, and in more recent years has been active in local and state politics, attending county and other conventions, and filling many positions of trust and responsibility. Ever since 1887 he has been postmaster of Florence, and he has served as councilman and school director. Fraternally he is one of the most popular men of the town, being a member of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is recorder. In 1882 Mr. Kyle married Christina Bovang, who was born in Sweden, and who is the mother of four children, William, David, Edwin and Isabella.

WILLIAM W. NEELY. The sturdy qualities of the Neely family are a direct inheritance from a Scotch-Irish ancestry. The father, Edward Neely, was born in Washington county, Ky., October 25, 1795, and died July 9, 1881, and the mother, Ruth (Miller) Neely, was born in Simpson county, Ky., in 1808, and died in May, 1890. The two were united in marriage in their native state and afterward went to Illinois, where they located near Quincy, the father engaging in the prosecution of his trade, which was that of cabinetmaker, and also farmed. In 1836 they removed to Cedar county, Mo., and remained there eighteen years, when they outfitted for the journey across the plains, which they crossed in 1854, locating on a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres ten miles west of Eugene, Lane county, along the banks of Coyote creek. This remained the home of the family until the father's death.

Of the eleven children born to his parents, William W. Neely was the eighth in order of birth, his natal day being December 22, 1842, and the first scenes of his childhood being in Cedar county, Mo. He accompanied his parents to Oregon and attended the common schools of Lane county in pursuit of an education. When fifteen years old he began one of his first business experiences, being a trip into northern California, when he drove a herd of cattle. When of sufficient age he took a homestead near Hale and made that his home for about eight years, and at the close of that time he removed to Josephine county and located a pre-emption claim of one hundred and eighty acres, upon which he remained for nine years. Returning then to Lane county he bought property above Mapleton and located along the Siuslaw river, and made that his home for fifteen years, when he disposed of that possession and located upon his present farm, where he has since lived. Besides farming he occupies his time in the fall in fishing, and also engages in logging.

In Lane county, in 1870, Mr. Neely was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Fountain, who was born in Boone county, Mo., February 18, 1853, and of the seven children born to them three are now living, namely: Thomas J., at home; Mary L., the wife of Ludwig Christenson, of Florence, Ore.; and Luella, the wife of F. C. Peil, of Monroe, Benton county. In his fraternal relations Mr. Neely is a Mason, holding membership with the lodge at Florence and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Mapleton, also being identified with the Eastern Star and Rebekahs. In politics he is independent in his views, voting for the best men for official positions, and is serving at the present as road supervisor and school director.

JAMES W. WHITE. Among the enterprising, prosperous and popular business men of Lane county is James W. White, who is carrying on a substantial trade in groceries, grain and feed, at Eugene. Although a mere youth when the Civil war broke out, fired with a patriotic enthusiasm he enlisted, and took an active part in many important engagements, leaving the field at the close of the conflict with an excellent record as a soldier. He was born in Vinton, Iowa, July 24, 1846, a son of Gideon Blackburn White. His paternal grandfather, John White, was born, reared and married in Kentucky, but afterward removed to Edgar county, Ill., where he engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death.

A native of Kentucky, Gideon B. White removed with his parents to Illinois, thence to Iowa, where he settled as a farmer in Marion county. Subsequently settling in Chautauqua county, Kans., he there spent his remaining years. He married Sarah Hollenbeck, who was born in Kentucky, but was reared in Edgar county, Ill., where her father, J. C. Hollenbeck, was for many years a well known miller. Of the fourteen children born of their union, ten grew to years of maturity, and four of the sons served in the Civil war, namely: Lawrence, who served in the First Minnesota Sharpshooters, was killed in the Seven-days' Battles; Jonathan, who was a corporal in the First Iowa Infantry, and is now a resident of Oklahoma; William, now living in Chautauqua county, Kans., served in the Twenty-ninth Infantry; and J. W., the special subject of this sketch.

The youngest child of the household, J. W. White was brought up on the home farm in Iowa, and obtained his education in the district school. In the fall of 1861, when fifteen years of age, he enlisted in the Thirteenth United States Regulars, but the recruiting officer refused to accept him without his parents' consent. He subsequently enlisted in the Seventeenth Iowa Infantry, in the camp at Keokuk, and was mustered in March 13, 1862, at Keokuk. He saw hard service both in camp and field, among the engagements in which he took part being the following: Corinth; Iuka; Holly Springs; Black River Bridge; Vicksburg; Champion Hills; Jackson, Miss.; Missionary Ridge; Dallas; Resaca; Snake Creek; Peach Tree; Buzzard Roost; Kenesaw; and Tilton. While at Huntsville, Ala., in 1864, he veteranized, and on October 13, of that year, he, with his regiment, was captured and confined in Million prison. Having a sum of money secreted about his person, Mr. White succeeded in buying the liberty of himself and the orderly sergeant of his company, giving $50 apiece for their parole, and returned home on a furlough. Being exchanged in the spring of 1865, just before the close of the war, he rejoined the few survivors of his regiment at New Orleans. Subsequently going to Washington, he took part in the grand review, then proceeded to Louisville, Ky., thence by train to Davenport, Iowa, where, in the summer of 1865, he was mustered out of service. Returning at once to the parental homestead, Mr. White remained there a while, and then began farming on his own account. Removing to Fredonia, Wilson county, Kans., in the spring of 1867, he entered one hundred and sixty acres of land, on which he erected a good set of buildings, and commenced the improvement of a farm, for a number of years being one of the leading farmers and stock-raisers of that locality. Disposing of his Kansas property in 1892, Mr. White settled in Eugene, Ore., where he has since been extensively and profitably engaged in the grocery and feed business, being favorably located on Willamette street.

In Wilson county, Kans., Mr. White married Miss Esther Ann Vaughn, a native of Kentucky. She died in April, 1899, in Eugene, leaving eight children, namely: William, of San Francisco, Cal.; Mrs. May Moffitt, of Bremerton, Wash.; Mrs. Minnie Croner, of Eugene; and James, Edna, Vineta, Velma and Lawrence, living at home. Politically Mr. White supports the principles of the Republican party, and for four years represented the third ward in the city council. Fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and of the Artisans. He is likewise a member and quartermaster of the J. W. Geary Post, No. 7, G. A. R. He belongs to the Christian Church, of which he is an active member, and one of the deacons.

MARK HULBURT was born in Whiteside county, Ill., October 18, 1847, his parents being J. F. and Eliza Jane Hulburt, natives respectively of Vermont and Illinois. The father became an early settler in the Prairie state, and though a miller by trade he engaged as a farmer there until 1853, when, with ox and cow-teams and the family carriage, he brought his wife and six children across the plains. The journey occupied six months, and at its close they settled in Linn county, Ore., taking up a donation land claim located six miles southeast of Albany. Until his death, in 1872, he engaged in improving and cultivating the broad acres, which meant a prosperous and pleasant home for himself and family. The death of his wife had occurred ten years earlier. They were the parents of twelve children, all of whom attained maturity. Named in order of birth they are as follows: Harriet Jane, now Mrs. Maple, who makes her home in Pendleton; Lovina, who became Mrs. Brewer, and was accidentally killed by explosion in 1902; Mark, of this review; Harlan, in the real estate business in Albany; Alice M., now Mrs. Turner, of Pendleton; Florence, now Mrs. Dow, of Linn county; Ida, Mrs. Cullon, also of Linn county; Austin and Alden, twins; Wallace, Warren and Frank, the five last named being farmers in Linn county.

When twenty-one years of age Mark Hulburt left home and put in practice the splendid training which he had received from his father, on the home farm, becoming then a stock dealer, buying and shipping stock. In 1870 he went to eastern Oregon and engaged in the stock business in that locality, establishing a ranch on Hay creek, Wasco county, where he raised cattle and horses for ten years, shipping them to all parts of the country. At the end of that time he returned to the Willamette valley, and became the owner of the property upon which he now carries on the same business. In 1893 he removed to the city of Albany, from which location he superintends the work of his ranch.

The marriage of Mr. Hulburt occurred in Linn county, Miss Sarah J. Turner becoming his wife. She was born in Missouri and came to Oregon with her parents. The one son of their union is Riley E., who is one of the successful business men of Albany, being engaged in a hardware establishment in that location. In his political convictions Mr. Hulburt casts his vote with the Republican party.

OLE MYRIND was born in Trondhjem, Norway, January 18, 1857. He was the son of Angrim Myrind, a native of the same location, whose occupation throughout his life was that of a shoemaker. He died in his native land in 1898, at the age of eighty-seven years, his wife, also a native of Norway, having passed away in 1869, when fifty-one years old.

Of the four sons and one daughter which were born to his parents Ole Myrind was the youngest in age, and his education was received in the common schools of his native country. When of a sufficient age he was apprenticed to learn the trade of a shoemaker, serving for three years before taking up the business for himself. Until 1888 he remained in Norway, when he took passage in a ship bound for Boston. Upon his safe arrival he went at once toward the farming lands of the country, locating first in Mitchell county, Kans., where he engaged as a farm hand, in the fall of the same year proceeding to Nebraska. In the latter state he became employed in a rock quarry at Bennett, Lancaster county, where he remained until the following year, when he went to Colfax, Wash., and worked on the construction of railroads. Until February, 1900, he continued in that work, and he then came to Portland, Ore., and engaged in fishing in the Columbia river, located at Astoria for two years. In 1892 he came into the Siuslaw valley and bought the right to eighty acres of land located two miles east of Mapleton, and has since been engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Meeting with success in his work he has added eighty acres to the original purchase and has now one hundred and sixty acres. He has made all improvements upon the farm, erecting dwelling, barns and outbuildings, etc. Another source of income beyond the profits of his farm is his fishing in the Siuslaw river each fall.

In politics Mr. Myrind adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party, and socially belongs to the Grange of Mapleton.

J. B. TILLOTSON. The painstaking and conservative element in Mr. Tillotson's make-up is undoubtedly inherited from his English ancestors, who were represented at a very early day in America. Bartlett Tillotson, the paternal grandfather of J. B., was born in Virginia, and at an early day removed with his family to a plantation near Dalton, Stokes county, N. C., where he farmed and worked at his trade of manufacturing cooper. His son, John, born near Lynchburg, Va., was a planter in Stokes county, and there married a native daughter, Parthena Powell King, daughter of William King, also a planter and a soldier in the war of 1812.

The third oldest, and the only one on the coast of his father's six children, J. B. Tillotson was born near Dalton, Stokes county, N. C., January 13, 1862, and lived at home until he became of age. He attended the public schools as opportunity offered, and as early as twelve years of age began to work at carpentering under his uncle, becoming in time a practical and experienced carpenter. As soon as he left home he purchased a farm near Walnut Cove, Stokes county, and not only engaged in farming, but devoted considerable time to teaming and contracting. In 1890 he came to Oregon and settled first in Corvallis, and the first year worked at bridge carpentering, afterward engaging in general trade work in Albany. This town has been his headquarters ever since, although he has removed his family to Portland, a more central location for his constantly extending business. From the first bridge construction has appealed to his abilities as particularly congenial and satisfying, and considering the number of years which he has devoted to this class of engineering, the amount of work accomplished has been remarkable. Among the many bridges constructed by Mr. Tillotson, mention may be made of those which span the Santiam at Jefferson, and Stayton, of new bridges over the same river at Mill City, McDowell, the Rocky Point bridge across the South Santiam near Foster, the Waterloo bridge, rebuilt the bridge at Roseburg over the South Umpqua, and rebuilt the bridge at Sandy on the Base Line Road, and the draw-bridge at Skamokawa, Wash.

The absorbing nature of the work of Mr. Tillotson has never permitted him to actively participate in political or social undertakings to any extent, although he has been very active in church work, having for many years been a member of the Christian Church, and one of the board of deacons. He is fraternally connected with the Foresters of America, the Knights of the Maccabees and the Order of Pendo. He married in North Carolina, Martha J. Smith, a neighbor and native daughter, and the mother of two children, Martha Fay and Greta Frances.

WILLIAM C. WASHBURNE. In keeping with the reputation for resourcefulness and business sagacity established by his honored pioneer father, William C. Washburne, the present mayor of Junction City, is variously identified with the substantial affairs of Lane county, being cashier of the Farmers & Merchants' Bank at Junction City, secretary and treasurer of the Junction City Hotel Company, and owner and leaser of large tracts of stock-raising and timber land in Lane and the adjoining counties. A native son of Lane county, he was born on the old donation claim near Junction City, September 21, 1867, and is the eighth child of the large family of children born to Charles W. and Catherine A. (Stansbury) Washburne, grandson of Robert and Eva (Roy) Washburne, and great-grandson of Charles Washburne, the latter of whom was killed by the Indians near Clarksburg, Virginia, during the Revolutionary war. The grandfather, Robert, established the family in Ohio about 1822, later living in Illinois and Des Moines county, Iowa, in which latter state himself and wife passed their last days. Their son, Charles, remained at home until their death, afterward engaging in farming on the home farm until the gold excitement swept over the land, in 1849. With a company of seventy he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and after a few months of mining at Coloma, Cal., and Georgetown, he went to San Francisco, embarked on a sailing vessel, and returned to his home in Iowa via the Isthmus of Panama.

After his marriage, in 1851, Mr. Washburne settled down to farming in Henry county, Iowa, and in the meantime experienced the discontent which usually visited the lives of returned travelers from the west, and, in 1853, he sold his farm and outfitted with ox-teams and wagons, preparing to cross the plains to Oregon. He had two wagons, eight yoke of oxen and some loose cattle, and their journey was uneventful, save for the birth of their first child, Ruth Ellen, on the plains near Chimney Rock. One and a half miles southwest of Junction City Mr. Washburne located his claim of three hundred and twenty acres, where he built a log cabin just in time to shelter those dear to him from the driving winter rains. Many of the animals with which he had started out survived the ordeal of the plains, and with these he began a stock-raising business, increasing the same from year to year, until he was one of the most extensive stock-raisers in Lane county. Additional lands were necessarily required for the accommodation of stock and farming, and in time he had six hundred acres in Lane county, and large landed property interests in Washington. A large portion of these lands are still in his possession. In 1891 he purchased the mill property at Springfield, placed in it a complete roller process with a capacity of one hundred and fifty barrels per day, and eventually handed over the management of the mill to his sons, Byron and William. He made an addition to Junction City in 1891 and he was one of the organizers of the Junction City Hotel Company, of which he was president for many years. As a Republican he has actively advanced the interests of his party in this county, and represented it in the state legislature in 1872. An energetic and masterful personality, he has greatly influenced all departments of activity in this section, and stands today as a representative of all that is admirable and progressive in northwestern citizenship.

The pronounced good fortune of his father permitted of superior educational opportunities for his children, and William C., like the rest, availed himself to the utmost of his chances. From the public schools he went to the State University in 1890, taking a two-years course in English, and afterward graduating from the Portland Business College, having taken the banking and general business course. Thereafter he entered his father's Springfield mill as manager and bookkeeper, and in 1893 became identified with the local bank, known as the Farmers and Merchants' Bank, incorporated under the state laws with a capital stock of $35,000. This is a solid and paying institution, the directors being such well known men as J. A. Bushnell, C. W. Washburne and J. P. Millorn, with Mr. William Washburne as cashier, and G. F. Shipworth as assistant cashier. Mr. Washburne is identified with extensive stock interests in the county, and for the purpose leases at least eight hundred acres of land, upon which he has about six hundred sheep and two hundred head of cattle. He also owns a one hundred and sixty acre tract of timber land, and two hundred acres of farming and grazing land, besides considerable property in Junction City. As a Republican, he has taken an active interest in local affairs, and besides his present term as mayor, has served six years in the city council, filling also other positions of trust and responsibility. He is fraternally one of the best known men of the younger generation, being identified with the Masonic order (demitted), Eugene Chapter No. 10, Royal Arch Masons; the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, No. 357, of Eugene, and the Woodmen of the World; Oasis Lodge No. 41, I. O. O. F., of Junction City, of which he is financial secretary. Mr. Washburne is popular and influential in his native county and state, and to an exceptional degree enjoys the good will and confidence of the many people with whom he is thrown in contact. Mr. Washburne acts as his father's business manager, which brings him in close relation with the business men of Washington and Oregon.

CAPT. CHARLES LA FOLLETT was born September 21, 1829, on a farm in Putnam county, Ind. At the age of sixteen he left home and attended a writing school, thereafter teaching penmanship during one winter. Another winter was devoted to the study of phrenology, and after that for three years he traveled around, lecturing on phrenology during the summer and studying during the winter time. In a company of one hundred and forty-four well armed men Mr. La Follett started across the plains from Missouri in 1849, his equipment consisting of five yoke of oxen and a two-horse wagon. He was made wagon-master and sergeant of the train, and had his hands full trying to conceal his uncle, Walter Henton, who was one of the party, and whom the Mormons sought to capture in retaliation for his having been one of the sixteen men to kill Joe Smith. Provisions ran short during the journey, and many adventures enlivened what would otherwise have been a very weary and monotonous march. In Oregon Mr. La Follett found the Indians so troublesome that he went to Santa Clara county, Cal., and there taught an early subscription school, and in 1852 he went with a Mr. Snelling into the Redwood timber district and had charge of from fifty to seventy-five men engaged in getting out timber. This proved a profitable venture, and at the end of eighteen months his available assets consisted of $20,000, $10,000 of which was lost in an onion-raising undertaking and the balance being lost on a claim in Redwood City. He reached Portland in 1853. At the home of Dr. McBride, near North Yamhill, he got up a subscription school, and during the next season attended the Pacific University. For several years following he traveled through California and Oregon lecturing on phrenology in the summer and teaching in the winter, and to intensify the interests of his lectures invested in a picture machine, then a great novelty in the west.

In 1856 Mr. La Follett married Mary A. Snodgrass and the following year began the study of law, being admitted to the bar in 1858. His initial practice was conducted in Dallas, where he became prominent in politics, and in 1863 was elected to the legislature. During the session he gave substantial evidence of his belief in Prohibition by drawing up and securing the passage of a law prohibiting minors visiting saloons, a matter which lay very near to the heart of Mr. La Follett. He served in the legislature three terms, and during the last term Governor Gibbs appointed him to a lieutenantancy in the army, that he might raise a company in Linn and Benton counties for the suppression of the Indians. To further this good work a band was hired at an outlay of $50 a day, innumerable meetings held at which collections were taken up, and at the end of the campaign one hundred and three men had enlisted. Lieutenant La Follett was mustered in as captain of Company A, First Oregon Infantry, at Salem, and went with his company to Vancouver, where it was stationed until the following summer. He then went to Fort Yamhill and took possession of the house of Philip Sheridan, just as the distinguished soldier took his departure. The regiment was ordered to leave in September, and the captain, with Lieutenant Shipley and one hundred and ten men, acted as guard to control the Indians. During the Snake River war this same band crossed the mountains to the Crooked River country, and there carried their provisions in wagons over the lava beds, and soon afterward built a fort to keep the Indians out of the region. What was known as Camp Pope, on Squaw creek, was the outgrowth of this expedition, and here they remained during the winter, and in the spring Captain La Follett and Superintendent Huntington made a treaty with the Warm Spring Indians, which resulted in the soldiers leaving camp in July, and returning to Fort Yamhill. The soldiers all entertained the sincerest admiration for the bravery and able leadership of their captain, and before the soldiers were discharged the mothers of the boys sent to San Francisco and got a flag to present to him, which emblem of appreciation was unhappily lost on the ship Jonathan, which sank on the way to Portland. Another flag was later secured, and this remains one of the treasured possessions of the fearless and high-minded leader.

Soon after the war Captain La Follett was a candidate for the senate but was defeated, and in 1870 he was appointed Indian agent of the Grande Ronde Agency, maintaining the position for four years. On account of his wife's ill health he moved onto a farm in the mountains near Grande Ronde and for fourteen years engaged successfully in general farming and stock-raising. He then located in Sheridan and engaged in the practice of law, and in 1888 took up his residence in Portland, remaining in the northern city until 1899. In the meantime he had been elected to the legislature from Yamhill county. Since 1899 he has lived retired in Sheridan. Five children have been born into the La Follett family, of whom W. G. A., the oldest son, lives in Sheridan; C. B. is a merchant of this town; Edith is the wife of H. C. Foster, treasurer of Yamhill county; Ollie is the wife of J. Soppenfield, of the vicinity of Salem; and Hettie lives in Seattle, Wash. Captain La Follett is identified with the Donelson Post, G. A. R., of Sheridan, and is active in the undertakings of the post, at one time having served as commander.

brightest and most enterprising men to aid in the advancement of civilization of the Pacific slope. Among these men none hold, or more merit a higher position of both local and state prominence, than Archie J. Johnson, the son and grandson of pioneers, and the representative of a New York family which has made its way with true pioneer instinct to a locality where men of ability and earnestness of purpose are required to cement the union of a then remote territory, and develop the possibilities which nature has so plentifully bestowed upon it. That these three, father, son and native son, have faithfully fulfilled their duties as citizens, a brief biographical résumé will quickly show, and it will be interesting reading to those who have watched the beginning, growth and triumphal lead in the van of progress of this western commonwealth.

The grandfather, Hiram Alvah Johnson, was born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., on February 18, 1819, and after his emigration to the middle west, he remained in Illinois until 1848, when he crossed the plains with ox-teams, and at once took up a donation claim near Jefferson, Marion county, Ore. For twenty-eight years he made his home upon this farm of six hundred and forty acres, and in the town of Jefferson, where he was engaged in a general merchandise business, and at the close of that period he removed to Salem, and made his home there until his death, in February, 1896, at the age of seventy-seven years. He was a man of strong independent ideas, and as such he influenced more or less the affairs of the community in which he resided. He was a Republican in politics, and for twelve years he served as justice of the peace in Salem. He was a member of the Christian Church, and into this work he carried the same traits dominant in his political and social life. His son, John Charles, the father of Archie J. Johnson, was a native of Illinois, being born on May 29, 1842, and he came with his father into the west, living upon the latter's farm until 1869, when he bought property located three miles north of Scio, Linn county, consisting of a thousand acres. There he successfully engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1874, when he decided to venture into the commercial life of the city of Scio, engaging in a general mercantile business with one J. M. Brown, with whom he remained for one year. The firm was afterward known as Johnson Brothers for four years, after which John C. Johnson sold out and lived retired for a couple of years, when he again became connected with the general merchandise business of the same city, his partner being Riley Shelton. This connection occupied another four years, and for a like period after that he lived retired, in 1889 engaging for one year with his son, Archie J., of this review, and then selling

ARCHIE J. JOHNSON. To a greater or less degree a man is measured by the success which he achieves in his undertakings, the circle of his influence widening in proportion to the height which he attains among his associates, his words carrying weight as his actions have previously proven his ability to command respect and confidence. It is no discredit to the other sections of the Union that the great northwest should, so early in its infancy, have reason to name with pride a large percentage of its citizens as those who have risen to more than local prominence, whose hands have upheld the western states through the trying period of growth and consequent power, for they are natives or sons of natives of the middle and eastern states which have perforce passed on some of their his interest in the business to Ross E. Hibler. He then removed to Salem, where he now makes his home, though each summer finds him with his family upon his two-hundred-and-forty-acre farm near Stayton, Marion county.

In 1864 John Charles Johnson married Violetta Gunsauls, a native of Indiana, who was born in 1846, the daughter of Manuel Gunsauls, who was a native of Pennsylvania, moving first to Ohio and later, at the age of fifteen, to Illinois, and came across the plains to Oregon in 1853, locating one and a half miles east of Jefferson, Marion county, where he died in 1878, at the age of sixty-four. Of the four sons and three daughters which blessed the union of J. C. Johnson and Violetta Gunsauls five children are now living, the second being Archie J. Johnson, who was born three miles northwest of Jefferson, September 18, 1867. He received a preliminary education in the common schools, and upon the completion of the course he entered, in the spring of 1885, the Portland Business College and made a phenomenal record in his studies, graduating in December of the same year, in less time than any preceding scholar. He had also developed early a decided talent for business, at the age of fourteen years acting as clerk in a general merchandise establishment at Scio, for the ensuing year and a half continuing to hold the position, in connection with which he attended school as occasion offered. At sixteen years of age he took the position of bookkeeper and head salesman for Johnson & Shelton, and maintained the same creditably until 1887. He then became timekeeper for the Oregon Pacific Railway, but gave this up and re-entered for a short time the mercantile life in Scio, from which he removed to Seattle, Wash., in the spring of 1888, and engaged in the real estate business. The next year found him again a resident of Scio, and in connection with his father, herein previously mentioned, he engaged in the general merchandise business, and later continued with Mr. Hibler, who is now the owner of the store. In 1891 he sold out his interests in the business, and in January, 1892, he removed to Salem, where he lived until November of the same year, but seemingly not satisfied to live any place but in the city where he had spent his boyhood days and had met with success in all his business dealings, he returned to Scio, and with T. J. Munkers purchased the controlling interest in the bank of Scio, and at once assumed the active management of it. In 1894 he bought Mr. Munkers' interest, and he then became president and conducted the business until the fall of 1900, his brother C. V. having assumed the cashiership with him in 1896. In 1900 he sold out and engaged in stock-raising, having bought four thousand one hundred and sixty acres of land in Benton and Polk counties, and began the stock business on extensive plans, in connection with his brother (C. V. Johnson) and brother-in-law (J. C. Simpson), making a specialty of registered stock. They now have a fine herd of Shorthorn and a few choice Hereford cattle, along with their other grade cattle, sheep and goats. In partnership with Ross E. Hibler he is extensively engaged in buying mohair and wool throughout the Willamette valley, a far-reaching business in this state. Mr. Johnson has certainly made a success of his business interests in the city of Scio and elsewhere, and his connection with the various commercial and industrial enterprises of this city, his chief prominence in the latter being in the flouring mill business, having purchased a one-half interest in 1895 in the fine flouring mill located there, and disposed of the same in 1900, working up a large export business in flour during this period, and has been of much benefit to the business affairs there, and he is rightly named as one of the principals in the prominent work of the community.

Mr. Johnson was married in January, 1888, to Miss Linnie Young, a native of Minnesota, and they are now the parents of the following children: Cleo L.; Zeta A.; Elmo E.; Darrel D. an Orlo O., all of whom are at home. Fraternally Mr. Johnson is a member of the Encampment, subordinate and Rebekah lodges of the I. O. O. F., and the Modern Woodmen of America. He belongs to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Even among the busy hours of his business life Mr. Johnson has found time to take an active interest in all public and political movements, as an ardent Republican, serving his party in various positions of trust and honor. In June, 1894, he was elected to the state senate to represent Linn county for four years, carrying by a large majority a previously Democratic county. In this position he became a prominent factor in the affairs of the state, serving on various important committees. He was the promoter of the bill at the 1897 session to tax foreign companies when carrying on business in the state, but which could not be considered on account of the failure in the organization of the house during the entire session. He has also been a member of the state central committee, for years a member of the county central committee of his party and has served several terms as councilman of the city of Scio and as its mayor, was a school director for two terms, was chairman of the board when the Scio school building was erected, he being one of the promoters of the project. The chief business interest of Mr. Johnson at the present time is the position to which he was appointed in March 1899, that of national bank examiner, for the northwest district, including the states of Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Idaho, and up to April 1, 1902, including Wyoming. This position he has since held with the same success which has characterized all his efforts, and which win for him the respect of all who appreciate the business sagacity and untiring energy of their fellow townsman. He is a very busy man, for all his time not given to his official duties is taken up with his large personal interests. Mr. Johnson is esteemed among his associates for an exceptionally pleasing personality and intrinsic worth of character, which has made him a valuable citizen to all communities in which he has in the past resided, and especially to the town wherein most of his life has been passed, that of Scio, Linn county. In July, 1903, Mr. Johnson removed to Corvallis, where he has taken up his permanent residence, being near his farm and live-stock interests and is at home in this beautiful college city on the banks of the Willamette river.

CAPT. THOMAS A. STEEAR. A sea-faring life is one that has many fascinations even amid its dangers, and generally, when one finds occupation in such work the attractions far outweigh the advantages of a home and the peaceful pursuits on land, and it is impossible to be satisfied with any other employment. The exception to the general rule is to be found in the person of Capt. Thomas A. Steear, who has settled down into a peaceful, contented land life after fourteen years' experience on the sea, satisfied to engage in agricultural pursuits for the remainder of his years, his home now located on a farm of ninety-five acres three miles southwest of Mapleton, Lane county.

Captain Steear was born in Orange county, N. Y., May 4, 1837, next to the youngest in age of the seven children born to his parents, both of whom were natives of New Hampshire, and the death of both occurring in New York state. The father, John Steear, being a farmer, this son interspersed his home duties with an attendance of the common schools of his native state until he had reached the age of thirteen years, when he left home and became a messenger boy aboard a merchantman, which sailed from the city of New York. After three years in this service he went into the United States navy as a sailor on a gunner, and served in the Crimean war under the French government on a United States vessel chartered by the French. While in the United States navy he was on the Naugatuck and witnessed the sinking of the Cumberland and Congress by the Merrimack at Hampton Roads, which he considers the great event of his life. He also participated as a soldier in the battle of Sand Creek with the Comanche and Arapahoe Indians, at which battle over eight hundred Indians were killed. The captain has been steamboating on the Sinslaw river for about fifteen years, periodically, in connection with his farm and stock-raising. Various incidents came into the life of the captain as he traveled into different locations of the world in the capacity of a sailor, but after fourteen years in the service he left the sea and first located in Colorado, in the vicinity of Denver, engaging in the cattle business. This employment was continued successfully for many years, and, in 1887, he came to the Siuslaw valley and bought the right to his farm of one hundred and thirty-five acres of land, afterward becoming the owner of the ninety-five acres which is now his home.

The marriage of Captain Steear occurred in Colorado, in 1878, and united him with Miss Mary A. Campbell, a native of Illinois, and of the children born to them John is located on the adjoining farm; Susan and Amadella are at home. As a Democrat in his political affiliations Captain Steear is actively interested in advancing the principles of his party, and has served as school director since he first located in the valley. Fraternally he is a Mason and is past warden of the lodge in which he holds membership.

REV. PETER BEUTGEN, B. S. T. The position as pastor of the Purification Church, Engene, belongs to the Rev. Peter Beutgen, B. S. T., to which he was appointed in 1901, acceptably filling the post to the present time. He is one of the cultured and well read men of the Catholic faith in this part of the United States and does much to advance the cause of the religion to which he has devoted the energies and talents of his life.

The Rev. Peter Beutgen was born at Tecumseh, Mich., in the neighborhood of Detroit, October 7, 1864. His father, Nicholas Beutgen, was born on the Rhine, Germany, and he came to Kent county, Canada, where he was employed as a baker. After locating near Detroit, Mich., he removed to that city and continued to follow his trade until 1875. At that date he located in Portland, Ore., and after a number of years spent in the prosecution of his trade he became an assistant to the city engineer and superintendent of streets, with whom he remained ten years, his death occurring there in 1896. He married Mary McNally, a native of Ireland, and she died in Portland in 1902. To Mr. and Mrs. Beutgen were born four sons and four daughters, the sons besides our subject being as follows: John, a merchant of Los Angeles, Cal.; Nicholas, a merchant of Portland; and Francis, a contractor of New York City.

became a resident of Portland, removing at that time with his parents to that city. When fourteen years old he entered St. Hyacinth's College in the city of that name in Canada, where he completed the classics in seven years. After a course of three years in another university he spent the ensuing three years at Mount Angel College, engaged in teaching and a farther continuance of his studies. He also engaged in mission work in this state for some time. At Mount Angel he was ordained a priest in 1890, by Bishop Gross, who sent him to Coos Bay, where he organized the church, and later built St. Monica's at Marshfield and St. Mary's, Star of the Sea, at Cape Blanco, this being now the most westerly church in the United States, and both now having large congregations. The Rev. Peter Beutgen entered mission work extensively, remaining so employed for three or four years, when he became a student at the Catholic University at Washington, from which he was graduated in 1898, with the degree of B. S. T. He then returned to Oregon and was first appointed pastor of Baker City, where he remained a year, during which time he traveled on horseback to the missions. During his pastorate of two years at Roseburg he kept up his interest in the missions, and at the close of this period he received his present appointment, a congregation which was established about twelve years ago and now numbers three hundred. He belongs to the Catholic Knights of America, in which he officiates as chaplain.

G. W. GRIFFIN. A young man of decided push and energy, G. W. Griffin has already achieved a substantial position in the business circles of Eugene as manager of the Griffin Hardware Company, one of the leading firms of its kind in Lane county, and has gained in a marked degree the esteem and confidence of the community. A son of the late G. P. Griffin, he was born December 29, 1870, in Earlville, N. Y.

A native of New York state, G. P. Griffin was first engaged in business for himself as a merchant in the town of Earlville, and was afterward identified with the mercantile interests of Rockford, Ill., and of Manchester, Iowa, while in the latter place being also engaged in the stock-raising business in Wyoming and Montana. Going to Nevada in 1860, he worked as a millwright, building five large quartz-mills. Returning to Earlville, N. Y., in 1867 he again engaged in business. Coming to Oregon in 1888, he located at Eugene as a hardware merchant, and five years later, in 1893, organized the Griffin Hardware Company, becoming its president, a position that he retained until his death, in 1897. He was a man of good business ability, quick to seize advantageous opportunities, and was successful in his undertakings. Politically he was an earnest supporter of the principles of the Republican party. In 1859 he married Mary A. Spraker, who was born in New York state, and now resides in Eugene. Since the death of her husband she has succeeded him as president of the Griffin Hardware Company. Of the six children born of their union, the following are living: Drew, a member of the Griffin Hardware Company; G. W., the special subject of this sketch; and Lizzie, wife of R. S. Bryson, of Pendleton, Ore. Charles W., formerly a member of the firm, was drowned in the Willamette river the night of July 20, 1903.

Although born in New York state, G. W. Griffin was reared in Illinois and Iowa, receiving a practical education in the public schools of those states. After coming with his parents to Eugene, he studied for a year at the University of Oregon, and was subsequently a clerk in his father's hardware store. On the incorporation of the Griffin Hardware Company, in January, 1893, he was made secretary of the company, and since the death of his father has served as manager of the entire business. This firm has a two-story building, 29x190 feet, well stocked with hardware of every description, logger's and miner's supplies, stoves, tinware and agricultural implements and tools of all kinds, carrying a complete assortment of the various goods found in a first class store of its kind. The company also owns a large implement warehouse, and two large storage buildings.

Taking an active interest in promoting the welfare of Eugene, Mr. Griffin has not shirked the duties of public office, but served as city treasurer in 1897, and from 1900 until 1902 as county coroner, and is now a member of the city council, representing the third ward. He is a staunch Republican in his political affiliations. He is prominently identified by membership with several of the leading organizations of the county, belonging to Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M.; to Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; and to the Knights of Pythias lodge, which he has served three times as chancellor commander, for the past six years being a member of the grand lodge. He also belongs to the Uniformed Rank K. of P.; the Royal Arcanum; and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is a charter member of the Commercial Club of Eugene and a member of its board of trustees.

ALEXANDER SMITH. The son of one of the largest land owners in the Willamette valley, Alexander Smith was always interested in the accumulation of landed property and the cultivation of the soil, an occupation which he followed up to the time of his death, being also largely and profitably interested in dealing in stock. His ancestry is traced back to the state of Virginia, where his grandfather, George, settled upon coming to this country from his birthplace in Ireland. Some time later he removed to Indiana, where he became a large land owner near South Bend. Greenberry Smith, the father of Alexander, was born in Virginia and accompanied his parents to Indiana, and on attaining manhood left home, going to Clay county, Mo., where he engaged in farming, giving this up in 1845 to undertake the journey across the plains. His brother, Alexander, had joined him, and together the two started with a herd of cattle, a part of which they took through safely to Oregon whither they were journeying, the amount of time occupied by the trip being six months. In Benton county Mr. Smith took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, located upon Soap creek twelve miles north of what is now the town of Corvallis though at that time there was but one house here. He early became a model farmer of this section, putting improvements upon his claim in the way of buildings and added cultivation. He also became largely interested in the stock business, principally in eastern Oregon, where he went in the year 1862, locating in what is now Gilliam county, though it then formed a part of Wasco county. For fifteen years he remained in this business and continued to add to his land until he owned about eight thousand acres in Polk and Benton counties though the amount aggregated over ten thousand at the time of his death. At one time he added to his profits by conducting a general store at his ranch, though he continued this for but a few years. The last of his days were spent in retirement in Corvallis where his death occurred in 1886, at the age of sixty-seven years. Fraternally he was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Only once in his life had Mr. Smith been enticed away from his chosen work, and that was for a journey in 1849 to the mines of California, where he remained but eighteen months. Mr. Smith had been married twice, his first union being with Miss Eliza Hughart, a native of Missouri, and daughter of Joseph Hughart who came to Oregon in 1845 locating in Benton county. She was the mother of one child, Alexander Smith of this review, her death occurring when he was but three months old. Mr. Smith later married for a second wife, Elizabeth Baker, who was born in the eastern part of Tennessee, the daughter of John Baker, a pioneer of 1846. She died in 1902 in Corvallis, to which city her husband had removed the family. She left one child, John Smith, who is now one of the wealthy men of Benton county and makes his home in Corvallis.

Alexander Smith was born on the donation claim taken up by his father, December 10, 1848, and was reared to manhood on this farm. He was given the best of advantages in the educational line, after his early education was completed in the public schools being sent to Vancouver College. Following the example of his father he spent ten years engaged in the stock business in the original location selected by his father, after that bending his best efforts to the successful cultivation of his large farm which was located two and a half miles south of Corvallis. His death occurred in 1890, a loss to the community of a large-hearted, whole-souled man, who had ever been ready to assist all who called upon him in the hour of need. Politically Mr. Smith voted with the Democratic party.

By his marriage June 2, 1871, with Miss Anna Callaway, Alexander Smith allied himself with not only a very prominent family of Oregon but one which traces its ancestry on the maternal side to the nobility of England. Her father, Hon. William Richard Callaway, was born in Tennessee, the son of William, one of the pioneers of Missouri, and a large land owner in Scotland county of that state. Tiring of farming, the son, William R., went to Fillmore, Andrew county, where he engaged for some time in a mercantile business, later, however, returning to the old farm in Scotland county. In 1865 he decided to make a change of home, not from necessity, but from the desire to give his strength and energy to the upbuilding of a commonwealth beyond the Rockies. The trip was made across the plains, in company with a large party all well armed and well equipped, the wagons drawn by horses. Mr. Callaway had four wagons, two teams allowed for each, besides quite a number of loose horses. After a six-months trip the party arrived at their destination, Mr. Callaway locating first in Linn county, but soon removed to Benton county, purchasing property advantageously located on Soap creek, where he built a house and other improvements and engaged extensively in general farming. Adding to his property from time to time he finally owned over one thousand acres, the station Callaway, on the Southern Pacific railroad, being upon this land. Mr. Callaway's last year was spent in Corvallis whither he had removed, intending to pass the remaining years of his life in retirement. His death occurred in 1895, at the age of seventy-two years. He had always been a very prominent man in this section of the country through the influence of the many good qualities which distinguished him, and as the choice of the people he was an able representative in the state legislature for one term. In his fraternal associations he affliated with the Masons. Mr. Callaway married Miss Abigail Cecil, who was born in Tennessee, a descendant of Lord Cecil of England, her immediate ancestor being Samuel Cecil, whose birth occurred in Tennessee, his home on attaining manhood being in Kentucky and Missouri until 1864, when he came to California. After a year spent in that location he came to Oregon, remaining, however, but a short time before returning to California and engaging in farming until his death in Yolo county. Mrs. Callaway died before the removal to Corvallis. On the death of her husband, Mrs. Smith removed to Corvallis, where she now makes her home, a welcome addition to the cultured society of this city. She owns three hundred acres of the old homestead upon which she was reared, in addition to much other property left in her charge at the death of her husband. She is the mother of two children, of whom Eliza is now the wife of J. W. Hayes, a farmer of Benton county, living in Corvallis, and Clarence, who makes his home with his mother.

JAMES F. ROBINSON. As the manager of the Lane County Electric Company, James F. Robinson is establishing for himself an enviable reputation in regard to his executive ability and mechanical knowledge, after a very successful career in various other lines in the city. Previous to the organization of this company, in which Mr. Robinson acted as one of the principals, he served in the same capacity in the one established in 1890 and which was known as the Eugene Electric Company. He then superintended the construction of the plant and afterwards rebuilt it, and the company is now putting up a fine plant in Springfield, which has a capacity of six hundred horse power, the engines to supply both Springfield and Eugene with power and light. Since the organization Mr. Robinson has served as a director.

Mr. Robinson was born in Henry county, Iowa, near Mt. Pleasant, December 2, 1846, the youngest of the three children born into the family of his parents and the only one who attained maturity. His father was James Robinson, a native of Ross county, Ohio, the grandfather being Josiah Robinson. The latter was born in Virginia and became a settler in Ross county on the north fork of the Scioto river, where he engaged as a farmer until his death. Religiously he was a member of the Presbyterian Church. The father also became a farmer in Ohio and later removed to Iowa, where his death occurred in October, 1846. His wife was formerly Catherine Macauley, born in New York state, the daughter of James Macauley, who came from Inverness, Scotland, and became a resident of New York and later settled in Ohio and from there removed to Iowa. In 1849 he crossed the plains to California, enduring safely all the hardships and dangers of the trip only to experience death in a mine in an Illinois town. Mrs. Robinson married a second time, a man named Bradford, and later she died in Macon county, Mo.

On the farm in Iowa Mr. Robinson attained the age of eleven years, when his mother removed to Macon county, Mo., where he received a preliminary education in the public schools, after which he returned to Ohio, and attended Bryan Academy in Chillicothe. Later he was graduated from South Salem Academy, after which he returned to his home in Missouri, and remained until after the close of the war, when he again went to Chillicothe and worked on his grandfather's farm for two years. On locating once more in Macon county he engaged as clerk in a hardware store. In 1872 he crossed the continent and coming by way of San Francisco located in Eugene, Lane county, Ore., which has since been his home. On his arrival here Mr. Robinson first entered the hardware business, establishing the first hardware store south of Albany and successfully conducted it until 1888, under the firm name of Robinson & Church. At that date they sold out and dissolved partnership. Mr. Robinson then became interested in the organization of the water works here, superintending the construction, and when finished he became superintendent of the company, in which he was a director. This employment continued for two years, when he resigned to accept his present position in which he has won much commendation for his excellent management.

The first marriage of Mr. Robinson occurred in Macon county, Mo., Miss Jennie Hughes, of Wisconsin, becoming his wife. She died in San Francisco, leaving one daughter, Stella, who is a graduate of University of Oregon. His second marriage united him with Nannie Hughes, also of Wisconsin, the ceremony being performed in Eugene, and they are the parents of two children, Ralph D. and Emma Helene. In his fraternal relations Mr. Robinson is one of the prominent men of the state, having filled the most important offices of Masonry. He was made a member of this order in Macon Lodge No. 106, and now belongs to Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., in which he is past master. He entered the Grand Lodge as an officer and worked up to the grand master of Grand Lodge of Oregon, in which he served one term, and in 1898 he was elected grand secretary of grand lodge and has been re-elected each year. He was made a Royal Arch Mason in Macon county and is now a member of Eugene Chapter, No. 10, R. A. M. He served as high priest, and was grand high priest of the Grand Chapter of Oregon two terms in succession, and since 1896 he has acted as grand secretary of the Grand Chapter of Oregon. He was raised to Knights Templar degree in Emanuel Commandery No. 7, of Macon, Mo., and is now a member of Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, in which he is past eminent commander. Mr. Robinson organized the first commandery in Oregon, that being Oregon Commandery No. 1 in Portland, and there acted as eminent commander for two terms, and also organized the Grand Commandery of Oregon, acting as the first grand commander. He is at the present time grand recorder of the Grand Commandery of Oregon, having held the post since 1895, and is a member of Oregon Consistory No. 1, Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., and is grand recorder of the order of High Priesthood. In his political principles Mr. Robinson is a staunch Republican and has served his party in various ways. His wife is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

HON. JOSEPH DE WITT MATLOCK. A pioneer whose life has been marked by the course of events in the great Northwest, whose shrewd business instinct and quick decision have enabled him to see and profit by the opportunities which have been the foundation of statehood, is the Hon. J. D. Matlock, now a resident of Eugene, Lane county, Ore., where he lives retired from the duties which have so long engrossed his attention. He has been greatly interested in the growth of this city, both commercially and politically, but his energies have not been expended here alone, as for some time he carried on a profitable mercantile enterprise in Alaskan fields, having but recently returned from the north. A brief reading of his life will be interesting for those who have experienced pioneer life in this section of the country, and also for those who have watched the growth of this western commonwealth.

Joseph De Witt Matlock was born in Benton county, Tenn., March 8, 1839, the son of Edward Lane Matlock, a farmer in that locality, who emigrated from his native state of Georgia. In the fall of 1839 the father removed to Dade county, Mo., where he served one term as county judge, and continued in his occupation of farming, until his emigration to Oregon in 1853, where he settled near Goshen, Lane county, on a donation claim of two hundred and ninety-six acres, to the improvement and cultivation of which he devoted the years until 1862. In the last-named year he went to the Florence mines, and the following year to the Boise Basin mines, in the latter becoming ill of lung fever and dying July 1, 1863, at the age of forty-six years, having been born April 18, 1817. He had faithfully served as wagonmaster in the Rogue River Indian war, in 1855-56. His wife was formerly Susan C. Fry, a native of North Carolina, born December 3, 1815, and died at Heppner, Ore., May 11, 1896. She was the mother of seven sons and one daughter, named in order of birth, as follows: Caswell John, a rancher in Morrow county, Ore., who served in the Rogue River Indian war; J. D., of this review; James W., ex-sheriff of Morrow county, now residing in Heppner; Edward Lane, who died in Heppner while sheriff of the county; Wm. F., a capitalist of Pendleton, Ore., who served as state senator two terms and as major general of the Oregon National Guards; Thomas J., a rancher in Heppner; Benjamin F., who died in Morrow county; and Sarah, who married Lee Greenwood and died in Eugene, Ore.

The education of J. D. Matlock was received in Dade county, Mo., but was rather limited, though his father, as one of the most public-spirited men of that community, had borne one-half of the expense of the school in their district. He was fourteen years old when the journey was made across the plains, the little company starting in April, 1853, with ox-teams and quite a large number of loose cattle, which this lad was compelled to drive, walking the entire distance. His father had, besides, six or seven wagons. With no unusual occurrence the party followed the old Oregon trail until they reached Fort Boise, and from there they followed Meek's cut-off, which led along the Malheur river to the big lakes, two weeks being consumed in coming around them, and also crossed the desert, where their supply of water was exhausted. They then crossed the Des Chutes river and came in on what is now the Military road, crossing the Willamette river nineteen different times before they arrived at Butte Disappointment, October 26, 1853. Mr. Matlock, as a boy, went upon his father's farm and there remained for several years. His desultory education was finished here, first with an attendance at the common school at Goshen, the Eugene high school, and he then entered Columbia College, which was burned, and he then entered the Cornelius high school, where he completed his education. In 1862 he went to the Florence mines, where he met with fair success, after which he returned to Lane county. There he was married, in the fall of 1862, to Elizabeth E. Rutledge, who was born November 9, 1844, in Illinois, and who came to Oregon in 1853. Mr. Matlock then located on a farm seven miles southeast of Eugene, where he bought one hundred and sixty acres, upon which he farmed until his wife died in 1864. He then commenced teaching school, which occupation was continued for two years, during which time he was elected county superintendent of public instruction, holding this position for one term. He then engaged in pork-packing and the general merchandise business in Pleasant Hill, Lane county, in which he remained for about twenty months, after which he again located on a farm, selecting eight hundred and fifty acres in the vicinity of Pleasant Hill, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising for fifteen years. He met with a most pleasing success in this work, and at the close of the fifteen years he had accumulated a comfortable competency, whereupon he sold his property and removed to Eugene, becoming the owner of the merchandise stock of T. G. Hendricks in 1884. Two years later he erected on the corner of Willamette and Eighth streets a handsome three-story building, to which his constantly increasing business was removed, and he here carried on the work until 1896, when he sold out and prepared to go to Alaska. January, 1898, found him en route for the north, going first to Skagway and then engaging in business at Lake Bennett, British Columbia, where he continued successfully for two years. He then sold out and prepared to move his stock to Dawson, taking it down the Yukon river on flat-boats. While en route he lost about $2,000 through the sinking of a boat during a storm, for, though he succeeded in raising it, the stock was almost worthless. In Dawson he once more opened up a general merchandise business, but remained only eighteen months, when he closed out the stock and returned to Eugene coming down the Yukon river to St. Michaels, thence to Nome. Mr. Matlock now owns five hundred acres located five miles from Eugene, which is devoted to the raising of stock, this land now being rented. For many years he was interested in the Eugene Lumber Company, acting as director for the company, and has but recently disposed of his interest in the business.

Notwithstanding his engrossing business interests, Mr. Matlock has always taken an active part in public affairs, being broad-minded and earnest in his efforts for the best interests of the community. In 1874 he was elected to the state legislature on the Democratic ticket, of which party he is an adherent. For one term he was mayor of Eugene, and was councilman for a period of ten years, now holding that office as a representative of South Eugene, from the Second ward. He is also chairman of the street commissioners and a member of the health commission. He is chairman of the Lane county Democratic central committee and a member of the First Congressional District Democratic committee.

The second marriage of Mr. Matlock united him with Louisa Rutledge, who was born April 1, 1852, in Illinois, and is a half-sister of his first wife. Her death occurred in Eugene, July 17, 1891, after which he married Mrs. Sarah Durant, the widow of William Durant. She was born in Indiana, August 15, 1843, and came to Oregon in 1874. Her father was Samuel Lowe, a native of Ireland, who came to a farm near Omaha, Neb., and when retired made his home near that city until his death. The first husband of Mrs. Matlock was a merchant in Eugene, who died in 1887. Of the six children born of their union five are now deceased, one daughter, Jennie, who married Robert M. Pratt, living in Eugene. Mr. Matlock is the father of twelve children: Elizabeth C. is the wife of S. C. Smith, of Eugene; Edis De Witt and Caswell C. are merchants in Eugene; Lulu S. died in Eugene; Louisa C. is the wife of George Randebusch, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Bertha M. is the wife of E. E. Emmons, of Dawson, British Columbia; Mary M. died in Eugene; Joseph Fry is attending the Naval Training School; Frankie and William are deceased; Eugene is at home; and Hazel is deceased. In his fraternal relations Mr. Matlock was made a Mason in Eugene Lodge No. 11, A. F. & A. M., and is also a member of Eugene Chapter No. 10, R. A. M.; Ivanhoe Commandery No. 2, K. T., and the Consistory No. 1, having taken the thirty-second degree; and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Eugene, in which he is past noble grand, and also belongs to the Encampment. He is a member of the Christian Church.

HUGH M. FINLEY. The fruit-raising possibilities of Benton county, and more especially of the region around Bruce, have tempted many to engage in this always interesting occupation to the credit of themselves and of the whole neighborhood. Among these may be mentioned Hugh M. Finley, owner of a farm of two hundred acres on the Willamette river, and about six miles northeast of Monroe. The majority of the improvements on this paying property are traceable to the enterprise and progressiveness of the present owner, who has lived here since 1876 and is an integral part of the prosperous community. He is one of the largest fruit growers in the vicinity, having a prune orchard alone which is thirty-five acres in extent. Besides this he has a grain warehouse capable of storing his own and his neighbors' commodities.

Born in Saline county, Mo., January 27, 1847, Mr. Finley is a son of James W. and Margaret (Campbell) Finley, natives respectively of Kentucky and North Carolina, and the former born in 1820. At a very early date James W. Finley moved with his parents from Kentucky to Missouri, where he married, and lived on a farm until 1852. In the meantime seven children had been born into his family, of whom William A. is now a resident of California; Newton also lives in California; Sarah Emery is a resident of California; J. P. lives in Portland; Anna Embree lives in Polk county, Ore.; James B. is in Nevada; and Hugh M. is the subject of this article. With his seven children and wife Mr. Finley crossed the plains in 1852 with ox and mule teams, the journey consuming about six months. Coming direct to California, he took up a claim in Santa Clara county, and soon afterward the mother died. Mr. Finley subsequently married again, and lived to be fifty-six years old.

At the age of twenty Hugh M. Finley came from California and located in Corvallis, where he supplemented his common school education by further training at the Oregon Agricultural College, from which he was duly graduated. Thereafter he engaged in educational work, and, in 1872, married Emma Canthorn, a native of Missouri. For five years Mr. Finley was engaged in teaching. In 1876 he bought his present farm of two hundred acres on the Willamette river, where he has reared his four children, of whom Ross C. is in Portland, Edna and Ada are in Corvallis, and Percy is at home. Mr. Finley is a Democrat in politics, and is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is popular and well liked and is one of the cultured, broad-minded and very successful men of his neighborhood.

HON. LINDSAY APPLGATE. Few pioneers of history who participated in the multitudes of disasters and hardships attending those emigrating to a new, unsettled country have had more thrilling experiences than those of Lindsay Applegate, who, with his brother Charles and Jesse Applegate, stand so conspicuously in the early history of Oregon.

Lindsay Applegate was born September 18, 1808, in Henry county, Ky., and lived in his native state until 1820, when the family removed to St. Louis county, Mo. There the educational advantages were yet in very poor condition and the education he received until his fifteenth year was by no means complete. With some young comrades he enlisted under General Ashley of St. Louis, in a trapping expedition over the Rocky mountains. This expedition was divided; one division taking a train of pack mules was to travel overland and the other, of which Lindsay Applegate was a member, with heavy baggage started to ascend the Missouri river. When the river party had reached Pawneetown, they were attacked by the Indians, defeated, and sought refuge at Council Bluffs. At this place young Applegate and several others were taken ill, which necessitated their return to St. Louis. From there he returned to his home, but his restless spirit longed for a more adventuresome life than was there afforded him, and he followed trading on the Mississippi river. After awhile, he discontinued this to work in the newly discovered lead mines of Galena, Ill., and later served as volunteer in the Black Hawk war under General Whitesides.

In 1831, Mr. Applegate was joined in marriage with Elizabeth Miller in Cole county, Mo.; not long afterward he removed to southwestern Missouri, where he erected the first saw-mill built in that section of the state. In company with his wife and brothers and a small company of emigrants he crossed the plains to Oregon in 1843 and soon became known as one of the pioneer settlers of Polk county. In 1844 he served as a member of the First Volunteer Company organized to protect the new settlements from the Indians. In 1846 he was one of the fifteen who discovered the south road from the Willamette valley to Fort Hall. Two years later he made a trip by land to the newly discovered mines of California, but the same year returned by water. He raised a company of soldiers in 1850 and went in pursuit of the deserting regulars from Oregon City and captured them. The same year he went south to the Umpqua river, there to serve as special Indian agent under General Palmer. Lindsay Applegate also raised a detachment of Mounted Oregon Volunteers and was soon mustered into the United States service in the war against the Rogue River Indians. August 22, 1853, they marched from Winchester to Fort Alden, near Table Rock, then the headquarters of Governor Lane, and served until September 7, 1853, when Mr. Applegate was made captain of the company. When the treaty between the Indians and Governor Lane was signed at Table Rock, Captain Applegate was also present.

In 1859, he took possession of the Toll House in the Siskiyou mountains, Jackson county, and there attended to the toll road from that place to the California state line, which was then on his land. Two years later, as captain of the Rogue river volunteers, he traveled east of the Siskiyou mountains, protecting the emigrants into Oregon from the Indians. In 1864 he served as interpreter at the Klamath-Modoc treaty and in the ensuing year was appointed sub-agent, serving at Klamath until 1869, when a military agent took the place and he was removed. As a proof of Captain Applegate's honesty while acting as Indian agent we quote from his final discharge and settlement: "Your account for disbursements in the Indian services from January 1, 1868, till January 1, 1869, has been adjusted and a balance found due you of $42.01, differing that amount from your last account as explained in the accompanying settlement. (Signed) E. B. French, Auditor."

There are those who believe that had Lindsay Applegate remained in charge of the Lake Indians all would have gone well, and that one bloody drama of the Modoc war would never have been played. Mr. Applegate represented Jackson county in the Oregon legislature in 1862 and acted under Superintendent Rector as special Indian agent for southern Oregon. He died at his old home in Ashland, Jackson county, Ore., one of those restless strong spirits which help hew out the way for civilization in the wilderness, and who are nevertheless willing to aid liberally in promoting the refining influences of an advancing people.

Among his children were three of special mention, as follows: Lucien B. Applegate, who was surveyor general of Oregon and Indian agent at Klamath Falls; Capt. Ivan Applegate, who served in the Modoc Indian war, and Capt. Oliver C. Applegate, who is now Indian agent at Klamath Falls and also served in the Modoc war.

HENRY SHEAK. The position which Henry Sheak has occupied in the professional line in Oregon has been one of no little importance, for many students have gone from his instruction into the business world either to add to its prestige by a life in keeping with their work or to a failure which would reflect upon their preceptor. That success has attended Mr. Sheak is attested by the many who have profited by his capable instruction in their own successes, strong commendations from the citizens of all communities where he has made his home being the tribute paid to his qualifications and special fitness for the work which has engrossed his attention for so many years.

To the citizens of the Willamette valley Mr. Sheak needs no introduction, for he is well and favorably known. He was born near Canal Fulton, Ohio, June 19, 1843. His great-grandparents were Hollanders and immigrated to this country with an infant son, christened Christian, and settled in Connecticut, but both parents died when Christian was so young that he never learned the German language. Christian Sheak grew up and married Mary Kirkham, a Yankee girl of English ancestry. The issue was three children, Mary, Ezekiel and Almira. They removed to Troy, N. Y., where Ezekiel, the grandfather of Henry Sheak, grew up, attended the public schools, working on the farm, clerking in a grocery, learning the harnessmaking trade and that of shoemaking, teaching school, becoming captain of a battery in the state militia and at thirty-nine marrying Olive Young, a young widow with two boys, George and Hamilton. James Devoe, her grandfather, came to this country with LaFayette and she attended a reception given LaFayette on his last visit to this country. Mrs. Sheak's mother's maiden name was Irene Root, and her people came from England in early colonial times, many of her relatives participating in the Revolutionary war.

The marriage of Ezekiel Sheak occurred about 1835 at the home of the bride's parents at Saratoga Springs, N. Y. On October 28, 1837, the first child was born and named James. The following year Mr. Sheak with his father's family and one step-son, Hamilton, removed to Canal Fulton, Ohio, and purchased a tract of timber land near there, and the work of carving out a home on the frontier commenced. The parents were aged and feeble, but Ezekiel was in his prime, athletic, six feet and one inch in stature and weighed one hundred and ninety pounds. Log houses were built and the heavy forests were rapidly converted into orchards and into fields of grain. Here three more sons were born to Ezekiel Sheak and wife, John, Henry and Charles.

In 1846 the parents both died and Ezekiel gave all of his share of the estate, which had been held in common, to his maiden sister, Almira, and moved on a farm near Massillon, Ohio. Here he provided a good home for his family and educated his children in the public schools, until 1855, when he was taken down with lung fever and soon died. A series of misfortunes had left the family destitute, and the mother, paralyzed with grief, was left in a pitiable condition. Henry, at the tender age of eleven, with tearful eyes and a heavy heart, turned from all the endearments of home and found a home among strangers. The family with whom he found a refuge was Dutch, and Henry soon learned to talk the language. They clad him with a suit of clothes of a boy much larger than he, who had died, and his uncouth appearance was very mortifying to him, but his extreme timidity kept him from revealing his embarrassment. In early springtime his feet were wet for weeks at a time, and many times he found his stockings frozen in the morning, and he had a hard time to get them on, to say nothing about his discomfort after they were on. Here a good part of two years was spent. Meanwhile the mother and two older brothers had bought eight acres of land and put up a house, and Henry returned home to work in summer and attend school in winter. His ambition was to get an education, and his mother had promised to let him attend the high school of Massillon as soon as the place was paid for. About the time this was accomplished Henry was greatly agitated over the news and pictures in Harper's Weekly, of the preparations the south was making for war. When the news came that Sumter had been fired upon he was so excited that for two nights he could not sleep at all, and he made his bed on the floor and practiced the most abstemious habits of living in order to inure himself to the hardships of soldier life. On April 21, 1860, when he was but seventeen years of age, he enlisted, but was disappointed by not being called into the field. Nearly all of his neighbors were in sympathy with the south, so he bought a soldier cap and wore it to show which cause he espoused. In September of the same year both he and his brother James enlisted in the Nineteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and went to the camp of rendezvous at Alliance, Ohio. The regiment was soon sent into Kentucky and the winter campaign was very severe, what with marching through rain, sleet and mud, living on mush made of unsifted corn meal without salt, half burned and half uncooked, carrying that in the haversack and eating it cold, but straight for dinner, often having to wring out the wet blankets after the night's rest and carry the enormous load of wet blankets and wet clothes all day, trudging through the slush all day and crawl under wet blankets at night and lie in mud and water. After several weeks of this experience Henry was picked up in a fence corner one day and taken in an ambulance to an extemporized hospital and laid on the bare floor, where he lay half unconscious for two days, when his case was diagnosed and he placed on a mat of straw and given something to eat. After several weeks he was able to walk, and wanted to go to his regiment, but being refused, he and a comrade who had lost his speech ran away from the hospital and for several weeks marched alone through the storms of winter, depending upon the mercy of guerillas for their lives and the hospitality of the people for food and shelter, when they finally reached Bowling Green, Ky., and took the cars and met their regiment at Nashville and were soon en route for Shiloh. After this severe battle the Corinth campaign commenced, and after that city was evacuated the army marched through northern Mississippi and Alabama to Battle-Creek, Tenn. Here the army camped, and for two weeks lived on fresh pork, foraged without permission, and cooked and eaten without salt or crackers or any condiment whatever. Then Mr. Sheak was taken down with chronic diarrhea and taken to the hospital at Nashville, and only recovered in time to return to his regiment just before the battle of Stone River. After this sanguinary battle Mr. Sheak was on the top of a train which ran off the track, and he was thrown down an embankment of about thirty feet and was injured internally, on account of which he was sent to Nashville, and from there to Louisville and thence to Camp Dennison, and recovered in time to return to his regiment just before the battle of Chickamauga. After this disastrous conflict the army was shut up and besieged at Chattanooga and the army became so famished that Mr. Sheak said he often was tempted to gnaw the flesh from his own arms. The battle of Missionary Ridge relieved the siege, and part of the army was sent to relieve the army besieged at Knoxville. The army was without rations and but partially clothed, but they parched corn and wrapped their feet in rags and marched over the frozen ground, leaving the snow stained with blood. Under these circumstances the time for which the regiment had enlisted had expired and the men were asked to re-enlist and Mr. Sheak, with all of his company, with the exception of two, again entered the service of their country for three years, or during the war. This term of service commenced January 1, 1864, and Mr. Sheak was promoted to corporal.

A furlough of thirty days was joyously spent with friends, after which the regiment returned to east Tennessee and soon started on the Atlanta campaign, when they were under fire night and day for one hundred and four days continuously, and the army slept with their accoutrements on, with the exception of three days. Mr. Sheak had many bullet-holes shot in his clothing from time to time, one bullet going through the crown of his hat and grazing his scalp; and in the last battle of the campaign, the battle of Lovejoy, he had eighteen bullet-holes shot in his clothing, and every commissioned officer in the regiment was either killed or wounded.

Assistant Inspector Gen. R. L. Walker certifies as follows: "This is to certify that Henry Sheak, corporal Co. I, One Hundred and Ninetieth V. V. I., was a member of my company and participated in the following named battles: Shiloh, Corinth, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, Mission Ridge, Newhope Church, Pine Knob, Kenesaw, Ferry Road Camp Ground, Peachtree Creek, Atlanta, Lovejoy, Columbia, Franklin and Nashville. Since May 17 last he has held a clerkship in this office and by good conduct as a soldier on the field and by ability, faithfulness and integrity in this office he has won for himself the esteem of both officers and men. [Signed] R. Ludlo Walker, Acting Assistant Inspector General, and formerly Captain Company I, Nineteenth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

"San Antonio, Texas, September 29, 1865."

From the office of the inspector general he was promoted to the office of the assistant paymaster general, and from that to the office of the assistant adjutant general, which position he held until summoned by his regimental officers to assist in mustering the regiment out of service, which occurred November 28, 1865.

On returning home, Mr. Sheak spent the first winter in the high school of Massillon, Ohio; then spent one term in the literary department of Oberlin College, and then being offered the position of bookkeeper in the First National Bank of Massillon he prepared himself for the position by taking a course in the Business Institute of Oberlin, graduating therefrom, but on returning home to take the position in the bank he found that the position had been given to a brother of the president of the bank the day before he reached home. Mr. Sheak having overtaxed himself taking his commercial course, he found himself broken in health and decided on a change of work and purchased a tract of land in the vicinity of Frankfort, Mich., and put it out to fruit; but, while visiting a brother in Iowa, he was given the principalship of the commercial department of Western College, and he also matriculated as a student in the literary department and graduated therefrom in 1873. During a period of eighteen months prior to his graduation he held the office of official court reporter of the eighth judicial district of Iowa. In the winter of 1872 he was taken down with typhoid fever and for several days was not expected to live. This sickness left him ever after a sufferer from indigestion and consequent weakness. Through exposures during his army life he lost the use of one ear and contracted rheumatism, both of which have seriously crippled him in his life-work.

Soon after his graduation from Western College he took the ague, and as soon as he recovered sufficiently to be able to travel he, in company with his college chum, Prof. R. E. Williams, president-elect of Philomath College, came to Oregon and took a position with President Williams in the faculty of that college. The next year he went to Portland and engaged in teaching stenography, and did reporting for the newspapers. President Williams becoming sick, begged Professor Sheak to return to Philomath and take a position with him in the college faculty, and to take his place during his sickness, and begged it for friendship's sake. Mr. Sheak accepted the invitation, and from that time to 1902 occupied a professorship in Philomath College, being continuously principal of the commercial department and part of the time teaching mathematics, part of the time the natural sciences, the physical, ethics and psychology. Nearly all of this time he was a member of the board of trustees and of the executive board, and secretary of both, and for three years the agent and treasurer.

On September 5, 1878, Professor Sheak was married to Miss Ida A. Castle, the daughter of Bishop Nicholas Castle, D. D. Two children were born of this union, Gertrude Almeda, who, after reaching her senior year in college, completed a course of music in the conservatory of music at Philomath and then took courses at the Willamette University and the conservatory of music at Denver, Col., and was principal of the conservatory of music at Philomath College for two years. In 1900 Miss Sheak was united in marriage to Prof. W. G. Fisher, who occupied the chair of languages in Philomath College. Two years later the professor accepted the pastorate of the First U. B. Church of Portland, where they now reside. The second daughter, Edith Lenora, was born May 18, 1886, and at this writing is a sophomore in Philomath College and a student of music.

Aside from Mr. Sheak's college work he was statistical secretary of the State S. S. Association for five years; wrote the first charter for the city of Philomath and secured its passage in the legislature, and has been either mayor or councilman of the city government almost continuously for eighteen years. Three times he was nominated for county superintendent of public instruction by the leading political parties, but declined the nominations.

In political preference Mr. Sheak is a Prohibitionist, and during his residence in the west has done much to advance the cause which he espouses. In his religious convictions he affiliates with the United Brethren Church. Broad-minded and progressive, Mr. Sheak has proven himself a desirable citizen, lending his influence toward the promotion of all enterprises which have for their end the general welfare of the community, and seeking in every way to fulfill the law of earnest, practical living.

W. D. WALLACE. Frugal and thrifty by inheritance, W. D. Wallace, a farmer of Lane county, located in the vicinity of Jasper, has added to his native qualities those which come from an early contact with the world when viewed from the standpoint of a pioneer, for he was only eight years old when his parents emigrated to the west and the hardships and privations which followed the movement became a part of his life. He was born in Iowa, November 21, 1844, the son of James A. Wallace, born in 1821, and married in Illinois to Miss Irene C. Daniels, after which the young couple located in Iowa a short time and then moved back to Illinois, and remained until 1852. They then started across the plains with ox-teams, nearly all of which died on the journey. Reaching Barlow's Gate Mr. Wallace succeeded in trading the wagon for a pony and placed his wife and two younger children on its back, himself and another child on one of the remaining oxen and packed their provisions on another ox and a cow, when they proceeded over the mountains. When they finally got to Foster Mr. Wallace again made an exchange, this time securing a wagon in trade for the pony, and hitching the cattle, a yoke of oxen and two cows, to the wagon, proceeded to the Willamette valley, eventually locating at Jasper, where the father took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres in Lane county and made that his home until his death, in 1868. Their first garden was cultivated by hitching one ox to a rude plow, using ropes for tugs, and while the elder man held the plow, W. D., then a lad of thirteen years, guided the ox. The death of his wife occurred in 1899. Of their six children W. D. was the first in order of birth, those following being Marion and J. C., located in this vicinity; Mary E.; Lucy A. and Emma.

W. D. Wallace remained at home until he was twenty-four years old, engaging in the duties which fell to his lot as the son of a pioneer farmer and fitting himself for successful work. After his marriage in 1868 he went to work for himself, and now owns six hundred and forty acres of land, of which two hundred is a part of the old claim of his father. He carries on stock-raising, having cattle, sheep, horses and goats, and is meeting with the success which attends energy and application when guided by intelligent and practical ideas. His wife was, in maidenhood, Lucinda M. Drury, a native of Missouri, who came west in 1853. The following children have blessed their union: Robert, at home; Chester, near his childhood's home; Charles, at home; John T.; Fred; Benjamin H.; Caroline S.; Irene M.; Nora A., and Mary B. Mr. Wallace is a member of the Christian Church.

WILLIAM H. WEATHERSON. The West, an important factor in moulding public opinion in Lane county, and published at Florence by William H. Weatherson, is fortunately under the supervision of a wide-awake and progressive promoter of western enterprises who is keenly alive to his responsibility as a journalist. This small periodical abounds in newsy and interesting information, and though not partisan, has a mind of its own, which is expressed fearlessly and to the point, and always with due regard for the best interests of the community. The genial editor has the faculty of maintaining friendly relations with people in and out of his paper, and has never succeeded in making enemies. Many years of educational work, and continuous research along general lines, has fitted Mr. Weatherson for a newspaper career of great promise. Born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., June 2, 1858, he is of Scotch ancestry, his grandfather, William, who was born in 1776 and died in 1856, having established the family name in New York. Edkin Weatherson, the father of William, was born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., January 12, 1832, as was also his wife, formerly Alice Cowan, whose natal day was July 16, 1836. The parents were married in New York and moved to Rice county, Minn., when William was eight years of age. Here the family located on the farm which is still the home of the parents, and where the father has for years been known as one of the foremost farmers of his neighborhood.

The oldest of the nine children born to his parents, Mr. Weatherson improved his early opportunities at the district school, and when sixteen years of age began to teach during the winter, spending his summers in the harvest-fields of the home farm. Upon removing to Oregon, in 1886, he located on the Siuslaw, and for ten years engaged in teaching at different points along the river, afterward taking up a donation claim of one hundred and twenty acres four miles east of Mapleton. In September, 1896, he came to Florence and became owner and manager of The West, and in connection therewith has established a real estate business, handling both town and country property. Mr. Weatherson still owns his farm in the vicinity of the town of Mapleton, and four lots in Florence. He is one of the most progressive and cultured of the citizens who are maintaining a high standard of municipal well-being, and is practically connected with the social, economic, educational, and political advancement. A Republican in politics, he is a school director and president of the city council, and he is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he has passed all of the chairs and attended the Grand Lodge; and the Modern Woodmen of America, of which he is clerk. With his wife and children he is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Weatherson married, in 1887, Cora E. Knowles, who was born in Rice county, Minn., May 30, 1862, and who is the mother of six children: Alice E. Hazel L., Agnes E., Edkin E., Dora H., and Hattie A.

JAMES H. HAWLEY. Oregon's progress has been marked chiefly by the development of her agricultural interests. From the practical duties and helpful discipline of farm life have come many of the men to whom our nation owes her supremacy, and for strong, helpful and vigorous manhood we still depend upon the sons of farmers. Within the borders of Oregon are always to be found those who are capable of assuming the responsibilities and duties of citizens, these being chiefly the sons of those sturdy and faithful pioneers who braved the dangers and privations of the wilderness while they worked for that which their children enjoy today.

It is the pride of James H. Hawley, of this review, that he is both the son of such a man and a native citizen of such a state as Oregon. His father, Ira Hawley, was born in the state of New York, May 16, 1817, and following the occupation of his father he engaged in farming from his earliest youth. When seventeen years old he started out into the world to make his own way, in Illinois working as a farm hand for the period of four years. Through the practice of industry and economy he was enabled at the end of that time to purchase a farm, upon which he made his home until 1849. He then crossed the plains on a Cayuse pony, being occupied for about a year in the gold fields of California, after which he returned to his home in Illinois by the way of the Isthmus. In the spring of 1852 he once more crossed the plains, bringing with him into the west his family, with whom he settled in Lane county, Ore., upon a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, located on the divide between Douglas and Lane counties. The energy and ambition which had characterized his life in the middle west also proved dominant traits in his new location, and in the years which followed brought him large returns for his efforts. In addition to general farming he engaged in stock-dealing, the proceeds of his work being invested in real estate, he becoming in time the owner of a large amount of property, amounting to four thousand acres. This he divided among his children a few years before his death. For many years his home was known as the Mountain House, the last hostelry on this side of the mountains. He lived to be over eighty years old, while his wife, who was formerly Elvira Riley, a native of Indiana, died at the age of seventy-six. Of the children born to them the oldest son is located near Moscow, Idaho; William B. is in Lorane; George M. lives near Cottage Grove, Ore.; James H., of this review, and Robert located in this vicinity.

James H. Hawley was born upon the farm where he now lives, this being the donation claim which his father first took up in Oregon, his natal day being September 17, 1862. On this farm, located four miles south of Cottage Grove and on the divide between Lane and Douglas counties, he was reared to a useful manhood. With the progressive spirit which marked the natives of New York state, the father spared no effort nor expense in the education of his children, his son, James H. Hawley, receiving a course in the University of Oregon. On completing his education James H. Hawley returned to the parental roof and engaged with his father in the home duties until his marriage, in 1886, with Miss Hulda Alice Withers, a native of Oregon. She was the daughter of J. E. P. Withers, one of the most substantial and upright pioneers of the early days. The young people began their married life on the home place, and with the exception of four years spent in California this has ever since remained their home. Mr. Hawley now owns about eighteen hundred acres of land, almost all of which is in one body, besides additional property in Cottage Grove, and is an extensive stock dealer. He has one hundred and fifty head of cattle; nine hundred head of goats; two hundred head of sheep, and fifteen head of horses and mules.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hawley; L. Homer and Alsea Hazel, who add to the happiness of the household. Mr. Hawley is a Republican in politics, but has never taken an active interest in the movements of his party, nor has he ever cared for official recognition. In fraternal relations he affiliates with the Woodmen of the World.

HON. MITCHELL WILKINS. The name of Wilkins is one which will always attract the attention of the student of the history of Oregon, for it was borne by one of the early settlers of the state, one whose high character and conscientious efforts have left their impress upon the progress of events. This pioneer, the Hon. Mitchell Wilkins, was born in Orange county, N. C. His father, who was descended from a Scotch family of the colonial period, died in North Carolina when the son was but nine years of age. Early in life Mitchell Wilkins started out in the world to seek his own livelihood, for several years engaging in boating and boat-building on the Mississippi river. He afterward settled in Andrew county, Mo., near St. Joseph, which was then little more than a pioneer camp on the outskirts of civilization. He performed the first carpenter work of any note in that embryo town, erecting the first substantial buildings there.

In 1847 Mr. Wilkins and his wife became members of a party of seven hundred people who started overland from St. Joseph for the far west, a long trip fraught with many dangers and privations in those days. Mr. Wilkins met with his full share of trouble and losses. While crossing the plains he lost his team, this necessitating the abandonment of the wagon in the Rocky mountains; and the journey to the Willamette valley was completed with one horse, one ox and two cows. Mr. Wilkins and his young wife, their hopes and ambitions high despite the drawbacks with which Fate had handicapped them, walked all the way across the mountains, following the old Barlow route, and reached their destination in safety. They spent the winter of 1847-8 near what is now Marquam, Clackamas county, where Mr. Wilkins erected a small log cabin. In the spring of 1848 they resumed their journey toward the south. Arriving in what is now Lane county, Mr. Wilkins took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres located ten miles northeast of the site of the city of Eugene. Here he set about the work of erecting a temporary log cabin, into which he moved his family in the fall of that year. During the following year he constructed a more substantial house of hewed logs, and a few years later was enabled to erect a frame house of a more pretentious character.

Mr. Wilkins had barely become established in his pioneer home in the wilderness before the news of the discovery of gold in California began to attract the attention of the inhabitants of the western frontier. In the hope of bettering his financial condition he started for the Eldorado on horseback in the fall of 1849. He arrived in the Sacramento valley without incident of note, and at once engaged in placer mining on a small scale; but after fourteen days he and the party associated with him in the work were driven out by the snow and the depredations of the Indians, and Mr. Wilkins returned to his home in Oregon.

From that year until the time of his retirement from the active responsibilities of life, Mr. Wilkins devoted his energies to stock-raising, in which he met with most gratifying success. From time to time he made purchases of land adjoining his original claim until he is now the owner of three thousand acres, located principally in the foothills, which he has improved and fitted up in every way necessary to make it a model stock ranch. He has always raised stock of the finest breeds, including Devons, Durhams and Polled-Angus cattle. He is now eighty-four years of age and makes his home in Eugene, having retired from active cares, principally by reason of a paralytic stroke experienced in 1893.

Mr. Wilkins has not been selfishly interested in his work toward success in this generous region, but has cheerfully and capably aided in the promotion of all worthy causes whose tendency has been to advance the welfare of the people at large. In politics he has been a Republican since the Civil war, serving in 1862 as a member of the Oregon state legislature. For some time prior thereto Mr. Wilkins had taken a prominent part in the political undertakings of the county and state. During the historical triangular fight for the governorship of the state, he was nominated for the office on the Independent ticket, but was not able to overcome the Republican majority. He has always exhibited a deep and abiding interest in the general welfare of agricultural interests in Oregon. He became one of the chief organizers of the State Agricultural Society, and for many years served as its president. In 1876 he visited the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia as commissioner from Oregon, acted in the same capacity at the New Orleans Exposition in 1884 and the Columbian Exposition at Chicago in 1893. It was in the fall after his return from Chicago that he was stricken with paralysis.

Mr. Wilkins was united in marriage with Permelia Ann Allen, a native of Missouri, and a daughter of Robert Allen, who crossed the plains in 1847 in the same train with which his daughter and son-in-law were connected. His wife had died in Missouri. Mrs. Wilkins is still living at the age of seventy-seven years. Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins have been the parents of seven children, four of whom are now living: Francis Marion, a retired druggist of Eugene; Jasper and Amos, who are located on the ranch; and Angeline, widow of Samuel D. Holt, of Eugene.

Personally Mr. Wilkins belongs to the highest type of the pioneer citizen and self-made man. His success in life has been due solely to his own efforts. The characteristics which have contributed most to his success, as shown by the record of his life, have been his indomitable energy and perseverance, his integrity in all business transactions, and the liberal, broad-minded manner in which he has conducted all his operations. His record in public and private life has been above reproach, free from all suspicion of dishonor. Honesty, courage, enterprise and fairness toward his fellow-men have endeared him closely to all who have been favored with his friendship. Now, in the twilight of a long and useful career, he and his estimable wife are surrounded by their friends and all the comforts due those honored men and women who have passed the allotted span of life. The clean, noble records they will leave behind them should prove a source of inspiration to future generations, and of gratification and pride to their own descendants.

GEORGE M. HAWLEY. In the vicinity of Cottage Grove, Lane county, is located the home of George M. Hawley, one of the progressive and up-to-date farmers of this region. He is a native son of the state, having been born on the Divide, Ore., September 9, 1857, the son of Ira Hawley. The latter was born in New York state, May 16, 1817, and his father being a farmer by occupation he was early trained to that life. When seventeen years old he started out into the world to make his own way, going first to the state of Illinois, where he engaged as a farm hand, working by the month. This was continued steadily until he had attained his majority and with the proceeds of his four years' work he bought a farm, where he engaged in farming for himself. He was married about this time to Elvira Riley, a native of Indiana. Mr. Hawley remained in Illinois until 1849, when he crossed the plains on a Cayuse pony into the gold fields of California. There he mined for about a year, when he returned to Illinois by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and in the spring of 1852 returned west, direct to Lane county, Ore., where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located on the divide between Douglas and Lane counties. This remained his home for many years, and in the prosecution of stock dealing and farming he gradually accumulated a large amount of property, none of which he was ever known to sell. He became one of the very successful men of the county and was one of the principal stock dealers in this section, his estate amounting to four thousand acres, which he divided among his children a few years before his death. He lived to be over eighty years old, his wife dying at seventy-six. The two acquired fame as keepers of what was known as the Mountain House, the last stopping place on this side of the mountains. Of the children born to them the oldest son is located near Moscow, Idaho; William R. is in Lorane; George M., of this review is located near Cottage Grove; Robert is located in this vicinity; and James H., whose sketch appears elsewhere in this volume.

George M. Hawley was reared on his father's farm and received his education in the district schools. He remained at home until attaining his majority, and he then came to the farm which he now occupies, then having three hundred and seventy-five acres two miles north of Creswell, and three hundred and forty embodied in a stock ranch two miles west. For six years he lived alone upon this farm and then married Mary C. Adams, a native of Cottage Grove, and the two children born to them are Herbert and George F., both residents of Cottage Grove. Mr. Hawley now has seven hundred and fifteen acres of land, two hundred and fifty of which are tillable, and he is now carrying on general farming and stock-raising, in the latter business preferring Durham cattle, Cotswold sheep and Angora goats. Mr. Hawley has a neat dwelling and substantial outbuildings to add to the general appearance of his property.

For a second wife Mr. Hawley married Minnie Ozment, a native of Lorane. Mr. Hawley is prominent in fraternal orders, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Woodmen of the World, and various of the auxiliaries, among them the Rebekahs, etc. Politically he is a Republican and has held various offices in the vicinity, and always takes an active and intelligent part in the affairs of the community, and is one of the trustees of the First National Bank of Cottage Grove.

WILLIAM LEWIS McFARLAND. At an early day the paternal grandfather of W. L. McFarland, William McFarland, came from Scotland and established his family in Ohio, settling on a farm in the vicinity of St. Clairsville, where he reared a large family of children. Among the sons born in Ohio was Elijah, the father of William Lewis, who eventually succeeded to the old farm, and died there at the age of sixty-nine years. He married Jane Gable, a native of Germany, whose father, Peter Gable, was one of the very early settlers of Ohio. Mrs. McFarland survives her husband, and at the present time is seventy years of age. Of her twelve children nine are married and have homes of their own. Of these, William Lewis, the third oldest, was born in St. Clairsville, Ohio, September 20, 1860, and with his brother, James, a blacksmith living in Junction City, Ore., are the only members of the family on the coast.

For two years and nine months W. L. McFarland served an apprenticeship with Martin Brothers, blacksmiths, in St. Clairsville, Ohio. Afterward he worked at Bellaire, Ohio, in the Baltimore & Ohio shops, and with the same railroad company was later employed in different shops between Bellaire and Chicago. The last of the five years with this company he was foreman of the shops in Chicago. Not less successful was a trip down the Mississippi valley as a journeyman, after which he returned to Ohio and ran a blacksmith shop of his own until 1885. Desiring an all around change, and having heard much about the climate and other advantages of Oregon, he sold out and came to Eugene, where he started a business of his own in 1886, in partnership with Mr. McMurry. Six months later the entire business passed into the hands of Mr. McFarland, who is still doing business on the corner of Eighth and Olive streets, one of the oldest blacksmith sites in Eugene.

Besides the property occupied by his blacksmith shop, 54x80 feet, he owns a large lot on west Eighth street, where he built a large building containing two stores and apartments, in 1903. This building covers sixty square feet of ground, and is modern in construction and equipment. He also owns a building, 60x120 feet, in Springfield, this state.

While living in Bellaire, Ohio, December 23, 1883, Mr. McFarland married Mary Rampe, who was born in London, England, a daughter of Herman Rampe, who was born and died in Germany. Mrs. McFarland was left an orphan at an early age, and when nine years old came to America with a friend, making her home in St. Louis. She is the mother of six children: Jennie, Lucy, Edith, Mary V., Hazel and William. Although never inclined to participate actively in Republican politics, Mr. McFarland is a staunch upholder of his party. Fraternally he affiliates with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and Knights of the Maccabees, being a past officer of the latter organization.

JAMES POLK MILLIORN. The old Milliorn place in Junction City, built so many years ago by that honored pioneer, T. A. Milliorn, has been occupied and owned by his son, James Polk, since 1875, the latter interestingly and substantially identified with Oregon since his twelfth year. Born near Knoxville, Tenn., August 30, 1840, he vividly recalls every particular of the overland trip in 1852, and his participation in what was indeed a momentous crisis for the family. The driving of loose stock and the riding of horses fell to his lot, and the train came by way of the Platte river, escaping attacks of a serious nature on the part of the Indians, and being rather fortunate until arriving at Pacific Spring. Here the dread cholera invaded their ranks, his mother being seriously ill with it, and his sister and three other members of the party succumbing to the disorder. Starting in April, the train arrived at the Cascades in November, and there they lost all of the stock which had survived the long journey across the plains. From the lower Cascade to the mouth of the Sandy the father and mother came on a flat boat, and James got onto the old Clinton which was lying on some rocks in the Columbia river, and though there were people on board who were more fortunate than himself in the way of clothes and provisions, he did not succeed in getting them to help him with even a blanket in which to sleep. He was very hungry also, and when he reached Sandy he was reduced to such a state that he was glad to give 25 cents for a turnip with which to stay the pangs of hunger, for he had then been twenty-four hours with nothing to eat. The family spent the first winter on a claim six miles east of Portland, and in February, 1853, came to Lane county, settling on three hundred and twenty acres three-quarters of a mile west of Junction City.

In 1860 Mr. Milliorn went to Washington with James Patterson, driving beef-cattle to a point above Scattle, and finally made his way to the Snoqualmie river, with an Indian for a guide. The same year he went to the Rogue river in Jackson county and was variously employed at farming, mining, repairing wagons, sawing logs, and running a cooper shop, and the following year came back to his father's place in Lane county. In 1862 he engaged in mining in the Florence district, Idaho, on Baboon Gulch, and when he returned was the richer by several hundreds of dollars. In 1863 he changed his field of mining operations to the Caribou district, going there overland with a pack train and with a cargo of bacon. The way was dangerous, as is well known, and in some places it was necessary to tie the horses together by their tails and let them slide down deep declines. In the fall he came to Canyon City with sheep, and in 1864 went to the Boise Basin via the Columbia trail with sheep, encountering many interesting experiences while in the wild and desolate places of the great northwest.

In January, 1865, Mr. Milliorn married Kittie Mulholland, who was born in Missouri, and crossed the plains with her parents in 1853, locating at Pleasant Hill, this county. Immediately after his marriage he engaged in a general merchandise business ten miles below Corvallis, in partnership with W. G. Pickett, now deceased, and for whose estate Mr. Milliorn has been appointed administrator. The mercantile business was disposed of in 1865, and in 1869 he went on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres four miles south of Junction City, remaining there until purchasing the old homestead in Junction City in 1875. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Milliorn, of whom H. M. is engaged in the merchandise business in this town; W. G. is a farmer; and J. E. is in partnership with his merchant brother. Mr. Milliorn is a Democrat in political affiliation, and he has been a member of the council many terms. Mr. Milliorn contributed his share towards the suppression of the Indian in the early days. He was sixteen years of age when he enlisted in the Rogue river war in 1855-6, and at the time was the youngest man in the war. He went in the capacity of wagon-master, but was finally detailed to build bridges on Eels creek.

ROBERT HARRISON was born in Lincolnshire, England, in 1828. He crossed the ocean in 1848 and after looking around a little in New York city made his way to St. Joseph county, Mich., where he worked on farms until the spring of 1852. His two brothers, who had also come to America, became interested in crossing the plains and trying their luck in the northwest, and Robert joined them in their preparations, and hopefully looked forward to making the long journey. The brothers had six yoke of oxen besides three cows, and they came across without any particular difficulty, either with the Indians or with the illnesses which often afflicted the travelers. During the first winter in Oregon Mr. Harrison stayed with one of his brothers in Linn county, and in 1852 he went to the mines of Eureka, Cal., but was not a successful miner, and soon returned to the slower means of livelihood offered in the fertile Willamette valley.

In 1856 Mr. Harrison married Mrs. Tennessee Hannah, and soon after bought the eighty acres which comprise his present farm. Continuously ever since he has made every effort to improve his property, and at present has a pleasant and comfortable residence, good barns, fences and outhouses, as well as many of the latest agricultural implements. As his stock-raising and general farming enterprise increased, more land was required, and at one time he owned twelve hundred acres. A generous and helpful father, he has divided all but his present eighty acres among his five sons and three daughters, all of whom are doing well, and who are proving a credit to their practical and kindly home teachings. For the greater part Mr. Harrison has devoted his land to stock-raising, in which he has been very successful.

MAJOR FRANK E. EDWARDS. Conspicuous among the residents of Benton county worthy of representation in this biographical volume is Major Frank E. Edwards, a native-born citizen, a veteran of the Spanish war, and an alumnus of the Oregon Agricultural College, with which he is now officially connected, being commandant, and professor of military science and tactics, and, also, assistant professor of chemistry. A man of scholarly attainments, a thorough-going soldier, and a most successful teacher, he is held in high esteem by the students, his associates, and the board of regents, and is one of the most popular members of the faculty of the institution.

Born September 13, 1875, in Lane county, near Springfield, Ore., he is a son of Webley J. Edwards. He comes of substantial New England ancestry, the earliest of his progenitors of whom he has any definite knowledge having emigrated from one of the New England states to New York city, where they owned a large tract of land. His great-great-grandfather, Webley Edwards, of New England birth, served as an officer in the Revolutionary army, being captain of a company. His great-grandfather was engaged in steamboating on the Ohio, residing in Indiana.

The major's grandfather, T. D. Edwards, was reared and educated in Indiana, but later removed to Ohio, where he was engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1854. Coming then to Oregon across the plains, with ox teams, bringing with him his family, his son, Webley J., being then an infant of six months, he located near Springfield, on a donation claim, in Lane county, where he cleared and improved a homestead. On retiring from active pursuits, he removed to Eugene, Ore., where his death occurred, in 1895.

Webley J. Edwards was born in Ohio, but was brought up on the old home farm in Oregon, where he has since resided. A prominent farmer and stockman, he first started in business in Lane county, going from there to Lake county, where he followed ranching and general farming with signal success for three years. Returning then to the valley, he continued in his chosen vocation until his removal to Mayville, Gilliam county, his present place of residence. He married Jane Gross, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of Andrew Gross, a native of Germany, who emigrated to America, settling in Iowa, where he carried on agricultural work until 1856, when he came with his family to Linn county, Ore. He is now prosperously engaged in general farming in Brownsville, Linn county. Four children were born of their union, namely: Frank, the special subject of this sketch; Fred A., a graduate of the University of Oregon, and of the Oregon Agricultural College, is engaged in business as a stock-raiser and dealer in Gilliam county; Stephen Hubert, residing on the home farm; and Velma, living with her parents.

Brought up on the home farm, and educated in the district schools of Lane and Gilliam counties, Frank E. Edwards entered the Oregon Agricultural College in 1891, and was graduated, in 1895, with the degree of B. M. E. In 1896, while he was taking a post graduate course, he served as captain of a company of cadets. From 1896 until 1898 he was connected with the college as instructor in chemistry, resigning his position to enlist, as a private, in Company M, Second Oregon Infantry. Being mustered into service on July 2, 1898, he went with his regiment to San Francisco, thence to Manila, arriving there on Thanksgiving day, 1898. He was subsequently made corporal of his company, and as a part of Wheaton's Flying Brigade, on March 25, 1899, took part in the battles of Tondo February 26, Pasig March 14, and Malaban March 25, and the following day, March 26, was severely wounded at the battle of Polo, being shot through both legs, at the thighs. He was incapacitated for further military duty but returned, on crutches, with his company to California, then to Oregon, where he was mustered out of service on August 7, 1899. A month later, Mr. Edwards accepted the position of commandant of cadets, and professor of military science and tactics at his alma mater. In 1900 he was made instructor in chemistry, and assistant in the chemical department of the Agricultural Experiment Station. In June of that year he was appointed to the staff of Gen. Charles F. Beebe as brigade signal officer, with rank of major, an office that he filled until the reorganization of the O. N. G., in 1903, when, on the resignation of General Beebe, he resigned.

Major Edwards married, in Corvallis, September 29, 1900, Miss Helen Elgin, who was born in Marion county, Ore., and was educated at the State Normal School in Monmouth, Ore. Major and Mrs. Edwards have one child, Webley Elgin Edwards. Major Edwards is a staunch Republican in his political affiliations, and an active member of the Christian Church, being one of the board of deacons, and president of the Sunday school connected with it. He is identified with several fraternal organizations, belonging to Corvallis Grange No. 242; to Edward C. Young Camp of the Spanish American War Veterans, of which he is past commander; to the Knights of Pythias; and is ex-president of the Alumni Association.

W. O. HECKART. To no class of men in the world are growing communities more indebted than to their contractors and builders, artisans whose ingenuity enables them to appropriately house families, institutions and business enterprises, and whose busy brains are ceaselessly striving not only to overcome competition, but to make their respective communities the equal architecturally, if not the superior, of those by which they are surrounded. The enormous responsibility of the builder, his relations to life and death and safety, his satisfaction in well doing, and his ignominy in failure, all conspire to make of him an important and leading factor, especially when it is recalled that it is his work upon which the reputation of a city is primarily based. Corvallis has her builders in whom intense pride is felt, and of these none takes higher rank than W. O. Heckart, the constructor of her principal residences, business blocks and churches and also builder of many of the important structures in near-by towns. The Masonic Temple, the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the Methodist Episcopal Church South of South Corvallis, the Christian Church, and many of the finest and largest residences in this town, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Harrisburg, Ore., the Court House in Toledo, Lincoln county, the Government Hospital on the Silitz Indian Reservation, and the Calkins, Patterson, Beckwith, and other residences and buildings in Eugene, are the result of a general demand for the excellent work of Mr. Heckart, and in fact he does not recall a time when he was not familiar with the workman's bench. His ancestors were equally handy with fire-arms, and the emigrant who established the family in Pennsylvania some time during 1700, furnished a son for the Colonial army of 1776. He in turn reared a lad who carried a musket in the war of 1812, which patriot was the paternal grandfather of the builder of Corvallis. The soldier married in Pennsylvania, and while living on a farm near Harrisburg, Dauphin county, his son, Michael, the father of W. O. Heckart, was born. When the latter was sixteen years old the family removed to Missouri, where the grandfather died, and where Michael married Mary Moyer, a native of Ohio. Soon afterward, in 1851, Michael pre-empted land in Wapello county, Iowa, where his wife died, and where he built up quite a large farming and carpentering business. He erected the first Presbyterian church in Ottumwa, and was very successful as a builder for the balance of his life. A Democrat in politics, he was public spirited and progressive, and gave his ten children a practical education, fitting them also to care for themselves in a business way. Ten of these children attained maturity, and nine are living at the present time, two being in Corvallis, W. O. and Charles L., the latter a carpenter.

The fourth youngest in his father's family, Mr. Heckart was born in Wapello county, Iowa, February 5, 1860, and was reared on a farm eight miles south of Ottumwa. Having gained a practical knowledge of the carpenter's trade he went into actual business with his oldest brother at the age of sixteen, and in 1883 removed to Holt county, Neb., where he took up a homestead and tree claim, improved the same, and lived thereon for six years. In the meantime he had alternated farming with contracting and building, and when he located in Corvallis in 1889, he was well qualified to undertake the large business which soon came his way, and from 1900 until 1903 served as city councilman of the Second Ward, representing his ward on several important committees, and thoroughly fulfilling the expectations of those who had placed him in power. In 1902 he was a candidate for state senator, being defeated only by one hundred and nineteen votes, his defeat due no doubt to the fact that he never canvassed the county. With his wife, whom he married in Iowa, and who was formerly Carrie Howk, a native daughter, he lives in a comfortable and modern residence on the corner of Fifth and Monroe streets. He is fraternally associated with the Modern Woodmen of America and with the Ancient Order United Workmen. In religion he is an elder and trustee of the First Presbyterian Church.

JOSEPH P. TAYLOR. A well known figure both in the earlier and later stages of Lane county development is Joseph P. Taylor, whose wise use of five hundred acres of fertile land has brought him a competence and whose enterprise and public-spiritedness have made him popular and influential. Mr. Taylor comes of an old New Jersey family, in which state he was born July 27, 1830, the same state witnessing the birth of his father, Henry W. Taylor, in September, 1808. While yet a youth the father learned the blacksmith trade, and followed the same for many years in his native state. Of a religious and humanitarian nature, he early espoused the cause of the Christian Church, and almost up to the end of his life devoted a large share of his time to preaching in local pulpits. Until his marriage with Charlotte Peterson he continued to live on his father's farm, and afterward worked at his trade and farmed on his own responsibility. In 1830 he removed with his family to Philadelphia, and there and at other points in the Quaker state found employment at his trade for about three years. For eight years he lived in Highland county, Ohio, and later, while living in southwestern Missouri, he decided to emigrate to the far west, starting April 19, 1852. The country there was not one-tenth occupied, and nine-tenths of the land was covered with its natural growth. There were three families composing the train, with six wagons, one of which was used to haul feed for stock on the first of the trip, as the grass was young and short. Just before they reached the Kaw (Kansas) river they encountered one of the most fearful hail storms that they had ever witnessed. Gulches that had been dry became filled with rushing torrents of water and ice twenty feet deep and the hail piled up to the wagon hubs on the face of a gradual slope. But they soon were able to move on; between the Blue river and the Platte their road merged with that over which the St. Louis travel came. The next morning they saw camps in quarantine with the smallpox, but which was soon checked; however, the cholera proceeded, which was then raging in St. Louis. The travel here and on the south side of the Platte became so dense that during the mornings there was a line of wagons, seven abreast, many of the drivers urging their teams to get in the lead. On the north of the river they could see a line of wagons equal to their own, moving along the trail. After they crossed the South Platte, in what was then known as the Hollow, the cholera reached a crisis and produced a terribly melancholy season. Every living thing seemed to feel it, but the little train in which Mr. Taylor's family traveled escaped serious sickness. There were many graves filled there by the cholera victims in 1850. As they passed on they noticed now and then a new marble tombstone put up by passing friends, over the graves of some who had died before. The train passed on with the common humdrum of camp life, up the Platte and Sweetwater rivers, across the Rocky mountains and Green river, also the Salt Lake basin and down the Snake river past the Salmon Falls. When the grass became short the train concluded to cross the Snake river. Some young men thereupon undertook to make a boat. They secured some wagon-boxes and soon had a square-end boat, and began to carry the people and their effects over the river, while the stock was made to swim the rushing torrent. While the boat was under construction there accumulated quite an encampment. And as the goods were taken out of the wagons the germs of the cholera were stirred up and the plague broke out afresh. The Taylor family was among the first to cross, but there were graves being dug when they left the next morning. They moved eleven miles that day to a meadow where was plenty of good water. Here they found travelers already encamped, and they were digging a grave for one of their number. A little boy in the Taylor train, a son of Harry Hazleton, sickened and died that night. The next morning before they left camp there were thirteen newly made graves. Every camping place from that on to the second crossing of Snake river was a graveyard. Mr. Taylor's youngest brother was buried near Boise river, where Boise City now stands. The train re-crossed the Snake river at old Fort Boise. Another brother sickened here and died in two days. Here they had their first view of the Grande Ronde valley, which Mr. Taylor remembers as one of the most beautiful valleys on earth.

The train here met a great many Oregonians who came out from the Willamette valley to meet their friends. From them was learned the high price of food in the settlement, and as there were many emigrants who had run short of provisions, and Mr. Taylor had a supply for the winter he sold his surplus to those who needed it for just what he learned that he could replace it for. He sold one hundred pounds of homemade pressed tobacco at fifty cents per plug (three plugs to the pound) in a little while. The parents came very near dying with the cholera on Willow creek, but recovered, and that was the last they saw of the dreaded enemy. The little band crossed the Cascades through some of the tallest trees in the world and arrived at Foster September 19, 1852, just five months from the time they left the home in Missouri. Thus they crossed the plains with their little train with just nine men able to bear arms without placing a guard for a single night. Of ninety head of stock only two died, and two or three became foot-sore.

Joseph P. is the oldest in the family of ten children. Jerry and Alexander live in the neighborhood, Mrs. Jane Garoutte resides on the old donation claim, and Mrs. Mary Frances White makes her home in Monmouth, Polk county, Ore. With the example of his father's fine and useful life before him Joseph Taylor approached manhood with a due appreciation of his duties and responsibilities as a free American citizen. The opportunity to test his mettle was forthcoming in 1855, for the Indians had rendered unbearable the life of the settlers, and it seemed the duty of all able-bodied people to help quell the disturbance. Enlisting for service as a private, he took part in the battles of Cow Creek, and Big Meadows.

Mr. Taylor says: "After the two days' fight at Big Meadows the volunteers established a post and built a stockade and a double log-house for quartermaster and commissary stores. There being no quartermaster to take charge of the stores, the major of the northern battalion appointed me quartermaster for the post. This was irregular, the legislature not having provided for such a quartermaster. My captain gave me a discharge. This was also irregular, as I should only have been reported on extra duty with my rank. So, although the general government acknowledged my services and paid me the wages of a regular, the state of Oregon rejected my claim as quartermaster on account of irregularities. Although thousands of dollars worth of goods were placed in my care and passed through my hands, and I performed the hardest service that I ever did on any account, it was disallowed, and although I hunted Indians on foot while my horse ran on the grass, I have never received a cent from the state of Oregon. Over forty years have passed since I did this service."

After his discharge Mr. Taylor continued to live at home until 1858, the year of his marriage with Mary A. Small, a native of Tennessee, who crossed the plains in 1853, her people locating near the Taylor farm. Taking up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres south of Cottage Grove he has continued to make that his home up to the present time, and to his original purchase has added and now owns more than five hundred acres. His farm has modern and practical improvements, and he raises produce, grain and stock.

It is fitting that the son of so kindly and good a father should follow in his footsteps, and in this connection Mr. Taylor fulfills popular expectations. He is fair and honorable in all of his dealings and possessed of more than ordinary interest in and regard for his fellow-men. He also is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for a great many years has been class leader and steward. Politically he is a Prohibitionist, and this idea of temperance is by no means confined to intoxicants, but permeates every phase of his life, impressing all with his sobriety. Of the nine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, Lincoln is a resident of Cottage Grove; Ida C. and Rebecca are living at home; Harvey has a farm near the home place; and Lillie J. is making her home in Portland. Many positions of trust and responsibility have been tendered Mr. Taylor by his fellow townsmen, and he has held several of the local minor offices, including that of school director, for fifteen consecutive years.

FELIX G. EBY. A worthy representative of the legal fraternity of Oregon, F. G. Eby, a well-known and esteemed citizen, has made the most of his opportunities, and in the course of his active career has steadily climbed the hill of progress and success. He is a self-made man in the broadest sense implied by the term, his life experiences furnishing an excellent example to the young men of this day and generation of what may be accomplished by persistent industry, enterprise and good judgment. A native of Lane county, he was born near Eugene, August 11, 1865, a son of David Eby. On the paternal side he comes of thrifty German stock, his grandfather, Samuel Eby, having been born, bred and educated in Germany. Emigrating to the United States he spent his first winter in this country in Pennsylvania, working as a millwright. The following spring he moved to Illinois, where he was engaged in milling several years, and also became actively interested in the Moline Plow works. Removing from Illinois to Topeka, Kans., he engaged in milling and speculating, being very successful in his operations. He died in that city, in 1893, at the venerable age of ninety-six years.

Born near Springfield, Ill., June 13, 1826, David Eby, father of F. G. Eby, spent a part of his early life there where he learned the cooper's trade. Crossing the plains in 1851, he followed his trade in Astoria, Ore., for two years. Going to Portland, Ore., in 1853, he was employed in the manufacture of barrels for a year, and was then a resident of Oregon City for a year. Locating in Linn county in 1855 he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Harrisburg, and settled with his bride, Elizabeth Barger, a native of Missouri and the daughter of Preston Barger, on the farm which he improved, living there until 1864. Purchasing land then in Lane county, he carried on general farming for five years in that locality, in 1869 removing to eastern Oregon, where he was engaged in stock-raising two years, the present town of Prescott being located on the land that he then owned. Returning to Lane county in 1871 he carried on farming near Co-burg for two years, when he sold his farm, and settled in Harrisburg, where he worked for a year at his trade. Then buying three hundred and sixty acres of land a short distance from that place, he worked at farming until 1885, when he purchased a ranch near Goshen, Lane county, where he resided until 1897. Disposing of all his real estate in that year, he has since lived in different places in the valley, making his home with his children, since the death of his wife in August, 1900, looking after his financial interests, and enjoying himself. He is an active member of the Christian Church, in which he is deacon, and since the formation of the State Grange of Oregon has been chaplain of the organization. Mrs. Eby's father, Preston Barger, was born in the state of Ohio and was also of German descent. In early manhood he lived in Illinois, removing from there to Missouri, and then, a few years after his marriage, coming to Oregon, crossing the plains in 1851. Locating in Linn county, he took up three hundred and sixty acres of land, on which he and his good wife spent their remaining years, he dying at the advanced age of ninety years, and she in her eighty-ninth year.

The eldest child of a family of four boys and three girls, F. G. Eby attended first the district schools of Oregon, subsequently entering the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated in 1884. From 1885 until 1888 he taught school in Linn county, being quite successful as a teacher. In 1893 he began reading law at Woodburn, and also engaged in insurance and real estate speculations. Passing the examination of the State Board of Examiners in 1896, he began the practice of law in Woodburn, continuing there four years thereafter. Moving to Cottage Grove in May, 1900, "Judge Eby," so called on account of his sound reasonings on legal and other questions, formed a partnership with J. C. Johnson, and has since been actively and successfully engaged in his professional labors. He is especially interested in mining properties in the Bohemia district, having been one of the incorporators and promoters of the Le Roy Mining Company, of which he was formerly secretary and treasurer, and of the Hiawatha Mining Company, in which he is a director. Being elected city attorney of Cottage Grove in 1900, he served until the office was abolished in 1902. He was elected and served two terms as city attorney of Woodburn.

Politically Judge Eby is a staunch adherent of the Republican party, supporting its principles at all times and places. Being a fluent speaker, his services are in great demand in political campaigns. Fraternally he was made a Mason in 1890, at Gervais, Marion county, joining Fidelity Lodge, No. 54, A. F. & A. M., of which he is past master; he is also a member of the Woodmen of the World and of the Foresters of America. October 28, 1903, he was married to Miss Tola Shull, an accomplished and highly esteemed young lady of Walla Walla, and since that time has resided at No. 660 Broadway, Portland. Mr. Eby has offices in the Chamber of Commerce, having identified himself with the business interests of Portland.

EDWARD P. REDFORD. Among the enterprising and successful farmers to whom Lane county owes so much for her present advanced position, Edward P. Redford deserves more than passing mention. Inheriting from thrifty and successful farmers an appreciation of the possibilities of his useful occupation, he has progressed as study and research have broadened his mind and placed him in touch with the best to be obtained in his field. Born in Barren county, Ky., August 10, 1829, he is the son of a father who moved his family to Missouri about 1848, this being the third state in which he had owned farms, that in his native state of Virginia being the largest. There were fifteen children in the family, and Edward P., who was the fourth, led an uneventful life as a youth, attending the district schools irregularly, and working hard during the summer season. Like any other strong and resourceful young man, he was on the lookout for improving his prospects, and was willing to take great risks in order to place himself in a better position. The tales of mining and farming which reached him from the west fell upon attentive ears, and April 24, 1850, he started out with ox-teams to make his fortune in the far west. Arriving in California at the end of five months, he mined and prospected for a year, but was not favorably impressed with the uncertainty and rough life incident to mining, nor was he sufficiently successful to warrant a continuation of the struggle. For a time he engaged in teaming, and in November, 1852, landed in Portland, Ore., of which state he has since been a resident.

In the spring of 1853 Mr. Redford moved to near Eugene, and in February, 1853, took up a donation claim in Lane county. His marriage with Sarah M. Cochran occurred January 14, 1855, Mrs. Redford being a native of Missouri, and she came across the plains with her parents in 1852, locating on a farm in Lane county. After his marriage Mr. Redford took up a claim three miles northeast of Cottage Grove, moving in 1861 to near Coburg, and in 1863 to his present place, three miles northeast of Cottage Grove. This farm consisted of two hundred and twenty acres, being on the angles of sections 9, 10, 15 and 16, township 20, range 3 west. At present he owns one hundred and fifty-six acres, upon which he has made all modern improvements, and carries on general farming and stock-raising. For about seventeen years he conducted harvesting machines around the country, and in this way materially increased his yearly allowance, many of the settlers being unable at that time to own the necessary machinery for the conduct of their farms.

Of the first marriage of Mr. Redford nine children were born: John M., of Creswell; James E., of Arena; Mrs. Elizabeth Armstrong, of California; and Mrs. Ida B. Stocks, of this vicinity, being the only survivors. Mrs. Redford died February 27, 1875. For a second wife Mr. Redford married Mrs. Harriett E. Hymas, a native of Missouri. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Redford has taken an active interest in county politics, although he has never been willing to have his name put in nomination for office. He is a member and elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. During his life in the west Mr. Redford has identified himself with its unpleasant as well as agreeable phases of development, and during the Rogue River war gladly left his farm to espouse the cause of the settlers against the troublesome Indians. Enlisting under Captain Buoy, in Company B, he served for three months during the latter part of 1855 and the beginning of 1856, participating in many of the important battles. Mr. Redford commands the respect and good will of all with whom he has been associated in whatsoever capacity, and as an agriculturist, soldier and general citizen, has done his part in the upbuilding of his adopted state.

U. G. BERRY. The general merchandise store owned and managed by U. G. Berry is one of the successful business concerns of Peoria. Formerly the property of L. H. Ahrbecker, it came under the present control in 1896, and has since been enlarged both as to building and stock. A large trade is conscientiously cared for, the general line of commodities being of excellent quality and at moderate prices. For five years Mr. Berry has been the postmaster of the town, a part of the store being arranged for the accommodation of the mails.

Mr. Berry comes from a family from which one would expect only upright and capable men, for his youth was surrounded by the noblest and most worthy influences, and he was reared to appreciate the value of industry and a good name. His father, J. L. Berry, of German descent, was born in Richmond county, Ill., and in early manhood devoted himself to a course of study at the United Brethren College in his native state. During his entire life he combined farming, preaching and general ministrations, at an early day removing to Minnesota, where he made his home for several years. He married Susan Reaves, who bore him seven children, four sons and three daughters, of whom U. G., the oldest, was born in Minnesota May 7, 1869. In 1881 the family fortunes were shifted from Minnesota to Wasco county, Ore., on the Hood river, and here the father took up a claim. At the same time U. G. attended Philomath College for a few months. The father did not long survive the change of climate and general surroundings, for his death occurred in Philomath in 1885, at the age of forty-seven years.

After his father's death the oldest son in the family naturally assumed control of the farm, which greatly improved with the passing years, and proved both valuable and productive. Not wishing to remain longer in the country, the family decided to sell the property in 1890, and move to Corvallis, where U. G. Berry engaged in the transfer business with the City Dray Company. In time he succeeded to the entire ownership of the business, and at the end of six years he moved to Peoria, and bought his present store of Mr. Ahrbecker. At Corvallis he was married in 1891 to Anna Ridenaur, who was born in Benton county, October 28, 1871, a daughter of William Ridenaur, who is still living, retired, in Lincoln county. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Berry: Glenn and Lucile. Aside from the office of postmaster, Mr. Berry has held several elective offices, among them that of school director and clerk for six years. He is one of the staunch Republicans of this town, and has never swerved from party allegiance since casting his first presidential vote. He is popular fraternally, and is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. Mr. Berry is genial and large-hearted, generous in his contributions to local enterprises of a charitable or upbuilding nature, and fair in his judgment of his friends and the world at large.

WILLIAM HAMILTON. In the comparatively brief space allowed one can scarcely do justice to the many interesting features of the life of William Hamilton, a pioneer of pioneers, whose memory of Indians and general border experiences would furnish many a theme for the novelist or playwright. Mr. Hamilton was born in Jefferson county, Ind., January 10, 1836, and is the third youngest of the three sons and two daughters born to Forqus and Matilda (Woods) Hamilton, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Virginia. The family was established in Pennsylvania by the paternal grandfather, who came from Ireland at a very early day, and farmed for the remainder of his life. From Pennsylvania Forqus Hamilton moved to Ohio, and from there to Jefferson county, Ind. His death occurred in Jennings county, Ind., his wife surviving him for a number of years.

Limited educational opportunities did not dwarf the early ambitions of William Hamilton, who learned more from observation and practical experience than do most men in many years of application to books. In 1851 he crossed the plains in a caravan bound for Oregon. For ten years he mined and prospected in northern California, and in the spring of 1861 made his way to the Orofino mines in Idaho. He spent the winter of 1861-2 in the Salmon river basin and at the Florence and Idaho mines. In 1862 he bought animals and engaged in packing from Lewiston to the Salmon river district and Elk City, and afterward from Walla Walla to the Boise Basin. In 1864 he returned from this pioneer experience to the Willamette valley, afterward visiting the mines, but in 1865 settled in Lane county, which has since been his home. His first farm in this county was on Lake creek, twenty-five miles west of Junction City, and consisted of one hundred and sixty acres of land, which he lost because of a defective title. He later took up one hundred and twenty-nine acres near his original farm, and in 1872 bought forty acres of land from the railroad company, located in section 17. All of this land has since been disposed of, Mr. Hamilton having lived on a portion of it until about two years ago, and subsequently moved to Junction City.

Mr. Hamilton has never married, but this does not indicate that his life has been self-centered, or that the large profits from his various enterprises have not passed into useful channels. He is humanitarian in the extreme, giving liberally to the worthy causes represented in his neighborhood and county, and proving a friend indeed to many less fortunate than himself. In his early conflicts with the Indians he was not unmindful of the things due the deposed monarchs of the plains, and often made friends with the most troublesome of the leaders. In 1855 he enlisted in the Harris Company under Col. John Ross, and later served in the Second Oregon mounted volunteers, participating in the battle of Hungry Hill, and in that of the Cabins with the Applegates, the latter of whom were renowned for hard and desperate fighting. He was discharged from the service in the Rogue River valley, and thereafter returned to the mines to undergo for many years the deprivations and dangers which beset all who tried to make their way in the early days. He is probably more familiar with the trails and out-of-the-way places in this northwestern country than any other man now living in Junction City, and it was this very knowledge of the country that caused him to be selected as guide to lead from the hills the army that afterward went to Grave Creek. In political affiliation Mr. Hamilton is a Lincoln Republican, a Jeffersonian Democrat and a silver man to the core. He is at present employing his leisure in writing a complete history of his life, and his facile pen will undoubtedly lend itself to graphic descriptions utterly impossible on the part of even his most intimate and well-informed friends. Mr. Hamilton is appreciated for his many admirable traits of character, for his goodness of heart and his intense public spirit, and his friends throughout the northwest are legion.

JAMES ISAAC JONES. A man of remarkable business energy, foresight and sagacity, James Isaac Jones, of Cottage Grove, occupies a position of eminence in the financial, agricultural, political and social life of Lane county. During his active career he has been conspicuously identified with many of the leading industries of this section of the state, and in his operations has invariably met with success, fortune smiling upon his every venture. A son of C. H. Jones, he was born December 1, 1866, in Macon City, Macon county, Mo., of Virginian ancestry.

Isaac W. Jones, the grandfather of James Isaac, was born in Virginia, of colonial stock. Going to Tennessee as a pioneer, he worked at his trade of an iron-forging until 1850, when he followed the march of civilization westward to Missouri. Purchasing land in Macon county, near the city of Macon, he carried on general farming until his death, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. A model citizen, and a man of true Christian character, he was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which he did much active work, being a local preacher.

Born in Tennessee, C. H. Jones accompanied his parents to Missouri, and with the exception of a year spent in Indiana, lived in that state until 1883. On account of failing health he then emigrated to Oregon, locating at Cottage Grove as a carpenter, and still resides here, living rather retired from active pursuits. He married Louisa Harriet Gentry, who was born in Indiana, near Bloomington, where her father, James Gentry, was born, lived and died. Six children were born of their union, James Isaac, the third child in succession of birth, being the only son.

Completing his education in the public schools of Oregon, James Isaac Jones embarked in business on his own account in 1889, as a butcher, borrowing $50 for the purpose. At the end of two years he sold out, having paid off his indebtedness and cleared $600 in that time. In 1891 he bought a saw-mill on the Coast Fork river, and in a short time had so enlarged his business that he had to increase the capacity of the mill from six thousand feet per day to ten thousand feet per day, later increasing it to thirty-three thousand feet per day. With characteristic enterprise he built a lumber plant at what is now Saginaw, in Lane county, thus establishing the town, which he named, and assisted in building. The mill has a capacity of sixty-five thousand feet per day, and the flume is five miles, nine hundred feet long and one thousand six hundred and sixty feet high at the summit. The plant, which is one of the largest in the county, has planing-mills and dryers connected with it. In 1898 Mr. Jones sold out his lumber interests, and the following year bought four hundred and twenty acres of land adjoining Cottage Grove on the southeast, the farm being known as the old Shields donation claim, and subsequently laid off the J. I. Jones addition to the town.

Embarking in enterprises of a different nature in 1899, Mr. Jones purchased three different groups of mining claims in the Bohemia district, buying a part of the Music and Oregon and Colorado groups, and all of the Winchester group. In 1900 he sold his share in the first two groups, but still retains the Winchester, which he is developing, obtaining a fine grade of lead ore. In his mining ventures he met with much success, and also made money in land speculations, having, in 1900, in company with J. W. Cook, of Portland, purchased ten thousand acres of railway land and two thousand acres of school script land, all of which he has since sold at an advantageous price. In 1901 he bought the Major Chrisman ranch of seven hundred and fifty-four acres, at Saginaw, where he is carrying on an extensive dairy and creamery business, keeping one hundred and seventy-five head of cattle. He is also the owner of four hundred and twenty acres of good timber land in Lane county. In 1900 Mr. Jones established himself in the hardware business in Cottage Grove, continuing for a year as head of the firm of Jones & Phillips.

Mr. Jones married, at Cottage Grove, Lillie Lewis, who was born near Junction City, a daughter of J. B. Lewis, a general merchant of this place. She died a year after their marriage.

Mr. Jones married a second time, in Eugene, Ore., Gertrude H. Roberts, who was born in Iowa, the birthplace of her father, John Roberts, a farmer, who is now living retired from active pursuits in Eugene. Four children have blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Jones, namely: Oscar I., deceased; Frankie Carl; Robert Lester; and Maria. In politics Mr. Jones is a Republican, and has always taken a cordial interest in the success of his party. He has served as precinct committeeman, for one term was mayor of the city, and is now serving his second term as councilman. He is prominent in fraternal organizations, belonging to Cottage Grove Lodge, A. F. & A. M.; to Eugene Chapter, R. A. M.; to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; to the Knights of Pythias; and to the Artisans. He is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is steward and trustee, and superintendent of the Sunday school, having held the latter position the past four years.

JAMES SCOTT McMURRY. On Alder street, near the Masonic cemetery, James Scott McMurry is engaged in hay growing and general farming on a portion of the old claim which has been a treasured possession of his family since 1851. Within sight of the lights of the city of Eugene, Mr. McMurry has the advantage of both city and country, and his every day life is passed upon one of the most fertile and well equipped farms in this vicinity. Mr. McMurry was three years and three months old when his feet first trod the soil of the unimproved farm, for he was born near Quincy, Adams county, Ill., July 22, 1848, and reached here in September, 1851.

Fieldin McMurry, the father of James Scott McMurry, was born in Kentucky, whence had settled his paternal grandfather, James McMurry, after his emigration from Scotland. James McMurry spent his last years in the Bourbon state; after his death his son, Fieldin, removed to Adams county, Ill., where he married Harriett Riggs, a native of that state, whose father, Scott Riggs, was a farmer and early settler there. With his wife Fieldin McMurry began housekeeping on the farm he had purchased near Quincy, and there four of their children were born, all of whom accompanied their parents across the plains in 1851. The family equipment consisted of three wagons and several ox-teams, and the journey was accomplished without any serious drawbacks to the health or convenience of the travelers. The father purchased the Culver donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, erected a small log house and later built a more modern residence, his last home being just east of where the University of Oregon has since been built. He became a prominent man in this locality, and was honored by his election to offices of trust and responsibility. He was the first treasurer of Lane county, and was also a member of the territorial legislature which met at Corvallis. Formerly a Whig, he was equally staunch as a Republican, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Besides James Scott, who was the fourth child, there was Milton, now living in Eugene; Louisa Hubbard, Mary and Zodiac, who died in Eugene; and Emma, Mrs. Archambeau, of Portland.

After his father's death, in 1860, J. S. McMurry remained at home and helped his mother with the management of the farm. Besides the country schools he attended Christian College, at Monmouth, in 1871-72. At the age of twenty-five, in 1873, he married Emma Murphy, daughter of John E. Murphy, a prominent resident of Polk county, and thereafter went to housekeeping on a farm half a mile from Monmouth, Polk county, consisting of one hundred and sixty acres. Here he engaged principally in grain farming until 1879, during which year he came into his inheritance of one hundred acres of the old farm. His father had sold off ten acres for the Masonic cemetery four years before his death, but otherwise retained his property intact. Mr. McMurry has about fifty acres in hay, and the balance is devoted to grain and general farming, also to a fine fruit orchard and large garden. In 1901 he built a prune dryer at Thurston, and now derives a substantial income from drying and shipping prunes for the surrounding horticulturists.

Like his father, Mr. McMurry is a Republican, although he has no thought of participating in the official affairs of his district. He is essentially a man of domestic habits, devoted to his farm and family. For many years he has been a member of the Christian Church, in which he faithfully performs his duties as deacon. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Eight children have been born into the McMurry family. The oldest daughter, Daisy, is the wife of Mr. Love, and is making her home in Canyonville; Ralph and Frank became soldiers in the Spanish-American war, serving in the Philippine Islands in Company C, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry; Myrtle, Nellie, Elsie, Glenn and Edna are living at home. Mr. McMurry is a practical and energetic farmer, progressive and public spirited, and no one in the community bears a better reputation for sincerity of purpose and business integrity.

GEORGE M. HAWLEY. The faith which peopled and developed the resources of Oregon also gave rise to a spirit of independence which characterized those who cast their lot in the early days as pioneers, and without this the west must have lacked that which has so quickly lifted to importance its commercial and industrial interests. Many of the present prominent citizens of the state are the sons of those adventurous spirits, and their inheritance of courage, energy and perseverance has early insured their success in the various lines of business adapted to this section of the country, of which none holds a higher place than the cultivation of the soil, in which many of the most talented men of the state are engaged.

In the vicinity of Creswell, Lane county, is located the home of George M. Hawley, one of the progressive and up-to-date farmers of this region. He is a native son of the state, having been born on the Divide, Ore., September 9, 1857, the son of Ira Hawley. The latter was born in York county, N. Y., May 16, 1817, and his father being a farmer by occupation he was early trained to that life. When seventeen years old he started out into the world to make his own way, going first to the state of Illinois, Knox county, where he engaged as a farm hand, working by the month. This was continued steadily until he had attained his majority—a perseverance uncommon in so young a man,—and with the proceeds of his four years' work he bought a farm, where he engaged in farming for himself. He was married about this time to Elvira Riley, a native of Indiana, and he remained in Illinois until 1849, when he was attracted by the glowing reports to cross the plains on a Cayuse pony into the gold fields of California. There he mined for about a year, when he returned to Illinois by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and in the spring of 1852 he crossed the plains with his family, coming direct to Lane county, Ore., where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres located on the Divide between Douglas and Lane counties. This remained his home for many years, and in the prosecution of stock dealing and farming he gradually accumulated a large amount of property, none of which he was ever known to sell. He became one of the very successful men of the county and was one of the principal stock dealers in this section, his estate amounting to four thousand acres, which he divided among his children a few years before his death. He lived to be over eighty years old, while his wife died at seventy-six. The two acquired fame as the keepers of what was known as the "Mountain House," the last stopping place on this side of the Calipoos mountains. Of the children born to them, Niram is located near Moscow, Idaho; William B. is in Lorane, Ore.; George M. is the subject of this review; Robert D. is located in the vicinity of Creswell; and James owns the old homestead on the Divide.

George M. Hawley was reared on his father's farm and received his education in the district schools of Cottage Grove. He remained at home until attaining his majority, and he then came to the farm which he now occupies, then having three hundred and seventy-five acres one and one-half miles north of Creswell, and three hundred and twenty embodied in a stock ranch eight miles west. For six years he lived alone upon this farm and then married Mary C. Adams, a native of Cottage Grove, and the two children born to them are Herbert and George Frances. He now has six hundred and ninety-five acres of land, two hundred and fifty of which are under cultivation, and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising, his greatest industry being the raising of Durham cattle, Cotswold sheep, Angora goats. A neat dwelling and substantial outbuildings add to the general appearance of his property.

March 31, 1894, Mr. Hawley married for a second wife Minnie M. Ozment, a native of Lorane. Mr. Hawley is prominent in fraternal orders, being a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Daughters of Rebekah, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Woodmen of the World. Politically he is a Republican and has held various offices in the vicinity, and always takes an active and intelligent part in the affairs of the community. One of the most important business positions which he has held is that of one of the trustees of the First National Bank of Cottage Grove.
