“ Let the record be made of the men and things of to-day, lest they pass out of memory to-morrow and are lost. Then perpetuate them not upon wood or stone that crumble to dust, but upon paper, chronicled in picture and in words that endure forever.”—Kirkland.

“ A true delineation of the smallest man and his scene of pilgrimage through life is capable of interesting the greatest man. All men are to an unmistakable degree brothers, each man's life a strange emblem of every man's; and human portraits, faithfully drawn, are, of all pictures, the welcomest on human walls.”—Thomas Carlyle.

PREFACE

A cursory review of the local history of the Willamette valley can but arouse enthusiastic pride in the work of the heroic men and women who have succeeded in bringing this portion of Oregon up to the position of grandeur and future promise it occupies among the grand galaxy of progressive western states. The publishers are especially gratified with the character of the book they are able to herewith present. The citizenship of the Willamette valley is of a high standard, and the histories presented in this volume are such that can but be looked upon with great admiration and satisfaction, not only by those immediately interested, but by the citizens of older states who must feel gratification in knowing that our Union is able constantly to produce citizens of courage and ability to strengthen and broaden our sisterhood of states. The commonwealth of Oregon has been very largely founded and fostered by the sons of the eastern and middle western states, and the entire country is proud of the achievement.

The last fifty years have witnessed a marvelous, almost miraculous, growth in material prosperity, which has been only in keeping with the progress made in art, literature and educational lines, and the whole, in turn, but augurs the great possibilities of the advancing century. And in every particular Willamette valley is keeping well abreast of the other portions of Oregon in the progress of material and educational improvement.

In the following pages mention is made of many of the men who have contributed to the development and progress of this region—not only capable business men of the present day, but also honored pioneers of years gone by. In the compilation of this work, and in the securing of necessary data, a number of writers have been engaged for many months. They have visited leading citizens, and have used every endeavor to produce a work accurate and trustworthy in even the smallest details. Owing to the great care exercised in the preparation of biographies, the publishers believe they are giving their readers a work containing few errors of consequence. The biographies of some representative citizens will be missed from this work; this, in some instances, was caused by their absence from home when our writers called, and in other instances was caused by a failure on the part of the men themselves to understand the scope of the work. The publishers, however, have done everything within their power to make the volume a representative work.

The value of the data herein presented will grow with the passing years. Many facts secured from men concerning their early experiences in the state are now recorded for the first time, and their preservation for future generations is thus rendered possible. Posterity will preserve this volume with care, from the fact that it perpetuates biographical history which otherwise would be wholly lost. In those now far-distant days will be realized, to a greater degree than at the present time, the truth of Macaulay's statement that "The history of a country is best told in the record of the lives of its people."

HON. HENRY W. CORBETT.

HON. HENRY W. CORBETT. The First National Bank of Portland, of which Mr. Corbett officiated as president from 1898 until his death, March 31, 1903, dates its existence from about 1866 and has the distinction of being the first national bank to be organized on the coast. From an original capital stock of $100,000 it was gradually increased until now the capitalization is five times as great as at first, while there is a surplus of $700,000 and deposits aggregating about $7,000,000. Without any exception it is the largest bank of the northwest, and at the same time none has a wider reputation for solidity, strength and conservative spirit in investments.

The maintenance of a general oversight of this institution by no means represented the limit of Mr. Corbett's activities. Scarcely an enterprise of importance has been inaugurated in Portland since the city's pioneer days in which he was more or less interested and to which his support was not given, when once convinced of its value to the municipality. As president of the Portland Hotel Company, he was closely associated with the building of the Portland, one of the finest hotels on the coast, and the fame of which, spreading throughout the country, has been of incalculable value in bringing the city into prominence. For years he was largely interested in the city and suburban railway system, his position as a member of the board of directors having made it possible for him to contribute to the development of a satisfactory system of transportation. Connected with the organization of the Security Savings and Trust Company of Portland, he was its president and a member of its directorate. Another enterprise which received the benefit of his co-operation and influence was the Title Guarantee and Trust Company of Portland, while he was further connected with important local business industries through his position as president of the Willamette Steel and Iron Works.

Special interest centers in the life history of one who was so closely identified with the progress of Portland along every line of commercial development. The genealogy of the Corbett family is traced to Roger Corbett, a military chieftain who won distinction under William the Conqueror. The eldest son of Roger was William, owner of a country seat at Watesborough. The second son, Sir Roger Corbett, had for his inheritance the castle and estate of Caus. The latter's son, Robert, went to the siege of Acre under Richard I, bearing for his arms in this campaign two ravens, which have since been used by the family for a crest. Early in the seventeenth century the family was established in New England, being among the first settlers of Milford, Mass. Elijah, son of Elijah Corbett, Sr., was born in Massachusetts and became a manufacturer of edged tools, first in the Bay state, and later at White Creek, Washington county, N. Y., where he died. His wife was Melinda Forbush, a native of Massachusetts and descended from a pioneer family of that state, whose history is traced back to England. Her death occurred in New York. Born of her marriage were eight children, of whom three sons and two daughters attained maturity. One of the sons, Elijah, came to Portland in 1864 and remained here until his death. Another son, Hamilton, died in New York during early manhood. The daughters were Mrs. Thomas Robertson, who came to Portland in 1856, and Mrs. Henry Failing, who settled in this city in 1858; both are now deceased.

The youngest member of the family circle, as well as its last representative, was Henry W. Corbett, who was born in Westboro, Mass., February 18, 1827. When four years of age he was taken by his parents to White Creek, N. Y., and later settled in Cambridge, that state, where he completed the course in the Cambridge Academy at thirteen years of age. For three years he clerked in a village store. At the age of seventeen he went to New York City, having with him $22 in money and only a very limited supply of clothing. He obtained a position in a dry-goods store on Catherine and East Broadway. A year later he entered the wholesale dry-goods house of Bradford & Birdsell on Cedar street, where he remained for three years as a clerk. A later position was with Williams, Bradford & Co., wholesale dry-goods merchants. In the fall of 1850 he resolved to come west to Portland. At that time thousands were seeking the gold fields of California, but comparatively few were identifying themselves with the limitless possibilities of Oregon. The motive that impelled him in his decision was the fact that Oregon was an agricultural country and California then almost wholly devoted to mining, and he reasoned that the produce raised in Oregon would be taken to California, payments being made with gold dust; thus Portland would be an excellent trading point.

On the steamer Empire City, January 20, 1851, Mr. Corbett set sail from New York to Panama. Crossing the isthmus on muleback he then took the Columbia, which had been built by Howland Aspinwall of New York to ply between San Francisco and Portland. After a few days spent in San Francisco he proceeded to Oregon, arriving at Astoria on the 4th of March. The next day he reached Portland. There were only a few business houses on Front street. The houses were small and poorly furnished. Improvements were limited. What is now a beautiful city was then covered with large forest trees of pine and spruce. The territory of Oregon embraced Washington, Idaho and a part of Montana.

Some months before starting west Mr. Corbett shipped a stock of goods on the barque Francis and Louisa via Cape Horn. On the arrival of the vessel in May, 1851, he transferred the goods to a building on Front and Oak streets and embarked in a general mercantile business. Leaving the store in charge of a manager, in June of 1852, he returned east via Panama, and spent almost a year in New York, meantime shipping goods to the Portland store. In 1853 he returned to Portland, where he continued the business. On the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad it was no longer necessary to bring goods around the Horn, but they were sent by rail to San Francisco, thence by boat to Portland. In 1868 he made the first trip by rail from the east to San Francisco. Previous to this he had made thirteen trips across the isthmus.

Through his election as United States senator from Oregon in 1866 Mr. Corbett gained prominence among the statesmen from the west, and was enabled to do much toward advancing the interests of his home state. However, he was not a politician at any stage of his career, and his service in public capacities was only as a result of the constant solicitation of his friends, his personal tastes being in the direction of financial and commercial affairs rather than politics. As a business man he contributed to the development of Portland in a degree surpassed by none. As early as 1851 he began to be a leader among merchants. He was the first business man to close his store on Sunday, this being regarded at the time as a startling innovation. From that day forward he was strict in his adherence to measures he believed to be just and right. The business which he established shortly after his arrival in Portland was conducted under the name of H. W. Corbett, then as H. W. Corbett & Co., later as Corbett, Failing & Co., and lastly as Corbett, Failing & Robertson. Since 1867 their store has been the largest wholesale hardware establishment in the northwest, as well as one of the largest on the coast. In 1868 H. W. Corbett bought a controlling interest in the First National Bank, of which Mr. Failing was made president and continued as such until his death in 1898, at which time Mr. Corbett became the executive head of the institution.

In 1865 Mr. Corbett took the contract for the transportation of mails to California. Four years later he bought out the California Stage Company and enlarged the line to carry out the contract for running the four-horse stage coach with the mail between Portland and California. On his election to the United States senate he relinquished the contract. From the early days of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company he was one of its directors and up to the time of his death was a director of its successor, the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company. At different times he has had important manufacturing interests. The building interests of Portland were greatly promoted by his co-operation. Among the buildings which he was interested in erecting are the following: First National Bank building; Worcester block, six stories, on Third and Oak streets; Cambridge block, on Third and Morrison; Neustadter building, on Stark and Fifth; Corbett, Hamilton and Marquam buildings, etc. An earnest advocate of the Northern Pacific Railroad, while in the senate he gave himself to the work of promoting the measure. After the failure of Jay Cooke to carry the plan to a successful issue and when Henry Villard undertook the completion of the road, Mr. Corbett took a pecuniary interest and in many ways promoted the work.

While living in New York, Mr. Corbett was married at Albany, that state, to Miss Caroline E. Jagger, who was born in that city and died there in 1865. Two sons were born of that union, namely: Henry J., and Hamilton F., both of whom died in Portland in young manhood. The second marriage of Mr. Corbett was solemnized in Worcester, Mass., and united him with Miss Emma L. Ruggles, a native of that state. Movements of a humanitarian nature always received the encouragement and assistance of Mr. Corbett. One of the worthy movements to which he lent his aid was the Boys and Girls Aid Society, which endeavored to arrange affairs so that children, guilty of a first crime, were not thrown among hardened criminals. A home was built especially for such first offenders and its influence has been lasting and far-reaching.

The election of Mr. Corbett to the United States senate, over Governor Gibbs and John H. Mitchell, occurred in 1866 and he took his seat March 4, 1867. His record as senator was a most excellent one. He secured the appropriation for the Portland postoffice, also the custom house at Astoria, and succeeded in having Portland made the port of entry for the Willamette custom district. One of the bills he introduced provided for the return of the government to specie payment, which, though not passed at the time, was eventually adopted. In the senate he was especially effective in securing much needed financial legislation. On the expiration of his term, March 4, 1873, he visited Europe, spending seven months in a tour that was of deep interest to him as well as a source of recreation. In 1896, when the St. Louis platform declared for the gold standard, the Republican party in Oregon became somewhat disorganized on account of the advocacy by many of free silver. However, the influence of men as conservative and successful as himself did much to secure a Republican victory, and McKinley was given a majority of two thousand. In 1900 Mr. Corbett was the Republican candidate for the United States senate and had the majority of Republican legislators, but was defeated by John H. Mitchell through a combination of Democrats and some of the Republicans. In 1898, when the legislature failed to elect a United States senator, Governor Geer appointed him to the office, but he was not seated on account of the ruling of the United States senate, they declaring that an appointed senator was not entitled to a seat caused by the failure of a state legislature to elect when they had the opportunity. On several occasions he was a delegate to national Republican conventions, where he was recognized as one of the leading men from Oregon. Considerable of his time and thought had been devoted to his duties as president of the board of directors of the Lewis and Clark Exposition, in the success of which he was deeply interested, as affording an opportunity to show to the east and to visitors from other countries the remarkable advancement made by the northwest during the eventful one hundred years since, at the instance of President Jefferson, Captain Lewis and Captain Clark, at the head of a small expedition, sailed to the headwaters of the Missouri and thence crossed the country to the coast, where they arrived November 14, 1805. The condition of the present, contrasted with the wildness of that period, affords an opportunity for the student of history to note the changes that have rendered possible the present high state of civilization, for which no class of people deserve greater praise than the indomitable, energetic and resourceful pioneers. On the day prior to his death, realizing that his strength was failing, Mr. Corbett resigned the office of president.

PROF. IRVING W. PRATT. The city of Portland is one of the greatest strongholds of Masonry in the United States. During the days of the greatest ascendancy of this ancient and mystic order on the Pacific coast, no man has been more ardently devoted to the promotion of its highest interests than Prof. Irving W. Pratt; and it is safe to assume that the great personal esteem in which he is held is accepted by him as ample reward for his unselfish and high-minded services in behalf of the order, extending over a period of more than forty years. He has been honored by elevation to the highest post a Mason may hope to attain in the state, and every possible mark of distinction has been conferred upon him by the fraternity in this jurisdiction.

During the early colonial period in American history the founder of the Pratt family in America came from the vicinity of London, England, and settled in Connecticut, from which state Benjamin Russell Pratt, one of seven brothers, went forth to fight in behalf of the cause of the colonies in the Revolution. Soon after the close of the struggle he removed from Connecticut to the banks of Cayuga Lake, in New York state, where he spent the remainder of his days. Franklin Pratt, a son of this Revolutionary soldier, was born in Norwich, Conn., and grew to manhood in New York state, whence he removed to Ohio, settling in Huron county about 1842. By occupation a contractor, he secured the contract to construct a section of the Sandusky, Mansfield & Newark Railroad, now a part of the Baltimore & Ohio system, the second road to be built in Ohio. Earlier in life he had been for some time a superintendent on the Erie canal. In 1858 he removed to Lenawee county, Mich., where he bought a farm, on which he resided until his death at the age of seventy-five years. While living in New York state he married Hannah Holaway, who was born in Delaware county, N. Y. Her father, Benjamin Holaway, a native of Pennsylvania, and of English descent, became a pioneer of Huron county, Ohio, where he died at the age of ninety-nine years. To an unusual degree he retained his physical and mental faculties to the last, and on the day he was ninety-eight years of age he walked five miles, feeling little the worse for this exertion.

In the family of Franklin Pratt there were six sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Benjamin Russell, served in the Mexican war, holding a commission as captain of the Third Ohio Regiment. His death occurred at Dayton, Ohio,

The second son, Martin, was killed by the fall of a tree while hunting, in his young manhood. Henry, the third son, occupies the old homestead in Michigan. Irving W. was the fourth in order of birth. Nathaniel Lee, the fifth, is a merchant at Blissfield, Mich. The youngest, Martin L., who served as a Michigan volunteer during the Civil war, is now engaged in teaching in Albina.

Irving W. Pratt was born at Waterloo, N. Y., March 17, 1838, and was about five years of age when the family settled in Ohio. At the age of sixteen he entered Norwalk Academy, from which he was graduated, in the meantime teaching schools in adjoining districts. He considered himself fortunate to secure a position as teacher at $8 per month and "board 'round," in which manner he paid the expenses of his academic course. On leaving Ohio he taught district schools in Michigan, and with the means thus secured paid his way through the Ypsilanti State Normal School, from which he was graduated in 1861. He then resumed teaching.

At the first call for volunteers for service in the Rebellion Professor Pratt offered his services to his country, but was rejected on account of disabilities. Disappointed at his failure to get into the service, he soon turned his thoughts to the far west and decided to seek a home on the Pacific coast. By way of New York and the Isthmus, in 1862 he went to San Francisco, thence to Placerville, Cal., where he was employed as principal of the Placerville school. Resigning in 1867, he returned to San Francisco with the intention of going to Los Angeles, but was dissuaded from his intention by a Mr. Martin, who induced him to change his course toward Portland. After his arrival in Oregon he recovered from the ague, from which he had been a constant sufferer for some time. He was not long in securing a position as teacher, as instructors possessed of more than ordinary qualifications were not easy to obtain in Oregon in those days, and for two years he had charge of schools in East Portland. He then came to Portland as principal of the Harrison Street school, located in the second school building erected in the city. For twenty-two years continuously he served as principal, resigning in 1891 in order to accept the position of superintendent of the city schools. When he began teaching in Portland in 1869 but thirteen teachers were employed by the city. During the five years he occupied the post of superintendent he had the supervision of the work of two hundred and eighty teachers, distributed among twenty-eight buildings, and his efficient conduct of the educational system of the city is on record as successful to an eminent degree. Upon retiring from this office in 1896 he accepted the principalship of the Failing school, which he now holds, superintending the work of twenty teachers. Incidental to his professional labors, for sixteen years he served as a member of the state board of education.

Professor Pratt maintains an interest in religious work and contributes to the support of the Congregational Church, of which his wife is a member, though he is not identified with any denomination. He is connected with the Commercial Club, and in a general way has given abundant evidence of his public spirit. He is devoted to the principles of the Republican party, and actively supports its candidates and measures.

The Masonic record of Professor Pratt, to which brief reference already has been made, dates from 1865, when he was initiated into the order in Pilot Hill Lodge No. 160, at Pilot Hill, Eldorado county, Cal. Soon after his removal to Portland, in 1867, he organized Washington Lodge No. 46, and became its first master. Since 1874 he has been a member of Portland Lodge No. 55, in which he is past master. In Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., he is past high priest, and in Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T., he is past eminent commander. He is also a member of Washington Council No. 3, R. & S. M. In 1871 he received the Scottish Rite degrees, from the fourth to the thirty-second, and for eleven years served as presiding officer in these important bodies. He is past grand secretary of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, and since 1892 has been active inspector-general of the Supreme Council of the Southern Jurisdiction in the state of Oregon, the highest post of honor possible of attainment in the state. In this capacity he organized Oregon Consistory No. 1, A. & A. Scottish Rite, the first consistory in the state. Upon the organization of Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., in 1888, he was made illustrious potentate, and occupied this post for fifteen years continuously, or until December 26, 1902. At the session of the Temple on the evening of January 17, 1903, Professor Pratt was treated to one of the greatest surprises of his life in being made the recipient of a magnificent loving cup, a tribute of affectionate regard from the nobles of Al Kader Temple. The inscription on the cup is as follows: "From Al Kader Temple, Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. Portland, Oregon, January 17, 1903. To Irving W. Pratt, for fifteen years Illustrious Potentate of Al Kader Temple, from its organization, February 15, 1888, to December 26, 1902. A tribute of affection and esteem. Es Selamu Aleikum." Professor Pratt is also the possessor of one of the most beautiful Masonic jewels in the United States, which was presented to him in March, 1885, by Portland Lodge No. 55, and the Scottish Rite Masons of Portland.

Abraham Bush

Engraved by J. H. Johnson

The marriage of Professor Pratt was solemnized in Portland July 14, 1874, and united him with Sophia C. Taylor, who was born in Ohio. She came to Portland in 1853, joining her father, Peter Taylor, a native of Scotland and a pioneer inhabitant of this city. Her education was received in the schools of this city, and early in life she engaged in teaching. Professor and Mrs. Pratt have their home at No. 611 First street, and are the parents of six children, namely: Douglas L., Irving H., Martin T., all of whom are engaged in business in Portland; Jo S., who is a clerk on a transport in the Pacific squadron of the United States navy; Allyne Francis and Gertrude S. The three eldest sons enlisted in Company H, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry, for service in the Spanish-American war, and were soon sent (1898) to Manila, where they rendered efficient service as soldiers, being fortunate in retaining their health in spite of the trying tropical climate. On their return they all engaged in business in Portland, where they now reside.

It will be observed by a perusal of this brief sketch of important events in the busy life of Professor Pratt that his career has been one of great utility. His long period of service in Portland as an educator has been characterized by marked success, a consensus of the opinion of those who have closely watched his record being that no incumbent of the office of superintendent of the city schools has done more than he to elevate the standard of the schools. As a citizen he has proven himself progressive and public-spirited, giving freely of his time and influence to the work of promoting those movements intended to enhance the intellectual, social and industrial prestige of the community in which he has spent the most active years of his life. Personally he possesses an abundance of those qualities of mind and character which tend to endear a man to those with whom he comes in daily contact, and the people of Portland who have learned to know him best are steadfast in their allegiance to and devoted in their friendship for him.

ASAHEL BUSH. The career of Asahel Bush, pioneer journalist and banker, of Salem, illustrates in a striking degree the possibilities of the Northwest during the first half-century of its development. The citizenship of Oregon probably affords to-day no more conspicuous example of the self-made man of affairs, no better or more worthy type of American citizenship, than is to be found in the subject of this necessarily rather brief memoir. A record of the salient points in his career, illustrating the various steps he has taken onward and upward to the attainment of the unquestionable and unquestioned position as the foremost citizen of the Willamette valley should, and undoubtedly will, prove a source of inspiration to the ambitious young men of the present generation whose aspirations lie along lines of a nature more or less similar to those pursued by Mr. Bush during the days preceding the period since which his position in the commercial world has been assured.

The ancestral history of Mr. Bush, both lineal and collateral, is distinctly American. The founders of the family in the New World emigrated from England in 1630, and from that time to the present men bearing that name have lent their best efforts toward the promotion of the welfare of the country, placing America first in their affections and interests. In 1650 representatives of the family moved from the state of Connecticut, where they had resided for more than twenty years, to Westfield, Mass. Aaron Bush, grandfather of Asahel Bush, was a farmer of New England, where his entire life was spent. Asahel Bush, his son, father of the pioneer of whom we are writing, was born in Westfield, Mass., also carried on agricultural pursuits in that state. In public affairs he was prominent and influential, and served as selectman of his town and as a representative in the Massachusetts State Legislature. He was a believer in the Universalist faith, and a man of broad mind and liberal views. In early manhood he wedded Sally Noble, a native of Westfield, Mass., whose ancestry may also be traced back to England. Asahel and Sally (Noble) Bush became the parents of six children, but two of whom are now living.

Asahel Bush, whose name introduces this memoir, was the fifth child in order of birth, and the only one who located on the Pacific coast. He was born in Westfield, Mass., June 4, 1824, was reared in that town, and completed his literary education in the Westfield Academy. At the age of seventeen years he moved to Saratoga Springs, N. Y., where he was apprenticed to the printer's trade in the office of the Saratoga Sentinel. Here he was employed for about four years, during which time he learned the details of the trade, it having been his original intention to make newspaper work his vocation. As he grew to maturity his views of life broadened, and he determined to make his life more useful by mastering the law, thereby equipping himself more fully for the struggle which he realized lay ahead of him. With this ambition dominant in his mind, he returned to his native state and began the study of the law in Westfield under the direction of William Blair and Patrick Boise, being admitted to the bar of Massachusetts in 1850. Judge R. P. Boise of Salem, a nephew of Patrick Boise, who had previously been a student in his uncle's law office, was a friend of Mr. Bush, and the aspirations of the two young men about this time tended in the same direction, both arriving at the conclusion that the well-nigh boundless resources of the then new and undeveloped Northwest offered to them broader opportunities than the East. Accordingly they decided to put their fortunes to the test in the territory of Oregon, whither a tide of immigration was then flowing. Soon after having been admitted to the practice of his chosen profession, Mr. Bush started for Oregon by way of the Panama route, leaving New York City as a passenger on the steamer Empire City, bound for Aspinwall. He made the journey across the Isthmus on a boat poled up the Chagres river and on the back of a mule over the mountains, and re-embarked on the steamer Panama, which, after stopping for a short time in the harbor of San Francisco, proceeded northward to Astoria. At that point Mr. Bush took a small boat up the Columbia and Willamette rivers to Portland. A short time afterward he located at Oregon City, where he established a newspaper, which he named the Oregon Statesman, for the publication of which he had had a printing press shipped from the East around the Horn. The first issue of the Statesman appeared in March, 1851. Mr. Bush continued to be editor, proprietor and publisher of this pioneer newspaper until 1853, when he removed his office to Salem, there continuing in journalism until 1861. The business evidently appealed to him as more fascinating and satisfactory than the practice of the law, for by this time he had abandoned the idea of engaging in the practice of his profession.

In 1861 Mr. Bush sold his newspaper, which thereafter was known as the Union. In 1867 he engaged in the banking business in Salem as a member of the firm of Ladd & Bush, his partner in this enterprise being the late W. S. Ladd of Portland. This relation was sustained until 1877, when Mr. Bush purchased the interest of his partner. For the past twenty-six years he has retained control of the institution and has been actively engaged in the conduct of its affairs, and through his individual efforts he has made it one of the strongest banking houses in the Pacific Northwest. In 1867 he erected the commodious brick structure now devoted to the purposes of his business.

Mr. Bush has further contributed to the improvement of the city through the erection of a number of stores and other buildings. He is a stockholder in and president of the Salem Flouring Mills, in which he has been interested for many years. In company with Mr. Ladd and others he purchased this enterprise several years ago and equipped the plant with roller process machinery. When the mill was destroyed by fire it was immediately rebuilt, and there is now a modern mill having a daily capacity of four hundred barrels. He is also financially interested in the Salem Woolen Mills, is the owner of the Salem Foundry, and for some time was a stockholder in the old Oregon Steam Navigation Company, the predecessor of the present system known as the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company. In addition to these enterprises, in which much of his capital has been profitably invested and to which he has devoted no inconsiderable portion of his time and energy, he has, at various times, been identified with other local enterprises which have helped to establish the city of Salem on a sound manufacturing, commercial and financial basis.

In his political views Mr. Bush is a Democrat who has always remained firm in his belief in the principle of free trade. He has taken an active part in the promotion of the welfare of his party in Oregon, and probably no other man has accomplished more for the general well-being of the Democracy of this state than he. For several years he was a member of the Democratic State Central Committee, of which he served for a time as chairman. In 1892 he was sent as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, on which occasion Grover Cleveland was nominated for the presidency for the third time. For eight years he served as Territorial Printer for Oregon, the first and only man to hold that office. He was appointed one of the board of visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., filling that post in 1861, when two classes were graduated for the purpose of providing officers for the army in the Civil war. For many years he was a regent of the Oregon State University, but resigned the office; and at the time of its incorporation was a trustee of Willamette University. He is a member of the Oregon Historical Society, and in religious faith is a Unitarian. In 1902 he was made a member of the Board of Directors of the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition to be held in Portland in 1905.

In 1854 Mr. Bush made a trip to his old home in Massachusetts by way of the Panama route, returning to Salem the same year. In 1861 he made a second trip by the same route, and in 1865 he crossed the plains to the East by stage, returning home by way of the Isthmus.

The marriage of Mr. Bush occurred in Salem in October, 1854, and united him with Eugenia Zieber, who was born in 1833 in Princess Anne, Princess Anne county, on the Eastern shore of Maryland. Her father was a native of Philadelphia, and her mother of Maryland. Her family crossed the plains in 1851, settling in Oregon City, but afterward removing to Salem. John S. Zieber, her father, became surveyor-general of Oregon in 1853, filling the office for one term. Mrs. Bush was a graduate of the Moravian Seminary at Bethlehem, Pa., and was a lady of superior culture and refinement, possessed of many graces of character. She died in Salem in 1863, leaving four children: Estelle, who is a graduate of the school in which her mother received her education; Asahel N., a graduate of Amherst College, class of 1882, now a partner of his father in the banking business; Sally, a graduate of Smith College at Northampton, Mass.; and Eugenia, who is a graduate of Wellesley College.

It is difficult to place a proper estimate upon the services of Asahel Bush to the state of Oregon, and particularly to the community in which he has been for so long a period a most potent factor. Thoughtful men who have watched the progress of the state for the past four or five decades are generally agreed that there is living to-day no other individual whose personality, sound judgment in affairs of finance, trade and commerce, broad-mindedness, thoughtfulness for the welfare of the community at large, and unselfish and disinterested desire to witness the most economical utilization of the partially developed resources so abundant throughout the country in which he was a pioneer, has made, and is yet making, so marked an impress upon the trend of events in the state. For many years his strong guiding hand has been felt in nearly all important undertakings throughout a large expanse of territory within the borders of the state, and his judgment has been sought and deferred to by hundreds of men in all walks of life. A common expression in local commercial and manufacturing circles has been: "Ask Mr. Bush what he thinks about it." His integrity has always been above reproach, and his motives in all his operations have never been questioned. Honored and respected by all who have learned to know him, and well-beloved by those who have been favored by an intimate acquaintance with him, he is now—in his eightieth year—recognized as the foremost citizen of the Willamette valley, if not, indeed, of the entire state of Oregon.

Such, in brief, is the life history of Asahel Bush. Those whose discernment enables them to read "between the lines" and who are familiar with the history of the state, will readily realize the nature of the environments which surrounded him in the early years of his residence here, and what courage and fortitude, as well as enterprise and energy, it required to face the pioneer conditions of the Northwest and establish large business interests here upon a profitable basis. In his undertakings, however, he has been greeted with such a measure of success that his methods naturally prove of profound interest to the commercial and financial world. Yet there is no secret in connection with his advancement, for his success has been attained through earnest and conscientious effort, guided by sound judgment and keen foresight, supplemented by principles of honorable manhood.

HON. JOHN B. CLELAND. About 1650 the Cleland family, who were strict Presbyterians, removed from Scotland to Ireland, and there, in County Down, Samuel Cleland was born and reared. Before leaving that county he was made a Mason and subsequently rose to the rank of Knight Templar. About 1812 he settled in Orange county, N. Y., where he improved a farm near Little Britain. In his old age he joined his son's family in Wisconsin and there spent his last days. His son, James, a native of Orange county, became a pioneer of 1846 in Wisconsin, where he settled near Janesville, in Center township, Rock county, on the West Rock prairie. Like his father he took a warm interest in Masonry and in his life has exemplified the lofty principles of the order. During his active life he maintained a deep interest in politics and was a local leader of the Democratic party. For some years past he has been retired from agricultural pursuits and now, at eighty-two years of age, is making his home in Janesville. His wife, Isabella, was born in county Down, Ireland, and died in Rock county, Wis., in 1879. In early childhood she was brought to this country by her father, John Bryson, who settled on a farm in Orange county. Of her marriage there were five children, and three sons and one daughter are now living, the eldest of these being Judge John B. Cleland, of Portland. The others are: Mrs. Mary Fisher, of Janesville, Wis.; Samuel J., a farmer near Emporia, Kans.; and William A., of Portland, a well-known attorney.

On the home farm in Rock county, Wis., where he was born July 15, 1848, Judge Cleland passed the years of early boyhood. He attended the country district schools, the grammar and high schools of Janesville, and later Carroll College in Waukesha. At the expiration of the junior year in college he entered the University of Michigan in 1869 and was graduated from the law department March 29, 1871, receiving the degree of LL. B. Admitted to the bar of Michigan, then to that of Wisconsin, and soon afterward to that of Iowa, in July of 1871 he settled at Osage, Mitchell county, Iowa, where he was a practicing lawyer and justice of the peace. In 1876 he was elected district attorney of the twelfth judicial district of Iowa, comprising eight counties, and this position he held from 1877 to 1885. In the fall of 1884 he was elected circuit judge of the twelfth district by a large majority. A constitutional amendment two years later abolished the circuit courts, and he was then elected district judge, which position he resigned in 1888 on removing to Fargo, N. D. After two years as a practitioner in Fargo he came to Oregon in 1890, since which time he has been a resident of Portland. The appointment as circuit judge came to him in January, 1898, from Governor Lord, to succeed Hon. L. B. Stearns, resigned, as judge of one of the departments. The nomination for this office was tendered him in June, 1898, and at the following election he received a flattering majority, immediately thereafter entering upon his duties for a term of six years.

In Center township, Rock county, Wis., Judge Cleland married Ellen J. Cory, who was born in that county, her parents having been pioneers from Orange county, N. Y. They are the parents of four children, namely: Laura Josephine, Bessie Isabella, Earl James and Mattie Ellen. Mrs. Cleland is identified with the Congregational Church and a contributor to religious and philanthropic movements.

The eminent position held by Judge Cleland among the attorneys and jurists of Oregon is indicated by the high honor they conferred upon him in electing him to the presidency of the State Bar Association. No jurist in the entire state is more highly esteemed than he, and none enjoys to a fuller degree the confidence of the people in his impartiality, intelligence and sagacious judgment. By his previous experience on the bench in Iowa he had gained a thorough knowledge of the duties of a jurist and was therefore qualified to assume the responsibilities devolving upon him. With him partisanship sinks into the background, yet he is a loyal Republican and since boyhood has never swerved in his allegiance to the party. Socially he is associated with the University Club and Multnomah Athletic Club. Like his father and grandfather, he maintains a constant interest in Masonry. While in Iowa he was made a Mason in Osage Lodge No. 102, where he served as master for two terms. In Osage Chapter No. 36 he served as high priest, while his connection with the commandery dates from his admission to Cœur de Leon Commandery, K. T., of which he was eminent commander for seven years. At this writing he is a member of Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M.; Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., and Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T., of which he was eminent commander for two terms. During his residence in Iowa he was senior grand warden of the Grand Commandery, and since coming to Oregon he has enjoyed similar honors, having been grand master of the Grand Lodge in 1898-99 and grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Oregon during the same year. The Shrine degree he received in El Zagal Temple, N. M. S., Fargo, N. D., and he is now affiliated with Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland. His Consistory degree has been given him since coming to Portland, and he has also attained the thirty-third degree here.

Aside from his connections with bench and bar, fraternal and social organizations, Judge Cleland has a host of warm personal friends in every walk of life. His commanding presence makes him a conspicuous figure in even the largest concourse of people. In physique he is stalwart and well-proportioned, about six feet and four inches tall, and possessing a dignified and judicial bearing, yet with a kindly and genial courtesy that wins and retains deep and lasting friendships.

WILLIAM A. CLELAND. During the years of his residence in Portland Mr. Cleland has established a reputation for accuracy of knowledge and breadth of information in matters relating to his profession, that of the law. For this he was well qualified through the advantages derived from an excellent education. While his early advantages were limited to the district school near the home farm, in Rock county, Wis., where he was born June 22, 1855, yet his teachers were thorough and, finding him to be ambitious, delighted to aid him in securing a satisfactory start. When thirteen years of age he became a student at Milton and two years later went to Beloit, where he completed the preparatory department and in 1872 entered Beloit College. In 1874 he matriculated as a junior in Princeton University, from which he was graduated in 1876, with the degree of A. B. His alma mater in 1902 conferred upon him the degree of A. M.

Immediately after graduating Mr. Cleland entered the law office of his brother, Judge John B. Cleland, at Osage, Iowa, where he combined the duties of clerk with the study of law. Two years later he returned to Wisconsin, where he remained until after his mother's death. In 1879 he went to Fargo, N. D., where he continued his law readings and acted as clerk. Admitted to the bar in 1881, he opened an office in Grafton and a year later formed the firm of Cleland & Sauter. While continuing the office at Grafton, in January of 1889 he became a member of the firm of Miller, Cleland & Cleland, of Fargo. In 1890 he came to Portland and with his brother, John B., formed the firm of Cleland & Cleland. Since the accession of his brother to the circuit bench in 1898 he has continued alone.

Always a believer in Republican principles, Mr. Cleland served as chairman of the county and district central committees while living in Dakota. Socially he is a popular man, numbering a host of friends and well-wishers, an active participant in the affairs of the Commercial Club and a welcomed guest in the most select circles of the city.

Belonging to a family conspicuously prominent in Masonry, he has shared the general interest in that order. While living at Grafton, N. D., he was made a Mason in Crescent Lodge No. 11, in which he served as master from December of 1887 to December of 1888. February 6, 1884, he was initiated in Corinthian Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., at Grand Forks, N. D. February 18, 1885, he was made a member of Grand Forks Commandery No. 8, K. T., from which he was demitted March 5, 1890, to Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T., of which he is past eminent commander. In 1889 he became a Shriner in El Zagal Temple, N. M. S., at Fargo, and since May 26, 1891, has affiliated with Al Kader Temple, of Portland. He is also associated with Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M., and Portland Chapter No. 3, of which he is past high priest. In June of 1902 he was elected grand priest of the Grand Chapter of Oregon, which responsible position he has since filled with characteristic enthusiasm and success.

HENRY FAILING. At the time of the death of Henry Failing of Portland, C. A. Dolph, as chairman of the sub-committee appointed to draft a suitable memorial, submitted the following sketch of his life, which was adopted by unanimous vote of the water committee at its regular meeting, December 20, 1898, and ordered spread upon the records of the proceedings of the committee: Henry Failing was born in the city of New York January 17, 1834. He was the second son of Josiah and Henrietta (Ellison) Failing, the first son having died in infancy. His father was a native of Montgomery county, in the Mohawk valley, in the state of New York, and was descended on the male side from the German Palatines, who settled that part of the province in the early part of the eighteenth century. His mother was an English woman, with a strain of Welsh blood in her veins, and came to the United States with a brother and sister about the beginning of the nineteenth century. Josiah Failing was reared on the farm of his parents and remained at home until a young man, going to New York about 1824. There he was married, June 15, 1828, to Miss Henrietta Ellison, daughter of Henry Ellison, of York, England, and Mary (Beek) Ellison, a native of New York. She was born in Charleston, S. C., whither her parents had gone shortly after their marriage. Mr. Ellison died suddenly when his daughter was hardly a month old, and the widow, with her fatherless infant, returned to the home of her parents in New York, where her daughter grew to womanhood. The Beeks were descended from the early Dutch settlers of the province, coming over from Holland before the transfer of the colony from the Dutch to the English more than two hundred years ago. Nathaniel Beek, father of Mrs. Ellison and grandfather of Mr. Failing, did service in the cause of independence during the Revolutionary war, in the Ulster county regiment of New York militia.

The early boyhood of Henry Failing was passed in his native city. He attended a public school in the ninth ward, then and now known as No. 3. The school was at that time under the control of the New York Public School Society, an organization which has long since ceased to exist, the management of the schools being now merged into the general system of the board of education. The work of the schools in those days was confined to the more simple branches, but what was taught was thoroughly done; so that when, in April, 1846, young Failing at the age of twelve bade farewell to school and sports, he was well grounded in the English branches. He entered the counting house of L. F. de Figanere & Co., in Platt street, as an office boy. M. de Figanere was a Portuguese, a brother of the Portuguese minister to the United States, and his partner, Mr. Rosat, was a French merchant from Bordeaux. The business of this firm was largely with French dealers in the city and it was there that Henry Failing acquired such a knowledge of the French language that he was enabled to both write and speak it with facility and correctness. Three years later, having meanwhile become an expert accountant, he became junior bookkeeper in the large dry-goods jobbing house of Eno, Mahoney & Co., of which concern Amos R. Eno (the lately deceased New York millionaire) was the head. His knowledge of the importing business and custom-house firms and dealers was such that neither of these two concerns had occasion for the services of a broker during his stay with them. Mr. Eno, with whom Mr. Failing maintained a correspondence until the former's death, told an intimate friend that it was one of the mistakes of his life that he did not make it more of an inducement for Henry Failing to remain with him. As it was, they parted with mutual regret.

The almost meagre opportunities for the acquirement of knowledge which Mr. Failing possessed were so diligently and wisely used that when, in 1851, a little more than seventeen years old, he made the great move of his life, he was better equipped for his future business career than many of far greater opportunities and educational facilities. April 15, 1851, in company with his father and a younger brother (the late John W. Failing), he left New York to establish a new business in Oregon. The journey was by sea to Chagres on the Isthmus of Panama, thence by boat up Chagres river, and thence to Panama by mule train. From Panama they came to San Francisco by the steamer Tennessee, afterwards lost on the coast. They reached Portland June 9, 1851, coming on the old steamer Columbia, which that year had been put on the route of the Pacific Steamship Company, C. H. Lewis, late treasurer of the water committee, being a passenger on the same steamer. For many years Mr. Failing and Mr. Lewis were accustomed to observe the anniversary together.

After a few months of preparation, building, etc., the new firm opened business on Front street, one door south of Oak. The original sign of J. Failing & Co. can be seen yet on the four-story building that occupies the ground. On this spot Mr. Failing continued to do business many years, retaining his interest until January, 1893. Josiah Failing from the first was prominent in municipal and educational affairs, being a member of the first city council in 1852 and mayor of the city in 1853. In 1854 the elder Failing retired from business and Henry Failing continued in his own name. He was married, October 21, 1858, to Miss Emily Phelps Corbett, youngest sister of Hon. H. W. Corbett, formerly of this city. Mrs. Failing died in Portland July 8, 1870, since which time he has been a widower. He had four daughters, one of whom died in infancy. Three are now living, namely: Miss Henrietta E. Failing, Mary F. Failing and Mrs. Henry C. Cabell, wife of Capt. Henry C. Cabell, U. S. A.

In the year 1869 Mr. Failing, in connection with his father, Josiah Failing, and Hon. H. W. Corbett, bought a controlling interest in the First National Bank of Portland from Messrs. A. M. and L. M. Starr, who had, with some others, established the bank in 1866. Mr. Failing was immediately made president of the institution, which he continued to manage until his death. Immediately after the change of ownership the capital of the bank was increased from $100,000 to $250,000, and in 1880 it was doubled to its present amount, $500,000, while the legal surplus and the undivided profits amount to more than the capital. In addition to this, dividends far exceeding the original investment have been made to the stockholders. In January of 1871

Mr. Failing and Mr. Corbett consolidated their mercantile enterprises, forming the firm of Corbett, Failing & Co., the co-partnership continuing twenty-two years, when Mr. Failing's interest terminated by the dissolution of the firm. The name of the concern is perpetuated in the present corporation of Corbett, Failing & Robertson, their successors.

In the political campaign of 1862 Mr. Failing was chairman of the state central committee of the Union party, a combination of Republicans and War Democrats, who carried Oregon for the Union in those exciting times. In 1864, at the age of thirty years, he was by popular vote elected mayor of the city of Portland, and during his first term in that office a new charter for the city was obtained, a system of street improvement adopted and much good work done. At the expiration of his term of office he was re-elected with but five dissenting votes. In 1873 he was again chosen mayor of the city and served for a full term of two years. His administration of the affairs of the city was able, progressive and economical. In the legislative act of 1885 he was named as a member of the water committee and upon its organization was unanimously chosen chairman of the committee, which position he held until his death. Upon all political questions he had decided convictions, in accordance with which he invariably acted; but he never engaged in political controversy nor indulged in personalities. His marvelous judgment and powers of exact calculation are well illustrated by his service as chairman of the water committee. For many years he, substantially unaided, annually made the estimates required by law of the receipts and expenditures of the committee for the year next ensuing. These estimates are, under the varied circumstances necessarily considered in making them, characteristic of him, and some of them are marvels of exactness. His estimate of the cost of operation, maintenance, repairs and interest for the year 1893 was $100,000, and the actual outlay was $100,211.91. His estimate of receipts for the year 1892 was $240,000, and the receipts actually collected were $237,300.85. His estimate of the receipts for the year 1897 was $232,000. The amount actually collected was $231,860.95. The magnitude of the task of making these estimates is emphasized when the fact is considered that not only the fluctuations in the population of a large city must be considered, but climatic conditions anticipated, and the amount of water consumed in irrigation based thereon; the amount of building and the volume of trade considered, and an estimate made of the amount of water consumed in building and in the use of elevators. These various sources of revenue were all carefully considered and estimates made which were in excess of the actual income in but trifling amounts.

The career of Mr. Failing affords encouragement to young men seeking place and power in business affairs. It demonstrates what can be accomplished by patient industry and honest effort, unaided by the scholastic training afforded by colleges and universities. The counting house was his schoolroom; but he studied not only men and their affairs, but also the best authors, becoming well informed in literature, science and the arts. He appreciated the advantages of a classical education and contributed liberally to the support and endowment of the educational institutions of this state. At the time of his death, which occurred November 8, 1898, he was a regent and president of the board of regents of the University of Oregon and was a trustee and treasurer of the Pacific University, the oldest educational institution of the state. He was a stanch friend and supporter of the religious and charitable institutions of the city and state. The First Baptist Church of Portland, and the Baptist Society of which he was many years the president, also the Children's Home, of which he was treasurer, were special objects of his solicitude, and he contributed largely to the support of all. In connection with the late William S. Ladd and H. W. Corbett he was active in the project for purchasing and laying out the grounds of Riverside cemetery. For many years he was desirous of seeing a suitable piece of ground laid out and properly improved for cemetery purposes, and this beautiful spot, where his remains now rest, is in no small degree the result of his effort. To the Portland Library Association, of which he was president, he made large donations in money and gave much time and thought to the work. The library building, now one of the fairest ornaments of our city, is largely the result of his benevolence and enterprise. He was especially generous and kind to the pioneers of the state, who, like him, aided in laying the foundation of a civilization which is now our common heritage, and his name will be remembered and honored by them and their posterity as long as the history of our state is written or read. In appreciation of his character and of his services to the city and state, his associates of the water committee of the city of Portland direct this tribute to his memory be entered upon their records.

HON. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN. Believers in the influence of heredity will find much to support their claims in the ancestral record of the governor of Oregon, Hon. George Earle Chamberlain. The qualities that have given him an eminent position in the public life of the northwest are his by inheritance from a long line of capable, scholarly and influential ancestors. The family of which he is a member came from England at an early period in American history and settled among the pioneers of Massachusetts. His grandfather, Dr. Joseph Chamberlain, a native of Delaware, was one of the distinguished physicians of Newark, that state. The lady whom he married also came of a prominent pioneer family. Her uncle, Charles Thomson, who served as secretary of the continental congress from 1774 to 1789, was born in Ireland, of Scotch lineage, November 29, 1729. Accompanied by three sisters he settled at New-castle, Del., in 1741, and there became a teacher in the Friends' Academy. In 1758 he was one of the agents appointed to treat with the Indians at Oswego, and while there was adopted by the Delawares, who conferred upon him an Indian name meaning "One who speaks the truth." The possessor of literary ability, he left his imprint upon the literature of his age through his "Harmony of the Five Gospels," a translation of the Old and New Testament, and an inquiry into the cause of the alienation of the Delaware and Shawnee Indians. His private file of letters, containing communications written to him while secretary of the continental congress and before that time, is among the most valued possessions of Governor Chamberlain, and contains letters from all the leading men of that day.

In the family of Dr. Joseph Chamberlain was a son, Charles Thomson Chamberlain, a native of Newark, Del., and a graduate of Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia. After receiving the degree of M. D., he settled in Natchez, Miss., in 1837, as offering a favorable opening for a professional man. During the years that followed he built up a large practice and established an enviable reputation for skill in the diagnosis and treatment of disease. An evidence of his kindly spirit of devotion to duty and self-sacrificing labors for others is shown by his record during the yellow fever epidemic of 1871. At that time, when many physicians felt justified in considering their own health, he attended patients night and day, without thought of self, until at last he was stricken with the disease and soon died.

The wife of Dr. Charles T. Chamberlain was Pamela H. Archer, a native of Harford county, Md., and now a resident of Natchez, Miss. Her father, Hon. Stevenson Archer, was born in Harford county, and graduated from Princeton College, 1805, after which he became an attorney. He served in congress from 1811 to 1817 from Maryland, and in the latter year accepted an appointment from President Madison as judge of Mississippi Territory with gubernatorial powers, and resigned later. From 1819 to 1821 he again represented his district in congress, where he was a member of the committee on foreign affairs. In 1825 he was elected one of the justices of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, which office he held until his death in 1848, at which time he was chief justice. His father, John Archer, M. D., was a native of Harford county, Md., born in 1741. After graduating at Princeton in 1760, he studied for the ministry, but throat trouble rendering pulpit work inadvisable, he turned his attention to medicine. The first medical diploma ever issued in the new world was given to him by the Philadelphia Medical College. In 1776 he was elected a member of the convention which framed the Constitution and Bill of Rights of Maryland. At the commencement of the Revolutionary war he had command of a military company, the first enrolled in Harford county, and was a member of the state legislature. After the war he practiced his profession and several important discoveries in therapeutics are credited to him. In 1797 he was a presidential elector and from 1801 to 1807 was a member of congress from Maryland. His death occurred in 1810. The Archer family is of Scotch-Irish descent and was represented among the earliest settlers of Harford county, where for generations they wielded wide influence. It is worthy of record that the portrait of Hon. Stevenson Archer appears among those of distinguished men of Maryland placed in the new courthouse in Baltimore, that state, and also adorns the courthouse in his native county.

In a family of five children, one of whom, Charles T. Chamberlain, is a merchant in Natchez, Miss., Hon. George Earle Chamberlain was third in order of birth. His name comes to him from an uncle, George Earle, who was one of the noted men of Maryland, and assistant postmaster general of the United States during General Grant's term as president. In his native city of Natchez, Miss., where he was born January 1, 1854, he received such advantages as the public schools afforded. On leaving school in 1870 he clerked in a mercantile store. Two years later, entering college at Lexington, Va., he took the regular course of study in the Washington and Lee University, from which he was graduated in July of 1876, with the degrees of A. B. and B. L. Shortly after his graduation he returned to Natchez, where he remained until after the presidential election. However, prospects for success in the south were not encouraging at the time, and he determined to seek a more favorable opening. With this purpose in view he came to Oregon, which has been his home since his arrival December 6, 1876. Early in 1877 he taught a country school and in the latter part of the year was appointed deputy clerk of Linn county, which position he held until the summer of 1879. During 1880 he was elected to the lower house of the legislature and in 1884 became district attorney for the third judicial district of Oregon. In the discharge of the duties of these various offices he gave satisfaction to all concerned, evincing wide professional knowledge and resourcefulness. His talents being recognized by the governor, he was given the appointment of attorney-general of Oregon on the creation of that office by act of legislature in 1891, his appointment bearing date of May 21, 1891. For a short time before this he had been interested in the banking business at Albany, being connected first with the First National Bank, and later with the Linn County National Bank.

At the general election following his appointment he was elected attorney-general on the Democratic ticket, receiving a majority of about five hundred, notwithstanding the fact that the Republican majority in Oregon at that time was about ten thousand. In 1900 he was elected district attorney of Multnomah county by a majority of eleven hundred and sixty-two, the county being then about four thousand Republican. The highest honor of his life came to him, unsolicited, in 1902, when the Democrats nominated him for governor by acclamation. In the election that followed he received a majority of two hundred and fifty-six over the Republican candidate, although on the congressional vote the state at the time was nearly fifteen thousand Republican. These figures are indicative of his popularity, not only with his own party, but with the general public. Among his large circle of friends and admirers are many who, though of different political faith, have yet such a warm regard for the man himself and such a firm faith in his ability to guide aright the ship of state, that many thousand votes were given him by people accustomed to vote another ticket than his own. It is doubtful if any public man possesses greater strength among the people of the state. Through the long period of his residence here he has won and maintained the confidence of the people, and his upright life, combined with unusual mental gifts, has given him his present prominence and prestige.

In Natchez, Miss., Mr. Chamberlain married Miss Sally N. Welch, who was born near that city, a descendant of an old Revolutionary family from New England. Her father, A. T. Welch, a native of New Hampshire, was a large planter near Natchez, the possessor of abundant means that rendered possible the giving of valuable educational advantages to his children. Mrs. Chamberlain was graduated from the Natchez Institute and is a lady of culture and refinement, an active member of the Calvary Presbyterian Church and also a member of the Eastern Star. Born of this marriage are the following children: Charles Thomson, a graduate of

Wm D. Fenton

Portland High School and Academy, and a member of the class of 1903, Cooper Medical College, San Francisco; Lucie Archer, Marguerite, Carrie-Lee, George Earle, Jr., and Fannie W.

The Commercial Club of Portland, Multnomah Amateur Athletic Club, University Club and Oregon State Historical Society, number Governor Chamberlain among their members. A life member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in Portland, he is past exalted ruler of the local lodge. While at Albany he joined the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he is past noble grand and a demitted member of lodge and encampment. Interested in the Knights of Pythias, he is past chancellor of Laurel Lodge No. 7 at Albany. His record in Masonry is interesting and proves him to have been devoted to the lofty principles of that order. His initial experience with Masonry began in St. Johns Lodge No. 62, A. F. & A. M., at Albany, of which he is past master. At this writing his membership is in Willamette Lodge No. 1, at Portland, and he is past grand orator of the Grand Lodge of Oregon. The Royal Arch degree was conferred upon him in Bailey Chapter No. 8, at Albany, in which he is past high priest, and he is also past grand high priest of the Grand Chapter of Oregon. He was raised to the Knight Templar degree in Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T., at Albany, in which he is past eminent commander. The thirty-second degree was conferred upon him in Oregon Consistory No. 1, at Portland, and he is also identified with Al Kader Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine.

JAMES D. FENTON. The genealogy of the Fenton family is traced to England, whence three brothers came to America, one settling in Virginia, another in New York and the third in New England. Descended from the Virginian branch was James E. Fenton, a native of the Old Dominion, born in 1798, and in early life a resident of Kentucky, but after 1820 a pioneer farmer of Boone county, Mo., where he died. His son, James D., was born and reared in Boone county and became a farmer in Scotland county, that state. From there, in May of 1865, he started across the plains with ox-teams, accompanied by his wife and seven children. Joining an expedition of over one hundred wagons, he was able to make his way safely through a region inhabited by hostile Indians. During the winter of 1865-66 he taught school near what is now Woodburn, in Marion county, Ore., but in the spring of 1866 he removed to a farm near McMinnville, Yamhill county. In addition to improving this property, he cleared a tract near Lafayette, and on the latter farm his death occurred in February of 1886, when he was fifty-four years of age. Through all of his active life he adhered to Baptist doctrines and favored Democratic principles. At one time he held the office of county commissioner.

The marriage of James D. Fenton united him with Margaret A. Pinkerton, who was born near Barboursville, Ky., and is now living in Portland, at seventy-two years of age (1902). Her father, David, was born near Asheville, N. C., of Scotch descent, and settled in Kentucky when a young man. After his marriage he established his home on a plantation near Barboursville. In 1846 he removed to Clark county, Mo., and from there in 1865, accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Fenton to Oregon. His grandfather, David Pinkerton, was a cartridge box maker and rendered valued service during the Revolutionary war. The Pinkerton ancestors became identified with the Carolinas as early as 1745. In the family of James D. and Margaret A. Fenton there were ten children, namely: William D., attorney-at-law, of Portland; Mrs. Amanda Landess, of Yamhill county; James Edward, an attorney at Nome, Alaska; Frank W., an attorney at McMinnville, Ore.; J. D., a practicing physician in Portland; H. L., a merchant at Dallas, Ore.; Charles R., an attorney, who died at Spokane, Wash., in 1893; Matthew F., who is engaged in dental practice at Portland; Hicks C., a physician of Portland; and Mrs. Margaret Spencer, also of Portland.

HON. WILLIAM D. FENTON. Within recent years, and particularly during the opening years of the twentieth century, William D. Fenton has gradually grown to be recognized, within the ranks of his profession and among the laity, as a man exerting a strong influence upon the current of public events in the city of Portland, and to no meager extent in the state of Oregon at large. His unquestioned ability as a legal practitioner and the hearty interest he has taken in affairs calculated to develop and foster the important material interests of the home of his adoption have brought him prominently before the public, in whom rests an abiding confidence in his manifest capabilities, his public spirit and his integrity of character. Educated in western schools, fortified by an accurate knowledge of the west and its resources, and well-grounded in the principles of the law, he began the practice of his profession with a good foundation of hope for future success. Since 1891 he has been engaged in practice in Portland, where, in addition to his general practice (with a specialty of corporation law), he now acts as counsel for the Southern Pacific Company in Oregon.

Mr. Fenton was born at Etna, Scotland county, Mo., June 29, 1853, a son of James D. and Margaret A. (Pinkerton) Fenton. (See sketch of James D. Fenton, preceding). When the family crossed the plains in 1865 he was old enough to be of considerable help to his father, and during much of the journey assisted by driving an ox-team. After settling in Oregon he took a preparatory course in McMinnville College, and in 1869 entered Christian College at Monmouth, Ore. (now the State Normal School), from which he graduated in 1872 with the degree of A. B. For a time thereafter he taught school in his home county. In 1874 he began the study of the law in Salem, and in December of the following year was admitted to the bar before the supreme court of the state. From 1877 to 1885 he practiced in Lafayette as a member of the firm of McCain & Fenton. During his residence in Yamhill county he served one term as a member of the state legislature representing that county. He first located in Portland in 1885, but six months later the death of his father caused him to return to Yamhill county, where he continued to reside four years. In April, 1889, he removed to Seattle, where he was engaged as assistant district attorney for a while. In June, 1890, he returned to Oregon, and the following year re-located in Portland, where he has since been continuously engaged in the practice of his profession. For some time he was a member of the firm of Bronaugh, McArthur, Fenton & Bronaugh, one of the strongest law firms of the northwest; but upon the death of Judge McArthur and the retirement of the senior Bronaugh the partnership was dissolved. Besides his interests in Portland he owns a portion of the old homestead.

Since the inception of the movement for holding the Lewis and Clark Exposition in Portland in 1905, Mr. Fenton has taken a leading part in the formulation of plans for that gigantic enterprise. As a member of the sub-committee on legislation of the Lewis and Clark board (consisting of Mr. Fenton, P. L. Willis and Rufus Mallory), he drafted the bill presented to the Oregon legislature at its session of 1903 and passed by that body. The bill provides that the governor shall appoint a commission of eleven members, who shall work in touch with the Lewis and Clark board; that if the commission and the board cannot agree upon any subject the differences shall be adjusted by the governor, secretary of state and state treasurer, whose decision shall be binding on the commission; that $50,000 of the $500,000 appropriated shall be used to pay the expenses of making an Oregon exhibit at St. Louis in 1904, and that as much of this exhibit as possible shall be returned to Oregon for the Lewis and Clark Exposition; that the commission shall erect a memorial building in Portland on ground to be donated for the purpose, provided that not more than $50,000 of the state's money shall go for this building, and provided that the Lewis and Clark board shall contribute $50,000 toward the cost of the same structure. The measure further provides that one-half of the total amount of the appropriation shall be available in 1904 and the remainder in 1905, but the commission is authorized to enter upon contracts before this money comes in, on warrants drawn by the secretary of state. It was Mr. Fenton's idea in framing the bill to give the commission as much discretion in the use of the public funds as would safely conserve the interests of the state.

In Monmouth, Ore., October 16, 1879, Mr. Fenton married Katherine Lucas, a native of Polk county, this state. Her father, Albert W. Lucas, a Kentuckian by birth, came to the northwest as early as 1853 and identified himself with the agricultural interests of Polk county. The four sons of Mr. and Mrs. Fenton are named as follows: Ralph Albert, member of the class of 1903, University of Oregon; Horace B., class of 1902, Portland Academy; Kenneth L., class of 1904, Portland Academy; and William D., Jr. The family attend the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which Mr. Fenton formerly served as trustee. He is a member of the State Bar Association, and socially is connected with the Arlington and University Clubs, being a charter member of the latter. His identification with Masonry dates from 1880, when he was initiated into Lafayette Lodge No. 3, A. F. & A. M. At this writing he is connected with Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M., Oregon Consistory No. 1, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

MILTON SUNDERLAND. Back to patriotic sires on both sides of his family, Milton Sunderland traces his descent, and unquestionably derived from these same admirable sources the reliable traits of character developed at a later period among the trying pioneer conditions of Oregon. Mr. Sunderland, who is rounding out his well directed retirement in Portland, was born in Mercer county, Mo., June 8, 1842, and was reared in Iowa until his tenth year. His paternal and maternal grandsires followed the martial fortunes of Washington for four years, one of them being a celebrated and most astute spy, who, afterward being captured, was one of two to successfully run the gauntlet and escape. The parents of Mr. Sunderland, mentioned at length in another part of this book, were Benjamin and Elizabeth (Schaffer) Sunderland, natives respectively of Tippecanoe county, Ind., and Pennsylvania.

The little log school house in Wapello county, Iowa, where Milton Sunderland gained his first glimpse into book lore, was situated one mile from the paternal farm, and was only patronized by the Sunderland children for a few months during the winter time. A flood appearing in 1851 his father decided to run no more risks in the Keokuk district, and an emigration of the family to the west was planned. The ten-year-old lad made himself useful driving loose cattle on the way, and he walked a great many miles of the long distance. The remarkable personality in this part of the great caravan that wound its way over river and plain was the mother of the six Sunderland children, who drove the family carriage drawn by two Canadian ponies, each weighing a thousand pounds, missing only one day of such service when once on the way. Also she was a ministering angel to the sick and weary and discouraged, and by her great strength of character and sublime faith in their ultimate good fortune, stimulated them to renewed effort.

After the family located on their permanent section of land, one mile east of Woodlawn, Milton, though barely eleven years of age, made himself generally useful, and materially assisted in grubbing and clearing the timbered land, and preparing the way for crops. About this time the family lived in a rude cabin with a dirt floor, and the inconvenience and loneliness can be appreciated only by those similarly placed. Having reached his majority Mr. Sunderland started for Florence, on the Salmon river, Idaho, his brother accompanying him on the four hundred mile walk. They had three pack horses, and were reasonably successful as miners, and also increased their revenue during the three years later devoted to logging on the Columbia Slough Road. In Portland Mr. Sunderland was interested in the wood business for eleven months, and then returned to the Columbia river district and engaged in the dairy business. Since then he has been dealing in stock on a large scale and has lived on farms in different parts of Multnomah county. His last rural residence was on the old Payne place of one hundred and ninety acres, where he engaged in farming until moving to Portland in 1886. This ranch, finely improved, and equipped with all modern labor saving devices, passed from the possession of Mr. Sunderland in March of 1901, and with it went the stock, which had the reputation of being among the finest in Multnomah county. At one time he owned as many as nine hundred acres, a considerable portion of which was in the city limits, and was therefore more suitable for residence and business blocks than stock raising. Mr. Sunderland is interested in a coal mine twenty-eight miles south of Portland, in Washington county, the company having already begun to operate the same. In the spring of 1902 Mr. Sunderland built a summer home at Hood River, three-fourths of a mile from the depot, and here the family spend much of their time during the summer.

Various social and other organizations benefit by the membership of Mr. Sunderland, whose genial manner and unflinching tact not only win but retain friends. He is essentially social in his tastes, and is devoted to out-of-door sports, especially hunting and fishing. Politically he has always been a firm supporter of the principles of the Democracy, and for several years served as school director, being an earnest advocate of good schools. For thirty-five years he has been identified with the Orient Lodge No. 17, I. O. O. F., and for many years a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Fidelity Lodge No. 4, in which he has passed all the chairs and is a charter member of the Degree of Honor, an auxiliary of the Workmen. With his wife he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and contributes generously of time and means towards its maintenance and charities.

His wife bore the maiden name of Elizabeth Stansbery. (A complete sketch of her family will be found in the biography which follows.) To Mr. and Mrs. Sunderland have been born the following children: Mary A., a graduate of the Portland Business College, and now Mrs. Beckwith of Portland; Charles, a graduate of the Portland high school, and now engaged in dairying on the Columbia Slough Road; Ivy M., Mrs. Rowe of Portland; and Bertha, at home with her parents.

All his life Mr. Sunderland has been a very busy man, and now that he has retired from active business he well deserves the rest which a long, busy and useful life rewards. At all times he has been ready and willing to give time and means in support of any measure that had for its basis the betterment of the conditions with which the people of Oregon are surrounded. He has never been a man that cared for publicity, preferring to do his part in a quiet unostentatious way. A man with strong domestic tastes, he has found his great happiness within the bosom of his family and all his life he has been a devoted husband and loving father. To such men too much credit cannot be given, for it is to them the great debt of gratitude is due, as they are the ones who have redeemed Oregon from a wilderness and they are the ones that have stood for all that was good and pure.

teams, encountering all of the hardships and privations incident to the long, tedious trip. A native of Indiana and a son of John Stansbery, John E. was thoroughly familiar with the life of the pioneer. His father was born in New Jersey and settled in the Hoosier state at a very early day. Later in life he removed to Jefferson county, Iowa, where he lived until death ended his career in this world. Reared on the plains of the great middle west, John E. Stansbery had few advantages, as in those days the services of the boy were too valuable to be wasted in school, and as soon as old enough he was obliged to perform his part of the farm labors. When a young man he learned the cooper's trade, which he followed for some years. Later he engaged in farming in the state of his nativity, and in 1852 he started for Oregon, but for some reason, when Jefferson county, Iowa, was reached, the little party tarried. Here he engaged in farming and stock raising until May 3, 1862. Then, in company with his wife and six children, he resumed the trip that had been begun ten years previous. Six months were spent in covering the weary distance and it was on October 15, 1862, that the little band reached Portland. For the first two years they lived on a farm near Hillsboro, while the third year was spent on what was known as the old Quimby place. The next five years were spent on the Whittaker farm, and then a dairy farm of one hundred and sixty acres was purchased in what is now Woodlawn. On this farm he conducted a dairy and carried on general farming up to the time of his death in September, 1881.

His wife, who in maiden life was Miss A. M. Hughes, was born in Charleston, Clark county, Ind., a daughter of William Hughes, a native of Kentucky. The original name of the Hughes family is veiled in obscurity, having been lost track of when the paternal great-great-grandfather was kidnapped from his seaport town in England, and brought to America when a very small lad. In this country he was adopted by a family by the name of Hughes, from whom he took his name. He accompanied them on their removal from Kentucky and remained with them after they took up their residence in Indiana. The paternal grandfather Hughes, also William by name, was a cooper by trade, and after he engaged in farming in Indiana he had a small shop on his farm, where he did the work of the neighborhood.

John E. Stansbery, the father of Mrs. Sunderland, married Miss A. M. Hughes, who is still living and resides in Portland. She became the mother of thirteen children, ten of whom grew to maturity, and nine of whom are now living, Nancy Elizabeth being the oldest; Mary Margaret is now Mrs. A. J. Dufur of Wasco county, Ore.; Susan E. is now Mrs. Windle of Portland; Rosa Bell married W. D. Zeller of Portland, but now in Dawson; Lucetta became the wife of John Foster, who died January 3, 1901; Frances is now Mrs. M. A. Zeller of Portland; J. E. and S. E. are twins and live in Woodlawn; and William Grant is living in Dawson. Mrs. Sunderland was reared in Iowa until her fourteenth year, when she accompanied her parents on their removal to Oregon. She has a very vivid remembrance of the long trip across the plains, which to her was a long joyous holiday.

In politics Mr. Stansbery was a firm supporter of the men and measures of the Republican party, but he never had the time nor inclination to take any active part in the political struggles, preferring rather to devote his whole time to his business interests. Fraternally he was identified with the Masonic order, while religiously he was an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

I. N. FLEISCHNER. The rapid development of manufacturing on the Pacific coast in recent years has brought to the front young men of executive ability and firm grasp of detail. A man of this progressive type is I. N. Fleischner, of the firm of Fleischner, Mayer & Co., Portland, the largest manufacturers of and dealers in dry goods in the Pacific northwest. Mr. Fleischner is a native Oregonian, having been born at Albany, July 16, 1859. His father, Jacob Fleischner, had settled in Oregon in the early '50s. Coming from Austria when quite a young man, he engaged for a time in merchandising in Iowa, but soon joined in the westward march and crossed the plains to Oregon in an ox-team, which was the only method of conveyance half a century ago. At Albany he began business again and widened his field of operations by moving to Portland in 1860. At present his family consists of himself and wife. Six children were born to this union, of whom two sons and three daughters are living.

I. N. Fleischner was educated in the public schools of Portland, supplementing the high school course by a term at St. Augustine Military College, Benicia, Cal., from which he was graduated in 1878. After leaving school, he entered the firm of which he is now a partner. Upon the death of his uncle, Louis Fleischner, he succeeded with his brother to the Fleischner end of the business. At that time the firm was composed of I. N. and Max Fleischner, Solomon Hirsch, Samuel Simon, and Mark A. Mayer. Mr. Hirsch has since died.

From the time that he first engaged in business, Mr. Fleischner has been actively identified with every movement for the good of the state of Oregon. He has served the Manufacturers' Association as vice-president and for two years was secretary of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, the most influential commercial body on the northwest coast. The Commercial Club and other business and social organizations include him among their members. In June, 1903, the city of Heppner, Ore., was partially destroyed by a flood and nearly two hundred and fifty people were drowned. A great amount of relief was sent from Portland to the stricken people, and Mr. Fleischner was honored by the mayor with appointment as chairman of the relief committee, a position which he filled with signal ability. Mr. Fleischner's firm was one of the largest subscribers to the stock of the Lewis and Clark Fair corporation, which has been formed to hold an international exposition at Portland in 1905 in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country by the explorers Lewis and Clark. Mr. Fleischner is a member of the board of directors of this corporation and chairman of the committee on press and publicity.

Mr. Fleischner is an extensive traveler and has made several trips abroad, taking in Europe, Asia and northern Africa. He is a close observer, and his letters and lectures on places he has visited have been greatly appreciated in Portland. Mr. Fleischner was married in 1887 to Miss Tessie Goslinsky, of San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. Fleischner have one child.

HON. JOSIAH FAILING. In the dawn of her awakening prosperity Portland had her commanding personalities who manipulated her resources with dexterous hand, and developed whatsoever of lasting good was suggested by her advantages of climate, situation and soil. Such an one was Hon. Josiah Failing, founder of a family of splendid commercial and moral importance, and transmitter of traits everywhere recognized as the fundamentals of admirable citizenship. So fine a mental revelation of Portland's needs, so harmonious a blending of opportunities and accomplishments, suggest to the student of nationalities the country from which he drew his inspiration, especially when he is universally recalled as one of the founders of the public school system of his adopted city. That empire which produced a John Jacob Astor, produced also the house of Failing, and from the Palatinate on the Rhine came the paternal grandfather of Josiah, who settled in the Mohawk Valley west of Albany, N. Y., in 1710. This emigrant ancestor had the thrift that is begotten by industry, the positive purpose born of moral motive and the vigorous mentality that is nurtured and strengthened by upright living, all of which are characteristics par excellence of the children of the Fatherland. Descendants of the establisher of the family in America continued to live in New York state, and at Canajoharie, Montgomery county, Josiah Failing was born on his father's farm, July 9, 1806.

Shut in by the horizon of the paternal acres, Mr. Failing realized his limitations and was convinced that destiny intended him for larger things than were possible in the then circumscribed life of the agriculturist, and when sixteen years of age he went to Albany, to learn the trade of paper stainer, and in 1824, accompanied his employer to New York. He served his apprenticeship and continued to follow his trade until he was forced to abandon it on account of ill health. His next venture was in the trucking business, which he followed for some years. During this time he served for several terms as superintendent of public vehicles of the city. Becoming convinced that the west with its undeveloped resources offered better inducements, he determined to seek a home on the Pacific coast, and in 1851, accompanied by his two oldest sons, Henry and John W., he came to Oregon, which was then a territory, and settled in Portland. Two years later he was followed by the remainder of the family. At that time the city was in its infancy, but Mr. Failing seemed to have faith in its future and soon after his arrival he organized the firm of J. Failing & Co. The following twelve years were devoted to the active management of this business, at the end of which time he retired.

The pronounced ability of Mr. Failing was bound to receive ready recognition in his new home in the west, and especially were his broad and liberal political tendencies required in shaping the future municipal policy of the town. In 1853 he was elected mayor of the city, and during his term of service he wisely directed its affairs from chaos to a semblance of order and stability. He was a delegate to the national convention which nominated President Lincoln for a second term, and to the convention which nominated General Grant. More than any other of the great forerunners of northwestern development he foresaw the advantages of educating the rising generation, and to this end devoted his most strenuous efforts, eventually accomplishing the establishment and management of that system whose present high excellence is attributed to his timely guidance. It is perhaps in this connection that Mr. Failing will be longest remembered, and no higher tribute could emanate from the hearts of a grateful posterity, who realize that this large-hearted and clear-minded pioneer saw them in his waking dreams, traversing the byways and lanes accessible to the assimilated intelligence of the world, and willingly gave of his time, his money and his counsel for the furtherance of his immeasurable desire.

In his religious inclinations Mr. Failing was a Baptist, and he was one of the founders of the first church of that denomination in the city of Portland, which occurred in August, 1860. Always interested in its advancement and well-being he actively promoted its interests, and contributed generously to its charities. To live far beyond the biblical allotment was the privilege of Mr. Failing, and to no wayfarer among the stress of a growing city could that "Old age serene and bright and lovely as a Lapland night" descend with greater beneficence. Throughout his days he was distinguished for honesty, industry, and that fine consideration for others which more than any other trait in human nature is responsible for the worth-while accomplishments and friendships of the world. He was both a philanthropist and a humanitarian, and his efforts to alleviate the misery around him were continuous rather than intermittent. His death, August 14, 1877, deprived the city of one of her noblest men. He not only left behind him the heritage of a good name, of substantial public services and unquestioned integrity, but has contributed to the future growth of Portland three sons, Henry, Edward and James F., men of high character and more than ordinary business ability.

JAMES F. FAILING, for many years a merchant of Portland, and now president of the wholesale hardware firm of Corbett, Failing & Robertson, bears a name forever enshrined among the pioneers of Oregon, and associated with the most substantial development of Portland. He was born in New York City, March 24, 1842, and of the six children born to Josiah and Henrietta (Ellison) Failing who reached maturity, he is the youngest. His parents were natives respectively of Montgomery county, N. Y., and Charleston, S. C. Josiah Failing died in Portland, August 14, 1877, and was survived by his wife until January 20, 1885. Of the children in the family Mary F. is now Mrs. Merrill of Portland; Elizabeth became the wife of John Conner of Albany, Ore., but is now deceased; Henry is mentioned at length in another part of this work; John W. studied medicine after retiring from business in 1865, and thereafter practiced near Knoxville, Tenn., up to the time of his death, in January, 1895; Edward is also written of in this work; and James F. completes the number.

When eleven years old James F. Failing came with his brother and mother around the Horn in the ship Hurricane, the journey to San Francisco taking four months. They came at once to Portland, the trip being made by steamer. The youth was educated at the Portland Academy and Female Seminary, which was the leading school of the state, and in 1860, after completing his studies, began clerking for his brother Henry. January 1, 1871, was organized the firm of Corbett, Failing & Co., Henry Failing and Mr. Corbett being the two principal partners, the other members of the firm being Marshall B. Millard, Edward Failing, James F. Failing as the Portland partners, and John A. Hatt as the eastern partner. With some changes the firm continued in business in Portland until January 1, 1895, at which time the corporation of Corbett, Failing & Robertson was formed, consisting largely of the two firms of Corbett, Failing & Co., and Foster & Robertson. The firm carry one of the largest hardware stocks in the northwest, and the business is still located on the east side of Front street, between Oak and Stark streets. Although still president of the company James F. Failing retired from business about two years ago, and is now enjoying a rest from a very active career.

In Albany, Ore., in 1880, Mr. Failing was united in marriage with Jane J. Conner, Mrs. Failing being a native of Albany, and daughter of John and Martha (Whittlesey) Conner. Mr. Conner was a pioneer merchant and banker of Albany, who died in Portland February 12, 1902. Mrs. Failing is a graduate of the Albany Collegiate Institute, and is the mother of five children: Edward J., a graduate of Yale University, class of 1903; Kate Whittlesey, attending school at Waterbury, Conn.; John Conner; Frederick Ellison; and Henrietta Chase. Mr. Failing is a member of the First Baptist Church of Portland. He is a Republican in politics, and is a member of the Oregon Historical Society, and the Oregon Pioneers.

EDWARD FAILING. In writing the history of a city or county one must devote considerable space to the men who have built up and developed the commercial industry. The present generation of Oregon owes much to those men, who, by their business ability and perseverance, have made this one of the greatest states in the Union. Although not a native of Oregon, practically the entire life of Mr. Failing was spent in the city of Portland. It was here he received his educational training and it was here that he first entered the mercantile field. His efforts were well rewarded, and when he died he was able to leave his family a comfortable competence.

A native of New York City, Mr. Failing was born December 18, 1840, a son of Josiah and Henrietta (Ellison) Failing. (A complete sketch of Josiah Failing will be found on another page of this work.) At the age of thirteen our subject was brought to Portland by his parents. Soon afterward he entered the Portland Academy and Female Seminary, where he received his educational training. It was natural that he should take to the business in which his father was engaged, and when a young man he entered the store of H. W. Corbett, accepting an humble position. By close application and industry he steadily advanced from a clerkship, until, in 1868, he was admitted to the firm of H. W. Corbett & Company. On the formation of the firm of Corbett, Failing & Company, he became one of the members, and when this firm was succeeded by Corbett, Failing & Robertson, he remained with the latter organization. While the greater part of his time was devoted to his store duties, he nevertheless found time to take an active interest in other business affairs, and was for a time a director of the First National Bank of Portland. Two years prior to his death, which occurred January 29, 1900, he retired from active business and devoted his time to the settlement of his brother Henry's estate.

In Trinity Church, Portland, August 2, 1866, Mr. Failing was united in marriage with Miss Olivia B. Henderson, daughter of Robert Henderson, a native of Tennessee. Mr. Henderson crossed the plains to Oregon in 1846, and settled in Yamhill county, where he later purchased a farm upon which he lived for the remainder of his life. His well-directed life was interspersed with some outside activity, among which may be mentioned a season of mining in California in 1849. His thrift and industry were rewarded with a competence, and his home seven miles south of McMinnville, and five miles from his first settlement in Oregon, was one of the most desirable in that section of the county. His death occurred November 1, 1890, in his eighty-second year. He was survived by his wife, who was formerly Miss Rhoda C. Holman, until 1901, when she, too, was called to her final reward. Mrs. Henderson was born in Kentucky. Besides Mrs. Failing there were the following children: Lucy A., the wife of Judge Deady, Portland; Mary Elizabeth, Mrs. George Murch, Coburg; John J., Coburg; Frances A., Mrs. John Catlin, Portland; J. Harvey, Salem; Alice M., Mrs. C. C. Strong, Portland; and William A., Salem. The three sons of Robert Henderson spent a large portion of their lives on the old homestead in Yamhill county. Mrs. Failing was born in the northern part of California. She was educated principally in Portland and during her married life was her husband's greatest comfort and consolation. Since his death she has lived at the family home in Portland. The order of birth of her nine children is as follows: Henrietta Henderson; Lucy Deady; Elsie C., the wife of E. H. Shepard; Emma Corbett; Katherine Fredericka; Rhoda Duval; Ernestine; Henry Robertson; and Olivia H. Mrs. Failing is an active member of the Trinity Episcopal Church.

The death of Mr. Failing was a blow to the city of Portland that was felt by all. A man of splendid business ability, his most earnest efforts were directed towards maintaining the integrity of the enterprises with which he was connected, and in placing them on a par with the best of their kind in the world. Quiet in manner, he never had the desire for public life found in many. Not that he was not public spirited, for there was no man in Portland that took a more active interest in the welfare of the city than he. No movement calculated to be of benefit to the city of his adoption went by without his endorsement and he was at all times willing to give of his time and means. Although he did not unite with any church, he was an ardent Baptist and strong supporter of that denomination. Of his goodness and thoughtfulness in the midst of his dearly beloved family, the various members alone are capable of testifying. It can truly be said, the world is better for having known him. In his life there was much that was worthy of emulation. He was a noble man and his record is one of which Portland is proud.

HON. JULIUS C. MORELAND. During the stirring days in England when Oliver Cromwell held the reins of power one of his staunch supporters was a member of the Moreland family, but after the death of the Protector it seemed advisable for this ancestor to seek another home; hence about 1660 he crossed the ocean to Virginia, settling on the James river. From him descended a long line of planters, who were strict adherents of the Quaker faith. John Moreland, a Virginian by birth, settled in North Carolina in young manhood, but in 1807 moved to Kentucky and five years later settled in Tennessee, where he died about 1853. Though reared in the Quaker religion, he became connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and his son, Rev. Jesse Moreland, who was born near Asheville, N. C., January 1, 1802, for more than seventy years held a license as a local preacher in that denomination. All of this ministerial work was done gratuitously, for love of humanity and a desire to uplift men and women through the benign influence of Christianity. Meantime, in order to earn a livelihood, he conducted farm pursuits. Discerning the evil influence of slavery, he determined to seek a home far removed from its shadow, and therefore settled in Carlinville, Macoupin county, Ill., in 1848. Four years later, accompanied by his wife and seven children, he crossed the plains with ox-teams, crossing the Missouri at St. Joseph, thence proceeding up the Platte, and finally arriving in Oregon October 6, after a journey of six months. The home of the family for some time was on a farm in Clackamas county. After the death of his wife in 1859 he took up merchandising, which he followed for twelve years. In 1882 he settled in Salem, thence went to Portland, where he died March 3, 1890, at the age of eighty-eight years, three months and two days. While living in Carlinville he was made a Mason in Mount Nebo Lodge, of which Gen. John M. Palmer was then master.

The wife of Rev. Jesse Moreland was Susan Robertson, a native of Cumberland county, Tenn., and a daughter of George and Elizabeth (Nelson) Robertson. The founder of the family in America was Gen. William Robertson, an officer under Cromwell and a member of the jury in the trial of Charles I, and as such a participant in the order demanding the death of Charles II. On the death of Cromwell he sought safety by flight, and in 1658 settled in Virginia. Major Charles Robertson, who was born in the Old Dominion, about 1750 went to North Carolina. In 1768 he and a brother James crossed over the then wilderness to what is now Watauga Springs, Tenn., where they settled in the midst of the wildest surroundings imaginable, being, in fact, the first white settlers in the entire state. Soon they were joined by John Sevier. Both James and Charles were soldiers of the Revolution. The name of James Robertson is preserved in history as that of one of the four most celebrated men of Tennessee. Though less prominent, Charles was no less active and worthy. In the war with England he fought at Eutaw Springs, Cowpens, Musgrove Mills, and other engagements, holding the rank of major. His son, George, though only fifteen years of age, insisted upon entering the colonial army but was refused permission. With a spirit worthy of his ancestors he determined to go even without permission, and the following morning Major Robertson was surprised to find that his best horse and rifle as well as the boy were missing. A desire to fight the British was strong among those Tennessee pioneers, and it finally became necessary to draft men into the home guard, in order that there might be men enough left to protect the women and children against the Indians.

During the war of 1812 five of the Robertsons fought under Jackson in New Orleans and later Julius C. N. Robertson was a brigadier-general in the Creek war under the same general. Major Charles Robertson died in 1797, but his brother James survived until 1820. George, the fifteen-year-old soldier, became a farmer and died about 1830. In the family of Rev. Jesse Moreland there were nine children. Wesley, who was captain of Company C, Seventh Iowa Infantry, was in the Civil war with Wallace at Shiloh, with Grant at Donelson and Henry, and with Lyon at Booneville and Wilson Creek; he passed away June 23, 1862, and rests at Corinth. The other members of the family were as follows: Mrs. Sarah J. Owen, of Mount Tabor, Portland; Martha, who died in Illinois at twenty years of age; Mrs. Mary Robinson, of Portland; William, of Clackamas county, Ore.; Samuel A., who was attorney, police judge and a writer on the staff of the Oregonian, and who died in Portland in 1886; Eliza and Josephine, who died in Oregon respectively in 1857 and 1860; and Julius C., who was born in Smith county, Tenn., June 10, 1844, and is now an attorney of Portland.

When eight years of age Julius C. Moreland accompanied his parents to Oregon, where he aided in clearing a farm, having the privilege of attending school three months during the year. In April of 1860 he came to Portland and secured employment in the composing room of the Oregon Farmer, where he remained for three and one-half years. Afterwards he attended the old Portland Academy, from which he was graduated in 1865. For six weeks during 1864 he had charge of the state printing office at Salem. After graduating he began the study of the law, working at intervals at his trade in order to pay expenses. In 1867 he was admitted to the bar, after which he practiced in Boise City, Idaho, and also followed his trade on the Idaho Statesman for a year. On his return to Portland he acted as foreman for the Daily Oregonian for a short time. In December, 1868, he formed a partnership with John F. Caples under the firm name of Caples & Moreland, the two continuing together for six years. In 1885 and 1886 Governor Moody appointed Mr. Moreland county judge of Multnomah county, and in 1890 he was elected to the office, which he filled efficiently for a term of four years. Since then he has devoted his attention to professional practice. A man of conspicuous legal talent, he ranks among the leading attorneys of the state, while his genial personality wins many friends outside the ranks of strictly professional circles. In politics a Republican, he was at one time secretary of the state central committee, from 1872 to 1875 was a member of the city council, and from 1877 to 1882 held office as city attorney.

In Boise City, July 3, 1867, Judge Moreland married Abbie B. Kline, who was born in Fort Scott, Kans., and in 1853 accompanied her parents to Corvallis, Ore. They have five children, viz.: Harvey L., who is in the insurance business: Susie A., wife of M. W. Gill, of Portland; Eldon W., who is in the employ of the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company; Julius Irving and Lucen. The position of president which Judge Moreland holds in the Oregon Pioncers' Association has brought him into close contact with many of the leading pioneers of the state, by all of whom he is held in high regard. He is connected with the Portland Chapter, Sons of the American Revolution, is a member of the Commercial Club, the State Bar Association and the Portland Board of Trade. Though not identified with any denomination, he is a contributor to religious movements, especially to the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which his wife is a member. His initiation into Masonry occurred October 22, 1866, in Harmony Lodge No. 12. In 1872 he became a charter member of Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M., of which he served as master in 1878-79. In 1872 he became affiliated with Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., of which he officiated as high priest in 1884-85. In 1879 he became associated with the Knights Templar through his initiation into Oregon Commandery No. 1. In 1893-94 he was grand master of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, and previous to this he had served as grand orator of the Grand Lodge, grand senior deacon and deputy grand master. Since 1888 he has been identified with Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland. No follower of Masonry has been a more devoted disciple of its high principles than has he, and in his life, whether occupying public office or discharging the duties of a private citizen, it has been his ambition to exemplify the teachings of the order.

HON. MELVIN C. GEORGE. From the colonial period of American history the George family has borne its part in epoch-making events. While each generation contributed to the development of the country's material resources, they also gave men of valor to assist in our nation's wars. Jesse George, grandfather of M. C., was a soldier in the Revolutionary struggle, serving in Captain Radican's company of volunteers from Virginia, and later in Capt. William George's company in a regiment commanded by Col. Thomas Merriweather. His enlistment dated from September 1, 1778, and he continued at the front until peace was established. Afterward, with Virginia troops, he was sent on a journey of exploration to the northwest, and during the trip he was so pleased with the prospects that he decided to migrate further west. Accordingly he at once took his family to Ohio, where he was one of the very earliest settlers. In recognition of his services in the army he was granted a pension by Lewis Cass, secretary of war, his hardships, sacrifices and perils of several years being recognized by the munificent pension of $13.50 per annum, a little more than a dollar a month. There is now in the possession of M. C. George a copy of an application made by this Revolutionary ancestor in which he asked for an increase in the pension.

In the family of Jesse George was a son, Presley George, who was born in Loudoun county, Va., and grew to manhood in Ohio. There he married Mahala Nickerson, who was born at Cape Cod, Mass., and grew to womanhood in Ohio. Her father, Col. Hugh Nickerson, who was born in Massachusetts in 1782, commanded a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers in the war of 1812, and later settled in Ohio. His wife, Rebecca Blanchard, was also of eastern birth. Tracing his ancestry we find that his father, Hugh Nickerson, Sr., was a soldier in the Revolutionary war in Capt. Benjamin Godfrey's company, under Colonel Winslow. This Revolutionary soldier was a son of Thomas and Dorcas (Sparrow) Nickerson, and a grandson of Thomas Nickerson, Sr., whose father, William, was a son of William Nickerson, Sr., a passenger on the ship John and Dorothy, which crossed the ocean from Norwich, England, and landed in Boston June 20, 1637. On the Sparrow side the ancestry is traced back to Elder William Brewster, one of the chief founders of Plymouth colony, and a ruling elder of the church at Leyden, and at New Plymouth, also keeper of the postoffice at Scrooby, at that day an office of considerable importance. Another ancestor of the Sparrow family was Governor Thomas Prince, who in 1621 crossed to Plymouth from England in the ship Fortune, and afterward held office as governor of Massachusetts.

The family of Presley George consisted of eight children, but five of these died of diphtheria or scarlet fever in Ohio. The father and mother, with the three surviving children, left their eastern home and proceeded by boat from Marietta to St. Joe, Mo. There they outfitted with ox-teams and crossed the plains, arriving in Linn county, Ore., at the expiration of six months. Previous to this they camped for several weeks in what is now East Portland, where there were only two houses at that time. Entering a donation claim near Lebanon, the father took up the work of a farmer in the new locality. Coming from a timber country, he preferred a location where there was a forest growth and accordingly settled in the midst of a heavy timber. However, an experience of eight years proved unsatisfactory, and he moved to another farm three miles from Lebanon, where he remained until his retirement from agricultural pursuits. At the time of his death, which occurred at the home of his son, M. C., in Portland, he was eighty-three years of age. It is worthy of note that he was the youngest of fifteen children, all of whom lived to be more than seventy years of age, and the men of the family were without exception large, stalwart and sturdy, weighing two hundred pounds or more. His wife also attained the age of eighty-three and died at the home of her son in Portland. In religion they were members of the Old School Baptist Church. On the disintegration of the Whig party, he identified himself with the Republicans. Of his three sons, Hugh N., who was a teacher, journalist and attorney at Albany, and a presidential elector in 1864, died in his home city in 1882. The second son, J. W., who was United States marshal of Washington in 1884, died in 1892 in his home city, Seattle. The only surviving member of the family is Hon. M. C. George, of Portland, who was born near Caldwell, Noble county, Ohio, May 13, 1849. To the advantages of an academic education he added a course of study in Willamette University, after which he had charge of the academy at Jefferson and also for a year acted as principal of the Albany public school.

In order to fit himself for the profession of law, toward which his tastes directed him, Mr. George took up a course of study in 1873 under Judge Powell of Albany, later reading with Colonel Effinger of Portland. On his admission to the bar he began to practice in Portland. At once he entered upon public life as a leader in the Republican party. From 1876 to 1880 he represented his district in the state senate. During the latter year he was nominated for congressman-at-large against Governor Whitaker, the incumbent, and was elected by a majority of almost thirteen hundred. In March of 1881 he took his seat in congress. The following year he was re-elected, serving in the forty-seventh and forty-eighth sessions of congress. While in that body he was a member of the committees on commerce and revision of laws. Much of his legislation was in connection with the opening of Indian reservations and concerning the establishment of a territorial government in Alaska. Large appropriations were secured for Oregon, including the payment of the Modoc Indian bill of $130,000. On the expiration of his term in 1884 he declined to be a candidate for re-election, and resumed the practice of law. However, his fellow-citizens recognized that his qualities admirably adapted him for public service and frequently solicited him to accept offices of trust. In 1897 Governor Lord appointed him judge, and in June of the following year he was elected to the office to fill an unexpired term of two years. At the expiration of that time he was elected for a full term of six years, and has since filled the office, discharging its many and responsible duties in a manner calculated to place him in a rank with the most able jurists of the state.

The marriage of Judge George occurred at Lebanon in 1872 and united him with Miss Mary Eckler, who was born in Danville, Ill. Her parents removed from Kentucky to Illinois, where her mother died. Later the family started across the plains. During the journey the father died and was buried on the present site of Council Bluffs. From there the sons brought the balance of the family to Oregon, arriving here in 1853. Three daughters, Florence, Edna and Jessie, comprise the family of Judge and Mrs. George. The oldest daughter is a graduate of Fabiola Hospital training school in San Francisco.

Fraternally Judge George has numerous connections. In the Odd Fellows' Order he has been past grand and a member of the encampment. He was made a Mason in Lebanon Lodge and now belongs to Washington Lodge at Portland, of which he was past master for three years. His initiation into the Royal Arch chapter took place at Corvallis, and he is now identified with Washington Chapter in Portland, besides which he belongs to Portland Commandery, K. T., and Portland Consistory, thirty-second degree. For five years Judge George was a director of the city schools of Portland and during two years of that time he was honored with the presidency of the board. As a member and (for a time) chairman of the board of bridge commissioners, he was directly instrumental in the erection of the Burnside bridge in Portland. The State Bar Association numbers him among its members, as do also the Oregon Pioneers' Society, State Historical Society, Chapter of Sons of the American Revolution and Sons and Daughters of Oregon Pioneers, of which last-named he has officiated as president from the date of its organization.

JACOB MAYER. The lights and shadows, failures and successes which are the inevitable heritage of the strong and reliant and resourceful have not been omitted from the life of Jacob Mayer, whose name in Portland stands for all that is commercially substantial, personally upright and practically helpful. As long ago as 1857 Mr. Mayer came to Oregon, bringing with him a wide knowledge of men and affairs, and here he opened a retail dry goods store. In 1865, just at the close of the Civil war, he started, in Portland, the first exclusive wholesale dry goods business in the northwest. In the years that have intervened his strenuous vitality and profound appreciation of the opportunities by which he has been surrounded have penetrated with telling effect the industrial, social, humanitarian and political atmosphere of his adopted city, and rendered worth while an ambition which else had been characterized by spectacular money getting and keeping.

The most remote memory of Mr. Mayer goes back to the town of Bechthelm, near Worms and Mentz, in the province of Rhein-Hessen, Germany, where he was born May 7, 1826. He is the youngest of the children in the family of Aaron Mayer, a merchant of the Fatherland who immigrated to America in 1847, lived for a time in New Orleans, but eventually removed to St. Louis, Mo., where the remainder of his life was passed. His son Jacob had preceded him to America in 1842, and the youth secured a position with his brother as clerk, in 1849 starting an independent dry goods business of his own in New Orleans. This proved to be a very satisfactory departure, but the business was disposed of the following year, owing to the gold excitement in California, and preparations were made for a similar business on the western coast. During 1850 Mr. Mayer started for the Isthmus, carrying with him a cargo of merchandise, and accompanied by his wife and children. Arriving at Panama he boarded the Sarah and Eliza, upon which slow-going craft the passengers experienced such misery, deprivation and adventure as falls to the lot of but few whose pioneer longings lay toward the western sea. One hundred days out from Panama the supply of water and provisions was practically exhausted, and but a half pint of water a day was the meager allowance available for slaking thirst. Sharks and pelicans served as food for the wayfarers upon the trackless waste of waters, and served to render less hideous the haunting fear of starvation which intercepted their fast diminishing dreams. When hope became an elusive phantom there loomed upon the horizon a Boston ship with a less depleted larder, and to strained eyes and failing faculties it seemed like a mirage above the desert sands. For a barrel of sea biscuit Mr. Mayer gave the extent of his money possessions, which amounted to $800, and thus terminated indescribable suffering of mind and body, the memory of which had haunted the consciousness of the voyageurs as naught save such experiences can. One hundred and twenty days after leaving Panama the Sarah and Eliza wandered into the port of San Francisco, discharged its commercial and human cargo, having added a sorry chapter to its life upon the deep.

In March, 1850, Mr. Mayer started the second dry goods store in the city of San Francisco, the first, that of Sac & Kenney, having been started by a Frenchman. Mr. Mayer conducted his business until 1857, and that year he came to Oregon, where he engaged in the retail dry goods business until starting a wholesale dry goods business in 1865. For ten years, or until 1875, he continued alone, but in that year he formed a partnership with L. Fleischner, A. Schlüssel and Sol Hirsch, under the title of Fleischner, Mayer & Co., which has stood to the present day, although Mr. Mayer is the only member of the old firm now living, and he has turned the business over to his son Mark. Having come to the front in all matters pertaining to the development of the city of his adoption, Mr. Mayer has lent his fine business and executive ability, tempered with extreme benevolence, to the inaugurating and promoting of the best known enterprises here represented. For the past ten years he has been president of the Masonic Building Association; is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade, and is one of the pioneers and charter members of the Oregon Historical Society. All charitable organizations, irrespective of denominational influence, have profited by his substantial and practical support, and it is to his credit that he was the founder of the first Hebrew Benevolent Society of San Francisco, and he was also the founder of a similar organization in this city. As a member of the Young Men's Christian Association he has exerted an influence for high living and large accomplishment, and his efforts have been as praiseworthy in connection with the organization of the first B'nai B'rith Society on the coast, which was none other than that of District No. 4 of California, and today he is the only charter member living. In 1855 he obtained the charter for Ophir No. 21, and from this and District No. 4 were formed various branches in the state. He organized Oregon Lodge No. 65, of which he was first president and is still a member. Mr. Mayer was also the organizer and one of the charter members of the Congregation Beth Israel, in which he has been prominent from the beginning, and has held the various offices of the organization.

Fraternally Mr. Mayer has been connected with the Masons since 1852, when he became a member of Perfect Union Lodge No. 17 of San Francisco, and was afterward a member and for two years master of Lebanon Lodge No. 49, also of San Francisco. In Portland he is identified with Willamette Lodge No. 2; is a member of Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M.; Washington Council No. 3, R. & S. M.; Oregon Lodge of Perfection No. 1; Ainsworth Chapter Rose Croix No. 1; Multnomah Council of Kadosh No. 1; Oregon Consistory No. 1; Supreme Council of Jurisdiction, thirty-third degree, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. For many years he was grand treasurer of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, and during 1888 and 1889 was grand master of the Grand Lodge of Oregon. He is, and has been for many years, grand representative of the Grand Lodge of England and Spain, near the Grand Lodge of Oregon, to which position he was appointed in 1895 by Prince Edward of Wales, now King of England. Another office held by Mr. Mayer is that of treasurer and chairman of the education fund of the Grand Lodge of Oregon.

In New Orleans Mr. Mayer was united in marriage to Mary Auerbach, who was born in Germany, and who is the mother of six children, the order of their birth as follows: Josephine, now Mrs. Solomon Hirsch of Portland, and whose husband was minister to Turkey; Clementine, now Mrs. Oscar Meyer of New York City; Bertha, the wife of H. Zadig of San Francisco; Rosa, now Mrs. M. Blum of San Francisco; Mark A., representative of his father's dry goods business in New York City; and Benjamin, who died in San Francisco at the age of twenty-three years. Mr. Mayer is a broad and liberal politician, and his exertions in behalf of his party have been characterized by the same good sense and appreciation of the needs of the community which have been discernible in his business and social undertakings. Among the political services rendered by him may be mentioned that of United States commissioner for the New Orleans World's Fair, to which responsibility he was appointed by President Arthur.

E. E. SHARON. To the members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows Mr. Sharon is known as one of the leading workers in the organization in Portland, and, indeed, in Oregon itself. His connection with the fraternity began at Pendleton, this state, where he was initiated in Eureka Lodge No. 32, February 17, 1883. For some time he was its secretary, also held rank as past grand, and still retains membership in the same lodge. Formerly connected with Umatilla Encampment No. 17, he was past chief patriarch and scribe, and is now scribe of Elison Encampment No. 1, of Portland. When the Grand Lodge was in session at Pendleton in 1894 he was honored by election as grand secretary of the order, and removed to Portland, where he has since made his home. At each succeeding meeting he has been re-elected grand secretary of the Grand Lodge. At the same time and place (Pendleton, in 1894) he was elected grand scribe of the Grand Encampment of Oregon, and each year since then he has been regularly chosen to succeed himself in this office. Under his oversight there are one hundred and forty-nine lodges, forty-five encampments and more than one hundred Rebekah lodges.

The Sharon family is of English extraction.

John Sharon, a pioneer farmer of Mount Pleasant, Jefferson county, Ohio, had a son, James H., who was born at the old homestead there, and married Amanda L. Van Dorn, a native of Ohio, of German and Welsh descent. They began housekeeping at his old home and there a son, E. E., was born January 22, 1860, he being the oldest of six children, five now living. Of the others J. L. lives in Pendleton, Ore., Mary is in San Francisco, and Jessie and Lura reside in Wheeling, W. Va. In 1861 the father took his family to Monona county, Iowa, and a year later crossed the plains by horse-train, arriving at the Rocky Bar Mines in Idaho at the close of a tedious trip of six months. In 1865 he came to Oregon and settled in Umatilla county, where he engaged in farming, surveying and teaching. In 1875 he was appointed clerk of Umatilla county and elected for a full term of two years in 1876. This election was a personal tribute to his popularity, for the county usually gave a large Democratic majority. His death occurred in 1889 in Pendleton, where his widow still resides.

On completing the studies of the Pendleton high school, E. E. Sharon began to assist his father in the office of county clerk, and later was with the next incumbent of the office. On resigning he became editor of the Pendleton Tribune, a leading Republican paper of the county. In 1881 he sold his interest in the paper and went to San Francisco, where he was graduated from Heald's Business College in 1882. For three months afterward he was engaged as a bookkeeper in Oakland, thence proceeded to Boise City, but soon returned to Pendleton, where he was bookkeeper for Alexander & Frazier a period of three years. Later he acted as deputy sheriff, and finally resumed the editorship of the newspaper with which he had previously been connected. A later venture was in the insurance business and as express agent. From Pendleton he came to Portland in 1894 and has since made this city his home.

At Pendleton, December 12, 1886, Mr. Sharon married Miss Frankie B. Purcell, who was born in Muscatine, Iowa. Her father, Thomas Purcell, a native of Indiana, born May 25, 1829, settled in Muscatine, Iowa, where he followed contracting. During the Civil war he was captain of Company C, Sixteenth Iowa Infantry, and while leading his men in action received a severe wound, afterward falling into the hands of the enemy, by whom he was confined in Libby and Andersonville, and finally exchanged. After the war he continued in Iowa until 1879, when, with his wife and child, he crossed the plains and settled in Weston, Ore., and there engaged in contracting and also sold furniture. Fraternally he was a Master Mason and a Grand Army adherent. His death occurred in Weston May 11, 1890. His first wife, Hester Ann Myers, was born in Louisville, Ky., and died in Iowa, leaving three children, namely: William, a farmer of Pendleton; Josephine, in Iowa; and Frankie B., Mrs. Sharon. After the death of his first wife he married Sadie O. Arlie, of Iowa. Mrs. Sharon is a member of the Rebekahs, in which she formerly served as noble grand, and is also a member of the Knights and Ladies of Security. On the organization of the Muscovites Mr. Sharon became a charter member and was elected the first recorder, which position he still holds. In Pendleton Lodge No. 52, A. F. & A. M., he was made a Mason, and is now past master of Hawthorn Lodge No. 111, of Portland; and also a member of Washington Chapter No. 18, R. A. M., of Portland, in which he is past high priest and secretary; and a member of Washington Council No. 3, R. & S. M. He became a member of the Knights of Pythias at Pendleton in 1880, and is now past chancellor of Ivanhoe Lodge No. 10, also past grand chancellor of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, 1892-93, and for four years supreme representative from Oregon. Besides belonging to the Order of Rebekahs he is connected with Webfoot Camp, Woodmen of the World. Always a staunch Republican, his interest in the success of his party led him to once accept the position as chairman of the Umatilla county central committee and at another time he served as its secretary. Both he and his wife are identified with the Episcopal Church, in which faith they are rearing their three children, Bessie, Leila and Allen.

HON. HENRY SPOOR ROWE. Descended from an old colonial family of New England, Henry S. Rowe was born in Bolivar, Allegany county, N. Y., October 11, 1851, his parents being John S. and Hulda (Peck) Rowe, also natives of New York. His father, who was master of seven different trades and a man of great mechanical genius, devoted much of his life to the building of grist and saw mills, first in New York and later in the south and in Wisconsin. In mechanical work with wood and iron he had few superiors. His ability in invention made it possible for him to construct anything from a violin to a large mill, and in his labors as master mason he won praise from people most competent to judge.

The wife of John S. Rowe was a daughter of Joel Peck, a New Yorker who became one of the pioneer farmers of Palmyra, Wis., where he died. One of her brothers, George R. Peck, is a prominent attorney of Chicago, and another, Charles B. Peck, is a leading citizen of Houston, Tex. In her family there were four sons and two daughters, of whom two sons and one daughter are now living. One of the sons, Herbert M., at the age of fourteen years enlisted in the First Wisconsin Cavalry and later was transferred to the Thirteenth Light Artillery, serving in Missouri until his capture by the Confederates and subsequent confinement in Libby prison. On being exchanged he returned to the artillery service, but his splendid war record was abruptly terminated by his death, which occurred June 8, 1863, in Baton Rouge. Another son, John S., who was connected with the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, died in Portland. Oscar D. is a large tobacco dealer and at this writing county recorder of Roek county, Wis., where he has made his home many years.

The public schools of Palmyra afforded Henry S. Rowe fair advantages. While a mere boy he learned telegraphy in Janesville and at the age of thirteen was given work in that city with what is now the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. Going to Lawrence, Kans., in 1870, he was engaged as clerk in the freight house of what is now the Santa Fe (then the Leavenworth, Lawrence & Galveston) road. After a year he was made terminal agent, his duties including the opening of all the offices in the frontier districts and the starting of the little hamlets that sprung up along the line of the road. From that position he was promoted to be general agent for the Fort Scott & Gulf, and the Leavenworth, Lawrence & Galveston roads at Kansas City, remaining there until 1880. On the purchase by Henry Villard of the uncompleted road extending into Oregon, Mr. Rowe came to Portland in 1880 and was at once retained by the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. For a time he acted as the company's agent for steamers. On the starting of the train service on the railroad in 1882 he was made general superintendent, which position he held until the road was leased in 1887 by the Union Pacific, at which time he retired from railroading.

An enterprise which had already engaged a portion of Mr. Rowe's time was the Weed & Rowe Hardware Company, which had stores at Elmsburg and Yakima, Wash. On selling out the store in the latter town in 1889 he became president of the Yakima National Bank, the inception of which was due to his recognition of the needs of the village for such an institution. In 1892 he organized the Albina Savings Bank, becoming president of the concern, but the following year he sold his interest in order to devote himself to real-estate enterprises. July 1, 1902, he accepted a position as general agent for the Northwestern Pacific coast for the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, the duties of which position he has undertaken with the same enthusiasm and discretion characteristic of him in every post of responsibility.

The Republican party, of which Mr. Rowe is a supporter, has honored him at various times by election to positions of trust. He has attended state conventions as delegate and has served on the county central committee. His first election as mayor of Portland occurred in 1900, when he received a plurality of about one thousand over his two opponents. It is said of him that one of the most noteworthy features of his administration as executive was his economical oversight of the city's expenses, and there have been many tributes paid to him for his success along this important line. At the expiration of his term he took up his duties as general agent for the St. Paul road. For several years he was president of the board of fire commissioners of Portland, and was a member of the water committee during the building up of the works, thus deserving a share of the credit for securing for Portland the best water in the entire country. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and the Commercial Club.

The marriage of Mr. Rowe, in Independence, Kans., united him with Agnes H. Hefly, who was born in Bellevue, Iowa, and by whom he had two sons, namely: Henry S., Jr., clerk for the city auditor of Portland; and Donald H. While in Independence, Kans., Mr. Rowe was made a Mason, and is now connected with Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M. In the same Kansas town he was raised to the chapter, while his connection with the Knights Templar began in the commandery at Lawrence, Kans. At this writing he is connected with the chapter and commandery in Portland, also Oregon Consistory, thirty-second degree. Other fraternal organizations which have his membership are the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Woodmen of the World and Modern Woodmen of America. While not identified with any denomination, he attends the Episcopal Church and is always interested in and a contributor to measures having for their object the uplifting of humanity, as he is also an enthusiastic advocate of movements for the material development and progress of Portland, his home city.

HON. ALEXANDER SWECK. The family of which State Senator Sweck is a distinguished representative has been connected with American history since a very early period in the settlement of the country, the first of the name establishing themselves in Virginia. Later generations removed to West Virginia, whence Martin Sweck, after his marriage to a lady of English family, removed to the then far west, settling in the primeval forests of Missouri. His son, John, was born at St. Genevieve, that state, and from there started across the plains for California at the time of the discovery of gold, but the illness of the father and mother caused him to return to the old home, and not long afterward he married there. In 1852 he again started for the Pacific coast, and this time brought the trip to a successful consummation, arriving in Oregon on the 1st of September. At once he took up a donation claim at Tualatin, where he improved three hundred and twenty acres. On this homestead he conducted general farm pursuits until his death, in February of 1889, at which time he was sixty-eight years of age. Many important movements of his locality owed their inception to his energy. Especially was his interest in educational matters keen and permanent. A portion of his farm was laid out for a town site, the sale of lots bringing him a neat return for his outlay of labor in years gone by. His wife, formerly Maria Beard, was born in St. Genevieve, Mo., and is now living on the old homestead at Tualatin. Her father was a minister in the Methodist Episcopal denomination and a pioneer preacher in Missouri.

The family of John and Maria Sweck consisted of the following-named children: C. A., an attorney at Burns, Ore.; Alice, wife of M. W. Smith, of Portland; Lawrence, a stockman in Grant county; Alexander; Mrs. Lillie Harding, living on the old homestead; and Thaddeus, who is connected with the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, of Portland. Alexander Sweck was born in Tualatin, Washington county, Ore., August 6, 1861, and in boyhood attended district school, afterward taking a course in the Pacific University until the senior year, when illness obliged him to relinquish his studies. In 1883 he took up the study of law under Milton W. Smith, and five years later was admitted to the bar, after which he took up the practice of his profession. In 1896 he was elected municipal judge, which office he filled for two years. The highest honor of his life thus far came to him in 1900, when he was nominated to represent Multnomah, Washington and Columbia counties in the state senate. As the candidate of the Citizens' ticket he was elected over the Republican candidate by a majority of about eight hundred. During the session of 1901 he drew up the bill on assessment and taxation, which passed successfully and is now in active operation. Other measures received the benefit of his wise judgment and shrewd discernment. Among the Democratic members of the senate he is a leader, his recognized superior qualities fitting him for wielding a wide influence among his fellowmen. As a member of the state committee and as chairman of the county central committee, he has done much to promote the welfare of his party. However, in matters relating to the general welfare, party lines are always sunk beneath his patriotic spirit, and, as a public-spirited citizen, he favors movements for the progress of his city and state aside from any bearing they may have upon strictly party affairs.

In the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks Mr. Sweek serves as past exalted ruler. His connection with Masonry began in the Forest Grove Lodge, and he is now a member of Harmony Lodge No. 12, of Portland, of which he is past master. In addition he is identified with Portland Chapter, R. A. M., and the Oregon Consistory No. 1, thirty-second degree, besides which he is an active member of the Knights of Pythias and past chancellor in the same.

HON. JOHN W. WHALLEY. Among the men of the west who, through their own efforts, have risen to positions of honor and prominence, is to be named the Hon. John W. Whalley, who laid down alike the responsibilities and successes of his life November 10, 1900, and passed to a Higher judgment. Beyond the advantages of fine parentage and a long line of ancestry which has transmitted those qualities and characteristics essential to greatness, Mr. Whalley relied solely on his own strength to perfect the talents which he felt to be his, and through which he rose to an eminent position as a lawyer of the state of Oregon, having held for many years the profound respect and esteem of his fellow laborers and of those who profited by his exceptional ability. A brief résumé of his life is herewith given, representative of the type of men who made the west, and an example of perseverance and indefatigable energy, combined with an unflinching honesty and integrity which have left no measurement as to the moral influence in the community in which he made his home for so many years.

John William Whalley was born at Annapolis, Nova Scotia, April 28, 1833, a son of the Rev. Francis Whalley, a clergyman in the Church of England, who was, at that time, under an appointment from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Lands. In 1835 the family returned to England, where the father became rector of Rivington Parish, in Cheshire, but was subsequently appointed chaplain of Lancashire Castle, followed by service as rector of parishes at Churchtown, Lancashire, New Hutton, Old Hutton, Kendal and Westmoreland. The ancestors of the paternal line for a long period were yeomen, owning and cultivating the estate of Coventree near Dent, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, to which they had become emigrants from Norfolk, where they belonged to the same family as that of which Edmund Whalley, of the army of Cromwell, was a member. Many of the family held honorable positions in church, army and the bar, the elder sons managing the estates while the younger followed professions. On the maternal side the ancestors were numbered among the first families of Wales, and for over two hundred years occupied, under lease for that term, Overton Hall, of Lord Kenyon's estate. The lease terminated during the lifetime of William Jones, the grandfather of J. W., of this review, who, with his family, removed to Canada, thence to New York City, where he died and was buried in St. Paul's churchyard on Broadway.

Of the three sons and one daughter born to his parents the only one living is Richard Whalley, a clergyman in the Church of England, now residing in that country. John W. Whalley was the third oldest of the children and was very industrious and apt in his studies, while pursuing his grammar studies at the age of nine being able to read Cæsar, and following this up with Ovid at ten years. The reduced circumstances of his parents precluded the possibility of a collegiate course and held out the necessity for a trade, and at the age of thirteen years he took service aboard the merchantman Speed, which sailed from Liverpool for New York City in 1847. Not caring for a seafaring life he left the ship upon his arrival in New York City and visited some of his mother's people in New Jersey, there meeting an uncle, Thomas Jones, who was the author of a treatise on bookkeeping and a teacher of that science. Mr. Whalley entered his office and remained there for about a year, and March, 1848, he returned to England, with the understanding that a position was awaiting him there in the Bank of England. Failing to secure the expected place, through lack of wealthy or influential friends to work for him, and recognizing as self evident that his country afforded but little opportunity of advancement for an ambitious young man, he bound himself to an apprenticeship on the Antelope, which sailed in February, 1849, for California. His arrival in that state was in July, when the gold excitement was at its height, and with a number of others he sought the mines, eager and hopeful of making a fortune. During the winter of '49 he mined on the south fork of the American river, a little below Columbia, and in 1850 he moved to the Middle Yuba. He perseveringly endured the hardships and privations of a miner's life in Sacramento, Redwood and Yreka until 1858, and not having yet found his fortune he came to the conclusion that he preferred another kind of life. Desiring to study law, and not having the means, he engaged as a school teacher at Little Shasta, near Yreka. He continued in this employment until 1864, being one of the pioneer teachers of the Pacific coast. During 1861-62 he served with great efficiency as superintendent of schools, and while so engaged became a frequent contributor to the local press, and to the Hesperian Magazine, published at San Francisco. With a mind full of beautiful imageries and an easy, graceful style, he became a poet of more than local renown, his poems being copied extensively throughout the United States and evoking favorable comment from the press. During his earlier days of teaching he read law with Judge Roseborough, of Yreka, and was admitted to practice before Judge Dangerfield in 1861, in Siskiyou county, Cal.

In 1864 Mr. Whalley withdrew from his pedagogical work, and going to Grant county, Ore., he began the practice of his profession. He was married July 21, 1861, to Lavinia T. Kimzey, who was born in Missouri in 1842, and with her parents in 1847 crossed the plains to California, where she grew into a cultured and refined womanhood. They became parents of seven children, of whom one son and one daughter died in infancy. Of the remaining five Mary was born in California and became the wife of J. Frank Watson, president of the Merchants National Bank, of Portland, and they now have two children, namely: Frank Whalley and Clifton Howe. Susan was born in California and became the wife of Maj. James N. Allison, U. S. A., who is now stationed in the Philippine Islands. They are the parents of the following children: Marion, Philip Whalley, Malcolm G. and Stanton W. Lavinia was born in Portland and is now the wife of H. S. Huson, who is vice president and general manager of the Pacific Coast Construction Company. They make their home in Portland and have four children: John Whalley, Jane, Herbert R. and Richard S. Jane is the wife of W. T. Muir, a prominent attorney of Portland, and their two children are Mary and William Whalley. Charlotte is unmarried and resides with her mother at No. 393 West Park street. All are graduates of St. Helen's Hall, of Portland.

In Canyon City, Grant county, Mr. Whalley formed a partnership with L. O. Stern which was soon dissolved. While there he had a student in the person of M. W. Fechheimer, who had lived in Portland for a time and after he was admitted to practice he returned there and opened an office. His accounts of the advantages of the city led Mr. Whalley to make this place his home, coming in 1868, where he formed a partnership with Mr. Fechheimer, under the title of Whalley & Fechheimer, and this well known firm flourished for a number of years, being one of the strongest of the northwest. They made the bankrupt law of 1867 a specialty and the greater part of the business of this department passed through their hands for several years.

Their surplus earnings were invested in real estate, which, with the rapid increase in value, made each a fortune. In 1883, desiring to make an extended trip to Europe, he dissolved his legal partnership and with his daughter Susan visited Scotland, England, France, Spain, Germany, Italy and Switzerland, remaining abroad eighteen months. Upon his return to Portland in 1884 he resumed the practice of law in connection with H. H. Northup and Paul R. Deady, under the firm name of Whalley, Northup & Deady, and the work quickly grew to lucrative size, gaining a prominence in railway litigation. In 1885 Judge E. C. Bronaugh was admitted as a member of the firm, which was then known as Whalley, Bronaugh, Northup & Deady. The latter shortly retired and his name was dropped from the firm. In March, 1889, Mr. Whalley retired from active practice, having acquired a large property which required his personal attention, but five years later he became a partner of Judges Strahn and Pipes and practiced again for two years. At that time Mr. Whalley withdrew from the firm and formed a partnership with his son-in-law, W. T. Muir, which lasted until the death of the former. For a number of years he had held a chair in the law department of the University of Oregon as instructor in pleadings.

As a Republican in politics Mr. Whalley represented Multnomah county in 1870 as a member of the state legislature, but retired altogether from political movements and enterprises at the close of his first term. He was a prominent man in the fraternity of the Odd Fellows, in 1870 representing the Grand Lodge of Oregon in the Sovereign Grand Lodge at Baltimore. Always actively interested in the welfare of the city, he was a member of the Columbia Fire Engine Company No. 3, Volunteer Department, and so continued until the paid department was installed.

Mr. Whalley long held a place in the front rank of the profession to which he gave so much of his life. He had a well ordered mind and in his forensic encounters always had his legal forces under control. He had a love of "fine point" which became a subject of trite remark among his legal brethren throughout the state. He became famed for his logical and strategic qualities, availing himself of every means to guard against legal surprises and to overlook no legal defense. The care which he bestowed upon the "critical niceties" of the law was due to his mental activity and habit of thoroughness in whatever he undertook, and not to any neglect of the broad principles which make the study and practice of law one of the most useful and elevating pursuits of mankind. He had a keen appreciation of the humorous, and this, with his imitative faculties, made him the most entertaining and enjoyable companion at the bar. He was an indefatigable sportsman and was a master of the science of casting a fly or making one; every foot of that sportsman's paradise from "Mock's bottom" to Charley Saline's was to him familiar ground. With a few chosen friends he controlled the shooting privileges of twelve hundred acres of lake marsh ground on Sauvie's Island, always taking a great interest in the preservation and protection of game birds in the state, urging the enactment by the legislature of beneficial game laws. The statutes of the state to-day contain many game laws of his own construction which are susceptible of no misinterpretation. He was the first president of the Multnomah Rod and Gun Club of Portland, an organization which under his personal influence and endeavor accomplished much good along these lines, and became especially vigilant in the detection and prosecution of violators. He was chosen the first president of the Sportsman's Association of the Northwest, and re-elected a second term. He had a fondness for dogs and was always their protector and friend.

As a member of St. Stephen's Chapel he contributed generously to the maintenance of the church work, acting as vestryman for some years and as superintendent of the Sunday school for three years before his death. A tribute paid to his memory by a friend was: "A man of alert mind, of great legal and literary erudition; of ready command of language, speaking and writing with admirable force; at all times accessible, steadfast in his friendships, and intellectual powers that would have brought him to distinction in any situation."

HON. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS. A record of the life of Judge Williams, former United States senator and attorney general of the United States, is in some respects a history of the rise and progress of Oregon. It is now (1903) just half a century since he first cast his lot with the inhabitants of the then territory of Oregon; and by reason of his identification with the development of its resources during the pioneer period of the territory and the constructive era of the state, and likewise through his intimate association with its most vital public interests during practically the entire history of its statehood, he has for many years been regarded as one of its foremost citizens, whose rich experience in the affairs of the nation, on the bench, and before the bar, entitle his opinions on questions of general public interest to the highest consideration.

Judge Williams was born in New Lebanon, Columbia county, N. Y., March 26, 1823, and received an academic education at Pompey, N. Y., whither his parents removed when he was a child. At the age of twenty-one he was admitted to the bar of New York. Immediately thereafter he removed to Iowa, then a territory, and opened an office at Fort Madison. At the first election after the organization of the state government, in 1847, he was elected judge of the first judicial district of that state, serving five years. The immediate cause of his identification with Oregon was his appointment, in 1853, as chief justice of this territory, an office to which he was reappointed in 1857 by President Buchanan. He became a member of the constitutional convention which drafted the first constitution for the state of Oregon, and acted as chairman of the judiciary committee of that body. In this capacity he vigorously opposed the introduction of slavery into this state, and before the instrument was presented to the voters made an active canvass in behalf of the anti-slavery clause therein. In 1860 he became one of the founders of the Union party, and subsequently canvassed the country for Lincoln and aided with all the strength at his command in awakening sympathy for the Union cause. His election as United States senator in 1864 took him to Washington at the most critical period in the country's history, and it is a matter of record that his services during that vital epoch were in line with the policy which, in its consummation, was productive of such splendid results. In the senate he was a member of the committees on finance and public lands, and also of the reconstruction committee.

Among the measures which he was instrumental in bringing before the senate, and which became laws, are the following: The Military Reconstruction Act, under which the insurrectionary states were reorganized and their representation admitted to congress; an act creating a new land district in Oregon, with a land office at La Grande; an amendment to the act granting lands to the state of Oregon for the construction of a military road from Eugene to the eastern boundary of the state, granting odd sections to supply any deficiency in the original grant; various acts establishing post roads; a general law to secure the election of United States senators; the "tenure of office act," vetoed by President Johnson, but passed over his veto; numerous appropriations for Oregon; an amendment to the act of 1861 relative to property lost in suppressing Indian hostilities in Oregon; an amendment to the judiciary act of 1789; an amendment to the act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Central Pacific in California to Portland, Ore.; an act to pay two companies of Oregon Volunteers commanded by Captains Walker and Olney; an act to strengthen the public credit; an amendment to the act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Central Pacific to Portland, by which the grant was prevented from reverting to the government; an act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville; a resolution to facilitate the building of a light-house at Yaquina Bay, and other light-houses on the Oregon coast; an act granting certain lands to Blessington Rutledge, a citizen of Lane county; a resolution to increase the pay of assistant marshals in taking the census of 1870; an act extending the benefits of the donation law of 1850 to certain persons; and an act creating a new land district in Washington, with a land office at Walla Walla.

In 1871 Judge Williams was appointed one of the joint high commissioners to frame a treaty for the settlement of the Alabama claims and the northwestern boundary, and other questions in dispute between the United States and Great Britain. There is no question but his ability, wisdom and tact secured a settlement of the boundary question favorable to the contention of the United States. It had been claimed that the only solution of the difficulty was to refer the matter to the Emperor of Germany; but Judge Williams refused to agree to this proposition unless it were stipulated that the Emperor's decision should be strictly in accord with the treaty of 1846; that he should not decide de novo, but simply explicate the meaning of the convention which had already decided the question. The commission finally yielded to his views and thus rendered possible the decision that gave to the United States San Juan and other islands. It is not generally known throughout the United States that the part Judge Williams bore in the solution of this question was such an important one, but all who are familiar with the case accord him the honor for his wise stand in the adjustment of the problem.

In 1872, upon the invitation of President Grant, Judge Williams became attorney general of the United States; and in this important cabinet post he proved himself a keen, resourceful and logical adviser, and demonstrated the possession of high qualities of statesmanship. His record in the cabinet was an honor to the state of Oregon as well as to himself. The people of the northwest exhibited the keenest pride in his capable service during an administration when it was necessary to solve numerous perplexing problems, and the generation which witnessed the events of those days are wont to refer to it with great satisfaction. Many important questions were brought before him, to all of which he brought the same thoughtful attention so characteristic of him in earlier years and in his own private affairs. The sting left by the Civil war in the south had not yet begun to heal, and a great degree of tact was required daily of the attorney general, to whom were brought for solution intricate questions arising from the conflict. Subsequent events in the history of the republic have demonstrated the fact that the policy he pursued in these various matters was eminently fair and sagacious, and in numerous instances he was happy in being able, through his prudent counsels, to restore peace to distracted communities. In 1874 Judge Williams' name was presented to the senate by the president as successor to Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase; but so great an opposition to his confirmation developed in the east, among those who wished an eastern jurist to succeed to the office, that, in the interests of harmony, he withdrew his name, much to the regret of President Grant, who was one of his warm personal friends and admirers.

History has accorded to this distinguished citizen the honor of having been the first to outline, through the medium of the Washington Star, the policy ultimately adopted by congress for the adjustment of the historic presidential contest of 1876. The essential features of the famous Electoral Commission Act under which Gen. Rutherford B. Hayes was made president were embodied in an article which he contributed to the Star, and the credit for the plan outlined and soon after adopted is conceded to belong to him.

Since his retirement from public life Judge Williams has made his home in Portland, among whose citizens he holds an assured position of eminence and influence. For many years demands have been made upon him by his personal friends and his party for his services in political campaigns, and by the citizens of Portland, on their numerous social gatherings. Not only is he a strong speaker on public questions, clear, powerful and convincing in his arguments, but to a rare degree felicitous as a post-prandial orator. In brief, he is a giant in intellect, totally devoid of the arts of the politician, in the common acceptance of the term. His utterance on the subject of Christianity from the standpoint of the historian, freed from the romance which attaches to the life of the Saviour, commanded the attention and interest of thoughtful persons throughout the country; and a valued contribution to the best thought of the period on this subject is found in his lecture on "The Divinity of Christ."

Judge Williams is now spending the twilight of his life in the administration of the official affairs of the municipality of Portland, having been elected to the mayoralty in 1902. In the labor which he has thus assumed in his advanced years he is bringing to bear the same conscientious effort, the same honesty of purpose and highminded views of the duties of a public servant, which characterized his record while filling some of the most responsible and onerous offices in national affairs. He is giving to the city, through his appointment of men of acknowledged integrity and public spirit, a corps of executive and advisory officials whose efforts in the direction of honest and unselfish labor in behalf of the public are being generally appreciated, and all indications now point to an administration unequalled in the history of the city for moral courage, political economy and breadth of view—a sight too rare in the conduct of municipal affairs in these days when corruption and vice are rampant throughout the larger cities of the land generally.

HENRY EVERDING. During the many years of his residence in Portland Henry Everding has advanced with the people of his adopted locality, and has entered with zest into the business and social life by which he was surrounded. Possessing the adaptiveness characteristic of his Teutonic nationality, he has also applied the thrift and conservatism so necessary to the successful development of pioneer or growing conditions. A citizen of this part of the west since 1864, he first started a grain, feed and produce business in partnership with Edwin Beebe, under the firm name of Everding & Beebe, his partner having been similarly employed since 1862. This modest beginning was located on the corner of Front and Taylor streets, and after various changes from one part of the city to the other settled down to where Mr. Everding has been conducting his affairs alone, ever since the death of Mr. Beebe, twenty years ago. It is the oldest commission house in Portland, and in the early days had a much more extensive and far reaching trade than at present, at that time shipping grain and produce to California and the adjacent states.

A native of Hanover, Germany, Mr. Everding was born April 14, 1833, and comes of a family distinguished in war and peace, and vitally connected with commercial, agricultural and industrial affairs. The father of Mr. Everding died at a comparatively early age, and thereafter the widow and children carried on the work of the farm which he left to their care. Of the eight children all came to the Pacific coast. John, who came in 1853, is now a resident of San Francisco; Charles, Fred and Richard came over in 1854; the two first mentioned died in California, while Richard is living in Portland; Henry and his mother came in 1855. There were three daughters in the family, one of whom is deceased, while the others reside in California and Portland respectively. Henry was six weeks out from Bremen on a sailer, and after landing in New Orleans took a three weeks' trip up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers to Cincinnati, where he worked in a starch factory for six months. For a few months following he clerked in different stores, and while learning the language and familiarizing himself with the customs of the country, managed, by thrift and economy, to save a little money.

In April, 1855, Mr. Everding went to New York and embarked for Aspinwall, and from Panama sailed on the John L. Stevens for San Francisco, which craft contained fourteen hundred passengers. When thirty-six hours out the boat came upon the wreck of the ill-fated Golden Age, a large number of whose passengers were taken aboard the Stevens and returned to Panama. No interruption marred the progress of the second sailing, and the hopeful little band arrived in San Francisco in May, 1855. Here Mr. Everding was fortunate in finding work in the starch factory of his brother, John, who had started the first enterprise of the kind in the city. Later Mr. Everding and his brother Frederick stocked and ran a ranch in Contra Costa county, the management of which fell to Frederick, while Henry turned his attention to the starch factory. As before stated, he came to Portland in 1864, and inaugurated the large grain, feed and produce business with which his name has since been connected.

Since coming to Portland Mr. Everding has been united in marriage with Theresa Harding, a native of Prussia, Germany. Mr. Everding is essentially social, as are the most of his countrymen, and is identified with Willamette Lodge No. 2, A. F. & A. M.; Oregon Commandery No. 1, of which he is a charter member, having been transferred from the Knights Templar Commandery No. 1, of San Francisco. He is also connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Portland. Mr. Everding is one of the substantial and highly honored pioneers and citizens and has been among the most helpful and representative of the countrymen who have settled in this city.

COL. JAMES JACKSON, U. S. A. A military career of more than ordinary distinction is that of Col. James Jackson, a lieutenant-colonel of the United States Army, retired, and colonel and inspector-general of the state of Oregon, on the Governor's staff. His services during the civil and Indian wars entitle him to a conspicuous place in the military history of the United States.

Colonel Jackson was born in Sussex county, N. J., November 21, 1833. His father, Timothy Jackson, was an ordained minister of the Baptist Church, and filled pulpits in different parts of New Jersey and Ohio. His mother, Mary A. Jackson, was the daughter of Rev. Morgan Ap John Rhees (Welsh Rhys) and Ann Loxley. Dr. Rhees was a Baptist minister and brought a colony of Welsh dissenters to America, establishing them at Beulah, Pa. This colony not proving a financial success, he removed to Philadelphia, where he married Ann Loxley, a daughter of Benjamin Loxley, who at the breaking out of the Revolution was keeper of the King's stores in Philadelphia, but resigned this office to join the colonial forces, in which he held commissions from lieutenant to major, and was a volunteer aid, with rank of colonel, on Washington's staff at Valley Forge. Colonel Jackson's father died in 1843, and his mother soon after returned with her children to Philadelphia, where Colonel Jackson received his education in the public schools, graduating from the high school in 1850. He then studied architecture, located in Charles City, Iowa, in 1855, and was living there when the Civil war came on. He determined to volunteer for the suppression of the Rebellion, and after closing up his business joined the Twelfth United States Infantry, was on recruiting duty for some months, and then went into the field in Virginia, in August, 1862, as a sergeant of Company C, Twelfth United States Infantry. In April, 1863, he was promoted a second lieutenant in this regiment and participated in the battles of Second Bull Run, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Spottsylvania, the various battles in the Wilderness, and the siege of Petersburg, until November, 1864, when the regular brigade, being badly depleted, was withdrawn from the field and sent north to recruit its strength.

In the reorganization of the army, after the war, he was assigned to the Thirtieth Infantry and accompanied the regiment to the plains in January, 1867, where he was engaged in guarding the construction of the transcontinental railroad and scouting in the Indian country. He was promoted a captain in 1868, and January 1, 1870, was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service as captain of Troop B, First Cavalry. As commander of this troop he took part in the Modoc war, the Nez Perce war and the Bannock war. He was, at different times, stationed at Camp Warner and Fort Klamath in Oregon; Fort Walla Walla, Fort Colville and Fort Coeur d'Alene in Washington; and Forts Keogh and Custer in Montana. In 1886 he was placed on recruiting service in New York City, and after the termination of this tour of duty was detailed as inspector-general of the Division of the Atlantic. In 1889 he was promoted major of the Second Cavalry, joining the headquarters of this regiment at Fort Walla Walla and going with it to Fort Lowell, Ariz., in 1890. This post being abandoned, he took station at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., and while serving there was detailed for duty with the Oregon National Guard, reporting to the governor of the state in June, 1892, and taking up his residence in Portland. At the solicitation of the state military officers he was continued on this duty until his retirement from active service November 7, 1897, a few months previous to which he was promoted a lieutenant colonel and assigned to the First Cavalry.

For special gallantry in action at the battles of Weldon Railroad and North Anna, during the Civil war, Colonel Jackson was brevetted a captain and major, and for gallant services in the Modoc and Nez Perce wars he was brevetted a lieutenant colonel. For "most distinguished gallantry in action against hostile Indians" he was awarded a medal of honor by congress.

Soon after the beginning of the Spanish-American war, in April, 1898, Colonel Jackson was appointed, by Governor Lord, inspector-general of the state of Oregon with the rank of colonel, and assisted in organizing the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry Regiment, which, shortly after its organization, reported for duty in San Francisco, and was one of the first regiments sent to the Philippines. He has held the office of inspector-general ever since, having been reappointed by Governor Geer, and annually inspects each organization of the National Guard in the state.

Colonel Jackson, by virtue of his descent from Colonel Benjamin Loxley, is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution, and, through his services in the Civil war, a member of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States—has been commander of the Oregon Commandery of this order—and the Grand Army of the Republic (Lincoln-Garfield Post), in which he has held the offices of department inspector and of aide-de-camp on the staff of Generals Warner and Lawler, Commanders-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. He is a member of the New York Club, the Army and Navy Club of New York City, and the Commercial Club of Portland, being at present vice-president of the latter club.

Colonel Jackson has two children by his marriage with Miss Ida Beach of Oakland, Cal.: a son, Rhees Jackson, and a daughter, Marion Beach Jackson. Rhees Jackson served in the Second Oregon Volunteers in the Philippines as first-lieutenant and battalion adjutant, and was recommended by its commander, Gen. Owen Summers, on account of gallant and efficient service, for a commission in the regular army; he was appointed by the President second-lieutenant in the Twelfth United States Infantry August 1, 1899, and is now a first-lieutenant in that regiment. Colonel Jackson's daughter is living with her father at his home on Willamette Heights in Portland. The present Mrs. Jackson was Miss Ella Greene, of Davisville, Cal.

H. W. Scott

HARVEY W. SCOTT, president of the Lewis and Clark Exposition Company, is of the type of men that have transformed the Pacific northwest from a wilderness. With his own hands he has cleared away the forest trees to make room for the simple home of the pioneers, with its mica windows and puncheon floors; he has split the rails for the fence built around the family homestead; in going to and returning from school he has followed the only paths through the woods—the trails beaten down by wild animals and Indians; he has shouldered rifle and gone forth in defense of the white man's right to occupy the country; he has seen the ox-team of the plainsmen pass away and the steamboat and the railroad take its place as the means of transport; he has seen the activities of the people rise from a small and uncertain traffic with the Hawaiian Islands to a world-wide commerce. The remotest corner in Africa is better known to Americans today than Oregon was to them when Mr. Scott made it his home. In Mr. Scott the past and the present are indissolubly linked. In him the hardy spirits that followed the footsteps of Lewis and Clark to the Pacific ocean join hands with those who have taken up the wand of civilization and progress where the pioneer laid it down. The trails of half a century ago have become the railroad of today; the bateau of the trader has gone and in its place has come the ocean carrier; warships anchor where Indian dugouts lolled in the '50s; the old settler is passing and the new order is here. Mr. Scott is in every way the most eminent representative of the old and the new and it was fitting that he should be chosen to head the undertaking for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country by Lewis and Clark.

Mr. Scott was born in Tazewell county, Ill., near Peoria, February 1, 1838. His father, John Tucker Scott, was a farmer, and his son, Harvey W., was reared to the same calling. In the winter he attended district school, but his early educational facilities were limited. In those days, Illinois was in the wild west, and claimed a population of about one-tenth of what it numbers today and its facilities for education were crude indeed. In 1852 John T. Scott crossed the plains to Oregon, first settling in Yamhill county, where after one year's residence the family located in Mason county, Wash., on Puget sound. Here Harvey W. Scott did his share of the arduous work of clearing up a farm. When the great Indian wars, which had for their purpose the extermination of the white settlements, broke out, he enlisted as a private in the volunteer army organized by the settlers and served one year. In 1857 he walked from the farm to Forest Grove, Ore., a distance of over one hundred and fifty miles, and entered school, continuing at his studies four months. A little later his father removed from Washington to Oregon, locating in Clackamas county, twenty miles south of Oregon City. To this farm the young man went at the close of his short term in school.

He who can buy land cleared and ready for the plow in these modern days cannot realize what homemaking was in Oregon fifty years ago. There were giant trees to fell, rails to be split, and cattle to be cared for. Pioneers in those days did not while away much of their time as some farmers are wont to do now. Every moment was precious. Mr. Scott remained on the farm until he was twenty-one years old, doing his full share of the work. In the summer of 1859 he branched out for himself and taught school. His father now removed to a farm three miles west of Forest Grove and the son again took up farm work, devoting part of his time to a saw mill which his father operated.

Mr. Scott was now resolved to obtain an education and applied himself to the studies which he had begun in 1857. No young man in this generation or any other generation in Oregon has persevered so hard for the essential equipment of life or achieved so signal a triumph as has Mr. Scott. In 1859-60-61-62-63 he worked on neighboring farms and saw mills, earning money to pay his way through school. He would shoulder an axe and work at clearing for a while and with the money thus earned would go to school. When this slender fund was exhausted by tuition fees he would find new work to enable him to resume his studies. This he kept up until 1863, when he received his diploma as the first graduate from Pacific University.

After leaving his school Mr. Scott went to the placer mines in Boise Basin, Idaho, where he spent a year. In 1864 he returned to Portland and for a year studied law in the office of E. D. Shattuck, who had been a member of the constitutional convention, and in the Rebellion period a leader in Oregon among the Union forces in politics. Mr. Scott was reading law and serving as librarian of the Portland Library when, in 1865, he was offered the position as editorial writer on the Oregonian. He accepted, continuing as an employe until 1877, when he purchased an interest in the paper which he still owns.

In the editorial management of the Oregonian Mr. Scott has always fought for the right, knowing that time would justify his course. In the Civil war period, when there was a strong Southern sentiment in Oregon, he was a steadfast friend of the Union, and gave his loyal support to all administration policies aimed to establish the nation upon a firm and enduring basis. He neither favored nor countenanced half way measures or compromises that left open the vital point to trouble a future generation. He has always been for meeting the main issue fairly and squarely and settling it once and for all. Time and again he has taken a firm stand for the enforcement of law, the preservation of order, and the observance of the nation's treaties with other countries. Perhaps the greatest achievement of his life was the signal victory for sound money in the national campaign of 1896. Sound money with Mr. Scott meant the gold standard, without equivocation, not sixteen to one, nor thirty-two to one, nor international bimetallism, nor coinage of the seignorage, nor "do something for silver." He knew the evil that lurked in a base currency and fought it with all his power and resource. For two years before McKinley and Bryan had been nominated, nearly every daily newspaper west of the Mississippi river, Republican as well as Democratic, was trimming with the silverites, if not openly espousing sixteen to one. On the Pacific coast, the Oregonian, among the leading dailies, stood alone in its advocacy of gold. The Oregonian lost both business and subscribers for the stand it had taken on the money question, but Mr. Scott never turned back, never wavered in his purpose. The issue was not new to him, for he had made the same fight for the sound dollar years before, in the days of the Hayes administration. The result was in the nature of a personal victory for Mr. Scott, for Oregon was the only state west of the Rocky mountains that gave its full electoral vote to McKinley.

In journalism, Mr. Scott belongs to the school of the elder Bennett, Charles A. Dana, Medill and Watterson—editors who took the right stand on great questions regardless of the public clamor or the consequence to their own interests. The esteem in which he is held by the newspaper men of the United States is evidenced by the fact that he is a director of the Associated Press, the world's foremost collector of news. In 1900 he presided over the meeting for reorganization of the association in New York.

The Lewis and Clark Exposition received its impetus from a resolution adopted by the Oregon Historical Society in December, 1900, favoring a celebration and fair in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country by Captains Lewis and Clark. Mr. Scott was then president of the society. He gave the enterprise his cordial support after he had cautioned the people of Portland to weigh carefully the responsibility they were about to assume, and they had given heed to his advice in the preliminary steps. The Oregonian Publishing Company at once became one of the largest stockholders of the Exposition corporation. Mr. Scott was elected on the board of directors and was chosen first vice president. Upon the death of H. W. Corbett, in March, 1903, Mr. Scott assumed the duties of president and was elected to that office by the board of directors on July 24, 1903.

In 1856 Mr. Scott was married to Miss Elizabeth Nicklin, who died in 1875, leaving two children. In 1877 he was married to Miss Margaret McChesney, of Pennsylvania. Three children have been born of this union.

Politically Mr. Scott is a staunch Republican. He has fought all the battles of his party in Oregon for nearly forty years, and was actively identified with its fortunes in the few years following his arrival at the voting age and preceding his service with the Oregonian. Indeed, Mr. Scott is entitled to the full measure of credit for making Oregon a Republican state. For nearly twenty years following the admission of the state, the Democrats had a strong footing in Oregon. Their last great victories were in 1876 and 1878, when they won all the important offices, including both the United States senators. Since 1880 the Republicans have been successful, with the exception of the loss of the governor in 1886, 1890 and 1902, and the state treasurer in 1886. For several years past there has been a strong desire on the part of the rank and file of the Republican party to honor Mr. Scott with a seat in the United States senate as a suitable recognition of his distinguished services to his party and his state. Mr. Scott is disinclined to accept political office, preferring to continue at the post of editor of the Oregonian which he has filled for so many years. However, at the urgent solicitation of friends, he permitted his name to be presented to the legislative assembly of 1903 for United States senator. The legislature had been deadlocked all session on the senatorship and Mr. Scott was placed in nomination an hour before final adjournment as a compromise candidate who might be acceptable to the several factions into which the Republican majority of the legislature was divided. He received the votes of twenty-nine members, but C. W. Fulton, who had led throughout the session, was chosen.

The Corvallis Times, a Democratic newspaper, paid Mr. Scott the following tribute in its issue of March 9, 1903, following the adjournment of the legislature: "For forty years his great ability has been spent in the promotion of Republicanism, and in converting disciples to its faith. He has not only given the best years of his life to his party, but he has, in addition, laid at its feet a great newspaper with which its battles have been fought and its victories won. It is a fact so patent as to be beyond cavil, that to the work of Mr. Scott and his Oregonian is due the fact that within twenty-five years, Oregon has been transformed from a Democratic into a sure Republican state. The character that he has stamped on that newspaper has been such that it has exerted a commanding influence that has been effective in drawing recruits to the Republican party. It is unquestionably true that if, through all these years, Mr. Scott had been ected to conduct his newspaper in the interest of Democracy, the Republicans in the state would be in the minority, and that in the places of many of those Republican members who repudiated him for senator, there would have been Democrats. It is wholly and practically probable that but for the implements of war that Mr. Scott has constantly kept in the hands of the Republicans of Oregon, the senator elected by the late joint assembly would have been, not a Republican, but a Democrat.

"Indeed, whatever of prestige the Republican party has in the state, whatever of preferment its partisans enjoy, Mr. Scott and his paper gave them. Whatever loaves they have divided, his toil and talents supplied. It ever there was a condition in which a party organization from sheer gratitude was indebted to an individual, it is manifestly, signally and unquestionably true in the case of Mr. Scott. His brain, his capital, the influence of his paper, his life-work until he has reached that period in his career where reward is already long overdue—all these have been uncomplainingly and constantly laid at the feet of Republicanism in Oregon. A reasonable regard for the service he has rendered his party in the state should, when his name was presented as a candidate at Salem, have dictated his election by an enthusiastic and unanimous vote."

WILLIAM SARGENT LADD. In tracing the genealogy of the Ladd family it is found that their earliest recorded history is connected with the counties of Kent and Sussex in England. Before the days of Henry VI they owned and occupied as their manor house the estate of Bowyck in the parish of Eleham. Thomas Ladd, the then owner of Bowyck manor, died in 1515, and his grandson Vincent, a later owner of the estate, died in 1563. In 1601 the manor passed through marriage into the Nethersole family. In 1730 John Ladd, a direct descendant of Vincent Ladd, was created a baronet by George II, but the baronetcy became extinct a generation later. The first representatives of the family in America were Daniel and John Ladd. The former, however, was the first to land here, arriving in New England in 1623. The latter established his home in New Jersey in 1678, with a company of members of the Society of Friends. It is said that he was employed in laying out the city of Philadelphia; beyond doubt he was a surveyor of ability and employed in many important enterprises connected with his occupation. During 1688 he took up six thousand acres in Gloucester county, where at the time of his death he was an influential citizen and large land owner.

Representative of a family so intimately identified with early American history was Dr. Nathaniel Gould Ladd, who was born July 13, 1798, and, notwithstanding hardships, obstacles and reverses, rose from a humble position to prominence as a physician. His wife was Abigail Kelcey Mead, who was born in New Hampshire August 7, 1806. In 1830 the family moved to Meredith, N. H., and three years later settled in a village now known as Tilton (then Sanbornton Bridge). During the previous residence of the family in Holland, Vt., a son was born October 10, 1826, to whom the name of William Sargent was given. Being one of ten children, whose parents had only limited means, he had few advantages in boyhood; indeed, it may be said that he had no opportunities for advancement except such as he made for himself. Always ambitious, with the love of study characteristic of the true scholar, diligent in his application to text books, and quick to acquire knowledge, he soon gained a valuable fund of knowledge. Though the schools of those days were crude in comparison with the educational institutions of the present day, his determination and energy surmounted obstacles. Whether in the schoolroom, on the farm or in his home, he was a constant student, and, indeed, throughout all of his life he continued to be fond of reading and study, as eager to grasp new thoughts when advanced in years as when a boy at home. Early experiences in breaking and tilling a New England farm, followed by acquiring the mastery of rebellious pupils in a rough district school, developed in him traits of self-reliance and firmness of purpose that had no little to do with his subsequent success.

Following his experience as a teacher Mr. Ladd engaged in railroading, securing employment in a freight house on the line of the Boston, Concord & Montreal Railroad, and later holding other positions in the same occupation. While thus engaged he met Daniel Webster, who remarked to him, in the course of their conversation, "There is always room at the top." The young man, feeling that the top might be reached with less difficulty in a newer country than his home state, began to plan for the future. The gold fever of 1849 did not fascinate him nor did he fall a victim to its alluring prospects, but he did begin to contemplate the opportunities offered by Oregon's vast farm lands. Deciding to seek a home in the far west he set sail on the Prometheus from New York, February 27, 1851, and crossed the isthmus, thence sailed north to San Francisco and from there to Portland. With him he brought a few articles of merchandise and these he began to sell, business being conducted on an extremely small scale. Hard work, however, will win when the environment is favorable, and so it proved with him. Four o'clock in the morning found him ready for business, and throughout all the day he was busy, energetic, hopeful and sanguine.

A change came in his affairs during 1852, when the firm of Ladd & Tilton formed a partnership, continuing the same until the spring of 1855. Meantime, in 1854, Wesley Ladd came to Portland, bringing with him Caroline Ames Elliott, the fiancée of William S. Ladd. They were married in San Francisco, October 17, 1854, and their union proved one of mutual helpfulness and happiness. Indeed, in later years Mr. Ladd ascribed much of his success to the optimistic spirit, patient devotion and cheerful comradeship of his wife. They became the parents of seven children, five of whom attained mature years, namely: William M., who was born September 16, 1855, received a classical education in Amherst College, and is now a member of the banking house of Ladd & Tilton, of Portland; Charles Elliott, who was born August 5, 1857, and is also connected with the bank founded by his father; Helen Kendall, who was born on the 4th of July, 1859; Caroline Ames, born September 3, 1861, now the wife of Frederic Bailey Pratt, Brooklyn, N. Y.; and John Wesley, born January 3, 1870, now connected with Ladd & Tilton.

No step in the business experience of Mr. Ladd was more important than his identification with the founding of the banking business which is still conducted under the original title of Ladd & Tilton. Opened for business in April of 1859 with a very small capital, the institution enjoyed a steady growth from the first. Two years after its organization the capital was increased to $150,000, and not long afterward was further increased to $1,000,000. When the partnership was dissolved in 1880 the bills receivable amounted to almost $2,500,000, but so conservative had been the management of the bank and so sagacious its officers that, in 1888, less than $1,300 of this large sum was outstanding. While the building up of this important banking business occupied much of Mr. Ladd's time and thought for years, his activity was by no means limited thereto. Instead, we find him participating in many enterprises of public value or private utility. As a financier he stood foremost. Throughout the entire northwest his opinion was regarded as final in matters pertaining to local banking and financial interests. The utmost confidence was reposed in his judgment, not only by the great middle class, but also by those men who like himself were captains of industry and leaders in finance and commerce.

From an early period of his residence in Oregon he was interested in farm lands, a frequent purchaser of unimproved property and instrumental in the development of the agricultural resources of the state. Besides owning three farms of his own, he was, with S. G. Reed, the owner of five others. Among his possessions was an estate of four hundred acres near Portland, which was a model farm in every respect. The raising of thoroughbred stock also engaged his attention, and he devoted considerable attention to Clydesdale and Cleveland bay horses, Short-horn cattle, Berkshire hogs and Cotswold and Leicester sheep. Another enterprise in which he was once interested and which has become an establishment of great magnitude was the Oregon Furniture Manufacturing Company, which he organized in April of 1874. During 1883 he became interested in milling, which was then a comparatively new industry in the northwest. Through his wise oversight the occupation was put on a firm basis. At the time of his death he owned three-fourths of the entire flouring-mill interests of this part of the country. In 1888 he organized the Portland Cordage Company, which is still one of the leading concerns of its kind in this city. In the organization of what is now the Oregon Iron & Steel Company at Oswego he was a prime mover and he also acted as a director of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. His interests in Portland realty were large and of a value constantly increasing. The first brick building in the city was erected by him, and in later years he was one of the principal factors in the improvement of vacant property. The movement which had its climax in the erection of a magnificent hotel, one of the finest in the west, had in him a staunch supporter. He was also interested in the Portland Water Company and in numerous other concerns organized to aid in the development and progress of the city.

In early life Mr. Ladd supported Democratic principles and during 1861-65 allied himself with the "War" Democrats. Subsequently he refused to ally himself with any political organization, although during his last years he uniformly voted for the presidential candidates of the Republican party. At one time, through the solicitation of friends, he consented to act as mayor of Portland, but other official honors he firmly declined, preferring to concentrate his attention upon matters of finance and commerce rather than enter the arena of public life. In his various enterprises he gave employment to many men, and it was always noticeable that by all he was not only respected but deeply loved. In him the workingman always had a staunch friend, and, while he was easily the master of his employes, yet his consideration for them was so great that they always regarded him as a personal friend.

As indicative of the religious spirit which impelled Mr. Ladd in all his actions, it may be stated that from early life it was his custom to set aside one-tenth of his income for charitable and philanthropic purposes, and no destitute family, if worthy, ever sought help from him in vain. Quick to detect and denounce deception and hypocrisy, he was equally alert in aiding the honest and unfortunate. It is probable that no movement for the city's benefit was ever inaugurated where his name did not appear among those of contributors. When the people began to agitate the founding of a library, his contribution was the first made and was sufficiently large to place the fund on a safe basis. In making the gift, the only stipulation made was that the library be kept out of politics. This, however, by no means represented the limit of his assistance to the library. For twenty-four years the banking house of Ladd & Tilton gave the Library Association, rent free, the second floor of their bank building, on the corner of First and Stark streets, which represented a gift of many thousand dollars. Indeed, the library remained in these quarters until the handsome new building was ready for occupancy.

The chair of practical theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of San Francisco was in 1886 the recipient of $50,000 from Mr. Ladd, and he also gave several scholarships to Willamette University. Though reared in the Methodist faith, in 1873 he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which he afterward gave his support and allegiance, although remaining to the end a generous contributor to religious movements of the various creeds. With the co-operation of Messrs. Corbett and Failing, he donated to the city what is now known as the Riverview cemetery, several miles south of Portland on the Willamette river. At one time, during his travels, he saw at Bangor, Me., a homestead that he admired, and a counterpart of this was built by him in Portland, and in 1878 enlarged and improved. In this home his earth life ended January 6, 1893, when he was sixty-six years of age. The demise of a man so intimately associated with the city's development called forth tributes of affection and esteem from people of all classes; the bankers recognized in his death a loss to their fraternity; business men united in deploring the loss; the poor, so often, the recipients of his kindness, the pioneers, side by side with whom he had lived and labored so many years, and the organizations to which he had given generous assistance, recognized that with his passing away one of Portland's greatest men was gone. In the years that have since elapsed his influence has been apparent in matters connected with the city's growth. His commanding personality, as pioneer, banker and Christian philanthropist still wields an influence among the citizens of today, and in the annals of the city of Portland and the state of Oregon his name is forever enshrined.

SENATOR JOHN H. MITCHELL. For forty-three years the subject of this review has been one of the most prominent figures in the political history of the Pacific northwest. Becoming a citizen of the state soon after it was invested with the sovereign dignity of statehood, he at once became an active man in the political arena, and so rapid was the growth of his influence that within six years from the time of his arrival he had served a term in the state senate, establishing a record that was the admiration of all Oregon. So popular did he become that he was the choice of a large part of his party for the highest office the state had to give. This honor that his party friends thus early in his career wished to bestow upon him, was deferred but a few years when, September 28, 1872, he was elected to the United States senate, a position which, with two vacations, one of six, another of four years, he has held up to the present time. His career in this, the highest legislative body in the United States, is too well known to comment upon. Suffice to say he has been no disappointment to his party and among his brother senators he is highly respected and honored as a man of more than ordinary ability. The Pacific northwest owe to him a debt of gratitude that will never be paid, as through him this country has been ably represented and it is a fact that there is no man in the state so capable of carrying on the business and looking after the interests of Oregon as he. A hard worker, he is at all times working for Oregon. During the winter of 1902-03 this hard work showed its result, as for a time he was a sick man, and the people of Oregon showed the interest they had in him by the numerous inquiries that were made. For a couple of weeks it was the main subject of conversation, but owing to a rugged constitution he was able to ward off the disease and take up the work of the office before the close of the session. When the word was flashed over the wires that he was once more at his desk a sigh of relief went up from all Oregon.

The following biographical sketch of the career of Senator Mitchell we copy from the History of Portland edited by H. W. Scott:

"He was born in Washington county, Pa., on the 22d day of June, 1835. During his infancy his parents moved to Butler county, the same state, where he was reared on a farm and where he acquired the rudiments of an English education at the district school. At the age of seventeen he began teaching in a country school and after spending several winters in this way realized sufficient money to pay his tuition at Butler Academy, in Butler county, and subsequently at Witherspoon Institute. After completing the full course at both of these institutions he commenced the study of law in the office of Hon.

Samuel A. Purviance, formerly member of congress from that district, and later attorney-general of the state under Governor Curtin. After two years of study he was admitted to the bar in Butler county by Hon. Daniel Agnew, lately chief justice of the supreme court of the state of Pennsylvania, and then presiding judge of that district in the spring of 1857. He then began the practice of his profession at Butler, in partnership with Hon. John M. Thompson, since a member of the National House of Representatives from that district, and was thus engaged until he came to California in April, 1860. For a short time thereafter he practiced law at San Luis Obispo, and later for a brief time in San Francisco. The fame of Oregon as a young and growing commonwealth had in the meantime attracted his attention, and he determined to link his fortunes with the new state. With this end in view he arrived in Portland, July 4, 1860, where he has since resided.

With that same energy which has been so conspicuous in his career, he not only at once turned his attention to building up a legal practice, but took an active part in local politics. So quickly did he make his influence felt that in 1861 he was elected corporation counsel of Portland. The succeeding year he was nominated and elected by the Republican party to the Oregon state senate, in which body he served for four years. During the first two years of his term he was chairman of the judiciary committee, and the last two years he held the position of president of the senate. At the close of his senatorial term every mark of approval from his immediate constituents was accorded him, and in 1866 strenuous efforts were made by his political friends to secure him a seat in the United States senate. They only failed to elevate him to this exalted position through the lack of one vote in the caucus, his competitor for the nomination being Governor Gibbs, who received twenty-one votes and Mr. Mitchell twenty. In 1865 he was commissioned lieutenant colonel of the state militia by Governor Gibbs, and two years later was chosen professor of medical jurisprudence in Willamette University at Salem, Ore., and served in that position for nearly four years. During all this time he was engaged in the active practice of his profession in Portland. In October, 1862, he formed a law partnership with Hon. J. N. Dolph, later his colleague in the United States senate, which continued until January, 1873, when he resigned all other engagements to enter upon his duties as United States senator. During this period he had acquired a reputation as a lawyer second to none in the state of Oregon and was constantly employed in important litigation. For several years he was the attorney of the Oregon & California Railroad Company and the North Pacific Steamship Transportation Company, while his practice extended to all the courts, federal, state and territorial, of Oregon, Washington and Idaho.

"In September, 1872, Mr. Mitchell was nominated, in caucus, by the Republican members of the state legislature for United States senator, receiving the votes of over two-thirds of all the Republicans in the legislature on the first ballot. On September 28, 1872, he was elected by the legislature in joint session as United States senator for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1873. In this body he soon took a prominent position. He was assigned to duty on the following committees: Privileges and Election, Commerce, Claims, Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and Railroads. At the end of two years he was made chairman of the committee on Railroads, and served as such until the end of his term. When the electoral commission was organized, Senator Oliver P. Morton was chairman of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Election, but having been chosen a member of the Electoral Commission, Senator Mitchell was made acting chairman of the committee on Privileges and Election, which committee, for the purpose of taking charge of the great controversy involved in the presidential contest in 1876, in the states of Oregon, Louisiana, South Carolina and Florida, was then increased from nine, the ordinary number, to fifteen senators. As acting chairman, Senator Mitchell presided over the committee during all the investigations which followed and which at the time attracted so much interest all over the country. He was also selected by the unanimous vote of the Republicans in the senate as the senator to appear before the Electoral Committee and argue the Oregon case. This duty he performed and in a long speech ably presented the legal questions involved and to the perfect satisfaction of his party friends defended the position taken by the Republicans of Oregon. During his first term he was on several occasions selected by the Republican majority as chairman of said committee to visit South Carolina, Louisiana and Florida for the purpose of investigating contested elections.

"In April, 1873, Senator Mitchell and Senator Casserly, of California, were appointed a sub-committee of the committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, to visit the Pacific coast and investigate and report upon the best means of opening the Columbia river to free navigation. It was in this position that he had opportunity to do a great service for Oregon. Soon after his appointment on the committee, Senator Casserly resigned his seat in senate and Senator Mitchell was authorized to proceed alone. He thereupon during the summer of 1873 made a most careful examination as to improvements necessary to increase the navigation facilities of the Columbia river, and at the next session of congress submitted an elaborate report to the committee on transportation news, Senator Windom of Minnesota being chairman, in which he recommended, among other things, large appropriations for the mouth of the Columbia river, and also an appropriation for a survey at the Cascade, with the view of ascertaining the cost and advisability of constructing a canal and locks. This report, as written by Senator Mitchell, was incorporated into the report of the committee without alteration, and submitted to the senate, and based on this report, congress at its next session made an appropriation for a survey for canal and locks at the Cascades, which paved the way for their subsequent construction.

"At the expiration of his senatorial term, March 4, 1879, the legislature of Oregon was Democratic, and Honorable James H. Slater, a Democrat, was elected as his successor, whereupon Mr. Mitchell resumed the practice of his profession in Portland. In the fall of 1882, he was urged by party friends to again submit his name as a candidate for United States senator, the legislature at that time being Republican. After much hesitation he consented to do so and in the legislative caucus received on the first ballot the vote of two-thirds of all the Republicans in the legislature, and thus became the nominee of the party for United States senator. A bolt, however, was organized, and he was not elected. The contest, however, was continued from day to day until the last day and the last hour of the forty days' session. During the most of this time he was within a few votes of an election. It required forty-six votes to elect and during the session he received the votes of forty-five different members. Finding an election impossible, although urged by his supporters to continue in the fight to the end, and if not elected himself, thus prevent the election of any one else, he withdrew from the contest during the last hour of the session and all of his supporters, except one, who had so earnestly stood by him during the forty days, gave their votes for Hon. J. N. Dolph, who was elected. Throughout this long contest, without parallel in the political history of the state, for the bitter personal character of the fight, Senator Mitchell apparently lost none of his personal popularity, and after the adjournment of the legislature and upon his return from Salem to Portland he was tendered a reception which in warmth and cordiality partook more of an ovation to a successful than to a defeated candidate.

"After his defeat Mr. Mitchell resumed the practice of his profession, and although earnestly urged by party friends to again permit the use of his name as a candidate for United States senate, at the regular session of the legislature, in January, 1885, he peremptorily declined to do so. The legislature, however, after balloting through the whole session, adjourned without making an election. The governor of the state thereupon called a special session of the legislature to meet in November, 1885. Senator Mitchell at that time was in Portland, and although not personally desirous to be a candidate, and steadily refusing to permit the use of his name until within three or four days before the election, he was again, November 19, 1885, elected to the United States senate for a full term, receiving on the second ballot in joint convention the vote of three-fourths of all the Republicans, and one-half of all the Democrats of the legislature, having on this ballot a majority of twenty-one votes. He was at this time elected to succeed Hon. James H. Slater, and took his seat December 17, 1885, when he was assigned to duty on the following committees: Privileges and Election, Railroads, Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, Claims, Mines and Mining, Postoffices and Post-roads, and special committee to superintend the construction of a National library. After a year's service he was made chairman of the committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and in March, 1889, was made chairman of the committee on Railroads."

On January 19, 1891, Mr. Mitchell was again re-elected as his own successor, for a full term of six years; in this election there was no contest, the Republicans being largely in the majority in the legislature, and every one of them voted for Mr. Mitchell as his own successor; this term expired March 4, 1897.

At the meeting of the legislature in January, 1897, it being the duty of that legislature to elect Mr. Mitchell's successor, on January 10, 1897, in a caucus of the Republican members of the legislature, there being forty-eight members present, two more than a majority of the whole legislature, the whole number constituting the two houses being ninety, on an open roll call he received every one of the forty-eight votes, and was declared the unanimous nominee of the Republican party for United States senator to succeed himself; twenty-eight members of the house refused to take the oath of office during the entire session, thus destroying a quorum, and preventing a vote for senator, and also preventing the passage of any appropriation or other acts during the entire session, which resulted in his defeat. Mr. Mitchell was again, February 23, 1901, elected to succeed Hon. George W.

McBride, and took his seat March 9, 1901; his present term of service will expire March 3, 1907.

Mr. Mitchell enjoys the distinction it is believed no other man in the United States ever attained in connection with service in the United States senate; he is the only man who has ever been elected from the same state to the senate after two vacations. He served from March 4, 1873, to March 4, 1879; was out from March 4, 1879, to March 4, 1885; served from March 4, 1885, to March 4, 1897 (twelve years); was out from March 4, 1897 until March 4, 1901, and is now serving his fourth full term.

The people of Oregon have reason to feel a justifiable pride in his career. A man of remarkable energy and untiring industry, Senator Mitchell has throughout his career as a public man shown a keen discrimination and a wonderful ability for grasping the great and intricate questions that are every day to be met with by United States senators. It is not our intention to make comparisons, but we do say that Oregon has never had a man who has filled this exalted position in a more satisfactory or painstaking manner than has Senator Mitchell. No request of his constituents is received, whether from the rich or poor, but it is given his personal attention. As a speaker he is forcible, tactful and with his sound judgment and eminently practical views he is well equipped to defend the interests of his adopted state. His long term of service has made him one of the most popular men in the United States senate and among his colleagues he is recognized as a power. Here in Oregon, where for over forty-three years he has made his home, the senator is known by all and there is no man in the state who has a larger personal following than he. Generous to a fault, whole-souled and sympathetic, to know him is to admire him.

Personally Senator Mitchell is a man of striking appearance; he is an interesting conversationalist, has a direct, forceful way of talking, while his wonderful memory makes him a most congenial companion.

GEORGE JENNINGS AINSWORTH. A comparatively brief life was that of George Jennings Ainsworth, a native of Oregon, and the son of a substantial pioneer, but he left behind him the evidence of well-directed effort, both as a citizen and the maker of a home. He was born in Oregon City, April 13, 1852, the son of John C. and Jane (White) Ainsworth, who died when he was seven years of age. He received his education in the public schools of the state and the old Portland Academy, after which he entered and took a four-years' course in the State University of California, from which he was graduated in 1873, the year following taking a post-graduate course. He was elected on the University Board of Regents for a term of eighteen years. His school days over and the preparation for his life work complete he returned to Portland and engaged upon the river boats, with the self-reliance which had even thus early distinguished him, declining all aid and starting at the foot of the ladder and familiarizing himself with every detail of the different departments. Promotion was not long in coming to him, nor an infrequent occurrence, for he steadily rose to positions of importance in his new relations.

During his experience on the river he was commander of the steamers Otter, Welcome, Dixie Thompson, Emma Hayward, Oneonta and others. In January, 1877, he was made a director of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and in 1878 was made assistant general superintendent, later assuming charge as general superintendent. He was vice-president of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company when its affairs were closed after the Villard coup, and when the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company succeeded it he was appointed superintendent of the river and sound divisions, and operated the portage roads at the Cascades and the Dalles, resigning in 1882 to assist his father, who had become interested in a number of enterprises at Oakland, Cal. After six years there Captain Ainsworth went to Redondo Beach, and under the direction of his father and R. R. Thompson, the owners, succeeded in transforming a barren waste of land into one of the finest commercial ports of southern California. The Redondo Beach Company, Redondo Railway Company, and Redondo Hotel Company were adjuncts in the development which brought into existence a magnificent hotel, narrow gauge railway, a wharf suitable for the largest ships afloat and many other improvements. Captain George remained in charge of this vast property six years, when his father's death occurred, which compelled his return to Oregon as administrator of his father's estate. Returning to Portland he at once assumed control of the business affairs with the details of which he was perfectly familiar, as he had been associated intimately with his father from early boyhood, in his more mature years becoming a co-worker and a companion of the elder man. His own death occurred but a little later, as he died October 20, 1895.

Mr. Ainsworth was a man of many admirable personal characteristics, being public-spirited and earnest for the welfare of whatever community he had made his by a residence. Though not a politician in the common acceptance of the term he was strongly identified with the Democratic party and spared no efforts to advance the principles which he endorsed. His ability being recognized by the local leaders in California he was induced to accept the nomination of United States senator, but was defeated in the election, while the canvass was in progress, himself being absent in the pursuit of his business in eastern states. In the accumulation of property he was uniformly successful, for his shrewd business judgment went hand in hand with an ambitious, enterprising spirit and wide profits were the result. He was a lover of sports, being fond of hunting and fishing, appreciated a good joke and could tell many. At his death he had large holdings in California as well as landed property in Portland and vicinity, and left his family, for whom he had always cared with an exceptional kindness and thought, well provided for in the matter of this world's goods. Personally he was a man of benevolent and kindly disposition, in religious faith a Presbyterian, in which church he officiated as elder. Fraternally he was a Mason, and was identified with the Blue Lodge, Chapter, Commandery, Consistory and Scottish Rite, and was always active in lodge work.

June 16, 1875, Mr. Ainsworth was united in marriage with Margaret Sutton, a native of San Francisco, and the descendant of a long-lived Boston family of English ancestry. The parents, John and Anna B. (Doland) Sutton, came to Portland in 1870, and in January, three years later, the father was lost at sea, aboard the George S. Wright, and the mother now makes her home, at the age of seventy-three years, with her daughter, Mrs. Ainsworth. The other children of her father's family were Julia, who married G. B. Wright, of British Columbia; Mave, who married Otis Sprague, of Tacoma; James, who is in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and located in Portland; John, a native of Portland, who is now located in California and engaged in scientific research; Albert, an architect, of San Francisco; Herbert, born in Portland, in the employ of a lumber company, of San Francisco; Jennie K., who was married in Tacoma to A. D. Wheeler, a mining expert, of British Columbia; and Ada V., a resident of Boston, and the widow of A. E. Bull. The four last named of the children were graduates of the Portland high school. Two children blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Ainsworth: Lawrence Sutton, born in Portland, April, 1877, and now purser on the steamer Regulator, makes his home with his mother; and Mabel, born in Portland, became the wife of Edwin Mays, and they have two children, George Ainsworth and Eunice. This family is also included in that of Mrs. Ainsworth, who in May, 1899, removed from her home, "Pagoda Villa," at Berkeley, Cal., and became a resident of Portland.

CAPT. JACOB KAMM, about whom centers the development of river and other transportation facilities in Oregon, and who for many years has been a most important factor in the upbuilding of numerous gigantic enterprises in Portland, is one of the most striking types of mankind residing in the region known as the Pacific northwest. Perhaps no other man living to-day in Portland has been more intimately associated with all that has tended to give this city the great commercial prestige it now boasts, and surely no man has entered into the spirit of industrial and commercial development more heartily and unselfishly than he. A brief résumé of the principal events in the life of this pioneer builder, illustrating the various steps in his upward career, will prove a stimulus to the young men of the present generation who start out in life no more fully equipped than he to attain success.

Jacob Kamm was born in Canton Glarus, Switzerland, December 12, 1823. His father resigned his commission in the Swiss army to make a home for himself and his family among the broader opportunities offered in America, bringing with him his son Jacob, then eight years of age. Four years after their arrival his father died of yellow fever in New Orleans, leaving his twelve-year-old son to solve for himself the problems of life in a strange land. Some foreshadowing of the ambitious dream of the elder Kamm must have come to him at the period when his capabilities and the possibilities of success in this country of wonderful resources first began to dawn upon the son, and has, perchance, followed unremittingly into the strenuous activity which has characterized all his maturer years.

Soon after the father took up his residence in New Orleans, the younger Kamm secured a position in the office of the New Orleans Picayune, in which office he remained until the death of the foreman, who was a personal friend. After the death of this friend, a new foreman was secured and Mr. Kamm was forced to look elsewhere for a position. For a time he remained in the city, working at whatever came his way, until November, 1837, when he went to St. Louis. Here he secured a position as cabin boy on the Ark, a small steamer plying the Illinois river. While en route from the southern city he made the acquaintance of a smooth-talking stranger, who robbed him of all his money with the exception of ten cents, the whole amount of his capital on arrival in St. Louis. In his new position as cabin boy he felt his limitations, and having a mechanical turn of mind he improved all his spare time mastering the details of marine engineering. Expert workmanship brought him into contact with concerns who offered him paying positions, and he soon managed to save enough money to purchase an interest in the Belle of Hatchie, a steamboat which he ran until his health gave way under the unbroken strain to which he was subjected. After disposing of his interest in this boat he put in a number of years as engineer on packet boats plying between St. Louis, Keokuk and New Orleans. At that time the requirements demanded of engineers before they were licensed to ply their vocations were very high. Mr. Kamm received his diploma from the Engineers' Association of the state of Missouri. Owing to impaired health, Mr. Kamm sought relaxation and change, and with a party of friends he crossed the plains in 1849, locating in the mines around Sacramento, Cal. Soon after his arrival he secured a position as engineer on a steamboat running on the Sacramento and Feather rivers in California. A well-remembered incident connected with these pioneer days of California was the meeting of Mr. Kamm and Lot Whitcomb in Sacramento in 1850. As the result of this meeting Mr. Kamm decided to come to Milwaukee, then a flourishing hamlet above Portland, in order to install the machinery ordered for the steamer Lot Whitcomb. This proved a herculean task, owing to the lack of proper implements with which to work, the sole equipment being a bellows and anvil. Mr. Kamm's assistant, a blacksmith by the name of Blakesley, happened, fortunately, to be ingenious and painstaking, and the combined application of the two men resulted in the manufacture of crude tools which filled the demand. Considerable trouble grew out of the construction of the boilers, which arrived from New York in twenty-two separate sections, and as there were no boiler makers in the west at the time Mr. Kamm was compelled to figure out a way to overcome this difficulty. That he was equal to the emergency was demonstrated to the satisfaction of all concerned when the Lot Whitcomb proudly steamed out of the harbor, a substantial and thoroughly reliable craft, the first of the kind ever equipped in this port. On this historic occasion the man behind the engines was Mr. Kamm, and he continued to operate her machinery until she was sold and taken to California.

With Messrs. Abernethy, Clark and Ainsworth associated with him in the ownership, Mr. Kamm constructed the first stern-wheel steamer built in Oregon, the Jennie Clark. This also proved an undertaking of considerable proportions, for the machinery had to be brought in a sailing vessel around the Horn, entailing a great expense and risk, but Mr. Kamm had great faith in the enterprise and when his first partner, a Mr. Hall, stepped out he got the above gentlemen to take a quarter interest each, while he put up the money for the balance. The Carrie Ladd, another pioneer water craft of Oregon, was the nucleus of what afterward became known as the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. This vessel was constructed under the direction of Mr. Kamm, and was owned by him in partnership with others. He was a large stockholder in the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, which was organized in 1860, with Mr. Kamm as chief engineer, which position he filled until 1865. He afterward sold his interest, which was the second largest, to a syndicate, which in turn transferred its stock to that gigantic enterprise known as the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company. Another company which in its days of independent prosperity operated extensively on the Willamette, and which eventually was merged into the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, was the Willamette Transportation Company, of which Mr. Kamm was one of the organizers and principal stockholders. At one time he also owned that well-known ocean coasting steamer, the George S. Wright, which, after passing into the hands of Ben Holliday, was wrecked in Alaskan waters. Although at one time Mr. Kamm thought of going out of the steamboat business entirely, his plans were changed through no fault of his own, but chiefly through having loaned money to a friend, with steamboat property as security.

With his years as invaluable experience in this direction, it is not surprising that Mr. Kamm has been identified with the organization of most of the large steamboat transportation companies of the northwest, or that to some extent he has been interested in railroads. In 1872, through a business transaction, Mr. Kamm came into possession of the Carrie, a small steamer, which proved to be the nucleus of the Vancouver Transportation Company. In February, 1874, the company was incorporated with Mr. Kamm as president, a position which he has held up to the present time. His next venture was his connection with the Ilwaco Railway and Navigation Company, but his interests in this concern were disposed of some years ago. Associated with others, Mr. Kamm built the Norma, which is the only boat that has passed through the famous Box Canyon on the Snake river without being wrecked.

While practically his whole life has been devoted to navigation Mr. Kamm has, nevertheless, found the time to take up other business matters, and was at one time vice-president of the United States National Bank of Portland, and he is also a prominent stockholder in several other banks in the city. His interests have extended to Astoria, where he has been an important factor in the upbuilding of the present enterprising community. He is president of the First National Bank of that city, and one of the heaviest taxpayers of Astoria. He also has valuable property in San Francisco; and in Portland owns, among other property, the large business block bearing his name.

The beautiful home occupied by Mr. Kamm and his wife in Portland, consisting of fourteen acres almost in the heart of the city, was, at the time of its purchase in the early '60s, outside the city limits. At the present time it is hedged in by the stress of commercialism and handsome residences, and is one of the most conspicuous landmarks which bind the past to the present. This home, with its countless memories of early days, is presided over by one of the most charming women of Portland, to whose co-operation and unceasing sympathy this honored pioneer attributes a large share of his success in life. Mrs. Kamm, whose marriage to the subject of this brief memoir occurred September 13, 1859, was formerly Caroline A. Gray, daughter of the late William H. and Mary A. (Dix) Gray. Mr. and Mrs. Kamm are the parents of one son, Charles T. Kamm, who, like his father, has won a captaincy.

Mr. Kamm became identified with the Masonic fraternity in St. Louis, July 27, 1847, and was one of the early members of Multnomah Lodge No. 1, A. F. & A. M., of Oregon City. At the present time he is the third oldest Mason in the state of Oregon; is a member of Clackamas Chapter R. A. M.; Portland Commandery No. 1, K. T.; Oregon Consistory No. 1, Scottish Rite; and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is a member and president of the board of trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Portland, and for many years has been a generous contributor toward its maintenance.

Success has come to Mr. Kamm, the result of his own efforts, and that too in the face of one of the greatest of handicaps—ill health, as from young manhood to the present time he has been a sufferer and there have been many times when it was only by superhuman efforts that he kept himself from giving up the struggle. Jacob Kamm is a typical representative of the stalwart founders of the civilization of the Pacific slope, and in his integrity, his broad-mindedness and his resourcefulness, has met the demands of our splendid western citizenship. Personally he is a man possessed of numerous striking and delightful characteristics. Those who know him best, the representatives of the younger generation as well as those who, like him, have spent many years in useful operations in Oregon, cheerfully accord him a rank among the most enlightened, useful, public-spirited, kind-hearted and generous citizens of the state; and in him they find a man whose support of all worthy movements calculated to enhance the commercial, industrial and social standing of the metropolis of Oregon comes from entirely unselfish motives. That he has come to be recognized as one of the foremost citizens of the northwest is a tribute to his personal worth, his indefatigable industry and perseverance in the face of obstacles that would have seemed insurmountable by many others, and his determination, inherited from his study father, to accomplish what he could toward success by honesty and industry alone. These characteristics have made his life what it has been—reflecting great credit upon himself, and a source of the greatest inspiration to those young men of the present generation whose only hope of reward may be found in doing what lies before them in the line of duty with a firm determination to adhere to a policy of integrity, watchfulness and perseverance.

MRS. CAROLINE AUGUSTA KAMM.

The history of Oregon were indeed incomplete without due mention of the family to which Mrs. Caroline Augusta Kamm, wife of one of Oregon's noblest and most resourceful pioneers, belongs, or of the place which she herself has occupied these many years in the hearts of her many friends. Mrs. Kamm was born at Lapwai, Oregon territory, now Idaho, October 16, 1840, and is the oldest daughter born to William H. and Mary A. (Dix) Gray, pioneers respectively of 1836 and 1838.

The Gray family is one of the very earliest to settle in Oregon, and their impress upon the institutions which served as a nucleus for later large achievements was marked in the extreme. William Henry Gray was born in Fairfield, N. Y., September 8, 1810, and in 1836 was selected by the American Board of Missions as secular agent in Oregon. On the trip across the plains he joined Whitman and Spaulding and their wives at Liberty Landing, Mo., and the subsequent trials of this courageous little band have been already often recorded. They succeeded in reaching Walla Walla, Wash., September 2, 1836, and, having partially accomplished his mission in the west, Mr. Gray undertook again the perilous trip over the plains, that he might marry Mary A. Dix, who was born in Champlain county, N. Y., January 2, 1810. The marriage ceremony took place February 25, 1838, Mrs. Gray being the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier, who had decided to devote her life to missionary work. In 1838 this courageous couple set forth upon their life mission in the west, taking with them three other missionaries and their wives, and locating at Fort Lapwai, Idaho. The zeal of the missionaries is understood when it is known that two weeks after their arrival

Mrs. Gray had started a school for Indians under a pine tree in the wilderness, and had a membership of from fifty to one hundred. Nor were her efforts confined to teaching the children, for during leisure hours she instructed the mothers in keeping their homes clean, in the art of making bread, and also taught them to cut and make the clothes for their families. The following March her pine tree school was exchanged for more satisfactory quarters in a little log building without any floor and with puncheon seats, and this advance in accommodations was the signal for renewed effort to give the Indians in Idaho the benefits of an uplifting civilization. In 1838 both Dr. Gray and his wife received certificates from Rev. Dr. Greene of New York as missionaries of the American Board of Foreign Missions, both of which now hang in the historical rooms together with their passports.

In July, 1842, Mr. Gray resigned from the Board of Foreign Missions, and during the summer of the same year made a trip to the Willamette Valley where he became trustee and contractor, and built the old Oregon Institute, since known as the Willamette University. In 1843 he was the leading spirit in the formation of the provincial government, and in 1845 he was elected a member of the legislature from Clackamas county. From 1842 until 1844 he lived with his family in Salem, and from then until 1846 made his home in Oregon City. He then removed to the Clatsop Plains, where, aided by his wife and three others, he organized the first Presbyterian Church in Oregon. During the latter years of their lives Mr. and Mrs. Gray lived principally in Astoria, and her death occurred in Clatsop county in 1881, while that of her husband occurred at the home of Mr. Kamm in Portland November 14, 1889.

Mr. Gray was a man of diversified gifts, and besides being a practicing physician for many years, was a writer of no mean merit. Of his History of Oregon, written in 1870, Rev. Geary, D. D., when asked for his opinion, said emphatically: "True, every word of it, but you told too much." To Dr. Gray is due the distinction of performing the first operation of trephining of the skull on the Pacific coast, and the Indian boy who was thus benefited by his skill spread his good fortune up and down through the forests. In the order of their birth the children born to this noble pioneer couple are as follows: Capt. J. H. D. Gray, who died in Astoria October 26, 1902, and was ex-state senator and ex-county judge of Clatsop county; Caroline A., Mrs. Kamm; Mary S., the deceased wife of Mr. Tarbell of Tacoma, Wash.; Sarah F., now Mrs. Abernethy of Coos county, Ore.; Capt. William Polk; Capt. A. W., of Portland; and Capt. James T., also of Portland.

Mrs. Kamm is a very popular and well informed woman, and is full of generous impulses and unbounded sympathy. Her name is at the head of many charities, although unostentatiously she gives much towards the alleviation of human suffering. In her travels through the country with her husband she has accumulated a horde of interesting information, and is particularly enlightening about the early times in which her parents took so prominent a part.

CHARLES E. LADD. Of Charles E. Ladd it may be said that he has succeeded in spite of wealth. The incentive which is supposed to animate the average actions of men being wanting, he has yet developed a business capacity beyond the average, and which has placed him in the front ranks of captains of industry on the coast. It is usual to praise those who succeed in spite of poverty; they have an enormous advantage, in that if ambitious they must work. The man of inherited wealth possesses already all that the average successful man craves as a result of labor. Mr. Ladd has ignored every incentive save that of desiring to maintain a family prestige splendidly established by his father, W. S. Ladd, one of the best remembered of the early pioneers whose unceasing toil won him a handsome competency.

A native son of Portland, Charles E. Ladd was born in 1857 and was educated at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and at Amherst College, from which he was graduated in the class of 1881, with the degree of A. B. Returning to Portland, he became president of the Portland Planing Mills, and upon the death of his father became identified as manager with the banking firm of Ladd & Tilton. Besides the numerous corporations with which he is connected, Mr. Ladd is a director in the Portland Library Association; a member of the board and on the executive committee of the Lewis & Clark Exposition; a member of the University, Commercial, Arlington and Multnomah Clubs; and a member and director of the Chamber of Commerce. In Somerville, Mass., Mr. Ladd was united in marriage with Sarah L. Hall, a native of Somerville. The family are members of the Calvary Presbyterian Church.

William S. Ladd, whose worth-while career is extensively written of in another part of this work, died in Portland, January 6, 1893, leaving a widow and the following children: William M., head of the banking house of Ladd & Tilton; Charles E.; Mrs. H. J. Corbett of Portland; Mrs. F. B. Pratt of Brooklyn, N. Y.; and J. Wesley, also associated with the banking house of Ladd & Tilton. The latter institution, founded by the elder Ladd and Mr. Tilton, and now owned entirely by the Portland family of Ladd, is one of the most solid financial institutions this side of the Rocky mountains, and one of the most substantial in the country.

HON. GEORGE C. BROWNELL. Among the distinguished lawyers and lawmakers of Oregon George C. Brownell is numbered, and for the third term he is serving in the state senate, leaving the impress of his individuality upon the legislation which has been enacted during the period of his connection with the general assembly. A native of the Empire state, he was born in Willsboro, N. Y., August 10, 1858, the second in the family of seven children born unto Ambrose and Annie (Smith) Brownell. Of English ancestry, the Brownell family was founded in New England at an early period in the development of this country. The father of our subject was a native of New York, born in Essex county, whence he removed to Columbia county, where his last days were passed. He was a mechanic, but at the time of the Civil war he put aside all business and personal considerations in order to aid in the preservation of the Union as a member of Company F, One Hundred and Eighteenth New York Infantry, which was assigned to duty with the Army of the Potomac. He took part in a number of engagements and on one occasion was severely wounded. His wife was a native of Addison county, Vt.

After acquiring his literary education in the public schools and an academy, George C. Brownell took up the study of law under the direction of Charles L. Beale, member of congress living in Hudson, N. Y., and in Albany, in 1882, he was admitted to the bar. He entered upon his professional career in Frankfort, Kans., where he engaged in practice with marked success, winning prestige at that bar, and in public affairs he was also prominent, serving as mayor of Frankfort in 1884-85. On the 6th of January, 1886, he removed to Ness City, Kans., and the same year was appointed attorney for the Denver, Memphis & Atlantic Railroad, extending from Chetopa, Kans., to Pueblo, Colo. A large private practice was also accorded him in recognition of his skill and ability in the line of his chosen profession, and for two years he served as county attorney of Ness county, Kans.

Since June, 1891, he has been a resident of Oregon City and a practitioner at its bar, and today a distinctively representative clientage is accorded him in recognition of his capability. He has broad and comprehensive understanding of the principles of jurisprudence, possesses a keenly analytical mind, prepares his cases with great care and precision and therefore seldom fails to gain the verdict desired. But Mr. Brownell has not confined his attention solely to the practice of law, having been a factor in the lawmaking body of the state. In 1892 he was made the nominee of the Republican party for state senator, but declined to accept the nomination because he had been a resident of the state for less than a year. He was, however, in the county convention, made chairman of the delegation to the state convention and was chairman of the Republican central committee of Clackamas county and had charge of the convention that year. In 1894 he was nominated for the position of state senator by acclamation and defeated Hon. W. A. Starkweather, who had been a member of the first constitutional convention of Oregon and was an ex-representative and a former register of the land office, Mr. Brownell being elected by a plurality of three hundred and twenty-seven. In 1898, after the most bitter contest that had occurred in the county in years, he was renominated by acclamation, covering every one of the thirty-six precincts of the county, and in the June election he defeated Hon. W. S. Wren by two hundred and thirty-eight votes. In the special session of 1898, he was chosen by the Republican caucus to present the caucus man, the Hon. Joseph Simon, to the joint assembly as the candidate for United States senator. In 1900 Mr. Brownell received the unanimous endorsement of the Republicans of Clackamas county for member of congress. In 1902 he was a third time nominated for state senator by acclamation and after a hard contest before the people defeated the Hon. George W. Grace, by a plurality of six hundred and ninety-five. During the session of 1901 Mr. Brownell took an active part in the election of a United States senator, and it was he who on the fortieth ballot, when hope of electing a senator was about gone, presented the name of John H. Mitchell, who was later elected. Again during the session of 1903-04, when Mr. Brownell was serving as president of the senate, he was successful in having his candidate for United States senator, Hon. C. W. Fulton, elected, and in the speech made by Senator Fulton directly after the deciding ballot had been cast, he gave Senator Brownell the full credit for what he had accomplished.

Mr. Brownell has been a very active and valuable member of the upper house of the state legislature and his labors have been a potent factor in framing legislation enacted during his terms of service. He was the author of and introduced into the senate the initiative and referendum resolution to amend the state constitution: was the author of the law which provided that supervisors should be elected instead of appointed; and at each session he introduced a bill to authorize the calling of a constitutional convention to revise the organic law of the state and finally secured the passage of the bill through the senate in 1901, but it was defeated in the house by two votes. He was also the author of the bill to elect precinct assessors, instead of county assessors, and this also passed the senate, but was defeated in the house by a vote of two. He introduced the bill, and secured its passage through the senate, exempting to every laboring man that was the head of a family thirty days' wages from attachment and execution for debt, and this passed the house and became a law. In the senate Mr. Brownell offered resolutions for the appointment of a committee to investigate the handling of school funds of Oregon and was made the chairman of the committee, whose report gave a shortage of $31,000 in the school funds, and thus prevented other fraudulent use of money appropriated for educational work in the state. On May 20, 1903, Mr. Brownell delivered the address of welcome at the state capital as chairman of the committee on behalf of the senate and house of representatives of Oregon.

In Rockland, Mass., Mr. Brownell was married to Miss Alma C. Lane, a native of the Bay state. They have two adopted sons, Howard and Ambrose, the former a law student. Mrs. Brownell is a member of the Presbyterian Church and Mr. Brownell belongs to various fraternal organizations, holding membership relations with the Knights of the Maccabees, the Woodmen of the World, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Improved Order of Red Men.

While not engrossed with his labors as a legislator, Mr. Brownell finds that his time is fully occupied with a large and growing law practice of a distinctively representative character. He is especially strong as a trial lawyer, being a forceful, eloquent speaker, whose deductions follow in logical sequence and whose analyzation of a cause and the application of the points of law which apply thereto is correct and comprehensive.

HON. CHARLES W. FULTON. The junior United States senator from Oregon is Hon. Charles W. Fulton, a statesman of eminent ability, one of the foremost attorneys of Clatsop county, and a man of exceptional talent and high character. A resident of Astoria, he is prominent in legal, political, fraternal and social circles, and is deservedly popular and esteemed as a citizen. A son of Jacob Fulton, he was born August 24, 1853, in Lima, Allen county, Ohio, the same county in which his paternal grandfather, Loami Fulton, was born.

A native of Allen county, Ohio, Jacob Fulton was reared on a farm, and when young, learned the trade of a carpenter and builder. He subsequently removed with his family to Harrison county, Iowa, locating on a farm in Magnolia. During the Civil war, he served as second lieutenant of Company A, Twenty-ninth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, being in the Department of the Tennessee until forced to resign on account of ill health, in 1864. Removing to Pawnee City, Neb., in 1870, he was successfully engaged in mercantile pursuits until his death. He married Eliza McAllister, who was born in Pennsylvania, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and was left an orphan in early childhood. She survived her husband, and still resides in Pawnee City, Neb. Of the eight children that blessed their union, one daughter and five sons grew to years of maturity. Four of the sons became residents of Astoria, namely: Charles W., the special subject of this brief biographical review; George C., an attorney, in partnership with his brother Charles; Dr. J. A., a well-known physician; and Dr. A. L., a prominent physician, who died at his home in Astoria in 1900.

Obtaining his elementary education in the district schools of Magnolia, Iowa, whither his parents removed when he was a child of two years, Charles W. Fulton afterwards completed the full course in the Pawnee City Academy. Ambitious to enter the legal profession, he accomplished his desire by virtue of hard work, studying law under Judge A. H. Babcock, now of Beatrice, Neb., in the meantime teaching school winters in order to assist in defraying his expenses. Being admitted to the bar in April, 1875, Mr. Fulton immediately came to Oregon, and the following three months taught school in Waterloo, Linn county. Going in July of that year to Astoria, he found that the entire population of Clatsop county was but seventeen hundred souls, and that Judge Bowlby, Judge Elliott, Gen. O. F. Bell, J. Taylor and W. L. McEwan were the only attorneys in the city of Astoria, and of these Judge Bowlby and Mr. Taylor are the sole survivors. Opening a law office, Mr. Fulton at once began the practice of his profession, which he has continued until the present time. He has met with most excellent success, having so much business to attend to that in 1884 he admitted his brother, George C. Fulton, to an equal partnership, and both are kept busily employed in looking after the interests of their large clientele.

One of the leading Republicans of the state, Mr. Fulton has ever been influential and active in local and national affairs, and since 1884 has done much campaign work at every state election. As state elector in 1888, he was selected to carry the vote for President Harrison to Washington in February, 1889, having previously served as chairman of the Oregon delegation to the convention which nominated him to the presidency, and in 1892 he was a delegate to the national convention held in Minneapolis, Minn. For two terms he served as city attorney for Astoria. In 1878 he was elected state senator, and served two years. Again elected to the state senate in 1890, he served from 1891 until 1893, in the meantime helping to re-elect Senator Mitchell as United States senator, and serving in 1893 as president of the senate. In 1898 Mr. Fulton was elected state senator, and served in the special session of that year, and in the sessions from 1899 until 1901, in the latter year being again president of the senate. In 1902 he was re-elected state senator, and in the biennial session of 1903 was elected United States senator, and took the oath of office March 5, 1903, at a special session of the United States senate.

Mr. Fulton married, in Astoria, Miss Ada Hobson, who was born at Clatsop Plains, a daughter of John Hobson, who came to Clatsop county with the first wagon train of emigrants to cross the plains, arriving in 1843. Mr. and Mrs. Fulton have one child, Frederick C. Fulton. Fraternally Mr. Fulton is a member and past exalted ruler of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

IRA F. POWERS, SR. The long and prominent association of Mr. Powers with the commercial affairs of Portland, together with his high character as a man, his kindness as a friend and his liberal, philanthropic spirit, gave him a place of influence and honor among his fellow-townsmen and caused the news of his death, which occurred September 8, 1902, to be everywhere received with regret. The family of which Mr. Powers was a member was established at Littleton, Mass., very early in the history of America, and the lineage is traced back in England as far as the twelfth century. In 1683 the letter "s" was added to the original name of Power, thus giving it its present form. Many generations continued to reside in New England, but finally Levi Powers migrated from Vermont to Ballston, N. Y., where he married Mary Frost. Among their children was Ira F. Powers, Sr., who was born at Au Sable, Clinton county, N. Y., in 1831. From the age of twelve he was self-supporting. However, though he had little opportunity to acquire an education in schools, he gained a broad fund of knowledge in the great school of experience, and few men of his day had a more thorough business education than he, though it was wholly self-acquired. When news came of the discovery of gold in California, he came to the coast via Cape Horn, and though his faith in mining was not great, he followed the general trend of emigrants, and experimented as a miner, the result being sufficiently satisfactory to induce him to remain in the occupation for about thirteen years. Meanwhile he prospected in various parts of California and Idaho.

The spring of 1865 found Mr. Powers in Portland, where, in partnership with A. Burdard, he engaged in the second-hand furniture business, continuing the same profitably until all was lost in the fire of 1875. Meantime, in 1872, he had embarked in the manufacture of furniture under the firm title of Donly, Beard & Powers, their plant being located at Willsburg. During 1875 he started a factory on Water street near the foot of Montgomery, but later removed the plant to South Portland, where he had a tract of three acres. In 1893 the business was incorporated under the title of the Ira F. Powers Manufacturing Company, with himself as president, and this position he held until his death. In the meantime he had other interests of an important nature, chief among these being his connection with the banking business, his membership in the Chamber of Commerce and the Manufacturers' Association, his work as a builder of the Morrison street bridge and also as a stockholder in the Madison street bridge. Fraternally he was a charter member of Pilot Peak Lodge, I. O. O. F., but allowed his membership in this body to lapse in later years. He was also connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In Masonry he was first a member of Gold Run Lodge, F. & A. M., in California, and later of Harmony Lodge No. 12, of Portland, in which he officiated as treasurer for twelve years. After coming to Portland he also became associated with Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M.; Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T., and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. In politics he was a pronounced Republican.

In disposition he was large-hearted and generous, and was one of Portland's most philanthropic citizens, a friend to the needy and especially kind to homeless boys. It is said that at times he had as many as five such boys in his own home, doing all he could to train them for positions of usefulness and honor in the business world. Largely through his efforts the Boys' and Girls' Aid Society was organized in Portland, and in many other ways he was enabled to help those who were homeless and friendless.

The first marriage of Mr. Powers occurred in 1860 and united him with Minnie Wilson, who died four years later, leaving a son, Frederick, now living in Maine. In 1870 he was again married, his wife being Mary Sullivan, who was born in New York City and came with her parents, D. and Jessie Sullivan, to the west in an early day, later accompanying her mother from California to Oregon. She died in 1875, leaving an only son, Ira F., Jr. The last named was born in Portland, in 1872, and at seventeen years of age entered his father's store, where for three years he studied business methods and the details of that special enterprise. For a year he engaged in the furniture business at Lagrande, Ore., after which he traveled as salesman for Heywood Bros. & Wakefield Co., his route comprising Oregon, Idaho, Montana and Washington. While as a commercial traveler he was successful, yet it was his father's wish and his own desire to enter into business for himself, and, accordingly, in August, 1902, he resigned from the road and became secretary of the Ira F. Powers' Manufacturing Company. Upon the death of his father he succeeded to the presidency of the concern. His furniture establishment is situated at No. 190 First street, where both a wholesale and retail business is conducted, and where four floors, 50x100 feet, furnish ample space for storage and exhibit purposes. The sales are not limited to Portland, but extend throughout the entire northwest. To supply the constant demand for extension and center tables, the manufacture of which is the firm's specialty, modern machinery has been introduced, until now the plant, operated ten hours a day, has a capacity of about fifteen hundred tables per month.

In many of his business and fraternal connections Mr. Powers has followed the example of his father. He is identified with the Manufacturers' Association, the Portland Board of Trade, Harmony Lodge No. 12, A. F. & A. M., and is likewise a member of the Commercial Club and the Multnomah Athletic Club. In politics he is a staunch adherent of the Republican party. It is his ambition to maintain the high standard of business honor and intelligence established by his father and to increase the volume of business transacted by the concern of which he is the head. In succeeding to the business, he has before him the example of his father to stimulate him to an increased ambition, knowing that he cannot better honor his predecessor in business than by keeping all of his transactions above criticism and sustaining the high reputation already gained by the company.

HON. JOSEPH S. HUTCHINSON. On the arrival of Joseph Hutchinson from Yorkshire, England, he took his family to Iowa and settled near Dubuque, but soon removed to Shullsburg, Lafayette county, Wis., and there supplemented the tilling of a farm by work as a lead ore smelter. His life was protracted to the advanced age of eighty-seven. His wife had died of cholera during their residence in Iowa when forty-six years old. At the time of crossing the ocean their son, Christopher, was a small boy, and hence his early recollections were principally of frontier scenes in Iowa and Wisconsin. Following in the footsteps of his father, he took up work in lead ore smelting, and continued in the same, in various towns, until about 1881. While living in Grant County, Wis., he served two terms in the state legislature. From Wisconsin he went to Oregon, and in 1897 began prospecting in Dawson, Alaska, later going to Nome, where he staked a rich claim, but through a fraudulent entry in the land office he was defrauded of what was justly his. Thereupon he returned to Portland.

While living in Wisconsin Christopher Hutchinson married Susan Oatey, who was born near Land's End, Cornwall, England, and came to America with her father, Samuel Oatey, settling in Shullsburg. After a time as a salaried employe in lead mines, he was promoted to the position of mine superintendent in Cuba, later returning to Wisconsin. In the family of Christopher Hutchinson there were four sons and two daughters, all of whom are in Oregon, Joseph S. being the third son and fourth child. He was born in Shullsburg, Wis., July 7, 1868, and attended the grammar and high school of his native town. After completing his schooling he learned the barber's trade. In 1891 he came to Portland, where he took up work at his trade. On the organization of the Barbers' Union, in October, 1899, he was chosen its first president. It was through his instrumentality that the union was organized and placed upon a solid basis; it has proved a wise step, and many have profited by the sick benefits offered. Death benefits also are given.

In Portland, December 1, 1895, Mr. Hutchinson married Lelah Hendershott, who was born in Marion county, Ore., and by whom he has two children, Howard and Corrine. Fraternaly he is connected with the Maccabees and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is also counselor of the Order of Pendo. Politically he is a staunch Republican, loyal to his party and a worker for its success. In 1902 he was nominated on the Republican ticket as a member of the legislature representing Multnomah county and was duly elected, since which time he has served in that capacity to the satisfaction of all concerned. March 6, 1903, he was appointed license inspector in the office of the city auditor, which, under the new charter, comes within the civil service regulations.

Newton Clark.

HON. NEWTON CLARK. A varied, eventful and interesting career preceded the coming of Hon. Newton Clark to Portland in 1889, his chief incentive in thus selecting this city for his home being the better to fulfill his important responsibility as grand recorder of the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of the state of Oregon, a position which he has maintained with special distinction, and for a longer time, than any other man in the state.

A native of McHenry county, Ill., Mr. Clark was born May 27, 1837, and is a son of Thomas L. and Delilah (Saddoris) Clark, and grandson of Richard Clark. The latter was born in Ohio, and served in the war of 1812 under General Harrison. At a later date he settled in Indiana, still later taking up his residence in McHenry county, Ill., whence he removed to the farm near Baraboo, Wis., and there the remainder of his life was spent. Thomas Clark was born in Indiana, and in time followed the family fortunes to Illinois and Wisconsin. In 1863 he removed with his own family to Golden City, Colo., where he farmed at the foot of Table mountain until coming to Oregon in 1877. The journey hence was via the overland trail, and was accomplished with horse teams and wagons, the travelers halting at a farm on Hood river, in Wasco county, where Mr. Clark died, at the age of eighty-one years. His wife, who was born in Ohio, was a daughter of Henry Saddoris, an early resident of McHenry county, Ill. Mrs. Clark, who lives with her son Newton, her only child, still retains her bright faculties, and takes a great interest in the career of her son.

After completing his training in the public schools of Baraboo, Wis., Newton Clark graduated from Bronson Institute at Point Bluff, and thereafter taught school for a couple of years. This peaceful occupation was interrupted by the demand for his services in the Civil war, and he was mustered into Company K, Fourteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, at Fond du Lac, in September, 1861. This well-known regiment participated in the battles of Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka, Holly Springs, Champion Hill, the siege of Vicksburg (at which place Mr. Clark veteranized), the Red River expedition under General Banks, Sabine Cross Roads, Yellow Bayou, the siege and battle of Mobile, and the battle at Fort Blakely and Spanish Fort. Having charge of the headquarter's train of Maj.-Gen. J. B. McPherson, who commanded the Seventeenth Army Corps at the siege of Vicksburg, he had the pleasure of furnishing the United States flag which was floated from the cupola of the courthouse in the capitulated citadel on the morning of its surrender upon that memorable Fourth of July. After the capture of Mobile Mr. Clark was placed on guard duty at Montgomery, Ala.,

and was thus employed until his mustering out at Mobile, in the fall of 1865. At Corinth he was promoted and commissioned second lieutenant of his company, and was afterward promoted to the position of quartermaster and first lieutenant of the regiment, serving thus until the close of hostilities.

Following his military services Mr. Clark engaged in farming on the paternal farm near Baraboo, Wis., and in 1869 removed to Dakota as a government surveyor, where for seven years he was engaged in running township and section lines over the greater part of the territory, now called North and South Dakota. He had his own corps of assistants, and while surveying also managed to engage in farming with considerable profit. He was identified with many of the pioneer undertakings in the great Dakotas, and among other things to his credit built the first frame house in Minnehaha county, now in South Dakota, and which was located two and a half miles from Sioux Falls, but now adjoins the city limits. Mr. Clark served for one term in the territorial legislature which met at Yankton in 1875, and he was chairman of the county commissioners of Minnehaha county for three years. Clark county, S. D., was named in honor of Mr. Clark.

In 1877 Mr. Clark joined his father at Fort Laramie and with him came overland to Oregon, the journey taking from the middle of June until the 1st of September, from the Fort to Hood River, Oregon. Here Mr. Clark bought one hundred and sixty acres of school land, combining farming with surveying, and eventually was employed by the government to survey section and township lines in Oregon and Washington. This occupation proved a hazardous one, and during the seven years spent mostly in the Cascade mountains, he was often obliged to carry his food on horseback, and when the exceeding roughness of the roads made this impossible he had to carry it on his back. This life gave him an intimate knowledge of the Cascade mountains and he was a member of the first party of white men to visit the interesting Lost Lake lying northwest of Mt. Hood. The great glacier, lying on the eastern slope of Mt. Hood, known as the Newton Clark Glacier, bears his name.

In April, 1889, Mr. Clark was appointed to his present high office of grand recorder of the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of the state of Oregon, and soon afterward took up his permanent residence in Portland. He still owns the Hood River farm, which, however, is rented to other parties.

In Baraboo, Wis., Mr. Clark married Mary Ann Hill, a native of Edinburg, Scotland, and who was reared in Wisconsin, a daughter of William Hill, who served in a Wisconsin regiment during the Civil war. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Clark, of whom Lewis is a civil engineer in Portland; Grace, Mrs. Dwinell, resides in Baraboo, Wis.; and Jeanette is assistant recorder to her father. Mr. Clark became identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen in 1881, in which year he became a member of Riverside Lodge No. 68 at Hood River, and still retains said membership. He served as master workman, and was an active member of the Grand Lodge previous to his present appointment. He served as representative to Supreme Lodge at Sioux Falls with the degree of honor. In Masonic circles he is also well known, and is still a member of the Minnehaha Lodge No. 5, of Sioux Falls. As a member of the Grand Army of the Republic he is identified with Canby Post No. 67, of Hood River, of which he is past commander, and ex-aide on the department staff. A staunch Republican, he has never interested himself in political undertakings further than to cast his vote. Mr. Clark is a member of the Commercial Club, and his wife is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

ADOLPH A. DEKUM. With the inspiration and encouragement afforded by the successful career of his father, the late Frank Dekum, and with an enthusiastic faith in the future of Portland, his native city, Adolph A. Dekum has conducted expanding and important business interests. In Portland, where he was born February 28, 1865, he received the advantages of study in the grammar and high schools, and then gained his initial experience in the hardware business through a clerkship with the Honeyman Hardware Company. During 1888 he embarked in business with his brother, Otto C., under the firm name of Dekum Bros., the two conducting a wholesale and retail hardware trade at No. 245 Washington street. In 1895 he bought his brother's interest and has since conducted the business alone, his present location being Nos. 131-33 First street, where he has a double store, fitted with all the heavy ware, tins, shelf goods and hardware needed by the retail trade.

In addition to the management of his extensive business, Mr. Dekum acts as trustee of his father's estate, having entire charge of the same. Both the Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade have the benefit of his membership and keen business and progressive spirit. His marriage, in Warren, Ohio, united him with Linda E. Andrews, who was born in that state and graduated from the school of her native town of Warren. Her father, Francis Andrews, was a large stock and wool buyer of that place. In politics Mr. Dekum votes with the Republicans. He is a member of the Native Sons of Oregon and of Multnomah Amateur Athletic Club. Actively identified with the Taylor Street Methodist Episcopal Church, he has promoted its welfare through his intelligent and faithful service as a member of its board of trustees.

JUDGE ARTHUR L. FRAZER, one of the eminent jurists of Portland, was born in Polk county, Ore., November 22, 1860, a son of John A. and Sarah (Nicklin) Frazer, natives respectively of Kentucky and West Virginia. John A. Frazer was an educator during the greater part of his life, having qualified therefor at Hanover College in Indiana. He engaged in teaching in Kentucky, and in 1854 crossed the plains with ox teams, settling in Polk county, where he improved a place, and combined the occupations of small farming and teaching almost up to the time of his death in Salem, in July, 1866. Although born in a Democratic community, his father was a strong anti-slavery man, and the son profited by his enlightened example. As a Republican he was well known in Polk county, and represented it in the state legislature in 1864. On the maternal side Judge Frazer comes of colonial ancestry, the Nicklin family being closely allied with that of General Washington. John H. Nicklin, the father of Mrs. Frazer, was an early settler of Iowa, and an immigrant to Oregon in 1852. He settled on Salt Creek, Polk county, where he built the pioneer sawmill of the county, conducting the same with considerable success. Afterward he built a mill in Salem, where is now located the old Kinney mill, and his death occurred while carrying on this latter industry. Mrs. Frazer, who died in March, 1866, four months before her husband, was a relative of Mrs. Lamberton, of Hillsboro, and was the mother of four children, two of whom are living. Of these, Hough N. is clerk of Gilliam county.

Left an orphan at the age of five years, the youth of Judge Frazer was characterized by a hard struggle for existence, especially after leaving the home of his uncle in Salem, at the age of eleven. For some time he lived among strangers, worked hard on farms, and was brought face to face with the serious and responsible phase of life. As happens sometimes in most unexpected manner, this lonely youth became known to a Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Buffum, very early settlers in the state, having come here in 1845. These people of resource and large heart proved benefactors indeed, and through their instrumentality the possibilities of life were opened up to a receptive and keen intelligence, and what is better a grateful one. Through the influence of Mr. Buffum the lad was sent to the state university at Eugene, where he displayed studious traits, and from which he graduated with the degree of A. B., in 1882. Thus started on the highway of worth-while things, the way was opened for the study of law, for which he had long entertained a preference, and at the same time he acted in the capacity of principal of the Amity school. In 1883 Mr. Frazer entered the law office of ex-United States Senator James K. Kelly, at Portland, and was admitted to the bar in October, 1884. For a few years following he practiced law in the office of Mr. Kelly, and after the removal of the latter to Washington, conducted an independent practice.

In 1898 Mr. Frazer was elected circuit judge of the fourth judicial district of Oregon, and assumed control of the office in July of the same year, succeeding Judge Shattuck, of department 1. Judge Frazer is noted for his equitable rulings, his large grasp of general law, and his invariable fairness in all matters that come under his jurisdiction. He is a member of the State Bar Association, the Oregon Historical Society, and the Native Sons, Abernethy Cabin No. 1. In Portland he became identified with the Willamette Lodge A. F. & A. M., and is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Artisans, and the Knights of the Maccabees.

In Portland Judge Frazer married Dora Francis, a native of Clackamas county, and daughter of Stephen D. Francis, who was born in the state of Massachusetts. Mr. Francis removed from Massachusetts to Vermont, from there to Illinois, and to Clackamas county, via the plains, in 1854, locating eventually in Mt. Tabor. Mrs. Frazer, who was educated in Portland, is the mother of four children, the order of their birth being as follows: Kenneth Francis, born in 1890; Genevieve, born in 1892; Dorothy, born in 1895; and John Hough, born in 1900.

HON. RUFUS MALLORY. Ever since the early days of American settlement the Mallory family has been identified with the history of our country, the original immigrant, Peter Mallory, having crossed the ocean in 1643 and settled in New Haven, Conn. From him descended David Mallory, a native of Connecticut and a lifelong resident of that state, from which he went forth to do service in the colonial army at the time of the Revolution. In recognition of his services therein the government donated to him a land warrant in Missouri, which was afterward located by his grandson. His son, Samuel, was born in Oxford, Conn., August 9, 1782, and in early life settled at Coventry, N. Y., later going to Allegany county, that state, and finally to Steuben county. With the exception of a short period devoted to seafaring he made agriculture his occupation. In religion he was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His death occurred August 19, 1854, at Greenwood.

The wife of Samuel Mallory was Lucretia Davis, who was born in Oxford, Conn., and died in Greenwood, N. Y. Her father, Col. John Davis, a native of that state, of Welsh extraction, served with such valor in the Revolutionary struggle that he was promoted to the rank of colonel. In times of peace, as in times of war, he was a leader among men, and he left the impress of his personality upon his locality in such imperishable memory that the anniversary of his birth is still celebrated at High Rock Grove, where he lived. Nine children comprised the family of Samuel and Lucretia Mallory, of whom the following survive: Augustus, of Heppner, Ore., now more than eighty-three years of age; Mrs. Maria Slocum, of Heppner, who is eighty-two years of age; Mrs. Hallock, who is seventy-nine, and Mrs. Abigail Wallace, seventy-five, both of Heppner; Homer H., of New York; and Rufus of Portland. The last named was born at Coventry, Chenango county, N. Y., June 10, 1831, and as a boy attended district schools in Allegany and Steuben counties, afterward studying in Alfred University. From the age of sixteen he alternated teaching with attending school, and in this way paid for what schooling he received, in the meantime taking up the study of law.

Going to Iowa in 1855, Mr. Mallory became a pioneer teacher at New London, Henry county, where he remained for three years. Meantime a study of the resources of the west had decided him as to his future course, and in 1858 he started via Panama for Oregon, making the trip by ship to San Francisco and thence overland via Red Bluff and Shasta, riding muleback over the mountains. On his arrival at Roseburg he found a teacher was needed, so stopped there, accepted the school, and remained for fifteen months as teacher. During 1860 he was admitted to the bar and the same year he was elected district attorney of Jackson, Josephine and Douglas counties. The people of Douglas county in 1862 elected him to represent them in the legislature, and in the fall of that year he removed to Salem. Later he served for two years as district attorney for the third district, including Linn, Polk, Marion and Yamhill counties. Shortly after his retirement from that office in 1866 he was nominated for congress by the Republicans and received a fair majority over J. D. Fay. While a member of congress he was present at the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, which stands out in his memory as one of the most eventful incidents of his life. In the body of which he was a member were some of the greatest statesmen our country has ever had.

For a short time after his retirement from congress Mr. Mallory was engaged in professional practice. In 1872 he was elected to represent Marion county in the state legislature, and during his term of service had the honor of being chosen speaker of the house. President Grant in 1874 tendered him the appointment of United States District Attorney, to which position he was reappointed under the Hayes administration, his service continuing until 1882. On the expiration of his term the government chose him to act as special agent in relation to some matters at Singapore, Asia, and he accordingly visited that city, afterward continuing around the world, his trip being completed in seventy-eight days. On his return to Oregon in November, 1883, he, with C. B. Bellinger, entered the law firm of Dolph & Simon under the firm name of Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon. The connection continued until Judge Bellinger was appointed by President Cleveland as United States District Judge for Oregon, when Judge Strahn was admitted, the firm becoming Dolph, Mallory, Simon & Strahn. On the death of Judge Strahn the title became Dolph, Mallory & Simon, and on the election of Mr. Simon to the United States senate another change was made to Dolph, Mallory, Simon & Gearin.

The record of Mr. Mallory in professional circles brings his name into mention in connection with many of the most noted cases in Portland. One of his specialties has been to act as attorney for defendants in damage suits. For some time he was attorney for various railroads, but on the segregation of the roads he withdrew. On the organization of the State Bar Association he became a charter member and later was honored by election as its president. In the organization of the Columbia River & Northern Railroad Company he was an active factor, and has since aided in pushing the work of construction from the Columbia River northeast to Goldendale. He is a director of the City & Suburban Railroad Company and the United States National Bank, and acts as attorney for both corporations. While living in Roseburg he married Lucy Rose, who was born in Michigan and by whom he has a son, Elmer E., attorney-at-law, of Portland. Mrs. Mallory is a daughter of Aaron Rose, a native of New York and pioneer of Michigan, who came overland to Oregon in 1851 and founded the town of Roseburg, where he settled upon a tract of six hundred and forty acres. Until his death in 1901 he was closely connected with the building up of the town.

During the existence of the Whig party Mr. Mallory was one of its adherents. In 1852 he voted for Winfield Scott. On the organization of the Republican party he identified himself with the same and has since been loyal to its principles and candidates. In 1868 he was sent as a delegate to the national convention held in Chicago, at which time General Grant was nominated for president. Again, twenty years later, he was appointed a delegate to the national convention held in Chicago, on which occasion he gave his support to Benjamin Harrison, candidate for the presidency for the first time. On two occasions the Republicans of the state, in convention assembled, have honored him by electing him president of the meeting.

LAWRENCE A. McNARY. In tracing the genealogy of the McNary family, it is found that Hugh McNary, a Virginian by birth and a member of a Colonial family of the Old Dominion, identified himself with the pioneers of Kentucky, where the subsequent years of his life were passed in the task of clearing a home from the wilderness. During the Revolution he and a brother served with the patriot forces, and the gun that he carried was kept by the family and afterwards brought to Oregon.

Alexander, son of Hugh McNary, was born in Kentucky, whence he moved to Morgan county, Ill. In 1845, accompanied by his wife, two daughters and three sons, he crossed the plains by ox team, after having spent the winter of 1844 and 1845 in Missouri. The trip was a memorable one, and rendered especially dangerous by the participation of a portion of the immigrants of that year in the Meek-Cut-Off expedition, when a man named Meek attempted to find a shorter road for intending settlers in the Oregon territory, but became lost in the mountains. The family of Mr. McNary, with many others, were subjected for many days to suffering from absence of water, proximity to hostile bands of Indians and the ever present anxiety of winter overtaking them before civilization could be reached; but they finally made their way to the old trail and on to Oregon, arriving at The Dalles after a journey of six months. Thence they proceeded by raft to Portland, where they camped in December, 1845. The city at that time had only one store and about one dozen houses.

From Portland Alexander McNary proceeded to Polk county, where he located a donation land claim, and ultimately acquired an improved estate of six hundred and forty acres, remaining on that homestead until his death, about the year 1860, at the age of sixty-two years. In his family there were the following named sons and daughters: Sarah E., who married A. C. R. Shaw, and died in Fresno county, Cal., in 1901, at the age of seventy-four years; Hugh M., who was born in Morgan county, Ill., and was a youth of eighteen when the family came west, and who died at Salem, Ore., in 1891; Alexander W., a farmer, who died in Polk county in 1898; Catherine, who married John C. Allen, and died in Polk county about 1860; and Davis, who died in Polk county about the year 1862.

When twenty-one years of age, Hugh McNary took a claim in Polk county, and thereafter followed farming until 1859, when he removed to Wasco county and settled on Eight Mile Creek, eight miles from The Dalles. His attention was given largely to freighting from The Dalles to the mines of eastern Oregon and Idaho, and later devoting himself to the cattle business. He afterwards removed to Klickitat county, Wash., where he continued in the cattle business until the year 1876, when he removed to Salem, still continuing to be a large land owner, having about one thousand acres in Linn and Polk counties. At the time of his death, which occurred at Salem in 1891, he had reached the age of sixty-four years.

His wife, Catherine Frizzell, who was born in Green county, Mo., and now resides in Portland, was one of the six children of Rees and Lilly Frizzell, who brought their family to Oregon in 1852. The father died in the eastern part of the state before the completion of the journey, and the mother died in the year 1887, at her homestead in Polk county.

Hugh and Catherine McNary had seven children, namely: Mrs. Sarah A. Smith, of Vale, Ore.; Anna L. and Lillian M., who reside at Salem; Angelo P., a stock raiser in Wheeler county; Lawrence A., an attorney of Portland; Hugh P., engaged in the hardware business at Salem; and Wilson D., a physician in the State Insane Asylum.

The education of Lawrence A. McNary, who was born in Wasco county, in the year 1866, was obtained in the public schools of Salem, and later at the Willamette University, where he took a three years' course. In 1888 he took up the study of law with Richard and E. B. Williams, of Portland. In June, 1890, he was admitted to the bar and at once began the practice of his profession with ex-Governor W. W. Thayer, who at that time had just retired from the bench of the supreme court of the state, which continued until a short time before the death of Judge Thayer. In 1902 the Republicans of Portland nominated him for the office of city attorney. He was elected and entered upon his duties in July of that year for a term of three years. While the duties of that office naturally require close attention, and while in addition to these responsibilities he retains the oversight of his general practice, he still keeps in touch with all movements looking toward the welfare of the city.

He is a member of the Oregon State Bar, the Multnomah Club, the Commercial Club and Portland Lodge of Knights of Pythias. His capable, though brief, record as an office bearer has added prestige to the name of one of Oregon's oldest and most honored families.

CAPT. JOSEPH KELLOGG. Especial interest attaches to the records of those pioneers, who, during the earlier half of the nineteenth century, braved the dangers of the unknown west, the perils from wild animals and even more savage Indians, devoting their lives to the redemption of the Pacific coast region and counting no sacrifice too great that was made for the benefit of their home locality. Such an one was Capt. Joseph Kellogg of Portland, one of the founders of the People's Transportation Company of the Willamette, and a man widely known and universally honored.

The genealogy of the Kellogg family shows that they came from England to Massachusetts during the colonial period and numerous of their representatives were prominent in the old Bay state. The captain's grandfather, Joseph Kellogg, Sr., was born in Vermont and became owner of a large tract of land at St. Albans. During the Revolutionary war he served under General Putnam, and some years afterward removed to Longdale, Canada, where he was appointed a magistrate and, it is said, married the first couple in the town. Next in line of descent was his son, Orrin, who was born at St. Albans, Vt., in 1790, and who married Margaret Miller in Canada in 1811, taking her back with him to Vermont. The following year they visited Canada and, owing to the outbreak of the war, were compelled to remain there until hostilities ceased. Thus it happened that their son, Joseph, who was born June 24, 1812, first opened his eyes to the light upon foreign soil, but, by act of congress, all children born under such circumstances were regarded as native-born sons of our republic. After the war was ended the family crossed into the States and settled near the present site of Lockport, N. Y., but soon moved to a farm on the Maumee river in Ohio. There the son grew to manhood and, in 1844, married Estella Bushnell, who was born in Litchfield, N. Y., February 22, 1818, and was taken by her parents to Ohio at the age of two years.

The family started for Oregon in 1847, and here the parents remained until death, the father dying at eighty-five and the mother when seventy. Of their twelve children nine attained mature years and seven settled in Oregon, namely: Joseph; George, who built and ran a boat on the Columbia river and was also a graduate physician and active practitioner;

Elisha and Jason, chief engineers on boats owned by Joseph; Edward, a farmer in southern Oregon; Phoebe and Charlotte, who died in Oregon. While still a boy Joseph Kellogg learned the millwright's trade and at seventeen years of age built a frame bridge across the Ottawa river which at the time was pronounced the best bridge on the river. In Ohio his uncle had let a sub-contract to a millwright who built the mill, but the work was unsatisfactory, and the uncle asked his nephew to rebuild, which was done promptly and well. Inspired by this success, he took contracts to build mills in different parts of Ohio, but the country was low and swampy, causing him to suffer with fever and ague. Believing the west afforded better climatic and financial openings, he determined to seek a home there. November 24, 1847, he and his family started on the long journey. The following winter they spent at St. Joe, where they outfitted with an ox-train. As soon as the grass was long enough to provide feed for the oxen, they resumed their journey. When but a short distance out they met Joe Meek, who was hastening east with the news of the Whitman massacre and the Cayuse war. Undaunted, although saddened by this news, the party proceeded on their way.

Among the members of the company was P. B. Cornwall, who afterward became a wealthy citizen of California. Some time before this a few Masons in Oregon had sent to Missouri for a charter, which was granted by the grand lodge of that state October 19, 1846, authorizing the formation of Phoenix Lodge No. 123. It was entrusted to Mr. Cornwall to be delivered to his Masonic brethren in Oregon, but, while crossing the plains, he learned of the discovery of gold in California and decided to go there. Having found that the Kelloggs, father and son, were good Masons, he placed the charter in their care, to be delivered to Joseph Hull in Oregon. Joseph Kellogg accepted the responsibility and placed the charter in a small rawhide trunk, which he himself had made in Canada in 1834, and which was cylindrical, with a flat bottom, two feet long and one foot deep. This trunk he locked and put in the bottom of his wagon, and in due time the charter was delivered to Mr. Hull. Besides, he had the honor of assisting to establish Multnomah Lodge No. 1, the first Masonic lodge in Oregon, and of this he was the first secretary and treasurer.

Shortly after his arrival in Oregon a donation claim was secured by Orrin Kellogg between Milwaukee and Oregon City, and this in time he converted into one of the most profitable estates in the whole region. Though somewhat advanced in years, his energy and determination enabled him to cope with all the hardships of frontier life. One of the first tanneries there was put up by him and he was also a pioneer in raising fruit. The subject of navigation on the lower Willamette and Columbia early engaged his attention, and he was the first of the family of river captains bearing the name of Kellogg. His interest in progressive movements was shown when he accompanied the expedition of his son, Dr. George Kellogg, in the opening of Yaquina bay to commerce. A man of superior ability and broad mind, he was qualified for the difficult task of opening a new region to settlement and adding a great commonwealth to our nation's galaxy of states.

While the father was thus engaged, his son, Joseph, was no less active and progressive. Locating a claim at Milwaukee, he laid out the town and built a sawmill, having with him as partners in the venture Lot Whitcomb and William Torrence. In the fall of 1848 he began building a schooner which was completed that winter and sent to San Francisco with a load of produce for the mines. On its arrival the vessel and cargo were sold, and a larger schooner purchased, which was used in carrying lumber from Portland to Sacramento. In a short time sufficient money had been made to enable the owners to secure the barque Lausanne and a pair of engines and boilers, also a complete outfit for a steamer. In the spring of 1850 they began to build the Lot Whitcomb, the first steamboat of any size built in Oregon. The launching of this steamer on Christmas day of the same year was the occasion of general rejoicing, but the day had a sad ending in the explosion of a cannon and the death of a ship captain.

The business of the firm increased with gratifying rapidity. A flour mill was erected in Milwaukee and later Captain Kellogg built the Merchant mill in Portland. Two vessels made regular trips to Sacramento, laden with lumber, the selling of which brought large profits to the firm. When the original partnership was dissolved, the firm of Bradbury, Eddy & Kellogg was established, and the standard flour mills were erected, which for years were the most extensive in the state. In 1863 he built the steamer Senator, which was later sold to the People's Transportation Company, an organization formed in 1861 by a number of influential men whose object was to navigate both the Willamette and Columbia rivers. However, by reason of an agreement made with the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, they confined their work to the Willamette river. About 1867 the company built the basin above the falls to facilitate the portage. This work, which was superintended by Captain Kellogg, stands today a monument of his engineering skill. With the steamer Onward he began the navigation of the Tualatin, and built a canal between that river and Sucker lake, thereby making it possible to bring freight to Oswego and thence to Willamette. About the same time he laid out the village of Oswego.

Shortly after the People's Transportation Company disposed of its interests in 1870, the Willamette Transportation Company was organized, with Captain Kellogg as vice-president and a director, and as superintendent of the building of the steamers, Governor Grover and Beaver. However, these interests were soon sold, and he formed a new company with his brother Jason and his two sons, placing his boats on the Columbia, on the line to Washougal and the Cowlitz. The two steamers, Joseph Kellogg and Toledo, were erected under his supervision, and his two sons were placed in command of them. They are still on the Cowlitz route and navigate that river into the heart of Washington. This corporation, known as the Joseph Kellogg Transportation Company, is one of the most popular in Oregon, and has proved a source of profit to its enterprising officers. In order to sail as far up the Cowlitz as possible, the company built the Chester, the lightest draught steamboat in the country, drawing only seven inches, and being used principally between Castle Rock and Toledo. Another boat owned by the company is the Northwest.

Possessing the characteristics of a public-spirited citizen, Captain Kellogg has done much to promote the welfare of the state and advance its interests. About 1857 he was actively connected with the telegraph line to be constructed between San Francisco and Portland and the first in the state of Oregon. At his mill were sawed the cedar posts for the section between Portland and Oregon City. Another public-spirited enterprise which he fostered by a generous contribution was the building of the old macadam road between Portland and the White House, the first road of its kind in the northwest and still the best drive out of Portland. In early days it was his hope that Milwaukee might prove the metropolis of the state, but he has since discerned that the growth of Portland is advantageous for the entire state, as thereby the commercial interests of the lower river are massed at one point, rather than divided between some point higher up on the same river and another place on the Columbia river. Old river men declare that Captain Kellogg is the most efficient pilot who ever guided boats on the lower Willamette, and he performed successfully the feat of taking vessels past Ross Island to her dock, which it seems impossible to do now. He was one of the first to receive a license and is now the oldest river pilot. Though now advanced in years he is still a first-class navigator, with a clear eye, a steady hand and a vigorous muscle, and were the necessity to arise he could hold his own with the river men of the present generation.

In politics Captain Kellogg is a staunch Republican. One of the recollections of his Ohio experiences is connected with a rally in 1840, attended by thirty thousand people and addressed by General Harrison. It was the captain's privilege to meet the hero of Tippecanoe and he entertains a pleasant memory of the kindly pressure of his hand and cordial expression of interest. As might be expected of so influential a pioneer, he holds membership in the Oregon Historical and Pioneer Association, among whose membership none is more highly regarded than he. In Masonry he ranks high. June 27, 1872, he became a member of Portland Lodge No. 55, and in 1858 identified himself with Clackamas Chapter, R. A. M., but is now connected with Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M. He is also a Scottish Rite Mason of the thirty-second degree. September 11, 1891, on the occasion of the forty-third anniversary of the organization of the first lodge in Oregon, he was made an honorary member of the Masonic Veteran Association of the Pacific coast, in recognition of his services in bringing the charter safely through in the perilous journey over the plains. At Denver, Colo., August 11, 1890, he was elected a member of the Masonic Veteran Association of the United States and vice-president for Oregon. The lofty principles of Masonry have been inculcated into his life. It has been his aim to exemplify the teachings of the order, carrying out its precepts of kindness and brotherly love, which, indeed, may be said to be his religion.

Three sons were born to the union of Captain and Mrs. Kellogg, of whom the youngest, Harvey, died in infancy. The oldest, Orrin, is also represented in this volume, as is the second son, Charles H., whose death August 7, 1889, was recognized as a heavy loss to the river interests and the steamboat business.

CAPT. ORRIN KELLOGG, JR. The name of Kellogg has been indelibly impressed upon the navigation history of the northwest, any record of which would be incomplete without considerable mention of Capt. Joseph Kellogg, and his capable sons, Capt. Orrin and Capt. Charles H. Kellogg. The former of these sons, who is also the older, was born in Wood county, Ohio, October 16, 1845, and was two years of age when the family started for the far west. His earliest recollections, therefore, are associated with the Pacific coast regions, particularly with the village of Milwaukee, where he attended the common schools. Habits of industry and perseverance were early impressed upon him, and at an early age, when most boys are care-free, he began to assist in the cultivation of the farm and the management of the sawmill. Upon removing to Portland he attended the Central school and still further enlarged his education by a course in the Portland Business College, of which he was among the first graduates.

Leaving school, he took up the occupation of steamboating on the Tualatin river, first as engineer and later as captain of the steamer Onward. Since then he has given his attention mainly to navigation interests, although for a time he owned and conducted a dry goods store in Hillsboro. Returning to Portland in 1874 he resumed steamboating, and has since operated on the Willamette and Columbia rivers. In 1878 he was placed in command of the steamer Toledo, owned by the Joseph Kellogg Transportation Company, of which corporation he is president. In the running of his steamer he has sought to accommodate ranchers all along the line of the boat, giving each a landing, taking their produce on his boat, selling it at market, and bringing back the money, or purchasing for the ranchers any farm machinery, household goods, etc., that they might need. His accommodating spirit has made him very popular, and he has a host of warm friends among the people of the Cowlitz country. In addition to accommodating farmers he has done much other important work. Through his influence government aid was secured for the Cowlitz river improvement, and the resources of the company were drawn upon to further the same. As a result of his broad and progressive policy his company gained control of the trade of the Cowlitz country, opened up a valuable region for settlement, developed thriving villages from pasture lands and gave the ranchers a market for their produce at reasonable freight rates, thus preventing railroad monopoly. Due credit must be given him for these satisfactory results.

While living at Hillsboro, Ore., Captain Kellogg married Margaret Ellen Westfall June 5, 1870. They have three children, Stella May, Ruby Ethel and Chester Orrin. Mrs. Kellogg was born in Des Moines county, Iowa, May 30, 1850, and came to Oregon with her father, Nathan Westfall, settling first at West Chehalem and later going to Hillsboro, where she remained until after her marriage.

CAPT. CHARLES H. KELLOGG. Through a close identification with the river interests of Oregon, dating from his early childhood until his lamented death, Captain Kellogg acquired a thorough knowledge of his chosen occupation and was recognized as the most efficient steamboat man in the northwest. Old and experienced navigators, such as Captain Couch, gave him unstinted praise, and even those unfamiliar with steamboating recognize him as an expert in the business. The native talents he possessed, coupled with his long experience, made him one of the most efficient and successful pilots that ever guided their crafts through the lower Willamette and the Columbia.

The second son of Capt. Joseph Kellogg, in whose sketch appears the family history, Capt. Charles H. Kellogg was born in Wood county, Ohio, October 1, 1846. His earliest recollections are of Oregon, to which state he was brought by his parents in infancy. As a boy he attended the district school at Milwaukie, Ore., and later was a student in the Central school and academy at Portland, completing his education in the Portland Business College, of which he was among the first graduates. His initial knowledge of the river business was gained under Captain Baughman. As soon as qualified to assume command of a vessel he was put in charge of the Senator, a steamer owned by the People's Transportation Company and plying between Portland and Oregon City. When the company's interests were sold to Ben Holladay, he relinquished his position and identified himself with other interests. On the completion of the locks at Oregon City, he had the honor of piloting the first steamer through the locks. For a time he was captain of the Governor Grover on the Willamette river, and later commanded various boats for the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. On the organization of the Joseph Kellogg Transportation Company he became a stockholder, and was first its vice-president and then its treasurer, and had command of the steamer Joseph Kellogg until his death.

The first marriage of Capt. C. H. Kellogg occurred February 2, 1870, and united him with Miss Emma E. Goode of Oregon City. His second marriage took place in January, 1882, his wife being Miss Mary Ellen Copeland, of Scappoose, Ore., by whom he had two children, Pearl and Earl Joseph. While he was still in the prime of life, with a hope of enjoying many years of usefulness and honor, death came to Captain Kellogg August 7, 1889, removing one whose death was a source of sincere mourning among all of his associates and whose memory is still cherished in the hearts of those to whom he was endeared.

CAPT. W. H. SMITH. A veteran of the Civil war and a representative of one of the oldest families of Clackamas county, Captain Smith is now spending his last years in ease and retirement at his beautiful home in Parkplace. Retiring in nature, he has never cared for the emoluments of public office, preferring rather to give his whole time and attention to his own business interests. A native of Ohio, his birth occurred in Washington county, December 14, 1840, a son of John A. Smith, who was born in Parkersburg, W. Va., where for a time he lived after reaching mature years, but later removed to Ohio. In 1855 he settled in the northern part of Missouri, and ten years later found him bound for Oregon with a large party who were also seeking a home in the undeveloped northwest. The journey across the plains was made with ox teams. The encounters with the Indians were many and thrilling. Indeed they were compelled to organize the band into a military train, of which Captain Knight was made the commander and F. M. Dodson orderly sergeant. Soon after reaching Oregon, Mr. Smith settled in Clackamas county, taking up a homestead from the government. Here he resided until 1878, when he sold out and removed to Pomeroy, Wash., where he purchased a tract of land and here he lived the balance of his life, passing away at the age of eighty-four years. His wife, Eliza B. Brewer, whose birth occurred in Ohio, was a daughter of Peter Brewer, a native of New York. His death took place in Lewis county, Mo., when he was about eighty years of age. He was a farmer and participated in the war of 1812.

In Washington county, Ohio, where his birth occurred, Captain Smith spent the first fifteen years of his life, attending the public schools and thus gaining a good foundation for the many busy and useful years before him. The five years previous to the breaking out of the Civil war were spent in Missouri on a farm. When the call for troops was made, Captain Smith was not slow to respond, and in May, 1861, he enlisted in the Home Guards of Colonel Moore. Later, however, he enlisted in the Eleventh Missouri Cavalry, the latter company being consolidated with the Second Missouri Cavalry, and was afterwards known as Company L. From private he advanced to orderly sergeant, and later was made first lieutenant, and finally was brevetted captain, commanding company L, Second Missouri Cavalry. During his service he was engaged in encounters at Cape Girardeau and Pilot Knob; was in Price's raid in Independence, Mo., in 1864, also in the battle of Mine Run. His experience with the James Boys and Quantrell's men was one that will always be remembered. After four years of noble service spent in defense of his country, he was mustered out, April 7, 1865.

Soon after the close of the war Captain Smith made the trip to Oregon via the plains. His first employment was found in a saw mill on the Clackamas river, near Oregon City. Here he remained for about twenty years, during which time he assisted in changing the mill to a paper manufactory. Feeling convinced that the growing west offered a good field for investment, he purchased the Buck donation claim, which consisted of one hundred and seventy acres. At one time he owned fifteen acres in what is now Parkplace and laid out an addition which was called Smith's addition to Parkplace.

On May 7, 1871, occurred the marriage of Mr. Smith with Miss Louise Rivers, a native of Canada. Her father, Israel Rivers, was born in New York, of French descent, his parents going to Canada when he was a young man, and there he engaged in the lumber business. After rearing his family the father took his wife and children and started for the west, locating for a time in Illinois and Kansas, but finally settled in Clackamas county in 1866, and here they still reside. Captain and Mrs. Smith have three living children, as follows: Charles E., a resident of Parkplace; Fred W., graduated from the Parkplace high school, the Corvallis college and the Portland business college, and is now employed as a railway mail clerk; Katie, the wife of Paul Freytag, who is engaged in the grocery business in Oregon City.

In political belief Captain Smith is a Republican and for thirty years has served his district as school director. Fraternally he is a member of the Blue Lodge, A. F. & A. M., the Grand Army of the Republic, and the Union Veterans' Union.

While Captain Smith has led a life of retirement, he has nevertheless neglected none of the duties of good citizenship and at all times he has been found ready and willing to do his share. No movement calculated to be of benefit to his adopted state or county has went by without his firm and active support. He is a type of citizenship which stands for all that is good and pure. His record is an honorable one and with those who know him his word is as good as his bond.

CAPT. JAMES H. McMILLEN. The first member of the McMillen family of whom we have any record is the great-grandfather, James McMillan, a native of Scotland, who upon immigrating to America settled in Rhode Island. His eldest son, also named James McMillan, served valiantly in the Revolutionary war. The latter's eldest son, Joseph McMillen, it will be noted, changed the spelling of the family name, and this has been the style used by subsequent members of the family. The father was a native of Oneida county, N. Y., but in early life removed to Attica, where he learned the millwright's trade. At Pompey, N. Y., he erected a mill, and in 1826 he removed to Buffalo, where he erected the First Presbyterian Church, besides many other structures, and also followed millwrighting to quite an extent. Going to Lodi, that state, in 1829, he continued at his trade there, building mills along Cattaraugus creek, and in the year 1836 he removed to Illinois, and on the banks of the Desplaines river also engaged in erecting mills. Working his way further west we next hear of his crossing the plains in 1852. In Oregon City he at once began to work at his trade, also assisting in the building of steamboats and similar work. In 1856 he went back to his home in the east, going by way of Panama, and upon returning to the west brought his wife with him. Settling in Forest Grove, he there spent the remainder of his life, dying in 1890. His wife, formerly Ruth Gannett, was a native of Springfield, Mass., and the daughter of Joseph Gannett, who participated in the Revolutionary war, taking part in the battle of Bunker Hill as a minute man. He was of English descent and came of good old Puritan stock. Mrs. Ruth McMillen died at her home in Forest Grove, when more than ninety years of age.

In the family of Joseph McMillen there were seven children, five of whom came to Oregon and three of whom are living at this writing, two sons and one daughter. In Attica, N. Y., where he was born May 10, 1823, James H. McMillen spent his childhood years, and in the schools of Ohio received his early knowledge of books. Going to Illinois with the family in 1836, he continued his studies there for a time, but, finally, wishing to begin his business career, at the age of fifteen years commenced to learn his father's trade, and this he found of inestimable value, as future years proved. March 14, 1845, he took up the weary march across the plains by ox-teams and did not arrive at Oregon City until October 25 of that year. Work at his trade, however, was waiting for him, and almost immediately he found employment in Governor Abernethy's mill. The massacre of the Whitman party in December, 1847, incensed the settlers and inaugurated what is known as the Cayuse Indian war. Mr. McMillen was one of the first to volunteer and was made first duty sergeant in the first company of Oregon riflemen, doing service in the vicinity of The Dalles. Here he found work at his trade and for a time was employed in building fortifications for the defense of the soldiers. After a service of sixty-eight days he was discharged, as his services were needed in repairing Governor Abernethy's mill, which furnished flour for the soldiers. After performing this task satisfactorily he was again ready to shoulder his gun, and wherever he could be of use in subduing the Indians, there he was found ever ready to perform his duty toward the settlers. In the spring of 1849 he was one of the argonauts that sought the gold fields of California, but unlike the great majority of them his efforts were crowned with more than a modicum of success. From the American river and its tributaries, along which his labors lay principally, he took a large quantity of the yellow dust, and in the Oregon canyon, ten miles east of Coloma, he took out as much as $700 in a single day.

Although he spent but a few months in the gold fields he returned in December of 1849 $8,000 richer than when he started out in the spring. On the Tualatin plains in Washington county he bought a large farm, and to this he added until he had nine hundred acres in the tract. In the meantime he had been employed at his trade, and many mills all over the states of Oregon and Washington stand as monuments to his handiwork.

In 1865 Mr. McMillen sold his farm on the Tualatin plains and on the banks of the Willamette purchased a forty acre tract not far from the steel bridge. A few years later he laid out McMillen's addition to East Portland, but this has been almost entirely disposed of, although he still retains three blocks on the river front, where he has built up a fine residence property. Since taking up his residence in Portland he has built several mills, one of which was for Mr. Weidler, in whose employ he remained as millwright for twelve years.

A sketch of Mr. McMillen's life would be incomplete were no mention made of his identification with the North Pacific History Company, which published the History of the Pacific Northwest, known everywhere, and especially in the west, as the best work of the kind extant. He helped organize, was one of the incorporators of the company and was its president. To him should be given the credit for a large part of the historical matter contained in the work, especially the early history of Oregon, which his associations here in pioneer days made it possible for him to produce.

In Polk county, Ore., in December, 1845, Mr. McMillen was married to Miss Margaret Wise, a native of New York state. She died eleven months later, leaving a son, Frank, who died when he was twelve years old. In Portland occurred his second marriage, which united him with Miss Tirzah Barton, a native of Cincinnati, Ohio. She was the daughter of Capt. Edward Barton, who in 1851 came to Oregon with his family, and who still conducts a carriage manufactory in Portland. Of the second marriage the following children were born: Ernest, who died in 1891; Justus and Union, who died at the age of ten and six respectively; Myrtle, who died in her twelfth year and whose ability as a natural artist was very apparent; Constant, who was killed in an elevator accident when in his twenty-second year; Right H., of Washington; June, the wife of Julius Ordway, engaged in the lumber business in Portland; and Ivy M., wife of William J. Glover, shipping clerk for Bell & Co., of Portland.

Aside from his private interests Mr. McMillen has served his fellow citizens in numerous capacities. For four years he was councilman in East Portland, and for twelve years was director and clerk of the school board. Educational matters have always claimed a goodly share of his attention and he materially assisted in building the schoolhouses in this vicinity. Fraternally he is a Mason, holding membership in Washington Lodge at East Portland. For a number of years he held the office of president in the First Spiritual Society of Portland, with which he still holds membership. He is also interested in the Monument Association and is now its efficient treasurer. This association erected, in 1903, in Lone Fir cemetery, a monument to the soldiers who participated in the Mexican, Cayuse Indian, Civil and Philippine wars. Mr. McMillen is a member of the Pioneer Society and the Historical Society, in both of which he takes an interested part. For seven years he held the office of captain of Multnomah Camp No. 2, Indian War Veterans, which comprises the soldiers who participated in the Cayuse Indian war, and is now serving as treasurer. Politically he is a Republican, upholding its principles upon every occasion.

PROF. REUBEN F. ROBINSON. Early representatives of the Robinson family in America identified themselves with the colonists of Virginia, and from that commonwealth sent forth of their bravest and best to fight for the patriot cause during the Revolution. Reuben Robinson, who was a nephew of Col. William Robinson of the Revolutionary army, left Virginia and settled in east Tennessee, and from there went to Missouri. He possessed the hardihood and dauntless courage of the frontiersman and it was but natural, when the tide of emigration turned toward the Pacific coast, that he should decide to seek a home beyond the Rocky mountains. With ox teams in 1852 he started across the plains. The long and eventful journey came to an end near Junction City, Lane county, Ore., where he took up a donation claim and made it his home the remainder of his life. He not only managed his farm but taught school for several terms during the early period of Oregon settlement.

Prior to the removal of Reuben Robinson to the west, his three sons, George D., Washington and William, in 1849 had crossed the plains toward the setting sun. Washington died in California and afterward William settled at Jacksonville, Ore. The other son, George D., who was born in the Cumberland mountain region of east Tennessee, engaged in mining for a year in California, but in 1850 came on horseback to Oregon, swinuning his horse across rivers and camping out at night wherever he happened to be. After arriving in Lane county he seized the opportunity of attending school for several short terms, but Oregon's school facilities in the early '50s were not such as to hold ambitious young men long. He afterwards engaged in farming and in hauling produce to the miners of Southern Oregon. About 1865 he, with his family, moved to Polk county and improved a farm near Dallas. In the spring and summer of '68 he drove a large band of cattle to Bitter Root Valley, Mont. Returning the same year, he bought land and continued his farming interests near Dallas, sending his older children to the Dallas school. Believing that a change of climate would prove beneficial to his wife, who was in ill health, in 1880 he removed to Washington and settled near Spokane, where he bought and brought under cultivation a desirable tract of land, on which he lived for a number of years. Being physically unable to continue the hard work of the farm, he sold it and returned to his home in Dallas. His wife died in the spring of 1900 and was buried in the Odd Fellows cemetery at Dallas. Since 1900 he has made his home with his children in Portland and Dallas, where he takes a lively interest in municipal affairs, favors educational improvements and reforms, believes thoroughly in the public school, the free library and other agencies for uplifting humanity, and casts a Republican vote at every general election.

The marriage of George D. Robinson in Lane county in 1854 united him with Sarah Richardson, a native of Iowa and the granddaughter of a Revolutionary soldier from Pennsylvania. Her father, William Richardson, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., of Scotch descent, and settled in Iowa during the early days. He served in the Black Hawk war. Accompanied by his family, he crossed the plains in 1852 and settled in Lane county, Ore., but later removed to Polk county, where he died in 1885.

In the family of George D. and Sarah Robinson there were the following-named children: John W., who is now a farmer in Polk county; George Washington, who died in infancy; Reuben F., county superintendent of schools of Multnomah county; S. Elvira, Mrs. C. M. Cahill, of Spokane, Wash.; Abraham L., who is engaged in the grain business at Waverly, Wash.; S. Grant, who is connected with the Union Market Company in Portland; Mary A., wife of J. Card, of Dallas; Georgia, who died in infancy; and J. Curtis, who is with the Great Northern Railroad Company in Spokane.

While the family were living near Junction City, Ore., R. F. Robinson was born December 9, 1861. As a boy he attended district schools in Polk county and for four years (1880-84) was a student in La Creole Academy, the intervening vacations being devoted to teaching in Polk county. During the last two years of his academic course he not only kept up with his classes, but also acted as instructor in mathematics. After his graduation he was chosen first assistant teacher in the academy and in 1885 became principal. This position he resigned in 1886 in order to accept the office of county superintendent of schools of Polk county, to which he was elected on the Republican ticket. On the expiration of his term, in 1888, he was elected principal of Central school and the East Portland high school. On the consolidation of the city, the latter school was merged into the Portland high school, and he continued as principal of Central school until 1900, when he was elected superintendent of schools, on the Republican ticket, by a majority of about three thousand. The duties of the office he assumed, in August of 1900, for a term of four years.

During the first year of Mr. Robinson's service as superintendent of schools of Polk county he continued to act as academy principal as well, but finding his new office required constant attention, he resigned his principalship, and then gave much attention to the organization of the school system there, re-writing the records of the school districts. Since then no county superintendent in Polk county has ever divided his time, but has devoted his attention exclusively to official duties. As a teacher his experience has been varied. He has taught in country schools, has been principal of an academy and principal of a high school, besides acting as superintendent of schools. In the latter capacity he made a special study of methods of instruction for institute work, and since 1900 he has acted as an instructor in a large number of institutes in Oregon and Washington. He has closely organized the schools of the county and carefully guards the educational interests wherever industry and close attention will avail. He is a member of the executive committee of the State Teachers' Association and is the regular instructor of the Multnomah Teachers' Progress Club, an organization of teachers formed for the study of methods and practical school problems.

Aside from his educational work, Professor Robinson has taken a course in law at the University of Oregon, from which he was graduated in 1898, with the degree of LL. B., and during the same year was admitted to the bar.

He has not practiced law, but studied it for the benefit that would accrue to his regular work. This knowledge of law he finds of importance to him in his chosen profession. Politically he is a Republican and always takes an active part in the county affairs. While at Dallas he was made a Mason in Jennings Lodge No. 9, but is now connected with Washington Lodge No. 46, of Portland; also Washington Chapter, R. A. M. In the Ancient Order of United Workmen he is connected with Fidelity Lodge No. 4, of which he has been a leading officer. For five years he was a member of the finance committee of the Grand Lodge of Oregon and is now connected with the board of arbitration. The Woodmen of the World also number him among their members. His marriage occurred at Dallas in 1885 and united him with Ella E. Hallock, who was born and educated in this state. Her father, Ezra Y. Hallock, a native of Long Island, came via the Horn to Oregon in 1852 and settled in Polk county, where he engaged in milling. The family of Professor and Mrs. Robinson consists of six children, namely: Carl H., Earl N., Frank L., Reubey Faye, Warde and Claude.

CAPT. RICHARD HOYT. Yet another of the pioneers of this state whose active life began upon the high seas, and who eventually sailed into Portland harbor to identify his activities with the upbuilding of the city, was Capt. Richard Hoyt, from whose life many useful and interesting lessons may be drawn. Although he died February 2, 1862, there are many still living who recall his genial and hospitable nature, his capacity for entertainment and his shrewd business ability. In fact the proverbial inability of mariners to either make or retain money never applied to him, for he possessed none of the tendencies which tempt seamen to extravagant expenditure, and left his family unusually well provided for.

Captain Hoyt came of a family represented among the very early settlers of New England. He was born in Albany, N. Y., August 7, 1816, his father, Richard, being an educator and farmer during his active life. As is usually the case, the seafaring life appealed to Richard Hoyt while he was still a lad, and when rebelling at a supposed want of opportunity in his immediate family circle. At the age of twelve he ran away from home and shipped before the mast on a sailing vessel, which seemed a calling for which he was best fitted. He liked the work, and under the inspiration of sea breezes advanced rapidly in nautical matters. Arriving at the age of twenty-one, he was given command of a vessel for Captain

J H Jones

Prince, and was delegated to sail from Portland, Me., to European ports. His adventures upon the deep were many and exciting, the present order and system upon the high seas not being in use at that time.

While in port in Albany, N. Y., in 1842, Mr. Hoyt married Mary Ann Middleton, who was born in Lincolnshire, England, August 9, 1818, and reared and educated in Albany, N. Y. Shortly after the marriage he set out on a whaling voyage in the north, and though intending to be absent but a few months was gone three years. He came to Oregon as master of a vessel in 1847, bringing missionaries for the Methodist Church, the voyage taking eight months. Among them were "Father" Wilbur, the founder of the "Old Portland Academy," and Rev. Mr. Roberts, equally well known, both accompanied by their families. Again in 1849 he brought another load of missionaries to carry on the work of the church, and this time he left his ship in Portland, secured his discharge papers, and went to the mines in California. His first practical experience on land proved disappointing and unprofitable, and the seasoned sailor naturally turned his thought to the water which he loved so well. Therefore, he began boating on the Sacramento river, but in this venture he failed to realize his expectations. In the meantime, in 1851, he sent east for his wife and son; his brother, George W. Hoyt, was delegated to bring them safely, via the Isthmus of Panama, to the coast.

Arriving in Portland in the fall of 1851, Captain Hoyt located his family in a house owned by Captain Irving on Second street, and five years later he purchased a quarter of a block on the corner of Sixth and Morrison streets, where his death occurred in 1862. As soon as he came here he interested himself in boating, and for his purpose bought a vessel, fitted it with new machinery, and christened it the Multnomah. The Multnomah certainly had a successful career, and while plying between Portland and Astoria, towed, freighted, and also carried the mails. About this time he bought an interest in the Eliza C. Anderson, a well known river boat of its day, but the Multnomah claimed his attention to the last, rewarding him handsomely for the investment. The mail contract which he had signed with the government did not expire until a year after his death, and his wife was obliged to fulfill the contract, which her experience with her husband amply fitted her to do. She continued to live in the home on the corner of Sixth and Morrison streets until 1878, and then went to make her home with her daughter, Mrs. Phillips, until her death, September 1, 1893. Mrs. Hoyt was a woman of large heart and practical ideas. She was well educated and well read, and kept pace with her family in their studies and interests. She had a brother, John Middleton, who was a wagon maker by trade, and who came to Portland at an early day, plying his trade when there was great need of mechanics and master workmen. Richard Hoyt, the oldest son of the captain, was born in Albany, N. Y., in 1847, and was educated in the Willamette University and the old Portland Academy. He was fourteen years old at the time of his father's death, but young as he was, he was thoroughly familiar with the river, and was able to take the Multnomah from Portland to Astoria. He married and had three children, Herbert H., Christina, who died aged eighteen years, and Lindley. Sarah M. was born in Portland in 1853, and was educated in the public schools and St. Helen's Hall. Her marriage with P. F. Phillips occurred in 1875, her husband being a native of St. Johns, New Brunswick. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, but John Richard, the oldest son, died at the age of six years, and Ralph died March 3, 1903, at the age of seventeen. The other children are: Minnie S.; Aimee W.; Maude M.; and Hazel and Harry, twins. Mary Frances Hoyt was born in 1856 and for her first husband married T. S. Carr, by whom she had two children, a son who died at the age of three years, and a daughter, Ethel, now the wife of Marcus Eddy Spaulding, of Tacoma, Wash. For her second husband Mrs. Carr married Loyal B. Stearns, and at present makes her home in Portland. Mrs. Hoyt was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, towards the support of which her husband liberally contributed, although he was not a member.

JOHN H. JONES. One of the most kindly and gracious, as well as substantial and forceful representatives of past and present commercial activity in Oregon, is John H. Jones, president of the Jones Lumber Company, and the oldest active lumber merchant in the state, if not in the northwest. This venerable, liberal and thoroughly successful manipulator of western opportunities was born on a farm near Carthage, N. Y., October 3, 1832, a son of Justus and a grandson of Elihu Jones, the former of whom lost his father when but fourteen years of age and was thus thrown upon his own resources at an early age. His mother afterward married a Mr. Halsey, and he himself was apprenticed to a blacksmith in New Jersey, from which condition, akin to servitude, he escaped and ran away to Canada. While in the Dominion he married and settled on a farm, and later removed to Carthage, N. Y., where he farmed and plied his trade for many years. He died in 1847, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years.

Justus Jones was born in Ogdensburg, N. Y., March 14, 1807. In 1845 he removed to the vicinity of Keokuk, Iowa, where he engaged in farming until the fall of 1848. He then removed his family to Lakeview, Dane county, Wis., traveling with ox teams, where they made their home until the spring of 1852. Not content with the prospects in Wisconsin, he once more hitched up his ox teams, loaded his wagons and started on the long journey for Portland; and notwithstanding the many dangers and deprivations incident to such a trip in those days, arrived safely at Fort Laramie, July 4, 1852, after having traveled three months and three days. November 27 following the family reached Portland, and in the month of February, 1853, he and his two sons made the first settlement at Clatskanie, Columbia county. The pioneer family at once engaged in logging and lumbering with fair success, but at the end of three years the father returned to Portland, where the remainder of his life was spent. He died at the Jones sawmill in 1893, at the age of about eighty-five years. His wife, Lois Hastings, was a daughter of John Hastings, who went from Massachusetts, about 1800, and settled in Jefferson county, N. Y., where Mrs. Jones was born. The family came of Puritan stock and were related to the famous Bacon family. Mrs. Jones died in Oregon in 1879, leaving two children, of whom Elihu King, her youngest son, resides in Portland.

Upon removing with his family to Iowa in 1845, John H. Jones attended the district schools at intermittent intervals, and experienced the same unsatisfactory advantages after settling in Dane county, Wis., in 1848. When the family set out over the plains in 1852 he drove an ox team to Fort Boise, and was there attacked with bilious fever, from the ravages of which he was relieved by the incessant care of his mother. Arriving in Portland in the fall of 1852 he spent the winter in the city, and in the spring located on a farm in Clatskanie, in what is now Columbia county, which remained his home for three years. In 1855 he located at Cedar Mills, Washington county, Ore., seven miles from Portland, and there erected and operated the small water-wheel mill which marked the beginning of his career as a lumber merchant. This mill was entirely of his own construction, and in it he engaged in the manufacture of lumber until 1870, when he located in Portland. In the meantime, however, he had returned to the east in 1862, via Panama, and in 1864 married Jane Catherine Osborne, a native of New York, with whom he returned to his mill in Oregon, by way of the Panama route.

In 1871 Mr. Jones erected a steam mill on the Macadam road. This was burned in 1873, rebuilt at once, and again destroyed in a similar manner in July, 1889, through sparks from the railroad locomotives. Just prior to the last disaster he had dissolved partnership in the milling firm, but his brother rebuilt the property and he again took an interest and incorporated the firm of E. K. Jones & Co. in 1891. The Jones Lumber Company, incorporated in 1901, grew out of the latter-named concern, and Mr. Jones became its president, as he had been of its predecessor. The mill has a maximum capacity of fifty thousand feet per day, and its output is shipped to California and many eastern points.

During all these years Mr. Jones has extended his abilities into various lines of development. Several business and other structures in the city are due to his faith in the continued prosperity of his adopted state, and he owns besides several residences and some country property. Mr. Jones is at the present time the oldest active lumberman in this section, and though seventy years of age still retains the business ability and fine personal traits which have brought about his remarkable success in the west. He has given abundant evidence of his appreciation of the opportunities by which he was surrounded by investing heavily in town and country property, and has in many ways taken an active part in those affairs intended to contribute to the general development of his adopted home.

The wife of Mr. Jones died in 1875, leaving four children: Elizabeth Lois, wife of William Towne of Holyoke, Mass.; Lovina Dell, wife of W. H. Grindstaff of Portland; Birdie Lucy, wife of George D. Schalk of Portland; and Herman Halsey, manager of the Jones Lumber Company.

HERMAN HALSEY JONES. Among the younger business men of Portland, Herman Halsey Jones, secretary, treasurer and manager of the Jones Lumber Company, is securely fortified in a position whose responsibilities he has so successfully shouldered as to entitle him to a conspicuous place in the ranks of the most enterprising and sagacious representatives of the commercial world of the Pacific northwest. While it is true that opportunities of no mean nature were placed within his grasp when he stood upon the threshold of his business career, his record proves that, unlike many a young man similarly situated, he was possessed of powers of discernment and judgment sufficient to enable him to make the most of these opportunities from his first effort to the present time.

The family to which Mr. Jones belongs has a record for enterprise, energy and initiative work extending through several generations. The history of the identification of the family with the industrial interests of Oregon began more than a half a century ago when, in 1852, Justus Jones, the paternal grandfather of the subject of this sketch, came from his pioneer home in Wisconsin and established one of the earliest lumber industries of this state in the vicinity of Portland. His son, John H. Jones, took up this business where the pioneer left off, and the representative of the third generation is now energetically engaged in prosecuting the business developed by his father, whose advanced age renders him willing to allow the brunt of the great responsibilities attached to the conduct of the enterprise to fall upon the younger and more active man.

Herman Halsey Jones was born in Portland, March 17, 1870, and received his education in the public schools of that city. From his earliest youth he was more or less familiar with the business conducted by his father, and after entering the employ of the mill in 1890, beginning at the bottom of the ladder, he learned all the details of the business in its various departments. When the firm of E. K. Jones & Co. was incorporated in 1891 he was elected to the directorate, and filled the position of vice-president until assuming the positions of secretary and manager in 1898. Upon the organization of its successor, the Jones Lumber Co., in 1901, he became its secretary, treasurer and manager. The mill, located at No. 1280 Macadam street, has a capacity of fifty thousand feet per day of ten hours, and the yard, located at Fourth and Columbia streets, is the largest retail yard in Portland. The mill is operated by steam power, has double circular saws, lath mill, box shooek plant and moulding plant, and its products are shipped to California and many eastern points.

In Portland Mr. Jones was united in marriage with Mamie C. Morris, a native of England, and a daughter of David A. Morris, foreman of the Willamette Steel & Iron Works. She came to the United States with her parents in 1876, and has resided in Portland since 1879. They are the parents of a son, named Morris Giesy. Mr. Jones is a member of the Native Sons of Oregon, and in political affiliation is a Republican, though not a seeker for public honors. He was one of the incorporators of the Portland City Retail Lumber Company, a clearing house association for the lumber merchants of this city. He is one of the energetic and typically western business men, possessing personal attributes which cannot fail to keep him among the foremost in business and social affairs.

ROCKEY PRESTON EARHART. During his public service, which lasted over a period of twenty-five years, Rockey Preston Earhart became a prominent and influential figure in the legislative life of the state of Oregon, serving almost constantly in some capacity during this time, and unlike many other public men every succeeding position lifted him higher in the estimation of the people whom he served. Always a careful, thorough business man, punctual in the discharge of duties, and always implicitly trusted, Mr. Earhart took a firm stand on every question which affected the people morally, socially or financially and they well knew that their interests were upheld by a representative in every way worthy of their trust and confidence. Personally he was a man who influenced all with whom he came in contact, through the possession of a courteous, kindly disposition and a forceful, speaking magnetism, winning many friends, for whom he entertained a frank, warm and loyal attachment, which could not but be reciprocated. His splendid optimism, from which fine quality the greatness of the world has grown, caused him to be sought for at every gathering, political or otherwise, for he was an eloquent and engaging conversationalist, describing with striking force whatever had come within his line of vision. Such a character as that of Mr. Earhart must stand for all time as one of the pillars in the magnificent statehood which has been erected in the northwest, and though gone from mortal sight, as all must go, he still lives in the hearts of those who knew him in the pioneer days of the country.

Mr. Earhart was born in Franklin county, Ohio, June 23, 1836, and received his education in the private schools of his native state, where he gained a practical business training. He left his home in 1855 and came to Oregon by way of the Isthmus of Panama, seeking a broader scope for his abilities. Upon his arrival in this section he came in contact with some of the public men of the day, and they, recognizing the ability which was needed in all departments of the growing west, secured for him an appointment as clerk in the quartermaster's department at Ft. Yamhill, then under the command of Capt. Robert McFeely, who later became a general in the United States Army, and quartermaster P. H. Sheridan, then an almost unknown soldier. Mr. Earhart remained in this department until 1861, this date being the signal for the departure of Sheridan, who went toward the states to offer his services in putting down the rebellion, during which time he served valiantly in the Yakima Indian war, rendering valuable assistance to the officials under whom he served. In 1861 he embarked in a merchandising enterprise in Yamhill and Polk counties, continuing so engaged for three years, during which time he was married, July 2, 1863, to Miss N. A. Burden, who was herself a young pioneer to the coast.

Judge Job Burden, the father of Mrs. Earhart, was one of the first judges appointed in that county, and was a pioneer of Oregon. His home was in Sangamon county, Ill., and from that state a party of emigrants, of whom the judge and his family were members, came in 1845, equipped with supplies, wagons and ox teams. The journey occupied six months, the close of which found them safely located in the western state. Judge Burden followed farming in Polk county and endured all the hardships and privations of the early settler, and by his earnest and persevering work proved his substantial qualities as a citizen of the county in which he made his home. He and his wife died there at advanced ages. Of their six children three daughters survive, Mrs. Earhart having been born in Illinois in 1844 and thus crossed the plains at the age of one year. Of the children which blessed her union with Mr. Earhart, Alice A. is the wife of H. F. Gibson, of Seattle, Wash.; Eva T. is the widow of F. H. Alliston, of Portland; Clara E. is the wife of Dr. George F. Koehler, of Portland; and Agnes L. is the wife of W. A. Holt, also of this city. They were all born in Oregon and were educated in the public and best private schools which the country afforded.

Mr. Earhart engaged in merchandising until he received an appointment as United States Indian Agent at the Warm Springs Agency, to succeed Colonel Logan, remaining for about a year, when he was followed by Capt. John Smith. For some time after this he served as chief clerk and special Indian agent under Superintendent Huntington, and was secretary of the board of commissioners appointed by the general government to treat with the Klamath and Modoc Indians. In 1868 he again engaged in the mercantile business at Salem, Ore., and continued there until 1872. In conjunction with other citizens Mr. Earhart was active in maintaining peace at the capital during the troublesome times when the Civil war was in progress and when an outbreak might have occurred but for the courage and coolness of a few citizens who were prepared for active service at any moment. In 1870 Mr. Earhart was called upon to represent Marion county in the legislature, as a Republican, and was there instrumental in securing the first appropriation for the erection of public buildings in the state. He moved to Portland at the close of the term and was engaged for some time in the business department of the Daily Bulletin. He was appointed chief clerk of the surveyor general's office in 1874 and successfully maintained this position until 1878, when he resigned to accept the office of secretary of state, to which he had been elected. He entered upon his duties and reorganized and systematized the business of the office, and so acceptably did he discharge his duties that he received the unanimous vote of the Republican state convention for renomination and secured a majority of twenty-five hundred votes in the June election, 1882. His second term was as eminently satisfactory as the first, and upon his retirement his administration was heartily endorsed by both parties. From 1885 to 1887 he served as adjutant general of the state, and in 1888 was elected member of the legislature from Multnomah county, and re-elected for a second term, which was never completed. In 1890 he was appointed collector of customs, a position which was also interrupted by the summons of death. During his last residence in Portland Mr. Earhart was instrumental in the organization and incorporation of the Northwest Insurance Company, taken up by the prominent men of the city of Portland, and in this company Mr. Earhart was appointed manager, which position he held for a number of years. His death occurred at his home in Portland, No. 365 Twelfth street, south, May 11, 1892.

In fraternal relations Mr. Earhart was very prominent, having been made a Mason in 1863 and had held every office in the gift of the fraternity. In 1872 he was elected grand secretary of the Grand Lodge, serving until 1878, when, in recognition of past services in that body, he was elected to the high and honorable position of grand master and re-elected in 1879. He was also sovereign grand inspector and attained the thirty-third degree in the Scottish Rite in Oregon. He assisted in the organization of the first commandery of Knights Templar established on the north Pacific coast, and served for four years as eminent commander, and upon his retirement he was presented with a handsome Masonic jewel. At the time of his death he was grand commander of Knights Templar of the state. Religiously he was a member of the Congregational Church.

CAPT. GEORGE H. FLANDERS. A little more than a decade ago the city of Portland was called upon to give up one of the men whose character has truly left an ineradicable impression upon the moral, social and commercial life of that city; whose purity of thought, word and action has placed him as one apart from the large number of those who gave their strength and manhood to the upbuilding of the west; who, though long passed away, is still remembered by the many friends who loved him and the many who knew his worth through the kindness which he had shown them in the day of their need. Captain Flanders lived a life of such usefulness, intelligent, practical and Christian, giving freely of all wherewith he was blessed, in every business enterprise earnest for the advancement of the growth of the city but ever guarding his own honor and that of the community, the word being the key note to the blamelessness of his entire life. A brief sketch of his life is herewith given, his participation in the early history of the city numbering him as one of the representative citizens.

George H. Flanders was born in Newburyport, Mass., December 25, 1821, the representative of an old New England family, the English ancestor having come to that state in 1640. There the father, John, was also born. From his earliest boyhood Captain Flanders followed the sea, engaging in manhood in foreign trade, and finally he turned his eyes toward the western states, a splendid faith in their future justifying the removal here. In the year 1848 he came with his brother-in-law, Captain Couch, in a vessel of his own named "Palos," around the Horn to San Francisco and a little later became a resident of our city, where he remained throughout the remaining years of a long and useful life, closely identified with the business interests of the city and the development of her resources. It is a fact worthy of note that Captain Flanders never revisited his home in the eastern states, so entirely content did he become in the life and interests which were his as a citizen of this section. He was first connected with Captain Couch in the building of the wharf which extended from Ankeny to Davis street and was known by the names of the two men, and Captain Flanders also built the Greenwich wharf. For several years he was engaged in the mercantile business here and in transportation between Portland and San Francisco, and also owned one-fourth of the Couch donation land claim, now known as Couch addition to the city. In connection with Captain Couch he built the first Masonic temple in the city, located at the corner of Front and Burnside streets, this being one of the first brick buildings here erected. One of the most important positions which the captain filled was that of United States hull inspector, succeeding to this upon the death of Captain Couch, and maintaining honorably and creditably the same for the period of ten years, at the expiration of that time resigning.

In fraternal relations Captain Flanders was a member of the Masonic order, belonging to Wilamette Lodge, and in religion he was a conscientious member of Trinity Episcopal Church, in which he officiated as vestryman until his death, which occurred November 22, 1892. He married Maria L. Foster, born in Winthrop, Me., also blessed with the ancestry of a sturdy Puritan family, and she now makes her home in the old home in this city.

HON. JOHN W. MELDRUM. From an early period in the history of America the Meldrum family has been identified with its growth, and it is a noticeable fact that its members have been associated with the pioneer element. William Meldrum, who was of Scotch-Irish descent, settled in Kentucky as early as 1804, while that state was yet in its infancy and unredeemed from the wilderness. At a later date he became a pioneer of Illinois, settling near Carrollton, where he passed the remaining years of his busy life. John, a son of this pioneer, was born in Shelby county, Ky., in March, 1808, and became a stonemason and builder, following that occupation both in Illinois and Iowa.

As early as 1845 the Meldrum family started on the long and difficult journey across the plains. The family consisted of John Meldrum, his wife, Susanna Depew (Cox) Meldrum, and their four children. Starting from Council Bluffs, Iowa, in April, they followed the Platte and Green river route, and landed at Oregon City in October, 1845. The third in order of birth among the children was John W., who was born near Burlington, Iowa, December 17, 1839. From the age of six years he has been a resident of Oregon. Almost his earliest recollections are therefore of the far west, with its pioneer environment and sparsely-settled communities. The hardships and privations incident to opening up a home in the wilderness he experienced while yet a boy, and in his later years he has looked back upon the past with a keen appreciation of the changes which time has wrought in our population, improvements and well-being. His education was such as the early schools of the state afforded, but has been supplemented by self-culture and habits of reading and close observation. His father had a claim near Ilwaco, Wash., and for a time he remained there, assisting in clearing the land, but about 1856 he returned to Oregon City. The next few years witnessed a number of changes in his life. For a time he taught school, for two years read law, and for four years worked in the Florence and other mines.

About 1865 Mr. Meldrum's attention for the first time began to be turned to surveying. For a period of twenty consecutive years, excepting only one year, he was employed as United States deputy surveyor, and meantime worked in every part of Oregon, as well as in Idaho. In 1888 he was elected county surveyor of Clackamas county, and two years later was honored with the office of county judge, which officer was at that time ex-officio chairman of the board of county commissioners. In this position his knowledge of engineering was brought into practical use in the betterment of the county roads, then everywhere in a deplorable condition during all except the summer months of the year. Realizing that no permanent improvement could ever come under the labor tax system of working the roads, then employed, he devoted his energies to the abolishment of that system, and the substitution of the money-tax system in his county. But it was not until the middle of his term, in 1892, when a new commissioner, R. Scott, of Milwaukee, whose ideas on road building coincided with those of the judge, came into the board, that it was possible to make the change. As soon as practicable thereafter the change of systems was made, and although considerable opposition was encountered at first, especially in the country districts, it soon became evident from the amount of actually permanent improvement already accomplished on the county roads that the new system of working the public highways was much better and it has been employed in the county since that time. The result has been greatly improved roads, the benefits of which the people, from actual experience, have learned to appreciate, and many who at first opposed the change now bless the judge who was instrumental in bringing it about.

The judge has a comfortable country home on the banks of the Willamette river, one-half mile below the mouth of the Clackamas river. On September 25, 1872, in Oregon City, the marriage of the judge and Miss Georgiana Pope was solemnized. Mrs. Meldrum is a native of Oregon City, and a niece of Governor Abernethy. They are the parents of three children, namely: Charles E., of Oregon City; Eva S., a teacher in the high school of the same place; and David T., a student at Cornell University.

During 1898 Mr. Meldrum was appointed special agent for the general land office, examining surveys in Nevada and Wyoming, where he remained for ten months, filling the duties of his office. In 1902 he was elected county surveyor of Clackamas county, which office he is now filling. The experience of his past surveying expeditions adapts him admirably for his present position, and he is filling it to the satisfaction of the people of the county. Since 1869 he has been associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is also a member of the Encampment, besides having filled the chairs in the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is still a member. For ten years he has been a member of the board of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Oregon City, in the work of which he is warmly interested, as well as being a generous contributor to its maintenance. From the time of casting his first vote he has been a staunch Republican, and was one of the four delegates-at-large from Oregon to the St. Louis convention which nominated McKinley and Hobart. He is a member of the Pioneer Society and the Oregon Historical Society, and is at all times interested in anything pertaining to pioneer days in Oregon.

ROBERT C. KINNEY was a son of Samuel Kinney and a nephew of Gov. William Kinney of Illinois. He was born in Belleville, St. Clair county, Ill., in 1813, of Kentucky parentage. He pre-empted a tract of land on the banks of the Mississippi river which he thought eligible as a site for a future city. Here he built a hotel and wharf and laid out a town, and ran a boat between this point and St. Louis. Thus he became the founder of Muscatine, and a pioneer of Iowa. For a time he engaged in the flouring and sawmilling business, and also read law with Judge Hastings, a prominent member of the early bar of San Francisco. In 1847, accompanied by his family he crossed the plains via the Platte route and Oregon trail, making the journey with ox teams. Near Lafayette he took up a donation claim under the territorial laws of Oregon.

Attracted by the news of wonderful gold mines in California he joined the throng of adventurous spirits, who have since rendered that state and epoch brilliant by their achievements in many fields, and during a part of 1848-49 shared their hardships and their fortunes. Returning to his farm in the latter year he devoted himself to its improvement for a time, but re-entered the milling business in 1859 by the purchase of the McMinnville mills, and finding the business profitable and to his taste, added the purchase of the flour mills at Salem in 1875 and removed thither with his family. This enlargement of his business called for branch offices in Portland, San Francisco and Liverpool, England. To this Salem milling company belongs the credit of chartering the first vessel for the shipment of flour from Portland to Liverpool, China, Hindoostan and elsewhere in the Orient, and to Montevideo in South America. In the management of this growing and profitable business Mr. Kinney found his sons to be capable and successful lieutenants, and hence the business which they pioneered has grown to its present importance. But these growing interests did not withdraw Mr. Kinney's attention from his duties as a citizen, and his sterling sense and sound judgment were called for by his fellow citizens to aid in the convention which framed the first constitution for Oregon.

Through his marriage to Eliza Bigelow, R. C.

Mary Ann W. Kinney

Kinney became connected with the founder of the city of Milwaukee, Wis. Mrs. Kinney was born in Nova Scotia, and at an early age accompanied her father, Daniel Bigelow, to Illinois, thence to Wisconsin, where Mr. Bigelow engaged in sawmilling. The little mill which he operated became the nucleus of a village, which he called Mil-waukee.

In the family of R. C. Kinney there were eight children who attained mature years, and of these three sons and three daughters are now living. Mrs. Mary Jane Smith is a resident of Astoria, and her sons, Senator J. H. Smith and A. M. Smith, are prominent attorneys of the same place. Albert W. Kinney, who was in the milling business with his father, died in Salem in 1882. This son, together with William S. and M. J. Kinney, continued in the business projected by their father, and William S. Kinney was the president and manager of the Clatsop Sawmill Company until the time of his death in 1899. Augustus C. Kinney, the Astoria physician so well known as a specialist in tuberculosis, was among the first advocates of the germ theory of the origin of this disease, and had come to be recognized in this country as an authority in this field before the demonstrations of Koch of Germany removed all doubt by the discovery of the tubercular bacillus. His well considered articles in medical journals and before medical societies had before that attracted much attention from medical men and now a large practice in his special field is a part of his reward. Alfred Kinney, a younger brother and a physician and surgeon in general practice lives in Astoria, where he stands high in his profession. Mrs. Josephine Walker lives in San Francisco, and Mrs. Eliza Peyton, wife of Dr. J. E. Peyton, lives in Redlands, Cal.

MARSHALL J. KINNEY, the fourth son of R. C. Kinney, was an infant when the family came to Oregon in 1847. He was educated in the public schools of the state and in the McMinnville Academy. After the completion of his education he entered into the employ of his father, where he soon mastered the details of the business. In 1868 he went to San Francisco to take charge of a branch office there. Though barely twenty-one years of age the business, running into many hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum, and extending across both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, was conducted with such good judgment as to command the confidence of his business associates of all classes in San Francisco, as well as the entire approval of his father in Oregon.

The death of his father, in 1875, and of his older brother soon after, and the consequent sale of the Salem mills, recalled him to Oregon, where, in 1876, he became interested in the salmon packing business in Astoria. Through his enterprise there was built up what was at the time the largest salmon cannery in the world. Not satisfied with the methods of canning then in vogue, he introduced improved machinery and methods, and in this way brought the business up to a high plane of activity and success. About seventy-five thousand cases were packed annually, and the Kinney brand of salmon became known in every part of the world. In addition to his Astoria business, he established canneries at Chilcoot and Cape Fox, in Alaska, and started the cannery at Fairhaven, Wash., of which he is still president.

In addition to his canning interests, which continue to be large and valuable, for twenty years or more Mr. Kinney has engaged in the lumber manufacturing business with his brother, William, president of the Clatsop Mills Company. The mills have a large capacity, manufacturing lumber from the timber fields of Oregon. The company owns valuable tracts on the Columbia river and in the coast counties, which are especially adapted to the purpose of the concern. In 1899 Mr. Kinney removed his office to Portland, where he has since made his home and his business headquarters.

Mr. Kinney is a life member of the Occidental Lodge of Masons in San Francisco. Among the other organizations with which he is connected are the Oregon Pioneer Association, the Oregon Historical Society, and others of a similar nature. In San Francisco he married Margaret Morgan, who was born in that city and died there, leaving a daughter, Harriet M. His second marriage united him with Narcissa White of Pennsylvania, who gained a national reputation through her distinguished services in the cause of temperance. (An account of the life of Mrs. Kinney will be found in the following sketch.)

NARCISSA WHITE KINNEY. If we were asked to characterize Narcissa White Kinney we would write: The grand law of her being was to conclude whatsoever she undertook. No matter what its difficulties nor how small its worth, she held to it until she had mastered every detail, finished it, and made the result of it her own. Carefully she studied the matter in hand and with indomitable energy, perseverance and skill carried forward to completion the ideas she evolved and finally crystallized into living practical issues. Hence, whatever she did bore the ineffaceable impress of her personality.

Mrs. Kinney came of good stock. She was Scotch-Irish by inheritance, and for grit and grace there seems to be no better combination. Her ancestors on both sides hail from "bonnie Scotland," but stopped on their way to America, for several generations, in the North of Ireland. Her mother's maiden name was Wallace, and family records show that she was a direct descendant of Adam Wallace, who was burned at the stake in Scotland for his religion. The thrilling account of his steadfast faith and triumphant death has been handed down to us through the sombre records of "Fox's Book of Martyrs." At his death his two sons, David and Moses Wallace, fled to the North of Ireland, whence Narcissa's grandfather, Hugh Wallace, emigrated to America in 1796 and located in the western part of Pennsylvania. Her father's ancestor, Walter White, suffered martyrdom for his religion during the reign of Queen Mary, and four of her far-away grandfathers—two on each side of the house—fought side by side at the battle of the Boyne.

Mrs. Kinney's father, George W. White, was a Christian gentleman of high moral character much respected by all who knew him. He was an intelligent man, a deep thinker, well posted in the literature of the day, in history, and especially in the sacred scriptures. He realized the advantages to be derived from a liberal education and labored hard to give his children the very best attainable in that early day. He spent the greater part of his life on a part of the old homestead taken up by his father. At seventy years of age he was suddenly killed in a railroad accident which occurred near his home in 1883.

The mother, Susanna Kerr Wallace, was born in Ireland and came to America with the family when eighteen years of age. She was a woman of strong personality, very energetic and full of resources, deeply pious, and carried her religion into her every-day life in such a way as early to impress her children with their need of spiritual guidance. She was the mother of eight children, one boy and seven girls, all of whom honored their father and their mother in their lives. The youngest daughter, Maria, from early girlhood longed to become a missionary to the foreign field, and finally gained the consent of her parents to study medicine and so prepare herself for the work of a medical missionary. After graduating from a medical school in New York City, she took up work in the slums of the city for one year as a preparation for the foreign field. In 1886 she sailed for India under the board of the United Presbyterian Church, and on reaching her destination began work in Sialkote. In a few years she formulated plans, raised funds, and founded a medical hospital there, which has proven an inestimable blessing to the afflicted and diseased women and children in that benighted land, and is considered by the church as a powerful factor in civilizing and christianizing those depraved and ignorant heathen. After eight years of arduous labor, Dr. White returned to America broken in health, with but little hope of ever being able to return; but after several years her health was restored, and in 1902 she again sailed for India to devote the remaining years of her life to her chosen work.

Narcissa White, the subject of this sketch, was born in Grove City, Pa., in 1854. She was the sixth daughter, the youngest of the family but one. She received her primary education in the Grove City public schools, and was later graduated from the State Normal School of Pennsylvania, with high honors, distinguishing herself as a writer and speaker and showing such marked ability as a teacher that she was immediately elected principal of the training school in Edinboro, Pa. She labored here for some time and was sent out through the state to organize county institutes, where she gave instruction in chart work and elocution. So energetically did she prosecute her work that her health gave way and she was laid aside for two years.

During these years the great temperance crusade was in progress, and its outgrowth, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—which has now become such a powerful organization—was in its incipiency, but was claiming public attention. Miss White, among others, became interested in the movement, and after studying carefully its aims and methods, became profoundly impressed with the need and importance of its work and felt it her duty to work under the auspices of that organization. With her, a duty known was a duty performed. She at once joined the white ribbon ranks, was elected president of the Grove City Union, and in a short time county president, then state superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, and in that position did an immense amount of work. She visited county institutes and gave instruction in the scientific teaching of the effects of alcoholics and narcotics upon the human system, in such a logical way as to elicit warm commendations from educators generally. All this work was gradually preparing her for the larger field she was soon to occupy. In 1880 she was called to the platform exclusively. She was made a national lecturer and organizer, and in that capacity visited every state and territory in the Union, also Canada and British Columbia.

During these years Narcissa White had developed wonderfully. Naturally she possessed a keen, logical mind, a most persuasive manner, a quick, sparkling wit and a charming personality. Her face was handsome and expressive, one that would attract attention among the crowds. She had a lofty, graceful bearing and a fine physique. Her address was dignified, without a suggestion of haughtiness. She was gracious to everyone, yet without a trace of superiority. Her success as a platform orator was remarkable. She had developed into one of the most brilliant speakers in the entire coterie engaged in reform and educational work and was sought far and near and everywhere hailed with delight. Her presence was magnetic; her voice, which she had carefully cultivated, was clear and penetrating, so flexible and sympathetic that she swayed her audience at her will. She brought to the platform such intense enthusiasm that it was contagious, and impelled her hearers to give assent to her earnest pleadings.

As a champion of truth and righteousness and in shaping and carrying forward the great reforms of her day, she had no mean part. Her great heart was stirred to its very depths by the wrongs inflicted upon defenseless women and children by the liquor traffic, and her deep sense of right and justice was outraged by the protection the traffic received from our national and civic government, so she threw her whole soul into the battle for prohibition and her strong personality and burning eloquence left their impress upon every community she visited in our great commonwealth.

Miss White twice visited the Pacific coast in the interest of temperance and did most effective work in Oregon and Washington, particularly in securing temperance legislation. During these tours she met and formed the acquaintance of Marshall J. Kinney, at that time the proprietor of several of the largest fish canneries on the Columbia river. Mr. Kinney's family was among the pioneers of Oregon, known all over the coast. The father and five stalwart sons have been identified with many of the large industries which have attracted immigration to the northwest. In 1888 Miss White left the lecture field to become the wife of Mr. Kinney, and came to Astoria, "the city by the sea," to make her home. Here she soon found many avenues for work, and her fertile brain, ever active, among other things developed plans for elevating and christianizing the hundreds of fishermen in the employ of her husband. Mr. Kinney, being in full sympathy with all her work, gave her free rein, and she opened a mission and taught those ignorant men and women—many of them Russian Finns—new ideas of life. She opened to them the Scriptures and led many of them to the feet of the Master.

Mrs. Kinney was a devoted Christian, reared in the United Presbyterian Church, and after her removal to Oregon a member of the Presbyterian Church. She was identified with all the activities of the church, and was especially interested in the foreign mission work in India, where her sister labored. In her will she left her wedding ring, a valuable diamond, to the India mission. It was to be sold and the money used for furthering the work there.

Mrs. Kinney was also a philanthropist. She planned largely to promote education in Oregon by assisting in establishing libraries, organizing Chautauquas and summer schools, and repeatedly lectured before such assemblies and before the state universities and colleges. She was also the center of a large social circle of cultured and refined people. Her sparkling wit, quick repartee and winning manner made her a general favorite at all social gatherings.

In 1894 she was elected president of the Oregon W. C. T. U., which position she held until about one year before her death, when her failing health compelled her to resign. She was a most efficient president, a model presiding officer, and possessed great executive ability. She was a careful financier, and had the faculty of imparting to her followers a measure of her own earnestness and enthusiasm. By her unselfish devotion to the cause she represented she inspired all with whom she labored to do their very best. She knew no such word as failure, so her administration was one of progression and wide influence.

In the autumn of 1899 Mr. and Mrs. Kinney left Astoria and went to Portland to reside. She was not robust, but was not an invalid by any means, and in her new home was entering into such work as presented itself. She was apparently as well as usual when, without warning, she was stricken and yielded up her life forty-eight hours after she was taken ill. It seemed a strange dispensation of Providence that had called her away in the midst of her usefulness and at the very zenith of her mental power. These things we cannot fathom and may not question.

We will not say, "God's ordinance
Of death is blown in every wind;"
For that is not a common chance
That takes away a noble mind.

We know only that God called her, and she obeyed. We know, too, that her consecrated life—single-hearted, generous, pure and noble—has left an influence which will rest like a benediction upon her adopted state and upon all who came in touch with her, and that it will go on and on, spreading and growing and blessing even generations yet to come.

HON. SAMUEL BRUCE HUSTON. The ancestral history of Samuel Bruce Huston has been one of close connection with America and her development from the early colonial epoch of the nation. James Huston, the great-great-grandfather of our subject, was born in the little rock-ribbed country of Wales, whence he crossed the Atlantic to the new world, braving the dangers incident to an ocean voyage at that time. He lived first in Delaware and afterward in Mifflin county, Pa., and his spirit of loyalty and bravery was manifest in the early times when the French and Indian war was in progress, for during that contest he served as an officer. When the yoke of British oppression became so intolerable that the colonists resolved to sever all allegiance to the British crown he joined the Continental army and fought for the independence of the nation. Hon. Alexander Huston, the great-grandfather of our subject, was born in Mifflin county, Pa., and immigrating to pioneer districts took up his abode in Nelson county, Ky., whence in 1809 he removed to Indiana, and in both states he visited Indian camps. He was a member of the first constitutional convention of Indiana, and he aided in laying broad and deep the foundation upon which was reared the superstructure of the commonwealth. His son, Samuel M. Huston, the grandfather, was born in Nelson county, Ky., ere the removal of the family to Indiana. In the latter state he engaged in farming, and in Salem, Ind., Oliver Huston, the father of our subject, was born and reared. He, too, followed farming in the vicinity of Salem and of New Philadelphia, and when the Civil war broke out he responded to his country's call for troops, enlisting in Company G, Eighteenth Indiana Infantry, with which he went to the front, and in the battle of Stone River, in 1862, he was killed, thus laying down his life upon the altar of his country. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Lucretia Naugle, was born in Washington county, Ind., a daughter of Jacob Naugle, who was born near Washington, Pa., and became a pioneer farmer of Indiana, whence in 1842 he removed to Texas, where he was engaged in raising cattle. His son, Benjamin Naugle, served in the war for the independence of Texas, and during the Civil war fought with the Texas Rangers. He died in the Lone Star state. Tradition says that the great-grandfather Naugle was a soldier of the Revolution. The mother of our subject died in Illinois and of her three children but one is now living.

Samuel Bruce Huston of this review was born in Salem, Ind., March 16, 1858, and spent the first eight years of his life in that state, but after his father's death he became a resident of Crawford county, Ill., where he was reared upon a farm, while in the district schools he acquired his education until he had prepared for entrance into the Northern Indiana Normal School, where he spent three years. He was enabled to acquire his more advanced mental training because of the money which he had previously earned in teaching, and his determination to secure an education, even in the face of difficulties, showed forth the elemental strength of his character, which has been developed with the passing years, making him a strong man in those qualities and characteristics which are essential to a successful career.

Entering upon the study of law Mr. Huston spent one year as a student in Robinson, Ill., his reading directed by George N. Parker, after which he entered the law office of the firm of Heffron & Zaring, in Salem, Ind., being admitted to the bar in 1879. For four years thereafter he occupied a clerical position in the employ of the Santa Fe Railroad Company, between Trinidad and Santa Fe, and in 1883 he came to Oregon, settling in Forest Grove, where he remained for a year. In February, 1884, he located in Hillsboro for the practice of law and soon gained a distinctively representative clientage, his practice being not confined within the limits of this county but extending throughout the state and embracing much important litigation. The zeal with which he has devoted his energies to the profession, the careful regard evinced for the interests of his clients, and an assiduous and unrelaxing attention to all the details of his cases have brought him a large business and made him successful in its conduct. As his financial resources have increased he has made judicious investments in real estate and is now the owner of farm property in Washington county and business property in Portland.

In Forest Grove occurred the marriage of Mr. Huston and Miss Ella Geiger, a daughter of Dr. William Geiger, who came to Oregon across the plains in 1839, and for many years was a successful and prominent physician of this part of the country, his death occurring in 1901, when he was eighty-five years of age. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Huston: Blanche, Oliver and Carl.

The qualities of leadership are dominant in Mr. Huston, and his fellow citizens, recognizing his worth and ability, have frequently called him to office. He has served and at the present time is filling the position of councilman, has been city attorney and mayor of the city and for nine years he was a school director, acting as president of the board for a part of that time. Still higher political honors awaited him, for in 1892, on the Democratic ticket, he was elected to the state senate, serving in the sessions of 1893 and 1895, during which time he secured the passage of a number of important bills, including the one to stop the sale of school lands or indemnity lands and providing for the appointment, by the governor, of a commissioner to select and list all of the lands the state had lost by reason of donation claims, homestead claims and forest reserves, where the same covered school sections. This became a law and has proved of great value to the state and materially increased the school fund. It was also due to Mr. Huston that there was a bill passed making it a criminal offense to point firearms, either loaded or unloaded, at any human being. In 1896 Mr. Huston became a gold-standard Democrat and is now a Republican. The step which he thus took is indicative of his faithfulness to his honest convictions. He is ever fearless in what he believes to be right and never weighs his actions in this regard in the scale of policy. He is a member of the State Bar Association, of which he is now (1903) president, and holds a position of prestige at the bar as well as in political circles, for his comprehensive knowledge of jurisprudence and his forceful presentation of a case before court or jury have secured him high honors and gratifying successes at the Oregon bar.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS WORTH. Enshrined in the hearts of all true Oregonians are the pioneers who blazed the way for progress and enlightenment on the coast, and though many of them have long since passed beyond the ken of those comprising the teeming present, their names, if not their faces and voices, are familiar to the student of state history. Such an one was John Quincy Adams Worth, an early merchant of California and Oregon, a pioneer of 1855, and a member of the state legislature on the Democratic ticket for two terms. At the time of his birth, February 2, 1824, Mr. Worth's parents, Joseph and Charlotte (Ellison) Worth, were living in Starksborough, Vt., where the father was conducting quite a millwright business. From Vermont the family removed to New York, and from there to Ohio, later locating in Wrightstown, Wis., where the elder Worth died at the age of eighty-eight years. Mr. and Mrs. Worth, Sr., lived together in harmony, rearing their large family of ten children in comparative comfort, and training all in ways of industry and strict morality. Two children died in infancy, and the majority of the others lived to an advanced age. Lionel died in Illinois; Guy C. died in Alton, Iowa; William E. died in San Francisco, of which town he was a pioneer, and where he was superintendent of the Union Iron Works for many years; Richard K. died on the way to the gold mines of California in 1849; Eliza Ann, Mrs. Turnbull, died in Ohio; George W. died in infancy; Samuel M. died in May, 1901, in Sancusky, Ohio, where he was engaged in a mercantile business; Arthur W. came from California to Oregon in 1855, was an architect and builder, and died a bachelor, November 13, 1866; Martha J. married Philip DeWalt, lived in Ohio for many years and died in Florida; Harriet A., Mrs. Morrison, died in Wisconsin; John Q. A. died in Oregon, February 26, 1867; and Vincent died at the age of five years.

The Worth family was established in America by very early emigrants who settled in Nantucket off the Massachusetts coast, and whose children subsequently dispersed and founded families of their own in various eastern states. The solid and reliable English traits of character were shared by all of the brothers and sisters of John Quincy Adams Worth, and were trained into usefulness by a common school education, and practical lessons taught at home. After completing his education at Newark, Ohio, John applied himself to learning the tailor's trade, and then returned to Sandusky, and entered into a dry goods business with his brothers, later being taken in as a partner. They were successful, accumulating considerable money, and with this the brothers came to California via Cape Horn in 1852, making their way to Mokelumne Hill, Calaveras county, where they started a general store, and operated a pack train, teaming to Sacramento. At the same time Mr. Worth had interests in several mines thereabouts, but his combinations proved trying for his health and he was obliged to abandon them at the end of three years. After selling out the brothers went to Albany, Ore., and spent the winter, going later to Orleans, where they engaged in business for one year. Mr. Worth founded the little town of Peoria, and with his brother operated a store in connection with the growing of its industries. He was successful and prominent in his locality, was regarded as a benefactor, and very progressive man, and his death in 1867 left a void difficult to fill. He was a Democrat from his first voting days, and aside from two terms in the legislature, filled various positions of trust in his respective communities. He was fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and was a sociable, genial man, interested in churches and schools and all that had to do with the fundamental well being of his district.

In 1862 Mr. Worth was united in marriage in Brownsville, Ore., with Miss Geary, who was born in Ohio in 1842, and who, since his death, has reared her children on the farm in Linn county, although she permanently located in Portland in 1889. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Worth, Edward Geary, the oldest, having been born April 13, 1863. Mr. Worth is a man of education and ability, and was trained at the University of Eugene, eventually succeeding to the position of superintendent of lighthouse construction for the government, located in Portland. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Joseph E., the second son in the family, was born October 14, 1864, and in 1901 married Leona Henderson. He was a civil engineer during the first years of his business life, taking up that profession after leaving the University of Eugene. November 5, 1890, he engaged in the drug business with Dr. J. H. Irvine, after three years assuming his present position as sole manager of the drug enterprise. Mr. Worth is a public spirited and popular man, is fraternally widely known, and is identified with the Knights of Pythias, of which he has passed all of the chairs; the Anchor Lodge No. 45, A. O. U. W.; the Artisans, Golden Rod Assembly No. 108; and the Multnomah Camp, W. O. W. Ada Lillian, the only daughter of the family, was born April 6, 1867, and married Alva O. Condit, in March, 1891. Mrs. Condit is a graduate of the Monmouth Normal School, and her husband is a practicing attorney of Salem.

EDWARD RACHFORD GEARY. A brave, patient and richly endowed nature was called from various fields of activity through the death of Edward Rachford Geary, September 3, 1886, but though so long a time has elapsed, months, years nor great changes will place a limit on the extent and usefulness of his ministerial, educational and general accomplishments. While giving all praise to this pioneer of 1851 for his successful manipulation of resources, it is but fair to say that certain advantages aided in his rise to prominence, not the least being a more than ordinarily strong constitution, a stature developed to six feet, and inherited traits which have always been associated with the best and most virile blood of England. These same ancestors were peculiar in one particular, in that all were devoted to a seafaring life, only one son being left to perpetuate the Geary name of nine generations, the others were killed in the British navy.

Born in Hagerstown, Washington county, Md., April 30, 1811, Mr. Geary was one of four sons (two reaching maturity), born to his parents, Richard and Margaret (White) Geary, the former of whom was an educator, and removed with his family to Pennsylvania in 1823. Edward was six years older than his brother, John, the latter of whom was equally impressed with the importance of life, and moulded his tendencies into broad and liberal channels. John Geary won the rank of captain in the Mexican war, and that of general in the Civil war, and he became the first mayor of San Francisco, having removed to California at an early day. He carried scars from wounds in both wars, and aside from this distinction, won more than local prominence as a politician. At the time of his death in Harrisburg, Pa., at the age of sixty, he had just completed his second term as governor of Pennsylvania. Edward Geary early turned his thoughts to the ministry, and after graduating from the Jefferson College, Pa., entered the Allegheny Theological Seminary. Afterward he went to Alabama, organized and conducted an academy for three years, and soon after his return to Pennsylvania, in 1838, married Harriet Rebecca Reed, whom he had known as a child. Miss Reed was born in New Berlin, Pa., May 24, 1814, and received an excellent education in her native state. Soon after the marriage the young people removed to Wayne county, Ohio, where Mr. Geary had charge of a Presbyterian church at Fredericksburg for twelve years, during this time having other church responsibilities in the state. His first wife died February 17, 1844, leaving two children, Mrs. Martha L. Perham, of Butte, Mont., and Mrs. Worth. For a second wife Mr. Geary married Nancy Merrick Woodbridge, a native of New York, who was born near Owego, Tioga county, January 17, 1818. Mrs. Geary died in Oregon in 1889, having borne eight children, two of whom died in infancy. Of the other children, John White Geary is a physician of Burns, Ore.; Elizabeth W. died in Eugene in 1885; Ellen E. lives in Astoria; Woodbridge, a graduate of West Point, was stationed first in Texas, and then at Fort Parker, N. Y., later at Mackinac, Mich., and Sault Ste. Marie; becoming an instructor in tactics in the Agricultural College in Corvallis, Ore., and from there enlisting in the Spanish-American war, his death occurring as major and acting captain at the battle of Malla-bon, Philippine Islands; Dr. Edward P. Geary, of Portland, Ore.; and May L., who died in early childhood.

Mr. Geary came to Oregon in the year 1851 as representative of the Board of Foreign Missions, to look after the church and school work. By way of the Isthmus of Panama he reached San Francisco, and from there embarked on a sailing vessel for Astoria, coming from there up the river to Oregon City, and thence on the upper river aboard the first boat to make the trip, known as the Little Hoosier. Upon arriving in Oregon he found work much less advanced than he anticipated, and instead of a ready means of livelihood in his chosen occupation he was obliged to turn his attention to secular work. He organized a school and in connection preached as opportunity offered, and about this time was appointed secretary to General Palmer, superintendent of Indian affairs. Later he succeeded General Palmer in this important responsibility, in April, 1859. In 1856 he had removed to Linn county from his former home near Lafayette, settling upon a claim which continued to be his home for some years. For a time he was interested in a general merchandise business, and on one occasion was sent east to purchase machinery for the woolen mills at Brownsville, the second enterprise of the kind in the state of Oregon. The burning of this mill entailed great loss to its promoters, Mr. Geary sustaining a portion of it himself. He afterward became interested in another general store, but sold out the same upon becoming one of the organizers of the Albany college, of which he served as president. For some time he served as county judge, although he never aspired to political recognition; in the meantime he had purchased a farm near Albany, making this his headquarters while associated with the college and judiciary. In 1873 he removed to Eugene, where he built a home and was instrumental in locating the university at that place. This college enlisted his sympathy and co-operation, and up to the time of his death he was a member of the board of regents, and a substantial contributor to its financial welfare.

In the meantime Mr. Geary had preached in many churches, most of which he himself organized and started upon their self-supporting careers. The gospel was to him a living force in the every day affairs of men, and after its application, came all else that made living desirable. No call was too remote, or entailed too arduous toil for his ready response, and at one time he rode one hundred and thirty miles on horseback to Portland to converse with a member of the board of missions for a couple of hours. He possessed a magnetic and forceful personality, impressing all with his sincerity and truth, facts observable especially in his intercourse with the Indians in the very early times, when he used to secure treaties, thus averting disaster on many occasions. Many experiences of a startling nature came his way while intent upon his errands of mercy, and on one occasion while going through the almost impenetrable woods he was attacked by bears and succeeded in killing one with the butt of his gun. He had the faculty of adapting himself to all conditions and circumstances, and was equally at home in the tents and huts of the early settlers, as in the ministerial halls of the assembly. He was a member of the general assembly in 1884, having served in a similar capacity on a prior occasion. Thus was the life of Mr. Geary cast in useful and distinguished mould, and whether as a preacher, merchant, educator or agriculturist, he maintained a settled faith in goodness and success, as understood by the larger minds of the world, never losing track of the gospel of humanity, which smoothed his way in times of distress and seeming failure, and encouraged his progress in the way to which nature and inclination had called him.

CHARLES N. WAIT, attorney at law and agriculturist of Clackamas county, was born in Oregon City, this county, February 10, 1856, and bears a name prominently identified with the jurisprudence of the state of Oregon. His American ancestors were connected with the early history of the extreme eastern states, his paternal great-great-grandfather, Benjamin, having been born in Connecticut, from which state he emigrated to Hatfield, Mass. This remote forefather was never wanting in physical or moral prowess, and because of his bold frontier experiences was known as an Indian annihilator. His fighting ability seems to have been inherited by his son, John, who was a soldier in the Whately Company, under Capt. Henry Stiles, and afterward a sergeant in Capt. Russell Kellogg's company, on the Bennington alarm. Joel, the son of John, followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary war, and was in both the Hatfield Company, commanded by Captain Graves, and the company of Captain Murry.

Judge Aaron E. Wait, father of Charles N., and first chief justice of the state of Oregon, was born in Whately, Franklin county, Mass., December 26, 1813, a son of Aaron Wait, also a native of Massachusetts, and a soldier during the war of 1812. Aaron Wait married Sarah Morton, a native of Whately, and daughter of Solomon Morton, representative of a prominent Massachusetts family. Four children were born of this union, Eunice, Clementine, Charles G., and Aaron E., the latter the youngest of the family. Aaron Wait died when his namesake son was an infant, and his wife afterward married again, in consequence of which the lad lived with his grandfather until his fourth year, and then with his uncle until he was eight years old. His education was difficult of attainment owing to the lack of necessary funds, and was chiefly acquired while serving an apprenticeship of four years at the broom maker's trade in Hatfield, Mass., his spare money defraying the expenses attached to his schooling. For some time he subsequently engaged in teaching in New York, and in 1837 removed to the state of Michigan, where he studied law in Centerville, St. Joseph county, and was admitted to the bar of Michigan in 1842. Before leaving the state he was the military secretary to Governor John S. Barry.

Accompanied by Judge Lancaster, Mr. Wait made preparations to cross the plains in 1847, there being forty wagons in the train and a large number of stock. The journey was not attended by any disastrous occurrences, although terrific storms made progress difficult at times. It is recorded that Judge Wait made a deep impression upon the Indians with his glasses, which he wore for near-sightedness, and which the red men believed to endow him with almost supernatural powers, permitting him to see enormous distances and through practically everything. The judge persisted in watching the cattle and horses at night, and came near dealing out the death penalty to a would-be horse thief, who, however, dropped into the tall grass when he found he was discovered, and managed to sneak away to safety. Arriving in Oregon, Mr. Wait settled in Oregon City, and here he entered upon the practice of law with ex-Senator James K. Kelley, with whom he remained for a number of years. In 1849 he varied his practice by going down into California on a little seventeen ton vessel, intent upon claiming a share of the gold for which thousands were striving. He was fairly successful as a miner, his largest find in one place during the course of a day being $60, and his largest all around find in a day was $100.

Upon returning to Oregon Judge Wait became connected with the Cayuse War Commission, which up to that time had accomplished practically nothing. His service was marked by extreme fairness to all concerned, and he audited nearly all of the war claims, and every claim he allowed was met precisely as he had made it. The judge practiced under the provisional and territorial laws of Oregon, and was elected to the circuit bench in the fourth judicial district and later served as the first chief justice of Oregon, immediately after the admission of Oregon as a state in 1859. He held many important offices within the gift of his fellow townsmen, practically his only defeat taking place after his nomination to the senate in 1862. From a large legal practice Judge Wait gradually drifted into real estate speculations, and, as seems natural with so many active men, chose to spend his later life amid the peace and quiet of farming enterprises. In 1876 he removed onto his six hundred acre farm near Canby, remained there for eight years, and then went back to Portland, where he lived until 1897. The same year he returned to the Canby farm, where his death occurred December 13, 1898. He was a very large land owner, had two thousand acres in Jackson county, Ore., his Canby farm of six hundred acres, and enough other Oregon land to make up five thousand acres. In Washington he owned one thousand acres. No finer type of the gifted and substantial citizen has invaded the ranks of law and agriculture in Oregon, and to none has been accorded more universal esteem, or generous appreciation of splendid personal characteristics. Judge Wait married Mary Ann Sprenger, who was born in McConnellsville, Ohio, a daughter of a merchant who was born in Germany and came to the United States as a young man, settling in Pennsylvania. From the latter state Mr. Sprenger removed to McConnellsville, Ohio, from where he emigrated to Linn county, Ore., his death eventually occurring on his donation claim at an advanced age. Of the first marriage of Judge Wait three children were born, of whom Charles N. is the only one living. Of the second marriage contracted by the judge three children were born, but only one matured, Anna Evelyn, the deceased wife of Frank Hanford, of Seattle, Wash.

The education of Charles N. Wait was acquired in the public schools of Portland, which training was supplemented by a course at the Bishop Scott grammar school. His first business experience was as general timekeeper on construction with the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, whose employ he entered in 1880, and with whom he remained for eight years. In 1888 he became chief clerk of the money order department of the Portland post-office, and, owing to close confinement and consequent effect upon his health, resigned at the end of two years. For the following two years he acted in the capacity of deputy United States marshal under John Myers, after which he entered the law department of the Oregon State University, from which he was duly graduated with honors. In June, 1891, Mr. Wait began to practice in Portland, and in 1897 removed to the old homestead in Canby, since which time he has combined the management of the large estate with the general practice of law. He is a Democrat in political affiliation, and has taken a prominent part in the affairs of his party in Oregon. For one term he was deputy city attorney of Portland, and he was secretary of the state central committee when Cleveland was last elected. Also Mr. Wait has been mayor of Canby for one term. He is fraternally associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, of which he is past master; the Warner Grange, of which he is past master; the Elks; the Red Men; and the Knights of Pythias.

The first marriage of Mr. Wait was contracted in Clackamas county with Laurena J. Marks, who died July 20, 1891, leaving one son and two daughters. October 2, 1895, Mr. Wait married, in Washington, Wilhelmina Woicka, who was born in Portland, and whose father, William, a jeweler by trade, was born in Germany. Mr. Woicka came to America as a young man, and died in San Francisco, Cal. Of this union there have been born two sons, Aaron E. and George N.

JOHN COLGATE BELL. With nearly ninety years behind him the memory of John Colgate Bell goes back over the better part of the nineteenth century and recalls the changes which the years have brought to the nation and to the individual. As a mere lad his hand was shaken by La Fayette on his tour of the country in 1824, and he has listened to the retelling of happenings of the two wars with Great Britain, by his grandfather, William Bell, who served as a soldier under Washington at Brandywine and other battles of note, fighting valiantly for his adopted country, for he was a Scotchman by birth, and by his father, also William Bell, who served as major of cavalry in the war of 1812. The father was a pioneer of the state of Kentucky and he himself has put the greater part of the continent between him and the scene of his birth, enduring the hardships and dangers of the early days and now enjoying the affluence and prosperity which a wise use of opportunities entail.

The birth of Mr. Bell occurred in Mount Sterling, Montgomery county, Ky., February 24, 1814. The father was a native of Philadelphia, and early removed to Kentucky, where he engaged as a wholesale hat merchant. In 1834 he went to Missouri, where his death occurred at the age of eighty-eight years. His wife, formerly Virlanda Grimes, was born in Bourbon county, Ky., and died in Missouri at the age of fifty years. Of their four children the only one now living is J. C. Bell, of this review. He received his education at the academy of his native town, his first employment being as a clerk in a store there. When his parents removed to the state of Missouri, Mr. Bell, then twenty years old, accompanied them, and there bought a farm and engaged in raising tobacco, in which employment he remained for two years, in 1837 entering the mercantile world as a wholesale and retail grocer of Clarksville, Pike county, Mo. This business was successfully conducted for about three years, when he went to New Orleans for eighteen months and then to Platte county, Mo., where he passed the ensuing ten years. While in that location he was married in Weston, in 1845, to Sarah E. Ward, who was born in Greenup county, Ky., in 1829, afterward becoming a resident of Fleming county, where she was reared and educated. She was the daughter of Gen. Thompson Ward, a commander in the war of 1812, and an attorney and politician, representing his district in the Kentucky legislature for sixteen years. He moved to Weston, Mo., and in 1854 came to Oregon, crossing the plains with ox teams in a journey of five months. He settled in Salem, where he followed farming and stock raising until his death, which occurred at the age of eighty-five years. His wife, who before her marriage was Sarah Kountz, died in Salem, at the age of sixty-seven years. Besides Mrs. Bell the other daughter of this family now living is Mrs. Nancy Belt, the wife of Dr. Belt, of Salem.

In 1850 Dr. Belt brought his family to Oregon and Mr. Bell accompanied them, leaving his own wife in their Missouri home until he had first tried the western life. They set out primarily for the gold fields of California, leaving May 1 of that year, but through delays they changed their intentions and came instead to Oregon. On the way they fell in with Major Davis and came to Portland, but left Mr. Davis here while they journeyed on to Salem, which city was the scene of about twenty years of the practical business life of Mr. Bell. In the same year he was appointed manager of a store at The Dalles, where he was employed in hauling supplies to the soldiers as well as carrying on a large trade with the Indians. Major Tucker was the commanding officer and Mr. Bell had been appointed by Colonel Loring. He built the first house and occupied it at The Dalles before the officers were in their own quarters. Until 1851 Mr. Bell remained there, then sold out, and purchasing thirty-two pack mules, conducted a pack train from Salem to Yreka, Cal., a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, which occupation was continued for a year. The year following he returned to Missouri and in 1854 came back across the plains with his family. During this trip they experienced the horror, while camping on the banks of the Oyhee river, of witnessing a massacre of a party of emigrants by Indians, which would probably have been their own fate had not Mr. Bell performed a strategic movement which averted the danger. In Salem Mr. Bell opened a general merchandise establishment and continued the same for many years, also buying a farm near that city, where he engaged in stock raising and cultivation of wheat, this latter, however, occupying his attention for only three years. After selling his business in Salem in 1870 and also his farming interests he retired from active duties until his appointment by Cleveland as postmaster of Astoria, at which time he moved his family there and served in that capacity for four and a half years. In 1890 he removed to Portland, which has since remained his home, conducting until his retirement a real estate business here, in which he met with the uniform success which had characterized the efforts of his life.

Throughout his entire residence in this state Mr. Bell has been associated with the enterprises calculated to advance the interests of the community, taking an active part in all affairs that have come within his range of influence, which has, fortunately, been wide and far-reaching through his business contact with the people of the state. In 1861 he was one of the stockholders of The Arena, in Salem, the first Democratic paper of the city, and the same year assisted very materially in the election of Colonel Baker to Congress, his tragic death at Ball's Bluff, in 1861, being especially felt by those who had sent him as their representative. In 1864, while Mr. Bell was in San Francisco, the Democratic party nominated him for state treasurer, but he was defeated at the election. He has been very active in the Democratic conventions, acting as delegate to the state, county and local meetings. While living in Weston, Mo., he gave much aid in the time of the Mexican war, assisting in recruiting the regiments of Colonel Donovan and General Price, both being organized at Fort Leavenworth. Mr. Bell then ranked as lieutenant-colonel.

To Mr. and Mrs. Bell were born ten children, of whom two died in infancy in Missouri and one at the age of two years in Salem; Nancy Garnett, born in Missouri, married Walter Jackson and died in Portland, leaving two children, Alice Bell and Harold, who now make their home in that city; Laura W., born in Missouri, married J. H. D. Gray, formerly county judge of Astoria, Ore., but who is now deceased; they became the parents of eight children; William T. is engaged in the mercantile business in Enterprise, Ore., and has three children, two sons and one daughter, namely: Memory, Burnett and Helen; Alice is the wife of S. Z. Mitchell, of Tacoma, Wash., the manager of the General Electric and Improvement Company, and they have one son, Sidney A.; Sarah Blanche is the wife of Capt. R. E. Davis, who is connected with the Willamette Iron Works, and they have one son, Robert Bell; Genevieve is the wife of C. M. Maxwell, an electrician of Seattle, Wash., and they have two sons, Allyne and John C.; Robert Edward is married and engaged as an electrician in Tacoma, Wash. The sons were all educated in Salem University, and the daughters in the parochial school, Sisters of the Sacred Heart, all making their home with their parents until marriage, trained to domesticity by the father, who has always cared more for his home than anything else in the world. Mr. Bell is a member of the Pioneer Association of Oregon, and fraternally is a member of the Masonic order, having been made a Mason in Clarksville, Mo., in 1837. He is a charter member of Multnomah Chapter, R. A. M., at Salem.

FRANK S. FIELDS, County Clerk of Multnomah county, has been prominently identified with Portland and its vicinity for a period of more than a quarter of a century.

During that time his career has caused him to become recognized as a man of most estimable personal qualities, who is unselfishly devoted to the promotion of those movements calculated to enhance the numerous advantages of the city and the state as a desirable place of residence, as well as to educate the rest of the world in the many material advantages offered by the commonwealth to men of energy and enterprise.

His father, Samuel H. Fields, was born near Lexington, Ky., in 1821, and at an early age was made an orphan. In his youth he went to Missouri with the intention of assisting in the pioneer development of that state. There he learned his trade, that of mason, and about 1854 removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he established himself in business as a contractor and builder. Subsequently he carried on operations in the same calling in Kilbourn City and New Lisbon, in that state. In 1875 he came to Oregon and purchased a tract of twelve and one-fourth acres in Mount Tabor, which he converted into a fine fruit farm. The remainder of his life was spent at Mount Tabor, where his death occurred in 1896. During the Civil war he served as a member of the Eighth Wisconsin Infantry. His widow, who before her marriage was Luconda Hamilton, now makes her home in Mount Tabor. In their family are four children, namely; Eliza J., wife of E. J. Brubaker, postmaster of and merchant in Mount Tabor; Louis R., superintendent of the Oregon division of the Southern Pacific Railroad; Charles E., who is engaged in the real estate business in Portland; and Frank S., the youngest child in the family.

Frank S. Fields was born April 13, 1862, in New Lisbon, Juneau county, Wis., where the first thirteen years of his life were spent. With his parents he came to Oregon in 1875, attending school at Mount Tabor until he reached the age of sixteen. In young manhood he began his business career by becoming a telegraph operator in Oregon. For eight years he was stationed at Halsey, Ore., as telegraph operator and agent for the Oregon & California Railroad Company. His entry into public life occurred in 1887, when he began a two years' term as city recorder of Halsey. He also served one term as mayor. In 1890 he engaged with his brother, Charles E., in the real estate business in Portland, the firm name being C. E. & F. S. Fields. They laid out an addition of eight acres northwest of Mount Tabor, Summit Addition to Mount Tabor (comprising sixteen acres), Summit Annex to the same place (ten acres), and Mount Tabor Central Tract Addition (eight acres). They also laid out Mount Tabor Commercial Block, a tract of one acre where the postoffice now stands, and a five-acre addition known as East Paradise Springs, besides other plots. Frank S. Fields is now retired from the firm, which is known as Fields & Co., with offices in the Alisky building.

In 1895 Mr. Fields was appointed deputy clerk of the county court, under H. C. Smith, and this post he filled for two and one-half years, or until the expiration of his term. In 1902 the Republicans of Multnomah county nominated him for the office of county clerk, and he was elected, assuming the duties of that office July 7 of that year. At the time he entered the office, the law passed in 1901 consolidating the offices of clerk of the county court, recorder of conveyances and clerk of the circuit court into one office, to be known as county clerk, took effect. The enactment of this law resulted in the saving to Multnomah county of thousands of dollars annually, as under the old regime from twenty to twenty-five deputies were employed in the three departments, whereas the work is now done by a reduced force under the direct supervision of Mr. Fields. He has always exhibited a keen interest in educational matters, and for some time served on the Mount Tabor school board in the capacity of clerk, holding this position until his election to the office of county clerk. Although not identified by membership with any religious body, he does all in his power for the promotion of good along all avenues, and aids all worthy measures by material support. His wife is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fraternally he is connected with Mount Tabor Lodge No. 42, A. F. & A. M., Mount Tabor Camp, Woodmen of the World, holding the office of council commander in the lodge at Mount Tabor, with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the Artisans and the United Brotherhood of Railroad Employees. He is also a member of the Board of Trade.

In Salem, Ore., April 24, 1883, Mr. Fields was married to Bessie E. Lindsay. She was born in Bucyrus, Ohio, but reared in Salem, where she removed with her parents in girlhood. Her training in the public schools of that city was supplemented by the full course in Willamette University, from which she was graduated. They are the parents of three children, Vera M., a graduate of the Portland high school; Frank H. and Grace G.

WILLIAM BARLOW. In this great north-western country, with its boundless possibilities, and but imperfectly developed resources, its remoteness from the cradle influences of New England, and its diversified interests beckoning the traveler from afar, the large hearted, courageous and far-sighted pioneer is revered for what he has accomplished, and for the strength and hope which his sterling characteristics have infused into all departments of activity. At the present time there is in process of writing a history of the Barlow family, different members of which have made perceptible inroads into the opening of Oregon, and who, in their attainments and characters, are representative of the most far-reaching and helpful pioneership. Pending the completion of this interesting narrative, it is a pleasure to enumerate the salient points in the careers of the best known members of the family, with reference especially to their association with the state of Oregon.

Very early records credit the Barlows with emigration from Scotland, and with settlement near Plymouth Rock, Mass. Virginia became the home of the later members of the family, in which state the paternal great-grandfather, John, was born, and where he enlisted for service in the Revolutionary war, in time attaining to the rank of captain. His son, William, the paternal grandfather, was also born in Virginia, and after going into Kentucky with Daniel Boone to fight the Indians, liked the state so well that he forthwith settled therein. In Nicholas county he owned a large farm, and reared a large family, his death occurring at the age of sixty-five years.

Samuel K. Barlow, the father of William, and son of William, was born in Nicholas county, Ky., and in his youth learned the tailor's trade. When twenty-eight years old he removed to Indiana, but later took up his residence near Peoria, Fulton county, Ill., just at the close of the Black Hawk war. Subsequently he pioneered where Chicago now stands, but because there was no prophet to advise him, refused to pay $400 for the property upon which now towers one of the greatest centers of activity in the world. At that time the prairie around and bordering on Lake Michigan was unbroken by farm houses or barns, and in the woods there roamed game of various kinds, as yet unfrightened by the gun or wily scheme of the pale faced hunter. Ignoring the chance to buy up the future site of Chicago, Mr. Barlow started from Fulton county to cross the plains, March 30, 1845, his means of transportation consisting of four teams of three yoke of oxen each. With his family he traveled alone to Independence, Mo., where the band was increased to one thousand wagons, and divided up into different companies. Mr. Barlow was captain of the company bearing his name, and faithfully guarded the interests of his charges through all the dreary months on the trail. The way was via the Platte and the Sweet Water rivers, the journey being rather a pleasant one, and singularly free from annoyances of Indians or the ravages of disease.

Slowly the cavalcade moved into the Willamette valley, travel stained but hopeful, and ready to do and dare to an extent unappreciated by people under any other circumstances.

William Barlow helped very materially to build the first wagon road over the Cascade mountains. Previous to 1845, all immigrants coming to western Oregon came to The Dalles and were conveyed by bateaux down the Columbia to the Willamette valley. Mr. Barlow's father determined to make the route one continuous journey by land. He and William Rector blazed the route and S. K. Barlow's family and a few helpers followed. Upon William Barlow, the oldest son, devolved much of the responsibility and work of the undertaking. He and John M. Bacon were the first men to test the road. Following the blazed trees made by the pathfinders, they made the trip on foot to the Foster settlement, where provisions were procured to take back to the hungry women and children who were struggling with the difficulties of the new mountain road. The road was eighty miles long; sixty-five miles of it were cut through the primeval forests and canyons of the mountain slopes. The late Judge Matthew P. Deady, of the United State supreme court, said of it: "The construction of the Barlow road contributed more toward the prosperity of the Willamette Valley and the future state of Oregon than any other achievement prior to the building of the railways in 1870."

Christmas eve, 1845, Mr. Barlow arrived with his family in Oregon City. He had been successful in Illinois, and had money with which to start life in the west. He bought a hotel for which he paid $2,000, later sold to his son, William, and also took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres near the city, which he eventually sold for $5,000. Later he bought six hundred and forty acres, upon a portion of which the town of Barlow has since been built and named in his honor, and this land he sold for $6,000. In the meantime he had purchased land in Canemah, and thither he repaired to spend his last years, his death occurring there at the age of seventy-two years. Mr. Barlow was one of the splendid personalities which illuminated the pioneer days of Oregon, and who, by his fine grasp of existing opportunities, furnished a worthy example to all would-be promoters of western interests. He was fashioned somewhat on the Cromwellian order, was of Scotch ancestry, and fearless almost to audacity. He despised lies and soft people, and never stooped to a small meanness during the course of his long and well ordered life.

While living among the crude conditions of Indiana S. K. Barlow married Susanna Lee, who was born in South Carolina, and whose father, William Lee, was born in Ireland. Mr. Lee's father was a colonel in the British army, and fought for the crown for seven years. In time he changed his tactics and fought against rather than for England, for which evidence of insubordination he was captured and imprisoned in a dungeon for a year. After his release he sent his two boys, William and Frank, to America, and William settled in Charleston, S. C., where he enlisted for service in the Revolutionary war. He was a lieutenant of artillery and during the first engagement at Charleston a shell burst, causing him to be crippled for life, and cutting short his military service. Nevertheless, he lived to a good age, for he was sixty at the time of his death in South Carolina. His widow and her children removed to Kentucky, and later to Indiana, settling near Vincennes, but the mother finally removed to the vicinity of Indianapolis, and died there.

William Barlow, son of the pioneer, was born ten miles west of Indianapolis, Ind., October 26, 1822, and was reared in Indiana and Illinois. He was the second oldest of the five sons and two daughters born to his parents, and like the rest of the family availed himself of such education as was procurable at the little log subscription school-house. He came across the plains with his father, and bought six hundred and forty acres of land near the Clackamas river, and within six miles of Oregon City. After disposing of this land at a profit he went on the Molalla river and bought a section of land upon which he planted fifty acres in wheat. In 1848 he sold his property to Matthias Sweaglc, a friend of the old days in Indiana and Illinois, who paid him $2,000 in gold. What this amount of money meant may be best judged when it is known that it was very scarce at that time, and that what little currency was to be had included English, Canadian, Mexican and various other kinds. Later Mr. Barlow brought up in Oregon City, where he bought wheat, made it into flour, and after getting in a supply of one thousand barrels of the latter commodity talked it over with his partner and decided that one ought to buy the other out. As no Barlow ever thought of backing down, the flour was soon under the exclusive ownership of the Barlow side of the house, and a rise in the price of flour enabled him to sell at an enormous profit. This happy chance proved the beginning of the success of Mr. Barlow, and placed to his credit what was then a comfortable competence.

In 1849 Mr. Barlow left his flouring business and went down to the mines of California on horseback, and during his absence from home collected a varied assortment of experience, albeit his success as a miner did not reach large proportions. The Indians showed him a great deal of unsolicited attention, and while endeavoring to turn them from the error of their ways he was compelled to acknowledge their superiority of numbers and fighting prowess, and retreat to a safe haven. His object par excellence was to regain possession of a fine riding horse of which the red men had relieved him, but it is feared the horse had henceforth a much be-decked and savage master. After his flour sale Mr. Barlow bought the Lovejoy donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres on the hills back of where Canemah now stands, and afterward he went into partnership with A. F. Hedges in laying out the town of Canemah. The partner went to New Orleans in 1850, bought an engine for a steamboat and saw mill, and a fine stock of general merchandise, and when he returned Mr. Barlow took the stock of goods and saw mill, and the partner took the boat, and all went merrily and successfully to the advantage of all concerned. The land back of Canemah increased in value and sold at a large profit, and the way of the pioneers was brightened by more than anticipated success.

Upon purchasing his father's place at Barlow Prairie in 1852, Mr. Barlow was practically free from other business obligations, and in a position to devote all of his time to the cultivation of his fine property. A modern residence was unfortunately burned in 1884, but Mr. Barlow at once arranged for a larger and more commodious residence. No more beautiful rural residence contributes by its harmony and appropriateness to the agricultural well being of Clackamas county, nor is any farm more admirably managed or finely cultivated. Located on the Southern Pacific railroad, it has its own way station and warehouse, and while essentially a country home, is in close proximity to town interests. At one time Mr. Barlow was asked to put up $2,500 and thus become half owner of the land upon which Portland has since been built, the other man in the case, Dan Lonsdale, having paid $5,000 for it in leather. He afterwards traded a portion of the same land for the leather with which he had bought it to a tannery located on the property. Mr. Barlow was deterred from entering into this transaction through the advice of his father, to whom he went for counsel, and whose opinion he valued more than that of anyone else in the world. Mr. Barlow has been foremost in all public enterprises in his locality, his force of character, akin to that of his father, forcing him unwittingly into all that has called for strength and concerted action.

He early saw that the climatic conditions of his adopted state were suitable for orchard culture and next to Mr. Llewcllan of Milwaukee, was the first to establish an apple nursery. In 1852 he imported from Illinois, by way of the Horn, a bushel of black walnuts, and a fine grove of bearing trees attest the success of this experiment. In public enterprises, Mr. Barlow's name was among the originators of the Oregon State Fair, the first woolen mill in Oregon, the building of the first telegraph line, and in 1860 he gave up his residence and part of his farm for the establishment of barracks for the First Oregon Volunteers. In 1861 he moved to Oregon City and was enthusiastic in sanitary organizations for the Union boys. Mr. Barlow was engaged in mercantile pursuits in the county seat for ten years, when he returned to the Barlow farm, where he has resided continuously for thirty-two years.

He is a Republican in political affiliation, and has served as county commissioner and assessor, and was nominated representative from Clackamas, but resigned on account of sickness. His political enthusiasm led him to give an inaugural ball and dinner in honor of Lincoln's first inauguration. When Col. E. D. Baker arrived in Oregon, Mr. Barlow drove him to Salem in his family carriage. This carriage is now a historical relic, having been shipped to Governor Abernethy via the Horn in 1859. Mr. Barlow purchased it on its transit and has owned and used it ever since.

Mr. Barlow often expresses his sentiments in regard to two great political movements of the last decade in these words: "There is just as good material in a woman to make an honest and intelligent voter as there is in a man, and there is just as good material in silver to make an honest dollar as there is in gold." He is fraternally associated with the Masons, and bears the distinction of being the oldest living member in Multnomah Lodge No. 1, the first lodge organized on the coast.

In 1852 Mr. Barlow married Mrs. Martha Ann Partlow Allen, of which union there have been born three children, of whom Mary is one of the well known educators of the state, and is possessed of great natural talent for her chosen occupation. Jennie, the second daughter, is deceased; and Cassius U. is managing his father's farm, and is an exceedingly capable and popular member of the younger generation of Oregon promoters. Mr. Barlow is now eighty-one years old, but possesses a keen memory of all his pioneer exploits. A habit of reading formed in youth is a great solace to him in his old age. His wife died in 1901, and his two children are now administering to the comfort of his declining years.

ROBERT ARMINGTON IRVINE. A family of exceptionally substantial standing in the annals of this state is that of which Dr. E. L.

Irvine, a well known medical practitioner of Portland, represents the third generation. His father, Robert Armington Irvine, and his grandfather, Jesse Irvine, were born in Kentucky, the former in 1824, and the youth of both was characterized by a hard struggle for existence. Both of these men had strong and leading traits of character, and came of a long lived and vigorous family, longevity being particularly marked on the maternal side, which was English, the paternal side furnishing the Scotch perseverance and conservatism so much needed and appreciated in pioneer localities.

In his young manhood Robert Irvine married Miss Berry, presumably of Kentucky, and in 1852, accompanied by his wife and two children, his mother, and several brothers and sisters, crossed the plains to Oregon, accomplishing the long distance between his old and adopted home with ox and horse-teams in six months. The hope of his emigration was dimmed ere he had tested its wisdom or value, for his daughter died en route and was buried in the bottoms on the Platte river, his wife later succumbing to the rigors of the overland trail at the Cascades. John, the son of the family, alone remains of his first marriage, and at the age of fifty-four is engaged in farming in Linn county. Mr. Irvine started out with more than the usual equipment for travel, having one hundred head of cattle and fifty horses. Even this number proved insufficient, owing to disease and the depredations of the Indians, and in order to complete his journey in comfort he was obliged to purchase a horse on the way. His mother located in the little town of Salem, and her own was the first grave to be dug in the desolate Lee Mission cemetery, since so thickly populated. Her son, Samuel, died on the farm near Salem; James died on a farm adjoining his brother Robert's in Linn county; Benjamin is living retired in Lebanon; Jesse is a resident of Corvallis and his son is editor of the Times; Mary E. and her husband, Charles Claggett, lived in Salem, but both are now deceased; Margaret J., deceased, was the wife of Robert Miller, and died in Lebanon in 1902; and Elizabeth, deceased, became the wife of James Claggett, brother of her sister's husband. Of this large family which started out so bravely and formulated their plans over brightly burning camp fires, tramping ceaselessly from morning till night over rough roads, and in many ways enduring great hardships, Elizabeth and her husband stopped in Portland; Mary and her husband left the train at Salem; and the others went on to Linn county, taking up such claims as their means permitted or their requirements demanded. Thus was established in the western wilds, and in touch with the enormous fertility and resource of a great state, as large a family as reached Oregon in the aggregate, in 1852.

Recovering somewhat from the disaster which visited him on the plains, Robert Irvine married, in 1853, Sarah Jane Smith, who was born in Ohio in 1834, and with her parents, who were natives of Kentucky, and had previously lived in Ohio, came to Oregon in 1852. Her father, Elijah Smith, was a man of means, and after arriving in the far west was able to avert much of the discomfort which rendered hard and discouraging the lives of the early settlers. He located first in Linn and afterward in Marion county, his death occurring at the home of his daughter, Amanda Bossler, in the Waldo Hills, at the age of ninety three years. He was a doctor by profession, and a man of leading traits of character, taking a prominent part in the political and other advancements, by which he was surrounded in Oregon, and wielding an influence in financial and general circles. Besides his youngest child, Mrs. Irvine, he had ten other children, the order of their birth being as follows: John, the postmaster of Lebanon; Hiram, a retired farmer living in Salem; William, a graduate of the medical department of the Willamette University, who died at Turner, Ore.; Elijah, a capitalist of Medical Lake, Wash.; Abner, living in Marion county; Taylor, a resident of Salem, Ore.; Susan, the deceased wife of William Peebler, of Lebanon; Mary, the wife of George Matleer, of Heppner; and Amanda, the wife of John Bossler, of Macleay, Marion county.

Robert Irvine settled on a farm near Scio, Linn county, and through the exercise of business judgment accumulated six hundred and twenty acres of land before his death. He lived on his farm until 1868, in which year he was elected sheriff of Linn county, and removed to Albany to better attend to his duties, and because of the superior educational facilities. He was re-elected sheriff in 1870, and after completing his term, in 1872 purchased a farm on the prairie near Albany, which continued to be his home for several years. After retiring from active business life in Albany, he continued to take an interest in politics, and in 1886 was elected state senator, finishing the term, and also the second term to which he was re-elected. His political service was characterized by wise and conservative methods, and with due regard for the best interests of those who placed him in power. His name was a household one throughout the county and state, and carried with it both influence and power. Attending all state and county conventions, his acquaintance with the prominent men of the state was naturally large, and his large estates, both in the county and city of Albany, gave him an unquestioned financial standing. He was a promoter of education, morality, and good government, and whenever called upon in any popular cause, fulfilled the expectation for a large and generous contribution. Many years ago he became a member of the Masonic lodge of Albany, in which his genial personality and good fellowship were greatly appreciated. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church profited by his membership and support, and it is said of him that he was consistent in his attendance, harmonizing his Sunday and everyday life, and applying the beneficent Golden Rule in all of his departments of activity. The widow who survives him lives at the old home in Albany. His oldest daughter, Margaret Ellen, is the wife of Lark Bilyeu, an attorney of Eugene; E. L. is a resident of Portland; Mary is the wife of A. B. Slau-son, assistant librarian of Washington, D. C.; and Amanda is the wife of E. L. Thompson of Portland.

E. L. Irvine, one of the well known medical practitioners of Portland, was born on his father's farm near Albany, April 12, 1858, and was educated primarily in the public schools, afterward attending the Albany College and the Willamette University, completing the English course in the latter institution. After spending two more years on his father's farm he began the study of medicine under Dr. J. L. Mill, of Albany, at the same time taking a course of lectures in the medical department of the Willamette University, from which he was duly graduated in 1883. After a medical practice of three years in Portland he was appointed assistant superintendent of the Oregon State Insane Asylum under Harry Lane, maintaining the position four years. Dr. Irvine possesses the broad and liberal tendencies of his father, and his participation in public affairs is a foregone conclusion. Maintaining the best tenets of his profession of infinite possibilities, he leaves no stone unturned to keep abreast of the times, and in his diagnosis and treatment discloses individual theories based on profound research and of demonstrated merit. Dr. Irvine is a member of the Oregon State Medical Society, a member and medical examiner of the Knights of Pythias, the Degree of Honor and the United Artisans. Politically he supports the man best qualified to serve the public interests. In Albany, in 1882, Dr. Irvine married Laura Robertson, a native of The Dalles, Ore., and daughter of W. H. Roberston, deceased. After the death of Mr. Robertson, his widow married Christopher Houk and made her home in Albany. E. Lloyd, the only child of Dr. Irvine, who was born in Albany, August 7, 1883, was educated in the high school of Portland, and is now in the second year of his medical studies. After severing his association with the Oregon State Insane Asylum, Dr. Irvine located in Albany, in 1891, and in 1900 came to a large field of activity in Portland. Already his former success is being duplicated, and it is the wish of all who have watched his meritorious career that substantial appreciation and encouragement may reward his scholarly attainments and unquestioned allegiance to science.

WESLEY JACKSON. To the pioneers of Oregon the present generation owes a debt of gratitude that will never be paid. They were men who were truly cast in heroic mold. Few had money, and it certainly required a sturdy nature and a perseverance that today is rarely found in men. Men in 1850 were known for their true worth. All were animated by a common hope. The confidence in the future of Oregon was great. They were noble men and too much cannot be said or done in their honor. To this class of men belonged the gentleman whose name forms the caption of this review. A native of New York, his birth occurred in the village of Medina, and here the days of his boyhood and youth were passed. A few weeks of the year were spent in the school-room, but in those days the services of the youth were of too much value to be wasted in school. He was needed to assist in the work of the farm. Attracted by the discovery of gold in California, Mr. Jackson left his home in 1849 and joined the thousands who were emigrating westward. San Francisco was reached after a long and tedious voyage around the Horn, and the following year was spent in mining on McCamel Hill. At the end of this time, with the capital he had accumulated, Mr. Jackson came to Portland on the vessel Ajax, and soon after his arrival he opened a crockery store. From a very small beginning he gradually built up a business that was not only the largest in the city of Portland, but was one of the most important of its kind in the Pacific northwest. Each year for a considerable period he would go east and purchase his supply of goods and at the same time he would also buy in large quantities for other firms in different lines of business. Mr. Jackson continued in this line of business until 1883 and during that time he became one of the best known business men in the west. His reputation was an enviable one and the success that crowned his efforts was but the natural results of diligence, enterprise and honesty. On disposing of his crockery business in 1883, he organized and established the North Pacific Manufacturing Company, which under his judicious and efficient oversight became one of the most important industries in the city of Portland. The plant was constructed under his personal supervision and the company engaged in the manufacture of buggies, carriages and wagons, transacting a business that aggregated $100,000 per annum. From the plant the Jackson vehicles were shipped to all parts of the country, particularly through Oregon, Idaho and Washington. It is worthy of note that here were manufactured the first street cars used on the Pacific coast which were run on the streets of Portland. To assist them in the production of their high-grade vehicles, hardwood lumber was ordered from the east and reached here via the Horn. However, the establishment and oversight of so large a business overtaxed the physical powers of the founder and owner, and his sudden death, May 10, 1891, was a direct result of overwork.

While Mr. Jackson was at all times a man who had many business matters to occupy his attention, he nevertheless was one of the most public spirited citizens of Portland. No movement that was calculated to be of material benefit to the city went by without his support. His time and means were always at the disposal of any interest deserving the support of good citizens. Among the many enterprises with which he was connected was the Portland Telephone Exchange which he aided in starting. He was also actively identified with the Transcontinental Line. Fraternally he was a Mason and politically he supported the men and measures of the Republican party, but he never had the time nor the inclination to take an active part in the political struggles of his party. He was ever on the side of right and when called upon he always responded.

While still a resident of Medina, N. Y., Mr. Jackson was united in marriage with Frances Moore, a native of that city and now a resident of Portland. Three children were born of this union, as follows: Wesley James, who died in 1876, while attending school at Andover, Mass.; Annie G., now Mrs. Shofner of Portland; and Carl H., a sketch of whom follows.

CARL H. JACKSON. A native son of Oregon, Mr. Jackson has established an enviable reputation among the business men of Portland. A son of Wesley Jackson, he was born in the city of Portland on January 26, 1870. When old enough he entered the public schools, which he continued to attend until his graduation in 1886. Soon after he entered the office of his father, who was then engaged in the manufacture of buggies, carriages, etc., and here he acquired a thorough knowledge of the manufacturing business. In 1892, one year after the death of his father, he succeeded to the management of the business and immediately closed out the same. The plant was remodeled as a planing-mill and handed back its charter. The Northern Pacific Planing Mill Company was formed with Mr. Jackson as president and manager. The dimensions of the mill are sixty-five by one hundred and fifty feet, being three stories in height, with large warehouses and sheds. Two blocks bounded by Twenty-second and Thurman streets are utilized for the mill, which in addition to its planing business is engaged in the manufacture of sash, doors and building materials. As time has passed the output of the concern has been enlarged until at the present time it is one of the most important industries of the city.

Much credit is due Mr. Jackson for what he has accomplished. In all of his transactions he has shown a conservative spirit which is usually the accompaniment of old age, but when found in youth or middle age, with qualities of energy, enthusiasm and determination, produce almost invariably gratifying results.

Though not active in politics, Mr. Jackson is a firm believer in the principles of the Republican party. He has never had the time nor the inclination to seek public office, preferring rather to devote his whole time and attention to the management of his business. Fraternally he is identified with the Hoo Hoos; the Ancient Order of United Workmen; the Woodmen of the World; Modern Woodmen of America; and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

Aside from his connection with the planing mill company he took an active part in the organizing of the Oregon Sash and Door Company, and for a time served as its vice-president and secretary.

RICHARD B. KNAPP, who for thirty-five years has been identified with the business of Knapp, Burrell & Company, agricultural implement dealers, and also president of the Baggage and Omnibus Transfer Company, the largest concern of its kind north of San Francisco, is one of the very early settlers in Portland, his residence in this city dating from July, 1859. He has lived to witness the growth of the metropolis of Oregon from a city of a little less than three thousand inhabitants to one of the largest and most prosperous in the territory west of the Mississippi. And in this wonderful development Mr. Knapp has been a factor of more than ordinary strength, his influence always having been cheerfully extended in behalf of all those movements having for an end the establishment of a firm foundation for a future city which might properly be accorded a rank among the most progressive municipalities of the country, and a commercial and industrial community known as worthy of more than passing consideration on the part of foreign countries. Though he has not yet reached the age when his life work may be said to be complete, he is able to see, in the status of Portland at the beginning of the twentieth century, a most optimistic outlook for her future greatness among the newer cities of the world.

Mr. Knapp was born in Geneva, Ashtabula county, Ohio, July 28, 1839. His father, Auren Knapp, and his grandfather, Caleb Knapp, the latter the founder of the family in Ohio, were natives of Sheffield, Conn. Auren Knapp was engaged in farming near Geneva for many years, but his death occurred in Clatsop county, Ore., in 1884, in which county he spent the latter years of his life in retirement. His wife, whose maiden name was Sarah M. Burrell, was born in Massachusetts, and of her four sons and three daughters all but one daughter attained maturity. Of the children two of the daughters never came west, and one of them, Mrs. Mary R. Higley, is still living in Ohio. Jabez B. Knapp, another son, who was born in Ohio, became a teacher in the south, crossed the plains in 1852, and engaged in general merchandise business in Portland in 1855. In 1870 he disposed of his mercantile interests here, and engaged in the lumber business at Knappton, at the mouth of the Columbia river. He finally retired to his dairy farm on the banks of that river, where his death occurred April 17, 1900, at the age of seventy-eight years and eight months. Fraternally he was a Mason. Kirk Knapp, the second oldest son, died in Ohio at the age of twenty years; while Auren, Jr., came to Oregon, via Panama, about 1868, and died while engaged in logging on the Columbia river.

After completing the course at the academy at Kingsville, Ohio, Richard B. Knapp removed to Grand Rapids, Wis., in 1858, and spent the winter of that year in the pineries of that state. In the spring of 1859 he started for Oregon, going by way of New York City, Panama and San Francisco. In July, 1859, soon after his arrival in Portland, he secured employment with the firm of Knapp & Hull, dealers in agricultural implements. In 1860 Mr. Hull retired from the business, and the firm became Knapp, Burrell & Co. In 1862 R. B. Knapp secured an interest. In those days they were obliged to bring their goods around the Horn, and one of the members of the firm went east each year to secure the needed supply. So successful did they become that they were enabled to establish branch stores in Oregon and Washington, and the house soon became well known throughout the western states. In the spring of 1870 J. B. Knapp retired from the business, which was continued by M. S. Burrell and R. B. Knapp until Mr. Burrell's death in 1885. R. B. Knapp then incorporated the concern afterward known as Knapp, Burrell & Company, which experienced an era of uninterrupted prosperity extending over a period of several years, establishing a reputation for enterprise and business integrity unexcelled throughout the entire west. Mr. Knapp is now retired from active business cares, although he still retains the presidency of the Baggage and Omnibus Transfer Company, of which he was the principal organizer and largest stockholder. From time to time he has been interested in various enterprises for the betterment of the community interests, and his sound business judgment, his keen insight into commercial affairs, and his resourcefulness are generally recognized.

In political faith Mr. Knapp is a Republican. He was a charter member of the Chamber of Commerce, the Commercial Club and the Arlington Club, from all of which he has since resigned. Fraternally he is associated with Willamette Lodge No. 2, A. F. & A. M., Portland Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., Oregon Consistory No. 1, A. & A., Scottish Rite, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S.

HON. ROBERT D. INMAN. The typical western man is popularly conceived as a man of liberal ideas, of generous and hospitable instincts, imbued with a spirit of adventurous enterprise, and withal hardy and courageous. He is not punctilious in minor questions of etiquette or inclined to make much of mere forms and ceremonies. He is a friend to his friends, a man of sterling integrity and of firmness of character developed by habits of self-reliance. Such men are the state builders whose names and deeds are a part of the history of the newer states of the American commonwealth. To this class belongs Hon. Robert D. Inman, who in spite of the disadvantages of youth and without the assistance of influential friends has risen to a position of affluence. A native of Ohio, Mr. Inman was born in Miami county, near Piqua, August 11, 1853, and is the oldest of the two sons and two daughters born to Asa and Lucinda (Kendall) Inman, natives of the Buckeye state, where the latter is still living. The family was established in America during the seventeenth century, the first emigrant from England presumably settling in Vermont, as the paternal grandfather was born in that state, and became a pioneer of Miami county, Ohio, and later engaged in farming near Marshalltown, Iowa. The paternal great-grandfather, Alab Inman, served his country in the Revolutionary war. Asa Inman was a natural mechanic and when a youth engaged in contracting and building, which occupation he followed all his life. During the Civil war he manifested his patriotism for his country by enlisting in the service and at the battle of Shiloh he fell while valiantly defending the stars and stripes. His wife reared the children in ways of usefulness and honor, and proved a veritable helpmate to her husband.

When but two years of age the parents of Hon. Robert D. Inman removed from Ohio to Iowa and settled near Marshalltown, where the family lived until the father enlisted in the Civil war. They then returned to Ohio, where young Inman attended the public schools as opportunity afforded, but in those days the youths were obliged to spend most of their time assisting the family in the struggle for a living, and at the age of eight Mr. Inman began his career as a tow-boy on the old Ohio canal. Various occupations engaged his attention until 1865, when he joined a large train of emigrants bound for the Pacific coast, under the leadership of William Davidson. The trip consumed seven months and its members were forced to endure many hardships. At Rock creek they were attacked by a party of Indians and six of the party were killed. Arriving in Oregon, Mr. Inman worked for a time on the farm of Mr. Davidson in Washington county, and in June, 1869, he located in Portland, where for a time he was employed by the west side road cutting ties. He next secured a position with the Oregon & California Railroad, serving his time from brakeman to fireman. After severing his connection with the railroad he became identified with the John Wilson circus, remaining with the exhibition for the following two years. A year was thereafter spent in the employ of G. W. Shaver, and in 1875 he entered the employ of the Willamette steam mills, and after being in the yards for a short time was promoted to a position in the machinist department, where he remained for the next seven years. During this time he developed a remarkable mechanical ability, which was probably inherited from his father, and later, when he became associated with the Northern Pacific Lumber Company as one-quarter owner and director, he was well qualified for the superintendency of the construction of the new mill and the placing of the machinery. In 1889 he resigned his directorship and sold his interests in this company, having been identified with the concern for seven years.

His next venture in the lumber industry, of which he was a thorough master, occurred in 1890, when, in partnership with Johan Poulsen, the Inman-Poulsen Lumber Company was incorporated with Mr. Inman as president and Mr. Poulsen as secretary and treasurer. The mills were constructed in 1889 and in 1890 was inaugurated a lumber business which has since developed into the largest in the state of Oregon, in fact the business transacted by this company is one of the largest on the Pacific coast, while the mill is considered to be the swiftest in the west.

Beginning with a capacity of thirty-five thousand feet of sawed lumber per day, the output has been increased to four hundred thousand per twenty-four hours, or one hundred million per year. The mills are equipped with large circular saws, planing apparatus, and sixteen hundred horsepower engine. The goods are shipped to all parts of the world, a large share going to the Orient. Three hundred and fifty hands are employed, and the enterprise is thus of great value as a commercial center, and a promoter of all around activity. To Mr. Inman is due the credit for a number of important patents, among them being a power set works for setting out the log on the carriage.

Aside from his connection with milling matters Mr. Inman is variously associated with business and social affairs in Portland. While always a very busy man, he has nevertheless found time to perform the duties falling to the lot of good citizenship and there is no man in Oregon more interested in the ship of state than Mr. Inman. At all times a staunch Democrat, he has been very active in promoting and supporting the interests of his party, and as a public servant has rendered altogether satisfactory service. In 1892 he was elected to the state legislature, serving in the session of 1893, and so well did he serve his constituents that in 1900 he was elected to the state senate on the Citizens' ticket, and during the session of 1901 was interested in several bills, including the street car vestibule bill, the bill regarding fees in county offices, and the Barber's Sunday closing bill. Recognizing his worth and ability his party called upon him to accept the nomination for the office of mayor of Portland, and unlike many, he resigned his position in the senate and in the election that followed was defeated by George Williams, probably the strongest man in the opposition party.

In addition to his other interests Mr. Inman is a director in the Merchants' National Bank, is also a member of the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce, while for six years he has served as water commissioner. Fraternally he is a member of the Masons, holding membership with Harmony Lodge No. 12, the Consistory, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is a member of the Hoo Hoo's, of which he served as state snark for two terms, and one term was on the supreme nine. He is also identified with the Portland Rowing Club, and the Commercial Club, and is a life member of the Multnomah Amateur Athletic Club. A few years ago he built the Al Kader, a small steamer which he uses as a pleasure boat, and which has the reputation of being the fastest boat of its kind in the northwest. In 1875 he was united in marriage with Miss Frances L. Guild, a native of Oregon, and a daughter of Peter Guild, who crossed the plains in 1847 and became the owner of a large tract of land, now within the city limits of the city of Portland. As a result of this union two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Inman, the oldest being Minnie Myrtle, while the younger is Ivy Frances.

Thus in brief outline we give to our readers and to history a sketch of a man, who in face of many obstacles, which at first seemed almost insurmountable, has climbed the ladder of success step by step, until today there is no man in Portland or in the state of Oregon, who is more universally respected. His life is a living illustration of what can be accomplished if one but has the perseverance. His motto has been "honesty and fairness to all," and with the natural business sagacity with which he seemed to be endowed, Mr. Inman has stopped at nothing. It is true that he owes much of his success to his wonderful mechanical talents and in that particular line he has few if any equals in the Pacific northwest, for to him is accorded the honor of being the greatest lumber-mill man the west has ever known. While Mr. Inman has spent many years before the public he is happiest when in the bosom of his family, where he is known as a loving husband and an indulgent father.

GEN. OWEN SUMMERS. About the early boyhood years of General Summers there was little to stimulate hope for the future or to indicate his possession of superior ability in military affairs. He was born in Brockville, Canada, June 13, 1850, and in infancy was taken to Chicago by his parents, John and Elizabeth Ann Summers, the former of whom engaged in the shoe business there. During the cholera epidemic of 1856 the father, mother and one daughter died of the disease, leaving four small children. Of these three are living: James, Mrs. J. C. Olds and Owen, all of Portland. The six-year-old boy, thus early orphaned, soon saw the dark side of life. His was no easy path to fortune. He was taken on a farm near Frankfort, Will county, Ill., where he worked early and late for his board and clothes. During a small part of the year he was permitted to attend a school held in a log building in the township where he lived.

In the spring of 1864 he went to La Center, Lee county, Ill., and while attending school there he and three schoolmates (of whom he was the youngest) left school to enlist for service in the Civil war. Going to Dixon he offered his services, but as he was only fourteen years of age, weighed only one hundred pounds, and in height stood only five feet and one inch, the enrolling officers were loath to accept him. The examining physician, too, refused to pass him, but the energetic, youthful volunteer was more than a match for them all. He secured the aid of a Pennsylvania Dutchman, who consented to become his guardian, and with the permission of this man the physician was prevailed upon to grant him a certificate. February 1, 1865, at Dixon, he was mustered into Company H, Third Illinois Cavalry, and joined his regiment immediately afterward in the eastern part of Mississippi, later serving in Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky and the Carolinas. After a number of skirmishes and cavalry dashes he was ordered to St. Louis, and, the war being now closed, was fitted out for an expedition against the Sioux in Minnesota and Dakota. At the close of that service he was mustered out December 11, 1865, and returned to Lee county, Ill., where he resumed farming.

In 1871 he went to Chicago. His recollections are most vivid of the exciting scenes connected with the great fire in that city. At the peril of his life, he not only saved his own family, but that of two others. The rebuilding of the city gave him considerable business as a contractor. In January, 1875, he came to Oregon, but after ten days in Portland, proceeded to San Francisco and from there returned to Chicago, where he spent six weeks. On his second return to San Francisco, he remained for two years and then spent six months in San Diego as a government contractor, after which he returned to San Francisco. Coming to Portland in January, 1879, he started a crockery store at No. 183 First street. Six months later the firm of Olds & Summers was formed, his partner being J. C. Olds, a brother-in-law. The firm dealt in crockery, both wholesale and retail, and became one of the largest concerns of the kind in the northwest. On losing their building by fire in 1886, they moved into a new building on Yamhill street, between First and Second. Later they returned to No. 183 First street and No. 23 Yamhill, where a three-story building had been erected, they occupying the ground floor and basement of the arcade. In 1890 they moved into and occupied the four-story building at Nos. 183-85 First street. In 1895 the partnership was dissolved, Mr. Olds entering a department store, and Mr. Summers continuing the business at the old place. A year later he moved to No. 157 Washington street and No. 111 Third street, where he continued in business. Meantime he received the appointment as United States appraiser of the port of Portland by the unanimous decision of the delegation from Oregon, and has since filled the position with characteristic intelligence and sagacity. In 1900 the crockery business was disposed of.

Though but a boy when serving in the Civil war, Mr. Summers had gained a thorough and practical knowledge of military affairs and this has been of aid to him in subsequent events. Through his energetic efforts a bill was formulated and passed by the legislature during the session of 1886, of which he was a member, by which the militia was organized into the National Guard of Oregon, consisting of three regiments. May 21, 1883, he organized a company of Veteran Guards, which was composed of ex-members of Civil war regiments, and of this he was chosen first lieutenant. After the reorganization of the military department of the state, in 1887, he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment, Oregon National Guard. Seven years later he was promoted to be colonel of the regiment. At the opening of the war with Spain all the National Guard troops of Oregon were ordered to Portland and consolidated, and with additional recruits formulated and constituted the Second Oregon, U. S. V., of which company Summers was given the command by Governor Lord. May 4, 1898, the regiment went into camp. On the 7th, organization of the field staff was made, constituting the date of the organization of the regiment. On the 24th of the same month the men set sail for the Philippines, this being the first expedition to leave the United States for war in a foreign country. June 1st they arrived at Honolulu; June 20th, entered the port of San Luis de Apra, island of Guam; June 21st, Companies A and D disembarked to effect the surrender of the islands; June 28th, sighted Luzon; June 30th, anchored in Manila bay off Cavite; July 1st and 2d, troops landed; August 12th, ordered to Manila; August 13th, received the surrender of fifteen thousand Spanish troops, inside the walled city; August 14th, removed to barracks Cuartel de Espana, Calle Victoria, Manila, Company F remaining as palace guard; January 11, 1899, regiment began to leave Cuartel; February 5th, battle of Manila, and insurgents driven from their trenches; February 6th, fighting all day along the line, and capture of the water works; February 10th, battle of Caloocan; February 15th, more than one hundred prisoners captured by Company A; February 24th, third battalion engaged at San Juan del Monte; March 3d, fighting at Santa Ana; March 5th, Company C engaged on Mariquina road; same day, Company K engaged near San Juan del Monte; March 6th, Company G and Hotchkiss battery engaged insurgents on Mariquina road; March 7th, G and K engaged enemy near Mariquina; March 10th, entire regiment ordered to prepare for the front; March 13th, advanced upon Guadalupe; March 14th, E and I crossed river and engaged enemy opposite Pasig, while B, D, L and M engaged from bluff overlooking Pasig; March 15th, E and I crossed river and engaged enemy one mile in advance of former position; March 18th, Company D sent to relief of Tagui; March 19th, B, D, E, I and L engaged in battle of Laguna de Bey; March 20th, regiment returned to Manila; March 22d, Company F and third battalion joined regiment; March 24th, marched to Caloocan; March 25th, battle of Malabon, captured seven lines of entrenchment; March 26th, entered village of Tinageros; April 11th, enemy attacked Marilac and Bocave camps; April 16th, attack on outposts east of Melinto; April 23d, cavalry engaged enemy north of Santa Maria; April 24th, Narzogara captured; April 25th, capture of Angot; May 1st, capture of San Rafael; May 3d, captured Baliuag; May 4th, captured Maasin; May 13th, captured San Miguel; May 17th, captured San Isidro; May 22d, telegram received ordering Oregon to Manila; May 23d, homeward bound; June 13th, first battalion embarked on Newport and third battalion on the Ohio; July 13th, reached San Francisco; August 7, 1899, mustered out. During its term of service the regiment had participated in forty-two engagements.

Among the many communications received by General Summers bearing testimony to his excellent service in the Philippines, he especially treasures the following:

“Col. O. Summers, Commanding 2d Oregon, U. S. V.:

“Sir—I desire to express to you in very strong terms my appreciation of the manner in which you and your regiment performed the very difficult and delicate duties of acting provost marshal and provost guard during the time immediately following the capitulation of Manila. It gives me much pride and pleasure on the eve of my departure to recall the way in which I have been supported by all of my troops, and the cheerful fortitude with which they have endured the hardships of the campaign.

“Very respectfully,

“WESLEY MERRITT,

“Major-General, U. S. A.

“June 12, 1899.

“Sir:

“Your regiment, having been relieved from my command for the purpose of proceeding to the United States for muster-out, gives me an opportunity of which I am glad to avail myself of expressing to you and to the officers and men of your regiment, my high appreciation of their gallant and faithful service while they have been under my command.

“While I am glad the regiment is to return to their homes, I regret to lose so many good soldiers. When your regiment came to my command their reputation as brave and gallant soldiers had preceded them. Since you have been with me our work has been constant, arduous and dangerous. I learned very soon to place implicit confidence in your energy, judgment and courage, and the gallantry and bravery of your men and officers. You have nobly earned the reputation of being among the best soldiers of the American army. In saying farewell to the regiment, I wish you Godspeed and all the good fortune and prosperity that may and should come to you.

(Signed)

"H. W. LAWTON,
" Major-General Volunteers.

"Candaba, May 23, 1899.

"Adjutant-General:

In view of the remarkable successful engagements of Maasin, Balac Bridge and San Isidro, participated in by the troops under Colonel Summers' immediate command, I recommend Colonel Summers for promotion to the grade of brigadier-general of volunteers. At least, I believe him entitled to the corresponding brevet. I make this recommendation in advance instead of in my final report on account of his relief from this command and the probability of immediate return to the United States. My report will contain recommendations of other officers.

"LAWTON,

"Col. Owen Summers, 2d Oregon Vol. Inf.:

"Sir—Your regiment is about to leave for home to be mustered out of the service of the United States, and I now desire to convey to you my high appreciation of the distinguished services of yourself and of the Second Volunteer Infantry. The skill, ability and courage with which you have fought your regiment is deserving the thanks of our countrymen; the bravery, determined courage, and gallant conduct of the officers and men of the Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry prove them worthy successors of the men who fought at Shiloh, at Gettysburg and in the Wilderness. Their gallant conduct during the recent campaign in Luzon has reflected credit upon the state from which they came.

"Very respectfully,

"LLOYD WHEATON,
" Brigadier-General U. S. V.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

"Whereas, The people of the state of Oregon, regardless of party affiliations, are desirous of expressing their deep feelings of gratitude and their admiration for the courage of the Oregon soldiers who have so nobly offered their lives in defense of helpless humanity in avenging the loss of the Maine, in behalf of civilization,

"Whereas, The hearts of some of our people are bleeding as the result of the loss by sickness or in battle of loved ones to them most dear; therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, the house concurring, That the congratulations, admiration and confidence of the people of the state of Oregon be and the same are hereby extended to the Oregon soldiers in the Philippines, and that the sympathy of the people be and is hereby extended to the mourning friends of the heroic dead;

"That the secretary of state be and he is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the commanding officer of the Oregon regiment at Manila, and that said officer be and he is hereby requested, upon receipt of such copy, to cause the same to be read to each company of his said regiment."

Adopted by the senate, February 6, 1899.

T. C. TAYLOR,

President of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house, February 6, 1899.

E. V. CARTER,

Speaker of the House.

The quality of the men who composed the Second Oregon was indicated by a brief order of General Wheaton at Melinto: "Orderly, overtake those Oregon grayhounds on the road to Polo and order them to Melinto. Go mounted or you will never catch them." When, after the victory at Malabon, General Wheaton was asked, "Where are your regulars?" he pointed to the Second Oregon, saying, "There are my regulars." They were more than once placed in positions where supreme courage was absolutely imperative, and never once did they falter or fall back. Their record is one of unstained honor.

On his return to Oregon General Summers was tendered the re-appointment as United States appraiser by the president, taking effect September 1, 1899. In addition he reorganized his business and incorporated the Summers & Prail Crockery Company, but in February, 1900, sold his interest and has since given his entire attention to his government position.

In Portland, July 23, 1880, he married Miss Clara T. Olds, who was born in Oregon, her parents having been pioneers of 1847. They are the parents of one son, Owen George Summers. Mrs. Summers is identified with the First Unitarian Church of Portland, the Native Daughters of Oregon and the Women's Relief Corps.

In politics General Summers has always been a Republican. He is a member of the Commercial Club, at one time was connected with the Knights of Pythias, and is now associated with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being past noble grand of the Portland Lodge. In 1871

he was made a Mason in Apollo Lodge, No. 642, in Chicago, and afterwards became a charter member of Columbia Lodge, No. 114, A. F. & A. M., of Portland. At one time he was honored with the position of commander of the George Wright Post, G. A. R., of Portland, and in 1886 he was elected department commander, serving one term. An indication of the esteem in which he is held is afforded by the fact that on his return from Manila, the citizens of Oregon presented him with a beautiful jeweled sword, in recognition of his meritorious service at the head of the Oregon boys.

GEN. CHARLES F. BEEBE. While the associations of General Beebe have been largely along the line of military affairs and particularly with the Oregon National Guard, he has had, nevertheless, an interesting career as a business man and is now identified with various movements of an important nature bearing upon the commercial progress of Portland. The family of which he is a member settled in New England during the colonial era. His grandfather, Silas Beebe, a native of Connecticut, was for years a sailing master and built and owned a number of vessels running out of the harbor of Mystic. It was in this seacoast town that Charles E., father of Charles F. Beebe, was born and reared, and from there he went to New York City in youth to enter upon a business life. From 1840 until his death, in 1892, he was extensively engaged as a tea merchant and importer, the firm of Beebe & Bro. being one of the oldest houses of its kind in the city. His wife was Jane B. Wade, born in Springfield, N. J., and deceased in 1891. Her father, Elias Wade, Jr., was a native of New Jersey and a wholesale grocer for some years. From 1865 until his death in 1878 he acted as managing partner for the large importing and shipping house of Grinnell, Minturn & Co., of No. 32 South street, New York.

In a family of four children all but one attained mature years. Of these William W., a graduate of Yale in 1873, became an attorney in New York City and later made his home in Colorado Springs, Colo., where he died. Another son, Alfred L., a graduate of the Columbia School of Mines in New York City, was for years assistant chemist of the New York Board of Health, but in 1898 came to Portland, where he has since resided. The third son, Charles F., was born and reared in New York City and in 1865 was graduated from Flushing Institute. Afterward he entered his father's office at No. 149 Front street, New York City, and later became a partner in the house of Beebe & Bro. On his withdrawal in 1879 he became interested with Henry M. Evans in the cotton brokerage business, under the firm name of Evans & Beebe. This partnership was dissolved in 1883, and during that year Mr. Beebe, with his brother-in-law, A. M. Sutton, came to the west to take the agency for Sutton & Co., of New York. On his arrival in Portland, in January, 1884, he opened a branch house, starting the business on the 1st of February, at No. 16 North Front street. In July of the same year Mr. Sutton established an agency in San Francisco, the two acting as western agents for the Dispatch line of clipper ships around the Horn from New York and Philadelphia. In connection with the Portland agency, a general ship chandlery business was conducted. During 1896 Sutton & Co. discontinued business in Portland, but Mr. Beebe, having become interested in the city and bound to its people by intimate ties of friendship, decided to remain. January 1, 1897, the Charles F. Beebe Company was incorporated with him as president, and the firm has since dealt in general supplies, imported pig iron and coke, and conducted a general shipping and commission business. The two-story building of the firm is on the northwest corner of First and Ankeny streets.

Besides being at the head of this important enterprise, Mr. Beebe is secretary of the Oregon Lime and Plaster Company, engaged in the manufacture of lime and plaster, with plant four miles from Huntington. On the organization of the Adamant Company he became a charter member and is now its secretary, the concern owning and operating a mill at the foot of Fourteenth street. Though not active in politics, he is a staunch Republican. In the Chamber of Commerce he was president one term, vice-president two terms, and has also served as a member of the board of trustees. The Arlington Club has honored him by election to official positions, while in the Commercial Club he has twice been elected to the presidency. In 1903 he was appointed by Mayor Williams a member of the Executive Board, under the new charter. Owing to his thorough military training he is serving on the committee having supervision of the police department. Of Presbyterian faith, he still has his membership in the Madison Square Church in New York.

In New York City occurred the marriage of General Beebe to Miss Emma Bowne, who was born at Flushing, Long Island, and received her education in Miss Porter's School at Farmington, N. Y. Her father, Simon R. Bowne, was a member of a very prominent Quaker family of Flushing. Born of her marriage are three sons, namely: Walter Bowne, secretary of the Charles F. Beebe Co.; Gerald E., a member of the class of 1904, Yale College; and Kenneth, a graduate of Portland Academy.

After seven and one-half years of service in the Seventh New York Regiment, Company H, beginning February 14, 1871, Mr. Beebe was honorably discharged in November of 1878. Immediately he was appointed aide-de-camp, with rank of first lieutenant, on the staff of Brig.-Gen. J. M. Varian, commander of the Second Brigade, New York National Guard. From time to time he was promoted until he was brigade-quartermaster, with the rank of captain. On the death of General Varian, the command of the regiment passed into the hands of Brig.-Gen. Louis Fitzgerald, and Captain Beebe was retained with a very few others. To him came the appointment as inspector of rifle practice, with the rank of major, which position he resigned in the fall of 1882. Soon afterward he was appointed assistant in the department of rifle practice, with his former rank of major, under Gen. Charles F. Robbins, inspector-general of rifle practice in New York, on the governor's staff. This office he held until coming to Oregon, when he resigned.

At the time of the reorganization of the National Guard of Oregon, in the spring of 1886, when Company K was organized in Portland. General Beebe was appointed second lieutenant, then first lieutenant, and three months later, when the company was permanently organized, was elected its captain, serving as such for a year. In July of 1887 he was elected colonel of the First Regiment, Oregon National Guard, on the organization of the full regiment. When in camp at Milton, Ore., in 1891, he was re-elected colonel. February 22, 1895, he was appointed and commissioned brigadier-general in command of the Oregon troops by Governor William P. Lord. At the expiration of his term of four years he was again chosen for this responsible position, under appointment from Governor T. T. Geer, and as such continues to the present writing. The Oregon troops comprise the following regiments: Third Infantry, O. N. G., in Portland; Fourth Infantry, O. N. G., comprising companies in the Willamette valley; First Separate Battalion, in Eastern Oregon; Light Battery Artillery, in Portland; troop of cavalry at Lebanon, and a signal corps at Corvallis. It is needless to state that General Beebe has accomplished much in behalf of the National Guard of Oregon, for this fact is known to all in the least familiar with the development of military affairs in this state, and due credit is given him for his thorough work in the development of the same. His connection with the militia in New York is held in remembrance through his life membership in the Seventh New York Regiment Veteran Association. It was in New York that he gained his accurate training in military tactics and the knowledge thus acquired has been invaluable to him since coming to the coast and has been instrumental in enabling him to bring the Oregon National Guard into a position among the foremost among similar organizations of the west.

FRED BICKEL. The word pioneer is distinctly applicable to that venerable citizen, Fred Bickel, who came to Oregon in 1853, and locating in Portland, materially assisted in the general upbuilding of the town. He started the first confectionery store and soda water manufactory here and has of late years been successfully engaged in the storage business. It is also to his credit to be enrolled among the soldiers who were destined to discipline the murderous and treacherous bands of Indians who infested the plains and were especially troublesome during the wars of 1854, 1855 and 1856. During that momentous period he volunteered in Company A, Oregon Volunteers, served in eastern Oregon, and was mustered out and honorably discharged during the summer of 1856. He participated in several skirmishes with the Indians in Walla Walla Valley, one of which lasted for four days.

In his general makeup Mr. Bickel embodies the most desirable of Teutonic traits, all of which have been fostered and developed by a careful early training and the subsequent necessity for looking out for himself. He was born in the town of Rodenburg, Germany, on the river Fulda, May 21, 1832, and is a son of George and Elizabeth Bickel, natives respectively of Rodenburg and Solz. George Bickel was a blacksmith up to the time of his retirement, and he brought his family to America about 1846, locating in St. Louis. Of the three children who attained maturity in his family, Fred is the second child and oldest son and the only one living. Like the majority of the German reared youths, Fred Bickel started out on his own responsibility at the age of fourteen, and upon landing in St. Louis, after an ocean voyage of fifty-three days, apprenticed himself to a confectioner for four years. At the expiration of two and a half years his employer died of cholera, and the youth thereafter worked for his employer's wife and her brother, Frank Dekum, assisted by another apprentice. Eventually he came to California with Mr. Dekum, the journey towards the coast being replete with many adventures. From New Orleans they sailed to Chagres, Panama, where they took a small boat up the river of that name to Corcona, the head of navigation. Thereafter they walked twenty-eight miles to Panama, where they were compelled to wait two weeks because all transportation opportunities were engaged in advance for about three months. The travelers managed to secure passage on the vessel Anna Smith, bound for Acapulco, which, however, was obliged to put into port because of shortage of water. Finally they got aboard the Golden Gate, bound for San Francisco, which city they reached after two months, about May 21, 1852.

In Shasta City, Cal., Mr. Bickel engaged in business with Mr. Dekum, but the latter removed from Shasta City to Portland in 1853. For some time Mr. Bickel assumed control of the confectionery shop left in his charge, but in May, 1853, it was burned to the ground, entailing considerable loss. Shortly afterward he came to San Francisco, whence he embarked on the Columbia for Portland, which he reached in June of that year. Here he entered into partnership with Mr. Dekum, under the firm name of Dekum & Bickel, confectioners, which was the first enterprise of the kind in the town, and was located for the time being between Stark and Washington streets. In 1856 he started the first soda manufactory in Portland, which he and Mr. Dekum ran for ten years, but which is now carried on by other parties. At the expiration of their relationship Mr. Dekum and Mr. Bickel had been connected for more than twenty years.

After going out of business with his old time partner Mr. Bickel was out of work for a time, but in 1883 built the large storage house which he has since managed, and which is 80x100 feet ground dimensions. The building is four stories in height, and the front contains two double stores. Mr. Bickel has also put up other stores and public buildings in Portland, and at the present time is a large holder of town real estate. He erected a block on Second street, between Ash and Ankeny, which is 150x112 feet ground dimensions, is two stories in height, and has eleven stores in front.

Through the marriage of Mr. Bickel and Catherine Karlskind, who was born in St. Clair county, Ill., near Belleville, five children have been born: Caroline Fredericka, and Louise, both of whom are living at home; George L., a strawberry rancher on Hood river, Ore.; Albert, a clerk in Portland; and Frederick, a collector in Portland. Mr. Bickel is a Republican in politics, but has never been induced to accept official recognition. He has been prominent before the public in various capacities, and to him is due the organization of several societies in which his countrymen feel particularly at home, among them being the Turn Verein and the German Aid Society. He is also a member of the Historical Society and the Oregon Pioneers' Association.

CAPT. J. C. AINSWORTH. The history of Oregon would be incomplete did it fail to give the life record of Capt. J. C. Ainsworth, who was for many years a well known factor in navigation and railway matters as well as a promoter of banking interests in the northwestern country. He was a son of John Commiger Ainsworth, who died when his son J. C. was seven or eight years of age. Captain Ainsworth was born in Springborough, Warren county, Ohio, June 6, 1822, and on the Mississippi river received his first lessons in the profession which afterward made him famous. On arriving at man's estate he was quickly promoted to the position of pilot and subsequently to that of master on a passenger steamer plying between St. Louis and upper river points. While in this service he first heard of the discovery of gold in California and the wonderful possibilities for labor and capital in that state. He accordingly journeyed to San Francisco in 1850, accompanied by the noted banker, William C. Ralston, and soon after his arrival on the Pacific coast he went to Oregon to take command of the Lot Whitcomb. His life in the northwest from this time until he retired, nearly thirty years afterward, was inseparably associated with marine pursuits, and to his thorough and practical knowledge of the business in all its details was due the marvelous success achieved by the great transportation company in which he was a leading spirit from the time of its inception until it was merged from the Oregon Steamship & Navigation Company into the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. He was president of the latter company until it was sold to the Villard syndicate in 1881, for $5,000,000. He built the Missouri Pacific Railroad through from California to the Sound, getting the engine into Puget Sound twenty-four hours before the expiration of a valuable land subsidy. This, too, he completed, furnishing the means from his own pocket. He started the Ainsworth National Bank in 1883, built the Ainsworth Block in 1881, at the corner of Third and Oak streets, and started the Central Bank of Oakland, Cal., acting as its president until his death. While Captain Ainsworth made for himself a reputation as a remarkable financier among the money kings on both sides of the continent, yet he always remained a firm friend of the laboring classes. Retrenchment with him did not commence with a reduction of salaries. "Give the boys good salaries," was a sentiment he always expressed, and "the boys," since grown gray, many of them in the service of less appreciative masters, will never forget the kind-hearted employer who appreciated good services and acknowledged the same in a substantial manner. As an indication of the regard in which Captain Ainsworth was held by the people of the upper country, from whom much of the revenue of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company was derived, an extract from an article published in The Dalles Inland Empire after the retirement of Captain Ainsworth, is herewith given: "He has been at all times a gentlemanly public servant, a faithful custodian of the interests of his fellow stockholders and the most equitable and merciful of employers. In fine, he has been a good friend to friends and a semi-foe to enemies. His broad sense of justice has made him the object of an almost filial degree of affection from his employes, and to his sagacity in making three voluntary reductions of freight rates without compulsion in five years' time, the growth and expansion of the Eastern Empire are largely attributable."

Captain Ainsworth's friendship for his early companion and friend, W. C. Ralston, lasted until the tragic death of Mr. Ralston, and in this connection the following story was told in the San Francisco Examiner: "When Captain Ainsworth and W. C. Ralston arrived in California they separated. Mr. Ralston remained in San Francisco, and engaged in the banking business with Eugene Kelly, while Captain Ainsworth went to Oregon and began steaming on the Willamette river. Each was successful, and one day Ainsworth saw a chance to increase his fortune if he could become possessed of $100,000. As he desired this amount very much he went to San Francisco and called on his old friend, W. C. Ralston, for assistance. The details of the plan were outlined and the required amount was promptly advanced on a sixty-day note. When Mr. Kelly returned from an eastern trip he looked over the affairs of the institution and noted the transaction. He was much displeased with the loan and insisted upon its immediate recall. Ralston defended his action warmly, but unsuccessfully, and some words passed between the partners. In the meantime Ainsworth had gone to Oregon, and the customary notice was delayed until the sailing of the next steamer. Ainsworth concluded the deal, cleared up something like $250,000, and started the borrowed money homeward within a few days, and the vessel which carried the recall passed the money on the way to the bank. This transaction so angered Ralston that he withdrew from the partnership and opened the Bank of California. Before retiring from the Oregon Steam Navigation Company Captain Ainsworth invested largely in real estate in Tacoma, and was prominently identified with the construction of the Northern Pacific Railway Company between the Columbia river and Puget Sound. In 1880 he removed to Oakland, Cal., where he became interested in local banking and subsequently exploited the famous watering place, Redondo Beach, expending nearly $3,000,000 in transforming it into one of the finest seaside resorts on the Pacific coast. Captain Ainsworth died at his home near Oakland, December 30, 1893, and few if any of the pioneers in the transportation business of the northwest have left a record which will prove more lasting or more creditable.

The second marriage of Captain Ainsworth occurred in San Francisco, the lady of his choice being Fannie Bobbitt, daughter of Gen. Edwin Burr Bobbitt, a graduate of West Point and chief of the Quartermaster Department, U. S. A. His son, Lawrence S. Bobbitt, is second in rank for chief of ordnance, stationed at Dover, N. J., and his son, Edwin B. Bobbitt, is a graduate of West Point and now a captain of ordnance stationed at Washington, D. C. Unto Capt. J. C. Ainsworth and his wife were born six children, five of whom are still living, two sons and three daughters. H. B. Ainsworth is manager of the Los Angeles & Redondo Railroad Company, of Los Angeles, Cal. J. C. Ainsworth, Jr., is represented in the following biographical sketch. The mother of this family survives her husband and resides in Portland. Captain Ainsworth was for years a very prominent Mason, and Ainsworth Lodge and Ainsworth Chapter, in Oregon, are named in his honor. He attained the thirty-third degree and was first Grand Master of Oregon and was for years active inspector-general of the supreme council of the Southern Jurisdiction in the state of Oregon, the highest post of honor possible of attainment in the state.

Captain Ainsworth was a man fitted by his excellent business qualities to take a leading part in the upbuilding and growth of a new country such as the northwest at the time he took up his abode here, and that he faithfully fulfilled every duty devolving upon him and carried forward to a successful completion whatever he undertook was a well known fact. Strict integrity and uprightness were salient features in his characteristics, and all who knew him regarded him with the highest honor and respect.

(For many of the facts contained in the preceding biography credit is due to Lewis & Dryden's History of the Pacific Northwest).

J. C. AINSWORTH. One of the leading and prominent business men of Portland is J. C. Ainsworth, who is active and energetic and takes a deep interest in everything pertaining to the commercial progress and general upbuilding of the state in which he lives. He is one of Portland's native sons, having been born in this city January 4, 1870, and is a son of Capt. J. C. and Fannie (Bobbitt) Ainsworth. He was graduated from the University of California in 1891, with the degree of Bachelor of Sciences. He then took a special course in electrical enginearing in the same institution, graduating in 1892 and receiving the degree of Master of Science from his alma mater. Subsequent to this he spent one year in the Central Bank of Oakland, Cal. In 1894 he came to Portland, Ore., and engaged in the banking business for himself, with the Ainsworth National Bank and acting as president of the same, which had a capital stock of $100,000. In 1902 he consolidated the Ainsworth National Bank with the United States National, under the name of the United States National Bank, the same having a capital stock of $250,000 and later increased it to $300,000. This is one of the strongest institutions on the coast. He was one of the incorporators of the Fidelity Trust Company Bank, of Tacoma, having a capital stock of $300,000, and in 1902 he succeeded Col. C. W. Griggs as president of the company. He is president of the Oregon Telephone & Telegraph Company, having a capitalization of $500,000, and is assistant secretary and treasurer of the Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Company, which institution has a capital of $15,000,000, and has lines extending from Mexico to Alaska with 150,000 subscribers. He is treasurer of the Portland Railway Company; director of the Portland Hotel Company, the Portland General Electric Company, the Portland Street Railway Company, the Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Company, the Los Angeles & Redondo Railway Company, Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and numerous others, including the Lewis and Clark Fair.

In Portland, June 26, 1901, J. C. Ainsworth was united in marriage with Miss Alice Heitshu, who was born in California. Mr. Ainsworth is a staunch Republican in his political views and is ex-president of the Arlington Club. His religious faith is indicated by his membership in the Presbyterian Church. Through his good business judgment he has not only gained for himself success in life, but his efforts have been of benefit in promoting the advancement and prosperity of the communities in which he has been financially interested. He is a wide-awake, capable man, quick to take advantage of a good business opportunity. A gentleman of fine presence, genial manner and handsome appearance, his good qualities win the regard of all with whom he comes in contact.

CAPT. JOSEPH A. SLADEN. Since his retirement from the active list of the army, in 1889, Captain Sladen has been a resident of Portland, where he was engaged for five years as special agent and adjuster for the German-American Insurance Company of New York. January 1, 1894, he was appointed clerk of the United States circuit court by Judge W. B.

Gilbert, circuit judge, which position he still occupies. He is also United States commissioner, to which position he was appointed by Judge C. B. Bellinger, United States district judge.

Captain Sladen was born in Rochdale, Lancashire, England, April 9, 1841, the youngest of four children, three boys and one girl. His father dying while he was very young, his family came to this country when he was about five years of age. They settled at Lowell, Mass., where he attended the public schools, and left the high school to enter the army at the outbreak of the Civil war. He enlisted in the Thirty-third Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and participated in the campaigns of the Army of the Potomac, including the famous battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. With the Eleventh and Twelfth corps he went west to the relief of Rosecrans at Chattanooga, and took part in the campaigns under General Sherman which resulted in the capture of Atlanta, and in the battles incident thereto. He was also in the March to the Sea, and the campaigns through the Carolinas, which ended in the battle of Bentonville, N. C. For distinguished gallantry at the battle of Resaca, Ga., he was awarded a congressional medal of honor, and in 1866 was brevetted a first lieutenant and captain in the regular army for distinguished gallantry at the battle of Jonesboro, which resulted in the downfall of Atlanta. In November, 1864, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Fourteenth United States Colored Infantry, and thereafter served till the close of the war as an aide upon the staff of Gen. O. O. Howard. He was appointed a second lieutenant in the Seventeenth United States Infantry March 27, 1866, and continued on duty as an aide to General Howard, remaining on duty in Washington, D. C., until 1874, when he accompanied that general to the department of the Columbia, with headquarters at Portland. He participated in the Indian wars in that department, that of the Nez Percés in 1877, and that of the Bannocks and Piutes in 1878. With the appointment of General Howard as superintendent of the United States Military Academy he accompanied that officer as adjutant general of that institution, and also accompanied him to the department of the Platte, at Omaha, when that general was ordered there in 1882.

In October, 1885, Captain Sladen was ordered on duty with his regiment, the Fourteenth United States Infantry, to which he had been transferred, at Vancouver Barracks, Wash., and served there as regimental quartermaster until promoted to the command of his company in 1888. April 8, 1889, he was retired from active service on account of the loss of his right leg, which had occurred in the line of duty. In 1891 he was elected commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for the department of Oregon, and served on several occasions as aide on the staff of the commander-in-chief of that organization. He is a member, and past commander of Lincoln-Garfield Post, G. A. R., and also a past commander of the Oregon Commandery of the military order of the Loyal Legion.

In Massachusetts Captain Sladen was united in marriage, in 1866, with Martha Frances Winchester, a native of Lowell, and of this union there have been born four children. Fred Winchester, who graduated from West Point in June, 1890, is now a captain in the army, and an instructor at the United States Military Academy, having been detailed at that institution after serving through the Philippine campaigns as an aide to Major-General Otis; Harry Stinson, a graduate of the Leland Stanford University, is now with the Portland General Electric Company; Frank Joseph, a graduate of Yale, class of 1902, is a student at the Johns Hopkins Medical College; and Caroline L. is the wife of Capt. John J. Bradley, of the Fourteenth United States Infantry.

Captain Sladen is prominent in Masonic circles. He was made a Mason in B. B. French Lodge, of Washington, D. C., in 1866, and was afterwards master of Mount Hood Lodge at Vancouver, Wash. He is a thirty-second degree Mason, and is identified with the Oregon Consistory, and El Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is a member of the First Baptist Church of Portland; a Republican in politics, and is socially a member of the Arlington Club. Although so long connected with affairs military, and every inch a soldier in bearing and general deportment, Captain Sladen possesses a geniality and good fellowship which have won him many and lasting friends, and he has evinced in his latter day undertakings shrewd business and executive ability.

WILLIAM FRAZIER. In the record of the life of a successful man there is always much of interest, and particularly is this true in the case of a man who is forced to begin the battle of life in extreme youth, unaided and penniless. No greater source of inspiration can be offered a young man of ambition than the example afforded by such a life in the maturity of its success.

The death of his parents when he was a mere child forced William Frazier to undertake the solution of the problem of self-support at a very early age, but the self-reliance thereby developed proved of incalculable benefit to him. Though the years of his youth were less free from care than those of most boys, the activities of his manhood doubtless have been more successful by reason of these very deprivations and hardships of boyhood. He was born in Shelik, near

Ross Shire, Scotland, September 15, 1851, and was the second of three sons. The oldest, Hector, died in Washington; the youngest, Collin, is engaged in farming in Grande Ronde Valley, Union county, Ore. His father, George Frazier, a ship carpenter by trade, was lost in a shipwreck off the coast of England, and subsequently the widowed mother brought the three sons to the United States, settling near Kawanee, Ill., where she died two years later.

When the family crossed the ocean William Frazier was a child of six years. For a time after their arrival in Illinois all went well, and he had the privilege of attending the country schools of Henry county, Ill., three winter terms. But with the death of his mother he was thrown upon his own resources. In 1863, at the age of twelve years, under the escort of his uncle, John McDonald, he crossed the plains to Oregon as a member of a party accompanying a train of one hundred wagons. At that time the Indians were particularly troublesome, and his party never would have reached the coast had it not been for a government escort of thirty-six mule teams and one hundred and fifty men under the command of Captain Crawford. The great cavalcade of emigrants and soldiers proved too formidable for the wandering bands of Indians to attack, and they were permitted to pursue their course unmolested. One of the wagon teams was driven by the twelve-year-old boy, who in many ways proved himself a useful companion for the older men. Soon after their arrival at the coast, his uncle settled upon a claim in Grande Ronde Valley where, at the age of eighty years, he still makes his home.

After three months with his uncle, Mr. Frazier went to Umatilla Landing, where he worked in a dry goods store for Mr. Case during the winter. In the spring he secured employment on a pack train from Umatilla to Boise City, Bannock, Albany and Placerville, Idaho, which occupation he followed for two years, riding the bell horse and acting as cook for the train. During the fall of 1865 he arrived in Portland, where he has since made his home. At first he followed any occupation that presented itself, and availed himself of such leisure as he could command in order that he might attend to his neglected schooling. For one winter he attended Portland Academy. In the spring of 1869 he bought an interest in a butcher shop in Portland, but after a year or more began to take contracts for the piles on the lower docks of the Willamette. This work consumed two years, during which time he cleared the neat sum of $10,000. A portion of his earnings he invested in a livery stable, which he conducted for three years and then sold. His next enterprise was with L. A. Goddard, under the firm name of Goddard & Frazier, the two conducting a large stable on Morrison and Second streets. In 1883 a three-story barn was built, 100x100, on Fifth and Taylor streets, and here he has since engaged in business, being with Mr. Goddard until 1897, and since then a member of the firm of Frazier & McLean. In addition to the renting of horses and vehicles, he has done a large business in buying and selling stock. At times he has brought in three carloads of horses from Chicago at once, these being sold principally to loggers and lumbermen. For twenty years he has supplied the government with horses, furnishing five thousand for the Manila campaign, and in all of his contracts with the government his work was conducted with sagacity and dispatch.

In Portland, in 1873, occurred the marriage of William Frazier and Margaret E. Long, who was born near this city, her father, Edward Long, having come from Ohio in 1847 and settled two miles from the city of Portland. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Frazier is Charles R. Frazier, who graduated from a business college and attended Leland Stanford University for two years, afterward acting as deputy county sheriff under his father. The Commercial Club and Riverside Driving Association number Mr. Frazier among their members. While he is not connected with any denomination, he is a contributor to the Baptist Church, with which his wife is identified. His fraternal connections include membership in the Woodmen of the World, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M.; Oregon Consistory No. 1, thirty-second degree; and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. The leading position he held in the Republican party, as well as among the citizens of his home town, led to his selection in 1896 for the office of county sheriff, and not only was he elected at that time, but in 1898 and 1900 he was honored by re-election, serving from July, 1896, to July, 1902, when he retired and did not enter the lists as a candidate. The qualities which he possesses qualified him for the duties of sheriff. With a robust mental and physical sturdiness, he was a terror to evil doers and law-breakers, and his several administrations won the commendation of the law-abiding element of the county. As a private citizen, as well as in his official capacity, he has won a large circle of friends and well-wishers, and has gained a deserved prominence in the city to which he came, unknown, many years ago.

HON. SOLOMON HIRSCH. The Pacific slope has furnished to the country many men of high intellectual attainments, who have distinguished themselves in the various fields of endeavor for which the American commonwealth has become noted during the past few decades. In the commercial world by far the great majority of these have been men who began life with no resources excepting their own industry and indomitable spirit. While the pioneers of the great west have been, as a rule, men born and reared in America, there also have been found, especially in the years following immediately after the first great rush to this country of wonderful opportunity, numerous conspicuous instances where rare successes have been the reward of diligent application on the part of those who have come from foreign shores to cast their lot with the ambitious sons of the east who have sought fame and fortune in this opulent region. The history of the operations of the early settlers on the coast has shown, however, that it has been men of force of character and determination only (with rare exceptions has this been true) to whom the greatest measure of success has come. The life record of the late Hon. Solomon Hirsch of Portland, ex-United States minister to Turkey, forms one of the most splendid illustrations of this obvious truth—that personal character and genuine worth count for more in the contest for supremacy in the liberal atmosphere of the west than in any other section of this free country, or in any other country in the world. Even so brief a résumé of the life services of Mr. Hirsch as it is possible to give in a volume of this character will be a source of inspiration to the young men of the future generations who start out on their careers no more amply equipped to fight the battle of life than he. The story, in the telling, sounds like a romance.

Born in Wurtemberg, Germany, March 25, 1839, he was a son of Samson Hirsch, a member of an old and respected family of that kingdom. There were five sons in the family who came to the Pacific coast. Leopold, who settled in Oregon as early as 1851, engaged in the mercantile business in Salem, and died in 1892. J. B. and Mayer were pioneers of 1853 in this state, and also followed mercantile pursuits in Salem, where the former died; the latter died in New York in 1875. Edward, who settled in Oregon in 1858, became a merchant in Salem, where he has also been prominently identified with public affairs. In 1878 he was elected state treasurer of Oregon, and upon the expiration of four years was re-elected to the office. Further honored by the people of his city, in 1890 he was chosen to represent them in the state senate. In 1898 he was appointed postmaster of Salem, an office which he fills at the present time.

The youngest of the five sons in the family, Solomon was fifteen years of age when, in 1854, he set sail from Havre for New York. After a voyage of forty-two days he arrived at his destination. Without any delay he secured work as a clerk in New York, and later was similarly employed in New Haven, Conn., and Rochester, N. H. Meantime, from his brothers, who had preceded him to Oregon, he received glowing reports of the prospects in the west, and determined to join them in this state. March 20, 1858, he took passage on the vessel Star of the West for Aspinwall, and after crossing the Isthmus, proceeded on the Golden Gate to San Francisco, where he made a short stop. From there he came to Portland, landing here in April, 1858. His objective point was Salem, but he soon moved to Dallas, where he opened a retail store, continuing there until 1861. A later location was Silverton, Marion county, where he conducted a mercantile business until the fall of 1864. Upon returning to Portland he became a partner of L. Fleischner and A. Schlüssel, under the firm title of L. Fleischner & Co., wholesale merchants occupying a store on Front street, between Stark and Oak streets. In 1875 the concern was consolidated with that owned by Jacob Mayer, and the name thereupon became Fleischner, Mayer & Co., under which style it operates at the present time. The members of the firm at the time of the death of Mr. Hirsch were: Solomon Hirsch, Isaac N. Fleischner, Marcus G. Fleischner, M. A. Mayer and Samuel Simon. The trade built up by this firm, as manufacturers and importers of dry goods and men's furnishings has extended into Washington, Idaho and Montana, besides reaching into every part of Oregon.

In fraternal relations Mr. Hirsch was a Mason, and the manner of his initiation into the order may testify to the great esteem in which he was held. Amongst the oldest prerogatives of a grand master of Masons, very rarely conferred or exercised, is the right of conferring the degree of Masonry without the usual scrutiny of the candidate by secret ballot. In the history of the order in the state of Oregon that prerogative has been exercised but once—in the case of Mr. Hirsch and Cyrus A. Dolph, who together, in 1902, were so distinguished, in the language of the craft being made Masons "at sight." The honor may be somewhat inexplicable to those not identified with the order. But Masons will understand that this compliment was a recognition of the honor, the probity, the character, the noble life, the high principles of the man thus welcomed into the greatest secret order the world has ever known.

The marriage of Mr. Hirsch took place in Portland, February 1, 1870, and united him with Josephine, daughter of Jacob Mayer, a native of New Orleans. There are four children in the family, namely: Ella, Sanford, Mai and Clementine.

The public service of Mr. Hirsch was as noteworthy as his private business career. As a member of the state legislature during the session of 1872 he assisted in electing United States Senator Mitchell. In 1874 he was chosen to represent his district in the state senate, and four years later was again elected to that office. Upon the expiration of his second term, in 1882, he was re-elected, and served up to and including the session of 1885. During his latter period of service he again gave his support to Mr. Mitchell; but failing to bring his candidate success, turned his support to J. N. Dolph, who was elected. During the session of 1880 he was honored by the election to the presidency of the senate. Upon the expiration of his third term he declined further renomination and returned to private life. Nevertheless a very large proportion of his fellow-citizens, and particularly the members of the Republican party, were not content to allow him to remain aloof from public affairs. In 1885 they brought his name before the people as a candidate for the United States senate. A few of the minority Republicans had their own candidate, but Mr. Hirsch was the choice of the majority of his party. When the matter was taken up by the legislative body of which he was at the time a member, he lacked but one vote of being elected. Had he cast that vote for himself, he would have gained a seat in the United States senate, but he was unwilling to do so and therefore lost the office. An occurrence so unusual was widely commented upon at the time and has never been forgotten. During his service as state senator he supported scores of important bills. Among these was an assignment law for the benefit of the poor (1878), to which he introduced an amendment giving it many features in common with the more recently adopted national bankruptcy law.

In 1888 Mr. Hirsch went abroad for the purpose of visiting Mr. Fleischner in Vienna. While there he was taken sick and went to Carlsbad for the benefit of the waters. While still taking a course of treatment, in 1889, he received a cablegram from the state department notifying him of his appointment as United States minister to Turkey. The appointment came without solicitation on his part, and naturally was an entire surprise. At first Mr. Hirsch felt constrained to decline on account of the condition of his health, but finally decided to accept upon receiving permission from the department to continue his treatment as long as necessary, and also permission to return home after the formal presentation of his letters of credence. In June, 1889, he went to Constantinople, where the Sultan granted him an audience for the presentation of his letters. Immediately afterward he returned to the United States, arranged his business affairs preparatory to an extended absence, and then, accompanied by his family, returned to Europe in October of the same year. He remained at his post until the summer of 1891, when he was granted leave of absence in order that he might return to the United States and tender his resignation. Arriving in Washington, he called upon President Harrison, but found the latter unwilling to accept his resignation. At the urgent request of the chief executive Mr. Hirsch withdrew his request to be relieved of the responsibilities of the office and returned to Turkey in December, 1891, with the understanding, however, that the next year his resignation would be accepted, as the death of his business partner in 1890 rendered his return to Portland desirable. Again, in October, 1892, he returned to Washington, and this time he was allowed to resign the post, as agreed upon, the president tendering him the most flattering acknowledgment of the valuable character of his services as minister plenipotentiary at a post of more than ordinary difficulty during a most critical period in the relations between the two countries. Not only was his work highly acceptable to the department of state, but the missionaries located in the various parts of the Ottoman Empire also tendered him the most cordial resolutions in recognition of his unselfish devotion to their welfare and interests. In 1897 President McKinley offered him the same post, or that of United States minister to Belgium, as preferred, but his business demanded his presence at home and he felt obliged to decline the honor.

While not himself seeking the honor, many of the most influential citizens of Oregon had looked forward to the nomination and election of Mr. Hirsch to the United States senate in 1903. Many of his warmest adherents predicted that nothing could have prevented his election; and this is now the generally accepted belief. It is but an echo of the best public opinion to record in this brief memoir of one of the most distinguished men of the Pacific slope, that the state of Oregon could have furnished no more capable, sincere or highly qualified man for the office; and that if he might have been spared to round out his useful life in this position, the state would have been represented at Washington by a gentleman possessed of such a broad knowledge of public affairs and the needs of the region he represented, as to make him the peer of the most distinguished members of that great body.

In the midst of private affairs of great magnitude and importance, and public services of an invaluable nature, Mr. Hirsch was not unmindful of the best interests of his home city. Through his unselfish labors as a member of the Chamber of Commerce, as president of Beth Israel Congregation, and as a life member of the Portland Library Association, he promoted local interests in the social, educational and religious world. The Republican party at all times had the benefit of his counsel and advice; and his services as chairman of the Republican Central Committee in 1882, and again in 1896, will be remembered as instrumental in perfecting the organization of the party on a basis which has made its operations in great political campaigns vastly more easy and successful. Chiefly as the result of his labors, the Republicans of Oregon elected a governor in 1882 for the first time in many years; and in the memorable campaign of 1896, when every possible obstacle in the way of Republican success was raised by the adherents of the free silver party, his management of the campaign was such as to save the state to his party. It has since been said by thoughtful party leaders that the same result probably would have been attained through no other management.

The career of this useful man of affairs and distinguished citizen of Portland was terminated by his death December 15, 1902. Among the many eulogistic editorial utterances following this sad event, we give place to the following from the Portland Labor Press, which is particularly felicitous as coming from the leaders of the great masses of laboring men of Portland, by whom Mr. Hirsch was regarded as a friend in all that the term implies:

"Mr. Hirsch, while a man of large affairs and one whose impress was felt in many ways and walks of life, has left behind him the universal respect and regard of our entire people. He was a large employer of labor, and his uniform justice and fairness in his relations as an employer won the confidence and guaranteed to his house the faithfulness of those dependent upon him for employment. The great factory of the Fleischer-Mayer Co., employing over three hundred people in the manufacture of men's garments, will live long after him as a monument to his enterprise and far-sightedness. While in the congested cities of the eastern states it is found necessary to enact the most stringent laws compelling rigid inspection of factories of this character, the Fleischer-Mayer plant is a recognized model for health, cleanliness and up-to-date hygienic and sanitary appointments. Could it be said that the future manufacturers would all be like Solomon Hirsch, Oregon would not need to burden her statutes with laws governing sweat-shop methods in the making of men's wear. The working people can rightly feel that in the death of this good man they have lost a true, tried and just friend, and their sympathies will go out to those closer and dearer, who mourn his loss."

At the services held in his memory at Temple Beth Israel on Sunday, January 4, 1903, a large concourse of his personal friends, including practically all the most prominent men in Portland and many people from the lowlier walks in life who esteemed it a high privilege to be able thus to honor the memory of one dearly beloved by all, were in attendance. Eulogistic addresses were delivered by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise and ex-Attorney-General George H. Williams, the present mayor of Portland. Dr. Wise's estimate of the character and services of Mr. Hirsch may be summed up briefly in the following excerpts from his address:

"Solomon Hirsch was a man of ideals. Man of affairs though he was, he did not permit himself to become the servant of his business, or the slave of his possessions. He remained master of himself and all that he possessed. Virtue he pursued, and knowledge high; with him the two were closely allied, for in his life to know was to do. Virtue he pursued from the beginning unto the end of his days, and knowledge high through all his busy, crowded life, with the ardor of a youthful lover.

"In the highest sense of the term he might be styled a self-made man, for he rose from very humble beginnings unto high place, with no aid from without, unaided save by Him of whose help and guidance his life was a grateful and pious acknowledgment. Self-made though he was, no one could have been further removed from the arrogance and boastfulness of the merely successful man who believes only in himself and in his own prowess; though self-made, he was God-fearing and God-revering.

"Solomon Hirsch proved his Americanism not only by the probity of his conduct in public life, which but served to make his personal character conspicuous, so that adapting the words of Theodore Parker 'his private character became a public force,' but especially in his resentment of the inhuman attitude of some European powers to his fellow-Jews. * * * The cry of the hounded Roumanian Jewish expatriate wrung that noble heart which bled for the sorrows and sufferings of his people.

"I would say that his love of the race and religious fellowship whence he was sprung rivaled his devotion to his adopted country. If rivalry there was between his attachment to his mother-faith and his loyalty to his fatherland, it was a rivalry that tended to deepen his attachment and strengthen his loyalty at one and the same time. So faithfully did he cherish the religion of his fathers that I have long thought that, if he was ambitious, it was because he hoped to serve his people by representing them honorably and worthily in public life. Eagerly he welcomed every opportunity to win and merit the world's respect for the Jew. * * * The religion he professed impelled him to nobility of action. Full as was his life of deeds and achievements, it was fullest of the little kindnesses and tendernesses and courtesies, the little and great benevolences which endeared him to his fellow-men. Disciple of the House of Israel unswervingly faithful, citizen of his adoptive country gratefully patriotic, settler of the northwest sternly honorable, if none of us can take his place, each of us can take pattern and inspiration from his life."

JOHN MILTON HODSON. The Hodson family are quite numerous, being represented in England, Canada and all the states and territories of the United States, particularly in the middle states. There are three forms of spelling the family patronymic: Hodgson (the old English form), Hodgkin, and Hodson, the latter being used by probably ninety per cent of the members of the family. The genealogy of the particular branch to which the subject of this article belongs is traced to Robert Hodgson, an officer in the English army, who served in Ireland from about 1645 to 1650. After the death of Robert, his children, two sons and a daughter, came to America, in 1660, the daughter and one of the sons locating in New York. The other son, George Hodgson, settled on Sassafras creek, in Susquehanna county, Pa., in which vicinity many of his descendants now reside. His son John lived and died upon the old homestead.

Robert Hodgson, the son of John, removed to North Carolina about 1750, settling near Guilford Courthouse, where he reared a large family, eight sons and two daughters. Nearly, if not quite, all of the latter about 1800 found homes in the then new territories of Ohio and Indiana. Jonathan Hodgson removed to Clinton county, Ohio, with his family in 1811, and there cleared out a large farm and reared a family of four sons and two daughters, all of whom were born in North Carolina, prior to the removal of the family to Ohio. Matthew Hodgson was born in North Carolina in 1795, and came with the family to Ohio, where in 1820 he was married to Hannah Hunt. About this date, by almost unanimous consent, at least ninety per cent of the Hodgson family dropped the letter "g" from the name, as in the pronunciation of the same it had always been considered a silent letter. Matthew Hodson, who was a farmer and wheelwright, continued to reside in Ohio until 1852, when he removed to Hancock county, Ind., his death occurring there in 1875. The Robert Hodgson who removed from Pennsylvania to North Carolina was a minister in the Society of Friends (Quakers) and nearly all of his descendants have adhered to the faith of that church. The family of Matthew Hodson consisted of two sons and three daughters. Asa H. Hodson removed from Indiana to Oregon in 1879, settling in McMinnville, where he engaged in the hardware business. His death occurred in 1889. His son, Orlando O. Hodson, continues the business established by his father and is meeting with success in his undertakings.

John Milton Hodson was born near New Vienna, Ohio, August 24, 1839, and removed with his parents to Hancock county, Ind., in 1852. The education which he received in the public schools of Ohio and Indiana was supplemented by a course in the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, and for several years he was engaged as teacher and superintendent in the schools of Indiana. In 1872 he engaged in the newspaper business as editor and joint proprietor of the Winchester (Ind.) Journal, but in 1880 he sold out and engaged in the orange business in Florida, following this for some time. Not being pleased with the conditions prevailing in that country, he returned to Indiana in 1881, and two years later removed to Oregon, locating in Lane county. He founded what was known as the Eugene Register, publishing the same until 1888. In 1890 he came to Portland as deputy collector of customs for the port of Portland, which position he held for three years, or until Cleveland's administration was inaugurated, when he resigned. For four years, dating from the fall of 1894, he was interested in the firm of Irwin-Hodson Co., printers and blank book manufacturers, as secretary and accountant. All through his busy life he has been engaged in buying, improving and selling real estate, which is his principal business at the present time.

October 17, 1861, Mr. Hodson was united in marriage with Martha A. Rawls, who passed to the spirit life in 1881, leaving a daughter, Gertrude. In 1883 he married Winona Coffin, a great-niece of the famous abolitionist, Addison Coffin. In 1865 Mr. Hodson was made a Mason in Golden Rule Lodge No. 16, of Knightstown, Ind., and was exalted a Royal Arch Mason and knighted in the bodies of Knightstown in 1870. Since coming to Oregon he has attained the thirty-third degree, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, being crowned an honorary inspector general of the Supreme Council of the southern jurisdiction, by Illustrious I. W. Pratt, in January, 1902. At this writing he is preceptor of Oregon Consistory No. 1. His official relations with the craft have been almost continuous since he was made a Mason, having served in nearly every station within the gift of his brethren. He is a past M. W. grand master, past M. E. grand high priest, past M. E. president of high priesthood, past M. Illustrious grand master of the Cryptic Rite, and past grand commander of Knights Templar of Oregon. He enjoys the distinction of being the only Mason who has passed the presiding chairs of all the grand bodies in the state. For a number of years he has been the writer of the reports on correspondence for the grand lodge, grand chapter and grand commandery. He is an earnest supporter of the principles and philosophies of the world's greatest fraternity, believing them the most profound and valuable of any human organization, and that their most perfect demonstration should be found in the daily life and conduct of its members.

HON. GEORGE W. BATES. To follow the career of George W. Bates from the time when, as a sturdy youth on his father's farm back in Lee county, Iowa, he worked and played beside the stream that sang its refreshing way through the meadows, and in which he oftentimes plunged to dissipate the noon-day heat, were to travel faster and with more accomplishable vigor than is either consistent or profitable to average mortals. Yet so seemingly exhaustless is the present vitality and resourcefulness of this intrepid promoter of western enterprises, so varied are his interests, and so splendid his grasp of the opportunities by which he is surrounded, that one is constrained to look forward rather than back, and to expect as well as appreciate.

Of Teutonic ancestry, Mr. Bates was born in Lee county, Iowa, November 21, 1851, and lived among the home surroundings until his seventeenth year. His father, Nicholas, was born in Germany, and came to America with the grand-father Bates, locating in Iowa when that part of the country was yet a territory. Nicholas farmed for many years in Iowa, but spent the last fifteen years of his life with his son, Hon. George W. He married Matilda Harris, a native of Illinois, and member of an old southern family. Mrs. Bates died in Iowa in 1868. Of her six children a daughter and three sons are living. Of these, one son, J. W., is a bridge-builder, at present operating near Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, and William is a resident of San Francisco.

At the age of seventeen George W. Bates started out upon an independent career, and from the bottom learned all about railroading and railroad building, finally completing his instruction with laying track and bridge building. In 1874 he identified himself with the San Francisco Pacific Bridge Company, and engaged in building bridges and docks, and was sent by the same company to Portland in 1880, intending to remain for three months. The business chances represented in this town appealed to his largeness of perception with considerable force, and in due time he found himself a part of the moving forces around him. He constructed the dock for William Reed in 1880, and while associated with A. S. Miller & Son contracted for building the bridges between Roseburg and Ashland, on the California & Oregon Railroad. He was associated with Lee Hoffman for eight years, or until 1890, and during that time put in piers and steel bridges all through Oregon. The bridge across the Columbia river at Pasco, most of the snow sheds and the bridge on the Cascade division, and many kindred constructions in different parts of the state, are due to his practical grasp of an enormously interesting and responsible occupation. However, building bridges required frequent absences from home, and often called for deprivations and exposures to extremely trying and inclement weather, so after contributing to an unusual degree to the promotion of bridge building in the state Mr. Bates decided to engage in some occupation more concentrated and less wearing.

With others similarly interested, Mr. Bates purchased the little water plant in Albina and organized the Albina Light and Water Company. From a very small beginning the plant was enlarged and modernized, and made to conform to the most pressing needs of this part of the city. An electric lighting system was introduced all over Albina and East Portland, for which valuable franchises were secured. In December, 1891, was begun a deal with the Portland General Electric Company, which was carried through in January, 1892, and by the terms of which the company disposed of their electric lighting business for $200,000. January 1, 1902, the water business was also sold for a like amount. When Mr. Bates first bought the water plant it was realizing $350 a month.

At the present time Mr. Bates is engaged in banking in Portland, and has under his supervision the Bank of Albina, incorporated in the spring of 1893; the Multnomah County Bank, and the Albina Savings Bank. During the panic of 1893, having plenty of money on hand from the sale of the water works, he used it to enable the Savings Bank to maintain its credit, and he also bought the other two banks. The banking business is incorporated under the firm name of George W. Bates & Co. He built his present bank building in 1896. Mr. Bates is also interested in the laundry business, and in 1894 incorporated the Union Laundry Company, of which he is president, and which is one of the largest laundry enterprises in the Northwest. The present building was erected in 1902 on the corner of Second and Columbia streets, has three floors, and is 60 x 100 feet ground dimensions. The Diamond Vitrified Brick Company, near Vancouver, is another enterprise in which Mr. Bates is interested, and of which he is president and a director. This is a very large plant, and its brick are shipped over all the country. For some years he owned the Parker Mill, and during that time organized the Albina Saw Mill Company, of which he became president, and managed to work up the affairs of the mill to a high standard. This plant was disposed of in 1899, in response to the more pressing demands upon the time of Mr. Bates.

As a Republican Mr. Bates has rendered the same kind of service to his party which has characterized his many business enterprises. He represented Multnomah county in the state senate during the sessions of 1897-99, and was appointed police commissioner by Mayor Frank, but resigned from the same. Mayor Mason also appointed him police commissioner, and he was appointed to the same office by Governor Geer upon the passage of the new charter. He is a member of the Commercial Club, and attends the Presbyterian Church, of which his wife is a member. Mrs. Bates was formerly Miss L. M. Menzies, who was born in Oregon, and whose father, Capt. James Menzies, owned a home near Sandy, and was a pioneer of that district. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bates, Lloyd, George W., Jr., and Bruce Adler.

MILTON W. SMITH. The success which has encouraged the efforts of Mr. Smith in the practice of law is another indication of the ability possessed by the native sons of Oregon. Born at Aurora, this state, July 15, 1855, he owes his education to our schools, where his keen natural gifts were broadened by contact with teachers of intelligence and superior ability as educators. In 1878 he received the degree of A. B. from Pacific University, one of the oldest institutions of the west, and three years later the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by his alma mater. Immediately after graduating he took up the study of law in the office of Judge Deady, of the United States district court, at Portland, and continued his readings until he was admitted to the bar in March of 1881. During August of the same year he established himself in practice and has since won his way to an eminent rank among the attorneys of his home city.

In addition to professional practice, Mr. Smith has officiated as treasurer and a director of the Portland Library Association since 1890, and at this writing is chairman of the book committee managing the library. Since 1894 he has acted as a director of the Multnomah Law Library and during all but three years of this time has been its president. Ever since his graduation he has maintained his interest in his alma mater and is keenly alive to the advantages offered to the young by this pioneer college. In his desire to promote its welfare, he accepted the position of secretary of its finance committee and a director of the university, which offices he now fills. At one time he held office as president of the Alumni Association. However, it is not higher education alone that commands his interest and enthusiastic allegiance. In the education of the little children, in seeing that their feet are planted in the right direction when they ascend the hill of learning, his interest is keen and constant. Indicative of this fact is his efficient service as vice-president of the Portland Free Kindergarten.

As a director Mr. Smith is connected with the Columbia & Northwestern Railroad, running from Lyle, Wash., to Klickitat, same state. The Arlington and University Clubs number him among their members, and he is also actively associated with the State Bar Association. His marriage, which was solemnized in Portland, united him with Alice Sweek, who was born in Oregon, her parents, John and Maria Sweek, having come from Missouri in 1852 and settled in the vicinity of Portland. Since the death of Mr. Sweek his widow has continued to make her home in the same locality. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Smith are Ruth, Josephine and Marion. As yet Mr. Smith has not identified himself closely with politics, though he is a firm believer in Republican principles. His inclinations are toward his profession rather than public life or political service. Keenly alive to the opportunities offered by the law, it has been his ambition to keep in touch with its progress and important decisions rendered bearing upon the people or the lands of Oregon. One of his leading characteristics has been conservatism, as opposed to the recklessness sometimes evinced by the enthusiastic and daring. This conservative spirit, however, is not a bar to progress, but leads him to the exercise of great caution in pronouncing opinions, so that a decision, when once given, is seldom changed, thus lending added weight to his counsel and advice on subjects pertaining to the law.

FRANK RIGLER. During a very early period in the settlement of Pennsylvania members of the Rigler family crossed the Atlantic from Germany and identified themselves with the pioneer families of William Penn's colony. When the Revolutionary war came on John Rigler enlisted in the colonial army and held rank as captain under "Mad" Anthony Wayne. Inspired by the example of his brother, the captain, Andrew Rigler, then a mere boy in years, offered himself to his country and went to the front to fight for independence. Little is known concerning Andrew Rigler, but it may be judged, from his faithful service in the army, that he was a man of courage and high patriotism. His son, Jacob, a lifelong resident of Pennsylvania, was by occupation a farmer, stock dealer and nurseryman, and died at eighty-four years of age.

Next in line of descent was Hon. Henry Rigler, who was born and reared in a suburb of Philadelphia, became a large stock dealer, and for a time served in the Pennsylvania legislature. Originally a Whig, on the disintegration of that party he allied himself with the Republicans. In religion he was a Presbyterian. At the time of his death, which occurred in Philadelphia in 1894, he was seventy-nine years of age. His wife, formerly Mary Castor, was born in Philadelphia and died there in 1901, when seventy-nine years of age. She was a member of an old Quaker family that settled in Pennsylvania with William Penn and was a daughter of a Mexican war soldier, who lost his life while taking part in the battle of Monterey.

In the family of Hon. Henry Rigler there were ten children, all of whom attained maturity, and five sons and three daughters are now living, Frank being the sixth in order of birth and the only member of the family on the Pacific coast. He was born in Philadelphia January 9, 1855, and as a boy lived in the parental home near Frankford arsenal, attending the Central high school, from which he was graduated in 1872. His first employment was in the city engineering department, after which he engaged in railroad engineering in Kansas for six months. On his return to the east, in 1875, he began to teach in Bucks county, four miles from Doylestown, where he continued for two and one-half years. His next position was that of vice-principal of the Boys' Grammar school in Philadelphia. After a year in that position he relinquished his work on account of throat trouble. Hoping that a change of climate might prove beneficial, in January, 1879, he came to the coast, settling in Polk county, Ore., where he taught at Buena Vista a short time and then became principal of the Independence school. In 1882 he was elected superintendent of schools of Polk county and for a term filled that position with marked ability. On retiring from office he became superintendent of the Walla Walla schools, where he remained for eighteen months. From there, in December, 1885, he came to Portland as principal of the Park school, where he remained until the expiration of the school year of 1887-88. Leaving Portland, he accepted a position as superintendent of the Oregon City schools, where he remained until 1891. On his return to Portland he accepted the principalship of the Harrison street school, and continued in that capacity until June of 1894, when he was chosen principal of the high school.

An acceptable service of two years in the high school was followed by Professor Rigler's election as city superintendent of schools in June, 1896, and he has since devoted his time and thought to the discharge of his duties. Under his supervision there are thirty school buildings, with three hundred and twenty teachers and an enrollment of thirteen thousand and three hundred pupils. The oversight of so many teachers and pupils is no slight responsibility, yet it is one that he has ably maintained, and through his acceptable service he has won the confidence of those best adapted to estimate judicious and systematic educational work. He is interested in the National Educational Association, has been a member of its National Council, and was formerly a director for Oregon in the organization. Almost continuously since 1882 he has been a member of the state board of examiners of teachers. The State Teachers' Association numbers him among its leading workers, and in the office of president, which at one time he held, he was enabled to materially promote the welfare and success of this body. His interest in educational matters extends into institute work, and as an instructor in county institutes he is favorably known throughout the state, into all parts of which he has gone to aid in bringing before the teachers plans of vital importance for the prosperity of our public schools. For a number of years he served as president of the Schoolmasters' Club, in which he was a charter member. Owing to the nature of his profession and its constant tax upon his mental and physical powers, he has not identified himself with political affairs, in which indeed he has taken no part whatever aside from casting a Republican vote at local and general elections.

During his residence in Walla Walla, in 1884, Professor Rigler married Lena Koehler, who was born in Iowa, and is a graduate of the Cedar Falls Normal School in that state. Born of their marriage are two children, named Evelyn S. and Howard.

JOHN MARION LEWIS. In John M. Lewis, treasurer of Multnomah county, we find a native of the state who has given abundant evidence of the possession of the qualities essential to a trustworthy, capable and thoroughly safe servant of the public. He traces his lineage back to old families of Virginia and Tennessee. His paternal great-grandfather, Fielding, was born in the Old Dominion in 1767, but at an early age removed to North Carolina and from thence to East Tennessee, where the grandfather, also named Fielding, was born in 1811. Some time prior to the year 1830 the latter removed to Wabash county, Ill., and thence to Missouri, and finally came to Oregon in 1852. The family, which included his son, James P.

Lewis, father of John M., started across the plains with an ox-team in the early summer of 1852, and were six months in reaching their destination, a point near Brownsville, Linn county, Ore. They crossed the Snake river at a point near the site of Huntington, followed the general course of that river down to its junction with the Columbia, thence down the Columbia valley to the mouth of the Willamette, and thence up the Willamette to Linn county. The voyage, at the best fraught with peril, was in this case characterized by peculiarly sad features. Moun-tain fever and cholera broke out in the party, and the bodies of four of the family were left in graves along the route, victims of the ravages of these maladies. Lucinda (Moore) Lewis, wife of Fielding Lewis, died on the banks of Snake river near Birch creek; Charles Wesley, a son, died on Burnt river; Marion died at the Upper Cascades, and Mary Ellen died on the Oregon side of the river opposite Vancouver barracks.

Upon his arrival in Oregon James P. Lewis entered land in the forest, which he at once began to clear and improve for a home for his family. Subsequently he removed to Althouse, Josephine county, where he purchased a farm upon which he still resides and where for two terms he served as county assessor. November 29, 1853, he was united in marriage to Tennessee T. Tycer, the ceremony being performed by the Rev. H. H. Spalding, who came to Oregon with Dr. Marcus Whitman in 1836. Tennessee T. Tycer was born in Linn county, Mo., a daughter of Lewis Tycer, a native of Nashville, Tenn., and an early settler of Linn county, Mo. The family of the latter came either from Virginia or North Carolina, and was of French descent. Lewis Tycer settled in Oregon in 1853, crossing the plains with his family. The house which he erected near Brownsville after abandoning his original cabin home, and in which he died at the age of seventy-seven years, is still standing.

Of the nine children born to James P. and Tennessee (Tycer) Lewis, three sons and three daughters are now living. George W. is sheriff of Josephine county, and James E. is a farmer in that county. John M. Lewis, the subject of this sketch, was born in Linn county, Ore., September 20, 1855. Until 1872 that county was his home, but in that year he accompanied the family to Josephine county, attending the common schools and aiding in the duties of the farm during the summer, and later on engaging to some extent in mining during the winter. In 1881 he arrived in Portland, and at once set about to improve his education. In 1882, after taking a course in the Portland Business College, he secured a position in the government employ, having charge of the mailing division in the Portland postoffice under Postmaster George A. Steel for about three years. When a Democratic official, C. W. Roby, assumed charge of the office, Mr. Lewis continued to fill his post for eighteen months, or until he found it necessary to retire on account of the inroads upon his health caused by the confining nature of his work. For three years after relinquishing his position in the postal service he was in the employ of the H. R. Duniway Lumber Company in East Portland as lumber inspector. From 1888 to 1890 he was a member of the city council of East Portland. In the latter year President Harrison appointed him postmaster of East Portland, a post he filled until the consolidation of the cities of Portland and East Portland, when the office was discontinued. Later he was made superintendent of Station A, which was established in place of the old office in East Portland, and filled the place under Postmaster Steel until the close of the latter's second term. In 1894 he entered the county treasurer's office as deputy treasurer under A. W. Lambert, holding the position two years; and was then reappointed to the same office by Ralph W. Hoyt, serving for four years more. This was followed by his nomination and election to the office of county treasurer, the duties of which he assumed July 7, 1902, for a term of two years.

In Portland, May 1, 1883, occurred the marriage of Mr. Lewis and Ella M. McPherson, a native of Linn county, Ore., and a daughter of W. A. McPherson. The latter settled in this state about 1850, and at one time filled the office of state printer. His death occurred in 1891. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, one of whom, Herbert Wayne, died at the age of two years. Those living are Edith, Ione and Wade Vernon. In the Cumberland Presbyterian Church Mr. Lewis is a ruling elder, and is also a teacher in the Sunday school connected with that society. In his political views he is a staunch Republican. Fraternally he is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Woodmen of the World. He was also a charter member of Abernethy's Cabin No. 1, Native Sons of Oregon.

Mr. Lewis belongs to the class of men who have shown by their unselfish interest in public affairs that they are warmly devoted to the promotion of those movements whose tendency is to help to give Oregon rank among the most progressive, prosperous and inviting commonwealths of the Union. His public spirit has been abundantly manifested on many occasions, and the fact that Oregon is the state of his nativity undoubtedly explains, in a measure, the extreme heartiness of his desire to co-operate with others, on all possible occasions, in advancing the material interests of the state and the community in which he makes his home.

CYRUS A. DOLPH. The genealogy of the Dolph family in America is traced to Balthazar De Wolf, who was born about 1620, resided for some years in Wethersfield, Conn., but removed to Lyme, that state, in 1664. By his wife, Alice, whom he married in 1645, he had six children. The oldest of the family, Edward, was born in 1646 and died in 1712, after having been a life-long resident of Lyme. By his wife, Rebecca, Edward De Wolf had four sons, viz.: Simon, born in 1671; Charles, 1673; Benjamin, 1675; and Edward, Jr. The line of descent is traced through the second son, Charles, who spent the active years of his life in Middletown, Conn., and died there in 1731. His wife, Prudence, died ten years after his demise. Their son, Joseph De Wolf, born in 1717, lost his life in the battle of Louisburg, 1757, while fighting in the colonial army during the French and Indian wars. By the marriage of Joseph De Wolf and Tabitha Johnson there was born a son, Abda, through whom the line of descent is traced. Inheriting the patriotic spirit of his father, Abda enlisted in the French and Indian wars and later, when war was declared with England, showed his zeal for liberty and independence by serving in Colonel Whiting's Albany county regiment, New York troops. At the time of the conflict with the French his sympathies being with the English, he and a number of his cousins decided to Anglicize their family name by changing it to Dolph. This was the origin of the present mode of spelling.

The marriage of Abda Dolph united him with Mary, daughter of Nathaniel and Ruth Coleman, of New Haven, Conn. Their son, Joseph, was born in Fairfield, Conn., June 6, 1767, engaged during his active life as a teacher and surveyor, and died December 21, 1827. The lady whom he married, Elizabeth Norton (born 1772, died 1839), was a daughter of Joseph and Martha Norton, the latter in turn a daughter of Jabez and Elizabeth (Allen) Norton. Both Joseph and Martha Norton were descended from Nicholas Norton, of Weymouth, Mass. (1636-60). During much of his life he made his home at Edgartown, on Martha's Vineyard. It is said that of the thirteen hundred and fifty-six inhabitants of Edgartown in 1790, one hundred and seventy-four of these were Nortons. Probably as many others were descendants of Nicholas in the female line, making three hundred and forty-eight descendants in the one hundred and thirty years. The progenitor of the family, Nicholas Norton, by his wife, Elizabeth, had a son, Benjamin, whose son, Nicholas, married Martha Daggett, and their son, Jabez Norton, was the father of Mrs. Elizabeth (Norton) Dolph. Little is known concerning the first Nicholas, except that he was born in 1610, and died in 1690, after having for years made his home at Weymouth and then at Edgartown. Mention has been made of one of the Norton descendants, who married a member of the Daggett family. This family traced its lineage to John Daggett, of Weymouth, who died in 1642. By the marriage of John Daggett to Bathsheba Pratt, there was a son, Thomas, who married Hannah Mayhew, and their son, Joshua, married Hannah Norton, daughter of Isaac and Ruth Norton. Joshua and Hannah Norton had a daughter, Martha, previously mentioned as the wife of Nicholas Norton.

Through the wife of Thomas Daggett the family is brought into relationship with the Mayhew family, of colonial fame. The founder of this family in America, Thomas Mayhew, was born in England in March of 1592. In 1641 he obtained a grant of Martha's Vineyard and the neighboring islands, and the next year settled at Edgartown, whose inhabitants were then Indians. With him came a few Englishmen and they in turn were joined by others from their native land. However, the population still consisted almost wholly of Indians. During King Philip's war, when the savages became hostile and killed the white settlers all over New England, such was the influence of Thomas Mayhew over the red men of his islands that they remained quiet and peaceful, though they might easily have killed the few white men, had they so desired. After a long and honorable service as governor of the island, Thomas Mayhew died in March of 1682. His son, Thomas, was a missionary to the Indians, and so greatly beloved by them that even many years after he perished at sea in a shipwreck he was seldom named by them without tears. Other members of the family also became prominent, especially Experience (born 1673, died 1758), Zachariah (1717-1806) and Jonathan (1720-1766), the last-named distinguished as a theologian and patriot.

The genealogy is traced from Joseph and Elizabeth (Norton) Dolph to their son, Chester V. Dolph, who was born at Whitehall, N. Y., on Lake Champlain, February 14, 1812, and died November 3, 1869. His wife was Elizabeth V. Steele (born 1813, died 1884), whose parents were William Steele (1785-1868) and Rachel Vanderbilt (1795-1883). William Steele was a son of John B. and Grace Seville (Brown) Steele. Rachel Vanderbilt was a daughter of Cornelius and Elizabeth (Rodman) Vanderbilt, her father being a member of one of the most noted pioneer families of Staten Island, in New York.

In the family of Chester V. Dolph were four sons, namely: Joseph Norton, deceased, late United States senator from Oregon; Cyrus Abda, the subject of this narrative; and William V., who is living at the old home in New York, and John Mathew, an educator of note now living at Port Jervis, N. Y. Cyrus Abda Dolph was born on his father's farm near Havana, Chemung (now Schuyler) county, N. Y., September 27, 1840. The name of Abda was given him in honor of his forefather, Abda Dolph, who was born in Bolton, Mass., in 1740, and served with distinction during the Revolution, as did also a brother, Charles, to whom congress voted the thanks of the country for military services. As a boy Cyrus A. Dolph assisted in the work of the farm during the summer and attended the village school during the winter. At the age of eighteen he began to teach school, which occupation he followed from 1859 to 1862.

During the progress of the Civil war the Indians on the western plains took advantage of the disturbed condition of the country to harass emigrants seeking to settle in the west. So serious did the condition become that congress, during its session of 1861-62, made an appropriation to provide military escort for emigrants crossing the plains to Oregon. In the spring of 1862 the two brothers, Joseph Norton and Cyrus Abda Dolph, enlisted in a company known as the Oregon Escort and assisted in bringing a train of immigrants across the country to Oregon and Washington, after which they received an honorable discharge at Walla Walla, and thence came to Portland. In 1866 he was admitted to the bar and took up active practice of the law. Ever since then he has ranked among the leading professional men of Portland. In June, 1869, without solicitation on his part, the Republicans nominated him as city attorney, and he was elected by a large majority, serving the full term of two years. During a temporary absence from the city, in 1874, he was nominated by the Republicans for the state legislature, but declined the honor, as he did two years later, when the nomination for the state senate was tendered him. In 1891 he was urged to accept the appointment of circuit judge of the northern judicial district and was unanimously endorsed by the best citizens of the northwest. However, feeling that an acceptance of the high honor would mean a life work and thus interfere with other plans, he declined the position. Notwithstanding his refusal to accept official positions, he is a staunch Republican and always gives his support to the men and measures of the party. For many years he was a member of the water works committee, and at this writing he is regent of the University of Oregon and president of the board of trustees of the Portland

Library Association. Associated with a number of other citizens, he organized the Security Savings and Trust Company, of which Hon. H. W. Corbett was president up to the time of his death.

Nor do the movements and organizations hitherto mentioned represent the limit of Mr. Dolph's activities. He was one of the founders of the Portland Savings Bank and the Commercial National Bank of Portland. For some years he has held the office of president of the Northern Pacific Terminal Company of Oregon, and has also been financially interested in the Oregon Improvement Company. Besides acting for years as a director of the Oregon & California Railroad Company, in 1883-84 he was retained as general attorney for the corporation. From 1883 to 1889 he was a member of the directorate of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. In 1883 Henry Villard, then president of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, selected Mr. Dolph as general attorney of the first-named corporation and consulting attorney in Oregon for the latter company. These positions he has filled with efficiency and in a manner indicative of his high legal talent. The many important and intricate questions that have arisen in relation to these two great concerns he has handled with dispatch and decision, disposing of them to the entire satisfaction of the officers and stockholders of the companies.

June 24, 1874, Mr. Dolph married Eliza Cardinell, a native of Canada, and daughter of Charles Cardinell, of French-Huguenot ancestry. They became the parents of four children, namely: Joseph N., Hazel Mills, William Vanderbilt and John Mathew Dolph.

Beginning in law practice in Portland, Mr. Dolph has since continued professional practice in this city, where, at different times, he has been associated as partner with a number of the brightest minds connected with the bar of this city and state. In 1883 he became the senior member of the firm of Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon. Ten years later the title was changed to Dolph, Mallory, Simon & Guerin, the other members of the firm being Rufus Mallory, Hon. Joseph Simon and John M. Guerin, all men of note, distinguished in the annals of the law in their home city and state, and forming, in their association, a partnership of legal talent of exceptional strength, character and ability.

HON. JOSEPH NORTON DOLPH. The life which this narrative sketches began near Watkins, N. Y., at a village then known as Dolphsburg, October 19, 1839, and came to a close in Portland, Ore., March 10, 1896. (See preceding sketch for the genealogy of the Dolph family). The intervening years represent a period of great activity and high honors. Into the life of the boy at an early age there came high aspirations for the future, and these ambitions were associated with the west, in which he had become interested through reading in the New York Tribune Fremont's "Military Expedition to the Pacific Coast," Washington Irving's "Astoria," and Dr. Elijah White's account of missionary life in Oregon. The way did not at once open for him to seek a home in the northwest, and meantime, at the age of eighteen, he began to teach school, which occupation he followed for eight years. His leisure hours were devoted to the study of law with Hon. Jeremiah McGuire at Havana, N. Y., and in 1861 he received admission to the bar.

The hoped-for opportunity to locate in the west came in the spring of 1862, when he and his brother enlisted in Captain Crawford's Company, known as the Oregon Escort, raised under an act of congress (1861-62) for the purpose of protecting the immigration of that year against hostile Indians. As orderly sergeant of this company he crossed the plains, receiving an honorable discharge at Walla Walla, Wash. His service during the expedition was so satisfactory that the following year, when the same captain was again detailed to accompany an expedition of similar character, he endeavored to secure the services of his former orderly, but the latter had other plans in view, and so declined.

In the spring of 1863 Mr. Dolph formed a partnership with John H. Mitchell, which continued until the latter was elected to the United States senate. Meantime, in October of 1864, Mr. Dolph was elected city attorney. He prepared and proposed important amendments to the city charter, which were afterward adopted, and he also revised for publication the ordinances of the city. In January of 1865 President Lincoln appointed him United States district attorney for the district of Oregon, and this position he held until 1866, when he resigned it to take his seat in the state senate. During the session of 1866 he served in that body, again taking the seat in the session of 1868, but a contest arising he was deposed by a strict party vote. However, the confidence maintained in his ability by the people was exhibited in 1872, when he was returned to the senate by an increased majority, after which he rendered efficient service in the two succeeding sessions. A still higher, though strictly party, honor came to him in 1866, when he was chosen chairman of the state Republican central committee, and his service of two years in that capacity proved beyond a doubt that he was one of the greatest leaders of his party in the northwest. Not only was he an eloquent advocate of party principles, but was also a man of remarkable executive ability, thus admirably qualified to direct the functions of an important committee. Perhaps no service rendered his party was greater than that in connection with the meeting of the electoral college at Salem in 1876. After Governor Grover had given the certificates of election to Cronin, Mr. Dolph advised the course adopted by the Republican electors, and on the spot drafted the papers which were by the electoral commission adjudged sufficient to establish the election of Messrs. Odell, Cartwright and Watts. Thus the papers drafted by him secured the return of Dr. Watts as Republican elector and thereby decided the vote of Oregon in favor of Rutherford B. Hayes for president.

During the early days of Mr. Dolph's experience as an attorney he acted as counsel for the Oregon & Central and the Oregon & California Railroad Companies, and also as counsel for Ben Halliday, who was then running his steamships from Portland to San Francisco, and was also constructing the Oregon & California Railroad. When Mr. Mitchell was elected to the United States senate in 1872 he retired from the firm, and thereupon Mr. Dolph took into the firm as partners Judge E. C. Bronaugh, C. A. Dolph and Joseph Simon. For some years he was retained as attorney for the Oregon Steamship Company, the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, the Oregon Improvement Company, the Oregon Transcontinental Company, and other corporations organized by Henry Villard, whose name is so indissolubly associated with the development of the northwest coast. He was also the adviser of the officers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company at Portland, attorney for various minor corporations, also president of the Oregon Improvement Company, and vice-president of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Oregon Transcontinental Company.

The highest honor of Mr. Dolph's life came to him in 1883, when he was chosen to succeed Hon. Lafayette Grover, Democrat, in the United States senate. Assuming the duties of his position, he was at once placed on the committee on public lands and claims. In 1886 he was chosen chairman of the committee on coast defenses. The committee on commerce also received the benefit of his wide experience. Measures presented by him in the interests of navigation have become laws and have proved invaluable in the development of our country's maritime interests. As a member of the committee on foreign relations, he also proved himself an astute statesman. In 1889, at the expiration of his first term, he was elected to succeed himself, without opposition, by the two legislative houses, and during his second term held practically the same committee relations as during the first. In every respect he proved himself a patriot and an able statesman, and his retirement from the senate in 1895 was a source of regret to his colleagues in that body, as well as to the people of his home state. During the twelve years of his official service he made his home in Washington, where he and his wife (formerly Augusta E. Mulkey) entertained on a liberal scale and with the greatest hospitality, extending a hearty welcome not only to people of that city, but to visiting friends from the Pacific coast. Since his death, Mrs. Dolph has continued to make her home in Washington.

In closing this résumé of Senator Dolph's career, mention should be made of his fraternal relations. In 1876 he was elected Most Worthy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F., State of Oregon, which position he filled for one year. Nor was his identification with Masonry less conspicuous, for in that body he was, in 1882, elected Most Worshipful Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Oregon, and in this office he showed the same tact, executive ability and wise judgment characteristic of him in other positions. In physique Senator Dolph was stalwart, of imposing appearance, grave in demeanor and earnest in expression, which physical attributes were but the outward expression of high mental qualifications and unsullied honor.

GEORGE WASHINGTON SHAVER. One of those to whom the finding of gold on the coast opened up vistas of vast possibility was George Washington Shaver, erstwhile farmer, who crossed the plains in a party with ox teams and wagons in 1849, intent upon wresting from the earth sufficient riches to enable him to carry out many ambitious projects. He was born in Campbell county, Ky., March 2, 1832, and in the southern state received as fair an education as his father's many responsibilities permitted. While still a young man he removed to Missouri, and while here became enthusiastic on the subject of the coast.

That Mr. Shaver was successful in life was due partially to his failure as a miner, else he had remained longer than a year in California, and this state might never have benefited by his noble and capable citizenship. Arriving in Oregon in 1850, he settled in the Waldo Hills, Marion county, from which place he removed to southern Oregon, where he again tried his luck at mining. February 2, 1854, found him in Portland, where he married Sarah Dixon, daughter of a pioneer of that section, and with whom he returned to his farm in Marion county. Here four children were born to them, and six more were born after their removal to Portland in 1860, settling in what is now known as the Eliza-both Irving addition. During his early residence in Portland Mr. Shaver found an outlet for his energies in the wood business, whose possibilities he seemed to appreciate more than any other at that time, and upon which he embarked with a great deal of enthusiasm and expectation of success. For many years he furnished the steamers plying between Portland and San Francisco with all the wood used in their business, and he further branched out and furnished the wood for river boats and barges. Large portions of the forests that reared their densely crowded trees in the primeval days disappeared under the necessity for providing timber to these boats, and Mr. Shaver probably denuded more acres of land during his busy career than did any other man of his time.

In time Mr. Shaver became president of the Shaver Transportation Company of which his son, Capt. James W., was treasurer and manager, and thus was greatly enlarged his field of activity. His death, which occurred October 26, 1900, removed from accustomed haunts one of the most useful of the founders of the commercial greatness of Oregon. He was not only a man of sound business judgment and capacity for observation and action, but in his character he embodied all that is excellent and of good report. No worthy cause but profited by his generosity and large heartedness; no friend but was benefited by his counsel and assistance. To the end he retained in increasing measure the confidence of all with whom he was ever associated, and to his family and friends left the heritage of a good name, and the dignity of a small fortune.

CAPT. JAMES W. SHAVER. The Shaver Transportation Company occupies an altogether unique position among the large developing forces of the great northwest, and has had much to do with shifting from one place to another the products of the dense forests for which Oregon is famous, and for placing the output of the great mills in their respective localities of usefulness. No more familiar sights greet the observer on the Columbia and Willamette rivers than the heavily loaded barges, puffing tow boats, in advance of stealthily gliding rafts of logs, and other craft calculated to promote the clearance of the enormous water business of the state.

Capt. James W. Shaver, the present head of the Shaver Transportation Company, was born in Waldo Hills, within five miles of Silverton, Ore., October 2, 1860. To his father, Capt. George W. Shaver, is due the organization of the transportation company. At the time of his death in October, 1900, he was survived by his wife, formerly Sarah Dixon, who was born in the east, and who still lives at the old home in Portland. Of the ten children who grew to maturity in this household, four sons and four daughters are living: John R., sheriff of Clackamas county, and living in Oregon City; Alice, Mrs. Wittenberg of Portland; James W.: Lincoln, captain and chief engineer in Multnomah county; George M., interested in the transportation company, and who spends his summers in Alaska; Delmar, a captain in the employ of the company; Pearl, Mrs. George Hoyt of Portland; and Susie, Mrs. A. S. Heintz, of Portland.

Locating in Portland with his parents when six years of age, Capt. James W. Shaver naturally received his education here, and at an early age became interested in his father's enterprises, which then consisted of a livery business in East Portland, as well as a large cord wood concern. They had a wood yard in East Portland and at the Shaver dock, and at this early stage of proceedings were of immense importance in the wood business of the day. In 1880 Mr. Shaver embarked in the boating business, and with Henry Corbett and A. S. Foster bought out Mr. Bureau, continuing business under the name of the People's Freighting Company. The firm inaugurated its activities by running the steamer Manzanilla, and Mr. Shaver became captain of the boat and manager of the company, which operated between Portland and Clatskanie. Soon afterward the father joined the company and Mr. Corbett stepped out, having previously purchased the interest of Mr. Foster. At this time, June 10, 1893, a re-organization was effected, under the name of the Shaver Transportation Company, the father being president, and the son secretary and treasurer. In 1889 the G. W. Shaver was built and called after the father; this useful little craft was one hundred and forty feet long. The Sarah Dixon, named after the mother, took its place among other boats on the rivers in 1892, and after that the Manzanilla was sold, the Shaver and Dixon doing all the work of the company. About 1900 the Shaver was sold, and the same year a tow boat called No Wonder was purchased for towing logs. The next year, in 1901, the firm built the Henderson, also used for towing purposes, and these boats are in constant use, among other undertakings towing for three of the largest mills here. For many years Mr. Shaver acted in the capacity of captain for the company, but of late years has devoted his time to managing the business, and is still secretary and treasurer. He of course has a captain's license, and is remarkably familiar with all phases of river life in this state. The offices of the firm are located at the foot of Washington street.

In Portland Mr. Shaver was united in marriage with Annie Schloth, who was born in Portland, and whose parents were very early settlers of the state. Mr. Shaver is variously identified with social and fraternal organizations in the county, among them being the Woodmen of the World. He is a man of strict integrity, and the public at large place the greatest confidence in his character and business ability.

LOT P. W. QUIMBY. In many and varied avenues Lot P. W. Quimby has been identified with the business interests of Portland and has given no small assistance in the material growth of the city. He has just retired from the position of game and forestry warden for the state of Oregon, having received the appointment in 1898, his life having previously been associated as hotel keeper and liveryman, of the former being one of the oldest now living in the city. At one time in the past he served his state as a member of the legislature from Multnomah county, where he upheld the interests of his constituents and did all in his power to promote general movements for the welfare of the community.

Mr. Quimby comes of a family of Scottish ancestry, his father being Daniel Quimby, a native of Vermont, who lived to be seventy-two years old. Besides engaging as a blacksmith the elder man also followed farming in the latter part of his life, and through steady application and hard labor he maintained a comfortable and even plentiful home for his family, and though of a limited education himself was vitally interested in giving the best of advantages to his children. He married Polly Woodruff, also a native of Vermont, and she died the year after the death of her husband when she was sixty-nine years of age. Of their nine children two died in infancy, and one daughter at the age of fifteen; six grew to maturity, namely: Mary E., who married James Mathewson and reared a family (she died in Massachusetts in 1890); H. A., who is a wholesale crockery merchant in Springfield, Mass.; Cordelia M., the widow of Hiram Nichols, of Lyndon, Vt.; D. J., a resident of Portland, where he is proprietor of the International Hotel; L. P. W., of this review, and Laura, wife of Edwin P. Swetland, of Portland. The children were all reared on the paternal farm, and though advantages were necessarily limited, two daughters became teachers in the eastern states.

The birth of Mr. Quimby occurred in Caledonia county, Vt., July 6, 1839, and like the other members of his family, he was under the necessity of contributing his strength to the assistance of the farm work, for about three months of the year receiving instruction in the district school in the vicinity of his home. When seventeen years old his education was considered complete, so far as further attendance was concerned, and at eighteen years he went to work on a peddler's wagon, working for his brother-in-law, Mr. Nichols, traveling through the eastern states and Canada, though his principal time was spent in Vermont and New Hampshire. This occupation was continued for quite a number of years in the life of Mr. Quimby, but in 1859 he decided to try to better his condition by crossing the continent to the less crowded states of the Pacific coast. He accordingly left New York City, coming to California via steamer, by the isthmus, and upon his arrival there he at once began placer mining in Columbia. While there he became acquainted with D. O. Mills by selling his gold dust. Mr. Mills was one of the wealthy men of this country at this time. On leaving the mines Mr. Quimby went to San Francisco county and worked for three months on a farm in Susan valley, when he went into the city and engaged in the water business, peddling this necessity of life, and also assisting in hauling it to many of the important buildings of the city. He found this a lucrative occupation for quite a time, but finally engaged in the livery business, only a short time passing before he had there sold his interests and opened a restaurant on Market street. This also was disposed of, and February 22, 1862, he came to Portland.

On his arrival in this city Mr. Quimby formed a partnership with W. H. Bennetts and engaged in the livery and transfer business and forwarding, bringing to the city the first platform scale and the first express wagon. In 1864 he sold out to John White, and later purchased the livery business of Sherlock & Bacon, located on Third street, remaining there for one year, when he again sold out and purchased an interest in the Weston Hotel, now known as the Occidental Hotel, and in partnership with Samuel D. Smith remained one year in that connection. Disposing of his interest to Mr. Smith he purchased the American Exchange, formerly the Lincoln House, and continued for three years, when he took a partner in the person of Charles Perkins and the two continued together until 1876, when Mr. Quimby again became sole owner and remained such until the loss of the property by fire in the year 1878. This meant a heavy financial loss to Mr. Quimby and he did not immediately re-open the hotel. He was appointed receiver for a grocery house about this time and he proceeded to devote his time to the closing up of those affairs, and not until 1880 did he again engage in the hotel business, at this date opening up the Hotel Quimby, continuing successfully until 1897, for the first six months having a partner in the person of Mr. Hersey. Upon sale of the property in 1897 Mr. Quimby retired from his long accepted position as mine host, in which he had certainly met with success, for the reputation of the two hotels which he conducted had extended for a great distance on the Pacific coast, the service and accommodation being such as to delight the heart of the traveler. Following closely his withdrawal from his former interests came the appointment of Game and Forestry warden.

In Portland, in 1866, occurred the marriage of Mr. Quimby, uniting him with Miss Amelia M. West, the daughter of Col. W. G. West, a pioneer of the west. He established the Wells-Fargo route between Portland and California, and died while in the employ of this company, passing away at the home of Mr. Quimby in Portland. Mrs. Quimby was born in New York state, receiving her education in New York and California, and is now fifty-seven years old. Since 1882 their home has been at Fourteenth and Johnson streets, where Mr. Quimby put up a house when it was a heavily timbered tract of land and no streets in the vicinity. Their children are six in number, one of whom died in infancy, the others being as follows: Elmer W., a scenic artist and traveling salesman, his home with his parents, as he is still unmarried; Daisy, the wife of L. Q. Swetland, of Portland, their one daughter being Florence E.; Lottie, the wife of Harry Taylor, of White Horse, Alaska; and Polly and Daniel, both of whom are unmarried. All were born in Portland and received their education in the public schools of this city. As a Republican in politics Mr. Quimby has had many offices tendered him but he has not cared to accept, as his business interests have engrossed all his time, though he takes an active interest in all public matters, and is a liberal supporter of every worthy movement, and especially has he warmly advocated the improvement of public thoroughfares. Fraternally he is a member of Hope Lodge, A. O. U. W. In religion he was reared in the faith of the Baptist Church.

HON. JOHN McCRAKEN. There are few men now living whose arrival on the Pacific coast antedates that of Mr. McCracken, who first landed on western soil September 17, 1849, and has been identified with the development of Oregon ever since 1850. The family of which he is a member came of Scotch ancestry, but his father, John, was a native of Dublin, Ireland, and in early life associated himself with mercantile pursuits in London, where his son and namesake was born July 11, 1826. From that city the family crossed the ocean to America, settling in New York City, where the father was establishing himself upon a substantial basis as a merchant at the time of his death. His wife, Sarah Pigeon, was born in England, of an old English family, and died in Connecticut. Of their six children John and his sister are the sole survivors. He was six years of age when the family crossed the ocean in 1832, and hence almost his earliest recollections are of this country. When he was eleven years of age his father died and afterwards his opportunities for an education were very meager, for the necessity of self-support soon presented itself to him. It had been his mother's hope that he might enter the ministry, but his tastes were distinctly commercial and the need of earning a livelihood deterred him from taking up any profession.

For about four years Mr. McCracken was employed as clerk in a retail store at Fiskville, R. I. In 1846 he went to New York, where he took charge of the books and collections in a large plumbing establishment. Probably he would have remained in the east permanently had not the discovery of gold stirred his ambition and led him to seek his fortune on the Pacific coast. In March of 1849 he joined the Greenwich & California Mining & Trading Company, of which he became vice-president and a trustee. The company bought a vessel, Palmetto, of two hundred and eighty tons, and this was stocked with supplies and other freight. Thus equipped for the voyage the forty-two members of the company started from New York via Cape Horn, putting in at Rio Janeiro eleven days and at Valparaiso seven days, and after a voyage of six months and nine days landing on the beach in the bay at San Francisco, September 17, 1849. The mechanics in the company went on shore, where, being offered $48 a day wages, they concluded it advisable to accept this offer rather than work for themselves, so the company disbanded. Mr. McCracken, together with the president and secretary, remained to settle up the company's accounts. A house they had brought with them was sold for $350 per thousand feet for the lumber. The pork and beef were sold at high prices. The profits were divided and sent to the members of the company.

After a brief experience in freighting to the mines, in the spring of 1850 Mr. McCracken embarked in the mercantile business at Stockton. In the fall he sold out and went to San Francisco. On the day that California was admitted as a state he took passage on a sailing vessel for Astoria, where he landed in October, thence proceeding to Portland. At that time there was only a hamlet of a few buildings. A dense forest extended as far as Second street, and the rest of the town was dotted with trees. The wharf was small, but was sufficient to accommodate the few vessels that anchored here. Soon he bought an interest in the Island mills at Oregon City, where he engaged in the manufacture of lumber and flour. The water power was improved by Methodist Episcopal Mission, and later bought by Lane & Thompson, subsequent to which Mr. McCracken bought Mr. Thompson's one-fourth interest. The high water of 1852 ruined the mills and left the buildings a wreck. The work of rebuilding was at once begun, but the second venture did not prove successful on account of the fact that wheat, bought at $5 a bushel, was to be used in making flour to be sold at $50 a barrel, but a drop in the price of flour to $6 or $8 a barrel proved ruinous to the mill, which was sold at a great sacrifice.

Elected by the territorial legislature as chief clerk of the house of representatives, Mr. McCracken served in the sessions of 1852 and 1853. In 1854 he was appointed United States marshal of Oregon and Washington by President Buchanan, serving almost two years. In the fall of 1855 he returned to Portland, where he started in the produce business, shipping to California via steamers and sailers. The firm was Richards & McCracken, the senior member, James Richards, being in San Francisco. A large and successful business was established and conducted until Mr. Richards was lost on the vessel Brother Jonathan, which was wrecked off Crescent City while en route to Portland. A subsequent partnership was that of McCracken, Merrill & Co., of Portland and San Francisco, and later Aldrich, Merrill & Co. conducted the business in San Francisco for five years, since which time Mr. McCracken has been mostly alone. The J. McCracken Company was organized in 1892, and is now located at the corner of Second and Pine streets, where a wholesale business is conducted in building materials. Among the materials carried in stock are Roche Harbor lime, Portland cement, building, casting and land plaster, King's Windsor cement plaster, Monterey sand, marble dust, mortar colors, fire brick and fire clay. Under the supervision of Mr. McCracken were built the large warehouses on Ninth and Irving streets, covering three-fourths of a block, also the warehouses on Davis and Front streets, but these were later sold.

The interests held by Mr. McCracken are not limited to his identification with the J. McCracken Company. For some years he was a director of the Commercial National Bank, and was the first president of the smelter at Linton, which position he still holds. For some years he occupied for his homestead the block between D and E, and Seventh and East Park streets, but this he has sold to the government for the new custom house site. His marriage took place in Oregon City and united him with Ada Pambrun, whose father was an officer of the Hudson Bay Company. They are the parents of four children, of whom the daughter is the wife of Charles B. Hurley, of Tacoma. The sons, Henry, James and Robert, are connected with the business which their father established in 1856.

A careful study of political questions long ago led Mr. McCracken to ally himself with the Republican party. During early days he served as president of the city council, in which he remained a member for several terms. In 1891, 1893 and 1901 he was elected to the state legislature from Portland, serving three terms. In 1891 he was interested in a consolidation bill for the city. During his service in the legislature he was instrumental in promoting bills of an important nature and gave his support to measures of undoubted value. In religion he is connected with Trinity Episcopal Church, of which he is senior warden. In Masonry his interest and connection have continued for many years. Initiated into the order in Portland, he served as master of the lodge and during the '60s was for two terms grand master of the Grand Lodge of Oregon. For two terms he officiated as grand high priest of the Grand Chapter of Oregon. In the Portland Commandery he has been eminent commander, while he has also reached the Consistory and thirty-third degrees, being inspector-general in the latter. Among his brethren in the Masonic order his standing is the highest, as it is also among men of commercial and executive ability, all of whom recognize in him the qualities of uprightness, tact, keen discernment and loyalty to his home city that have characterized his long association with the history of Oregon.

AMEDEE M. SMITH. Very early in the settlement of Nova Scotia the Smith family removed there from England, but subsequently exchanged the bleak and icebound shores of their peninsular home for the more prosperous region of Massachusetts, and from there proceeded to New Jersey. Freeman Smith, a native of New Jersey, became a resident of Fayette county, Pa., and in 1842 established his home on a tract of raw land near Cedar Rapids, Iowa, of which he was one of the founders. A man of rare insight into causes and their effects, fortified by a determined will, and possessing the hardihood of a pioneer, he was fitted for the task of creating a new town on the edge of the then wilderness. His ability was inherited from his father, Dr. Isaac Smith, a successful physician and talented man, who during the Revolutionary war served as colonel of the First Regiment from Hunterdon county, N. J., but resigned his commission in 1777 in order to accept an appointment as justice of the supreme court of his state.

In the family of Freeman Smith there were eleven children. The youngest of these, Amedee M. Smith, Sr., was born in Fayette county, Pa., in 1839. At the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in Company F, Twenty-fourth Iowa Infantry, and served for three years as a non-commissioned officer. On being honorably discharged from the service he learned the pottery business in a pottery owned by his brother, Freeman Smith, in Iowa. Meantime he had married, and in 1865, accompanied by his wife and their child, he came via Panama and San Francisco to Portland. On this trip he was accompanied by his father and mother, who settled at Albany, Ore., but in 1866 removed to Buena Vista, this state, where his father died in 1881, at the age of eighty-nine years. During the same year they had come by the isthmus to Oregon, his brother, Freeman, had crossed the plains, and previous to this, during the '50s, three other brothers had come, Henry, who settled near Eugene, James, who died immediately on his arrival, and W. H., who took up land in Clatsop county.

For the first year of his residence in Oregon Amedee M. Smith made Albany his home, but in 1866 removed to Buena Vista, Polk county, where, having found suitable clay land, he and his brother, Freeman, and their father, started a pottery, which was the first enterprise of its kind on the Pacific coast. In 1870 A. M. Smith bought the interests of his father and brother and continued alone until 1883. Meantime, in 1881, he had brought his family to Portland and established his headquarters in this city. From a very small beginning he built up a plant occupying several acres of ground at this time. In 1883, on the river front and Sherlock avenue, he erected a building 200x250, three stories in height, on a lot 200x600, and put in six large kilns, at the same time incorporating the Oregon Pottery Company, of which he was president and James Steel secretary. Everything in the line of vitrified pipes was manufactured there, while the plant at Buena Vista meantime turned out the pottery. On the destruction of the Portland property by fire in 1890 he erected brick buildings on the same site and a tract of land adjoining. The buildings occupy about 300x300 feet, three and four stories in height, and are equipped with steam boilers and engines of two hundred horse power, with the latest improved machinery for the manufacture of sewer pipe, chimney pipe, flue lining and fire proofing.

In the early days of the pottery business in Oregon it was the custom of the manufacturers to start out from the kilns with a load of pottery and travel throughout the Willamette valley until all they carried was sold. Money being scarce, often they accepted produce in exchange for their wares. However, as the population increased and railroads came in, the capacity of their plant was also increased and they made their sales in large quantities, shipping by railroad.

On the death of A. M. Smith, Sr., his son and namesake was chosen president and manager of the Oregon Pottery Company. Two years later, in 1896, James Steel retired from the concern, which was then reorganized as the Western Clay Manufacturing Company, with A. M. Smith, Jr., as president and manager; W. H. Britts, vice-president; and Blaine R. Smith, secretary and treasurer. The company is still doing business under the same name and with the same officers as at first, the three being also the sole owners of the plant. In 1890 the manufacture of pottery was discontinued and the plant devoted entirely to the manufacture of their other products. Frequent enlargements have been made and today the plant is the most complete one of its kind on the Pacific coast. The products of the kilns are shipped to all points on the Pacific coast and their trade extends as far north as British Columbia and Alaska. They also have an extensive trade in the Hawaiian Islands. The office of the company is at No. 55 Fourth street, Portland.

While still in the east, Mr. Smith was united in marriage with Miss Mary E. Speelman, who was born in Pittsburg, Pa., a daughter of A. E. Speelman, a native of the Keystone state and a glass blower by trade. On account of the failure of his eyesight Mr. Speelman gave up his trade and removed to Iowa during the early '50s, settling on a farm near Marion, Linn county. Later he went to Minnesota and his death occurred at Verndale, that state. In religion he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The family of which he was a member came from Germany, while his wife was a member of the Isherwood family, of English extraction. Seven children blessed the union of Mr. Smith and Mary Speelman, namely: Albert G., who died at the age of nine years; an infant that died in Iowa; Elizabeth, now Mrs. W. H. Britts; Amedee M.; Blaine R.; Mary E., wife of Dr. F. C. Sellwood, and Leta R., all residing in Portland. The mother of these children passed away in 1883, and for his second wife Mr. Smith married Mrs. Emma J. Coulter, of Connellsville, Pa., and by this union two children were born, Harold S. and Mildred.

In the death of Mr. Smith, which occurred September 29, 1894, Oregon lost one of its honored pioneers and Portland was called upon to mourn one of its most prominent and highly esteemed citizens. His death was not only a severe blow to the industrial world, in which he had taken such an active part and in which he was so well known, but by his demise Portland lost a citizen who at all times was in favor of any movement calculated to be of benefit to his adopted state or county.

The Taylor Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was an active member, had in him one of its most sincere supporters and at his death he was a member of its board of trustees. His influence was always for the good, and his sympathy, his benevolence and his kindly greeting will long be remembered by all with whom he had come in contact. His duties were performed with the greatest care and throughout life his personal honor and integrity were without blemish. His character, as it was manifested to his associates, was remarkable for its simplicity; he had great earnestness and concentration of purpose; in planning he was deliberate but forcible. His wisdom had been largely gained by observation, as the advantages of his youth were limited. In his business dealings he was ever prompt, reliable and entirely trustworthy and he gained a greater degree of success than many who at the start were blessed with better advantages.

AMEDEE M. SMITH, JR. At Buena Vista, Polk county, Ore., Amedeo M. Smith, Jr., was born December 16, 1868. At the age of twelve years he accompanied his father and mother on their removal to Portland. Here he attended the grammar and high school, remaining in the latter until the senior year, when he was obliged to give up study on account of ill health. Six months were spent in southern Oregon, and then, having regained his health, he returned to his home and entered the business of his father, with which he has since been actively associated. At the first he was connected with the Buena Vista factory, but in 1888 came to Portland as superintendent of the plant here. In 1890 he entered the office of the company as bookkeeper, and three years later was elected vice-president and manager of the Oregon Pottery Company. On the death of his father, in 1894, he succeeded to the office of president, which he held both in that company and in the reorganized plant.

In Portland Mr. Smith was united in marriage to Miss Alice M. Johnson, who was born at Point Reyes, Cal., her parents having removed there from Massachusetts. She is a lady of excellent education, having attended the University of the Pacific. In fraternal relations Mr. Smith is a Mason, connected with Mount Tabor Lodge No. 42, A. F. & A. M.; Oregon Consistory No. 1, thirty-second degree; and Al Kader Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. Politically he votes with the Republican party. He is a member of the Manufacturers' Association and an active worker in the Oregon Historical Society, especially interested in movements connected with the perpetuation of the annals of the pioneers. At one time he was Sunday-school superintendent of the Taylor Street Methodist Episcopal Church, in the work of which he is deeply interested. Since 1894 he has been connected with the official life of the church and at present is a member of the board of trustees. The Young Men's Christian Association also receives the encouragement of his influence and financial aid, and through his services as a member of the board of directors he has been enabled to promote its welfare in Portland.

REV. JOHN W. SELLWOOD. This well known and widely loved pioneer minister of Oregon was born near Mendon, Ill., July 22, 1839, and was the son of Rev. James R. W. Sellwood, an Englishman by birth and for years an Episcopal rector, holding pastorates in Mendon, Ill., and Grahamville, S. C., thence coming to Oregon as early as 1856 and becoming the first rector of St. Paul's Church in Salem. During the last years of his life, owing to failing eyesight, he was forced to relinquish ministerial work, and thereupon retired to a farm near Milwaukee, later settling in Portland, where he died.

Few opportunities came to the boyhood of John W. Sellwood other than those obtained by his own determination and industry. The eldest of five children, he early proved himself the mainstay of his parents and their comfort and assistant. Nor was this merely the case in matters material, but especially so in spiritual affairs. From an early age his mind turned to thoughts of God, and he cherished an ambition to follow in his father's steps as a missionary and minister of the Gospel. When he was yet young his father removed to Grahamville, S. C., and in 1856, with a brother, John, decided to respond to the urgent appeal of the then bishop of Oregon, Thomas F. Scott, who needed missionaries to labor in this then frontier field. The two started together and en route were the victims of a bloody riot at Panama, from which they barely escaped with their lives. The children, too, were with them and endured all the horrors of those hours of danger. When the groans of the wounded and the dying were to be heard on all sides, the eldest son, John W., solemnly consecrated himself to the work of the ministry, and the decision then made was never regretted. On the other hand, in the midst of hardships, toil, privations and vicissitudes, he yet called it his greatest glory that he might preach the glorious Gospel of the Christ.

In due time the family arrived in Oregon, but the uncle had been so seriously wounded in the massacre that for months he was unable to enter upon his work, but on regaining his health he took charge of Trinity Church, Portland. Rev. James R. W. Sellwood meanwhile went to Salem, where he became rector of St. Paul's Church. His son, John W., pursuant upon his resolve to enter the ministry, gave himself to preparation for the work, and in 1862 was ordained deacon in St.

Paul's Church, Oregon City, three years later being advanced to the priesthood in St. Stephen's Chapel, Portland. At the same time (July, 1865) he was united in marriage with Belle J., daughter of Rev. James L. and Frances (Brown) Daly, natives respectively of Dublin and county Sligo, Ireland, and of Scotch extraction. For the purpose of engaging in educational work James L. Daly went to Australia, and for some time remained in Sydney. On account of ill health he came to California, but, not finding the social environment desirable, went to Honolulu, where he opened a school. Ill health again forced him to relinquish his work and in 1853 he came to Portland under Bishop Scott, taking up missionary work, in which he proved an efficient and consecrated laborer. His life was prolonged to the age of almost eighty years, when he died in Portland in 1895, five years after the death of his wife. Of their ten children four are living. Mrs. Sellwood was born in Australia and received her education in Punahou College, Honolulu. Born of her marriage is one son, John J., who is a graduate physician of the University of Oregon Medical College and now practicing in the village of Sellwood, founded by his great uncle.

Immediately after his marriage Mr. Sellwood became rector of St. Paul's Church in Oregon City, in addition to which he extended his work to Butteville, Salem, Mount Pleasant schoolhouse, Clackamas Station and Canemah, a little town one mile from Oregon City. As a result of his work a large Sunday school was built in Oregon City and a chapel erected in Canemah at a cost of $800. For two years he was superintendent of schools of Clackamas county, and during that time visited even the most remote schools and sought to elevate the standard of education here. It has been said that no missionary seemed to throw greater enthusiasm into his work than did he and certainly none enjoyed the work to a greater degree. His ministry was a source of constant joy to him. He was never happier than when preaching to his parishioners and trying to aid them in their spiritual life. No toil was too great that would promote the cause of Christ and the church in the particular field which he had chosen as his scene of labor. His love for Christ led him to love every created being. None was too lowly to be excluded from his sympathy, and none too high to be aloof from his affection. Each one of his congregation had a special place in his heart. His work was so full of delight to him that other occupations seemed uninteresting in comparison. Many hardships and privations he had to face and more than once sorrow was his companion, yet never, through all of his life, did he lose faith in his Creator and never did he lose faith in the ultimate success of the work in which he engaged. The humble successes that came to him were received with a grateful heart.

Though staunch in his allegiance to the Protestant Episcopal Church, Mr. Sellwood was not a bigoted churchman. On the other hand, he possessed a broad and catholic spirit and saw the good in all, ever praying for the reunion of a divided Christendom. As a preacher he was earnest and forcible, never led aside into sensational subjects, but clinging closely to "Christ and Him crucified." A text was chosen only after careful and prayerful deliberation, and the subject matter of the sermon was presented after much prayer. When before his people he lost himself so wholly in his subject that no trace of self-consciousness could be discerned. Indeed, he forgot himself in the message he was to deliver.

After fifteen years of labor in Oregon City Mr. Sellwood accepted the pastorate of St. David's Church in East Portland, where the last ten years of his busy life were passed. From a small congregation, St. David's has grown into a large and well organized parish, and this happy result is largely due to his efforts in those days of small beginnings. While he was pastor of that flock, on Christmas eve of 1899, after a day of severe illness, he insisted upon speaking to the children at their Christmas exercises, saying, when his family protested, "I feel I must look into their dear, bright faces once more." The next day he again went to the church, hoping to administer the holy communion to his loved congregation, but he was taken with a chill and was carried from the church, never more to enter it in life. Weeks of pain and illness were met with his accustomed cheery and bright patience, and finally, March 12, 1890, with the parting words upon his lips, "All is peace," he entered into the unknown. A large concourse of those who loved him attended the funeral services, where Bishop Morris, in the memorial sermon, paid a deserved tribute to his years of patient and self-sacrificing toil. The organizations with which he had been connected passed resolutions of respect. The bishop and clergy of the diocese of Oregon adopted resolutions bearing testimony to his goodness of heart and gentleness of spirit. Other organizations who took similar action were St. David's Vestry, Women's Guild of St. David's parish, Daughters of St. David's, Young Men's Guild of St. David's Church, St. Paul's parish in Oregon City and the convention of the diocese. Since his death his wife, who had been his constant and successful co-laborer in the ministry, has devoted herself largely to missionary work in the Protestant Episcopal Church in Oregon, and is now registrar of the diocese of Oregon, and is also the diocesan secretary of the Women's Auxiliary.

Thos G. Hendricks

HON. THOMAS G. HENDRICKS. The name of Hon. Thomas G. Hendricks has been associated for many years with all that is substantial and progressive in connection with the best interests of the city of Eugene and the Willamette valley. The power to act intelligently, as well as to think, to marshal his forces at the right time and place, to concentrate, to lead and to infuse others with his own indomitable courage and determination, are attributes which have contributed to the successful career of Eugene's most representative citizen.

While Mr. Hendricks' financial stability rests upon his achievements as a merchant and banker, his greatest claim upon the consideration of posterity is his association with the building, organization and subsequent management of Oregon's greatest institution of learning—the University of Oregon at Eugene. It is doubtful if any other undertaking of his life has been the source of so great a measure of personal satisfaction, so earnest and absorbing an interest, as the development of this ambitious project, the realization of which will be the proud heritage of the coming generations. Mr. Hendricks is one of those far-sighted men who saw the necessity for just such an institution, and in the beginning of the seventies he accepted the responsibility of raising funds for its erection, the state not yet having arrived at an appreciation of its duty in the matter. The few who helped him to raise the required fifty thousand dollars, and who, as members of the building committee, overcame gigantic obstacles, ignored discouraging influences and conditions and with singleness of purpose made straight for their goal, are entitled to rank with the state's greatest benefactors. That Mr. Hendricks was the life and soul of this little band, the far-sighted adviser and friend, redounds to his lasting honor and invests his career with additional dignity and nobility. After the state had accepted the institution he became a member of the board of regents, being appointed consecutively for twenty-four years, or until the stable condition of the university justified him in withdrawing his active support. During all of these years he was chairman of the executive committee, and it was largely due to his judgment that the university took on the methods and the prestige of institutions of historical renown and established usefulness. Thus has the greatest ambition of this pioneer Oregonian been realized; yet broad and comprehensive as is its scope, it has been but one of the numerous avenues invaded by his business sagacity and genius for organization and development.

Mr. Hendricks comes of a family of which much might reasonably be expected. Born in Henderson county, Ill., June 17, 1838, he is a son of James M. and grandson of Abraham

Hendricks, the latter of whom established his family in Kentucky at an early day, and died in Illinois. James Hendricks was born in Kentucky and married Elizabeth Bristow, of Virginia, daughter of Elijah Bristow, the first settler of Lane county, Ore. With his wife he settled on a farm in Henderson county, Ill., and while there served with distinction in the Black Hawk war. Five children were born to him and his wife in Illinois. In 1848 he outfitted for the journey across the plains, having three wagons, eight yoke of oxen and a number of loose cattle. Leaving the familiar scenes behind them in March, and pushing forward to the uncertainties of the west, they crossed the Missouri river at St. Joseph, and were soon after obliged to stop for a couple of weeks, in order that the grass might grow and supplement the scant supply of feed for the stock. Fortunately the members of the train escaped many of the discomforts and dangers which surrounded the early emigrants, their chief drawback being the stampeding of their cattle by the Indians and Mormons. Crossing the Cascade range by the Barlow route, they arrived at Pleasant Hill, Lane county, in October. Here they found Elijah Bristow joyfully awaiting them, he having preceded them to Oregon in 1845. Mr. Hendricks settled on a section of land twelve miles southeast of the site of Eugene, his only neighbors being Eugene Skinner, Jacob Spores, Messrs. Isaac Briggs, P. F. Blair and their families, and William Dodson, a bachelor. Mr. Hendricks at once set about the task of clearing a farm out of the wilderness tract, and engaged in farming and stock-raising on an extensive scale. In 1851 he crossed the mountains and for a time was engaged in gold-mining in California. He took an active part in the affairs of government, and in religious and educational movements, and became a member of the first church to be organized in Lane county, a church of the Christian denomination, which erected its house of worship near his home. The first school in Lane county was built within sight of his farm, and was established by his father-in-law, Elijah Bristow. It became known as School District No. 1. Mr. Hendricks died in 1876. His wife's death occurred the year previous. They were the parents of eleven children. Of these Benjamin F. is maintaining the gunshop at Fort Bragg, Cal.; Susan J. married John A. Winter and died in California; Sarah A. married J. W. Skaggs and resides in Santa Cruz, Cal.; Elijah B. is engaged in the drug business in Cheney, Wash.; James M., who died in Lane county, was for many years engaged in the hardware and implement business in Eugene; Columbus C. is a capitalist residing in Pendleton, Ore.; LaFayette is a farmer of Lane county; Albert M. is engaged in painting in Eugene; and Olive

E. is the wife of F. P. Close, a farmer of Lane county.

Hon. Thomas G. Hendricks, the second child in the family, received his rudimentary education in the district school established by his grandfather, Bristow, conducted in a small log structure which, for many years, was the seat of learning in Lane county. At a later period Cascade Academy was established at Cloverdale, and he entered this school in 1853, remaining for three years. In the meantime the general mercantile business of Mr. Bristow became firmly established, and Mr. Hendricks began his business career in 1857 as a clerk in this pioneer store. By 1860 he had advanced to an interest in the firm, thereafter conducted under the name of E. L. Bristow & Co. The firm contributed to the commercial stability of the town of Eugene by building the first brick store there in 1866. This was likewise the first brick structure in Lane county. In 1874 Mr. Bristow sold his interest in the store to his brother, W. W. Bristow, and after the death of the latter in the same year, Mr. Hendricks became sole owner and proprietor. In 1884 he disposed of his stock, but retained possession of the building, and the same year organized a banking business under the firm name of Hendricks & Eakin, his partner being S. B. Eakin. With true western enterprise the bankers erected a two-story building on West Willamette street, between Eighth and Ninth streets, with the first plate glass front in Lane county. The bank started business in January, 1884, with a capital stock of $50,000. In February, 1886, the concern was reorganized as the First National Bank of Eugene, with a paid-up capital of $50,000. The splendid business standing of the bank suggested numerous innovations, and the deliberations of the owners resulted in the erection of a handsome edifice in 1898—a two-story building with a stone front.

As a practical demonstration of his faith in the future of this section of the Willamette valley, Mr. Hendricks has invested heavily in town and country property, including Hendrick's Addition in College Hill Park and other valuable residence and business sites. His public spirit has found vent in the promotion of many local enterprises, among them being the city water works, of which he was one of the builders, and a director until disposing of his interest therein. He was elected one of the first councilmen of Eugene, and has since served many times in that capacity. He has also been mayor of the city for two terms. From 1880 to 1884 he was a member of the Oregon state senate, having been elected as the nominee of the Democratic party. During that time he served on the committee on education. He was not at home when elected by a good majority in a Republican county. During the two terms of his service in the senate he advocated many measures demanded by the most thoughtful of his constituents, and secured the passage of considerable judicious legislation. In 1872 Mr. Hendricks received from the county court the appointment to the office of county superintendent of public instruction to fill a vacancy. He was twice re-elected to this office, serving in all six years, and was the first incumbent of the office to take an active interest in the welfare of the schools and to visit them in official capacity. The experience thus gained formed the foundation of his interest in the cause of education, and particularly in the cause of higher education.

Mr. Hendricks is a member of the State Historical Society, and of the Lane County Pioneer Association, of which he has served as secretary. Fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is past noble grand of the lodge at Eugene. In 1865 he became a member of the Christian Church, and for many years has been a member of its board of trustees.

October 20, 1861, Mr. Hendricks was united in marriage with Mary J. Hazelton, daughter of Harvey Hazelton, who settled in Lane county in 1852 or 1853. She died in Eugene in 1866. They were the parents of two children: Harry A., who died in infancy; and Ida B., wife of Frank L. Chambers, of Eugene. The second marriage of Mr. Hendricks was solemnized January 3, 1869, and united him with Martha A. Stewart, a native of Missouri, and a pioneer of 1852. (See sketch of Elias Stewart, which appears elsewhere in this volume.) They are the parents of two children: Ada A., a graduate of the University of Oregon, class of 1896; and Ruby V., a graduate of the same institution, class of 1903.

In closing this necessarily brief outline of the life and services of Thomas G. Hendricks, it is but just to make a permanent record of the esteem in which he is held by the people of Oregon. At no time during his long, honorable and useful career has his position as an influential factor and high-minded man of affairs been brought into question; and with the progress of years and the development of the spirit of public utility which he has always exhibited, those who have been able to keep most closely in touch with his daily life accord him a post of eminence among the men of the Pacific northwest. Many men of intelligent discriminating powers have expressed the conviction that in naming two living men who properly may be regarded as the first citizens of the Willamette valley, the name of Thomas G. Hendricks should thus be perpetuated. In the history of the city of Eugene, no man has done more toward the advancement of its highest community interests—social, moral, intellectual and commercial. Every act on his part whose tendency has been to add to the prestige of the city in any way has demonstrated his unselfish and gracious public spirit. The record of his entire life exhibits no taint or blemish; its purity and integrity, in both its public and private phases, has been beyond question. Assuredly the career of this useful and high-minded man of affairs should prove a never-diminishing source of inspiration to the youth of the present and future generations, as well as of great pride to those bound to him by ties of blood.

THEODORE THURSTON GEER. The history of a state as well as that of a nation is chiefly the chronicle of the lives and deeds of those who have conferred honor and dignity upon society. The world judges the character of a community by that of its representative citizens, and yields its tribute of admiration and respect for the genius, learning or virtues of those whose works and actions constitute the record of a state; and it is their character, as exemplified in probity and progress, in kindly virtues and in integrity in the affairs of life, which is ever affording worthy examples for emulation. Perhaps there is today no man better known in Oregon than Theodore Thurston Geer, recently governor of the state, a man who is leaving the impress of his individuality upon the commonwealth, who has aided in framing important legislation and who in his recent service as chief executive promoted the welfare of the people of the state through an administration that was progressive, yet practical, and upheld the best interests of the majority.

Governor Geer is a native son of Oregon, his birth having occurred in Marion county, seven miles from Salem, March 12, 1851. His father, Heman J. Geer, was born in Madison county, Ohio, while the grandfather, Joseph Cary Geer, was born in Windham county, Conn., February 5, 1795. When seventeen years of age the latter enlisted for service in the war of 1812, and in 1818 he became a resident of Madison county, Ohio, casting his lot among the pioneer farmers. In 1840 he removed to Galesburg, Knox county, Ill. The ancestry, however, can be traced farther back than this, for it is definitely known that two brothers, James and George Geer, came from England about 1630 and settled in Windham county, Conn. Joseph C. Geer was united in marriage to Miss Mary Johnson, who was born in Rhode Island and was of English descent. When he came to Ohio in 1818 he was accompanied by his wife and two children, the journey being made in a wagon. They went to Illinois in the fall of 1840, making the trip down the Ohio and up the Mississippi rivers, and after seven years spent in Knox county they again started westward in a train commanded by Capt. Joel Palmer. All of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Geer also became residents of Oregon. The second son, Fred, had crossed the plains in 1846, and the third son, Joseph Cary, Jr., had come overland in 1845 and now lives in Modesto, Cal. Three others, Isaiah, Ralph C., and Heman J., came in 1847. The grandfather settled in Clackamas county, directly across the river from Butteville, Marion county, where he secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, which he improved, continuing to carry on farming there until his death, which occurred in August, 1881, when he had reached the age of eighty-six years and six months. During the last twenty years of his life he was blind. He was always a Republican, but never cared for or sought office.

Heman J. Geer was born September 23, 1828, in Madison county, Ohio, and was educated in the schools of that state and Illinois. In 1847 he crossed the plains with an ox-train, driving from Illinois, and reached Marion county after six months of travel. In October, 1848, he was married here to Cynthia Ann Eoff, who was born in Illinois, November 4, 1833, a daughter of John Leonard Eoff, who was born in Pulaski county, Ky., July 2, 1812. He removed to Indiana, then to Illinois, went to Iowa in 1841, and in 1847 brought his family over the long trail to Oregon, the train being commanded by Capt. L. N. English. He settled on Howell Prairie, in Marion county, securing a donation claim of one section, of which he was the owner until his death. His father, John Eoff, was a native of Virginia, became a pioneer of Kentucky and there died. Our subject visited his grave in 1887. Mr. Eoff was of German descent and took part in the Indian wars with Daniel Boone. At the time of their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Heman J. Geer located on a claim of six hundred and forty acres in the Waldo hills, Marion county, and there Mr. Eoff followed farming for four or five years, after which he sold that property and located in Silverton, where he established a nursery business. His oldest brother, Ralph, established the first nursery in the state, from seeds he had brought with him. In May, 1861, Heman J. Geer removed to Salem, and in 1862 went up the Fraser river at the time of the gold excitement. In 1866, however, he went to Union county and located on the place where he now resides. He was joined by his son, Theodore, and together they converted the wild land into an excellent farm. Heman J. Geer has since been successfully engaged in the nursery and horticultural business and is well known as a fruit grower. He has demonstrated the possibilities of the state in this direction, and through his well directed efforts has met with gratifying prosperity. In political views he is a Republican. An honored pioneer, he is familiar with the history of the state from an early epoch, and experienced many of the hardships of life here before railroads connected this section with the older east. He served in the Cayuse Indian war and watched with interest the advance of civilization as the Indian wigwam was replaced by the tasteful residence of the white man. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Geer were born five children, of whom two are living, Theodore T. and Mrs. Theodosia Janes, of Salem.

Theodore T. Geer was reared in Oregon. After attending the district school, on the 5th of September, 1863, he entered Willamette University, where he remained until April, 1865. He afterward worked with his uncle, Ralph Geer, on a farm in the Waldo hills, making his own way from the time he left college, and he has never been too proud to remember the manual labor he performed in reclaiming portions of Oregon's wild land for civilization. In December, 1866, he joined his father at Cove, in Union county, and assisted him in developing a farm from the wilderness.

On the 16th of June, 1870, Mr. Geer was united in marriage to Mrs. Nancy (Duncan) Batte, and the following year he secured a homestead at Cove by buying a right. This land he farmed until he had perfected his title, and in May, 1877, he sold the property and located near Salem on a place adjoining that upon which he was born, eight miles east of the city. Here he had three hundred and twenty acres of land, some of which had been broken by his father with ox-teams in 1848. Mr. Geer there began general farming and stock-raising, and his progressive, systematic methods of agriculture have made the property valuable and productive. Mrs. Geer was born in Calloway county, Mo., October 22, 1841, a daughter of F. W. Duncan, who was born in Prince Edward county, Va., February 26, 1816. When two years old he was taken to Kentucky, and in 1829, at the age of eleven, went to Calloway county, Mo., with his parents. There he followed farming until 1864, when, on account of his Union sentiments, he was forced to leave his home, and with his family he then crossed the plains to Oregon. Here he followed farming for some time in Union county. His death occurred at the home of Mr. Geer in Marion county, in 1881. Three children were born to Theodore T. Geer and wife: Maud A., Theodosia A. and Frederick Heman, the latter an express messenger on the Southern Pacific railroad for Wells-Fargo Express Company, making his home at Portland. In 1898 Mrs. Geer started to visit her old home in the east and stopped to see the Omaha Exposition. The same night she was taken ill and died in Omaha on October 13, and her remains were brought back to Oregon for interment.

Mr. Geer has always been an active Republican, fearless in defense of his honest convictions, not bitterly aggressive, but unequivocal in his statements, so that no one need question his position. He has always been a close and earnest student of the issues which have divided the people into great national parties and his views have many times been expressed through the papers. When seventeen years of age he began writing for the press upon political and other subjects, during the Grant campaign in 1868, and there is probably no man in the state, who is not a journalist by profession, who has been a more frequent contributor to the press. In 1880 he was elected to the legislature from Marion county, serving in the session of that year, when Governor Moody was speaker of the house. Mr. Geer was instrumental in passing the bill locating the insane asylum at Salem and providing a building for it. In 1888 and again in 1890 and 1892 he was re-elected, and in the session of 1891 he was chosen speaker of the house, acting in that capacity when the Australian ballot law was passed. An excellent parliamentarian, his rulings were strictly fair and impartial, and his legislative service throughout proved of benefit to the entire state as well as to his local constituency. In 1896 he was nominated presidential elector on the Republican ticket and received the highest popular vote given any elector in the state. He took a most active part in the campaign, being on the stump for seven weeks, working untiringly for the success of his party. By the state electors he was chosen to carry the vote to Washington, in January, 1897, and visited President McKinley in Canton. After his return he was nominated by acclamation in the state convention, in April, 1898, as the candidate for governor, although he was not present on that occasion. During the campaign he visited every county in the state but one, addressing the people on the issues of the day, and as his legislative service had been such as to warrant public confidence, he was elected by a plurality of ten thousand five hundred. On January 10, 1899, he took the oath of office, thus becoming the chief executive of his native state for a term of four years. His administration was free from misrule in state affairs, and no matter what his enemies might say against him—and no man in public life is without enemies—they have never urged against him that he has been the tool of others, but on the other hand every one acknowledges his loyalty to his honest convictions, and the state at large endorses his administration as that of a governor who has had the interests of the commonwealth at heart, has placed the state before party and general good before personal aggrandizement.

Under the Mays referendum law of 1901, Governor Geer was nominated as the Republican candidate for United States senator by the petition of three thousand electors in various parts of the state. But political combinations resulted in the choice of another. His vote for senator, under the law mentioned, was, with two or three exceptions, the greatest popular vote ever recorded in Oregon—forty-five thousand—exceeding the vote he received for governor of the state. During the Ohio state campaign in 1901 he was sent for by the Republican National Committee and canvassed the state for the Republican nominees. He had been invited to that state for the same purpose in 1900, and was again invited there in 1902. During the presidential campaign of 1900 he was called upon to make a number of speeches in Idaho and Washington, where he addressed large crowds in the principal cities of those states.

On the 14th of June, 1900, in Astoria, Governor Geer married Isabelle Trullinger, a native of Washington county, Ore., and a daughter of J. C. Trullinger, who came from Iowa in 1848, crossing the plains to Oregon with his parents. His father, Rev. Daniel Trullinger, also came in 1848 and settled in Marion county, the remainder of his life being spent principally in Washington and Clackamas counties, his death occurring near Molalla, in the latter county. The father of Mrs. Geer was a prominent mill man and lumber manufacturer. He built the electric light plant in Astoria and was the owner of that and the gas plant at the time of his death. In 1893 he served as a member of the state legislature. Mrs. Geer is a talented artist, well known in artistic and social circles in Oregon.

In social circles the governor is popular. Twenty-seven years ago, in Union county, he was made an Odd Fellow and now is a member of Olive Lodge, in Salem. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and of Abernethy Cabin (at Portland), of the Native Sons of Oregon. His life history stands in contradistinction to the old adage that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country," for Mr. Geer has gained recognition as one of the most distinguished citizens of his native state, and his lifework has had an important bearing upon the stable progress and prosperity of the commonwealth.

HON. JASON WHEELER. As a representative citizen of the days when men's souls were tried and lives impoverished in the mighty effort to establish a stronghold for the American nation in the northwest, the Hon. Jason Wheeler recalls vividly the trend of events from pioneer days to the present prosperity and affluence. He is properly called a landmark of those early times, for from his entrance into the territory he has been connected with almost every movement, every enterprise upon which statehood has been reared. As a sturdy, steady patriot of the new land he exposed his life to the dangers of Indian warfare; as a public official, chosen to serve through the indisputable evidence of his personal worth, he faithfully performed the duties which fell to his lot; as a citizen he has accepted the bounty of the government and given it back tenfold, in the cultivated fields of the lands which have made the agricultural life of the state of Oregon. Personally he is rich in characteristics which have won him many friends, and call forth the esteem and confidence of all who have ever known him.

Mr. Wheeler was born in Ohio, August 4, 1823, the son of Deland Wheeler, a native of Vermont, who served in the war of 1812. He removed to New York state, and after his marriage with Margaret Court, a native of that state, and the daughter of John Court, a native of England, who was engaged in farming there, he made a trip to Ohio. He returned to Cayuga county, N. Y., and continued his farming interests there, until his death at the age of sixty years. Of the eight sons which blessed his marriage all attained maturity. John came to Oregon in 1848 and died near Grant's Pass; Truman started across the plains in 1849 and died en route, near Salt Lake; George came to Oregon in 1872, and now makes his home at Everett, Wash.; and Leonard came in the same train in which his brother Jason traveled, and his death occurred in Lebanon, Linn county.

Jason Wheeler was the second oldest of this family of children, and on his father's farm in New York state he grew into the ways of a useful and practical life. He received a rather limited education in the district school in the vicinity of his home, after which, at the tender age of thirteen years, he ventured out into the world with the responsibility of his own livelihood before him. For six years he worked on neighboring farms, and when nineteen he decided to try his fortunes in the west, of which he had heard so much, and accordingly journeyed as far as Centreville, Mich., where he found employment in a hotel. Five years later, in 1847, he still further followed the sun in his course, outfitting at St. Joseph, Mo., with ox-teams and wagons, and May 1 starting over the old Oregon trail along the Platte river. The journey was a long and tedious one, and the party were saved from dangerous encounters with Indians only by the constant guard maintained day and night. September 7, 1847, found them at the end of their trip, at Oregon City. Mr. Wheeler came down the Columbia river from The Dalles with Governor Abernethy, and at Peterson's butte in Linn county took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres. Building a little log cabin there, he prepared to make this his home. With the breaking out of the Cayuse war, he volunteered under Captain Maxon and at once went to the scene of action. In the battle of Wells Springs, February 28, 1848, he was wounded in the right knee, and it was under these conditions that the greatest suffering was experienced. The soldiers had constructed a place for their wounded comrades at Whitman station, and there he was carried in a wagon, a distance of fifty miles from the scene of his injury. After many weeks of suffering he returned in May of the same year to the valley. In the spring of 1849 he went overland to California and engaged in mining on the American river. He continued there until the fall, and then, with the fruits of a well-spent summer he invested in various mercantile articles, and embarked on the sailing vessel Hagstaff for Portland, which he was not destined to reach until he had passed through many hardships and dangers. After a voyage of eighteen days the boat was wrecked at the mouth of the Rogue river, and the passengers were left scattered among the mountains.

When he, with the passengers and crew of the wrecked vessel, started up the river, depending for means of sustenance on spike-nard and other roots and sugar pine, for ten or twelve days, and the suffering of the party for water was intense, as they had left the river and for several days went up a "divide," where there was no water. So great was the suffering for food and water that some of the party, notably Shively, became temporarily insane. Mr. Wheeler one day went out with his gun to try to find something to appease the cravings of their hunger, and he fortunately shot a squirrel and a pigeon, and returned to camp, and found Shively roasting a snake, and Mr. Wheeler said, "Shively, what are you going to do with that snake?" "I am going to eat it," said he. "I am so hungry I would eat anything." Wheeler said, "If you will not eat the snake I will give you half the squirrel." He agreed to that and Mr. Wheeler gave him half the squirrel—for the mess of eight persons. About nine or ten days after the party left the wrecked vessel, as they were struggling along toward the mountain top, they saw a large herd of elk, and following the directions of Mr. Wheeler, the party divided, each party passing around the mountain in such a way as to surround the elk without alarming them. When the maneuver was accomplished, at a prearranged signal, the party pressed toward the game, which did not appear to be disturbed by the presence of men, and the first one to approach the line of half famished men was a large bull, which was shot by Mr. Wheeler at a distance of about forty yards, and in an incredibly short time twenty elk had been shot, and one of the party cut out a quarter, weighing perhaps one hundred pounds, and said he could carry it a distance of about two miles to camp. It is needless to say he had overestimated his strength and underestimated the weight of his game, and before proceeding one hundred yards he stopped and cut out the bone, and with a stick over his shoulder to support it he managed to struggle into camp. The party, who was so hungry and weak, had so overloaded themselves that they were constantly stopping and lightening their load, until they finally reached camp with a small piece each. The next morning an elk was seen soon after leaving camp and was shot by the party, and such was its position that, though repeatedly shot, it did not fall, and on nearer approach it was discovered that it was prevented from falling by a tree, against which it was leaning and a slight push sent the game to the ground. From that time little game was found, and was so scarce the supply of food was exhausted, and only an occasional deer was killed, which kept the famished men up till they reached Cow creek, at a point not far from what is now Riddle Station; while there Mr. Wheeler met an Indian who evinced hostile designs, had a large knife which he brandished menacingly, whooping, as Mr. Wheeler thought, to give notice to other Indians who were in the vicinity, and whooped in answer, and the Indian gave directions as to the road the party should travel but indicated that they—the white men—should walk in advance, thus affording the Indians the advantage, if his designs were hostile; but Mr. Wheeler was too wary to walk in a narrow trail with an armed hostile Indian behind. His experience had been a good school, and he had been an apt scholar and learned that an Indian could only be trusted while under the vigilant eye of an armed white man. Hence he said to the red, "No, you walk in front and I will follow," and thus they traveled, the red in front and the white man, with a trusty rifle, following, until they reached Canyonville and Mr. Wheeler told the Indian he could dispense with his further services and he might return if he desired, and the Indian then left the party, and, to use the language of Mr. Wheeler: "We came on toward the Umpqua valley and we made camp on the Umpqua and stopped all night, and the boys scolded because I did not shoot a wolf for food, and I said he was too poor and gaunt, but, said they, 'We would have eaten him, anyway,' but we had nothing to eat, and the next morning we started following the trail we had traveled in the spring as we came south. I knew the road thence, as we had been over the road the spring before. This was about forty miles from the Welch place, the only place where there was any one living—where any one dared to stay—on account of the Indians. We reached Welch's the second day and remained and recuperated our strength, for we were badly worn and our feet were blistered and sore with much walking. After leaving Welch's we came to the valley and continued on to Portland."

The way had been hard and wearisome, but the trip was full of rich experiences which, in a measure, compensated for the hardships and deprivations endured.

In Portland he bought a pair of blankets, and made his way in a canoe down the Columbia river to Astoria, where he helped in the building of a sawmill, in which he worked for some time. Eventually he made his way back to his claim in Linn county. Subsequently he took up a section of land three miles north of Lebanon, where he successfully engaged in stock-raising.

The marriage of Mr. Wheeler occurred in Linn county, Ore., June 2, 1850, his wife being Eliza D. Claypool, who was born on the Platte purchase, a daughter of David Claypool, and came to Oregon in 1846, crossing the plains with her parents. Her death occurred in Albany in 1897. She was the mother of the following children: Melissa, now the wife of Dr. J. M. Kitchen, of Stayton, Ore.; Delia, deceased; Ellen, wife of John Morgan, of Albany; Mary, wife of C. H. Walker, of Albany; and Frank, located in California. Mr. Wheeler was married a second time in Linn county, September 29, 1898, to Miss Diana Elizabeth Hanchett, a native of Fulton county, Ill. In his political convictions a Democrat, Mr. Wheeler was first elected sheriff of Linn county while lying sick and wounded after the Cayuse war. He has since been quite active, serving three terms as county commissioner, and one term in the territorial legislature, and he has also served one or two terms as councilman of Albany, and one term as mayor, and once as a member of the state legislature. As a popular and prominent man in the state he was a member of the committee which was sent to Congress to obtain the passage of the Indian War Pension bill. Among the most important enterprises in which Mr. Wheeler gave very material assistance was the building of the Albany canal, the construction of which he superintended, and also performed the same duties in connection with the military road over the Cascade mountains. This road is four hundred and forty-eight and a half miles in length, and as manager he later sold out to Colonel Hogg for the sum of $130,000, which he divided pro rata among the stockholders, the sale and division being successfully carried to a close. During the administration of President Cleveland he was appointed Indian agent at the Warm Springs Indian reservation, occupying the post three years.

Mr. Wheeler was made a Mason in Corinthian Lodge of Albany. He also belongs to several state organizations, among them being the Indian War Veteran Association and the Pioneer Society. A devoted member of the Baptist Church, he is active in all the work pertaining to the same, and has acted as trustee. Constantly contributing to the cause of the church he also donated funds amply sufficient to cover the expense of a parsonage, and in many such ways he evidences his character as one belonging to an upright, honest, and honorable citizen. The first claim taken up by Mr. Wheeler in Oregon has been traded for one hundred and forty acres of land adjoining Albany, the cultivation of which he himself superintends, though now in his eighty-first year.

CHARLES H. LEE, M. D. "Earn thy reward; the Gods give naught to sloth," said the sage Epicharmus and the truth of this admonition has been verified in all the years which have run their course since his day. It is especially manifested in the learned professions where advancement depends entirely upon individual merit. Not by wealth, purchase or influence can one gain prestige in any of the professions, but steady progress therein is the legitimate outcome of earnest purpose, careful preparation and unflinching devotion to the calling. It has been in this way that Dr. Charles H. Lee has won distinction and success as a representative of the medical fraternity. In recent years ill health has compelled him to abandon in large degree the practice of medicine, but after a rest he has fully recuperated and is again an active practitioner of Corvallis.

The doctor was born in Hillsboro, Highland county, Ohio. His father, Edward Lee, was a native of the Shenandoah valley of Virginia, born in 1800, and the grandfather, Barnard Lee, died in the Old Dominion. He had married Miss Elkins, a representative of an old Virginian family of that name. About 1830 the doctor's father removed to Ohio and engaged in farming and stock-raising in Highland county, where he died in 1854. His wife bore the maiden name of Sarah Fisher and was born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Frederick Fisher, whose birth occurred in Germany. Crossing the Atlantic to the new world he settled in the Keystone state, but spent his last days in Highland county, Ohio. Mrs. Lee passed away in 1896 at the age of eighty-six years. Both she and her husband were members of the Lutheran Church and in their family were eleven children, all of whom reached years of maturity, while three are still living. One of the sons, Dr. J. B. Lee, was graduated from the Starling Medical College of Ohio, and he also graduated from the medical department of the University of Oregon. In 1862 he joined Foster's independent cavalry and went to Fort Leavenworth. He came to Oregon in 1863, located in Corvallis, where he practiced medicine up to the time of his death in 1892. He not only won distinction as a representative of the profession, but was also very prominent in public life and served as mayor of Corvallis, while for several terms he represented his district in the state senate. Another brother, Dr. James P. Lee, was a hospital steward in the army during the Civil war and died while serving his country.

Dr. C. H. Lee, who is the youngest of the family, was born June 2, 1850, and was reared in Highland county, Ohio, upon the home farm. When sixteen years of age he began teaching directly after his course in the high school. At the age of twenty he took up his study of medicine under Dr. Noble and later continued his reading under the direction of Dr. R. C. Russ. In 1874 he entered the Miami Medical College of Cincinnati, Ohio, in which he was graduated in 1877 with the degree of M. D. He then began practice in New Petersburg, Ohio, where he remained until 1884, which year witnessed his arrival in Corvallis, Ore. After eighteen months spent in this city he returned to Hillsboro, Ohio, where he spent about nine months, and in July, 1866, he again came to the northwest, locating in Newport, Ore., where he successfully engaged in practice for two years. Once more he took up his abode in Corvallis in 1888 and entered into partnership with his brother, this relation being maintained until the latter's death in 1892. Dr. Lee of this review has since practiced alone and is very successful in his administration of remedial agencies for the alleviation of human ills. He is also very efficient in his surgical work and for a long period he enjoyed an extended patronage, but of recent years has partially retired, confining his attention to his office and city practice.

The doctor was united in marriage in Corvallis to Miss Henrietta Foster, a native of Benton county and a daughter of John Foster, who was born in Ohio and came to Oregon in its pioneer days. Mrs. Lee was educated in Mills Seminary in Oakland, Cal., and is a most estimable lady who has made her hospitable home the center of a cultured society circle. The doctor was initiated into the mysteries of the Masonic craft in Buford, Ohio, and now belongs to Corvallis Lodge No. 14, A. F. & A. M. He took the Royal Arch degree at Greenfield, Ohio, and he has since been a worthy exemplar of the craft. In politics he has always been an active Democrat and in the line of his profession he is connected with the State Medical Society. Dr. Lee has become very widely known during his residence in this section of the state and his prominence is not less the result of social worth than of professional skill. He is a man of broad intelligence, highly educated and is a representative of a distinguished and honored old southern family.

JAMES MARTIN. To James Martin is due the distinction of raising and shipping the first wheat in Benton county, and when the first consignment was well under way the captain in whose care it was placed honored the nationality of the pioneer grower by calling a certain portion of the river Irish Bend. In the estimation of all who knew him, Mr. Martin carries with him the finest traits to which his countrymen are heir, including invariable good nature and adaptability. He was born in County Down, Ireland, in June, 1822, and was one in a family of ten children born to farmer parents. He had no particular chance for advancement in his native land, and, being well aware of this fact, came to America in 1847, when he was at the ambitious and resourceful age of twenty-five. For about three years he was variously employed in Philadelphia, Pa., and in 1850 came to Ohio, settling in Mahoning county, near Canfield.

In 1852 Mr. Martin thought to try his chances in the west, but his manner of reaching it differed somewhat from the conventional route mapped out by the average fortune seeker. Going to New Orleans down the Mississippi river, he made his way to Vera Cruz and the City of Mexico, where he bought a pony and packed his goods, and himself walked to Acapulco and from there to San Francisco. After following mining a few months with indifferent success he came to Corvallis, and, after spending the first winter in the town took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres five miles northeast of Monroe. Here was conducted a lonely bachelor enterprise for some time, but which underwent a change in 1869, when the owner returned to Ohio and married Mary Wilson, a native of the Buckeye state. Returning immediately to Oregon, he settled on his claim, and from time to time success has induced him to add to his original purchase. In all he owns eight hundred and three acres of land, five hundred of which are under cultivation, and he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. From the first he has given much attention to grain, and was one of the first in his neighborhood to appreciate its possibilities in this direction. Upon his meadows graze large numbers of Durham cattle, and a variety of other kinds of stock, the sale of which brings to their owner a considerable yearly revenue. Mr. Martin is a Democrat in politics, but has never been an office-seeker, although he has creditably sustained many minor offices of a local nature. With his wife he is a member of the Episcopal Church, and contributes generously towards its support. Two children have been born into the family, Ida and John, both of whom are living at home.

HON. REUBEN PATRICK BOISE, connected for more years than any other man in the state with the jurisprudence of Oregon, and an important factor in the shaping of her splendid destiny, was born in Blandford, Hampden county, Mass., June 9, 1819. His ancestors on both sides of the family followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary war, and on the paternal side he is descended from those French Huguenots whose devotion to principle made them welcome refugees in any foreign land. From scarcely more tolerant Scotland members of the Boise family emigrated to the north of Ireland, whence the paternal great-grandfather emigrated to Massachusetts, settling on the farm in Blandford. This same farm was the birthplace of the paternal great-grandfather, Samuel. Like his forefathers, Reuben Boise, grandfather of the Hon. Reuben Patrick, was a farmer, and served in the state legislature. He married a Miss Patrick, who lived to be ninety-four years of age.

The father of Judge Boise lived and died on the old Hampden county farm, in the meantime exerting a broad influence in politics and the general affairs of his district. From Jefferson's time he was a Democrat, and then a Whig, finally subscribing to the principles of the Republican party. He held several offices in Massachusetts, among them being that of county commissioner, and he also served in the state senate and legislature. He married Sallie Putnam, who was born in New Salem, Mass., a daughter of Jacob Putnam, soldier at the battle of Bennington during the Revolutionary war, and relative of Gen. Israel Putnam, of Revolutionary fame. Mrs. Boise, who lived to be ninety-four years of age, was the mother of eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom Judge Boise is the third child and only one living. Two of the sons, Jarvis and Fisher Ames, died at the age of twenty-six years, just as they were to be admitted to the bar; and the other son, Stillman, died at the age of fifty.

Judge Boise was educated in the public schools of Blandford, and after preparatory study under Dr. Cooley entered Williams College at the age of twenty-one years, graduating therefrom in 1843, with the degree of A. B. After a year of school teaching in Missouri, he returned to his native state and studied law under his uncle, Patrick Boise, a distinguished lawyer of Westfield, being admitting to the bar three years later, in 1847. For the following two years he engaged in practice at Chicopee Falls, Mass., and during that time served as one of the town commissioners in charge of the schools. In the meantime he had accumulated a great deal of information concerning the west, to which he came in 1850, via Panama, locating in Portland, which was then but a small town. However, shipping and other interests were beginning to create a demand for legal talent, and the promising young lawyer found that he had plenty to do. By the fall of 1852 he was launched upon a fair practice, and his faith in the agricultural possibilities by which he was surrounded led him to invest in six hundred and forty acres of land west of Dallas, which he still owns, and upon which he lived about four years. In 1851 the territorial legislature elected him prosecuting attorney of the first and second districts, his field of effort lying between Eugene and Washington territory. In 1853 he was elected one of the code commissioners for Oregon, selected to compile the first code of laws for the territory, the others being the Hon. James K. Kelly and Hon. D. R. Biglow. In 1854 he was re-elected prosecuting attorney, and the same year represented Polk county in the territorial legislature, being re-elected for two years in the latter position. In 1857 he represented Polk county in the constitutional convention, was chairman of the committee on legislation, and in this capacity was instrumental in furnishing to Oregon her fundamental laws of government.

In 1857 Mr. Boise was appointed by President Buchanan one of the supreme court judges of the territory with Judges Williams and Deady, and after the admission of Oregon to statehood he was elected supreme judge of Oregon, with Judges Waite, Stratton and Prim. In 1878, by the constitution of the state, the judges first elected to the supreme court were to draw lots for their terms, one term two years, one four years and two six years. Judge Waite having drawn the shortest term, was by the constitution made chief justice of the supreme court; Judge Stratton at the end of two years became chief justice, and Judge Boise, at the end of four years, became chief justice. For twelve years Judge Boise continued to hold this honorable position, the duties thereof being particularly trying as the supreme judges were also obliged to be circuit judges of their districts. From 1862 to 1864, inclusive, he served as chief justice of Oregon, and upon the expiration of his term was re-elected for six years. After being again chosen in 1870 his seat was vigorously contested by Hon. B. F. Bonham, and rather than engage in long and expensive litigation, Judge Boise resigned his office and returned to the general practice of law. In 1874 he was elected by the legislature one of the capitol building commissioners, an office which he filled with distinct credit until 1876. The same year he was elected to his old position on the supreme bench. When the legislature, as authorized by the state constitution, provided for a separate supreme court and circuit courts, the new supreme court consisted of three judges. Judge Boise was appointed by the governor one of the three judges of the supreme court under the new system, with Judge James K. Kelly and Judge Prim. Judge Kelly being the oldest in years, became chief justice, and Judges Boise and Prim associates, and circuit judges were appointed from the judicial districts. These judges, both supreme and circuit, held their offices under the court and the new law creating them, until the next general election, when Judge Boise preferred the nomination for judge of the third judicial district, the same district from which he had formerly been elected to the supreme bench. He was elected and has held the office ever since, with the exception of six years, from 1892 to 1898. At present he has charge of Department No. 2, and in spite of his advancing years, and the fact that he has been a circuit judge of Oregon for all but eleven years since 1857, he still performs the duties of his office with old-time vigor and enthusiasm.

Judge Boise has been a resident of Salem ever since 1857. Until 1865 he lived on property in the town upon which is now built the convent of the Sacred Heart, and in 1880 purchased the farm which is still his home, and of which he retains sixty acres. During the years much property has passed through his hands, and the old farm taken by him upon his arrival in the territory has been enlarged to twenty-six hundred acres. The first house in Salem was built upon his present home, and he owns the old mission mill house and grounds, a portion of the house having been built in the early '40s. A part of his farm at Salem has been laid out in city lots, and the North Salem addition is included in this property. His farm is finely improved and profitable, and has greatly increased in value with the building up of the town. For some years Judge Boise was interested in a woolen factory near Dallas. Especially has he been interested in the development of the agricultural resources of his county, and as a member, and five times master of the Grange, has had the opportunity to further the interests of the farmers, whom he regards as the backbone of communities wherever found.

Oregon has had no more staunch supporter of her educational institutions than Judge Boise. Twice has he been a member of the board of trustees of Pacific University at Forest Grove, and has held the same position in La Creole Academy, at Dallas, and Willamette University at Salem, serving also as regent of the Agricultural College at Corvallis. Pacific University conferred upon the judge the degree of doctor of laws. Judge Boise is a member of the Oregon Historical Association and the Pioneer Association, and in this connection treasures his old-time friendships for other founders of the legal structure of the golden west, among whom may be mentioned Judge Kelly, who came to Oregon in 1851, and is now living in Washington; Governor Grover, who came to Portland in 1851; and George H. Williams, who arrived in the state in 1853.

The first marriage of Judge Boise was contracted in San Francisco in 1851, and was with Ellen F. Lyon, a native of Boston, Mass., and daughter of Capt. Lemuel Lyon, a pioneer of the Pacific coast. Mrs. Boise, who was a cousin of General Lyon, who was killed at the battle of Wilson Creek, Mo., died in Oregon, leaving two children, of whom Reuben P., Jr., is engaged in the real-estate business in Salem; and Whitney L. is an attorney in Portland. In 1867 Judge Boise married Emily A. Pratt, a native of Worcester, Mass., a daughter of Ephraim Pratt, a manufacturer of Massachusetts, and sister of Captain Pratt, who started the woolen mill of this town. Of this last union were born two children, of whom Ellen, a graduate of Willamette University, was drowned in the undertow at Long Beach, Wash., at the age of twenty-two; and Maria, also a graduate of Willamette University, is living with her father. During his first voting days the judge was a Douglas Democrat, but after the war subscribed to the principles of the Republican party. It is unquestionably true that it was largely owing to the efforts of this early pioneer judge that his state was saved to the Union, for he unceasingly worked to that end, and by sound logic, well delivered, did much to direct public opinion into channels of humanity and broad-mindedness. The career of Judge Boise needs no eulogy. He has been noted for his equitable rulings and lucid exposition of the law; for his rugged integrity under any and all circumstances; and for his devotion to friends and the interests intrusted to his care.

AUGUSTUS H. BUCKINGHAM. Among the more recent acquisitions to the business community of Bellfountain due mention should be given to A. H. Buckingham, who since March 1, 1903, has been engaged in mercantile interests here. Heman C. Buckingham, the father of A. H., was born March 15, 1812, in New York state, and until his first marriage, which united him with Miss Laura Kinney, he remained at home with his parents. Mrs. Buckingham died when quite young, leaving one child, who is also deceased. After his marriage to his second wife, who was Miss Betsie Trumble, the family moved to Illinois, which was their home until the year 1845, which witnessed their outfitting for the trip across the plains. Instead of making the continuous journey, however, they varied the monotony by spending the winter months in St. Joseph, Mo., but with the dawn of spring again resumed the journey. Oregon City was their destination, and there the father engaged in a mercantile business until 1850, when he came to Benton county, taking up a donation claim south of Bellfountain. His second wife did not long survive the arduous journey to the west, and at her death left two children, one of whom, Lovina Greeg, resides in the vicinity of Bellfountain.

The third marriage of Heman C. Buckingham was with Matilda J. Starr, a native of Ohio, who came to Oregon in 1848. Of the nine children who blessed this marriage seven are living, and are named as follows: Precious, Mrs. Pruett, of Oakland, Cal; Augustus H.; Deette, Mrs. Barrows, of Coos county; Victor, a resident of Roseburg, Douglas county; John, also a resident of Coos county; Edith, Mrs. Rayburn, of Portland; and Mrs. Winnifred Woodcock, of Bellfountain. The parents continued to live on the old donation claim until their death, the father passing away when sixty-eight and the mother when sixty-three years of age. Both were prominent and active members of the United Brethren Church. Mr. Buckingham was a very popular man in his community, and served one term in the state legislature.

Augustus H. Buckingham received his education in the district schools and in Philomath College, and remained at home until his marriage with Miss Lillian Frink, a native of Benton county. Their early married life was spent in the vicinity of the old home place, and two years later they removed to Philomath. During the three years in which they resided there the wife died, and thereafter Mr. Buckingham went to Pendleton, Umatilla county, where for about three years he was engaged in the grocery business. His second marriage occurred in 1886 and united him with Miss Henrietta Pendergrass, a native of Coos county, and the following year the family removed to the latter county, remaining there until 1900. In the meantime having purchased two hundred and seventy-two acres of the old family homestead, Mr. Buckingham removed hither in the year last mentioned, engaging in general farming upon the tract until March 1, 1903, when, as previously stated, he purchased his general mercantile store in Bellfountain. During Mr. Buckingham's residence upon the farm many improvements were made which have enhanced it both in appearance and in value, and one hundred and fifty acres are now under active cultivation. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Buckingham, George, Lelah and Velma, and all are at home with their parents. Among the fraternal organizations Mr. Buckingham's name is to be found enrolled as a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Degree of Honor, and he is also identified with the Grange. Politically he supports the principles of the Republican party.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS CONE. The third generation of the Cone family in Oregon is worthily represented by Gustavus Adolphus Cone, who was born upon the farm near Hubbard upon which he now lives, September 19, 1873. His father, also Gustavus Adolphus, one of several brothers to emigrate to the west in the early days, was born in Rush county, Ind., November 21, 1823, and when nine years of age removed with his parents to LaPorte county, also in Indiana. There he learned the cooper's trade, which he followed in Indiana. The other members of the family removed to Illinois and thence, in 1841, to Iowa. His two brothers, Anson and Aaron, having come to Oregon in 1846, Gustavus A. followed their example the following year, leaving behind him a paying cooperage business in Michigan City, Ind. Seven months were required to accomplish the journey from Indiana to Oregon. Having arrived at his destination, he located in Oregon City and worked at his trade. During the historic year 1849 he contracted the gold fever, which was rendering half the inhabitants dissatisfied with existing conditions, and went to California, where he mined with moderate success on the middle, north and south forks of the American river. Afterward he engaged in the hotel business in Sacramento. In the fall of 1849 he returned to Oregon by vessel, spending twenty-seven days on the water. Soon after reaching Portland he purchased the title to six hundred and forty acres of land on the French prairie. Having thus established himself permanently and satisfactorily, he was united in marriage December 15, 1850, to Rebecca Emma Iler, a native of the state of Ohio, and a daughter of James Iler. Of the seven children born and reared of this union, Benjamin F. lives on a ranch near Moscow, Idaho; Louise is the wife of John Murray of Butteville, Ore.; Lewis died at the age of twenty-one; Laura is the wife of Fred Ernst of Jefferson, Ore.; Heman is a resident of Portland, Ore.; Anna is the wife of A. L. Rice of Silverton; and Gustavus Adolphus is living on a portion of the old donation claim.

Too much cannot be said of the admirable and useful life of Gustavus A. Cone, who possessed all of the strong and reliable attributes with which we are wont to invest the typical western pioneer. In the twilight of a venerable age he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had eighteen grandchildren and four great-grandchildren, nearly all of whom were possessed of rugged constitutions, and who, without exception, regarded their grandparent as the embodiment of all that was honorable and genial. Many years before his death he was the undisputed owner of the entire six hundred and forty acres of land, and upon this he successfully raised grain and general produce, devoting much time to the breeding of Short-horns and other high-grade stock. His business ability found vent in a general mercantile enterprise conducted in Butteville for several years in partnership with his eldest son, Benjamin F., and he was instrumental in bringing about the organization of the Farmer's Warehouse Association. A Republican in his political affiliations, he filled many positions of trust in the community, and he took a deep interest in the maintenance of a high standard of education, serving for many years on the school board. He was one of the oldest Masons in the state of Oregon, was connected with Multnomah Lodge of Oregon City, and passed all the chairs in the Blue Lodge. His death occurred December 26, 1898.

The present Gustavus Adolphus Cone was reared on the home farm in Marion county, and was educated in the public schools, the Oregon State Agricultural College at Corvallis, Newburg College, and the Portland Business College. With the exception of one summer spent among the mines of Idaho, he has continued to reside upon the old donation claim, of which he now owns three hundred and twenty acres. He is engaged successfully in general farming and stock-raising, and has thirteen acres under hops. May 9, 1896, he was married to Alice Ackerson, who was born in Johnson county, Neb., a daughter of Truman and Mary Ann (Linford) Ackerson, who came to Oregon in 1876. Mr. and Mrs. Cone are the parents of three children: Earl T., Hazel M., and Letha Beryl.

Mr. Cone is a staunch Republican, as was his father, and fraternally is associated with the Maccabees. He has prospered in his chosen calling, and has a justifiable ambition to make his property one of the finest and most productive in the entire northwest. He takes an active interest in public affairs, though not identified prominently with the political undertakings of his neighborhood, and is ever ready to assist in these enterprises which are calculated to improve general conditions. He enjoys the confidence and esteem of all who know him, who regard him as a man of probity, conscientious and fair-minded in all that he does, and with a fine regard for the rights and privileges of others.

MAGNUS EK. To those interested in the derivation of names, and in their relation to things in the material world, and more especially to those unfamiliar with the Swedish tongue, the name of Magnus Ek, ice manufacturer and expert millwright of Corvallis, seems singularly appropriate. Surely in his general make-up Mr. Ek has something of the sturdiness and strength of the "ek" or oak, as it is translated in English, and one is inclined to attribute a great deal of his success in life to the possession of this same strength and ruggedness. As indicated, Mr. Ek is a native of Sweden, and was born at Skaane Christianstad, a fortified town, located on the Helge-a, near the Baltic sea, and two hundred and sixty-five miles from Stockholm. The date of his nativity is September 27, 1860, and he was educated in the public schools of his native city. His father, Mons Ellis Ek, was a native of the same place, and by trade was a cabinetmaker. His mother, Bengte (Swenson) Ek, was born in the same northern clime, and both parents spent their entire lives in the immediate vicinity of their birth. Of the six children born into the family all are living, Magnus, the second child, and his sister, a resident of Ohio, being the two members who emigrated to America.

When about fifteen years of age Magnus apprenticed to a cabinetmaker for four years, and after completing his services traveled as a journeyman through Sweden, Denmark and Norway. In the spring of 1882 he came to the United States, and from Chicago made his way to Casey, Ill., and engaged in railroad work. Returning to Chicago he became interested in milling with the North Chicago Planing Mill Company, but soon worked up a desire to go west, thereafter hunting around for ways to accomplish his desire. The most hopeful method seemed to associate himself with different railroad companies as cabinetmaker and general carpenter, so he became an employe of the Northwestern Railroad Company on the western Iowa division. At the expiration of three years he branched off into working as a millwright for the Alton Croix Company of Iowa, and then for a time traveled in the interest of milling. As millwright he became identified with the Novelty Iron Works, and after that traveled around to different cities in Iowa, constructing mills. Many of the foremost mills now operating in Iowa were placed in operation by this excellent and very skillful millwright.

In 1885 Mr. Ek came to California, and after working for the Pioneer Mill Company of Sacramento for three months became associated with the Sperry Mills, and from there went to San Francisco. Here he received the contract to put in the big mills at Salem, Ore., having completed which he placed mills at Rickreall and Turner. For several years he was with the Oregon Milling Company, and he then entered into the sawmilling business six miles southeast of Silverton. This was a steam sawmill, and in partnership with Mr. Johnson, under the firm name of Johnson & Ek, he manufactured large quantities of lumber and general building supplies. After disposing of the mills he lived for a year in Portland as an employe of the Johnson Shipyard, and then went to California on a dredge building expedition for the Ridsen Iron Works Company, on Feather river. This contract lasted eight months, and upon returning to Portland Mr. Ek worked in the shipyard for another year, and then located in Silverton, where he had in the meantime built a fine residence.

In 1900 Mr. Ek came to Corvallis to overhaul the Fisher Flouring Mills, and later acted in a similar capacity for the Fisher mills at Silverton. In August, 1901, he bought of John Zeis the ice-works of this place, and immediately remodeled and enlarged the plant, so that at present it is one of the best equipped ice manufacturing plants in the state. During the season the plant is kept going night and day, and the capacity is three tons per day. Two engines, one of twenty and one of eight horse power supply the motive power, and in connection with the manufacture of ice is maintained a storage business of large capacity. To his plant Mr. Ek has added a cabinet-shop, and turns out all kinds of work in the carpenter line. He delivers ice all over the town, and attends to a great deal of the carpenter work and building.

In Silverton, Ore., Mr. Ek married Emma Johnson, a native of Kansas, and daughter of Matthew Johnson, at present a resident of Portland. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ek, Ray, Vivien, Ellis and Walter. Mr. Ek is a Republican in politics, and was a member of the council in Silverton for one term. He is fraternally connected with the Masons of Turner, and the Woodmen of the World. His religious home is with the Lutheran church. As will be seen by this account, Mr. Ek is a man of more than ordinary ability and versatility, and he has fortunately succeeded in all of his avenues of activity. Alert, progressive, observing, and adaptive, he has already accomplished, and in successful manner, more than the average man succeeds in crowding into an entire lifetime.

FRANCOIS XAVIER MATTHIEU. A life replete with interest through intimate association with the events of pioneer days, is that of Francois Xavier Matthieu, who is one of the last surviving members of the first emigrant train to cross the plains and give to the upbuilding of the west the hardy and fearless men and women who dared to venture into the dangers and privations of such a journey for the sake of the homes they hoped to make in the rich lands of the great northwest. Probably there is no man living in the Willamette valley to-day who is more conversant with the conditions and history of that interesting period and the events that led up to the statehood of Oregon, than Mr. Matthieu. A late reminder of his first experiences in Oregon occurred May 2, 1901, at the unveiling of the monument at Champoeg, where Governor Geer, in behalf of the Oregon Historical Society, presented to him a badge, as a mark of distinction to the last survivor of the fifty-two people who voted for the first provisional government west of the Rocky mountains, May 2, 1843. This badge is of silk, the colors being red, white and blue; a rosette with the seal of Oregon occupies the center, while a pendant medallion represents Oregon as a member of the Union. The inscription reads as follows: "Only survivor of the fifty-two persons who voted to organize the first civil government west of the Rocky mountains, at Champoeg, May 2, 1843, known in history as the Provisional Government of Oregon." At that early historical meeting in Champoeg, May 2, 1843, there were present one hundred and two people, many of whom were French Canadians. Mr. Matthieu had used every effort to induce these people to cast their vote in favor of the Americans, and when Joseph L. Meeks asked the party to divide, he was the first to step to the American side.

The birth of Francois X. Matthieu occurred at Terre Bonne, near Montreal, Canada, April 2, 1818. He is a descendant of French ancestry, his parents being Francois Xavier and Louise (Daufin) Matthieu, both, however, being natives of the district of Montreal. Being one of seven children, three sons and four daughters, and his parents in rather straitened circumstances, he lacked many of the advantages which might otherwise have been his, the farm life to which he was reared being the only occupation of his boyhood years. But few schools existed in the country, and all his education was acquired through association with a neighbor, who had come from the United States and settled there. During the Canadian rebellion, in 1835-38, Mr. Matthieu took an active part by supplying arms to the rebels. At twenty years of age, Mr. Matthieu left his home and located in the United States; he was then unable to speak a word of the English language. Going to Albany, N. Y., he engaged in carpenter work for seven months, after which he came as far west as Milwaukee, Wis., making the journey by way of Erie canal and the lakes. One month was passed in the last-named city, and he then went to St. Louis, by way of Chicago, traveling by wagon and water. Failing to secure work in that city, he engaged, after a like length of time, with the American Fur Company. While in this employ he was sent to what is now North Dakota, in the Black Foot Indian country, there to trade liquor to the Indians for furs. There were thirty men in the company, twenty wagons with two mules to each, and two barrels of liquor in each wagon, the journey being made by water and land, as was the custom in those days. The liquor was so welcome to the Indians that Mr. Matthieu was able to trade one gallon of it for as many as fifteen buffalo skins, such bartering meaning great profit to the company for which he was working. While there, he learned the Indian language. After one season he returned with his furs to St. Louis, where he engaged with Joe Rubedow, a fur trader, at that time located above Fort Benton, in the Black Hill country, where he remained until the spring of 1842. In that year, at Fort Laramie, he joined the first emigrant train bound for the great west. This train consisted of fifty or sixty wagons, and one hundred and fifty people, sixty-one of whom were men, under the command of Hastings and Lovejoy. At Fort Hall the emigrants were compelled to abandon their wagons and walk the balance of the way, driving their oxen. There Mr. Matthieu and six others left the train and joined the Hudson Bay Company, going on to Wallula, Wash., from which settlement they followed the Indian trail to Mount Hood and The Dalles, and on pack animals from there to Oregon City.

The morning after his arrival in this part of Oregon Mr. Matthieu started for the Willamette valley, where the Hudson Bay Company had trappers. At that time there were about two hundred and fifty families scattered throughout the country, principally French Canadians, employed by the Hudson Bay Company, having come there at different times between the years 1824 and 1842. On reaching the valley Mr. Matthieu took up his abode with Etien Lucien, a Canadian by birth, who had settled here in 1811. One of the most striking conditions of the times when Mr. Matthieu took up his residence in this section of the country was the absence of gold or silver for currency, a necessity being given in exchange for provisions, labor or land. In 1843, Mr. Matthieu took up a claim of three hundred acres near Fairfield, but he never made his home in the location. In 1844 he bought a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, paying $600 therefor, and upon which he now makes his home, having removed here in 1846. The farm is located one and one-half miles southwest of Aurora, Marion county. He at once erected a hewed log house, in the same year building a house at Butteville, where he followed the carpenter's trade. Later he purchased some property in Aurora and improved it, though he still made his home on the claim. In 1851 he started a general merchandise store in Butteville, in company with George La Rock and Mr. Du Puis, the three continuing in partnership for twelve years, when Mr. Matthieu became sole owner and conducted the business until 1866. At that date he sold his stock and returned to his farm.

At variance with his steady business interests, Mr. Matthieu has branched out in other directions, among his ventures being a trip to California, in 1849, during the gold excitement. In partnership with another, he loaded fourteen pack horses with flour and other provisions, intending to dispose of their stock to the miners. The venture was not a success, financially, as Mr. Matthieu lost $2,000, and after three months, much of which time he suffered from illness, he returned by water to Portland, Ore. A more pleasant diversion in his pioneer life was a trip back to Canada in 1858, where he enjoyed visiting the scenes of his childhood.

By the marriage of Mr. Matthieu, April 15, 1844, to Rosalie Aussant, who died February 12, 1901, aged seventy-four years, he has had fifteen children, named in order of birth as follows: Philomene, born April 20, 1845, now Mrs. Dwight Geer, of Wilbur, Wash.; Charles, born July 7, 1847, and living on the home farm; Clara, Mrs. Ouimette, born August 16, 1849, and now a widow; Rose, born November 10, 1851, now the wife of Charles Bergevein, of Portland; Priscilla Clotilda, born November 10, 1851, and died November 7, 1874; Arcino Laodice, born January 4, 1857, and now the wife of A. Burton; Francis Xavier Edward born October 17, 1858, and died November 3, 1891; Henry Clovis, born November 9, 1860, and died February 19, 1862; Alfred Stephen, born November 14, 1862, a druggist in Portland; John Joseph Fabian, born October 30, 1864, and living on the home farm; Ernest Theodore, born August 2, 1866, located in Salem; Francis L., born February 25, 1868; Robert Wilfred, born August 5, 1869, and was accidentally shot April 20, 1895, dying within an hour and ten minutes; Mary Louise, born July 25, 1871, now the wife of Samuel Howard, of Portland; and Violet Adelaide, born April 21, 1873, and died September 12, 1896.

While making for himself a competency in the country of his adoption, Mr. Matthieu has not neglected to give his energies, mental, moral and physical, toward the upbuilding of the opportunities of the territory into a great and noble commonwealth. His most earnest efforts have been devoted toward this end, since he first cast his vote for the provisional government, soon after which he was elected justice of the peace, being the first to hold that office in this community, an office which at that time included the duties of a circuit or probate judge. He discharged the duties of that position for four years. The only court on the coast, there was no appeal from his decision. He and Dr. Wilson served together. After the organized law Mr. Matthieu was one of the first county commissioners of Marion county. In politics a staunch follower of Democratic principles, Mr. Matthieu was very active in the organization of the Democratic party in Oregon, and served in 1874, and again in 1878, in the state legislature, ably representing the people who had honored him with their votes. He had previously given his time and attention to the laying out of roads, and the organization of schools, and many other public services too numerous to mention. During the Cayuse Indian war he was assistant quartermaster on French Prairie, and helped to raise a company, giving liberally of horses and provisions for the troops, thus proving his loyalty and courage. Among other noteworthy incidents in his life was the organization of the Pioneer Association, to which he contributed his efforts in company with Judge Grim, Eli Cooley and W. H. Reese, Mr. Matthieu being the only one of the four men now living. He was the first president of the society, serving for two years. A late honor in the life of Mr. Matthieu occurred when President Roosevelt visited Salem, the place of honor beside the president on the platform being given to this venerable pioneer. Fraternally, Mr. Matthieu has been a Mason since 1856, being a member of Multnomah Lodge, of Oregon City. In June, 1901, the grand master's degree was conferred upon him by the state Grand Lodge, then in session at Portland. An evidence of the exceptional morality of Mr. Matthieu lies in the fact that though eighty-five years of age he can boast that never in his life has he used tobacco in any form, all other acts of his life corresponding to the high sense of honor that has placed him among the first citizens of Marion county.

R. WILLIAM FRY. Among the native sons of Linn county who are proving worthy their early training, and the opportunities which surround them, R. William Fry occupies a prominent place. He is not only industrious and practical in the management of his two farms, but is of a progressive turn of mind, alert to every advantage which invention and latter-day ingenuity has placed at the disposal of the tiller of the soil. Of the farm near Albany where he was born

September 15, 1856, Mr. Fry owns one hundred and sixty acres, and his home place near Newport consists of one hundred acres. His father was one of the early settlers of this state, and the son grew to maturity under the most kindly and auspicious circumstances, being instilled with a thorough appreciation of the dignity and usefulness of agricultural life.

At the age of twenty-one years Mr. Fry left the old homestead and took up his residence on the farm of his uncle, which he rented for two years, and then removed to a farm near his old home. Four years later found him located amid the scenes of his youth, and which bore innumerable tokens of the industry and good management of his sire. Eventually he came to his present farm, in connection with which he runs his share of the old place, devoting both farms to general farming and stock-raising. He is successful and popular, living far behind his yearly income, and thus laying up for a stormy day, or perchance for the more complete enjoyment of a bright one.

The marriage of Mr. Fry and Irene Swank took place in 1895. One child, Roberta, was born December 15, 1899. Mr. Fry is a Democrat in politics, and his sociability and loyalty find appreciation and outlet in the lodge of the Modern Woodmen of Albany. He is one of the strongest members of a successful community of agricultural interests, and his wide-awake efforts reflect credit upon all who surround him as friends or associates.

THOMAS H. SIMS. One need not look to the past to find examples worthy of emulation, for in the life history of those about us we can find qualities that may well be an example to those who would gain the respect and win the confidence and regard of their fellow-men. The life history of Thomas H. Sims illustrates forcibly the power of activity and integrity in the every-day affairs of life. He has gained success as a lumber manufacturer of the northwest and now lives retired in Salem, where he stands high in the community.

A native of Woodstock, Ontario, Canada, Mr. Sims was born April 3, 1853. His father, William Sims, was a native of Greenwich, England. The latter was a carpenter and builder, and when a young man crossed the ocean to Woodstock, Ontario, and in that place and the surrounding district he followed the builders' trade until his life's labors were ended in death. He held membership with the Church of England and was a man whose personal worth was above question. He wedded Jane Martin, who was born in Sussex, England. Her father, who was a stair builder, brought the family to the new world, settling in Woodstock, and Mrs. Sims is still living in Oxford county, Ontario. Mr. and Mrs. Sims became the parents of ten children, seven of whom yet survive, and of this number three are in Oregon, Thomas H. and two sisters, Mrs. Mary E. Shaw, of Salem, and Mrs. James Milne, of Howell Prairie.

Thomas H. Sims was the ninth in order of birth in his father's family. His youth was spent in Oxford county in the province of Ontario. When the son was only three years old his father died at Woodstock and the mother afterward removed to the township of East Nissouri, where Thomas H. Sims attended the National School. In his boyhood he lived upon the farm and early became familiar with the work of the farm and also learned the carpenter's trade under the direction of his brothers, who were contractors. He was fourteen years of age when he undertook to master the builder's art and he found no difficulty in this, for he possessed much natural mechanical ability and skill in the use of tools. The brothers continued together in their farming operations and as contractors and builders until 1877, when, attracted by the opportunities of the west, Thomas H. Sims came to Oregon, settling at Stayton, Marion county, where he spent the first summer. He was engaged in farming until the fall of 1877, when, in connection with his brother-in-law, John A. Shaw, he purchased a saw-mill operated by water power, at that place, and was for several years successfully engaged in the manufacture of lumber. On disposing of his interest in that enterprise he became a merchant of Stayton, and while thus engaged he joined Mr. Shaw, W. H. Hobson and Lee Brown in the incorporation of the Santiam Lumber Company, of Mill City. Mr. Sims became general manager and superintendent and erected a new mill on Santiam river, at Mill City, operating the same by water power. This mill has a capacity of ninety thousand feet of lumber in ten hours, and the company owns its own lumber tracts situated on the river above the mill, thus affording opportunity to engage in logging by river as well as by rail. Retail lumber yards were established in Salem and in Albany, and extensive shipments were made to the east. In 1891 Mr. Sims came to Salem as manager of the business here, and the splendid success of the lumber enterprise was due in large measure to his thorough understanding of the business, his practical knowledge and sound judgment. He also engaged in merchandising at Stayton as a member of the firm of W. H. Hobson & Co., and the Santiam Lumber Company was the owner of a mercantile store at Mill City. In 1893 Mr. Sims closed out the yard in Salem, but continued as manager of the mill until it was sold to the Curtis Lumber Company in 1899. He has become largely interested in timber and farm lands, but is now practically retired from business cares, enjoying a well earned rest. In 1893 he erected his present home on State and Fifteenth streets.

At Shaw Station, June 23, 1879, Mr. Sims was united in marriage with Miss Sarah J. Shaw, who was born in Oxford county, Ontario, a daughter of Angus and Mary J. (Keley) Shaw. Her father, also a native of Ontario, followed farming in that locality until 1876, when he, too, became a resident of the northwest, purchasing a farm in Marion county, upon which Shaw Station has since been established. He had a large tract of land and became a prosperous agriculturist. He was of Scotch descent, his mother having been a Miss Cameron prior to her marriage. Mrs. Angus Shaw was born in the north of Ireland, and was brought to the new world by her parents, who located in Ontario. She is now a resident of Reidville, Washington county, Ore. In the Shaw family are nine living children, seven of whom reside in this state, while two are residents of Washington. Those residing in this state are: John A., of Albany; Mrs. J. J. Graham, also of Albany; W. A., of Portland; S. A., also of Portland; Mrs. Rachel Stish, of Mill City; Mrs. Thomas H. Sims, of Salem; and Daniel, of Reidville. Mrs. Mary McIntosh and J. F. Shaw reside in Washington. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Sims has been blessed with three children: Austin, Mercedes and Bernice.

From the time age gave to Mr. Sims the right of franchise he has been a stalwart advocate of the Republican party, and in December, 1900, was elected on that ticket as alderman from the Third ward, the only member of his party elected at that time. He became chairman of the fire and water committee and took an active interest in the work of the city council, doing everything in his power to advance progress, reform and improvement in Salem. That he discharged his duties in a manner satisfactory to his constituents and to the public at large is shown by the fact that in 1902 he was re-elected without opposition. While in Canada Mr. Sims was made a Mason and afterward transferred his membership to the lodge at Stayton, but is now demitted. His wife became a member of the Eastern Star, and she is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Sims has shown himself a resourceful business man, quick to plan and perform, yet his business activity has been based upon sound judgment and a recognition of existing conditions and possibilities. In establishing, controlling and enlarging important mercantile and industrial enterprises of the northwest he has gained for himself wealth and at the same time has promoted the commercial prosperity of the community in which his lot has been cast.

Wm Laughlin

WILLIAM LAUGHLIN. One of the large land owners of Yamhill county is William Laughlin, the possessor of nine hundred acres of land devoted principally to stock-raising interests. Mr. Laughlin, who feels a just pride in his Revolutionary ancestry, and in forefathers who accomplished largely and substantially, was born in Lincoln county, Mo., October 13, 1830. His grandfather was James, and his father, Samuel, the latter being especially worthy of mention as comprising one of the largest bands that crossed the plains in 1847.

William Laughlin was educated in Missouri and Yamhill county, Ore., and when eighteen years old left the farm upon which his father had settled and tried his luck in the mines near Stockton, Cal. From the fact that he spent over two years in the mines argues that he must have been reasonably successful, and that from May, 1849, until August, 1851, he succeeded in appropriating to his own use a fair share of the hidden treasure of the earth. From the mines he went to San Francisco and thence embarked for Portland, arriving at length on the old homestead in Yamhill county. In 1853 he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres east of North Yamhill, where he farmed and raised stock for four years, and then traded for a farm of two hundred acres upon which he lived and prospered until October 8, 1892. He then settled on his present farm of one hundred and ninety-four acres, which, however, he had purchased in 1886. To this has been added by more recent purchase, so that at present Mr. Laughlin owns about nine hundred acres, being one of the very large operators of this county.

April 3, 1857, Mr. Laughlin was united in marriage with Phoebe Roberts, born in Tippecanoe county, Ind., October 8, 1839, and of this union there were born sixteen children, twelve of whom are living: Bedford H. is a resident of Forest Grove; Charles lives in Alaska; George also is in Alaska; Abram is a farmer in Yamhill county; Mrs. Mary Tate lives in Seattle, Wash.; William lives near Yamhill; Samuel is cashier of the North Yamhill Bank; Benjamin lives in the state of Washington; Alice is living at home; Leona lives in Washington; Mrs. Delia Richardson lives in Goldendale, Wash., and Crystal lives with her parents. Like all the members of his widely diffused family Mr. Laughlin is a staunch adherent of the Republican party, and among the offices maintained by him with credit may be mentioned that of road supervisor and school director. He is a liberal minded, progressive member of the community, and as an agriculturist is both practical and successful.

BEDFORD H. LAUGHLIN of Forest Grove, is a native son of Oregon, and was born on his father's farm in Yamhill county, February 4, 1858. His parents, William and Phoebe (Roberts) Laughlin, are natives respectively of Missouri and Indiana, and his grandfather, Samuel, was born in the state of North Carolina. The latter removed from North Carolina to Missouri in the '20s and in 1847 crossed the plains with ox teams, locating on the claim in Yamhill county where the remainder of his life was spent. His son, William, was reared principally in Missouri, and was seventeen years of age when the memorable trip was undertaken, and he in time took up three hundred and twenty acres in North Yamhill, Yamhill county, to which he has since added another large farm. He served with distinction in the Yakima Indian war of 1855-56, and has in many other ways shown his deep interest in the affairs of his native state. At present he is living on his well improved property two miles west of North Yamhill, managing both of his farms with an abundant degree of success. His wife is a daughter of Henry Roberts, who removed at an early day from Pennsylvania to Indiana, and who crossed the plains in 1848, his daughter being at that time seven years of age. Sixteen children were born to William and Phoebe Laughlin, and of these twelve are still living, Bedford H. being the oldest of the family.

After completing his education at the district schools and Tualatin Academy, Mr. Laughlin engaged in business for a year in Forest Grove, and then turned his attention to mining for several years. At present he is one of the best informed men in the county on mining affairs in general, he having experienced all the ups and downs which harass the soul and delight the heart of searchers after golden fortunes. 1883 found him in the Cœur d'Alene district during the excitement, after which he went up into British Columbia, and in all worked in the mines and at prospecting for five years. During that time he spent a couple of winters in Forest Grove, and after finishing in the mines engaged in railroading with the Northern Pacific and the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, principally in the freight department.

In 1896 Mr. Laughlin renewed his association with mining, going to the extreme north to Cook's Inlet, Alaska. After spending the winter in Juneau he availed himself of the promising conditions in the Klondike and started over the Chilkoot Pass in March, 1897. Going down the Yukon, he took up a claim on American gulch, tributary to Bonanza creek, and in this enterprise was seconded by two comrades who also took up claims in the same neighborhood. The men worked faithfully for three years, and realized considerable success, although not sufficient to wish to devote the remainder of their lives to mining. Mr. Laughlin spent the winter of 1900-01 in North Yamhill, and in the spring of 1901 tried his luck in the Copper River country. Returning to this town that fall he bought a livery business which he built up and enlarged, and conducted a general livery and transfer business until he disposed of the same in March, 1903. Mr. Laughlin was united in marriage in Forest Grove June 18, 1902, with Nora E. Johnson, a native of Yamhill county, Ore., and a daughter of Thomas and Rebecca Gallee. Mr. Laughlin was made a Mason in Washington, and was identified with Palouse Lodge No. 46, until his transfer to Holbrook Lodge No. 30, of Forest Grove. He is a member of the Republican party, but has never taken an active interest in local affairs, or been willing to serve his party officially. He is a progressive, particularly well informed, and adaptive citizen, and his life has been prolific of great good will and esteem on the part of his fellow townsmen.

JEPHTHA THOMAS HUNT. No more interesting family has invaded the Pacific northwest than that of which Jephtha T. Hunt is a representative, and which was established in Oregon in 1847. The progenitor of the Hunt family was an officer in the army of William the Conqueror. After the battle of Hastings and the conquest of England, for his services in behalf of this mighty warrior he received a grant of lands in the north of England, where he settled down to peaceful pursuits, married a British maiden, and founded the present Hunt family. The latter has furnished many men who have won distinction in the various walks of life—governors of states, generals in the army, distinguished members of the bench and bar, illustrious physicians and profound scientists.

About the year 1600 three brothers of this family left the north of England and landed in New York, and in that state founded the Hunt family of America. Wilson Price Hunt of Trenton, N. J., was John Jacob Astor's most trusted man in the company which founded Astoria, Ore., April 12, 1811. He was also the first white man buried at the mouth of the Columbia river. The bank of the Skipanon river, where he was buried, having caved off, revealed his burial place, and his skull was placed in Wood's Museum in Portland, Ore.

Two of these brothers who came to America in the early days of the seventeenth century founded families in North Carolina. About the year 1800 some of the members of the family left Rowen county, N. C., and moved to Clairmont county, Ohio, and Wayne county, Ind., and from them the Oregon branch of the family sprang. One of these, Charles by name, Jephtha T. Hunt's great-great-grandfather, moved to Indiana, where Jonathan Hunt, his great-grandfather, was born. The latter married a Miss Shotwell. He located on a farm near Smithfield, Ind., where John S. Hunt, the grandfather, was born, and where his father, George W., was born February 8, 1831.

George W. Hunt's father learned the gunsmith's trade in his youth, and in 1835 emigrated with several of his neighbors to LaPorte county, Ind., and built the first house at Byron. He afterward built the first gun shop in the town of LaPorte, and became prominent in the general undertakings of that section, which he was forced to leave because of the chills and fever, a common affliction in those days. In eastern Indiana he settled near Liberty, the county seat of Union county, and while operating his saw and grist mill there lost large sums of money by reason of the general financial depression of the times. From personal friends in Oregon he received most favorable reports of this state, and forthwith made preparations to cross the plains. In the history of the family written by George W. Hunt appear details of the plans entered into for the long journey. It is recorded that the father and his sons partially made their own wagons, and ran a sugar orchard long enough to make sugar to carry them. On the way they encountered many Indians and had many other novel and exciting experiences; but having a fair outfit, they managed to reach their destination in safety, and in fairly good health and spirits. From one cause or another they lost many of their cattle, especially during the latter part of the trip, when hundreds of miles of travel had reduced them almost to skeletons, and made it difficult for them to withstand the chill of winter. The party were obliged to purchase new oxen, and these outstripping the weary ones, the latter were left behind, with few exceptions.

Arriving in the Waldo Hills, John S. Hunt took up a claim now called the Warren ranch. At the time of his arrival here his sole cash capital consisted of but fifty cents. One of his brothers, Harrison H. Hunt, had established a milling business at the upper end of Cathlamet bay on the Columbia, having brought his mill irons across the plains in 1843. He was already transacting an extensive business with the Sandwich Islands, and gave of his abundance to the pilgrims but recently arrived from the east. There was a large family to make a start, for the grandfather had six sons and three daughters, and but one child, Noah W., was older than George W. Harrison H. Hunt had had the Columbia built at New York and brought her west, the first and for a long time the only ocean steamer plying regularly the waters of the Pacific between Portland and San Francisco.

From the first the newcomers had trouble with the Indians, who began levying tribute upon the white settlers, and enforcing their demands by stealing ammunition and intimidating the women and children left alone. The subjugation of the red men interfered for a time with the erection of suitable homes and the cultivation of the land, but, the trouble once lessened, the elder Hunt at once built his house and afterward erected the first school house in the neighborhood. This building served as a church for several years, and for a long time was the only house of worship in the vicinity.

Having attained his eighteenth year in 1848, George W. Hunt bought his freedom from his father, whom he left with twelve acres of cleared land, all of which was fenced and planted. His destination being his uncle's mills, he embarked on the boat at Oregon City, and in passing the site of the city of Portland, saw nothing but a dense forest. In 1849 he went to the mines of California, and there had divers experiences of a startling and sometimes dangerous nature, making money at times, and as often losing. August 3, 1851, he married Elizabeth N. Smith. The newly wedded couple were very young to start out in life together, the husband being twenty and the wife but seventeen. A few days after the ceremony they moved to the homestead located where the postoffice of Whiteaker is situated, where their six children were born, and where they spent the greater part of their lives. During the Cayuse Indian war George W. Hunt assisted in organizing a company for service against the Indians, and with a large number of his neighbors participated in the battle of Abiqua. This conflict was of such a decisive character that it practically ended the troubles with the Indians, which the early settlers had been experiencing for a long period. In 1876 Mr. Hunt opened a general merchandise store and blacksmith shop on his farm, and these he operated with success in connection with farming until his retirement and removal to Salem in 1886. His wife died October 10, 1891, and his death occurred October 9, 1902.

George W. Hunt was a man of wide general knowledge, of great resource and sound business judgment. Conservative and reliable, the country had need of his services, and correctly appreciated him as a citizen who adhered closely to his convictions, and worked for the good of all by whom he was surrounded. When thirteen years of age he espoused the cause of Christianity, his wife's conversion following shortly after their marriage. Their home was always a center of religious activity, as it was also a place from which radiated a splendid spirit of good will and helpfulness. Early settlers less fortunate than themselves found rest, consolation and practical assistance under this hospitable and charitable roof, and the children of more than one generation bless their name and revere their memory.

Jeptha T. Hunt was born on the farm which he now occupies February 12, 1862, and was educated in the public schools and in Willamette University. In 1886, upon his father's retirement and removal to Salem, he assumed charge of the farm and the store, and conducted the latter until 1892. At the present time he is the owner of seven hundred and ten acres of land, four hundred and eighty acres of which are a part of his father's old claim, and two hundred lying east of the homestead. He also has a third interest in a farm of one hundred acres in Marion county, near Salem. His father was the first man to import Shropshire sheep to the Pacific coast, and found the Waldo hills to be especially adapted to grazing purposes, and the son continues to value these profitable animals, raising numbers of them each year. He also makes a specialty of registered Durham cattle. A hop yard of ten acres has proven a fruitful source of income, and general farming and grain raising are carried on extensively with good results.

June 18, 1886, Mr. Hunt was united in marriage with Miss Myrtle E. White, a native of the Waldo hills, and a daughter of Thomas J. and Rachael Arnott (Merrifield) White. To this union four children have been born: Clarence J., Marion S., Norris E., and Helen R.

Like his father, Mr. Hunt is a staunch Republican, but he has never taken any active part in the local contests of his party. In his fraternal relations he is connected with Stayton Lodge No. 51, A. F. & A. M., and the Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Hunt is a practical business man, as well as a successful farmer, his experience in mercantile pursuits having covered a period of several years. He is the possessor of one of the finest estates in Marion county, and in increasing his worldly possessions he has consistently refrained from wilfully doing anything which would reflect dishonor upon the ancient name which he bears. To him and to his highly esteemed father and grandfather, those responsible for the compilation of this publication are glad of an opportunity of making a permanent record of the facts set forth in this sketch.

N. M. NEWPORT. To a man of such depths of character and mental attainments as distinguish the life and services of N. M. Newport among his associates of Albany, Lin county, the hampering of a career at the beginning with hardship and trial meant only the pathway of opportunity leading to a far more desirable goal, since opposition invariably brings out that which is strongest in a man's nature. It is against many obstacles that Mr. Newport contended in his efforts to reach an honorable position in the work of the west, and the success to which he has attained is compatible with the strength of purpose and will which encouraged him to effort. Through his own efforts he has become a finely educated, cultured man, following this up with the degree which admitted him to practice law in the courts of the United States, and while so engaged in this city he also holds a place of prominence on the editorial staff of the Herald, his productions being marked by soundness of reason, and deep thought and research.

The Newport family is of English extraction, the grandfather, Calvin, having been born in Pennsylvania of this ancestry, and died in Tennessee, where he had engaged for many years as a farmer. As a patriot he served in the war of 1812. His wife was Miss Margaret Able, the representative of an old Pennsylvania family. The father, John D. Newport, was born in Tennessee, and when a young man removed to Missouri. While a resident of that state he fought for the Union through the entire Civil war as a soldier in a Missouri regiment of volunteer cavalry. He married Harriet Bennett, also a native of Tennessee, having been born there in the eastern part of the state. She was the daughter of M. G. Bennett, who was an early settler and farmer of Missouri. The grandfather of the family was a member of an old and honored Virginia family, and as a patriot he served in the Revolutionary war. The mother died in Missouri, and of her ten children, five are now living, the third oldest and the only one now on the Pacific coast being N. M. Newport, who was born in Buffalo, Mo., March 12, 1864.

N. M. Newport was reared on his father's farm in his native state, where a rather limited education was received through the medium of the district school in the vicinity of his home. When he was sixteen years old he accompanied his brother M. Calvin to Oregon, the latter locating on a dairy farm near Astoria, where he remained two years. At the close of that period he returned to Missouri, but alone, as N. M. Newport had decided that opportunities here only waited for the man to recognize their worth and he thereupon concluded to make this his home. While on the farm with his brother Mr. Newport had begun attending school during the winter and working in the summer, and in 1883 he had accumulated sufficient funds to justify his entry into Willamette University, Salem, however difficult must be the completion of the course. During the summers he was employed in a cheese factory at Astoria and one year he remained out of college to make enough to allow him to finish. During his last year at the University he founded the Willamette Collegian, of which he remained the manager until his graduation, and was also class president his senior year. He was graduated in 1890 with the degree of A. B., and in 1893, by invitation of President Whitaker of Willamette University he delivered his master's oration on commencement day and received the degree of A. M. Upon leaving his work of preparation in 1890 Mr. Newport had begun attending school during the Salem Journal, remaining so employed for one year, during which time he was also engaged in the study of law. In 1891 he came to Albany and continued his study in the office of General Blackburn, being also a student in the law department of Willamette University. He was admitted to practice in 1893 and the same year graduated and received the degree of LL. B. from the school wherein he had so patiently worked his way for so many years. He then entered upon a practice here in partnership with J. J. Whitney, remaining in this connection until 1899, when the partnership was dissolved and he has since been alone in a constantly increasing and necessarily remunerative demand for his services.

In connection with the absorbing interests of law Mr. Newport has also devoted much time and thought to the editorials which he contributes to the Albany Daily Herald, the increasing strength and thought showing the broadening of the capabilities which have developed from study and earnest effort along these lines. He spares no effort to keep himself well informed and in touch with the current topics of the day and his able and forceful manner of portrayal has made him many admirers. He has also been much interested in horticulture, setting out and improving several orchards of apples and prunes in Benton county.

The marriage of Mr. Newport occurred in Albany, and united him with Miss Emma R. Cougill, a native of Kansas, who came to Oregon with her parents when only one year old. Her father is J. B. Cougill, of Albany. Two daughters have been born to them, Beatrice and Louise. In politics Mr. Newport is a staunch and earnest Republican, for the past eight years having been a member of the Linn county central committee, of which he is now acting as chairman, having advanced from the position of secretary for four years and a member of the executive committee for two years. Fraternally he is financial secretary of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and belongs to the Encampment; Ancient Order of United Workmen and Knights of the Maccabees. He is also an active member of the Alumni Association of Willamette valley and belongs socially to the Alco Club. As a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church he officiates as one of the board of trustees, and by the life which he lives in all sincerity and honor, upright, stanch and in every sense of the word, manly, he adds no little to the moral character of the city wherein he makes a worthy and valued citizen.

WILLIAM MILLER. The dominant characteristics which have made the Scotchman a valued addition to the citizenship of any community or land in which he casts his lot are manifest in the career of William Miller, who from early pioneer times has been a resident of Oregon. He was born two and a half miles from the city of Glasgow, Scotland, July 26, 1815, a son of Andrew and Elizabeth (Spence) Miller, both natives of the land of hills and heather. The father was a mine operator and was killed by fire damp in the mines when his son William was but nine years of age. In religious faith he was a Presbyterian. His wife, who belonged to an old family of her native country, died in Scotland at the advanced age of eighty-five years, having long survived her husband. They were the parents of seven children, of whom William was the fourth in order of birth and the only one now living. The eldest brother, Malcolm, came to America and made his way to Oregon in 1850. He followed farming in Linn county and there died, leaving a large family.

William Miller was reared in the suburbs of Glasgow and attended a private school until his father's death, when he was forced to earn his own livelihood. He went to the mines, where he was first employed at pushing a car, and eventually became a miner. He also learned the method of taking iron ore from the earth and as time passed his efficiency and fidelity won him promotion until he became foreman, and later superintendent of the mines.

The favorable reports which he had heard concerning America led him to come to the United States in 1842, in the hope that he might better his financial condition in a country where higher wages were paid. He left Glasgow on the sailing vessel Elizabeth and after a voyage of two months arrived at New York on the 28th day of May, accompanied by a brother-in-law. They journeyed on foot across New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to Schuyler county, of the last named state, settling near Rushville, where Mr. Miller opened the first coal mines of the county for Colonel Rose. He had read in the newspapers that Dave Newsom of Springfield, Ill., offered two miners from the old world $5 per day for their services, and thus it was that he was attracted to the new world. In the spring of 1843 he opened a coal bank of his own and operated it until 1846, when he was taken ill with chills and fever and had to seek a different climate. His physician recommending his removal, he determined to come to the new country of Oregon, and with ox-teams drawing a wagon, he came with three young men, Messrs. Chambers, Agnew and West. They started March 28, 1846, crossing the Mississippi at Glasgow and the Missouri at St. Joseph. They joined a wagon train at Independence, Mo., and proceeded by way of the old Oregon trail and down the Snake river, crossing then from the John Day river to the Shules river by the Barlow route to the headwaters of the Clackamas river, arriving in Oregon City, November 15, 1846. Here Mr. Miller was first employed at the construction of some tan vats and later entered the employ of James Jervey and John Martin, for whom he dug a ditch on French prairie. He was afterward in the Cayuse Indian war under Captain Pugh and later engaged in gathering the harvest on French prairie. In 1848 he started on horseback over the mountains for the mines of California and was very successful in his mining ventures on the Macalamy bar, realizing handsomely from his labors there, covering three months.

Mr. Miller then returned to Illinois by way of San Francisco, Panama, New Orleans and up the Mississippi and Illinois rivers to Beardstown, Ill., where he arrived in 1849, remaining there until the spring of 1850. He then outfitted with his own money, nine wagons, drawn by horses, mules and oxen, and again started for the west. This time he was accompanied by his mother-in-law and brother-in-law, his brother, with his wife and nine children, and his brother-in-law, David McDonald, with his wife and six children, but Mrs. McDonald died while on the plains. Mr. Miller also employed seven men to assist him and he came over the same trail which he had previously traveled, although the journey this time was accomplished in a much shorter time than the first trip, reaching The Dallas July 4. People said he could not cross the mountains because there was too much fallen timber, but he replied that he would go through to Barlow's gate. From there he sent six men ahead with axes and ordered them when they came to a big tree fallen across the road to cut small timber and bridge it. Thus they got along well, crossing the mountains in three days, and at length they reached Oregon City. Mr. Miller located in Yamhill county, while Mr. McDonald took a claim in Polk county and Mr. Miller's brother in Linn county.

Securing a right, Mr. Miller located a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres in Yamhill county, near Wheatland, on the banks of the Willamette. This was partly open timber and there he improved a farm and engaged in the raising of grain and stock-horses, cattle, sheep and hogs. He had fullblooded Durham cattle and also bred and raised standard-bred horses, selling one three-year-old for $1,700. He also bought land adjoining his original claim, having nine hundred and sixty acres in one body, nearly all of which is tillable, and this he still owns. At Wheatland, in partnership with M. B. Hendricks, he built the first flour mill and conducted it for many years, or until it was destroyed by fire. He continued farming until 1858, when great misfortune overtook the family, four of the children dying within four weeks. No longer could they content themselves on the farm where such great sorrow had come to them and they then moved to Salem. Mr. Miller purchased Griswold's island in the Willamette river and kept it for a year, during which time he cut the timber from it, but the citizens of Salem and vicinity wanted a man to superintend the streets and highways, and offering him the position he accepted it and thus served for four years, when he resigned and returned to his farm. He then made many improvements upon it, restocked it and for three years carried on agricultural pursuits, after which he returned to Salem, establishing his home at the corner of Court and College streets, where he is now living retired, satisfied with a competency which supplies him with the necessities and comforts of life, not desiring great wealth.

Mr. Miller was first married in Scotland March 28, 1837, the lady of his choice being Miss Jane McDonald, who was born in that country August 8, 1817, a member of the McDonald family of Inverness. When her husband first came to the northwest she remained in Illinois—from 1846 until 1850—and in the latter year accompanied him across the plains. She died November 21, 1895, in the faith of the Presbyterian Church, of which she had long been a consistent member, and her loss was deeply felt by many friends as well as her immediate family. She was the mother of nine children: John and Elizabeth, who died in Scotland; William, who died in Illinois; Andrew, who died in Oregon, at the age of thirteen years; Mrs. Jane Kellogg, who lives on the old home farm; Caroline, Isabelle, Andrew and William, all of whom died in this state. The last three were born in Oregon and Caroline on the plains, when they were making the journey to the northwest. Mr. Miller was again married, in Portland, his second union being with Mrs. Jane Barndrake, who was born in Germany, came to Oregon at an early day and died in Salem. For his third wife he chose Mrs. Mary Martin Pearson, who was born in Davis county, Iowa, a daughter of John Martin, who was born in Kentucky, where his father died. John Martin, who served in the war of 1812, removed to Illinois and afterward to Iowa, and in 1845 he came across the plains with his wife and four children, their wagon drawn by the slow-moving ox team, which was the factor in most travel westward at that time. They proceeded by way of St. Joseph and the Oregon trail and Meeks cutoff, intending to go to California, but Meeks was lost in the fog and eventually they reached Oregon. They were almost starved to death, being for five days without food, and they put salt on grass and ate that. At length they reached The Dallas and proceeded down the Columbia on a raft made of logs. Mr. Martin settled on French prairie, where he farmed, and in 1849 he removed to Polk county, where he took a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, two and a half miles west of Salem, improving that and opening up a good farm. In 1855 he removed to the vicinity of Roseburg, where he engaged in raising stock until fall, when he started to Yreka, Cal., to drive a band of hogs, but the Rogue river Indian trouble broke out and he had to turn back, losing most of his hogs. He was then appointed government commissary, serving for nine months during the Rogue River war, after which he located on Deer creek, ten miles from Roseburg, where he farmed for six years. He next went to Jacksonville, Ore., where he remained for a short time, and after a year spent at Crescent City he returned to Jacksonville, where his two eldest sons died of smallpox. Afterward he located in Salem, where he died at the age of eighty-four years. Mr. Martin married Malinda Smith, who was born in Virginia, a daughter of Ezekiel Smith, who came to Oregon from Iowa in 1846, in the same train with Mr. Miller, and settled in Yamhill county, four miles north of Wheatland. In 1848 he went overland to California with his youngest son and mined on Feather river until both were murdered there, in 1849, their tent being shot full of arrows. Mrs. Martin, the mother of Mrs. Miller, died in Salem. Her children were Mrs.

Eliza Jane Chambers, of Portland; Mrs. Mary Miller; Mrs. Emily Howell, of Crescent City, Cal.; John and Joseph, who died in Jacksonville, this state; Chauncey, who died near Salem; Mrs. Lucy Foss, of Portland; and Andrew J., who resides in California.

Mrs. Miller was born in Iowa, but was educated in Polk county, Ore. She was first married in that county to Joseph Allred, who was born in Indiana and crossed the plains in 1845 with his grandfather, in the same train with Mrs. Miller. He was reared in Washington county until twenty-one years of age and died in California. By his marriage to Mary Martin he had five children, of whom four are living: Mrs. Katie Worden, of San Francisco; Mrs. Emma Carp, of Siskiyou county, Cal.; William, who is living in Santa Cruz county, Cal.; and Walter, of Klamath county, Ore. After the death of her first husband, Mrs. Allred married John Pearson, who was born in Tennessee and came to this state in 1862. He was a farmer of Klamath county and died on the old homestead there. Of the three children of this marriage, but one reached mature years: Harry, who is a farmer of Klamath Falls. August 22, 1900, Mrs. Pearson gave her hand in marriage to Mr. Miller, and they have a pleasant and comfortable home and many friends in Salem.

Mr. Miller was made a Mason in Beardstown, Ill., and is now a member of Salem Lodge, No. 4, F. & A. M. He took the Royal Arch degree in the chapter at Salem. He is also a member of DeMolay Commandery No. 5, K. T., and El Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, while his wife belongs to the Methodist Church, and in politics he is an unswerving Democrat. Both he and his wife hold membership with the Oregon Pioneer Society.

In 1876 Mr. Miller went to Scotland, visiting his old home and his relatives there, and to some extent he traveled in Europe, spending three months abroad. Mr. Miller is now almost ninety years of age, but Nature has been kind to him because he has not abused her laws. He has remarkable memory concerning pioneer times in this state and he deserves to be classed with the van guard, who opened up this splendid region to civilization.

HON. IRVIN L. SMITH. Upon the military history of his country and the legislative annals of his adopted state the name of Hon. Irvin Lucien Smith is deeply engraved. He was born in Franklin county, Ohio, six miles east of Columbus, his natal day being May 16, 1827. His paternal grandfather, Samuel Smith, removed from New York to Ohio, becoming one of the pioneer farmers of the latter state. Among his children was Thaddeus Smith, the father of our subject, who was born in the Empire state and with his parents went to Ohio, where he too devoted his energies to farming and there engaged in the tilling of the soil until 1834, when he became a resident of Tazewell county, Ill., not far from Peoria. At that point he carried on farming for many years and at length died in that locality. His wife, who bore the name of Mary Ross, was born in Ohio, of Scotch ancestry. Her death occurred in Illinois soon after the removal of the family to that state and the father later married again. By the first marriage he had four children, two of whom reached manhood: Irvin L. of this review and Levi E., who came to Oregon in 1870 and now resides in Portland. Of the eleven children born of the second union all reached adult age and two of the sons were soldiers in the Civil war. Eli, who served throughout the entire struggle in the Fourth Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, enlisting in 1861, now resides on a farm in Washington county, Ore. William, who became a member of the Sixth Illinois Infantry, was killed in battle at Altoona, Ga. One brother, Leonard, died in Medford, Ore.; and a sister, Mrs. Stephenson, lives in Forest Grove.

In 1834, when Irvin L. Smith was about seven years of age, his parents removed from Ohio to Illinois, making the journey overland by wagon, a distance of four hundred miles, across corduroy roads. He was reared on the old family homestead, attending the public schools and in his youth he was a schoolmate of the Hon. Shelby M. Cullom. The "little temple of learning" was built of logs and was furnished in the primitive style of the period, the methods of instruction being little better than the building and its equipment. Quill pens were used and it was a very common thing to hear the remark from a scholar, "Master, please mend my pen." When nineteen years of age Mr. Smith began work at the carpenter's trade, afterward mastered cabinet making and then engaged in the furniture business in Mackinaw, Ill. Subsequently he resided at Pleasant Hill, in McLean county, that state, and in 1856 he took up his abode upon a farm in the same county, carrying on agricultural pursuits until after the outbreak of the Civil war. In August, 1862, he responded to his country's call for volunteers and joined Company H, Ninety-fourth Illinois Infantry, under Colonel McNulty, being mustered in at Bloomington. The regiment was sent to Springfield, Mo., where Mr. Smith, because of his ability as a carpenter, was detailed to build a hospital, remaining there until after the battle of Prairie Grove, Ark. While there the Confederate troops under Marmaduke advanced upon Springfield and he was engaged in repelling them. Later he participated in the siege of Vicksburg, his regiment being one of the first to enter the city after its capitulation. He participated in the battle of Yazoo City and Port Hutchinson, going thence to New Orleans, where for a time he was ill in the hospital. Following this he crossed the Gulf of Mexico to Brownsville, Tex., and the Ninety-fourth Illinois was one of the two regiments which crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico to protect the American consul, bringing him back into the United States. This trip consumed ten months. Later Mr. Smith participated in the capture of Fort Morgan, Spanish Fort and Fort Blakely, then crossed the gulf again to Galveston, Tex., and a month later returned to New Orleans, where he was mustered out in the fall of 1865 with the rank of sergeant and received an honorable discharge upon his return to Illinois. When he went to the war he left a family consisting of his wife and five children. He had a farm that was in an excellent state of improvement and well stocked and which was free from all indebtedness. It was of course a sacrifice for him to join the army and fight for the flag, but he did this willingly and was most loyal in his attachment to the United States. His wife, in order to meet the living expenses of the household and to pay the high assessments which the war made it necessary to institute, had to sell off the stock and also to incur indebtedness, and thus upon his return Mr. Smith found it necessary to again resume work at the carpenter's trade in order to pay off this indebtedness and gain a new start.

Upon his Illinois farm the subject of this review remained until 1870, when he came to Oregon, locating near Forest Grove, where he purchased a farm, conducting it for a year. He then established the Western Hotel in Forest Grove, which he conducted for four years, at the end of which time he built a shop and embarked in the furniture business. Subsequently he and his sons, James and George, erected a sash and door factory and furniture plant and continued its conduct until the second Democratic disaster, when they retired from business. At that time Mr. Smith took up his abode upon his place of seven acres in Forest Grove and there he lived in honorable retirement until April, 1903, when he moved to Sheridan, Yamhill county. He has passed the Psalmist's span of three score years and ten and well does he merit the rest which is vouchsafed to him.

Mr. Smith was first married in Illinois, the lady of his choice being Miss Margaret Mathews, who was born in Ohio and died in Oregon. They became the parents of twelve children, ten of whom reached years of maturity, namely: Mary, who died in this state; James, a farmer of Umatilla county, Ore.; Mrs. Flora Hinman, of Baltimore, Md.; George, who is engaged in the furniture business in Sheridan, Wyo.; Elmer, of Forest Grove; Mrs. Esther Kane, who is a teacher of Portland; William, a carpenter of Portland; Fred, who is engaged in the furniture business in Sheridan, Wyo.; Mrs. Carrie Merchant of Yamhill and Lillie D., the wife of Rev. W. E. Stewart, of Reno, Nev. After the death of his first wife Mr. Smith was again married, in Salem, Ore., his second union being with Mrs. Margaret J. McMeekin, who was born in Sangamon county, Ill., a daughter of James H. Brown, Sr., who was born in Virginia, and a grand-daughter of James Brown, who removed from the Old Dominion, settling in Columbus, Ohio, while later he became a resident of Tazewell county, Ill., where his death occurred.

James H. Brown, the father of Mrs. Smith, took up his abode in Sangamon county, Ill., where he followed farming and was married. In 1850, with his wife and seven children, he crossed the plains to Oregon, driving an ox-team, and in September he reached his destination. Portland at that time contained but one store. He settled three miles from Sheridan, in Yamhill county, where he purchased a tract of land and engaged in the raising of grain and stock, succeeding so well in his undertakings that in course of time he became the owner of sixteen hundred acres. His death occurred upon his farm in 1875, when he was seventy-two years of age, and the old homestead is now owned by his three sons. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Sophia W. Hussey, was born in Sangamon county, Ill., a daughter of Nathan Hussey, who was born in Ohio and took up his abode upon a farm in the Prairie state. In 1846 he, too, made the long and perilous journey across the plains with an ox-team and settled on the Yamhill river near Fort Yamhill, where he resided until his death in 1895. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Brown were four daughters and three sons, all of whom are living. Their daughter, Margaret J., was reared in Oregon and in Yamhill she gave her hand in marriage to Archibald McMeekin, who was born in Scotland. His parents removed to the north of Ireland, settling in Antrim, whence they came to America, their home being first established in Canada. In 1852 Mr. McMeekin crossed the plains to Oregon. He was a blacksmith and farmer and after reaching this state carried on agricultural pursuits on Mill creek, in Polk county. Later, however, he sold that property and located in Salem. The year following his marriage he was stricken with paralysis and for twenty-four years could not walk a step, during which time with wonderful devotion Mrs. Smith cared for him as she would a child and also managed their farming interests. She owned five hundred acres of land in Mill creek which she has since sold. Her husband died in Salem in 1885 and later she was united in marriage with Mr. Smith. She is a lady of marked force of character, of splendid ability, and is deserving of the greatest credit for what she has accomplished.

In public affairs Mr. Smith has been prominent and influential. An earnest advocate of Republican principles, he served on the first board of trustees of Forest Grove and for three or four terms was a member of the city council. For two terms he was mayor of Forest Grove and in 1878 he was elected county commissioner. In 1880 he was honored with the election to the office of state legislator and in 1886 he was again chosen to represent his district in the general assembly and served during the special session of 1887. A prominent and patriotic member of the house, he did everything in his power to promote the welfare of the state and advance the interests of its institutions. He belongs to James B. Mathews Post No. 6, G. A. R., of which he was the first conductor, and his wife is a member of the Women's Relief Corps, in which she has served as senior vice-commander. This worthy and highly esteemed couple belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Mr. Smith formerly served as trustee. His has been an eventful career. He lived in Illinois during an early period in the development of that state and has served upon juries there when Abraham Lincoln was one of the attorneys at the bar. Going to Oregon he has borne an active and important part in the progress and substantial upbuilding of his section of the state and has been particularly helpful along educational lines, serving upon the school board when the schoolhouse of Forest Grove was built. Character and ability will come to the front anywhere, and the genuine worth of Mr. Smith has been widely recognized, making him a distinguished citizen of the Willamette valley.

DR. PLATT A. DAVIS. On the 7th day of April, 1902, the citizenship of Marion county was deprived, by the hand of death, of the services of one of the most widely known, highly honored and beloved pioneer physicians of Oregon, Dr. Platt A. Davis. For half a century he had gone up and down the valley of the Willamette, crossing the prairie and climbing the hills in his daily rounds, and probably no other physician in the valley was personally and intimately known by so large a number of the earlier inhabitants. Dr. Davis was born near Randolph, Ohio, September 11, 1825. He was educated for his professional career in Philadelphia, Pa. In 1852, at the age of twenty-seven years, he crossed the plains for Oregon. Locating at Silverton, Marion county, he at once opened an office for practice, and the remainder of his life was devoted to his professional labors in and about Silverton. For many years the number of practitioners in the Willamette valley was small, and Dr. Davis was frequently compelled to make long and wearisome journeys over the mountainous country to the eastward of Silverton, as well as through all other sections of Marion county. Frequently his services were demanded in adjoining counties, for within a few years after his location in Silverton his skill in medicine brought to him a fame that was not confined to his local field of practice. His work frequently was so laborious that a man possessed of lesser powers of endurance would have broken down under the strain.

In recognition of his eminent success as a practitioner Willamette University accorded him an honorary degree in 1871. At the time of his death he was probably the oldest physician in Oregon, and undoubtedly one of the most profoundly respected and beloved men who ever lived in the valley.

Dr. Davis was worthy of more than passing mention in the memoirs of the representative citizens of Oregon. He was possessed of characteristics which commanded attention wherever he was known. He had an unusually alert mind, was a great student, and extremely well-informed on all subjects which appeal to an analytical and inquiring intelligence. There was nothing small or narrow in his intellectual make-up. He was an entertaining and edifying conversationalist, was broad and liberal in his views of affairs in general, and in his practice availed himself of many opportunities such as are sought by the humanitarian and public benefactor. His beneficences were numerous, though in doing good he was always absolutely free from ostentation. Throughout his entire career he exhibited a keen interest in the welfare of the community in which he made his home, and no taint or blemish ever marred the beauty and splendor of his life. Men like him are rare, and the life he led at all times will cause his name to be perpetuated as that of one of the noblest and most high-minded citizens of the Willamette valley.

Before coming to Oregon, Dr. Davis was engaged in practice for a few years in Iowa. He was married in Millersburg, Ill., in 1849, to Sophia Wolf, whose death occurred in 1864. Their children were: Dr. La Fayette L. Davis, of Lamborn, Kans.; Charles C. Davis, of Spokane, Wash.; Winfield S. Davis, deceased; Dr. Edward V. Davis, deceased; Dr. William Henry Davis, of Albany, Ore.; Mrs. Viola Davis Brown, of Walla Walla, Wash.; and Dr. S. T. Davis, Chicago, Ill. June 29, 1865, Dr. Davis was united in marriage with Susan Moore, who survives him, and resides in Silverton. They became the parents of two daughters, Nellie, deceased; and Dr. Jessie (Davis) Brooks.

JOSEPH G. VAN ORSDEL, who is now engaged in the real estate business in Dallas and has to his credit two terms of capable service in the office of county sheriff, was born near New Castle, Lawrence county, Pa., July 18, 1853, being one of a family of eleven children, ten sons and one daughter, born unto Ralph and Margaret (Randolph) Van Orsdel. His paternal grandfather, Col. Job Van Orsdel, was a native of Holland and when a young man came to America. He then went south and married the daughter of a planter. He won his title by valiant service in the war of 1812 and in recognition of the aid which he gave to the government he was given a grant of land of six hundred and forty acres in Crawford county, Pa., but never realized anything from the property. For many years he remained in the government service and maintained his residence at Gettysburg, Pa. Ralph Van Orsdel, the father of our subject, was born in Adams county, Pa., on his father's farm adjoining what later became the battlefield of Gettysburg, which was stained by the blood of hundreds of brave men from both the north and south. In early life Ralph Van Orsdel learned the miller's trade and followed milling in New Castle, Pa., for a time, but subsequently turned his attention to agricultural pursuits in that locality and was very successful in his farm work. In his political views he was a staunch Abolitionist and rejoiced greatly in the outcome of the Civil war. He died near New Castle, Pa., at the advanced age of eighty-two years. The mother of our subject was born in Butler county, Pa., a daughter of John Randolph, who was a native of Virginia and a lineal descendant of Senator John Randolph, one of the most distinguished sons of the Old Dominion. Her father removed from his native state to Butler county, Pa., and there Mrs. Van Orsdel was reared. She died in Lawrence county, Pa., at the age of seventy-five years. Like her husband she was a devoted member of the United Presbyterian Church. Of her family seven sons and one daughter reached the age of maturity. Job Van Orsdel, the eldest, was a train master in the Civil war and is now a prominent business man of Youngstown, Ohio. The other are: Mrs. Belle Donaldson, of Lawrence county, Pa.; William, killed in Sherman's march to the sea, while in front of Atlanta; John C., of Pittsburg, Pa., who is national organizer of the Knights of the Macabees; James Fremont, a stockman of Stockdale, Kans.; Hon. Josiah Alexander, attorney-general of Wyoming; and J. G. of this review.

Upon the home farm in Lawrence county, Pa., amid the lights and sounds that came from the furnaces and rolling mills of that industrial center, J. G. Van Orsdel was reared, and educated. He remained at home until twenty-three years of age. In 1876 he went to California, proceeding to San Francisco and thence to the mining regions. He engaged in clerking in Amador City, Cal., for a time and in 1879 he returned to Pennsylvania, where he was married, and engaged in farming, cultivating a tract of land near New Castle. In 1889 he arrived in Oregon, and purchased one hundred and twelve acres of land adjoining the town of Independence. Stocking his farm with a large number of cows he engaged in the dairy business, and was the first man to run a milk wagon in his section of the state. That enterprise occupied his time and attention until 1898, when he received the nomination on the Democratic ticket for sheriff of Polk county. He was elected, and in July, 1898, he took the oath of office and removed to Dallas. He still owns a part of his farm, although seventy acres of it has been divided into lots, constituting an addition to the town of Independence. In the discharge of his official duties Mr. Van Orsdel manifested a fidelity and promptness which caused his re-election in 1900 by a majority of sixty-two. During his first term he was called upon to carry out the mandate of the court by executing one William Magers, who murdered A. R. Sink. He retired from his duties with the confidence and good will of the public. He at once embarked in the real estate business and became agent for securing the right of way for the Salem, Fall City & Western Railroad. He secured the right of way for nine and a half miles, obtaining forty-five different deeds through the transaction. As a member of the firm of Van Orsdel, Hayes & Company he is now doing an extensive business handling timber lands, farm and city property, besides loans and insurance.

In New Castle, Pa., on December 22, 1880, occurred the marriage of Mr. Van Orsdel and Miss Elizabeth Pomeroy, who was born there a daughter of Col. John and Eliza (McGary) Pomeroy, natives of Westmoreland county, Pa. John Pomeroy represented an old family of the Keystone state, of Scotch-Irish descent, and was a farmer by occupation and held the rank of colonel in the National Guards of Pennsylvania.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Van Orsdel have been born seven children: John Pomeroy, a civil engineer in Cheyenne, Wyo.; Ralph Alexander, a student in Dallas College; Ruth E.; Robert Randolph; Pauline E.; and Thomas Clark. One daughter, Patience, died in infancy.

Mr. and Mrs. Van Orsdel are members of the Presbyterian Church, and he is the president of its board of trustees. He was made an Odd Fellow in Friendship Lodge No. 6, of which he is now noble grand master. Both he and his wife are connected with the Rebekah degree. He is also identified with the Knights of the Maccabees, and is a director of the board of trade of Dallas. In his political views he was a Republican until 1892, when, on account of his opinion on the tariff question, he endorsed the Democratic party, with which he is now affiliated.

WORTH HUSTON. More than any other man of whom we have immediate knowledge, Worth Huston fulfills the popular conception of an incumbent of the sheriff's office, to which he was recently elected. Six feet three and a half inches tall, broad-shouldered and strong-limbed, with force and determination written in every line of his expressive face, his physical fitness has a counterpart in his mental and educational qualifications, and in his extensive knowledge of the motives which animate the average individual as he travels the divers byways of life. A native son of Linn county, Ore., he has also the advantage of knowing his surroundings as well as anyone living here, and of being on speaking terms with the greater part of the well-known men who have contributed to its agricultural, commercial and general development.

Born on the old donation claim near Albany, November 2, 1854, he is the youngest in a family of nine sons and one daughter, and the only one born in Oregon. His paternal grandfather, George Huston, was born in Virginia, and as a young man removed to eastern Tennessee, where his son, Joel B., the father of Worth, was born in 1810. He served as a private in the war of 1812, and as a farmer and stock-raiser was fairly successful. Joel B. settled in Henderson county, Ill., at an early day, and there married Catherine Huston, a native of Iowa, whose father was a very early pioneer of Iowa. Nine children were born in Illinois, and these, with his wife, Mr. Huston brought across the plains with ox teams in 1853, locating on a claim of three hundred and twenty acres near Plainview, twelve miles south of Albany. This he improved and operated up to the time of his death at the age of sixty-nine years, his wife surviving him until 1898, when she died, at the age of eighty-three. Their oldest son, William, is living in Rochester, Wash.; Walter lives near Harrisburg; Joel B. is at Halsey; John is a resident of Heppner, Ore.; Marion lives in Wasco county, Ore.; and Luther, of Heppner.

As a boy Worth Huston laid the foundation for his present fine constitution while exercising plentifully on the home farm, and tramping to the somewhat distant country school-house. Later on he attended the Harrisburg College, and at the age of twenty began farming on his own responsibility on the home place. At all times appreciative of the horse, he has devoted twenty years to studying and raising the finest specimens in the county, and he is credited with introducing in 1890 the first French bred coach horses into the state of Oregon, and was one of the first to import registered Percherons, and now has on his farm a large number. He has greatly improved the breed since first bringing them across the water. No better judge of the fine points of a horse is to be found anywhere in Linn county, nor has any a finer sympathy for the creatures who fail to find humane and considerate owners. Mr. Huston is a member of the National Percheron Horse Breeders' Association. He is a member of Camp Albany Modern Woodmen of America and Albany Lodge Knights of Pythias. For many years he has been an active member of the Christian Church, and is a deacon therein, contributing liberally of his means towards his chosen denomination.

On the old homestead Mr. Huston was united in marriage with Lucy Dannals, who was born in Linn county, Ore. Nine children have been born of this union: Maud; Carl; Fannie; Walter, on the home farm; Delwin; Ollie; Eva; Ray; and Clark. Mr. Huston has at all times a whole-souled regard for the general well-being of his neighborhood.

AUGUST STARK, M. O., M. D. As a general practitioner and an eye, ear, nose and throat specialist, Dr. August Stark bears a reputation second to none in the state of Oregon. In qualifying for his chosen line of work he has spared neither personal effort nor expense, and has availed himself of the best training to be had in this country. Upon the theory that congenial work means successful, he has penetrated the practically inexhaustible avenues of research with ever-increasing interest, finding in each discovery an impetus to further advance the interests of science. Of Teutonic parentage, he is a descendant of a race who have achieved wonderful success in medical and surgical circles, and whose dominant characteristic is the ability to concentrate upon the hard and trying problems of life until some result shall have been accomplished. This national trait was unquestionably possessed by Joshua Stark, the father of the doctor, who was a stone-mason by trade, performing his tasks with conscientious exactitude. He was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, and in 1860, when about forty years of age, came with his wife, Christine, to America, locating in Bethel, Shelby county, Mo. Here his son August was born March 17, 1864, and here he engaged in contracting for many years. In Bethel the parents both died, leaving three sons and four daughters, two sons and two daughters still living.

Having completed his education in the public schools August Stark entered a drug store at the age of eighteen years, where he remained for some time, also in connection with his gaining some knowledge of the jeweler's trade, combining the two occupations until coming to Oregon in 1889.

With F. G. Will he bought out the jewelry store of W. F. Carter, conducted the same with fair success, and at the same time began the study of the eye, in time entering the Ophthalmic College of Chicago, from which he was duly graduated in 1894, with the degree of master of optics. Returning to Albany he assisted with the management of the jewelry store, and in connection therewith began the study of medicine, completing his course at the University of Oregon, from which he was graduated in 1901. Soon after he disposed of his mercantile interests that he might devote all of his time to medicine and surgery. In 1902 he took a post-graduate course at the Chicago Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat College. His practice extends through the entire valley, patients coming from afar to profit by his skill in dealing with the physical disorders above mentioned. Dr. Stark is popular both in social and professional circles, and is identified with the Knights of Pythias and the Alco Club. Politically he is a Republican. Genial in manner, sincere and enthusiastic along the lines to which his life is devoted, he commands not only the esteem but the appreciation and gratitude of the intelligent citizens of the community.

CHARLES W. BLACK is the proprietor of the city livery stables of Dallas. He was born on Mill creek in Polk county, Ore., January 28, 1874, and belongs to one of the old and prominent pioneer families of this state. His paternal great-grandfather was a native of Illinois and founded the family in America by establishing his home in Pennsylvania. The grandfather, Thomas Black, was born in the Keystone state and about 1835 removed to Ohio, settling five miles north of Columbus. In 1837 he again started westward, establishing his home near Jacksonville, Ill., and in 1841 he resumed his journey toward the setting sun and became a resident of the New Purchase in Iowa, his home being near the present city of Oskaloosa. The pioneer spirit was strong within him, and in 1868 with his family he crossed the plains to Walla Walla, Wash., in a wagon train in which horses, mules and oxen served as means of transportation. There were altogether twenty-six wagons in the company and Mr. Black served as captain. In 1864 he removed from Washington to Oregon, making his way to the Willamette valley and locating in Polk county. Subsequently he removed to Yamhill county, where he died in February, 1868. In various communities he took an active and helpful part in the work of improvement and general progress. He was a pioneer of Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Washington and Oregon, and in all these places he left the impress of his individuality for good upon the localities in which he lived. While in Polk county, Iowa, he served as county commissioner for two terms, but his best public service was done as a private citizen. He did not seek the honors or rewards of office, but was content to do what he could at all times for the benefit of his community. He married Sarah C. Beck, who survived him but a few months, passing away in July, 1868.

Joseph Black, the father of our subject, was born in Washington county, Pa., in 1834, and accompanied his parents on their various removals, being largely reared in Decatur and Polk counties, Iowa. In 1861 he came to the northwest with his parents, two sisters and two brothers, making the long overland journey across the hot sandy plains and over the mountains, until they reached the fertile valleys of the northwest. He has been engaged in farming in Oregon since 1864 and is now the owner of a rich and well improved tract of land on Mill creek in Polk county. His home, since 1882, has been in Dallas, where he is widely and favorably known, being a man of jovial and genial disposition, good hearted, liberal and having many excellent qualities which have gained for him many friends. His political support is given to Democracy. He married Eliza Ridgeway, who was born in Polk county, Ore., in 1850. Her father, John Ridgeway, crossed the plains in 1845 and established his home in Polk county. Mrs. Black is an earnest Christian woman, holding membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In the family were five children, only two of whom are now living, the elder Emma, wife of Charles F. Belt of Dallas, and Charles W.

Charles Walter Black, whose name introduces this record, was reared and educated in Dallas. Having attended the public schools, he continued his studies in La Creole Academy. He afterward engaged in the teaming business which he followed until he became a liveryman, in 1901, when he entered into partnership with William Tatom as a member of the firm of Tatom & Black, and they purchased of Samuel Ray the city livery, which they conducted together until the 1st of September, 1902, when Mr. Black purchased his partner's interest and has since been alone. The city livery is one of the oldest stables in Dallas and to Mr. Black is accorded a liberal and constantly growing patronage. He owns many fine carriages and good horses and he is always obliging and courteous to his patrons, and has secured a creditable standing and merited success in his business career.

Mr. Black was united in marriage in 1902, to Miss Nettie Greenwood, a native of Illinois. He votes with the Democracy but has never had time nor inclination for seeking public office. He is well known in his native county and his pleasant kindly spirit makes him a general favorite.

HON. BENJAMIN F. BONHAM, an Oregon pioneer of 1853, a practitioner grown old in the service of legal science, and the recipient of many unsolicited political honors, is a man of broad and liberal mind, whose life has been one of labor and untiring devotion to the best interests of his adopted state. He is recognized as a profound student of the law and as a jurist his decisions have been impartial, showing a careful consideration of the legal points at issue, and yet never losing sight of the merits of the case, with a view to promoting substantial justice between man and man. Having passed the age of three score and ten years, we present to our readers a chronological record of the life work of a man who has conferred honor and dignity upon society.

Judge Bonham was born October 8, 1828, near Knoxville, Tenn., and was reared principally in Indiana, to which state his people removed when he was twelve years of age. At a very early day an English forefather settled in Virginia, where was also born his paternal grandfather and namesake, Benjamin, a planter who settled in East Tennessee. Virginia was also the birthplace of his son, John P. Bonham, the father of Judge Benjamin F., who in time combined farming and merchandising near Knoxville. In 1840 he removed to Middletown, Henry county, Ind., where he continued his former occupation up to the time of his death in 1864. He was a Democrat in politics and held membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife, Sarah (Jones) Bonham, was born in East Tennessee and died in Indiana. Her father, John Jones, was also born in Virginia.

Of the seven children in his father's family, Judge Bonham is one of two survivors, and the only one to come to the Pacific coast. Like many other men who have attained prominence in the west and elsewhere he undertook self support in the humble capacity of a school teacher, having qualified therefor in the public schools and in Delaware County Seminary, at Muncie, Ind.

In 1853 he came across the plains, arriving in Oregon in September, and for the first two years was engaged in teaching school, one year on French Prairie and one in Salem. In the meantime he had been reading law, with a view to entering the legal profession. In 1856 he was admitted to the bar by the Supreme Court of Oregon. The unsettled condition of the country at that time had need of just such latent resources as were embodied in this promising young attorney, and he at once stepped into positions requiring tact and ability. In the early '50s he held the offices of territorial auditor, librarian and superintendent of schools in Marion county, and while thus diversely engaged served as a member of the last territorial and the first state legislature. In 1860, upon retiring from public office, he began to devote all his attention to the practice of law, and in 1870 was elected a member of the Supreme Court, at the same time serving ex-officio as judge of the Circuit Court for six years. Between the years 1874 and 1876, inclusive, he was Chief Justice of the state of Oregon. Upon retiring from office he resumed practice in partnership with Judge W. M. Ramsey, continuing until 1885.

Judge Bonham's substantial service in behalf of the Democratic party has brought him more than local renown, and in 1885 he was appointed by President Cleveland Consul-General to British India. In the fall of that year he embarked from the port of San Francisco, and for over four years represented the United States at Calcutta, with credit to himself and entire satisfaction to both governments. His experience in the foreign service of the United States at one of its important posts, enabled him to gain a comprehensive knowledge of international law, and his equipment in this respect was, upon his retirement from the position, of a much more practical nature than could have been gained in any of the technical institutions of learning. After his resignation from this post he set sail for the United States, coming by way of Suez canal, Marseilles, Paris and London, arriving home August, 1890. He again resumed the practice of law in Salem and vicinity in partnership with Hon. W. H. Holmes. In 1894 he was appointed postmaster of Salem, holding that office for four years, since which time he has devoted all his energies to the practice of law, and in 1899 entered into partnership with Carey F. Martin, a graduate of the state university and a very energetic and promising young attorney.

In 1858, at Salem, Judge Bonham was united in marriage with Miss Mildred A. Baker, who was born in Illinois in 1840, and is a daughter of John Baker, a well-known and highly respected Oregon pioneer of 1847, who is now residing on his donation claim near Salem at the age of eighty-seven years. Of the seven children born to Judge and Mrs. Bonham, two only are living—Raphael P. and Winona M., both of Salem. Three of the children—Frank E., Burton M. and Wayne L.—died of diphtheria in 1879, and two sons—Clinton O. and John Clifford—died of fever in 1881.

Judge Bonham is a member of the Marion County Bar Association of which he has been president for the past eight years. He is possessed of superior legal attainments, and his unceasing devotion to the best tenets of a great profession have brought him enviable standing, the friendship of kindred minds, and the highest regard of all with whom he has come in contact, in social, civil and judicial life.

OSCAR HAYTER, one of the most promising of the younger generation of Oregon lawyers, and representative of an old pioneer family of 1851, was born near Dallas, Polk county, December 3, 1873. His father, Thomas Jefferson Hayter, a native of Franklin county, Mo., and a retired citizen of Dallas who has twice crossed the plains, is mentioned at length in another part of this work. His mother, Mary I. (Embree) Hayter, was born in Howard county, Mo., a daughter of C. D. Embree, who crossed the plains in 1844, lived on a donation claim in Polk county from 1845 until 1889, and died in Dallas in 1900, at the age of ninety-four years.

Until his tenth year Mr. Hayter was reared on the farm, and then located with his parents in Dallas. He was educated in the public schools, subsequently graduating from La Creole Academy. After studying law for a short time in Dallas he became interested in the Clackamas Abstract & Trust Company as compiler of abstracts, and at the same time continued the study of law, being admitted to the bar October 9, 1895. Almost immediately he entered upon a practice of law in partnership with Judge J. J. Daly, of Dallas, an association amicably and satisfactorily continued until 1900, since which time Mr. Hayter has practiced alone. He is a member and ex-vice president of the State Bar Association, and is variously connected with the social organizations in which his town and county abound. Fraternally he is a member of Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. and A. M., of which he is past master; Ainsworth Chapter No. 17, R. A. M. and Oregon Consistory No. 1, in Portland and Al Kader Temple N. M. S. In politics Mr.

Hayter is a staunch Democrat and at the present time is secretary and ex-chairman of the County Democratic Committee. Mr. Hayter is a genial practitioner of the law, and his career has been an active one from the day of entering practice.

HON. THOMAS J. HAYTER. Prominent among the pioneers now living retired in Dallas is Hon. Thomas J. Hayter, owner of a twenty-acre tract of land in the town, and of an eighty-acre farm three miles southwest. Mr. Hayter, who is an ex-member of the Oregon state legislature, an intrepid Indian fighter, and a former extensive stock-raiser, was born in Franklin county, Mo., February 8, 1830, and comes of English forefathers long identified with the south. The establisher of the family in America was his paternal great-grandfather, who came from England and settled first in Maryland, removing in later life to Virginia, where his death occurred. The paternal grandfather, Abraham, was born in Maryland, and became a planter in Washington county, Va., whence he removed to his last home in Campbell county, east Tennessee. James H. Hayter, the father of Thomas J., was born in Washington county, Va., in 1793, and removed to Franklin county, Mo., about 1816. Here he started a saw and flour-mill in the wilderness, which was the pioneer industry of its kind in that section, and at which he worked up to the time of his death in 1856, from cholera, at the age of sixty-three years. Ten days after his death, his faithful wife, who was formerly Sarah Fulkerson, of Lee county, Va., succumbed to the scourge. Of their ten children, seven grew to maturity, and two are living. W. L. Hayter being now a resident of Coos county, Ore., an Oregon pioneer of 1854, and Thomas J.

The seventh child in his father's family, Thomas J. Hayter spent an uneventful youth on the Missouri farm, the first interesting period in his life being the preparation to cross the plains. About nineteen years old, he was just the age to appreciate all the proposed change meant, and he entered with zest into equipping for the departure, which took place April 15, 1849. Via the old California trail, past Fort Hall, Humboldt, and Truckee the train made its way, and upon arriving in Sacramento he found employment as a teamster until going to the mines, August 28, 1849. He must scarcely have realized his mining expectations, for in the fall of 1850 he came to Oregon on the schooner Creole, twenty-three days being consumed on the trip between San Francisco and the mouth of the Columbia. The Little Columbia, the first steamer on the river, brought him to Portland, whence he came immediately to Polk county, and took up a claim. This he disposed of in 1852, and the following year returned to Missouri, via San Francisco, Panama, the steamer Philadelphia to New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi and Missouri to his old home, having been on the route from San Francisco twenty-two and a half days.

In the spring of 1854 Mr. Hayter again crossed the plains with ox-teams, taking the same route to Raft river, and from there branching off onto the old Oregon trail. On this trip he took more time, in order to safely get through with a large herd of cattle. He arrived at the first house in Oregon September 4, 1854, and soon after was located on a claim three miles west of Dallas, where he engaged in the stock business until 1856. In the fall of 1855 he volunteered in Company G, First Oregon Regiment, and served in the Yakima Indian war until an annoying bronchial trouble forced him to retire from the service. Having been honorably discharged he returned to his stock farm, and after selling it in 1856 located on a farm east of Dallas upon which he farmed until 1884. Since then he has lived retired on his farm of twenty acres in the city, although he still owns and derives a substantial income from a farm of eighty acres.

In May, 1856, in Polk county, Ore., Mr. Hayter married Mary I. Embree, who was born in Howard county, Mo., in February, 1838, and who is still living. Mrs. Hayter is the mother of four children, four of whom are living: Eugene is deputy sheriff of Polk county; Mark is a dental surgeon of Dallas; James Carey is editor and proprietor of the Polk County Observer; and Oscar is an attorney-at-law. Mr. Hayter has been a Democrat for many years, and served in the state legislature of 1876. He is a member of the State Pioneer Association.

GEORGE M. GOOCH. There is no citizen in Dallas who takes a deeper or more sincere interest in the welfare and progress of the city and county than does George M. Gooch, and while conducting a successful business enterprise he always finds time and opportunity to aid in the promotion of any movement for the general good. A native of Daviess county, Mo., he was born April 24, 1849, and since 1879 has been a resident of Oregon. His father, William Gooch, was born in eastern Tennessee and the grandfather was of German lineage and belonged to an old Tennessee family. He died in that state. His son, William Gooch, removed from Tennessee to Daviess county, Mo., becoming one of the early settlers there. Entering land from the government he improved a farm which subsequently he sold and then took up his abode in Fannen county, Tex., where for five years he carried on agricultural pursuits;

but being a Union man, believing firmly in the right of the nation to preserve the Union, he found that he was not welcome in the south and with his family started in 1861 to return to Missouri. At the outbreak of the Civil war, while on his way northward, he was robbed by a band of guerrillas, who took his horses, leaving him only one wagon. He had, however, hid some money and with this he was enabled to purchase some oxen and continued on his way to Johnson county, Mo. He then began merchandising in Fayetteville and was also appointed postmaster of that place, but before the end of the war his store was raided by bushwhackers, who supposed he had money hidden. At night they took him from his home, tied a bed cord around his neck and wrapped one end around a saddle horn, with which they dragged him for a long distance. He managed to save his life by catching hold of the rope and keeping the noose from tightening around his neck. He ran for a time, but finally fell and was dragged on the ground. He had given the robbers all the money he had, but, supposing he had hidden some, they took this method to make him reveal its hiding place. After dragging him for some distance they returned him to his own gate and were preparing to repeat the operation when they were frightened away by what they supposed to be the approach of federal troops. In time Mr. Gooch regained his health and continued his duties as postmaster and merchant in Fayetteville until he sold his interests and removed to Grundy county, Mo., where for twenty years he was engaged in farming. On the expiration of that period he retired to private life and resided in Trenton, Mo., until his death at the age of seventy-seven years. His wife bore the maiden name of Vina Mannerling. She was born in eastern Tennessee and died in early womanhood in Missouri. There were five children of this marriage: John J., who is living in Seattle, Wash.; George M.; J. H., a millwright of Springfield, Ore.; A. K., of Trenton, Mo.; and O. J., of Kentucky.

George M. Gooch spent the greater part of his youth and young manhood in Missouri, but on account of the war he received limited educational advantages. In his youth he assisted his father in the store and in the post-office and when nineteen years of age removed to Trenton, Mo., where he was apprenticed to a miller and followed the trade at that place for five years. He afterward spent two years in a mill in Linn county, Mo., and later was employed for one year in the Princeton mill in Mercer county, Mo., following which on account of his health, he went to Grundy county, Mo., where he engaged in farming. He found the outdoor life of field and meadow beneficial, and after two years fully regained his health.

In 1878 Mr. Gooch was married in Grinnell, Mo., to Miss Amelia Hein, who was born on a vessel while her parents were sailing around Cape Horn. Her father, Andrew Hein, was a native of Germany and went to South America, but afterward made his way to New York and subsequently to Missouri, where he was engaged in blacksmithing and wagon-making. His last days were spent in Aumsville, Ore., and his wife died in Salem, this state.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Gooch were born five children: Bertha, preparing for teaching; Bessie, Freddie, Cordie, and one who died in infancy. About the time of his marriage Mr. Gooch removed to Burt county, Neb., and was employed in the Lyons flour mill for one year, and in 1879 he arrived in Salem, Ore., and obtained the position of second miller in the Salem Flouring Mill, where he remained for two years. On the expiration of that period he went to Whitman county, Wash., where he purchased a farm which he broke and improved, successfully engaging in the cultivation of wheat. He had two hundred and thirty-three acres of land, all of which was tillable and for twenty-two years he was a successful farmer. He still owns that property, which is now rented. In 1899 he took up his abode in Salem and in October, 1900, he came to Dallas. Here he purchased the old Felix Noel mill in partnership with his brother, J. H., under the firm name of Gooch Brothers. In 1902 the brother sold his interest to C. F. Hein and the firm of Hein & Company was organized with Mr. Gooch as manager of the business. The mill is supplied with a full roller process and its motive power is water and one forty horse-power engine. The plant is located at the head of Mill street and has a capacity of fifty barrels daily. The leading brand of flour is called "Snow White" and on account of the excellence of the product the firm enjoys a large trade in the valley. In addition to the mill they have a warehouse adjoining.

Fraternally Mr. Gooch is connected with the Artisans. In politics he is independent, but in early manhood he cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln in support of his war policy. Both he and his wife are devoted and loyal members of the Baptist Church, in which he is serving as a trustee.

FRANK E. MEYER, assessor of Polk county, and one of the most popular and promising of the younger generation of politicians in the state, was born on a farm in this county, November 9, 1865, the youngest of the ten children born to Hon. John Henry and Elizabeth (Shanklin) Meyer, the latter of whom was born in Kentucky, January 5, 1826, and at an early day removed to the state of Illinois.

Hon. John Henry Meyer, one of the pioneers of Oregon, was born between the towns of Ostepcoplin and Osnabruck, Hanover, Germany, November 30, 1818, a son of Gerhart H. and Elizabeth (Piete) Meyer, also natives of Hanover. Gerhard H. Meyer brought his wife, four daughters and three sons, to America, and on the way one of the sons died in the sailing vessel and was buried at sea. Mr. Meyer settled near Quincy, Ill., in 1833, but was not permitted to long enjoy the advantages of his adopted country, for his own death and that of his wife occurred the year after their arrival in the country. At the time of this catastrophe John Henry and his older sister were the main props upon which the other children depended, and they managed to cling together, and make the best of a disconsolate situation. In time John Henry made his way to Missouri, where he married, and two children were born, and whence he started across the plains with his family and brother William. The train in that early day experienced many hardships and had considerable trouble with the Indians, and in addition the two children, both of whom were boys, succumbed and died. Mr. Meyer took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres six miles north of Dallas, which he improved and turned into a paying investment, and to which he added until he owned about fifteen hundred acres. With the exception of three hundred and sixty acres retained for his own use he divided his property among his children, all of whom were thus enabled to start in life under promising conditions. His death July 14, 1900, removed a man highly honored in the community, and who possessed more than ordinary ability and public spiritedness. A life-long Democrat, he served his party in various capacities, but in none which reflected greater credit upon himself and district than as a legislator for two terms. His wife is an active member of the Presbyterian Church and Mr. Meyer contributes generously towards the maintenance of that denomination. His wife died January 23, 1899, at the age of seventy-three. The next oldest of the children after those who died on the plains was John, who was drowned in the Umatilla river, November 21, 1877, and who was ex-county judge and ex-school superintendent; George, living on a part of the old homestead, served as representative for two terms; Sarah is the wife of S. T. Riggs, of Salem; Amanda J. is now Mrs. Hastings, of Polk county; Mary is the wife of Mr. White, of Polk county; James lives on a part of the old farm; and Anan is a farmer near Fall City.

At the age of fifteen years Frank E. Meyer came into possession of one hundred and thirteen acres of land, which was a part of the old homestead, and which he farmed and cultivated until removing into Dallas in the fall of 1900. In June, 1900, he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for county assessor, overcoming a Republican majority of one hundred and fifty. So creditable and altogether satisfactory was his administration of the affairs of the assessor's office that he was re-elected in May, 1902, his term of service to continue until January, 1905. In Dallas, Ore., Mr. Meyer was united in marriage with Mary Esta Holman, who was born in Polk county, Ore., a daughter of Hardy Holman, extended mention of whose life may be found in another part of this work. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Meyer, Floyd Clair and Roy Merle. Mr. Meyer is fraternally identified with the Woodmen of the World. His wife is a member of the Women of Woodcraft. Mr. Meyer is progressive, public-spirited, genial, and thoroughly in accord with western ideas and enterprises. In the discharge of his duties as assessor he is ably assisted by his gifted wife.

JOHN MINTO has every claim for representation in the history of the Willamette valley, both from his noble birth and long residence on the Pacific slope, and also for his long public and semi-public service, which of itself has made him a prominent character in the history of the state. His life has been crowded with events of importance, which have followed one another in close succession, and his intimate connection with all the leading agricultural issues of our country has won for him merited distinction. He is now living a retired life at his home in Salem, Ore., and still enjoys life at the advanced age of eighty-one years.

Mr. Minto is a descendant of a prominent Scotch family. His great-grandfather on the paternal side was born in Scotland and went to England as steward of a large estate. His grandfather's name was John Minto and this name has since been handed down from father to son. The grandfather spent the early years of his life in gathering the money that would carry him and his family to America, of which he had read so much. He started with all the family except his son John, the father of the subject of this review, who remained for a time in England, and a sister who had emigrated to America in 1818. But he never reached his destination nor realized his hopes, as he went down in the wreck of the brig Enterprise off Newcastle in 1820, all of the family being rescued except himself and an infant nephew whom he had in his arms.

John Minto, the father of our subject, was born at Wylam, England, on the Tyne, about nine miles from the city of Newcastle. The same house in which he was born was also the birthplace of his eldest son, who is the subject of this review. The father was a coal miner by occupation and by trade a gunsmith. His marriage with Mary Hutchinson, who was of English ancestry, took place in England, and in 1840 they, with their family, came to America, stopping first at Pottsville and later at Pittsburg, Pa., where for several years the father followed coal mining. Early in 1848 the family removed to Iowa, where the mother's death took place. The father lived to be fifty-five years old and died in 1855 of tropical fever on the Caribbean Sea, within a day's sail of Aspinwall, while on his way to join his son in Oregon.

Nine children were born into the parental family, namely: Margaret, John (of this review), Mary, William H., Jane, Annie, Robert H., Isabell and Sarah. Margaret was twice married, her first husband being Mr. Haig, by whom she had one son, John Haig, who was a soldier in the Civil war; her second union was with Thomas Craig, a veteran of the Civil war, and her death took place in Iowa. Mary died in Pennsylvania in 1880; her husband, Henry Ramsey, was also a soldier in the Civil war. William H. was drowned in the river Tyne, England, when a youth of thirteen years. Jane is the widow of Fred Richards and resides at Tipton, Iowa; Annie is the widow of William Arnett and formerly lived at Springfield, Ohio, but is now a resident of Kansas. Robert H. responded nobly to our country's first call for troops at the outbreak of the Civil war, and was a volunteer in the First Ohio Cavalry, serving three months; after receiving an honorable discharge he at once re-enlisted in another cavalry troop and served until the termination of the war; he died in Indian Territory. Isabell, the first child of this family who was born in America, married Alonzo T. Waln, Sr., and resides at Hawkeye, Iowa. Sarah became the wife of Lucien B. Fullerton; at the time of her death in Oregon she owned the donation claim four miles south of Salem, Ore., originally taken up by her brother John, and the same is now owned by her sister's son, Alonzo T. Waln, Jr.

John Minto, whose name heads this article, was born October 10, 1822, in England. He accompanied the family to America and his early education was irregular and defective, owing chiefly to the moderate circumstances of the family as well as to the inferior schools of those early times. From his eighth to his twenty-second year, he found almost steady employment in the mines, digging coal after he had passed his eighteenth year. He finally left Pittsburg, intending to go to Iowa, but when he reached St. Louis he conceived the idea of going to Oregon. He had read so much about frontier life that the very name of Oregon had a peculiar fascination for him, and finally influenced his decision. Changing boats at St. Louis, where he also bought supplies to cross the great plains, he proceeded to St. Joseph, Mo., where he fell in with the Gilliam Company, which rendezvoused at that place. He contracted with R. W. Morrison and drove the leading teams of the Gilliam Company across the plains and Rocky mountains, arriving one month ahead of the balance of the train, and returning, assisted the others on their way. That was in 1844, and he arrived in Oregon City October 18, though the balance of the party did not arrive at Linton, their destination, until much later. Early in 1845 he returned to The Dalles and drove Capt. R. W. Morrison's cattle to the valley, arriving in March of the same year.

July 8, 1847, Mr. Minto was joined in marriage with Martha Ann Morrison, who was born in Montgomery county, Mo., December 17, 1831, a daughter of Capt. R. W. and Nancy (Irwin) Morrison, both of whom died on the Clatsop. They were noble pioneers of that section and both died at the old home farm, which was the original Morrison donation claim. They both lived to attain the advanced age of eighty-four years, and at their death left a large family, as follows: Martha Ann, who became Mrs. Minto; Mary E., widow of Hiram Carnahan, residing at Carnahan Station; Thomas H. Benton, president of the Historical Society at Astoria; John H. and James F., deceased; Hannah M., wife of Captain Hamlin; William M. and Jefferson. The three last mentioned reside on a part of the home farm. Soon after his arrival in Oregon Mr. Minto worked for Peter Burnett, making cedar rails, and next assisted in logging for Hunt's sawmill, near the present site of Clifton. During the year 1845 he purchased the original Methodist Mission claim, and turned his attention to agricultural pursuits. He subsequently sold this farm and took up a donation claim four miles south of Salem, and began immediately to improve it, setting out orchards, etc. About this time he began raising sheep, and soon became a leader in that industry. Fine wool sheep were first introduced into Oregon about 1860, and being already a prominent sheep-raiser, Mr. Minto paid $512 for an interest in ten head of choice Merinos. From the first he was successful in this business, and was soon considered an authority on all questions pertaining to sheep. He also contributed many articles on sheep-raising to the leading agricultural papers of the country, and for two years was secretary of the State Agricultural Society. During the second year he was elected by the managers of the society to edit The Willamette Farmer, devoted wholly to agricultural interests.

In 1873 Mr. Minto was appointed by the county court to go to the mountains and ascertain if there was a natural pass into eastern Oregon, as had been reported by some hunters. The report was confirmed, and the pass was named Minto's Pass, in honor of our subject, who personally superintended the work of constructing a trail. In 1882 he learned from Hon. John B. Waldo that a lower pass existed seven miles south of Minto's pass, and, upon the latter's suggestion, Mr. Minto was furnished with the funds to make a survey, and finally a railroad was built through this pass over the Cascade mountains.

In politics Mr. Minto is a Republican, though he was originally a Douglas Democrat. He served several terms in the lower house of the state legislature, being elected in 1862, 1868, 1880 and 1890. In 1892 he received a commission from the secretary of agriculture to report on the sheep-husbandry in the northwest, embracing California, Oregon and Washington. In 1895 he was appointed by Governor Lord as a member of the State Board of Horticulture of Oregon, and shortly afterward was elected Secretary of the board and served as such for three and one-half years. He has been a copious writer on every subject connected with farm life, and the management of the Pioneer Association of Oregon selected him to make the presentation speech February 5, 1889, when the life-size portrait of Dr. John McLoughlin, which now adorns the state house, was presented to the state. It is needless to add that he did not disappoint his friends on that occasion, as he is a fluent speaker.

In 1867 Mr. Minto purchased the Island property, which was then covered with driftwood and undergrowth. Under his management it soon put on an air of thrift, and since 1870 he has made it his home. He owns two hundred and forty-seven acres of land, seven acres being on the east side of the river.

Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Minto, as follows: John Wilson, Mary E., Robert B., William Jasper, Irwin, Douglas C., Harry Percy, and May. The last-named died in infancy, and Irwin and Robert B. died of typhoid fever when eighteen years of age. Mary E. is the wife of Robert C. Halley and they reside on part of Mrs. Minto's donation claim four miles south of Salem. Jasper resides in the latter city. Douglas C. operates the home place and Harry Percy is prospecting for gold in Alaska.

Though Mr. Minto is now in his eighty-first year, he has not ceased to think and care for the best interests of Oregon, and his views have often been sought in matters of moment.

JOHN PORTER. Among the courageous pioneers of Marion county, who put forth their highest efforts toward the upbuilding of the community in which they had located, were Edward Porter and his son John, the subject of this sketch. Coming to Oregon when the country was practically virgin wilderness, they were participants in and interested witnesses of the rapid transformation of the heavily timbered land into a rich and productive agricultural region, and by every means within their power aided in its growth and advancement.

Edward Porter was born in 1803. Early in life he engaged in farming in Ohio, where he married. In 1835 he removed with his family from Ohio to Illinois, settling in Fulton county, where for nearly a score of years he continued farming. In his youth he had learned the trade of steel-smith, and made tools of all kinds, an occupation which demanded no small measure of skill. In 1853 he started on the long journey overland, bound for Oregon. He and his family crossed the intervening country with teams and wagons, which were then the only means of land transportation in the west. With his wife and children he came direct to Marion county, and located about five miles southeast of Silverton, on what is known as the Porter donation claim. In common with other pioneers he labored with untiring energy to improve his land, and as the years rolled by found himself possessed of a comfortable home. Here he resided until after the death of his wife, Anna (Anderson) Porter, who was born in 1805. His remaining years he spent at the home of his youngest son. He lived to be over seventy years of age.

A native of Vermilion township, Richland county, Ohio, John Porter was born October 6, 1830, and in that state spent the first five years of his life. Going then with his parents to Indiana, and thence to Fulton county, Ill., he was there reared and educated. When his parents started westward in 1853 he accompanied them on their trip across the plains. They were nearly six months journeying with the plodding ox-teams, but had no serious adventures en route. Being young and unmarried he remained at home, assisting in the clearing of the land taken up by his father until he reached the age of about twenty-five years, when he took unto himself a wife and established himself as a householder on the old Porter donation claim. There he resided until 1859. In that year he located near Fairfield, on the French Prairie, where he remained until 1864. From that time until the death of his wife in 1897 he resided on the White donation claim. Since 1897 he has made his home with his children.

Mr. Porter's wife, whose maiden name was Annis White, was born in Indiana, and came with her parents from Missouri to Marion county in 1852. They settled about five miles southeast of Silverton, on the White donation claim. Of the ten children born of their union, one died in infancy. The others are as follows: Allen, residing in Grant county, Ore.; Rene, wife of F. M. Remington, a resident of Idaho; Edward S., a farmer of Marion county; Charlotte, wife of E. W. Ross, also a farmer of Marion county; Anna, wife of R. N. Harrison, of Washington; John H., living not far from the old homestead; Josie, wife of L. D. Leonard, of Idaho; Ai, who lives on the home farm; and Lena, wife of B. H. Davis of Silverton.

A man of unusual energy and ability, John Porter has met with almost unprecedented success in his life occupation. Since the beginning of his career he has accumulated a large amount of land, aggregating about sixteen hundred acres, a large part of which is in a good state of cultivation and yielding him a handsome annual income. Straightforward and honest in all his dealings, he enjoys in a marked degree the confidence and good-will of all who know him. He is liberal and public spirited, and has taken an active part in the political undertakings of his neighborhood. The record of his entire life has been above reproach, and his name will go down in history as that of one of the earnest, conscientious, fair-minded and upright men of Marion county.

O. P. DANNALS. Continuously since 1896 O. P. Dannals has served as councilman of the First ward in Albany, and during that time has proved himself a conscientious and painstaking public servant. His reputation as a broad-minded and incorruptible politician goes hand in hand with his standing as one of the substantial business men of the town, and one who has for years contributed to its material and moral upbuilding. An expert blacksmith and machinist, he stands at the head of his line in this community, and his shop, with its horse-power machinery and modern facilities for doing a large and varied business, is one of the busiest places in the town.

James Dannals, the father of O. P., was born in Rochester, N. Y., and by trade is a cabinet-maker and carpenter. As a young man he saw an opportunity to make a fortune in the mines of California, but after crossing the plains with ox teams in 1851, and spending a year in mining and prospecting, he gave up the idea of making money rapidly and came to Oregon. Taking up a claim near Eugene in the spring of 1853, he soon after moved into the town and engaged in the furniture business, continuing the same until 1862. For a short time following he farmed in the vicinity of Salem, and in 1868 bought a farm twelve miles south of Albany, in Linn county, where he lived and prospered until 1876. He is now living retired in Albany, where he is well known, and where he has served in the city council. He married Louise Clover, a native of Indiana, and daughter of Paul Clover, who crossed the plains with his family in 1852, settling on a farm in Linn county. Oscar Paul is the oldest of the four sons and four daughters born into this family; Lucy, the oldest daughter, is the wife of Worth Huston, the present sheriff of Linn county; Rosa is deceased; Frank is a painter and decorator in Albany; James is deceased; Daisy is now Mrs. Allen, of Washington; Charles is engaged in painting in Albany; and Laura is living at home.

Born on the old donation claim near Eugene, February 5, 1854, Oscar Paul was educated in the public schools, and while still a boy, learned the cabinet-maker's trade from his father. Later he was apprenticed to a blacksmith and machinist, and at the expiration of his service was amply qualified to look out for himself in any emergency. In 1876 he began to farm in Linn county, and in 1878 located in Albany, where his father was running a furniture factory, and where he himself worked as a cabinet-maker and upholsterer. In 1882 he removed to east Oregon and worked at blacksmithing at Dufur, Wasco county, returning to Albany in 1882, and establishing his present shop in one of the most desirable locations in the town. He makes a specialty of horse-shoeing, but besides has a most complete machinist's outfit, both for repairing and manufacturing.

In Linn county Mr. Dannals was united in marriage with Alice McCulley, a native daughter of Linn county, and whose father, J. M., is a farmer in Idaho. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dannals, the order of their birth being as follows: Elmer J., a conductor with the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad; Clyde, a blacksmith in business with his father; Nellie, employed with the telephone company; Floe; and James. A Republican in politics, Mr. Dannals has taken a keen interest in his party's local undertakings, and was elected councilman first in 1896, being re-elected continuously since, the last time in 1902. He is fraternally popular, and is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. Like the majority of men who are thrown much with horses, Mr. Dannals has a keen appreciation of the good points of a horse, and owns some valuable specimens of this noble animal. In the estimation of competent judges the driving horse with which he usually appears is one of the finest to be found in Oregon. A beautiful thoroughbred Arabian, of the kind the Bedouin chiefs rank as deserving a place with their owners in the great hereafter, with a splendidly arched neck and shining sides, it is not surprising that the hand which guides the reins is a kindly and gentle one, and that it is numbered among his most valued possessions.

STIRLING PRICE MUNKERS. Prominently identified with the management of the public affairs of Linn county, S. P. Munkers of Albany, occupies the responsible position of county recorder. A native son, he is a worthy representative of one of the earliest and most honored pioneer families of the Willamette valley, the name of Munkers being conspicuously associated with its industrial development, and the promotion of its prosperity. He is a son of the late Hon. Thomas McLean Munkers, and was born in Linn county, September 16, 1864.

Descendant of a distinguished Virginian ancestry, Mr. Munker's paternal grandfather, Benjamin Franklin Munkers, was born and reared in the Old Dominion state, but began his life work as a farmer in Missouri. Crossing the plains with his family in 1845, he took up a donation claim in Marion county, Ore., near Salem, and was there engaged in agricultural pursuits until well advanced in years. Removing then to Linn county, he resided in Scio until his death.

As a boy of fifteen years, Thomas McLean Munkers came with his parents to Oregon from Jackson county, Mo., the place of his birth, making the journey with ox-teams in 1845. In 1846, accompanied by two of his brothers, he rode across the mountains to California, but not being impressed with the country, soon returned to Salem, Ore. During the excitement that followed the discovery of gold at Sutter's Mills, he again visited California, and while there took part in the Indian war, and was an active participant in various skirmishes with the savages, both in California and Oregon. After his marriage he settled in Linn county, purchasing a farm of four hundred and eighty acres in the forks of the Santiam river. Improving the land, he devoted his attention to the raising of grain and stock until his retirement from active pursuits, when he settled in Scio, where his death occurred in 1898, at the age of sixty-six years. Active and influential in public matters, he represented his district in the state legislature three terms, and served one term as state senator. He was a Democrat in politics, and a member of the Christian Church.

Hon. Thomas McLean Munkers was twice married. His first wife, whose maiden name was Phoebe Ann Crabtree, was born in Kentucky, a daughter of Washington Crabtree. Her father was an early pioneer of Linn county, taking up a donation claim near Red Hills, at the forks of the Santiam river, where he improved a farm, and also worked at his trade of blacksmithing and carriage and wagonmaking, as well as manufacturing plows. He died at the venerable age of ninety-three years, a respected and honored citizen. Mrs. Phoebe Ann (Crabtree) Munkers died at the age of twenty-six years, leaving three children, namely: George W., who died in Marion county, Ore., in June, 1902; Sarah I., wife of John Smallman, of Stayton, Ore.; and Stirling Price, the subject of this review. For his second wife Mr. Munkers married Mary Jane Chrisnan, by whom he had three children, two of whom are now living: Ida, wife of Ed. King, of Salem, Ore.; and J. C. Munkers, of Mohawk, Ore.

Reared on the home farm, Stirling Price Munkers received a practical education in the district schools, remaining beneath the parental roof until attaining his majority. Accepting then a position as superintendent of the warehouse at Munkers Station, he was associated with G. F. Simpson as a dealer in grain for nine years, and after a time became a partner in the business. Returning to the old homestead, Mr. Munkers had charge of the farm for five years, being successfully employed in grain and stock-raising. Purchasing a farm of his own, he engaged in general farming for three years, when he sold out and removed to Scio, and for a time worked at various occupations. Accepting the nomination for county recorder on the Democratic ticket in June, 1902, Mr. Munkers was elected by a majority of one hundred and fifteen votes, for a term of two years, and took the oath of office on July 7, 1902.

On June 29, 1892, in Albany, Ore., Mr. Munkers married Miss Maggie McKnight, who was born in Linn county, of pioneer parents. Two children have blessed their union: Zelpha Ann and Royal Bruce. Mr. Munkers is a member and past chancellor of Scio Lodge No. 36, K. of P.; and Scio Camp, W. O. W., of which he is past counselor. Politically he is a sound Democrat. Mrs. Munkers is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

MATTHEW SMALL. With southern blood his birthright and southern skies the first he ever looked upon, the father of Matthew Small was still a staunch Abolitionist, going even to the length of giving up his home and the pleasant associations of his young manhood to remove from the conditions that were so foreign to his inborn principles. Thomas Henderson Small was born in Wayne county, Ky., October 6, 1810, and was reared to the life of a farmer. In that state, December 22, 1831, he married Miss Elizabeth Burnett, who was born in Mercer county, Ky., July 14, 1806, and there they continued to make their home for some time. In 1832 they removed to Tennessee. Finding the social conditions there such as he could not endorse, Mr. Small gathered up his worldly goods and with the proverbial ox-team started in September, 1852, on the journey over an unsettled continent. Whatever the remainder of their life was, one year of it was spent as was that of the Israelites of old, in wandering toward a land which they fondly hoped would prove the realization of their dreams. On the trip they had stopped in Gentry county, Mo., where they had remained through the winter, taking up the journey again with the breaking of the cold. They were providentially spared the depredations of the Indians while on the way, reaching Oregon safely September 7, 1853, and coming direct to Marion county, where they settled in the Waldo Hills, about four and one-half miles south of Silverton and twelve miles east of Salem.

Having purchased the squatter's right to property in this locality, Mr. Small at once proved up on the claim, putting upon it all the improvements that brought it from the wilderness to rank with the farms of this fertile county. His first wife having died on the old donation claim six miles south of Silverton, October 21, 1882, after a few years he married Mrs. Fannie E. Green, a native of Missouri, who was born January 28, 1839, and died June 30, 1893. By his first marriage he had nine children, three of whom are living as follows: Henry, of California; Matthew, of this review; and Rhea, living on the old home place. Thomas H. Small died May 3, 1901, when over eighty-nine years of age, after a well-spent life, not the least of whose labors was his ministry in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, he having given about a third of his time to religious work. He was ordained to the ministry in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in eastern Tennessee, about 1832. During the years of his residence in Oregon he performed onerous pastoral duties in various sections of the Willamette valley, and never sought pecuniary reward for his services. He was one of the best known men in the vicinity, and the general esteem in which he was held has made his name one to be remembered.

Matthew Small was born October 25, 1836, in Sweetwater, Monroe county, Tenn., receiving his education through the medium of the district schools, principally in his native state. He journeyed to the west with his parents and remained with them until his marriage, which occurred in Oregon April 2, 1857, uniting him with Miss Mary J. McAlpin, a native of Indiana. Their first home was one mile north of the old home place, but in 1870 they removed to the location where they now live, about a half-mile south of Silverton, on the old mountain road. The house in which the family live was built in 1853. In his farming Mr. Small has always been progressive, endeavoring to bring this industry to a higher standard of excellence and to make it pleasant as well as profitable. In addition to city property Mr. Small and his wife own nine hundred and fifty acres, upon which he is at present engaged in general farming and stock-raising. He is also interested in fine sheep and goats, being the first man to introduce Angora goats into the Willamette valley. His first wife having died March 9, 1891, at the age of forty-nine years six months and four days, he married Margaret M. Moore, April 5, 1892. She is a native of Ottawa, LaSalle county, Ill., and a daughter of William Craig and Margaret Jane (Wauchope) Moore, born respectively in Pennsylvania and Ireland. They died in LaSalle county, Ill. By his first union Mr. Small had five children, only three of whom are living: Olivia, wife of Capt. David Craig, of Macleay, Ore.; Isham B., of Oswego, Ore.; and Narvesta, wife of James G. Smith, of Silverton. The children by his second marriage are Hugh Talmage and John Quincy. Politically Mr. Small is a supporter of the Prohibition party, and finds his religious home in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In closing this brief sketch of the life of Mr. Small, it is but just to add that, throughout his entire career, he has been highly esteemed by his fellowmen. The admirable traits in his character—his probity, his generosity toward others, his fine religious qualities, his public spirit, and the broad view he takes of affairs in general—all contribute to render him one of the most worthy citizens of the Willamette valley. Not only his family, but his many friends and acquaintances, view his record with feelings of justifiable pride; and when the time comes that he shall be called from the scene of his earthly labors, his good works will stand perpetually as a monument to the graciousness, honor and unselfishness which have characterized his entire career.

WILLIAM RALSTON. This honored and worthy pioneer citizen of Linn county, Ore., is passing his sunset days in ease and comfort, enjoying the reward of his early industry and perseverance. He has been identified with the interests of Linn county for over half a century and has long been recognized as one of its best citizens, aiding and maintaining it in reaching its present position among the first-class communities of the state. He is a son of Jeremiah and Margaret (McKnight) Ralston and was born in Rockville, Parke county, Ind., March 24, 1824.

Jeremiah Ralston was born in Greene county, Ohio, where he stayed until he reached manhood's years, then moved to Washington county, Ind., where he was joined in wedlock with Margaret McKnight. Of the large family of children afterward reared by them, only three are now living. After residing in Indiana for a number of years they moved to Iowa and located in the city of Burlington, where he engaged in mercantile life until 1847. That year he left Iowa and traveled by ox-teams to Oregon to seek his fortune anew. The train of which he was a member had many difficulties and hardships to pass through before reaching his destination, for the Indians at The Dalles were troublesome. Upon their safe arrival, however, they located at Lebanon in Linn county and through the years of prosperity that followed he was always numbered among that city's inhabitants until his demise twelve years ago, at an advanced age. He entered the business life of the city and worked his way to the top of the ladder, owning the leading merchandise store of the city at the time of his death. Politically, he was an aggressive supporter of the Democratic party all his life, and in religious affairs belonged to the Methodist Church. His wife, who died in Iowa in 1840, was a member of the Secular Church, now the United Presbyterian.

William Ralston was the eldest child of his parents. His education was derived from schools in Indiana, where he remained until ten years of age, and from those in Iowa, where the family later located. After his father moved to Oregon, he assisted all he could in managing the store and home place until 1848, at which time he went to the mines of California, and labored there three years. Finding this not as suitable as he had believed, he returned to Oregon and engaged with his father as a partner in the first store ever started in Lebanon. The business continued five or six years, until William severed his connection to engage in general farming and stock-raising near Lebanon. This farm consisted of a donation land claim of three hundred and twenty acres, which was improved as fully as possible by Mr. Ralston, and became his home place until 1878, the year of his retirement from active life.

In 1854 he was joined in marriage with Laura Denney, a daughter of Christian and Eliza (Nickerson) Denney and a native of Muskingum county, Ohio. Her father was born in Virginia and went to Ohio at an early age, moving in 1853 to Oregon, where he settled in Linn county near the city of Lebanon, but lived only a short time after his arrival.

Mr. Ralston and his wife had five children, of whom only two are now living. The deceased are Franklin, who lived three years; Christian, who had attained the age of twenty years, and William, who died in infancy. The others are Loner L., a stockman of Portland, Ore., and Joseph H., residing in Albany, Ore., where he follows the business of an electrician. The mother died in 1886 at her home in Albany. Mr. Ralston was afterward joined in marriage with Plantena Biddle, the widow of Dr. William Biddle, who died in May, 1903. Both of these ladies were devoted and active members of the Methodist Church which Mr. Ralston also joined some years ago and has served many years as a trustee.

Fraternally he is a member of the Masonic Order, being a Knight Templar. He has always been a Democrat in his political views, and for three terms served as a councilman of the city of Albany. He is admired by his fellow-citizens for his integrity and uprightness.

FRANK EUGENE ALLEN. The business contingent of Albany is materially augmented by the successful business career of Frank Eugene Allen, engaged in an extensive grocery and hardware business since 1888, and a resident of this town since 1886. He was born in Adrian, Lenawee county, Mich., September 18, 1852, to which part of the country his father, Asa, a native of western New York state, removed at a very early day. The family afterward removed to Richmond, Macomb county, where the father cleared a place in the beech and maple wilderness, and built the first house and church in the vicinity. He was one of the very first settlers of that region, and up to the time of his death was an important factor in its development. His wife, Ellen (Sanford) Allen, was born in Wyoming county, N. Y., and died fifteen years after the birth of Frank Eugene, her oldest son. She had four children in all, and of these two sons and one daughter are living.

Equipped with a public school education, Frank Eugene Allen became independent at the age of eighteen, and for a few years worked on farms in different parts of Macomb county. In 1876 he came west to Oregon, and at once inaugurated a successful stock business on a farm near La Grande, Union county, and was thus employed for ten years. With the gains from his stock dealing he located in Albany in 1886, and organized the Pacific Mattress Company, of which he was manager for a couple of years. In 1888 he bought out N. Blodgett, one block west of his present store, and engaged in a grocery business, conducting the same until entering into partnership with E. Washburn in 1896, when he moved here and added to his original stock a complete line of hardware. He is successful and thoroughly understands catering to the public and is possessed of the tact and consideration which retains the good will of the public.

Mr. Allen has been twice married and is the father of five children. His present wife was formerly Rachel Dumond, a native of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. The children are: Berthe, who is Mrs. Whitlark of La Grande; George, who died in Stockton, Cal., in 1902.; Elmer, who is clerking in Spokane, Wash.; Ruth and Donald. Fraternally Mr. Allen is one of the best known men in the Willamette valley, and few have exceeded him in the extent of honors conferred. In 1884 he became a member of the La Grange Lodge No. 41, A. F. & A. M., and is now a member and past master of St. John's Lodge No. 62. In 1896 he became high priest of Bayley Chapter No. 8, Royal Arch Masons, and in 1898 became eminent commander of Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T. In 1896 he was elected grand junior warden of the Grand Commandery of Oregon and September 25, 1902, was elected grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Oregon. He is also a member of the Knights of Pythias, of which he is past chancellor; and the Woodmen of the World. For many years Mr. Allen has been connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he is steward. He is a member of the Alco Club, and politically is identified with the Republican party. Mr. Allen is the sole architect of his fortune, and his quiet and unostentatious rise to prominence is both to be commended and emulated.

CHARLES SCOTT. The name of Scott has been indelibly associated with the rise and progress of Marion county, and the development of one of the most important industries in the entire valley of the Willamette. Robert H. Scott, father of Charles Scott, a detailed outline of whose career appears on other pages in this volume, was for many years one of the most prominent and highly esteemed citizens of the county, and accomplished as much, if not more, than any other individual toward the promotion of the industrial interests of the community. The example he set, and his firm principles of strict integrity, determination, unflagging industry, and public-spirited efforts toward the advancement of the general welfare of Scott's Mills and Woodburn, where the most active years of his life were spent, doubtless proved a source of great inspiration to his sons, who have striven to emulate their worthy sire in all those characteristics which combined to render him a conspicuous figure in the valley for so many years.

Charles Scott received from his father an heritage which has enabled him to compete successfully with other captains of industry in the great northwest. He became one of the most expert millers in Oregon while still a young man, and although at the present time various worthy interests have resulted in his abandoning the full control of the mills his father established in Woodburn, he has always been associated with the trade. He is the fifth of the ten children born to Robert H. and Ann (West) Scott, and was born at Westport, Ore., November 5, 1864. He was favored with excellent educational advantages. After completing his rudimentary training in the public schools, he entered the Oregon State Agricultural College at Corvallis, to which he was appointed as a student by T. W. Davenport, of Silverton, Ore. After three years spent in this institution, he entered the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated March 10, 1886. While a youth he had assisted his father with his books, and in other work about the mill, and gradually became interested in saw-milling. For two years he acted in the capacity of manager of the plant at Scott's Mills. He then removed to Woodburn and engaged in the milling business with his father, and for several years managed his interests in that town.

In later years Mr. Scott has become identified with various other important interests. Mining has demanded a great deal of his time and attention. He owns the controlling interest in the Esmeralda gold and quartz mine in the state of Sonora, Mexico, which contains a ledge varying in width from two to six feet, and has been worked to a depth of sixty feet. He is also interested in mines in Montana, seven miles north of the National Park, in Sweet Grass county. These are both quartz and placer, one of the former being the Hidden Treasure, which has been incorporated for $10,000,000. Another line of activity has occupied no little of his time and energy. At Scott's Mills he owns forty acres of land upon which he is raising large quantities of prunes, pears, apples and other fruits. He also owns two hundred acres of farming land near Scott's Mills which he devotes to general farming and stock raising.

At Glad Tidings, Ore., June 21, 1893, Mr. Scott was united in marriage with Lulu Shaver, a native of that town, and a daughter of Alfred H. and Margaret (Ridings) Shaver. Her father, who was born in Kentucky, came to Oregon in 1851, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and locating in the Waldo Hills. Subsequently he moved to Glad Tidings, where he and his wife passed the remainder of their days. Mr. and Mrs. Scott are the parents of one son—Alfred Merle.

Mr. Scott was reared in the faith of the Democracy, but with the characteristic breadth of mind by which he levels all things, he has developed an independence of thought in political matters. Fraternally he is a member of Woodburn Lodge A. F. & A. M.

Mr. Scott is a man of pronounced business ability and of unquestioned integrity, and he wields an important influence upon all public undertakings in his adopted city. Numerous occasions have arisen during the years of his maturity when the opportunity of exhibiting a fine public spirit has presented itself to him, and he has never failed to assist in the promotion of such causes as have been inspired by a desire to advance the welfare of the people. Though a very busy man, he does not show an inclination to neglect the finer ideas of humanity, but, by his advice and example, encourages the best which an ambitious community demands.

JOHN BALDWIN TEAL. Since coming to his present farm in 1880 John Baldwin Teal has advanced steadily to the fore in county affairs, and as a politician and lumberman has gained an enviable reputation, being the first lumberman to invade this section of Polk county. His property is fortunately well adapted to lumbering, being heavily wooded, and he has added to his original purchase of one hundred and sixty acres, until he is the owner of six hundred and forty acres of valuable timber land. For the first ten years of his residence here he made rails and shakes, and being successful he branched out into the saw and planing-mill business, building the first mills of this part of Polk county in 1891. Since then the hum of machinery has broken the former stillness of the surrounding country. Shipments are made at the rate of the mill's capacity, which is ten thousand feet per day. A modern residence, fine barns and outbuildings, and a complete general farming outfit, facilitate one of the most ambitious and far-reaching projects in this part of Polk county.

This genial and popular miller and farmer is a native of New York state, and was born at Utica, May 5, 1849. As far back as authentic records show, his ancestors pursued their various vocations in Yorkshire, England, where Charles Teal, the paternal grandfather, was born, and where his son, Thomas Teal, the father of John, was also born. The father emigrated with his wife, Elizabeth (Baldwin) Teal, to America, in the spring of 1840. He was possessed of considerable skill as a stationary engineer, although he had little money, and no influence to assist him on this side of the water. Locating in Utica, he worked at his trade for some months, and in 1851 removed to Illinois, locating in Scott county, where he also followed his trade until the outbreak of the Civil war. Enlisting at the age of thirty-nine in Company K, Fourteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, as a private, he was destined to be enrolled among the fallen heroes of that memorable strife, and fell at the battle of Pittsburg Landing, April 6, 1862. He was survived by his wife, who died in Florida in the fall of 1886, at the age of eighty-four years. She was the mother of four children, three sons and one daughter, of whom Charles is a potter by trade, and a resident of Macomb, Ill.; Susan, deceased wife of G. B. Campbell, of Upshire county, Fla.; and W. H., deceased.

When the father went to the war John Baldwin was bound out for his board and four dollars a month, and while thus serving, supplemented his rather meager common school education by attending night school. At the age of seventeen he apprenticed to a carriage-maker, serving four years, and in 1870 he came over the Union Pacific Railroad to Oregon, locating at Dallas, where he followed his trade for ten years. In 1880, as heretofore stated, he came to his present farm, bringing with him his wife and children, the former of whom, Ursula A. (Huffman) Teal, was born in Virginia, June 5, 1852, a daughter of John A. Huffman, who died in Kansas City in 1891, at the age of seventy-four years. Ursula A. Huffman came to Oregon in 1870 with Nathan Baker and his wife, and her marriage with Mr. Teal occurred in 1871. She is the mother of eleven children, nine of whom are living: Charles D., at home; Annie B., the wife of Abie Brown, of the vicinity of Falls City; William A.; James E.; Chester O.; John B., Jr.; Nova A.; Ira L.; and Orva P.

Besides saw-milling and general farming, Mr. Teal is interested in the raising of Angora goats, and has about two hundred and forty head at the present time. He has taken a prominent part in Republican politics, has been school director and road supervisor many terms, and since 1901 has served as county commissioner. Fraternally he is well known and popular, and is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees of Fall City. He is a capable and far-sighted business man, a scientific agriculturist, and successful stock-raiser, and he may be counted on to further with counsel or practical assistance any project which has for its object the maintenance of the well-being of the community.

HON. JOHN W. COWLS. The name of Hon. John W. Cowls is inseparably associated with the early educational, judicial, mercantile and financial development of Yamhill county, and his death, November 24, 1896, removed from accustomed haunts and innumerable friends a noble, versatile and well-adjusted personality. During very early colonial days his emigrating ancestors settled in Massachusetts, where was born his paternal grandfather, Adonijah, one of the staunch supporters of colonial independence during the Revolutionary war. This patriotic sire removed in later life to New York state, where his son, Cyrus, the father of John W., was born. The latter married Rachel White, a native of New York, and whose people were also early settlers in Massachusetts, and devoted members of the Methodist Church. As far back as authentic records go, the male members of the Cowls family have been fraternally associated with the Masons.

A native of Onondaga county, N. Y., Hon. John W. Cowls was born November 3, 1823, and was educated at the De Reuter Institute and the Pompey Hill Academy. The knowledge thus gained was applied to educational work, in which he engaged in his native state, and in connection with farming, after his removal to Ohio, in 1840. From Wisconsin, which was his home for five years, Mr. Cowls crossed the plains to California in 1852, and though he was moderately successful in prospecting and mining in the vicinity of Placerville, failing health interfered with his cherished plans, and compelled his removal to the more bracing climate of Oregon. At no time of large proportions, his available assets were soon diminished to $2.50, and in order to replenish his depleted finances he earnestly sought employment as a teacher. In passing, one day, he encountered Zebedee Sheldon in his yard, who, reckoning before consulting his wife, arranged very favorable terms with the disconsolate scholar for the education of his six children. The bottom falling out of this arrangement, Mr. Cowls offered to teach the children a few days for his room and board, and so favorably impressed the parents with his worth, that his services were retained for some time. Two of the boys thus instructed developed into physicians, one locating in Salem and the other in Eugene City. After three months in the Sheldon home, Mr. Cowls secured a school two and a half miles from the present site of McMinnville, and at that time but few and widely separated settlers inhabited the region, the children for the most part arriving for their tuition on horseback, and in their general lives experiencing deprivations unthought of by the searchers after knowledge of to-day.

This particular school was recalled by Mr.

Cowls as the center from which radiated his later success, for he was thus thrown into intercourse with the older members of the community, who quickly arrived at an appreciation of his abilities. Though still continuing to teach, he was able also to fulfill his duties as county auditor, an office to which he was elected after the first meeting of the Republicans in Oregon in 1857. When the state constitution was adopted, he was elected county clerk, and afterward served for eight years as county judge, during the latter office engaging also in farming three miles northwest of McMinnville. His special fitness for official responsibility being fully demonstrated, Mr. Cowls was nominated and elected to the state senate, and during the session admirably maintained the best interests of those who had worked in his behalf. Beginning with 1864, Mr. Cowls operated a mercantile establishment in McMinnville, in partnership with James R. Bean, but after a year and a half, returned to his farm, ostensibly to remain for the rest of his life. However, his ambition to accomplish largely had by no means diminished, for in 1888 he established the McMinnville National Bank, of which institution he was the honored and capable president for the balance of his life. The impress of his sterling integrity pervaded this developing enterprise, and invested it with a substantiality not exceeded by any of its kind in the county. Besides owning the building in which the bank is housed, Mr. Cowls otherwise contributed to the structural development of McMinnville, and after erecting the first residence, in 1865, when few people had as yet identified their lot with the embryo town, built several residences and public buildings.

The first wife of Mr. Cowls was formerly Mrs. Lucretia Martin, and of this union there was born a daughter, Mary, who died at the age of two and a half years. The present Mrs. Cowls was formerly the wife of James F. Bewley, mentioned at length in another part of this work, and she was, before her first marriage, Lucy E. Graves.

COL. JAMES B. GRAVES. Among the Oregon pioneers of 1847 the name of Col. James B. Graves is worthy of prominent mention. His ability for public service was soon recognized, and his valuable assistance as a member of the territorial legislature gained him great prominence. He was born in Virginia in 1796, and came of English ancestry. The family was established in America by Thomas Graves, the father of James B., who came to the land of the oppressed in time to assist in making it the land of the free. He settled in Virginia, and in time owned large landed estates, his enlistment in the Revolutionary war covering many of the important battles of that memorable time. From Virginia he removed to Kentucky, and from there to Warren county, Mo.

Before the removal of the family to Missouri James B. Graves married Diana Newton, a native of Kentucky, and she became the mother of nine children. In Missouri Mr. Graves was a member of the state militia, for meritorious service in which he gained the rank of colonel. Discontent in the middle west led to plans for removal to the far northwest, and in 1846 the oldest son and daughter joined a train across the plains, the father, mother and five children following the next year. After spending two months in the vicinity of what is now McMinnville, the father took up a donation claim, which has since been in the possession of the family, and which is located one mile west of Sheridan. As may be imagined, no country possessed fewer signs of civilization than did this very region around Sheridan, for in the territory there was scarcely an aggregation of houses and interests worthy the name of town. Portland was in its infancy, and Oregon City owed its signs of life solely to the fact that it was the principal distributing point for the arriving emigrants. On his square mile of beautiful and fertile land Colonel Graves built the log cabin which was the home of the family for several years, and here the first wife died in March, 1848. His second marriage also occurred here, and united him with Mrs. Catherine Bewley, who died in 1867.

In 1862 Mr. Graves purchased a home in Salem, but from 1867 until his death, in 1882, at the age of eighty-five, he lived with his children. He was a man whom all delighted to honor, and his sterling integrity and interesting personality pervaded whatever he started out to accomplish. At one time he took much interest in politics, and his services in the early territorial legislature were characterized by marked ability and disinterested devotion to the best welfare of his district.

HENRY A. CLEEK. The successful career of Henry A. Cleek should furnish encouragement to all who contemplate engaging in stock-raising operations in Linn county. When he arrived in Oregon in 1861 his worldly possessions consisted of the clothes he wore, an old wagon, and four horses much the worse for their trip across the plains. For the first eighteen months he was glad of common wages as a farm hand, and with his earnings he was able to pay for a farm of one hundred and sixty acres in Benton county, near Corvallis. This he stocked to a limited extent, and as success came his way he added to his land, in time settling on three hundred and twenty acres nine miles south of Corvallis, where he engaged in farming for about fourteen years. At the end of that time he was able to sell his land at a profit, and he changed his base of operations to Willow creek, Crook county, Ore., where he conducted a very large stock-raising business for the period of twenty-eight years. He had three thousand acres of land in Crook county, and became one of the best known stockmen in that section of the state. The experience gained was invaluable, besides enabling him to retire with an ample competence in 1900. Two years later he disposed of his Crook county farm and his herds of cattle, but he still owns twelve hundred acres of farm land near Plainview, which he rents, and he also possesses the farm formerly occupied by him in Benton county, and consisting of three hundred and twenty acres.

This ambitious and successful stock-raiser and at present retired citizen of Albany, was born in Sullivan county, Tenn., October 28, 1833, and was reared on a farm. His father, Henry Cleek, was a farmer during his entire active life, and from Sullivan county moved to Ray county, his death occurring in Monroe county, also in Tennessee. His mother, Linda (Titsworth) Cleek, also was born in Tennessee, and died in Monroe county after raising to maturity a family of twelve children. Of these children, Henry A. is the oldest, and the only one in Oregon. He lived on the home farm until his twenty-fourth year, and in 1857 joined a party of home-seekers bound for the coast, his outfit consisting of ox and horse teams. Leaving Arkansas in March, they proceeded over the Platte route to California, arriving in Yolo county, Cal., in October. Here Mr. Cleek engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1859, and that year returned to Tennessee via Panama, remaining there until the spring of 1860. Going then to Independence, Mo., he wintered there, and in 1861 again outfitted for the long journey across the plains. This time he came with horse teams, starting in March and arriving in Oregon in September, via Red Bluffs and Honey Lake.

In Albany, Mr. Cleek married Sarah Isom, who was born June 27, 1849, in Cole county, Mo., a daughter of John Isom, who, with his wife, was born in Virginia and brought his family to Oregon at an early day. Mr. Isom took a prominent part in agricultural and business affairs in Linn county. Among his undertakings was the erection of the Red Crown Mills, which he successfully managed for several years. His death occurred in February, 1903, aged seventy-five years, after a particularly active life. His widow, Elizabeth (Mercer) Smith Isom, now makes her home with her children.

Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cleek, the order of their birth being as follows:

Isom, living in Prineville, Ore.; Varian, wife of Samuel Smith, sheriff of Crook county; Hugh, a farmer near Plainview; and Charles and Lillie, twins, living with their parents.

Mr. Cleek is a Democrat in politics, but has been too busy with his stock to think about holding office. He is one of the most successful stockmen that this county has produced, and in addition, he is a very enterprising and liberal gentleman, contributing generously when called upon in a public or private capacity. In manner Mr. Cleek has about him the breeziness and whole-souled honesty which we are wont to associate with men of his calling, and his journey through life has been brightened by the devotion of many friends, and the good will of all his associates.

JOHN WALLING. As the son of a prominent business man of Lincoln, Polk county, John Walling has been interested in various enterprises in this community, working for his father in both his mercantile establishment and the People's Transportation Company, the oldest business of its kind on the Willamette river, and in which the elder Mr. Walling owned an interest. John Walling is now engaged in farming on property which he purchased in 1880, consisting of seventy-two acres of land, forty of which is devoted to the cultivation of hops, the income so acquired amounting to no small percentage of the money invested.

The origin of the Walling family is English, the grandfather having been an Englishman who fought in the Revolutionary war. He was at that time a farmer in the state of Virginia, where his son, J. D., the father of John Walling, was born April 1, 1818. Being reared to the life of a farmer J. D. Walling continued in that occupation in early manhood, locating first in Iowa, where he remained until the spring of 1847, when, with the usual outfit for such a journey, he joined an emigrant train of ox-teams and set out for the west. The train was unusually large, and, with the usual experiences of such a journey, they reached Oregon safely after six months. The first winter of the Walling family in Oregon was spent in Oregon City, the next spring, however, finding them located near Zena, Spring valley, Polk county, on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which property Mr. Walling made his home until his death in 1870, being killed by being thrown from a vehicle while driving. In addition to his farming interests Mr. Walling was engaged in general merchandising in Lincoln, and a warehouse in the same location. In politics a Republican, he served as road supervisor. While giving his attention to the duties of this office he met his death. Fraternally he was a member of the Masonic order, belonging to the lodge at Amity. The wife of Mr. Walling was in maidenhood Eliza A. Wise, a native of New York state, and the descendant of a Dutch family. She survived her husband twenty-two years, dying in 1892, at the age of sixty-two years. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Walling thirteen are now living, four sons and nine daughters.

John Walling is the fourth child of the family, and was born in Iowa, September 14, 1846, being but one year old at the time of the removal to the west. He received his early education in the common school located in the vicinity of his home, and when his school days were over he went to work for his father in his store in Lincoln, where he remained until after his father's death. He then rented a farm for a few years and engaged in the cultivation of the soil, until 1880, when he purchased his present property, which has since yielded him a good income.

The marriage of Mr. Walling occurred in Polk county, in 1870, and united him with Celia Harris, who was born in Missouri, January 16, 1850, her father, James R. Harris, crossing the plains in the same year. Of this union nine children have been born. Six died in infancy, while those living are: Tracy, Lorin and Alvin, all of whom are still at home with their parents. Politically Mr. Walling is a Republican, and has served in several offices, among them being that of road supervisor and school director, holding the latter position for twelve years. In his fraternal relations, he affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holding membership with the lodge at McCoy, and with the Maccabees at Lincoln.

VERY REV. LOUIS METAYER. Thomas Carlyle says, "Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life purpose. Labor is life." Admitting the full truth of this saying, Very Rev. Louis Metayer, Rector of St. Mary's Church at Albany, and Dean of Southern Oregon, is surely worthy of receiving divine favor. Imbued with the true missionary spirit, and with scarce a thought of self, he has labored untiringly in his appointed vineyard, and in the upbuilding of the parish with which he is connected is reaping a rich reward for his many years of toil and sacrifice. A native of France, he was born June 24, 1855, in the diocese of Laval. His father, Louis Metayer, was born, lived and died in France. His mother, whose maiden name was Louise Marie Marcus Du Plessis, survives her husband, and still resides in her native country.

Reared in France, the Very Rev. Louis Metayer prepared for college when quite young, and afterwards obtained a fine knowledge of philosophy and the classics at the Archbishop's College, at Chezal-Benoit, in the arch-diocese of Bourges. Coming to American in 1875, he studied theology in the Montreal Seminary, and on December 20, 1879, was ordained for the Diocese of Oregon by Bishop Morro. Desirous of entering the missionary field, he came to Portland, Ore., as secretary to Archbishop Blanchet, who resigned from the see of Oregon in 1883. He was subsequently Secretary for Archbishop Segher, who was murdered in Alaska. In September, 1885, Father Metayer was appointed by Archbishop Gross as Rector at Albany. Coming to this city, he courageously took up the work before him, and has labored diligently. There was neither church nor congregation here at that time, nor had there ever been a resident priest in this locality. Purchasing a small school-house in Albany, he had it moved to the site that Archbishop Blanchet had bought thirty years before, remodeled it, and it did duty for a church until the new one was completed, in 1898. This new edifice was blessed by Archbishop Gross, August 17, 1898, it being the last church that he blessed, his death occurring the following November. It is a noteworthy coincidence to relate in this connection that the first church building that the late archbishop blessed was the old school-house of which Father Metayer first had charge as a church.

Father Metayer labored hard to secure the money to erect his church, which cost $18,000, and which is built according to European architecture, resembling the old abbeys of the continent. In connection with the church is a vestry, toward the erection of which he contributed largely from his private fortune, his small congregation being unable at present to assist very much. He also purchased land about one-half block from the church and on it has erected a fine, large rectory, which is surrounded by beautiful grounds.

Rev. Father Metayer has also in his parish the Academy of Perpetual Health, which was established and built in Albany in 1887, and in November of that year was dedicated by Archbishop Gross, and is controlled by the Benedictine Sisters. In 1893 he was appointed, by Archbishop Gross, Dean of South Oregon, and he is now a member of the Council of Archbishops of Oregon.

WILLIAM R. HAND. In the business circles of Albany Mr. Hand is accorded a high place. Eminently successful in a financial sense, he has throughout his entire career exhibited clearness of perception and soundness of judgment, and moreover enjoys an enviable reputation for moral worth and integrity of purpose. He possesses true public spirit, and uses his influence to enhance the best interests of the city and county, and all worthy enterprises for their development meet with his hearty support.

William R. Hand was the only child born to his parents, Crandal and Delilali (Musselman) Hand, both of whom were born in Iowa, the father in the vicinity of Keokuk. As a participant in the Civil war he served valiantly as a private in an Iowa regiment, and was wounded in the service. Upon retiring to private life he settled on a homestead claim in Lincoln county, Neb., which was the scene of the family life until the father removed to Albany, Ore., in 1882. Here his death occurred at the age of fifty-four years. His army associations were kept fresh in his memory by meeting with old comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic, of which he was a member. The mother is still living and makes her home in Albany with her son.

Born February 1, 1872, on his father's farm in Nebraska, William R. Hand was a lad ten years of age when the trip was made to Oregon, and he distinctly remembers the incidents connected with the journey, which to a boy of that age were romantic indeed. In the public schools of this western state he received his education, and when sixteen years of age was apprenticed to learn the trade of architect and builder, under Mr. Shell, in Albany. Having become proficient at his trade he put it to practice in his home city, but in 1895 went to San Francisco, where, in addition to following his trade, for two years he took a night course in an architectural school. Determined that there should be no part of the profession with which he would not be perfectly familiar, he took a course of instruction with the International Correspondence School, from the drawing department of which he received a diploma. A self-made man, Mr. Hand began life for himself without fortune but made the most of his privileges and advantages and steadily worked his way up until today he is numbered among the substantial business men of his community. He is now devoting his entire attention to architectural work, and has drafted plans for many of the prominent buildings in Albany and elsewhere in Linn county, and is meeting with well-merited success.

In Albany December 28, 1897, was celebrated the marriage of William R. Hand and Miss Clara Bentley, a native of Albany and the daughter of one of Oregon's pioneer citizens. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hand, Eula, and an infant which died unnamed. Business affairs have not absorbed Mr. Hand's attention to the exclusion of all else, and every movement looking to the material advancement of the city meets his encouragement and active support. In politics a Republican, he advocates with enthusiasm and fidelity the platform of his chosen party and supports its candidates with his ballot. In the fraternal organization Woodmen of the World he is holding the office of council commander. Mrs. Hand is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Albany, to the support of which Mr. Hand liberally contributes.

JAMES F. BEWLEY. Worthy of ranking among the chief developers of the state of Oregon was James F. Bewley, a pioneer of '47, and for many years an agriculturist of Yamhill county. A native of Tennessee, Mr. Bewley was born April 9, 1828, the third oldest of the twelve children of John W. and Catherine (Ellis) Bewley, natives also of Tennessee. From their ancestral home in Tennessee, the Bewley family removed to Indiana, and from there to Missouri, in which latter state they developed an ambition to go west, and, accordingly, outfitted for the dangerous and adventurous journey. Two of the children, Crocket A. and Lorinda, having qualified as teachers, stopped at Whitman Mission to help educate the Indians, a most unwise decision, for Crocket A. was killed by the people for whose interests he was willing to sacrifice his time and ability, and Lorinda was kidnaped and held until ransomed. The rest of the family proceeded upon their journey, unconscious of the fate of their loved ones, but the father died soon after reaching Oregon, and his wife and children lived in Oregon City until removing to Yamhill county, in 1849. Here the mother married Col. J. B. Graves, whose interesting career is spoken of elsewhere in this work, and in Salem, where the remainder of her life was spent, her death occurred in 1867.

James F. Bewley became an independent land owner in Oregon in the spring of 1852, when he took a half section of land near Sheridan. September 12, 1852, he married Lucy E. Graves, a native of Missouri, and daughter of his step-father, Colonel Graves. For some time afterward he lived in a rudely constructed frame house, and in 1860 disposed of his property, and purchased the three hundred and twenty-acre farm of his father-in-law. This property was his special pride for many years, and his most intelligent and broad-minded efforts were expended in making of it a model agricultural enterprise. Somewhat weary of arduous labor, Mr. Bewley took up his residence in Forest Grove, after ten months removing to McMinnville. The five acres of land purchased for his home is now within the corporate limits, and the home erected thereon reflected his ideas of comfort and refinement. At the same time he managed his finely-improved farm, up to the tragic event which occasioned his death in 1888. Owing to a small-pox epidemic, McMinnville was quarantined, but notwithstanding this fact, Mr. Bewley went to his farm and stopped to see a man at Sheridan. Being met by an officer, a colloquy followed regarding his attitude in the matter, and such proportions did the argument assume that Mr. Bewley was ordered to throw up his hands, and was instantly shot. His son, who was present, was also shot at, and in turn shot at the murderer, but the ball fell short of the mark. This sad event threw disorder and sadness into the happenings of McMinnville and vicinity, for Mr. Bewley was a man most highly honored by all who knew him, and his sixty years of worthy living deserved a less ignominious termination.

In memory of the brother so ruthlessly killed by the Indians in 1847, Mr. and Mrs. Bewley named their first son Crocket A., and his birth occurred July 31, 1853. He died while yet a bright-eyed boy, but his brother, Roswell L., born December 24, 1864, still lives and owns the old homestead. In October, 1888, he was united in marriage with Anna R. Young, a native of New York state. Mrs. Bewley, who afterward married J. W. Cows, also deceased, is one of the highly-honored and popular women of McMinnville, and in her interests displays broad-mindedness and capability. She is foremost in all efforts of the women of her locality to improve their social and intellectual surroundings, and is especially prominent in the Christian Church, the Ladies' Aid Society and the Woman's Relief Corps of Custer Post No. 5, G. A. R., of which latter organization she was for one term junior vice-president.

ROSWELL L. BEWLEY. While his mother was on a visit to Salem, Marion county, Ore., Roswell L. Bewley was born, December 24, 1864, and he was afterward reared on his father's farm, one and a half miles from Sheridan. Judging by his present success, he must have had an excellent agricultural training, his educational chances being also far above those of the average farm-reared youth, for he was permitted the advantages of the public schools, the Forest Grove College, and the McMinnville College.

Mr. Bewley assumed charge of one of the finest ranches in this county in 1888, and on October 7, 1888, married Anna R. Young, who was born in New York state, and who has borne him twin boys, William H. and James Garfield. At the present time Mr. Bewley owns five thousand acres of land, nearly all in one body, of which one thousand acres are devoted to farming enterprises, and all under cultivation. Also, he owns a stock ranch of eight hundred acres in Polk county, and has some of the finest stock in the state. He is one of the most experienced and in-fluent stockmen in Oregon, and one of the largest land owners. Mr. Bewley is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with Sheridan Lodge No. 64, F. & A. M., of which he is past master.

GEORGE F. SIMPSON. In estimating the extent to which individual effort has influenced the development of the northwest, it is hardly fair to regard as typical the career of George F. Simpson, whose more than ordinary ability and resource have enabled him to accomplish more than his fellow pioneers of less fortunate mould. The most careless surveyor of present conditions must needs feel an interest in the lifework of so worthy and honored a man, and perchance may find for his own encouragement that success is rarely denied the capable and earnest striver.

The virtue of perseverance, a characteristic of Scottish folk, is inherited in marked degree by Mr. Simpson, whose paternal great-grandfather, both in Scotland and America, was determined, practical and persevering. This was true also of Francis Simpson, the father of George F., who was born on a farm near Winchester, Clark county, Ky., and during his active life combined farming and carpentering. About 1840 he settled in Cooper county, Mo., twelve miles from Booneville, and from there moved to Cass county, Mo. His wife died in Cooper county, Mo., leaving to his care two children, G. F. and J. W., the latter of whom is now living on Snake river, Wash.

Through a second marriage, contracted in Missouri, four sons and two daughters were born, all of whom are living. In 1850, with his second wife and seven children, Mr. Simpson crossed the plains with ox teams, and after living on a farm in Washington county, Ore., for a couple of years, operated a saw-mill on Dairy creek. In April, 1852, he located on a section of land four miles south of Albany, but later sold it, and bought a farm twelve miles south of the town. This continued to be his home until 1870, when he went to Big Valley, Cal., where he died in 1871.

Born on the old homestead near Winchester, Clark county, Ky., June 29, 1835, George F. Simpson was five years old when the family moved to Missouri, and soon after that he lost his mother. The children were naturally enthusiastic over the plan to cross the plains, and George, then fifteen years of age, made himself very useful on the long and tiresome journey. They came up the Platte through the Indian country, and arrived in Oregon the latter part of October. He was a footsore and tired youth, for he had driven an ox team all the way from Missouri, and walked the entire way. They had a considerable number of loose stock, and were fortunate in being able to retain nearly one-third of it until the end of their trip. George lived on the donation claim with his father for a couple of years, and during that time attended the early subscription school in his neighborhood, his teachers being Hugh George and Rev. Irvine.

As early as 1853 Mr. Simpson began trading in cattle, and at different times took herds over the mountains to California. In the latter state, on Humbug creek he engaged in mining during 1854-5, and upon returning to Oregon, married, in December, 1859, in Linn county, Mary Nanney, who was born in Kentucky, and came to Oregon in 1852. Abner Nanney, the father of Mrs. Simpson, was born in Kentucky, and moved to Missouri previous to crossing the plains. He located in Oregon on a claim which comprised the present site of Shedd's Station, although he subsequently retired to Albany, where his last days were spent. His wife, formerly Isabelle Morgan, was also born in Kentucky and died in Oregon.

After his marriage Mr. Simpson settled on a farm four miles south of Albany and engaged in stock-raising, and in 1863 bought a quarter section, and later ninety acres of land, making three hundred and thirty acres in all. Before locating on this farm, in 1862, he had a rough experience in trying to reach the Florence Mines in Idaho, and he will never forget crossing the White mountains on foot through the snow and storm, with a burden of one hundred pounds on his back. Nevertheless, notwithstanding this handicap, he made thirty miles a day. Eventually he sold his farm and at the present time manages one of the finest farms in this county, and unquestionably one of the most valuable. It is one hundred and forty acres in extent, located two and a half miles south of Albany, and is equipped with a fine new house and barns, modern fences, the latest of agricultural implements, and all known aids to scientific and practical farming. Mr. Simpson raises stock principally, making a specialty of high-grade sheep and Angora goats.

In 1873 Mr. Simpson moved into Albany, and has since been substantially identified with its business growth. The same year he became superintendent of the Farmers' Grain Storage Company, an enterprise destined to promote the agricultural prestige of the vicinity more than any other agency as yet established. He was the first superintendent of the company, and directly controlled its affairs for many years. To facilitate the object for which it was started, he bought the warehouse at Tangent, and during the first year taxed its capacity with ninety-thousand bushels of wheat. There was no dividend the first year, but the second realized a dividend of forty per cent. This increase of business inspired him to enlarge his capacity, and he built a larger and better elevator, of which he had charge for seven years. The disposal of the first storage required some time, but he finally found a buyer who paid a dollar a bushel, whereas the ruling price was eighty cents. After disposing of his elevator, Mr. Simpson engaged in wheat buying for about twelve years, and was compelled to retire from business because of a stroke of paralysis. At the time he had sixty thousand bushels of wheat on hand, and not being able to personally superintend its disposal at the proper time, suffered a financial loss of $20,000. In the hope of securing the boon of health he traveled for several months in California, and, having accomplished his desire, he returned to Oregon, where he has lived uninterruptedly since. For a couple of years he ran the Magnolia Mill in partnership with his son, and in the meantime he has been improving his farm, which has ever been a source of pride and satisfaction to him.

Politically a Republican, Mr. Simpson represents the most liberal and broad-minded of the local adherents, and at times has actively participated in town and county affairs. Fraternally, no man in the county is better known or more gladly welcomed to the prominent lodges, among them being the Corinthian Lodge of Albany, of which he has been past master two terms; the Royal Arch Masons of Albany; the Commandery No. 3; and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. With his wife he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of the six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Simpson, George W. is living in Portland, and is interested in mining; Abner was killed in a mill by the falling of a scaffold; Frank is a bookkeeper in Athena; Ada is now Mrs. Robson of Albany; Eva is a graduate of the Albany College, and is at present a teacher of English and elocution in the Tacoma (Wash.) College; and Ora will graduate from the Albany College in the class of 1903. No man in Albany bears a more honored name than does Mr. Simpson, nor is any more emphatically typical of that broad and tolerant citizenship which commands universal approbation.

DAVID NACHTIGALL. A native of Russia, David Nachtigall was born in the southern part of that country, April 16, 1853, the son of Peter and Neta (Schultz) Nachtigall, natives respectively of Holland and Russia. The death of Peter Nachtigall having occurred in 1870, at the age of thirty-seven years, his widow afterward became the wife of John Boese, and now makes her home in South Dakota, being in her seventieth year. Of the thirteen children born to Mr. and Mrs. Nachtigall only three are now living. They are: David, of this review; Toby, a shoemaker in the state of Missouri; and Mrs. Anna Smith, of Smithfield, Ore.

The early education of David Nachtigall was received in the common schools of Russia, his school days being soon over, however, and an apprenticeship in a linen factory beginning. He was seventeen years old when his father died and he then went to make his home with an uncle with whom he worked for six years, half of the time being spent in the old country and the remainder in the United States, whither he had come with his uncle in 1873. His relative sought a home in York county, Neb., where later David found employment among the farmers, which work meant to him, with his rigid economy and patient industry, the beginning of a competency. In 1878 he married a native of his home country, Mary Abrahams, and the two went to housekeeping on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres which he was then able to purchase. There they remained until 1892, at which time they came to Oregon. Mr. Nachtigall first rented land in Polk county, near Crowley, and after being satisfied that the country was all one could wish in which to make a permanent home, he bought his present farm of two hundred and eighteen acres, located near Salt Creek in the same county. His purchase was made in 1900, and since that time he has been engaged in general farming and the raising of cattle, sheep, horses, etc. Thirty-three acres of his farm are devoted to the cultivation of hops.

Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nachtigall, of whom there are five daughters and three sons. In addition to the success which Mr. Nachtigall has made in his chosen lifework he has, since being numbered among the citizens of Oregon, so won his way into the confidence of the people of the community by his honorable life and intelligent interest in the affairs of the day that they have used their influence to secure his appointment as postmaster of the Salt Creek postoffice, his term extending from 1900 to 1904. He is independent in his political views, reserving the right to cast his ballot for the man whose services he thinks will be productive of the most good for the country. Religiously he is a member of the Baptist Church.

WILLIAM W. ROWELL. As the proprietor of the Russ House, Albany, Linn county, W. W. Rowell is winning a wide popularity in the community, which is not bounded by the limits of the city or county, but his reputation as a successful landlord is carried beyond this by those who know him in his business capacity. He is a man of splendid personality, as well as a successful business man, and since his purchase of the hotel in 1892 he has built up a good patronage and has emphatically met with rich returns from his efforts.

Mr. Rowell was born in Albany, Orleans county, Vt., May 14, 1852, the descendant of an English family who truly loved their adopted land. Three brothers of this family had come to the colonies just previous to the breaking out of the Revolutionary war, and so deeply were they impressed with the righteousness of the cause of the colonists that they generously gave their aid in the struggle. The first American born was William, the grandfather of W. W. Rowell, of this review, and his birth occurred in Vermont, where he represented both a New Hampshire and a Massachusetts family. The father, Guy E., also owes his nativity to that state, in which he engaged in farming and stock-raising as a means of livelihood. Being a prominent man in the affairs of the community in which he lived he acted often in an official capacity, serving as selectman at various times. His wife was in maidenhood Betsey G. Page, also a native of Vermont, and the descendant of an old New England family. At her death, which occurred in Vermont, she was the mother of nine children, all of whom are living, and all located in the New England states, with the exception of W. W. and his brother, Z. E., who is a farmer in California.

William W. Rowell was the second oldest of his father's children, and was reared on the paternal farm, and educated in the public schools and Albany Academy. When nineteen years of age he began working at the carpenter's trade, and continued in the work until he came to California with his brother in 1875. After engaging for two years at his trade in San Francisco, he spent one year in Southern California, and then located in Mendocino county, where he became interested in a stock ranch, which he left in 1888 to settle in Linn county, Ore. Here he bought a farm located three miles from Albany, and engaged in its cultivation until 1892, when he sold it and invested the proceeds in his present lucrative business, which has become very successful under his able management.

The marriage of Mr. Rowell occurred in Ukiah, Mendocino county, Cal., and united him with Miss Mary Harter, a native of Iowa, and of the union two children have been born, of whom Edith is the wife of T. A. Riggs, of Dallas; and Oliver is a clerk in the establishment of A. M. Reeves. Politically, Mr. Rowell is a staunch Republican, true to the party and to the principles which it advocates. Fraternally, he is a member of the Foresters, the Fraternal Union and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

Thos. Metoshan,

HON. PHIL METSCHAN. Truth is always stranger than fiction, and in the lives of even the most dignified of men is an element of romance. This is noticeable in the record of Phil Metschan, the president of the Imperial Hotel Company of Portland, and ex-state treasurer of Oregon. Little did the boy of fourteen foresee the future that awaited him as he crossed the ocean, in a three-masted clipper, and during the tedium of forty days on shipboard amused himself by pondering upon what he would do in America. But the dreams of the boy never turned to the far-distant shores of the Pacific, nor did they reveal to him the honors which the future held for him as Destiny awaited his coming to the sunset sea.

In Hesse-Cassel, Germany, Phil Metschan was born March 24, 1840, a son of Frederick U. and Caroline C. (Schiricke) Metschan, natives of the same province. His father was a graduate of Heidelberg College, which was founded in 1386, and is the oldest university in Germany. He was a lawyer by profession and an attaché of the Duke of Hesse. Like all of his family, he adhered to the Lutheran religion. His death occurred in February, 1875, and three years later his widow came to America with three of her daughters. Her death occurred in Canyon City, Ore., in 1884. Of her eight children three daughters and two sons survive, one son, Max, being a deputy in the office of the internal revenue collector at Tacoma.

When Phil Metschan arrived in Cincinnati he had only $4.75 with which to begin in the new world. However, he had two uncles there, and one of them took him into the meat market to learn the butcher's trade. In the spring of 1858 he went to Leavenworth, Kans., and began in business in Shawnee market, but was taken ill and forced to change his occupation. Those were the days of the Pike's Peak excitement, and he joined the throng of gold-seekers westward bound. In the spring of 1859 he crossed the plains to Denver and thence to California Gulch (now Leadville), where he opened a meat market. Returning to Leavenworth in the fall of 1860, he enjoyed the privilege of voting for Abraham Lincoln. In the spring of 1861 he went back to California Gulch, but soon joined an expedition for the far west, traversing the pony express route and landing in Sacramento just before the floods of 1861. During the winter he was employed on General Hutchinson's ranch. In the spring of 1862 he started for the Caribou mines in British Columbia, but a short stay in Victoria convinced him of the futility of the enterprise and he returned to the States, arriving in Portland in June, 1862. Soon afterward he went to Canyon City, Grant county, Ore., where he followed mining and prospecting at first, and then opened a meat market, conducting the same and a general mercantile business until 1890.

After settling in Canyon City Mr. Metschan married Miss Mary Schann, who was born in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, and died in Salem, Ore., in 1895. His second marriage took place in San Rafael, Cal., and united him with Mrs. F. D. Sweetser, who was born in Canada and accompanied her parents to California. His children, all born of his first marriage, are named as follows: Frank, a stockman at Silvies, Harney county, Ore.; Anna, whose husband, George H. Cattnach, is an attorney of Canyon City and ex-representative; Mrs. Amelia Meredith, of Salem; Julia, Mrs. Griffith, whose husband is a physician in the state insane asylum at Salem; Phil, formerly cashier of the Grant County Bank and now proprietor of the Paris hotel at Heppner, Ore.; Otto, who is engaged in the stock business in eastern Oregon; Anton H., a clerk in the Wells-Fargo Bank; Lillian; and Edward who is attending the Pennsylvania Dental College at Philadelphia.

During his residence in Grant county Mr. Metschan was a prominent factor in Republican politics. For four years he held the office of county treasurer, for two years served as county clerk, and for four years officiated as county judge, after which (1888-1890) he again served as county clerk. In 1890 the Republicans placed him on their ticket for state treasurer and he was elected by a majority of sixty-seven hundred, while at the same time a Democratic governor was elected by five thousand majority. He assumed the duties of office in January, 1891, and about the same time established his home in Salem. At the expiration of his term he was re-elected by a plurality of twenty-three thousand over his Democratic opponent, his victory proving not only his popularity as a man but also his successful administration in the high office with which he had been honored. In January, 1899, his second term being ended and a constitutional limit of office reached, he retired from the position in which he had served with distinguished fidelity and efficiency. In May of the same year he purchased the Imperial hotel and incorporated the Imperial Hotel Company, of which he is president and which has enlarged the hotel and increased its capacity.

Any reference to the life of Mr. Metschan would be incomplete without mention of his fraternal relations. He was made a Mason in Canyon City Lodge No. 34, A. F. & A. M., of which he is past master. During 1896-97 he was honored with the office of grand master of the grand lodge of Oregon. He was raised to the Royal Arch degree in Blue Mountain Chapter No. 7, of Canyon City, in which he is past high priest.

For a time connected with Oregon Commandery No. 1, K. T., he later became a charter member of DeMolay Commandery No. 5, K. T., of Salem, and is also identified with Oregon Consistory No. 1, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland. While in Canyon City he was initiated into the Odd Fellows as a member of Hobah Lodge No. 22, in which he is past noble grand. During 1881-82 he officiated as grand master of the grand lodge, I. O. O. F., of Oregon. In the Grand Encampment he is past grand patriarch, and also acted as supreme representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge in session at Los Angeles and later at Denver. Other organizations to which he belongs are Hope Lodge No. 1, A. O. U. W., and Lodge No. 142, B. P. O. E., both of Portland. Upon the organization of the Illehee Club of Salem, in which he bore a prominent part, he was chosen its president, and since leaving Salem has still retained his connection with the society.

JOHN W. YORK, now deceased, was a pioneer of Oregon of 1852, settling in this state in the fall of that year. He was born in Jackson county, Ga., near Raleigh, in 1800, and was an only child of James and Aletha Wright York. He came of English and Scotch ancestry. His grandfather was killed by the Tories. His father, at the age of sixteen, together with two brothers, fought in the Revolutionary war.

When but a year old John Wright York was taken by his parents to St. Louis, Mo., and there his father died, after which the mother was married again and removed with her family to Kentucky, where the subject of this review lived for a few years. He then returned to Missouri and later went to Illinois. He acquired his education by the fireside, for there were no schools of any importance in the localities in which he lived. He, however, became a well read man, possessing a natural aptitude for intellectual work. He continually broadened his knowledge by reading, observation and investigation and during the greater part of his life he devoted his time and energies to the work of the ministry. When a young man he was licensed to exhort in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1826 was licensed to preach. He was then given charge of a circuit; it required eight weeks to visit the different congregations therein. His speech was always correct, his arguments forceful, his logic convincing, and he exerted strong influence in behalf of Christianity and the development of upright manhood among his fellow men.

Mr. York was united in marriage to Miss Mary P. Collier, who was born in Jefferson county, Ky., in 1812. They became the parents of eight children, but five of the number died in infancy or early childhood. Martha C., the eldest, was born in Carrolton, Green county, Ill., February 5, 1831; Ann Aletha was born at Carrolton, Green county, Ill., January 3, 1833; and Emily Y. was born at Waterloo, Monroe county, Ill., January 24, 1835. They came with the family to Oregon in 1852. Martha Cordelia was married to William Masters at Dayton, Ore., May 13, 1860, and her family history is given in the sketch of his life given elsewhere. Ann Aletha became the wife of Rev. C. G. Belknap in Oregon. They reared four children, of whom three are yet living: Charles, Mary and Rosa. Mrs. Belknap died in May, 1880, in California, where she had lived since 1869. Her husband, however, still survives. Emily Y., the other member of the family of Mr. York, is a graduate of Willamette University of Oregon, being the first to pursue a full course in that institution. She afterward engaged in teaching in the public schools for one winter and for several years was a teacher in the "Old Portland Academy." She became the wife of A. W. Moore, of Olympia, Wash., who died within a few years, and she is now living with her daughter, Mrs. Mary E. Houck, in Roseburg, Ore.

In 1842 Mr. York, of this review, was called upon to mourn the loss of his wife, who died in St. Clair county, Ill. He was at that time preaching in central Illinois, being connected with the Illinois Conference. He afterward wedded Nancy S. Barrett, a daughter of Judge Barrett, of Farmington, Mo.; she died of cholera in 1844, only ten months after their marriage. For his third wife he chose Mrs. Parmelia Ann Quinton, nee Bush. On account of the ill health of his wife he started for the northwest in 1852, hoping that she would be benefited by change of climate. This hope was realized, for her health soon improved and she lived until December 17, 1880, when she passed away in Corvallis at the age of sixty-nine years.

Mr. York was the owner of three farms in Illinois, which he had purchased at different places where he was engaged in his ministerial labors. He started overland with ox teams and he also had a fine stock of horses and cattle. On the 15th of April, 1852, he left Carlisle, Ill., and arrived in Oregon in October of that year. While on the trip the Indians stole his stock, and cholera broke out among the members of the party, one of the number dying of that disease. There were eighteen young ladies and seventeen young men in the train of twenty wagons and the party was therefore a lively one and the trip enjoyable. When the family arrived in Oregon Mr. York had only ox teams to haul his carriage and wagons. Making his way to Corvallis he there located a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he established his home, giving his attention to its cultivation and improvement. He never discontinued his labors in the ministry, however, but preached for one year at Corvallis, for two years at Albany, for one year in the Mohawk valley and for one year as presiding elder of the Umpqua district. Throughout his entire life he preached the gospel and was stationed for a time at Dayton, Ore., and later at Rock Creek, near Oregon City. Throughout his residence in this state he remained in the Willamette valley, save for the period of two years spent in the Umpqua valley. He covered his circuit on horseback, being one of the pioneer preachers of the northwest. He was on that circuit when the first church was built at Corvallis and up to the time of his death he never faltered in his efforts to establish Christianity upon a firm basis in this state.

In early life Mr. York was a strong Whig, and afterward became a stalwart Democrat, while at the time of the Civil war he gave a staunch support to the Union cause. He was a man of large form, strong and rugged, and proved a very useful citizen of the Sunset state from pioneer times down to his death. Selling his farm he removed to Corvallis, where he lived for about twenty-five years, spending his last few years in retirement. There is no measurement by which we can determine the strength, extent and scope of his labors, but it is well known that his influence was a powerful factor for good in the early days of Oregon.

WILLIAM MASTERS. They who planted civilization in the northwest, who braved the dangers and trials of pioneer life, are fast passing away. On the roll of the honored dead appears the name of William Masters, who was a pioneer of Oregon of 1852. He was born in Lancaster, Pa., May 17, 1819, a son of Christopher Masters, who was born in Chester county, Pa., March 17, 1778, and died in Fairfield, Ind., November 6, 1859, and Mary (Kerling) Masters, who was born November 14, 1781, and died August 10, 1838. In the family were fourteen children, of whom William was twelfth in order of birth. On the home farm he was reared and in the district schools he obtained his early education, which was supplemented by a course of study in a college in Indianapolis, where he was a schoolmate of General Burnside. He went to Indiana when nineteen years of age. In early life he served an apprenticeship as cabinetmaker there, later he removed to Fairfield, Franklin county, Ind., where he followed his trade.

It was during his residence in that place that William Masters was united in marriage to Miss Mary Garrison. They became the parents of four children during their residence in the east. In 1852 they started with their family on the long journey across the plains to Oregon. It was with the hope of more rapidly acquiring a fortune and of establishing a good home for his family that Mr. Masters came to the Sunset state. After traveling for long weary months, just as the train crossed the Sandy river, Mrs. Masters and two children died and are now buried in Lone Fir cemetery. The party arrived at their destination in September, 1852, having made the journey with ox teams. Mr. Masters located in Portland, where he opened a wagon shop in partnership with Mr. Jacobs, continuing in that business at the corner of Second and Morrison streets until 1859, when he sold out. He then became a partner in an enterprise for the packing and shipping of apples to California and in this was very successful for a number of years. He then opened a general mercantile establishment, forming a co-partnership with F. Harbaugh and W. W. Baker, being thus engaged until 1863, when he went to the Caribou mines, driving a band of cattle. When the Indians became hostile and waged war against the settlers in 1855-56, he volunteered for service when recruits were called for, going to the Cascades, where the Indians were committing depredations, with a company of volunteers from Portland.

On the 13th of May, 1860, Mr. Masters was married in Dayton, Ore., to Martha Cordelia York, and with his wife he came to Portland to live. By his first marriage he had four children: Lewis L. and Mary, who died at the same time the mother passed away; S. LaFayette, who was born in 1848 and is now a resident of Tenino, Wash.; and J. Wilbur, who was born in the year 1850 and died in January, 1891. He was a merchant of North Yakima and at his death left four sons and a daughter. LaFayette is a farmer and is married and has nine living children. By his second marriage Mr. Masters became the father of three children, of whom one died in infancy. William York, born April 1, 1862, is mentioned later in this connection. Francis K., the other child, was born March 20, 1872. Both were born in Portland. Francis, after graduating from the public schools in Portland, attended the State University at Eugene for one year, was a student in the law school at Portland and was admitted to the bar and is now engaged in the abstract business.

William Masters was ever a staunch advocate of Republican principles and an active worker in this party, doing everything in his power to promote its growth and insure its success. He was honored with several public offices and positions of trust: from 1872 until 1874 he served as treasurer of Multnomah county. No one was ever in doubt as to the position he occupied in regard to public affairs, for he was fearless and outspoken in defense of his honest convictions. In his business affairs he prospered. He lived in Yakima for eight years, where he was interested in farming and stock-raising, and in Portland he engaged in speculating in land, buying, improving and then selling property. He became well-to-do, and was widely known as a successful business man. During the last thirteen years of his life he lived retired from active business cares. He started out in life, however, empty-handed and the success which he achieved was due to his own well directed efforts. He made a great deal of money, but seven times suffered loss by fire. After coming to Portland he purchased a home, his place covering a quarter of a block at the corner of Fourth and Morrison streets. He also lived on Jefferson street at the corner of Fourth street for three years and for fourteen years at the corner of Jackson and Sixth streets, there spending his last days, his death occurring in that home on the 5th of October, 1897. In the Methodist Episcopal Church he was a very active and helpful member. He belonged to the Taylor Street Methodist Church, was a leader in its work and was liberal in his contributions to its support. He also gave generously to other worthy causes. At the time of his death he held the oldest membership in the First Methodist Church here. He gave an unflinching allegiance to the temperance cause and was found as a champion of all measures pertaining to the moral progress of the community.

William York Masters, to whom we are indebted for the history of his honored father, pursued his early education in the "Old Portland Academy," and afterward in the Agricultural College at Corvallis, where he pursued a full course and was graduated with the degree of A. M. in the class of 1882. He then read law with the firm of Killin & Moreland, and was admitted to the bar in 1884. He then formed a co-partnership with Judge J. C. Moreland, which was maintained for some time, and since the dissolution of the partnership Mr. Masters has been alone in practice. He was a stockholder and vice-president of the Pacific Coast Abstract Company, which in 1901 was re-organized under the name of the Pacific Coast Abstract Guaranty & Trust Company, with Mr. Masters as its vice-president and attorney. The office of the company is now located in the Failing building. He also enjoys a lucrative general law practice, is a capable attorney, having broad and comprehensive knowledge of the science of jurisprudence, which he applies with accuracy and correctness to the points in litigation.

William Y. Masters was married in Corvallis March 31, 1886, to Miss Elizabeth M. Bell, who was born in Corvallis and is a daughter of H. M. Bell. They have three sons and two daughters, William H., Bertha B., Edward W., Alfred R.

and Margaret E. The family home is at No. 605 Sixth street in Portland.

Mr. and Mrs. Masters are members of the First Methodist Episcopal Church. He served as a member of the city council in 1901-02, is a member of Samaritan Lodge, I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand, also a member of the Encampment. He likewise belongs to Industry Lodge, A. O. U. W., and was a member of the Alpha Tau Omega college fraternity when in college. He is now an active factor in professional circles of the city and is not only a worthy representative of an honored pioneer family, but also deserves mention in this volume by reason of his own personal worth and prominence.

WILLIAM W. PLIMPTON. Few of the native sons of Oregon have attained a more enviable position in the business circles of Portland than the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this brief review. The greater percentage of the men who have become actively identified with the upbuilding of Portland, and in fact the entire Pacific northwest, are men who have emigrated from the more developed east, where they received the full benefits of fine schools and the experience of men who for years had been successful in the carrying on of various enterprises. Thus to the young men of the northwest especial credit is due when in the face of the keen competition of thorough going business men with much older heads, they have reached a position of affluence.

William W. Plimpton is a descendant of an old English family, a member of which, John Plimpton, emigrated to this country in 1636 and settled at Medfield, Mass. Here the descendants of the family lived for many years, and here in 1826 the father of our subject, S. B. Plimpton, was born. He followed the shoemaker's trade for a few years, but at the age of twenty-five, the family ties being broken by the death of his parents, and attracted by the discovery of gold in California, he came to the Pacific coast, via the Horn. The first year was spent in the mines, at the end of which time he came to Oregon, and at Rainier, in Columbia county, he took up a donation claim and engaged in farming. In 1860 he removed to Westport. Here he met with success and continued farming, and later removed to Oak Point, and still later returned to Westport, whence he removed to Willsburg, where he is now living. In 1853 he was united in marriage with Miss Lydia P. Wright, who was born at South Reading, now Wakefield, Mass. Of the children born of this marriage, three attained maturity, William W. being the oldest; Sarah is now the wife of H. J. Winterbotham, of California; and Ortlely is an electrician, now residing in Oregon.

John T. Apperson

William W. Plimpton is indebted to the public schools of Oregon for his preliminary education, which was supplemented by study in the grammar schools in the city of San Francisco. At the age of seventeen years, in 1871, Mr. Plimpton made his first start in life by obtaining a position with Knapp, Burrell & Co., implement dealers in Portland. Beginning at the bottom he steadily worked his way upward, step by step, and from the office he was promoted to the shipping department, later had charge of the order department, in fact learning thoroughly every phase of the business. That his services were greatly appreciated is shown by the term of years he was with the firm, with which he severed his connection at the end of nearly twenty-five years, resigning in January, 1896. Profiting by the experience he had here gained he at once took the necessary steps to organize the Western Storage & Transfer Company. The following six years he devoted his whole time and attention to the management and development of the business. From the first the enterprise proved to be a success and with Mr. Plimpton at the helm it rapidly came to the front, and in 1902, when he turned the management over to his son, it was considered one of the most substantial concerns in the city. The warehouses, erected under the personal supervision of Mr. Plimpton, are modern in construction and ample in size, covering one hundred and fifty by two hundred feet, ground dimensions. As stated, in 1902, Mr. Plimpton severed his connection with the business, doing so for the purpose of accepting a position with the Acme Harvester Company of Peoria, Ill., as assistant manager of their Portland office.

In 1888, Mr. Plimpton was united in marriage with Alice J. Miller, also a native of Oregon, being the second daughter of Adolph and Betsy Miller, who were early pioneers and located at Portland in 1853. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Plimpton, William M. was educated in the public schools and Scott Academy and is now occupying his father's former position with the Western Storage & Transfer Company; their other child, Ethel W., is now the wife of James D. M. Abbott, of Portland.

In politics Mr. Plimpton is an unswerving Republican, but he has never had the time or inclination to take an active part in the campaigns of his party. Although his time and attention have been devoted to his business interests, Mr. Plimpton is a firm supporter of all measures calculated to be of benefit to the city and state. While there are many men who have risen from the ranks there are none that deserve more credit for what they have accomplished than does Mr. Plimpton.

CAPT. JOHN T. APPERSON. It is seldom throughout the incipient stages of growth, down to a period covering many years in the development of a progressive commonwealth, that to any one man is accorded a foremost place by general consent. New countries in these latter days of steam and electricity develop often with rapidity; new issues are met by new leaders, while those who laid the foundation of society rarely retain their hold on affairs for any extended period of time. In this, however, Oregon has been an exception to the rule, and the career of Capt. John T. Apperson is a conspicuous example of the exception. Coming to Oregon when the country was an undeveloped wilderness, no settled social, political or business order, he has exerted a continually increasing influence in the various lines of development which have added to the wealth and greatness of the state. Apart from his business life, he has been one of the foremost builders of our state. The results of his high integrity and of his efforts to elevate the tone of society and keep pure the moral sentiment of the community, make a double claim upon our respect and recognition. Fortunate, indeed, has it been for the state, that its political leaders, like our subject, have been men whose social, religious and domestic relations have stimulated and honored the highest of her people. The lessons of such lives are the best inheritance of a state or people.

John T. Apperson was born in Christian county, Ky., December 24, 1834, a son of Beverly Apperson, who was born in the vicinity of Jamestown on the banks of the James river, and was united in marriage with Jane Gilbert Tubbs, a native of Tennessee. Ten children were born of this union, as follows: Beverly, who died when young; Sarah; Matilda Jane; John T.; Harriett Rebecca; Albert A.; Dona Elvira; Jacob R.; Susan H.; and Milton M., who died in childhood. Beverly Apperson was a planter and farmer, and after his marriage removed to Kentucky. In 1835 he took up his residence in Missouri, living for a time near Springfield, and later locating near Neosha, Newton county. This father was ambitious for his family and in order to better their conditions joined an expedition bound for the coast, in which there were one hundred wagons and much live stock. The journey was a tedious one and much trouble was experienced with the Indians, especially so with those at Umatilla, who were afterward connected with the Whitman massacre. Little did the hopeful band think that ere their journey's end was reached, death would take from their midst one of its most stalwart and hardy members, but the grim messenger strikes where least expected and at Ham Fork, Beverly Apperson died of an attack of fever and was buried in a lonely grave, remote from home and kindred. Heartbroken, the mother and nine children continued on their way to the new Eldorado, which to them was Oregon City, where a cousin and son-in-law resided. The first winter in Oregon, however, was spent near Portland, at the mouth of the Sandy, where the cattle were wintered and where the mother took up a claim afterward abandoned. In the spring of 1848 the family removed to Lawnsdale, where the mother found employment in a tannery owned by the cousin. Here this brave woman labored for her flock and gave to them the few advantages then obtainable.

John T. Apperson, of whom we are writing, remembers well the long journey across the plains, and although but thirteen years of age, he did his share of the labors incident to the life of the pioneers. He remained at home and worked to assist in the maintenance of the family. With the breaking out of the gold excitement in California in 1849, the family came to Portland, and John T. departed for the Golden state. For a time he mined on the Yuba river and Deer creek, meeting with considerable success, but owing to the state of his health he was obliged to seek other employment, and two years were spent in ranching and cattle raising. At the expiration of this time, Mr. Apperson returned to Oregon and for three years was in the employment of the Milling and Transportation Company, and thereafter engaged in steamboating, his first boat being the Rival, its course being between Oregon City and Portland. Being possessed of an economic nature he saved from his earnings and in time was able to purchase an interest in the boats Clinton and Union, freight and passenger carriers plying between Oregon City and Dayton. He continued in this line of business until 1861, when the breaking out of the Civil war offered an opportunity for every citizen to display his patriotism. Mr. Apperson was among the first to lay down the business duties of life, and as a private he enlisted in the First Oregon Cavalry from which position he was later promoted to first lieutenant. Instead of following out the original intention to join the Army of the Potomac, the government sent them into eastern Oregon, Washington territory and Idaho, where they were engaged in fighting Indians and bushwhacking. Mr. Apperson continued in the service until 1865, in which year he obtained his honorable discharge. He at once took up his old occupation, that of steamboating, which he followed for the next five years.

During these years spent on the river and in the army Mr. Apperson had gained an acquaintance which extended over a large territory. In those days it was hard to find men who were capable to handle the reins of government. Those were the days when the state was being made and it needed men of unquestioned ability, of honesty and integrity. A Republican in politics, Mr. Apperson had always been found thoroughly abreast of the times and a firm supporter of the principles of his party. Recognizing his worth and ability his party made their first call upon him in 1870, in which year he was elected to the state legislature. He served his constituents well and in 1874 he was selected to fill the office of sheriff, to which position he was later elected. His administration was so satisfactory that his party determined to keep him in public office, and in 1878 he was elected to the state senate, where he served from 1878 to 1882. No member was more active than he. Bills that were calculated to be of benefit to the state always had his active and hearty support. Other political honors came to Mr. Apperson in 1884, when he was sent as a delegate to the National Convention held in Chicago, at which time he labored earnestly for the nomination of James G. Blaine. Four years later, in 1888, he was again called upon to serve in the legislature, and in 1889 he was appointed registrar of the United States land office at Oregon City, which position he held for the succeeding four years. Since retiring from the latter position he has lived in retirement from public office. Twenty-four years of his life have been given to his state. His record is an honorable one over which there falls no shadow of shame or dishonor.

Fraternally Mr. Apperson is one of the most prominent Masons in the state and is the oldest on the Pacific coast, having joined Multnomah Lodge in 1858, of which he is past master. He is also identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, has passed the chairs in both branches of the order, and has been grand representative of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the United States and attended the convention held in the city of Cincinnati in 1882. In 1872 he served as grand master of the state of Oregon.

All his life Captain Apperson has been a staunch supporter of educational matters and has done all in his power to better the conditions of the schools in the state. In 1885 a law was enacted creating a Board of Regents of the State Agricultural College at Corvallis. In the same year Captain Apperson was appointed a member of the Board by Governor Moody, and at this time he is still serving. For seven years he was president of the board and during that time he won the appreciation of all. On his retirement from the office of president the board passed resolutions of thanks and praise for the manner in which he had conducted the affairs of the office. In addition to other matters Mr. Apperson has been greatly interested in the agricultural conditions of Oregon and for many years was a member of the state board, while for ten years he served as president of the same.

In Walla Walla, Wash., Mr. Apperson was united in marriage with Miss Mary A. Elliott, a native of Missouri and a daughter of William Elliott, who was born in Vincennes, Ind., and a farmer during his active life. Mr. Elliott crossed the plains to Oregon in 1846, and has lived for many years with his daughter, Mrs. Apperson. To his credit is courageous service in the Indian wars and a life of devotion to his family.

If space permitted the writer could say much more of the life and deeds of Captain Apperson. There is no man in the Willamette Valley more deserving of the esteem and confidence of his fellow-men than he. His life is like an open book—open to all. He has lived a life of high purpose. His interest in the growth and development of his adopted state has been sincere, and by example he has endeavored to elevate the standard of morality and progress in all of the avenues of his activity. It is to such men the present generation owes a debt of gratitude that will never be paid. Too much cannot be said or done in their honor. They are the men that have made Oregon one of the greatest of states and their lives are well worthy of emulation.

CAPT. GEORGE ANSON PEASE. Not a few of the fortunes which have been made in the great northwest have come from the waters of its many rivers, for steamboating has not been the least of the remunerative employments of this section. Capt. George Anson Pease is one of the pioneers who realized the possible profit of such work, his early observation having taught him as much, for his mother had six brothers engaged in boating on the Hudson river, and almost immediately after his arrival here in 1850 he became so employed and continued so throughout his entire business career. It is a self-evident fact that he has been successful in a financial way, and the general esteem and respect of his fellow-men bespeak that greater one which can only be won by years of trustworthiness. In 1861 Captain Pease rescued forty people from a flood, proving those qualities which have always distinguished his life.

The father of Captain Pease, Norman Pease, was an architect and builder of New York state and said to be the best in his trade throughout the state. He was born in Ohio and after his removal to New York he married Harriet McAllister, a representative of a Scotch family, and he died January 4, 1847, at the age of forty-three years, while she came to Oregon in 1862 and made her home in Oregon City until her death in 1890, in her eighty-fourth year. She was the mother of seven children, one of whom died in infancy, the others being as follows: George Anson, of this review, the oldest child, and the only son, born in Stuyvesant Landing, Columbia county, N. Y., September 30, 1830; Maria A., now the wife of Alexander Warner, of Mt. Tabor; Martha E., the widow of John Howser, at the time of her mother's death being in Portland, but now living in New York City; Jane, who became the wife of A. M. Cannon and died in Spokane Falls, Wash., in 1893; Harriet E., the widow of Capt. C. W. Pope; and Pamela, who became the wife of Alfred Herring and died in Portland, in 1887. Captain Pease and his sisters were all educated in the subscription schools of his native state, but at the age of fifteen years he became connected with his father to learn the carpenter and joiner's trade, and at the death of his father he finished his apprenticeship with another man. He remained at home until 1849, when he set out for the west, his trip being made by way of the Horn, his arrival safely accomplished September 30, 1849. He remained in Sacramento for a time and spent the winter in the mines, where he met with success, which was turned into failure through his trust of the man with whom he was working. Having lost all that he had gained he decided to go north and try his fortune in Oregon, arriving here in July, 1850, where he has ever since remained. He purchased a couple of boats and ran them from Milwaukee to Oregon City and later from Portland. In 1851 the first steamboat was brought to the Willamette river and Captain Pease secured a position as clerk and deck-hand, remaining for six months, the first boats being the Hoosier, Oregon, Canema and Franklin. With others Captain Pease bought The Elk in 1858 and Onward in 1860, and became pilot and captain of the steamer Hoosier in 1851. In 1863 he built a boat which he called the Enterprise and ran on the upper river, which proved a profitable undertaking and later it was put into The People's Transportation Company. For some years the captain was a member of the board of directors, but later they sold the Benjamin Holliday and he remained in his employ as superintendent of the river lines. Mr. Holliday afterward sold out to the Oregon Steamer and Navigation Company and Captain Pease still remained as master in the employ of that company until he resigned and became a pilot in 1879, after some years going to work for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. In 1896 he was appointed captain of the United States government dredge, W. S. Ladd, and remained successfully until May, 1903, when he resigned and quit active work.

In Linn City, in 1857, Captain Pease was united in marriage with Miss Mildred A. Moore, who was born in Illinois and came to Oregon when she was five years old. She died in Portland, whither the family had removed in 1868, in October, 1889, when thirty-seven years old, the mother of four children, of whom two, Francis A., aged six, and George E., aged two, are deceased, while the living are Archibald L., who is married and has two sons, George Norman, a student of Cornell University, and A. Leroy, a student of Hill Military Academy; and Harriet M., residing in San Francisco, the wife of T. J. Colbert, manager of the carpet department of the Emporium, and they have two children: Mildred Grace, now Mrs. Peters, and George Pease Colbert. The children of Captain Pease were all educated in the public schools of Oregon City and Portland. Fraternally the captain is a prominent man, having been made a Mason in 1855, in Oregon City, and having acted as master of Multnomah Lodge, which is the oldest on the Pacific coast. He is a charter member of Portland Lodge No. 55, and belongs to the Chapter, R. A. M., charter member of Scottish Rite and member of Al Kader Temple. He belongs socially to the Pioneers' Association of Oregon and Historical Society, and in the line of his business belongs to the Masters and Pilots' Association of Untied States Steam Vessels. Captain Pease is a self-made man and the success which he has achieved may be traced to that decision of character which impelled him to grasp a difficulty as soon as presented and use every strength and purpose of his intellect to overcome it and lift himself to a higher position among his fellow men.

KENNETH A. J. MACKENZIE, M. D. The founder of the Mackenzie family in America was Roderick Mackenzie, a member of an old family of Scotland and himself a native of Ross Shire. The ancient families of Langwell and Aldy, Earls of Cromartie and Brahan, are members of the same family. When a young man he settled in Canada where he soon became identified with the operations of the famous Hudson Bay Company, first in the capacity of clerk, and subsequently rising to be chief factor in the service. Through his keen intelligence and rare executive ability he rose rapidly to a position of influence among the company's officers, and his work at the various posts where he was stationed reflected the highest credit upon his capabilities and his devotion to the company's interests. Upon retiring from active business he purchased a homestead at Melbourne, Quebec, on the St. Francis river, where he continued to reside until his death in 1896. Throughout his life he adhered to the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, in which faith he had been reared. His wife, who also died in 1896, was Jane Mackenzie, a native of Fort William, in the Lake Superior district. Her father, also named Roderick Mackenzie, a native of Ross Shire, Scotland, likewise became a chief factor in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, and for years was stationed in the northwest, eventually dying in the Red River settlement, where he owned a large farm.

In the family of which Dr. Mackenzie was the eldest son there were four sons and two daughters. Of these, Peter is a well-known advocate in Quebec, and rendered able service as a representative of his district in the Provincial Legislature. Thomas is a farmer in Australia. Francis A. is engaged in business in Montreal. One of the daughters, Isabella, is married to R. Lea Barnes, manager of the Wells-Fargo Bank; and resides in Portland, while the other, Jane Mackenzie, continues to occupy the old homestead.

Kenneth A. J. Mackenzie was born in Cumberland House, Manitoba, January 13, 1859. As a boy he was afforded excellent educational advantages, attending the Nest Academy in Scotland, later the high school of Montreal, Canada, and subsequently being graduated from Upper Canada College in Toronto. Having decided to enter the medical profession, in 1877 he matriculated in McGill University, where he took a complete course of lectures, being graduated in 1881 with the degree of M. D. C. M. With a desire to broaden his professional knowledge before undertaking active practice, he went to Edinburgh, Scotland, where he took a post-graduate course in the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, which conferred upon him the degree of L. R. C. P. and S. E. In the hospitals and clinics of Berlin, Vienna, Paris and London he had further advantages of the highest importance to one whose ambition was to acquire a thorough knowledge of medicine and surgery.

Upon returning to America, Dr. Mackenzie, in 1882, located in Portland, Ore., where he has since established an enviable reputation for skill in surgery and accuracy in diagnosis and treatment in general practice. By his professional brethren he is at this time freely accorded the position of pre-eminence among the practitioners of Oregon, and ranks as the peer of the most successful and distinguished medical scientists of the Pacific slope. Aside from his large private practice, he has been variously identified with important interests properly associated with his professional work. For twenty years he has served as a member of the medical faculty of the Oregon State University. In 1883 he was appointed to the staff of St. Vincent's Hospital, where his broad knowledge and observation, extending into the hospitals of the medical centers of Europe, as well as of this country, made his services especially valuable. He has also held the post of chief surgeon for the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. His high standing among the members of the profession is indicated by the fact that he was honored by election to the presidency of the Oregon State Medical Association and of the Portland Medical Society, in both of which organization he has been an active laborer. He is also a member of the American Medical Association and of the International Association of Railway Surgeons. Fraternally and socially he is identified with the University Club and the Arlington Club, and is a life member of the Portland Library Association. In religious connections he is a member of Trinity Episcopal Church of Portland, and is a contributor to the success of other movements of a religious and benevolent nature.

On 1885 Dr. Mackenzie married Cora Hardy Scott, a native of Louisiana, and a daughter of Pliny and Cora Hardy of St. Landry's parish, La. She died in 1901. Their children are named as follows: Ronald Seaforth, Jean Stuart, Barbara and Kenneth A. J., Jr.

COL. HENRY E. DOSCH. In noting the history of the Dosch family we find they were prominent in military affairs in Germany, where Col. John B. Dosch and his father, Col. Ernest Dosch, were officers in the army; and the former had two brothers who also held high rank in the service of their country. At the close of an honorable career in the army he entered the diplomatic service, and subsequently, with a record of which he might well be proud, he retired to his large estate adjoining Kastel-Mainz, and there his last years were passed. His wife, Anna, was a daughter of Ulrich Busch, a large and wealthy lumber merchant of Kastel-Mainz; her brother, Adolphus Busch, has since become one of the most prominent residents of St. Louis, Mo. In her family of seven children one son and one daughter survive, the former being Col. Henry E. Dosch, of Portland, proposed director-general of the Lewis and Clark Exposition, and commissioner of the board of horticultural commissioners of Oregon.

In his native town of Kastel-Mainz, where he was born June 17, 1841, Col. Henry E. Dosch received excellent educational advantages. On the completion of the regular course in the School of Commerce and Industry in Kastel-Mainz, he was apprenticed to a large importing oil house, where he served for three years. In March of 1860 he came to America and secured employment as bookkeeper in St. Louis. At the opening of the Civil war he enlisted as member of General Fremont's body guard, serving as such until November, 1861, when the one hundred and fifty-one men composing the guard were honorably discharged. At the battle of Springfield, Mo., these valiant guardsmen met and routed three thousand Confederates in a desperate conflict that lasted from three in the afternoon until dark. During this engagement Mr. Dosch was wounded in the right leg. It might have been supposed that this baptism of fire would discourage Mr. Dosch from further efforts to enlist; but not so. On the expiration of his time he endeavored to secure admission into the volunteer service, and in March of 1862 was accepted as a member of Company C, Fifth Missouri Cavalry. Later, on account of losses in the Fourth and Fifth, these regiments were consolidated and he then resigned. A later office was that of sergeant of Company C, after which he was promoted to be sergeant-major of the regiment and then adjutant, and for the last three months he was acting colonel. On the consolidation of the two regiments, in 1863, he resigned his position and retired from the service.

The first experience of Colonel Dosch with western life and environment was gained in 1863, when he crossed the plains with ox-teams and after two weeks in Salt Lake City continued his journey to Virginia City, Nev. For a time he was connected with the Wells-Fargo pony express, and at one time he walked from Omaha to Sacramento and thence to San Francisco. In April of 1864 he became bookkeeper and cashier for a firm dealing in miner's supplies at The Dalles. The next year he embarked in the mercantile business at Canon City, Ore., and continued until the loss of his stock and store by fire led him to come to Portland in 1871. In this city he conducted a wholesale business in the boot and shoe line for nineteen years, having his establishment on Front street. The mental and nervous strain incident to the building up of a large wholesale business proved very trying and he was finally obliged to retire, in order that his health might not be permanently injured. Being of too active a temperament to enjoy complete rest, he turned his attention to horticulture, a science which has always possessed the keenest fascination for him. In 1889 the governor of Oregon appointed him a member of the board of horticultural commissioners and each succeeding governor has re-appointed him to the office. During his term of service five volumes of biennial reports have been issued. Those published in 1899 and 1901 have been adopted as text books at Cornell University, University of Michigan, University of Wisconsin, Stuttgart University in Germany, and various colleges in England.

Perhaps in no way has Colonel Dosch more materially aided in the progress of Oregon and in bringing before the world a knowledge of its resources, than through his connection with exhibits of the products of the state. During the World's Fair in Chicago an exhibit was inaugurated that attracted much attention from people who previously had been wholly unacquainted with the state's possibilities. Through his efforts the legislature was interested in the exhibit and an appropriation was made, thereby enhancing the success of the enterprise. A later project which he superintended was the exhibit of the products of Oregon at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha. So successful was he in this work that he was appointed to the same position in connection with the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, N. Y., and the Inter-State and West Indies Exposition at Charleston, S. C. One of the highest honors of his life came to him with his appointment as director-general of the Lewis and Clark Exposition, to which he is now giving much time and thought. During 1903 he will have charge of an exhibit at Ozaka, Japan, and while visiting this International Exposition it is his hope to arouse an interest on the part of the Japanese and induce them to make an exhibit at Portland during the Lewis and Clark Exposition.

There is probably no citizen of Portland whose knowledge of horticulture is broader and more thorough than that possessed by Colonel Dosch. In his office as commissioner of the state board of horticultural commissioners, he has directed its operations and headed its work in the direction of bringing to the people of the state, as well as elsewhere, an accurate knowledge of Oregon soil, its possibilities as a horticultural center, and the special fruits suited to various localities. Often he has accepted invitations to contribute to horticultural journals, and the articles appearing therein over his signature always command a wide reading. His association with the board of horticultural commissioners has been productive of the greatest good to the fruit-growing interests of the state, and to those having a knowledge of his contribution to the success of the board's reports the accepted value of the reports is a tribute to his accuracy and judgment. It may be doubted if any measure has contributed more to the development of Oregon's horticultural resources than the act of legislature, approved February 25, 1889, for the creation of a state board of horticulture; and it may also be doubted if any one member of the board has contributed in so great a degree to its success as has Colonel Dosch. As originally created, the board of horticulture consists of six members, appointed by the governor, secretary of state and state treasurer. One member represents the state at large, while the others represent five districts, namely: first district, Multnomah, Clackamas, Yamhill, Washington, Columbia, Clatsop and Tillamook counties; second district, Marion, Polk, Benton, Lincoln, Linn and Lane counties; third district, Douglas, Jackson, Klamath, Josephine, Coos, Curry and Lake counties; fourth district, Wasco, Sherman, Morrow, Gilliam and Crook counties; and fifth district, Umatilla, Union, Wallowa, Baker, Malheur, Harney and Grant counties. The members reside in the districts for which they are appointed and are selected with reference to their practical experience in or knowledge of horticulture. Appointment is for a term of four years. The present officers of the board are E. L. Smith, president; L. T. Reynolds, treasurer, and Henry E. Dosch, secretary, while the representatives of districts are as follows: W. K. Newell, first district; L. T. Reynolds, second district; A. H. Carson, third district; Emile Schanno, fourth district; Judd Geer, fifth district; and E. L. Smith, state-at-large.

The marriage of Colonel Dosch was solemnized at Canon City, Ore., in 1866, and united with him Marie Louise Fleurot, who was born in France and received her education in Portland. They are the parents of six children now living, namely: Ernst, who is a merchant at Skagway, Alaska; Lillie, Camelia, Arno, Roswell and Marguerite. The family attend the First Presbyterian Church of Portland, in which Colonel Dosch for a time officiated as treasurer.

For several terms he was commander of Lincoln-Garfield Post No. 3, G. A. R. During his residence in Canon City in 1867 he was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and is now identified with Minerva Lodge in Portland. During 1887-88 he was grand master of the grand lodge of Oregon. In politics he has always been allied with the Democratic party, but during the campaigns of 1896 and 1900 connected himself with the gold wing of that party, not being in favor of a sixteen-to-one standard. During the long period of his residence in the west he has kept in touch with the progress in the world of thought and action, and while especially devoted to the great northwest, yet has no narrow spirit of prejudice, but is loyal to the welfare of our country, and interested in worldwide progress. Frequent trips to the east, as well as several voyages across the ocean to the old home land, have brought to him an intimate knowledge of the development of our nation and the influence of modern thought in the old world; but, while loyal to the land of his birth, he believes the history of the future ages is to be written by the United States and especially by that portion thereof lying beyond the Rockies.

EARL C. BRONAUGH, JR. From his earliest recollections identified with the history of Portland, Mr. Bronaugh is keenly alive to the opportunities offered by his home city, and is one of the enthusiastic advocates of its possibilities. He was born in Cross county, Ark., February 26, 1866, and when two years of age was brought to Oregon by his father, E. C. Bronaugh. His education was begun in the public schools of Portland, and was completed at the University of the Pacific, at San Jose, Cal., from which he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of A. B. Three years later the degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by his alma mater. He began the study of law while a clerk in the office of Whalley, Bronaugh & Northup, and afterward entered the law department of the University of Oregon, from which he was graduated in 1890, with the degree of LL. B. During June of the same year he was admitted to the bar. In taking up the active practice of his profession he became a member of the firm of Bronaugh, McArthur, Fenton & Bronaugh, which, by the death of Judge McArthur, in 1897, and the retirement of the senior Bronaugh, was changed to Fenton, Bronaugh & Muir. The latter partnership was dissolved in February, 1900, and later the firm of Bronaugh & Bronaugh was organized by Mr. Bronaugh and his cousin, Jerry Bronaugh, the two now conducting a general practice and acting as attorneys for a number of corporations. Mr. Bronaugh has made a specialty of the law of real property, and has been, since 1900, attorney for several foreign loan companies.

Mr. Bronaugh was married in San Jose, Cal., to Miss Grace Huggins, a native of Iowa. They now have four children: Elizabeth, Lewis, Earl C., Jr., and Polly. The family is connected with the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Portland, in which Mr. Bronaugh is a member of the board of trustees, and for eight years has been Sunday school superintendent. He is a member of the board of directors of the Y. M. C. A. The Arlington Club, University Club, State Bar Association and Alumni Association of the Phi Kappa Psi and Phi Delta Phi are among the organizations to which he belongs. During his university work he was one of the founders of Chase Chapter of Legal Fraternity, Phi Delta Phi, University of Oregon. Fraternally he is connected with the A. O. U. W. and the Royal Arcanum. In 1900 he was elected to represent the Seventh ward in the city council, and served two years, meantime being chairman of the committee on streets, health and police, and was also a member of the judiciary committee. Under appointment by the legislature in 1901 he became a member of the charter board and served as chairman of the committee on executive department and a member of the committee on the legislative department.

EARL C. BRONAUGH. In the last half century the lawyer has been a pre-eminent factor in all affairs of private concern and national importance. He has been depended upon to conserve the best and permanent interests of the whole people, and is a recognized power in all the avenues of life. He stands as the protector of the rights and liberties of his fellow men, and is a representative of a profession whose followers, if they would gain honor, fame and success, must be men of merit and ability. Such a one was Earl C. Bronaugh, who passed away March 6, 1899, after a connection of thirty-one years with the bar of Oregon, and it is safe to say that there never was an attorney in the state who was held in higher respect by his associates. Coming to the state at a time when the work of development had just begun, he became identified with the substantial growth and upbuilding of the same. Unostentatious in manner, he never allowed himself to become a public man, preferring to give his whole time to the practice of his profession.

At the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, members of the Bronaugh family, who were French Huguenots, fled to Scotland for refuge, and from there came to America. The emigration must have taken place some time before the Revolution, as members of the family took part in the struggle for independence. Jeremiah Bronaugh, the father of the personal subject of this review, was born in Virginia, where the family had settled at a very early day. In about 1846, Mr. Bronaugh became a pioneer of western Tennessee, and still later removed to Arkansas, where he lived the balance of his life. In early manhood he was engaged in the mercantile business, but the most of his life was devoted to agricultural pursuits. By marriage he was united with Miss Elizabeth Clapp, a daughter of Dr. Earl B. Clapp, of Abingdon, Va. Dr. Clapp was a native of Massachusetts, and served as surgeon during the war of 1812 with the Virginia troops. He married Elizabeth Craig, of Abingdon, a daughter of Capt. Robert Craig. Captain Craig was a native of Pennsylvania, and in 1787 he removed to the Old Dominion. During the struggle for independence he served under Washington during two campaigns. He was also very active in promoting patriotic societies, organizing many in different portions of the country. He died in Abingdon in 1834, aged ninety years. For seventy years he was a very active member of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. Earl B. Clapp was a descendant of Thomas Clapp, a native of Dorchester, England, who came to this country in 1633, and settled in Massachusetts, where the descendants of the family resided until some time prior to the war of 1812, when Dr. Clapp migrated to Virginia, being the first member of the family to leave the New England states. His marriage with Elizabeth Craig resulted in the birth of four children, one of whom was Elizabeth, who became the wife of Jeremiah Bronaugh. Of this latter union there were seven children, three of whom lived to reach mature years, as follows: Earl C., our subject; Anna Louisa, now Mrs. Poindexter, of Bardwell, Ky., and William J., who died in Arkansas. His son, Jerry, is now an attorney of the city of Portland.

Earl C. Bronaugh was born in Abingdon, Va., March 4, 1831. There he spent the first twelve years of his life, at the end of which time he accompanied his parents on their removal to Shelby county, Tenn. There a new home was founded in the wilderness, and for six years Mr. Bronaugh assisted his father in the work of the farm and wood. While a resident of Abingdon he had attended the public schools and laid the foundation for an education, and while working with his father he devoted his spare time to study. Early in life he had become imbued with a desire to make law his life occupation. Accordingly, in 1847, he entered the law office of his uncle, J. W. Clapp, of Holly Springs, Miss., and after two years of study he was admitted to the bar.

Being without means to take up the practice of his profession at once, the following two years were spent in teaching in Tennessee and Arkansas. He then located at Jacksonport, Ark., where he engaged in practice for a short time. Soon after he removed to Little Rock, the same state, where for a time he served as clerk of the chancery court. Later, two years were spent at Brownsville, Ark., from which place he removed to Helena, in the same state. Here he became prominently identified with affairs and was elected judge of the circuit court in 1860. This office he continued to hold until the breaking out of the Civil war.

While not a man in sympathy with slavery, his education and environments had been such as to imbue him with the principles of the south. He was a firm believer in state sovereignty and when his adopted state seceded from the Union he gave his support to the Confederate cause. He enlisted in the army of the south and for one year continued in the service. At the expiration of this time his health failed and he soon after received his discharge from the service and returned home, where he remained until the close of the war. For a time after the close of the great struggle he remained in the south, but he soon realized that it was a poor country in which to strive for a fortune and position and after a few years he determined to seek newer fields in the far west where there were fairer chances for reward. In the year 1868 he came to the city of Portland. On reaching here he was without a dollar in the world, but he was not of the sort that give up and become disheartened. He was determined to succeed and at once opened a law office. From the first he received his share of the public's patronage and as time passed and people learned of his ability his practice grew until at the time of his death there were none that commanded a more extensive clientage, and his legal attainments placed him in the very front rank of the Oregon bar.

For three years he was associated with Hon. John Catlin as a partner and for ten years was a member of the firm of Dolph, Bronaugh, Dolph & Simon. In 1882, owing to failing health, he removed with his family to St. Clair county, Cal., where he remained for two years. On his return to Portland he became a partner in the law firm of Whalley, Bronaugh & Northup. The senior member of this firm retired in 1889, and from that time until the death of Mr. Bronaugh, the style of the firm was Bronaugh & Northup.

At a meeting of the members of the Portland bar soon after the death of Mr. Bronaugh there was a large attendance and many of the leading attorneys of the city delivered a number of scholarly and eloquent orations. It was said at the time there was never before a like meeting where so many sincere and able addresses were given. The committee on resolutions, in addition to a sketch of his life, presented the following eulogy, which was adopted by the meeting:

"As a lawyer, Judge Bronaugh had few if any superiors at the Oregon bar. Some might excel him in eloquence, others in powers for skillful cross examination, but no one in the knowledge of the law or accuracy of statement. No case intrusted to him was lost through his want of care, research or ability. It has been said of him that no man could make a better record in a cause for appeal to the supreme court, and no lawyer saw the controlling questions in a case with more clearness than he. Before a jury he was an exceedingly dangerous antagonist. Always in earnest himself in what he did, he never failed to impress those whom he addressed with the sincerity of his views. Persuasive in speech, logical and forceful in argument, with a play often of quiet and graceful humor and gentle wit, of which he used to please and not to wound, it was not surprising that he should have been a great verdict winner. Those whom he vanquished in forensic contest never felt the sting of their defeat intensified by any boasting on his part or the detraction of the abilities or conduct of his adversary. In defeat he was always calm, courteous and brave, fertile in resources but fair in action. It is not the language of mortuary panegyric, but the plain simple truth, which everyone in the community in which for thirty years he has lived and labored, will attest, to say of him that his name was the synonym of uprightness and honor, and that he was in the estimation of everyone, whether client or adversary, esteemed and respected as an honest man.

Priceless indeed is that legacy of a good and honored name that he bequeathed to his family which he loved so well, and for whom he so cheerfully labored. He was a devoted husband and father; a kind and generous neighbor; a plain and simple gentleman of the old school; unaffected in manner, speech and dress; sincerely devoted to his profession and unmindful of the strife and contentions of public life. He did not mingle much in public, was retiring and modest, and preferred the quiet home, the grave decorum of the court room, and the desk and library of his office. He was a man of strong religious convictions, and deeply sensible of the sufferings of the human race. The loss of seven children in their childhood and youth gave a touch of sorrow to his face, and the gravity of life and its issues made a profound impression upon his whole career. And yet he was a most hopeful man in the promises of the faith he professed. The hope of a simple, sincere Christianity animated his life and efforts. To him this life was but a preparation for that to come. It was therefore doubly earnest to him, for as Longfellow wrote, he felt—

'Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returneth
Was not spoken of the soul.'

"Although his star of life is no longer seen, yet it has set as sets the morning star in beauty, which goes not down behind the darkened clouds of the west, but melts away in the pure radiance of Heaven. Let us emulate his virtues and follow his example."

Mr. Bronaugh had a deep and abiding faith in the cardinal principles of the Christian religion. Though reared in the Presbyterian faith, later in life he identified himself with the Christian Adventist denomination, and became an earnest worker in the cause. He was a man of unsullied reputation, pure minded, generous hearted, and always adhering strictly to the principles which he laid down for his self-government, when, as a thoughtful and reasoning creature, he first decided to champion the cause of the Master of the hearts and lives of men. He contributed liberally of his means for the furtherance of the Gospel, and his benevolence aside from church work was numerous, though very quietly conducted. The ethical system associated with the church was carried by him into his daily life, and in Masonry, in which he took an earnest and active interest, he found the fellow of the church. The time he had to spare from the practice of his profession was devoted to the study of the Bible; it was his recreation, and many of the Biblical articles from his pen have been published in different sections of the country.

HON. JOHN F. CAPLES. The descendant of a family identified for many years with the jurisprudence of Ohio, with the founding of at least one of the towns of that state, and with the maintenance of its agricultural prestige, the career of Hon. John F. Caples has naturally been founded on broad and liberal lines, and with a view to large accomplishment. He was born at what is now Ashland county, Ohio, January 12, 1832, and is the youngest of the eight sons and two daughters born to Judge Robert Francis and Charlotte (Laffer) Caples, natives respectively of Westmoreland and Allegheny counties, Pa. The paternal grandfather Caples was of English descent, and was an early settler in Pennsylvania.

Judge Robert Francis Caples became identified with Wayne county at a very early day, where he engaged in farming and was associate judge of the county courts. In time he removed to within fourteen miles of Tiffin, Seneca county, Ohio, where he entered, cleared and improved the land upon which the town of Risdon was built, and of which he was one of the proprietors. The nearby town of Rome, of which Mr. Foster was proprietor, was eventually incorporated with Risdon, under the name of Fostoria. Judge Caples studied law in his youth and was admitted to the bar, in after life becoming known for his equitable rulings and wise disposition of legal complications. His death occurred in 1835 of cholera. His wife was of German descent, and a daughter of John Laffer, a pioneer of Allegheny county, Pa., who followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary war, under command of General Wayne. Mrs. Caples died in Ohio in 1852, having survived her husband seventeen years. Three of her large family are living, and of these Henry L., a resident of Vancouver, an attorney, and ex-member of the Washington legislature, came to the coast in 1852.

The education of Hon. John F. Caples was acquired in Risdon, now Fostoria, Ohio, and at the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware, which latter institution he attended for four years. His legal training was inaugurated with the firm of Stanton & Allison, of Bellefontaine, Logan county, Ohio, and he was subsequently admitted to the bar of Logan county in 1853. In 1855 he transferred his law practice to Findlay, Ohio, and later to Warsaw, Ind., and after returning to Ohio entered the government recruiting service in northwest Ohio and northern Indiana. In 1865 he brought his family to the coast via the Isthmus, San Francisco and to Vancouver, Wash., in which latter city he engaged in practice and served as city attorney. A year later, in 1866, he located in Portland, and in 1872 was elected to the legislature from Multnomah county, was chairman of the judiciary committee, and assisted in the election of Mr. Mitchell to his first term in the United States senate. In 1878 he was elected district attorney, his territory comprising Multnomah, Washington, Clackamas, Columbia and Clatsop counties, a responsibility maintained by Mr. Caples for six years in succession, an honor hitherto accorded to no district attorney in the state. In 1897 Mr. Caples was appointed United States consul to Valparaiso, Chili, by President McKinley, and while holding this important post had opportunity to exercise the diplomacy and tact which have been important factors in the formation of his success, and which were especially required because of the complications resulting from the Spanish-American war. Mr. Caples resigned the consulship in 1901, and thereafter returned to Portland, where he has since engaged in a general practice of law.

In Champaign county, Ohio, Mr. Caples married Sarah J. Morrison, in 1854, Mrs. Caples having been born in Ohio, and her death occurred in California in 1877. Six children were born of this union: Carrie, wife of Dr. W. H. Saylor, of Portland; Mrs. Matthieu, of Portland; Mrs. Paget, of Portland; Mrs. Anthony, of California; Robert A., a newspaper man of Vinita, I. T.; and Jennie, living at home. Mr. Caples is a member of the State Bar Association and of the Board of Trade. Fraternally he is associated with Portland Lodge No. 55, A. F. & A. M., the Consistory and the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite; and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. As a staunch upholder of Republicanism he has enrolled himself among the western politicians in the broadest sense of that much abused term, and aside from the honors before mentioned, served as presidential elector of Oregon in 1892, and was the messenger who conveyed the vote to Washington. In 1896 he served in a similar capacity for President McKinley. Back in Ohio Mr. Caples was a delegate to the Ohio state convention at Columbus in 1856, and he was present at the Chicago nomination of Abraham Lincoln. As an orator, eloquent and effective platform speaker, and general trial lawyer, Mr. Caples is excelled by few, if any, on the Pacific coast, and within the state of Oregon no one is personally known to more people than he. He is a member of the Taylor Street Methodist Episcopal Church, a member of the board of trustees, and chairman of the same for many years.

HON. JAMES WILLIS NESMITH. The name which heads this review is one written high in the annals of Oregon's history, and stands for the life of a man whose influence still makes itself felt throughout various circles in the life of the west. Beyond the borders of the state which Colonel Nesmith made his by the life and work of a pioneer, has also gone that broadening influence, for he became one of the prominent men of the national government during the trying times of '61, and gave the strength of his intellect and manhood toward the support of those principles, upon which the foundation of the Union rests. True, always, to his principles of honor, loyal to that which claimed his allegiance, and earnest in the prosecution of whatever duty came into his hands, Colonel Nesmith won the esteem and confidence of all with whom he came in contact, friend and foe alike trusting him, for in his social, business and political relations, in public and private life, his career was free from the stain of dishonesty. Oregon is justly proud to claim him as a representative son.

The life of Hon. James Willis Nesmith began in New Brunswick, in 1820, while his parents, William Morrison and Harriet (Willis) Nesmith, were visiting in the north. Both the father and mother of Colonel Nesmith were representatives of old and distinguished families, on the paternal side inheriting the sturdy qualities of Scotch-Irish ancestry. After their marriage in 1814 the young people took up their abode in Maine, where they remained until the death of the mother, which occurred while the colonel was still an infant. When this son was five years old, the father lost his entire fortune by fire, and was thus prevented from giving to his children those advantages which would otherwise have been theirs. Though deprived of the regular training of school, Colonel Nesmith did much studying, as he had a natural inclination for books, and had also a keen observation, which enabled him to pick up a great deal of valuable knowledge as he grew older and found more association with the outside world. Like many another eastern-bred youth, he felt a strong desire to test his ability in a pioneer life, and he was not old when he came as far west as Ohio, and in company with his cousin, Joseph G. Wilson, late member of Congress from Oregon, attended the district school near Cincinnati. A little later he came to Missouri, and was joined by his father, who died and was buried there.

After the death of the elder man the younger had left no ties to bind him to the east, and he at once sought to join a company bound for the trip across the plains. He failed to join the party he sought, but became, instead, a member of the Applegate party, who crossed in 1843. Locating in Oregon City, he followed out the suggestion of Peter Burnett, who was also one of the party that crossed the plains in 1843, and began the study of law. With that application which ever distinguished his efforts, the colonel soon became familiar with the common sense idea of jurisprudence contained in the few books which came into his possession, and two years later qualified to fill the office of judge under the provisional government.

Always a staunch Democrat, it required no small degree of courage for Colonel Nesmith to ally himself on the side of another party and platform, as he was compelled to do, at the time of the breaking out of the Civil war. Many of those who had always been his friends, Democrats in politics, gave their support to the southern cause, while his ideas of honor and his deep-rooted convictions made the colonel a staunch Unionist. He was not an abolitionist, nor in sympathy with the anti-slavery agitation, and it was because of this that his friends expected him to join them in their espousal of the southern cause. He did not, however; he stood apart from the regular party ranks, and in 1860 accepted a position as elector on the Douglas ticket. He was elected through the votes of the Douglas Democrats and the Republicans, the latter having entire confidence in the integrity and the worth of the man selected to fill the position. He therefore became senator to fill the place left vacant by General Lane, for many years a warm personal friend of the colonel's, and who accepted the place of vice president on the old Democratic ticket with Breckinridge. Whatever trials and difficulties arose during the time in which Colonel Nesmith served as senator were met with that same courage, that frank, fearless honor, but masterly will and intellect, which contributed so largely to the personal success of the man. It was not an easy position to fill, and a man less worthy in any way would have failed in the discharge of duties. Until the close of the war he upheld national authority and became a trusted adviser of President Lincoln. After its close, however, he vigorously opposed the reconstruction measures of the Republican party, and was ever afterward identified with the Democratic party. Upon his return to Oregon he became a leader in that party, and in 1873 was elected to fill the vacancy in Congress caused by the death of his cousin, Joseph G. Wilson.

Colonel Nesmith was never too busy in the pursuit of his profession, or his own aggrandizement in any way, to neglect his duty as a citizen and a pioneer in the western state. He was one of the number who fought in the Cayuse war in 1848 to avenge the death of Whitman, and again in 1855 he served with distinction in the Rogue river and Yakima wars, earning there the title by which he has ever been known, that of colonel. In 1857 he was appointed superintendent of Indian affairs, and served for two years, in a position of great responsibility, covering a field which included Oregon, Washington and Idaho. He also served at one time as United States marshal at Salem, and became a member of the state legislature, meeting every duty promptly, and as promptly fulfilling it. This most admirable trait was that which won the commendation of those who had the interests of Oregon at heart, and meant to intrust them only to men who possessed the courage, honesty and earnestness of purpose to carry forward the great plan which was to make her one of the first of the states.

In 1846 Colonel Nesmith was united in marriage with Pauline Goff, whose father was a pioneer of 1844, and she bore him the following children: Joseph Lane, Mary J., Harriet, Valena, James and William. The death of the colonel occurred in 1885. Thus passed away from mortal sight one of the men to whom Oregon owes her greatness; but memory survives the lapse of time, and his name loses none of the luster which attaches to it as that of a pioneer, a courageous, loyal, worthy man and gentleman.

BLUFORD D. SIGLER. In the business career of Bluford D. Sigler, the young man of the present generation may find a source of inspiration and encouragement. Coming to Portland when that city was at the zenith of its era of early commercial development, he was still a very young man when he decided to establish himself independently in business. But the northwest, with its boundless resources, is a country of young men, and here Mr. Sigler found abundant opportunity to build the foundations of a business which is amply rewarding his laborious and well-considered efforts.

Mr. Sigler was born in Georgetown, Vermilion county, Ill., November 27, 1866. His family was founded in Illinois by his paternal grandfather, John Sigler, a native of Pennsylvania, who became one of the earliest pioneer farmers of Vermilion county. His son, Samuel W. Sigler, father of B. D., was born in Illinois, and was reared and educated in that state. Upon the outbreak of the Civil war he left his farm to take up arms in the defense of the Union, and served as a private in Company C, Seventy-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry. His active service continued until the close of hostilities. He married Deborah Smith, a native of Vermont county and a daughter of Jefferson Smith, an extensive farmer and an early settler of Illinois. In 1870 Mr. Sigler moved with his family to Medoc, Jasper county, Mo., and engaged in a general merchandise business, which he disposed of five years later in order to take up his residence in Dayton, Ore., where he established a similar business. In 1883 he removed to Portland and conducted a feed business until 1898, but in that year returned to Dayton, where he now resides.

The only child in his father's family, B. D. Sigler received his education in the public schools of Illinois and Missouri, concluding his studies in the high school of Portland, to which city he removed with his parents in 1883. In his boyhood he had become familiar with the mercantile business, having been educated along these lines by his father, and in 1886 became a clerk in a store in Mount Tabor. At the expiration of two years he became identified with the sawmill business of Smith Brothers & Company, whose works were located at the foot of Harrison street. In 1897, in company with Samuel E. Wrenn and W. V. Smith, he organized the Multnomah Box Manufacturing Company, which succeeded to the business of the Multnomah Box Company. This enterprise proved highly successful, and at the end of three years was disposed of at advantageous terms. The wholesale feed business next engaged the attention of Mr. Sigler, who organized the Sigler Milling Company in 1901, with himself as secretary and manager. The concern conducts an extensive and constantly increasing trade in flour, feed, lime, land, plaster, and shingles, besides doing a general commission business. A. T. Smith is president, and A. J. McDaniel vice-president. The business is located on the corner of Front and Madison streets, occupying a building 30x75 feet, and containing four floors.

Aside from the enterprises with which he is identified in Portland, Mr. Sigler has taken a wholesome interest in politics, the Republican party receiving his stanch and unqualified support. In 1902 he was nominated for councilman for the sixth ward, and elected by a majority of one hundred and twenty-five. In the council he is a member of the committees on accounts and current expenses, sewers and drainage, and parks and public property; and is chairman of the committees on liquor license, and on health and police. He is a life member of the Multnomah Amateur Athletic Club, of which he served as secretary for one year; and is now vice-president of the same and a member of the Commercial Club. His marriage, which occurred in Portland united him with Veina E. Adair, a graduate of the University of Oregon, whose parents came to this state in the early '50s.

REUBEN DANNALS, one of the pioneers of Clackamas county, was born in Greene county, Ohio, October 23, 1829, and is the second oldest son of the four sons and five daughters born to Reuben and Hannah (Wyckel) Dannals, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and the east.

From his native county of Bedford, Pa., the elder Reuben Dannals removed with his parents to Ohio, and later to Illinois and Iowa, coming to Oregon in 1865. Settling in Linn county, he farmed for several years, but at the time of his death, in 1883, at the age of eighty-two years, was living a retired life. All of the children of the family were obliged to work hard from early morning until late at night, and Reuben performed his share with willing heart and capable hand. As might be expected, he had little time for either leisure or study, and his education has been a matter of his own acquiring during later years. He was one of the most enthusiastic of the little band who crossed the plains in search of larger opportunities. Although there were eighteen wagons from their own neighborhood in Iowa, the Indians were so very troublesome that they were obliged to fall in with a freight train for protection during the most dangerous part of the journey. Three ponies were stolen during the dawn of one morning, and they had many other experiences which added zest and interest to the journey.

When the family arrived in Clackamas county Mr. Dannals bought, on his own responsibility, one hundred and forty-two and one-half acres of land, a part of which he soon after sold, and at present his possessions consist of eighty of the original acres, besides one hundred and sixty acres at Highland, this state. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and has met with great success in his chosen occupation. With him across the plains came the wife of Mr. Dannals, formerly Hannah Colson, who was born in Ohio, and whom he married in Iowa. Three children have been born into the family of Mr. and Mrs. Dannals, of whom Charlotta is the oldest; Hiram is the second child and only son; and Minnie is the youngest. Mr. Dannals is a Democrat in politics and is fraternally associated with the Grangers. He enjoys the respect and good will of all who know him, and his integrity and public spiritedness have never been questioned.

W. H. Byrd

WILLIAM H. BYRD, M. D. The family of which William H. Byrd, M. D., of Salem, is a distinguished representative is one of the oldest and most favorably known throughout the Willamette valley. His father, Lorenzo A. Byrd, who is still living in Salem at the advanced age of eighty-one years, is a striking type of the best class of sturdy pioneers who braved the dangers and hardships of the plains more than half a century ago in order to assist in the foundation of a new commonwealth in a region whose natural wealth was, in those early days, little more than conjectural. The family was founded by him in the northwest in 1847, and since that year the unusual versatility and adaptability of its members to environment have been demonstrated in various ways. With descendants who have taken a high position in professional, educational, mercantile and agricultural circles, this honored pioneer must view with a great degree of satisfaction the happy augury which led his ambitious young steps toward the greater possibilities of the northwest, and inspired him to earnest and upright endeavor. (See sketch of Lorenzo A. Byrd, which appears elsewhere in this volume.)

William H. Byrd, the eldest son in the family of Lorenzo A. and Martha (Savage) Byrd, was born near Fairfield, Marion county, Ore., October 31, 1854, was reared on his father's farm, and received his classical education in the public schools of Fairfield and Salem. Upon reaching young manhood he engaged in teaching school, at the same time beginning the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. J. C. Shelton of Salem. In 1880 he matriculated in Cooper Medical College, in San Francisco, but the following year entered the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated with the class of 1881. Opening an office in that year, he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession uninterruptedly, with the exception of the winter of 1890-91, when he took a course in surgery in the New York Post-Graduate Medical College. His practice has assumed large proportions and has been attended by exceptional success.

For several years Dr. Byrd has been local surgeon for the Southern Pacific Company. When Willamette University established its medical department in Salem, in 1896, he was chosen professor of surgery, and one year later was made dean of the faculty, a post which he has continued to fill to the present time. Since 1896 he has also served on the staff of the Salem Hospital, which was established in that year. In the line of his profession he is identified with the Marion County Medical Society, the Oregon State Medical Society, the American Medical Association, and the International Association of Railway Surgeons.

In Salem, in 1882, Dr. Byrd was united in marriage with Teresa Holderness, a native of Oregon. She died in Salem in 1886, leaving a daughter, Winifred M., now a student in the Boston Conservatory of Music. In 1890 he married Margaret J. Macrum, a native of Pennsylvania, and a daughter of I. A. Macrum, deceased, of Forest Grove. Mrs. Byrd is a graduate of the Pacific University, and a lady of many graces of mind and character. Dr. and Mrs. Byrd are the parents of two children, Clarence M. and Donald W.

In politics Dr. Byrd is a Democrat. For several terms he has been a member of the Salem Board of Education, and has also served in the city council. Fraternally he is identified with the Masons, being a member of Pacific Lodge No. 50, A. F. & A. M., Multnomah Chapter No. 1, R. A. M., DeMolay Commandery, Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland; and has taken all the Scottish Rite degrees up to and including the thirty-second. He is also connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he is past noble grand; and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of Salem, in which he has been exalted ruler.

Genial in disposition, optimistic in temperament, and an erudite scholar, Dr. Byrd commands the attention and good will of the community in which he dwells. By his contemporaries he is regarded as the peer of the most noted physicians and surgeons of Oregon. A well-trained and inquiring mind has resulted in the accumulation of a vast store of the knowledge disseminated by the greatest masters of medical and surgical science; and to this he has added through his own personal investigations, directed along special lines which have appealed to him as worthy of profound study. By the laity he is highly regarded for the many splendid traits in his character which have become so conspicuous during his professional career in Salem.

JOB CONNER. For many years a highly esteemed resident of Ballston, the late Job Conner was well known throughout this section of Polk county as an industrious and enterprising farmer, a good citizen, a kind neighbor, a loving husband and father; and his death, which occurred November 10, 1888, on the home farm, was a cause of general regret.

A native of Ohio, Job Conner removed in boyhood to Iowa with his parents, and resided in that state until 1847. Following the tide of civilization westward in that year, he, with three of his brothers, William, Nathan and Robert, came to Oregon to take up land in this newer country, hoping thereby to speedily improve their financial condition. All settled in the Willamette valley, where they engaged in agricultural pursuits. In 1871 Job Conner purchased the farm now owned and occupied by Mrs. Conner and her family. Laboring earnestly and industriously, he placed a large part of it in a good state of cultivation, and added substantial improvements, making his estate one of the most valuable and attractive of any in the vicinity, residing on it until his death.

In 1855 Mr. Conner was married to Polly Ann Riggs, who died April 13, 1871, leaving several children. Those living are: Robert S., of Colorado; Thomas Edgar; Jane Baxter, Roswell, Yamhill county; Louisa Morrison, of California; Nancy Ann Berdau, of Idaho; and one who died in infancy.

On May 16, 1872, Mr. Conner married Martha Hicklin, who was born in Jennings county, Ind., September 27, 1842. Her father, John L. Hicklin, removed from Kentucky, his native state, to Indiana, from there coming to Oregon in 1849. Locating first on the Columbia river, he remained there a year, then went to Washington county in search of a more favorable site for establishing himself permanently. Being pleased with the land in that part of the state, he took up a donation claim near what is now called Tigardville, Ore., and having made some improvements, sent for his family. His wife, whose maiden name was Martha Thorn, went with her family from Indiana to St. Joseph, Mo., where she joined a train composed of twenty-eight wagons starting across the plains. Four of the wagons came to Oregon, Mrs. Hicklin and her family reaching the home farm at Tigardville on September 13, 1851. Mr. Hicklin continued adding to the improvements already made, by energetic efforts clearing a good homestead, on which he carried on general farming until his death, October 14, 1877. His widow survived him, dying in June, 1882, at the home of her sister, Jane Conner, near Ballston.

Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Conner five children were born, namely: Mrs. Sarah Olmstead, who resides on a farm adjoining the parental homestead; Lowman, living at home; Elbert, who is in Idaho; Belle, living at home; and Mrs. Ella Hastings, of Smithfield, Ore. Mr. Conner actively supported the principles of the Republican party, and served his district several terms as school director. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pleasant Hill while Mrs. Conner belongs to the Baptist Church at Ballston.

PETER WILLIAM MESS, city recorder of Mount Angel, and an educator of extended experience, was born in Luxemburg, November 9, 1842, but received practically his entire training and education in the United States. The family had long been identified with Luxemburg, his father, Michael, having been born there September 12, 1799. The father removed with his family to the United States in 1847, Peter William Mess being then three years old. After a year near Tiffin, Ohio, Michael Mess removed to a farm in Henry county, where his death occurred in 1855. He did meritorious service under King William of Holland, and he not only served the Dutch Republic for five years for himself, but undertook an additional five years for a stranger. His wife, Susan, was born on disputed territory bordering on the Moselle river, September 12, 1803, and her death occurred in Henry county, Ohio, July 10, 1871.

The fourth of the five children in his father's family, two of whom were daughters, Peter William Mess was educated in the public schools of Ohio, at the Wesleyan University at Delaware, and at the Heidelberg College at Tiffin, Ohio, leaving that institution to enlist for the Civil war. As a soldier in Company D, One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, Mr. Mess participated in many of the important contests of the war, including the battles of Thompson's Station, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Tunnell Hill, Resaca, Cassville, and Pickett's Mill. In the latter he was wounded so severely as to necessitate the amputation of his right hand. He was discharged at Nashville, Tenn., November 8, 1864, cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln, and returned to his class work at Tiffin College. At the expiration of the session he engaged in teaching a district school in Henry county for a term, and then studied for a term at the State University at Bloomington, Ind. Returning to Ohio, he passed through the freshman, sophomore, and junior years at Delaware College, and though within a year of graduation, discontinued his study to engage in teaching in Henry county, Ohio, in the fall of 1869. After five terms in Henry county he removed to Kansas in April, 1874, locating at St. Paul, where he engaged in educational work for ten years at St. Francis College, and for six years in the district schools of the neighborhood, making sixteen years in all. For one year he served as superintendent of Kaw Indian schools of Kansas, and was appointed census enumerator of Neosho county in 1890. The same year he located in Mount Angel, Ore., and continued his former occupation of teaching, occupying the chair of mathematics at Mount Angel College.

In September, 1891, Mr. Mess bought a small place in Roseburg, Ore. The following June he returned to Mount Angel, and was appointed postmaster of the city. In 1894 he removed to Grand Ronde, teaching in the male department of the Indian school. Since then he has been recorder of Mount Angel, and has also held a notary's commission since 1892. Mr. Mess has had two first-grade certificates, and now holds a certificate which entitles him to teach for six years.

While living in Ohio in 1871, he was united in marriage with Mary Clemmens, who was born in Ohio in 1840, and died in Kansas in January, 1883. A second marriage was contracted by Mr. Mess in Neosho county, Kans., his wife being Eva M. Reischman, a native of Louisville, Ky., who was born in 1855, a daughter of Nicholas Reischman, a native of Bavaria, Germany. Mr. Reischman came to the United States in 1851, locating at New Albany, Ind., where he engaged in farming until removing to Kansas in 1868. He came to Oregon in 1895, and died in the hospital in Portland, June 13, 1902, at the age of seventy-four years.

Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Mess, the order of their birth being as follows: Norbert N.; Lenora M.; M. Cyrilla; Michael J.; Peter W., Jr.; Theresa Rose, and Benedict Rupert, all of whom are living at home. Mr. Mess is a Republican in politics. He is connected with the Grand Army of the Republic, G. K. Warren Post No. 114, Department of Kansas, and finds a religious home in the Roman Catholic Church.

CHRISTOPHER A. VANDRAN. When but fourteen years of age Christopher A. Vandran made the journey with his parents from his home near Wurtzburg, Bavaria, to America, and each year has witnessed a forward step in the march of progress for this emigrant family. The father, Christopher, Sr., was born in Bavaria, and was there engaged as a carriage manufacturer, but hoping to better the condition of his family he came to America in 1881, settling first in Kansas, remaining, however, but two months before changing his location to Oregon. In this state he located near Coburg, Lane county, where he died after engaging for several years as a farmer in this vicinity. The wife of Christopher, Sr., also a native of Bavaria, died in Albany, being the mother of five children, all of whom are living.

Christopher A. Vandran was the second of his parents' family, having been born near Wurtzburg, Bavaria, September 2, 1867. He received his education in the public schools of his native country, and on settling in Oregon he engaged with his father in farm work. Later he spent two and a half years in St. Paul, Marion county, and in 1884-5 he occupied his time as a gardener. Tiring of a farm life, he came to Albany in 1890 and entered the employ of Mr. Gross, who was then manager of the Southern Pacific Hotel. In 1894 Mr. Gross sold out in Albany, and Mr. Vandran was made manager for the company of the Depot Hotel, a transient house and railroad eating station, and has since continued to hold the position. Mr. Vandran is now much interested in the breeding of Chinese pheasants, raising for stock birds, and shipping them as far east as New York, in fact, to every section of the United States. He began his raising of pheasants from wild birds. He also owns a few fine bird-dogs. Through the kindness of Mr. Vandran the rose garden and pheasant farm are thrown open to the public, and during the twenty minutes' stop of all the overland trains at Albany the passengers enjoy the interesting sight.

Fraternally Mr. Vandran is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and religiously belongs to the Roman Catholic Church.

PRESTON BRUCE MARSHALL. The Albany Farmers' Company, of which Preston Bruce Marshall is secretary and manager, was organized April 25, 1873, and has since held its own among the developing and substantial concerns of Linn county. From a comparatively small beginning it has increased its sphere of usefulness until the company now have an elevator at Albany with a capacity of two hundred thousand bushels, one at Tangent of one hundred thousand bushels, and one at Tallman of the same capacity as the latter, the combined capacities being four hundred thousand bushels. The company act as agents for the farmers, taking their grain and general produce, storing it until making the desired sale, and charging them a reasonable per cent for the transaction. Needless to say they have facilities for disposing of commodities not at the command of the individual farmer, and to the hard-worker the item of getting this business taken off his hands is by no means an indifferent one. The enterprise has stimulated trade and encouraged the farmers to do their best, for they are assured that a superior grade of produce brings a better price than an inferior one, and besides establishes his reputation as painstaking and progressive.

Mr. Marshall, who has held his present position since 1889, is a member of an old pioneer family of this state, and was born on a farm near Albany, November 11, 1861. His grandfather, John, was a large farmer near Springfield, Ill., where was born his father.

Arthur G., in 1831. When the latter was twenty-one years of age, in 1852, he started across the plains with his sire, and on the way grandfather John succumbed to the deprivations of the journey, and the young man was left to complete the distance alone. He located on a claim seven miles from Albany, and some time after coming here married Josephine Morris, who was born in Illinois, and crossed the plains with her father, Preston Morris, in 1851, settling on a farm in Linn county, where the father died. The young people went to housekeeping on the donation claim settled upon by Mr. Marshall, who proved a good manager, and amassed a competence for his wife and children. His wife, who is still living on the old claim, bore him eleven children, seven of whom are living, Preston Bruce being the second child.

Like his brothers and sisters, Preston went to the public schools, and he afterward attended the State Normal at Monmouth. After teaching school for a year he engaged in farming on the old place, and in 1889 located in Albany, where he was elected to his present position by the board of directors of the Albany Farmers' Company. In this county he was united in marriage with Winnifred Wilds, a native daughter of Linn county, and daughter of one of the early pioneers. One child, Arthur, has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Marshall. Mr. Marshall is a Republican in politics, and is an ex-member and secretary of the county committee. At present he is serving his second term in the city council from the Third ward, and is chairman of the license committee. He is fraternally prominent and widely known, and is identified with the Masons, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Encampment, the Rebeccas, and the Uniformed Rank Knights of Pythias. He is also a member of the Native Sons. Mr. Marshall is esteemed for his many admirable personal characteristics, for his unquestioned integrity, and for his appreciation of the duties and demands of the highest citizenship.

ARTHUR H. WATKINS. Worthy of special mention among the younger generation of business men in Polk county is Arthur H. Watkins, general manager and secretary of the Coast Range Lumbering Company, the largest milling concern on the west side of the Willamette river south of Portland. His father, E. H. Watkins, now living at Cathlamet, Wahkiakum county, Wash., is extensively identified with the business interests in Polk county, and has proved himself a veritable master of western opportunities.

In Herefordshire, England, where E. H. Watkins was born and reared, he married for his first wife Emma Gaut, with whom he came to the United States in 1867, locating at Plymouth, Lucerne county, Pa., on the banks of the Susquehanna. Here he engaged in a general merchandise business with considerable success, and here was born his son, Arthur H., May 3, 1873. In 1878 the elder Watkins desired to go west, and his wife and son therefore went to England, where they visited relatives and friends for five years, and where the lad went to school. In the meantime the father reached Leadville, Colo., where he engaged in mining, and in 1881 went to New Mexico, making his headquarters at Las Vegas. In 1884 he came to Oregon and located at Portland, where he became interested in a grocery business on the east side, and after giving that up in 1891 removed to a farm of two hundred and fifty acres near North Yamhill, Yamhill county. About 1893 he became interested in a lumbering, farming, and general merchandise business in Wahkiakum, Wash., which is still operated under his name, as is also a large business at Seattle, Wash. It will be seen that he has a genius for organization, as well as many-sided business ability. He owns a large town site adjoining Cathlamet, and is prominent and influential in commercial and business circles. A Democrat in politics, he has served as county commissioner, and has been a member of the state central committee of Wahkiakum county. His first wife died in Portland in 1887, and of the three children born of this union Arthur H. only is living. Mr. Watkins married in 1890, Cora P. Church, of Portland, and of the three sons born of this marriage two are living, Ray and Ralph.

Educated in the public schools of England and America, Arthur H. Watkins studied also at the Bishop Scott Academy for one term, and eventually graduated from the Holmes Business College in Portland. From early youth he has been identified with his father's various interests, and at present is connected with both the farming and lumbering enterprises of the elder man. In 1894 he became a member of the general merchandise firm of E. H. Watkins & Son, of Washington, and in 1896 engaged in logging in the same state. In the summer of 1901 he came to Falls City and engaged in the general merchandise and lumbering business, and now has charge of the Coast Range Lumbering Company's interests, a responsibility which he is proving thoroughly capable of assuming. The mills have a capacity of one hundred and twenty thousand feet per day, and the company have two miles of flume, connecting the mills with the planing mills at Falls City. They are equipped with modern machinery and dry kilns, and for the transportation of their output have a switch of the S. W. & F. Railroad. The company was incorporated with a capital stock of $25,000, and from the beginning of its business life Mr. Watkins has been its general manager and secretary.

So successful a business man must needs see the advantage of lending his influence to all efforts to improve the general conditions among which he is living and working, and Mr. Watkins is keenly alive to all public-spirited undertakings. Though not particularly active as a Democrat, he is now serving his first term on the city council and his sound judgment and advanced ideas will undoubtedly be called into requisition in other official capacities. He married in Cathlamet, Wash., Rosa A. Haniagan, of which union there have been born three children, one of whom, Lester, is deceased, and Harold and Arlyn are living at home. Mrs. Watkins is a daughter of C. R. Hamagan, a farmer of Iowa who came to Oregon in 1881, and after living for a time in Portland removed to Washington in 1883. He is still living on his farm in Wahkiakum county, and is devoting his energies principally to stock-raising.

Mr. Watkins is fraternally connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks of Astoria. He is popular and well known in Polk county, and has a comprehensive knowledge of both lumbering and merchandising, occupations which go together in the west, as in Michigan and other lumbering centers, and which in Oregon have been among the prime developing factors of the state.

JESSE EDWARDS. Many enterprises of Newberg owe their establishment and successful conduct to Jesse Edwards, who is now the president of the Newberg Terra Cotta and PRESSED Brick Company. He is classed among the public-spirited citizens, and was largely instrumental in the establishment of the settlement made by the Friends church. He came to Oregon September 8, 1880, when a young man, his birth occurring in Hendricks county, Ind., February 8, 1849. He represents one of the old families of the south. His paternal grandfather, Anuel Edwards, was born in North Carolina and successfully followed farming throughout his business career, his death occurring in Hendricks county, Ind., when he had reached the advanced age of about ninety years. His son, John Edwards, the father of our subject, was born in Guilford county, N. C., September 4, 1806, and in the year 1830 he removed to Indiana, making a settlement in Hendricks county upon the farm on which the birth of his son Jesse occurred. There he continued to engage in agricultural pursuits until 1882, when he disposed of his interests in the Hoosier state and came to Oregon, settling in Newberg, where he lived retired until his death, which occurred when he was eighty-eight years of age. He was a stock-raiser and also speculated in land in addition to carrying on general farming pursuits, and in all his business undertakings he prospered and at the same time his integrity and honor were above reproach or question. He married Abigail Stanley, a native of North Carolina, as was her father, Jesse Stanley. The latter likewise devoted his energies to farming and prospered in his chosen work. He died in North Carolina at the advanced age of eighty years.

Jesse Edwards was the only child born unto his parents, but both his father and mother had been married before. He supplemented his early educational privileges, afforded by the common schools, by study in the high school at Westfield, Hamilton county, Ind., and then, in order to further fit himself for life's practical duties, he entered Bryant & Stratton's Commercial College, at Indianapolis, Ind., and when he was graduated therefrom he pursued a course in the University of Michigan as a pharmacist. Later he established a drug store at Mooresville, Ind., and conducted the enterprise in a profitable manner for a year, but at the end of that time he returned to his father's farm and assumed control of the business as manager, devoting his attention to the cultivation of grain and to the raising and shipping of stock. In 1874 he removed to Hamilton county, that state, and purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which he also stocked with good grades of cattle, horses and hogs, living thereon for three years or until 1877, when he once more returned to the old family homestead, which he purchased. When three years had passed he came to Oregon and settled on the present site of the town of Newberg, purchasing the land on which the place has since been built. His first purchase made him the owner of one hundred and eighty-five acres; his second purchase brought to him fifty acres; and later he bought one hundred and twenty-four acres. He now owns one hundred and seventy acres, which is highly cultivated and improved. Here he built the Newberg House, which was first his private residence, and in 1885 he erected his present beautiful home. In 1882 he established a general mercantile store and in 1883 he became the owner of the first steam sawmill in this portion of the country. Mr. Edwards is very quick to recognize and utilize business opportunities and certainly no man has done more for the upbuilding of Newberg than he. In 1886 he established a tile factory, which was conducted for some time, and in 1890 he assisted in the organization of the Bank of Newberg, becoming its president in the second year of its existence, and continuing to serve in that capacity until 1899. In 1892 he organized the Newberg Pressed Brick and Terra Cotta Company, of which he is still the head. This is the only pressed brick manufactory in the entire state, and from the beginning Mr. Edwards has been its chief executive officer and to his capable management and keen business discernment the success of the enterprise is largely due. The other stockholders of the company are members of his immediate family, his son, O. K. Edwards, being manager, secretary and treasurer, while C. J. Edwards is vice-president. The business is capitalized for $50,000, with $30,000 paid up, and the trade is constantly growing in volume and importance, so that the industry is now an important one. The capacity is two million bricks per annum. In 1898 Mr. Edwards also established a private dairy, which he is continually improving.

Mr. Edwards was married in Hendricks county, Ind., to Miss Mary E. Kemp, whose birth occurred in Park county, that state. Her father, Jeremiah Kemp, was a native of North Carolina and a tinner by trade. Removing westward he took up his abode in the Hoosier state and there he died in early manhood. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Edwards have been born four children, three sons and a daughter: Clarence J., who is proprietor of the Newberg Electric Light Plant and an excellent business man; Walter F., who deals in wood and builders' supplies, both wholesale and retail, in Portland as a member of the firm of Timms & Edwards, agents and manufacturers; O. K., who is manager of the pressed brick and terra cotta business of this place; and Mabel, who is at home. She has attained considerable proficiency in painting and music. The sons have all completed a college course and the family is identified with the Friends church, in which the different members are active and faithful members. In 1879, in Indiana, Mr. Edwards served as a recording minister of the church and he took a very active and helpful part in the organization of the denomination in Newberg. For ten years he was president of the board of managers of Pacific College, an institution under the auspices of the Society of Friends, serving in that capacity until 1901, while at the present time he is one of its members. He has given generously to the support of this institution and has also labored effectively for its upbuilding and promotion. Three times has he made trips to the east in the interest of the college. In politics an earnest Republican, he served for two or three years as a member of the city council at Newberg, and was also a school clerk and trustee in his younger years. For almost a quarter of a century Oregon has numbered him among its prominent and progressive citizens. He may well be termed one of the founders of Newberg, for he not only owned the site of the town, but has been the promoter of many of its leading business enterprises. His connection with any undertaking insures the prosperous outcome of the same, for it is his nature to carry forward to successful completion whatever he undertakes. He has earned for himself an enviable reputation as a careful man of business, and in his dealings is known for his prompt and honorable methods, which have won him the deserved and unbounded confidence of his fellow men.

MERRITT L. THOMPSON. The drug store of Merritt L. Thompson is one of the active business centers of Falls City, and in its appointments would do credit to a much larger and older community. Since coming into the possession of the present owner in 1893, a marked change has taken place in the enterprise, the trade has steadily increased, and the stock has been correspondingly enlarged to meet more exacting and discriminating patronage. Since September, 1897, Mr. Thompson has been the postmaster of Falls City, and as a staunch upholder of Republican principles other honors have been conferred upon him. He was mayor for one term, and for the past four years has been city treasurer. It will thus be seen that he is possessed of characteristics which inspire confidence and suggest authority, and which place him in the front rank of promoters of the general well-being.

The representative of an old New York family, Mr. Thompson was born in Cayuga county, N. Y., August 18, 1864, his father, Charles H., and his grandfather, Lovell, being natives of the same state. Charles H. married Jerusha Merritt, who was born in New York state, and with her he removed to a farm of eighty acres one and a half miles from Greenville, Mich., where he is now living, and is about sixty years of age. Of the two sons in the family, both were educated in the public schools, and both started at a practically early age to earn their own living.

Merritt L. began to work in a drug store at Genoa, N. Y., when fourteen years old, and the following year accompanied his parents to Michigan. After going to school for a year he entered a drug store in Greenville for a year and a half, and then filled a similar position in a store in Howard City, Mich., for about the same length of time. Returning to Greenville he engaged in the drug business for about four years, and then made up his mind to try his luck in the far west. In Aberdeen, Wash., he found employment in a drug store, and during his two years' association with this concern visited his home in Michigan on two occasions. Desiring to go further west, he came to Portland in 1890, but after vainly looking for a position for a couple of months went to Independence, Ore., where he remained for five months. In the meantime he had been looking around for a desirable permanent location, and hearing of a drug store for sale in Falls City came here in 1893 and purchased the business of Otto Messman.

Reaching the west with comparatively few available assets, Mr. Thompson has made the most of his opportunities, and for his industry can point to his drug store building, several town lots, and the thirty acres of land adjoining the city on the west, which is laid out in lots, and is known as Thompson's First Addition.

In Falls City, in 1895, Mr. Thompson married Maggie Travis, who was born in Pennsylvania, as was also her father, Calvin M. Travis. Mr. Travis removed from his native state to Kansas, and from there came to Oregon in 1890, locating at Falls City. A carpenter by trade, he has spent many years in working at his trade, but is now engaged in farming near the city, although well nigh eighty years of age. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, Hallett E. and Mildred. Mr. Thompson, as an official, has proven himself worthy of the confidence of the people. He is equally well known in fraternal circles, being identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees of Falls City. He is enterprising, progressive and public-spirited, a shrewd business man, and a very genial companion.

E. S. REMINGTON. One of the much esteemed farmers of Yamhill county is E. S. Remington, a native of Ohio, born May 13, 1833, a sojourner in Illinois, and a westerner by long adoption. For many years his father was a resident of Trumbull county, Ohio, where he followed the trades of carpenter and millwright. In 1837 the family removed to Illinois, and twelve years later, in famous '49, the father prepared to go west in the hope of bettering the condition of those dependent on him for support. He traveled by ox team as far as Salt Lake City, where he sold his team, going the remainder of the journey by pack-mules. In common with the thousands of others who thronged to the west at that time, he tried prospecting and mining for several years in California on the American river.

While awaiting the father's return, or financial success, the principal support of the mother was her son, E. S., a lad of sixteen, who in the four years' absence of his father grew to sturdy manhood, generously taking up the burden of caring for the family, even venturing in 1853 to set out with the family to join the wanderer in the west. When we think of what the journey must have been to him, with its dreariness and danger, the long days and lonesome nights when he could not help but think of his responsibility should they never see again the loved one they were going so far to join, we gain a truer estimate of the courage of this young pioneer.

However, after six months, the emigrant train, consisting of fifteen yoke of oxen and one mule team, reached Bear valley safely, August 20, 1853, and the reunited family went at once to settle on a pre-emption claim, the one selected being eighteen miles from Sacramento, where they remained until 1859. The last year but one of their residence there was marked by the death of the father, thus once more throwing the entire responsibility upon the shoulders of the son. In 1859 the family made another move, into the state where they have ever since lived, settling three miles south of Hillsboro, in Washington county, Ore., where they remained for three years. They then removed to Marion county, making this their home until 1893. Here Mr. Remington met and married Miss Hannah Rauch. She was also a sturdy product of the middle west, who crossed the plains from Illinois with her parents in 1853. Until 1893 the young people made their home in Marion county, but in the last-named year they went into Yamhill county, where Mr. Remington bought the Joseph H. Garrison donation claim just south of Whiteson. Two years later, in 1895, he was bereaved by the death of his wife. In 1874 he had also lost his mother, for whom he had continued to provide even after his marriage, making her an honored member of his home up to the time of her death. She became the mother of nine children, three of whom are living.

Mr. Remington is the owner of considerable property, consisting of one hundred and ninety-nine acres in the home farm, seventy-five acres adjoining and one hundred and twenty in hill land, besides land in Marion county, making nearly four hundred acres in all, well improved and under cultivation. He made all the improvements on the farm now occupied by his son, the original land bought in Yamhill county, and also built a house where he now lives. He has four children living and settled near him: Henry, who runs a portion of the home farm, married Susie Thurman and has two children, Leta and Melvin; Elizabeth is the wife of William A. Forrest and the mother of one child, Vernal; and Mina and Vina are twins, Mina being the wife of C. Patterson, and Vina making bright the home that would otherwise be lonely without the presence of the wife and mother. Though now retired from active duties, Mr. Remington has not lost the zest of living, having always taken an active part in politics, being a stanch Republican, and holding at various times public offices at the request of his fellow-townsmen. He has lived a good, clean, useful life, giving from his earliest boyhood to those who claimed his help, bringing into his character the fruits of this self-sacrifice that have made him a most respected member of every locality of the west in which he has lived.

J. H. GRIMES. An important farming enterprise of Yamhill county is that managed by J. H. Grimes, who is successfully raising grain and general crops, and is making a specialty of Jersey cattle and O. I. C. hogs. This farm is located five miles south of Dayton, between Salem and Wheatland, and about one hundred and thirty acres are under cultivation, Mr. Grimes having recently purchased sixty acres of the adjoining farm.

A native of Indiana, Mr. Grimes was born near Millersburg, Elkhart county, September 25, 1862. His father, who was a farmer in the vicinity of his birthplace, died when his son was only two years of age. There were three other children in the family, and in spite of their limited resources the mother and children managed to keep together and share their common sorrows and pleasures. The son, J. H., managed to acquire a good education in the common schools, and he eventually assumed charge of the paternal farm, remaining with the rest of the family until his twenty-first year. In 1884 he came to Oregon, settling in Yamhill county near his present location, and from then until 1895 found employment on various farms in the vicinity. In the year last mentioned he was employed by the C. K. Spaulding Logging Company in Newberg, remaining in their employ for two years, after which he located upon the farm which has since been his home.

March 15, 1885, Mr. Grimes was united in marriage with Minnie Seese, a native of Indiana, and the daughter of Eli Seese, a farmer by occupation. Mr. Grimes is a stanch Democrat in his political views, and has taken an active part in the undertakings of his party both here and in his native state of Indiana. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights and Ladies of Security. With his wife and two children, Ray and Venelli, he is a member of the Evangelical Church, in which he is an active worker. Mr. Grimes has won the respect of all who know him in his adopted state and all accord him the credit due so conscientious and painstaking a farmer.

THOMAS W. RICHES, who for ten years has filled the position of postmaster in Silverton and is one of the well and widely known citizens of that locality, is numbered among Oregon's native sons, his birth having occurred on the 17th of November, 1853, in the Geer settlement amid the Waldo Hills about six miles from his present home. The Riches family is of English lineage. The grandfather, Thomas Riches, was born in England. Crossing the Atlantic to the new world he settled at Hamilton, Canada, where he spent his remaining days. His son, George P. S. Riches, the father of our subject, was born near London, England, and accompanied his parents on their emigration to the new world in 1830. Desiring to make his home in the United States instead of in the Dominion, he removed to Illinois, where he was engaged in the logging and lumber business until 1847.

In that year he crossed the plains to Oregon, among many other emigrants and brave pioneers who made their way into the northwest to subdue the wilderness and claim from the red man the dominion of this rich section of the country. He located in Oregon City, where he was engaged in business as a ship builder; and later he removed to Oakpoint, Wash. In 1851 he took up his abode in the Waldo Hills, where he secured a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and there he remained up to the time of his death, which occurred in April, 1892, when he was seventy-two years of age. His wife bore the maiden name of Mary Jane Watkins, who was born in Anderson, Ind. She started across the plains with her parents, but both died during the journey, one surviving the other only a day; and they were buried in the same place. Mrs. Riches is still living and makes her home on the old donation claim. By her marriage she became the mother of eight children, four sons and four daughters, and of these three sons and three daughters are yet living.

Thomas W. Riches, the eldest of the family, having obtained a public school education, engaged in farming for himself on attaining his majority. He was married, and in order to have a home of his own he purchased one hundred and fifty-one acres of the old donation claim from his father. This he continued to improve and cultivate until 1883, when he sold that property and removed to Silverton, where he purchased a grocery store, which he conducted for six years. He was then made assistant postmaster, and under President Harrison's administration was appointed postmaster. He was also appointed to the position of turnkey in the State Penitentiary, but remained there only six months. Returning to Silverton, he later engaged in clerking in a general mercantile establishment until he was re-appointed postmaster by President McKinley, and again by President Roosevelt, so that his incumbency in the position covers an entire decade.

Mr. Riches has been twice married. In 1873 he wedded Rosa Hibbard, who was born in Oregon and died in Silverton on the 17th of September, 1883, leaving two children: George H., who is now assistant postmaster; and Amy, who is an educator at Jefferson, Ore. For his second wife Mr. Riches chose Mary L. Hall, who was born in Vancouver, Wash. They have five children: Lloyd, Lelia, Harold, Gladys and Marjory.

In his fraternal relations Mr. Riches is an Odd Fellow, and is very prominent in the order. He has served as grand patriarch, and was Oregon's representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge in Detroit in 1889, and also in Richmond, Va., in 1890. He is likewise connected with the Woodmen of the World, and has filled all of the offices in the local order. His life is in harmony with the teachings of the Odd Fellows' fraternity, which is based upon brotherly kindness and helpfulness. For one term Mr. Riches has served as school director, and for two terms has been a member of the city council of Silverton. In public office he is always prompt and faithful in the execution of his duties, and his administration has been business-like, systematic and progressive, giving general satisfaction to the many patrons of the office.

HORACE E. BICKERS. The superintendent of the state reform school in Marion county is well qualified for his responsible position, years of practical business experience and close association with men in many walks of life having mellowed his judgment and turned his thoughts into humanitarian and common sense lines. Horace E. Bickers was born on his father's donation claim within six miles of the reform school, September 26, 1856, a son of Henry C. Bickers, who was born in the state of Virginia in 1820.

Henry C. Bickers was reared in Virginia and Kentucky, and as a young man removed to New Orleans, where he learned and followed the trade of ship carpenter. In the southern city he married Mary Carter, who died four years later, leaving three children, all of whom died young. In order to reach the western coast Mr. Bickers joined the government service and came across the plains with a caravan, stopping for a short time in the mines of California. His trip was not altogether satisfactory, for he encountered much difficulty with the Indians, and was wounded while attempting to defend himself during an attack. In 1851 he came to Marion county, Ore., and worked at the carpenter's trade, and in 1853 took up a claim of four hundred acres about two miles east of Marion. The same year he was married to Mrs. Malinda Brown, widow of Thomas J. Brown, who crossed the plains with her former husband in 1852. Mr. Brown's death on the plains was one of the sad occurrences which marked the early emigration to the west, and his wife proved one of the heroic pioneer women upon whose shoulders fell so much of the responsibility in the early days. Alone she resumed her journey with her four children, and coming to Marion county, she started a boarding house in Jefferson, of which she was the amiable hostess at the time of her second marriage. After his marriage Mr. Bickers continued to live on his claim, and there he and Jacob Conser built the first three reapers in this part of the state, and the first ones on the coast.

The elder Mr. Bickers was variously connected with the affairs in the county, and for many years derived a substantial income from cutting and sawing logs. He also engaged in carpentering and building, getting the material from the timber and making lumber by hand. In 1861 he took about $30,000 worth of cattle and horses into eastern Oregon, intending to engage in an extensive stock-raising business. The severe winters of '61-'2 annihilated his hope in this direction, for out of his herd he had but one team of horses left. With this team he drove his family to Boise City, Idaho, and there engaged in mining and prospecting and also followed that occupation in different parts of that and the adjoining country. In 1869 he went into San Diego county, Cal., and discovered what is now known as the Washington Ledge in the Julian district, and the same year, with his son, spent some time in Seattle, Wash. The year 1873 found him in Alaska during the excitement of that year, and on this trip he was accompanied by his son, Horace E. Several months were spent in the mines and in the fall of '73 they returned to California, where he made his home until his death in 1893. His wife died in August, 1900, at the age of eighty-one years. She was the mother of four children by this marriage, of whom Horace E. is the second oldest. William H. died in 1882; Mary died in 1862; and Andrew J. is a resident of Waldo, Wash.

From so energetic and ambitious a father Horace E. Bickers inherits the traits that have brought about his own success. He was educated in the public schools and learned carpentering from his father, an occupation which he followed from the age of twelve to that of twenty years. He was seventeen years of age when he went to Alaska, and the experience among the miners gave him an insight which he might otherwise never have received. In 1879 he went to Pendleton, Ore., where he acceptably filled the office of clerk in the postoffice until 1886. For the following two years he engaged as an accountant, and the next occupation to which he turned his attention was merchandising in Alba. His little store was also the postoffice of the town during the three years of his residence there, after which he sold out his interests and returned to Pendleton. In 1896 he was elected recorder of Umatilla county, serving for two years, and thus launched upon the sea of politics stepped naturally into his present position as superintendent of the Oregon State Reform School, to which he was appointed in 1899, his appointment being duly confirmed by the secretary of state.

In 1881 Mr. Bickers married Miss Ida Bean, of Vancouver, Wash., and of this union there were born three children, of whom Horace E., Jr., died in infancy; Hazel, who after graduating from the public schools of Pendleton, took a special course of music at Eugene, Ore., and is now attending the conservatory of music at Portland; and Mabel, also a student, is living with her parents. Mr. Bickers has always been a very active man in the Republican party, and fraternally is associated with various orders, namely: The Masons, belonging to Pendleton Lodge No. 52, A. F. & A. M.; and Pendleton chapter, R. A. M.; is a member of Pendleton Camp, W. O. W.; the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Pendleton; and Damon Lodge No. 4, K. P. Both himself and wife are identified with the Eastern Star.

MARTIN R. SETTLEMIER, who is engaged in agricultural pursuits in Marion county, was born in Montgomery county, Ill., March 24, 1846. His educational privileges were those afforded by the common schools of the frontier and were somewhat limited because his services were needed upon the farm. At the age of eighteen years his father allowed the sons to begin farming on their own account. The family had come to Oregon in 1850 and when Martin R. reached the age mentioned his father gave him two hundred acres of the original donation claim adjoining Mount Angel on the west. He also secured fifty acres more, and now has a valuable farm of two hundred and fifty acres, the greater part of which is under a high state of cultivation. There are altogether one hundred and fifty acres planted to cereals and other crops, while the remainder is devoted to pasture land. He has twenty-three acres planted to hops, which is becoming a very valuable product of the northwest. He makes a specialty of raising cattle and draft horses, and has some very fine specimens of Belgian horses and Durham cattle. In the various branches of his business he is meeting with creditable success. The greater part of his land was unimproved when he took possession, being covered with brush, but this he cleared away and transformed the tract into productive fields. He also built his residence, two barns and the other necessary outbuildings for the shelter of grain and stock, and today the farm is one of the best improved in this section of the county. Mr. Settlemier's possessions are not limited to this property, however, for he is the owner of two lots and residences in Portland and a house on east Davis street in East Portland. He also owns some lots in Astoria, Ore.

About two miles from his present home, in 1872, Mr. Settlemier was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Simmons, who was born in October, 1855, on Howell Prairie in Oregon. Her father, John H. Simmons, was a native of Indiana, and in 1845 made the long and wearisome journey overland to the northwest with his parents. His father secured a donation claim on Howell Prairie in Marion county, thus becoming the owner of six hundred and forty acres of valuable land. The father of Mrs. Settlemier resides about two miles northeast of our subject's home.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Martin R. Settlemier have been born nine children: Etta, now the wife of J. B. Palmer, who has two sons and one daughter, Hazel, George and Jesse, and is living in the Yakima district of Washington; Flora, who is assistant postmistress in Mount Angel; Elmer, who carries on farming on the old homestead, is married and has one daughter, Minnie; Mamie, deceased; Eva, the wife of C. Janz, a farmer on Howell Prairie; and Mary, Sadie, Perry and Adelpia Eldorene, all at home.

In his political views Mr. Settlemier is an earnest Republican who has studied closely the issues and questions of the day, and gives a stalwart support to the principles in which he believes. For one term he served as clerk and for many terms as school director, the cause of education finding in him a warm friend. In his farm work he is prospering through methods which always bring success, and his well improved property with its splendid buildings and highly cultivated fields forms one of the most attractive features of the landscape.

PETER A. FINSETH. The largest and finest mercantile establishment in Polk county is universally conceded to be the Bee Hive, operated and owned by the firm of Nordby & Finseth, the latter of whom is the general manager and largest stockholder. This store, which has been an upbuilding factor of Dallas since 1899, has been located in the Odd Fellows Building since 1900, and has quarters 32x80 feet in ground dimensions. The firm has a comprehensive understanding of the needs of a cosmopolitan community, and carries a complete and up-to-date line of dry goods, notions, shoes and clothing, and in its attitude toward a large and appreciative trade observes the courtesy, tact and consideration invariably associated with permanent success and uninterrupted retention of patronage.

Financially speaking, P. A. Finseth began at the bottom round of the ladder four years ago, and has since worked his way up to a substantial mercantile position. He is one of the many Scandinavians who have found a practical field of effort in the northwest, and who is appreciated because of his many fine national characteristics. Born in Trondhjen, Norway, July 19, 1867, he was reared in his native town until his fifteenth year, and attended the public schools, his emigration to America taking place in 1882. He located in Sioux City, Iowa, and inaugurated his mercantile career as a clerk in a dry goods store, remaining in that capacity for five years. In 1887 he shifted his residence to Portland, Ore., and engaged as a clerk for the proprietors of the Farmers' and Mechanics' store, two years later being promoted to the management of the linen, drapery and blanket departments. In 1894 he became a salesman in the linen department of the store of Olds, Wortman & King, and in August, 1898, resigned his position to start up in business for himself in Portland. On Morrison street, between First and Second streets, Portland, he established the Crescent, a well-equipped and modern dry-goods store, of which he was sole proprietor until January, 1899. He then started up business in Dallas on Main street, but has since removed his stock to the Odd Fellows building.

In Sioux City, Iowa, Mr. Finseth married Anna Paulson, a native of the vicinity of Christiania, Norway, and who is the mother of two interesting children, Leif and Roy. Mr. Finseth is a member of the Board of Trade, and in his political affiliation is a Democrat, and fraternally is identified with the Woodmen of the World. He is possessed of a broad knowledge of the mercantile business, and his friends and associates predict a continuation of his present success.

THOMAS HOWE. No more genial personality is included among the citizens of Mount Angel than Thomas Howe, and it is doubtful if any furnish more frequent glimpses of the bright and happy side of life. Mr. Howe is possessed of fine business ability, has substantially launched himself in the commercial life of the town, has invested in real estate, and has established the reputation of being one of the best dog fanciers and trainers in the United States.

In Mr. Howe is found a refutation of the generally accepted belief that the English are devoid of humor, and lack effervescence and buoyancy of spirit. He was born in Dorsetshire, England, June 22, 1842, his father, Thomas, and his mother, Phillows (Garrett) Howe, being natives of the same shire. The elder Thomas was a farmer during the greater part of his active life, and he was also a contractor for large excavations and kindred work. He lived to the advanced age of eighty-eight, his wife having died at the age of eighty-two. Eighteen children came into this home, fourteen sons and four daughters, of whom Thomas, Jr., is the fifteenth in the order of birth.

As soon as he had completed his education in the public and parish school in Dorsetshire, Thomas Howe entered upon an independent existence as game-keeper for John Tatchell Bulling, in the parish of Marshwood, Dorset. He was also game-keeper for Lady Rool, whose employ he left to enter that of Hon. Captain William Hood Waldron, of Dunchideock, Devonshire, England. He lived for a time in South Wales, and at the age of thirty-two began to work as porter and ticket collector for the Great Western Taffail Railroad. In 1875 Mr. Howe came to Canada, and after a residence of five years in Orillia, returned to England for nine months. Again locating in Canada, he soon after came to the United States, and at Salem, Ore., started the dog kennels which have since made him famous. He raises pointers, setters, and brake dogs in large numbers, always has them on hand, and ships them to all parts of the United States, some of them being sent beyond the borders of the country. In connection with his kennels Mr. Howe owns and manages a furniture store in Mount Angel, and also handles buggies, hacks, and agricultural implements. He also carries guns and ammunition, all manner of sporting goods, as well as pianos and organs. He has demonstrated his faith in the future of this section by investing heavily in real estate, and besides the two acres in connection with his home, owns the store building called the Howe Block. He is a Democrat in political preference, and is a member of the Episcopal church.

In Dorsetshire, England, April 3, 1863, Mr. Howe married Emma Rawlins, a native of the same shire, and whose father, Robert Rawlins, died on his farm in Dorsetshire at the age of forty-four. His wife died in 1883 at the age of seventy-three years.

Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Howe, of whom Charlotte, the eldest child, is the wife of George Applin, living in Dorsetshire, England; they have two children, Flossie and Alice. Frank is a resident of Portland, and is representative agent for the Union Metallic Cartridge Company, and the Remington Arms Company; Frank won the cup and gold medal from the mayor in 1902; he married Clara Rustin and they have four children: Florence, Wesley, Fred and Harry. Alice is the wife of T. R. Ryan of Mount Angel; has five children, Mary, Edward, Agnes, Leon, Frank; and Emma, the youngest daughter, is living at home. Two of the sons, Fred and Walter, are deceased. Mr. Howe has many friends in Salem, in Mount Angel, and in different parts of the state, and it is needless to say that he occupies an altogether enviable place in the social and business life of his home town.

JOHN JAMES COLWELL. When Scotland denied religious liberty to thousands of her loyal citizens, near-by Ireland offered an asylum to such as desired to avail themselves of her more rational but less prosperous conditions. Among those who, smarting under their years of persecution, took themselves and children to the sheltering country, were the paternal grandparents of John James Colwell, a retired farmer and business man of Falls City. The grandparents settled in County Cavan, Ulster, Ireland, and here John James Colwell, Sr., was born, reared, and eventually married a bonnie Scotch-Irish lassie by the name of Mary Ann Glenn. Miss Glenn was born in Ireland, of Presbyterian stock, and her father, William, born in Scotland, came to Canada at an early day, settling near Hamilton, where he died at an advanced age. From Ireland John James Colwell, Sr., came on a sailing vessel to Canada about 1834, locating on a farm near Toronto, where he farmed with moderate success until removing to St. Paul, Minn., in 1864. He and his good wife reared a family of eleven children, six sons and five daughters, and besides giving them as good an education as his circumstances permitted, he left a nice little estate at the time of his death in 1899, at the age of about seventy years.

Born twenty miles north of Toronto, Canada, July 12, 1849, John James Colwell was fifteen years of age when he went with the family to Minnesota, and in 1870 he entered the University of Minnesota, where he remained five years. In 1875 he started out to make his own living in the world, and as a mail carrier in Minneapolis, delivered the missives of Uncle Sam for about a year. In 1876 he went to Texas and engaged in school teaching twenty-two miles south of San Antonio, some time later turning his attention to stock-raising near that city. He remained in Texas seven years, and in 1884 returned to Minnesota and worked on his father's farm until 1886. He had long desired to see the far west, so he came to Portland, and as a means of livelihood engaged with the street car company as carpenter for about a year, when he returned east, and 1887 found him filling the position of foreman and check clerk of the floating gang at the steel mills at Carbondale, Pa., and two years later he again made the trip across the country to Oregon, locating on a farm adjoining Falls City. In 1891 he abandoned farming and in Falls City, worked at teaming for two years, and in 1893 engaged in a general merchandise business. He was fairly successful as a merchant, and in 1902 closed out his business, and prepared to take the rest of his life easy. That he is succeeding in his expectations is evident from his disposal of his time, for he has just returned from a delightful trip of three months to California and Texas, in which latter state he still has interests.

While living in Carbondale, Pa., Mr. Colwell married, September 27, 1890, Cora M. Baker, who was born in Fell township, Lackawanna county, Pa., July 17, 1870. Mrs. Colwell is a daughter of Jackson Baker, also born in Pennsylvania, and who, after many years of farming in his native state, came to Oregon in 1891. Mr. Baker located on property one mile east of Falls City, where he is now living with his wife, formerly Sarah Ann Montgomery, who is now seventy-eight years of age.

Mr. Colwell is a Republican in politics, but has never sought official honors. He has always been an earnest promoter of education, and in this capacity served for a term on the school board. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has contributed generously towards its support.

LOUIS H. PFANDHOEFER, M. D. Falls City is fortunate in the possession of so erudite and successful a practitioner as Dr. Louis H. Pfandhoefer, who came here in 1898 after many years of practical experience in Buffalo, N. Y. Although devoting his energies to all branches of medicinal science he has made a specialty of obstetrics, and has already demonstrated his skill in this direction. That he is favorably impressed with his adopted town and county is evidenced by the fact that he has invested in considerable property and besides a timber claim of one hundred and sixty acres, owns residence property consisting of five acres, on the banks of the creek. He is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in political affiliation is independent.

As his name indicates, Dr. Pfandhoefer is of Teutonic ancestry. He was born in the Rhine province of Germany, January 7, 1853. His family had long been known in the locality, his father, Louis, being a native of the Rhine country, as were also several of his forefathers. His mother, formerly Margaret Wusthoff, was born near there, so that his paternal and maternal associations are connected with one of the most historic and fertile parts of the empire. Louis Pfandhoefer, Sr., was a blacksmith by trade, and was also an excellent business man, so that his combined abilities resulted in a substantial little property. He was able to give his three sons and six daughters more than an average education.

Louis H. is the seventh child of this family, and he passed from the public schools to the historic Bonn University, from the portals of which have stepped forth some of the most brilliant men. However, his university career was destined to be short-lived, for, owing to the death of his father, he was obliged to return home at the end of the first term. In 1873 he entered the normal school, and thereafter engaged in educational work in Germany until coming to the United States in 1879.

In America Dr. Pfandhoefer located in Bayonne City, Hudson county, N. J., where he taught school for two years, and in the winter of 1881 changed his field of endeavor to Buffalo, N. Y. While teaching in the latter city he became interested in medicine, and in 1883, entered the Buffalo Medical College, from which he was duly graduated in the class of 1886. Thereafter he engaged in practice in Buffalo, but by 1898 found that his health was failing, and that a change of climate was imperative. He therefore came to Oregon, and for seven months rested and enjoyed life in Portland, coming then to his present home in Falls City.

In 1881 the doctor was united in marriage in Buffalo, N. Y., with Annie H. Winkelman, who was born in Buffalo, although her father, Charles, was a native of Germany. A tanner by trade, Mr. Winkelman was successful in both Germany and America, in the latter country plying his trade in the New England states and in Buffalo, where his death occurred at the age of fifty-eight. Five children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Pfandhoefer, of whom Louis, Jr., Charles and Johannas are deceased, while Henry and Violet are living at home.

HON. LEE LAUGHLIN, who, as a youth of fourteen, crossed the plains in 1847 with the largest caravan which had as yet raised the apprehension of the Indians, and paved the way for succeeding home and fortune seekers, has been substantially identified with the growth of Yamhill county, and has contributed to its agricultural, political and general well-being. The Laughlins, and there are many belonging to this special family, have proved themselves pioneers in the highest sense of that important term, and one and all have left the impress of strong and rugged personalities on whatsoever they have found to do in the great northwest.

James Laughlin, the paternal grandfather of Lee, was born in South Carolina, and participated in the Revolutionary war at the battle of Cowpens. He was a farmer by occupation, and when a man of middle age, with his family, removed to Hopkins county, Ky., where his death occurred. He married Rachel Dalrymple, who died in Missouri at the age of seventy-five years. Of the large family of children born into the family of James Laughlin, Samuel, the father of Lee, was the oldest, and was born in the Pendleton district, South Carolina, December 2, 1791. He was ten years of age when the family fortunes were shifted to Kentucky, and he remained on the paternal farm in Hopkins county until his twenty-second year. About 1814 he began to have pioneering inclinations, and, saddling his horse, started forth on a journey to what is now the great city of St. Louis. Arriving at the then small town, then a French settlement, he was offered five acres of land in the heart of the now busiest section of the city for his horse, but refused the offer as inadequate. In Franklin county he purchased a farm, but a high-water washout induced him to move north into Lincoln county. Reports from the journal of Patrick Gass, who accompanied Lewis and Clark, filled him with the fever of unrest, and he disposed of his Missouri farm, and joined the largest train that, up to that time, had ever braved the dangers of the plains. There were twenty-nine wagons under Capt. Joseph Magone, and besides Samuel and his brother, James, there were eleven Laughlins in the party. No braver or more determined band ever carried the flag of civilization before them, nor did any have more typical and varied pioneering experiences. Starting on their way April 19, 1847, they arrived at Wapato lake November 1, of the same year. In January, 1848, Mr. Laughlin took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, three miles north of Yamhill, and there engaged in general farming and stock-raising until his death, June 22, 1869. A former Democrat, he left his party on account of its slavery attitude, and died firm in the faith of Republicanism. He was a member of the Baptist Church.

While his father was living on a farm in Lincoln county, Mo., Lee Laughlin was born January 17, 1833. His expedition across the plains, at the age of fourteen, was both interesting and developing, and so imbued had he become with western ideas and chances, that at the age of sixteen, during the gold fever of '49, he went down into California, on the Trinity river, and engaged in mining for about three months. He was fairly successful on the Sacramento and Trinity rivers, making sometimes as high as $150 per day. With his little hoard he returned to Oregon in January, 1850, and the next year made another trip overland to the mines of the New Eldorado. As soon as age permitted, he took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres, three miles north of Yamhill, and engaged in farming thereon until 1864. In the meantime, Mr. Laughlin had realized the importance of education, and as opportunity offered, had applied himself at the public schools, also attending the Pacific University for a couple of years. For two terms he applied this knowledge as an educator in Yamhill county. After disposing of his Yamhill county farm he removed to Horseshoe Bend, near Boise City, Idaho, and engaged in the hotel business for a couple of years, and in 1866, returned to Yamhill county, and opened up a general merchandise business in North Yamhill. As the largest merchant in that section, he catered to an increasing trade for nine years, his affability and business ability enlarging both his capital and his list of friends. After retiring from business, in 1876, Mr. Laughlin paid a visit to the east for a few months, but finding the need for active occupation, returned to the store the same year, remaining there until 1886, when he permanently retired from business activity.

The business aptitude and progressive spirit of Mr. Laughlin has created a demand for his services in connection with many undertakings in this county. He is credited with being one of the principal organizers of the Republican party in Oregon, and since then has closely and actively watched the trend of Republican affairs. His first definite service was in 1860, when he was elected county assessor, and ten years later, in 1870, he was nominated to the state legislature. However, the Democrats being in the ascendancy, his seat, with that of others, was severely contested, and the political plums passed into the keeping of the opposition. In 1874, Mr. Laughlin was duly elected to the state legislature from Yamhill county, and so satisfactory were his services for the best interests of the people, that his re-election followed in 1880. During the last session he was chairman of the committee on public lands, and was also instrumental in securing the erection of the State Insane Asylum. Other offices were duly maintained with credit by this broad and liberal minded citizen, including that of school director and clerk for many years, and mayor of North Yamhill for a couple of terms. As a politician, he has won additional respect and confidence from those who placed him in office, and his services have invariably been accompanied by substantial and popular results. Mention of the creditable war record is due so valiant an Indian fighter, he having served in the Yakima Indian war of 1855. In 1887, Mr. Laughlin was one of the organizers of the McMinnville National Bank, and was a member of the first board of directors, and first vice-president, which position he held until the death of Judge Cows, in 1897, when he succeeded him as president, holding the position at the present time.

October 8, 1856, Mr. Laughlin was united in marriage with Emma Stewart, who was born in Putnam county, Ohio, and whose father, Benjamin E., crossed the plains in 1847, locating in North Yamhill. Mrs. Laughlin, who died February 11, 1901, left no children, but homeless children have at times found shelter and care under the hospitable Laughlin roof, and have grown to maturity under the most kindly and parental influences. Mr. Laughlin is a man of broad information and most liberal ideas, and his services to his adopted state are of an enduring and highly appreciated nature.

FREDERICK SCHWAB. The warehouse business of Frederick Schwab is contributing to the financial stability of Mount Angel, the owner being one of its most enterprising citizens. He embarked upon his present occupation in 1893, and has since dealt in grain, hay and potatoes, making a specialty of the latter. Other interests also claim the time and attention of Mr. Schwab, and he owns a farm of sixty acres two and a half miles east of the town, ten acres of which are within the corporation limits, although not yet laid out in lots. He has built a fine residence, and he also owns the warehouse and lot. Mr. Schwab takes a keen interest in the general affairs of this town, and may be counted on to meet any just demand upon his resources. Although independent in politics, he has held important city offices, including membership in the city council, and three terms as recorder.

The early life of Mr. Schwab was spent in Johnson county, Iowa, where he was born November 1, 1863, and whence he removed with his parents to Harrison county in 1866. His father, Louis, was born at Frankfort, Germany, and, immigrating to the United States in the first flush of manhood, located in Philadelphia, Pa., and engaged in the meat-market business. At the expiration of five years he removed to Iowa, settling on a farm near Blairstown, Benton county, where he remained until 1866. He then located in Harrison county, purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, and ten years later, in 1876, removed to Crawford county. In 1881 he became a resident of Oregon, and near Mount Angel bought one hundred and fifty acres, one and a half miles east of the town, and where he died in 1882. His wife, Josephine (Winters) Schwab, was born in Baden, Germany, and died in Oregon in 1893, at the age of seventy-one years. She was the mother of five sons and four daughters, of whom Frederick is sixth in order of birth.

As a boy Mr. Schwab accompanied his parents in their migratory agricultural life, and his education suffered somewhat from the uncertain conditions. Nevertheless, he was apt and quick, and has all his life been one of those who learn more from observation and direct contact with men and affairs, than from books. The business in which he is now engaged was his first attempt to earn an independent livelihood, and his success is proof of the wisdom of his selection. Since coming to Mount Angel he has married Mary Mayer, who was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, December 2, 1869, and whose father, Joseph, is at present living on the family homestead in the German principality. Mrs. Schwab came to America to visit her brother Joseph in 1890, and while here met and married her husband. Six children have been born of this union: Mary, Gertrude, Joseph, Bertha, Agnes and Paul. The family are members of the Catholic Church.

THOMAS G. HOPKINS. A valuable addition to the society of the western state has been Thomas G. Hopkins, with the many admirable characteristics that bespeak his nationality, and who, for a number of years has been an estimable citizen of Oregon, through his substantial business enterprises and shrewd judgment becoming a leader in the financial circles of the city of Albany. He is now at the head of the Albany Hardware Company, a business which was begun about 1885, and has since grown to remunerative and satisfactory proportions, becoming an incorporated concern in 1901, and through its successful operations adding much to the prestige of the city.

Thomas has been a family name for many generations in the Hopkins household, the grandfather and father both bearing the name. Both were born in Dartford, County Kent, England, the elder man emigrating to America, settling near Fond du Lac, Wis., where he was followed by his son in 1857. The grandfather followed chair manufacturing, while the father engaged in the hardware business in the city of Fond du Lac, continuing profitably in the same until 1891, and now living retired in that city at the age of seventy-nine years. He married Mary Wikes, also a native of County Kent, England, where she was born in 1812, the daughter of William Wikes, who later settled in Wisconsin. At her death she was the mother of six children, four daughters and two sons, all of whom, except one son, are still living.

The birth of Thomas Hopkins of this review occurred November, 1852, and he was the second of his father's children. He was reared in the state of his father's adoption and educated in the public schools of Fond du Lac. At the age of nineteen years he was apprenticed to a tinner, remaining with him until 1872, when he went to Green Bay, Wis. After three years he returned to Fond du Lac, and passed the ensuing two years. In 1877 he severed his connection with Wisconsin, coming to California. For a short time he worked at his trade in San Francisco. In July, of the same year, he came to Portland, Oregon, and after a year's successful prosecution of his trade in that city he was made second foreman of the firm of Hexter May & Co., with whom he remained for three years. In 1881 he came to Albany and entered the employ of W. C. Tweedale, remaining for two years as an employe, when he purchased an interest in the business, the firm being then Tweedale & Co. This co-partnership was continued for eighteen months, when Mr. Hopkins sold out and began business for himself in the hardware line. From 1890 he had a partner in the person of his brother, H. J. Hopkins, who died in 1901. He has now one of the largest hardware stores in Albany, carrying a complete line of all articles to be found in an establishment of this nature. He conducts also a plumbing and tinning shop.

The marriage of Mr. Hopkins occurred in Salem, in May, 1883, and united him with Cora Reily, a native of that city. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and of the Alco Club.

EDWARD ANGUS McPHERSON. The position of first warden of the state penitentiary is now (1903) being acceptably filled by E. A. McPherson, a native of Salem, Ore., born October 13, 1866, the son of W. A. McPherson, one of the progressive and able pioneers of 1852, who left the imprint of his strong personality upon the course of events in the early history. The father was born in North Carolina and in his native state became associated with newspaper work; but, feeling his ability to help in the up-building of a new country, he accepted the hard lot of a pioneer, and in 1852 crossed the plains and located near Scio, Linn county, Ore. He first engaged in farming, persevering amid the discouragements and trying conditions of those primitive days and succeeding in his work.

Some time after he located in Albany and was later elected state printer, his death occurring about 1892, in Portland. Besides E. A. McPherson of this sketch, there were the following children: Cassius, who died in Salem; Ella, the wife of John M. Lewis, treasurer of Multnomah county; Leon, of Portland; Kate, the wife of W. S. Weeks, who has charge of the supply department of the Northern Pacific Terminal Company, of Portland; Guy, of Portland; and Pearl, also of that city.

The early education of E. A. McPherson was received in the common schools of the state, after which he entered Willamette University. Upon the completion of his school course he entered the State Prison and for three years acted as guard, winning the confidence of the officials of that institution. He then located in Portland and became a clerk in the employ of the Moyer Clothing Company, with whom he remained for six years, working under Ben Selling. April 1, 1903, he received the appointment to his present position. While a resident of Portland Mr. McPherson was president of the Retail Clerks' Association and secretary of the Trades Council, in which discharge of duty he manifested the same thoroughness which has distinguished his entire career.

February 28, 1893, Mr. McPherson was united in marriage with Miss Carrie B. Hart, who was born in Wisconsin, in 1876, and two sons have been born to them, Oscar and Donald. In his fraternal relations Mr. McPherson is a member of the Masonic order, Mt. Tabor Lodge, A. F. & A. M., and also belongs to Portland Lodge No. 142, B. P. O. E. Politically, he casts his ballot with the Democratic party.

JAMES DANNALS. Formerly engaged in the furniture business in Albany, James Dannals had a reputation for fair dealing and honest worth not exceeded by any of the other pioneers of 1851. He is one of those who came to the west with a stanch belief in its future, and his success in the various occupations in which he was engaged strengthened his conviction that Oregon is a place par excellence for homes and substantial fortunes. Of an old and honored New York family, Mr. Dannals was born on a farm near Rochester, Monroe county, N. Y. His father, Richard, a tanner by trade, was a native of the same state, as was also his mother, Lucy (Clough) Dannals, who was born in Onondaga county, and died in Rochester.

As one of the three children to attain maturity in his father's family of five, James Dannals remained at home until his twenty-first year, in the meantime performing his share towards the general support. He learned the cabinet-makers' trade in Rochester, N. Y., and thus equipped for a livelihood removed to near Freeport, Ill., in 1849. While plying his trade he heard a great deal about gold mining on the coast, and contracting the gold fever himself he crossed the plains in 1850 with horse teams, starting out in March, and arriving at his destination on the American river in California after about six months on the plains. That he had a very exalted idea of mining is hard to believe, for in the spring of 1851 he crossed the mountains to Oregon with pack mules, arriving in Corvallis in June, 1851. Here he worked at his trade of building in partnership with Bushrod Wilson, and in 1853 took up a donation claim east of Coburg, in Lane county, which he improved to some extent, engaging also in building and contracting. Four years later he started a furniture business in Eugene, both manufacturing and dealing, but five years later disposed of his store and again turned his attention to farming. This farm was subsequently traded for a farm near Albany, Linn county, which he lived on until starting his furniture business in 1876. He is now living retired in Albany.

In Linn county Mr. Dannals married Louise Clover, daughter of Paul Clover, and who was born in Indiana, settling in Linn county after crossing the plains with her parents in 1852. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dannals, of whom Oscar Paul is a blacksmith in Albany; Lucy is now Mrs. Worth Huston, the sheriff of Linn county; Rosa died in Albany; Frank is a painter in Albany; Daisy is now Mrs. Allen of Washington; Charles is engaged in painting in Albany; and Laura is living at home. Mr. Dannals is a very determined Republican, and has always stanchly upheld the principles and issues of his chosen party. He served as councilman for one term and has held other offices of trust in the community. His religious relations are with the Presbyterian Church, of which he is an elder.

JOHN H. LINES. Among the pioneers of 1853 who have long since passed beyond the ken of those who knew and valued them in life, is John H. Lines, recalled as one of the men of southern birth who reflected great credit upon the agricultural and political development of Linn county. Born April 21, 1803, in South Carolina and removing with his parents to near Louisville, Ky., he was reared on a farm, and with a common school education and plenty of inherited ability and determination, settled in Louisville as a young man and engaged in the drug business. At an early day he removed to Lee county, Iowa, where he owned a large farm devoted to general farming and took a prominent part in local politics. For seven and a half years he was clerk of Lee county. Disposing of his Lee county farm in 1853, he brought his wife and four children to Oregon by way of the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco, and in Linn county, Ore., three miles south of Albany, located a claim of three hundred and twenty acres. This he improved to some extent, and after selling it at a profit invested in five hundred and forty acres east of Knox Butte. As in Iowa, his reliable and substantial traits of character, and oft-evinced interest in the public welfare received practical recognition from his fellow-townsmen, and he served as county clerk seven and a half years. From his first voting days he was a staunch Republican, but in local affairs confined himself rather to the personal character and principles of the respective candidates than to the issues of the party which they represented.

On November 17, 1842, in Lee county, Iowa, Mr. Lines married Martha M. Sample, who was born in Huntington county, Pa., February 11, 1824, and died in Oregon, September 8, 1902, having survived her husband thirty-four years. Mr. Lines died on his claim, October 21, 1868, leaving behind him a legacy of good will, success, and honor, and the esteem of all with whom he had ever been associated. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Lines, of whom Margaret, the oldest child, died in early youth; Mont D., a farmer, lives in eastern Oregon; Perry C. died in Linn county, September 2, 1887; Virginia is the wife of L. C. Marshall of Albany; Lillie is the wife of Dr. L. Foley, of Lebanon, Ore.; Frank is a farmer in Linn county; Cyrus died in early childhood; and Fred E. is engaged in farming in Linn county.

PAUL DARST. For the history of Paul Darst, one of the most interesting and worthy of the early Oregon pioneers, we herewith acknowledge indebtedness to the able article prepared by his brother, William, at the request of members of the Oregon Pioneer Association. As the sole survivor of a little party of three who traversed the plains comparatively alone in 1847, and as the later associate of his brother in many of his worthy undertakings, Mr. Darst is qualified to speak disinterestedly and to the point, and he is probably the only one of whom

Paul Darst was born in Gallia county, Ohio, September 28, 1819, and when eight years of age removed with his father, David, to Hocking county, of the same state, going in the fall of 1838 to Vermilion county, Ill. In the fall of 1840 they took up their residence in Henry county, Iowa, and when Paul was twenty-one years of age he started out to make his own living at farm work, continuing thus until the spring of 1847. During a portion of this time he worked on farms in Dade county, Mo., returning then to Iowa, where, in the spring of 1847, he prepared to cross the plains, accompanied by his brother William and John Morley. This small party, with their one wagon and team of oxen, started away from home and kindred April 7, 1847, and, continuing their way westward to within a few miles of St. Joseph, Mo., there camped on a river called One Hundred and Two. The 7th of May they crossed the Missouri river into the Indian country, and after traveling for a few days joined what was known as the Davidson party, of whom Albert Davidson was the capable guide, he having been to Oregon on a previous occasion. In the company were about forty-seven wagons, and Paul Darst and his friends joined them, traveling as far as Ash Hollow. There the company divided into three parts, Mr. Darst and his two companions and wagon becoming a part of the Louisa company, consisting of seventeen wagons. Arriving at the Powder river, the Louisa party also divided, and the Darst party became members of a small company of four wagons. Crossing over the Cascade mountains, they came to the new Barlow road, which had but recently been opened to the public, the toll on this thoroughfare being $5 for a wagon and team, and ten cents a head for stock. This little party arrived on the Clackamas river, a short distance below Oregon City, September 7, 1847, just four months from the time of leaving St. Joseph, on the Missouri river, and five months from the time of leaving Mount Pleasant, Henry county, Iowa.

After resting on the Clackamas river for two or three days, the four wagons proceeded up the Willamette valley on the east side, and along what might be called the mountain road. They passed the present site of Silverton, in the eastern part of Marion county, and on to the Waldo Hills country near the town of Sublimity. Here the party broke up, and as there was plenty of vacant land all around in this section nearly every man availed himself of the opportunity and became an independent landowner. Mr. Darst located on the claim which he afterward sold to George W. Hunt for $100, and the same became famous for its fine stock, and was later the site of the Whiteaker postoffice. This early settler took part in the Abaqua river war, which contest has often been questioned, but which, according to an eye witness, William Darst, was quite a momentous struggle. In February or March, 1848, in the eastern part of Marion county, and on the Abaqua river, the Indians became very troublesome, and Paul Darst and some of his companions went forth to meet them in mortal combat. William Darst and his friends arrived at the home of John Warnock too late to engage in the conflict, and were unable to follow because the deep snow covered up their tracks. When the party returned they reported that the Indians had been routed, some being killed, while the Indian wives and children were taken prisoners, as were also the horses and cattle. However, this wholesale capture was merely a ruse, and was used to induce the Indians to permanently abandon the county, whereupon their wives, children and cattle were turned over to them. To this day, in the estimation of William Darst, they have never since interfered with the peace of mind of any of the residents of Marion county. The whole party followed the red men to the Santiam river and saw them cross over, never to return.

Until 1849 Paul Darst worked on his original Oregon claim, and then went to the gold mines of California, making the journey on a sailing vessel, for passage upon which he paid $60 in the steerage from Portland to San Francisco. On the Yuba river he worked in the mines until about October 1st, and then, owing to impaired health, he returned to Oregon with about $1,500. Thereafter he worked on his claim until the passage of the donation law by congress, and he then sold his land, and in the vicinity purchased three hundred and twenty acres of deeded land. This was the eastern half of the claim of David Simpson and wife, about two and one-half miles north of Sublimity, in Marion county. Here he started in a second time to make his agricultural fortune, a task appreciated only by those who have cleared land in Oregon and assiduously worked for its cultivation. He was also a carpenter of much ability, and in connection with the management of his farm accomplished considerable building in his neighborhood and in California. For some years he was also engaged in teaching school in the neighborhood where he resided. In 1852 he was elected assessor of Marion county, and according to his brother William, assessed the whole of the county without any help whatsoever. This was an enormous task even in those early days, in order to make the return in the time required by law. In 1856 he volunteered in the Yakima Indian war, and of his service Col. George K. Shiel says: "Paul Darst enlisted about the 1st of January, 1856, in the second company raised by Marion county, E. J. Harding captain, for the recruited battalion of the First Regiment of Oregon Mounted Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1855-56. Col. Thomas Cornelius commanding." Mr. Darst remained with the command until it was mustered out of service some time in May, 1856, and, according to the colonel, had a very hard time of it. Their extremity may be imagined when it is known that for two or three weeks they were obliged to subsist solely upon horse meat and wild onions.

After the war Mr. Darst returned to his farm and combined farming and carpentering, and in 1857 was again elected assessor of Marion county. In the meantime the country had grown to such an extent and was so much more thickly settled that it was impossible for him to cover the whole county in the time required by law. Up to this time he had been a staunch Democrat but with the beginning of the Civil war he espoused the cause of the north. October 24, 1861, he married Cindarella Phillips, a young woman of about twenty, and together they commenced housekeeping on the donation claim. Mrs. Darst was not blessed with good health and in the fall of 1866 she went with her husband to California, remaining for about a year. Returning to the Oregon farm all went well until the 1st of April, 1874, when Mr. Darst was stricken with apoplexy. Following the custom of his time for all complaints the physician bled his patient in the arm and brought on paralysis of the right side. Gradually Mr. Darst grew worse, continually lost strength and at last failed to respond to remedies administered. April 23d his spirit left its earthly house, and he was buried not far distant from where he had come and gone and labored for so many years in the Downing settlement, about fourteen miles from Salem. A short time after his death a son was born to his wife, and thus three children were left fatherless, and a wife was left without her chief consoler and greatest strength. The son was called Charles Paul, and at present he is managing the home farm of five hundred and twenty acres for his mother. Of the daughters, Fidelia, is the postmistress of Whiteaker, and Parthenia is living at home. Mr. Darst was a man of force of character, of untiring industry and good business judgment, as evidenced by his possession of eight hundred acres of land. As reminders of a sterling pioneer, and as the possessors of abilities and admirable characteristics of their own, the household enjoys an enviable place in the community.

W. W. HALL, who has ever been found true to the trusts reposed in him in official life and who made for himself a most creditable record as county clerk of Marion county, is numbered among Oregon's native sons, his birth having occurred near the present site of Woodburn, July 25, 1805. His father, Benjamin F. Hall, one of the honored pioneers of this state, was born in Clay county, Mo., in 1826, while the grandfather, James Hall, was a native of Kentucky, whence he removed to Missouri. In 1845 he brought his family to Oregon, traveling with an ox train across the long stretches of sand and over the mountains. When the party were on the Meeks cut-off they became lost. At length they made their way to the Snake river and in November arrived in Oregon City. The grandfather secured a donation claim in Marion county near Champoeg, and improved a farm, upon which he spent his remaining days.

Benjamin F. Hall was a young man of nineteen years at the time of the emigration of the family to the northwest. When he had attained his majority he, too, secured a donation claim, comprising three hundred and twenty acres near the present site of Woodburn, and this property is still in his possession. His financial resources increased and gradually he extended the boundaries of his original tract and now has large farming interests. At one time he was the owner of fourteen hundred acres of valuable land, but this he divided with his children. He maintains his residence on the old home place and is an honored pioneer citizen seventy-six years of age, who receives the respect and high regard of all with whom he has been brought in contact. He has not only been helpful in the reclamation of the wild land for purposes of cultivation, but has also aided largely in the promotion of intellectual and moral interests of the community. He has taken an active part in educational work and in the upbuilding of the schools, and has been a liberal contributor and helpful member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In politics he is a staunch Republican. He was married March 24, 1854, to Miss Mary A. Johnson, who was born in Tazewell county, Ill., July 2, 1829, a daughter of the Rev. Neil Johnson, whose birth occurred in North Carolina, whence he removed to Kentucky and in pioneer times took up his abode in Illinois. In 1851 he brought his family to Oregon, making the overland journey, and settled near what is now the town of Woodburn. Here he secured a donation claim and his energies resulted in transforming the wild tract into a finely developed farm. In the establishment of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in this part of the state he took a most active interest and was instrumental in founding a church in Salem and other places. While he depended upon his farm to bring to him and his family a living he engaged in preaching the gospel without financial remuneration, and his influence in behalf of Christianity was widely felt. He died in McMinnville at the ripe old age of eighty-eight years, but the influence of his life and labors is yet a potent factor in the lives of many in this part of the state. His daughter, Mrs. Hall, is also a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and is now seventy-three years of age. To Mr. and Mrs. Hall were born eleven children, nine of whom reached nature years: A. D., who is a farmer at Waldo Hills, Marion county; Sophronia J., the wife of G. W. McLaughlin, who resides in Buena Vista, Polk county, Ore.; E. N., also a resident farmer of Buena Vista; E. T., who follows farming near Salem; O. L., who died at the age of twenty-eight years; William W., of this review; Mrs. Edith Haller, of Woodburn; C. C. and J. J., who follow agricultural pursuits near Woodburn.

William W. Hall remained upon the home farm until seventeen years of age. Having acquired a good preliminary education in the public schools in 1883 he entered the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, in which institution he was graduated in 1888, completing the regular five years' course with the degree of B. S. Mr. Hall then engaged in teaching, first becoming principal of the Brownsville schools. Later he was principal of the schools of Hubbard, Ore., and afterward occupied a similar position in Woodburn. He put aside his educational labors when elected county clerk in June, 1898, as a candidate of the Republican party. He received a majority of two hundred and twenty-eight and in 1900, when re-elected, his majority was increased to eight hundred and forty-nine. This fact stands in incontrovertible evidence of his promptness, system and accuracy in the discharge of his duties. No more capable official has ever served as county clerk and when he retired from the position in July, 1902, he carried with him the confidence and good will that he had taken with him to the office. He owns a farm at Woodburn and is engaged in horticultural pursuits and to some extent in stock-raising, but continues to make his home in Salem.

Mr. Hall was married in Corvallis, Ore., to Miss Clara Lilly, who was born in Benton county, this state, in 1868, a daughter of S. N. Lilly, one of the pioneer settlers who became identified with farming interests of Benton county at an early day. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Hall is blessed with one daughter, Eva. Socially Mr. Hall is connected with the Masonic fraternity of Woodburn and likewise belongs to Woodburn Lodge No. 102, I. O. O. F., of which he is a past noble grand, while both he and his wife are connected with the Rebekah degree. He is also a member of Salem Lodge No. 336, B. P. O. E.; French Prairie Camp No. 47, W. O. W.; Salem Assembly No. 87, Union Artisans; and Daniel Waldo Cabin No. 3, Native Sons of Oregon. He has always been a Republican in politics and interested in the welfare of his party. His entire life having been passed in the northwest he is imbued with the progressive spirit which has led to the wonderful development of this section of the county and is a popular and enterprising young man widely known in Salem.

EUGENIO E. GOFF. In no department of science has more searching inquiry been made during the past few years than in that relating to electricity, and although great progress and many important developments have been established, scientists are aware that but little is as yet really known of this potent force, which is destined one day to revolutionize labor, and settle complicated questions connected with our industrial conditions. One of the pioneer and most competent electricians of Oregon, E. E. Goff, of Albany, built, at Astoria, in 1887, the second electric light plant installed in the state, and has since carried on a successful business in that line. The representative of one of the early New England families, Mr. Goff was born November 6, 1858, in Bentonsport, Van Buren county, Iowa, a son of J. H. F. Goff.

A native of New York state, J. H. F. Goff was employed as a bridge builder in his younger days, constructing railroad bridges, for which he hewed the heavy timbers from the forest. He also built many saw and flouring mills. Removing to Iowa he continued his operations in that state until 1861, then removed to Nevada, and, near Lake Tahoe, he erected seven saw and shingle mills. Coming to the Pacific coast in 1870, he located in California, four miles south of San Jose, here he embarked in horticultural and agricultural pursuits, also built a four-mile flume for the Los Gatos flouring mills. Two years later he settled in San Benito county as a miller and ranchman, but subsequently returned to San Jose, and lived there until his death, in 1896, at the age of seventy-seven years. He married Hannah M. Gelatt, who was born in New York, a daughter of Richard Gelatt, a civil engineer and surveyor, who removed from New York state to Iowa. Four sons and two daughters were born of their union and of these three sons and one daughter survive, all excepting Eugenio E., the subject of this sketch, residing in San Jose, where their widowed mother still lives.

In 1861 J. H. F. Goff made his initial trip to Nevada, going by ox-teams across the plains, and returning to his Iowa home the same year by the way of the Isthmus of Panama. In 1862, taking his family with him, he again went to Nevada, being three months in accomplishing the journey to Carson City. There E. E. Goff obtained the rudiments of his education, attending the public schools until twelve years old. In 1870 he accompanied his parents to San Jose, Cal., where he continued his studies in the high school. He subsequently worked with his father on the ranch, and in the grist-mill, then learned the painter's trade, which he followed four years, being employed in Oakland and in San Jose. Entering the employ of the Pacific Coast Electrical Construction Company in 1882, he was stationed at the Union Iron Works, in San Francisco, under the instruction of Prof. N. S. Keith for a year. Mr. Goff was then sent by the company to Portland, Ore., to take charge of the newly patented electrical machinery at the Mechanic's Fair; here he made a most satisfactory and successful exhibit of electrical goods. Continuing with the same company, Mr. Goff remained in Oregon after the close of the fair as their Construction Electrical Engineer. In 1887 he installed, for J. C. Trullinger, the Astoria Electric Light Plant, of which he subsequently had charge for eighteen months.

Accepting the agency for the Heisler Electric Company, of St. Louis, Mo., Mr. Goff had headquarters in Portland, and in the next two years he sold and superintended the installation of five Central Station Plants, namely: At Pendleton, Eugene, Salem, East Portland and Albany. Purchasing a half interest in the Albany Electric Light Plant, in 1889, he has since resided here as its superintendent. In company with the late N. H. Allen, he incorporated the Albany Electric Light, Power and Telephone Company. Since taking charge of this plant, in 1889, he has made great improvements in the service, increasing its power from a fifty-two horse-power to a one hundred and sixty horse-power, which is developed by water and steam. On January 15, 1903, this plant was sold to the Albany Canal and Water Company, of which Mr. Goff is stockholder, and general superintendent and electrician. More water power and more room being needed, the plant was removed one block farther south, where a new building has been erected, and furnished with ample machinery of the most approved modern patents, including a new boiler and engine, two hundred horse-power, and horizontal twin turbine water-wheel of two hundred and sixty horse-power, also electrical machinery for both light and power.

Mr. Goff married, in Berkeley, Cal., in 1886. Clara Etta Kelsey, who was born in Oakland, Cal., October, 1858, and they have two children: Laura Adele and Alice Irene. Fraternally Mr. Goff is a member of St. John Lodge, A. F. &

P. F. Clark

A. M., and of the A. O. U. W. He belongs to the First Presbyterian Church, in which he is a deacon, and is also secretary of the Sunday school connected with it. He is one of the trustees of Albany College, in the management of which he is warmly interested. Socially he is a member of the Alco Club, and is a supporter of the Republican party.

CAPT. PETER F. CLARK. Twice has Peter F. Clark crossed the plains to the west, once with oxen and once with horses, on the way experiencing the deprivations and adventures which befell the early seekers after homes and fortunes. His life in the northwest has been successful and after a creditable war record during the Rebellion, and many years of farming and stock-raising, he may well survey with satisfaction his well directed career. A native of Greene county, Ill., he was born January 27, 1829, a son of Christopher H. and grandson of Peter H. Clark, the latter of whom was born in Virginia, on a plantation near Norfolk, December 18, 1779. The paternal great-grandfather, presumably the founder of the family in America, was a supposed second cousin of Captain William Clark, famed in Revolutionary annals, and he spent many years of his life in Virginia, and probably died there at an advanced age. His son, Peter H., was a minister in the Baptist Church, and reared a family of eleven children, of whom Christopher H. was the third oldest. He removed to Greene county, Ill., about 1824, and there died in 1833, at the age of fifty-four years.

Christopher H. Clark was born in Pittsylvania county, Va., August 10, 1806, and was reared on a farm, profiting by the religious atmosphere created by his father's calling. Although enlisting in the Black Hawk war he was never called upon to serve, and in 1822 he preceded the family to Greene county, Ill., his parents settling near him when they followed him there in 1824. He became an extensive farmer and stock-raiser, and in 1848 disposed of his lands and removed with teams to Lawrence county, Mo. There he lived until the spring of 1865, when he moved to Bourbon county, Kans., and it was there that his death occurred March 23, 1887. His marriage united him with Margaret Bell, who was born in Jefferson county, Tenn., January 23, 1809, and who came from a family distinguished in the early history of the country. Her grandfather, Francis M. Bell, was born in North Carolina, November 23, 1782, and his half brother, John Bell, was the presidential candidate on the Union ticket in 1860.

Until his twenty-first year, Peter F. Clark remained on the home farm in Missouri, and in 1850 crossed the plains with ox teams, mining for two years on the American river in California. In 1852 he returned to the east via Panama, and farmed and raised stock in Missouri with considerable success. The beginning of the Civil war found him living on a farm developed by his industry into a paying property, yet he left his interests and enlisted, May 19, 1861, in the home guards of Lawrence county, which guards had been raised principally through his instrumentality. The services of the guards were recognized by the governor of the state and were paid accordingly, Mr. Clark serving as captain about four months. For the following two months he was a member of the state militia, after which he raised Company A, Eleventh Missouri Cavalry, of which he was made first lieutenant, serving thus until the end of the war. Two companies, A and H, were detached from the regiment and sent to carry supplies to Kit Carson's regiment, and to act as escort to the governors of Arizona and New Mexico.

After the close of hostilities, Mr. Clark returned to Missouri and engaged in farming until 1874, when he again crossed the plains, this time with horse teams. Four months and thirteen days were consumed in the journey, whereas five months were lost in the former trip. Locating at Zena, Polk county, he remained there until 1876. He then purchased his present farm of one hundred and fourteen acres, all of which is under cultivation. The property is now rented and Mr. Clark is enjoying a well earned rest from the arduous toil which marked his earlier years. September 23, 1852, he was united in marriage with Margaret J. Marsh, in Lawrence county, Mo. Mrs. Clark was born in Tennessee, November 10, 1830, and died in Polk county January 28, 1900, leaving three children living and one deceased, as follows: Margaret E., who became the wife of A. W. Cochran, but is now deceased; Henrietta C., the wife of J. N. Gibson, of Pullman, Wash.; John F., an attorney-at-law of Oregon City, and Addie E., who graduated from the McMinnville College in 1889, and for three years was engaged in teaching in Polk and Yamhill counties. In 1896, Miss Clark went to Oregon City and became a grade teacher in the West Side school, later accepting a similar position in the Barclay school. After two years she became principal of the school, in which position she remained until June, 1903, when she was elected to the important position of superintendent of the Oregon City schools.

In politics a Republican, Mr. Clark has taken a keen interest in all matters of general interest, and his influence has often been felt in the councils of his party. Among other positions of trust and responsibility which he has filled, may be mentioned that of justice of the peace for twelve years, postmaster at Zena for six years, and clerk and director of the school board for many years. He is a member of Salem Post, No. 10, G. A. R., a member of and a deacon in the Baptist Church. A man of high moral courage and unquestioned integrity, Mr. Clark commands the highest respect of all who know him, and well deserves the financial and general success which has crowned his honest efforts in the northwest.

ABRAHAM McKILLOP. A lunch counter enterprise in Albany which is deserving of the large patronage accorded it, is that owned and operated by Abraham McKillop, who, though a young man, has both the experience and special ability for his chosen calling. The Albany Lunch Counter has many attractions for the hungry wayfarer, not the least of which is absolute cleanliness and agreeable surroundings. The viands are the best procurable, and where preparation is required, the utmost skill is evinced, an excellent chef being in attendance in the culinary department. The genial and tactful proprietor has a good word for everyone, a fact which goes far towards retaining his constantly increasing patronage.

The adaptability of the brightest of the sons of Erin is the inheritance of Mr. McKillop, who has also Scotch blood in his veins, his grandfather. James, having established the family in the north of Ireland after leaving his native Scotland. Abraham was born in Belfast, Ireland April 10, 1872, and is the youngest of the ten children born to his parents, James and Martha (McMeekin) McKillop. James McKillop was born in County Antrim, Ireland, and by trade was a linen weaver. He died when Abraham was two years of age, and his wife died when the boy was nine years old. The other children are James, who came to Oregon in 1870, lived on a farm in Marion county, and was killed while hauling lumber in the mountains; Robert lives on a farm at Scio, Ore.; Hannah, deceased, was the wife of Mr. McCauley, of Salem; Archie was accidentally killed in a logging camp; David is living on the farm of his brother Abraham near Salem; William is a farmer near Silverton; and Alexander is a rancher in California. Archie McKillop, brother of James, and uncle of Abraham, was a pioneer of the Pacific coast, having crossed the plains in 1849, and located in Marion county, where his death occurred.

After the death of his mother, Abraham McKillop went to live with a cousin until he was fourteen years old, and in 1886 he came to America, traveling overland to Salem, Ore. His first business experience was in a restaurant in Salem, where he began at the bottom and worked his way up to be cook, learning also to be a practical and economical buyer. In 1896 he came to Albany and bought and conducted a restaurant for two years, disposing of the same in 1898 in order to pursue a similar occupation in Sandow, B. C. He was very successful in the northern country, and at the end of eighteen months returned to Albany and again bought the restaurant he had owned before. Two years later he sold it and bought the White House Restaurant in Salem, a year later disposing of his purchase to buy, for the third time, the old Albany eating house. Since 1900 he has conducted this time-honored restaurant known as the Albany Lunch Counter, with gratifying success.

In Albany Mr. McKillop was united in marriage with Estella Critchlow, who was born in Salem, and who is the mother of one son, Archie. Mr. McKillop is a staunch defender of Republican principles, but he has hardly been long enough in one place to actively participate in the local undertakings of his party. He is popular fraternally, and is identified with the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. The old McKillop farm, settled by his uncle near Salem, is the property of Mr. McKillop, and its one hundred and eighty-one acres are devoted to grain and stock farming, and managed at present by his brother.

FRANK SKIPTON. On the corner of Second and Ellsworth streets, Albany, is located the livery and feed stable owned and managed by an enterprising and up-to-date business man, one who appreciates the value of first-class carriages and well-bred horses. Frank Skipton has a thorough understanding of his business, and is known as one of the popular and successful liverymen in the Willamette valley. He has tact and is obliging, never out of humor, and able to count his friends and patrons by the score. He was born on a farm near Des Moines, Iowa, October 20, 1865, his father, Elijah, having settled there at a very early day, removing from his native state of Illinois. The paternal grandfather, James, lived for many years in Illinois, and lived in contentment to the end of his days. Elijah Skipton brought his wife and three children across the plains with horse teams in 1851, spending six months on the way, with a train of one hundred wagons. He settled on a farm of two hundred and thirty acres in Benton county, Ore., seven miles from Corvallis, where he is still living, and successfully engaged in farming, stock and prune-raising. He is a prominent Democrat, and served continuously as county assessor for twelve years, refusing to longer fill that important office. He has also been county commissioner, and is a man of leading characteristics, thoroughly in touch with general affairs. His wife, formerly Mary Marion, a native of Illinois, is also living, as are four of their seven children, Frank being the fourth in order of birth.

While on the paternal farm Frank Skipton attended the public schools, and in time entered the schools of Roseburg, later attending the Philomath College. His school days ended, he returned to the farm, and after his marriage in Douglas county, in 1891, with Miss Alvia Imbler, bought two hundred and sixty-six acres of land near the old home, which he improved and devoted to grain raising for four years, when he sold it. He still owns seventy-one acres of the old farm. In 1895 he located with his family in Albany, and in 1896 bought the livery business of John Smear, which he has since maintained most successfully. To such an extent has the business grown that he opened another barn to accommodate his large and constantly increasing trade. The main barn is 110x96 feet, ground dimensions, and has ample accommodations for horses which are for sale, a department in which Mr. Skipton realizes large yearly returns.

He is identified with Laurel Lodge No. 17, Knights of Pythias, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and Knights of the Maccabees. All who know him entertain respect for the admirable personal characteristics of Mr. Skipton, and recognize in him a man of strict business integrity. In public matters he has always been a liberal contributor.

FERRIS A. LUCAS. The Bryan-Lucas Lumber Company, formerly the Luckiamute Milling Company, is one of the substantial commercial enterprises of Polk county, and in the community around Falls City enjoys a reputation in keeping with its large output and the high character of the men directing its affairs. The prime factor in the development of this industry is Ferris A. Lucas, a lumberman of many years' experience, and one who, although, comparatively speaking, one of the younger business men of the county, has already evinced marked financial ability. Born in the heart of the lumbering district of Michigan, in Steuben county, September 14, 1865, and reared at Stanton, the heart of the lumber section, he was accustomed from earliest boyhood to the hum of the sawmill, and to the free and easy life around farm and mill. His father, Israel J. Lucas, born in Ohio, moved from Indiana to Montcalm county, Mich., about 1865, and there became interested in milling and farming. He is a very successful, prominent and ambitious man, and has amassed quite a fortune from his combined interests. At present he is living at Stanton, Mich., where he owns four farms, at the age of sixty-five years. He is of Scotch-English descent, and his father, Israel, was also a native of Ohio, and died in Indiana. Israel, Jr., married Mary Ann Hodges, who died in Stanton, Mich., at the age of twenty-nine years, leaving four children, three sons and one daughter, of whom Ferris A. is the second child.

When within three months of graduation at the high school of Stanton, Mich., Ferris A. started in to farm for himself, being at that time twenty-one years of age. In 1889 he began to work at the carpenter trade, and in 1891 came to Oregon, locating in Falls City. He was not slow to realize that he had found a very desirable lumbering locality, and in 1896 became interested in a shingle mill, and the following year bought a lumber or sawmill with a capacity of fifteen thousand feet per day. In 1898 he put up a mill with a capacity of one hundred thousand feet per day, located four miles southwest of Falls City, and having a flume which carries the lumber to the town. At present seventy-five men are employed around the mill. The new mill, now being erected, will have the very latest in milling machinery, and will be another addition to a large and flourishing lumber community. A dryer is also being built at present, with a capacity of eighty thousand feet. A market is found in all of the states west of the Mississippi river, and the mill products are known all along the coast. As in Michigan and other lumbering centers, the company maintains a large general merchandise store for the accommodation of its employes and their families, the store building being one of the finest of the kind in the county. It is three stories high, and has ground dimensions 40x80 feet. In the building is a hall 40x80 feet, and the store contains everything in demand in the general merchandise line.

First known as the Luckiamute Milling Company, Mr. Lucas changed his associations in 1897 and took as his partner John J. Montgomery, and in 1898 sold a third interest to A. H. Dodd. In 1899 he bought out Mr. Montgomery, and in the same year sold a half interest in the business to R. E. Bryan, since which time the business has been conducted under the firm name of the Bryan-Lucas Lumber Company. Mr. Lucas is progressive in his ideas, and has all modern improvements in his business, including a telephone connection with Falls City.

In Michigan Mr. Lucas was united in marriage with Carrie E. Calkins, a native of Hillsdale county, Mich., and daughter of H. S. Calkins, a native of New York. Mr. Calkins was an early settler in Michigan, and at the present time is employed by his son-in-law in his mill. The twins born to Mr. and Mrs. Lucas died at birth. Mr. Lucas is a Democrat in political affiliation, and fraternally is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. A man of sterling integrity and sound business judgment, he not only has the confidence of the business community, but the friendship and good will of all who are associated with him in whatsoever capacity.

OLIVER EMMETT LEET. Among the real estate men who are helping to spread abroad the many advantages of Polk county, and by their advocacy of its climate, soil, and resources inducing homeseekers to settle within its boundaries, may be mentioned Oliver Emmett Leet, an enterprising citizen of Falls City, and a large landowner in different parts of the state. Mr. Leet is a native of Massachusetts, and was born at the old homestead at Williamstown, May 9, 1850. On this same farm his father, Alonzo Leet was born, reared, married, and eventually died at the age of sixty-five years. He was a farmer during his entire active life, and because of good management and shrewd business ability acquired a competence. The old Leet homestead was the scene also of the birth of the paternal grandfather, William. The paternal great-grandfather, Gerard, was born on Leet Island, Conn., which was named in honor of the family. Alonzo Leet married his wife Laura in Vermont, the daughter of Oliver Hill, a farmer of the Green Mountain state.

The youngest son and fourth child in his father's family, Oliver Emmett Leet was educated in the public school near the home farm, and at the age of seventeen learned the stone mason's trade in North Adams, Mass. In 1875 he came to the coast, and after a short time spent in California returned to Massachusetts. During the latter part of 1876 he came to Nebraska, but the same year returned to Massachusetts. A third time he came west in 1878, this time reaching California, but in December he again visited his native state. The various trips to the coast had been utilized by Mr. Leet for making observations of the country, and in hope of finding a desirable permanent location. October 15, 1879, he came to Oregon, and in October, 1880, settled in what is now Sherman county but at that time it formed but one precinct of Wasco county, containing only thirteen voters, and there he cast his first vote in Oregon for James A. Garfield, for president. He engaged in stock-raising, principally horses and cattle. In addition to the land he had taken up he bought a large tract and placed it partially under cultivation, and in 1888 desiring to try his fortunes in another part of the state, he settled in Newport, where he remained four years. Returning to his farm in eastern Oregon in 1892, he continued to farm and raise stock for two years. In December, 1894, he came to Falls City, where he bought ninety acres adjoining the town, and engaged in farming and fruit-raising. In 1896 he removed to Dallas, returning to the farm in October, 1898, and there remaining until November, 1901.

Locating in Falls City, Mr. Leet engaged in the real estate business, and although a comparatively recent addition to the business life of the city, he is recognized as one of the substantial business factors in the community. He deals principally in farm and timber land, concerning which his life of activity in various parts of the state has given him a wide knowledge. Personally he owns a great deal of property in Oregon, at Dallas, Hillsboro, and in Portland, as well as valuable town property in Falls City.

Mr. Leet married, June 30, 1872, in New York state, Mary Jane Parker, a native of Stanford, Vt., and daughter of Harry Parker, a native and farmer of Vermont. Mr. Leet is prominent in social affairs of his adopted town, and is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Politically a Republican, he held the office of councilman in Newport, Ore., for two terms. He is a resourceful and enterprising man, conscientious and painstaking, and with a particularly fine regard for the courtesies and amenities of life.

SILAS LIVINGSTON. Occupying a prominent position in the industrial circles of Albany, Linn county, Ore., Silas Livingston is a member of the firm which controls the interests of the Albany Planing Mills, a large and lucrative business which adds much to the financial prestige of the city. Though in business but a comparatively short time, as far as regards independent interests, Mr. Livingston has forcibly demonstrated his ability along these lines, and has made a gratifying success of his work.

The birth of Mr. Livingston occurred in Yorkville township, Racine county, Wis., March 13, 1844, his parents being David and Julia Ann (Nichols) Livingston. The founder of this family in America was John Livingston, an emigrant from Scotland. After a short residence in Canada he came to the state of New York and there became a farmer, later making his home in Wisconsin, where he died. His son, David, the father of Silas Livingston, was born in New York state, and was also a farmer. He became a pioneer of Racine county, Wis., and later removed to Minnesota, where he lived in both Hennepin and Carver counties. With his wife, the daughter of George Nichols, Mr. Livingston made the journey to Portland, Ore., where he died. His wife survived him until 1899, her death occurring in Albany. Her father was first a resident of New York state, where Mrs. Livingston was born. Subsequently he resided in Wisconsin. Of the nine children born to them, eight sons and one daughter, all attained maturity, though only three are now living. Of the sons four served in the Civil war, being as follows: John, in Burdan's First Sharpshooters; Alexander, likewise in Burdan's First Sharpshooters, being wounded at Antietam; Jasper, in the Ninth Minnesota; and S. Livingston, fourth of the children. The three first named are now dead, John and Jasper both dying while residents of Minnesota.

Silas Livingston was about seven years of age when his father removed to the state of Minnesota. There he was reared to manhood on the paternal farm, receiving a limited education in the district schools. Though but eighteen years of age Mr. Livingston enlisted in 1862 in Company D, Sixth Minnesota Infantry, and was sent to the scene of the Sioux Indian uprising, where he served until the Indians were subdued. He was then sent south, passing through Arkansas, Tennessee and Mississippi, and serving through the siege of Mobile. Before he left the service he was made a corporal. After a service of three years and three months he was mustered out at Ft. Snelling, in September, 1865.

In his native state he afterward engaged in farming for two years. In 1867 he went to Kansas and took up a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres, near Columbia, Cherokee county, where he remained for twelve years engaged in farming and threshing. At the close of that period he came west, settling first in Los Angeles county, Cal., near Wilmington, and in 1879 coming to Oregon. On his arrival in this state he first engaged with the bridge department of the Oregon Limited, and remained with them for seven months. After spending the winter in southern Oregon he came to Linn county, and in Albany engaged in the shops of the Althouse & Pierce Planing Mill Company. After one year here he returned to Portland, and was employed for the ensuing twelve years in planing mills of that city, and others in Albany, being principally engaged with the Sugar Pine Mill and Fixture Company with the exception of three years spent in the employ of the Curtis Lumber Company in Mill City, Ore. On entering the business for himself he engaged with Mr. Sears, and they now occupy three floors of a building, the dimensions of which are 60x90 feet, all fixtures and machinery being thoroughly up-to-date. The business has increased in volume through the enterprise and conscientious effort of Mr. Livingston and his partner to turn out exceptional work.

Mr. Livingston was married in Hennepin county, Minn., to Miss Amy Gould, a native of Wisconsin. They have four children, as follows: Alexander, an engineer on the Southern Pacific Railroad, who makes his home at Ashland, Ore.; Grace, wife of Sanford La Salle, of Albany; Pearl and Robert. Mr. Livingston is a Republican in his political affiliations, and in military circles he is known through his membership of McPherson Post, G. A. R.

JOHN HUGHES. The name of John Hughes, who for many years was one of the substantial business men and influential citizens of Salem, is closely interwoven with the history of the Willamette valley since the pioneer days of the community. He was born in Blountville, Tenn., June 21, 1831, a son of John Hughes, who was also a native of that state. His grandfather, David Hughes, was born in Ireland, but prior to the Revolution crossed the Atlantic to Virginia. When the colonists attempted to throw off the yoke of British oppression he joined the American army and fought for independence. He became a pioneer of eastern Tennessee, and there died at the age of ninety-two years. In religious faith he was a Presbyterian. Mr. Hughes' father, who carried on farming in eastern Tennessee, died at an early age. He had married Ann Himes, who was born in Lancaster, Pa., a daughter of Abraham Himes, who was also a native of the Keystone state and of German descent. He removed from Pennsylvania to eastern Tennessee, and there Mrs. Hughes was reared. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and died in Knoxville, Tenn., at the age of ninety years.

John Hughes was the eldest of a family of four children and the last surviving member. He was reared in his native locality, pursuing his education in the district and subscription schools. In 1852 he went by stage to the Mississippi, and took a boat for Council Bluffs, Iowa. On the 20th of May of that year he left the latter place and started for the gold mines of California. He and four comrades outfitted with a three-yoke team of oxen and one wagon, proceeding westward until they reached the forks of the Green river, where the party divided, three of the number going to Oregon and two to California. Cutting their wagon in two and dividing the oxen,

On the 7th of October, 1852, John Hughes arrived in the city of Portland, and came thence to Marion county, where for seven years he was engaged in farm work. He then engaged in painting in Salem for a number of years. In 1863 he began business as a merchant in that city, establishing a store for the sale of groceries, paints, oils and other commodities. For forty years thereafter, with the exception of the time when he was temporarily out of the city, he devoted his time to building up a trade which ultimately became one of the most important in the Willamette valley. At the time of his death he was the oldest merchant in the city of Salem. He erected the Hughes block, built a portion of the bank block, and at one time was interested in the Salem Flouring Mill. It will thus be seen that his efforts were not confined to one line of enterprise. He carried forward to successful completion whatever he undertook, and his identification with commercial pursuits resulted in making him one of the wealthiest men of the city.

Mr. Hughes was married in Salem July 29, 1857, to Miss Emma Pringle, who was born in Warren county, Mo., in 1838, a daughter of Virgil K. Pringle, whose birth occurred in Hartford, Conn., July 29, 1804. Her grandfather, Norman Pringle, was also born in Hartford, and about 1820 removed to Missouri. Her father, settling in Warren county, that state, followed the shoe-making trade until 1846, when he came to the northwest, accompanied by his wife and six children. They started April 15, 1846, with two ox-teams, coming over the old trail by way of Fort Hall and the Applegate cutoff. The travelers endured many hardships and much suffering. They made a road of their own from Humboldt to Oregon, reaching the Willamette valley on Christmas day, after a tedious journey of nine months. They brought their teams only as far as Eugene, and their cattle gave out on the journey. Mr. Pringle engaged in shoe-making in Salem until 1851, when he settled upon a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres four and a half miles southeast of the city. There he carried on farming for a time, but later he returned to Salem and was identified with business interests there until, having acquired a handsome competence, he retired to private life. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a man of unassailable integrity and genuine worth. He married Pherne Brown, who was born in Montpelier, Vt., March 22, 1805, a daughter of the Rev. Clark Brown, who was an Episcopal clergyman in the Green Mountain state. His entire life was devoted to the ministry in Vermont.

Unto Mr. and Mrs. Pringle were born eight children, of whom seven reached years of maturity—Virgilia, who became the wife of F. R. Smith, and died in Salem; Clark, who served in the Cayuse Indian war and is now living in Spokane, Wash.; Octavius, who was fourteen years of age when he crossed the plains, and is now living in Prineville, Ore.; Sarelia, who became the wife of Charles H. Northrup, and died in California; Albro, who died in Seattle; Emma, Mrs. Hughes, and Ella, widow of C. D. Young, a resident of Salem, and the only child who was born in Oregon.

The father of this family passed away in Salem, March 24, 1887, when eighty-three years of age. The mother's death occurred in the same city May 23, 1891. She was a great-granddaughter of Dr. Joseph Moffet, of Brimfield, Mass. His daughter, who became the grandmother of Mrs. Pringle, was liberally educated, and afterward engaged in teaching. She married Rev. Clark Brown, who died in Maryland. She afterward took her family to Missouri, whence, in 1846, she came to the northwest. In a log cabin at Forest Grove she established a private school which afterward developed into a widely patronized and celebrated institution. Her original capital in this enterprise is said to have been but six cents. Little by little the attendance increased until she had forty pupils. This pioneer educational institution, for years known simply as "Mrs. Brown's School," afterwards became the Tualatin Academy, and is now widely known as Pacific University. Mrs. Brown was thus actively and prominently connected with the educational development of the northwest, and her name should be enrolled among those of the prominent pioneers who contributed to the upbuilding and general welfare of Oregon.

Unto John and Emma (Pringle) Hughes were born five children—George P., who is manager of his father's store; Lulu, wife of A. N. Bush, of Salem; Francis, who is also connected with the store; Genevieve, wife of David B. Mackie, of Portland, and Ethel, wife of W. A. Carter, of Gold Hill, Ore.

The military experience of John Hughes was confined to the Indian troubles occurring in the pioneer days of Oregon. In October, 1855, he enlisted in the First Oregon Regiment for service in the Yakima Indian war, and was engaged in the Walla Walla country until 1856, taking part in many fights with the red men. Fraternally he was connected with the Odd Fellows, having served as Noble Grand of Salem Lodge, No. 1; and Mrs. Hughes is identified with the Order of Rebekah. With his wife he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for many years, taking an active and zealous part in its work. He was a trustee of Willamette University, and the cause of education always found in him a warm friend. He served as a member of the Salem City Council several terms, and exercised his prerogatives in support of all measures for the general good. He was also associated with the State Pioneers' Association and the Oregon Historical Society, of which Mrs. Hughes is also a member.

Few residents of the Willamette valley resided in this section of the state longer than Mr. Hughes and his estimable wife. They have witnessed its remarkable transformation as Nature has yielded up her rich treasures for the use of man, as business interests and industries have been established, and as the general work of improvement has been carried on. Their influence has invariably been on the side of substantial advancement. Mr. Hughes personally accomplished much toward promoting the commercial activity of Salem, where he was for so long a period numbered among the highly honored and prominent merchants. His death, which occurred April 25, 1903, was a distinct loss to the community; for few of the inhabitants of Salem have so closely endeared themselves to their fellow men of two mature generations as did this noble, upright and useful citizen of Oregon. The record of his life, a few of the more important features of which we have endeavored to preserve for the future, certainly contains much that should prove a source of inspiration to the rising generation and of pride to his descendants. No finer tribute to his memory can be offered—no more lofty monument to his fame can be erected—than the preservation in literature of the simple facts as they are known to all who knew him during his long and useful life.

GARDNER BROTHERS. No donation claim in Polk county is surrounded with more interesting reminiscences of the old pioneer days than that which was taken up by Samuel J. Gardner, one of the pioneers of 1843, and which is now occupied by his sons Cyrus L. and Chester C. Gardner, two of the most promising and successful of the younger generation of agriculturists and stock-raisers of his neighborhood. Especial interest surrounds the life of Samuel J. Gardner, who represented in his character and attainments the most hardy and resourceful of the emigrants who dared the dangers of the plains before the innumerable later caravans had rendered them more habitable and less hazardous.

Born in Boston, Mass., September 10, 1821, he died in California, December 26, 1866, having gone to the southern state for impaired health.

As a young man in the east Mr. Gardner engaged in school teaching for some years, and in 1843 came to Oregon accompanied by Nesmith, Applegate and Abernethy, spending a few years on the French Prairie, in Marion county. When he came to Polk county he had a pack on his back containing his worldly possessions, and finally with his earnings made arrangements to take up three hundred and twenty acres of land. March 3, 1853, he married Eliza Ann Smith, born in Missouri, July 1, 1835, and daughter of James Smith, who crossed the plains in 1846, locating on a claim near Lewisville, consisting of a section of land. After this marriage the young people came to the claim now owned by the sons, and built the house which is still standing, a silent reminder of the many years of struggle and deprivations in the early days. This house was built in 1850, and in it the six children were born, four of whom are living: George W., of Falls City; Thomas J., of Salem; and C. L. and C. C. on the home farm. For a second husband the wife of Mr. Gardner married, November 27, 1867, John A. Williams, who was born in 1812, and died April 30, 1884, on the home place. Of this union there were two children, Alvin A. and John D., the former of whom is deceased, and the latter of whom lives at Falls City. For a third husband Mrs. Williams married, January 3, 1886, W. A. Frost, and her fourth husband, married September 26, 1891, was Jacob Rhodaberger. Mrs. Rhodaberger died in Falls City December 26, 1901, at the age of sixty-six.

The Gardner brothers were given a common school education, and under their father's discipline developed into thrifty and conscientious farmers and stock-raisers. Cyrus L., was born on the donation claim February 1, 1861, and Chester C. was born on the same farm February 8, 1864. Chester C. married, February 11, 1891, Hattie Elliott, who was born in Polk county, December 11, 1871, and whose father, James W., crossed the plains in 1862, locating in Polk county, and from there removing to his present home near Bellevue, Yamhill county. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Gardner: Cyrus Orville; Wiley M.; Edith L.; and Lester W. Like their father, the sons are Democrats in political affiliation, but have never desired or been willing to accept anything but minor local offices. C. C. Gardner is a member and trustee of the Evangelical Church at Bridgeport. The brothers own the original donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres jointly. Chester C. purchased three hundred and eighteen acres adjoining on the south and Cyrus L. owns one hundred and sixty adjoining that on the southwest, making a farm of eight hundred acres in one body. The Gardner farm is one of the most valuable in Polk county, and has all of the modern improvements which are calculated to facilitate a high-class general farming enterprise. Both men are of advanced and practical ideas, and have enviable reputations for substantiality and all-around general worth to the community.

JOHN B. SMITH. Certain distinguishing features mark the establishment of the Smith family in Oregon, both as regards the father, Isaac, and his son John B., the latter of whom now owns and operates the original donation claim taken up by his sire in 1853, and where he was born November 18, 1856. The elder Smith was born in Warren county, Ky., February 14, 1816, a son of Godfrey Smith, who died at a comparatively early age, and who claimed Dutch ancestry. Isaac Smith went to Warren county, Ill., as a young man, and there married Margaret Butler, who was born in Kentucky or Illinois in 1822, and who bore him nine children, six of whom were sons, John B. being the seventh, all of whom are now living: Rufus M.; Silas W., of Waitsburg, Wash.; Berryman M., who was police judge of Portland for two years; Flora A. Campbell; R. Matilda Humphrey; John B.; Ira S., who was sheriff of Polk county one term and member of legislature one term; Isaac L., United States lighthouse keeper at Canby, Ore. Mr. Smith owned a large farm in Warren county, Ill., which, however, he disposed of in the early '50s, and in 1853 outfitted with horse and mule teams and crossed the plains to Oregon. His family had in the meantime grown to large proportions, and all accompanied him on the search for better and larger opportunities in the far west. The train was under command of Captain Butler, father of Mrs. Smith, and the journey covered a period of six months, being comparatively immune from distressing accidents or setbacks. The first winter was spent in Polk county, and the next spring Mr. Smith took up the claim now owned by his son, which consisted of three hundred and twenty acres. He engaged in general farming and stock-raising until his death, April 29, 1897, his wife having preceded him in December, 1871. He was a prominent man in his neighborhood, and his influence for growth and progress was of more than local extent. Since the Civil war a staunch Republican, he served many years as justice of the peace, and was elected to the state legislature for one term, serving as county judge until declining health necessitated his resignation from office. Broad and tolerant in his views, he was public-spirited in the extreme, and willingly shouldered the large responsibility which fell upon him in the early days.

Educated in the public schools of Bridgeport, and La Creole Academy at Dallas, John B. Smith began farming with his father, and at the age of twenty-one became independent, taking his share of the farm profits in return for labor expended. In 1886 he was united in marriage with Maggie Hill, who was born in Tennessee, December 27, 1867, and came to Oregon in 1884 with her father, Licurgus, locating in Polk county. Mr. Hill now lives in Bridgeport, four miles from Falls City, and is engaged in general farming and hop-raising.

After his marriage Mr. Smith continued to live on the home place, and in December, 1900, bought out the other heirs, and now owns the entire property. His farm is one of the finest and most valuable in this section, and is devoted chiefly to the raising of stock, including sheep, goats and cattle. The most modern improvements have been introduced, for the present owner is progressive in the extreme, and keeps abreast of the times in congenial and successful occupation. That he has been more expansive than the average farmer is evidenced by his town as well as city interests, for he owns considerable town real estate, including four lots in Newport. The staunch friend and promoter of education, he has materially advanced the educational opportunities of the children in his neighborhood, and has rendered valuable service as a trustee of Dallas College. He is an upholder of Republican principles, has been a trustee and school clerk for many terms, and held other positions of trust and responsibility in the county. With his family he is a member of the Evangelical Church, and for many years has been the popular and helpful Sunday school superintendent. His four children are being given every advantage within the power of their parents to bestow. Oscar P. is in Dallas, while Cecil, Hallie and a baby are living at home.

JOHN MORRIS. A paying farming and fruit-raising property of Polk county is that owned by John Morris, which, though not one of the largest in the neighborhood, is one of the best improved and most fertile. In 1890 he purchased the sixty acres comprising his farm, forty-five of which are under cultivation, and seven acres of which are devoted to strawberries. He has given horticulture considerable study, and finds a ready market for his finely flavored fruit. Mr. Morris was born in Columbus, Ohio, June 1, 1840, his father, Asa, being a native of Pennsylvania, and died in Franklin county, Ohio, at the age of fifty-five years.

C. O. Boynton.

Mary E. Boynton.

The mother and family moved to Mahaska county, Iowa, in 1853, and the son, John, stayed on the home farm until 1860.

Crossing the plains in the spring of 1860, John Morris was a member of the D'Lashmutt party, which included his widowed mother, who afterward married Jonathan Dyer. She died in Polk county in 1880, aged seventy-eight years. After arriving in Polk county, he lived with Mr. D'Lashmutt on Salt creek. In 1862 he went to eastern Oregon, and in Baker county engaged in mining for a year, going in 1863 to Placerville, Idaho. As a miner he was not successful, and his short but disastrous experience convinced him that the life of the farmer was after all one to be desired. So in 1865 he went to Walla Walla, Wash., and after a year of farming came to Polk county, locating on Salt creek. He was moderately successful as a farmer and stock-raiser, and in 1872 had saved enough money to justify him in marrying and wedded Mary E. Farley, a native of Yamhill county, daughter of Robert and Lydia (Casper) Farley, of which union there have been born five children: William A., a graduate of the Stanford University, now teaching the Latin class in the East Portland school; Robert F., attending the Willamette University; Carl G., graduate from the law department of Willamette University and died at home September, 1901, aged twenty-four; and two died in infancy.

For a number of years after his marriage Mr. Morris lived near Perrydale, and in 1891 came to his present farm near Salem. He is a Republican in politics casting his first vote for Lincoln in 1864, and has held the school offices for many years. He is a member of the Baptist Church of Rickreall, while his wife attends the church of the same denomination at Salem. Liberal minded and enterprising, Mr. Morris is also noted for his good business ability, and for his unswerving integrity. For further reference regarding the Morris family, see sketch of E. L. D'Lashmutt elsewhere in this volume.

CHARLES OSCAR BOYNTON. Following a career of credit to himself as a farmer and business man, Charles Oscar Boynton came to Woodburn in 1891, and erected his present comfortable and hospitable home on seven acres of land purchased for the purpose. With the exception of a year in the grocery business, as the partner of W. E. Finzer, he has since lived a retired life. Mr. Boynton is enrolled among that noble band of pioneers which arrived in Oregon October 3, 1850, and has since given their strong and reliable characters to the development of western resources. Of Revolutionary ancestry on both sides of his family, he was born in Troy, N. Y.,

June 10, 1822, his father, Ebenezer L., having been born on the old paternal farm of one hundred and sixty acres near Brattleborough, Vt., August 8, 1796. The paternal grandfather, Joel, also a native of Vermont, succeeded in making a fair living for his family out of the Vermont farm, whose well tilled and somewhat worn acres are still in the possession of the Boyntons. He left his plow and difficult duties to participate in the war for independence, serving with distinction in the Colonial army. He lived to be ninety-nine years old. Ebenezer L. Boynton moved from Vermont to New York about 1812, settling in Catskill, where he married Elizabeth Fancher, who was born near New London, Conn., January 21, 1795, and whose father, Andrew Fancher, was also a native of Connecticut, a farmer by occupation, and a valiant soldier in the Revolutionary war. In New York, he settled in the timber near Syracuse, cleared his land, engaged in farming and stock-raising, and died at an advanced age.

In 1821, Mr. Boynton removed from Catskill to Troy, N. Y., where he was appointed inspector of provisions by the legislature, which position he creditably maintained for many years. In 1836 he took up his residence in Fulton county, Ill., where he bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, and also eighty acres of timber land. Here he died at the age of ninety, after a very active life, during which he took an important part in the politics of his locality. At first a Jeffersonian Democrat, his political convictions had broadened, and he died a staunch Republican, and a warm admirer of the character and political policy of Abraham Lincoln.

The third oldest in the paternal family, Charles Oscar Boynton, was educated in the public schools, and at the age of twenty-one left the farm and apprenticed himself to the cooper's trade, at Cuba, Fulton county, Ill. In 1843, he located on a farm near Cuba, married Mary A. Bonney, July 26th of the same year, Mrs. Boynton being a native of Sandusky, Ohio, and born December 29, 1823. Her father, Truman Bonney, was born in the state of Vermont, where he was a tanner, stave maker, and later a cooper, and from where he emigrated to Ohio, settling near Sandusky, and, in 1834, removed to Fulton county, Ill. He crossed the plains to Oregon in 1845, and settled on the donation claim upon which his death occurred. After his marriage, Mr. Boynton continued to live on the Illinois farm, and in the meantime a great deal of local interest had been aroused regarding the superior opportunities in the west, and it is not surprising that quite a little colony in the neighborhood disposed of their farms and needless possessions, and prepared for the long journey over the plains. Nine families made up the little train that courageously set forth into the practically unknown west, and accomplished their desire without any particular incident. They came by way of the north side of the Platte river, and the first winter in Oregon Mr. Boynton spent two miles northeast of Woodburn. Near Needy, Clackamas county, he then took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, which he proved up, and which continued to be his home for thirty-nine years. The town of Needy sprang into existence upon a portion of the Boynton farm, and the owner was deeply interested in the various enterprises which gradually helped to establish a community of fair proportions. Nor was he an outside spectator, for he gave generously towards the promotion of various enterprises there represented, notably the Methodist Episcopal Church, for which he contributed five acres as a building site, and also gave money towards the erection of the edifice. In this connection, it is pleasant to mention the great good accomplished by Mr. Boynton in connection with the church, of which he has been a member for a great many years. He has always felt the help emanating from this denomination, and during the early missionary days, such well remembered disciples as Waller, Hines, Garrison and Parrish were welcome guests at the Boynton home. The first camp meeting grounds were held on this old farm, and many social and religious undertakings received their first inspiration from the vigorous personalities and helpful enthusiasm of Mr. and Mrs. Boynton. Their home was the center of a genial good fellowship appreciated by all the early settlers, and their hearts responded to all calls for sympathy and practical help.

Of the ten children born to Mr. and Mrs. Boynton, Ebenezer Larned, a horse dealer in Woodburn, married Lucinda Morgan and has three sons: Charles O., Jr.; Alva T., who is married and has one daughter, Eddie; and Edward, deceased; Bradford A. is deceased; Helen A., deceased, married Clark McCown and had three children: Mary A., married, and has one daughter; Charles W. and Lida; Thurston A., deceased, married Josie Moor and had one daughter, Thursa, the wife of Mr. Goodman, of Malheur county, Ore.; Jennie Alice, deceased, married Cuthbert Stump, and had three children: Paulina, Mary and Charles C., the latter deceased; Albert, twin brother to Jennie A., died in early childhood; C. Truman, living in Malheur county, Ore., married Susan Zumwalt, and they have two daughters, Bertha and Mary A., each of whom is married and has one son; Bessie is the wife of John Popejoy, and has two daughters: Mary A. and Charlotte O., the latter having three children, Marietta, Harley and an infant, and is living in Stockton, Cal.; Ida, deceased, married J. Robert Sconce, and they had one son, J. Robert Sconce, Jr., now in the United States navy; Lida, a twin sister of Ida, is living at home with her parents. Mr. Boynton has always been a Republican, and his fitness for office has received constant recognition. He served four years as county assessor, and was county commissioner for the same number of years. For twenty-two years he was justice of the peace, and his rulings were always equitable and in accord with the principles of truth and justice. Since living in Woodburn, Mr. Boynton has been solicited to fill numerous political offices, but has always refused. He served as delegate to the county convention, and was delegate from Clackamas county to the first Republican state convention in Oregon. Mr. and Mrs. Boynton are the only survivors of the first Methodist Episcopal class between Salem and Oregon City, organized by Alvin Waller. They are both members of the Pioneer Association, and Oregon Historical Society, and Mr. Boynton is a charter member of Woodburn Lodge No. 106, A. F. & A. M., and with his daughter, Lida, belongs to the Eastern Star.

SIDNEY TOMLINSON, who served as chief executive of Woodburn during the years 1901-02, was admirably adapted to the requirements of his responsibility, was the seventh to hold office in the city and presented a clean, wide-awake, and progressive administration. His foresight and recognition of its necessities resulted in the organization of a fire company for the protection of life and property, and he otherwise evinced a desire to place his charge among the influential, modern, and thrifty municipalities of the Willamette valley.

A native of the vicinity of Zanesville, Ohio, Mr. Tomlinson was born March 17, 1855. His family was represented in the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, and the Mexican war. The soldier of whom there is most authentic account is the paternal grandfather, Solomon Z., who was born in Virginia, reared in Pennsylvania, and participated in the war of 1812 and the Mexican war. The prime of his life was passed in Ohio, where he married, and whence he removed in 1860 to Nemaha county, Kans. In 1878 he took up his residence on land in the state of Iowa. He died at the age of ninety-three in Boone county, Iowa, where he was stricken with paralysis while at the home of his son, James F., the father of Sidney.

James F. Tomlinson was born in Columbus, Ohio, May 22, 1824, and in early life was a shoemaker by trade. After removing to Iowa in 1856 he settled in Boone county, where he bought land on the banks of the Des Moines river, forty-five miles from the city of that name. He became prominent as a farmer and politician, gathered a considerable fortune into the family exchequer, and held, among other political offices, that of county commissioner for sixteen years. His wife, Elizabeth (Simmons) Tomlinson, was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, a daughter of Joseph Simmons. Her death occurred in Iowa August 17, 1857, when her son Sidney was seventeen months old. Of the two children in the family, Clarinda is now the wife of H. A. Whitted, the latter a farmer near Steele, Idaho.

For twenty-seven years of his life Mr. Tomlinson lived on his father's farm, and the many responsibilities which fell to his lot prevented more than irregular attendance at the public schools. As a relaxation from agricultural life he engaged in a general merchandise business at Pilot Mound, Boone county, Iowa, for four years, and then removed to Harlan county, Neb., where he lived on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres for about a year. Upon removing to Oregon in 1888 he settled in Medford, Jackson county, and worked as a carpenter and builder for about three years. Since coming to Woodburn he has engaged in contracting and building on a large scale. Among his most worthy attempts in this direction may be mentioned the brick block opposite the depot; the building of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which he afterward sold; and Hotel Woodburn, the finest and best appointed hostelry in the city, and which is being conducted under his personal supervision. Before being elected mayor in 1901 he was a member of the city council for two terms, and he has also served six years on the school board, and in 1903 was re-elected for the ensuing three years, doing his utmost during that time to advance the cause of education, as exemplified in the Woodburn school. He was one of the chief organizers of the Woodburn Board of Trade, an organization which has materially promoted the mercantile and commercial interests of the city and county. He is the president of the board, and one of its most helpful and enthusiastic members. He is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees, and has passed the chairs of each. Mr. Tomlinson is extensively interested in real estate business, handling city and farm property in Willamette valley.

The family of Mr. Tomlinson consists of his wife, formerly Miss Lottie White, whom he married in Boone county, Iowa, April 1, 1882; and his only son, Vernon Wayne, who was born in Boone county, Iowa, January 18, 1883, and is now a student in the State University at Eugene, a leader of the University debating society, and will graduate in 1905. Mrs. Tomlinson is a daughter of Mathias White, who was born in Kentucky, and has owned and managed farms in Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, and died in the latter state. The mother still resides in Boone county, Iowa, and is over eighty years of age. Mrs. Tomlinson comes from a family noted for their abilities as musicians, and she herself possesses marked talent. She has given private instruction to many and is a vocalist of ability. From 1896 to 1900 she was assistant principal in the Woodburn school, and was principal of the Hubbard school from 1900 to 1901 inclusive. With her husband she ably manages the hotel in which they are both interested.

DEDRICK H. BOMHOFF. One of the successful and representative mercantile establishments in Woodburn is the grocery business of Dedrick H. Bomhoff, but recently located in a new building, fitted with all modern improvements. Mr. Bomhoff is one of the many sons of Germany who are utilizing their commendable national traits for the upbuilding of the northwest, to which he came in 1891, and in regard to the advantages of which he is most enthusiastic. He was born in Hanover, Germany, February 10, 1868, his father, Henry, and his mother, Anna, being natives of the same part of the kingdom. Henry Bomhoff is a carpenter, builder and contractor, and is at present living with his wife in Homfeldt, where he has been in business for many years.

The oldest of the three sons and two daughters in his father's family, Dedrick was not destined to reach maturity in his native land, for at the age of twelve he had a chance to come to come to America with a kinsman, locating in Greenleaf, Washington county, Kans., where he attended the public schools. Since that early age he has made his own living, and has no one to thank but himself for the large measure of success which has come his way. Having heard a great deal about the west during his life in Kansas he came hither in 1890, locating at Olympia, Wash., where he remained for a year. For a couple of years he worked on farms near Butteville and Hubbard, Ore., and became identified with Woodburn in 1894, his various efforts having resulted in his saving quite a little money. In 1898 he stepped boldly into the mercantile life of the town, and bought out O. A. Nandall's grocery store, which he has since conducted in larger form, and with increasing patronage. The new store just completed is worthy of both the town and man, is well stocked with the commodities most in demand in growing and progressive communities, and has at its head a very genial, broad-minded and tactful manager, whose pleasing personality makes his place of business popular and profitable.

Through his marriage in July, 1896, with Mrs.

Lizzie M. Scheurer, Mr. Bomhoff became allied with one of the pioneer families of Oregon. Mrs. Bomhoff is a daughter of Peter Fellow, who was born in the disputed territory of Alsace-Lorraine, between France and Germany, and who came to America at a very early day. Mr. Fellow located first in Illinois, and in 1860 came around the Horn to San Francisco, from there embarking for Portland. He took up a donation claim near Butteville, Marion county, Ore., consisting of six hundred and forty acres, improved the same to a fine farm, and lived there for the remainder of his life. Through her first marriage Mrs. Bomhoff had one child, Mabel, and of her second marriage there have been born three children, Annie, Grace and Harry.

Mr. Bomhoff is interested in all that has to do with the upbuilding of his adopted city, and has been before the public in various capacities. As a Republican he has served in the city council for one term. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, a charter member of the encampment. With his wife and children Mr. Bomhoff is a member of the German Lutheran Church. Is also member of the Mercantile and Tradesmen Protective Association. In 1899 he purchased and remodeled a dwelling which is now one of the finest in Woodburn, all the modern improvements to be found therein, and has a drilled well, one hundred and seventy-seven feet deep, the deepest in the city.

HENRY J. OSFIELD is a leading and prosperous representative of mercantile interests in Dallas, where he is engaged in dealing in groceries and queensware. A native of Illinois, he was born in Urbana, October 22, 1856, and is the second in order of birth in a family of seven children, five of whom are living. The parents were John J. and Rachel (Servis) Osfield. The paternal grandfather was a resident of New York and belonged to one of the old eastern families. John J. Osfield was born in the Empire state and came to Lockport, N. Y., where he pursued his education and learned the blacksmith's trade. Removing westward as civilization made its way into the Mississippi valley, he took up his abode in Urbana, Ill., where he became interested in the conduct of a wagon and carriage factory as a member of the firm of Boyden & Osfield. He was associated in that enterprise for many years and in 1876 he removed to Iowa, establishing his home in Villisca, but after two years he came to the Sunset state, locating in Portland, Ore., where he was engaged in carriage manufacturing throughout the remainder of his business career. His wife was born in Ohio and was a daughter of Asher Servis, who was a native of New Jersey and who married a Miss Scofield, a native of Connecticut. Removing westward, Mr. Servis followed farming in Warren county, Ohio, afterward in Illinois and subsequently in Harrison county, Iowa, where his death occurred. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Osfield were born seven children, five of whom are yet living and with the exception of our subject all are residents of Portland. The father died in September, 1901, at the age of seventy-six years, but the mother is yet living in Portland.

H. J. Osfield spent the days of his boyhood and youth in Urbana, Ill., acquiring his education in the public schools there, and in 1876 when twenty years of age went to Iowa, where he carried on farming on his father's land. He remained a resident of that state until 1880, in which year he arrived in Portland, Ore., where for two years he was employed at blacksmithing and carriage making. He then accepted a position as shipping clerk with the firm of Frank Brothers, dealers in implements, acting in that capacity for eight years or until 1890, when, with the capital he had acquired through his own labors, he established a store in West Portland. He was also instrumental in securing a postoffice there and was appointed its first postmaster. He continued to engage in general merchandising and to discharge his official duties until October, 1895, when he sold his store and removed to Dallas, thinking to find a broader field of labor at this place. Here he opened a grocery, queensware and notions store and later he purchased the store building which he now occupies. It is a two-story brick building, 30x70 feet, and he also has a large warehouse. His grocery and queensware store is the most extensive in the county, and he is also the leading dealer in produce. He has been very successful in his business here, working up a large trade. He carries a fine line of goods. His store is neat and attractive in appearance and his business methods commend him to the confidence and support of the public.

In Logan, Iowa, Mr. Osfield was united in marriage to Miss Mary Ellison, who was born in that state, and they have two children, Ada F. and Carroll Henry. They hold membership with the Presbyterian Church of Dallas, and Mr. Osfield is serving on the board of trustees. Socially he is identified with the Woodmen of the World and was made a Mason in Jennings Lodge, No. 9, A. F. & A. M. He is also a staunch and unswerving Republican, an active member of the board of trade and takes a deep and helpful interest in everything pertaining to progress and improvement in his locality. He is widely and favorably known, and throughout his career he has labored for the improvement of every line of business or public interest with which he has been associated, and at all times has been actuated by a fidelity to his country and her welfare.

JUDGE W. C. HUBBARD. The qualities which endear man to man are dominant traits in the character of W. C. Hubbard, and so widely and favorably is he known in Salem and the surrounding country that it is with pleasure that we present to our readers the record of his career. His residence in the state dates from 1847 and therefore the pioneer history of Oregon is as familiar to him as is the latter-day progress and development. He was born in Pike county, Ill., twelve miles from Pittsfield, November 8, 1836, and is the eldest living of the four surviving children in a family that once numbered eleven born unto Charles and Margaret (Cannon) Hubbard. The father was born in Kentucky February 14, 1800, and at an early day removed to Missouri, settling near St. Louis, while later he became a resident of Pike county, Ill., and there carried on farming. The explorations that had been made in the northwest and the reports that he had heard awakened in him a desire to become a resident of the section of the country whose resources were so glowingly described. Accordingly, in 1847, he started for Oregon accompanied by his wife and six children. They had two wagons drawn by oxen, thus traveling in the primitive manner of the times—the vanguard of civilization which was soon to transform this district from a wild region inhabited by Indians to one of the most important sections of our great land. They traveled by way of St. Joseph, Mo., crossing the river there, thence proceeding up the Platte and over the old Oregon trail. On the way the baby of the family died while they were in the Cascade mountains. They had no trouble with the Indians until they arrived at the Columbia river and even then they managed to make the red men keep their distance. They had left the main road at the foot of Blue mountain and proceeded to Whitman station, intending to spend the winter there. Dr. Whitman, at the time, was down in the valley and Mrs. Whitman urged them to proceed on their way because she believed that there would be many emigrants behind them whom they would have to assist later in the season. They arrived, therefore, in the valley October 20, and the father secured a donation claim on Clear creek, seven miles northeast of Oregon City, but remained there for only a year, when he gave up the property. He then located on the French claim, purchasing a tract of a former owner and also securing a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres. With characteristic energy he began to clear, improve and cultivate his land and in course of time a splendid farm was seen as the result of his labors. He continued to engage in agricultural work until his retirement from business life. He died at the home of his son in Mission Bottom in 1884, when eighty-four years of age. A worthy Christian man, he held membership in the Baptist Church and into the minds of his children he instilled lessons of industry and integrity which have borne good fruit in their later lives. His wife, who was born in Missouri, April 19, 1811, was a daughter of James Cannon, who died in that state. Mrs. Hubbard passed away at the old homestead in 1880.

Judge Hubbard spent the first ten years of his life in the state of his nativity and then came with his parents as they journeyed across the country to the northwest. He assisted in driving the loose cattle and walked six hundred miles of the way at one time, but at intervals he had the privilege of riding for a short distance. After reaching Oregon he remained at home with his parents until twenty-two years of age with the exception of a period of two years. In his youth, he attended school near his home and in Oregon City and at the age of nineteen years worked in the mines of California for a time. He passed through the Rogue river Indian war country, making the journey on pack horses, and at length arrived at Yreka, Cal. He was then engaged in mining at Deadwood until 1857 when he returned to his home, remaining with his parents until 1859. He then came into possession of one hundred and sixty acres of new land covered with brush, and there he began farming, but after two years he rented an improved farm, upon which he lived for three years. By that time his labors had brought to him a good financial return and with the money he had thus earned he purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land in the Mission Bottom and located at his new home. As the years have passed and his financial resources have enabled him to make additional purchases he has added to his property until he now owns a farm of six hundred acres in one body which is under a very high state of cultivation. This is pleasantly located twelve miles north of Salem. There grain is raised on an extensive scale, and to the cultivation of a portion of the property Judge Hubbard gives his personal supervision. He is, however, living practically retired at his home in Salem.

The judge was married in Parkerville, Ore., in 1859 to Miss Helen M. Cooley, who was born in Clay county, Mo., and was brought across the plains to Oregon in 1844, her father, Christopher C. Cooley, bringing his family to the northwest in that year. Reaching his destination, he settled on French Prairie, where he engaged in farming until his death. Mrs. Hubbard was but four years of age at the time of the overland trip. Unto the judge and his wife have been born seven children: Walter S., who is a member of the fire department of Seattle; Orville B., who is engaged in mining in Alaska; Oscar, who died on the home farm at the age of twenty-five years; Ira W. and Wylie W., who are stock men, living in Salem; Rodena, who died when but three weeks old; and Dollie, of Salem.

In his political views the judge has ever been an earnest Republican and has studied closely the issues and questions of the day and puts forth every effort in his power to promote the growth and extend the influence of his party. While residing upon his farm he was elected and served for two terms as county commissioner, entering upon the duties of the office in 1882. From early manhood he has also served as a school officer and the cause of education has found in him a warm and helpful friend. In 1892 he was elected county judge of Marion county on the Republican ticket for a term of four years, assuming the duties of the office in July of that year, serving continuously until July, 1896. In December, 1902, he was nominated on the Republican ticket for the position of city councilman from the fourth ward and in January, 1903, he took his position as a member of the board of aldermen for a two years' term. Fraternally the judge is connected with Chemeketa Lodge, No. 1, I. O. O. F., of Salem, and Salem Encampment. Judge Hubbard is kind-hearted, liberal, sympathetic and honorable, and in all life's relations he has been found true to the trusts reposed in him and worthy of the regard accorded him.

BENJAMIN B. COLBATH, who is now serving as sheriff of Marion county, was born in Salem, April 22, 1866. His father, Elijah J. Colbath, was a native of Bangor, Me., and became one of the pioneer settlers of Oregon in 1852. When a boy he went to sea and for many years followed a life on the ocean wave, rising successively from one position to another until he had become captain of a vessel. As such he sailed around Cape Horn to Portland and then resigned his captaincy in order to establish a home in Oregon. In 1853 he located in Salem and built a sawmill on the Willamette river, for the manufacture of lumber. For twelve years he conducted that enterprise in a profitable manner and then floods washed away the mill. He afterward engaged in contracting and building in Salem, where he likewise followed the occupation of a millwright until he went to the shore of Puget sound in 1889. He erected several large mills there but afterward returned to Salem, where he was actively identified with the improvements of the city as a contractor and builder. Many of the fine structures which he erected still stand as monuments to his enterprise and his skill. He was a Democrat in his political views and he died in Salem May 14, 1898. His widow, still surviving him, was born in Pike county, Ill., and bore the maiden name of Gabriella Hayden. In 1852 she came to Oregon with her father, William Hayden, who brought his family to this state, making the long and arduous journey across the plains, and upon its completion settling in Salem. In this state he followed farming until his death, which occurred in Polk county in 1868. Mrs. Colbath is still a resident of Salem, and of her six children five are still living, namely: James H., of Salem; Benjamin B.; Nathaniel, who is employed as a clerk in Salem; Alfred B., a contractor and builder here; and Camilla, of Salem.

Mr. Colbath was reared in Salem and his early educational privileges were those of the common schools. Later he entered Willamette University and completed a course in the Portland Business College in 1886. From early boyhood days he had been familiar with the building trade, having assisted his father, and followed carpentering in Salem until he went to Tacoma, where he engaged in the operation of a planing mill. For four years he was identified with industrial interests there, but in 1890 returned to Salem, where he carried on contracting and building on his own account until 1898, when he was appointed deputy sheriff under F. W. Durbin, serving for four years as his chief deputy. At the end of that time, in 1902, he was nominated on the Democratic ticket for the office of sheriff and was the only candidate on that ticket elected, the others all being defeated by a large Republican majority. Certainly no greater evidence of his personal popularity and the confidence reposed in him by his fellow citizens could be given than the fact that he was thus chosen for office. On July 7, 1902, he took the oath for a two years' term and is discharging his duties with the same reliability and promptness that characterized his service as deputy. He has always been active in support of the Democracy and his labors have not been without result in securing successes.

Mr. Colbath was married in Seattle, Wash., in 1850, to Miss Amanda Harrington, daughter of T. S. Harrington, and a native of Salt Lake City, Utah, and they have one son, Cyril B. Fraternally Mr. Colbath is connected with the Woodmen of the World and also with the Daniel Waldo Cabin, Native Sons of Oregon, and is also a member of Salem Lodge 336, B. P. O. E. He is a man well liked as is indicated by his election to the office of sheriff and his fidelity to duty is a matter above question.

CHARLES F. BELT. There is a satisfaction in having before one's eyes the example of a successful life, especially if the person who lived that life be in any way connected with one's own. It is an invisible, yet invincible, shield; it is the passport to a successful career, and even an abuse of the confidence inspired by such an association does not always have the effect of a withdrawal of the latter, since the potency of successful living continues long after the life is done. But better still than the example of such a life is the inherited tendencies that give fulfillment to so fair a promise.

In the years of Charles F. Belt, a native Oregonian, this fact is exemplified, for with the life of his father before him he could hardly fail to touch the first rounds of the ladder of success, but lacking inherent worth he could never have climbed to the height he now occupies. His father, Dr. Alfred Metcalf Belt, was born in Kentucky, July 23, 1804, and reared in Platte county, Mo. After completing his study of medicine he practiced there for many years. In 1850, with his wife and six children, he joined an emigrant train bound for Oregon, and on his arrival, continued the practice of medicine, making his home in the city of Salem. Those were the early days of Oregon, and the physician often had to travel many miles to reach his patients. Mounted on a horse with his saddle bags behind him, Dr. Belt rode up and down the Willamette valley, often remaining from home a week at a time in his ministrations to the remote settlers. It is doubtful if there was another pioneer who had more knowledge of this section of the country, on both sides of the Willamette river. With his long practice and thorough knowledge he filled with admirable success the position of professor in the medical department of the Willamette University, enjoying an enviable reputation that had been honorably earned by years of application in the profession to which he had given his life. In Masonic circles Dr. Belt was also prominent, having been made a Mason in Missouri. In Oregon he gave his hearty support to the upbuilding of the lodges of the craft, and he became a member of Salem Lodge No. 4, A. F. & A. M., and in the Grand Lodge of Oregon it was his honor to serve as its first grand master, an additional honor being the perpetuation of his name in the Belt Lodge of Kerby, Josephine county. In the midst of his busy life he found time to go to the defense of his country against the uprising of the Indians, serving as colonel of volunteers and as surgeon general. In his religious views Dr. Belt was a member of the Episcopal Church and Democratic as to his political affiliations.

On August 21, 1881, he passed away, after over fifty years in the successful practice of his profession. He married, June 17, 1835, Nancy, daughter of Gen. Thomas Ward, who won renown in the war of 1812. Mrs. Belt survives him, being now in her eighty-fifth year. She still makes her home in Salem, the scene of her husband's labors. Her father, Gen. Thomas Ward, died in Benton county, at the age of forty-nine years.

Of this union were born ten children, their names being as follows: Thomas; Sarah Elizabeth, now Mrs. Huelat; Joseph, who was graduated from the Cooper Medical School, dying in Salem; Emily, now Mrs. J. W. Jordan, of San Francisco; Alfred M. in the employ of the government at the Mare Island Navy yards of San Francisco; John D., a druggist of Sheridan; Benjamin F., pharmacist in Reading, Cal.; George W., an attorney and circuit judge at Spokane, Wash.; Marian, now the wife of Judge Burnett, of Salem, and Charles F., who was born February 14, 1860, in Salem, Ore.

With a fine education secured in the excellent public schools of Salem and the Willamette University, Charles F. Belt felt able to cope with the world in his efforts to live up to the splendid example set by his father, and in 1890 he left Salem, going to Dallas to study pharmacy with his brother, John D., where he remained for six years. Being strong in his political convictions, which were Democratic, he had early taken an active part in public affairs, and his efforts were appreciated by his fellow-townsmen, securing for him the appointment of postmaster of Dallas, under Cleveland's last administration. For five years he served in this capacity, at the end of which time he purchased a drug store in partnership with G. N. Cherrington, continuing in the business with marked success, and now owning one of the handsomest stores in the city, elegantly finished in white pine, with fixtures to match the surroundings. Their stock is up-to-date in every way, and their practiced handling of trade has won them many commendations. Their business is further increased by the placing in their hands of the agency of the Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company.

In 1896 Mr. Belt married Miss Emma Black, also a native of Oregon, the daughter of Joseph Black, a very prominent man of Dallas. Mr. Belt was elected a member of the city council in 1902, and he became a Mason in Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., in March, 1891, and has since taken the Scottish Rite degrees in Oregon Consistory No. 1 of Portland, besides being a member of Al Kader Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. He also belongs to Salem Lodge No. 18, Knights of Pythias, Woodmen of the World, and the Native Sons of Oregon.

JOHN M. KITCHEN, M. D., who for thirty-eight years has been a resident of Oregon, and for more than a quarter of a century has been engaged in the practice of medicine in Stayton, is a representative of one of the well-known families of Missouri. His father, Thomas Kitchen, was born in North Carolina, but at the age of twelve years left that state with his parents and emigrated to Missouri, where he grew to manhood. In 1847, having heard much of the wonderful opportunities afforded by the northwest, he set out for the Oregon country, the customary ox-teams being employed to convey him across the plains. After a journey consuming six months he arrived in Marion county. For some time he remained at the home of a Frenchman named Laroque, who had a claim on what is known as French Prairie, but as soon as he had become familiar with the relative value of lands in that locality he took up a donation claim on Muddy creek, near the site of the town of Halsey. In 1849, when the gold excitement was at its height in California, he left his newly established home and started on horseback over the mountains for the new Eldorado. His journey was rendered a very dangerous one by the presence of numerous bands of hostile Indians, who persistently attacked him; but he passed through in safety, reaching the gold fields on the Sacramento river, where he at once engaged in mining. Some time later he found it more profitable to run a pack train from San Francisco to the mining camps. In this occupation he remained until 1851, when, having acquired a handsome little sum of money, he returned to his home in Missouri, going by water to New Orleans. At the same time he also made a visit to his birthplace in North Carolina.

Mr. Kitchen's next location was near Little Rock, Ark., where he purchased a ranch; but not finding agricultural life in that region as satisfactory as he had anticipated he soon returned to Missouri and re-engaged in farming until 1864, when he went to Texas to remain until the close of the Civil war. The remaining years of his life were spent in that state, where his death occurred in 1900, at the age of eighty-five years. Sixteen years prior to his death he was stricken with paralysis, but it did not seriously affect his general health. He was twice married, his first wife being Mary McHard, a native of Kentucky. The only child of this union is Dr. John M. Kitchen. His second wife was Mary Best, a native of Missouri. To them were born eight children, four of whom are living: Jefferson, Moses, Samuel Tilden, all of Missouri, and Lottie, wife of Henry Teeters, of Randolph county, that state.

Dr. John M. Kitchen was born near Keytesville, Chariton county, Mo., February 12, 1842. The death of his mother occurring when he was but eighteen months old he was taken into the family of his mother's parents, with whom he remained for ten years. On account of the better educational advantages to be derived by the change he was then given into the care of his paternal grandparents. He attended the public schools until he was sixteen years of age, when he entered McGee College, a Presbyterian school now located at College Mound, Mo., where he remained for two years. Upon the outbreak of the Civil war he espoused the cause of the Confederacy, enlisting July 5, 1861, in the First Regiment of the Third Division of Infantry, under the command of General Sterling Price. He remained in this service from that time until June, 1863, in the meantime participating in the battle of Carthage, and numerous other engagements. At one time he remained in camp for four weeks drilling for a campaign, during which period the Federals were met at Fort Scott, Kans. In 1863 he was taken prisoner in company with a few other Confederate soldiers near Osceola, Mo., and for some time was imprisoned in a large store building in Clinton, that state. During his incarceration his slumbering convictions were awakened into life by maturer thought and judgment, and he realized that the south would eventually be vanquished. He took the oath of allegiance to the United States and entered the enrolled militia of Missouri in the fall of 1863. In 1864 he was honorably discharged, and entering the drug store of a personal friend, Dr. T. B. Jackson, a son of ex-Gov. Claiborne Jackson, who was also a physician, he began the study of medicine. In April, 1865, he started on his journey across the plains, reaching Brownsville, Linn county, Ore., October 5, his trip having been rendered more than ordinarily interesting by several exciting skirmishes with the Sioux Indians in the Medicine Bull Mountains.

Upon his arrival in Linn county Dr. Kitchen engaged in teaching in the public schools, a vocation he followed until 1874. In the meantime he continued his medical researches in Willamette University. In June, 1875, he removed to Stayton and engaged in practice in partnership with Dr. McCauley. The following year he resumed his studies in the medical department of Willamette University, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D., in June, 1877. Since that time he has been continuously engaged in the conduct of a laborious practice in Stayton, with the exception of a few months spent in East Portland and about four years, during which he took a much-needed rest on account of the state of his health. In 1893 he visited the Columbian Exposition at Chicago, and from there went to New York City, where he took a post-graduate course in the New York Post-Graduate Medical College.

The marriage of Dr. Kitchen, which occurred October 20, 1872, united him with Melissa J. Wheeler, a daughter of Jason and Eliza (Claypool) Wheeler. They have an adopted daughter, Deane, now the wife of Dr. F. R. Bowersox, of Glendale, Ore. Fraternally Dr. Kitchen is a Mason, affiliating with Santiam Lodge No. 25. In his political preferences he is a Democrat of the Jacksonian school, and has never wavered in his faith in the righteousness of the principles underlying the fabric of that party. He is a member of the Baptist Church. Dr. Kitchen's career as a practitioner has been greeted with success. He has not rested content with the foundation of knowledge with which he was equipped at the beginning of his career, as is altogether too frequently the case, but he has been and is to-day a constant student, keeping fully abreast of the most advanced thought in medical science. He is esteemed alike by his fellow-practitioners in the Willamette valley and by the laity, who keenly appreciate his talent and ability, the great care which he bestows upon all cases intrusted to him, whether his patients be rich or poor, and the kindly disposition so frequently manifested by him in the midst of his arduous professional labors. He is accorded a personal character above reproach, and belongs to that class of men who are always ready and anxious to contribute to the well-being of their fellow-men.

GEN. W. H. ODELL, who is now living retired in Salem, but who for many years was an active factor in business circles and in the development and progress of the state, was born near Delphi, Ind., December 25, 1830. He comes of an old family of Welsh lineage. On leaving the little rock-ribbed country of Wales, his first American ancestors settled in Canada, whence representatives of the name later went to New York. James Odell, the grandfather of our subject, was born in northern New York, whence he removed to South Carolina. Later he became a pioneer farmer of Ohio and Indiana. He died near Delphi, Ind., where he had settled in 1825. John Odell, the father, was born near the dividing line between North and South Carolina, in 1799, and in 1803 was taken by his parents to Wayne county, Ohio, and in 1808 to Wayne county, Ind. He stood guard at a block-house in which the farmers had taken refuge during the battle of Tippecanoe. In 1825 he took up his abode near Delphi, Ind., being the first settler of the township, following an old trail to his home, as there was no wagonroad. Having built a log house he began hewing out a farm in the midst of the forest of oak and black walnut trees, and continued his farming operations in the Hoosier state until 1851, when he came with his family to Oregon, traveling across the country until he reached Yamhill county. He settled near Dayton, securing a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, which he broke and improved, making his home thereon until his death, in March, 1869. In politics he was first a Whig and afterward a Republican; and religiously he was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. While in Indiana he married Sarah Holman, who was born near Louisville, Ky., a cousin of Congressman Holman, of Indiana, and a daughter of George Holman, who, in 1781, at the age of sixteen years, was taken prisoner by the Indians while acting as an escort to a government team on the road from Virginia to Kentucky. For three years he was held captive by the Indians, and then securing his freedom, he settled near Centerville, Wayne county, Ind., where he followed farming until his death, at the age of one hundred and two years. He was a representative of an old Virginia family, of English descent. His daughter, Mrs. Odell, died in Yamhill county, in 1888, at the age of eighty-three years.

In the family of John and Sarah Odell were eleven children, ten of whom reached years of maturity: Mrs. Martha Coovert, deceased; Russell B., a farmer of Josephine county, Ore.; Joseph, who died in Yamhill county; Mrs. Sarah McTeer, who resides near McMinnville; W. H., of this review; James A., who died in Eugene, Ore., in 1872; Mrs. Mary Farnsworth, who died in Yamhill county; George W., a physician, residing near McMinnville; Charlotte, now Mrs. A. L. Alderman, of Dayton, this state, and John Albert, who is engaged in the insurance business in McMinnville.

Upon the home farm in Indiana General Odell was reared and pursued his education in the subscription schools. When twenty years of age he came with his parents to Oregon, starting from Indiana on the 10th of March with ox teams, in a train of sixteen wagons, with four yoke of oxen to each wagon. At Peoria they crossed the Illinois river, and at Fort Madison, the Mississippi. They purchased one hundred and fifty head of cattle in Iowa, and then proceeded onward, crossing the Missouri river at Council Bluffs. At that time there was not a single house on the site of Omaha, and beyond that a waste. They followed the old Oregon trail, and did not see any Indians between Elkhorn and Green river, except at a ferry, and there they were leaving because of a small-pox scare. The family arrived in the Willamette valley September 26, 1851, and in Yamhill county October 3.

Mr. Odell remained with his father until February, 1853, and assisted in breaking the fields, planting the crops and also in planting an orchard. He then entered the Oregon Institute, now Willamette University, where, for two years, he pursued a course in the classics and civil engineering, going into the field in the summer of 1854, with a corps of surveyors. He began as chainman with a company engaged in government work in Yamhill county, after which he returned to school, and the next spring he again spent two months in surveying. In 1855, he settled on a farm near Dayton, and continued to improve the place until 1860, when he rented his land, and he and his wife took charge of the Santiam, better known as Lebanon, Academy, with which they were connected for three years. Removing then to Eugene, General Odell entered the service of the surveyor-general of Oregon as deputy United States surveyor, and was thus engaged until 1871. During two summers, 1864 and 1865, he was employed by the Oregon Central Military Wagon Road Company, in locating and making the survey of the route, and in the summer of 1869-70, was superintendent of construction of the military road. In 1871 he was appointed by President Grant surveyor-general of Oregon, and made his headquarters at Eugene. He served in this office until 1874. The following year he was nominated a presidential elector on the Republican ticket, and being elected, he was selected by the Electoral College to carry the votes to Washington, and he became a prominent factor in what was known as the Oregon Case. The votes which he carried for Oregon made the election of the Republican nominees, Hayes and Wheeler, possible.

General Odell continued to act as deputy United States surveyor until the spring of 1877, when he purchased the Statesman, of which he was the editor and proprietor until 1884, and during that time he was for two years the state printer, having been elected in 1880. After selling his paper he was appointed postmaster of Salem by President Arthur, and filled the position for four years and one month, or until April, 1889. In 1891, he was appointed by the surveyor-general of Oregon as inspector of public surveys. For fifteen months he was engaged by the Indian department in surveying and allotting lands to the Indians on the Selitz reservation. With Judge Boise and Major Harding he was appointed a commissioner to negotiate with the Indians for such of their lands as were in excess of the amount of the allotments. In this work General Odell was made disbursing agent. In 1895, following the election of Governor Lord, he was appointed clerk of the state land board of Salem, and upon the expiration of his four years' term he retired to private life, and is now living in Salem.

In 1855, General Odell married Mrs. Elizabeth (McLench) Thurston, who was born near Bangor, Me., and was a graduate of the Bangor Female Seminary. In 1853, she became preceptress of the Oregon Institute, which position she held for two years, and in 1860, of the Santiam Academy for a term of four years. She was the widow of the Hon. Samuel R. Thurston, who crossed the plains in 1847, and settled in Oregon City. He was an attorney, and served as a delegate to congress from the territory of Oregon. He died while on the way home from the second session on the steamer off the coast of Acapulco, Mexico. Mrs. Odell, who died in Portland, in March, 1890, was the mother of two children by her first marriage, George H., and Mrs. A. W. Stowell, of Portland. In 1894, in Indiana, the general married Mrs. Carrie (Bright) Taylor, a native of Ohio.

General Odell is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Oregon Historical Society and the Pioneer Society. Since 1878 he has been a member of the board of trustees of Willamette University, and its president since 1891, and his efforts in its behalf have been instrumental in promoting its welfare and extending its influence. Always a Republican in politics, his opinions have carried weight in the councils of his party, and for many years he was a member of the state central committee. An active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he is now serving as chairman of the board of trustees of his home church, and in 1890 he was a delegate to the general conference of the church held in Chicago. If one examines his life to find the secret of his influence in so many lines, it will be seen that it rests upon his deep interest and zeal in every movement which he endorses,—a zeal which inspires others. He has much of that quality which, for want of a better name, is called personal magnetism, and which arises from a sincere regard for his fellow men and a hopeful view of the world and its progress.

CHARLES P. BISHOP. Among Salem's business and professional men none is more closely identified with the growth and best interests of the city than C. P. Bishop, who has made his home here for twelve years, a period within which the city has attained her present proud position, vying with other metropolitan centers for leadership in the world of commerce. For many years Mr. Bishop has been known for his sterling qualities, his fearless loyalty to his honest convictions, his sturdy opposition to misrule in municipal affairs and his clear-headedness, discretion and tact as manager and leader. He is now serving as mayor of the city and is a popular and progressive officer, his administration being at all times practical and beneficial.

Mr. Bishop was born in Contra Costa county, Cal., September 23, 1854, and traces his ancestry back to an early epoch in American history. His great-grandfather was killed in the war of 1812. His grandfather, William Bishop, was born in the south and was married in Tennessee, after which he removed to Alabama. He was a mechanic and went to that state in order to build cotton gins. Subsequently he became a pioneer farmer of Indiana, and in 1836 removed to Illinois, settling in McLean county, ten miles from Bloomington. There he secured government land, which is still in possession of his descendants and upon that farm he passed his remaining days.

Hon. W. R. Bishop, the father of Salem's mayor, was born in Carroll county, Ind., and obtained his education in the public schools of Illinois and in Cherry Grove Seminary. In 1850 he started across the plains to California, traveling with mules and horses. He made his way to the mines and for a year was engaged in a search for the precious metal, after which he turned his attention to farming, which he followed in California until 1856, when he went by way of Portland to Linn county, Ore. There he secured a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres and devoted his energies to its cultivation and improvement until 1879, when he removed to Portland, where he is living retired. In 1893 he represented Multnomah county in the state legislature. He served as secretary to Governor D. W. Ballard of Idaho, and was appointed by him superintendent of public instruction for that territory. He acted in the latter capacity from 1866 to 1868, when he resigned in order to return to Oregon. He has been an advocate of Republican principles since the Dred Scott decision, and upon the organization of the party he became a stalwart advocate of its principles and has never wavered in his allegiance to the party. Socially he is connected with the Masonic fraternity; and he is an ordained minister of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In early manhood he married Elizabeth J. Adams, a native of Indiana. Her father started across the plains to California in 1846, accompanied by his wife and three children; but he died during the trip. His widow continued the journey and with her little family located in California, where Mrs. Bishop was living at the time of her marriage. She became the mother of three sons and four daughters. With the exception of one daughter all reached mature years, namely: C. P., of this review; Mary D., the wife of W. O. Stannard, of Portland; Jay A., of Salem; Mrs. Clara L. Starr, of Brownsville, Ore.; Mrs. Effie Muir, who died in Portland in 1901; and Fred E. and Estella, both of Portland.

C. P. Bishop, of this review, was reared upon the home farm in Linn county, Ore., and obtained his education in the public schools of Crawfordsville. In 1874 he started out in life for himself as a clerk in Brownsville, and in 1878 began business on his own account as a general merchant of Crawfordsville, where he remained until 1884. In that year he established a clothing store in McMinnville, which he conducted with success until 1889, when he joined Thomas Kay in the incorporation of the Thomas Kay Woolen Mills Company, Mr. Kay becoming president and manager, while Mr. Bishop was a director in the business until 1900, at which time he resigned. He assisted Mr. Kay in building up the mills at Salem, and in 1889 he went to Portland as a representative of the milling interests there. In 1891 he established his home in Salem and became proprietor of the Salem Woolen Mills store. In 1897 he established the Salem Woolen Mills store in Portland, located in the Sherlock building. This store is large and well arranged and in each place he carries on a general merchant tailoring business with excellent success. He is a man of marked enterprise, keen discernment and unflinching perseverance, and he forms his plans readily and is determined in their execution.

While residing in Brownsville, Ore., Mr. Bishop was married to Miss Fannie Kay, who was born in Yorkshire, England, in November, 1857, a daughter of Thomas Kay, who was also a native of the same country and became a practical woolen manufacturer, as were his ancestors for several generations. Crossing the Atlantic to New England he there engaged in woolen manufacturing. About 1862 or 1863 he came to Oregon, having been persuaded by the people of Brownsville to remove to this state and build and operate a woolen mill there. Two or three years afterward, however, the mill was burned, and while he had periods of prosperity he also suffered a number of hardships in his business career. In 1872, in company with two others he leased the old Brownsville Mill for a period of three years, and later they purchased the property, conducting it for sixteen years, when they sold out. In 1889 Mr. Kay built the Salem Woolen Mill, of which he was manager up to the time of his death in 1900. This proved a large and important enterprise and was successfully conducted by Mr. Kay from its establishment. In 1896 his plant was destroyed by fire, but the following year he rebuilt and carried on the work with unflagging energy. Prominent in the Masonic fraternity, he attained the Knight Templar degree, and his life was in harmony with the beneficent teaching of his craft. His widow, Mrs. Ann Kay, still resides in Salem. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Bishop have been born three children: Clarence M., who spent five years in the University of Oregon; Thomas Royal, who was for two years a student in the Willamette University; and Robert Chauncey, who is now preparing for a commercial career at the Bond Institute of Mercantile Training in New York City, and will probably follow in the footsteps of his father. The two eldest sons are graduates of the Philadelphia Textile School, and of the Pennsylvania Museum and School of Industrial Art at Philadelphia, and will devote their lives to the woolen manufacturing industry on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Bishop is a member of the Greater Salem Commercial Club and is a man of marked influence and popularity in the city because of his genuine worth of character and his devotion to the public good, his loyalty to Salem and its interests being above question. In December, 1898, he was nominated on an independent citizen's ticket for mayor of the city and was elected by a large majority. He filled the office so acceptably that in December, 1900, he was re-elected. His administration has been one of great benefit to Salem and its people. He has been progressive and practical; and while he has introduced many improvements he has at the same time saved a large amount of money to the people. His administration refunded eighty-five thousand dollars of the floating indebtedness by reducing it twenty thousand dollars, and then refunded sixty-five thousand dollars by popular loan at four per cent, payable on or before ten years. Formerly the interest had been from six to eight per cent. It had always been claimed by financiers that bonds must be sold to bondholders, and that there must be a stipulated time of maturity; but the course which Mr. Bishop introduced soon proved practical and the issue was subscribed for three times over in Salem. In this he established a precedent hitherto unknown in Oregon. During the first year of his administration the electric light contract expired and was reduced from fifty-four hundred to twenty-five hundred dollars.

His business ability and his business-like administration of the city's affairs have been manifest in many other ways proving equally valuable to Salem. He has demonstrated that the affairs of the city could be run upon a tax levy of ten mills on the dollar, which his predecessors could not do, for in controlling the city's affairs they had run behind in expenses. Under the leadership of Mr. Bishop the city has certainly had an economical administration and is not only out of debt, but has a good surplus in its treasury. The soldier on the field of battle has displayed no greater loyalty than has Mr. Bishop in the support of American institutions and his condemnation of political intrigue. There is no doubt that had he entered into the methods of many politicians he could have obtained almost any office he might desire, but with him principle is above party, purity and economy in municipal affairs above personal interest.

Along other lines of progress and advancement Mr. Bishop is also prominent. He is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of McMinnville; and in 1897 he was elected a trustee of the Willamette University and is now vice-president of its board. He also is a member of the Oregon Historical Society. In consequence of his prominence in political, commercial and social life he has a wide acquaintance and has gained a host of warm friends, whose high and sincere regard he possesses.

THOMAS A. JONES. Soon after the birth of Thomas A. Jones, which occurred in Johnson county, Ind., August 20, 1844, his parents, Lewis W. and Mary A. (McCalpin) Jones, removed to Andrew county, Mo., where they resided for six years. The agitation regarding the rich lands and mining opportunities in the far west even at this early day had penetrated the quiet agricultural regions of Missouri, and Lewis Jones was one of the first men living in his neighborhood to place credence in the reports heralded throughout the country. After carefully considering the matter he decided to cast his lot among those who were seeking their fortunes in the country west of the Rocky mountains. Disposing of his farming land at a profit he outfitted for the long journey across the plains with four wagons and four yoke of oxen each, and started overland. Arriving in Oregon in the fall of 1852, after a journey which consumed six months, he bought three hundred and twenty acres of land in the Waldo Hills, then, as now, considered one of the garden spots of the entire Pacific slope. This property was located near what was known as the Union Hill school house, and contained a log cabin in which his family found shelter from the inclement weather of the approaching rainy season. A few acres were fenced in, and with this improvement to encourage his pioneer spirits he set about the task of housing his stock and performing such other duties as were required to make his household comfortable among the strange surroundings.

For six years this sturdy pioneer continued to occupy this farm, and undoubtedly would have made it his permanent home had not the title to the land been disputed. In order to avoid legal complications he bought three hundred and twenty acres near Jefferson, upon which there were a few improvements. There he resided until removing to Oakland, Ore., where he died in 1884, at the age of seventy-two years. The death of his wife occurred at the same age.

Lewis Jones was an energetic man, enterprising, capable and resourceful, and appeared to appreciate fully what was demanded of pioneer settlers of the most reliable kind. He took an active interest in the cause of education, promoting good schools, and was in a large measure responsible for the excellent condition of the roads of the county, even as they exist at the present day.

The little log school house located a mile from the Jones farm numbered among its pupils in this early day Thomas A. Jones, who was accounted one of the most eager and capable of the young searchers after knowledge. At the age of twenty-one years he began to work on the surrounding farms. October 30, 1878, he was united in marriage with Ellen Short, who became the mother of nine children. Of these Walter, the oldest son, has been in Alaska for the past five years; Etta is the wife of Norman Williams and they reside in Fairhaven, Wash.; William lives on a farm near his father; the remainder are Edith, John, Clifford, Bessie, Susan and Bertha, the two last named being now deceased. Bertha had become the wife of L. W. Ross, a jeweler of Albany, and they were the parents of two sons, Elfin and Carlton. The mother of this family passed away in January, 1886.

After his marriage Mr. Jones rented land for six years, and then bought the farm in the Waldo Hills, which is now his home. It contains one hundred and sixty acres of fine land, ninety acres of which is under a high state of cultivation. Upon the settlement of the estate of Mrs. Jones' father, John W. Short, another farm of one hundred and nine acres was added to this first one, both farms at present being devoted to general farming and stockraising. Mr. Jones is recognized as one of the progressive farmers of Marion county, and his efforts have contributed materially to the agricultural prestige of the community. He exhibits a commendable public spirit when the occasion demands, and is known as a man of strict integrity and excellent business judgment.

FRANK MARTIN BROOKS, M. D. Everything in connection with the life and work of Dr. Frank M. Brooks, of Silverton, indicates prosperity, culture, knowledge of the world, and exceptionally high professional standing. He enjoys one of the most desirable and lucrative practices in the Willamette valley, and from his home radiate helpfulness and strength into hundreds of homes throughout Marion county.

Dr. Brooks was born in Salem, Ore., April 10, 1868, a son of John and Martha R. (Harper) Brooks. His father, who was born in Kentucky March 7, 1824, crossed the plains in 1864, and settled upon a farm near Salem. There he engaged in general farming until 1897, when he retired from active life to spend his remaining years with his children. He still owns a home in the suburbs of Salem, consisting of twenty-five acres, the remainder of his property having been laid out in lots and named the Brooks subdivision. His marriage to Martha R. Harper, who was born in Hart county, Ky., August 2, 1834, occurred in Kentucky, April 9, 1848. To this union ten children were born, named in the order of their birth as follows: Mary W., deceased; Irene, wife of E. P. Hodnett, of Portland; William W., deceased; John H., of Silverton; Lydia A., wife of R. H. Leabo, of Salem; Frank M.; Clyde C., of Los Angeles, Cal.; Edward A., head keeper of the United States light station at Dungeness, Wash.; Lenora, of Portland, and Dr. Benjamin F., of Sedro Woolley, Wash.

After being graduated from the Salem public schools, in 1882, Dr. Brooks, then fourteen years of age, entered the employ of Murphy, Grant & Co., wholesale dry-goods merchants, in their branch house in Portland, with whom he remained for two years. In the meantime he had decided to devote his life to the science of medicine, and therefore resigned his clerkship for the purpose of applying himself wholly to the mastery of his chosen profession. After a course of study with Dr. Horace Carpenter, covering a period of two years, he entered Cooper Medical College in San Francisco, where he studied one year. He then entered the medical department of the University of Oregon, from which he was graduated with the class of 1890. The first two years of his career as a practitioner were spent in La Camas, Wash., but since 1892 he has been engaged in his professional labors in Silverton, with the exception of the time devoted to further research in the east and in foreign capitals. In 1894, he entered Jefferson Medical College, at Philadelphia, from which he was graduated May 15, 1895. Again resuming practice in Silverton, he was very successful. In 1902 he temporarily abandoned a large and lucrative practice in order that he might spend three months in Europe. This period he devoted to post-graduate work in the leading hospitals of London, Paris, Vienna, Prague and Edinburgh, where he was enabled to avail himself of instruction at the hands of some of the most illustrious exponents of medical and surgical science in the world. With this rare equipment for his future career he returned to Silverton, and is now practicing with a degree of success which has at once given him rank with the foremost physicians and surgeons of Oregon.

January 21, 1891, Dr. Brooks was united in marriage with Agnes Gordon, a native of Chicago, Ill., and a daughter of the Rev. John Gordon, D.D. Her father, who is a clergyman in the Baptist Church, is a native of Scotland. He was formerly pastor of the First Baptist Church of Portland. He is now a resident of Philadelphia, where he is pastor of the Second Baptist Church and dean of Temple College. Two children were born of this marriage, Irwin and Agnes, both of whom are living at home. Agnes Gordon Brooks died in Silverton, April 11, 1898. On September 11, 1900, Dr. Brooks married Jessie Fremont Davis, who is also a practicing physician. She was born in Silverton February 8, 1870, a daughter of Dr. Platt A. Davis, a pioneer physician of Silverton. She was educated in the Silverton public schools and in the Academy of the Sacred Heart of Salem, being graduated from the latter institution in 1887. In 1892 she entered the medical department of the University of Oregon, from which she was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine, in 1896. Until her marriage, she was engaged in practice in Silverton, though independently from the practice of her father.

Contrary to family tradition and family training, Dr. Brooks is a staunch adherent of Republican principles. For one term, from May, 1899, to May, 1900, he filled the office of mayor of Silverton. Fraternally, he is associated with the Masons, being a member of Silverton Lodge No. 43, A. F. & A. M., and other orders.

In closing this brief review of the career of Dr. Brooks, it does not seem out of place to make a permanent record of the high esteem in which he is held by reason of the many substantial and gracious traits of his character. The foundation of his learning had been laid broad and deep, and he has exhibited a determination to make the best of the opportunities afforded by the time and location with which he has been favored, by adopting every possible means of keeping in touch with the most advanced thought in the world of medical science. Personally, he is extremely liberal in his views of affairs in general, the result of extended travel and close contact with some of the best and brightest minds in Europe and America. Possessed of an optimistic temperament, his presence in the sick-room brings a cheer and encouragement which, in themselves, do much toward bringing a forgetfulness of woes to the patient. Aside from his professional labors—though they are of a most arduous nature—he has taken the time to give such aid as lies within his power to the advancement of other local interests. No worthy enterprise calculated to promote the best interests of the community is slighted by him; but on the contrary, he lends his influence, as well as more material aid when the occasion demands it, to the advancement of all measures which, in his opinion, will elevate the social, industrial, moral and intellectual status of the community. All in all, his record is one worthy of emulation by young men who are actuated by ambitions similar to those which prompted him to undertake preparation for a career in medicine. It is with genuine pleasure that those responsible for the compilation of this volume give this review of his life and work a prominent place in the annals of the men of the Willamette valley.

MAURICE KLINGER. One of the most important elements in our American citizenship is that furnished by the fatherland. The representatives of the Teutonic race have ever been progressive and have carried the civilization of their own country westward, taking an active part in reclaiming new districts and bringing them up to a high standard of improvement and progress. Mr. Klinger has been one of the most important factors in the upbuilding of Salem, his labors being felt along many lines of advancement and certainly he deserves prominent mention in this volume. He was born in Alsace, Germany, April 10, 1844. His father, Maurice Klinger, was a farmer and distiller there and spent his entire life in that province. The grandfather of our subject was also a native of that locality. The mother, whose maiden name was Mary Eckerlen, was born in Alsace and was a daughter of August Eckerlen, a farmer of that community. Unto the parents of our subject were born six children, of whom Maurice is the eldest. The others are August, of Mt. Angel, Marion county; Emil, who resides at the old home in Germany; Edward, who is also living at the old home place in the fatherland; Mrs. Adele Ackerlen, of Germany; and Ernest, who makes his home at New Whatcom, Wash.

In the land of his nativity Maurice Klinger spent the days of his boyhood and youth, attending the national schools in accordance with the rules of the country. He learned the distiller's trade in his early youth. When sixteen years of age he became his father's assistant at farming and distilling and was thus engaged until 1869, when he began learning the brewer's trade in the city of Kaisersburg. He afterward completed his trade at Colmer and in 1873, thinking to enjoy the better business opportunities of the new world, he crossed the Atlantic from Havre to New York City, and thence proceeded inland to Illinois. He was employed by John Stenger, a brewer of Naperville, Ill., and afterward spent a few months in Chicago, going thence to St. Louis, where he was in the service of the Leup and Anheuser-Busch Companies and also of the Winklemeyer Company.

The year 1877 witnessed the arrival of Mr. Klinger in Salem, and here with the capital he had acquired through his own diligence and economy he established the Capitol Brewery located on Commercial street. He afterward purchased the present site and in 1885 erected a new brick brewing plant, the main building being seventy-five by eighty feet. There is also a boiler house and ice machine and the plant is thoroughly equipped with all modern accessories for carrying on the work. There are two ice machines, one of ten tons and the other of twenty tons, and two boilers are used in the operation of the plant. He manufactures malt, beer and ice and the capacity of the brewery is thirty-five hundred barrels per annum. In the early days of his residence here Mr. Klinger had to haul his product to different cities in Polk, Yamhill and Marion counties before the era of railroad shipment. As the years have passed he has built up a very extensive trade, developing a splendid brewery and the patronage which is accorded him has made him one of the wealthy citizens of his community. His business methods have ever been straightforward and honorable and the business which he has developed has become one of the leading industries of Salem. Mr. Klinger has also extended his efforts into other lines of activity and his building interests have done much to improve the city. He erected store buildings, including a double store and a single store, and he is also the owner of other property. His attention is now largely given to the supervision of his investments. In 1900 he sold the brewery business, for he found that his attention was largely taken up by his other interests.

Mr. Klinger was married in Sublimity, Ore., to Miss Virginia Eckerlen, who was born in Alsace, a daughter of John Eckerlen, who was also a native of that locality and a farmer by occupation. In 1871 he brought his family, consisting of his wife and five children, to America, locating in Dupage county, Ill., and in 1875 he became a resident of Sublimity, Ore. He followed farming in that locality for a time, but afterward died in Mount Angel. His wife bore the maiden name of Mary Klinger, who was born in Alsace, while her death occurred in Sublimity. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Eckerlen were five children, of whom four are living, Mrs. Klinger, wife of the subject of this review, being the third in order of birth. She has two children, Ernest and Bertha.

Mr. Klinger belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen and has held office in the Salem lodge. He votes with the Republican party and in matters of citizenship he is public-spirited and progressive, giving hearty aid and co-operation to every movement for the substantial up-building and material improvement of his city. He certainly shows in his life history what may be accomplished by determination and energy guided by sound business judgment, for to these qualities he owes his splendid success in life.

WILLIAM Y. RICHARDSON, who is serving as county treasurer of Marion county, represents one of the old and honored pioneer families of Oregon, his grandfather, John Richardson, having arrived in this state in 1851. Andrew J. Richardson, the father of our subject, was born near Quincy, Ill., and was about eighteen years of age when the family crossed the long, hot stretches of sand and made their way through the mountain passes into the fertile valleys of Oregon. They settled in Linn county, and on attaining his majority A. J. Richardson secured a donation claim near Scio in that county. With characteristic energy he began its cultivation and improvement and resided thereon until 1872, when he took up his abode in Stayton, where he conducted a hotel known as the Farmer's Hotel. He is one of the oldest representatives of this line of business in Oregon and has a wide acquaintance among the traveling public. He married Emeline Crabtree, a native of Missouri and a daughter of Washington Crabtree, who was born in Tennessee, whence he removed to Missouri. About 1852, with ox-teams, he crossed the plains and settled near Scio in Linn county, where he remained until his retirement to private life, when he took up his abode in Stayton, dying there in October, 1901, in his ninety-third year. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Richardson were born seven children: Susan C., wife of J. H. Wylie, a business man of Seattle, Wash.; William Y., of this review; Warren, of Stayton, Ore.; and four who have passed away.

William Y. Richardson was born on the home farm near Stayton, Linn county, June 2, 1864, and upon the home farm remained until eight years of age, when his father removed to Stayton just as the place was being established. There the son attended the public schools and later he was engaged with his father in the livery business under the firm name of Richardson & Son. When nineteen years of age he purchased the business from his father and continued as proprietor of the barns with success. Later he consolidated his business with that of Thomas Brothers, under the firm name of Thomas Brothers & Company. They had two barns in Stayton, conducting these until 1894, when the firm sold out to Thomas & Trask. Mr. Richardson then moved to Salem to become proprietor of the Club stables as a member of the firm of Downing, Thomas & Co. This firm conducted a general livery business for three years; at the end of that time our subject sold out and returned to Stayton, where he engaged in dealing in stock including cattle, sheep and horses. He was recognized as a prominent dealer in sheep, buying and selling. When elected to public office in July, 1902, however, he returned to Salem.

Mr. Richardson was married in this city to Miss Maude Kress, a native of Wisconsin, and they have two children, Paul K. and Homer J. Mr. Richardson belongs to the Woodmen of the World and he has taken an active interest in local politics, serving for seven years as a member of the city council of Stayton, and for one year as its president. In 1902 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for the office of county treasurer and was elected by a majority of about sixteen hundred. On the 7th of July, of that year, he entered upon his duties which he is now acceptably discharging, managing the affairs of the office in a prompt and business-like manner.

JAMES A. HOWARD. A liberal and enterprising citizen of Albany, Linn county, is to be found in the person of James Austin Howard, who has recently become connected with the commercial life of the city, engaging in 1902 in the real estate business. The energy and application which he has put forth clearly stamps him as one of the rising young men of the community.

J. L. Howard, the father of J. A. of this review, was a native of Kentucky, and the son of Charles Howard, a representative of an old Virginia family. The grandfather made his home in Kentucky at an early date, later removing to Iowa, where J. L. Howard spent much of his life up to the year 1864. At this period he crossed the plains with ox-teams, six months of the year being consumed in the passage, during which they had many exciting encounters with the Indians, and upon the arrival in Oregon he settled near Sheridan, Yamhill county, where his mother died. A short time after he continued the journey by team into California, and from that location returned east via San Francisco and Panama. On making his home in Iowa once more he located four miles south of Marshalltown, and engaged in farming. Fond of the excitement and adventures of traveling Mr. Howard made many trips to Oregon, his last one being the ninth and leaving him a resident of the state in which he had been so long interested. The last journey was made in June, 1887, and the changing years had brought a wonderful difference in the mode of traveling, his thoughts in the Pullman sleeper going back to the days and nights on the open plains, surrounded by a loneliness which held many unseen dangers, and through which the pioneers of those early days fought their slow, patient way.

The first settlement which Mr. Howard made was one mile east of Amity, where he now owns a farm of two hundred and seventy-two acres, and from which he later removed to a location one-half mile southwest of Albany. This consists of a comparatively small place, but from the cultivation of which he gains substantial returns, as ten acres embodied in the property are devoted to the raising of fruit. The wife who shares his home was formerly Rachel A. Gillespie, a native of Indiana, and the daughter of Norilla Gillespie, a prominent farmer in Marshalltown, Iowa. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Howard, Franklin is an extensive farmer in Washington; Charles Norilla is a merchant in Chico, Cal.; James Austin is the subject of this review; Robert Pleasant is farming on a part of the old home in Yamhill county; Stephen Edward is also engaged in farming on the home place; Ernest E. and Ella Penelope are both at home with their parents.

The natal day of James Austin Howard was February 13, 1871, and his birth occurred in Marshalltown, Iowa. His childhood was spent in a far different manner from many, enjoying with a child's keen delight the various trips across the country, and which gave to him a residence in Iowa, California, Texas and Oregon, in all of which he attended the public schools, his education being in no wise neglected on account of the many movings. He crossed the plains eight or nine times and in 1887 he became with his parents a permanent resident of Yamhill county. There he attended and graduated in the Amity schools, thereafter taking a course in both the McMinnville College and Willamette University. Interested more or less in his father's pursuit he followed farming in Amity for a short time, but in 1896 he went to Corvallis and engaged in the commission and produce business, in which business he remained for about a year. Returning at the expiration of that time to the farm he conducted the occupation for five years, when he again changed his location, settling in Albany, and entering upon his present business career. In addition to his real estate business, he is also engaged in the raising of sheep and cattle.

In Anny Mr. Howard was married to Miss Lula M. Jones, who was born in Yamhill county and educated in McMinnville College, and of this union one child has been born, Francyl. In his fraternal relations Mr. Howard affiliates with the Knights of the Maccabees, the Independent Order of the Lions, and the Twenty-five Hundredths of Albany, and religiously is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Broadminded and earnest in his efforts for the general welfare, he is interested in all political movements, his convictions lying with the Democratic party. In the business affairs of the city he is a member of the Albany Real Estate Exchange, in which he acts as treasurer.

L. T. DAVIS. A fine old pioneer home, an exclusive agricultural and stock-raising enterprise, and a forceful, progressive personality is embodied in the farm and character of L. T. Davis, than whom there is no more prominent and influential man in Yamhill county. Mr. Davis is a native of Andrew county, Mo., where he was born March 26, 1838, a son of Samuel and Mary (Brock) Davis from whom he inherited the sterling traits which have brought about his success.

Samuel Davis was one of the best known of the pioneers of this county, and though his death occurred as long ago as February 27, 1875, his aptitude in grasping and using the opportunities by which he was surrounded in the west may well serve as an example to all aspirants to homes and a competency. Mr. Davis was born in New Jersey, December 13, 1804, and when a young man moved to Ohio, where he married the wife who proved a helpmate indeed, and who died January, 1872, three years before her husband, at the age of sixty-six. The couple moved to Missouri in 1836, and ten years later, in 1846, started across the plains with nine yoke of oxen and three wagons, on the way experiencing little difficulty with the Indians, nor was their health impaired by the deprivations to which they were subjected for six months. Mr. Davis settled near Dilley, Washington county for about a year, and then lived for a year near Olympia, Wash., returning to the farm near Dilley, for about six months. In 1848 he became identified with Yamhill county where he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he erected a log house for the temporary residence of his family. The following year, the well remembered '49, he went to California with his son Albertus, and for a year engaged in mining and prospecting with considerable success. Returning with his little hoard to his family in Yamhill county he engaged in farming and stock-raising, his material success and personal popularity increasing with the passing of the years. At one time he owned one thousand acres all in one body, and he made many improvements on his land, keeping at all time in touch with the progress of farming as understood in the most advanced centers of activity.

In his capacity as an all around useful citizen, Samuel Davis exerted a highly moral influence in the community, and he was one of the pillars and the chief supporters, financially, of the old-school Baptist Church. At no time was he especially connected with politics, and never worked for or accepted responsible official recognition. He was a staunch advocate of education, and as far as lay in his power gave his children every available advantage. Of the nine children born to himself and wife J. B. is deceased; William B. is a farmer of Whitman county, Wash.; Martha A. is deceased; Albertus C. is deceased; and L. T., Sarah, Elizabeth, Rachel A. and May M. complete the number. All the daughters are deceased.

After leaving the parental home, at the age of twenty-one, L. T. Davis went to Boise City and became interested in mining and prospecting. He was educated in the public schools and at McMinnville College, and in his youth devoted much more time to securing an education than is permitted to the busy life of the average farm-reared lad. He also experienced many pleasures among the half wild scenes of the country, among which was that of hunting. He has had many exciting adventures while enjoying this pastime, his experiences being principally with bears and Spanish cattle. Many a time he has been driven to take refuge in a tree where he has remained a half day, one time especially recalled while hauling rails with an ox-team. One night he heard some sort of an animal prowling about the house and he went out with the intention of chasing it away, when he was met by a huge black bear which caused himself and dog to beat a hasty retreat. June 17, 1873, he married Margaret A. Hunsaker, a native of Oregon, and niece of Rev. A. J. Hunsaker, of McMinnville. Her parents crossed the plains in 1847, settling in Polk county. In the house where he now lives Mr. Davis and his wife started in to make a home on the old donation claim three and a half miles southwest of McMinnville, and here Mrs. Davis died in 1892. Four children were born to them, Mary E. and Ernest W., both of whom are deceased, and Lois V. and Naomi E., at home. In 1895 Mr. Davis married Clara J. Skinner, a native of Indiana, and daughter of O. B. and Letitia Skinner, who came to Oregon in 1877. O. B. Skinner died in Yamhill county in 1897. Of the seven children born to himself and wife four are living, namely: Charles J.; Clara J.; Ida A., who spent four and a half years in India as missionary for the Baptist Church; and Orrin C.

With the exception of three years spent in eastern Oregon and McMinnville Mr. Davis has lived continuously on his present farm, which is one of the finest in the county from the standpoint of productiveness and location. The home, on a hill commanding a view of the surrounding country, has all the charm of a life dating to the remote past, and although crude methods were employed in its construction, it is still stanch and whole, and capable of weathering many a storm, and resisting many a wintry blast. From farming Mr. Davis has branched out into other paths of activity, and some little credit is due him as an inventor. In 1866 his fertile brain invented a combined header and thresher, to which he sold the right in 1883, but which is still manufactured and in use on the coast, and highly appreciated for its many merits. In 1865 Mr. Davis and his father incorporated the Blue Mountain Road, still run as a toll road, and one of the oldest public thoroughfares in this part of the state. The Davis farm is the scene of extensive stock-raising, Red Poland-China and Berkshire hogs bringing a considerable revenue. One of the chief departments of interest on the farm is an orchard of thirty-five acres, containing about four thousand fruit trees, chiefly prunes, many of them bearing a fine grade of fruit.

A Prohibitionist in political preferment, Mr. Davis has refused all responsible and time-taking offices in the county, but has served as school clerk and supervisor for many years. He is one of the stanch supporters of the Baptist Church, is a deacon and clerk in the same and contributes generously of his means for its charities and general maintenance.

MRS. JOSEPHINE BOYLE is the owner of one of the most highly-cultivated farms of Polk county, owing to her capable management. She was born in Howard county, Mo., December 5, 1830. Her father, Col. Nathaniel Ford, was born in Buckingham county, Va., January 22, 1795, and her mother, Lucinda Embree, was a native of Clarke county, Ky., born November 18, 1799. Colonel Ford removed from Virginia to Kentucky, and thence to Missouri, locating in Howard county. For twenty years he was a member of the Missouri legislature, and also held the offices of sheriff and county clerk. In 1844 he left Howard county, and with ox teams made the journey to Oregon. In the company which made this trip were seventy-five men, of whom he was captain. They started April 15, and arrived December 13, 1844. On reaching Oregon City Colonel Ford decided to spend the winter there with his family, and the next spring came to Rickreall, where he established the town, and was the first man to locate on the Rickreall stream, which was named by the Indians. He took a donation claim where the town of Rickreall now stands, and resided there until his death, which occurred January 21, 1870. In politics he was a Democrat, and was a member of the Oregon legislature for several years. His wife died in January, 1874. In the early development of Polk county Colonel Ford took an active and prominent part. He was a natural leader among men and received the highest respect and esteem from all his friends and neighbors. Unto the colonel and his wife were born ten children, of whom four died in infancy and six accompanied their parents to Oregon. Mrs. Boyle is now the only surviving member. Her husband, Dr. J. W. Boyle, was born in Tazewell county, Va., April 15, 1815. His father, Abraham Boyle, was also a native of that county, and died in the Old Dominion about 1828.

Dr. J. W. Boyle removed from Virginia to Indiana, where he remained for a short time, thence removing to Fairfield, Iowa. Taking up the study of medicine he graduated from the medical school of St. Louis, Mo., in the winter of 1843-4, after which he returned to Iowa, continuing there until 1845. He then came to Oregon, where he was the pioneer and only physician in Polk county. He followed his calling through many difficulties, often traveling one hundred miles to minister to a patient, and thus he became a welcome friend in the frontier homes of the pioneers, having a very extensive practice throughout Polk, Yamhill, Marion, Linn, Benton and Lane counties. He possessed but limited means when he made his way to Oregon, and made his home with Colonel Ford, at Rickreall until 1846, when he married the colonel's daughter, Josephine. He had taken a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, and on his marriage took three hundred and twenty acres more, and the young couple took up their abode on the farm now owned by Ben Whiteaker. Dr. Boyle continued in the practice of medicine, and in 1859 removed with his family to Salem, where he engaged in practice until his death, which occurred July 6, 1864, when he was thrown from his carriage and killed. His loss was deeply mourned by his many friends and acquaintances, as he was known throughout the Willamette valley as an able physician and a kind and sympathizing friend. Unto Dr. Boyle and his wife were born seven children: Hannah Tatum, at home; Mrs. Rena Childers, of Portland; James M., of Dawson City, Alaska; William, at home, and Charles, at home, and two deceased. The farm where Mrs. Boyle resides consists of two hundred acres of rich and valuable land, which is at present operated by her sons. She is a member of the Christian Church and is well known in the community where she lives, her friends regarding her with esteem and affection because of her many excellent traits of character.

HARRISON BUTERICK. It was not without a trial of the possibilities of his own land that Harrison Buterick ventured across the great ocean and continent that lie between his present home and the land of his birth, nor yet blind instinct that led him to the fertile fields of Oregon, ready intelligence and shrewd judgment making him quick to act upon the suggestion contained in the glowing reports of the west that came to him in his first residence in the United States. The birth of this representative farmer of Polk county, Ore., occurred in Yorkshire, England, November 12, 1839, being the son of William Buterick, of Lincolnshire, England, who passed the years of his life in the country of his birth, dying there in 1875, at sixty years of age. He married Cenia Harrison a native of England, who died in 1845. Of the five children born to these English parents Harrison Buterick was next to the youngest, and was only six years old when he lost his mother. The education of his boyhood years was exceedingly limited, on account of the burden of self-support that fell upon his shoulders at fourteen, engaging then among the farmers of the neighborhood, where he worked until he was twenty-one years old. At that age he shipped as fireman of a steamboat plying on the North sea, in which occupation he remained for eleven years, having risen to the position of second engineer two years previous to his resignation.

Acting upon the sober judgment of his mature manhood, Mr. Buterick started for the United States, and after a voyage of fourteen days he landed in New York City, going thence to Grant county, Wis. For eighteen months he found occupation among the farmers of that section, but could not be satisfied to remain there with the more brilliant opportunities of the west portrayed in every report that reached him through the various channels connecting all farming sections of the country. His first venture into Oregon was into Yamhill county, where he settled near North Yamhill in the fall of 1872, and engaged in his chosen work of farming. Until 1889 he made Yamhill county his home, when he removed to Polk county, settling upon his present farm of four hundred acres leased from G. Glandon. He is now actively interested in general farming, and has also a threshing machine, with which he gains no little profits.

Mr. Buterick married, in 1862, Jane Hutchcroft, also a native of Yorkshire, England, born in June, 1838, and of the union five children have been born, of whom William is a resident of McCoy; Sarah A. is the wife of S. A. Cane, of Sheridan; Elizabeth is the wife of R. L. White, of McCoy; James lives in McCoy; Hannah is the wife of Melvin Bailey, of Bethel hills. Having gained an education through the constant application of the years of his manhood, Mr. Buterick sees the advantages accruing from the early training in the school room, and is actively interested in all educational movements of his vicinity. He is now director of the school in his district, and was road supervisor in Yamhill county, serving in the interests of the Republican party which he supports with his vote. Religiously he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he officiates as trustee.

B. D. WELLS. A fact which elicits no surprise among his acquaintances and friends is that B. D. Wells is an enthusiastic admirer of the Willamette valley, and a firm believer in the possibilities which the future may grant to the earnest, patient laborer among the scenes of this resourceful country, for it was in this clime that he experienced an almost wonderful recovery to health and strength when he had journeyed here but to die, as he thought. He made the trip from California in the fall of 1899, driving through, having left the southern state with nothing but the outfit necessary for travel, and engaged on the route at haying and harvesting to make enough to sustain his family, though he was ill from the time of starting until they arrived three months later, lacking six days, in Stayton, Ore. There he located, broken in health and weary with the journey, expecting to hear his summons to "join the innumerable caravan," but instead he soon felt the change of returning health and the vigor and courage which it imparts, and into his once empty hands have come a lucrative and engrossing custom in his business of a veterinary surgeon, especially noticeable since March 16, 1902, when he located in Albany, Linn county, and from which city his practice extends throughout Linn, Benton and Marion counties, and also into Lane and Polk counties.

Dr. Wells was born in Boston, Erie county, N. Y., June 8, 1852, the son of Major Wells, also a native of that state, and who died there after a successful career in the furniture business. The mother was Sarah Olin in maidenhood, also a native of New York state, and she now makes her home in Holland, Erie county, of the same state. She was the mother of five children, four of whom are now living, the third oldest being Dr. Wells, of this review. He was reared principally in Erie county, his education received through the medium of the public schools. In early youth he learned the carpenter trade, but met with an accident which prevented the continuance of the work. He then entered, in 1876, a branch school of Toronto Veterinary College, located in Buffalo, N. Y., and which was known as Buffalo Branch of Toronto Veterinary College, where he remained over two years. About this time he was incapacitated by illness and compelled to return home, and when able physically he began the practice of his profession in Holland, a city of his native county, from which he later removed to Wellington, Ohio, and from there located in Barton county, Kans., where he continued his work as a veterinary surgeon. Two years later, in 1888, he removed to Riverside, Cal., and there combined horticultural pursuits with his profession, and after eleven years' residence in Corona and Long Beach, he decided to leave for the northwest, and it was then the memorable trip was made to Oregon. In his first location of Stayton Dr. Wells remained two years, after which he sought a home in Albany, which residence, though of short duration, has made him many friends and a successful business.

The marriage of Dr. Wells occurred in Wellington, Ohio, Miss Martha Dyer, a native of that city, becoming his wife, and of the union one child, Garnett, has been born. In his fraternal relations Dr. Wells affiliates with the Masons, having been made a member of this order in Wellington, Ohio, where he still belongs, and politically he casts his ballot with the Republican party. Along the lines of his profession he is deeply interested, as a member of the State Veterinary Association utilizing every opportunity to excel in his chosen work. Dr. Wells has had many obstacles to contend with in his efforts to earn a livelihood, but he has allowed nothing to discourage him or make him lose faith in his own ultimate victory, and he owes his success to indefatigable energy and effort, the qualities which, in bringing personal success, also make the most worthy citizens.

EDWARD A. PIERCE, M. D. Though a comparatively brief period has passed since the establishment of Dr. E. A. Pierce in Oregonian fields, the time has been sufficient for him to demonstrate the splendid talent which is his in the practice of the most noble of professions, and to number him among the successful physicians of the state. Through a tour which he made of the west in 1894 the doctor was enabled to arrive at a correct estimate of the advantages held out to the man of energy and talent, and after a year's location in Portland he came to Salem, Marion county, in 1896, and has since made this his home and the scene of his activities.

The Pierce family is one of those whose lineage dates to the foundations of this country, on the paternal side being allied with the house which produced a president, and on the maternal side having ancestors among the passengers of the Mayflower. The paternal grandfather, Judah Pierce, was a native of Massachusetts and in the militia of that state acted as colonel, and after his removal to Truxton, Cortland county, N. Y., was appointed to the position of colonel. His son, Ethan A., the father of Dr. Pierce, was born in New York state, and spent his entire life there as a farmer, with the exception of two years in California, as a gold hunter of 1849, going by way of the Isthmus and bringing back with him the substantial fruits of his efforts. He married Harriet A. Geer, a native of Connecticut, and the representative of a prominent family of that state, her father, Moses T. Geer, and her mother, Hannah Phelps Dennison, both owing their nativity to that section and tracing their ancestry to a proud English birth. Both father and mother have since passed to their reward, the death of the latter occurring in 1860. Of the eight children born into this family four daughters and two sons are now living, the youngest being Dr. E. A. Pierce, born in Truxton, Cortland county, N. Y., April 3, 1855.

Dr. Pierce was reared upon his father's farm and trained to a thorough agricultural life, which though he has since departed from it, has been of no little benefit in the establishment of habits of energy, industry and the practical application of every rule which has brought about the success of his own career. Until seventeen years old he attended the district school in the pursuit of an education, entering then the Cortland Normal School, where he took a business course of two years. He also attended Homer Academy at different times from the age of eighteen until he had attained his majority, and engaged in the study of medicine even while teaching. In 1876 he became employed in his brother's store at Center Lisle, Broome county, N. Y., where he had charge of the drug department and was later appointed hospital steward of the Broome county almshouse, which position he also held in the insane asylum. This latter position was maintained from 1880 until 1885, during which time he studied medicine under the tutelage of Dr. C. B. Richards, who was in charge of the insane ward, and entered and graduated March 10, 1885, from the medical department of the University of New York City. The class numbered two hundred students, and the one selected for grand marshal was Dr. Pierce, the commencement exercises being held in the Academy of Music, with Gilmore's band discoursing music to the six thousand people present.

After his graduation Dr. Pierce located in Binghamton, Broome county, and opened an office wherein he continued successfully for ten years, identifying himself with many public movements of the city and making his voice heard in all matters of progression. The second year of his residence there he became jail physician and the third year was elected coroner, which latter position he maintained for six years, and during the last year acted as health commissioner and was also on the staff of the city hospital. While a resident of Binghamton, in company with Dr. C. W. Ingraham, he purchased Mt. Prospect medical institute for treatment of tuberculosis. Having married an Oregonian the doctor came west in 1894 to visit the country and while here became impressed with the opportunities and decided to locate permanently. In September, 1895, he settled in Portland after a resignation of his eastern positions, and in the spring of the following year came to Salem, where he has since engaged in the general practice of medicine and given the power and purpose of his life to the advancement of worthy and progressive movements in his adopted community. In exchange for various positions in his eastern home, among them being that of the presidency of the Broome County Medical Society, presidency of Binghamton Medical Academy, member of the New York Medical Society, of which he is now an honorary member, he has accepted those of equal importance in the Willamette valley, as member of the Oregon State Medical Society, Marion County Medical Society, occupying the chair of physical diagnosis and diseases of the chest, and that of lecturer on hygiene of the Nurses' Training School and the Sanitarium, and is also on the staff of the city hospital of Salem. Another position which he resigned to come to Oregon was that of assistant surgeon of the Sixth Battery, New York National Guards, to which he was commissioned by Gov. D. B. Hill, holding the rank of first lieutenant until 1895. In February, 1903, he was appointed physician to the Indian Training School at Chewawa, and one of the commissioners of the State Board of Health April 4, 1893.

The marriage of Dr. Pierce occurred in Binghamton and united him with Miss Grace Parrish, a native daughter of Oregon, having been born in Salem in 1872, but was then in the east studying music, under Professor Scharwenka.

Previous to this she had received the best instruction that the west afforded both in classical and musical courses, having been educated in Willamette University, Mills College, of Oakland, Cal., and Anna Wright Seminary, of Tacoma, Wash., in the latter institution graduating in music. The father of Mrs. Pierce was the Rev. Josiah L. Parrish, one of Oregon's oldest and most noted pioneers, and one whose labors in behalf of the advancement of the western cause lifted him to a prominence among his fellow men. A sketch of the life of this venerable pioneer is given on another page of this work. Not alone prominent in the pursuit of his profession, Dr. Pierce has allied himself with various fraternal orders and social clubs, having been made a Mason in Otseningo Lodge, Binghamton, N. Y., and there rising to the degree of Royal Arch Mason and Knight Templar, and is now allied with Demolay Commandery of Salem, the Consistory of Portland, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S. He is also identified with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and Woodmen of the World. He is a member of the Salem Commercial Club, in which he acts as vice-president, and is a member of the Illihee Club. Politically he is a Republican.

SAMUEL W. WEAVER, M. D. With an extended reputation in the practice of his profession, Dr. Weaver's earnest study and wide experience have given him a knowledge and skill that have gained for him the confidence and esteem of his many patrons, and won for him a fine position among the leading practitioners of Marion county. He is a Pennsylvanian by birth, having been born in Canonsburg January 9, 1853, a son of Thomas Weaver. His paternal grandfather, John Weaver, was born, lived and died in Canonsburg, Pa., being a well-known contractor and builder, and a prosperous farmer. He married Miss Mary McMillen, a daughter of Rev. John and Catherine (Brown) McMillen, the former a noted Presbyterian divine, and the founder of the first Latin school established west of the Allegheny mountains. This school, opened near Canonsburg in 1775, was afterwards called Jefferson College, later being merged into the Washington and Jefferson College.

Thomas Weaver spent his long life of four score years in Canonsburg, where he was busily employed in agricultural pursuits. He married Elizabeth Lesnett, who was born near Bridgeville, Pa., a daughter of Frederick Lesnett, a well-known farmer of that section of the country. Of the ten children born of their union, one son and one daughter died in infancy. Seven sons and one daughter grew to years of maturity, and the doctor, a brother, Frank Ritchie, and his sister are the only ones now living.

Receiving the rudiments of his education in the common schools of his native town, Samuel W. Weaver subsequently attended the Canonsburg Academy, later entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore, Md., from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1882. Beginning the practice of his profession in Pennsylvania, he remained in Washington county two years, then settled at Paradise Valley, Nev., continuing there an active practitioner for two years. Coming to Oregon in the spring of 1886, Dr. Weaver located in Hubbard, where he has a large and constantly increasing practice, being known as one of the leading physicians of this locality. In addition to his practice, the doctor has also another source of revenue, having a half interest in the drug store of Weaver & Scholl, a well-known and well-patronized establishment. Since coming here he has identified himself with the best interests of the city, and has built a most attractive residence for himself and family in a desirable location.

Dr. Weaver was married November 1, 1888, in Hubbard to Alice Grim, who was born September 28, 1867, and educated in that city, and of their union two children have been born, namely: Francis E. and Guy G. Mrs. Weaver is a daughter of Judge John W. and Frances E. (Geer) Grim, pioneers of 1847, and both now deceased. Judge Grim was the first county judge of Marion county. His family comprises the following children: Byron; Martha, wife of M. Schmer of Yamhill county; Thurston, of Marion county; William, of Marion county; Isaiah, of Portland; Edwin and Edgar, twins, the former mining in Philippine Islands and the latter an attorney at Nome, Alaska; Mary, wife of George H. Beebe, of Woodburn; Ralph, of Clackamas county; and Alice, wife of Dr. Weaver. Politically the doctor is a Democrat, and has rendered the city excellent service one term as a member of the city council. Fraternally he is a member of Hubbard Lodge, I. O. O. F. He is an accomplished musician, belonging to the Hubbard Symphony Orchestra, in which he plays the first violin. Among his valued possessions he counts the first violin ever played in this valley, it having been brought here prior to 1847.

LEVIN NELSON ENGLISH. To be successful in business, one must have, as a rule, an occupation that is congenial. The truth of this proposition finds an illustration in the agricultural undertakings of Levin Nelson English, who owns and occupies a finely cultivated farm near Sublimity. He is not only one of the most prosperous farmers in Marion county, but also one of the most ambitious and advanced in his ideas. He thoroughly enjoys his vocation, takes advantage of all innovations which, in his opinion, will prove beneficial, and is constantly looking for ways and means to render more contented and happy those intrusted to his care. His farm consists of four hundred acres, the greater part of which is under cultivation, and its improvements include three fine cattle barns, recently constructed. A general air of neatness and thrift in evidence everywhere bespeaks the careful and painstaking farmer.

A native of Macoupin county, Ill., Mr. English was born September 17, 1832, a son of Levin N. and Mary (Tucker) English, respectively of Kentucky and Maryland. When his son and namesake was three years of age the father moved to a farm near Burlington, Iowa. From there he went to Davis county, that state, his family in the meantime being increased to four sons and three daughters. In 1845 he made arrangements to cross the plains, and laid in a large supply of provisions, besides loose cattle and the requisite number of oxen. The long journey was accomplished in six months' time. Upon their arrival at the Cascade Mountains they crossed the range on pack animals, driving their cattle before them. Their wagons were left at The Dalles, in order to facilitate the journey westward from that point. At that time all the members were in fairly good health, and felt they had reason to congratulate themselves on their escape from Indian depredations and other disasters. But the family were saddened at this point by the death of one of the children, William, and a lonely grave was left to mark the last resting place of one who had counted much on making his way in this country of wonderful resources.

The family spent the first winter in Oregon City. In the spring of 1846 the father bought a right to six hundred and forty acres of land located seven miles east of Salem, in Marion county, upon which a small log cabin had already been erected. Into this the family moved and resided until prosperity permitted the erection of a more commodious residence. He then returned to Marion county, located on a farm, and operated it for two years, at the expiration of that time removing to Salem, where he died in 1880 at the age of eighty-five years.

Mr. English was a man of strong personality and marked characteristics. He always exhibited a keen interest in current events, and had strong convictions as to the righteousness of the policy pursued by those intrusted with the administration of the affairs of the government. In politics a staunch Democrat, he was honored by election to the Oregon State Legislature and in turn honored his county by the faithful performance of the duties intrusted to him. For many years he also served as a justice of the peace. Fraternally he was identified with the Masons.

Of the children born of his first marriage, Melinda married Joseph Foss, of Howell Prairie; William died while crossing the plains, as noted; Hiram is deceased; Mary A., deceased, was twice married, her first husband being Jeremiah Morris, after whose death she became the wife of Coleman Burnett; Rebecca was the wife of Preston Smith; Delilah is the widow of William Hendricks, and resides at Chehalis, Wash.; Levin N. is the subject of this sketch; and Robert is deceased. For a second wife Mr. English chose Mrs. Mary Daley, a native of Missouri. Of this union the following children were born: Francis, deceased; Thomas; Mahalla; LaFayette; Elizabeth; Nancy, and Lewis.

When the memorable journey across the plains was undertaken Levin Nelson English, Jr., was thirteen years of age. At the age of fifteen he enlisted with the Oregon troops for service in the Cayuse Indian war with his father and brother Hiram, and during the three months' campaign in which they were actively engaged they had some very trying and exciting experiences. For twenty-seven days they were without bread of any kind, and besides being exposed constantly to the menaces of the Indians, they suffered at times from most inclement weather. After the massacre at Whitman's Station they fought their way through their savage enemies, following them through to the Snake river, where a fiercely contested battle took place. The elder English raised his own company, drilled it, and throughout the entire campaign served as its captain. After the thrilling experiences of the three members of this family they were glad to return to their home.

Until his marriage to Miss Elizabeth Riggs, which took place in February, 1853, the subject of this memoir remained at home assisting his father in the operation of the farm. His wife, who is a native of Scotland county, Mo., is a daughter of Jonathan and Mary (Burton) Riggs, and crossed the plains from Iowa in 1852. They settled on a donation claim four miles south of Eugene, and later removed to Umatilla county, where Mr. Riggs died, at the age of eighty-five years. His wife passed away in that county at the age of eighty-three. After his marriage Mr. English resided for a time on Howell's Prairie. In 1853 he took up a claim of five hundred acres in the foothills, where he erected a log cabin and remained for four years.

He then purchased a farm of one hundred and seventy acres on Howell Prairie, which he operated successfully for ten years. This property he sold at the end of that period and went to California, spending two years at Los Angeles and San Diego. Upon his return he rented a farm for a year. In 1870 he purchased his present farm of four hundred acres, which is unquestionably one of the finest and most productive in the Willamette valley.

Unto Mr. English and his estimable wife four children have been born. Robert N. is deceased; William H. now has charge of the home place; Alice is the wife of Byron Denney, of Marion county, and has one daughter, Florence; John A. is engaged in farming near Sublimity, and has a family of two children, Clarence and Mildred.

It will be seen from a reference to this brief outline of the career of Mr. English that he is doubly entitled to a permanent place in the annals of the representative families of the Willamette valley. He is not only a descendant of one of the earliest pioneers of the state and a pioneer himself, but during the long years of his residence in Oregon has been closely associated with the best interests of the home of his adoption in various ways. He is highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens as a man of probity, ever willing to assist in every way in his power in fostering and developing the resources of the state, in securing the best possible educational facilities for the rising generation, in inculcating in the minds of the young a healthy moral tone, and in aiding materially all projects of a worthy character. His spirit is an unselfish one, broad and liberal. That he has attained more than the ordinary measure of success in his chosen field of endeavor is a fact that can be attributed solely to his own energy, perseverance and praiseworthy ambition. The record of his career, which is here preserved for the inspiration of future generations, will do much to promote in the minds and hearts of those to come, a worthy ambition to emulate the principles which have guided his life and crowned it with the success which is his just due.

JOHN M. WATSON. One of the best known representatives of the dairy interests of Marion county, Ore., is John M. Watson, who resides on a farm of seventy-five acres near Turner, where he devotes his time principally to the product of a fine herd of Jersey cows. Mr. Watson was born in Beaver county, Pa., near Beaver Falls, April 8, 1848, the son of Nicholas and Hannah (Creighton) Watson. With his parents he removed to Mansfield, Ohio, in 1853, and thence, in 1860, to Findlay, Ohio, wher-

he completed his education and grew to maturity. In 1864 he enlisted as a private in Company K, One Hundred and Eightieth Ohio Infantry, which formed a part of the Twenty-third Army Corps. His active service was principally in North Carolina, and the principal engagement in which he participated was the battle of Kingston, that state. At the close of the conflict he was mustered out of the Federal service and at once returned to his home, where he remained until his twenty-fourth birthday. At that time he moved to Auburn, Ind., where he was engaged in the manufacture of hubs and spokes for three years. In the Centennial year he sought better financial returns for his energies and abilities by a prospecting tour of the Black Hills. Soon after abandoning this venture he went to Iowa, where he remained for a short time. The opportunities which he was earnestly seeking not appearing to him up to this time, he finally decided to try his fortunes in the far west, Oregon appealing to him as a fertile field for young men of brain and brawn. Removing to this state in 1876 he located in Marion county, where he remained until 1879. In that year he went to Idaho, where he took up government land under the pre-emption act, and operated a farm for two years. Returning to Oregon in 1881 he engaged in the management of a hotel at Turner, in which his efforts were attended by success. Upon the expiration of two years he became associated with the Oregon Milling Company, an occupation which he found both congenial and profitable, and to which he devoted his time for seven years. At the end of that time he purchased the farm upon which he now resides. Here he makes a specialty of dairying, though general farming is engaged in to some extent.

Mr. Watson has been twice married. In 1872 he was united with Miss Clara Beach, who became the mother of one daughter, Clara, now deceased. In 1879 he married Miss Jane Steele. They are the parents of five children, named as follows: Clara E., wife of E. L. Martin, of Turner; William Byrd; Ruth; Sophia R. and John M., Jr.

Mr. Watson has become one of the thoroughly representative men of Marion county. An earnest Republican, he has been prominently identified with the party, and has been called to positions of official trust. In 1890 he was elected county commissioner of Marion county, serving continuously in the office for eight years. He has also exhibited a profound interest in educational matters, and has been a member of the local school board for several years. Fraternally he is a member of Pearl Lodge No. 66, A. F. & A. M., of Turner, in which he has filled the various chairs. On every occasion when

Mr. Watson has found the opportunity to demonstrate his public spirit he has done so, not for the sake of any personal aggrandizement, but with motives of an entirely unselfish character. He has accomplished all in his power for the improvement of the social, moral and intellectual status of the community, and in all ways has shown himself to be a useful citizen.

WILLIAM E. BAKER. That Mr. Baker has been an important factor in the growth and up-building of Albany is disputed by no one, but on the contrary he is conceded by all to be one of the city's most enterprising citizens. As a contractor and builder he stands second to none in the profession in Albany, where upon every hand are to be seen evidences of his superior handiwork. When he came here in 1888 the city could boast only two brick buildings, but in the years that have intervened scarcely a brick structure has been erected for which he has not had the contract. As a partial list of the structures he has erected mention may be made of the Masonic Temple, Baltimore building, Vance building and the woolen mill, all in Albany, and the bank building in Lebanon. In addition to contracting and building, he also fills contracts for doing cement work of all kinds, this department alone furnishing a splendid income.

A native of England, Mr. Baker was born near Wells, Somersetshire, where his father, William, who was descended from an old established family, followed the peaceful life of the agriculturist. Charles Baker, the grandfather, was a wagon and carriage-maker by trade. William Baker chose as his life companion Charity Foxwell, also a native of England, and the daughter of William and Mary (Stone) Foxwell, the former of whom was a stone and brick contractor. The parental family comprised eight children, six sons and two daughters, all of whom reside in England with the exception of William E. and his brother Walter G., who is superintendent for a large contracting firm in Seattle, Wash.

William E. was the oldest child born to his parents, the date of his birth being January 13, 1850. His early boyhood days were spent in steady application to his books in the national schools in the vicinity of his home, and at the age of twelve years he was apprenticed to his maternal grandfather for a term of seven years to learn the mason's trade. His grandfather dying four years later, however, he completed his apprenticeship under the direction of John Parrot. When twenty years old he began to apply the knowledge gained during his apprenticeship, and for one year worked at his trade at Bristol. In 1871, when he had reached his majority, he set sail for the United States, his destination being Skaneateles, Onondaga county, N. Y., where he remained until 1876, working at his trade. From the latter state he went to Sibley, Iowa, engaging in contracting and building there for twelve years, or until coming to Oregon in 1888.

W. E. Baker and Miss Mary Lukens, a native of Somersetshire, were united in marriage in England, and of the six children born to them all are deceased. His identification with the Masonic order dates from the time of his residence in Sibley, Iowa, and he is now a member of St. John's Lodge in Albany. Later he was made a Royal Arch Mason, being identified with Bailey Chapter, and subsequently was raised to the commandery, affiliating with Temple No. 3. While in England he was made an Odd Fellow, and is now a past officer in the lodge of the order at Albany, besides being identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Business and fraternal matters have not absorbed his time and attention to the exclusion of religion and politics, however, and in the Episcopal Church of Albany, of which he is a member, he is accounted one of the staunch supporters. Politically his sympathies and support are in favor of the Republican party. In his business dealings Mr. Baker has been very successful, his good management and fair dealing winning him a handsome competence, and he is numbered among the substantial citizens of the community.

JAMES HELMICK. There is an indisputable honor attached to the fact that one has come to ownership of the many attributes which go to make up the necessities of life, the strongest of them being the inalienable rights of citizenship, through an inheritance which has followed the name, proving the loyalty and the courage of an immediate ancestor. To James Helmick, a farmer of Polk county, has been given such an inheritance, left to him by his father, Henry Helmick, a pioneer of 1845, and a man who won his way against heavy odds in the days of Oregon's early history.

Henry Helmick was born in Germany, September 14, 1822, and came with his father, Stephen Helmick, to America in 1825. The first settlement was made in Pennsylvania, from which state the elder man removed later to Indiana, and followed this up with a movement into Iowa, settling near Burlington, where he and his wife passed the remainder of their lives. Henry Helmick grew to manhood principally in Iowa, and in 1845, he left the familiar surroundings of his youth and started across the plains for the productive lands of the northwestern territory. Two yoke of oxen and a wagon embodied all his worldly wealth, but courage was a dominant trait in the character of the pioneers of the times and he made the six months' journey, buoyed up by the hope of finding a home in the western land. The greatest misfortune of the trip befell Mr. Helmick after the journey was ended, or nearly so, the strong current in the river at The Dalles sweeping away the raft upon which the wagons were standing, preparatory to being taken ashore. Thus deprived of all that would have made farming a possibility, Mr. Helmick was compelled to take any kind of work offered, the first being to help in building a barn, the pay for which enabled them to subsist for a short time. The first winter was spent on Tualatin plains and in Salem, and in the spring of 1846, Mr. Helmick took up a donation claim upon the present site of Salem. He remained there but a short time, however, before giving it up and coming to Polk county. The claim which he took up here was located four miles south of Monmouth, and consisted of six hundred and forty acres, upon which he engaged in stock-raising and farming until his death, in 1876. Through perseverance and unending industry he had succeeded in building up a fortune, owning at the time of his death thirteen hundred acres. But once in the intervening years had he departed from the industries of his farm, that being in the spring of 1849, when he was attracted to the gold mines of California. Not meeting with the success he had expected and desired, he returned in the fall of 1850, and found a greater wealth in the wide lands of his adopted state.

The wife who shared the trials and burdens of the early life of Mr. Helmick was, in maidenhood, Sarah Steeprow, who was born in Indiana, July 4, 1823, of German parentage. The marriage was celebrated April 14, 1845, and the next day witnessed their departure for the west. Of the four sons and one daughter which blessed their union, two died in infancy, the remaining three attaining maturity. They are as follows: James, of this review; Lewis, now deceased; and Mary C., who became Mrs. James Tedrow, of Corvallis, Ore.

James Helmick was born in Polk county, Ore., February 21, 1851, upon his father's donation claim, and the old house in which the family lived is still standing. His early education was received in the district schools of his native county, which he attended until he was nineteen years old. At that age he left school and entered upon the work of the farm, remaining at home until his father's death, when the property was divided among the children. He now owns five hundred and eighty acres of land, to the cultivation of which he is devoting his intelligent effort, being now one of the most extensive and successful farmers in this neighborhood. He is principally interested in general farming, though sixteen acres are set apart for the raising of hops. In addition to his farming interests Mr. Helmick is engaged in a warehouse at Parker Station, having built the same in partnership with his brother, Lewis, in 1882. He handles grain in immense quantities, shipping from forty thousand to fifty thousand bushels annually, as well as produce of all kinds. He has met with the same success in this work, which has characterized his every effort, and stamped him as one of the leading farmers of Polk county.

In 1880, Mr. Helmick married Miss Amanda Mayes, who was born in Marion county, Ore., April 25, 1860. She was the daughter of Stephen Mayes, who crossed the plains in 1852 and located in the northern part of Marion county. The five children born to them are as follows: Francis, Sarah, Nellie, Mary and William, all of whom are still at home with their parents. Politically, Mr. Helmick is a staunch Republican, and through the influence of this party he served as county commissioner in 1890-94, and has also held the position of road supervisor, and that of various school offices. In his fraternal relations he affiliates with the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

ZENAS FERRY MOODY. No man in Oregon is more highly respected than Hon. Zenas F. Moody, and no man ever more fully enjoyed the confidence of the people or more richly deserved the esteem in which he is held. His life has been one of labor—labor in the business world and in the field of public service—and the result of his efforts is to be found in the benefits which have accrued to the entire commonwealth. He is a man remarkable in the breadth of his wisdom, in his indomitable perseverance and his strong intellectuality. His entire life has no hidden phase, being an open scroll inviting the closest scrutiny.

Born in Granby, Mass., May 27, 1832, his ancestry, both lineal and collateral, is distinctively American through many generations. The line may be traced back to George Moody of Moulton, Suffolk county, England, whose son, Deacon John Moody, crossed the Atlantic to the New World in 1633, settling in Boston, Mass. Later he resided in Roxbury, in that state, and in Boston he was made a freeman. His son, Samuel Moody, married Sarah Deming. At the time of his death, Samuel Moody was serving as a selectman in his town. His son, who also bore the name of Samuel, was born November 28, 1670, and died November 10, 1774. His wife, Sarah, was a daughter of Samuel Lane of Suffolk, Conn., and the son born of this marriage, another Samuel Moody, was born in Granby, Mass., September 10, 1702, and wedded Mary Hovey. The son of this union was Thomas Hovey Moody, the great-grandfather of the subject of this review. He was born in South Hadley, Mass., August 31, 1736, and married Eunice Chapin, a native of Massachusetts. Their son, Gideon Moody, grandfather of Z. F. Moody, was born in Massachusetts March 15, 1765, and served in the Revolutionary war in a company commanded by Captain Oliver Consey. To one of his sons, the father of Z. F. Moody, he gave the name of his own father, Thomas Hovey Moody. The birth of this son occurred August 19, 1795, and he became a farmer in New England. Eventually he removed to Illinois, settling at Concord, Morgan county, where he spent the remainder of his days. He served as Major in the old Massachusetts State Militia, and in politics he was originally a Whig and afterward a Republican. He married Hannah Ferry, who was born in Massachusetts, a daughter of Noah and Hannah (Montague) Ferry. Her birth occurred March 17, 1794, and she gave her hand in marriage to Thomas H. Moody in May, 1817. Her father was a son of Noah Ferry, Sr., and a grandson of Charles Ferry of Springfield, Mass. Senator T. W. Ferry of Michigan is a cousin of Governor Moody, his father, the Rev. William Ferry of Grand Haven, having been a brother of the Governor's mother. Hannah Montague was a daughter of Joseph Montague. The ancestry in that line may be traced back to Richard Montague of Hadley, Mass., who was the first of the name to come to America. He was of English birth, and in England the family history may be traced back to Normandy, the French name being Montacut.

Unto Thomas H. and Hannah (Ferry) Moody were born six children, five of whom reached mature years: Thomas Hovey, who followed farming in Illinois and afterward in Nebraska, in which state he died; Mary, who became the wife of Lemuel Stoughton and died in Connecticut; William Ferry, who was a merchant in Philadelphia, where his death occurred; Z. F. of this review; and Gideon Webster, who resides in Morgan county, Illinois. The parents were members of the Congregational Church. The mother died in Bedford, Mass.

Ex-Governor Moody spent the days of his youth in New England. He acquired his rudimentary education in the district schools, and afterward became a student in the Union School in Chicopee, Mass. He began his business career as a clerk. In 1851, possessed of a strong desire to see more of the country, he came to Oregon, sailing from New York March 13 as a passenger on the steamer Empire City. He landed at Aspinwall, and thence proceeded by way of the Chagres river and on the back of a mule to Panama. Here he boarded the steamer St. Louis, which carried him to San Francisco. There he became a passenger on the Columbia, bound for Astoria. It carried two hundred and fifty-three steerage passengers and five hundred and fifty first cabin passengers. Ex-governor Moody traveled in the steerage; for his money had become exhausted and, having nothing left, he borrowed twenty dollars to take him to Portland. For fourteen miles of this journey he traveled on foot.

As it was necessary that he secure employment of some kind at once, he began doing chores for his board. Six weeks later he secured a position with the first surveying party in Oregon engaged in the survey of the meridian line. He started in as chainman, but steadily worked his way upward until he became an expert surveyor. He followed this profession for some time, acting as Deputy United States Surveyor the greater part of the time until 1856, his labors being in the valley and among the mountains of this section of Oregon. In 1854 he embarked in general merchandising in Brownsville, Linn county. The following year he went to California, where Surveyor-General Hayes appointed him to examine surveys at the headwaters of the Salinas. After devoting six months to this labor he returned to San Francisco and made his report. In the fall of 1856 he left the Pacific Coast for Illinois, traveling by way of the Panama and New York route. Until 1862 he remained in Morgan county, Ill., residing in the city of Jacksonville, where for one term he served as county surveyor. But the fascinating influences of the great west were strong upon him, and, pining for life on the coast, he returned by way of the route he had taken to Oregon a few years before. Upon his arrival in this state he located at The Dalles. There he engaged in general merchandising for some time, and also performed considerable labor as surveyor. As deputy United States surveyor he located the boundaries of the Umatilla Indian Reservation. Subsequently he again engaged in mercantile pursuits at The Dalles, where he served for a time as member of the city council.

Varied and important have been the interests which, from time to time, have claimed his attention. His work, while contributing to his personal success, has also been an important factor in the development of the state in many ways. In 1865 he organized the Oregon & Montana Transportation Company, which built steamboats to navigate Lake Pend d'Oreille and Clark's Fork of the Columbia river, now on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. The aim of this company was to secure the transportation business from Montana to the Pacific coast. For one season the company continued in business, but the Missouri river route proved cheaper on account of the expenses incurred by the transfer by wagons, which was necessary from White Bluffs to the lake, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles. On account of this feature the company could not well compete with the Missouri river route. In an early day, from 1870 to 1874, Mr. Moody also had a contract for carrying the mails on the steamers on the Columbia river. With his sons, he has long been associated in business at The Dalles as a grain merchant and the owner of extensive warehouse interests, and the enterprises there have reached large and profitable proportions.

The active part which Mr. Moody has taken in public affairs, his splendid record as a business man, his ability, energy and devotion to the public welfare, led to his selection for high political office. In 1872 he was nominated by the Republicans of Wasco county as their candidate for the state senate, and received a majority of the votes cast. The election was contested, but as the senate was composed of eleven Democrats and eleven Republicans, Mr. Moody's opponent, who had been granted a certificate of election, was allowed to keep his seat. In 1880 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for the state legislature, was elected, and was serving as speaker of the house when he received the nomination for the governorship. In 1888 he was a delegate to the national convention in Chicago which nominated Benjamin Harrison for the presidency. He was the only Harrison man from the Pacific coast, and throughout the convention he gave the Indiana statesman his support, casting his ballot for him from the start. In 1882 he was the Republican nominee for the office of governor against the Rev. J. L. Smith, and was elected by a majority of nearly two thousand, being the first Republican nominee elected in sixteen years.

Governor Moody took the oath of office in September, 1882, and as the legislature had voted to make the time of inauguration in the January following the election, he was thus retained in office until January, 1887. He was not a candidate for re-election, and retired to private life at the close of his term. In the meantime he had accomplished much for the state. There has been no administration of more practical benefit to Oregon than that of Governor Moody. He made a close study of the social, economic and political problems which confronted Oregon, and brought to his administration the keen discrimination and sound judgment of a practical business man, in addition to the loyalty of a public-spirited and patriotic citizen.

We would intrench upon the province of history if we were to enter into a detailed account of his administration; but in the record of his life there should be given at least an indication of the work which he accomplished while occupying the gubernatorial chair. The biennial message which he transmitted to the legislature showed that he possessed a thorough understanding of the conditions in the state. During his term in office the tax rate was reduced from five and one-half mills on the dollar to one and nineteen-twentieths mills, and within this time, without special tax or appropriation by the legislature, much building was done. This included the erection of the brick stockade about the penitentiary grounds, and four additional workshops and a large wing to the main building of the penitentiary. Large tracts of land for the use of the asylum and the penitentiary were also purchased, all this being accomplished through the economy of the administration. The legislative hall and all the halls and corridors of the western approach and a portion of the eastern approach to the state capitol were completed, together with various minor improvements in the public buildings of the state, involving the expenditure of more than a quarter of a million of dollars.

In his biennial message of 1887, after a thorough review of conditions in the insane asylum, Governor Moody spoke of the fact that when a person appeared before the county court for examination as to his sanity, it was also customary to make inquiry as to his financial ability with a view to holding him responsible for his maintenance during the period of his confinement in the asylum. He urged that this practice should be abandoned, as the law frequently worked positive hardships in many instances, "particularly where the head of a household is bereft of reason, leaving the management of a small property in the hands of a dependent and inexperienced family." He also recommended that in case the patient who had been assigned for commitment was in extremely poor health, an experienced attendant should convey him to the institution in order that he might have the proper care while upon the way. In taking up the subject of the state penitentiary, he called attention to the fact that no provision existed for the separation of hardened criminals from youths and persons convicted of less heinous crimes, and serving the shortest sentences, and recommended that a course of moral training should be instituted, that the youthful criminals might be reformed and made law-abiding citizens. The State Agricultural College, the State University, the School for Deaf Mutes, the Blind School and the Orphans' Home also received due consideration and recommendations for means of further work. He showed that he had also made a thorough study of agricultural conditions, dairying and contagious diseases as affecting the prosperity of the state. He had also given earnest thought to questions of pilotage and navigation, as well as to highways, and he recommended a fish commission for the further care and development of what is one of the most important industries of the northwest. He recommended the establishment of a railroad commission, and that state aid should be given to the state militia. Another subject which came up for his consideration, and which he recommended to congress, was the reapportionment of the state, calling attention to the inconsistency in representation caused by the unequal population in different parts of the commonwealth. In closing this message he said:

"The volume and importance of your duties increase with each biennial session, and the necessary additional labor involved in the consideration of matters brought before you will call for the most patient industry and faithful application. In determining your responsibility in this work, it is well to consider that there is greater danger of too much than too little, legislation. Certainty and stability in our statutes are of the utmost importance. Hasty work and frequent changes are to be deplored. A well-established law should remain untouched, unless the demand for amendment or repeal is urgent and of vital importance. In the introduction of new legislation every point should be well considered and acted upon with deliberation. Grave matters of legislation should not be delayed until the closing days of the session, and then forced through with such haste as to preclude the possibility of proper consideration.

"Upon taking the oath and assuming the duties of the office of chief executive of the state, I promised faithfully to endeavor to promote the prosperity of the state and the happiness of her people. The record has been made, and it will determine whether the obligation thus taken has been fulfilled. Called from the scenes of a purely business life, and without experience in the administration of the affairs of state, the varied and complex nature of the numerous duties incident to this office have brought many embarrassments not experienced by my predecessors, who had the advantage of antecedent training and acquaintance with public affairs. Whatever success may have attended my efforts is largely due to the co-operation of the legislative assembly and my official associates, and the generous forbearance of the people. For the confidence which has been reposed in me, and for the assistance and forbearance extended, I desire to express my grateful acknowledgments; and I bespeak for him who has been chosen as my successor the same generous co-operation and support. Trusting that the work of the session upon which you are about to enter may be such as to redound to your credit and to the prosperity of the state, and invoking for you in your labors the blessing and guidance of the Divine Ruler, I take my leave of the duties and responsibilities of the executive office."

Ex-Governor Moody was married in Brownsville, Ore., November 19, 1853, to Mary Stephenson, who was born in Boone county, Ind., a daughter of William Stephenson. At an early day she was left an orphan, and with friends came to Linn county, Ore., crossing the plains in 1852. They are the parents of five children: Malcolm A., who is now serving his second term as representative in congress from the Second district of Oregon; Zenas A., a mechanical engineer, residing in Ashland, Ore.; William Hovey, who is engaged in business with his father at The Dalles; Ralph E., who is a graduate of the law department of Union College at Albany, N. Y., now an attorney in Portland and a former representative in the Oregon state legislature; and Edna, wife of Eugene P. McCornack, of Salem.

Ex-Governor and Mrs. Moody are members of the Presbyterian Church. In 1856 he was made an Odd Fellow in Concord, Ill. He is now a member of Columbia Lodge No. 5, of The Dalles, in which he has filled all the chairs. He is also a member of the State Pioneer Association and the State Historical Society. Honored and respected by every class of society, for many years he has been a leader in thought and action in the public life of the state, his honorable career adding lustre to the history of the commonwealth.

GEORGE H. GREER, whose residence in Oregon dates from 1852, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., December 7, 1836. His father, James Greer, was a native of County Antrim, Ireland, born May 10, 1806, and in the year 1831 he came to America, locating in Philadelphia, where he was engaged in weaving in the woolen mills, being a hand weaver, for the steam process of weaving had not then come into use. In 1837 he went by way of New Orleans to Indiana, for the river route was practically the only mode of travel at that time, else one would have had to drive in private conveyance across the country. In 1841 he went to Missouri, where he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land, and in 1852 he came to Oregon, making the journey with ox teams across the country to King's Valley. He arrived at The Dalles in August, having spent several months upon the way, for it was on the 1st of May that he crossed the Missouri river enroute for the northwest. On the 25th of October, he arrived in King's Valley and secured a donation land claim of three hundred and twenty acres, which he improved and continued to hold until 1871, when he sold that property and removed to Corvallis. In 1889 he took up his residence at Dallas, where he died when almost ninety-two years of age.

After coming to the northwest Mr. Greer followed farming and was also freight receiver and packer to Camden, Mo. In his political affiliations in early life he was a Whig and he strongly endorsed the Abolition principles when the question of slavery became the paramount issue before the people. When the Republican party was formed to prevent the further extension of slavery he joined its ranks and remained one of its stalwart advocates until his demise. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, devoted to its work and laboring earnestly for the upbuilding of the cause of Christianity. He traced his ancestry back to the early Wesleyan denomination and he was most loyal to the teachings of Methodism. A memorial window has been placed in the Methodist Episcopal Church at Dallas in memory of Mr. Greer and his wife. In early manhood he had wedded Margaret Hamilton, who was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, January 13 1808, and died at Dallas in 1885. Unto this worthy couple were born nine children, three sons and six daughters, of whom one son and three daughters came to Oregon.

George H. Greer was the third of the family and after acquiring his education in the common schools he entered upon his business career as a salesman in a store in Missouri. In this way he aided in the support of the family while his father was working in the mines of California. At the age of twenty years he began teaching school in Benton county, Ore., and in the winter of 1857 went to California. He taught in Sonoma county in 1858 and in Yolo in 1859, and in the summer of the latter year he returned to Oregon, where he continued his educational work until the fall of 1860. He then joined the Oregon Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1862 was made a deacon by Bishop Matthew Simpson and was ordained elder by Bishop Clark at Salem. He was then stationed at Dallas and afterward continued his labors as a minister of the gospel at Lafayette, McMinnville, and in the Puget Sound country. He was minister of a church in Olympia, afterward in Seattle and did his last pastoral labor in Port Townsend. In 1873, however, he left the Oregon conference because of the change in his religious views and for two years labored in the interest of the American Bible Society in western Washington. Burdened with doubt as to many of the teachings of the church, however, he then gave up religious work and went upon a farm, but his deep interest in the human race and its ultimate destiny continued to engage his attention and he eventually arrived at a belief in the Unitarian doctrine. In 1883 he became a student in the Unitarian Theological College at Meadville, Pa., and in 1884

the charge of Washington was assigned to him as a field of labor. He established societies in Tacoma and Seattle and again did work in Olympia and in Victoria, B. C. He was instrumental in building the house of worship at Tacoma now used by the Free Church, but on account of his wife's health he left that city and state and in 1891 went to Mayfield, Cal., where he remained until after the financial panic of 1893. Returning to Oregon, he then settled upon his farm, which is the old Spencer donation land claim which belonged to his wife's father. It comprises three hundred and twenty acres and since that time he has been devoting his energies to agricultural pursuits. He has twenty-five acres planted to prunes and the remainder of his land is devoted to general farming. In his work he is progressive and has developed a splendid property which annually returns to him a good income.

Mr. Greer was married in Oregon in 1864 to Miss Cornelia Jane Spencer, who was born in Wellsville, Ohio, and who pursued her education in the common schools and under the instruction of her father, John Spencer. He was born in Huntington county, Pa., April 17, 1802, and though he had no educational advantages in his youth, he became a man of scholarly attainments and broad intellectuality. While pursuing his ministerial work he mastered Greek and Latin without the aid of a teacher and he also read broadly in scientific literature and theological works. He continued upon the farm until 1828, when he was admitted to the Pittsburg Conference, which embraced western Pennsylvania, southeastern Ohio and the state of West Virginia. He thus continued his labors in the Methodist Episcopal Church until 1852, when he came to Oregon with an ox train, making the long and arduous journey overland. He located in what is still known as the Spencer farm, which is the home of Mr. and Mrs. Greer, in January, 1853, having spent the first winter in Portland. For a number of years he carried on agricultural pursuits here and in 1871 he removed to McMinnville, where his death occurred June 30, 1884. He was one of a family of nine children. His wife, Julia Ann Spencer, was born February 3, 1810, in Westmoreland county, Pa., and died upon the old Spencer homestead in October, 1889. The ancestry of the Spencer family can be traced back through many generations. The great-great-grandfather was Zachariah Spencer, who it is believed was born in England and for many years followed farming in Harford county, Md. The great-grandfather, James Spencer, lived for many years in western Pennsylvania and also became a successful farmer in Harford county, Md. He died in the former state and was buried in the cemetery at Johnstown, Pa. William Spencer, the father of John, was born in western Pennsylvania in 1773 and is buried in the Johnstown cemetery. At the time of the Civil war John Spencer, the father of Mrs. Greer, was an active Union man and had previously been a strong champion of the cause of abolition. He was very prominent and influential and his entire life was devoted to the cause of humanity. Thoroughly unselfish, he gave of his time, his energy and his means for the welfare of his fellow-men. In politics he was an active Republican and for two terms he served as county superintendent of schools in Yamhill county. His daughter, Mrs. Greer, is a lady of exceptional culture and intelligence and she, too, has left the impress of her intellectuality upon the educational development of the state. For six years she engaged in teaching in the city schools of Tacoma and during that time she was elected county superintendent of the schools of Pierce county, Wash. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Greer have been born two sons. Elwin Spencer, who pursued a course in divinity in the Meadville Theological School, a Unitarian school at Meadville, Pa., is now at home. Medorem William, of Chicago, Ill., is a graduate in the electrical engineering department of the School of Technology in Boston, where he completed the course in June, 1891, and in 1892 he was graduated in literature in Stanford University.

Mr. Greer is a man of strong socialistic tendencies and is now a believer in Unitarian faith. Fearless and upright in defense of his honest convictions, he stands to-day one of the highly respected citizens of the county because of his fidelity to what he believes to be right and because of his honorable record.

DORY BUSSARD. Since becoming a resident of Albany, Linn county, Ore., Dory Bussard has established and built up, as proprietor of a feed stable, one of the largest industries of its kind in the Willamette valley. He has been in this business since 1897, having come to this city at that date, and conducted for four years a feed stable at the corner of Baker and Second streets, in 1901 purchasing the quarter block of the Pioneer Hotel property. Upon this land he erected a building which covers nearly the entire spot, the dimensions of the part under cover, which is galvanized iron and surrounded by a brick wall, being 133x102 feet and has a capacity of one hundred and seventy head of stock.

Mr. Bussard was born in Streator, Ill., September 25, 1863, the son and grandson of two William Bussards, the elder, a farmer, having removed from Pennsylvania to Circleville, Ohio, where the younger William was born. On attaining maturity the father of Dory Bussard became a pioneer farmer near Streator, Ill., and in 1871 he made his home in Clinton, Mo., after three years returning to Illinois, now living upon a farm near Breeds, Fulton county. He married Caroline Defenbaugh, a native of Pickaway county, Ohio, the daughter of Dan Defenbaugh, who was the first white male child born in Hocking county, Ohio. He was a farmer by occupation. Mrs. Bussard died in 1875, in Canton, Ill., leaving nine children, of whom Mary is the wife of William Brown, of Canton, Ill.; Martin is engaged in the sale of agricultural implements in Albany, Ore.; Marquis is located near Eugene, farming; Margaret is Mrs. Duncan of Albany; Dory is the subject of this review; Susan is Mrs. Cygan, of Bloomington, Ill.; Elizabeth is Mrs. Mackey, of Chicago; Arizona is Mrs. Campbell, of Peoria; and William is in the northern part of Washington.

Dory Bussard, the fifth child, was reared on the paternal farm, and interspersed his home duties with an attendance of the public schools. When twenty-one years old he began farming for himself, engaging in the work near his birthplace, and after a few years he went to North Dakota, in 1888 purchasing near Devil's Lake new farm lands for wheat raising. Two years later he sold and again made his home in Illinois, then conducting a feed stable in Streator, where he remained lucratively employed for eight years. In 1896 he came to Oregon, locating first in Salem, where he built a feed yard, which, at that time, was the largest in the Willamette valley, but since his sale of that property in 1897, has taken second place in comparison with the one which he now conducts. In addition to his feed-yard Mr. Bussard is interested in a blacksmith shop and a hotel, the latter known as the Riverview House, and is also the agent in Linn county for the Corvallis Gate-opening Device, selling the farm right for this patent gate.

Through his marriage with Miss Carrie A. Mackey, a native of Streator, Ill., where the ceremony was performed, he has two children, namely: Edith and Ethel. Fraternaly Mr. Bussard is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, the Order of Pendo and Royal Neighbors. Religiously he is a member of the Congregational Church, and politically is a staunch Republican.

REV. JOSIAH L. PARRISH. No other state in the Union has been more liberally endowed with men whose personal sacrifices have made the life of the community in which they lived than has Oregon, a half century ago a wilderness, to-day the garden spot of the great northwest. It was firm faith in the future resources of this section which led to the wide emigration in the early days, when men of erudition, talent and ambition gave up fair prospects in their native localities, crossed the plains with their myriad dangers, endured hardships and privations, and undaunted by discouragements of all kinds brought their adopted state to a position of prominence and enrolled their names among the beginners of a nation. The pride in a fair state is laudable and the efforts of these men to make a cause for loyalty have been thoroughly appreciated by posterity, but while many engaged in the advancement of industrial, commercial and political conditions there were others who accomplished no less fine results in the line of moral betterment, which is the true test of a country's greatness. What this devotion to a practical and earnest religion meant in the life of the state is beyond computation at the present day, though its undoubted power is visible in the prevailing conditions, and speaks eloquently of the noble, self-denying lives of the early missionary settlers.

"For God and humanity," was the watchword of one of those earnest men, Josiah L. Parrish by name, a missionary of the Methodist Church, and a consistent upholder of the faith which he professed. At the time of his death, May 30, 1895, he was the oldest living pioneer, and the changing scenes which marked each epoch in his life have become state history, in which his own name is indissolubly linked as that of a man who gave his best efforts toward the moral and material uplifting of those about him, Indian as well as white inhabitant honoring his memory. The life of Mr. Parrish began in Onondaga county, N. Y., January 14, 1806, where he was born the son of Benjamin and Sally (Lamberson) Parrish, natives respectively of Connecticut and New Jersey. The father was born in 1777, the representative of a Puritan family of English ancestry, while the mother inherited the trustworthy blood of Dutch forefathers. Of their ten children Josiah L. was the oldest son, and beyond the advantage of a brief attendance of the public schools, was unable to secure in boyhood anything but a very common education. His father being a blacksmith, he early learned that trade, working at it when he was so small that he had to stand on a stool to blow and strike. His home remained in his native town until he had attained his seventeenth year, when he removed with his parents to Monroe county and later to Allegheny county. While still located in his native state he found employment at Brockway, on the Erie canal, remaining for many years satisfied with the opportunities which the east offered. When thirty-three years old he left his home and going to New York City sailed on the ship Lausanne, October 9, 1839, bound for the then wilderness of Oregon, by way of the Horn and Sandwich islands. He was then an ordained minister in the Methodist faith and it was in company with the missionaries which made up the party of the Rev. Jason Lee that he made the voyage and prepared to give of his strength and purpose of life to western growth and civilization.

In May, 1840, the party landed in Oregon, each of the several members preparing to go his own way in the fulfillment of the intentions with which the trip was undertaken. Though a minister and missionary Mr. Parrish was also a blacksmith, carrying with him a trade which is a most necessary adjunct to a successful teaching of religion, material benefit being imperative in an undeveloped country. He also engaged in harness, wagon and tool making. Mr. Parrish first stopped at the "old mission" located ten miles below Salem upon the banks of the Willamette river, where he was employed for three years in the prosecution of his trade, after which he was sent as a missionary to the mouth of the Columbia river. The Rev. Daniel Lee helped him to start a mission where he had found one white man, James Burney by name, this man having an Indian wife. Having always been accustomed to Indians, Mr. Parrish united with a clear common sense a fearless friendliness and a hearty good will, which met with a quick return in the manner in which he was able to handle the men with whom he came in contact. He first made his home on Clatsop plains, seven miles south of the Columbia river, in company with his wife and three children, and after becoming thoroughly familiar with the Indian language taught the religion which he had come to far to tell, and by his gentle, kindly personality so won the friendship of the red men that he became one of the most useful men of Oregon in his subjection and moral training. Several times during his life among them, being appointed Indian agent in 1849, his territory extending from California to British Columbia, and afterward being detailed to accomplish some dangerous missions in which members of their tribe were to be given into the custody of the whites. Two circumstances in particular are worthy of note, as they denoted the great confidence which Mr. Parrish had won among them and the power which his personality had over them. During the gold excitement a party of white men were sent from Fort Auford to find a trail that would connect with the trail for California, and while out they encountered two hundred hostile Indians, when several of their party were killed. Mr. Parrish was asked to take forty well armed men and go to the Indians and ask them for a conference with Dr. Dart, superintendent of Indian affairs, but he requested only that he have an Indian interpreter (the language of these Indians being Coquille) and various articles which he knew the natives particularly desired. This was granted and Mr. Parrish sought the Indians and alone won from them a treaty of peace. In 1854 Mr. Parrish was Indian agent of the district extending from California to Coos bay, during which service several treaties were made with the Indians, resulting in much good to the country. At one time there was a serious trouble, in which Mr. Parrish was sent to arrest an Indian who had killed a white man, and though the entire country was stirred up over the affair, both whites and Indians, he went fearlessly among them and after some delay, but without violence, he succeeded in taking back with him the offender, who showed the power of the missionary's personality when he followed the party to Fort Auford without the exercise of force. Mr. Parrish then returned to Salem, where he found his wife very ill, her health having been failing for some time. For this reason he resigned his post, remaining near his wife in the tender ministrations which he never failed to give to those in trouble or distress. He continued his ministerial duties, being stationed regularly in Portland in 1849, and also preaching at many other locations in the state.

The wife who shared his strenuous life was formerly Elizabeth Winn, a native of New York state, having been born March 17, 1811, and there united in marriage with Mr. Parrish in 1833. Her death occurred August 30, 1869, leaving three sons, the oldest, Lamberson W., having died in September, 1840, during the first year of their residence in the west. Norman O. died November 26, 1900; Samuel B., who served as chief of police of Portland, and died in that city, 1898, and Charles W., born in September, 1844, was one of the first white children in Oregon. He is now a lawyer at Burns, Ore. The second marriage of Mr. Parrish united him with Jennie L. Lichenthaler, by whom he had two daughters, Grace G., the wife of Dr. E. A. Pierce, whose biography appears elsewhere in this volume, and Josie, Mrs. Slater, of Salem. After the death of Mrs. Parrish in 1887 Mr. Parrish married the following year Mrs. M. A. Pierce, a native of Indiana, and the widow of J. O. Pierce, a pioneer of Washington county, Ore.

Beyond his abiding interest in the cause of Indian humanity Mr. Parrish became one of the most prominent men in the commercial and industrial life of Oregon, as active in all movements as in that of religion. He was a staunch supporter of all educational movements and served as one of the first trustees of the Willamette University, and later was elected a life-honorary member of the board of trustees, a position which he held for nearly thirty years. He became the owner of much valuable property in the Willamette valley and in the city of Portland, at one time losing much of the latter through the kindness which prompted him to sign the notes of those who were never able to return the money, but this still left him with sufficient to pass through old age comfortably. Through his position as one of the early pioneers of the state Mr. Parrish was invited to drive the first spike in the Oregon & California Railroad, when in Portland, and with others he made a speech commemorative of the event and the changes which the years had brought to the west. In 1880 he drove the first spike in the street railway of Salem, the broadax which he used having been brought to Oregon in 1840, and after a long and singularly useful career in hewing timbers for many of the missions, it then lay rusting beneath the waters of the Willamette river, where it was lost in 1840, and afterward found and utilized once more in the mission of Clatsop. It now adorns the museum of the Willamette University, to which it was presented in 1892 by Mr. Parrish. Among the most noticeable of his unselfish and noble acts was the ministrations for seventeen years in behalf of the convicts of the state penitentiary, where he preached the religion which had meant the fullness of his own life, the appreciation shown by the men being evidenced by the gift of a gold-headed cane by officers and convicts on one of his birthdays. This cane was afterward lost by fire but the memory of his deeds outlasts time and destruction, the worth of such actions ending not with the passing of life, but going on down through the coming years with a never-ending influence, adding regard and veneration to a name already lustrous with the light of work well done.

AI COOLIDGE. No history of Silverton or this section of Oregon would be complete without mention of Ai Coolidge, so active a part has he taken in the business development and substantial upbuilding of his community. More than a half century has passed since he arrived in Oregon, and there has been no movement for the good of the state and the advancement of its material interests that has not elicited his attention and insofar as possible his active co-operation. Successful in his undertakings, he is at the same time a man free from ostentation and display, but the intrinsic worth of his character is recognized by all with whom he comes in contact and has gained for him the highest regard. He stands to-day one of the honored pioneer citizens of Oregon, being among the few who can relate from memory as an active participant in the affairs, the incidents which form the early annals of the state.

Mr. Coolidge was born in Union county, Ohio, February 15, 1823. His father, James

F. Coolidge, was a native of Massachusetts, and when a young man he removed to Union county, Ohio, locating on the Big Derby river, where he engaged in blacksmithing and farming. He first purchased eighty acres of land, but afterward added to that until the tract comprised a quarter section. He married Fannie Rice, a native of Vermont, and a daughter of Squire Rice, who was also born in the Green Mountain state, whence he removed to Ohio. He became a trader and conducted a little store in Columbus at an early day. In the latter part of his life he was crippled by falling from a bridge, but he lived to reach the advanced age of about eighty years. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge were born seven children, two daughters and five sons, of whom only two are living—Annette, widow of George Wilbur, of Marysville, Ohio, and the subject of this review. The father was a Whig in his political views and was a member of the Universalist Church. Liberal and kind-hearted, his generous spirit and genial nature won for him many friends, and his death, which occurred in March, 1846, when he was fifty-six years of age, was deeply regretted by all who knew him.

Ai Coolidge was the third in order of birth in his father's family. To a limited extent he attended the common schools and in his youth he worked in the fields almost from the time he could reach the plow handles. In 1844 he started out in life for himself and devoted his energies to the manufacture of brick in Union county, Ohio. The following year he removed to Wisconsin, where he spent one year engaged in trapping and hunting. In 1846, however, he returned to Ohio. He had left his native state with $35 and he returned with $40, thus realizing a profit of $5 for his year's labor. Mr. Coolidge continued to make his home in the state of his nativity until 1851, when the opportunities of the northwest became known to him and he resolved to seek a home in this promising portion of the country.

A journey at that time was fraught with many hardships and considerable danger. The great system of railroads which now spans the country had not then been dreamed of, and the long journey over the hot and sandy plains and across mountains was usually made with ox-teams in covered wagons. It was in this way that Mr. Coolidge traveled, the party proceeding by way of the Platte river route. They were fortunate in escaping trouble with the Indians, and the journey over the new country really proved a pleasant one. On reaching Oregon Mr. Coolidge camped about a quarter of a mile from the present city of Silverton, and there was engaged in cutting logs for Bluford

Smith through that winter. He took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres about four miles southeast of the present site of Silverton, and then devoted his energies to the work which was before him. Beginning the development of his farm he split about seven thousand rails in order to fence a portion of his tract, built a house and the first year sowed six acres in wheat. In 1852 he embarked in general merchandising in what was then called Milford, but in 1855 was superseded by the present town of Silverton, and Mr. Coolidge transferred his business from the former to the latter. He occupied the Central hotel building, which is now standing there, and moved it from Milford to Silverton. Never for a day did he suspend his business, but continued it while the moving was going on, selling to customers all along the road. It required four months to get the building from Milford to Silverton. He brought his goods from San Francisco and continued to engage in merchandising at this place with good success for ten years. Subsequently he engaged in farming and raising cattle, having in the meantime purchased land to the extent of five or six thousand acres. He still retains possession of the first tract of land which he owned. Three miles south on Drift creek he bought four hundred and seventy-one acres and the soil is still in its virgin condition, there never having been a plow upon it. In the last year and a half he has sold about twelve hundred acres of his land, but he now has remaining more than two thousand acres. He has owned land all around the town, and is now the owner of the Coolidge or Postoffice block and the bank building. The enterprising spirit, practical labors and wise counsel of Mr. Coolidge have been most effective in the developing of Silverton. He was one of the promoters of the Silverton Electric Light Company and rebuilt the gristmill here, but later sold it. He is now the president of the Coolidge & McClaine Bank of Silverton, which was established in 1880 by Alfred Coolidge and A. F. McClaine, under the firm name of Coolidge & McClaine. It was incorporated under the same name in 1890. The bank has become one of the solid and trustworthy financial institutions of this part of the state. The bank building was erected in 1893.

About two miles above his present home Mr. Coolidge was united in marriage to Miss Sarah F. Allen, a native of Illinois and a daughter of Abner Allen, who was born in Tennessee, whence he removed to Illinois. In 1852 he crossed the plains to Oregon, locating about three miles south of Silverton. He purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres and continued its cultivation for some years. His death occurred at the home of Mr. Coolidge. Unto our subject and his wife were born six children, but only two are now living, Dollie, Ai, May and Lena all having passed away. The surviving members of the family are Eva, who is at home, and Alfred, who is the owner and president of the Second National Bank of Colfax, Wash., and president of the Traders' National Bank of Spokane, Wash.

Mr. Coolidge is a stalwart Republican in politics and for two terms he served as county commissioner. He has also been councilman for several terms, and for a long period has been a school director. His fellow townsmen, recognizing his worth and ability, have called him to public office, and no trust reposed in him has ever been betrayed in the slightest degree. He is alike honorable in business and social relations, and wherever he is known he is esteemed for his fidelity to principles which make up an honorable manly character. His life has indeed been a busy and useful one, and he has accomplished much. Though he is now eighty years of age and though the snows of many winters have whitened his hair, in spirit and interest he seems in his prime, giving to his business affairs careful supervision and at the same time taking an active interest in whatever pertains to the welfare of his locality.

JOHN J. SCOTT. Though young both in years and in his residence in Oregon, John J. Scott has made the most of natural ability and opportunity and holds now a position of prominence in the business affairs of the city of Albany, Linn county, where he has made his home since 1899. In the brief time of his residence he has shown exceptional ability along the lines of his business, and is a man of fine personality, winning a large circle of friends, who recognize his worth as a citizen. He is in the real estate business there and has every promise of a successful career, based upon the principles which have given him his first forward step in life.

The birth of John J. Scott occurred in Alpena, Mich., May 1, 1875, his parents being James, a native of New York, and Mary (McCallum) Scott, the latter of whom was born in Ontario and died in Michigan. The father early settled in Alpena, Mich., building and conducting a sawmill for many years. He later removed to Choate, in the upper peninsula of Michigan, and there built a sawmill, and conducted it successfully for some time, investing the proceeds of the sale of the same in a hardware business in Ewen, in the same county. In 1899 he changed his location to Oregon, now living upon a farm in Benton county, which is owned by himself and son, John, the other son, Walter, completing his father's family, making his home in Polk county, Ore. John J. Scott was the older of the two sons, and was reared in Alpena, where he attended the public schools until he was fifteen years old, when he was apprenticed to learn the tinner's trade, taking instruction in his father's store. After five years with his father he opened a tin shop in Ewen on his own responsibility, and conducted it until he changed his residence to Oregon in 1800. He first engaged in Albany with T. G. Hopkins in the prosecution of his trade, in which employment he remained for about a year, at the close of that period entering the produce business. In 1901 he began business as a real estate man of Albany, being one of the principals in the firm of Curran & Scott, which has since dissolved partnership, H. F. Hulburt taking the place of Mr. Curran. The firm name is now Scott & Hulburt. In partnership with his father he bought eighty acres of land two miles west of Albany, and in Benton county, where his father now lives, engaged in general farming.

Mr. Scott was married in Albany to Miss Nellie Riley, a native of that city, and the daughter of Peter Riley, a farmer and stock-dealer, who makes his home here. Mrs. Scott was educated in St. Mary's School. Interested always in the advancement of his business, Mr. Scott is a member of the Albany Real Estate Exchange, and politically he is a Republican.

PARIS R. WINSLOW. Left an orphan at a very early age, Paris R. Winslow has made his own way in the world without money or influence, and by so doing has won an honored place for himself among the successful and enterprising farmers of Polk county. Born in Lincoln county, Maine, April 21, 1846, he is a son of Josiah and Nancy (Rowell) Winslow, natives of Massachusetts, and whose death occurred in Maine respectively in 1851 and 1854. The elder Winslow was a blacksmith by trade, and followed it nearly all of his active life, combining therewith the management of a small farm.

Eight years old when left destitute of the care of father or mother, Paris R. went to live with an aunt in Hopkinton, Mass., where he continued the education begun in the public schools of Maine. Nothing of particular interest occurred in his life until the breaking out of the Civil war, when his desire to become a soldier and fight for the Union more than offset any business chances that might come his way. February 2, 1862, he enlisted in Company D, Fifteenth Maine Volunteer Infantry under Gen. B. F. Butler, and went to Mississippi, becoming a part of the Army of the Gulf. In this capacity he participated in the battles of Baton Rouge, Fort Hudson, Sabine Cross Roads and Pleasant Hill. Under General Sheridan he was a soldier in Shenandoah valley, and under General Banks was at Winchester and Cedar Creek, serving under the same able leadership until the close of the war. After being discharged and mustered out at Augusta, Me., July 14, 1866, he started the same year for California, making the journey by way of the Isthmus, and going direct to Olympia, Puget Sound. There he engaged in farming until 1870, and then removed to Klickitat county, Wash., and engaged in stock-raising until 1874.

Arriving in Polk county, Ore., in 1874, Mr. Winslow lived first on a farm in the Eola Hills, and in 1890 rented his present farm, which he greatly improved and in time purchased. It consists of one hundred and two acres, twenty-five of which are under cultivation, the whole being devoted to general farming, stock-raising and dairying. In 1875 Mr. Winslow was united in marriage with Addie Vandevort, who was born in Lane county, Ore., in 1857, and whose father, W. H. Vandevort, crossed the plains in 1852. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Winslow, of whom Helen K. is living in Salem; Herbert is in California; Elvie and Walter are attending the Willamette University; and Frank and George are at home. With his wife Mr. Winslow is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Lincoln, of which he is class-leader and trustee. He is a Republican in politics, but has never been identified with local or other office. He is esteemed for his personal characteristics and success in life, and has many friends who wish him well and appreciate his public spiritedness and thrift.

ERASTUS SPAULDING is one of the retired residents of Newberg who has stored up a great deal of interesting and instructive information regarding the early days of California and Oregon. Descended from a fine and reliable New England ancestry, Mr. Spaulding was born in Milford, N. H., August 14, 1832, his father, Abel, being a native of Massachusetts, as was also his paternal grandfather, another Abel. The latter served in the war of 1812, and died in his native town of Peperal at the advanced age of ninety-four years. He was a farmer during his entire active life, and handed down to his namesake son a keen appreciation of the many advantages of an agricultural life. However, the second Abel branched out somewhat from the example set by his sire, and on his two hundred acre farm on the state line between New Hampshire and Massachusetts, in Milford township, engaged in sawmilling with a water-wheel mill for many years. His latter days were rendered precarious by a defective heart, and this distressing disorder was the cause of his death at the age of seventy-six years. His wife, Anna Shaddock, was also born in the east, the daughter of a farmer in Massachusetts, and her death occurred on the old homestead in Milford township.

The second youngest in his father's family of seven sons and two daughters, Erastus Spaulding attended the early subscription schools at irregular intervals, and was early inured to long hours and hard work. Between the ages of ten and sixteen he knew little leisure on the home farm, and after that applied himself for seven years to learning and applying his trade of blacksmithing. During this time he lived in Westborough, Mass., and in 1858 he located in Leavenworth, Kans., where he lived and prospered for six years. Various activities engaged his attention in the Kansas city, including blacksmithing, masonry and teaming, and he also came to own and manage a saw-mill. He was a strict Abolitionist, and fearlessly made known his views on this then all-important question. Those were interesting times in Kansas, and the energetic blacksmith had some peculiar experiences. The Quantrells were traveling their liveliest gait, and the country was being scoured for their capture, dead or alive. Mr. Spaulding luckily escaped close association with this murderous band of robbers, and his services were never in demand to hunt them to their lairs.

In 1872 Mr. Spaulding unsettled himself from Kansas and located in California, where he found employment in the shop of the Excelsior Manufacturing Company, managed by his brother. Thereafter he developed a talent for invention, and with a man named William Plumber invented what became known as the Plumber Fruit Dryer. They built the second fruit dryer in the state of California, and placed it in Sonoma, Sonoma county. They were fairly successful in manufacturing their dryer, but a drought appearing the second year they removed to Oregon in 1874, locating their plant at East Portland. Here they manufactured and sold their dryer for three years, made a large amount of money, but owing to a failure in the fruit crop the fourth year determined to dispose of their company rights. The severing of the partnership was accompanied by considerable friction, owing to the unreliability of the partner of Mr. Spaulding.

After retiring from manufacturing dryers Mr. Spaulding bought a farm of one hundred and thirty acres near Pleasantdale, Yamhill county, a part of which was improved, and upon which he lived and farmed until 1896. He then took up his residence in Newberg, and though he still owns his farm, is practically retired from business activity. Four years ago he had a stroke of apoplexy, but at the present time has nearly recovered his normal health. In Massachusetts,

May 8, 1861, Mr. Spaulding was united in marriage with Elizabeth Kent, who was born in Canada, and whose father, a printer by trade, lived and died in the northern country. Of the three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Spaulding one died in infancy; Frank, who had just completed an apprenticeship as a machinist, was drowned while moving some lumber into its proper place for his employers in Portland, and, stepping backward, fell into the Willamette river, striking the lower deck of a steamer moored to the shore. His neck was broken, and for two days the effort to find his body was futile. However, a longshoreman saw in his sleep the place where the boy might be found, and strange as it may seem, a search of the place revealed the body of the unfortunate lad. He was twenty years and fifteen days old at the time of his death, and his taking away was sadly deplored by his family and many friends. C. K. Spaulding, the youngest son, is mentioned at length in another part of this work. Mr. Spaulding is a Republican in politics, and in religion professes no particular creed. He is fraternally associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen of the World.

J. J. COLLINS. Bringing with him into the west a fund of enthusiasm and a firm belief in the inexhaustible resources of the states of the Pacific slope, it is not a matter of wonder that J. J. Collins has grandly succeeded in his undertaking, building up for himself an interest in a substantial and remunerative business, as well as developing the latent possibilities of the country. After many years of experience in the timber lands of Michigan, where he gained a keen, true insight into every detail of the work, he desired a new and broader field for utilizing the ability and energy which he felt had become the moving power of his ambitions, and he therefore sought the fields of Oregon, and as a member of the firm of E. Dorgan & Co., of Albany, Linn county, he has added to the business possibilities of the city.

J. J. Collins was born in Carsonville, Sanilac county, Mich., December 5, 1865, the son of Jeremiah Collins, a farmer in that vicinity, and who died there. He was the second oldest of the eight children, six of whom are living, two sisters and a brother, F. H. Collins, having also located in Albany. He was reared to manhood on the farm of his father, receiving his education in the district school, and when eighteen years of age he went to Alpena, Mich., and entered the employ of F. W. Gilchrist. Beginning at the foot of the ladder he made his way gradually to one of the best positions in the business, becoming, before the close of the fifteen years' service, the buyer and scaler of logs. In 1899 he resigned his position and coming to Albany, Ore., he became one of the firm of E. Dorgan & Co., which was then formed by himself, E. Dorgan and F. J. Devine, the three being experienced lumber and timber men. Mr. Collins assumed charge of the office and the other two attended to the locating and buying of lands, beginning at once upon the work, and in their sale of the same meeting with extremely gratifying success. In 1902 they located about seventy thousand acres, most of the locaters being Linn county people, altogether in this short time having bought and sold over thirty thousand acres of land. The best efforts of this firm have been put forth in the endeavor to induce capital to build a good saw-mill in the city of Albany, and thus advance the timber interests of the county and vicinity, the value of which operations would extend throughout the Willamette valley, and induce emigration from the eastern states.

The marriage of Mr. Collins united him with Miss Katherine G. Mariman, a native of Missouri. In addition to the absorbing interests of his timber business, Mr. Collins is connected with fire insurance circles, representing the Phoenix & Milwaukee Mechanics. In his fraternal relations he is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Modern Woodmen of America and Foresters of America, in the first named serving as treasurer.

ANSON STERLING CONE. A family numerously and worthily represented in Oregon is that of which Anson S. Cone is a member. He is widely known as one of the extensive farmers and stock-raisers of the Willamette valley, and since 1846 has been actively identified with the best citizenship of this state of unbounded resources and possibilities, and with its wonderful latter-day development. He was born near Shelbyville, Ind., November 6, 1827, a son of Gustavus Adolphus and Mary (Garrison) Cone. When he was four years of age he was taken by his parents to Laporte county, Ind., and at the age of thirteen accompanied them to Lee county, Iowa, where his father purchased a farm. As early as 1846 rumors of the superior advantages offered by the west began to reach the quiet agricultural region of Lee county, and the sons in the Cone family discussed the subject with as much enthusiasm as did any of their neighbors—and perhaps with more practical results. At any rate Anson and Aaron Cone, two of the most enterprising and ambitious young men of that neighborhood, joined a caravan bound for Oregon in the spring of that year, having outfitted with ox-teams, with the unalterable determination of putting their fortunes to the hazard in the wonderful new country. A halo of romance invested everything connected with the great region for which they were headed, and, once started, nothing persuaded them to turn back.

Upon their arrival at Whitman's Station the brothers, accompanied by Asbury Pugh, purchased pack horses and proceeded on horseback the rest of the way to Oregon City, where they arrived about seven months after starting out. The following year Oscar H. and Gustavus A., their brothers, crossed the plains in the same manner, the former from the Iowa farm and the latter from Laporte county, Ind., and settled near Butteville. In 1852 the father of these young men, desiring to share in the advantages surrounding his sons, sold his Iowa property and followed them to Oregon. In 1853 Francis M., Oliver and Philander J. brought their mother to join the family, and thus were assembled in one state, and in practically the same neighborhood, the dear ones to whom separation and its attendant anxieties had been so severe a trial.

Anson S. Cone's first location in Oregon was in Washington county, where he was employed for a time at work upon farms which were being developed out of the wilderness in the vicinity of Hillsboro. Subsequently he removed to the vicinity of Oregon City, and in 1848 started for California with ox-teams. The pioneer spirit of adventure had taken possession of him, and he was determined to secure some of the gold, the discovery of which about this time had created such a sensation the world over. The party with which he traveled was the first to open a road over the mountains into the far-famed valley of the Sacramento. The expedition consisted of forty wagons and one hundred and twenty men, only one of whom was accompanied by his wife and children. Anson S. Cone first went to Sutter's Mill and prospected until the spring of 1849, at which time he visited the north, middle and south forks of the American river, experiencing fair success in his mining operations. In the fall of the same year his brother Aaron, who had been his companion in so many travels and adventures, and who had gone to California in the spring of 1849, died in Sacramento; and in August Mr. Cone himself became ill and was obliged to abandon his work and return to Oregon. He came by steamer from San Francisco to Astoria, and in the spring of 1850 went to Butteville, where he took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres. This is the property now occupied by J. B. Kenyon and his sons. In the summer of the same year he took up his present farm of three hundred and twenty acres, and upon this his father moved in 1852. In the latter year he built himself a log house on his original claim, and in the midst of crude and unattractive surroundings began the work of converting the wilderness into a productive farm. For four years he maintained bachelor quarters on this property, and endured many hardships without complaint, assured of ultimate improvement in his condition.

In 1850, when the Indians who participated in the Whitman Massacre were tried, Mr. Cone served on the jury, in charge of Joseph L. Meeks, then United States marshal.

In 1861 Mr. Cone went to Florence, Idaho, and for two years earned considerable money in the mines. For a time thereafter, he turned his attention to a pack train with which he conveyed provisions from Lewiston to the mining camps of Elk City and Clearwater Station, a distance of one hundred and thirty miles. During the heat of two summers he made this trip frequently, and finally, with his brother, Philander J., he took the train to Marion county. In 1866 he was united in marriage with Sarah A. Cone, widow of his brother Oliver, who had five children by her former marriage. Of these, Jane married Joseph Graham, of Clackamas county; Alvina is deceased; Orville O. resides near Sandy, Ore.; Everett A. M. lives on the farm; and Mary F. is the wife of Mr. Tower, in the mail service in Portland. By her first marriage with William Long she had a son, John Wesley Long, now on the home farm.

Soon after his marriage Mr. Cone settled on the farm upon which his father formerly lived, and which now consists of four hundred acres. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, has seventeen acres under hops, and is breeding hogs and Angora goats in large numbers. In politics he is a Republican, but has never evinced a desire to hold public office. Thorough, practical and substantial in appearance and fortune, he is a typical, large-hearted and resourceful northwestern pioneer. Possessed of a genial disposition and a kindly public spirit which actuates him to many deeds which will always reflect credit upon his name, he strives to do his part in the world toward making it better and happier. At his home he and his family dispense a gracious and generous hospitality. The publishers of this volume have taken great pride in preserving for the future a record of the life of Mr. Cone, with this brief estimate of the esteem in which he is held by those who have learned to know him best, feeling assured that such a review will prove the fountain-head of inspiration for many an ambitious youth of the present day, as well as of generations yet to come.

Z. H. RUDD. No history of the Willamette valley would be complete were no mention made of Z. H. Rudd, who, as manager of the Linn County Abstract Company, occupies an important place in the business affairs of the county. A native son of the state, he was born August 27, 1862, a son of Harry L. and Lydia A. (Morrison) Rudd, natives of Rutland county, Vt., and New Hampshire, respectively, the latter a daughter of Major Morrison, also a native of New Hampshire, but who finally settled in Michigan.

Harry L. Rudd was proud to claim descent from an old New England family. He was a farmer's son and was early initiated into the duties that fall to the lot of the agriculturist. From Rutland county, Vt., he removed to Cass county, Mich., there also engaging in farming. In 1849, however, he was seized with the fever of unrest, as were so many others upon the announcement that gold had been discovered in California, and forthwith started across the plains with gold and California as his goal. In the fall of the year 1851 he returned to the east, and in Michigan, in the early part of 1852, was united in marriage with Miss Lydia A. Morrison. The young people at once started across the plains, ox teams furnishing the motive power. He became associated with John N. Donalds in the management of a merchandise business in Burlington. Adjoining what is now known as Peoria, Linn county, Mr. Rudd took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and at once began to transform it into a habitable tract.

The long and useful life of Harry L. Rudd was brought to a close in 1892, his death occurring in Albany, his wife preceding him by one year. To this worthy couple three children were born, only two of whom are living. Lura, Mrs. Haight, of Albany, and Z. H.

As his father was a farmer, it was but natural that Z. H. Rudd should become acquainted with the duties that pertain to the farm, and at an early age he gave a helping hand. When the district schools were in session he improved every opportunity which they afforded, and subsequently he attended Armstrong's Business College in Portland, from which he graduated in February, 1882. From then until 1891 he remained on the old home farm, taking an active part in its care and cultivation. In 1891 he was appointed deputy to the county recorder, E. E. Davis, holding the position two terms, and in the meantime gaining a practical insight into the details pertaining to the office. In 1892 Z. H. Rudd, E. E. Davis and W. A. Kimsey formed what has since been known as the Linn County Abstract Company, although the individual owners have changed somewhat since its organization. Mr. Kimsey's interest was later purchased by the two other partners, and subsequently B. M. Payne and Z. H. Rudd bought Mr. Davis' interest. Substantially all the abstracts written in the county pass through the company's hands, and it goes without saying that the company enjoy the complete confidence of the people wanting work in that line. A number of assistants are required in the office to do the detail work. Mr. Rudd is manager of the company, for which position he is thoroughly qualified.

In Lebanon, Linn county, Mr. Rudd was united in marriage with Miss Mary Rieland, whose birth occurred in Ohio. Fraternaly Mr. Rudd is a Mason, being identified with St. John's Lodge No. 62 and is also enrolled among the Royal Arch Masons and the Woodmen of the World. Socially he holds membership with the Alco Club, and in political matters invariably casts his vote in favor of Democratic candidates. Mr. Rudd and his sister still own the old donation claim which his father took up in 1852, but rent it to tenants. In his business dealings he has been very successful, his good management, enterprise and fair dealing winning him a handsome competence, which numbers him among the substantial citizens of the community.

WILLIAM GOLTRA. Since coming to Oregon in 1853 William Goltra has been closely connected with the business as well as the agricultural interests of the communities of which he has been a resident, through the exercise of his practical, clear-cut methods, dictated by an unusually keen judgment. Not empty-handed when he came west—for no man can be called so who has mastered a trade, and with earnest energy and industry prepares for the work which is to win his livelihood—he also had for his capital the personal traits which have since characterized his success, and also called forth the admiration and esteem of those who have witnessed his efforts.

The Goltra family came originally from Germany, the first representative in America being the great-grandfather of William Goltra. He settled in New York state, where Oliver Goltra was born, the latter serving his country in the war of 1812. He was a farmer by occupation and made his home in young manhood in New Jersey, and later in life removed to Jacksonville, Ill., where his death occurred. The second Oliver, the father of William Goltra, was born near New Brunswick, N. J., and in that state he engaged at his trade of a hatter, carrying on his work in both Middlesex and Somerset counties until 1861, at which time he removed to Jacksonville, Ill., and became a farmer in Morgan county, later removing to Lincoln, where he died. In his religious views he was a Presbyterian. He married Anna Harris, a native of New Jersey, and a descendant of Welsh and English ancestors. Her father, William H. Harris, died in New Jersey, where Mrs. Goltra also died, his loyalty having been tested in the war of 1812 during which he faithfully served. Of the eleven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Goltra, ten attained maturity and nine are now living, only two of whom came to the Pacific coast, another son, Nelson, coming at the same time that William Goltra emigrated. He settled in Linn county, Ore., where he engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and was killed in Corvallis in 1858, by the explosion of one of the boilers of the saw-mill.

The oldest child living of this large family is William Goltra, who was born May 24, 1834, near New Brunswick, N. J., and there reared to manhood, receiving his education in the public schools. He early learned the trade of a carpenter, working at the same for some little time in his native state, but when only nineteen years old he started with his brother for the west. The outfit, consisting of ox teams and necessary supplies, was obtained in the spring of 1853 and they set out over the "Barlow route" for Oregon, May 12 witnessing their departure from the site of Kansas City, and five months later, to the day, they arrived at their destination. Mr. Goltra walked the entire distance between Missouri and the western territory, driving a team, his pluck manifest in the way he endured hardships and privations in this first struggle of life. The brothers first located in Clackamas county, Ore., and there spent the winter following the journey. William Goltra engaged in the prosecution of his trade. In 1854 he came to the city of Albany, Linn county, and for the ensuing eleven years continued here, contracting and building. In 1855 he bought the right to a donation claim seven miles southeast of Albany, known originally as the Keller claim, and near which the Southern Pacific railroad now runs, and improved and operated it in connection with his interests in Albany. In 1865 he removed to the farm and devoted his energies entirely to the cultivation of the same, and has added to the original number of acres purchased until he has four hundred and thirty acres. In 1873 he rented the farm and again located in Albany, engaging then in the grain business. He has since continued in this work, meeting with a gratifying success which can scarcely fail to accompany earnest, persevering effort, such as Mr. Goltra has put forth in everything that he has attempted in life. He buys grain from Linn, Marion and Lane counties principally, and ships to Portland and San Francisco, dealing almost entirely in wheat and oats. In 1896 he bought out the branch house of the Mitchell, Lewis & Staver Hardware Company, of Portland, and moved the stock into his own building at the corner of Ellsworth and First streets, where he carries a complete line of all farming implements, carriages, wagons and harness. The business is conducted under the firm name of Goltra & Rumbaugh. Mr. Goltra is well known through his extensive grain dealing, especially in the eastern part of the Willamette valley, where he bought and shipped grain over the "East Side Railway" between Silverton and Coburg, and the main line between Harrisburg and Turner, for many years. Mr. Goltra also owns other farms in the vicinity of Albany, and for some years was interested in the Farmer's Elevator Company, of which he was one of the organizers.

The marriage of William Goltra with Sarah E. Denney, occurred in Lebanon, Linn county. She was born in Ohio, the daughter of Christian Denney, who crossed the plains in 1852 and settled in Linn county. Of the four children which blessed this union, Eva died in Albany; Addie became the wife of D. W. Rumbaugh, of Albany; Laura was married to J. B. Starr, now of New York City; and John O., a graduate of Willamette University, is the secretary of the Portland Trust Company, and makes his home in Portland. Mr. Goltra is a Methodist in his religious views and a Republican in politics, and though never desiring official recognition, he takes an active interest in political affairs and gives every effort toward the betterment of municipal government and hearty encouragement toward movements calculated to advance the general welfare of the city. He is one of the representative citizens of the west, and it is through the efforts of such men of ability and integrity that the commonwealth of Oregon has so quickly risen to a place of importance in the affairs of the country.

E. J. SEELY. An important factor in the industrial interests of Linn county, and a leading member of the Democratic party, E. J. Seely holds a commanding position among the active and enterprising men of the thriving city of Albany. He takes a prominent part in public matters as chairman of the Democratic Central Committee, and is widely and favorably known as a most successful creamery operator, being the secretary and manager of the Albany Butter and Produce Company. A son of the late William Seely, he was born July 3, 1866, in Whitehall, Greene county, Ill. He is of French-Canadian descent, his paternal great-grandfather, Anthony Seelye, as the name was formerly spelled, having been born of French ancestors, in Canada. He subsequently removed to Missouri, settling in St. Louis, when that now important city was but a hamlet. His son, Stewart Seely, who curtailed the family surname by cutting off the final "e," was the grandfather of E. J. Seely. He was born and bred in St. Louis, but as a young man settled in Greene county, Ill., where he became a farmer of some prominence.

Born in Whitehall, Ill., William Seely was reared to farming pursuits, and continued a resident of his native town until 1888. Emigrating then to Benton county, Ore., he purchased land in Alsea, and was there engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, in 1892. He married Jennie Jones, who was born in Greene county, Ill., and died, in 1896, in Alsea, Ore. Her father, Josiah Jones, a native of North Carolina, was a pioneer settler of Greene county, Ill. Of the thirteen children born of their union, eight survive, namely: E. J., the special subject of this sketch; Charles, a resident of Astoria; Curtis, who is engaged in the creamery business at Waldport, Ore.; Mrs. Lana Neal, of Heppner, Ore.; Mrs. Lucy Warfield, Harry, Gusta and Inez. The last four named children live in Alsea valley.

Brought up on the home farm in Greene county, Ill., E. J. Seely obtained his education in the district schools and the Whitehall high school. Leaving home at the age of nineteen years, he went to Bartelsville, I. T., where he was employed in farming and stock-raising until the spring of 1889. Coming then to Oregon, he located at Springfield, Lane county, where he remained for five years in the creamery business, being associated with Douglas & Co., as manager of their creamery, and while there became proficient in the trade of a butter maker. Removing, in 1895, to Albany, Mr. Seely became secretary and manager of the Albany Creamery Association, with which he was connected five years. In 1900 he organized the Albany Butter and Produce Company, of which he has since been the secretary and manager. Buying a corner lot he built the creamery, and has been instrumental in the establishment of an extensive and profitable dairy business, making a specialty of manufacturing a choice grade of butter, in the season of 1902 making 155,000 pounds. Remodeling the building in 1902, Mr. Seely erected a cold storage plant, and is in every way successful. He both stores and manufactures ice, in which he carries on a substantial retail trade, having a lucrative patronage in Albany.

Mr. Seely married, in Albany, Miss Stena Freerksen, who was born in Illinois, of German ancestry, and they have one child, Claribel Seely. For several years Mr. Seely has been a member of the Democratic Central Committee, of which he is now the chairman, and for one term represented the third ward in the City Council. Fraternally he was made a Mason at Eugene, Ore., joining Eugene Lodge, No. 11, A. F. & A. M., and is a member of Eugene Chapter, R. A. M., and of Temple Commandery, No. 3, K. T., of Albany, being Past E. C. He united with the Odd Fellows at Springfield, Ore., and now belongs to Albany Lodge, No. 4, I. O. O. F., in which he has passed all the chairs, and to the Albany Encampment, of which he is Past C. P. Mr. Seely likewise belongs to the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, to the Alco Club, and to the State Dairymen's Association.

CAPT. DAVID CRAIG. The fine farming property owned by Capt. David Craig, located eight and a half miles from Salem, has witnessed many large undertakings in the line of stock-raising and general farm operations, and without doubt has been one of the most productive and profitable farms in Marion county. The owner has advanced ideas relating to his preferred occupation, and through the medium of his own practical experiments, agricultural journals and conferences with others as thoughtful and inquiring as himself, has probably brought his farm to as high a state of perfection as it is possible at the present time and under present conditions in the northwest. Of the three hundred and forty acres in the property, three hundred are under cultivation. The work of improvement has been greatly facilitated by reason of the many natural advantages existing, chief among which is the presence of numerous living springs. A beautiful rural home, surroundings of shrubbery, trees and flowers, with fine barns, hop houses and the most modern of agricultural implements, convey an idea of the enterprise and progressive spirit of one of the representative land-owners of Marion county.

When Captain Craig took possession of his farm in 1877, he had to deal with and solve the problem of disposing of vast areas of scrub oak and underbrush. Having accomplished this work, he began, on a small scale, the raising of wheat and oats, gradually increasing his annual production until he became one of the extensive grain-producers of his community. At the same time he embarked in stock-raising, a business which soon developed to large proportions. In years gone by, some very valuable stock has been bred on his farm. During the stock-raising period of his career, which terminated in 1895, he was awarded many prizes at the State Fair. He has made a specialty of Angora goats, Cotswold sheep and Poland-China swine. In 1894, Captain Craig put sixty acres of his land under hops. Two years later he reduced this to thirty acres, which has since been devoted uninterruptedly to the culture of this product. In 1902 the yield was over eighteen tons.

A native of Toronto, Canada, Captain Craig was born February 8, 1852. When eight years of age he was taken by his parents to London, Canada, where his rudimentary education was received. After the completion of his studies in the public schools he entered Day's Business College in Toronto, from which he was graduated. He was variously employed during the earlier years of his young manhood, until he came to Oregon with his father in 1875. His father located on a farm in the Waldo Hills in Marion county in that year, where David Craig remained for two years. In 1877 he settled upon the farm which he now occupies, and which he has since made his home. April 20, 1881, he was married to Olivia Small, a native of Silverton, Ore., and of this union five children have been born: Ernest E., the eldest son, while a student in Mount Angel College, ran away to participate in the Spanish-American war, and died in the Philippine Islands; Harvey S. graduated from the classical department of Mount Angel College, in June, 1903; Alma M., Willard D. and Vernon W. reside with their parents.

Recognizing his qualifications for public office, the people of Marion county elected Captain Craig to the Oregon state legislature in 1895, and again in 1897. During both sessions he supported all measures inspired by a desire to promote the highest interests of the state and the community in which he resides, and those who watched his record accord to him the highest credit for the capable and efficient manner in which he safeguarded the causes of his constituents. His first presidential vote was cast for a Republican candidate, and he has since stanchly adhered to the principles of that great party. Fraternally, he is identified with the Masonic order, affiliating with Pacific Lodge No. 50, A. F. & A. M., of Salem, and Multnomah Chapter No. 1, R. A. M., also of Salem. For many years he was connected with the Oregon National Guard. Upon the organization of Company I, Second Regiment, Oregon National Guard, in September, 1887, he was elected first lieutenant. May 17, 1890, he was elected to the captaincy of the company, and filled this office until his resignation, in 1892, after a continuous service of nearly five years.

Captain Craig is a man possessed of a high public spirit and a keen sense of personal honor. In all his associations with his fellow-men he has exhibited those characteristics which cause a man to be respected and honored, and his influence and his means have always been at the command of the public when the opportunity of assisting in any cause for the advancement of the general welfare presented itself to him. He has been a frequent contributor to the press, and his opinion on public affairs, thus disseminated, has been of immediate interest to the people. In every sense he has shown himself to be a thoroughly representative citizen, and his name will go down in history as that of one of the thoughtful, unselfish, generous-hearted and conscientious citizens of the county.

MANFORD McCROSKY. Though a resident of Oregon but three years, Manford McCrosky has become a man of no small importance in the industrial life of the community in which he has chosen to make his home. Having met with a gratifying success in his line of work in the middle west he has ventured to extend his operations into the less tried opportunities of the Pacific slope, confident as to his ability to win the approval and business confidence of the people with whom he should deal, and his effort has met with speedy and entirely satisfactory results.

Mr. McCrosky is a representative of a Scotch-Irish family, his grandfather, Samuel McCrosky, having been a near descendant of an emigrant from the country across the water. His home was originally in Pennsylvania, and from that state he removed to Ohio, where he continued to follow his occupation of farming. Near St. Paris of the latter state the father of Manford McCrosky, John, was born and reared to manhood, likewise following the occupation of an agriculturist, later making his home near Argos, Ind., where he was well known through the substantial results of his work. He married Cynthia Hunt, a native of Ohio, and daughter of Isaac Hunt, a farmer in that state, and she was the mother of two children, a son and a daughter. She died when the son, Manford McCrosky, was an infant.

The birth of Manford McCrosky occurred near Argos, Ind., September 24, 1864, and he there grew to manhood, receiving his education in the public schools of that state. Until 1888 he remained at home, and at that date he removed to Rosewood, Champaign county, Ohio, and there engaged in the employment which had occupied the attention of his forefathers. After a few years he became interested in the creamery business in the city of Rosewood, being one of the organizers of the Rosewood Elgin Butter Company, of which he became director, secretary and manager. The business venture was entirely successful and he continued in this employment until 1899, when he decided to carry his interests into the west. Unlike the pioneers of old, but no less interested in all that pertained to the welfare of the land in which he was seeking a home, he traveled to Oregon, and at once entered the employ of the Albany Creamery Association, remaining, however, but six weeks at their skimming station at Tangent, before he accepted a position as butter-maker with the T. S. Townsend Creamery Company, of Salem. For seven months he was satisfied with this position, but January 1, 1901, he returned to Albany at the request of the Albany Creamery Association, and though they gave him the position of manager and secretary he also took charge of a department where he could make the butter. Though receiving help at times in his department the work which he has chosen is done entirely by himself, and he derives much satisfaction in so doing when viewed in the light of results. He has competed in several butter-making contests, his first being at the Oregon State Fair, where he took first premium. At the Hillsboro meeting of the Oregon Dairymen's Association, December 16-18, 1902, he took the gold medal, his butter scoring 96½, and through his successive triumphs a proper valuation has been placed upon his work. He is also interested as a stockholder in the Albany Creamery Association, of which he is secretary and manager.

The marriage of Mr. McCrosky occurred in Urbana, Ohio, and united him with Victoria E. Newcomb, a native of that city, and they are now the parents of two children: Carl R. and Cecil B. Religiously Mr. McCrosky is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and politically he is a Democrat, while in his home in Rosewood serving for six years as justice of the peace, a position which he resigned on coming to Oregon. Always interested in his business affairs, Mr. McCrosky is an active member of the State Dairymen's Association, and during the Oregon state fair at Salem, in 1900, he was a judge of the creamery display.

JUDGE H. H. HEWITT. For many years associated with the jurisprudence of Oregon, Judge H. H. Hewitt occupies a position in the community of Linn county in keeping with his profound legal attainments, his political integrity and sagacity, and his advantages as a native son and a member of one of the earliest pioneer families of the northwest. Born near Wheaton, Yamhill county, December 7, 1846, he laid the foundation for his present rugged constitution on the home farm, and gained his rudimentary education while irregularly attending the public school of his neighborhood. A son of Henry and Elizabeth (Matheney) Hewitt, he is a grandson of another Henry.

The father of Judge Hewitt was born near Huntingdon, Huntingdon county, Pa., November 19, 1822, and was sixteen years old when his father moved overland to Platte county, Mo. A mountaineer chancing to pass the lonely and isolated farm of the Hewitts discoursed glowingly upon the advantages in the far northwest, and young Henry lent a ready ear to his account, and eventually inspired others with faith in the remote western country. At a public meeting he secured the signatures of a number of the prominent settlers of the locality, the majority of whom withdrew after promising to make ready for the proposed journey. At best the project was a hazardous one, for no wagon train had as yet penetrated the limitless tracts of the plains, and the chances were against their reaching the desired goal. Nothing daunted, the young man persevered in agitating the plan which accentuated his limitations and made his days and nights restless with uncertainty. He finally succeeded in getting together a party which included Messrs. Applegate, Burnett, Martyn, Lennox, Waldo, and many others, as well as Captain Matheney, one of the central figures in this first great emigration towards the western sea. Captain Matheney was one of the settlers of Platte county with whom the Hewitts became acquainted soon after removing there, and his daughter, Elizabeth, finally became the wife of young Henry Hewitt. She was born in Indiana, while her father was born in Virginia, and reared in Kentucky. From Indiana he took his family to Illinois, and in Hancock county won the rank which clung to him through life, that of captain of a company organized to drive the Mormons out of Nauvoo. In Missouri the fearlessness which characterized his entire life made him an important factor in the then wilderness country, and he naturally fell into a foremost position in the opening expedition of 1843.

History furnishes various accounts of the brave and fearless men who sold their middle west farms and risked all on the chance of reaching the western slope of the Rocky mountains. That the company was a large one is certain, for it is practically agreed that their original intention was to travel in four columns, of thirty wagons each, and sufficiently far apart to facilitate the formation of a square into which the loose cattle could be driven at night for protection from the Indians. Owing to the necessity of forming so many new paths this plan proved impracticable, and it is assumed, after reading many accounts, that the train finally resolved into a single line, the different wagons of which took their turn in leading the way. However, three companies were formed, each having a captain, and thus organization was effected, and complications minimized. Great difficulty was experienced with the loose stock, and greater difficulty in crossing the North and South Platte rivers. Here also one can hardly get a correct version of the methods employed, for each company accomplished the feat according to their best judgment, and the result, good or bad, of those who had preceded them. One authority speaks of chaining all of the teams together and passing over the South Platte in a solid column, while another recounts the placing of buffalo robes under the wagons, thus transforming them into boats. Ferries were made by lashing two Indian canoes together, and placing the wheels on each side of the wagons in the canoes. The mountains offered many obstacles for the intrepid travelers, and it is recorded of Mr. Hewitt that he was the first to drive a wagon over the range since Whitman's time-honored vehicle passed that way in 1838. From The Dalles the most of the party went by water, the cattle being driven along the south shore, and made to swim the Columbia river at Sauvie's island, going thence to Vancouver.

Locating in Washington county, Mr. Hewitt the next year moved to a claim three miles north of Wheatland, Yamhill county, the same being the Joseph McLaughlin farm, first settled upon in 1832, and constituting the oldest farm on the west side of the Willamette. Here he improved his land, reared his children, and ennobled his life by as true, sincere and helpful a career as any that contributed to the upbuilding of Oregon. His old-time friend, Captain Matheney, true to his former record, continued to exert an influence among his new surroundings, and after taking up his residence in Wheatland established the Matheney Ferry, destined for a long era of usefulness in propelling people across the river. The captain was a large, strong man, with wonderful powers of endurance, and an expert axman. A remarkable shot, he hunted with his friend in the timberlands, and up to the time of his death at the Hewitt homestead, at the age of eighty, delighted to recall the trials and adventures with which he had to contend in crossing the plains, and during the subsequent settlement of Yamhill county. His daughter, Mrs. Hewitt, who died in October, 1899, was the mother of ten children, the order of their birth being as follows: Ann Eliza, deceased wife of Mr. John L. Thornton, of Yamhill county; D. M., a farmer in Polk county; Judge H. H., of Albany; A. W., of Salem, Ore.; A. J., living on a part of the old home in Yamhill county; J. C., of Salem; M. C., a builder of Sacramento, Cal.; J. L., a doctor of dental surgery of Portland; H. W., a jeweler in La Grande, Ore; and L. L., living on the old homestead in Yamhill county.

Mr. Hewitt, whose death occurred January 15, 1899, at the age of seventy-six years, was a staunch Republican, and took an active part in the establishment of his party in Oregon. He was a regular attendant at county and state conventions, and served two terms as commissioner of Yamhill county. He was successful as a farmer, and at one time owned Scott Mount, in Portland, which he sold to H. W. Scott many years before his death. He participated in all of the measures adopted for the development of his county, and contributed both time and money for many worthy causes. His varied experiences included some time spent in the mines of California in 1848. His family was distinguished during the Civil war by the meritorious service of two of his brothers, one of whom, Andrew J., lost his life in battle as colonel of his regiment, and the other, Adam, entered the service after returning from Oregon, whither he had gone with a pack train in 1842.

Judge H. H. Hewitt secured his higher education at the Willamette University, from which he was graduated in the class of 1870, with the degree of A. B. For the following nine years he engaged in educational work, his time being disposed of for a year as principal of the Baptist College at McMinnville, as principal of the public schools of Amity for two years, principal of the Scio schools for two years, principal of the LaFayette Academy for a year; as professor of Greek, Latin and mathematics in the Albany Collegiate Institute for two years, and as principal of the latter institution for one year. In 1872 he was elected superintendent of schools of Yamhill county. In the meantime Mr. Hewitt had devoted his leisure to the study of law, and, having been admitted to the bar in December, 1877, he opened a law office in Albany in July, 1879. For ten years he engaged in practice in partnership with H. Bryant, and later was connected for three years with O. H. Irvine. In 1888 he was elected attorney of the Third judicial district on the Republican ticket, and in 1894 was nominated judge of the same district, and elected by a large majority. Upon the completion of his political service he retired to private practice, and has since been senior member of the firm of Hewitt & Sox. He is an ex-member of the State Central Committee, and was chairman of the Congressional Committee at the convention held in Roseburg, Ore., in 1902. For two years he has served as city attorney.

In Yamhill county in 1872 Judge Hewitt was united in marriage with Maggie J. Rowland, a native daughter of the county, and daughter of Jeremiah Rowland, and sister of Dr. L. L. Rowland, of Salem. Jeremiah Rowland was one of the early settlers of Yamhill county, having crossed the plains in 1844. Mrs. Hewitt died in 1899, leaving a daughter, Olga L., who shares her father's appreciation of mental culture, having graduated from the Albany College. Fraternally Judge Hewitt is prominent as a member and ex-senior warden of Albany Lodge No. 64, A. F. & A. M., the Royal Arch Chapter, the Knights of Pythias, and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is a member, and ex-vice president of the State Bar Association. No name in the legal annals of this county carries with it greater influence than does that of Judge Hewitt. He has the personal characteristics which rivet popular attention, and command universal respect. Industrious, fearless, profound and practical, he has made himself distinguished for erudition in the legal profession, for painstaking and exhaustive examination of every subject engaging his attention or committed to his care, and for guarding well the interests of clients, the public and the integrity of law.

JASON N. BRANDEBERRY. The firm of Brandeberry & Wheeler represent the largest retail lumber enterprise in Linn county. Started in Albany in 1899, an era of prosperity has already dawned for the promoters, both of whom are men of extended experience in their chosen occupation, and command the confidence of the business world. J. N. Brandeberry, the senior member of the firm, was born in Troy township, Ashland county, Ohio, November 18, 1848, and lived on a farm for the first twenty-two years of his life. The most remote ancestor of whom authentic record has been kept is his paternal great-grandfather, who came from Germany and settled in Pennsylvania, where his son, Abraham, the grandfather, was born. The latter removed to Medina county, Ohio, as a young man, and there Conrad Brandeberry, the father of J. N., was born, and upon the same farm the grandfather passed several years of his life, his death occurring after his removal to Ashland county, the same state. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Conrad Brandeberry farmed for many years in Ashland county, but in 1854 took up his residence in Williams county, Ohio, and died there in October, 1902, at the age of eighty-four years. He was a Republican in politics, and a member of the United Brethren Church. His wife, Jane (Malcolm) Brandeberry, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, a daughter of Alexander Malcolm, who brought his family from Scotland and settled in Ashland county, where the balance of his life was spent in farming. Mrs. Brandeberry, who survives her husband, is the mother of eight children. One of her four daughters is deceased.

From the public schools J. N. Brandeberry went to Oberlin College, Ohio, which he left at the end of a year to engage as a clerk in a drug store in Bryan, Ohio. During his four years' association with this concern he acquired a complete knowledge of the business, and thereafter traveled for a year before his marriage in Pioneer, to Mary L. Himes, a native of Williams county, Ohio. After farming for a year Mr. Brandeberry engaged in the drug and grocery business in Montpelier, and after four successful years his store was consumed by fire and he lost about all that he had accumulated. He then turned his attention to railroading, beginning as fireman on the Wabash Railroad, and the fifth year was promoted to engineer, acting in that capacity for two years. In 1886 he came to Corvallis, Ore., and worked at the carpenter's trade for a short time, and then became manager of the warehouse business of Wells & Cauthorn for about ten seasons.

Mr. Brandeberry's first lumbering experience was acquired in partnership with Nels H. Wheeler, with whom he has since been associated in business. The firm rented a mill in Corvallis for two years, and were so successful that they started a branch concern in Albany in June, 1899, thereafter managing both mills until disposing of the Corvallis mill in October, 1899. The company now have two yards, one on Jackson and Water, the other on Water and Washington streets, the main yard covering half a block. The company have complete arrangements for conducting a large retail and wholesale business, the former the most extensive in the county, the business being facilitated by switch connections with both the Southern Pacific and Corvallis & Eastern Railroads. The lumber for manufacturing is brought from Mill City, Ore., and the firm turn out all kinds of lumber and builders' materials. They are the exclusive agents, outside of Salem, for the Curtis Lumber Company, shipping their output to the east, west, north and south in the Willamette valley.

This prosperous part of Oregon has no more enthusiastic advocate of its many advantages than Mr. Brandeberry, who has evidenced his faith in its future by investing in real estate, and in a general participation in the upbuilding of its material, social, and moral structure. His progressive spirit is shared by his sons, Earl C. and Marvin D., the former a bookkeeper and the latter a salesman for the mills, both of whom are enterprising, ambitious, and promising members of the younger generation of business men of Albany. Mr. Brandeberry cast his first presidential vote for a Republican candidate, and he has never strayed from his allegiance to his party. Fraternaly he is connected with Albany Lodge No. 4, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Albany Tent No. 5, Knights of the Maccabees.

BENJAMIN AUSTIN LEONARD. A history of Marion county were indeed incomplete without due mention of two of its most venerable and honored pioneers, Mr. and Mrs. B. A. Leonard. Though the husband is now past eighty-three years of age, and his wife but five months younger, each continues to perform the duties which from long experience have become second nature, the husband still caring for his farm, and the wife performing her household work. The Leonard farm consists of two hundred and eighty acres, and general farming and stock-raising are engaged in, particular attention being given to fine Durham cattle.

A native of Bradford county, Pa., Mr. Leonard was born November 15, 1819, and is one of ten children born to Abel and Abi (Leonard) Leonard. His father, Austin Leonard, who was born in Massachusetts, was of Scotch or English descent. Preserved Leonard, who was probably a brother of Austin Leonard, served with the Continental army in the Revolutionary war. Abel Leonard, a tanner by trade, removed, in 1804, to Bradford county, Pa., and, with the family of which his wife was a member, founded Leonard's Hollow, now known as Leona. He was engaged in business there until 1829, when he removed to Ashtabula county, Ohio. In 1852 they started across the plains, intending to join their son, B. A., who had gone the year before; but the deprivations of the journey were more than they could stand. Arriving at the Missouri river they gave up the trip, as too exacting, and retraced their steps to Ohio, where they passed the remainder of their lives with their son, Horace. Their children, named in the order of their birth, were as follows: Junietta, wife of Asaph Blanchard; Leicester Upham; Harriet, wife of Philemon Guthrie; Horace F.; Laura, wife of William Glenn; Rosamond, wife of Hiram Belden; Benjamin Austin; Sallie, Mariah, and Abigail. All are deceased, excepting the subject of this review.

Naturally Benjamin Austin Leonard took to the shoemaker's trade as a boy, working with his father, and eventually serving a regular apprenticeship. He attended the public schools as opportunity offered, and worked at his trade for many years in Ohio. November 9, 1840, in Caldwell county, Mo., he married Jane Soaps, who was born in Campbell county, Tenn., February 24, 1820. Thereafter the young couple went to housekeeping in Caldwell county, Mo., where they lived until 1851, and then outfitted to cross the plains. They were six months on the way, and at the end of their journey, September 6, 1851, found themselves in the Waldo Hills, where Mr. Leonard took up a donation claim of three hundred and thirty acres, upon which he lived until 1867. This was all wild land, but he succeeded in improving much of it, and in acquiring fair success in general farming. He then bought the place where he now lives, four miles southwest of Silverton, and has since made all of the improvements.

While conducting his farming enterprises, Mr. Leonard has taken an active interest in Republican politics, although he has never desired official recognition. Eight children were born to himself and wife, the order of their birth being as follows: Abel Brower, operating the home farm; Horace, deceased; Thomas Benton, living at Ritzville, Wash.; Marv A., widow of Hiram Smith Reed, of Salem; Flora, wife of Alexander Clark, of Salem, and Lucinda, deceased (twins); Ellen S., wife of Jefferson Scriber, a banker at La Grande, Ore., and Jennette, wife of Jefferson Pooler, of Salem. Mr. Leonard has many friends in the vicinity of his home, and his long association with the county has been prolific of the best possible good feeling among all with whom he has been associated.

CHARLES OLVIS. Not all men find the niche in life which Nature intended they should fill, but that Mr. Olvis, who is foreman of the Albany tannery, is the right man in the right place is conceded by all. His paternal great-grandfather fought in the English army. The latter's son, Charles Olvis, was born in Belfast, Ireland, and in 1816 brought his family to America, settling in Baltimore, Md. He died at the advanced age of ninety-eight years. Among the children who came to this country with the grandfather in 1816 was John, the father of Charles, the subject of this article. He followed the weaver's trade in Baltimore until his death, at the age of forty-five years, his death resulting from injuries inflicted by a horse. He had married Miss Margaret McCartin, a native of Glasgow, Scotland, whose father, Edward McCartin, was born in County Down, Ireland. By trade he was a weaver, following the same in Scotland, and after his emigration to America carried on the same business in Baltimore. Mrs. Margaret Olvis also died in the latter city at the age of sixty-three years.

Of the seven children who formerly comprised the parental family only two are living. Charles Olvis was the youngest of the family and was born August 9, 1841, in Baltimore, Md., where he attended the public schools. When sixteen years old he was apprenticed to learn the tanner's trade under Spear & Cole, and after completing his apprenticeship went to Philadelphia to take a position at his trade. It was in 1864 that he came to the Pacific coast, making the trip by way of Panama, and ere long he found work at his trade in Salem, Ore. In March, 1865, he went to South America, and in the course of his travels visited Chile, Bolivia and Peru. The following year he returned to Oregon, and for the next two years was foreman of a tannery in Milwaukee, Ore. In 1868 he became interested in the mines at Boise Basin, but soon returned, content to resume work at his trade, first taking a position at Portland, later at Astoria, and finally at Salem, where he was foreman of a tannery. He was subsequently employed in San Francisco for two years and four months, but finally, in 1872, returned to Oregon, and for two years was foreman of the Lineweber tannery. Going from there to Victoria, British Columbia, he had full charge of a tannery there for five and one-half years, and at the expiration of that time again returned to Astoria and for eight years filled his former position of foreman in the Lineweber tannery. Upon the death of the proprietor Mr. Olvis leased the plant and for ten years was successfully engaged in the manufacture of leather. From Astoria he went to Vancouver, where he had charge of a tannery for over two years, and then, in July, 1902, returned to Oregon his identification with the Albany tannery dating from that time. Three months later he was made foreman of the beam house, and in February, 1903, became superintendent of the entire plant.

In Portland was celebrated the marriage of Charles Olvis and Miss Mary Johns, the latter a native of Germany. Two children were born of this marriage, a son and a daughter. The former, John, learned the tanner's trade and is now his father's able assistant. The daughter, Maggie, is Mrs. Marovich and resides in Portland. Mr. Olvis is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and in political matters is a staunch defender of the Republican party.

JOHN B. HOLMAN. As vice-president of the Albany Iron Works, John B. Holman occupies a position which has been won through the display of intelligent and practical ability, perfected by long experience in the line of a machinist in various shops throughout different parts of the United States. His talent for the work which he has chosen to do amounts to veritable genius, an inheritance which has been added to through many years of effort and cultivation, and, as all earnest and persevering labor meets with wide returns, so Mr. Holman has risen to a place of importance in the industrial life of the Willamette valley, in which he has been largely instrumental in establishing and perfecting the details of his business.

The lineage of the Holman family is that of English nobility, their ancestry being traced back to Sir William Boes Bennett Holman. The father of John B. Holman, Lewis, was born in Exeter, Devonshire, England, the son of a manufacturer of threshing machines, and the one who gave to his descendants their taste and talent for such work. The father also became a manufacturer, and later in life he settled in Ontario, Canada, where he followed the business of contracting and bridge building. With the invariable success of this family he rose to prominence in the community in which he made his home, remaining there until his retirement, soon after which his death took place. In his religious views he was a member of the Episcopal Church. In politics he was always greatly interested, giving his hearty support to William Lyon Mackenzie, who led the Ontario opposition against the Conservatives. His wife was formerly Jane Bailey, also a native of England, and the daughter of Richard Bailey. He was a representative of a prominent English family. Upon his emigration to America he settled in Ontario, where he became a large landowner, interesting himself in the cultivation of his many broad acres. Mrs. Holman, whose death occurred in Canada, was the mother of thirteen children, seven sons and six daughters, of whom only one son is deceased. Besides John B. Holman the living sons are R. D., a millwright in Salem; W. L., proprietor of the Holman Car Shops, of San Francisco, Cal.; James, a stairbuilder of Chicago, Ill.; Samuel, a contractor of Chicago, Ill.; George, a teacher in the schools of Ontario; and Joseph, a wealthy manufacturer, who died in London.

The birth of John B. Holman occurred November 19, 1839, in London, Ontario, and was there reared to manhood, receiving a rather limited education in the national school of the province. Early seeking the life which gave him an opportunity for the display of unquestioned talent, he had served his apprenticeship to the machinist's trade, and received his papers at twenty-one, having begun it when only sixteen and a half years old. With the documents evidencing his capability he set out for the broader opportunities of the United States, finding employment in various cities, among them being Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo and Rochester. In the best machine shops in the United States he remained for two years, where the training and experience proved invaluable to him. At the expiration of that period he returned to the old foundry and there worked for the Hon. Elijah Leonard, of London, for a short time. In 1865 he again left the community and settled in the western part of the United States. The trip, which was made by way of the Isthmus of Panama, was an eventful one in many ways, the steamer, Ocean Queen, on which he sailed from New York City, being wrecked off Cape Hatteras, thus obliging him to go to Cuba, and from there to Aspinwall, thence across the Isthmus. He took passage on the Golden City to San Francisco, and completed the voyage from that city to Portland on the Brother Jonathan.

On arriving in Oregon Mr. Holman settled in Salem, where he soon found employment in the shops of Drake & Moore, and remained with them to their entire satisfaction until the firm dissolved partnership. In 1867 he assumed entire charge of the shop of B. F. Drake of Salem, which provided very limited means for workmanship. Under difficulties he gradually established a more secure footing for the business and a more extended line of operations, making a gratifying success of his work, and as superintendent and manager he conducted the business until 1890, leaving it at this date one of the largest and most substantial machine shops in the Willamette valley. Able at this time to take a more active part in a business proposition he came to Albany, and with others bought out the business of Sox & Stewart, and changed the firm to the Albany Iron Works Company, of which he became vice-president and manager, proceeding to give his energies and talents to the up-building of this work. With the exercise of judgment, skill and management the business has come to be one of the most substantial and firmly established of any in the Willamette valley, the amount of work being done showing large returns for the money invested. The line of operations now extends over the entire valley, along the coast, and also in the state of Washington.

In London, Ontario, in 1861, Mr. Holman was married to Jane Weeks, a native of London, England, and four children have been born to them, of whom Walter John is chief electrical engineer in charge of the government plant at Presidio, Cal.; Minnie S. is the wife of Thomas Holman, of Salem; Carrie is the wife of H. G. Meyer, of Salem; and Victoria E. is the wife of J. H. Linn, of Santa Rosa, Cal. In his fraternal relations Mr. Holman affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, holding membership with Olive Lodge, No. 18, at Salem, and also belongs to the Encampment of Salem, in both of which he is a past officer; the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is also identified with the State Historical Society. His wife is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Though public-spirited and earnest in his endeavor for the general welfare, Mr. Holman is independent in his political views, believing that to be the surest means toward good government, and he carefully considers both men and question before casting his ballot.

EDWARD BIDDLE belongs to the little group of distinctively representative business men who have been the pioneers in inaugurating and building up the chief industries of this section of the Willamette valley. He early had the sagacity and prescience to discern the prominence which the future had in store for this great and growing country, and, acting in accordance with the dictates of his faith and judgment, he has garnered, in the fullness of time, the generous harvest which is the just recompense of indomitable industry, spotless integrity and marvelous enterprise. He is now connected with many extensive and important business interests in Polk county, being proprietor of the Dallas Iron Works, which constitute the leading industry of this character in the Willamette valley.

Mr. Biddle is a native of Greece, Monroe county, N. Y., his birth having occurred there on December 9, 1844. He is the eldest in a family of six children born unto Edward and Adelaide (Beeby) Biddle, both natives of Canada, the former born in Quebec and the latter in Montreal. The maternal grandfather was of English descent and became a farmer in New York. Edward Biddle also removed from Canada to the Empire State and, establishing his home in Greece, Monroe county, carried on agricultural pursuits in that locality until his death. His widow died in Rochester, N. Y., in April, 1903, at the age of eighty-nine years.

Upon the home farm Edward Biddle was reared and the work of plowing, planting and harvesting early became familiar to him. He attended the public schools in his youth and then, not desiring to follow the plow as a lifework, he turned his attention in other directions and in 1860 was apprenticed to the machinist's trade in the shop of M. S. Otis in Rochester, N. Y., where he remained for three years. On the expiration of that period he went to Chicago, where he entered the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad Company in their shops, and later was sent by the company to Centralia, Ill., where he remained for several months. Subsequently he was employed in a machine shop in connection with steamboat building at Cincinnati, but after a brief period he went to Hannibal, Mo., and for a year was employed as a machinist in the shops of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railway Company. During that time he joined a military company which drilled and was in the state service for three months in pursuit of the notorious Bill Anderson of Missouri. After his return from military duty he continued as a machinist in the railroad shops for three months and then went to Louisville, Ky., where he was employed in a similar capacity. His next move took him to Keokuk, Ia., where he was employed in the Des Moines Valley shops until the spring of 1865, when he went from Keokuk to New Orleans, where he again secured work at his trade. He afterward went to Whistler, Ala., and for three years was there employed in the Mobile & Ohio Railroad shops, when he returned to Rochester, where he continued for three months. At the end of that interval he started for New York, intending to go to California by way of the Isthmus of Panama, but ere he embarked he was led to change his plans and for three months was employed in the Baldwin Locomotive Works of Philadelphia. At the end of that time he carried out his intention of coming to the Pacific coast. He took passage at New York on the steamer Aspinwall bound for the isthmus, and from Panama he sailed on the steamer Golden Age for San Francisco.

In that city Mr. Biddle was employed as a machinist in the Union Iron Works for two months, and then, going to Sacramento, he obtained a position in the machine shops of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, remaining there for three years. He next was employed in the shops of the same company at Rockland, Cal., and later spent a year in the shops of the Vallejo Railroad Company. He was afterward made repair engineer at Marysville for the same company and later returned to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, working in their shops at Sacramento as a machinist for one year. At Carlin, Nev., he was employed as foreman in the machine shops of the Central Pacific Railroad Company for three years, and later secured a position at Carson City, Nev., in the shops of the Virginia & Truckee Railroad Company, acting in that capacity for eighteen months. On the expiration of that period Mr. Biddle left the railroad service and became machinist in the Belcher mine at Virginia City, Nev., where he remained for more than two years, when he became machinist in the Overman mine, later setting up pumping engines and machinery in the Lady Bryan mine of Virginia City. His next position was that of chief engineer of the Sutro Tunnel Company and in that capacity he acceptably served for six years, during which time the tunnel was completed.

In 1880 Mr. Biddle arrived in Oregon and for seven years was employed as a machinist and engineer by the Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, with headquarters in Dallas. Then, having through his industry, economy and careful management, acquired some capital, he established his own machine shop and foundry in 1888. He has since conducted it and has practically rebuilt the plant, supplying it with new machinery, with water power and all modern equipments for facilitating and turning out work of the highest grade. The foundry has two cupolas and has made castings weighing as high as thirty-seven hundred pounds. In the foundry both brass and iron castings are manufactured and all kinds of repair work in machinery, boilers and engines is done. Mr. Biddle also manufactures the best hop presses in Oregon, known as the Morrison Improved Hop Press. He likewise manufactures hop stoves and feed mills. The Dallas Iron Works are the oldest in the valley and the west outside of the city of Portland.

In 1870 in Virginia City, Nev., Mr. Biddle was united in marriage to Miss Josephine Davis, who was born in Boston, Mass., a daughter of Luther Davis, who followed the baking business in Boston and afterward in Virginia City. Mrs. Biddle is a most estimable lady and holds membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Biddle was made a Mason in Jennings Lodge, No. 9, A. F. & A. M., and for two terms was its master, while for eight terms he was high priest of Amesworth Chapter, No. 17, R. A. M. He stands today as one of the leading representatives of the craft in Oregon, and is past grand scribe and at present grand king of the Grand Chapter of Oregon. In politics an earnest advocate of Republican principles, he is serving as president of the Republican Club of Dallas, and for six years he has been a school director and two terms was a member of the city council. For forty-two years he has been connected with the machinist's trade and has gradually advanced, enlarging his efficiency and adding to his skill until today he is successfully controlling an industry of volume and importance which adds to the commercial prosperity of his city, and returns to him a gratifying and creditable income. His life has been one of continuous activity, and he is numbered among the substantial citizens of Dallas. In business he has achieved success through honorable effort, untiring industry and capable management, and in private life he has gained that warm personal regard which arises from true nobility of character, deference to the opinion of others, kindness and geniality.

ADOLF WOLF, who is now residing in Silverton, is widely known throughout the Willamette valley, with whose welfare he has been closely identified for thirty-seven years. He is one of the most extensive and successful hop-raisers in the vicinity of Silverton, and formerly was intimately associated with the upbuilding of Independence, Polk county.

Mr. Wolf was born in Frauenkirchen, Austro-Hungary, nine miles southeast of Neusiedl, in February, 1837, his father, Jacob, and his mother, Esther (Gerstel) Wolf, being natives of the same town. His father spent his entire life in the picturesque little Hungarian town, where he was known as a successful wine merchant. He lived to be seventy-five years of age, his death occurring in 1864. His wife, who died in 1862 at the age of seventy, bore him thirteen children, two sons and eleven daughters, of whom Adolf Wolf is the youngest son and the twelfth child in the family.

At an early age Mr. Wolf evinced habits of thrift and industry, and he studied diligently in the school of his native town. That he was ambitious to make his life a success was demonstrated in 1863, when he left his home and family and came to the United States. He had read much of the broader opportunities offered by this country, and was determined to take advantage of them, in the most favored location which he could find. After working for two years as a clerk in a tobacco store in Fremont, Ohio, he came to Portland, Ore., in 1866, where he acquired all the information possible as to the resources of the various sections of the northwest.

Firm in the belief that Polk county at that time offered better opportunities to him than any other locality, he settled in the new town of Independence, and for some time his was the only store in the town. At that time but few families had assembled there, and few interests were represented. Mr. Wolf, with keen foresight, at once entered into the spirit of development and upbuilding, contributing freely of his time and means for advancing the interests of the community. It was chiefly through his influence that the Oregon and California Railroad Company, now the Southern Pacific, was induced to run its line through Independence, an advantage to that town which was almost instantly apparent in the general increase in trade. In building the Southern Pacific through Independence gravel in large quantities was needed. Mr. Henry Hill, one of the town proprietors, owned a large gravel bank which was easy to work from, if it could be acquired; the company tried to get it by purchase or lease, but all means failed. Mr. Wolf was appealed to, and through his influence it was secured with no expense to the railroad company, and this was the means of making Independence what it is to-day, a fact appreciated by the citizens and the officials of the railroad.

In 1884 Mr. Wolf disposed of his business and property in Independence and moved to Silverton, where he purchased the general merchandise business of George Aiken, deceased. This he conducted successfully for several years. In 1890 he took his son, Julius C., into partnership, and in 1891 he erected the Wolf Block, in which he opened new headquarters for his trade. In 1899 he and his son disposed of the business to James Craig, who is still in possession.

At the present time Mr. Wolf is chiefly interested in the hop and the cattle industries. He has sixty acres under hops, and buys, sells and exports large quantities of this product every year. During 1903 he expects to ship at least four thousand bales out of the country. On his farm he raises a high grade of cattle and sheep. In his business operations he has been very successful, and ranks as one of the substantial men of Marion county.

Mr. Wolf was married in Portland, in 1868, to Fannie Kraemer, who is a native of Germany. They are the parents of three children, namely: Julius C., his father's partner in the hop business; Louis Jacob, who was graduated from Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, in 1903; and Sophia, who lives with her parents.

Mr. Wolf is identified with Silver Lodge, I. O. O. F.; the Rebekahs, and Silverton Lodge No. 45, A. F. & A. M. He is a firm advocate of Republican principles, and while a resident of Independence was actively interested in public affairs, serving for several terms in the city council and as school director. In Silverton he has served as mayor two terms, and has been a member of the city council for four years. He has an enviable reputation for business integrity, for enterprise, and for public-spirit, and is accounted one of the most liberal-minded and progressive citizens of Silverton. When he undertakes to carry out an object which he has deemed worthy of his support, he enters into the spirit of the enterprise with his whole heart. He has never failed to respond to the solicitations for aid in any worthy project. Throughout his entire life in the Willamette valley he has exhibited an unselfish interest in the general welfare of the people, and has done all in his power for the improvement of social, intellectual, moral and commercial conditions. He has earned his title to the rank of representative citizen, and is deserving of praise for the honorable success which has greeted his efforts.

JOSEPH P. GALBRAITH. Formerly actively associated with the manufacturing and mercantile industries of Linn county, as book-keeper of the Albany Woolen Mills, Mr. Galbraith is recognized as a citizen of worth, and an efficient business man. He served with distinction in the Union army during the Civil war, and has since been equally loyal in the support of the government. A man of talent and culture, he evinces a warm interest in the advancement of beneficial projects, and is a zealous worker in various secret societies. In the Masonic order he is one of the foremost members, and has done much to promote the good of the fraternity. A native of Rogersville, Tenn., he was born April 6, 1840, a son of William Galbraith. His paternal grandfather, Andrew Galbraith, a native of Virginia, removed to Hawkins county, Tenn., when a young man, and was there successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits, owning a large plantation. He was of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and a lineal descendant of Arthur Galbraith, who was born in the North of Ireland, but emigrated to this country, settling in Pennsylvania.

William Galbraith was born ten miles west of Rogersville, Hawkins county, Tenn., and removed to Jefferson county and there spent the greater part of his life. He first engaged in business as a merchant, then a railway agent, and subsequently a clerk and master in chancery. He served in the Seminole Indian war as lieutenant of a company of volunteers, and for one term was a representative to the state legislature. He, too, was prominent in the Masonic order, in which he attained the degree of R. A. M., and belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Eliza Cobb, who was born in Hawkins county, Tenn., the daughter of a planter, Jesse Cobb, who removed to Tennessee from his native state, North Carolina, in early manhood. Ten children were born of their union, and of these nine survive, and five are living in this section of the country, two of the sons residing in Oregon, and two sons and one daughter living in Washington.

At the age of six years Joseph P. Galbraith removed with his parents to Jefferson county, Tenn., where he received his early education, attending Holston College. In August, 1861, imbued with the true patriotic spirit of his ancestors, he made his way across the mountains to Camp Dick Robinson, in Kentucky, and, in September, 1861, enlisted in Company C, Second Tennessee Infantry. He subsequently took an active part in many engagements, being in the Battle of Mill Spring, Ky., at Murfreesboro, and at Cumberland Gap. For bravery in action he was promoted first to the rank of sergeant major, and was afterwards made adjutant of the Second Tennessee Regiment, U. S. V., with the rank of first lieutenant. He subsequently participated in several skirmishes in Tennessee, and while in the eastern part of the state assisted in driving the rebels into Virginia. While home on a furlough, his regiment was captured at Rogersville, Tenn., and sent to Richmond, Va. In February, 1864, Lieutenant Galbraith resigned his commission, and was afterwards engaged in business in Knox and Jefferson counties, Tenn., until the close of the war.

Returning then to Jefferson county, Mr. Galbraith was assistant clerk in the state legislature of 1864 and 1865, and afterwards served as a clerk under the United States Tax Commission. Having in the meantime studied law at Dandridge, Tenn., he was admitted to the bar in 1866, and practiced his profession in that city until 1875. Removing in that year to Washington county, Ore., he taught school there two terms, then came to Linn county, and for three terms was principal of the schools in Brownsville. Accepting a position as secretary and bookkeeper with the Brownsville Woolen Mills Company, under Thomas Kay, in 1877, he was associated with this company until 1886. Being then elected county clerk of Linn county, Mr. Galbraith served two years, but declined a re-election. Returning to Brownsville, he assisted in organizing a manufacturing company, which purchased the old woolen mill, with which he was connected about a year. Being offered a bonus, in 1880, to build a mill in Albany, the company sold its property in Brownsville and located in Albany under the same name and with the same officers, erecting a plant in Albany. The company was afterwards re-incorporated as the Albany Woolen Mills Company. In December, 1893, Mr. Galbraith disposed of his stock in that firm, resigned his position and resumed the practice of law, continuing his professional labors for eighteen months. The Albany Woolen Mills Company then passing into the hands of a receiver, Mr. Galbraith was appointed clerk and bookkeeper, and served in those capacities until the affairs of the company were adjusted. When the new company was organized in 1898, he became financially interested in it, and continued as bookkeeper until the plant was sold.

Mr. Galbraith was married in Tennessee, in 1863, to Miss Nancy J. McFarland, who was born at Millspring, Tenn., daughter of Dr. Benjamin F. McFarland, an old and prominent physician, who was for a number of years president of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Co. She died March 9, 1902. Ten children were born of their union, namely: Lena, wife of C. H. Younger, of Albany; Louis, who died in 1897; William, of Lewiston, Idaho; Hattie, at home; Eliza, wife of George B. Hart, who is United States Inspector of Customs in the Philippine Islands; Nina, wife of W. L. Lyons, of Pullman, Wash.; Jennie, wife of S. M. Garrison, living in Roseburg, Ore., and Frank, Joseph and Victor, all of Whatcom county, Wash.

Politically, Mr. Galbraith is a gold Democrat, and at the last election cast his vote for President McKinley. After serving one term as councilman he resigned his position, and in 1902 was elected justice of the peace. Fraternally, he was made a Mason in Dandridge, Tenn., in 1866, and while living there was raised to the degree of R. A. M. He is now a member, and past master of St. John's Lodge No. 62, A. F. & A. M., of Albany; a member and past officer of Bayley Chapter, No. 17, R. A. M.; a member and Past Eminent Commander of Temple Commandery, No. 3, K. T.; is a member of Adoniram Council, R. & S. M., of Albany, in which he is recorder; and has served as Grand Generalissimo of the Grand Commandery of Oregon, as Grand Senior Deacon of the Grand Lodge, and as Grand Captain of the Host of the Grand Chapter of Oregon. He is also a member of the Alco Club, and of McPherson Post, G. A. R. He is a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he is an elder, and is also a trustee, and the secretary and treasurer, of the board of trustees of Albany College.

THOMAS V. B. EMBREE, M. D. When Dr. Thomas V. B. Embree arrived in Oregon City December 24, 1844, he found the largest aggregation of houses and people anywhere assembled on the coast. At the time he was eight years of age, having been born five miles from La Fayette, Howard county, Mo., August 14, 1836. As one of the early pioneers of Oregon he has contributed his share to its upbuilding, and has practiced medicine within its borders for more than forty-two years. The establisher of the Embree family in America was the paternal great-grandfather of the doctor, who was born in England, and left his plantation in Virginia to participate in the war of independence. This southern plantation was the birthplace of his son, Thomas, the paternal grandfather, who in early life removed to Kentucky, but died on the farm in Howard county, Mo., to the pioneer development of which he devoted the last years of his life.

Carey Duncan Embree, the father of Thomas V. B., was born in Clark county, Ky., January 11, 1806, and was the sixth-born in a family of fifteen children. Owing to both the want of facilities and time, his early education was extremely limited, not exceeding a year and a half in all. At the age of twenty-eight he married Lucinda Fowler, a native of his own town, who was two years younger than himself, and with whom and their children, Thomas V. B., Mary Isadore, Marcellus A., and Benton, he started on the long journey across the plains. The family was equipped with wagons, six oxen, two cows and one horse. They had many experiences of a trying nature, and the weather was exceedingly inclement, the rain setting in soon after they left Boonville, and continuing at frequent intervals until the first of July. Arriving at Fort Hall, the sole remaining ox team was traded for one strong, reliable animal, and thus reinforced they proceeded on their way, meeting with difficulties from steep inclines, and inconvenience because of a depleted larder. However, the latter trouble was overcome through sending to Dr. Whitman for supplies. Upon arriving at The Dalles Mr. Embree was the possessor of but $1, and with this money he purchased a bushel of potatoes, some sugar and tea for his sick wife, after which they resumed the journey, meeting with many more obstacles than it is possible to enumerate in this work. Just above Dixie Mr.

Embree took a claim of six hundred and forty acres, and here he settled with his wife and five children, one of whom had been born near the end of their journey. The family lived in their wagons while the father hewed wood for the little cabin, his heart heavy, because of the almost entire absence of money, and the necessities of life, but the industry of the head of the family soon brought a change, and in time the property developed into one of great value. The year 1881 was a sad one for this patient and resourceful pioneer, for the wife who had so faithfully aided him in accomplishing his object in life was killed by falling from a wagon, being at the time seventy-five years of age. Mr. Embree went to California during the gold excitement of 1849, returning by boat, being forty-nine days upon the way. A few years before his death, at the age of ninety-four years and five months, he removed to Dallas, where he owned a twelve-acre lot, and where he worked as inclination dictated. He was an old time Democrat with pronounced southern tendencies, and as a politician was quite prominent in the early days of his arrival in Oregon. He was the first sheriff of Polk county, but resigned when asked to attach the property of a poor man, for his humanity and extreme kindness of heart rebelled at that seeming injustice of the law.

On his father's farm Dr. Embree was reared to hard work, and his early education was acquired under difficulties. At the age of twenty-two, in 1858, he began the study of medicine under J. W. Boyle, and in 1860 entered the medical department of the University of the Pacific in San Francisco, now the Cooper Medical College. After the first course he began to practice medicine in La Fayette, and later practiced in Amity and Lewisville, locating in Dallas in 1874. He graduated from the medical department of Willamette University in 1881, and the same year entered upon a three and a half years' practice in Corvallis. After eight years in Burns, Harney county, he returned to Dallas, where he devoted his best endeavors to the practice of his chosen profession, being one of the oldest physicians in active practice who acquired their professional training in the state. In 1903 he moved to Portland.

In October, 1855, Dr. Embree participated in the Yakima Indian war as a member of Company G, First Oregon Infantry, under command of Capt. Benjamin Hayden. Later he was a member of Company B, commanded by Capt. B. F. Burch. Until 1892 he was a staunch Democrat, but since then he has allied himself with the Populist party. He was a candidate for the state legislature in 1900, but was defeated. He is a member of the National Committee of the Allied People's Party, and a member of the state committee and ex-chairman of the county committee. For one term he was coroner of Polk county, and of Benton county for the same length of time. He is a member of the State Historical and State Pioneer Associations.

In Corvallis, Benton county, Ore., Dr. Embree married, in 1868, Annie E. Finley, who was born in Missouri and reared in Santa Clara, Cal. Seven children have been born of this union, four of whom are living, the order of their birth being as follows: Clyde, a printer by occupation; Alice J., now Mrs. Sellers, of Dallas; Van Buren, a photographer of Dallas; and Lillie, who became the wife of Harmon Guthrie and resides near Dallas. Dr. Embree has an enviable reputation of more than local renown, and hundreds of families have come to regard him as an essential part of their household. A practitioner for many years he keeps himself well advised as to the latest discoveries in medical science, and is in accord with modern thought as exemplified in the leading medical institutions. The doctor is genial and kindly, attributes so useful to the successful practitioner.

GREEN B. CORNELIUS, manager and proprietor of a livery business in Turner, was born in Henry county, Iowa, January 11, 1837, a son of Absalom and Elizabeth (Cotton) Cornelius, the former a pioneer settler of Oregon, and a man well known in his locality. Absalom Cornelius was born in North Carolina, and reared in Virginia, where he married and engaged in both farming and lumbering. About 1832 he became a resident of Iowa, and in 1845 crossed the plains with three wagons and several yoke of oxen, the train in which he traveled being composed of fifty wagons. They came via the Platte river route, setting out from St. Joseph, Mo., in May, and arriving at The Dalles in October. From The Dalles Mr. Cornelius reached Oregon City by flatboat, and on this trip got out of provisions, a deficiency remedied by Dr. David McLaughlin, who sent out a party with relief, the chief cause for gratitude being the wheat flour, which they had not tasted since leaving The Dalles. Across the plains Mr. Cornelius brought fifty head of fine Durham cattle, which he wintered at The Dalles, together with his household possessions. He himself spent the winter on a claim east of Oregon City, where he took up six hundred and forty acres of land, upon which he built a saw-mill. In the spring he returned to The Dalles and got his cattle, brought them to the ranch, and made his home there until the spring of 1850. He then removed to Marion county, taking up a donation claim the same size as his other tract, located three miles southwest of Turner. Here also he built a saw-mill, large enough for his own and the use of his neighbors. He farmed and raised stock for the remainder of his life, his death occurring in 1880, at the advanced age of eighty-two years. Of the fifteen children born to himself and wife, Mary A. is the widow of John Caples, of Salt Lake City, Utah; Sophia is the widow of N. O. Parker, of Wardner, Idaho; Capt. Aaron M. lives in Oakland, Cal.; Green B. is the subject of this review; and Absalom H., ex-county commissioner and ex-county assessor, lives in Jefferson, Marion county. The deceased children are: Elisha, Catherine Chamness, Catalina Morris, Allie Woodcock, Rebecca Rinearson, George and Samuel, the latter participating in the Cayuse and Rogue river wars.

Mr. Cornelius was eight years of age when he came to Oregon, and thirteen when he came to Marion county. He remained with his father until eighteen years of age, and then went to Clackamas county and bought a piece of land which he used for horse-raising for some years. In Linn county he bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, and upon this property took charge of his father's cattle for a couple of years, at the end of that time returning and assuming charge of the home farm. March 6, 1860, he married Amanda L. Parker, daughter of Hon. Samuel and Elizabeth (Sutton) Parker, who died at The Dalles en route to Marion county. They crossed the plains to Oregon in 1845. Mr. Parker became a very prominent man in this state. He was a man of varied gifts, much of his time being spent in public service, acting as speaker of the house during the first territorial legislature of Oregon. He took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres of land, where the state penitentiary is now located. One daughter, Priscilla, married Perrin Whitman, nephew of Dr. Marcus Whitman; Sarah, wife of John B. Jackson (deceased), of Washington county; Susan, wife of Capt. George W. Ferrel, of Mexican fame; Gideon J., of Idaho; George L. Parker, of Portland, and Newton O. (deceased) are the pioneer children of this noted man. The Oregon born children are: Dollie, Parker Bonham, Lizzie Parker Bonham, Will R., Samuel and Pierce Y.

In the fall of 1860 Mr. Cornelius traded his farm on the prairie for one of one hundred and eighty acres two and one-half miles south of Turner, and this was his home until 1862. He then bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, two and a half miles northeast of Turner. This he cultivated and improved until engaging in the livery business in Turner in September, 1902. Four children have been born into the Cornelius family: Ada Estella, who died in 1879, at the age of seventeen years, while a student in Willamette University; Sophia Lizzie, an elocutionist of marked ability, and a prominent educator in Oregon, having been principal of several different schools in the smaller towns, and a teacher in Portland; Ariadne, wife of C. J. Simeral, of Salem; and they have one son, Claire Cornelius; and Cassius P., in business with his father, who is also interested in the timber and mining industries of Oregon and Idaho. William Cornelius Parker, a nephew of Mrs. Cornelius, is a member of the family; he is a descendant of the Howell family, for whom Howells Prairie was named. Mr. Cornelius is a Republican in politics, and has served as school director for thirty years, resigning when he moved into Turner. He held the office of industrial teacher on the Indian farm at Chewawa for a year and a half. Mr. Cornelius is also identified with the Grange, and with various enterprises in which his district abounds.

LEWIS CLINTON POOLER. One hundred and sixty acres of the old Rice-Dunbar and Charles Scribner donation claims, one and a half miles east of Pratum, was occupied for many years by Lewis Clinton Pooler, a pioneer of 1852, and one of the honored farmers of this section. Mr. Pooler came from an old New York family, and was born in Oswego, in 1832, the son of parents who devoted their active lives to farming. As a boy he removed with the rest of the family to Fort Wayne, Ind., where he received the greater part of his early education, and where his parents spent their last days.

The ancestral records of the Pooler family, formerly spelled Poolleer, prove them of English extraction. George Poolleer, the first of the name to settle in the United States, was born in England, in 1733, and died in 1837, in Oswego, N. Y. He came to the United States in 1774, and served as a captain in the Revolutionary war. His wife was also English by birth, and of their union six children were born, of whom Joshua, the father of Lewis Clinton, was born in 1792, and died in 1842, in Indiana. He married Mary Stafford, an Italian, her birth having occurred in 1793, and her death in 1857. Of their nine children only two are now living, Mrs. Mary Peck, of Gypsum City, Kans., and Emory Pooler, of Topeka, same state. At the age of twenty years Mr. Pooler started out to make an independent living, having secured a position as driver with a party crossing the plains. This was in 1852, and though the year brought much disaster to many who were westward bound, this especial train escaped all but slight inconveniences. The Indians were not particularly troublesome, nor did disease devastate the ranks of the home-seekers. Mr. Pooler lived for a time in Oregon City, and afterward went to the Sound country, remaining for a couple of years, then returning to Oregon City, where he found employment in the near-by country as a teamster. In 1855, he married Adaline Stormer, daughter of Isaac and Reasoner Stormer. The mother died when Adaline was a child. The father married a second time, this union being with Mary A. Cooley, and with his family crossed the plains in 1852, in the same train with Mr. Pooler. The second wife died on the plains in 1852, and Mr. Stormer married a third time to Mary Lamb. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Pooler, the order of their birth being as follows: Jefferson A., who married Miss Annette Leonard, and by her had two children, Virginia, who died in infancy, and Clara, who became the wife of C. H. Lenge; Mary Alice, the wife of William Bowen, located near Willard, in the Waldo Hills, and they have four sons: Archie, Ernest, Clifford and Adolph; Marian Annette, the wife of William McAllister, of Pratum, and the children born to them were Guy, Mark, Russell and Lenna, the latter of whom is deceased; Effie Belle, the wife of George Bock, of Salem, by a former marriage, with Reuben Stedman, having two children, Stella and Jay, both of whom are deceased; Ida G., the widow of Eugene McAllister, of Kansas City, Kans., her one daughter, Eugenia, now living with her grandmother; Emory S., who died at the age of seventeen years; Amy Catherine, a school teacher, who lives in eastern Oregon; Earl L., who married Maude Desart, by whom he had two children, E. Lorene and Owen Lewis, this son being located near his father's farm; and W. Ivan, living at home.

After marriage Mr. Pooler and wife went to housekeeping on Drift creek, near Sublimity, where they lived for three years, at the end of which time they settled upon the farm now occupied by his widow. This was a discouraging undertaking at first, heavily timbered, with no modern improvements whatever. By sheer force of will-power and determination it was transformed into a paying investment, and equipped with modern buildings. Here Mr. Pooler passed many happy and successful years, his death occurring September 8, 1901, at the age of sixty-nine years, the esteem and confidence of his neighbors having been given him for his many fine personal qualities, for his public-spiritedness, thrift and enterprise. Since his death his widow has ably stepped into his place, and assisted by her sons, continues the policy of advancement inaugurated by this honored and high-minded pioneer. Mrs. Pooler has eleven grandchildren living.

During the Indian wars in 1854-55, Mr. Pooler gave himself freely to the service which lay before him as a citizen of the Sound country, becoming a volunteer in a service which left him a cripple throughout the remainder of his life, from the effects of a wound received at that time.

REV. CHARLES C. POLING, Ph. D. It is a widely acknowledged fact that the most important work to which man can direct his energies is that of teaching, whether it be from the pulpit, from the lecture platform or in the school-room. Its primary object is ever the same—the development of one's latent powers that the duties of life may be bravely met and well performed. The intellectual and moral natures are so closely allied that it is difficult to instruct one without in a measure influencing the other, and certainly the best results are accomplished when the work goes hand in hand. Christian instruction is having an influence over the world that few can estimate, for it is in youth that the life of the individual is marked out, the future course decided, and the choice as to the good or evil made. It is to this work of thus instructing the young that Dr. Charles C. Poling devotes his time, energies and thought, being now president of the Dallas College.

Dr. Poling was born near Martinsburg, W. Va., February 2, 1859. His paternal great-grandfather was born in Scotland and, coming to America, reared a large family in Virginia. He was of Scotch-Irish lineage. His son, Capt. John Poling, the grandfather of our subject, gained his title through his connection with the boating interests, being master of the "Potomac" on the Chesapeake and Ohio canals from Cumberland to Martinsburg. He was also engaged in ranching in Hampshire county, Va., and, raising stock, he drove his cattle to the markets of Baltimore, Philadelphia and Boston. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Rev. Daniel S. Poling, the father of Dr. Poling, was born in Romney, Hampshire county, Va., in 1830, and when twenty-one years of age was ordained a minister of the Evangelical Association. He began work in behalf of the church in the Shenandoah valley and afterward removed to Ohio. During this period he was also a staunch advocate of the abolition cause and did much to raise a feeling of indignation toward slavery. Removing to Pennsylvania, he has since continued his work in the ministry, never faltering in his labors in behalf of Christianity. Although now well advanced on life's journey he is still active in his church near Johnstown, Pa. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Susan Pownall, was born in Virginia, a daughter of Jonathan Pownall, who owned a large plantation near Romney, Va. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Poling were born eight children, of whom our subject is the third. His brother, Rev. D. V. Poling, is a graduate of Central Pennsylvania College and is now pastor of the Congregational Church of The Dalles, Ore.

Dr. Poling began his education in the public schools of Virginia, continued his studies in Ohio, and afterward entered Greensburg Seminary at Greensburg, Ohio. Later he was a student in Clarion County Institute of Pennsylvania and subsequently completed his sophomore year in Mount Union College of Mount Union, Ohio. Having determined to devote his life to the active work of the ministry, he was licensed to preach in 1880 at Johnstown, Pa., and for two years was pastor of the church at Brookville, Pa. He was ordained a deacon in Venango county, Pa., in 1882, and for two years was pastor of Trinity Church at Johnstown. After entering the ministry he continued his educational work as opportunity afforded, until he completed his philosophical course, graduating and receiving the degree of Ph. B. from LaFayette Seminary. Since then he has taken a four years' course in metaphysics and philosophy at Richmond College, of Richmond, Ohio, receiving therefrom the degree of Ph. D. In the spring of 1884 he and his wife were appointed to active service on the board of missions and assigned to duty in the Willamette valley, Ore., and April 1 of that year arrived in Portland. Dr. Poling established the first English mission of the Evangelical Association in the city of Portland, where he continued his labors for three years. In 1888 he was elected presiding elder of the Oregon Conference of the Willamette district and after serving for seven years in that important office he resigned to accept the presidency of LaFayette Seminary in 1895.

In 1888 Dr. Poling had taken the initiatory step toward founding the seminary, and when the county seat was removed to McMinnville he secured the old county building which he removed to its present site and therein LaFayette Seminary was established with Dr. Poling as president of the board of trustees. He was first elected to the presidency of the institution, but refusing the honor, Dr. W. C. Kantner, of Millersburg, Pa., was appointed president, with Dr. Bowman as one of the professors. Dr. Kantner successfully continued at the head of the institution until 1892, when he resigned and Professor Bowman was elected to the presidency of the seminary, in which capacity he remained until 1895. Dr. Poling was then elected president, conducting the institution for three years, and at the same time officiating as pastor of the First Union Evangelical Church. In 1891 President Poling was sent as a delegate to the general conference held in Philadelphia. In 1894 the general conference at Naperville, Ill., organized the United Evangelical Church, with which he cast his lot. In 1899 he was again elected presiding elder of the Oregon Conference and has since been superintendent of the work of the denomination in the state. Between the years 1895 and 1900 Dr. Poling sought a new location for the seminary, and eventually secured one at Dallas, uniting LaFayette Seminary with LaCreole Academy and incorporating the same under the name of Dallas College, with himself as president. They retained the old charter of the academy, and since the amalgamation the college has made marked advancement. There is, however, a separate board of trustees for both the college and academy, with Dr. Poling as president of each. The academy furnishes the preparatory course for entrance into the college. Marked improvements have been made, including the erection of new buildings and there is now a well equipped college building, new dormitory and gymnasium. The academic work includes a three years' course above the eighth grade school work, while the college embraces a full college course. Perhaps no better idea of the institution can be given than is presented in its catalogue. "LaCreole Academy, whose aim, as formerly, shall be 'to prepare students for college and for the active affairs of life'; and Dallas College, successor to LaFayette Seminary, will henceforth be conducted under the auspices of the Oregon Conference of the United Evangelical Church. While the control of the school is denominational, its instruction shall in no sense be sectarian. The purpose of the institution is to furnish to young men and women a liberal Christian education, to lay a deep and broad foundation in the study of the Sciences, Arts and Philosophies, and to build up a strong intellectual and moral character. The school, therefore, is open to persons of good moral character, who are willing to obey the rules and regulations adopted for its government."

Dr. Poling was married in Greensburg, Ohio, in 1882, to Miss Sevilla A. Kring, who was born in that state, a daughter of the Rev. S. B. Kring, a minister of the Evangelical Association, who died in Kendallville, Ind., in 1893. Mrs. Poling is a graduate of the high school of Van Wert, Ohio, and prior to her marriage was an evangelist for four years, laboring in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, and has ever been a most able assistant to her husband in promoting the cause of Christianity and religious education. Their marriage has been blessed with seven children: Daniel A., who is now in the junior year in Dallas College; Ethel V., who is pursuing a course in the academy; Laura A.; Charles S.; Mabel; Rudolph; and Paul Newton. At this point it would be superfluous to enter into any series of statements as showing Dr. Poling to be a man of broad intelligence and genuine public spirit, for these qualities have been set forth between the lines of this review. Strong in his individuality, he never lacks the courage of his convictions; but there are dominating elements in this individuality—a lively human sympathy and an abiding charity, which, combined with his sterling integrity, have naturally gained for him the respect and confidence of men.

JULIUS NEWTON HART. The district attorney for the territory comprising Linn, Marion, Polk, Yamhill and Tillamook counties, Ore., is one of the well known legal practitioners of the state, and is discharging his duties with courage, fidelity, and with absolute fearlessness.

Back to Colonial times Mr. Hart traces his lineage, and justly cherishes an enviable ancestral record. He was born near Fairfield, Wayne county, Ill., May 13, 1869, a son of John S. and Minerva J. (Neal) Hart, natives respectively of Carroll county, Ohio, and Wayne county, Ill. As far back as 1632 Stephen Hart came from Braintree, Essex county, England, settling in Massachusetts, and removing in 1635 to Hartford, Conn., which town he helped to found. He became prominent in early governmental affairs in Connecticut, and was a member of the general court for fifteen terms. From Stephen the line of descent is through John, John, John, Silas, Julius C., John S., and J. N. The first John, with his wife and daughter, became victims of the Indians, who burned their house at night, and all within. His son, Capt. John Hart, of the Connecticut militia, avenged the deaths in his family by relentlessly pursuing the red men. The first to establish the family outside of Connecticut was the great-grandfather, Silas Hart, a farmer by occupation, who removed to Wayne county, N. Y., where his son, Julius C., the grandfather of our subject, was born. Julius C. Hart devoted his life to farming and school teaching, which he followed for many years in Carroll county, Ohio, and afterward in Wayne county, Ill., where he removed in 1850. His wife was Catherine Carl, a native of Pennsylvania, whose father was a soldier in the war of 1812.

John S. Hart was a boy when his parents removed to Illinois, and he was reared to farming on the pioneer property cleared by his father. During the Civil war he enlisted in the Fifth Illinois Cavalry, and served for more than three years. After the war he continued farming and filled various political offices. After removing to Oregon in 1885 he located on a farm near Dallas, Polk county, which has since been his home. His wife is a daughter of Isaac Newton Neal, who was born in Kentucky. Her ancestors emigrated from the north of Ireland to Virginia before the Revolutionary war.

The oldest of the eight children born to his parents, Julius Newton Hart was reared on a farm, and attended the public schools during the winter. After coming to Oregon from Wayne county, Ill., in 1885, he continued to work on the farm for a year, and at the age of seventeen began teaching school in Polk county. Realizing the necessity of a superior education he increased his knowledge while teaching, attending both the State Normal School and La Creole Academy, graduating from the latter institution in 1889. Having decided at an early age to become a lawyer he attended the law department of the University of Oregon at Portland, and was admitted to the bar in 1895. In the meantime he had acquired an enviable reputation as an educator, and in 1896 was elected superintendent of schools of Polk county on the Republican ticket, and was re-elected in 1898, his term of service extending from July, 1896, to July, 1900. While superintendent of schools he engaged in a limited practice of law, and in 1900 was nominated for district attorney. He was elected in June and took the oath of office in July, 1900.

In December, 1890, Mr. Hart married Irene Dempsey, a native of Polk county, and daughter of James A. Dempsey, a native of Knox county, Ill. The paternal grandfather of Mrs. Hart, Judge Isaac I. Dempsey, came to Oregon in 1862, bringing with him his family, and settling at Rickreall, Polk county, where he filled the office of county judge. James A. Dempsey farmed for many years in Polk county, and died in Monmouth in 1893. His wife, Alice (Embree) Dempsey, a daughter of C. D. Embree and sister of Dr. Embree, represented elsewhere in this work, came to Oregon in 1844. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Dempsey, eight daughters and one son, Mrs. Hart being the third oldest. Two children have been born unto Mr. and Mrs. Hart, Julius Harold and Hallie Ruth. Mr. Hart is fraternally connected with Jennings Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., of which he is past master; with Ainsworth Chapter No. 17, R. A. M.; and Salem Lodge No. 336, B. P. O. E. He is also a member of the State Bar Association. Mr. Hart is entitled to much credit for the staunch support of the cause of education and for the standard of excellence which he was largely instrumental in inaugurating and maintaining. He has been uniformly successful as a lawyer, and is a broad-minded, cultured, liberal and enterprising citizen.

FRANK M. SMITH. Many years ago a little town of Jackson county, Mo., was the scene of what would now be called strange happenings, the congregating of white-topped wagons and meek, slow-plodding oxen, with men and women in the picturesque costumes of the early pioneer, with somber determination showing through the eagerness of their faces. These men and women were the products out of which the new west has grown. This little city was Independence, the starting point for the great emigrant trains that took their way into the west.

In the midst of these stirring scenes, Frank M. Smith was born July 20, 1831, near Independence, the son of Doctor and Nancy (Scott) Smith, natives of North Carolina and Kentucky, respectively, and here the family remained until Frank M. was sixteen years old. Living among these scenes it followed as a natural consequence that they, too, should be imbued with the spirit of the times, and in 1847 they started from Holt county with two ox-teams to put the width of the continent between them and their old home. The journey occupied three days less than five months, during which time Doctor Smith was seized with his last illness. By the time they reached Green river they left a mound of up-turned earth to mark their pathway, and the bereaved family went the remainder of the journey alone. By a strange decree of Providence they were unmolested by the Indians, reaching Oregon City safely, going from there to North Yanhill, where they remained until the spring of 1848. In the last named year they went to the Waldo Hills, Marion county, making this their permanent home by taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, putting into the improvement of the claim the strength of the seven young people who blessed the lonely mother with their presence. In 1876 occurred the death of this devoted mother.

The children born to Doctor Smith and his wife are as follows: Mandana, who was married in Missouri to Duff Kimsey, and died in Oregon; Moses I., died in Salem, aged about seventy years; Frank M., subject of this sketch; Elizabeth, who became the wife of George Hunt, and died in Salem. Sarah A., widow of Daniel Durbin, now a resident of Salem; Harriett E., died unmarried. Doctor, Jr., died on the farm now owned by Frank M.

Frank M. Smith remained on the home farm for seven years. At the age of twenty-three he went to Salem, where he was soon engaged successfully in the livery business. For ten of the twenty years which he devoted to this enterprise the Durbin brothers were his partners. In 1881 he purchased a farm of two hundred and sixty acres located three and a quarter miles south-east of Salem, where he has since resided. He has made many improvements to the place and has the greater part under cultivation, devoting the estate to the raising of stock and to general farming. In 1855-56 he enlisted in Capt. Charles Bennett's Company F, First Regiment, Oregon Mounted Volunteers, for the Yakima expedition, Col. J. W. Nesmith commanding.

In his political affiliations Mr. Smith is a Democrat, but he has never been ambitious for public office, preferring to give his time to his own personal affairs. He is one of the representative men of his section of the county, and is always ready to lend his assistance to the furtherance of those enterprises intended to benefit the community.

ALBION J. RICHARDSON. Numbered among the prominent and successful business men of Polk county is A. J. Richardson, who is living retired from active pursuits at his pleasant home in Buena Vista. A man of courageous industry, sound judgment, and keen New England foresight, he came to Oregon when the country was new, and by persistent effort and steadfastness of purpose succeeded in the various undertakings with which he has since been identified, and is now one of the most extensive landholders of the county, and a person of affluence and influence. A native of Maine, he was born at Mount Desert, Hancock county, May 11, 1835. He is of Scotch descent, and his father, Abraham Richardson, Jr., and his grandfather, Abraham Richardson, Sr., were both born and reared on that picturesque Maine island that is now a famous summer resort.

Abraham Richardson, Jr., followed the sea during his early life, shipping before the mast when a boy, subsequently sailing as master of a vessel. He was afterwards employed for many years in shipbuilding, being successful, and accumulating considerable property for those days. His wife, whose maiden name was Deborah Burnham, was also born on Mount Desert Island, and like her husband, spent her entire life in Maine. Seven boys and three girls were born of their union, and of these Albion J., the second child in order of birth, is the only survivor.

Receiving excellent educational advantages, A. J. Richardson attended first the public schools of Tremont, Me., afterwards continuing his studies at the Bucksport Academy. Working with his father as a shipbuilder, he became familiar with the trade, and followed it for two years in Rockland, Me. Leaving Boston in June, 1855, he came to San Francisco by way of Cape Horn, landing in that city in December, after a voyage of one hundred and thirty-two days. Going to Amador county, he was there engaged in mining two years, being quite successful in his operations. Starting then for the Fraser river, at the time of the gold excitement there, he changed his mind before arriving at his point of destination, and located in Portland, Ore., where he followed his trade. Coming from there to Polk county in the summer of 1859, Mr. Richardson worked at his trade until 1862, when he went to Florence, Idaho, where he was engaged in mining about six months. After spending the winter of 1862-63 in Oregon, he again went to the mining region of Idaho, making the journey with a pack train laden with merchandise for the mines, and remaining two years. Returning to Polk county, he was actively engaged in dealing in land for several years. From 1892 until 1898 he was a resident of Portland, Ore., but has since made his home in Buena Vista. One of the largest real estate owners in this section of the state, Mr. Richardson has about twelve hundred acres of land in the Willamette valley, two farms lying in Marion county, east of Buena Vista, two farms west of Buena Vista, and is the owner of considerable city property of value. His land is all rented, about twenty-five acres of it being devoted to hops. Since 1875 he has carried on a profitable business as a grain dealer, having a warehouse in Buena Vista, for eighteen years has been the leading grain merchant of this locality.

In 1862 Mr. Richardson married Hannah J. Linnville, who was born in Missouri, in October, 1845. Her father, the late Harrison Linnville, came from Missouri to Oregon in 1846, and took up a donation claim at what is now Parker's Station. He subsequently spent his last years in Corvallis. Of the four children born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Richardson, but one is now living, Lillian, wife of C. A. Gray, of Salem, Ore. Politically, Mr. Richardson is a staunch Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Lyons Lodge No. 29, A. F. & A. M., of Independence; Oregon Consistory No. 1, of Portland, and Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland.

TRENTON R. HIBBARD. The soldier on the field of battle is called upon for no greater heroism than is the pioneer who makes his way into the wilderness, far from other men and the comforts of an older civilization in order to establish homes and to reclaim the wild district for the uses of himself and his race. The conditions which he meets are very hard and oftentimes discouraging. Nature may be bountiful in her gifts to man, but she also realizes the value of work in the development of character. She has therefore simply bestowed upon him the materials from which he is to gain through labor that which brings him comforts and wealth. One always looks with interest upon the pioneer people who were brave enough to face the dangers and difficulties that awaited them on the Pacific coast. So far were they from the old homes of the Mississippi valley or the east that communication was almost entirely cut off, and yet with unflinching courage they undertook the work of reclamation here. Mr. Hibbard is among the number whose labors have been of great benefit to Oregon, and few indeed are the settlers of the state at the present time who can claim residence here from 1847. While he is now living a retired life, he is to some extent engaged in making loans and in renting property. He resides in Silverton, where he is an honored and respected citizen.

Mr. Hibbard was born near Pekin, Tazewell county, Ill., April 2, 1836. His father, King Hibbard, was born in Buffalo, N. Y., January 31, 1806, a son of Samuel P. Hibbard, whose birth occurred in Vermont, whence he removed to Buffalo. He was a teamster in the army of the war of 1812, and his family heard the firing of the guns of Perry during the famous naval battle on Lake Erie, which occurred only about six miles from their home. The grandfather of our subject became a resident of Oregon in 1848, locating near North Yamhill, Yamhill county, where he lived with his son until his death. In the year 1827 King Hibbard removed from Ohio to Illinois, stopping first where the city of Chicago now stands. One of his sisters gave birth to a boy there, the first born in Chicago. His name is Levi Reed, and he is now living a retired life in Portland, Ore.

On the 7th of April, 1847, King Hibbard left his home in Pekin, Ill., and started for the northwest, crossing the Missouri river at St. Joseph on the 3rd of May. He then proceeded by way of the Platte river and the Oregon route to the northwest. He saw thousands of buffalo upon the plains, and Indians were almost as numerous. There were no bridges across the streams, and neither had the ferry boats been put in operation. On one occasion the Indians stole the horses of the party, but they managed to recover them. They crossed the Cascades, and on the 17th of September arrived at the Foster place in Clackamas county. The Hibbard family located amid the Waldo Hills, and the father of our subject took a donation land claim of six hundred and forty acres, which he entered on the 25th of September. He was a typical pioneer settler, brave, self-reliant and determined, willing to cope with the hardships and difficulties incident to life on the frontier in order to establish a home for his family. With characteristic energy he began the development of his place and continued to work there until his death, which occurred on the 30th of June, 1860. He left everything in the hands of his son, Trenton R., administrator of the estate. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Nancy C. Brisbin, was born in Center county, Pa. Her death occurred in the Waldo Hills in January, 1864. Her father, John Brisbin, was a native of Pennsylvania, whence he removed to Kentucky, becoming an influential and prominent citizen there. He served as judge, and took an active interest in public affairs, contributing largely to the improvement and progress of his community. He was a very successful educator, and was also a fine penman. In the early '20s he removed to Illinois, locating near Jacksonville, and subsequently he took up his abode near Pekin, that state. In 1846 he made the trip to Oregon across the plains with an ox team, and died in the Cow Creek canyon. They had lost all of their stock and were coming on foot when Mr. Brisbin sickened and died. He was at that time alone with his son, who buried him, digging a grave with his hands. It had been necessary for them to wade through the water, and in this way Mr. Brisbin had become ill. The remainder of the train proceeded on their way, while the father and son stopped for what they believed would be but a brief period, thinking that the father would be better soon. After burying his father, the son hastened on and joined the rest of the party, but in the meantime nearly starved, the supply of food giving out. On reaching their destination a settlement was made by the Brisbin family in Marion county.

In the Hibbard family were eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom Trenton R. Hibbard was the eldest. He obtained a common school education and in early life engaged in farming with his father. Upon the latter's death he remained upon the old homestead, and educated and cared for the family until the younger children of the household were able to care for themselves. When all had grown to mature years he sold the property, in March, 1874, and divided the proceeds among the heirs, administering the estate satisfactorily to all. In the fall of 1874 he removed to Silverton and established a general mercantile store, which he conducted with success for several years, or until 1892, when he retired. Since that time he has been engaged in loaning money and in renting farms and other property, but to a large extent is resting from arduous labor. He also owns a stock ranch of one hundred and sixty acres in the mountains, on which he pastures cattle for others. He also has two hundred acres of the original donation claim, and he purchased fifty acres adjoining, so that that farm comprises two hundred and fifty acres, a portion of which is in orchard. Mr. Hibbard also owns town property, and has improved residence property in Silverton. He likewise has a store and house in Silverton and several lots in East Portland, Albina and Piedmont, which are unimproved.

In 1878 Mr. Hibbard was appointed postmaster, and filled that office for six years. He was also the first mayor of Silverton, and acted in that capacity for three terms. Politically he is a Republican. He takes a very active interest in the welfare of the party and does all in his power for its growth. He has served as constable of the precinct, and in that position, as in other offices which he has filled, he has ever been found faithful and reliable in the discharge of his duties. A prominent Odd Fellow, he belongs to the lodge, encampment and the Rebekah degree. He is also a member of the Masonic Lodge. Mr. Hibbard is a man of striking appearance, standing six feet and four inches in height and weighing two hundred pounds. He is said to resemble Abraham Lincoln, and he possesses many of the sterling traits of character of that great statesman.

WILLIAM M. POWERS and his wife are one of the most interesting couples in Linn county, who have grown old in the service of Oregon, and their many experiences in the early days would fill an interesting volume. Having the advantages of admirable ancestors, of parents who cherished high ideals for their children, and of Christian training in their youth, they have carried their zeal and nobility of character through the unsettled and oftentimes trying conditions in the northwest, stamping their business and social connections with the seal of sincerity and success. William Powers is a descendant of a New England family which traces its American lineage back two hundred years, its members located for the greater part in the state of Vermont, where was born the paternal grandfather, George Powers. Ezekiel Powers, the father of William, was also born in Vermont, and subsequently became a contractor and builder in Batavia, N. Y. He died when William was four years old, and about the same time his wife, Esther (Van Ness) Powers, followed him to the silent bourne. The Van Ness family have been distinguished for many years in New York, and claim to be of old Hudson river Knickerbocker stock. William M. is the only child living of this union, Cornelius, the oldest son, a shipbuilder, having died in Osage, Iowa; Joseph, an engineer, died in the south, and Daniel W. died after amassing a fortune in Rochester, N. Y.

Until his tenth year, William Powers lived in his native town of Batavia, N. Y., where he was born August 12, 1827. He was then sent to a farm in Mount Vernon township, Knox county, Ohio, and while working hard for his board and clothes, had absolutely no opportunity to attend school. In 1842 he went to Iowa with his uncle, Colonel Hall, settling on a farm in Mount Pleasant township, Henry county, where he was busily engaged in farming when the Mexican war broke out. This seemed an opportunity indeed to be of service to his country, and regretfully he returned to the monotony of farm life after having his application rejected on account of age and disability. The following year, 1847, a chance came his way in the guise of the famous Dan Rice circus, an enterprise which opened up wonderful vistas for boys with large ambitions and little money. The "great and only show on earth" was then being transported from place to place along the Ohio and Mississippi rivers by a steamer owned by the Company, and William began as cabin boy on this steamer in 1847, and gradually worked his way through the aggregation of mysteries which have dazzled audiences these many years. His circus experiences were varied, and comprised the gamut run by the most resourceful in those days, and he became a performer who won thunders of applause from admiring onlookers. He could do the most daring tricks known to tumblers of that time, and in time he became a horseback performer, excelling particularly in ring work. The fine mare "Fashion" and he were for months associated together in the minds of an anxious public, and were coupled together in glaring letters on the ingenious posters. Hundreds of times he made his entrance into the sawdust ring, performed his daring and skillful act, and, with the graceful Fashion, acknowledged the plaudits of the audience. These days are recalled by Mr. Powers with much satisfaction, and possibly a little regret, for who does not miss vociferous appreciation when once it has rewarded our efforts, of whatever nature?

In 1849 Mr. Powers became imbued with the gold fever, and with a pack train started across the plains in a company of fifty-two men. At Fort Laramie differences of opinion arose, and with three of his companions he left the train and proceeded alone the rest of the way. The small party were strangely at the mercy of whatever danger lurked on the plains, and each night two of the party were obliged to mount guard during the entire night. The trip from Omaha to Hangtown, now Placerville, Cal., was made in sixty days, a remarkably short time, considering the means of travel. Here the men sold their horses and engaged in mining, and in the fall of that year went to Oregon canyon near Georgetown, going later to the Yankee Jim Diggings, and still later to the Humbug canyon on the north fork of the American river. Mr. Powers was successful as a miner, but, owing to failing health while on the American river, he was obliged to think about returning home. Arriving at San Francisco, he found that there would be no steamer for fifteen days, so he concluded to return to mining, which he did on the Salmon river. Here he lost eight thousand dollars in the stream, and though he tried to dam it and regain his money, succeeded in getting back just eight dollars. Determined to hold on to the rest of his money, he took a small train of mules to Eureka and engaged in freighting to Reddings Springs, now Shasta, and then concluded to buy up a herd of cattle in Oregon and take them down to California. Making his purchases at Oregon City in December, 1851, he went to Eugene, and then drove the cattle over the mountains, having on the way a great deal of trouble with the Indians. However, with comparatively small loss, he reached his destination in Scott's valley, Cal., disposed of his stock, and returned to the Willamette valley, with which he had been much impressed while passing through it with his herd.

In 1852 Mr. Powers took up a donation claim at what is now Shedd's Station, but this proved to be school land, and he was obliged to pay five dollars an acre for it. He afterward bought one hundred and twenty acres nearby, and at present has two hundred and eighty acres, which has been improved from raw and unprofitable land, into good cattle-raising and wheat property. In 1853, he engaged in blacksmithing and merchandising at Burlington, Linn county. Naturally Mr. Powers suffered greatly from the depredations of the Indians, and like the other settlers, did his duty in subduing them. In 1855-56 he served as packmaster in the Rogue River war, previous to which he had left his farm in other hands and had engaged in freighting flour, coffee, groceries and general provisions over the mountains to California. His permanent location on the farm, in 1854, was temporarily interrupted by the Indian wars, but after the service he devoted himself exclusively to improving his land and raising high-grade cattle. In 1860 he located three miles from The Dalles on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres, where he engaged in stock-raising, making a specialty of trading horses and cattle until 1862. He then went to Baker City and with a partner built and operated a ferry across the Snake river below the mouth of Powder river, and at the same time was interested in the mining business in the Bannock mines near Idaho City. Here he made considerable money in mining, but unfortunately fell ill with mountain fever. His illness was taken advantage of by his partner, for during his absence he sold the ferry and disappeared, leaving Mr. Powers rich in experience, but poorer in money to the extent of $7,000. The loss through the ferry was much more than made up by the gain in mining, and he settled down on his farm contentedly, charging up the misfortune to the inevitable profit and loss in life. In October, 1900, Mr. Powers rented his farm and located in Albany, where he has since lived retired, his home the center of large-hearted hospitality and invariable goodfellowship.

In Linn county, Ore., July 19, 1854, Mr. Powers married Mary A. Hogue, who was born in Monmouth, Ill., a daughter of James P., born near Knoxville, Tenn., and Sarah M. (Finney) Hogue, born near Louisville, Ky., and daughter of James Finney. Mr. Hogue was a carpenter and builder in Monmouth, Ill., and afterward settled on a farm in McDonough county, where he lived until 1853. He then crossed the plains with his family, being five months on the way, and located on a claim in Linn county, Ore. His wife, who died in Albany in 1899, bore him eight children, of whom Harvey A., a lumberman of Portland, died in Boston, Mass., August 15, 1902; Frances J., the wife of Silas B. Story, died in Umatilla county; Mrs. Powers, Emily M., deceased, the wife of David Layton, the latter a major and veteran of the Indian wars; Eliza died in Linn county in 1857; Charles P. is a saw-mill man of Sellwood, Ore.; Inez, widow of John M. Irving, lives at 545 Rodney avenue, Portland; and George M. died at the age of seventeen years.

Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Powers: Izzie M., the wife of H. B. Springer, of Linn county; Stiles Burr, a farmer of Linn county; Guy M., engaged in horticulture near Missoula, Mont., and Frank H., a salesman for Woodard & Clarke, of Portland. In 1852 Mr. Powers was made a Mason in Salem Lodge No. 4. He was a charter member of Shedd's Lodge No. 79, A. F. & A. M., and charter member and served as master several times of Shedd's Grange. In 1873 Mr. and Mrs. Powers assisted in the organization of the State Grange. Mrs. Powers is also a member of the Eastern Star. Formerly a staunch Republican, the silver question materially changed the attitude of Mr. Powers regarding his party, and he is now independent of any party. With his wife, he is a member of the Oregon Pioneer Association, and of the State Historical Society. He is also a member of the Indian War Veterans' Association.

Kindly in manner, courteous and considerate towards all with whom he comes in contact, Mr. Powers is honored for the unswerving integrity which has characterized all of his transactions in the west, and for that public-spiritedness which has dictated an interest in all that pertains to the upbuilding of his adopted state.

REV. ADELHELM ODERMATT, O. S. B., the founder of Mount Angel, by far the strongest moral influence in this part of the state, and the instigator of every good work which has for its object the upbuilding of his people, was born in Stanz, the capital city of Canton Unterwalden, Switzerland, December 10, 1844. His ecclesiastical training was received at the Benedictine Abbey of Mount Angel, Switzerland, which he entered in 1865, and from which he was sent as a missionary to the United States in 1873. Until 1881 he was located at Maryville, Mo., and August 2 of that year he arrived in Portland to found a Benedictine priory. In search of a desirable location he traveled extensively over the northwest for six months, and subsequently assumed charge of the parishes of Gervais, Fillmore, and Sublimity. May 9, 1882, Father Odermatt left for Switzerland, and after having been appointed prior by the Right Rev. Abbot Anselm, O. S. B., of the mother house of Mount Angel, he returned to America October 29 of the same year, to found the Benedictine priory at Gervais.

The priory of Gervais consisted of five fathers, one lay brother, and five candidates for the monastery, in connection with which was maintained the St. Scholastica Convent, with ten sisters, of which Rev. Mother Bernardine, O. S. B., was the head. July 14, 1884, Father Odermatt moved the monastery to what was then called Fillmore, where he erected a new building and church and called the place and railway station Mount Angel, after the mother house in Switzerland. In 1886 the Benedictine sisters also removed their mother house to Mount Angel. In 1888 the Benedictine fathers built a new college, and the following year a seminary was erected for ecclesiastical students. So well founded was this enterprise, and so prosperous did it become, that in 1889 the fathers were obliged to build a new college, 150x50 feet, ground dimensions, and four stories high. The new building was modern in construction, and admirably filled the needs for which it was intended, and no more promising religious center existed in the state. However, a great disappointment was in store for those who had so zealously labored in the cause of humanity, for May 3, 1892, between the hours of two and four in the afternoon, the entire monastery, church, old college and seminary, as well as carpenter shop, flour mill, and engine house, were reduced to ashes, but one building remaining of the splendid work of years. Nevertheless, neither the founder nor his co-laborers were utterly cast down, but continued their school in the only building available to them.

Characteristic of the energy and resource which have dominated his career was the course of Father Odermatt in the face of this crushing calamity. He at once left for the east to engage in missionary work, and collect funds for the re-building of the institution, which was to represent in its completion and great opportunity for usefulness, the most ambitious project of a well directed life. Father Odermatt preached throughout the entire east, visiting all the large cities, and availing himself of any pulpit at his disposal. In spite of the general depression of the times, and the remoteness of the enterprise to which the easterners were asked to contribute, he succeeded beyond his expectations, the result of his six years' tour being eminently satisfactory. June 21, 1899, the cornerstone of the new monastery was laid by Archbishop Alexander Christie, D. D., of Portland, Ore., and by New Year's day, 1902, the monastery proper was roofed. At the present time there are seventeen fathers, three scholastics and thirty-four professed lay brothers in the monastery, and the good accomplished by them as a body is beyond calculation. The premises contain about one thousand acres of land, much of which is excellent farming land, while timber abounds, and pasturage permits the raising of large quantities of stock. The institution includes a dairy farm of extensive acreage in the foothills of the Cascade mountains, where the cattle are pastured in summer. Innumerable departments of industry are represented in this religious community, and the visitor who is permitted to observe them is impressed with the neatness, thrift and industry everywhere apparent, as well as by the Old World courtesy which he receives at the hands of those in authority. It is not strange that Father Odermatt ranks with the great material and religious upbuilders of the northwest, nor that his life work is typical, in its extent, of what may be accomplished in the face of great obstacles, and by the light of a supreme and unalterable guidance.

CONRAD MEYER. Among the many earnest and reliable citizens which Germany has contributed to the upbuilding of the American statehood is to be named Conrad Meyer, who is now a successful grocer of the city of Albany, Linn county, Ore., his residence in this country having dated from 1866, and in this city from September, 1872. Like the many other emigrants to the great northwest, Mr. Meyer came with only his determination to win in the battle of life to encourage him to put forth his best efforts, but it has proven amply sufficient when viewed in the light of results.

Both the grandfather, Mathias, and father, Andreas Meyer, were born in Alberschweiler, Bavaria, and there engaged in farming, though the father combined the work of a carpenter with that along agricultural lines, and there his death occurred. The military life held for the family more or less interest, as Mathias Meyer served in the German army. The mother of our Mr. Meyer, formerly Katherine Sinner, died when he was still in infancy, and of the four children born to her only two are now living, Conrad Meyer being the only one in America. He was born in the same location as his forefathers, the date of his birth being December 4, 1845, and he was reared to the age of thirteen years on his father's farm. Until that age the privileges of the common school were his, and through his attendance of them he gained the foundation for the structure which he has reared in the later years. For three years following the close of his school days he served an apprenticeship at the baker and confectioner's trade, and thereafter, for about five years, he traveled throughout Germany as a journeyman. In full confidence that his prospects would be brighter on this side of the Atlantic he sailed in 1866 for the United States, and on his arrival spent some time in Williamsburg and Brooklyn, and from that location journeyed to New England.

After five months in Providence, R. I., he removed to Boston, and remained there until 1867, when he came to Oregon, led to do so by the fact of having an uncle in Corvallis, Benton county. He sailed from New York City to Panama, and thence to San Francisco and Portland by water. Upon his arrival in the latter city he entered the employ of Alisky & Heggler, bakers and confectioners, and remained there for three years, holding the responsible position of foreman. In 1870 he had acquired sufficient means to justify an independent venture in the commercial world, and he bought out Fisher, located on Front street, near Morrison's bakery and restaurant, and conducted a business under the firm name of Stolte & Meyer, which was later changed to Smeer & Meyer. For two years he continued there with lucrative returns, but at that time he met with the misfortune of losing all he had in the business through a fire, and through having no insurance he was somewhat discouraged. He came to Corvallis at that period with the intention of making this visit his last one, as he intended then to return east and locate once more in Providence. His uncle, George Gerhard, used his influence to induce another decision, as he plainly foresaw a success for Mr. Meyer in the west if he persevered in his efforts. Yielding to Mr. Gerhard's persuasions he decided to remain yet a little longer here, and in September, 1872, he became bookkeeper for the firm of Meyer & Hauck, in Albany, and in 1876 he was again financially able to conduct a business for himself. In that year he purchased the business of William Strong, who was then in the present location of Mr. Meyer, and began again a forward march toward independence, combining the grocery business with that of a baker. In the twenty-seven years which have elapsed since the date of his purchase Mr. Meyer has risen to a place of prominence in the commercial life of the city, through the returns of a lucrative custom, which has been built up by his undivided efforts along such lines, making many material changes in the appearance of the place. In his first location, at the corner of First and Broadalbin streets, he owns sixty-seven hundred square feet, and upon it has erected a handsome building of three stores, of which he occupies the corner store, and in addition to this he has several residence properties in the city. His bakery is large and well furnished, the oven having a capacity of about a thousand loaves, and in this business, the most extensive of its kind in the city, he always keeps from two to three helpers.

The marriage of Mr. Meyer occurred in Albany, Ore., and united him with Miss Katie Rademacher, a native of Prussia and the daughter of Mrs. Philip Phile, of Corvallis, by her first husband, John Rademacher, an early settler in Corvallis. Three sons have been born of the union, Charles, Lorenz and Conrad, all of whom find employment with their father.

In his fraternal relations Mr. Meyer is associated with various orders, having been made a member of the Odd Fellows in Portland, and is now a member of the lodge at Albany, in which he is serving as past officer; of the Encampment he is also past officer. He belongs also to the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Order of Pendo. Religiously, Mr. Meyer is a member of St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church, and politically is a Republican. Through his long residence in Albany, Mr. Meyer has come to be a highly appreciated citizen, his worth and integrity fully proved in his business and social life, and he now enjoys the esteem of a large circle of friends.

ELIAS B. PENLAND. Among the real estate men of Albany, E. B. Penland occupies a prominent place, and his successful career reflects undisputed credit upon his native state of Oregon. Born in Philomath, Benton county, September 9, 1855, he represents the third generation of his family to contribute to the upbuilding of the northwest, the first and second generations being represented respectively by his grandfather, Levi Elsa, and his father, Henry. For many years Levi Penland was a large landowner and extensive stock-raiser in his native state of Kentucky, where his son Henry was born in 1833, at Lexington, and whence he removed when the latter was twelve years old to Missouri. Eight years later, in 1852, the family crossed the plains with ox teams, the grandfather bringing with him a fine stallion called Rifle Stock, one of the first blooded horses to be introduced in the state, and from whom was sired many valuable thoroughbreds. Levi Penland settled on a claim six miles south of Philomath, and there passed the balance of his life, raising stock and farming. Henry Penland located on a claim of half a section one-half mile east of the town site of Philomath, and in 1858 sold his farm and located on another near Halsey. He was very successful as a stock dealer and raiser, and at the time of his death in 1889, at the age of fifty-seven, owned six hundred and forty acres of land, a large part of which was under cultivation. He was a Republican in politics, was fraternally allied with the Masons, and found a religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

His wife, formerly Martha J. Brown, was born in Indiana in 1840, a daughter of Elias Brown, a farmer of that state, who started to cross the plains in 1847, and died on the way. His wife continued the journey with her child and took up a claim on Mary's river, where she married a Mr. Allen, and after his death became the wife of Mr. Spencer. Mr. and Mrs. Spencer finally took up their residence in Corvallis, where both died. Mrs. Penland, who became the wife of Mr. Quick of Halsey, had four children by her first marriage, the oldest of whom is Elias B. Levi Elsa, named after his grandfather, is living at Pendleton, Ore.; Clara is the wife of H. C. Davis of Eugene; and Fannie is the wife of Dr. P. T. Starr of Eugene.

While on the home farm near Halsey, Elias B. Penland attended the district schools, and for one winter studied at the Willamette University. At the age of eighteen he began farming independently on a part of the old farm, and in 1883 settled near Moro, Sherman county, and engaged in the cattle business for three years. He soon found that his land was particularly adapted to wheat raising, and discarded cattle for wheat. He became one of the successful growers in his vicinity. He pre-empted a large claim, later bought one hundred and sixty acres of railroad land, and the same amount of school land, as well as three-fourths of a section from his neighbors. His entire ranch consisted of eleven hundred and twenty acres, nine hundred of which was devoted to raising wheat. He was unusually successful, and still owns the property which gave him such a forceful start in life. Locating in Halsey in 1893, he added to his land holdings by purchasing two farms of four hundred acres each, and in 1901 he permanently located in Albany. Although a comparative newcomer in the real estate business, much valuable property has already passed through his hands, and he is among the most successful of those in the county similarly engaged. He is sole representative of the Page Fence Company of Adrian, Mich.

A Prohibitionist in political affiliation, Mr. Penland has exerted an influence for temperance as generally understood, but the term may be taken as an index of his character, and is applicable to all of his relations in life. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of the board of deacons. He married in Halsey, Ore., Lizzie Hopkins, who was born near Cleveland, Ohio, in 1856, and who is the mother of two children, one of whom, Dr. Hugh E., a graduate of the Oregon Agricultural School and a medical school of Kirksville, Mo., is practicing medicine in Eugene, while Mabel is living at home.

NELSON H. ALLEN. Since there must come a time to all men to put aside the instruments of material advancement and go to face a great Unknown it is well to labor in the passing years to leave behind a record of success, not alone as far as worldly wealth and social honors are concerned, though these also have their place, but rather a memory of integrity. Such was the apparent aim of Nelson H. Allen, one of the successful citizens of Albany, Linn county, whose death occurred September 3, 1897, in the sixtieth year of his life.

Nelson H. Allen, born September 9, 1837, in New York state, was the representative of an eastern family, rich in native virtues of frank integrity and trust in their fellow citizens, which trust proved their ruin financially, for the grand-sire gave his money into the hands of a man whom he had called a friend, and who, proving false to the trust, left them with but little of their once substantial fortune. The father, Stephen, also a native of New York state, was early a settler of Wisconsin, engaging in farming near Madison. In 1849 he started for the gold fields of California, his death occurring upon the plains, while en route for the west. His wife, formerly Rhoda Jenung, a native of New Jersey, where she was born of French descent, died in Wisconsin, leaving two sons, one of whom is still living in Wisconsin. During the Civil war he served in the cause of his country, and was one of the many prisoners who suffered the horrors of Andersonville. The other, Nelson H., of this review, came west from his birthplace near Lake Ontario, and grew to manhood in Wisconsin, receiving his education principally in the Spencer Business College, William Spencer of that institution being the originator of the Spencerian system of penmanship. After the completion of his school course Mr. Allen engaged in the hotel business at Racine, Wis., and later conducted the Jeneau House, in Chicago. He engaged in various lines of business afterward, at one time being a railroad employe, and later entering the mercantile business in Agency, Iowa, where he remained until 1875, when he changed his residence to Oregon. He came in July of that year, the journey being made via San Francisco and Portland. On his arrival in the northwest he settled in Albany, where he engaged in the manufacture of lumber in partnership with a Mr. Robinson, and later with a Mr. Mortin. He owned several tracts of land along the Calapooia creek, which he later sold, after which he engaged in the mercantile business, the firm being known first as Allen & Mortin and later as N. H. Allen & Co. Until 1886 he was connected with this business, and at that date he again disposed of his interests and organized the electric light plant, this being the third plant in the state. This was one of his most successful ventures and reflected much honor upon Mr. Allen, for his executive skill and management had much to do with the ultimate incorporation of the business, under the title of Albany Electric & Telephone Co. Mr. Allen was president of the company previous to his death.

The marriage of Mr. Allen occurred at Agency, Iowa, his wife being formerly Miss Mary Hanawalt, who was born near Agency, Iowa. She died September 23, 1898, when forty-four years of age. She was a member of the Baptist Church. Her father was Samuel Hanawalt, a native of Pennsylvania, who was one of the first settlers of Iowa. He there engaged extensively in agricultural pursuits, and became one of the most prominent men of that section of the state. Public spirited and in every way desirous of the general welfare he gave liberally of his time and means toward progressive movements, quite a portion of his land having been given for school purposes. His wife was in maidenhood Catherine Courtney, a descendant of an old Virginia family, which was originally founded by one of three brothers who came from Germany to Pennsylvania. Mrs. Hanawalt is still living. To Mr. and Mrs. Allen have been born four children, namely: Edna V.; Mamie L.; Francis Nelson, located in Seattle, Wash.; and Alma. The daughters are prominent in the social circles of Albany, and as members of the Baptist Church they are lending their best efforts to advance its interests.

In his fraternal relations Mr. Allen was a Knight Templar in Masonry and also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Knights of Pythias. He was buried with Masonic honors. Politically he was a strong Republican. In connection with his convictions and patriotism a curious incident in the life of Mr. Allen occurred at the opening of the Civil war, when he was in the state of Mississippi for the benefit of his health. He was conscripted by southern law and would have been forced into the ranks but for a timely escape, made after passing through many and hazardous experiences. He finally reached the north, where he would have entered the ranks of the army but for the condition of his health.

MRS. ELIZABETH F. LUCAS. In a comfortable little home on College avenue in Monmouth lives Mrs. Elizabeth F. Lucas, widow of Albert Whitfield Lucas, and one of the pioneer women of Oregon around whom still clings traces of the heroism which, more than the physical toil of men, had to do with the creating of homes and the upbuilding of industries in the very early days. Before her marriage Mrs. Lucas was a Miss E. F. Murphey, daughter of Rev. J. F. Murphey, granddaughter of William Murphey, and great-granddaughter of a soldier of the war of 1812. William Murphey was born in Tennessee, and as a boy removed with his parents to Kentucky, eventually removing to his last earthly home in Illinois, of which state he was a very early settler. He married in Kentucky, and in that state was born, in 1807, his son, Rev. J. E., who married Frances W. Doughty, a native of Kentucky, and daughter of Preston Doughty, a native farmer and large slave owner of Kentucky. Rev. J. E. Murphey removed to Illinois about 1830, locating with his father on an unimproved farm in the wilderness, in time contributing his share towards its development, and at the same time acquiring what was considered in those days an excellent education. He became a minister in the Christian Church, and after removing to Oregon in 1852 was prominently connected with the Christian College at Monmouth, of which he was the financial agent and a trustee. As time went on he became a profound student, and took a great interest in educational matters, exerting a broad influence for good in the community in which he lived. His death, June 7, 1876, removed one of the most worthy members of the ministry of pioneer distinction. Although in moderate circumstances, he reared to ways of usefulness and honor twelve children, five sons and seven daughters, nine of whom are living, Mrs. Lucas being the third oldest.

The foundation laid at the district schools has been utilized by Mrs. Lucas as a basis for further study, and during her entire life she has been a voluminous reader, keeping well posted on current events, and in touch with the literature of the day. In 1851 she was united in marriage with Albert Whitfield Lucas, who was born in Hardin county, Ky., in 1827, and who was of German-French ancestry. His forefathers were very early settlers in Kentucky, in which state his father, Marsham Lucas, was born September 5, 1801. In 1823 he married Cynthia Ann Whitman, daughter of Thomas Whitman, and in 1830 removed to Illinois, where, two years later, he participated in the Black Hawk war. Those were very trying times, for his family were obliged to make their escape from their home in order to save their lives, returning at the expiration of hostilities. His faithful wife died in 1837, and he eventually gave up farming and settled in Abingdon, Ill., where he died June 24, 1898, when nearly ninety-seven years of age. In early life he was a Baptist, but afterward became a member of the Christian Church.

Albert Whitfield Lucas was reared in Illinois, to which state he went with his parents when three years of age. After completing his education at Galesburg, he started to earn his living on a small tract of land near that town, and March 13, 1851, was united in marriage. The following year, April 13, 1852, he started from Monmouth, Ill., across the plains, being accompanied by his wife, her father and his family and a company composed of thirty wagons and nearly as many families, under the capable leadership of a Mr. Mason. At Grand Island the company divided, one of the trains being known as the Murphey train, of which Rev. J. E. Murphey was the gallant captain. Ox teams, horses and mules carried the emigrants and their possessions, and the journey was a pleasant one, the travelers experiencing but little of the annoyance or inconvenience which fretted the westward course of many of the homeseekers of the early days. More fortunate than many, Mr. Lucas had a few hundred dollars in his possession, and with this he purchased land which formed the nucleus of the whole section owned by him in later years, and of a still later possession of eight hundred and thirty-three acres. For housekeeping purposes they had the barest necessities in the way of furnishings, but the little house was a pleasant place to live in. In connection with the tilling of his land he engaged in school teaching to some extent, and was at one time engaged in mercantile pursuits.

In all his undertakings Mr. Lucas was successful, possessing sound business judgment and capacity for hard work. He was one of the stockholders in the Polk County Bank, and was a warm friend and financial supporter of the Christian College, serving in the capacities of trustee and clerk of the board for twenty years. Previous to 1887 he was allied with the Republican party, but at that time joined his forces with the Prohibitionists. This latter move proved to his disadvantage from an official standpoint, for the whisky element frustrated his election as senator and representative. For twenty years he was an elder in the Christian Church, having joined that organization in early life. His influence and money were at the disposal of all practical efforts at improving the general conditions among which he lived, and after locating in Monmouth in 1874, he took a keen interest in the welfare of the town. In the center of beautiful and well kept grounds, and surrounded by trees, shrubs and flowers, he built the little home now occupied by his faithful widow, and there enjoyed a life comparatively free from care up to the time of his death, April 6, 1893. Of the ten children born into his family, Ella Ann, deceased, was born November 16, 1851; Ada L., a resident of Portland, was born September 2, 1853; Jay Prentice, for four years a registrar of the land office at The Dalles, was born June 3, 1856; Mary Alice, deceased, was born May 26, 1858; Katie L., the wife of W. D. Fenton, of Portland, was born July 6, 1859; Susie, deceased, was born November 4, 1861; Albert Lincoln, an engineer on the Southern Pacific Railroad at Portland, was born February 13, 1865; Nellie, deceased, was born June 12, 1867; Frank, for five years postmaster of Monmouth, was born September 25, 1868; and Fred, deceased, was born April 14, 1871. Frank Lucas, one of the well known citizens of this town, who lives near his mother, is a graduate of the State Normal, and before locating in town farmed for a number of years. In 1896 he started up a general drug business in Monmouth, but was unfortunately burned out the next year. He married Lorena Mulkey, a native of this county, and daughter of William Mulkey. One child has been born of this union, Bernice. Mrs. Lucas is known as a philanthropist and most charitable woman, and her visits to the sick and needy have brightened many a household in the town and county. She is active in the Christian Church, and takes an interest in all social and literary matters.

JOHN ROBERT HINKLE. It is a pleasant thing to be able to trace one's family record through long years of change and struggle. One of the oldest families of Oregon, whose history is closely interwoven with that section of the country, is the Hinkle family, and among its more prominent members is the subject of this sketch, John Robert Hinkle, who has a handsome residence in Hubbard, and who is one of the most esteemed retired citizens of Marion county.

Mr. Hinkle has been a resident of Oregon since 1852. He was born in Perry county, Mo., June 30, 1843, a son of Alexander and Fanny (Hinkle) Hinkle. Alexander Hinkle, the father, was born in Pennsylvania, and when grown to manhood, he drifted to Indiana and later to Missouri, and engaged in agricultural pursuits in Perry county, of the latter state, until 1852. Like many of his friends and neighbors he desired to take advantage of the new laws made to stimulate immigration into Oregon, and conceiving the idea of going to the Far West, in 1852 he began the perilous journey. He crossed the plains by the Platte River route, and the journey consumed nine months. He located on the Elliott Prairie in Clackamas county, where he took up a donation land claim of three hundred and twenty acres. Later his claim was approved and he obtained a clear title to the land upon which the closing years of his life were spent. He died in 1882 in his eighty-second year. He was joined in marriage with Fannie Hinkle, who was however, no blood relation, as the name might indicate. This worthy lady also passed away on the home place in Clackamas county, when about fifty-seven years of age. Nine children were born to these pioneer settlers, five being sons and four daughters.

John Robert Hinkle was the youngest of the family, and he obtained but a limited education in the common schools. When eighteen years old, he took charge of the home place, which he conducted for many years. This farm has been increased to three hundred and fifty acres and our subject is the proud owner of the entire farm, which he leases out, but still oversees its management. In 1888, he purchased a livery stable in Hubbard, in connection with a partner whose interest he afterward purchased. He conducted a successful business until 1900, when he sold out and retired from active business pursuits.

Mr. Hinkle's marriage was celebrated at Salem, Ore., in 1866, when he was joined in wedlock with Mary Elmira Thomas, who was born near Silverton, Ore., August 12, 1850. Her father.

Lorenz Thomas, located near Silverton in 1842, having come from the east. He died in Clackamas county, at the home of our subject aged sixty-six years. Mr. and Mrs. Hinkle have two children, Eliza, wife of O. L. Darling, of Salem, and they have one son Lloyd; and Harvey A., a successful commission merchant of Hubbard, whose biography is found elsewhere in this volume, who has one daughter, Lona.

In social circles our subject is a worthy member of the Odd Fellows' Lodge. In politics he is independent, and at one time served as supervisor of Clackamas county. He is also largely interested in the cause of education, as his twenty years' service on the school board in Clackamas county will testify.

CHARLES KIEFER. The German element, which is both substantial and progressive, and is at the bottom of many of the strongest and most influential business organizations in nearly all of the cities and towns of the country, is represented in Albany by Charles Kiefer, at present retired, but formerly connected for fifteen years as owner and manager of the Albany brewery of this city. Mr. Kiefer comes of a family indefinitely associated with the city of Pirmasens, a walled town on the Vosges, in Rhenish Bavaria, Germany, where he was born April 17, 1837. His father, Adam, and his mother, Magdalene (Arnold) Kiefer, were born in the same locality, and the former was for many years engaged in the meat market business.

The only one of his father's nine children to come to the Pacific coast, Mr. Kiefer was fourteen years of age when he boarded a sailing vessel at Havre, France, bound for Pittsburg, Pa., where his uncle was already well established in business. He was thirty days on the ocean, and arrived at his destination in Pittsburg just before Christmas, 1851. Under his relative he gained a mastery of the tanner's trade, and after four years in the tannery he went to Philadelphia, and from there to Wilmington, Del., where he engaged for five and a half years in dressing morocco. In 1860 he came to the Pacific coast by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and from San Francisco went to the placer mining region around Big Oak, Cal. Not as successful as he had hoped to be, he started out on a tour of the state, investigating the prospects for permanent location, and finally arriving at the "John Day" country, on the Powder river, in 1862. Still intent upon making money in mining, he went horseback over the mountains from Walla Walla to the Columbia district, and later on arrived at Jacksonville, Ore., where he combined mining and brewing until 1865. He then removed to Corvallis and engaged in the butchering business for a year; in 1866 located in Albany, starting the first brewing concern there, and operated it most successfully for fifteen years. During that time he gained the reputation for fair dealing and business sagacity which has since clung to him, and also for the public-spirited interest which he has manifested in the social, musical, theatrical and general affairs by which he is surrounded.

The first wife of Mr. Kiefer was formerly Margaret Smith, who died a year after her marriage, in Wilmington, Del. In 1863 he married, in Jacksonville, a Miss Louisa Sage, who was born in Baden, Germany, and who died December 30, 1894. Of the children of this second union, Clara M. is the wife of Harry Noel, of Morenci, Ariz.; Bertha G. married William Warner, of Albany; Rosa M. died in Albany; Caroline L. is the wife of Stephen Riley, of Pendleton; and Carl is deceased. In Wilmington, Del., Mr. Kiefer became identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is now a member of the Albany Lodge, and with the Encampment, of which he is past chief patriarch. He is also a member of the Ancient Order United Workmen. Politically he is identified with the Democratic party, but aside from the formality of casting his vote has never been heard of in local or state undertakings of his party. The expression regarding the similarity between a man's word and his bond is applicable to Mr. Kiefer, whose business transactions have always been above reproach, and whose private life is worthy of emulation. He was one of the organizers of No. 1 Albany Fire Company, and is now No. 5 of the exempts.

ROBERT GLENN. Among the well-developed farms in the vicinity of Salem none presents a neater or more painstaking appearance than does that of Robert Glenn. One hundred and ten acres in extent, eighty acres are available for general farming, and their clearing is due entirely to the energy and perseverance of the present owner. Many fine improvements have followed in the wake of years of industry, including a pleasant residence, convenient barns and outhouses, and those agricultural implements which denote the modern and progressive tiller of the soil, the man who keeps abreast of the times.

Of Scotch descent, on the maternal side, Mr. Glenn is the second oldest of the three sons and three daughters born to his parents, Caswell and Jane (Smith) Glenn, and his birth occurred in Cole county, Mo., April 13, 1853. The other living children are: Missouri, wife of John McKee Roberts; Annie, wife of John Stephenson; and Emma, widow of Asa Forman. The father and mother were born in Cumberland county, Tenn., the former January 28, 1826, and the latter June 1, 1828. With their respective parents they moved to Missouri as children, and there met, and married, in 1850, and spent many years of their lives. Robert was reared on the farm in Cole county, and during the winter months attended the district schools, eventually remaining at home to be of great practical assistance to his father. He was nineteen years of age when the family outfitted with ox teams and crossed the plains in 1872, leaving the old farm behind in April, and arriving at their destination in Salem November 28, 1872. They located on the farm now owned and operated by Robert Glenn. Here the elder Glenn took a great deal of comfort, and experienced the greatest satisfaction in his adopted state, making money rapidly, and was firmly launched in the good will of his equally enterprising neighbors. His death occurred on the old homestead January 8, 1899, after twenty-six years in his northwestern home, and he was survived by his wife who still makes her home with her son. Mr. Glenn is a Democrat in politics, and has been a road supervisor for some years. He is a genial and obliging man to meet, successful in his farming and stock-raising, and alert to the many opportunities which come his way to be of general use in a constantly growing community.

FRANCIS MARION COOK. Of the sixty-four years of Mr. Cook's life all but six have been spent in Oregon, to which state his father immigrated in the earliest pioneer days. He was born near Springfield, Mo., March 8, 1839, a son of Isaac and Sarah (Robertson) Cook. In 1845 his parents, having decided to found a new home in the then comparatively unknown Oregon country, started from their Missouri home with two wagons, forty-four oxen and ninety-seven head of cattle. After a journey of six months they arrived at their destination without the loss of any of their stock, an experience very rare in those days as many of the immigrant trains suffered heavy losses through the depredations of the Indians. Locating in Marion county Isaac Cook took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres three miles south of the present site of Turner, upon which he immediately erected a small log cabin containing but one room. Upon this claim, the development of which was begun as soon as the family had become established in their new home, he resided until 1872. In that year they removed to eastern Oregon, locating at Camp Watson, where the father died in 1876 at the age of eighty-four years. His wife's death had occurred some time before. The children born to this couple were as follows: George, William and Thomas, all deceased; Delilah, wife of William Frazier, of San Jose, Cal.; Francis Marion, of this review; and one who died in infancy.

Isaac Cook's life was a useful and most honorable one. He was a man who was always ready to assist in all movements for the betterment of the community's interests. He assisted materially in the construction of the early roads of Marion county, and was specially active in the promotion of the educational interests of the community, helping to build the first school house in his district. He was an earnest member of the Baptist Church, became one of the organizers of the first church of this denomination in the neighborhood, and devoted considerable of his time and means toward the construction of the house of worship. He was a large-hearted, public-spirited, liberal man, whose integrity was never brought into question. His name deserves a conspicuous place among the pioneers of the Willamette valley.

Francis Marion Cook was six years of age when the long journey from Missouri to the Pacific coast was made. Upon his father's farm in Marion county he spent all the years of his youth and young manhood, assuming the management of the farm a short time prior to 1872. In that year he accompanied his father to Camp Watson, where he engaged extensively in the business of raising cattle, sheep and horses. The period of his residence at that place covered seven years. Soon after the death of his father he returned to the homestead and engaged in stock-raising and general farming. Success has attended his efforts. He is now the owner of the original donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, four hundred acres of which is fine bottom land, which he has brought to the high state of cultivation, and which is exceedingly productive. This farm is one of the best in Marion county.

On September 26, 1857, Mr. Cook was united in marriage with Mary J. Edgar, a native of Boone county, Ind., and a daughter of Moses and Susan (Markey) Edgar. She died March 26, 1903, leaving six children: Martha E., wife of Motier Howe, of Roseburg, Ore.; Isaac N., residing near Marion; Francis M., of Grant's Pass, Ore.; Nellie D., wife of A. J. Miller, of Turner; Susan, wife of F. J. Neal, who resides with Mr. Cook; and Thomas M., who is located at Kent, Sherman county, Ore.

Though Mr. Cook has never sought political office he has followed closely in the steps of his father in his interest in good roads and good schools. He has served as road supervisor, and at various times has filled offices connected with educational work in his district. He takes an active interest in all those projects which appear to him to have been inspired by a desire to improve the moral, educational or commercial interests of his section, and never hesitates to take the initiative when he becomes convinced that his ideas, put into effect, will result in the betterment of the condition of affairs generally. He is recognized as a man dominated by high public spirit, of liberal and progressive views and a generous heart. On many occasions during the long years of his residence in Oregon he has had opportunities to demonstrate the better qualities of heart and mind which have given him the high place he occupies in the esteem of his fellow men, who have learned to respect and honor him as a useful man. His integrity is unquestioned, and his unselfish devotion to the best interests of the community at large entitle him to a permanent place in the historical literature of the Willamette valley.

REUBEN LEE, of Aumsville, occupies an enviable place among the pioneers of Marion county. His successful encounter with early difficulties, his correct appreciation of the many advantages by which he has been surrounded, and his untiring perseverance and unflagging industry, entitle him to more than casual notice on the part of all who seek inspiration and support. As far back as any existing records show, the ancestors of Mr. Lee found their greatest field of usefulness among the tillers of the soil, an occupation followed by his paternal grandfather, John Lee, one of the earliest settlers of Macoupin county, Ill., and courageous soldier during the Revolutionary war. His son, also named John, the father of Reuben, was born on a farm in Ohio, and married Rebecca Beschers, with whom he removed to St. Louis, Mo., where he lived for two years. His last home was on the Indian reserve in Franklin county, that state, where his death occurred in 1841. His wife died the year before.

Reuben Lee is one of a family of six sons, and was born in Macoupin county, Ill., November 25, 1827. As death deprived him of his father's guidance and support when he was fourteen years of age, he was compelled to solve the problem of self-support from that time forward. His first occupation was with Senator Hirsch, from whom he received $80 for his first year's labor and $85 each for the second and third years. He then went to Franklin county, Mo., and contracted to work a farm for one-fourth of the proceeds. In connection with this undertaking he conducted a small store with fair success.

In the spring of 1850 he crossed the plains with one wagon and four yoke of oxen. Upon reaching the Grand Ronde valley he sold his cattle and proceeded on horseback to The Dalles. Arriving in Portland he camped beside the river; and worthy of mention in this connection is the fact that at that time the city could hardly be dignified by the name of hamlet, its real estate being valued at from $8 to $12 per lot. After spending a short time in the embryo town he settled upon a farm near Silverton, Marion county. While on the plains he suffered a severe attack of measles, which left him nearly blind for about two years. This depleted his finances very materially, for when he arrived in 1850 he had $1,500, and this had dwindled to almost nothing three years later.

In the fall of 1852 Mr. Lee entered three hundred and twenty acres of land near Silverton, and in a little log cabin kept bachelor quarters for three years. March 6, 1855, he married Frances Drinkwater, who helped to add cheer to the crude home, and materially aided him with her sympathy and thrifty ways. This helpful pioneer wife died January 17, 1872, leaving eight children, named as follows: Lawrence C., in the livery business near Pomeroy, Idaho; Ellinora the wife of James Witzel, and residing near Turner, Ore.; William Henry, living in Linn county; Warner L., living on a farm, a part of the old Craft donation claim, one and one-half miles west of Shaw; Isaac Howard, on a farm in Linn county, near Waterloo; Bertha, who died unmarried in October, 1882, when twenty-seven years of age; Clara Belle, wife of Lewis Campbell, of Portland, Ore.; and N. Evaline, wife of Elmer Brody, of Rampart, Alaska, where he is an attorney at law.

In September, 1876, Mr. Lee married for a second wife Elizabeth Hyett, who died in 1894, and in January, 1897, he was again married, this time to Mrs. Martha Ennis, who was born in Warren county, Ky., and has been a resident of Oregon since 1893. Mr. Ennis died in this state.

About 1860 Mr. Lee moved upon a farm of one hundred and sixty acres located seven miles below Salem, and in 1861 traded his farm property near Silverton for three hundred and seventy-five acres adjoining his one hundred and sixty acres. Here misfortune befell him because of the heavy rains which occurred during 1861-62, and not only his house and farm implements were destroyed, but his clothing and that of all his family. Nothing daunted, he built another home and remained on the premises until 1864, when he traded part of the land for a farm on the hill adjoining, upon which he lived until 1872. The next farm owned and improved and occupied by Mr. Lee was located near Brooks, and consisted of two hundred and thirty-seven acres, bearing no improvements. This he sold in 1875, and immediately purchased four hundred and eighty acres one and one-half miles west of Shaw, where he resided until the fall of 1902. On all of these farms Mr. Lee carried on general farming, and also dealt in cattle on an extensive scale, making a specialty of sheep and hogs.

Although now living retired in Aumsville, Mr. Lee still owns his large farm near the town, besides two hundred and eighty-seven acres in Linn county. He has always taken an active interest in the cause of education, has been a member of the school board for twenty years, clerk of the board for a part of that time, and has served as road supervisor for several terms. Although voting the Republican ticket, he has broad and liberal views as to politics. He is a member of the Oregon Pioneers' Association, and has an extensive acquaintance among the older residents of the Willamette valley now living.

Mr. Lee is one of the most striking examples of the selfmade man in Marion county. During his career many obstacles, seemingly insurmountable, have arisen in his pathway, but his indomitable perseverance, his energy and his industry have enabled him to reach the goal of every man's ambition—a competency in temporal goods, and the good-will and esteem of his fellow-men. It is to such men as he that posterity owes a debt of gratitude, not alone for the pioneer work of development they have accomplished, but for the excellent example they have set for the youth of the rising generation by reason of the traits of character which stand out so conspicuously in the personality of Reuben Lee.

JAMES SHELTON. Notable among the pioneer settlers of Linn county is James Shelton, who is now living retired from the activities of life in Albany. Coming here when the country was in its original wildness, he met with privations and obstacles hitherto undreamed of. Settlers were few in number and far between, and the Indians were a constant source of terror to the brave pioneers. None of the luxuries of life were to be had at any price, and many things deemed necessities east of the Rockies had to be dispensed with here. The forests, however, were filled with an abundance of game of all kinds, which furnished the chief subsistence of the inhabitants, grouse being their only summer meat. Pork was an unknown quantity for many years, and their nearest approach to coffee was a drink made from browned peas. Clothes were made from deer skins, which the men themselves dressed, and hats were manufactured at home from wheat straw. Little can the people of this day and generation realize the trials and tribulations that beset the courageous men and women who, by persistent toil and wondrous self-sacrifice, made the homes and lives of their immediate descendants so pleasant and joyful.

A Virginian by birth, James Shelton was born March 2, 1828, in Patrick county, which was also the birthplace of his father, Haman Shelton. His grandfather, Clayborn Shelton, a farmer by occupation, served in the war of 1812, and afterwards moved to Jackson county, Mo., where he spent the remainder of his life.

Haman Shelton removed with his family to Oregon at an early period, crossing the plains with his wife and twelve children in 1847. Locating in Linn county, he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, and was there engaged in farming until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Priscilla Fitzgerald, was born in Virginia, a daughter of Harvey Lee Fitzgerald. She died on the home farm, in Linn county. Of the twelve children born of their union, all came to Oregon, but only eight are now living.

Moving with his parents to Missouri when about five years old, James Shelton acquired his early education in the typical log school-house of his day, with its dirt floor, and rude benches. Coming with his parents to Linn county in 1847, in a train composed of three wagons, each one drawn by three yoke of oxen, he had charge of one of the teams during the journey of five months, starting in April and arriving September 15, the trip being made along Barlow route. Remaining at home a few years he assisted his father in clearing a farm. At the age of twenty-one years he began life for himself by taking up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres at the forks of the Santiam. With characteristic zeal he at once began its improvement, breaking up the sod with a rude plow of his own manufacture, drawn by five yoke of oxen. He subsequently bought adjoining land, and on his fine ranch of four hundred acres was engaged in general farming, including stock-raising, until 1894. He raised grain of all kinds, but made a specialty of wheat, and was very successful, his farm being one of the most fertile and productive in the neighborhood.

Mr. Shelton was also engaged to some extent in the mining operations of earlier days, going to California during the excitement of 1849, and remaining on the north bank of the American river a few months as a prospector and miner. Being taken ill, he returned to Oregon, resuming his agricultural labors. In 1862 he spent a few months at the Florence mines, and in 1863 mined in the Boise Basin, on each trip to Idaho going by pack train. Since 1894, Mr. Shelton has rented his farm, and made his home in Albany.

Mr. Shelton married, in Linn county, Ore., Miss Theresa J. Melholland, who was born in Illinois, and came across the plains with her brothers in 1852, with ox-teams. Mr. and Mrs. Shelton have two children, namely: Haman, who is successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits on the farm adjoining his father's; and Mrs. Rufina Follis, of Lincoln county. Politically Mr. Shelton is independent, voting for such men and measures as in his opinion will best advance the interests of the community. Mr. Shelton is a member of the Baptist Church.

SIDNEY SMITH. One of the distinguished pioneers of 1839, whose residence in Oregon extended through a period of over forty years, Sidney Smith was a man whose life was filled with kindly deeds, whose highest ambition was to help his fellow man and to assist in the establishment of a commonwealth, to which he gave the best years of his life. He was a descendant of old Revolutionary stock, his great-grandfather being a powder manufacturer in Vermont near the New York line during that memorable struggle for independence. The grandfather was a commissioned officer in the Continental army. The father of Sidney, Capt. John Smith, was a native of Vermont and served as captain of a company engaged in quelling the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania in 1799. Sidney Smith was born at Amsterdam, in the Mohawk valley of New York, on October 2, 1809. He was reared at Johnstown, N. Y., and when a young man went to Ohio, where for three years he studied medicine, but never engaged in practice. In 1839, his interest in Oregon was awakened by the reports of the Lewis and Clark expedition; accordingly he resolved to journey to the northwest, and with that object in view joined a company of sixteen young men who were similarly minded, among them being P. K. Fletcher, Amos Cook, Mr. Shortless and Mr. Farnham. They left Peoria, Ill., in the spring of 1839, and were the first to cross the plains with the intention of making permanent settlement. They intended to supply their larder with wild game and fish, so started with very little provisions, but not finding the food supply they had expected along the way, they reached the verge of starvation, living for sixteen days upon a biscuit apiece each day and upon dog meat, which they purchased from the Indians. Dissensions also arose in the party and they quarreled among themselves almost to the point of separating into two companies, but eventually they continued on their way together. Mr. Smith was less fortunate in one respect, for he accidentally shot himself, which deprived him of three of his ribs. He was carried on a stretcher resting on the backs of two mules, but after three weeks of suffering he finally recovered. At one time the Indians stole their horses and Mr. Smith, with another man, went to their camps and demanded of the chief that the horses be returned. At first the Indians refused, but with drawn guns the demand was repeated, and at length the chief promised to return the stolen animals by sundown of the following day, which he did.

At Fort Boise the company divided and Mr. Smith with a few companions started for Oregon. Others dropped out one by one until there were but two who completed the journey and arrived safely in Oregon. On October 2d Mr. Smith assisted in building a house at The Dalles. He was deeply interested in the new country to which he had come to establish his home and in his diary he speaks of the effect produced upon him when he first viewed Mt. Hood. He also mentions his first meeting with a white woman in this far-off land.

He was employed by the Hudson Bay company, working barefooted in the rain for seventy cents a day. He was afterwards employed by the Methodist Episcopal mission at Salem, rafting up and down the Willamette river, and during this time he boarded with Gustavus Hines, one of the first pioneers of the northwest.

He next found employment with Ewing Young, of Yamhill county, who had brought a large band of Mexican cattle from California, settling in the Chehalem valley, to which he supposed that he could lay claim. Mr. Young had the reputation of being a hard man to serve, but he found his equal in Sidney Smith, who stood up for his own rights and usually got them. When Mr. Young died, our subject was his only companion. He left a large herd of cattle, and having no known heirs this led to the organization of the provincial government for the purpose of disposing of his estate. Mr. Young had often said that when he died he wanted Sidney Smith to have his property; this the latter refused to accept, but when the auction was held he purchased the brand and the right to the stock that had not been rounded up, also the right to the land, and continued on the claim in the cattle business for several years.

When the donation claim act went into effect Mr. Smith found he was entitled to but six hundred and forty acres of land, and there he lived with but few comforts and many hardships, having considerable trouble with the Indians from time to time, and no white neighbors. The experiences and episodes of that period of his career would make an interesting volume if written in detail. With some of the Indians he formed warm and lasting friendships.

There was no man who figured in the early history of the state who did more for the emigrants than did he. A large-hearted man, of kindly nature, no one ever sought his aid and did not receive it. He frequently would kill a beef to furnish food for the travelers, and his house was the shelter for many an emigrant party. He was indeed liberal, helping the needy, feeding the poor and assisting the widows and orphans in many ways.

In 1845 Daniel Bayley, who was en route with his family to Oregon, obtained permission from Mr. Smith to remain upon his place for the winter. This was an eventful day for Mr. Smith. During the long dreary winter days Cupid was acting his silent part, and Mr. Smith married Mr. Bayley's daughter, Mianda, in the fall of '46. During their courtship they planted an acorn upon the grave of Ewing Young, which has grown to a large tree and still stands.

It was about this time that the Hudson Bay Company tried to persuade Mr. Smith to declare himself a British subject, as he was an actual settler, and the British wished to lay claim to this section of the country. Though they offered him much land he refused, saying that the company had not land enough to buy him.

In 1849 he went to California, and returned with considerable gold. Wheat and oats were selling very high in those days, and in his business undertakings Mr. Smith was very prosperous. In 1856 he located in LaFayette, Yamhill county, Ore., and the following year engaged in merchandising, which he followed for about ten years, when he retired to his farm. As the years passed he accumulated land until he was the owner of one thousand two hundred and eighty acres.

Mrs. Smith was born in Ohio, May 6, 1829, and was the daughter of Daniel Bayley, who was born in 1802, and died when about ninety-two years of age. He married Elizabeth Munson, who was a lineal descendant in the seventh generation from Thomas Munson, of England, who afterward lived in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., and served as a sergeant in the war against the Pequod Indians. The ancestry of the Munson family dates from Thomas Munson, who came to America in about 1634, and settled in Hartford, Conn., where he became prominently identified with the early history of that city. Timothy Bayley, father of Daniel Bayley, was a captain in the Revolutionary war, and like many other barefooted patriots at Valley Forge, suffered all the hardships of that memorable winter. Jared Munson, the father of Mrs. Bayley, was a physician. Mrs. Bayley was a woman of wonderful resources and ability, and after coming to Oregon acted as physician to the entire countryside for miles around. Mrs. Smith is still living, a fine Shakespearian scholar and a lady of marked refinement and culture. She resides in LaFayette, and is the mother of five children: Irene, now the wife of Dr. J. F. Calbreath, of Salem; Mrs. Almira Hurley, of Independence, Ore.; Mrs. Mianda Kimberlin, of LaFayette; Gustavus Hines, who is a graduate of the medical department of the Willamette University, and was practicing medicine at Enterprise, Ore., at the time of his death; and John U., an attorney at Hilo, Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. Smith was a Democrat in politics, but cast his vote for Lincoln and took an active part in the establishment of the first school in Oregon. He was a friend of every enterprise tending to improve social and political conditions in the state. He lived to see Oregon become possessed of all the comforts and evidences of civilization known to the older east, and to see it enter statehood of the Union. He looked with pride upon what was accomplished, assuming no credit for the part he bore in the attainment of this end; but history acknowledges its indebtedness to him, and many of the pioneers remember with gratitude the great and unselfish interest he exhibited in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the community in the territorial days. Since his death, which occurred September 18, 1880, his memory has been enshrined in their hearts.

He was among the one hundred and two men who met at Champoeg to decide whether Oregon should become British or American territory, and when Joe Meek, who was in favor of British sovereignty, drew an imaginary line upon the ground, one side representing the United States and the other Great Britain, Mr. Smith was the first man to step upon the side representing the United States, and thus declare himself in favor of American sovereignty.

RICHARD CLAXTON. As illustrating the adaptability of the land in Marion county to horticultural purposes, it is interesting to know that the farm of Richard Claxton yielded, in 1901, three thousand, four hundred and fifty bushels of prunes from fifteen acres. Other kinds of fruit are grown in correspondingly large quantities, proving that this successful fruit grower has a thorough understanding of his interesting occupation, and also that he realizes its possibilities in this particular part of the state.

In November, 1890, Mr. Claxton came to the Waldo Hills, Marion county, and purchased fifty acres of land two miles from Shaw. This land was entirely unimproved, and therefore available only after much painstaking application. The first year he set out three acres of Italian prunes and other fruit, and to this he has since added, year by year, until at the present time he has thirty acres of orchard, all bearing, twenty-nine acres being under prunes. Of this fruit he produces two varieties, the Petite and the Italian. To accommodate his large and increasing industry he erected a drier in 1896, the first of its kind in the neighborhood or district. The drier is 52x64 feet in ground dimensions, and he has made a front addition of 16x20 feet. This appliance enables him to handle not only his own production, but that of his neighbors as well. In 1902 Mr. Claxton, desiring to increase the production of fruit, in which he had become very successful, purchased forty acres adjoining his original property, twenty-four of which are devoted to prune culture. It will thus be seen that he is one of the most extensive producers of this staple in the Willamette valley.

The Claxton farm presents, in its entirety, a typical instance of the possibilities of agricultural and horticultural development in the state of Oregon. No improvement calculated to facilitate work or add permanently to the value of the property is allowed to remain unpurchased by the thrifty and far-sighted owner. The house is a modern and comfortable structure, and the barns and out-houses are in keeping with the progressive spirit of the owner.

Mr. Claxton's wife, to whose help and sympathy he owes a great deal of his success in life, was formerly Ida C. Towle, a daughter of George Towle, a sketch of whose career appears elsewhere in this volume. Their marriage was solemnized in 1886. They have two interesting and promising boys, George and Robert.

A Republican in political affiliation, Mr. Claxton has always been deeply interested in the welfare of his party, though he has never aspired to public office. He has evinced a deep interest in educational matters in his community, and for nine years has served as a member of the local school board. He believes in providing for the public schools the best equipment, both as to apparatus and in the personnel of the instructors, which money can procure; and his enlightened, modern ideas in this direction have accomplished much toward elevating the standard of the school in his district. Fraternaly he is connected with the Grange. Although not a member of the church, he is a liberal contributor to the support of religious institutions, and is always ready, with practical assistance, in any movement tending to benefit general, social, moral or intellectual conditions. Thoroughly honorable in all his dealings, he is highly esteemed for those desirable traits which underlie the western citizenship.

JOHN HENRY HAWLEY. The president of the Polk County Bank at Monmouth is numbered among the early pathfinders and home builders, who, in the stern, heroic days that tried the fiber of the manhood of men, amid almost incredible hardships and dangers, blazed the first narrow winding trails of progress through green wilds, and laid a sure foundation for the state whose heraldic ensign is now numbered among the sisterhood of states. Collectively the knights of the plains, upon whom a strong duty was imposed, constitute one of the most imposing pageants in the history of the world, beside which the Crusaders of old, with their perfumed clothes and high sounding titles, their charges and retainers, pale into insignificance because of the futility and subsequent uselessness of their mission. Not so the Oregon pioneer, in whose path has grown up the civilization of this part of the northwest, and many of whom possess to-day a memory which runs the gamut from primeval simplicity to cosmopolitan and strenuous activity. To an exceptional degree, John Henry Hawley represents the class of men of whom we speak, and he came a long way with his father in the early days. He was born in London, Canada, March 10, 1835, and was but ten years of age at the time of the overland trip.

Cyrus B. Hawley, the instigator of the family emigration in 1844, was born in the state of New York, and about 1820 removed with his people to the vicinity of London, Canada. Here the parents lived on a farm, while the young man worked at whatever he could find to do, eventually engaging in building and contracting in London, many of his constructions still standing in the quaint old town. In 1836 he removed to Detroit, Mich., and worked at his trade, and two years later located on a little farm near Farmington, Iowa, where he combined contracting and agricultural pursuits for about two years. He then moved to Andrew county, Mo., locating near the town of Sparta. While working at building and gathering his harvests, he heard glowing accounts of the far west. Not being satisfied with the prospects of Andrew county, he determined to join an emigrant train in the hazardous journey over the prairies. Disposing of his farm, he equipped with ox teams and wagons, his faithful wife, Elizabeth (Smith) Hawley, whom he married in the east, assisting him in every possible way. On the journey many pleasant incidents enlivened the company, and although the train was among the first to penetrate the wilds, they encountered very little opposition from the Indians, and suffered comparatively little from cholera, small-pox or mountain fever. Gen. Cornelius Gilliam was captain of the train, and he proved a very genial and competent guide, but after awhile the party divided into several sections, each going its separate way. Mr. Hawley located on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres three miles east of McMinnville, and here he erected a log house for the accommodation of his family, cleared his land of brush and timber, and was soon living in comparative comfort. At best his farm yielded not more than was required for the maintenance of his four sons and three daughters, and the mining chances in the surrounding states appealed to him as worthy of attention.

Accordingly he left his farm in charge of his oldest sons, and in the spring of 1862 went to the Boise Basin, Idaho, intending to add to his fortune from the gold mines. His dreams were not destined for fulfillment, for the following year, in 1863, he was stricken with mountain fever, and died in November at the age of fifty-four years. He was a man of resource and ambition, and cherished a just pride of birth, his ancestors having been among the early emigrants from England to settle in the United States, and their descendants have filled many positions of trust and responsibility.

John Henry Hawley built up a strong constitution while working on the donation claim near McMinnville, and his want of educational chances in the early days was realized as he approached maturity. At the age of twenty-one he took a two years' course at the Bethel Academy, and, having qualified as a teacher, he taught school in both Polk and Yamhill counties. With the money thus earned he bought a little farm of ten acres in 1858, and in 1861 went to the gold mines of Idaho. Although moderately successful, he spent only one year in the mines, and then returned home. The next year he engaged with his brother-in-law, Jonathan Atterbury, in packing provisions to the Idaho camps. In 1864 he embarked in the mercantile business in Bethel, Polk county, and in the meantime purchased four hundred acres of land upon which he began to engage in farming in 1875. Beginning with 1892 he spent a year in Salem, Ore., and then came to Monmouth, where he invested heavily in the stock of the Polk County Bank, of which institution he has since been president. Much of the success of the bank is due to the financial acumen of this tried and trusted official, whose name represents strength, integrity and absolute control of his business affairs. At the same time he continues to be interested in his farm, where he raises grain to a considerable extent, and makes a specialty of registered Lincoln sheep, and other high grade stock.

In 1858 Mr. Hawley was united in marriage with Eliza Mulkey, who was born in Missouri, a daughter of Luke Mulkey, a native of Kentucky. As a young man Mr. Mulkey removed from Kentucky to Missouri, and after crossing the plains in 1847, located near Corvallis, in Benton county, where his death occurred in 1895. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hawley, of whom Horace G. and May I. are deceased; William H. is a merchant of Pendleton, Ore.; Curtis L. is living on the old farm; Constance is the wife of B. F. Mulkey, of Ashland, Ore.; Luke M. is in the mercantile business with his brother in Pendleton, Ore.; and Maude E. is living at home. Since attaining his majority Mr. Hawley has taken a keen interest in local and general politics and has allied himself with the Republican party. He has filled many positions of trust and responsibility in the community, and is at present the chief executive of the city of Monmouth. During the session of 1882 he was a member of the state legislature from Polk county, serving on the committee for the enrollment of bills. At one time he was justice of the peace of Bethel, Ore. An elder and trustee of the Christian Church, Mr. Hawley is a teacher of the bible class in the Sunday school, and contributes generously towards the maintenance of the church. His two story frame home on College avenue is one of the hospitable and delightful centers in the town, and here one of the stalwart founders of the present prosperity of Polk county spends the hours between his arduous political and business responsibilities.

THOMAS COCKRELL. Since January 1, 1896, Thomas Cockrell has been connected with the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad, and on February 1, 1903, he accepted the position as agent at Albany, Linn county, and in his work has met with the commendation of employers and the good feeling of fellow employes and passengers, thus proving his capability for work where he is constantly thrown into association with the public. Mr. Cockrell is truly spoken of as one of the rising young men of the community, and it is through the avenue which has led many a man to fortune that he will seek the zenith of his ambitions—an evidence of the estimation in which he is held being in the fact that he was promoted to the Albany office, which is one of the responsible positions on the road.

The Cockrell family came originally from Virginia, where Mortimer J. Cockrell, the grandfather of Thomas Cockrell was born, and from which state he removed to Ohio, where he followed farming and conducted a cooper shop. His death occurred in Medina county. His son, Robert J., was born near Burbank, Wayne county, Ohio, and for many years was a grain dealer in that state. In 1890 he removed to Corvallis, Ore., where he now makes his home. He married Sarah J. Shoup, a native of Center county, Pa., and a daughter of George Washington Shoup, also of that state, who later became a millwright in Ohio. Mrs. Cockrell is the mother of four children, all of whom are living, the second oldest of them being Thomas Cockrell, who was born near Burbank, Wayne county, Ohio, December 23, 1875. In 1890 he accompanied his parents to Oregon, being at the time but fifteen years of age. He completed his education in the public schools of Lebanon, continuing at his studies until he was eighteen years of age, when he began the study of telegraphy.

He commenced January 1, 1896, at Yaquina Bay, and July 1, of the same year, he took a position as an operator at Morrison, Ore., and soon after came to Albany as assistant agent, remaining for one month at the latter place, after which he was sent as agent to Mill City. Three months later he was again in Albany, where he remained for one year. After eight months spent in Gates, and nearly five years in Mill City as agent he accepted the position which he now holds, and which his excellent service in the past fully warranted.

In fraternal orders Mr. Cockrell is prominent, holding membership in Laurel Lodge No. 7, Knights of Pythias, of Albany; past grand of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Mill City; and is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks No. 359, also of Albany. Politically he casts his ballot with the Republican party.

GEORGE W. BURKHART. The owner and proprietor of the flourishing blacksmith business at 418 West Second street, Albany, is deserving of more than passing mention among the successful politicians and public-spirited men of the town. He was born in Des Moines county, Iowa, October 18, 1845, the youngest of the eleven children born to his parents, John and Rebecca (Baltzell) Burkhardt, natives respectively of Tennessee and Pennsylvania. While still living in his native state the father enlisted for the war of 1812, and he afterward removed to a farm in Iowa, where he lived for many years. His children were all ambitious and on the lookout for better things, and it is not surprising that at least one of them should venture across the plains while yet the undertaking was a hazardous experiment. This one happened to be C. D., one of the older sons, who crossed the country as early as 1845, and sent back favorable reports of conditions as he found them in Oregon. Yielding to the entreaties of the other children, the father sold his farm in Iowa in 1847, and, outfitting with oxen and prairie wagons, brought the rest of his family to the northwest. He took up a claim two miles southeast of Albany, where his death occurred in 1855, at the age of seventy years, his wife surviving him until she was eighty-two years of age.

Two years of age when he came with his parents to Oregon, George W. passed his boyhood days among surroundings which would have seemed strange indeed to his little playfellows back in Iowa. Aside from his brothers and sisters, all of whom were older than himself, he had no one to play with but Indian boys, and he readily adapted himself to the strange looking chaps. As he grew older he learned the Chinook language, and came to think well of the much-painted red boys, who nevertheless showed great kindness of heart, and often pronounced generosity and gratitude. At the little log school of the district he received his educational start, and when old enough to look out for himself went to Albany and learned the blacksmith trade. In those days many-sided work was required of the mechanic, for industrial conditions had not as yet limited a man to the exercise of but one talent as a means of livelihood. He therefore applied himself to carpentering and building, afterward engaging in a large truck and dray business in Albany. He was successful from the start, and ran three teams to accommodate his many customers. In 1897 he engaged in his present blacksmithing and horseshoeing business on Second street, and has since had a trade in keeping with his position among the master workmen of his line.

The first presidential vote of Mr. Burkhardt was cast for a Republican candidate, and he has since given that party his staunchest support. That he possesses claims for leadership is recognized by his fellow politicians, and by the community at large, for he has served for nine years as deputy United States marshal, under both Kearney and Kelly, and has also been city marshal two terms, and constable two terms. With his wife, who was formerly Nancy Cooper, a native of Missouri, he attends the United Presbyterian Church. Hettie, the only child born to Mr. and Mrs. Burkhardt, is living with her parents. Mr. Burkhardt has been prominently before the public in other than political capacities, for he is public-spirited, generous, and capable, and uses his resources often in promoting some worthy effort in behalf of the community interests. He is one of the brave and gallant members of the fire department, having associated himself with the same as long ago as October, 1875. For several years he was foreman of the department, and many times risked life and limb for the safety of imperiled households. He is highly respected in the community of Albany, and his industry and success are worthy of emulation and all-around approval.

PETER RUETTNER. Prominently identified with the building interests of Linn county Peter Ruettner, of Albany, is carrying on a prosperous business as a contractor, builder, and house-mover. A man of sterling worth and honesty of purpose, possessing great physical and mental vigor, he holds a fine position among the foremost residents of the city, and by his upright conduct in the varied relations of life has gained the respect and esteem of all with whom he has come in contact, either in a business or social way. A native of Switzerland, he was born April 4, 1852, in Ragatz, Canton of Saint Gallen, which was also the birthplace of his father, Frank Ruettner. His grandfather, who was born in Switzerland, of French ancestry, was a carpenter and builder by occupation, and a man of some influence in his community.

Frank Ruettner married Amantia Buehler, who was born, reared and married in Saint Gallen canton, and they became the parents of nine children, seven of whom grew to years of maturity, and five, three boys and two girls, are now living. In 1871 he migrated to America, starting from Ragatz with his wife and seven children. In Germany, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, his wife was taken sick, and died at the Holy Ghost Hospital, where he left her in the care of their youngest son, Peter, the special subject of this sketch.

Having completed his early education in the common schools of his native land, Peter Ruettner at the age of twelve years began herding cattle and goats in the Alps, and during the three years that he was thus employed grew strong and large. He subsequently worked with his father at the carpenter's trade until 1871, when he started for the United States with the family. Remaining, however, in Frankfort-on-the-Main until after the death and burial of his mother, he worked at his trade in that city during the five weeks of his stay. Coming then via Bremen to New York, he landed in that city with but a single gold dollar in his pocket. Joining the remainder of the family in Chicago, Ill., as soon as possible, he witnessed the burning of that noble city, and with his hammer and saw added his little mite toward its rebuilding. In 1874, during the hard times that nearly paralyzed business, he secured a position as driver on the street cars, and continued thus occupied two and one-half years. Times becoming better, Mr. Ruettner followed the carpenter's trade for a few years, and then worked as a millwright about six years.

In 1887, finding that he had an uncle, Sebastian Ruettner, who had come to Oregon as a pioneer in 1845, living in Kings valley, he made up his mind to visit his kinsman. Coming here, accordingly, in 1888, Mr. Ruettner was so pleased with the country that he decided to make Oregon his permanent residence. Locating with his family in Albany, he embarked in business as a contractor and builder, and has met with eminent success. Since 1892 he has made house-moving a specialty, paying attention to that line of industry in conjunction with his other work. Enterprising, energetic and a sagacious manager, he has accumulated considerable wealth. In addition to his own residence, at the corner of Third and Main streets, he owns two most desirable houses, and other property of value.

While living in Chicago, Ill., Mr. Ruettner married Miss Minna Brandt, who was born in Des Plaines, Cook county, Ill. Her father, William Brandt, emigrated from Hanover, Germany, his native place, to Illinois, and was for many years engaged in farming in Des Plaines. He subsequently removed to Fillmore county, Minn., and there spent his last years, and died in 1880 at the age of sixty-five years, seven months and seven days. Mrs. Ruettner's mother died in Chicago, August 13, 1902, at the age of eighty years, five months and five days. Mr. and Mrs. Ruettner are both members of the Lutheran Church, and contribute generously toward its support. In politics, Mr. Ruettner is a staunch Republican.

HON. N. B. HUMPHREYS. Among the influential and respected citizens of Albany no man stood higher in the estimation of the people than Hon. N. B. Humphreys, who during the Civil war fought most gallantly for the preservation of the nation, and who has since faithfully performed the duties devolving upon him in his home, his town, his county, and his state. In all respects a worthy representative of the enterprise, industry and intelligence of Linn county, he has been prominently identified with the advancement of its highest interests. A son of the late George Humphreys, Jr., he was born in Louisa county, Iowa, December 30, 1840. He comes of substantial Scotch-Irish ancestry, his great-grandfather, David Humphreys, having been a life-long resident of the North of Ireland, and the descendant of one of the old Covenanters who emigrated to that country from Scotland.

George Humphreys, Sr., the grandfather of Hon. N. B. Humphreys, was born and reared near Belfast, Ireland. Emigrating to the United States when a young man, he settled in Ohio as a pioneer, and there cleared and improved a homestead, on which he spent the remainder of his life.

Born in Jefferson county, Ohio, on the parental homestead, George Humphreys, Jr., resided in his native state until 1836, when he settled on a farm in Louisa county, Iowa. Following the march of civilization westward, he crossed the plains to Oregon in 1865, and took up his residence in Albany, where he lived retired until his death. He married Elizabeth McCleary, who was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, and died in Oregon. Her father, Robert McCleary, was born in New England, of substantial Scotch ancestry, and died in Jefferson county, Ohio. Of the twelve children born to George and Elizabeth Humphreys six are now living, of whom George is an attorney in Portland, and Ross is a lumberman in Washington.

N. B. Humphreys, the ninth child in order of birth, obtained his early education in the pioneer log schoolhouse of his native state, and remained on the home farm until eighteen years of age. Beginning the study of law in the office of T. B. Perry, in Albia, Iowa, he was admitted to the bar in the spring of 1861. The following year, relinquishing the practice of his profession, Mr. Humphreys enlisted as a private, July 26, 1862, in Company D, Twenty-second Iowa Infantry, and was mustered into service at Iowa City. He subsequently participated in many of the more important engagements of the conflict, and for bravery in action was frequently rewarded by promotion. At Port Gibson, on May 1, 1863, he was wounded in the left knee by a piece of a shell, being then sergeant of his company. He was afterwards in the Battle of Champion Hills, on May 16, 1863, and the following day, during the engagement at Big Black River, received a bullet wound in the left shoulder. On May 21, 1863, he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and on May 22, while assisting in the siege of Vicksburg, he received a bayonet wound in the left arm. On June 21, 1863, Lieutenant Humphreys was commissioned captain of Company D, and with his regiment was subsequently transferred to the Department of the Gulf, thence sent by transports to Bermuda Hundred. As a part of the Nineteenth Army Corps, under General Sheridan, he was actively engaged in the battles at Winchester, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek. At the close of the Shenandoah campaign, Captain Humphreys was located for awhile in Savannah, Ga., then in Raleigh, N. C., remaining on duty in that state and in Georgia until the close of the war. The regiment, which was mustered out of service July 22, 1865, disbanded, at Davenport, Iowa, August 3, 1865.

Resuming the practice of his profession, Captain Humphreys was elected county judge of Monroe county, Iowa, in 1865, and served until the spring of 1866, when he came to Oregon. The train in which he crossed the plains consisted of fifty-four men, with wagons and mule teams to accommodate the entire party, which was four months on the journey. Locating in Albany, Linn county, he built up an extensive and lucrative practice, becoming one of the leading attorneys of this part of Oregon. In 1872 he was elected district attorney of the Third Judicial District, which contains five counties, and served for one term. From 1880 until 1882 he was state senator, serving as chairman of the committees on enrolled bills and on military affairs, and as a member of the judiciary committee. He introduced into the legislature the bill that has since become a law making the wife equal to the husband in regard to the custody of children; also introduced the bill regarding the building of a state insane asylum; and was instrumental in the passage of many other bills of minor importance. He later filled the mayor's chair in Albany one term, and in June, 1902, was elected justice of the peace, serving in that capacity at the time of his death, April 17, 1903.

In Polk county, Ore., Mr. Humphreys married Miss R. M. Smith, who was born in Polk county, of pioneer parents. Their only child, Saxon Humphreys, a graduate of the Monmouth state normal school, is a resident of Monmouth, and a teacher. Politically Mr. Humphreys was a staunch Republican. Fraternally he was made a Mason at Albia Lodge, F. & A. M., No. 76, in Iowa, and was a member of St. John's Lodge, F. & A. M., No. 62, of which he was past master, and also belonged to Bayley Chapter, R. A. M., No. 8. He was also a charter member of McPherson Post, G. A. R. In his religious views he was a Presbyterian.

JUSTINIAN WILLIAMS KIRKLAND. A resident of Independence, Ore., for the past twenty years, Justinian Williams Kirkland has played no unimportant part in the affairs of the city. By his judgment and excellent management of his business affairs he has made himself a worthy factor in the progressive movements of the community. His life has been full of the varied experiences that befall the man who has visited the different sections of country at a time when some unusual happening has drawn the attention of the world to that location, and of the past years he recalls many pleasant memories of occurrences which have marked his wanderings in the seventy-five years which he has lived.

The father of Mr. Kirkland was Abraham Kirkland, who was born in Mercer county, Ky., and after his marriage with Miss Elizabeth McGee, also a native of that state, he removed in 1812 to Boonville, Cooper county, and later to Monroe county, Mo. In 1843, while assisting at a house-raising, he was killed by a large log falling upon him. The mother also died in her Missouri home in 1883. Of the five sons and two daughters born to Mr. and Mrs. Kirkland, Justinian Williams Kirkland was next to the youngest, his birth occurring at Boonville, Mo., February 15, 1828. With a rather limited education received in the common schools of Missouri, he began life for himself, the first occupation being that of farming, and later he engaged in buying stock and disposing of the same in the St. Louis market. In this he met with good financial returns. In 1850 he joined a party bound for the new El Dorado, the trip being made with the customary ox-teams, and was of brief duration compared with the length of time considered necessary for a Californian journey. They started March 15 and reached their des-mination October 1, their stock of supplies having fallen so low that they had been on half rations for some time. Mr. Kirkland's first experience in California was a two months' illness, and upon his recovery he at once entered the mines near Rough and Ready. A two years' residence among these scenes netted him moderate returns, and in 1852 he went to San Francisco and shipped for New Orleans, via Panama and Havana, Cuba. His trip across the Isthmus of Panama was one of interest, being made on foot, a skiff used to convey him down the Chagres river a distance of sixty miles to Aspinwall. Upon his arrival at New Orleans he ascended the Mississippi river to St. Louis, where he was once more welcomed back to his home. With a desire to try his fortunes in the business world he engaged in the grocery business, in which he met with success until he had the misfortune to lose his property by fire, upon which he returned to the cultivation of the soil. In 1862 he responded to the call of the South in which he had been born and reared, and became a captain in the Confederate army, serving for three years in the Fourth Missouri Cavalry. Upon Lee's surrender he returned to private life, and with the changed conditions of Missouri he chose again to emigrate to newer fields of endeavor. In the spring of 1865 he crossed the plains to Montana by ox-team and located at Helena, where he engaged in mining and freighting, and in 1869 he continued his journey westward and arrived in Polk county, Ore. He engaged in farming for four years near Independence, and at the close of that period purchased three hundred and twenty acres near Rickreall, making his home in that vicinity for fifteen years, engaged in general farming. In 1885 he removed to Independence, where he engaged in the real-estate business. Upon the corner of Second and B streets he built a handsome little cottage where he now makes his home. Among the other town property which he owns is a forty foot lot on First street.

Mr. Kirkland's first wife was Miss Katherine M. Johnson, a native of Kentucky, whose death occurred in Independence in 1891, at the age of sixty-two years. His second union was with Mrs. Sarah Douty, who was born in the state of New York. Four sons were born unto J. W. and Katherine M. (Johnson) Kirkland: A. P., of Wallowa county; W. J., of Arlington; P. M., a druggist in this city, and John E., of Independence. During his residence in this city Mr. Kirkland has taken a prominent place in its affairs, having served two terms as mayor, as councilman many terms, also as county commissioner of Polk county for one term. His offices have been held through Democratic influence, of which party he is a consistent supporter. He has also been president of the board of trade of Independence. Fraternally Mr. Kirkland is associated with the Masons, in which he has taken the chapter degree; Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and Knights of Pythias.

MADISON SCOTT. As the descendant of a family successful for many generations, Madison Scott is upholding the standard of excellence set in the eastern states many years ago, through the display of evident business ability and quick, unerring judgment making his citizenship of great value to the community in which he makes his home. He has met with a much merited success in both his business and political relations, in the former devoting himself entirely to the raising of stock, and in the latter being often called upon to serve in some public capacity, always proving his worth and ability when so doing.

Mr. Scott is a member of a prominent New York family, the grandfather, Solomon, and father, Edward L., both owing their birth to that community of the east, where they both followed the occupations of farmer and stockman. In 1845 the latter removed to Lee county, Iowa, and, locating near Keokuk, he continued in the same business, becoming one of the noticeably successful men of the middle west. Attracted by the glowing accounts from the Pacific coast he decided to try his fortunes beyond the Rockies, and accordingly crossed the plains in 1850, traveling alone with his ox teams until he reached California. There he engaged in mining for the ensuing three years, enjoying each year a more complete success, which compensated for the long absence from his home and family, since his return would mean greater comforts for the coming years. At the close of this period he prepared for the return trip via the Isthmus of Panama, and the loved ones at home were waiting and watching since they knew when he would sail from San Francisco. The news that he expected to sail on a certain date was the last that was ever received from him, for he disappeared from human knowledge as completely as though the earth had opened and swallowed him. It was known that he carried $50,000, the result of his self-denying years of toil, and it is supposed that this was the incentive for some cowardly work that robbed a home of the father and the children of the competence which had certainly been hardly gained. He had married Charity Sorter, who was born in New York state, the descendant of Dutch ancestry. Her father, Zebulon Sorter, was a native of New Jersey, but had spent much of his life in New York, Iowa, and later in Clark county, Mo., where he died. Some time after the failure of her husband to return to their home Mrs. Scott removed to Sullivan county, Mo., where she reared her family and where she now makes her home at the age of eighty-eight years. She makes her religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church. She was the mother of six children, five sons and one daughter, of whom there are four sons living. The oldest son, Zebulon, was a lieutenant in the Eighteenth Missouri Regiment, and at the battle of Cornuth was taken prisoner and sent to Libby prison, where he died in 1863.

The oldest of the children now living, and the only one on the Pacific coast, Madison Scott was born October 28, 1842, in Allegany county, N. Y., and was five years old when the family fortunes were shifted to the state of Iowa. He was there reared to manhood, attending the district schools for his education, and when his mother removed to Sullivan county, Mo., he went with her. During the Civil war he served in the Twelfth Missouri Militia, and later in the Sixtieth, his period of service lasting about a year, when he was called out several times. After the war he engaged in farming, and in 1869 he removed to McKinney, Tex., and there commenced the breeding of horses. In 1871 he returned to Missouri and spent the ensuing two years there, after which he came west and purchased a farm in Linn county, Ore., located twelve miles southeast of Albany. He engaged extensively in the stock business, upon his own and rented lands nearby, raising full-blooded Shropshire sheep, Shorthorn cattle and other stock. He ships cattle and hogs principally to the Puget Sound country and through good judgment and executive ability is making good profits.

The marriage of Mr. Scott occurred in Missouri, in 1866, and united him with Miss Jane Terrell, a native of Monroe county, Iowa, the daughter of Horace Jefferson Terrell. The latter was born in Connecticut. After a brief residence in Lorain county, Ohio, he became an early settler in Monroe county, Iowa, from which place he removed to Sullivan county, Mo. He married Minerva McNeal, also a native of Connecticut, and a daughter of Alexander McNeal, who died in Ohio, to which state he had removed. Mrs. Terrell, who passed away in her Iowa home, was the mother of thirteen children, of whom two sons, Lemuel and Burt, died while serving in Iowa regiments during the Civil war. Three of her children are residents of the state of Oregon, of whom Mrs. Scott is one. She was reared in Iowa, where she began teaching school at the age of seventeen years, and continued in the work for about three years. She is the mother of the following children: Charles E., located in Benton county; A. I., who is at present engaged with his father in the stock business; Eva, the wife of Elmer Conn, of Albany; Leva, wife of J. H. Coe, of Shaniko, Ore.; Walter O., Nellie, Grace and Roxy Frances. Mrs. Scott is a member of the Baptist Church.

A staunch Democrat in politics, Mr. Scott has often been called upon to fill some position at the disposal of this party. In 1890 he was nominated on that ticket for the office of sheriff, to which he was elected by a majority of seven hundred votes. He took the oath of office July, 1890, and held the position until 1892, having removed in the first named year to the city of Albany, where he now makes his home. On retiring from office Mr. Scott again engaged in the stock business, and still finds lucrative returns from his work. Fraternally Mr. Scott affiliates with Lebanon Lodge No. 47, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being a member of the Encampment, and also with Safety Lodge Ancient Order of United Workmen.

A. MONROE MILLER is a retired farmer living in Dallas, but still owns the old donation claim of six hundred and forty acres which he secured from the government not long after his arrival in the northwest in 1847. Few are the residents of the state who arrived at that early date, but with the pioneer history Mr. Miller has long been identified. He has watched the progress of the coast country from the time it was inhabited largely by those who sought to make fortunes, but did not care to make homes in this district. He has watched with interest the upbuilding and substantial development of the state, and in as far as possible he has contributed to its improvement.

Mr. Miller was born in Cole county, Mo., about ten miles west of Jefferson City, November 9, 1827. His father, Richard Miller, was a native of Virginia and the grandfather, James Miller, removed from the Old Dominion to Kentucky and in 1820 became identified with farming interests of Cole county, Mo. He was of Scotch descent and many of the sterling traits of his Scotch ancestry were manifested in his life. The father of our subject followed farming in Missouri until 1847, when he crossed the plains with an ox-train, accompanied by his wife and six children. One child of the family had died in Missouri. They started with three wagons, fifteen yoke of oxen and seventy-five head of cattle, leaving their old home on the 12th of April. They crossed the Missouri river about twelve miles above St. Joseph and forded both South and North Platte in their wagon-beds, swimming the cattle. At times the Sioux Indians threatened, but caused no serious disturbance.

However, when they reached the Columbia river, Indians attempted to rob them and they had to keep men continually on guard so as not to allow the red men in their camp, and in due course of time the journey was completed in safety, arriving in the Willamette valley on the 1st of October. The father secured a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres four miles west of McMinnville, Yamhill county. He entered an entire section of land, but because he went to California for his wife's health and voted in that state he had to lose three hundred and twenty acres of his claim. In 1849 he took his family by water to California, this being a year later than our subject and his brother made an overland trip. Mr. Miller engaged in gardening near Martinez for eighteen months and then returned by the water route to his farm, where he lived until he retired from business life. His wife died in 1863 and in 1865 he went to live with his children, his death occurring at Turner, Ore., when he was eighty-two years of age. For many years he was connected with the Baptist Church as a minister and did everything in his power to promote the cause of the gospel. His wife bore the maiden name of Nancy L. Fulkerson, of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born in Virginia, a daughter of James Fulkerson, who at an early day went to Tennessee and afterward to Missouri, where he carried on farming until his death. He served in the Indian wars and passed away at the age of seventy-eight years. Mr. and Mrs. Miller became the parents of six sons and one daughter and with the exception of one son all came to Oregon. Alexis N. died in Lane county, Ore., in November, 1902. The others of the family are Andrew Monroe, William T., a farmer of Turner, Ore.; Mrs. Elizabeth J. Husicker, of North Yamhill, Ore.; John W., who died in California in 1900; and R. Jackson, who died in eastern Oregon.

A. M. Miller was reared on the old family homestead in Missouri until nineteen years of age, and during the winter months he pursued his studies in a subscription school which was held in one of the old-time pioneer log school houses, furnished with slab seats, while a desk was made by placing a board upon pins driven into the wall. The children used quill pens and the text-books were of a primitive nature. At the age of nineteen Mr. Miller accompanied the family on their emigration to Oregon, driving a five-yoked ox-team across the plains. From actual experience he is familiar with the events of such a trip, its hardships and its trials. On the 11th of September, 1848, he and his brother Alexis started over the mountains to California with ox-teams, they being of the first party to travel in this way. There were eight men in their party and they arrived in California on the 4th of November, making their way to the gold fields. Mr. Miller was then engaged in mining on Feather river until 1849, when on account of the scourge which broke out there he went to Contra Costa county. There he and his brother and two other men engaged in sawing lumber with a whip-saw, receiving a big price for their product. They spent two years there, during which time Mr. Miller built a hotel of sixteen rooms at Martinez. The nails, paint and carpenters' work for this building cost $2,200. The town, however, did not grow to be a San Francisco, as was anticipated, and three years later Mr. Miller sold the property for eight hundred dollars.

In the meantime he had returned to Oregon by way of the water route on the steamer California. This was in 1850 and he spent about a year in Yamhill county. In 1851 he located in Polk county, four miles north of Dixie, securing a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres. He built a frame house, cleared and improved his farm and engaged in the raising of grain and stock. In 1861-2 he made trips to the Florence mines with pack horses. During the greater part of the time since securing his claim he has carried on farming and still owns the original donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, besides having added to it an adjoining tract of seventy-five acres. His farm is now a valuable property and returns to him a good income from rental. In 1884 he took up his abode in Dallas where he has since lived.

Mr. Miller was married in Polk county, Ore., to Margaret A. Crowley, who was born in Holt county, Mo., a daughter of Thomas Crowley, who in 1846 made the journey across the plains with an ox-train by way of the southern route and the Rogue river pass. He died in Umpqua, as did one son and two of his daughters. His wife and seven children came on to the Willamette valley and another son died the following year. Mrs. Crowley reared her remaining children in the valley, Mrs. Miller being fourteen years of age at the time of the emigration to the northwest. Her married life, however, was of short duration, for she died seven months after becoming a bride.

In Yamhill county Mr. Miller was again married, his second union being with Mrs. Lucinda V. (Fulkerson) Logan, who was born in Virginia, but was reared in Cooper county, Mo. There she married Mr. Logan and with him crossed the plains in 1852, but he died soon after their arrival in the valley. By her first marriage she had two children: Mary C., who became the wife of Judge Meyers, both of whom are now deceased; and James F., who died in Polk county. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Miller were born three children, two of whom are living: Jasper R., of Portland; and Nellie E., the wife of U. S. Grant of Dallas. Mrs. Miller died January 5, 1887, at the age of sixty-one years. Mr. Miller is a member of the Baptist Church and served on the board of trustees for several years.

In politics Mr. Miller is a Democrat. He belongs to the Polk County Pioneers' Association. The days of chivalry can furnish no more interesting tales than are told by the pioneers of the northwest, and Mr. Miller is one whose life has been closely connected with its development and progress. There is therefore particular satisfaction in reverting to the life history of the honored and venerable gentleman whose name initiates this article, since his mind bears the impress of the historical annals of the state of Oregon from the early pioneer days and from the fact that he has been a loyal son of the Republic and has attained to a position of distinctive prominence in the thriving little city where he has retained his residence for so many years.

JOHN NATHANIEL DAVIS. One of the many worthy citizens and capable and thrifty agriculturists of Marion county is John N. Davis, who has resided on his present farm in the Waldo Hills for upwards of thirty years. During this long period of time he has gained for himself an enviable reputation as an honest man and a good citizen, and as one who has performed his full share in the advancement and development of one of the finest counties of the state. He came of New England ancestry, and of patriotic Revolutionary stock, his grandfather, John Davis, a resident of Rhode Island, having served his country as a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and the steel which he then carried and used to make a fire with instead of matches is now in the possession of his grandson, John N. Davis.

A native of Gainesville, Wyoming county, New York, John N. Davis was born June 27, 1824, a son of John W. Davis. His father was born in Rhode Island in 1783, and was there educated. Running away from home when a boy, he engaged in seafaring pursuits for many years. He sailed along the northwest Pacific coast three years, and in 1811 visited the mouth of the Columbia river. He had the distinction of being captain of the first steamboat run on Lake Erie. He subsequently took an active part in the war of 1812, participating in the battle of Black Rock, Erie county, N. Y., later in life locating permanently on a farm in Wyoming county. In 1839 he removed to Illinois, trading his New York farm for one in Sangamon county, and there he spent his remaining days, dying at the venerable age of eighty-seven years. John W. Davis was married three times. His first wife was Samantha Flower, who was born in New York state May 3, 1803, and died in 1828. They had two daughters and three sons, of whom John N. Davis is the third child and the sole survivor. For a second wife he chose Abigail Flint, who became the mother of two sons, both deceased. His third wife was Martha Taylor, who had six daughters and one son by a former marriage, all of whom are deceased.

Until twenty-three years of age John N. Davis remained at home, attending the district school as a boy, and assisting in the care of his father's farm. Thinking then to improve his chances of making a fortune, he went to Illinois, where he worked until 1851. The money thus earned he invested in oxen and wagons, and entered the employ of Joseph Williams, a widower with six children, who was about to start for the Pacific coast. His team being one-third of the outfit, he was hired as a driver on the expedition, receiving $15 per month for his services and the use of his team. Crossing the plains, Messrs. Williams and Davis came direct to Marion county, Ore., but after stopping here a short time Mr. Davis proceeded to California, where he was engaged in mining for a few months. Returning then to this state, Mr. Williams went to southern Oregon, where he was killed by the Indians in 1853. After taking the orphaned children of his former companion and employer back to their Illinois friends, Mr. Davis returned to Marion county in 1854, and for several years thereafter worked as a farm laborer, accumulating some money. After his marriage he went to housekeeping near Scott's Mills, and four years later, about 1870, purchased one hundred and sixty acres of his present homestead. He has since made improvements of an excellent character, added forty more acres of land by purchase, having now one of the best and most desirable farming estates in the neighborhood.

Mr. Davis was married September 22, 1866, to Martha Whitlock, a native of Marion county, and the daughter of Mitchell and Malvina (Engle) Whitlock, her parents having made the tedious journey across the plains in 1845. Four children were born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Davis, as follows: John F., who lives on the home farm; George William, deceased; Brayton H., living near Silverton; and James, deceased.

Mrs. Davis was born May 1, 1847, and her death occurred December 18, 1894. Mr. Davis has always taken an active part in political matters, and has rendered valuable service to his fellow-citizens as county commissioner for four years, as road supervisor for seventeen terms, and as a member of the school board. Fraternally he has been a Mason since 1850, and has assisted in organizing three different lodges, besides which he had the pleasure of helping to initiate Generals Sheridan and McClellan into the order in Portland, Ore., in 1853.

EDWARD S. PORTER. In the annals of Marion county no name stands higher for industry and integrity than that of Porter, and no family in the Willamette valley is held in higher respect and esteem. Among the courageous pioneers of Silverton and vicinity, who put forth their highest efforts toward the upbuilding of the place in which they had located, were Edward Porter, the grandfather of E. S. Porter, born in 1803, and his son John, the father of the subject of this sketch. Coming here when the country round about was in its virgin wildness, they were interested witnesses of the rapid transformation of the heavily timbered land into a rich and productive agricultural region, and by every means within their power aided its growth and advancement.

Removing from Ohio to Illinois with his family in 1835, Edward Porter settled in Fulton county, where he engaged in farming for nearly a score of years. Starting for the far-off west in 1853, he crossed the intervening country with teams, which were then the only means of land transportation, and with his wife and children came direct to Marion county, and located about five miles southeast of Silverton, on what is known as the Porter donation claim. In common with other pioneers, he labored with untiring energy to improve his land, and as the years rolled by found himself possessed of a comfortable home, wherein he lived until after the death of his wife, Anna (Anderson) Porter, who was born in 1805. His remaining years he spent at the home of his youngest son, living to be over seventy years of age.

A native of Vermilion township, Richland county, Ohio, John Porter was born October 6, 1830, and in that state spent the first five years of his life. Going then with his parents to Indiana, and thence to Fulton county, Ill., he was there reared and educated, remaining in that location until 1853, when, with his parents, he made another journey westward, coming to Oregon across the plains. They were nearly six months journeying with the plodding ox teams, but had no serious adventures en route. Being young and unmarried, he remained at home, assisting in the clearing of the land taken up by his father until about twenty-five years old, when he took unto himself a wife, and established himself as a householder on the old Porter donation claim, living there until 1859. Locating then near Fairfield, on the French Prairie, he remained there until 1864, when he removed to the White donation claim, residing there until the death of his wife, in 1897. Since then he has made his home with his children.

A man of unusual energy and ability, John Porter has met with almost unprecedented success in his life occupation. Since beginning life for himself he has accumulated a large amount of land, aggregating about sixteen hundred acres, a large part of which is in a good state of cultivation, and yielding him a handsome annual income. Straightforward and honest in all his dealings, he enjoys in a marked degree the confidence and good will of all who know him. He is liberal and public-spirited, and takes an active part in political matters. His wife, whose maiden name was Annis White, was born in Indiana, and came with her parents from Missouri to Silverton, in 1852, settling about five miles southeast of Silverton, on the White donation claim. Of the ten children born of their union, one died in infancy, the others being as follows: Allen, of Grant county, Ore.; Rene, wife of F. M. Remington, of Idaho; E. S., the subject of this sketch; Charlotte, wife of E. W. Ross, living near Silverton; Anna, wife of R. N. Harrison, of Washington; John H., living not far from the old homestead; Josie, wife of L. D. Leonard, of Idaho; Ai, living on the home farm; and Lena, wife of B. H. Davis, of Silverton.

Edward S. Porter was born June 3, 1860, near Parkersville, Ore., and acquired his early education in the district schools and the Silverton High School. Having obtained a practical knowledge of the many branches of agriculture under the wise instruction of his father, he chose farming as his life work, and after his marriage settled on the Charles Miller donation claim, five miles from Silverton. Thorough and systematic in his methods, and wise and judicious in the expenditure of his money, he has made an unquestioned success in his agricultural labors, and is now the owner of fourteen hundred acres of valuable land, all but one hundred and sixty acres being in one piece. On this he carries on general farming on a large scale, and is extensively engaged in stock-raising, dealing principally in Short-horn cattle. Mr. Porter is also identified with other interests, being junior member of the firm of Kinney & Porter, general merchants at Silverton, where he owns several pieces of town property; and is also largely interested in the breeding of Belgian horses in the Willamette valley. Taking a lively interest in all that concerns the public affairs of town and county, Mr.

Porter has exerted a decided influence in advancing the various enterprises inaugurated to develop their resources and promote their prosperity. He has served in various town offices, and for twenty years has been clerk of the school board. In politics he is a staunch Democrat, and fraternally is an Odd Fellow, active in the lodge room, having passed all the chairs in the order.

Mr. Porter was married, December 24, 1883, to Miss Lou Hubbard, a native of Oregon. She died April 16, 1893, leaving four children, namely: Grover S., Lora, Glenn E. and Lena L. Mr. Porter married for his second wife Mrs. Alice Sherfy Loran, of Johnson City, Tenn. At her death, December 14, 1902, she left one child by her first marriage, Ira P., who makes his home with his foster father.

WILLIAM L. VANCE. The life-history of William L. Vance, a well known resident of Albany, may well be likened to a romance of olden times, being filled with tales of poverty and riches, with thrilling experiences of pioneer life in an uncivilized country, telling of narrow escapes from the dusky savages, and eventually settling him in a comfortable home, with a substantial fortune, accumulated through his own strenuous efforts, at his command. A son of Bradley Vance, he was born near Jacksonville, in Morgan county, Ill., in 1831. He is of sturdy Scotch ancestry, his paternal grandfather having emigrated from Scotland, his native country, to Kentucky, where he fought in the Indian wars with Daniel Boone.

A native of Kentucky, Bradley Vance was born and bred near the city of Louisville. He was a farmer by occupation, and became an early settler of Morgan county, Ill., where he died, in 1833, of the cholera. He married Nancy, daughter of John Jewett, a farmer in Kentucky. She died of the cholera within nine hours of the time of her husband's death. Three children were born of their union, one of whom died when young, the two survivors being John, who came to the Pacific coast in 1852, and is now a prominent stockman, of Malheur county, Ore., and William L., the subject of this brief sketch.

Left an orphan in his second year, William L. Vance was brought up on a farm, living with his grandfather and uncles, and receiving very meagre educational advantages, his school life averaging less than a month a year. Beginning the battle of life for himself at the age of sixteen years, he worked in a saw-mill run by horse power, and being industrious, thrifty and prudent in his expenditures, he had accumulated the snug little sum of $400 by the time he reached his majority. In 1853, ambitious to seek gold in its native soil, he started for California. Leaving Jacksonville, Ill., he crossed the plains with the ox-train commanded by Batchelder and Carter. At Salt Lake City, finding the company determined to winter there, Mr. Vance and a comrade purchased mules and came to the coast with a small pack-train, being six months and sixteen days on the way to Placerville, Cal. At once engaging in mining, he was very successful, making $7,000 the first three months. Going to other mines he lost and made money, sometimes being without funds, and sometimes rolling in wealth. At the end of seven years, however, he left the mining region with a capital of over $8,000 in cash. During the time he suffered all the privations and hardships of the early miners, and came in contact with people of all kinds and conditions, including some of the most noble men he ever knew, and some of the most daring desperadoes.

The ensuing two years Mr. Vance was engaged in the cattle business at Yreka, Cal., going from there, in 1862, to the Salmon river valley, where he cleared $5,000 in packing from there to eastern points in one season; thence to Walla Walla, Wash., where he completed a successful wood contract. In 1863 he ran a pack train from the Humboldt river to Rogue River, Ore., and Chico, Cal., and at the same time also successfully engaged in mining, remaining in that locality over two years. In 1866 he attended school at Jefferson, Ore. Locating then in Umatilla, he drove a pack train from that city to Boise, Idaho, for three years, carrying on a very large and successful business in freighting. In his labors he employed seventy-five mules, finding them best adapted for travel, and although the life was hard, he enjoyed it. He oftentimes found the roads almost impassable, sometimes nearly perishing in the severe snowstorms of the plains and mountains, at one time becoming snow blind. Hostile Indians were frequently seen, his life being seriously endangered on more than one occasion. Disposing of his outfit in 1869, he made a trip east, going by way of the Isthmus of Panama, spending eight months in Illinois recuperating.

Returning to the Willamette valley by way of Panama in 1869, Mr. Vance purchased two farms in Tangent, Linn county, and was there actively engaged in agricultural pursuits for thirteen years, when he took up his residence in Albany. He has achieved distinguished success in his labors, and is now the owner of eight farms, containing from one hundred and sixty to three hundred and fifty acres each, aggregating in all nearly two thousand acres of good improved farming land. These farms he rents, receiving a good annual income from each. He likewise owns valuable business and residence property in other counties and towns, and is everywhere recognized as a man of great executive and financial ability. His farms are finely located, some being quite near railway stations, the most distant one being but two miles from a station. He has built two business blocks 44x100 and 40x100 feet, respectively. He was one of the directors of the Albany Woolen Mills, in which he was a large stockholder until he sold his interest in 1903.

Mr. Vance married, in Marion county, Ore., Martha Duncan, a daughter of James Duncan. She was born near Fayetteville, Ark., and died in Albany, Ore., January 30, 1903. Her father, James Duncan, the son of a farmer, was born in West Virginia. In 1841 he settled as a farmer in Arkansas, and lived there twenty years. Crossing the plains with ox-teams, in 1861, he came to Jefferson, Marion county, with his wife and five children. Purchasing a farm near Turner, he resided there until his death, January 30, 1899. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife, whose maiden name was Sarah Ann Brickey, was born in West Virginia, and died at Turner, Ore., December 30, 1898. She bore her husband eight children, seven of whom grew to years of maturity, as follows: Mrs. C. M. Morgan, of Albany; M. J. Duncan, of Idaho; J. N. Duncan, an attorney in Albany; W. C. Duncan, who lives on the old homestead in Turner; Mrs. Brown, who died in Washington in 1873; Mrs. Vance; and Robert Duncan, whose death occurred, in 1865, in East Oregon.

Mr. and Mrs. Vance became the parents of two children, namely: Lora, living with her father; and Mrs. Nancy Pearl Peacock, of Portland, Ore. Mr. Vance affiliates with the Republican party, and is one of its staunchest supporters, but has never sought political preferment.

LEWELLYN CLAY MARSHALL. The steady rise to prominence in the business and social world of Lewellyn Clay Marshall, in charge of the grocery department in the store of S. E. Young, at Albany, has been entirely the result of perseverance and determination, augmented by a correct estimate of his own abilities. Mr. Marshall is a pioneer, a Mason of high degree, and his many interesting experiences in the early days would fill a volume of interesting reading matter. Born on a farm near Springfield, Ill., October 12, 1843, he removed at an early age with his father, James Marshall, to Washington county, Iowa, locating on a farm in the then unsettled country. His five brothers and sisters were born in Illinois and Iowa, and in January, 1852, the entire family started on the long journey across the plains. They outfitted with ox-teams and prairie-schooners, and Lewellyn, then nine years of age, was an active boy and, though the youngest in the family, made himself useful driving stock and bringing water from near-by springs and rivers. The days and weeks and months passed uneventfully until reaching Round valley, the oxen plodding patiently, and the Indians keeping to themselves. In the valley the father injured his hand, and, blood poisoning resulting, occasioned his death at the Umatilla Agency in October, 1852, at the age of forty-five. The mother was prostrated with grief, two children, Samantha J. and Anson, were ill with fever, and it was a desolate and heart-sick little party that continued its way, leaving its strong and resourceful leader in a lonely wayside grave. The mother took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres on Sand Ridge, and later traded for one of the same size on the Santiam, where she lived until her death in 1867. Like her husband, she was a member of the Christian Church, and reared her children to a fearless reliance upon goodness and industry. Alfred, the oldest, died in Idaho; Arthur G., a veteran of the Indian wars, died in Linn county November 25, 1901; and Samantha J. became the wife of J. M. Archibald, and finally died in Linn county.

Realizing the dependence of the family caused by the death of his father, Lewellyn started out to work as a farmhand in Linn county at a very early age, and in 1862 went to the mines on the Powder river. After thoroughly investigating the possibilities of success in this region he turned his attention to freighting rather than mining, and from 1863 until 1869 carried provisions and miners' supplies from The Dalles to the Idaho mines with ox-teams. Returning to the valley in the latter part of 1869 he purchased a farm of one hundred and thirty-four acres six miles east of Albany, which property he improved to some extent, and lived thereon for seven years. Locating in Albany in 1876, he was employed by the Albany Farmers' Company for ten years, and while thus receiving and selling grain, owned a controlling interest with Simpson & Mansfield. In 1886 he resigned from the Farmers' Company and began clerking for Mr. Simpson, dry-goods merchant, in 1892 associating himself with his present employer, S. E. Young. At present other responsibilities are being assumed by him, he being president of the Albany Butter & Produce Company, and the Creamery & Cold Storage Plant. Mr. Marshall owns the old farm upon which his mother moved in 1853 in her lonely widowhood, and at times visits it for relaxation from business cares.

Mr. Marshall is one of the popular and in-influential men of the state. He is past master of St. John's Lodge No. 62, A. F. & A. M., past high priest of Bayley Chapter No. 8 Royal Arch Masons; past master of Adoniram Council No. 4, R. and S. M.; past eminent commander of the Temple Commandery No. 3, K. T., and was elected grand commander of the Grand Commandery of Oregon in 1898. He is also connected with the Order of the High Priesthood; the Eastern Star; and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He is a member of the board of trustees and served as president of the Masonic Building Association. The Pioneer Association of Oregon, as well as the Alco Club, profit by his helpful and genial membership. Politically he is allied with the gold standard Democrats.

December 31, 1868, Mr. Marshall was united in marriage with Virginia Lines, who was born February 4, 1851, near Fort Madison, Lee county, Iowa, and is a daughter of John H. Lines, of whom extended mention may be found in another part of this work. Like her husband, Mrs. Marshall is prominent in the social circles of Albany, and is a member of the Eastern Star.

ROBERT ADDISON. Among the pioneers of Yamhill county whose departure from accustomed haunts left a void in the hearts of his friends, and a place not easily filled in the community, was Robert Addison, a popular, influential and honored farmer, and a veteran of the Rogue River war. In his character Mr. Addison embodied the best of English traits, fostered by ancestors living for many years near Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, where he was born on a farm April 2, 1831. His parents came to America when he was seven years of age, or in 1838, bringing with them their nine children. This was destined to be a sorrowful family, for on the way to Wisconsin, up the Mississippi river, the mother fell overboard and was drowned, and the father was left alone with almost an overwhelming responsibility.

Locating in Lancaster, Wis., the Addison children were reared on a farm, and each and all were obliged to perform their share towards the family maintenance. Robert Addison remained at home with his father until about eighteen years old, and then started out to earn his own living. No better opportunity presenting itself, he accepted a position as driver across the plains with a small party, and reached his destination without any serious mishap or trouble with the Indians. From Portland he made his way to Idaho and followed mining and prospecting for three years, and after his return to Portland in 1852 worked at whatever he could find to do. In 1866 he bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres three miles south of Dayton, on the Dayton & Salem road, there being at the time but few acres under cultivation. His industry and good management accomplished wonders, however, and at the time of his death, March 15, 1898, he left to his widow and children a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, two hundred and forty being available for crops.

November 7, 1870, Mr. Addison married Martha Scott, a native of Indiana and daughter of William and Sarah A. Scott, who crossed the plains in an early day, settling in Spring valley, Polk county, Ore. The Scott family lived in Polk county for about four years, and afterward experimented in different parts of Polk county up to the time of their death. After his marriage Mr. Addison took his wife to the farm where she now lives, but on account of impaired health located in Dayton in 1897. After a year he went to live on the farm with his son, and after his death his widow again went to Dayton, remaining there until October 1, 1901, when she and her sons returned to the farm as a permanent home. Mrs. Addison has proved an excellent manager, and with the assistance of her sons is maintaining the admirable farming standard established by her husband, which caused him to be regarded as one of the best managers and most resourceful agriculturists in Yamhill county. He was one of the pillars of the Christian Church of Dayton, and generously contributed towards the support of the same, at all times being active in church and Sunday school work. He was a man of high moral standards, and was thorough and cautious in the extreme, believing that if anything was worth doing at all, it was worth doing well. Four children were born to himself and wife, of whom Anna L. is the wife of George Foster, of Yamhill county; Charles W. is a resident of Dayton; Otheniel is at home, as is also John R.

M. LORENCE. In all but birth, M. Lorence is an American, for he was but five years of age when he left his native land of Germany, where he was born February 14, 1863. He was one of two children born to his parents. After the death of his father, the mother courageously took up the burden of self-support and brought her children to America. They came by sailing vessel and were a long time on the water, and after reaching New York removed immediately to Wisconsin, where they lived for nine years. In 1877, the family located in Oregon, where they settled in Sublimity, but eventually purchased a farm six miles north of the town, where the mother died at the age of fifty-two years. She married a second time and had seven children.

After completing his education in the district schools, M. Lorence lived on the home farm until about nineteen years of age, and then started out to make his own way in the world. He was a good farmer, and conscientious, industrious man, and found no difficulty in getting desirable work in the country around his home. He married into one of the well-known families of this section, his wife, Ethel Schindler, daughter of L. Schindler, having been born on the farm upon which the young couple went to housekeeping, and where they are still living.

The old Schindler place is one of the landmarks of this part of the county, and is located four and a half miles south of Silverton. The part of the old claim owned by Mr. Lorence consists of two hundred acres, of which about thirty-five acres have been placed under cultivation by the present occupant. Mr. Lorence is a practical, thrifty farmer, and his farm has been fitted with many desirable modern improvements. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising and devotes considerable of his land to grain. Four interesting and promising children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lorence: Andrew, Elmer, May and Maggie Pearl. In politics a Republican, Mr. Lorence has served on the school board, and he is fraternally associated with the Woodmen of the World. He is one of the reliable and progressive farmers of Marion county, and enjoys the confidence of all who have had dealings with him.

STRAUDER FROMAN. A typical representative of the pioneer farmers of Oregon, Strauder Froman has long been identified with the agricultural interests of Linn county as proprietor of a well kept and finely improved ranch in Albany township. Possessing an unlimited amount of energy and push as a young man, he labored intelligently and diligently, by thrift and good management acquiring a competency, and is now living retired from active pursuits, enjoying the reward of his early toil and self-sacrifice. He was born in Danville, Ill., May 2, 1832. His grandfather, Jacob Froman, was for many years a farmer in Kentucky, but subsequently removed to Indiana, where he remained until his death.

When a boy of twelve years Thomas Froman, the father of Strauder, left his Kentucky home, going with his parents to Indiana, where he grew to man's estate. Ambitious and enterprising, he subsequently engaged in business in Danville, Ill., and in partnership with his brother Isaac made money in river trading. One of his earliest ventures in this line was the taking of one hundred head of beef steers, and two hundred and fifty hogs, with sufficient hay and corn to feed the same, to New Orleans, going on a flat-boat down the Vermilion river to the Wabash, thence down the Ohio river to the Mississippi, which he followed to his point of destination. Being successful in this venture, he afterward did considerable trading in cattle, hay and grain, shipping to the gulf ports. Disposing of his Illinois farm in 1854, he removed to Nebraska, going with horse teams to Richardson county. Two years later, Thomas Froman, whose son Isaac and daughter America, now Mrs. Price, had settled near Albany, Ore., in 1851, conceived the idea of joining them. Starting with his wife and seven children in an ox-train, he followed the old Oregon trail for a time, but on account of the Indian troubles in Oregon and Washington he pursued the California trail from Soda Springs, the thirty men of the train with their families proceeding to Chico, Cal., arriving there in August, 1856. The journey had consumed four months. Leaving his son Strauder, the special subject of this sketch, in charge of the loose cattle, one hundred head of them, Thomas Froman went with the remainder of his family to San Francisco, thence by boat to Oregon City, and from there came to Albany by team. Immediately purchasing land in this locality he engaged in farming, his ranch containing three hundred and twenty acres, on which he resided until his death, in 1880, at the age of eighty-two years. At the same time he bought an adjoining farm equally large for his son Strauder, purchasing both pieces of land from Judd Ness Robinson. He was a member of the Baptist Church and in his early life was a Whig, but afterwards became identified with the Republican party. He served in the Black Hawk war while a resident of Illinois.

Thomas Froman married Elizabeth Rand, who was born in Ohio. Her father, James Rand, a native of Ireland, emigrated to this country when a boy of seventeen years, and subsequently served as a soldier throughout the Revolutionary war. Settling then in Virginia, he married Miss Carder, and afterwards removed to Ohio, where he lived for a few years. Going from there to Indiana, he continued his agricultural pursuits until his death. Of the union of Thomas and Elizabeth (Rand) Froman twelve children were born, eleven of whom grew to years of maturity, namely: Frances died in Oregon; America, now Mrs. Price, of Albany, came here in 1851, settling on a donation claim; Louisa, who died in Illinois in 1853; Isaac, who came to Albany in 1851, resides on the donation claim which he then purchased; Strauder, the subject of this sketch; Minerva died in Nebraska; Mrs. Hannah Foster, who died in Oregon; Mrs. Elizabeth Pate, of Albany; Mrs. Mary Logsdon, of Albany; Thomas, who resides on the old homestead; and Mrs. Martha Wyatt, of San Francisco, Cal. The mother died on the home farm, in Oregon, at the advanced age of eighty-four years.

Brought up on an Illinois farm, Strauder Froman obtained his education at a subscription school in a rude log school-house, the teacher boarding around among the families during the annual term of three months. Going with his parents to Nebraska in 1854, he remained there two years, then, as previously stated, started in April, 1856, for California, arriving in August at Chico. Being left in charge of the cattle at that place, he stayed there until 1857, when he sold the stock and came to Oregon, locating on the ranch which his father had purchased for him in July of that year. Taking a drove of cattle across the mountains to California in 1859, he disposed of them at an advantage, and remained in the Sacramento valley until 1861. Returning to Oregon, he subsequently engaged in mining for three or more years, first at the Oraphino mines, then at the Powder river mines, near the present site of Baker City, thence to the Idaho City mines. Coming back to the Willamette valley in 1864, Mr. Froman resumed charge of his farm of three hundred and twenty acres, which is finely located about three and one-half miles southeast of Albany, and for more than a score of years was prosperously engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Since 1885 he has rented his ranch and resided in Albany. He was one of the organizers of the Albany Creamery Association, of which he has been president from the time of its inception, managing its affairs most successfully and satisfactorily.

On November 11, 1868, Mr. Froman married, in Albany, Ophelia C. Moore, who was born near Middletown, N. Y., a daughter of Henry Moore. Her grandfather, Jacob Moore, was born of Scotch ancestors, in the North of Ireland, and emigrated to this country from there, locating as a farmer in Orange county, N. Y. Henry Moore, a native of Orange county, N. Y., was a farmer by occupation, and removed from his native town to Illinois, purchasing a farm at Whig Hill, near Rockford, where he engaged in farming until his death. He married Frances Slaughter, who was born in Orange county, N. Y., of German ancestry, being the daughter of Isaac Slaughter, a farmer. She survived her husband, and, in 1864, started across the plains with her six children, three boys and three girls, in the train commanded by Captain Medorum Crawford, the train consisting of three wagons, each drawn by four horses. At Fort Laramie she was taken sick and died. The children continued with the company, and after spending a year at Walla Walla, Wash., came, in 1865, to Linn county. Three of the children are still living, Mrs. Froman being the eldest. Politically Mr. Froman is an uncompromising Republican, ever loyal to the interests of his party and his community. Fraternally he was made a Mason in Chico, Cal., and is now a member of Corinthian Lodge, A. F. & A. M. He likewise belongs to the Albany Grange, which he has served as master. Mrs. Froman is a member of the Eastern Star Lodge.

ARTHUR L. SIMPSON. The importance of model laundry facilities in a thriving and growing community can hardly be over-estimated, and in Albany this want is fully met by the Magnolia Steam Laundry, which, through successive stages of growth, has advanced to a place among the substantial business enterprises of the town. The rise of this concern is synonymous with that of its owner and manager, A. L. Simpson, who is one of the most capable and promising of the younger generation of business men of this community, and who is deserving of great credit for his successful handling of a large opportunity. Born in New York City in 1875, Mr. Simpson is of Scotch-Irish descent, his paternal grandfather, Robert, having been born in the North of Ireland, whither had settled his forefathers in the days of Scotch religious persecution. Robert Simpson came to New York City at an early day, and there engaged for many years in the grocery business. His son, Robert G., born in New York City, and the father of A. L., learned the grocery business in his youth, but in after years served an apprenticeship to a ship carpenter, which trade he worked at for several years. About 1860 he removed to Blackhawk county, Iowa, where he farmed for a time, and then returned to New York City, remaining there until removing to Sibley, Iowa, in 1877. In the latter town he engaged in the laundry business, and in 1889 located in Albany, Ore., where his death occurred in 1900. He is survived by his wife, formerly Calista Ashby, a native of Ohio, and who was reared in Illinois, and who bore him nine children, five of whom are living, A. L. being the youngest in the family.

After coming to Albany, Ore., in 1889, A. L. Simpson attended the public schools and the Albany College, and thereafter learned telegraphy in the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad office at Summit. For a time he was with the old Oregon & Pacific Railroad, but gave up this position in 1894 to engage in the laundry business. The enterprise had been started by his mother in 1890, and was run as a hand laundry until 1899, when the business was greatly enlarged and fitted with steam, having the most modern and time-saving machinery. At the same time a large outside trade was undertaken, which at the present time has no equal in the county, and few in the valley. From twenty-five to thirty hands are required to carry on the business, work coming in from all along the line of the Corvallis & Eastern Railroad, from north and south on the Southern Pacific, and all over Linn county. Mr. Simpson became sole owner of the laundry in 1900, and the capacity of the laundry will be materially increased in the future as needed. The building is 30x60 feet ground dimensions and two stories high and, as heretofore stated, is most complete in all of its appointments.

In Polk county, Ore., Mr. Simpson was united in marriage with Altha Pillar, who was born in Canada, and of which union there have been born two children, Lowell and Muriel. Mrs. Simpson is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Simpson has an eminently social nature, and is a welcome visitor at various organizations in which the town abounds. He is a member of the Alco Club, and is fraternally connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World. In political preference he is a Republican. To a gratifying extent he enjoys the confidence of the business men of the town, and his sagacity and sound judgment have placed him on a par with the most ambitious and resourceful of its citizens.

VICTOR FINK, M. D. After years of successful medical and surgical practice in Illinois and Wisconsin, Dr. V. Fink came to Oregon in 1889, and in 1890 located on his present farm of one hundred and seventy-eight acres near Dallas. A more interesting and delightful home it were hard to find in Polk county, for diversified farming and extensive fruit growing affords to the cultured mind infinite possibilities for research, more especially when the work is carried on scientifically, with no thought save that of improvement over former methods. On this model farm twenty acres are in hops, eight acres in prunes. There are also olive and English walnut, chestnut and bearing fig trees, as well as acres of almost every known variety of grapes. One can imagine he has traveled across the mountains to California, especially when the sun is shining and the fruit is ripening under the glow of an ideal Oregon day. An appreciative and warm-hearted interest in the beautiful things of life dictates the establishment in this sometimes cold and desolate region, of a redeeming and enchanting occupation, near to the heart of nature.

Of scholarly and martial ancestry, Dr. Fink was born in the southern part of Prussia, Germany, October 23, 1838, his father, William, having been born in the same place April 15, 1797. The elder Fink was above all else military in his tendencies, and as a captain in the regular army was one of that hurrying band of men under Blucher, who saved the day for the English at the battle of Waterloo. For meritorious service in this history-making battle he was promoted, and thereafter served his country for a number of years, eventually returning to his father's farm in southern Prussia. He was forty-one years of age when he united his fortunes with another military family of Prussia, his wife, formerly Louiza von Bohlen, having been born in his neighborhood April 18, 1800, a granddaughter of Ferdinand von Bohlen, a personal friend of Frederick the Great, and a soldier under that great general in all of his important battles. His wife dying eight years after their marriage, leaving but one child, Victor Fink, William Fink moved to west Prussia, where he bought an enormous farm, of some twenty-four hundred acres, and also engaged in manufacturing pursuits. His forte, however, was in a military rather than civilian line, for he lost money continually, his manufacturing and farming enterprises netting him only bitter experience in return for large sums invested. A certain pathos surrounded his last years, during which he was dependent upon his pension for a livelihood, and his death in 1870, was clouded by dismal memories of financial defeat. As a soldier, however, he was unexcelled for bravery and courage, and it was as a follower of the Fatherland flag, on tented field and in the heat of battle, that those who loved him best like to recall him.

That keen desire for knowledge which is a characteristic of the well-born Teuton, was most vehemently felt by Dr. Fink, who, as an only child, had every opportunity which his father could place in his way. Having decided to devote his life to medicine he took a course of lectures at Leipzig, and thereafter practiced medicine for a short time, eventually entering the Homeopathic College Hospital at Cöthen, from which he was graduated in due time. Armed with this excellent training he came to America in 1865, locating at Belleville, Ill., where he practiced medicine four years. In April, 1869, he went to Watertown, Wis., and for seventeen years made that city his home, enjoying an extensive and paying practice throughout Jefferson county. In 1886 he went to California, and in Los Angeles county bought a ranch, to which he devoted himself for three years, laying aside the profession which his abilities had adorned, and to the advancement of which he had so largely contributed. As before stated, he came to Oregon in 1889, purchased his present farm, and has since made this his home. Ninety acres of his property are under cultivation, and are now managed by his sons, the doctor having long since retired from active life.

In Belleville, Ill., in 1867, Dr. Fink married Catherine Beck, who, like himself, was born in the southern part of Germany, October 30, 1847. Of the children born to the doctor and his wife, Mrs. Clara Gede lives in Portland; Arthur, who, for two years was deputy county assessor, and the only Democrat in the family, and Victor are both managing the home farm; and Mrs. Katie Hanson lives on an adjoining farm. The doctor is a Republican in politics, and in religion a Lutheran. During the years of his professional activity Dr. Fink contributed profound and painstaking articles to various medical periodicals, and is the author of the Homeopathic Selbstarzt, a work of large dimensions and widely read by German students of this particular school.

WILLIAM GELDARD. In looking upon the lives of great men—great in the achievement of wealth, position, or some far-reaching deed that leaves its impress upon the progress of civilization, the three visible forms of greatness in the eyes of the world,—we cannot but admire the personality of the man who has molded this personality through years of indefatigable toil, self-denial, and self-renunciation, with poverty and loneliness to fight, and no incentive toward it save the inherent greatness of the character, holding with dogged determination to the shadow of success until the substance could be his. It is true, the motive is selfish from one point of view; it is also true that a good man could have no higher ambition than to become an influential citizen, wealthy, since the dollar is the key to the actions of the majority of men; educated, since to learning a less number give precedence; upright, since the whole world unconsciously listens when the motive of a man is beyond question.

Such a character, in all seeming, is that of William Geldard, born in Yorkshire, England, November 2, 1832, of parents who also owed their birth to this locality. The father, Leonard, a stone-mason by trade, spent his entire life in Yorkshire, until his death, in his seventy-fourth year. Three children were born to Mr. Geldard and Elizabeth, his first wife, and after her death in 1834, he married again, rearing a family of eight children. After the death of his mother, William remained at home for six years, and at the age of eight years, the time when a child most needs the tender sympathy and care of a mother, he went out to seek work among the farmers of their immediate neighborhood. Perhaps his peculiarly friendless condition, at so youthful an age, won him kindly sympathy from those with whom he worked, thus unconsciously keeping his life bright, while it was certainly hard. With his living to make, there was no time to attend school, and all the education he received was through the Sunday-school of the Church of England.

In 1854, William, then a young man of twenty-two, bade adieu to the scenes of his childhood, and set sail for the western world, landing in New York City, after a stormy voyage of five weeks' duration, when at times it was a matter of doubt whether the ship would weather the gales and carry her fearful passengers into port. After a week spent in New York City, he took his way westward, wisely decided that he could expect the greater results from his work on the soil, since his early training had been entirely along these lines. When he reached Wisconsin he had $15 left of the little sum he had put by for this emigrating trip, and, friendless and alone, he stood in a strange land with only this small amount between him and possible trouble and illness, when he might be forced to depend on some kindly hand for help. Friendless and alone was true of him for many years, but never helpless, and he went to work at once in Grant county, Wis., being employed as a farm hand, in which capacity he proved invaluable to his employer. However, the latter soon lost him, for, imbued with the spirit of independence, he managed to get enough land on which to begin farming for himself. From this time on his progress was steadily and perceptibly upward, and when, twenty years after, he came to Oregon, his roughest battles had been fought and won, and he could not claim his rise here from a $15 valuation.

After looking about him, he decided to locate permanently in the Sunset state, so he purchased a farm near Carlton, Yamhill county, where he now makes his home. Originally, there were four hundred and eighty-two acres in the place, but he has now increased his landed property to eight hundred and forty-eight acres, seven hundred being in active cultivation, about nine acres used in the cultivation of hops, the remainder being devoted to stock-raising and general farming. Among his many up-to-date farming implements he numbers a complete threshing outfit. Mr. Geldard's farm is one of the finest in Yamhill county, and all the improvements in the line of buildings, etc., are evidence of his good taste and judgment, the surroundings, in addition to their natural beauty, receiving much from the care and attention lavished upon them. It is his intention, however, to retire from the active duties of life, and make his future home in McMinnville, where he has purchased a house and four lots.

Mr. Geldard has made himself an honored member of the community, and a prominent citizen, and though not desirous of political honors, he still does not refuse the duties offered him through Republican influence, that being the party whose principles he upholds. He has served as road supervisor and school director for a number of years, taking much interest in educational matters, as he realizes the advantages accruing from that foundation for a life's work. Through his wide reading and close application, he has gained the education and information he lacked the opportunity of securing in his youth. In 1862, Mr. Geldard and Mrs. Mary Hutchcroft were united in marriage, twelve children blessing this union, of whom the following are living: John, of Sumpter, Ore.; Alice, Mrs. E. G. Freeman, of Santa Monica, Cal.; and Esther and Emma, who make their home with their father and mother. James Hutchcroft, a son by Mrs. Geldard's former marriage, also resides at home. As if in gracious memory of the land of his birth, Mr. Geldard still clings to the tenets of the Church of England, having also another link to his early life in the presence of his sister, Mrs. James Fletcher, who lives in McMinnville, Ore.

HON. WILLIAM WALDO, who is now superintending his property interests, including both city and farm real estate, and makes his home in Salem, is one of the honored pioneers of this portion of the country. He has also been active in moulding the affairs of the state and the impress of his individuality is to be seen upon its legislative records. He was born in Gasconade county, Mo., on April 22, 1832, a son of Daniel Waldo and a grandson of Jedediah Waldo, both of whom were natives of Virginia and descendants from the old and distinguished Waldo family, of Connecticut. The grandfather was a Virginia planter, and spent his entire life in the Old Dominion. Daniel Waldo removed from Virginia to Gasconade county, Mo., where he was engaged in the operation of a saw-mill and the manufacture of lumber. Later he went to St. Clair county, Mo., where he carried on farming. In 1843 he crossed the plains to the Pacific coast. The Applegate family, neighbors in Missouri, accompanied the Waldo family to the west, and they journeyed with the first wagon train that made the overland trip to The Dalles and the Willamette valley.

On reaching his destination Daniel Waldo secured a donation claim, ten miles east of Salem, comprising six hundred and forty acres. Here he carried on general farming, and to his first purchase he added until the place comprised one thousand acres. It is now the property of one of his sons. After a time the father left the farm and took up his abode in Salem, where he became a stockholder and officer in the company that established the first woolen mills ever built on the Pacific coast. He was interested in that enterprise until the business was discontinued. In matters pertaining to general progress and to the substantial upbuilding of this portion of the country he was always found alert and enterprising, doing much for the general good in this way. He gave his political support first to the Whig party, and afterward to the Republican party. He died in 1880, when eighty-one years of age. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Melinda Lunsford, was born in Kentucky and died in Salem in 1885, when about eighty-two years of age.

The family of this worthy couple numbered seven children: David, who died in California; Mrs. Narcissa Brown, who died in Salem; William; Averilla, who became Mrs. Bass and died in Salem; Mrs. Mary Logan; John B., who resides on the old home farm, and Ann J., who passed away a number of years ago.

Hon. William Waldo spent his early youth in St. Clair county, Mo., and was only eleven years of age when the family came to the northwest. Though but a boy he rode a horse and assisted in driving the stock. The party left Missouri in the latter part of April, 1843, proceeded up the Platte river, continuing on by way of Fort Hall and Sweetwater, crossing the divide and afterward fording Greene river. In October, after long and weary months of travel, they arrived at The Dalles. The elder Waldo and his sons took the stock through to Vancouver, where they crossed the Columbia river. To get the stock across the river it was necessary to transport them in bateaux, owned by the Hudson Bay Company, an operation requiring nine days. From there they continued on to Marion county, arriving here in the latter part of November, 1843. The first home of the family was a little log cabin, and that winter the father and sons put in a crop of wheat. There were no schools here for some years, and a teacher was employed in the Waldo home in order to instruct the children, until at length a public school was opened in one of the pioneer log buildings of this locality. Our subject was also a student in the old Salem Institute for one winter. Through a varied experience, reading, observation and contact with the world, he has become a well-informed man of broad and practical knowledge. He remained at home until sixteen years of age, and then, in 1848, joined a company under Captain Pugh and Colonel Waters for service against the Cayuse Indians. When the red men had been subdued and the company returned home Mr. Waldo at once started for the gold mines of California, journeying overland with pack animals. He engaged in mining upon the Feather river for a time, and afterward around the Moquelumne river, and in 1849 he returned by way of the sea to Oregon. He was then actively engaged in work upon the home farm until 1850, when he made a second journey across the country to California, where, for some time, he engaged in business, being located at Yreka until 1852. In that year he once more came to Oregon, and then returned to his old home in Missouri, by way of the Nicaragua route and New Orleans. He remained through the winter in Missouri, during which time he collected a herd of cattle of over three hundred head, including some cows and heifers, and these he drove across the plains in the spring of 1853, making up a train which made the journey in four months. At length, reaching the Willamette valley, Mr. Waldo was engaged in the cattle business and in farming.

Many times has our subject crossed and re-crossed the plains, first in the primitive manner of early travel, and later in the enjoyment of all the comforts afforded by the palace cars of the present day. In 1855 he took the Panama route to Missouri, where he remained until 1856, and in that year continued his education as a student in the University of Missouri at Columbia. In the latter year he retraced his steps to Oregon, coming by way of the Panama route, and in the same way he again went to Missouri in 1859, spending the winter at Kansas City. In 1860 he made another trip across the plains by way of Salt Lake, driving a pair of mules and an ambulance to California. It was impossible to come over the Oregon trail that year on account of the hostility of the northern Indians. He started on that trip in early April, and on July 4 reached the Sacramento valley, having been less than three months upon the way. He drove on an average of over twenty miles a day, and most of the way he was alone. Upon reaching Salt Lake City, he stopped for three days for rest and for the repair of his outfit. While there he was treated with great consideration and courtesy by the Mormon settlers, and has never forgotten the kindness they showed him. From Sacramento he continued northward until he arrived at home. Here he once more devoted his energies to the cattle industry until 1869, when he once more started out upon his travels, this time going by way of the Panama route to Independence, Mo., in order to superintend his uncle's affairs. In 1870 he returned to Oregon by way of the Isthmus. His next trip was made in the interest of the old Woolen Mills Company, for which he went to Australia, that company owning a flouring mill and wishing him to investigate as to whether Australia afforded a market that would make the business of shipping flour to that country profitable. He sailed from Portland late in the year 1870, and after eighty days, arrived in Sidney, where he spent a month. On the same vessel he then returned to Honolulu, and from there made his way by steamer to San Francisco, at length arriving at Salem, where he reported unfavorably upon the market of Australia, for he found that that was a fine wheat country and that there was no need of shipping flour to that locality. For some time Mr. Waldo continued his connection with the milling interests of Salem. More recently he has been interested in farming and in the supervision of his other property interests. He owns two blocks in the city of Salem and his farm property is likewise valuable. His investments were judiciously placed in an early day, and with the rapid growth of the country his land has become very valuable. About every four or five years Mr. Waldo returns to the east, and keeps in constant touch with the different portions of the country; but he feels that there is no better place for residence, nor no district offering better business opportunities than are to be found in the northwest.

Upon questions of national policy Mr. Waldo is a stalwart Republican, and his fitness for leadership, his loyalty in citizenship and his marked ability have led to his selection for various official honors. In 1882 he was chosen to represent his district in the state senate, and was re-elected in 1884. In 1885 he was chosen president of the senate, and while a member of the upper house of the Oregon legislature he aided in electing J. N. Dolph to the United States senate. He has since served one term as a member of the legislature, during which he was instrumental in securing the establishment of the state insane asylum at Salem. He has been a close and earnest student of the conditions of the northwest, of its possibilities and its interests, and whether in or out of office he has labored effectively for the material development of this section of the country and for the interests of the state. Socially he is connected with Salem Lodge and the encampment of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; in the former is a past noble grand, and in the latter a past chief patriarch. A man of great natural ability, his success in business has been uniform and rapid. His lifework has brought him into close connection with the west and with its history. There are few men now living in Salem who can claim residence here for a period of sixty years, and Mr. Waldo well deserves to be numbered among the honored pioneers whose efforts have laid the foundation for the present prosperity and progress of Oregon. In whatever relations of life we find him, in the public service, in political circles, in business or in social relations, he is always the same honorable and honored gentleman, and his worth well merits the high regard which is uniformly given him.

A. G. PERKINS. From a Revolutionary ancestry A. G. Perkins inherits the stable traits of character which are so well appreciated by his fellow townsmen in Marion county. He was born in Bangor, Me., June 16, 1831, and is a son of Nathaniel and Olive (Patton) Perkins, both natives of Maine, the former born in Oldtown in 1804. They lived on a farm in Maine, and there reared their nine children, the father dying at the age of seventy-eight, and the mother at the age of seventy-five. The ancestors on both sides of the family were Universalists.

Ordinary educational facilities were at the disposal of A. G. Perkins, and at a comparatively early age he proved that he possessed both studious and industrious characteristics. At the age of twenty-two he removed from his home in Maine to Minnesota, where he engaged in the lumber business, and lived until 1860. Having outfitted for crossing the plains he tarried in Colorado for a couple of years, and there mined and prospected, but, not realizing his expectations, he again started west with ox teams, eventually arriving in Baker City, Ore., where he mined with varying success until the spring of 1863. Upon the discovery of gold at Boise City, Mr. Perkins endeavored to make a fortune in Idaho, and after nearly two years of experiment located in Salem, Marion county, Ore., in 1864. Shortly after his arrival he purchased the old Lewis Pettijohn claim, twelve miles south of Salem, and hither brought his wife, formerly Hannah Barcaw, whom he had married in February, 1863. The young people located on a farm south of Salem, and in 1871 bought a farm of five hundred acres six miles north of Salem, where they lived until purchasing a farm adjoining their present home, six miles north of Salem, on the old Salem and Oregon City road.

The present Perkins home was purchased in 1892, and consists of four hundred acres, all in one body. Mr. Perkins is a practical and enterprising farmer, and all manner of modern improvements are to be found on his property. He is engaged in farming, principally making a specialty of Jersey cattle and Cotswold sheep. Mr. Perkins is a Republican in politics, but he has never cared to work for or hold public office. In his family have been born thirteen children, of whom the first six, Thomas, Ada, Ella, Willard W., Julia, and Vina, as well as the eighth, Clyde, are deceased, while Edna is the wife of Elton Shaw, of Salem; Iva is the wife of Elam Shaw, of Salem, and Ray and Rex, twins, and Floyd and Alonzo, are living at home. For several years the family has lived in the town of Salem, the object being to give the children better educational advantages. Mr. Perkins is one of the most substantial and honored farmers of Marion County, his approachable and genial nature, and thoroughly reliable business methods, commanding the lasting regard of all who know him.

JOHN ELLIS. The sojourner in Polk county, and more especially around Dallas, hears innumerable kindly expressions of opinion in regard to Uncle John Ellis, who was one of the most highly honored residents of Dallas. The capacity to permanently ingratiate himself in the hearts of many friends and well-wishers denoted personal characteristics of an enviable nature.

This interesting pioneer of 1865 was born in Vermilion county, Ill., March 7, 1829, and is the fourth of the ten children born to Wright and Sarah (Williams) Ellis. Wright Ellis was born in east Tennessee, and came to Illinois with his father, Shubal, also a native of Tennessee, who settled first in Ohio. The Ellis farm, ten miles south of Danville, Vermilion county, Ill., continued to be the home of Wright Ellis up to the time of his death, and here the ten children were reared and educated in the little pioneer subscription school near the old homestead. Illinois at that time was in a very primitive state of development, yet the family made the most of their opportunities, and continued to live on the homestead for several years after the death of the father. John Ellis was sixteen years old when he removed with his mother and the rest of the children to Iowa in 1845, settling in Dallas county, where they lived on a farm for twenty years. Here the mother died, and here John married in October, 1850, Julia Ann Stump, who was born in Indiana, and who bore him five children in Iowa.

With his little family Mr. Ellis started across the plains in May, 1865, there being one hundred wagons in the train. He outfitted with horse teams, and arrived in Oregon October 1, 1865, without any untoward incident marring a successful and uneventful journey. The first winter was spent in Sheridan, where they remained one year, when Mr. Ellis engaged in farming in Polk county for two years. He then went to Lake county, southeast Oregon, returning the following year to Polk county. Here he engaged in farming on eighty-two acres of land adjacent to the town of Dallas, until his death, July 5, 1903. He left a well-improved and profitable property, and his home, in which he spent his declining years, was renowned for its hospitality and good-fellowship. Mr. Ellis was engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and experienced success in the greater part of his undertakings. No more familiar figure was seen on the highways, at political gatherings, or in the meeting places of Dallas than that of Uncle John, for whom everyone had a kindly smile in recognition of his pleasing nature, and goodness of heart. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, of whom Sarah J. died near Dallas; Mary Ann is the wife of William Bogue, of Corvallis; Martha E. is now Mrs. H. Plummer; William is a farmer near Falls City; Marquis lives in Dallas and owns the electric light plant; Philander died in New Mexico, and Leander, of Roseburg, is an engineer for the Southern Pacific Company.

JAMES OSCAR BEARDSLEY. No name in Marion county is more indicative of the best that can be accomplished in general farming, stock-raising and fruit and hop culture, than that of J. O. Beardsley, who owns and operates a farm of four hundred and eighty-eight acres. Mr. Beardsley is a descendant of forefathers who were successful farmers in Ohio. He was born in Gallia county, Ohio, January 14, 1852, and was one of a large family of children. His mother, Harriett Evaline Cassel, died at the age of thirty-five years, when James O. was but five weeks old. His father, Henry Judson Beardsley, combined farming with steamboating on the Ohio river, and was captain on a merchandise craft, and also owned interests in other boats. He lived on the old home place in Ohio, enjoying a well-earned rest until his death, at the age of eighty-two years, March 30, 1903. Notwithstanding his advanced age, he was in full possession of all his faculties up to time of his death.

Until his twenty-second year J. O. Beardsley worked on the home farm in Ohio. In the meantime he acquired his education in the public schools and at the Gallipolis Academy. Following a prearranged plan, he came to Oregon in 1875, arriving June 6. Having but little money, he began work as a farm hand in Marion county, but soon after was enabled to rent a place on shares, and was so successful that after three years he was able to buy a small farm in the Missions Bottoms, where he lived and prospered until 1886.

In the meantime, in 1878, he married Miss Emma Gorsline, who was born August 8, 1853, a native of New York state; she has borne him six children, the order of their birth being as follows: Effie A., Walter W., Mary A., Arthur F., Elmer O., and Harry J. Of these, Walter, who married Miss Alice Potter, of Malvern, Iowa, is engaged independently in farming in Marion county. The others reside at home.

In 1886 Mr. Beardsley came to his present farm, which was partially improved, though merely incidental to the more extensive arrangements of the present owner. He has a well-appointed home, up-to-date outbuildings, and two Allen fruit-driers, each having a capacity of two hundred bushels for each drying of twenty-four hours. Twenty-five acres of this land is devoted to prune culture, and sixteen acres to hops. During the year 1902 he raised twenty-one hundred pounds of hops. Of this farm, four hundred acres are under cultivation, the balance being devoted to stock-raising, making a specialty of Durham cattle and Poland-China hogs.

In politics Mr. Beardsley is a Republican, and has taken an active interest in local affairs. He has always warmly advocated advanced ideas in the education of the youth of the land, and has served for many years on the local school board. He has also devoted considerable of his time to the duties of the office of road supervisor. Aside from these, he has never been an aspirant for political office, though frequently besought by his friends to allow his name to be presented before the conventions of his party. He is a member of and liberal contributor to the support of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Beardsley is highly esteemed by his numerous friends for his devotion to the highest interests of the community, for he has exhibited an unselfish and broad-minded spirit in his participation in all movements calculated to advance the public welfare. He is recognized as a man possessing fine business qualifications, and his integrity has never been brought into question, even by those who have had occasion to differ radically from him as to the ways and means to be adopted toward the common end sought.

DANIEL P. STOUFFER, city auditor and police judge of Dallas since 1892, and also engaged in the insurance and real estate business, is a native son of Oregon and was born near Ballston, Polk county, January 20, 1856. His father, Hon. Jonathan Stouffer, was born in Chambersburg, Pa., and in his youth learned the blacksmith trade. As a young man, he removed to Indiana, and the next year, in 1851, came to Oregon as driver of an ox team for James McCain. Arriving in LaFayette he worked at his trade for a year, and then married Agnes McCain, a native of Indiana, a daughter of James McCain and sister of James McCain, ex-district attorney, whose sketch appears in another part of this volume. After his marriage Mr. Stouffer settled on a claim of one hundred and sixty acres near Ballston, which he improved, and upon which he built his home. His wife died in 1861, when her son, Daniel, was five years of age. Mr. Stouffer entered the government employ as head agriculturist for the Indian reservation at Grande Ronde Agency, and after many years thus spent, retired to his farm near Ballston. His death occurred November 30, 1902, at the age of seventy-seven years and six months. He was a man of leading characteristics, and as a staunch upholder of Republicanism served as county judge from 1888 until 1892, and a member of the legislature in 1866. Fraternally he was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in religion was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The only one living of the three children born to his parents, Daniel P. Stouffer was reared in Polk and Yamhill counties, living for the greater part with his uncle and grandfather. After completing the course at the district schools he entered Willamette University in 1874, and was graduated therefrom in 1878, with the degree of A. B. His preliminary professional training was acquired under the law firm of Boise & Stratton, during the university course, but just before his admission to the bar he was taken ill, and was obliged to repair to the country in order to regain his health. In order to derive the benefits of outdoor exercise he purchased a farm of two hundred and forty-three acres, adjoining that of his father, and for fifteen years engaged with fair success in farming and stock-raising. During all these years he was justice of the peace, and on many occasions acted as mediator in the disputes that arose between his agricultural neighbors.

In 1889 Mr. Stouffer moved into Dallas and engaged in insurance and real estate, and in 1892 was elected city auditor and police judge, to which combined offices he has since been continuously re-elected every two years. He is also ex-officio city clerk, and at the same time continues to deal in insurance and real estate. As a relaxation from political and business problems Mr. Stouffer still retains an interest in his farm, which he has increased to five hundred and seventy-four acres, four hundred of which consists of tillable land. This farm is admirably situated and well watered from springs, and fifteen acres are devoted to the culture of prunes.

In Polk county Mr. Stouffer was united in marriage with Ella Richter, who was born in Indiana, and came to Oregon with her parents in 1871, her father being Christian Richter, of whom mention is made in the sketch of Johnson E. Richter. Lina Stouffer, the only child in the family, is a graduate of the Dallas College. With his wife Mr. Stouffer is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is president of the board of trustees, and ex-superintendent of the Sunday school. He is one of the Native Sons of Oregon, and in political affiliation is identified with the Republican party.

HON. JOHN JAY DALY. The passing of Hon. John Jay Daly, at the age of fifty-six years, closed the career of a brilliant lawyer and capable man of affairs. Judge Daly occupied an altogether unique position among the men who have been identified with the jurisprudence of Polk county, not only because of special natural gifts, but because it was his good fortune to start out in life under particularly auspicious circumstances. Of Irish descent, he was born in Rochester, N. Y., in March, 1846, a son of Michael and Jane Daly, and brother of Charles H. Jay Daly, a prominent physician of New York City. As a youth, Judge Daly was reared in an atmosphere of culture and refinement, his family being one of the most prominent in the state of New York. His early environment was reflected in his mature years, and found expression in an elegance of manner altogether charming, and a courtesy, tact, and consideration which made him the most delightful of friends and companions.

After graduating from the classical course of St. John's Catholic College, Fordham, a suburb of New York City, Judge Daly read law, and was finally admitted to the New York bar.

With the clear-sighted intuition which was one of his strongest points, he decided on settling in the west, and arrived in Polk county, Ore., in 1870. After engaging in school teaching for a couple of years in Buena Vista, he came to Dallas and opened a law office, and so intelligently and persistently applied himself to his profession that his early and subsequent success was a logical resultant. He soon became interested in politics, and as a staunch defender of Democracy represented Polk county in the lower house of the Oregon legislature in 1885, and in 1892 was a delegate to the national Democratic convention held in Chicago. In 1894 he was nominated for circuit judge of the Third Judicial district, but was defeated by his opponent on the Republican ticket, Hon. H. H. Hewitt, of Albany.

In the practice of his profession Judge Daly found his broad general knowledge, his capacity for reading character, and his marvelous faculties of enormous benefit. He was recognized as a strong advocate and strenuous fighter, guarding well the interests of his client at every point, and quick to seize and persistent in holding the point of vantage. A line of attack or defense, as the case required, once laid down, the correctness of his position became a conviction, and naught swerved him from his position. Nevertheless, generosity often characterized his attitude towards his opponent, and he was ever ready to grant such concessions as proved non-injurious to his client. For years he was attorney for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and also for many years attended to the legal complications of the old Scotch Company.

The plan of fraternal life insurance received substantial support from Judge Daly, and at the time of his death he held membership in three different organizations. As one of the chief upbuilders of the Ancient Order of United Workmen in the northwest, he served as grand master workman for the jurisdiction of Oregon, Washington and British Columbia from 1890 until 1891, inclusive, and during the latter year delivered before the lodge at Victoria, B. C., one of the most scholarly and brilliant addresses on the work of fraternal insurance ever heard in the west. For many years he was a member of the judiciary committee of the Oregon Grand Lodge, and in 1892 was a delegate to the Supreme Lodge of Helena, Mont., and in '93 to Toronto, Ontario.

Judge Daly possessed an optimistic and delightful personality. The doing of a favor, or the lending of a helping hand to friend or stranger was spontaneous, and seemed never to be recalled by him. A competence rewarded his well applied energy, but money he regarded as the means to an end, and that end the bettering of the conditions by which he was surrounded. Like many strong and highly polished natures, Judge Daly was eccentric, but the study of these peculiarities rendered him the more interesting, and never interfered with the balance and splendid equipoise of the man. This learned judge is enrolled among the students of legal science who have reflected dignity and brilliancy upon the professional history of Oregon, and his death is regretted by hundreds who knew, loved and admired him.

In Salem, Ore., in 1878, Judge Daly married Phya Burns, who was born near Dallas, Polk county, and was educated at the Notre Dame Convent in Salem and at San Jose, Cal. The family claims kinship with Robert Burns, the poet, after whom the paternal grandfather was named. The grandfather was the emigrating ancestor, coming from Scotland with his wife and children, settling presumably in Lexington, Ky. Here was born William Burns, the father of Mrs. Daly, who removed to Tazewell county, Ill., at an early day, and, crossing the plains in 1848, took up a donation claim near Bridgeport, Polk county, Ore. In 1849 he took advantage of the gold excitement and crossed the mountains into California, after which he returned to Illinois, settled up his business affairs and returned to Oregon again in 1853. The donation claim of six hundred and forty acres is still in the family, and is owned by his three children. He was extensively engaged in stock-raising, both in Polk county and in eastern Oregon, and at the time of his death, while on a trip to California, in 1877, was the possessor of a large and valuable estate. He was a Republican in politics, and a member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife, Rachel (Ford) Burns, who was born in Illinois, and died in Oregon at the age of sixty, was the mother of eleven children, six of whom attained maturity, Mrs. Daly being the youngest. The oldest son, Robert, died in the mines of California; John died on his farm in Polk county; William is a farmer in Polk county; James is a farmer near Dallas, and Rachel is the wife of Mr. B. F. Smith, of Lewisville, Polk county.

Mrs. Daly is one of the popular and well known women of Dallas, and has one of the most attractive homes in the little city, surrounded by beautiful grounds in which flowers, trees and shrubs abound. Her share of the old donation claim is three hundred acres, which is under a fine state of cultivation, about seventy acres being devoted to hops. This farm is watered by the Little Luckiamute river, and is equipped with all modern improvements. Mrs. Daly is a member of the Shakespeare Club, and in political preference is a Republican. Her son, L. F., is a graduate of Mount Angel College, class of 1901.

HENRY C. PORTER. Closely allied with the pioneer touch that has shaped the current of events in Oregon is Henry C. Porter, whose father gave no little of a worthy life to the development of the natural resources of this great state, linking with these the influences of a citizenship of intelligence and high integrity. The family traces its lineage back to the state of Virginia, the grandfather, David Porter, having been born in that state March 8, 1780, and emigrating from there to Tennessee. He was married at the time of his emigration from his native state, and was accompanied upon the trip by his wife and three children, Mary Rebecca, Alexander and Robert. In 1812 he took his family into Missouri, locating at Licking, having passed the preceding three years in Kennedy Fort, to which he had been driven by the depredations of the Indians.

William Porter, the father of Henry C., was born in Missouri, December 14, 1812, one of a family of ten children. He passed the years of childhood on the paternal farm. Feeling that he could not be satisfied with the education obtainable in the district schools of his native state he left home at the age of eighteen years, and going to Jacksonville, Ill., entered the college at that place, where he remained four years. His first intention had been to study medicine, but abandoning the idea he entered upon the more congenial life of teaching, the scene of his early labors being Pike county, Ill., where he remained until 1846, a decade of his life being passed among these surroundings. In 1840 he married Miss Sarah Coffey, a native of Pike county, and with a wife no less courageous than himself, he ventured in the spring of 1848 to set out on the journey with the great northwest for its termination. After six months of travel with ox-teams Oregon was reached by the emigrants. In the spring of 1849 they left Aumsville, Marion county, where they had passed the preceding winter, and Mr. Porter took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres located two and one-half miles southeast of Aumsville. Upon this farm a little log cabin was erected to shelter the pioneer family, and nothing daunted by the years of toil and hardships which he knew must lie between this humble beginning and the success which he hoped to win, he gave the strength of his manhood to the task of cultivating the broad acres. And not only in his personal plans has Mr. Porter met with success, but in the public affairs of his adopted state he was ever found ready to lend his best efforts toward any movement that had for its end the upbuilding of the common welfare, being actively interested in the early days of his community in the laying out of roads and the organization of schools, serving as teacher in the latter for many years. In the first legislative body of Oregon, the date of assembling being July, 1849, it was the distinction of Mr. Porter to serve as chief clerk, later being elected to the state legislature, where he remained one term. For four years he served as assessor of Marion county, and as county commissioner for one term. His political offices were held through the influences of the Republican party, of which he was a staunch adherent. Religiously, Mr. Porter was a member of the Christian Church. His death, which occurred March 30, 1899, was a source of regret to the entire community.

Mr. Porter had been twice married, his first wife having died of mountain fever soon after their arrival in Oregon. In 1849 he married her sister, Martha Coffey. The children of the first marriage are as follows: William G., who served three years in Company B, of the First Oregon Cavalry, the first stationed on the frontier, and whose death occurred in January, 1880, on his farm, one and one-half miles east of Turner; Nancy E., the wife of C. K. Reed, now located on the old homestead; John H., a farmer at the state penitentiary; and Sydney R., of Kent, Sherman county. Three children were born of the second union, of whom Henry C. is the subject of this sketch; Sarah L. died in 1892; and Mary J. is the wife of Henry C. Von Behren, living near Aumsville. Mrs. Martha C. Porter died May 17, 1903, in her ninetyeth year.

Upon the donation claim linked to the Porter name through long years of association Henry C. Porter was born November 24, 1850, and there he grew to manhood, receiving his early education in the district school in the vicinity of his home. Upon attaining manhood he married Miss Minnie F. Welch, a native of Ontario, Canada, born in 1858, who came to Oregon with her grandfather, J. T. Welch, in 1869. In 1880 Mr. Porter built the house which he now occupies, part of his farm being formerly owned by T. C. Coffey, who took up a donation claim in 1852. The father of the Coffey family was born in North Carolina, in 1790, and with his family of eight children came to Oregon at the same time that Mr. Porter's father made the trip, and took up land in this vicinity. Mr. Porter now owns three hundred and twenty acres, upon which he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, being principally interested in Hereford cattle. The location is two miles from Aumsville. Mr. and Mrs. Porter have one child,

PETER FELLER.

Minnie Maude, who is the wife of Otto G. Weaver, of Berlin, Linn county.

In various ways Mr. Porter has served the public, having been justice of the peace for eight years, and also notary public for some time. Fraternally he is associated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, being a member of Aunsville Lodge No. 90. He is a devoted member of the Christian Church, in the Sunday school of which he has served for twenty years as superintendent, a striking example of faithfulness to duty. He is supported in his religious affiliation by his wife and daughter, both of whom are members of the same church.

PETER FELLER. In 1847 there came from the province of Lorraine, where he was born March 6, 1822, a pioneer of Oregon who was destined materially to promote the agricultural prestige of the state, and to maintain a type of citizenship as useful as it is influential and worthy. This ocean voyage from Europe was accomplished in a sailing vessel which was delayed by storms and calms, and which put into the port of New Orleans sixty-two days after embarking from the other side. With his few worldly possessions Peter Feller, then twenty-five years of age, took another boat up the Mississippi river, eventually arriving at Galena, Ill., where he found employment on farms in the neighborhood of the town. Among the fellow passengers on the incoming vessel was a bright and attractive German girl by the name of Anna Notum, also a native of Lorraine, and from subsequent events it would seem that they became very warm friends before the vessel arrived in port, for they were married the following year, August 1, 1848, and thus an orphan girl found a home, and a stranger in a strange land a helpmate. Three children were born to the couple in Illinois: John; Barbara, deceased; and Peter. As time passed fortune favored them moderately, leaving them at least contented minds and bright hopes for the future.

In 1853 Mr. Feller, alert for greater opportunities than he found in Illinois, embraced the opportunity to drive some ox-teams across the plains in return for board and accommodations. After five months of experience more or less interesting, he arrived in Oregon City, where he looked around for a suitable permanent location, and where, in the meantime, he drove dray wagons as a means of support. Later he came to Butteville, and worked at various occupations, in 1857 returning to Illinois, to the wife and children who awaited him with so much anxiety. In May, 1857, he returned to Oregon with his family by way of Panama, and settled for a time near Butteville, soon after purchasing fifty acres of land upon which the present home now stands, and of which fifteen acres had been cleared. Other improvements consisted of a log stable and frame house, and in the latter the family lived for many years, although there was but one room for all purposes.

At the time of his death, October 2, 1896, Mr. Feller had transformed his crude possessions into a splendidly improved farm, with modern buildings and all manner of agricultural implements. At the last he owned four hundred acres, having added to his original purchase on several occasions. Advantageously located on the renowned French Prairie, he engaged for years in general farming and stock-raising, and in the meantime took a keen interest in developing the conditions by which he was surrounded. He was a member of the Catholic Church, as is all his family, and he held various local offices, among them that of school director. Of the eight children born to himself and wife two, Barbara and Francis, died in infancy; John is a carpenter of Woodburn; Peter, Jr., farmed with his father until his death, and then assumed complete control of the property; he was married February 6, 1898, to Christina Haag, and four children have been born into his family: Mabel E.; Lillian M.; Lucille J., deceased; and Harley Laverne. Of the other children, Mary is the wife of J. J. Ryan of Butteville; Annie is the wife of John Whitney, residing near Woodburn; Clara is the wife of George W. Case, residing near Champoeg; Lizzie is the wife of D. H. Bomhoff, a merchant of Woodburn; she had a daughter, Mabel Edith, by her first husband, Charles Scheurer; and Annie, Grace and Harry by her second marriage. Peter Feller, Jr., owns eighty-two acres of land near Hubbard, and in addition to general farming has ten acres under hops.

JOHN McCHESENEY. Many of the finest residences and public buildings in Albany owe their construction to the skill of John McCchesney, who, previous to locating here in 1888 had acquired extensive experience along general building lines. This prominent and successful member of a thriving community was born in Ontario, Canada, where had settled his father, Hugh, and his mother, Hannah (Dole) McCchesney, upon their arrival from their native Scotland. From Canada the father moved to Moorehead, Minn., and later to Tacoma, Wash., where he died at the age of eighty-six. He was survived by his wife, who came to Oregon and spent the remainder of her life with her son, John.

The sixth oldest of the nine children in his father's family, and the only one in Oregon, John McChesney was born November 17, 1853, and was primarily educated in the Canadian public schools. He was twenty years of age when he learned the carpenter's trade, and in 1873 removed to Detroit, Mich., where he worked for a time at carriage making. At Fargo, N. Dak., he engaged in a blacksmith and carriage making business with his brother, but afterward sold out and removed to Grand Forks, Dak., where he manufactured and contracted for brick. As before stated, he came to Albany in 1888, and has since made himself a necessary adjunct to the prosperity of the town. In all of its departments Mr. McChesney has a comprehensive understanding of his chosen occupation, and that it is the work for which he is particularly fitted, and which he finds most congenial, is undoubtedly the secret of his success. He has a correct appreciation of the substantial and lasting, as well as artistic and pleasing, and with almost no exceptions his work has been satisfactory in all of its details.

In Albany Mr. McChesney married Nancy Candis Conn, a native of Indiana, and sister of Perry Conn. Two children have been born of this union, Arthur Carmine and Esther May. As a Republican Mr. McChesney has been prominently before the public on various occasions. In religion he is a member and steward of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The most desirable traits of the typical northwestern business man are embodied in Mr. McChesney, among which are enthusiasm for and active participation in all undertakings which have for their object the uplifting and development of his adopted community.

JUDGE HIRAM M. PALMER. Entering upon his responsible duties as county judge of Linn county with a sincere desire to perform the obligations of his office to the satisfaction of his supporters and the general public, Judge Palmer of Albany has proved himself eminently worthy of the trust reposed in him, and has served the people with ability and fidelity. Practical, progressive and whole-hearted, he is an esteemed and popular citizen, and since becoming a resident of this section of the state has contributed his full share towards advancing its educational, political and agricultural interests. A son of A. F. Palmer, he was born near Batavia, Genesee county, N. Y., in 1849. He is a descendant of one of the early families of western New York, where his paternal grandfather, James Palmer,

Educated for the bar, A. F. Palmer practiced law as a young man, but was afterwards engaged in agricultural pursuits in Genesee county, N. Y., until 1853, when he removed to Iowa. Locating near the present site of the town of Malcom, he purchased land, and was there successfully engaged in general farming until his retirement in 1895, and is now seventy-eight years of age. He married Sarah J. Milliman. She was born in Tompkins county, N. Y., which was also the birthplace of her husband, being the daughter of Hiram Milliman, who removed from the Empire state to Ohio, and there spent his last years. Of the nine children born of their union, four sons and four daughters are living.

The oldest child of the parental household, H. M. Palmer obtained his elementary education in the district schools, afterwards completing a course of study at Grinnell College, in Iowa. Choosing for himself the independent occupation to which he had been reared, he took up a homestead and a tree claim, near Hastings, Adams county, Neb., in 1873, and subsequently added to his acreage by the purchase of railroad land until he became the owner of four hundred and eighty acres, which he devoted to general farming and stock-raising. Disposing of his Nebraska property in 1891, Mr. Palmer came with his family to Oregon, locating near Albany, Linn county. Purchasing two hundred acres of land about four and one-half miles southwest of Albany, he has since carried on a successful business as a stock-raiser and dairyman, and has met with satisfactory results as a fruit-grower, having about twenty-five acres of his ranch devoted to the culture of prunes.

Taking a warm interest in the affairs of his adopted state and county, Mr. Palmer represented his district in the state legislature during the special session of 1898 and the regular session of 1899, rendering excellent service. As one of the committee of five appointed by the legislature of 1898 to revise the new school laws, he did much to advance the cause of education in this state. He was also active in trying to pass better and more stringent game laws, and although not successful at that time, the more important parts of the bill which he championed are incorporated in the present game laws of Oregon. Declining a re-election, he was nominated by the Fusionists for county judge, in 1900, and was elected by a majority of six hundred votes, running far ahead of his ticket, his term of office being for four years. Judge Palmer has since resided in Albany, among its residents attaining to a place of prominence.

Judge Palmer married, in Iowa, Miss Electa

Lewis, a native of Illinois, and they are the parents of six children, namely: Leslie M.; Mrs. Flora E. Small, of Albany; Mrs. Lola R. Junkin, of Albany; Mrs. Nevada Alice Medin, also of Albany; Arthur L.; and Jay B. In politics Judge Palmer was a Republican until after the election of Garfield in 1880, but has since been identified with the Democratic party. He is an influential member of the local Grange, and is ex-president of the district council. Belonging to the Presbyterian Church, the judge is ruling elder, and was for eight years superintendent of the Sunday school in Riverside district.

PETER C. ANDERSEN. Engaged in the lucrative business of blacksmithing and horse-shoeing, of the latter making a specialty, Peter C. Andersen is a prominent and successful citizen of Albany, Linn county. He is not a native of the west, nor yet of the national government of which he has chosen to become a citizen, for he was born in Denmark, in the town of Hammelev, October 17, 1857, a son of Andrus, a farmer in that vicinity, and Elizabeth (Petersen) Andersen, the latter of whom is still living. Until he was sixteen years old he remained with his parents, engaging in the duties which such a life affords, and also attending the national school, and at that age he was apprenticed to a blacksmith, with whom he remained for five years. After one year in journeyman work he came, in 1879, to America, confident as to his ability to cope with the difficulties which he might encounter.

On landing, Mr. Andersen started at once for the west, stopping in the city of Chicago, Ill., where he worked successfully at his trade for two years. Changing his location to Manistee, Mich., he spent sixteen months working at his trade there, before deciding to make his home on the Pacific slope. In 1884 he settled at The Dalles, Ore., and in 1885 went back to Portland, the next year finding him located in Linn county, engaged in a successful prosecution of his trade at Halsey. He remained there but one year, however, residing for a time in both Corvallis and Lebanon before taking up a permanent location in Albany, where he now makes his home, the date of his removal here being 1887. For three months following his settlement in Albany he worked at his trade alone, after which he went into partnership with a Mr. Huston. After buying out the interest of his partner he erected in 1893 his present commodious shop at the corner of Second and Montgomery streets, where he now engages in the manufacture of wagons, carriages, etc., and carries on all kinds of work pertaining to the duties of a blacksmith. He has built up a splendid trade among the farmers of the vicinity, and even numbers among his customers those at a distance of forty miles. In addition to his industrial interests he has also an interest in the Poorman's Mining Company, the mine being located at Blue River.

The marriage of Mr. Andersen occurred in Albany, and united him with Miss Laura Cheswell, a native of England, and four children have been born to them, who are as follows: William H.; Lloyd C.; Edmond G.; and Wallace C. Politically Mr. Andersen is a Republican, and religiously is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fraternally he is prominent, being a member of Corinthian Lodge, A. F. & A. M.; of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows he is past noble grand and ex-representative; he is also a member of the Encampment, in which he is past chief patriarch and ex-representative; and has membership with the Rebekahs, Knights of the Maccabees; and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

WILLIAM THOMAS COLEMAN. On his father's donation claim near Bellevue, Yamhill county, Ore., William Thomas Coleman was born February 4, 1855, and was reared to the useful and fundamental occupation in which he is at present engaged. His father, James Coleman, mentioned at length in another part of this work, was one of the pioneers of Oregon, and during the many years of his active life in the west contributed his share towards its best development. The son accompanied his parents to Marion county in 1861, locating near St. Paul, where he was educated in the public schools, and where he attained twenty-three years of age.

In the meantime Mr. Coleman had purchased one hundred and fifty-four acres of land near Champoeg, and hither took his young wife, formerly Callie Orton, with whom he was united in marriage November 5, 1876. She is a daughter of Ira and Martha (Burton) Orton, both deceased, who came from Gentry county, Mo., in 1853, locating in the Chehalem valley, in Yamhill county. After living on this farm for a year he sold it and bought the one hundred and sixty acres which comprise his present home, and which had at the time sixty-five acres cleared. His industry has accomplished the clearing of one hundred and thirty acres in all, and he is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, devoting fifteen acres of his land to hop culture. In 1891 he moved his family into one of the finest rural homes in this section, and his barns and outbuildings are in keeping with the ideas of a practical and very progressive agriculturist.

Mr. Coleman is a Democrat in politics, but has never taken an interest in the political agitations of his neighborhood further than to cast his vote. He is wide-awake to all the general affairs by which he is surrounded, and may be counted on to aid financially and otherwise all wise efforts at improving the general welfare of the community. By his marriage Mr. Coleman became the father of one son, Raleigh, who was born February 4, 1881. The latter was united in marriage November 26, 1900, with Annie Haas, daughter of Joseph and Mary (Prager) Haas. She is a native of Melrose, Minn., and came to Oregon with her parents in 1893. Mr. Coleman bears an enviable reputation in Marion county, his many excellent traits of character having made him many friends, and surrounded him with well wishers.

JOHN W. ROLAND. Marion county figures as one of the most attractive, progressive and prosperous divisions of the state of Oregon, justly claiming a high order of citizenship and a spirit of enterprise which is certain to conserve consecutive development and marked advancement in the material upbuilding of the section. The county has been and is singularly favored in the class of men who have controlled its affairs in official capacity, and in this connection the subject of this review demands representation as one who has served the county faithfully and well in positions of trust and responsibility. He is now serving as county clerk, to which position he was elected upon the Republican ticket in 1902.

Mr. Roland was born in Danville, Vermilion county, Ill., September 1, 1848, and comes of a family of German lineage that was established in Virginia many generations ago. The paternal grandfather was a farmer by occupation and died in Kentucky. David Roland, the father of our subject, was born in Cynthiana, Harrison county, Ky., and in early life became familiar with commercial methods in merchandising. At a very early date he removed to Vermilion county, Ill., and served in the Black Hawk war of 1832. He followed merchant tailoring in Danville until 1852, when he brought his family, consisting of his wife and eight children, to Oregon, having outfitted with an ox team and other necessaries for the overland trip across the plains. They were six months upon the way, and while in the Cascades their stock was driven off and stolen, so that on their arrival in Portland Mr. Roland had nothing with which to begin life in the northwest. Through the succeeding winter he worked at his trade for A. B. Roberts, of Portland, and in 1853 he came to Marion county, Ore., securing a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres of wild timber land. After building a log cabin for the shelter of his family he turned his attention to the stock business and also to some extent followed his trade, making clothing for the early settlers. He had a good range and his attention was chiefly devoted to his cattle interests. In 1871 he removed to Jefferson where he lived retired until his death, which occurred in March of that year, when he was seventy-one years of age. He was an old line Democrat, a well-informed man and a true Christian, and his upright life gained for him the respect and genuine regard of all with whom he was associated. He married Eliza Barnes, a native of Harrison county, Ky., and of Scotch-Irish descent. Her death occurred in 1889, at seventy-nine years of age. In their family were eight children: C. B., who served in the Rogue River Indian war of 1856, and was a lieutenant in the First Oregon Volunteer Infantry in the Civil war. He carried on merchandising in Jefferson, Ore., was a member of the state legislature for one term and died in Marion county in 1894. Jacob resides in Multnomah county. Mrs. Pauline Phillips, the third of the family, is living in Lincoln, Wash. David S. died in Portland. George follows mining in Jackson county, Ore. Mrs. Melvina Worick is living in Portland. Esther is a resident of Jefferson, and John W. completes the family.

When three years of age, John W. Roland accompanied his parents on their removal to the northwest. He lived with the family upon the home farm, one mile from Jefferson, and pursued his education in the district school. When eighteen years of age he was apprenticed to learn the harness and saddler's trade in Salem, and when he had served for a term of three years he began business on his own account in Jefferson, continuing alone for a few years. In 1878 he was joined by his brother, Charles B. Roland, under the firm name of C. B. Roland & Co., and abandoning the harness trade they established a general store in Jefferson. There our subject also served as deputy postmaster under his brother for twelve years, and when his brother died he became postmaster and continued in that capacity until 1895, when he resigned, preparatory to his removal to Salem. August 1 of that year he was appointed chief accountant in the Oregon State Asylum by its board and under Governor Lord he held that position acceptably until January, 1900. He then became a fire insurance agent, representing the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company of Baltimore, Md. In 1902 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for the office of county clerk and was elected by a majority of fifteen hundred, taking the oath of office on the 7th of July, of the same year. He is also clerk of departments numbers one and two of the circuit court, and clerk of the probate court, in the discharge of his official duties being systematic, methodical and accurate, so that his course has won high commendation.

Mr. Roland was married in Jefferson to Miss Emma Reeves, who was born in California and died in Jefferson, Ore. They had two children: Edwilda, who is attending Willamette University, and Tracy. Mr. Roland was again married in Jefferson, his second union being with Miss Carrie S. Shumaker, who was born in Schoharie county, N. Y., a daughter of Jacob and Margaret (Burnett) Shumaker, who were also natives of the Empire state. Her parents moved to La Crosse county, Wis., where her father was engaged in building until 1888, when he brought his family to Oregon, settling in Jefferson. Mrs. Roland is a graduate of the high school and a most estimable lady, who shares with her husband the regard of many friends. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Since 1870 Mr. Roland has been a member of the Odd Fellows society, having been initiated in Jefferson Lodge, of which he is a past noble grand. He is connected with the Encampment of Salem, of which he is past chief patriarch, and with the Rebekah degree, to which Mrs. Roland also belongs. His fraternal relations also connect him with both the lodge and uniformed rank of the Knights of Pythias, and of the latter he has served as treasurer. He is a charter member of the Illihee Club, of which he served as secretary for three years. In politics he has always been an active Republican. In his private life he is distinguished by all that marks a true gentleman and an upright character, one that subordinates personal ambition to public good and seeks rather to benefit his fellowmen than the aggrandizement of self.

WILLIAM J. JERMAN. A very pleasant home just outside of Silverton is occupied by William J. Jerman, who has been a resident of Oregon since 1867, and who was formerly an extensive farmer and stock-raiser of Marion county. Mr. Jerman was born in Boone county, Mo., August 6, 1830, his father, Edward Jerman, having settled in Boone county on a farm formerly owned by his father-in-law, Thomas Turner. Edward Jerman was born in Madison county, Ky. Later in life he emigrated to Missouri, and in 1838 returned to his native state, remaining there for three years. The western fever again overtaking him, he returned to Missouri, locating on a farm in Audrain county, where he died in 1843, at the age of thirty-five. He was very successful as a farmer and stock-raiser, and though young at the time of his death, had accumulated six hundred acres of land. His wife, Lurane Turner, was also a native of Kentucky, and was born at Crab Orchard, Madison county. She became the mother of six children, three sons and three daughters, and died in Boone county, Mo., at the age of eighty years.

The oldest of the children in his father's family, William J. Jerman was educated in the public schools of Missouri, and in time became an independent landowner in that state, purchasing a farm in 1850. He was extensively engaged in buying and selling stock, and in the early days used to drive cattle down to the market in St. Louis. Lured by the tales of gold which came from the coast he became interested in mining, and in 1863, went to California, locating in Nevada county. After two years of fitful success as a miner he came to Oregon, in 1865, taking up land in Jackson county, where he engaged in teaming, farming, and mining. In 1867 he removed to Lane county, Ore., and the following spring came to Silverton, soon afterward buying a farm on Howell's Prairie, consisting of one hundred acres. To this he added from time to time, until he had one hundred and fifty-eight acres, which he finally sold, buying another farm. This was also disposed of in due time, and Mr. Jerman again came to Silverton in 1892, with the intention of making this his permanent home. He bought his present home in Brown's addition, in 1902, and is most pleasantly and conveniently located.

In Howard county, Mo., in 1850, Mr. Jerman married Martha Hilton, who was born August 22, 1832, in Huntsville, Randolph county, Mo., and daughter of Jonathan Hilton who was born in Madison county, Ky., and went to Missouri at a very early day. He was a carpenter by trade, and died in Howard county at a comparatively early age. Eleven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Jerman, the order of their birth being as follows: George Thomas, of Union county, Ore.; Allen G., a farmer on Howell's Prairie; Margaret Lurane, the wife of Edward Adcock, of La Grande, Union county, Ore.; Mary E., the wife of W. Gervis of Silverton, Ore.; James E., in California; Ida and Madison B., both deceased; David Franklin and William LaFayette, both of Salem, Ore.; Isaac Newton and Samuel Wellington of Silverton. Mr. Jerman has also reared a grandchild, Edna, who is the wife of Burt Brown of Portland. Mr. Jerman is a man of high principle, and enviable standing in the community, and has identified himself with all forward measures requiring his support. For more than fifty years he has been a member and active worker in the Christian Church, and in political affiliation he belongs to the Prohibition party.

ISAAC STEVENS. The Stevens family is numerously represented in Oregon, and especially in Marion county, where they own fine large farms, and represent the progress and enlightenment of western life. Every year a family reunion is held, thus binding more closely the ties of good will and uninterrupted friendship which are distinguishing features of the brothers and sisters.

Isaac Stevens, one of the best known representatives of his family in Yamhill county, was born in Indiana March 12, 1840, a son of Hanson and Lavina (Wickard) Stevens, natives of Indiana, the former born in 1818. The family removed from the Hoosier state to Iowa in 1846, and in 1852, made arrangements to cross the plains with ox teams and wagons. Starting out with three wagons and twelve yoke of oxen they crossed the plains without any particular mishap, the Indians even causing them very little trouble. After six months they landed at Howell Prairie, in the fall of 1852, and here Mr. Stevens took up a donation claim of three hundred and eight acres about a mile and a half southwest of Mount Angel. After a short time, however, the family located for a time in Washington, from which state the father eventually returned to Marion county, where he died in 1880. His wife died when forty years of age. Of the nine children born to himself and wife all are living but one.

In an effort to earn an independent livelihood Isaac Stevens left home when of age, working as a farm hand by the month. For two years also he followed mining and prospecting in Idaho. Upon again settling in Marion county, he was married November 9, 1865, to Catherine Ann McAlfresh, a native of Ohio, who came to Oregon with her parents in 1852. Soon after the couple went to live on a rented farm on Howell Prairie, and after three years, in 1868, bought a portion of his father's old donation claim, consisting of one hundred and fifty-four acres. At present he owns all of the claim with the exception of the fifty acres presented to his son, and is engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Many modern improvements attest the enterprise and thrift of this well-to-do agriculturist, and his home is one of the pleasantest and most convenient in the county.

Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Stevens, the order of their birth being as follows: Ellis, a farmer of this county; Vina, deceased; Ermie, the wife of Edward Bateson of Crook county; Willard, a creameryman of the vicinity of Lyons; and Millie, who is living at home. Although independent in politics, Mr. Stevens has promoted all good political conditions in his neighborhood, and has acceptably served as school director and clerk, the latter for eleven years. He has also been road supervisor, and has held other local offices within the gift of his fellow townsmen. As a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church Mr. Stevens has been an active worker for about thirty years, and is trustee of the church, also one of its most generous financial supporters. His farm, his character, and his general standing in the community, are consistent with reliability and substantial western citizenship.

HON. C. D. HARTMAN. Among the many men who are successfully following the vocation of farming in Marion county, the name of C. D. Hartman is entitled to especial mention. Mr. Hartman is known as one of the most public-spirited citizens of Marion county. He served for one term as representative in the Oregon state legislature, and for twelve years has been a member of the school board of Scott's Mills, his place of residence. Besides carrying on general farming and stock-raising, he owned and operated a threshing machine for a number of years, and also at one time conducted a saw-mill.

Mr. Hartman is a native of Marion county, having been born November 23, 1863, on the farm which is still his home, and which is a part of the donation claim located by his parents. He is a son of John and Mary (Moser) Hartman, the former a North Carolinian by birth, and the latter a native of Indiana.

John Hartman was one of the most prominent men of his day in the Willamette valley. While still a young man he married and settled in Missouri, where he followed the plasterer's trade for some time at St. Joseph. In 1852 he decided to locate in Oregon, and accordingly crossed the plains in an emigrant wagon, drawn by an ox team, being six months on the way. On this trip the party of which he was a member experienced some trouble with the Indians, who at one time stole their cattle, which, however, they eventually succeeded in recovering.

Arriving in Oregon they proceeded at once to Marion county, where Mr. Hartman took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres, about six and a half miles northeast of the present site of Silverton, on the Silverton and Scott's Mills road. Upon this farm, which was entirely undeveloped, Mr. Hartman built a log hut for the use of his family. This was replaced later on by a more modern and substantial house, which he also built. For a number of years he engaged principally in stock-raising. Gradually, however, he cultivated a little more land, and finally carried on general farming, to which he devoted the later years of his life.

John Hartman was well-known throughout the valley, and to know him was to be his friend. His popularity was attested by the fact that he was elected to each and every office to which he aspired, and at different times held all the minor offices within the gift of the people. He was one of the organizers of the Grange, and for many years devoted much of his time to furthering its interests. He was extremely charitable, and took an active part in the work of the church, never shirking his religious duties.

John Hartman and his wife became the parents of ten children. Of these, three died in infancy. Those living are the following: E. M., a resident of Wapinitia, Ore.; Barbara E., wife of Joseph Moore; I. V., wife of John Scott; Jennie; Addie, of Portland; C. D., the subject of this biography; and H. C. The latter was born in 1866, and continued to reside on the home place until his marriage to Effie Prather. He then settled on the east half of the donation claim. His farm consists of one hundred and seventy-four acres, and he has over one hundred acres under cultivation. A tract of fifteen acres is devoted to the production of hops, the yield of which in 1902 was about seventeen thousand pounds. Three children have been born to him and his wife: Floy, Rowland, deceased; and Bernice. Their farm contains many fine improvements, including a comfortable dwelling, and the family have many friends in the community.

C. D. Hartman received but a limited education, obtained by attendance at the district schools. He was united in marriage with Josie Cobb, a native of Illinois, who came to Oregon in 1892. Soon after their marriage the young people went to housekeeping on the home place, where they still reside, the beloved and aged mother of our subject residing with them. Mr. Hartman has added to the home place until he now owns three hundred and fifty acres, one hundred and thirty acres of which are under cultivation. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Short-horn cattle. A tract of about thirty acres is devoted to hop culture, the yield in this line alone in 1902 being thirty-eight thousand pounds. Many modern improvements have been added to his farm, which contains a convenient modern dwelling, with complete farm buildings.

Fraternally Mr. Hartman affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, having passed all the chairs in his lodge, and is also identified with the Knights of Pythias and the Modern Woodmen of America. He has one son, Earl G.

Mr. Hartman has always been a Republican, and from the time he cast his first vote he has taken a more than ordinarily active interest in the workings of the party in Oregon. As a nominee of that party he was elected as representative to the Oregon state legislature, and served in the office for one term, with distinct credit to himself and his constituents. He has always exhibited a keen interest in those movements which have been intended to promote the general welfare of the community, giving freely of his time and money toward their success. Though a comparatively young man, he has become widely known throughout the Willamette valley, chiefly by reason of the success which has attended his farming operations and the public-spirit which has characterized him in all his undertakings which were not of a private nature. He is regarded as one of the most substantial and worthy citizens of Marion county, and his selection for further high public office probably will be determined entirely by his own desires in the matter.

NEELY J. JUDAH, who is now serving for the third term as city recorder of Salem, was born in San Francisco, December 24, 1856. The ancestry of the family can be traced back through many generations to France, whence representatives of the name came to America. The paternal great-grandfather of the judge was a Jewish rabbi. His grandfather, Rev. Henry Judah, a man of broad learning and strong mentality, embraced the Christian faith and became an Episcopal minister. For many years he resided in New York City, and there died. Charles D. Judah, the father of the judge, was born in Bridgeport, Conn., and after completing a college course was admitted to the bar in New York. In that state he married Miss Elmira Elizabeth Smith, a native of New York City and a daughter of Floyd Smith, who for many years was vice-president of the Manhattan Gas Light Company. He was a member of a prominent old New York family, and married Katherine Ritter, of Knickerbocker stock.

In 1849, Charles D. Judah came, with his little family, to the Pacific coast, making the journey by way of Panama to San Francisco, where he entered upon the practice of law in partnership with John K. Hackett. They constituted one of the old and distinguished law firms of that city, and for many years Mr. Judah continued in successful practice there, but ultimately retired from his profession and returned to Delaware, where his last days were passed. He was a musician of exceptional ability, and was instrumental in having shipped around Cape Horn the first grand organ ever brought to the coast. This was erected under his supervision in Trinity Episcopal Church, and for many years he served as its organist. Later he became organist in St. Mary's Catholic Cathedral, having been converted to the Catholic faith.

In the family of Charles D. and Elmira E. (Smith) Judah were nine children, of whom three are living, namely: Henry R., who is assistant general passenger agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, at San Francisco; Neely J., of this review, and Mrs. Florence Tilton, of Victoria, British Columbia.

Judge Judah, of this review, spent the days of his youth in San Francisco, and there completed the high school course. In boyhood he had great love of the sea, and in his youth he made many trips upon the ocean. In 1873 he entered the United States navy as a member of the crew of the Saranac, doing duty in the waters of the north and south Pacific. After two years' service he was honorably discharged, and then going east he again joined the navy for special duty, responding to a call for volunteers to aid in the care of yellow fever sufferers at Pensacola, Fla., in 1875. He was located there for over one year, and rose through the ranks to an official position. In 1876 he was again honorably discharged, and in that year he visited the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia. Subsequently he made his way southward, and at Charlotte's Harbor, Fla., he entered the merchant service as master of the schooner Richard Morgan, plying between Charlotte's Harbor and Havana. This vessel was wrecked in the gulf, during a severe storm, the accident resulting largely from the faulty rigging of the schooner, and not from bad seamanship. His crew of seven men entered the life-boat with him and rowed sixty-eight miles to Charlotte's Harbor.

Mr. Judah then passed into western Texas for a time, and was married, while at Sweetwater, to Miss Ella H. Sloper. In 1884 Mr. Judah was elected county clerk of Nolan county, Tex., and after serving for two years, was re-elected in 1886, acting in that capacity until July, 1887, when he resigned and removed to Los Angeles, Cal. While there he acted as notary public and searcher of records for four years. In September, 1891, he arrived in Salem, acting as searcher of records, under Col. Harry Waters, for the Salem Land & Abstract Company. Later he resigned and became a clerk in the insurance office of the firm of Mitchell & Lunn, and afterward became connected with the Statesman, as its advertising agent; subsequently he was a member of the reportorial staff, his connection with the journal covering six years in all. He then resigned to enter upon the duties of the office of city recorder, to which he had been elected in December, 1898, on the Citizens' ticket. He was given an excellent majority, and that he manifested marked fidelity and capability in the discharge of the duties of the office is indicated by the fact that in 1900, and again in 1902, he was re-elected, entering upon his third term January 6, 1903. He is also ex-officio justice of the peace and police judge for Salem city.

In politics Mr. Judah is independent, with socialistic tendencies. He is a man fearless in defense of his honest convictions, unequivocal in his position, and no one has occasion to question upon which side he is to be found. While residing in Sweetwater, Tex., he was made a Mason in Sweetwater Lodge No. 571, A. F. & A. M., and by affiliation is now connected with Pacific Lodge No. 50, of Salem. He also holds relations with the Woodmen of the World, with the Knights of the Maccabees and the Salem Press Club, the Order of Lions, and formerly belonged to Ramona Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, of Los Angeles. He is also the secretary of the Greater Salem Commercial Club. Under the auspices of the latter club the Greater Salem Mid-Summer Carnival was conducted, lasting from June 29 to July 4, 1903. It was pronounced a thorough success, no little credit being due to the general manager, Mr. Judah. An enterprising citizen, liberal and progressive, Mr. Judah is well known in his adopted city, and the circle of his friends is extensive. His has been an eventful and interesting career, and the reminiscences of his travels and experiences make him an entertaining conversationalist.

NANCY W. HARRIS. The daughter and granddaughter of pioneers, it was natural that Mrs. Nancy W. Harris should have the same courage that made her ancestors leave their homes in the land of their birth, and start away into the wilderness to aid in the upbuilding of a new territory and grapple with the greater opportunities of a new country. Her grandfather, Francis Hodge, of English blood, made his home in North Carolina, where he married Miss Nancy Walker, who was of Scotch-Irish descent. Their son, William H. Hodge, the father of Mrs. Harris of this review, was born in Wentworth, Rockingham county, N. C., January 14, 1794. In 1820, he settled in Sangamon county, Ill., having previously spent some time in Tennessee and Kentucky. In Kentucky he married Miss Rachel Wall, a native of that state, born in Warren county, March 9, 1799. Their marriage occurred in 1814, the couple being very youthful. Mr. Hodge spent his years engaged in tilling the soil, though for four years, from 1827 to 1831, he served as sheriff of Tazewell county, Ill. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hodge, of whom Margaret Robinson is deceased; Nancy W. Harris is the subject of this review, and was born in Sangamon county, Ill., November 26, 1821; Andrew met his death in the Mexican war; Newton lives in McLean county, Ill.; Mary J. Hill makes her home in California; William lives in Mc-

Edw. Hensen

Lean county, Ill.; James resides in the same location; and Harriet Woodworth lives in Bloomington, Ill. The father and mother both died in McLean county, to which they had come at an early day, mention being made of them as among the first settlers of that county.

Nancy W. Hodge married Hugh C. Harris, who was born in Athens county, Ohio, December 20, 1818, the son of Francis Harris. The Harris family settled early in Delaware county, Ind., and there Hugh C. grew to manhood and engaged in farming. When twenty-one years of age he left home, and coming to Illinois, he settled in McLean county in the neighborhood of the Hodge farm, where he engaged in farming for himself. April 7, 1840, occurred the marriage of Nancy W. Hodge and Hugh C. Harris, the two making their home in Illinois until 1853, when they decided to try their fortunes on the western slope of the United States, both having the pioneer principles firmly implanted in their lives. They commenced the journey March 18, 1853, from the home place in McLean county, bound for Oregon. They started with twenty-two head of cattle, but on their arrival at Eola September 18 of the same year they had but eleven. The same winter they bought a farm near Rickreall, Polk county, where they continued to live for five years, at the end of which time they traded for their present place, a farm of one hundred and ninety acres located at Oak Grove. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Harris are as follows: William H., deceased; Mariam Allen, of Salem; Emmeline Hannah, of Salem; Charles, deceased; Elizabeth Heise, on an adjoining farm; Scott, of Spokane, Wash.; Belle Putnam, of Gilliam county; Mary Chitwood, deceased; Emerson, at home; Ollie Goodnough, of Portland; and Andrew, of California. Five of the children were born in their Illinois home.

The death of Mr. Harris, April 27, 1888, was a much regretted occurrence, he being accidentally killed while on the road to Rickreall with a load of produce. He had always been a prominent man in the community, taking an intelligent interest in the affairs of the day, serving as road supervisor and in various school offices for several years. He was a Republican in politics. Religiously he belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church of Oak Grove, where Mrs. Harris still holds membership.

EDWARD HIRSCH, one of the representative citizens of Oregon, has held many offices of public trust and has been found loyal and efficient because he is an honorable business man and because of a social, genial nature which is quick to recognize true worth in others. Everywhere these qualities have won for him warm regard, and it is safe to say that few men in Oregon have more friends than has Edward Hirsch, who is now postmaster at Salem. He has been a resident of this state since 1858. His father was Sampson Hirsch and in the family were ten children, who came to the new world, while six of the number became residents of Oregon. In the year 1854 Leopold Hirsch arrived in this state and after engaging in merchandising in Portland for a time, followed a similar pursuit in Salem, where his death occurred. In 1856 J. B. Hirsch arrived in Salem, where he carried on merchandising until his death. In 1856 Mayer Hirsch likewise arrived in this city and was an enterprising merchant here until his life's labors were ended. In 1858 Solomon and Edward Hirsch came to this state, the former settling in Portland. In 1864, Mrs. Herman, a sister, also arrived in Portland.

Edward Hirsch was born May 3, 1836, in Hohebach, Wurtemberg, Germany, and when only nine years of age was left an orphan. He then left his native village and went to Esslingen, where he resided for five years, during that time acquiring a good common-school education. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a merchant in Giebelstadt, Bavaria, where he remained for four years, and in 1855 he sailed for America, attracted by the business possibilities and opportunities of the new world. Manassa and Bernhard Hirsch, his brothers, had previously located in New York, where they were engaged in merchandising. As a passenger on the sailing vessel Splendid, Edward Hirsch left Havre, France, in 1855 and after a voyage of forty-two days reached New York City. Soon afterward, however, he went to Sheakleyville, Mercer county, Pa., where he was engaged in clerking, receiving about $75 per year in remuneration for his services. He then went to Griffin, Ga., where he obtained a salary of $200 per year, and later at Macon, Ga., he was paid $300 per year. In 1858 he accompanied his brother Solomon to Oregon by way of the New York route and the Isthmus of Panama, the fare being $200. They left New York in March as passengers in the Star of the West, which took them to Aspinwall, and from there they sailed on the Golden Age to San Francisco, where, upon the steamer Pacific, they came to Portland and in April, 1858, Mr. Hirsch, of this review, arrived in Salem. He had practically no capital, but he had good credit, and under the firm name and style of E. & S. Hirsch he and his brother Solomon opened a general mercantile store at Dallas, Polk county, the place then containing a population of about one hundred.

After two years spent at that place the brothers returned to Silverton, Marion county, where they opened a general mercantile store and remained there four years, at the end of which time they disposed of their enterprise and dissolved the partnership. Solomon Hirsch then went to Portland, while Edward Hirsch came to Salem. In 1863 he formed a business connection whereby he acted as a salesman for his brothers until 1866. In the meantime he had become interested in the Eagle Woolen Mills Company at Brownsville, and in that year removed to Brownsville in order to become manager of the mills, which he conducted until 1868.

In that year Mr. Hirsch was married in Salem and returned to this city to make his home. Here he engaged in general merchandising as a member of the firm of Herman & Hirsch, a connection that was maintained continuously and successfully for ten years, or until his election to the office of state treasurer in 1878. He was nominated upon the Republican ticket and elected by a majority of eleven hundred, the highest majority given to any candidate on the ticket; in fact, the candidate for governor was defeated, but Mr. Hirsch's election was the beginning of Republican successes in the state and many a victory has his party since enjoyed. He took the oath of office in September, 1878, and filled the position so acceptably and honorably that in 1882 he was re-nominated and re-elected, receiving a greatly increased majority, numbering about five thousand. He then served until January, 1887, a law having been passed to end the term of office in that month. He left the position not only with the confidence and respect which was given him when he entered it, but also with the commendation of the public. When he took the oath of office the state was $1,000,000 in debt and the taxes were seven mills on the dollar. At the close of his second term, owing to his capable control of the finances, the state was not only free from all indebtedness, but had met all current expenses, had erected a number of public buildings, including the state capitol and the insane asylum, the taxes had been reduced to less than two mills on the dollar and he turned over to his successor one-half million dollars in gold coin. This is the best record in the financial history of Oregon.

Mr. Hirsch subsequently retired to private life, but his fellow citizens were not content that he should remain out of office and in 1890 he was chosen state senator, serving in the sessions of 1891 and 1893. During that time he was instrumental in securing the passage of the bill for the completion of the state capitol and for instituting its heating and plumbing systems. His efforts resulted in the passage of other measures which proved of great public benefit, and in 1893 he was chairman of the important ways and means committee. In August, 1898, Edward Hirsch was appointed by President McKinley to the position of postmaster of Salem, taking the office August 15 of that year. In July, 1902, he was reappointed by President Roosevelt, so that he is now serving his second term. In March, 1903, the postal department of Salem was established in new offices. Under the administration of Mr. Hirsch, which has been practical and progressive, the postoffice receipts have been greatly increased, the business of the office has been systematized and extended and there are now nine different rural routes delivered from this office and five city delivery routes. In other local affairs Mr. Hirsch has been prominent and for three terms he has served as a member of the city council of Salem. In 1876 he was chairman of the Republican County Central Committee and throughout the years of his residence here he has been untiring in his efforts to promote the growth and insure the success of Republican principles.

In 1868 Mr. Hirsch was married to Miss Nettie Davis, who was born in Prussia, and in 1867, with her parents, became a resident of Brownsville, Linn county, Ore. To Mr. and Mrs. Hirsch were born seven children: Ella E.; Lulu, now Mrs. Byron Loomis; Guy; Maude, Mrs. Edwin McMahill, of Dayton, Ohio; Gertrude; Meyer, and Leona, all residents of Salem. Mr. Hirsch belongs to Chemeketa Lodge, No. 1, I. O. O. F., of which he is past noble grand, and to Willamette Encampment, of which he is the past chief patriarch. He is also a member of Illihee Club. His record is indeed an honorable one and reflects credit upon his native land and his adopted country. The pursuit of wealth has not been his sole object in life and, though he has prospered, he has yet found time and opportunity to aid his state to faithfully discharge the duties of high official positions and to throw around him much of the sunshine of life which comes from a genial nature, a kindly disposition, from deference for the opinion of others and from a recognition of the worth of those with whom he has been brought in contact.

WILLIAM M. HILLEARY, one of the influential and public-spirited farmers of the vicinity of Turner, Marion county, was born in Des Moines county, Iowa, February 21, 1840, and was reared on a typical middle west farm. His father, James Hilleary, was born near Winchester, Va., in 1814, and was reared principally in Kentucky, to which state his father, Francis, removed from his native state of Maryland at a very early day. When eighteen years of age, James Hilleary removed with his parents to Sangamon county, Ill., settling on a farm, from which they removed the next year, in 1833, locating near Burlington, Iowa. There the grandfather took up government land, and spent the remainder of his life, dying in 1844. In 1837, James Hilleary married Nancy Morris, who was born in North Carolina January 1, 1819, and who is still living on the old farm near Burlington. Twelve children were born to this couple, the order of their birth being as follows: James L., of Des Moines county, Iowa; William M., of Oregon; Mary J., wife of W. P. Perry, residing in the vicinity of Burlington, Iowa; George, living in Des Moines county, Iowa; Thomas, deceased; Sarah, who died when young; Lydia, also deceased; Irene, the wife of James O. Beebe, of Des Moines county, Iowa; Margaret E., living with her mother; Roger W., living on a farm near London, Iowa; Etta, the deceased wife of Charles Moffit, of Los Angeles, Cal., and Henry M., who carries on farming near the old home in Iowa. Mr. Hilleary was seventy-five years old at the time of his death, and for many years he had been a member of the Baptist Church, contributing liberally towards its support.

In his youth William M. Hilleary worked hard on the paternal farm, yet managed to acquire a fair common school education. That he started out in life practically without means was evident from the fact that he worked his way across the plains in 1861, driving ox teams and making himself generally useful. Arriving in Nevada, he went from there to California, reaching Oregon in the fall of 1861. In the meantime his uncle, William Morris, had located on a farm near Turner, Marion county, and hither the youth repaired and remained for the winter, assisting his relative with the work around the farm. In the spring of 1862 he went to the mines around Florence, Idaho, returning to Marion county in August, 1862. The following year he rented his uncle's ranch near Turner, and in 1863 helped to build a flouring mill at Annville. Realizing his lack of educational opportunity in the earlier days, he began to study and improve himself generally, and after taking a course at the Santiam Academy at Lebanon, engaged in school teaching in Linn county in the summer of 1864.

In December, 1864, Mr. Hilleary enlisted in Company F, First Oregon Infantry, for frontier service, and after six months spent at Camp Hoskins, was ordered to Vancouver, Wash., and was afterward stationed in the barracks at Walla Walla, Wash., and Boise City, Idaho. In May, 1866, he returned to Walla Walla, and was discharged at Vancouver, July 21, 1866, having been in the service nineteen months, and having attained to the rank of corporal. Returning to Linn county, Ore., he taught school until the spring of 1868, and that year bought the farm upon which he has since lived. In August, 1867, he was united in marriage with Irene L. Cornelius, who was born November 13, 1847, a daughter of George Cornelius, one of the early pioneers of Oregon. The father of the latter, Absalom Cornelius, had a good common school education, was of a progressive mind, and was noted for his honesty and uprightness of character. He was chosen by the Indians as arbitrator in their difficulties in Oregon, and his decision was always abided by. He never had an enemy, and was temperate in his habits. Owning a good farm, and meeting with success in his undertakings, he was enabled to give all his children a start in life. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hilleary, of whom Clara A., born August 24, 1868, became the wife of H. L. Earl, a hardware merchant of Turner. Mrs. Earl, who died May 14, 1903, was an influential member of the local Grange and of the Presbyterian Church, and was an artist of no mean merit. She was universally beloved and her death was deeply mourned. Homer E., born July 14, 1870, is a locomotive engineer of the Southern Pacific Railway, and a resident of Ashland, Ore.; and Lloyd E., born April 12, 1885, is living at home. For four years Mrs. Hilleary was editor of the Oregon department of the Pacific Rural Press, the official organ of the Grange, and was the first to memorize the master's work and lectures of the local Grange. For several years she served as an officer in the State Grange, as well as in the local organization. Her religious affiliation is with the Christian Scientists.

The Hilleary farm consists of two hundred acres of bottom land, splendidly improved, and adapted to various purposes. An extensive general farming, stock-raising and dairy business is carried on, all of which departments net their enterprising owner a good yearly income. As a promoter of Republican politics in Marion county Mr. Hilleary has had few more active contemporaries. He has been on the school board for many years, has served as justice of the peace for twelve years, and has been judge of elections. The present prosperity of the Turner Grange is largely due to his interest in its welfare in the early days, and to his continued effort to enlarge its sphere of usefulness since he became a charter member in 1873. At present he is identified with Surprise Grange No. 233, and was master of the State Grange from 1896 until 1900, having previously served as assistant steward of the same, as steward, master and secretary. He was also a member of the state legislative committee of the State Grange. In his official capacity with the State Grange, he and his wife have visited all parts of the country, as delegates to the national body. He served as regent of Oregon Agricultural College of Corvallis four years. He is also a member of Sedgwick Post No. 10, G. A. R., of Salem.

The entire career of Mr. Hilleary has been characterized by strict attention to the many duties which have entered into his daily life, and his success is due to his unflagging energy, enterprise and integrity. Those who know him best acknowledge him to possess a character above reproach. On numerous occasions he has exhibited a high public spirit and an earnest desire to do all in his power for the promotion of those movements calculated to advance the best interests of Marion county. He takes broad views of affairs in general, and has become firmly established as a useful and progressive man of affairs. The record of his life should prove a source of inspiration to the youth of the present generation who start upon their careers no better equipped than he, as well as a source of great pride to the members of his family.

JOHN SAPPINGFIELD. In the death of John Sappingfield, which occurred on his farm eight miles east of Salem, March 8, 1903, Marion county lost one of its oldest and most highly esteemed pioneer inhabitants. Mr. Sappingfield was born in Davis county, N. C., November 25, 1809, when even the eastern states were in their infancy, and at a period when the great "Oregon country" was a wilderness practically unknown to the civilized world. When he was a year old his parents, George and Catherine (Myers) Sappingfield, moved to southern Indiana, then regarded as far "out west," settling in Harrison county, where they lived upon a farm most of the time. In the course of time they removed to Parke county, that state, and about 1833 moved still further westward into Iowa. In the latter state they devoted their energies to farming in Des Moines and Monroe counties until 1847, when they removed to Davis county and took up a tract of land under the homestead laws of the country.

John Sappingfield had remained with the family in their various locations until they decided to settle in Davis county, Iowa, when he determined to seek his own fortune independently. May 27, 1838, he married Mary Hagey, a native of the same county in North Carolina which witnessed his own birth, and who had been brought by her parents to Des Moines county, Iowa. The young people felt the spirit of their fathers strongly exercised within themselves, and when the parents of Mr. Sappingfield finally decided to make Davis county their home, he and his bride concluded to seek an improvement in their fortunes in the great northwest, of whose wonderful resources they had heard so many tales from the lips of travelers who had visited Oregon Territory.

With their hearts fired by a most laudable ambition, they therefore set forth, in 1847, leaving the associations of their childhood and youth behind them, but with their minds fully made up to brave any and all dangers which might confront them, and to remain true to their purpose of assisting in laying the foundation of a great commonwealth in the land beyond the mountains. They started across the plains with two wagons, three yoke of oxen to each, accompanied by their family of three children, following the trail known in those days as the "middle route." After a long and wearisome journey of six months they arrived in Oregon, coming at once to Marion county, the destination of many of the far-seeing farmers who had emigrated from the east. Here Mr. Sappingfield almost immediately rented some land on the old Edmundson claim. This was in the fall of 1847. Subsequently he purchased the right to a donation claim located about eight miles east of Salem, which he regarded as the most fertile of the available land in the county. In the spring of 1848, he erected on this property a log house of one room, its site being the same plot of ground where he afterward built one of the most commodious homes of the day. Without any unnecessary delay he began the improvement of the land, and in the fall of that year brought his family to their new home, where he spent the remainder of his life.

From time to time Mr. Sappingfield was able, with the accumulation of years, to increase his landed possessions. His first step in this direction consisted of taking up six hundred and forty acres, about eighty acres of which was in prairie and the remainder in timber and small brush. To clear this land and prepare it for the fruits of the harvest time presented a herculean task, but it was not gigantic enough to daunt the sturdy and determined owner, who at once applied himself to the work with energy. During the years he devoted himself to the undertaking, he succeeded in making it one of the finest and most productive pieces of property in Marion county, and, indeed, in the entire Willamette valley. At the time of his death Mr. Sappingfield was the possessor of three hundred and twenty acres of the original donation claim, upon which they settled in 1848, and on which he erected three substantial houses. To his honor it is to be said that he assisted materially in the construction of nearly all the roads in the neighborhood of his home.

Side by side with this venerable man stood

his equally faithful wife, now in her eighty-fourth year, the couple forming, during the latter years of their lives together, almost the last link with a historic and romantic past. Their long and useful life together was peculiarly blessed. They accumulated an abundance of worldly goods and innumerable friends, and their recollections of more than a half century of life in the northwest enriched every passing day. Their union has been blessed with the following children: William, a prominent resident of the state of Washington; Louisa, deceased; George, deceased; Amanda, wife of J. T. King, a resident of Marion county; John W., deceased; Henry A., a farmer of Marion county; and Charles. The last-named son married Mary E. Given, in September, 1892, and the young couple make their home on the farm occupied for so many years by their parents, the same having been given over to their management.

Thus is told, though necessarily in brief outline, the story of the career of one of the worthy founders of the empire of the northwest. His business sagacity, his integrity of character, and his splendid personality, supplemented by his appreciation of the early possibilities of this region of the country, render his record one that will endure as a monument to the important part he bore in the development of one of the most favored agricultural localities in the whole world.

URIAH WHITNEY. Various enterprises in Marion county have enlisted the interest of Uriah Whitney, a pioneer of 1858, and at present living on a finely cultivated and profitable farm near Stayton. Mr. Whitney was born on a farm near Lewiston, Androscoggin county, Me., March 23, 1834, a son of Thomas and Naomi (Eaton) Whitney. When six years of age he was taken by his parents to St. Clair county, Ill., where his father combined his trade of brick mason with general farming. After the death of his mother in 1842, he was taken to the home of Robert Higgins, a prosperous and prominent farmer residing in St. Clair county, with whom he found a pleasant home and excellent guardianship. Upon attaining the age of twenty-one years he received from Mr. Higgins the sum of $150. Thereafter he remained with his friend, who was almost a father to him, for two years, receiving in return for services rendered $110 per year. This seemed a large amount to the farmer youth of that day, and young Whitney was no exception to the rule in this respect. After leaving the employ of Mr. Higgins he worked for various other farmers in the neighborhood, and by 1858 had quite a sum of money saved up. In the meantime he had determined to better his condition, if possible, by taking an early advantage of the wellnigh boundless opportunities offered by the great west and its almost fabulous resources. Therefore, in 1858, he started upon his journey for Oregon, going by way of New York City, where he embarked aboard the ship Washington, bound for Graytown, and thence to Aspinwall. Crossing the Isthmus of Panama, he re-embarked on another steamer bound for San Francisco. But in order to do so, he was obliged to borrow $50 to pay for his ticket, the preceding stages of the voyage having used up about all his money.

December 24, 1858, he arrived in Marion county, with practically no capital excepting his health, energy and ambition to succeed in life. The first year he worked in a sawmill and gristmill, for which he received the sum of $330. After working on a farm for W. M. McKinney for a year he was employed by other farmers. In 1861 he drove a herd of cattle across the mountains to Umatilla, for stock-dealers, and in 1862 embarked in a mining venture near Florence, Idaho, to which region he traveled with two pack-horses. The extent of his success in this venture may be judged when it is stated that instead of driving that team home he was compelled to make his way back afoot, a sadder and wiser man.

Upon returning to Marion county Mr. Whitney sought to recoup his losses by working upon farms. After saving some money in this way, he embarked in a general merchandising business in Aumsville with W. H. Darby, continuing thus for five years, and making a success of the business. After disposing of his interest to E. E. McKinney in the spring of 1871, he bought his present farm of four hundred and twenty acres for $10 per acre. Having thus assured himself of a home, he returned the same year to Maine, where he was married to Martha T. Whitney. Returning with his young wife to the farm just purchased, he resided there for two years, and then engaged in the mercantile business with the Hon. W. H. Hobson at Stayton. Upon selling his interest in this business he established a store at Aumsville with the same partner. After disposing of that he removed to Stayton and erected the property now known as the Gardner Flouring Mills. At the same time he started another general merchandise store at Stayton, and while managing both these enterprises became prominently identified in other ways with the best interests of the community. Misfortune overtook him in 1878, when the store was destroyed by fire. Soon afterward he traded the flouring mills for six hundred and forty acres of land situated in the Waldo Hills. After living on the new property for a year, he took his family on a visit of four months to Maine, spending a most delightful time among the scenes of his childhood. Returning to his farm in the Waldo Hills, he lived there for another year, and then returned to his original farm of four hundred and twenty acres, purchased at the time of his marriage in 1871, and upon which he is now making his home. Since locating there he has spent about eight years in Stayton, where he owned and operated a general store with W. W. Elder; but in 1899 he took up his permanent abode where he now resides, and here he is conducting general farming and stock-raising.

Five children have been born into the family of Mr. and Mrs. Whitney. Lillie is the wife of Thomas E. Worley of Albany, Ore., and is the mother of four children: Byron Uriah, Sherman, Augusta and Frederick; Lena C. is the wife of Frank Sylhaven of Stayton, and has a daughter, Pearl Naomi Shafer; Martha N., Laura and Henrietta are deceased.

Mr. Whitney cast his first presidential vote for James Buchanan, and ever since has been a staunch supporter of the Democratic party. He has never sought for public office though he served for two years as mayor of Stayton, for one year was councilman, and for one year was treasurer. Fraternally he was originally associated with Pearl Lodge, A. F. & A. M., of Turner, of which he was a charter member, and is now a member of Santiam Lodge No. 25, at Stayton. To him is due the distinction of having been treasurer of the Masonic lodge for twenty-five consecutive years.

No man in Marion county has a more enviable reputation for personal worth, probity and sound business judgment than Mr. Whitney. At all times he has striven to make his daily life an exemplification of the Golden Rule, which has been the cardinal principle of his religion. He has found many opportunities to benefit his fellowmen by sound advice and offers of assistance of a more practical and substantial nature, and he has never been known to oppose the progress of any project intended to develop the resources of the Willamette valley or to enhance its standing as one of the most desirable places of residence in the world. His long years of residence in the state and the success which has attended his efforts in many lines of endeavor constitute a career worthy of appreciation and emulation. The young men of the present generation may well regard the brief record of his life here presented as a model for their guidance; for honesty of purpose, integrity of character, perseverance, industry and a singleness of determination toward the goal of honorable success have been the principles which have formed the foundation of his entire career.

CHARLES H. BURCH. No history of Yamhill county would be complete without mention of Charles H. Burch, who is a venerable and honored citizen and has resided in this state since 1844. Great have been the changes which have occurred in this period and wonderful the development, and Mr. Burch has ever manifested a deep and active interest in public progress and improvement. He was born in Sheridan county, Mo., and was but two years of age at the time of his mother's death. His father was a physician and in the family were five children. Our subject remained at home until ten years of age, when his father died, and from that time until his sixteenth year he resided with his father's parents, acquiring his early education in the district school and afterward pursuing a course of study in the high school at Keytesville, Mo. At the age of sixteen he made a long and difficult journey across the plains, joining an emigrant train. He rode a mule and continued with the train until he reached Fort Bridger, Wyo., when he left the party with which he had traveled and came on into Oregon, being the first white emigrant to land in Oregon City. Settling first at Salem, he remained until 1846, when he went to California, and while there he enlisted in Company A, of the California Mounted Riflemen, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel John C. Fremont, later General, for service upon the frontier. While in Lieutenant-Colonel Fremont's Company, at San Miguel, Cal., he was detailed with another man, named Ryan, to arrest a spy, and Mr. Burch made the arrest alone at Mission San Miguel. The spy was tried by court martial, found guilty and shot by Colonel Fremont's order. Mr. Burch was mustered in at Sacramento and with his regiment went to Old Monterey and afterward to Los Angeles, where he was mustered out, having served for several months. He then returned to Sacramento, where he followed mining and prospecting and for some time in connection with another man he made all of the saddles used by General Kearney. About 1849 he purchased a farm in the vicinity of Marysville, Cal., on which he lived for about two years and then sold that property, returning to Yamhill county, Ore., where he took up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres. He still owns a part of this and the property is conveniently and pleasantly located about two miles east of Amity.

In 1851 Mr. Burch was united in marriage to Miss Phebe Buffum, a native of Illinois, who came with her parents to the northwest in 1847. Mr. and Mrs. Burch began their domestic life upon the donation claim and here they have resided continuously since. They had thirteen children: Hiram, who is living in Crook county, Ore.; Jane, at home; Clay, who makes his home in McMinnville; Charles H., who resides in Amity; Ann, who is living in Newburg; Georgia, a resident of Dayton, Ore.; Idress, Louisa and Victoria, all at home; and four who died in infancy.

At the present time Mr. Burch owns and operates two hundred and eighty-five acres of rich and arable land and is carrying on general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Durham cattle. He has made all of the improvements upon his place and now has a well developed farm equipped with good buildings and all modern accessories, and for several years in connection with his farm work he followed the carpenter's trade.

In his political views Mr. Burch has been a stalwart Democrat since casting his first presidential vote. He is regarded as one of the prominent and influential residents of this portion of Oregon and at one time he was one of the most extensive farmers of Yamhill county. His capability and his fitness for leadership led to his selection for legislative honors and in 1878 he was chosen to represent his district in the state senate. In 1884 he was elected for a second term, at both times overcoming a large Republican majority, a fact which indicates his personal popularity and the confidence and trust reposed in him by those with whom he has long been associated. Few men can claim the distinction of having arrived in Oregon in 1844, but this honor is due Mr. Burch, and since that time he has spent the greater part of his life in this state, assisting in the work which has brought Yamhill county forth from its pioneer environment to its present state of progress and importance. He is a man whose intrinsic worth of character is widely recognized, and with pleasure we present to our readers this record of his career.

COL. A. B. GILLIS, M. D., surgeon-general of the Oregon National Guard, and one of the most distinguished specialists in the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat in the state, now makes his home in Salem, where he has been engaged in the practice of his profession since 1893. He was born in Strathalbyn, May 15, 1854, a son of Malcolm and Hattie (Mathison) Gillis. His father was born in Rothsay, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, a son of Col. Malcolm Gillis, who was an officer in the British army and saw service in India and on the continent. Upon leaving his native country Malcolm Gillis, Jr., became a resident of Prince Edward Island, where he followed the occupation of farming. In his religion he was a devoted member of the Presbyterian faith, following the inclination of his forefathers for many preceding generations. His wife was born on the island of Arran, off the coast of Scotland. Her father occupied official posts under the government for several years, and spent his entire life in Scotland, where his death occurred. Malcolm Gillis, father of Col. A. B. Gillis, died in Charlottetown in 1884, and his widow is still living there. They were the parents of six sons and two daughters.

The subject of this review, the second youngest child in the family, is the only one residing in the United States. After being graduated from the Charlottetown normal school his inclination led him to ship aboard a merchant vessel, and for two years he was engaged in the East Indian trade. He signed in the capacity of supercargo, sailing under Captain Steward. During his voyages he visited Calcutta, Madras and the most important ports of China and Japan. Upon the expiration of his two years' service upon the sea he engaged in educational work in Ontario, continuing to follow the profession of teaching for several years. In the meantime he began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. Harkness of Dundas, Ontario, and afterward entered the literary department of Victoria University at Coburg. Subsequently he matriculated in the Royal Medical College, from which he received the degrees of M. D. and C. M. in 1888.

In the meantime, in 1885, his studies had been interrupted by the outbreak of the disturbances in the Canadian northwest known in history as the Louis Riel Rebellion, in which he served as second lieutenant in company D, P. W. R., until the close of the insurrection. After having received an honorable discharge he resumed his preparation for a medical career. From 1885 to 1887 he occupied the position of demonstrator of anatomy in the Royal Medical College and graduated with the highest honors a surgeon in the Kingston General Hospital in 1888. In the winter of 1891 he occupied the post of house surgeon in the Royal London Ophthalmic Hospital. In 1892 he pursued a special course of study in the New York Post Graduate School, devoting his researches there to diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. In 1898 he pursued studies along the same lines in the Chicago Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat College. He also studied in Vienna under Professors Politzer and Schnitzler.

Dr. Gillis maintained an office in Truro, Nova Scotia, until 1890. After his return, in 1893, from his studies in the principal medical centers of Europe, he located in Salem, where he has been continuously engaged in practice for ten years, devoting especial attention to those diseases for which he has thoroughly prepared himself. He is located in the Bush building, and has an extensive and lucrative practice, which is constantly growing in importance.

In 1890 Dr. Gillis married Anna Marie Krebs, cousin of the famous concert pianiste, Marie Krebs. Like her cousin, Mrs. Gillis has devoted her entire life to music, her musical education being completed abroad. While in Berlin she studied under Karl Klindworth. In Vienna she had the distinguished honor of being accepted by Theodore Leschetizky.

At their home Dr. and Mrs. Gillis dispense a lavish hospitality, both having a large and appreciative circle of friends in Salem. Dr. Gillis is popular in the Masonic fraternity. He was made a member of the craft in Arcadia Lodge No. 4, and is now identified with Salem Lodge No. 4, A. F. & A. M.; Royal Arch Chapter No. 7, of Salem; De Molay Commandery No. 5, of which he is Past Eminent Commander; Al Kader Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, of Portland, and has taken all the Scottish Rite degrees up to and including the thirty-second. He was made an Odd Fellow in Ontario, and is a charter member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He is also connected with the Illihee Club and the Greater Salem Commercial Club.

In 1897 Dr. Gillis was appointed by the pension department to the position of expert pension examiner. He is also a member of the State Board of Medical Examiners, having been appointed by Governor Lord and reappointed by Governors Geer and Chamberlain. He holds membership in the Marion County Medical Society, and for some time has occupied the chair of ophthalmology and laryngology in the medical department of Willamette University. On the 11th of July, 1898, he received from Governor Lord the appointment as surgeon-general of the Oregon National Guard with the rank of Colonel, and was reappointed by Governor Geer, and still holds the office.

During the years of his practice in Salem Dr. Gillis has come to be recognized by his professional contemporaries as one of the most highly qualified practitioners in his specialty in the state. His scientific labors have been rewarded with a great measure of success, which has come to him as the logical result of close application, a strong intellect and marked devotion to his chosen calling. He is still as great a student as ever, and keeps constantly abreast of the most advanced thought in medical science. Dr. Gillis is a man of fine physique, pleasing presence and an engaging personality, and is honored and respected by all who know him.

JAMES K. CHARLTON. Occupying a place of distinction among the most respected residents of Albany is James K. Charlton, a retired agriculturist, and an ex-sheriff of Linn county. He is a typical representative of the self-made men of our state, beginning life with no other equipments than the energetic ambition and force of character natural to him. Without a query as to whether or no life was worth living, he has done his best from youth up to make it so, and by sheer force of an active spirit and an indomitable will, guided by sound sense and high principles, he has met with grand success in his business career. A Virginian by birth, he was born in Monroe, W. Va., May 30, 1824, a son of John Charlton. His Grandfather Charlton, a life-long farmer of Monroe, W. Va., was a direct descendant of one of the early Scotch settlers of the Old Dominion and inherited in a marked degree the thrift and industrious habits of his ancestors.

Born on a farm in Monroe, W. Va., John Charlton lived in his native town until 1826, when he removed with his family to Greenbrier county, W. Va., locating on a farm where he remained until 1848. He then removed to Jefferson county, Iowa, and later moved to Davis county, same state, where he died. He married Charlotte Kyle, who was born in West Virginia, and died in Oregon. Her father, John Kyle, who was born in Ireland, emigrated to this country when sixteen years of age, and settled in West Virginia, where he was for many years a noted school teacher. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. John Charlton ten children were born, five of whom came from Iowa to Oregon, namely: Charles, now residing in Ellensburg, Wash.; James K., the special subject of this sketch; Madison, who died in Sprague, Wash.; Allen, who lives near Ellensburg, Wash.; and Mrs. William Cyrus, of Salem, Ore.

Obtaining a limited education in the subscription schools of his native town, James K. Charlton struck out for himself in 1846. Walking to Charleston, W. Va., a distance of one hundred and ten miles, he then proceeded by boat down the Big Kanawha river to the Ohio river, then down that stream, and up the Mis-

John A. Hunt

Mississippi river to Keokuk, Iowa. Continuing his journey on foot he walked sixty miles before reaching his point of destination, Fairfield, Jefferson county. Although the rich prairie land through which he passed could be bought for $1.25 per acre, he had not money enough to obtain title to a little bit of it. Going to work on a farm for $10.00 a month, he remained in that locality until the fall of the year, when he went to the Wisconsin pineries, where he remained during the winter season. Returning to Fairfield, Iowa, in the spring of 1847, he married and settled on a farm, which he conducted with fair success a number of years. Being stricken with the gold fever in 1850, he with two of his brothers crossed the Missouri river at Council Bluffs and started for California with ox-teams, taking the old California trail. On account of the prevalence of cholera along that route Mr. Charlton decided while at Fort Bridger, Wyo., to change his plans and come to Oregon. Arriving in the Willamette valley on September 8, 1850, he and his brothers spent the winter in a logging camp, then went to California, where they were engaged in prospecting a short time.

Soon afterward Mr. Charlton sailed from San Francisco for Panama and, having crossed the Isthmus on foot, took the ship Cherokee bound for New York City, from there returning to Fairfield, Iowa, by way of Chicago. Resuming his farming operations he resided there until 1853, when he moved with his family to Putnam county, Mo., where he was engaged in tilling the soil until 1866. Rigging up two wagons, one drawn by horses and the other by mules, he started, May 2, of that year, for Oregon, and arrived in Harrisburg, Linn county, July 28, 1866. Buying two hundred acres of land on the forks of the Santiam river, about eight miles east of Lebanon, he was there successfully engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1893, when he disposed of his property and moved to the village of Lebanon. Since the death of his wife, which occurred at Lebanon in 1893, Mr. Charlton has resided in Albany, where he is retired from the active cares of business.

In Iowa, in 1847, Mr. Charlton married Martha Keltner, a native of Illinois, and they became the parents of five children, namely Andrew, a farmer in Nevada; Mrs. Elizabeth Martin, who died in Albany; Henry, who is engaged in the stock and lumber business near Pendleton; Charles, who is guard in the state penitentiary at Salem, Ore.; and James. James Charlton, a finely educated young man, was first graduated from Albany College, afterward receiving his diploma from Princeton University, N. J., and then entered Columbia Law School, in New York City, where he was graduated. Returning from New York to Oregon he opened a law office in Albany. Three months later a severe attack of lung fever so prostrated him that he was forced to leave the country for the benefit of his health. Going to Denver, Colo., he was there successfully engaged in the practice of his profession until his death, January 31, 1903. Mr. Charlton is actively identified with the Democratic party and has served with fidelity and ability in public office. In 1884 he was elected sheriff of Linn county and held the position two years. He was also county commissioner for two years, performing the duties devolving upon him in that capacity with the utmost satisfaction to all concerned. He is a practical Christian and a valued member of the Baptist church.

JOHN A. HUNT. The Hunt family is deserving of especial prominence in a record of the lives of the men who have shed lustre upon the history of Oregon for many reasons, not the least of which are the facts that it is one of the oldest English families to be founded in America, as well as one of the earliest pioneer families of the state of Oregon. Its representatives have won fame on the field of battle, in the legal arena, in statecraft, in literature and in various other honorable fields of endeavor. Probably no other family has furnished to the country a greater number of men and women of distinction.

John A. Hunt inherits from his Quaker ancestors sterling traits of character and the thrift and industry which have enabled him to win a place among the most successful and honored citizens of the Willamette valley. He was born near Liberty, Ind., November 28, 1836, and is a son of John S. Hunt, a native of Smithfield, Ind. The latter emigrated to La Porte county, Ind., in 1835, erected the first house in the town of Byron, and became prominent and influential in the early undertakings of that community. After a few years' residence in that state he commenced to make preparations to cross the plains, and in March, 1847, started for Oregon, arriving at his destination with his family in the fall of that year. In the Waldo Hills, Marion county, he took up a claim, built a home, and soon afterward erected the first school-house in the vicinity. He also erected a building which he made the headquarters for his blacksmithing and gun shop, the first in the Waldo Hills. There was no lack of demand for his handiwork, and he prospered until selling out his interests in 1854. For many years thereafter he conducted a hotel in Salem, his little hostelry becoming a popular meeting ground for all who desired to learn of important local happenings. Here he died at the age of fifty-seven years, leaving behind him the legacy of a good name and a considerable property. His first wife, Temperance Estep, to whom he was married May 8, 1823, dying in 1851, he married for a second wife Mrs. Nancy Smith, widow of Dr. Smith, who died July 1, 1847, on his way to Oregon. (For further family history, the reader is referred to the sketch of Jephtha T. Hunt, which appears elsewhere in this volume.)

Although but eleven years of age when he arrived in Oregon, John A. Hunt retains a vivid recollection of his experiences on the plains, and of the part he bore in assisting in the establishment of the family in their new quarters. Naturally he spent a good deal of time about his father's shop, and he inherited the latter's mechanical ability to a great extent. At the age of twenty he began to work at the wagon-maker's trade in Salem. In 1858 he moved upon a part of his father's donation claim, which he proceeded to improve, and upon which he resided until 1877. His next place of residence was southern Oregon, where, in the vicinity of Oakland, he purchased four hundred and fifty acres of land, and lived there until 1882. Being better satisfied with Marion county, he then located on the farm where he now lives, and which consists of two hundred and twenty acres. He also owns three hundred and twenty acres of his father's old place, making his total holdings five hundred and forty acres. He carries on general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Short-horn cattle and Cotswold sheep. Located twelve miles from Salem, on the state road, this property is valuable and finely developed, and Mr. Hunt is to be congratulated upon the happy chance which directed the footsteps of his father in this direction; also upon the wise management and business ability which has enabled him to accomplish so much toward the improvement of the agricultural interests of Marion county.

Through his marriage with Mary E. Amon, which occurred on July 9, 1858, five children were born into the family of Mr. Hunt. Of these Mary Caroline is deceased; Elizabeth G. is the wife of Franklin G. Albaugh of Ashland, Ore.; Matilda A. lives at home; and the others are Howard B. and Nancy C., deceased, and an infant, deceased.

In politics independent, Mr. Hunt has exhibited a keen interest in public affairs of his neighborhood. While a resident of southern Oregon he served as a representative in the state legislature, and held numerous local offices. He was school director for many years, and school clerk during a portion of that period. He is a member of the Baptist Church, and has done much to further the interests of that denomination wherever he has resided. Mr. Hunt's life has been characterized by strict integrity and a devotion to the best interests of the public. Whenever the opportunity to assist in the furtherance of any worthy enterprises has presented itself to him, he has been found a liberal contributor toward that end. In all respects he is acknowledged to be a man of public spirit, with broad and liberal ideas regarding questions of public policy. With the history and traditions of his ancient and honored family behind him, it is hardly to be wondered at that he has always been actuated by an ambition to do nothing to bring the name into disrepute, but, on the contrary, to add to its prestige by his own good works.

REV. SAMUEL GLASGOW IRVINE, D. D. Phillips Brooks once said "Great is he who in some special location does good and helpful work for his fellowmen. Greater still is he who, doing good work in his special occupation, carries within his devotion to it a human nature so rich and true that it breaks through his profession and claims the love and honor of his fellow-men simply and truly as a man." These words emphasize the position which the late Rev. Samuel G. Irvine, D. D., occupied during his long and useful pastorate in the United Presbyterian Church of Albany, Ore. A man of deep religious convictions, the dominant forces of his character were sincerity of purpose and absolute fidelity to the higher interests of his parish and people. A certain inspiration or fervor marked his spiritual labors, and his wonderful personality attracted to him persons of all kinds and conditions, rendering his ministrations beneficial not only to those under his immediate charge but to the entire community. A descendant on both sides of the house of Scotch divines, he was born August 14, 1826, in Wooster, Ohio, and died October 31, 1895, in Albany, Ore. His father, Rev. Samuel Irvine, D. D., was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, of pure Scotch ancestry. Coming to America with his parents when young, he was brought up in Huntingdon county, Pa., where he received his elementary education. After his graduation from Jefferson College he assumed charge of the Associate Presbyterian Church at Wooster, Ohio, and subsequently preached in different localities in that state, remaining there until his death, in 1861. He married Maria Glasgow, who was born in Pennsylvania, being a descendant of an honored Scotch family that produced several ministers of note.

Receiving his early education in the public schools of Wooster and Fredericksburg, Ohio, Samuel G. Irvine subsequently worked for some time as a clerk in a general store, there acquiring such business knowledge and habits as were ever afterward of great value to him. Desirous, however, of continuing his studies, he entered Franklin College, at New Athens, where he was graduated with the degrees of A. B. and A. M. in 1845. Afterward he studied theology at Canonsburg, Pa., for two years, leaving college before graduation to accept the presidency of Muskingum College at New Concord, Ohio, and while there completed his studies under private tutors. On July 9, 1850, he was licensed to preach by the Muskingum Presbytery, by which he was ordained as a minister March 12, 1851. Subsequently preaching as opportunity afforded he had charge of a mission church in New York City from May, 1851, until the following August, when the Associate Synod appointed him as missionary in the wilds of Oregon.

Leaving New York City in August, 1851, Dr. Irvine and his wife came by way of Panama to San Francisco and after spending a few weeks in that city arrived at Willamette, Ore., in October of that year. Preaching his first sermon in Oregon City on November 9, 1851, he came up the valley the next week to Albany, where he soon after laid the foundation for his future work. Taking up a donation claim ten miles south of Albany and about a half mile east of the Willamette, he there established his home and began his ministerial labors. In common with his few neighbors he endured all the privations and hardships of pioneer life courageously, by his cheerful bravery, manliness and hearty sympathy, helping others to wisely bear their heavy burdens. His salary being meagre and educators few, he taught in a district school for a time, and for a year was an instructor in Albany College. In 1856 he was largely instrumental in merging the Associate Presbyterian Church and the Associate Reformed Church with the United Presbyterian Church, and for a number of years thereafter had charge of the Willamette and Albany churches. His influence in both organizations proved rich and salutary, his services being highly appreciated by the intelligent people that made up his congregations. As the churches grew in size and power, his time was wholly taken up by one society, so that, in 1874, he resigned his Willamette charge, from that time until the fall of 1893 devoting his work to the Albany church, his labors in the Master's vineyard, with the exception of two years spent in the east, being almost continuous for more than four decades. In 1860 he journeyed east with his family, going by way of the isthmus, and returning in 1861. In 1869 he made another visit to his eastern home and in 1878 he spent a short time in Ohio, while there being honored by his alma mater with the degree of D. D. He likewise had the distinction of serving as moderator of the General Assembly which met that year in Cambridge, Ohio. For a number of years Dr. Irvine served most faithfully as one of the trustees of Albany College, and for two terms was identified with the educational progress of the state as superintendent of the Linn county schools. He was a staunch Republican in politics, and took a keen interest in local affairs.

The doctor's last illness was long and painful, but he bore all of his afflictions without murmur, cheerfully submitting to God's will, trusting that, as the poet says, "somehow, good will be the final goal of ill." Troubled with rheumatism for many years, even to the extent of losing the sight of one eye and being threatened with total blindness, he nevertheless retained the full mental vigor for which his youth was distinguished, and continued in active service until compelled to take to his bed in August, 1892. In January, 1893, his life was brought very near to its close by an aggravated attack of pneumonia. He rallied, however, and for awhile there were bright hopes of his complete recovery. A relapse occurred in the summer, and in October, 1893, he sent in his resignation as pastor of the Albany church. The congregation, while feeling sorry to be obliged to accept the resignation of their faithful pastor and beloved friend, requested that the doctor might remain with them as pastor emeritus, which was conceded, with the provision that it should go into effect the following June. This delay gave Dr. Irvine an opportunity to act as host to the General Assembly, which was to convene in Albany at its next annual meeting. Though filled with physical suffering, his last days were filled with joy and brightness, and he passed away peacefully and quietly, as one who lies down to pleasant slumber.

Marked with some acts of goodness every day;
And watched by eyes that loved him, calm and sage,
Faded his late declining years away;
Cheerful he gave his being up and went To share the holy rest that waits a life well spent."

Dr. Irvine married first, March 27, 1851, in Cambridge, Ohio, Mary Rainey, who was born in Ireland, and came to America with her father, William Rainey, for many years a prominent merchant of Cambridge. She was a woman of culture and a graduate of Steubenville Seminary, Ohio. She died in the spring of 1869, leaving four children, namely: Maria, a graduate of Albany College, married W. H. Gaston, and died in Tacoma, Wash., in 1896; Mrs. Cora J. Stewart, of Albany, who was also graduated from Albany College; Elizabeth, of Albany, was graduated from Muskingum College, New Concord, Ohio; and O. H., formerly an attorney at McMinnville, Ore., died in 1901. The doctor married for his second wife, December 6, 1871, Mrs. Margaret M. Osburn, of Peoria, Ore. Mrs. Irvine was born in Warren county, Ill., near Little York. Her father, James Martin, a native of Cambridge, Ohio, and of thrifty Scotch-Irish ancestry, was an early settler of Illinois, and one of its pioneer farmers. Starting for Oregon in 1852 he left Missouri in April, crossing the plains with mule and horse teams, and arrived in Peoria, Linn county, Ore., in September, 1852, bringing with him his wife and child. Purchasing land, he cleared a good farm, and was here engaged in his chosen occupation during his remaining years. His wife, whose maiden name was Nancy Smith, was born in Pennsylvania and died in Linn county, Ore., in 1894. Both were members of the United Presbyterian Church. Margaret M. Martin, their only child, married first Alfred H. Osburn, a native of Pennsylvania, and for many years a teacher in Linn county schools. He died in manhood's prime, leaving one child, Nancy Temperance, wife of J. W. Blain, of Oakland, Cal. Dr. and Mrs. Irvine became the parents of two children, namely: Samuel E. and J. Clement. Samuel E. Irvine, who was graduated from both the Albany and the Monmouth colleges, studied theology at Allegheny Seminary, and is now pastor of the United Presbyterian Church at Etna, Pa. J. Clement Irvine, a graduate of Albany College, is now assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Albany.

PETER RILEY. Representing the agricultural interests of Linn county as one of its best and most favorably known farmers and stock-raisers is Peter Riley, of Albany, who has won an extended reputation as a breeder of fine horses, in that special branch of industry being one of the most prominent men of the Willamette valley. Beginning the battle of life for himself when but a boy, he has steadily trod the pathway of success, advancing step by step, and now occupies a firm position among the most prosperous citizens of the town or county, being highly esteemed for his many fine traits of character. A son of Edward Riley he was born April 15, 1846, in County Kildare, Ireland, the home of his ancestors for many generations. His paternal grandfather, John Riley, emigrated from the Emerald Isle to the United States and settled in St. Louis, Mo., where he followed his trade of a merchant tailor until his death.

Born and brought up in Ireland, Edward Riley first came to the United States when about twenty-three years of age. A merchant tailor by trade, he followed it first in Chicago, Ill., then in St. Louis, Mo., where he was made a citizen of the United States. Subsequently returning to the scenes of his childhood, he married a fair Irish maiden, Catherine Swords, and settled in County Kildare, where he remained until after the death of his wife. Coming again to America with his motherless children he settled in Jamaica, Long Island, where he followed his former trade with good success. Of his nine children seven survive, Peter, the special subject of this sketch, being the fourth child in succession of birth.

Being but twelve years of age when he crossed the ocean with his father in 1858, Peter Riley completed his early education in the public schools of Jamaica, Long Island, studying three years. Beginning life as a wage-earner in 1861, he was tow boy on the Lehigh canal for a short time. Anxious to see more of his adopted country, he started for California in 1865, taking the Panama route from New York City to San Francisco. Arriving on the coast he worked on a farm a short time, afterward being brakeman on the Central Pacific Railroad for a year. Subsequently locating in Wheatland, Cal., he worked on a farm, and then resumed railroad work, being first employed on the San Joaquin Railway, afterward being on the Sacramento and Vallejo Railroad, and on the branch road extending to Marysville. Crossing the mountains with a mule train in 1869 Mr. Riley came to Oregon as an employe of the construction company that had charge of the building of that part of what is now the Southern Pacific Railroad, extending from Salem, Ore., to Roseburg. Continuing with the same company he subsequently assisted in building the branch of the Northern Pacific Railway that extends from Kalama, Wash., to Tacoma, Wash., being foreman and having charge of the teams.

On the completion of the road, Mr. Riley located in Linn county, Ore., where he purchased two hundred acres of land lying two miles north of Albany along the river. Embarking in the wool business he has met with signal success, keeping a fine grade of Angora goats, which have proved profitable in this locality. In addition he is extensively interested in breeding draft horses, making a specialty of the Clydesdale and Percheron, also keeping a choice stock of French and Belgian horses. He formerly owned a noted Percheron stallion, Desires, imported by Dunliam, and now owns a fine stallion, Don, imported from Belgium, and the registered Clydesdale stallion, Junius. Among the younger stallions that he is raising are Percherons, Clydesdales and Belgians, all of superior stock and breed. Mr. Riley is an extensive landholder, owning the entire block bounded by Jackson, Railroad, Third and Fourth streets, and here has his fine residence, his large barns and woodyard. He carries on general farming on a large scale.

In Marion county, Ore., Mr. Riley married Mary Hunt, who was born in that county, a daughter of Thomas Hunt, a pioneer settler, who located there in 1847. Five children have been born to their union, namely: Thomas Edward, with the Corvallis & Eastern Railway Company; James Valentine, a horseman, engaged in business with his father; Katie, who died at the age of twelve years; Nellie M., wife of John Scott, of Albany; and William. Politically Mr. Riley supports the principles of the Democratic party by voice and vote, and was formerly a member of the County Central Committee. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of the Maccabees.

CHARLES CARROLL STRATTON, A. M., D. D., was born in Tioga county, Pa., of New England ancestry, his mother, Lavinia Fitch, being from Vermont, and his father, Curtis P. Stratton, from Hartford county, Conn. Through his paternal grandmother, whose maiden name was Hannah Adams, he was related to the Connecticut branch of the Adams family. His father's ancestors run back in New England to the first half of the seventeenth century, and thence to London, where the family emerges into recorded recognition as early as 1520.

In 1837 Curtis P. and Lavinia Stratton, with their young children, removed from Pennsylvania to Jefferson county, Ind., and settled a short distance back of Madison, on the Ohio river. About the same time also Myron Stratton, a younger brother, came west from Pennsylvania and settled in Jeffersonville, Ind. This was the father of Winfield Scott Stratton, well known as the owner of the Independence mine, but to be known hereafter much better and longer as the munificent founder of the Myron Stratton Home in Colorado Springs, for the aged and infirm. In 1852 the father and oldest brother, Riley E. Stratton, afterwards of the Oregon bar and bench, came to the Pacific coast around Cape Horn. After stopping for a time in California they came on to Oregon, for which they had originally started, and after looking over the country for a time wrote for the remaining members of the family to sell their belongings in Indiana and meet them in Oregon. This was effected and the journey across the plains with ox teams was accomplished with the usual privations, hardships and dangers, but without any serious disaster. The family at this time consisted of the father and mother, then fifty-four and fifty-one years of age, respectively, and ten children—five sons and five daughters. The parents were truthful, honest, plain people of good antecedents and blood, who desired to give their children the best education in their power, and train them to habits of truthfulness, industry and thrift.

The eldest son, Riley Evans Stratton, was then thirty-two years of age, a classical graduate of Farmers' College (Ohio), a junior member of the Madison (Indiana) bar, and married to Sarah M. Dearborn, of an old family in that city, a woman of many attractions of mind and person. After the death of Judge Stratton she married Smith Kearney, a well known Portland capitalist.

Soon after settling in southern Oregon Mr. Stratton was elected prosecuting attorney and on the admission of Oregon into the Union as a state he was elected to the bench of his circuit and became ex officio a justice of the Supreme Court of the state. He was an easy, graceful and lucid public speaker and upright judge, and his early death at the age of forty-four years cut short a promising career. The next surviving member of the family was Delia C., then the wife of James I. Patton, who, with their young family, were among the early settlers of the Umpqua valley. Following her was Sarah Victoria, afterwards wife and widow of Harvey Gordon, editor and proprietor of the Oregon Statesman, after A. Bush, and his successor as state printer, a man of brilliant gifts and great promise, whose career was terminated by a premature death when but little over thirty years of age. The next of the family in order of age was Charles Carroll, the subject of this sketch, the leading incidents of whose life will follow later. After him came Horace Fitch, at one time a member of the lower house of the Oregon legislature and later a member and president of the council in the Washington legislature. Milton Adams, the first of the family born in Indiana, was well known in business circles in Salem, Oregon City and Portland. He served a term as mayor in Oregon City and was president of the First National Bank of East Portland at the time of his death, in 1895. All of the remaining members of the family were born in Indiana. Lura Melvina married Archibald Simmons and lived and died in Springfield, near Eugene, where her children and grandchildren still reside. Augusta Josephine married Dr. Samuel Whittimore, at the time assistant surgeon in the navy, and later in the United States army. He died in 1898 and his family reside in Washington. Judge Julius Augustin has chosen Seattle for his home. He began life as a printer in Salem, Ore. This enabled him to make his way through the classical course of Willamette University. By the same means he studied law and was admitted to the bar in Salem. After several years of successful practice there, during which time he was reporter for the Supreme Court, he removed to Seattle, where he acquired a large and lucrative practice, was for a term on the bench of the Superior Court, and now lives in comfortable retirement. Irene Hasseltine is the youngest daughter and child. She married Parrish L. Willis, a well known and wealthy attorney of Portland, Ore. He has represented his district as a member of the state senate and been an efficient promoter of many local enterprises by which the welfare of the city has been advanced.

Of this large family of twelve children—for two sleep in Indiana—Charles Carroll was the sixth. Stimulated by the example of his older brother, reinforced by his own tastes, he resolved early in life to become a scholar, as that term was then understood, and moved by his moral convictions to become a minister. His plans were postponed and somewhat marred by the unwillingness of his mother to go to the Pacific coast without him, as money which he had begun to lay aside was spent in the journey to the Pacific and he had to make the best of the imperfect educational advantages of the young state. His first season was spent with his brothers Horace and Milton in aiding his father on the new farm in the Umpqua valley where the family first settled. Then he joined a surveying party in the mountains for several months. The net proceeds of this service were less than $200, but with this he started for Salem, the seat of the newly chartered Willamette University, at that time the most promising of the two or three institutions, of large name and hope but slender facilities, within reach. Being an expert penman he was able to supplement his inadequate means by writing one-half of each day in the adjutant-general's office and by this means remained in school. This continued until the sophomore year, in 1858. His classmates at this time were J. A. Odell, T. L. Davidson, Roswell L. Lamson and James Carey. For different reasons these young men had to leave the institution and he, being left alone, was advised by President F. S. Hoyt to leave the school for the present, enter the Oregon conference for which he was preparing, bring up his studies as he best could, and graduate later. This advice he pursued, and took his final examinations and received the degree of A. B. from the university in 1860, at thirty-six years of age. Meantime he had been pastor in Dallas, Roseburg, Jacksonville, Oregon City, Olympia and Portland and was at that time pastor in Salem.

In 1860, while pastor in Roseburg, he had married Julia Elenor Waller, daughter of Rev. A. F. Waller, one of the early missionaries sent out to evangelize the Indians of Oregon. Those who knew the sterling qualities of Father Waller during his lifetime, and the equally sterling qualities of Elepha Waller, his wife, will not need to be assured that Dr. Stratton found in his wife a worthy helpmate. To them have been born two children, Mary Elepha and Harvey Gordon, who are still with them.

The year following his graduation Dr. Stratton was elected to the chair of natural science in his alma mater, but was dissuaded by Bishop Ames from accepting, and received the appointment of presiding elder of the Portland district. Up to this time he had been for six years secretary of the conference, but this appointment forbade his re-election. In the fall of 1871 he was selected by his conference to represent them in the general conference, which met in Brooklyn in 1872. This was the first general conference wherein lay delegates were admitted, and as the episcopate was to be strengthened and it was finally decided to elect eight additional bishops, the session was of more than ordinary interest. He has been a member of two general conferences since, in 1880 and 1892, but thinks this one altogether the most interesting in his experience.

On the way to and from the general conference Dr. Stratton stopped off at Salt Lake City, and soon after returning to Salem, where he now lived, a telegram was received from Bishop Foster appointing him to the First Methodist Episcopal Church in that place. The three years which followed were years of great activity and devoted especially to completing the building of the First Church there and setting forward its religious interests. This was the third prominent church enterprise with which he had been identified, viz., the First Church of Portland, still the hive of Methodism there; the First Church, Salem, toward which he had secured over $20,000 on subscription, laid the cornerstone and begun the superstructure, and now the Salt Lake City Church. At the end of his pastorate there he transferred to the California conference and was appointed to the pastorate of the First Church in San Jose. Here were spent two quiet and useful years. Before the end of the second year he was elected president of the University of the Pacific, many of the students and most of the faculty of which had been his parishioners during the two years of his pastorate there. The next ten years were full of responsibility and services, with some degree of success, as well. The year following his election to the presidency of the university he was requested to organize and lead the Chautauqua movement on the Pacific coast. On the death of Bishop E. O. Haven he designated Dr. Stratton as his literary executor, to edit and complete an autobiography, at that time about half done, and to publish, if the demand should justify, selections from his sermons and university lectures. The autobiography was completed and published at once; the sermons and lectures await a more encouraging market. Meantime the university and the Chautauqua associations made steady progress; and the university buildings, catalogues and financial statements of that period bear testimony to its substantial improvement.

At this time Dr. Stratton's excessive overwork began to tell upon his health and symptoms of paralysis led him to listen to the advice of his physician, Dr. Wythe, to resign both as president of the university and as leader of the Chautauqua movement. Every reasonable inducement was held out for him to remain, especially in the university, and these inducements were renewed after the retirement of Dr. Hirst, his successor there, and after his own return to Oregon, but considerations on the other side overbalanced them and he persisted in his resolution. During this period of educational work Dr. Stratton was especially remembered by fellow educators, the degree of D. D. having been conferred by the Willamette, Ohio Wesleyan and Northwestern Universities. He is also a life director of the National Educational Association. Soon after this overtures began coming from his friends in Oregon, and especially from President Van Scoy of Willamette University, looking to his return to his early field as chancellor of that institution. All of these letters contained information that a plan was on foot which had taken definite shape at the last session of the Oregon conference, by the appointment of a large committee of influential members to confer with a similar committee to be designated by the trustees of the university as to the selection of a more suitable point and site for the institution. In this correspondence Portland was the point generally favored, especially by Dr. Van Scoy. All of this preceded Dr. Stratton's return to Oregon and was intended to pave the way therefor. His selection as head of Willamette University; his return to Oregon; the action of the joint committee above referred to in selecting Portland as the point for the building of what was intended to be a great university; the ratification of this action by an overwhelming majority of the Oregon conference and the refusal of the trustees of Willamette to accept the report of their own committee are matters of history.

It was not in contemplation that Willamette University should cease to be an educational center or that its property should be interfered with, but that its grade should be changed, that it should be affiliated with the larger and better located central institutions, in common with other institutions to be located in different parts of the state and northwest was proposed.

The organization of Portland University, the selection of trustees to represent the business lay element of the northwest, the alumni of the institution, and the Oregon, Puget Sound, Columbia river and Idaho conferences, the election of H. W. Scott as president of the board, and, notwithstanding his many engagements, his acceptance of the trust with his accustomed public spirit, the election of Dr. Stratton as president of the institution, the selection of the site at University Park, the purchase of the land, the organization of the Portland Guarantee Company to endorse the bonds by which the lands were to be paid for, the early promise of the school, the failure of its finances under the collapse of 1894-5 and 6 are known to all. But it is not so well known that the sales of University Park property during the years 1892-3 and 4 were sufficient to provide for the interest on the total indebtedness, the redemption of the bonds at maturity and leave a large surplus in land for permanent endowment. The lands were sold on contracts and were to be paid for in one, two and three years. On account of the pressure of the times and the decline of prices, payments on these purchases defaulted in shoals. After a time this general defaulting of purchasers of property resulted in the stoppage of interest payments on bonds. Then followed legal complications and the property finally passed into the hands of one of the religious orders of the Catholic Church. The influences which operated against the payments for the lands sold at University Park tended to stop the collection of subscriptions toward the University building fund. Many thousands of dollars in pledges which had been depended on to meet payments on contracts with builders defaulted. In order to protect the credit of the University, President Stratton drew on private funds while they lasted and then used his credit until it became necessary for him to retire from the University and look after the welfare of his family. All of these matters have been dwelt upon with so much detail because they were so intimately related to the life of our subject. The fate of Portland University he sometimes speaks of as his crucifixion. It has in a measure turned him aside from his chosen calling and shadowed the closing years of his life.

Dr. Stratton's family still reside at University Park, while most of his time is spent in Chicago, until he can complete his plans and retire to the rest befitting his years and to the home circle for which he longs.

EUGENE LINCOLN REMINGTON. One of the most expert machinists as well as large property owners of Woodburn is Eugene Lincoln Remington, owner and proprietor of Remington's bicycle and gun store, recognized as one of the reliable and necessary adjuncts of the city. This oldest resident of the first town of Woodburn is a native son of the golden west, and was born east of Silverton, Ore., March 24, 1867. His father, Marquis de LaFayette Remington, and his grandfather, Col. Virgilius E., a physician who was born June 6, 1805, in Greenville, Hampden county, Mass., were identified with the old Mormon town of Nauvoo, Hancock county, Ill., where the former was born February 2, 1847, on Laharp Prairie, and where the latter participated in the Mormon troubles which will ever be a blot upon the fair name of the little Mississippi river city. Nauvoo, founded by the Mormons in 1840, became an eyesore to the reputable citizens of the state, and the sect was driven out through the capture, and subsequent shooting at Carthage, of the chief Mormon agitator, Joe Smith. Col. Virgilius E. Remington had the honor of capturing this noted disciple of the church, but he was averse to shooting him, although he ever after got the credit for securing his ignominious end. Somewhat fearful of his fate at the hands of the accusing Mormons, and also because of a progressive nature which recognized superior advantages in the west, the grandfather crossed the plains with his family in '49 with ox teams, locating at Roseville Junction, Cal. He was very successful in mining, and became a well known figure there, and he now sleeps under an old oak tree on the outskirts of the town. Colonel Remington was a Master Mason. The marriage of Colonel Remington united him with Esther E. Doud, who was born May 3, 1808, in Canton, Hartford county, Conn., and died in Silverton, Ore., September 14, 1884. Of this union were born the following children: Virgilius D., born November 26, 1826, in Fowler, Trumbull county, Ohio, died August 29, 1898, at Whiteson, Yamhill county, Ore.; Esther M., born September 4, 1829, and died October 26, 1829, in Fowler, Trumbull county, Ohio; Lucius C., born May 31, 1831, in Fowler, Trumbull county, Ohio, and died September 28, 1858, in Placer county, Cal.; Elmore S., born May 13, 1833, in Mecca, Trumbull county, Ohio, and is living in Whiteson, Yamhill county, Ore.; Juliett L., born July 7, 1836, in Warren, Trumbull county, Ohio, and died October 13, 1889. She married Peter Rauch, who is living in Silverton. Evaline E., born September 5, 1839, in Macomb, Ill., and married J. H. Hadley, now deceased; she is living in Silverton, Ore.; John J. B., born August 3, 1841, in Mills, McDonough county, Ill., died September 8, 1858, in Placer county, Cal.; Josephine M., born March 4, 1844, in Mills, Ill., and died September 3, 1846; Marquis de LaFayette, the father of Eugene Lincoln Remington; Francis M., born August 16, 1849, on Macomb Prairie, Ill., and is now a hardware merchant in Culesac, Idaho.

Marquis de LaFayette Remington was seven years of age when he crossed the plains with his father. He was reared at Roseville Junction, Cal., until after the death of his father, January 14, 1858, in Placer county. With his mother and two brothers he came to Beaverton, Ore., in 1854, and on rented land engaged in farming until about 1863. He then moved near Silverton. There he bought one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, working this until 1870, when he located in Woodburn and engaged in blacksmithing. About 1882 he started a foundry and general machine shop, the successful operation of which netted him a fair income up to the time of his death at the age of fifty-one years. Mr. Remington was a mechanical genius, and was at the head of that business in his city, contributing a remarkable inventive talent towards the advancement of mechanical ideas. He invented and patented the Remington traction engine, the patent of which was sold to the Best Manufacturing Company, of San Leandro, Cal., and is still being manufactured by them. Other patents of labor-saving machinery and appliances are also attributable to his ingenuity. His plant sustained a severe loss in the fire of 1886, when he lost about $10,000 in building and machinery. Mr. Remington married Helen Elmyra Welch, who was born January 14, 1850, in St. Marys, Hancock county, Ill., and died in Woodburn, Ore., November 25, 1893. May 5, 1855, the Welch family started for California, going by rail to New York and then by steamer to the Isthmus of Panama, crossing by rail. The steamer Golden Gate landed them in San Francisco May 31, 1855. In 1859 they started for Oregon with teams. The Welch family lived near the Remingtons in California, and they were not divided in Oregon, for Thomas Welch settled on a farm northeast of Silverton, where he died September 1, 1899, at the age of sixty-five years. He was a native of Kentucky, while his wife, Lucinda C. (Tyrrell) Welch, was born in Tyrrell Hill, Trumbull county, Ohio, December, 4, 1826, and died in Woodburn, Ore., April 20, 1901, at the age of seventy-four years. Mrs. Remington, who died in Oregon in 1893, at the age of forty-one, was the mother of four children, two sons and two daughters, of whom three are living, Eugene Lincoln being the oldest. The oldest daughter in the family, Ella Atlanta, born September 8, 1860, was the wife of Timothy M. Hicks, and died November 7, 1887; Zella Esther, born August 12, 1876, is the wife of F. M. Harcastle, of Woodburn; and Laverne Thomas, born June 14, 1884, is living with his brother, Eugene Lincoln.

The necessity for assisting with the family maintenance at a very early age interfered with the education of Eugene Lincoln Remington, and his knowledge has therefore been self acquired. As a lad of thirteen he was busily engaged in his father's machine shop, and after learning the business he continued with his sire, becoming a partner in the firm in 1888, at the age of twenty-one. After the fire he engaged in the sporting goods business, carrying a complete stock of bicycles, guns, and general paraphernalia, in 1900 moving into the new store building which has supplanted the original machine shop. He has been very successful in disposing of his superior brand of wheels, and is well versed as to the respective merits of the wheels that come under his observation. No one in the county turns out more satisfactory repair work, and the line of guns, ammunition, and general sporting accessories is complete and up-to-date in every respect.

In 1891 Mr. Remington was united in marriage with Ida May Bancroft, a native of Lodi, Wis., who came to Oregon in 1889, locating at Woodburn. Her father, Henry L. Bancroft, is living in retirement in Woodburn, and has to his credit a meritorious record as a soldier during the Civil war. Three children have blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Remington, two sons and one daughter, namely: Charles Adrian, born March 10, 1894; Ferris Herbert, born August 4, 1895; and Mildred Myrtle, born September 30, 1902. Since casting his first presidential vote Mr. Remington has been allied with the Republican party, and has taken an active part in local politics of his city. He is fraternally connected with Woodburn Lodge No. 102, I. O. O. F., and is very active in that organization, being past grand, and has been twice representative to the Grand Lodge. With his wife he is also a member of Home Lodge No. 58, of the Rebekahs, Mrs. Remington having passed all the chairs of same. With his brother Mr. Remington owns the Remington Hall, and with their sister two residences; he built the one in which he lives. He is progressive, is anxious to increase his business knowledge, and has a keen interest in all that pertains to the general welfare of his community.

DAVID McCULLY. At his home in Salem, David McCully is now spending the evening of his life in retirement, having given the strength of his manhood for nearly a quarter of a century to the upbuilding of this commonwealth before he laid down the burdens and responsibilities of active life. He came to Oregon in 1852, a man of middle age, with the better part of his future still before him, and has since become one of the most prominent men in the Willamette valley, having been for many years identified with the commercial activity of the state.

David McCully was born in Sussexvale, New Brunswick, Canada, September 15, 1814, and comes of sturdy Scotch ancestry. His father, John McCully, was born in Nova Scotia in 1785. He was married in Maine to Mary Kopp, a native of that state, born in Eastport in 1788. They located in New Brunswick, where he engaged in business as a farmer, an occupation to which he devoted his entire life. In 1822 he removed with his family to Jefferson county, Ohio, where his death occurred in 1830. Six years after the death of Mr. McCully, his widow married John McPherson. In 1844 they removed to Iowa, settling in Henry county. Thence they emigrated to Oregon and there, in the home which she had helped to establish, in Linn county, Mrs. Mary (Kopp) McPherson died in 1872, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. Of the five sons and one daughter born to John and Mary McCully, by the latter's first marriage, the subject of this brief memoir was the second in the order of birth. He has one brother living—William H., the youngest of the family, now a resident of Brownsville, Ore.

In 1849 David McCully and his brother Asa had crossed the plains to California, where they were successfully engaged in mining until November 20 of that year. They then returned to their home by the water route. Less than three years later they again made the journey across the plains in company with the family, arriving in Salem August 17, 1852. From this city they continued on to Harrisburg, Linn county, and spent their first winter there, erecting the first house in that town and establishing the first general merchandise business there. Until March, 1858, they remained in that place, when Mr. McCully and his brother took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres adjacent to Harrisburg. Later in that year they located in Salem. In 1859 Mr. McCully and J. L. Starkey bought the business of Cohn & Fish, a dry goods and grocery firm of Salem. In 1860 Mr. Starkey disposed of his interest to Wall Smith, and the firm of Smith & McCully continued the business until 1864. Mr. McCully then sold a third of his interest in the store and engaged in river transportation. The company formed was known as the People's Transportation Company, and operated on the Columbia and Willamette rivers. Mr. McCully succeeded Stephen Coffin as president of this corporation. In the meantime financial troubles had overtaken the company, which of necessity was reorganized, paid its indebtedness and elected Mr. McCully to the presidency. One year later he resigned the post, and his brother Asa was elected as his successor.

The interests of the two McCully brothers continued to be centered in this important undertaking for eight years; and with ten steamboats on the Willamette and the Columbia rivers, the returns were remunerative enough amply to satisfy their desires. Through their direct efforts a business which had been a losing venture for some time was almost at once placed on a paying basis, and the great concern with which their name will always be indelibly associated accomplished as much, if not more, toward the development of the resources of the Willamette valley, the most important section of the state, than any other influence of the early days.

After relinquishing his interest in the transportation business, Mr. McCully engaged once more in general merchandising in Salem. In 1875 he disposed permanently of his share of the business and retired to private life. Though not now actively identified with any of the undertakings of Salem, he holds an interest in the bank and water-works system of Joseph, Wallowa county.

May 7, 1840, Mr. McCully was united in marriage with Mary N. Scott, who was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, October 16, 1821, and died in Salem November 21, 1895. They became the parents of seven children, of whom five are living, as follows: Mary J., widow of John Creighton of Salem; John W., a resident of Union county, Ore.; Alfred, an engineer on the steamer Gray Eagle, and a resident of Clackamas county, Ore.; Estella Ann, wife of A. N. Gilbert of Salem; and Frank D., a resident of Joseph, Wallowa county.

A Republican in politics, Mr. McCully has exhibited a keen interest in municipal affairs, and has never tried to evade his duty in any public service. In 1874-75 he served as a member of the Salem city council, where his influence was exerted toward the advancement of the general welfare. In closing this brief outline of the career of one of the most worthy citizens of Oregon, it is but just to make a permanent record of the high esteem in which Mr. McCully is held by those who, during the half century of his residence in the state, have learned to appreciate the many traits of character which have caused him to be loved and honored. Perhaps the first and highest of these characteristics has been his unselfish devotion to those manly principles which actuate men to do everything in their power toward elevating the moral and social standing of their own communities. His splendid personality in itself has been a potent factor in giving him an influential position among men, and the fine principles which have guided him through life have served as a silent precept and example for others. The history of his life should be a source of inspiration to the young men of the present generation, as well as of justifiable pride to his family and his friends.

It is with genuine pleasure that those responsible for this publication give to him a permanent and prominent place among the honored, influential, generous-hearted and public-spirited men of the Willamette valley. The engraving which appears in this volume was made from a photograph taken especially for the purpose, in July, 1903, and preserves his likeness as he will be best remembered by his numerous friends in Salem and elsewhere.

SAMUEL COAD. Typical of the safe, solid, and substantial element which has contributed to the upbuilding of Oregon is Samuel Coad, a pioneer of 1853, and at times interested in many of the enterprises represented on the coast. For some years he has been a resident of Dallas, where he is engaged principally in the real estate business, and where he owns considerable valuable property. Mr. Coad was born in Westmoreland county, Pa., February 19, 1833, a son of John and Jane (Jeffrey) Coad, natives of England, the latter dying in Minnesota. John Coad entered the English army at the age of nineteen, and in the war with France was taken prisoner and retained until exchanged. Some of his children were born in England, and accompanied him to America, settling in Westmoreland, Pa., where he engaged in farming and canal boating. In 1842 he removed to near Burlington, Iowa, where he lived on a farm for some years. His death occurred in Allegheny, Pa., at the age of eighty years. The original spelling of the name was Coade, but for convenience the terminating letter has been abolished.

The second of the eleven children born to his parents, Samuel Coad is the only one of his family to come to Oregon. He was nine years old when he went to live near Burlington, Iowa, and he there attended the public schools and served an apprenticeship to a carpenter. In 1853 he joined the overland train which had as fellow-travelers John Wolverton and Mr. Nealy, and on the way drove an ox team, five months elapsing between the start and the arrival at Foster's. Arriving in due time at Salem he worked at his trade, but the same fall located in Spring Valley, Polk county, where he built and contracted for a couple of years. Afterward he continued his occupation on the Luckiamute, and also tried his fortune at prospecting for gold in the Rogue river district. Not being very successful, he returned to carpentering as a surer means of livelihood, and about this time the government was beginning to erect blockhouses for protection in dealing with the Indians. Mr. Coad helped to build these primitive defenses, and in 1855 became an active participator in the great Indian struggle. As a soldier in Company B, First Oregon Volunteer Infantry under command of Captain Burch he served for about four months, and during that time participated in the engagement on Snake river, and was also disabled by an accident. Later he built more defenses for the government, among them being the fort in King's Valley.

On the Luckiamute Mr. Coad worked at carpentering after the war, and in 1853 married Henrietta Gilliam, youngest daughter of General Gilliam, recalled as one of the intrepid pioneers and Indian fighters of Oregon, and mentioned at length in another part of this work. After marriage he settled on a farm on the Peedee for about seven years, and then, having sold his property, bought another farm three and one-half miles east of Dallas. However, he rented out his farm and engaged in building in Dallas, and also built the woolen mills at Ellendale, returning after a couple of years to the farm. Three years later he sold his farm and came to Dallas, the better to educate his children, and that he might start a drug business on Main street, in partnership with his brother-in-law, B. F. Nichols. His health failing at the end of a year, he sold his interest in the store and clerked for a year in the dry goods store of W. C. Brown, thereafter purchasing four hundred acres of sheep land west of Dallas, which he traded at the end of three months for a farm containing the same amount of land. At the end of a year this also was sold, and Mr. Coad returned to clerking in the town, where his life was saddened by the death of his wife in April, 1875. The following year he married Anna McNeal, who was born in Dodge county, Neb., a daughter of Abram McNeal, who removed from his native state of New York to Michigan, and from there to Dodge county, Neb., of which he was an early settler. His farm was located on the military road, and here Mrs. Coad and her twin sister were born, the first white children of the county. In 1860 Mr. McNeal crossed the plains with a four horse team to San Francisco, and the following year came to Salem, where he built and contracted until removing to Tacoma, Wash., where he died at the age of sixty. His wife was Annie Beebe, who was born in Michigan, a daughter of Walter Beebe, who was accidentally killed on the way to the coast, his wife surviving him until ninety-two years of age. Mrs. McNeal died in Nebraska in 1858, and her daughter, Mrs. Coad, was reared by Mrs. E. G. Emmens from her fifth year, or from 1862. Mrs. Emmens proved a mother indeed to the young girl, and the association begun thus early has gained in intimacy and affection to the present time. Mrs. Coad was educated in the public schools and at La Creole Academy, and when very young evinced that decided talent for oil painting which has placed her among the foremost artists of this class in the county. She is the mother of two sons, of whom J. E. is a resident of Portland, and George R. is in Dallas.

After his second marriage Mr. Coad settled on a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, and after a year he purchased a drug store in the town, of which he was manager and proprietor for two years. For the following seven years he lived on the old Grant place, since disposing of which he has lived in Dallas, and has in the meantime managed a great deal of town and city property. He is the owner of large real estate interests, including both business and residence property, and is the owner of the Odd Fellows Building. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and for more than thirty years has been a welcome member of various lodges. Politically he has ever espoused the Republican cause, and was one of the organizers of the party in this county. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church and of the Oregon Pioneers' Association. Mrs. Coad is a member of the home chapter of the Eastern Star. Five children were born of the first marriage of Mr. Coad, and of these, Frank J. is engaged in the sash and door manufacturing business; C. G. is postmaster of this town; Maggie is the deceased wife of T. B. Rowell; Mary is the wife of J. B. Stamp of Monmouth; and Henrietta died at the age of seventeen.

WILLIAM GRANT. Four years ago William Grant retired from active business in Dallas, after contributing towards the development of the city to the extent of erecting the majority of her residences and public buildings. This honored citizen is entitled to a place par excellence among the pioneers of this locality, as he was only three years of age when he came to Oregon in 1844, locating on a claim immediately adjoining the present city of Dallas. No one now living within the borders of the flourishing little municipality can more authoritatively speak of the early days, nor have any at their command more interesting anecdotes of the struggles and successes of those who were responsible for the first impetus forward.

To go to the beginning of authentic knowledge concerning the family of Mr. Grant, one learns that his ancestors lived in Scotland, and were first represented in America by the paternal great-great-grandfather, who left the seat of religious and political persecution in his native land and settled presumably in Virginia. At any rate, some of his descendants found their way to the old Dominion state, for here was born the paternal grandfather, Richard Grant, who removed to Tennessee, and finally died in Platte county, Mo. His son, David, the father of William, was born in Cocke county, Tenn., in 1810, and in his youth was a farmer in both Tennessee and Missouri. In the latter state he married America, daughter of Gen. Cornelius Gilliam, a record of whose life may be found elsewhere in this work. Two children were born of this union in Missouri, one of whom, William, was born in Jackson county, July 10, 1841. The father crossed the plains with his little family in 1844, and took up a claim of six hundred and forty acres adjoining Dallas on the east, which he found to be exceedingly wild, and upon which he erected a little log cabin for the temporary accommodation of his family. His home in the wilderness soon took on a semblance of order, and the passing years found him a successful and well contented man, than whom no more honest or public-spirited lived hereabouts. He was highly esteemed, and invariably affectionately called Uncle Dave Grant. Everyone had a pleasant word for him, and everyone in the neighborhood revered him for his sincerity and extreme temperance in all directions. He lived on the pioneer farm until 1879, and that year built himself a home in Dallas, where he lived in retirement until his death in 1880 at the age of seventy years. William is the only one of the four children in his father's family now living, Mary A., the other one who crossed the plains in '44, having died soon after coming to Oregon, at the age of three. Margaret, who was born in Oregon, and who became Mrs. Elkins, died in Redlands, Cal.; and Martha Ellen, also born in Oregon, married Monroe Burford and died in Clatskanie, Columbia county, Ore.

William Grant distinctly recalls the first log schoolhouse erected in the neighborhood of Dallas, and in fact the first in Polk county, which was just inside of what constitutes the present corporation of Dallas City. It had a dirt floor, with puncheon seats, and was located among the stately and beautiful oaks. That the diminutive William might not be lost on the way to and from school the father plowed a furrow from his home westerly to the schoolhouse and in this furrow the little fellow walked to receive his first instruction at the hands of the pioneer schoolmaster, William Snyder. Having imbibed all of the knowledge possible at the primitive school he attended the opening of La Creole Academy, of which his father was one of the organizers, trustees and upbuilders, and where he continued to be a student for several years. During 1861-2 he tried his fortunes in the mines at Florence, Idaho, and in the latter part of '62 married Beatrice Aurelia Robertson, born in Missouri, and who came to Oregon, via Panama with her father, William Robertson, in 1852. William Robertson was a miller by trade and settled near Bollston, finally removing to Springfield, Lane county, where he conducted a mill, until his death in 1874.

In 1864 Mr. Grant enlisted as a soldier in Company A, First Oregon Infantry, U. S. V., and served on the frontier against the invading red men. So commendable were his services, that he was made a lieutenant in February, 1865, and thereafter continued to serve until June 19, 1866, when he resigned and was mustered out in Salem. The following year he engaged in the hotel business in Dallas. He then removed to Springfield, Linn county, where he engaged in building and contracting for seven years, following which, he continued the same occupation in Lebanon, Linn county, for four years. He became permanently identified with building interests in Dallas in 1879, and during the following years put up about all of the important buildings in the city. At present he owns one hundred acres of the old donation claim settled by his father in 1844, and here he has a fine orchard of ten acres, devoted mostly to prune culture.

Mr. Grant has identified himself with the most progressive enterprises in Dallas and vicinity, and has been especially active in Republican politics. Although rocked in the cradle of Democracy, he has always applauded Republican principles, and he has been called upon to fill many offices of trust and responsibility in his neighborhood. He served as deputy county sheriff and clerk, and was elected county treasurer in June, 1864. The following June he took the oath of office, but in November resigned to enter the Civil war. He is a member of the Polk County Pioneer Association, and the Dallas Post G. A. R., of which he is past commander. Fraternaly Mr. Grant is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in religion is a member of the Christian Church. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Grant: U. S., engaged in raising fine goats, and inspector of the American Angora Association; Glen Oscar, who is following in his father's footsteps, as builder and contractor in Dallas; McCoy, who is living on the old farm; Belden H., who is a merchant at The Dalles; and Viola Estelle, at home, who has become well known as a writer of temperance stories for the "Search Light" and other magazines.

Thus is told all too briefly the story of a man firmly launched in the good will of all with whom he has ever had to do, and whose well directed life has redounded to the advantage of his family, friends, and adopted state.

DAVID SMITH. An early settler of Linn county and a veteran agriculturist, David Smith, of Tallman, has been intimately associated with the industrial interests of this part of the state for fully half a century, and by his own exertions has acquired a handsome competency. In common with his pioneer neighbors he labored with unremitting zeal throughout his earlier years, toiling early and late to establish in an uncivilized region a home for himself and family, and in course of time met with a happy reward, becoming the owner of a large, well stocked farm, which, with its substantial improvements, indicates the general prosperity of its worthy proprietor. Now, in the declining years of a long and useful life, he is living in peace and plenty, happy in the love and affectionate care of his numerous descendants, having seven daughters, five sons, forty grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.

A native of east Tennessee, Mr. Smith was born March 18, 1828. When six years of age he accompanied his parents to Missouri, where he grew to manhood on a farm. Subsequently engaging in agricultural pursuits for himself, he lived in that state a number of years, acquiring some property. In hopes of bettering his financial condition he made up his mind to try life on the frontier. Accordingly, in 1852, he started across the plains with one wagon, four yoke of oxen, and three cows. He lost all of the cows on the way, and a part of the oxen. After arriving in Oregon, he bought two yoke of oxen, and that fall located with his family near Scio, in Linn county. Taking up a donation claim of one hundred and sixty acres, situated about four miles east of Scio, he lived there twelve years. Purchasing then the Christian Clymer claim of one hundred and seventy-one acres, he carried on farming and stock-raising for seven years successfully. Adding then to his property by the purchase of a farm of three hundred and six acres, lying nearer Lebanon, he continued his chosen occupation there for seven years. Returning at the expiration of that period to the old Clymer place, he resided on it until 1892. In addition to general farming he was employed to some extent in the lumber business and stock-raising. In 1887 he built a warehouse at Tallman Station, and operated it until 1900, when he sold out, but still owns considerable interest in the farmers' warehouses. Removing to his present fine farm, in 1892, Mr. Smith has since been numbered with the extensive and prosperous agriculturists of this section of the county, and is held in high regard as a citizen of worth and stability. Having recently sold much real estate, he now owns but five hundred and eighty-five acres of land.

While living in Missouri, Mr. Smith married for his first wife Sarah Ripertoe. She died September 18, 1852, leaving two children, namely: Percy, a resident of Umatilla county, Ore., and Thomas, who assists in the management of the home farm.

In September, 1854, Mr. Smith married Sarah J. Montgomery, who was born and reared in Hickman county, Ky., a daughter of Samuel and Julia (Grimes) Montgomery. In 1847 Mr. Montgomery, accompanied by his wife, five sons and only daughter, started for Oregon, with three wagons, four yoke of oxen and four cows. After journeying eight months he arrived in Linn county in October, 1847, and at once took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres on the North Santiam river. In the spring of 1848, he took his family to California, and was there employed in prospecting and mining for two years. Returning east in 1850, by way of the Isthmus, he stayed at his old home in Kentucky a short time. Fitting himself out with ox teams and a drove of cows, he came back to Oregon in 1851, and lived in Linn county the ensuing eight years. Disposing then of his property in this section, he was engaged in stock business in southern Oregon for a time, and then removed to California, where he remained until his death, in 1876, at the age of sixty-six years. His wife survived him, dying eighteen months later. Mr. and Mrs. Smith became the parents of eleven children, all of whom grew to years of maturity, there being eight daughters and three sons, as follows: Julia Ann, wife of George Peebler, of Umatilla county, Ore.; Sarah, deceased wife of Frank Burkhart; Andrew J., of Lebanon; George S., of Gilliam county, Ore.; Mary Frances, wife of James Brannon; Jessie D., of Lebanon; Eliza Jane, wife of William Long; Celia Bell, wife of Charles Scott; Martha Ellen, wife of William Yank; Susan C., wife of Charles Ensley, and Ida M., wife of George Yank.

E. L. D'LASHMUTT, now deceased, was for many years an enterprising agriculturist of Polk county and afterward a respected and valued citizen of Dallas, and his loss in the community was deeply mourned. He was born in Franklin county, Ohio, a son of Elias D'Lashmutt, who was a merchant of the Buckeye state and there died. As the name indicates the family is of French lineage. The subject of this review was reared in the county of his nativity and after attaining his majority carried on farming until 1853, when he removed to Iowa, settling near Oskaloosa. He became one of the extensive farmers and successful stock-raisers of that locality, where he continued to make his home until the 18th of April, 1860, when he started for the northwest, believing that this district offered better opportunities for business advancement. He traveled with an ox and horse train, being captain of the company which included thirty-five wagons. They made the journey by way of Council Bluffs, Fort Hall and the old Oregon trail. Mr. D'Lashmutt was accompanied by his wife and five children and after long and weary weeks of travel they were cheered and gladdened by the sight of the beautiful Willamette valley, where they arrived on the 13th of September. Mr. D'Lashmutt settled first on Salt Creek. Afterward he became the owner of the old Frederick place in Polk county, a large farm of three hundred and ninety acres, which he continued to cultivate and improve in a successful manner until 1880, when he located in Dallas, spending his remaining days in this city.

On the 5th of February, 1849, Mr. D'Lashmutt was married in Columbus, Ohio, to Miss Lydia Morris, who was born in Belmont county, Ohio, a daughter of Asa Morris, a native of that state and a grand-daughter of Solomon Morris, who was born in Virginia and served his country in the Revolutionary war. Asa Morris carried on agricultural pursuits in Ohio until his death. He had married Phoebe Ward, who was born in Ohio, and in 1860 she came to Oregon with Mr. and Mrs. D'Lashmutt and was afterward married to Jonathan Dyer of Polk county, where she died in 1886. Mrs. D'Lashmutt was one of five children, four of whom are still living: William, deceased; Mrs. Eliza Ruffner, of Sanoma, California; Mrs. D'Lashmutt; Mrs. E. A. Graham, of Salem; and John Morris of Salem, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this work. Mrs. D'Lashmutt was reared in Columbus, Ohio. Her husband was twice married and by his first union had one daughter, Ann E., the wife of E. A. Stevens, of Washington county, Ore. By the second marriage there are four children: Mrs. Emma Campbell, of Dallas; Ella, the wife of M. M. Ellis, of Dallas, Mary Violet, the wife of Dr. H. F. Smith, of Seattle; and Ida, the wife of W. H. Percival of Independence.

Mr. D'Lashmutt was a Republican in his political views. He lived a quiet, unassuming life, yet there was in his career those qualities of manhood which awaken respect and confidence among his fellowmen. He was a loyal citizen, honorable in business and wherever known he won the high esteem of those with whom he was associated. He died in 1888 at the age of seventy-four years and thus was called hence one of the worthy pioneers whose names are deeply engraved on the pages of Oregon's history. Since her husband's death Mrs. D'Lashmutt has resided in Dallas, where she is much esteemed for her many good qualities. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church, belongs to the Ladies' Aid Society and takes a deep interest in the spread of Christianity.

GEN. CORNELIUS GILLIAM, maternal grandfather of William Grant, and whose grandchildren are among the most honored citizens of Oregon, was born in North Carolina, and at an early day settled in Missouri. While residing there he became prominent in military affairs, attained to the rank of captain in the Black Hawk war, and was present at the surrender of Osceola. He also assisted in expelling the Mormons from Missouri, and he was colonel of the Missouri State Militia, a position resigned that he might take up his residence in the west. In 1844 he crossed the plains with his own and the Grant families, and they took the old Oregon trail, on the way encountering every known obstacle which impeded the progress of the early tourists of the plains. Arriving at the Tualatin Plains December 25, 1844, the little band started for The Dalles, and found that their troubles had really just begun. But one party had preceded them, and that was in 1843, and there were practically no roads, and for hundreds of miles they were obliged to break their own roads. It was a weary and footsore little band that finally arrived at their destination, yet all were hopeful, and willing to do all in their power to improve their forlorn condition.

Gen. Gilliam took up a donation claim upon a portion of which Dallas has since been built, but this was soon after sold, and he bought a claim of six hundred and forty acres on a branch of the Luckiamute. His rank of general was acquired as general in command of the Oregon troops during the Cayuse war, and he fearlessly led the soldiers in the dreaded and dangerous Cayuse country on both sides of the Columbia, until the war was over and peace declared. This last noble service was destined to be his undoing, for on the way home he happened to go to the end of a wagon to get a piece of rope, and a soldier stepping up, offered to get it for him. By mistake a loaded gun, with the ramrod left in had been left in the wagon, and it was accidentally discharged, the ramrod hitting the colonel in the forehead, and killing him instantly. This was in 1848, and he was tenderly brought to Dallas and given a soldier's burial, and no man of his time and place was more deeply mourned by his fellow-soldiers in the field. At the time of his death he held an honored military position on the coast, and no name in Oregon was more truly typical of courage and fidelity.

Gen. Gilliam had other claims to distinction than that vested in his military service. He was quite a politician in his day, and in Jackson county, Mo., served for several terms as sheriff, and was also a member of the Missouri legislature, was a Mason of high standing and his grave is decorated by the fraternity up to this time. He was also an ordained minister in the Baptist Church, and an earnest expounder of the doctrines of that denomination. Through his marriage with Mary Crawford, a native of Missouri, and who died in Oregon, the following children were born to them: America, who became Mrs. David Grant; Hon. W. S. Gilliam of Walla Walla, Wash.; Mrs. Louise Gage, who died in Oregon; Mrs. Rebecca Gage, who also died in Oregon; Mrs. Sarah Nichols, who died in Washington; Marcus D., who was a farmer and died on the old donation claim of his father; Elizabeth, who is the wife of Frank M. Collins of Dallas; and Henrietta, who was Mrs. Samuel Coad, of Dallas, but is now deceased.

JOHN DAVID SMITH. Both John David Smith and his wife are members of families intimately connected with the early pioneer days of Oregon, and both are justified in regarding the uncivilized red man in anything but a favorable light. Mr. Smith is one of the many sons of Missouri who have transferred their citizenship to Marion county, and in the fertile valley of their adoption have impressed their worth as agriculturists and men. He was born in Ray county, Mo., November 23, 1843, and came of a family of decidedly southern characteristics.

Daniel Smith, the father of J. D., was born in Lincoln county, Tenn., September 2, 1809, and when a small boy removed with his parents to Missouri, remaining there until 1851. In Missouri he married Emily Ringo, who was born in Kentucky, October 5, 1819, and whose parents came to Missouri at a very early day. In the spring of 1851 Mr. Smith outfitted and crossed the plains, arriving at their destination in Oregon at the expiration of six months. The first winter was spent near Parkersville, Marion county. The following spring he took up a donation claim ten miles north of Salem, which was all in timber and extremely wild. Here he was living at the outbreak of the Indian war in 1855, known as the Kinse war, and he was one of the first to enlist in Company K, under command of Captain Goff. Very near the beginning of hostilities he was killed while performing picket duty. After his death his widow continued to live on the old place, and three years later married Samuel Simpson, removing to his home in Garfield, Wash., where her death occurred at the age of seventy-nine years in 1898. She was the mother of four children, of whom Mary J. is the widow of Francis Manning, of Marion county; Madison C. lives in Boise City, Idaho; Sarah A. is the wife of Peter J. Pefly, of Lewiston, Idaho, and J. D., the subject of this review.

At the age of sixteen Mr. Smith started out to make his own living, equipped with an education received in the public schools and at the University at Salem. With his brother he took a drove of cattle to Boise City, Idaho, intending to reap a considerable sum from their sale, but was doomed to disappointment, for the cattle all died, and the boys were forced to hustle for a living. Until 1870 he worked as a general laborer, and then took charge of the home place until his marriage, February 4, 1874, to Iphigenia Masterson, a native of Springfield, Ore., and daughter of J. A. and Valinda (Campbell) Masterson, pioneers of '53, who settled in Linn county. Mr. Smith took his bride to the old Smith donation claim, and there lived and farmed until January 1, 1891, when they removed to their present farm of two hundred and forty-two acres, one mile south of Gervais. Mr. Smith has one hundred and fifty acres of his property under cultivation, and in addition to general farming, derives a substantial income from raising Cotswold sheep. In addition to this farm he still owns half of his father's old donation claim of two hundred and forty-two acres.

In political affiliation Mr. Smith is independent, and believes in voting for the best man. He takes a great interest in education, and his influence on the school board has been a progressive and helpful one. For many years he has been identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Fraternity Lodge No. 9, and the United Artisans, Gervais Lodge No. 79, in both of which organizations he has passed all the chairs. He is esteemed by all who know him, and his position in the community is that of a broad-minded, progressive, and exceedingly well informed man. Five children have been born to this family: Roy, Nellie, Kittie, Maud M., and Madison Clarence.

The parents of Mrs. Smith are worthy of mention among the early settlers of Oregon. J. A. Masterson was born in Kentucky, and when a boy removed with his parents to Missouri. There he married Valinda Campbell, a native of Missouri. They lived in the state until 1853.

The Mastersons then outfitted with ox teams and crossed the plains in a large train, comprising the sisters of Mr. Masterson and their families, one of which was named Ward. All went well, and the members of the train were congratulating themselves upon their immunity from illness and disaster, when, arriving at Fort Boise on the Snake river, the party were attacked by Indians, and all murdered but four. Mr. and Mrs. Masterson happened to have gone on ahead to look for a camping ground, and so missed the terrible fate meted out to their friends and relatives; and the two Ward boys, at first supposed to be dead, were revived and were able to resume their journey. It can be imagined with what heavy hearts the survivors buried their loved ones on the desolate plains, this being one of the worst massacres in the early days, and afterward known as the Ward massacre. Mr. Masterson took up a donation claim in Marion county, where his wife died at the age of thirty-three. Mr. Masterson is making his home with a son in Malheur county. He is a blacksmith by trade as well as a farmer, and during his active life has combined these two occupations advantageously. Eight children were born to himself and wife: Gilky is deceased; Mrs. J. D. Smith; Mary W., the widow of W. F. Cauthorn of Marion county; Henry, deceased; Givens, a resident of Washington; Clayborn, deceased; Alfred, a resident of Malheur county, Ore.; and Elizabeth, the wife of Robert Mann, of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

W. R. BROWN is a well known blacksmith of Amity and by earnest, persevering labor has acquired a handsome competence. He was born July 4, 1837, in New Brunswick on the Richibucto river. His father was a farmer by occupation and in the family were twelve children, who were educated in the district schools. It was thus that our subject obtained his mental discipline and upon the home farm he remained until fifteen years of age, when he entered upon an apprenticeship at the blacksmith's trade, remaining in Richibucto until twenty-one years of age, when he left his home locality and took up his abode in St. Johns, New Brunswick. There he followed blacksmithing for about three months, after which he went to Boston, Mass., and worked at his trade for about a year. On the expiration of that period he removed to Taunton, Mass., where he spent two years, after which he returned to his native country. He next went to Sackville, New Brunswick, where he spent one year in the Academy, after which he returned to Taunton, Mass., where he again followed blacksmithing for a year. At the end of that time Mr. Brown started for the Pacific coast, going by way of the Fall River Line to New York, where he took passage on a steamer bound for Aspinwall, and after crossing the isthmus of Panama he boarded another steamer whose destination was San Francisco. There he arrived in 1863 and for a short time he followed his trade in that city. Later he went to Sacramento, where for some time he was engaged by a railroad construction company, after which he returned to San Francisco and later went to Victoria. Subsequently he proceeded up the Frazier river to Caribou, B. C., and in 1864 he arrived in Portland, Ore., where he resided for about two years. In 1866 he established his home in Amity, where he purchased a shop and has since engaged in the blacksmith's trade. His thorough understanding of the trade and his expert workmanship have enabled him to secure a good patronage. He owns several pieces of property in the village, besides his home place, and his possessions are the visible evidence of his life of thrift and industry.

Mr. Brown was united in marriage July 19, 1887, to Miss Martha E. Stephens, a native of Missouri, and their union has been blessed with five sons: William J., Paul, Robert, Ivan and Elden, all of whom are at home.

Mr. Brown is recognized as one of the leading and influential citizens of Amity and was one of the first members of the town council and for two years he served as its chairman. He is an exemplary member of the Masonic fraternity and has held all of the chairs in the local lodge, including that of worshipful master. In politics he has always been a stalwart Republican, believing firmly in the principles of the party, and his progressive and public spirit are manifest in the co-operation which he gives in all measures which are intended for the public welfare and improvement.

REBECCA CALHOON. That efficient farmer managers are by no means confined to the male persuasion has been repeatedly demonstrated in various parts of the country, but more especially in the extreme west, where women enter intelligently and enthusiastically all departments of agricultural undertakings being as much at home at the business end of the line as they are in the manipulation of household affairs. To this class belongs Mrs. Rebecca Calhoon, whose pleasant home and well tilled farm constitute one of the fine properties and hospitable centers in Yamhill county.

Before her first marriage Rebecca Lemasters, Mrs. Calhoon was born in Morgan county, Ky., January 14, 1836, and when four years of age was taken by her family to Missouri, locating in Andrew county. Her father, Isaac Lemasters, was born in Ohio, February 11, 1804, and died December 5, 1888. Her mother, Nancy (Elam) Lemasters, was born in Virginia and died at Ash Hollow, west of the Rocky mountains, in 1852, on the way across the plains, at the age of forty-one years. In 1850 Mr. Lemasters moved from Andrew county, Mo., to Gentry county, and remained there until starting across the plains in March of 1852. The train left Council Bluffs, Iowa, and at the expiration of six months of varied and interesting experience landed in Lafayette, Yamhill county, in November, 1852.

Miss Lemasters had the usual bringing up of the pioneer daughters, and in her youth was instructed in household work, attending at irregular intervals the district schools. Her first marriage, May 18, 1853, was with Charles Berry, who was born in far-off Maine, March 15, 1820, and died August 1, 1865. Mr. Berry came around the Horn to California in the year of gold, '49, and after a year's experiment in the mines of that state removed to Oregon in 1850. He took up three hundred and twenty acres of land in Yamhill county upon which his wife now lives, and there engaged in general farming and carpentering, a trade learned in his native state of Maine. To this day are standing many of the old residences and barns which he built during his residence in the state, for so good a workman was he that his services found ready recognition among patrons of substantial building. As a result of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Berry four children were born, three sons and one daughter: Charles A. Berry lives on an adjoining farm; John also lives on an adjoining farm; Mrs. Ann Willis lives near by her mother; and Maine Berry lives on an adjoining farm.

For a second husband Mrs. Berry married, September 27, 1866, J. J. Calhoon, who was born in Holmes county, Ohio, and who came to California via the plains in 1854. Mr. Calhoon became a resident of Oregon in 1858, and after a three years' residence in Tillamook county located in Yamhill county, where he engaged in farming until his death, September 29, 1902. He was a man of enterprise and public spirit, and achieved considerable success after removing to the west. He was a member of the Christian Church, in which he served as elder, and during his active life promoted the financial and other interests of the church, and is a member of the Pioneers' Association of Yamhill county. Mrs. Calhoon has been a member of the Christian Church since 1853.

JAMES W. MARTIN. Ever since his twenty-third year, James W. Martin has earned an independent livelihood as an agriculturist in Yamhill county, and at present he is the owner of three hundred acres of land, seventy of which are under cultivation. Large numbers of fine stock graze upon his fertile meadows, and besides general crops he is devoting considerable time and attention to hop cultivation, twenty-three and a half acres being at present under the latter named commodity. A survey of the various departments represented on the well-developed Martin farm convinces the beholder that a master hand is at the helm, and well understands the science which is at the bottom of all-around supremacy in this or any country. Modern labor-saving appliances, finely constructed barns and outhouses, and an all-pervading air of neatness and thrift indicate a superiority of management consistent with the best interests of the county.

A native son of Yamhill county, Mr. Martin was born August 20, 1853, on the paternal farm, located one mile southeast of Lafayette, near where the locks are now constructed. His father, Franklin Martin, was born in Howard county, Mo., April 15, 1824, and his mother, Anna M. (Burnett) Martin, was born in Clay county, Mo., August 28, 1835. He is the third oldest in a family of thirteen children, five sons and eight daughters, three of whom died in infancy. The paternal grandfather was born in North Carolina, and died on a large farm near Liberty, Mo., of which locality he was a very early pioneer. Franklin Martin crossed the plains in a train of one hundred and fifty wagons in the spring of 1846, and, after a six-months trip, landed in Yamhill county, Ore., in the fall, after an extremely precarious and danger-infested journey. During the entire route the travelers were obliged to hew their way through bands of savages, and other inconveniences arose in the shape of swollen streams and illness among those comprising the train. In 1848, the father bought six hundred acres of a Frenchman by the name of Sharlotte, and having settled his little family thereon, betook himself to the mines of California the following year. After a moderately successful year in Humboldt county, he returned to his new and heavily-timbered farm in Yamhill county, where his death occurred January 24, 1882. He was exceedingly industrious, and made the most of his western opportunities, and out of the four hundred and twenty-five and a half acres owned during the latter part of his life, about three hundred had been placed under cultivation. This represented an enormous amount of muscle and energy, yet from his subsequent large harvests, and fine aggregation of high-bred cattle, Mr. Martin reaped ample compensation for his pains.

At the age of twenty-three, James W. Martin, who had been educated in the public schools, and thoroughly drilled in things agricultural, bought of his mother one hundred and two acres of the original donation claim taken up by his father. Although still holding on to his land, he has branched out considerably into other occupations, and from 1890 until 1900 conducted a livery business in Lafayette and Independence, Ore. Gradually he has added to his original purchase until he now owns three hundred acres. In 1876 he married Alice L. Palmer, daughter of Gen. Joel Palmer, the latter of whom died at Dayton, Ore., in 1881. General Palmer was an early settler in Oregon, having arrived in the state as early as 1845. The following year he returned to the east, and after again settling in Oregon, in 1847, identified himself largely with Indian affairs. He was superintendent of Indian affairs for the state of Oregon, and was Indian agent at the Slitz Agency. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Martin, Roy P. and Lilith A., both of whom are living with their parents. A Democrat in politics, Mr. Martin has actively promoted the interests of his party in this county, and was nominated for sheriff of Yamhill in 1890. He is a welcome member of various fraternal organizations in the state, notably the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Woodmen of the World, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the latter of Lafayette. With the Odd Fellows he has passed through all the chairs, is noble grand, and has represented the lodge at the Grand Lodge for eight years.

MRS. ELIZA G. EMMENS was born October 14, 1817, in Logan county, Ohio, and is a descendant of an old English family that had early made America their home. Her grandfather, John Garwood, had originally settled in Virginia, but in 1805 had removed to Logan county, Ohio, where he reared his family, his trade being that of a miller, building his own mill in which to work. His son, Lott, the father of Mrs. Emmens of this review, was born in Virginia, in 1792, taking up farming for his life occupation, remaining at it until his death at the age of seventy-five years in 1857, in Logan county, Ohio, whither his father had removed. He married Ruth Branson, who died in Ohio, the daughter of William Branson, both natives of Virginia, and of this union three children were born, Mrs. Emmens being the second child and only one living.

Having already attained a ripe old age and yet with the promise of many years before her, Mrs. Emmens recalls vividly the great changes which have come within her range of vision. Her earliest recollections go back to a little log schoolhouse in the Ohio wilds, where to-day the land blossoms with the easily cultivated harvest yields, when she sat upon the puncheon benches with the light upon her book falling through greased paper windows, her quill pen carefully laid away until the hour for writing came. When the bitter days of winter came in good earnest the room was heated by a roaring fire in the big, open fire-place. In 1835, at the age of eighteen, she married John H. Robb, a native of Pennsylvania, born near Burgettstown, and at this time a farmer in her native county. Becoming interested in the tales of the golden lands of the west—for the farmer as well as the miner—Mr. Robb, with the hearty co-operation of his ambitious wife, prepared to take the long journey necessary in order to reach the desired location. Having secured their outfit at St. Joe, they set out May 5, 1852, members of an ox train on the old Oregon trail, reaching their destination September 20. Coming at once to Polk county, they located on a donation claim near Bethel, but later returned to Dallas, where they had stopped previous to the settlement on the claim. After another effort at farming, this time a short distance south of Dallas, Mr. Robb took a trip to California. In the fall of 1861 he passed away at his home in Dallas, at the age of forty-seven years.

On June 18, 1862, Mrs. Robb was again united in marriage to Johannes Emmens, the son of Jacobus Emmens, the New York representative of an old Holland family. In Gravesend, N. Y. Johannes Emmens was born and reared, taking up his residence later in Illinois, where he carried on farming. In 1852 he crossed the plains, reaching Willamette valley in August of the same year. After his settlement of a donation claim in Polk county, he removed to Dallas, where as a Republican, he held several political offices, among them being that of deputy county clerk and county treasurer, while under the administration of Lincoln he served as postmaster of Dallas. He was also at one time engaged in the dry goods business in Dallas, but soon after returned to his farm two miles east of Dallas. He lived to be nearly eighty-two years old, dying June 16, 1902.

Though nearly eighty-six years old, Mrs. Emmens' mind is still unimpaired. The past is still as vivid in her memory as though it had happened but yesterday, and she enjoys talking of the time when she and her husband were among the first pioneers in Polk county. She recalls distinctly the meteoric shower of November 13, 1833, being then a girl of sixteen in her Ohio home. Of the children born to her father and mother she is the only one living, her splendid constitution and health carrying her far beyond three score years and ten, and leaving her practically alone, but with her courage and good cheer she makes bright every hour of the evening of her life. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and perhaps the secret of her happy life is the every-day use of her religion.

LEVI BENNETT is a native of Illinois, born in Tazewell county, in March, 1834, and is now living in Yamhill county, Ore., near Whiteson. He was one of a family of four children whose parents were farming people. His father died when the son was thirteen years of age and for two years thereafter he lived with a neighbor. The educational privileges which he enjoyed were received prior to that time in the district schools near his home. When a youth of fifteen he joined a company of people who started across the plains to the northwest in 1848. He went as one of the drivers of an ox team and for six months traveled with the party, walking the entire distance. Progress was slow and hardships were many, for not only did they have to endure the trials incident to the journey across the hot, sandy plains and through the mountain passes, but there was also danger of attacks from the Indians, the latter stealing some of their horses near the Platte river. They crossed the Cascade mountains about fifteen miles from The Dalles and Mr. Bennett spent his first winter in Oregon upon a farm near Salem, which is now the site of the state penitentiary. In the spring of 1849 he went to French Prairie in Marion county, where he was employed as a farm hand until his removal to Yamhill county. Here he followed logging in Moore's valley for about three years and for about two years he made his home upon a farm at Whiteson. In 1854 he went to south Oregon, where he was engaged in mining and prospecting, but in the following year he returned to Yamhill county.

Mr. Bennett was then married to Miss Mary M. Stephens, who had traveled overland to the northwest in 1845 with her parents, who settled in Portland. Mr. and Mrs. Bennett after their marriage located upon the farm where he now lives. He had purchased one hundred acres of land, most of which was prairie, and here he has resided continuously since, with the exception of a period of four years, which was spent upon a farm within four miles of the old homestead. All of the improvements upon his place are his work, and these include a good set of farm buildings and machinery and all modern equipments for facilitating the work of field and meadow. At the present time he owns one hundred acres of good land and in connection with the cultivation of cereals best adapted to the soil and climate, he is also extensively engaged in raising hops, having in 1902 a crop of about five thousand pounds, the sale of which has been profitable:

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Bennett has been blessed with five children: Cyrus M., who is with his parents; John H., in Whiteson; Lillian R., the wife of E. G. Murphy, of Whiteson; Rosamond J., at home; and Maryetta, deceased. Mr. Bennett is independent in his political views. He has served as a member of the school board for about twenty years and the cause of education finds in him a warm friend. Fraternally he is connected with the Masonic Lodge of Amity, in which he has filled all of the chairs.

JAMES REID. Too much cannot be said of the enterprise and thrift, the business sagacity and honorable personal characteristics which have placed James Reid among the most influential and successful farmers of the vicinity of McMinnville. Descended from rugged and profoundly religious Scottish ancestors, he was born in the county of Halton, Ontario, Canada, May 31, 1843, his parents being natives of that deeply indented, ocean-swept portion of western Scotland known as Argyllshire, where are raised some of the finest stock in the world. Of the thirteen children born to the parents in Scotland and Canada, but one is deceased, and the living members are so widely separated as to suggest from the start ambitious and resourceful tendencies. Two of the brothers are in Africa, one is in Australia, one in Manitoba, one in Oregon, and the remainder in Canada.

Principally in Canada Mr. Reid received his education, and his youth gained considerable assurance from having to learn the rule of three and the principles of parsing while occupying a backless and very hard wooden seat in a primitive log school house. At his father's death he was a strong young fellow of twenty, morally, mentally and physically able to cope with whatever the future might have in store for him. With the skill born of experience he managed the old homestead until 1873, and then came to Oregon, where he was variously employed for about a year. In 1874 he located on his present farm of two hundred and thirty-six acres, four miles east of McMinnville, and August 25, 1875, married Mary A. Fletcher, born near LaFayette, Yamhill county, October 4, 1850. The Fletcher parents came to Oregon as early as 1840, and a complete record of these early and remarkably successful pioneers is to be found in another part of this work.

Since his marriage Mr. Reid has labored to invest his property with all the improvements known to modern agricultural science, and few properties in the county evince greater regard for advanced methods in all departments of farming. At the present time he owns three hundred and four acres of land, the greater part of which is devoted to stock-raising, including Berkshire and Poland-China hogs, Cotswold sheep, Jerseys and Short-horns. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Reid have been born four children: Ytol Viola; Lottie Lorene, who died February 19, 1902; Clifford Fletcher, and Clair James.

In political affiliations a Republican, Mr. Reid has never identified himself to any extent with political undertakings, but has nevertheless served his county as supervisor for a couple of years, and he has rendered efficient service for a number of years as a member of the school board. He is a welcome member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and with his wife is an active member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, contributing generously towards its maintenance and charities.

HON. JOHN F. CALBREATH, one of the distinguished physicians of the state of Oregon, now serving as superintendent of the Oregon State Insane Asylum at Salem, was born in Weston, W. Va., June 1, 1854. His father, John Calbreath, was a native of Augusta county, Va., born near Stanton, and his paternal grandfather was a planter of the Shenandoah valley. He was of Scotch descent, his ancestors having been members of one of the ancient Highland clans. John Calbreath followed farming near Weston, W. Va., until the time of the Civil war, when his property was practically destroyed by the contending armies. He removed to Iowa in 1864 and for a year resided at Cincinnati in that state. In 1865 he brought his family across the plains, traveling with a party of two hundred through the Indian country, the trip consuming six months. He located at Philomath, Benton county, Ore., where he leased land and began farming. Later he moved to eastern Oregon to engage in the cattle business, but died soon afterward, in the fall of 1872. In his religious faith he was a Presbyterian. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Nancy Christ, was also a native of Augusta county, Va., a daughter of Daniel Christ, who was born in that state and was the owner of an extensive plantation. He died in the early '70s, having attained the age of over one hundred years. His daughter, Mrs. Calbreath, the mother of our subject, died in 1872. Her children were: Thomas W., a farmer of Wasco county, Ore.; Daniel M., of Polk county, Ore.; Mrs. Janet Brown, who died in Harney county, Ore.; and J. F.

When but ten years of age Dr. Calbreath accompanied his parents to Iowa, and the following year came with them to Oregon. On account of the war, which interfered with the conduct of the schools of the south, his education in youth was limited, but after arriving in Oregon he attended school, including a course in Philomath College. He did not go to eastern Oregon with the family, but remained in Philomath College for a time, and since leaving that institution has made his own way in the world. At the age of sixteen he rented a farm, which he operated for two years, having one hundred and ten acres planted to wheat. He then began studying medicine, having determined to make the medical profession his field of labor. At the age of seventeen he had begun teaching, and that profession, combined with farming, enabled him to gain sufficient means to pay the expenses of a course in medicine. In 1872 he began study under the direction of Dr. J. R. Bayley, of Corvallis, and the following year entered the medical department of Willamette University, where he remained for one term. He next became a student in Toland Medical College, San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1875 with the degree of M. D.

Locating in La Fayette, Yamhill county, Ore., Dr. Calbreath then engaged in the practice of medicine with Dr. Littlefield, an association which was maintained until 1886, when Dr. Calbreath moved to McMinnville. There he became a partner of Dr. E. E. Goucher, under the firm name of Calbreath & Goucher, and in his chosen field of labor he met with gratifying success, working his way upward to a position of prominence. In 1896 he went to New York City and took a course in the New York Post-Graduate College, after which he returned to Oregon and continued the active practice of his profession until appointed superintendent of the Oregon State Insane Asylum, in January, 1900. He then moved to Salem.

Dr. Calbreath's administration of the affairs of the asylum has been one of lasting benefit to the institution and has won for him the highest approval of his contemporaries. He has gradually made a number of much-needed improvements in connection with the establishment, having added five new wards, besides two more in the course of construction. There are one thousand acres in the asylum farm, which is located five miles from Salem, while the main buildings of the institution are located on a tract of two hundred acres. There is also an orchard of thirty acres at the asylum proper.

A. J. Cornelius

Dr. Calbreath has made a close study of the needs of the institution and its inmates, and has not only carefully performed his duties as physician, but has also given special attention to sanitary conditions, to outdoor and indoor exercise, and to the minutest details bearing upon the health and general condition of the thirteen hundred unfortunate persons under his charge. His administration has demonstrated the fact that he is highly qualified for the work which he is now so ably performing. In a profession where advancement depends upon merit and skill he has steadily progressed until he stands to-day among the most able physicians of the state.

In Corvallis, in 1874, Dr. Calbreath was married to Miss Irene Smith, a native of Yamhill county, and a daughter of Sidney Smith, who came from Ohio to Oregon in 1839. Mrs. Calbreath is a lady of superior culture and refinement. She is a graduate of St. Mary's Academy of Portland, and prior to her marriage she was a member of the faculty of the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis. To Dr. and Mrs. Calbreath have been born two daughters, Helen and Evelene.

A pronounced Republican and prominent in political circles, Dr. Calbreath was elected in 1894, as his party's nominee from Yamhill county to the state senate, receiving a large majority. He served in the sessions of 1895 and 1897, and was a member of the Ways and Means Committee and chairman of the Committee on Medicine during both sessions. He was not a candidate for the second term, and returning home he resumed the practice of his profession. In 1896 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention at St. Louis, and was made vice-president of the Oregon delegation.

Socially Dr. Calbreath is past master of La Fayette Lodge No. 3, A. F. & A. M.; past high priest of McMinnville Chapter, R. A. M.; has taken all the degrees in the Scottish Rite up to and including the Consistory, and is a member of Al Kader Temple, N. M. S., of Portland. He is also a member of the Uniformed Rank, K. P., and is now serving his second term as a member of the board of regents of the State Normal School at Monmouth.

Besides has other interests, he is the owner of a fine prune orchard and farming properties in Yamhill county. His life record is commendable and honorable, and his professional career shows the result of close application and a strong mentality.

ABSALOM H. CORNELIUS. Coming in childhood to the state of Oregon, the son of a pioneer, Absalom H. Cornelius scarcely remembers any other home than the one he has known here for so many years. He was born in Henry county, Iowa, near the city of Burlington, January 2, 1839, and crossed the plains with his parents in 1845. He remained on the homestead taken up by his father in Marion county, Ore., until he was twenty-one years of age. Then going to southern Oregon, he followed mining in Josephine county for about one year and then followed the same calling in Florence, Idaho. Somewhat dissatisfied with the miner's life, he returned to Marion county after a trial of six months, and located on a part of his father's farm, about two and a half miles southwest of Turner, where he continued to live for ten years, actively engaged in the cultivation of the soil.

By his marriage, September 20, 1868, Mr. Cornelius allied himself with a pioneer family of Oregon, his wife being Lavina Powell, the daughter of Elder Noah Powell, who was well known throughout the Willamette valley as a minister in the Christian Church. He was born in Greene county, Ohio. From Illinois, in 1851, he crossed the plains with his family by means of two wagons drawn by ox-teams, being on the journey about six months. He first located in Marion county, near Silverton, where he took up a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres, but not being entirely satisfied he removed to Howell Prairie. After a residence of a few years there he located near Amity, Yamhill county, and later made his home in Linn county for six years. From that location he removed to a farm in Marion county, where he died at the age of sixty-six years. His wife also died there at the age of eighty years. The five children who blessed their union are in order of birth as follows: William; Josiah and John D., who are both deceased; Theresa A., who died in 1901, the wife of John Shafer; and Lavina, Mrs. Cornelius.

Mr. Cornelius formerly owned two hundred and twenty-five acres of land, located one mile from Marion village, the same being the property which Elder Powell owned in Marion county. In March, 1903, he sold his farm and retired to Jefferson, where he invested in real estate and remodeled a comfortable home, and with his wife is living in comfort after years of hard work. For thirty years he was engaged in general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of Jersey cattle. A Republican in politics, Mr. Cornelius has served as county commissioner for two years and as assessor for four, in addition to his services as a member of the school board for ten years. Fraternally he has been a member of the Masonic order for twenty-two years. Of the children born to himself and wife, Flora is the wife of F. L. George, of Salem, and they have three children; Emily is the wife of C. O. Green, of Oakland, Ore., and they have six children; Annie, the wife of J. W. Cardwell, is the mother of three children and the family live on a farm three miles north of Salem; Nettie is the wife of George Van Buren, station agent at Comstock for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and they have three children; Maude is the wife of J. S. Roberts and they have three children and live in Portland; Rodney, the only son, is a telegraph operator at Drain, Ore., in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railway Company; and Nora is deceased. Mrs. Cornelius is a member of the Christian Church.

EDWARD F. SOX. Though a prominent and enterprising business man of Albany, Linn county, Ore., Edward F. Sox has not confined his mental grasp to opportunities leading to this avenue, but with a praiseworthy ambition encouraged by exceptional executive ability he has widened his line of advancement, adding both mental and moral culture to his manhood, making in his community a place and name for himself as scholar, Christian and business man. During a residence of more than thirty years Mr Sox has clearly demonstrated his ability to lead where judgment and enterprise are essential to success, and as a man of this caliber he has stamped his personality in his adopted state.

Born in Palmyra, Lee county, Ill., January 25, 1846, Edward F. Sox is the son of Herman and Margaret (Owens) Sox, both of whom were born November 14, 1814, the father in Germany, the mother in Wilkesbarre, Pa. As a young man Herman Sox emigrated to the United States, a land where talent and opportunity were parallel. For some years he was a railroad builder in Pennsylvania, and there he met and married Margaret Owens, December 27, 1838, and the next year they went to St. Louis, Mo., where they made their home for some time. In 1840, becoming interested in the farming capabilities of the prairie lands of Illinois, though at that date wild and uncultivated, he purchased a number of acres in Whiteside county which he proceeded to improve. His death occurred in that state near Sterling, March 24, 1888, his wife surviving him until June, 1902, when she also died at the home of her son, L. N. Sox, in Sterling. Fraternally he was associated with the Masons.

Of the nine children born to his parents, all of whom are living except a sister, Mary, who married Ira Compton, of Dixon, Ill., Mr. Sox is the fourth in order of birth and the only one who lives in Oregon. He received his preliminary education in the public schools and prepared for college in the Prairieville Union schools, being deterred, however, from entering by enlisting May 30, 1864, in Company D, One Hundred and Fortieth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He was mustered in at Dixon and sent south, his service being principally in Tennessee and Missouri. He was mustered out October 29, 1864, being then not yet nineteen years old, and in 1865 he entered Wheaton College, where he remained for two years, at the close of that time entering the University of Michigan. Though at the time of entering he had expected to graduate in the class of 1870, he attended but one year, after which he became a teacher in the public schools of Whiteside county, Ill., continuing in his position for two years. In 1871 he changed his residence to Portland, Ore., and taught in the public schools until the fall of the same year, when he was elected to the chair of mathematics in Albany College, a position which he maintained for three years, resigning at that date to return to Illinois, and with his brother assisted in the management of his father's affairs. In 1877 he again made his home in Albany, Ore., and was made principal of the city schools for one year. From this date is reckoned his business career, for he then entered the hardware business in partnership with W. S. Peters, the firm being known for two years as Peters & Sox. In 1882 Mr. Sox changed his location to Seattle, Wash., where he was one of the organizers of the firm known as Ballard & Sox, hardware dealers, which two years later was enlarged and incorporated under the title of the Seattle Hardware Company, which to-day is one of the largest of its kind in the city of Seattle. Mr. Sox served for some time as treasurer of the company, but in 1886 he sold his interest and returned to Albany and engaged in the same business with C. H. Stewart. The year 1896 witnessed the organization and incorporation of a stock company, under the title of the Stewart & Sox Hardware Company, of which Mr. Sox was elected president, continuing to hold that office to the present time. In the spring of 1903 Mr. Sox purchased Mr. Stewart's interest. This is now one of the best-equipped and most extensive hardware business interests of Albany, in connection with which carrying a full line of Studebaker wagons and buggies; Parlin and Orendorff Canton clippers and Moline plows and cultivators, Plano harvesters and cutting machinery, Russell threshers, etc. In 1893 Mr. Sox erected the building, which is 50x100 feet and two stories in height, a creditable addition to the business blocks of Albany. In addition to his interests in the city, Mr. Sox also has farming interests in Linn county.

The marriage ceremony which united Mr. Sox with Miss Weltha M. Young was performed in Albany, January 27, 1874. She was born in Benton county, Ore., January 16, 1855, the daughter of Isaac and Rebecca Young and sister of S. E. Young, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this volume. She was a member of the first class that graduated from Albany College. Of this union two children have been born: Carleton E. and Emma Rebecca. The son graduated from Albany College in the class of 1891 and from Leland Stanford University, California, in 1894, and is now a practicing attorney of the firm of Hewitt & Sox. He is also a member of the board of trustees of Albany College and stockholder and director of the Stewart & Sox Hardware Company. The daughter graduated from Albany College in the class of 1902. While in Seattle Mr. Sox interested himself in municipal affairs, serving in the interests of the Republican party as alderman for one term, and was also president of the Young Men's Christian Association for two years. He was superintendent of the Sunday School of the Plymouth Congregational Church, though he is now a member of the United Presbyterian Church, in which he officiates as ruling elder, and occupied the position of superintendent of the Sunday School for ten years, a position he maintained with credit in every particular. He has always been interested in all educational movements. In the social life of the city he has been prominent, being a member of the Alco Club and a charter member of McPherson Post No. 5, G. A. R., of which he is past commander.

HON. STEWART MCKINDRA PENINGTON. Hardship, privation and toil were the daily diet of the pioneers of the early days, but it was one which made true, earnest men, upon whose worth and conscientious effort depended the future of the west. That was a time, in both middle and extreme west, when the fighting spirit of the Spartans was once more called into life and utilized in the following of peaceful pursuits under warlike conditions, for such was certainly the case among the tangled paths familiar only to the feet of the Indian, who used his knowledge as a lure for the men in the van of western civilization. To Hon. S. M. Penington, of Albany, Linn county, the memory of the time when he made the journey into the west, alone and on his own responsibility, recurs with vivid force, since it is illustrated by the innumerable changes which have characterized the growth of Oregon, and which he has helped to bring about through his association as a pioneer with the development of the resources of the state. For more than a half century he has been connected with the progress of the west, liberally contributing to every enterprise which he considered worthy of his support and he is now a worthy member of the generation which pauses to look with deep interest upon the work of the years, before surrendering the heritage to the guardianship of the ones who are to follow.

The entire life of Stewart McKindra Penington has been one of stirring activity and changing scene. He was born in Monroe county, Ky., August 5, 1824, the eighth in order of birth of thirteen children that blessed the home of his parents, John Stewart and Jemima (Houser) Penington, natives respectively of Virginia and Pennsylvania. They were both early settlers of Kentucky, the father being a farmer there, and the mother having emigrated with her parents. In 1831 they removed to Illinois, settling at Pennington Point, McDonough county, where Mr. Penington improved a farm. He died there at the age of seventy-six years, and his wife also died in the same state when she was sixty-five years old. They were both members of the Christian Church, and it was the privilege of Mr. Penington to enlist in 1815 for service in the war of 1812. Of the twelve children who attained maturity the oldest, Thomas J., served in the Black Hawk war, and the youngest, William T., was a soldier during the Civil war, and S. M. Penington was the only one who sought a home on the Pacific coast. When seven years old Mr. Penington removed with his parents to Illinois, where he was reared to manhood upon his father's farm, receiving a practical agricultural training. Following the custom of the early settlers he attended the common school in the vicinity of his home, a very primitive affair, a little log building built in the midst of field or forest, in the very early times having for windows nothing but oiled paper and for heating purposes a great fireplace. The materials with which the young students sought to advance their stock of knowledge were also primitive, the quill pen being one of the treasured articles of the pupil. When eighteen Mr. Penington started out in the world to seek his own livelihood, engaging in farming, and a short time after he bought a farm, which consisted of unimproved prairie land, the first plowing of which requiring six yoke of oxen. For some years he remained in that location, industriously occupied with his farming interests, but having read and heard much of the brilliant opportunities to be found in the Oregon territory he decided in 1847 to emigrate to the west. In company with a few friends he hired out to drive an ox-team across the plains, determining at least to see Oregon whether he chose afterward to make it his home or not. His trip to the west was one of the most exciting periods in Mr. Penington's life, for adventure followed them from the beginning to the end of the journey. It was soon very evident that he was more than an ordinary driver, as he never met with an accident of any kind, while the others experienced various troubles; thus he was selected to lead. At Fort Hall the train ran short of provisions and several of the young men decided to complete the journey by pack horses and riding ponies, the price for the pony which Mr. Penington purchased from the Indians being two hickory shirts, though it afterward transpired that they had hoped to follow up the party and steal back their former property. For one hundred and fifty miles the Indians followed the six boys, three of whom stood guard every night and kept the enemy off by shooting at them as they were creeping up.

After leaving Fort Hall the journey was completed quite rapidly, September 15 finding them in the desired location. Mr. Penington at once engaged in boating as a means of livelihood, remaining at this work on the Columbia river for a short time, when he entered the Oregon City saw mill owned by Governor Abernathy. In the summer of 1848 he engaged to conduct a farm on Tualatin plains for R. D. Torney, and that same summer he located a donation claim four miles north of Lebanon, Linn county, in the Santiam bottoms. In 1849 he journeyed by water to California; after landing at San Francisco he at once went to the Spanish Bar of the American river, where he engaged for nearly two years in mining. He was successful the first year, but not meeting with like returns the second he returned to Oregon in the fall of 1850 by pack train, and settling upon his claim he began to make improvements. Until 1871 he remained there engaged in general farming and stock-raising; at the expiration of this period he rented the land and going to eastern Oregon he became extensively interested in the stock business, raising principally cattle and horses and meeting with gratifying success in this venture. He was located six miles from the mouth of Butter creek, Umatilla county, his residence being for the last ten years in Pendleton. In 1885 he sold out his interests in that part of the state, returned to Linn county and purchased and remodeled a comfortable residence in the city of Albany, where he has since made his home. He still owns his claim, which has developed into a prosperous, well appointed farm.

The marriage of Mr. Penington occurred in Linn county, February 28, 1850, Miss Abigail Cooper, a native of Ohio, becoming his wife. She had crossed the plains in the same train with Mr. Penington, her father, Samuel Cooper, having at that time brought his family to Oregon, where he located upon a donation claim in the Santiam valley. The children born to them are as follows: Mary, who became the wife of Dr. J. L. Hill and died in 1898 in Albany; Jenima, who married John H. Claypool and died in Linn county; Idella, who died in Umatilla county unmarried; Charles Clyde, a resident of Union county, Ore., where as sheriff and farmer he performs the duties of a citizen; Anna, who died in Umatilla county; Alice P., the widow of Freeland Richards, of Albany; and Celia B., who died in Albany, February 23, 1903, unmarried. While interested in making a success of his business affairs Mr. Penington has never forgotten to lend his aid in the upbuilding of the country, as a Democrat ably representing Umatilla county in the state senate in 1878, where he helped elect James H. Slater to the United States senate, and again in 1882 he was called upon to serve in the same office. Altogether he served in four regular and one special session, being actively interested in all that pertained to the welfare of the community which had honored him with its support. In local politics he is guided by the character of the candidate for a position, but in national affairs supports the Democratic party. He was made a Mason in Corinthian Lodge No. 17, A. F. & A. M., of Albany, in which he served as master. Both himself and wife are members of the Baptist Church, he having officiated as trustee of the same. He has always been active in advancing the work of the church, both here and in Pendleton, where he made his home for nearly fifteen years, being liberal with both time and money and sparing no effort toward the moral elevation of the new country.

ALEXANDER ESSON, an extensive farmer near Gervais, may be said to have no native land, for he was born at sea, off the east coast of Scotland, July 10, 1829. His father, an officer in the British army, died when his son was thirteen and a half years of age, his mother having died when he was but eleven months old. Left thus comparatively alone in the world, he found a home with an aunt until a short time after the death of his father, after which he was thrown upon his own resources, working on the farms in the surrounding locality.

At the age of sixteen Mr. Esson enlisted for military service in the Seventy-ninth Regiment, Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders, and was transferred to Quebec, Canada. He served for six years in the army. In 1852 he removed to Livingston county, N. Y., where he followed teaming and farming until 1857. After trying his fortunes in Wisconsin for a year he went to west Canada and in the fall of 1858 started for California by way of the Isthmus of Panama. Not realizing his mining expectations in California he came to Oregon in June, 1859, and after a year spent in Silverton located on a farm on Howell Prairie which he occupied and worked for about four years. December 24, 1862, he married Christina Stevens, who was born in Indiana, December 28, 1844, her family having crossed the plains in 1852. They began housekeeping on the farm on Howell Prairie. In 1863 he bought a farm of three hundred and twenty acres, to which he removed the following year and has since made this his home. Of this farm twenty-seven acres was cleared. This property is located two miles west of Mount Angel and under the management of the present owner has greatly increased its tillable surface, about one hundred acres being now under cultivation. Mr. Esson is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of the latter, which includes Shorthorn and Holstein cattle, Cotswold sheep and Poland-China hogs.

In political affiliations Mr. Esson is a Prohibitionist, and with his family is identified religiously with the Christian Church. He has served for several terms as road supervisor, and for years has been a member of the school board. To himself and wife have been born twelve children: Inez, deceased, formerly the wife of G. Simmons, became the mother of three sons and one daughter; Albyn is a minister of the Christian Church, residing in Portland with his family; Alfred M. is an attorney, located in Seattle, Wash.; Ida died at the age of twenty-one years; Florence is the widow of L. D. Smith, and with her son, L. D., makes her home with her father; A. S. is a dentist by profession and is located with his family at The Dalles; Hugh B. is principal of the Clatskanie high school; Ronald is attending the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis; Leroy A. is living at home; C. Elizabeth is a student at the University of Oregon, at Eugene; Mary Mabel and Isabella are also living with their parents.

GEORGE THOMSON, a successful and worthy representative of the farming interests of Yamhill county, was born in Lanark county, Ontario, Canada, January 17, 1833. His father, Henry Thomson, was a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, and in that country was employed in cotton and woolen factories, becoming a carder and spinner. Emigrating to the new world he took up his abode in Ontario, Canada, where he again became employed in woolen factories, but the last fifteen years of his life were devoted to agricultural pursuits. He died in the province of Ontario when about sixty-five years of age, in the faith of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a devoted and consistent member. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Agnes MacConnal, was born near Edinburgh and died at the birth of her son George, of this review. After four years the father married again, his second union being with Jennie Twiddle, who was born near Edinburgh and survived her husband for a number of years, passing away when about ninety years of age. By the first marriage there were three children: James and Douglas, both of whom died in Ontario; and George. The children of the second marriage are: Archie, Mrs. Agnes Murray, Mrs. Jane Calvert and Mrs. Mary Calvert, all deceased; Margaret and Henry. By another marriage Mr. Thomson also had the following children: Mamie, Robert, Elizabeth, Archie and Thomas, all of whom have passed away; and three who died in infancy. His children altogether numbered seventeen.

George Thomson received very limited educational advantages, having little or no opportunity of attending school, and his knowledge has been acquired mostly in the school of experience, reading and observation, having made him a well-informed man. He began to earn his own living in a woolen factory in Canada when but seven years of age and afterward he went upon the home farm with his father, there remaining until twenty-two years of age. At that time he removed to Port Sarnia, in the western part of the province of Ontario, and soon afterward he removed to Michigan, being employed in the logging camps near Port Huron. For five years he following that business and then returned to Ontario, Canada, where with the proceeds of his labors he purchased a farm and engaged in general agricultural pursuits until 1883, when he sold his property and made his way westward to Bonhomme county, S. Dak. There he purchased a farm and devoted his energies to its cultivation until 1890, making a specialty of the raising of corn, also raising of hogs. Following his sale of his South Dakota property he came to Oregon, establishing his home near McMinnville. He purchased eighty-eight acres of land two and a half miles northeast of the town and of this thirty-five acres are under a high state of cultivation. He has twenty acres planted to hops, which is a very productive and profitable crop in Oregon, and he likewise follows general farming, his efforts being attended with a fair degree of success.

In 1859 occurred the marriage of Mr. Thomson and Miss Jean McMillan, and unto them were born two sons and two daughters: J. J., a resident of Lincoln county, Ore.; Archibald S., of the same county; Mrs. Agnes McFee, who is deceased, and Elizabeth, who has also passed away. For his second wife, Mr. Thomson chose Lydia B. Rogers, who was born near Danville, Iowa, a daughter of Rev. D. B. Nichols, a minister of the Congregational Church, who was living at Mission Hill, S. Dak., and while residents of that state Mr. and Mrs. Thomson became acquainted and were married. He belongs to the Grange of McMinnville, of which he is now serving as chaplain, and his religious faith is indicated by his membership in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of that town.

SAMUEL S. TRAIN. As postmaster of Albany and proprietor and editor of the Albany Daily Herald, Samuel S. Train holds a position of prominence in the life of this thriving, wide-awake city. Becoming well known and popular through the columns of his well-conducted and enterprising paper, he is enabled not only to spread to a large territory the news of city, county, state and nation, but to arouse in the minds of the many readers of his pages a spirit of local pride and patriotism and a strong desire for the improvement of educational, moral and social conditions. A son of Thomas Train, he was born August 6, 1841, at Port Henry, Essex county, N. Y., near the shores of Lake Champlain. He comes of substantial colonial stock, being a direct descendant of one of three brothers who emigrated from Wales to New England in the early part of the seventeenth century. Two of these brothers married and reared families, their descendants becoming scattered throughout the Union. Asel Train, the grandfather of Samuel S., was born and reared in Vermont, but removed to New York state when a young man, and there engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death.

A native of Essex county, N. Y., Thomas Train learned the trade of carpenter and builder, and also worked as a millwright, erecting mills on different streams in New York state. Crossing the state to Buffalo with his family in 1852 he there took passage on a steamer for Detroit, thence proceeding by rail to Chicago. Continuing his journey to Stephenson county, Ill., he located near Lena, on a farm which he had purchased the previous year, when he had visited Freeport and the adjoining towns with a view of settling permanently in the Prairie state. Clearing and improving a homestead he was there employed in general farming until his death in 1871, at the age of seventy-one years. He was an uncompromising Republican in politics and an active member of the Congregational Church. His wife, whose maiden name was Betsey Barber, was born in Essex county, N. Y., of Holland Dutch descent, her ancestors having been among the pioneers of the Mohawk valley. She died in Stephenson county, Ill., in 1877, aged seventy years. She bore her husband eight children, four of whom grew to years of maturity, namely: Leonard R., who served in the Civil war as a member of the Forty-sixth Illinois Infantry, and as a retired publisher resides in Cowlitz county, Wash.; Joseph B., living in Ventura, Cal., served in the Civil war as a corporal in the Ninety-second Illinois Infantry, and was wounded at the battle of Shiloh; Samuel S., the special subject of this sketch; and Malenda B., who married Alonzo Fowler, died in 1899, in Illinois.

Coming with his parents to Illinois in 1852 Samuel S. Train was reared on the home farm, obtaining his elementary education in the district schools, this being supplemented by a course of study at the Presbyterian Collegiate Institute at Mendota, Ill. He subsequently learned the carpenter's trade with his father, but gave it up to begin his journalistic career on the Illinois Sons of Temperance, a paper published at Lebanon, Ill. Enlisting in 1862 in Company G, Ninety-second Illinois Infantry, at Rockford, under Col. Smith Watkins, he served until honorably discharged on account of physical disability. Going then to Boscobel, Wis., Mr. Train secured employment in the office of one of the leading papers of that place, the Boscobel Broadaxe, of which he was subsequently the proprietor and editor. Selling that paper he returned to Illinois, locating on the parental homestead, where he worked at general farming for a number of years at the same time teaching school during the winter terms. Going to Nebraska in 1872 he taught school at Mission Creek, Pawnee county, and also bought one hundred and sixty acres of land, on which he made many excellent improvements, and while making his home on his farm taught school in Marshall county, Kans., for one term.

In 1876 Mr. Train came to Oregon, locating first at Astoria, where he worked as a carpenter for awhile, afterward being employed in the printing office of the Astorian for three months. At the close of that period he came to Linn county to help start the Nucleus at Harrisburg, and was connected with it during its existence of two years, at the same time serving as principal of the Harrisburg schools, a position which he retained six years. In 1878 Mr. Train bought the plant of the defunct journal and established the Harrisburg Disseminator, a weekly, seven-column folio, which he afterward, in company with Mr. Whitney, changed to a six-column quarto. In 1884 Mr. Train purchased the Albany Herald, a weekly, six-column quarto, which he successfully edited and published. In 1885, with characteristic enterprise, he established the Albany Daily Herald, an undertaking that proved successful beyond his expectations, the circulation having greatly increased from year to year, it being now the leading daily of the county. In connection with the publishing of his paper, Mr. Train had a job printing office which he managed most profitably, carrying on a good business in that line of industry.

In December, 1898, Mr. Train was appointed by President McKinley postmaster of Albany, and was reappointed to the same office March 18, 1903, by President Roosevelt. Since assuming charge of the postoffice, February 15, 1899, he has devoted his entire time and attention to the interests of its patrons. Changes of importance to all concerned have been inaugurated; the receipts of the office have largely increased; free delivery service was established June 1, 1903; and the office was changed from a third-class to a second-class office.

At Prairie du Chien, Wis., Mr. Train married Mary J. Ricks, who was born in Allegheny county, N. Y., of English parentage, but was brought up and educated in Wisconsin, where her parents settled in 1853. Three of her brothers served in a Wisconsin regiment in the Civil war. Mrs. Train is a woman of much culture and refinement and at the age of fourteen years began teaching school in Wisconsin. She subsequently taught in Illinois and Nebraska, and after coming to Oregon was a teacher for seven years. Mr. and Mrs. Train have had two children, namely: Minnie, who died in Harrisburg, Ore., at the age of seventeen years; and Arlene, who is attending Albany College. Politically Mr. Train has always been a staunch Republican, and since the great debate at Freeport, Ill., between Lincoln and Douglas, he has been an active worker in party ranks, from 1886 until 1888 serving as chairman of the Linn County Republican Committee. Fraternally he was made a Mason at Lena, Ill., afterward joining Thurston Lodge No 28, A. F. & A. M., of Harrisburg, of which he is past master. He is a member and past commander of McPherson Post, G. A. R., is also a member of Grand Prairie Grange, P. of H., and of the Alco Club.

PERRY W. SPINK. After many years of hazardous and uncertain fortune Mr. Spink is now enjoying a well-earned rest among the peaceful and prosperous conditions which are typical of the changes which the years have brought to the western states. In the beautiful home recently erected on plans suggested by his talented wife, he looks out into the wealth and worth of the commonwealth built by the strokes of the axe and the upturning plow, to both of which he gave the strength of his young manhood. The qualities which made him successful among the Indians of Rogue river and afterward insured the protection of his life when men and women were suffering the depredations of the savages have followed him into the later years of his life, and the esteem of a community in which he has lived so many years is freely accorded him.

Benjamin Spink, the father of Perry W. Spink, was born in Washington county, N. Y., near the town of Hampton, his Scotch-Irish ancestry discernible in his patient, sturdy farming, which he continued until his death in the same state. He married Lucy Wood, a native of Rutland, Vt., and she also died in New York state. She was the mother of two sons and three daughters, of whom the third oldest was P. W. Spink. He was born in the same location as his father, September 24, 1829, and there remained until he was twenty-one years old, engaged in the practical duties of a farmer. His education consisted of an attendance of three months each year of the public schools, the remainder of the year being devoted to the arduous duties of his home life. Shortly after attaining his majority, the date being October 2, 1850, he came as far west as Kane county, Ill., where his brother Alonzo had previously settled, and there he engaged for a year and a half in farming. At this time he also became a victim to the spirit of unrest which pervaded the middle west, caused by the glowing tales of the riches to be attained beyond the Rockies, and March 23, 1852, joined the tide of emigration setting toward the Pacific slope. He left Kane county at this date, and with horse teams set out for the long and dangerous journey across the plains. He was in company with a train, and after crossing the Missouri river at St. Joseph, April 23, they traveled up the Platte, remaining on the west side until they came to the fork of the trail, one road leading to California and the other to Oregon. There they paused and a vote was taken as to whether they should take the trail to California or to Oregon, for to many it was simply a change and one locality was as desirable as another. The majority decided in favor of Oregon and at once came over this trail to The Dalles. There the party were compelled to ship the wagons down the river. Mr. Spink and another young man brought the horses to Cascades, and from there to the mouth of the Sandy river, finally ending the trip at Oregon City in September, 1852.

Upon his arrival at Oregon City Mr. Spink began to earn his livelihood by cutting cordwood at the mouth of the Clackamas river, where he remained for only a month, when he drove on to Jacksonville, intending to go into the mines of southern Oregon. After prospecting for a short time he became employed in conducting a pack train between the valley and the mines. In this work he remained until the Rogue River war, from 1853 to 1856, during which he was a volunteer in a small company that rescued several people. He had had various dealings with the Indians during his years among the mountains, and through many little favors he had won their friendship, and thus he was a peculiarly favored personage in those trying times, coming and going at will among the people that were raiding the entire country. In the winter of 1856 he discontinued his pack train, and coming to Albany has since made that city his home, with the exception of the spring of 1857, when he took a herd of cattle to Sacramento valley, Cal. In this city he first engaged in teaming, hauling merchandise from Portland, and continued this until the fall of 1857, when he rented a farm near Albany and successfully conducted the same for three years. A like period was spent on another farm in the same neighborhood, after which he again located in Albany, in 1863 engaging once more in teaming and trucking. He soon conducted three teams in the work and shortly had all the business of this nature in the city, successfully holding it for about twenty years. But the work was exceedingly heavy and Mr. Spink was advised by physicians to give it up, therefore in 1882 he sold out and endeavored to interest himself along other lines. He took up the wood business, furnishing wood to the citizens of Albany until 1887, when he engaged in the lumber business, establishing a yard at the corner of Ferry and Water streets, dealing extensively in all building materials. In this work he remained until 1902, so successfully that, though he sold out in that year, he took it up once more in 1903, the immense business which he had built up demanding his return. That Mr. Spink has been very successful is a self-evident fact, for with nothing but courage and energy he has made for himself a strong position financially in the community, his lumber yards being one of the sound industries of the city, while he now owns a finely improved farm of three hundred and sixty-eight acres, located two and a half miles southeast of Harrisburg.

The wife whom Mr. Spink chose in 1857 to share his fortunes was formerly Miss Rebecca J. Rankin, another of the faithful pioneer women of the early days, having come from her birthplace in Illinois to Oregon in 1853. Her father, John Rankin, brought his wife and children west in that year and settled upon a donation claim. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Spink, Ira died at the age of eight years; Ernest died at the age of thirty-one years; Lucy died at the age of eight years; and Ida is the wife of A. C. Stellmacher, who is located upon the farm owned by Mr. Spink. January 8, 1871, Mrs. Spink died and Mr. Spink was again married, December 10, 1872, to Mary E. Armstrong, who was born in Wabash county, Ind., and came to Oregon in 1872. In his politics Mr. Spink has been a stanch and earnest Republican since the war, though he has never sought official recognition in any form.

JOHN J. GRAHAM. A man of great intelligence, enterprise, and rare business and executive ability, J. J. Graham, of Albany, occupies a place of prominence among the active and progressive agriculturists of Linn county. A farmer by birth and breeding, he has profited by his early knowledge and experience, and possessing those inherent qualities that are sure to command success at all times and in all places, he has been unusually prosperous in the work to which he has devoted his time and attention since the days of his youth. He was born April 23, 1843, in County Tyrone, Ireland, on the same farm that his father, William Graham, was born, lived, and died. His paternal grandfather, John Graham, was born in Scotland, but removed to County Tyrone, Ireland, when a young man, and there spent the remainder of his life as a farmer.

William Graham inherited the habits of industry and thrift of his Scotch ancestors, and succeeded to the occupation in which he was reared, being engaged as a tiller of the soil during his entire life. He married Frances Given, a daughter of John Given. She was born in County Tyrone, and after the death of her husband emigrated to America, and died in Ontario. Of the nine children born of their union, seven survive, five girls and two boys. The sons both reside in the northwest, J. J., the special subject of this sketch, living in Oregon, and Samuel being a resident of Fernie, British Columbia.

The oldest member of the parental household, J. J. Graham, spent his childhood on the ancestral homestead, acquiring his education in the national schools. Emigrating to Canada when twenty years of age, he worked for wages as a farmer and dairyman in Oxford county, Ontario, for awhile, and then embarked in agricultural pursuits on his own account. Industrious, thrifty and economical, he accumulated some money, and desiring to invest it where he could secure the best returns he came to Oregon in 1876 as an investor. Locating at Waldo Hills, Marion county, he purchased one hundred and forty acres of land, which he devoted to general farming and stock-raising until 1884, meeting with satisfactory results. Coming then to Linn county Mr. Graham assumed charge of the nine hundred acres of land owned by the East of Scotland Investment Company, and had the superintendency of this large tract for sixteen consecutive years. Closing out the company's business in 1902 he purchased two hundred and eighty acres of the land himself, selling the remainder to different people, and has since been prosperously engaged in raising grain and stock, carrying on an extensive business. He also owns the adjoining farm of two hundred and twelve acres, lying six miles north of Albany, where he owns considerable property, and has resided since 1894. In addition to managing his own property, Mr. Graham is superintendent of the four farms in Linn county belonging to the Old Scotch Company, performing the duties thus devolving upon him with characteristic fidelity and ability.

While a resident of Ontario, Mr. Graham married Margaret Shaw, who was born in Ontario, a daughter of Angus Shaw and sister of John A. Shaw, in whose sketch, which appears elsewhere in this work, further ancestral history may be found. Mr. and Mrs. Graham are the parents of six children, namely: Angus, a graduate of Albany College, is bookkeeper at Merrell's, in Portland; Mrs. Rachel Bronson resides in Portland; Frances was graduated from Albany College in the class of 1903; Mary, John, and Donald complete the family. Cordially endorsing the principles of the Republican party, Mr. Graham has never shirked the responsibilities of public office, but has served as county commissioner, and for one term was a member of the city council, representing the Third ward. He is a member of St. John's Lodge, F. & A. M., of Albany, and is a member and past officer of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Both he and his wife belong to the First Presbyterian Church.

HENRY ALLEN. No state can boast of a more heroic band of pioneers than Oregon. They were not adventurers and mere fortune seekers who came to the northwest, but men and women who desired to establish homes here and to provide for their families by taking advantage of the natural conditions of the country, and while promoting their individual success also do the best they could for the communities in which they resided and for the commonwealth. Mr. Allen became one of the early settlers of Oregon and is now living retired in Silverton amid a host of warm friends gained through a genial manner and social disposition. His residence in the state covers more than a half century, for he arrived in Oregon in 1852.

A native of Tennessee, Mr. Allen was born June 1, 1828. His father, Abner Allen, was born in North Carolina and when quite young removed to Tennessee, and in 1830 became a resident of Illinois, locating at Perry, Pike county, where he purchased two hundred and forty acres of land from the government. There he carried on general farming until 1852, when he made his way across the plains with ox-teams to California, spending four months on the long journey. He located three miles south of what is now Silverton, Ore., securing a donation claim of eighty acres, and engaged in the stock business. He also had money which he loaned and thus he added to his income. During the latter part of his life he engaged in travel to a large extent, spending about half of his time in California, as he believed the climate of that state was more beneficial to his health. He died, however, at his home in Silverton in 1891, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. Well and worthily did he win the proud American title of a self-made man. Throughout his entire life he was energetic and untiring in his labors and thus won success. Without any extraordinary family or pecuniary advantages to aid him at the outset of his career, he started out to make his own way in the world and his capable control of his business opportunities enabled him to gradually advance until he was the possessor of a handsome competence. In early manhood he wedded Susan Aiken, who was born in North Carolina and died of mountain fever on the Sweet-water river while they were crossing the plains in 1852.

Henry Allen is the eldest of the six children, two sons and four daughters, of this worthy couple. His educational privileges were extremely limited. He attended school for only about three months in his life, for, as he lived in pioneer districts, school privileges were not easily obtained. He was twenty-one years of age when, in 1849, he left the Mississippi valley and with an ox-team started for the Pacific coast. By that slow method of travel he proceeded by way of the Platte river and the Oregon route, crossing long stretches of land where nothing but sage brush grew and at other times forcing his way over the mountains where there was almost no trail. At length, however, he reached the mining districts of California, and for two years was engaged in searching for the precious metal, being moderately successful in his work. He then invested his money in a pack train, which he purchased for $4,000, and started from Trinity county to Shasta county, Cal., carrying with him all kinds of provisions and tools. On the Trinity river, however, Indians came upon the camp at supper time and took from him nearly everything that he possessed, and then killed his mules. After he had recovered somewhat from his losses he returned to Illinois in 1851. The following year, accompanied by his father and his family, he once more made the long and difficult journey overland to the Pacific coast. While in Illinois he had married and was accompanied by his bride on the second journey, which was terminated on the 2d of September. They located near Silverton, where Mr. Allen purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land; and as the years have passed he has added to this until he now owns a valuable farm of five hundred acres all under cultivation. This property is now rented and he is living retired in Silverton, where he has purchased a cottage on Water street. For three years, from 1895 to 1898, he was engaged in the cattle business in the Des Chutes valley, in Crook county, where he owned one hundred and sixty acres.

In Pike county, Ill., February 14, 1852, Mr. Allen was married to Miss Frances Rockwood, who was born in that state, a daughter of Roderick Rockwood, who was born in Paris, France, and was brought to New York state by his parents at the age of three years. At an early day Mr. Rockwood went to Illinois, settling first in Brown county and afterward in Pike county. Throughout his entire life he followed blacksmithing. In 1866 he removed to Kansas, where he died when about eighty years of age. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Allen have been born three sons and two daughters, namely: Timothy D., who is engaged in the operation of his father's farm; Roderick D., who is a clerk in the insane asylum at Salem, Ore.; Harvey L., who is now an undertaker at Lewiston, Idaho; Alwilda Josephine, the wife of L. F. Mascher, a farmer and hop producer of Marion county; and Adell Gertrude, at home.

Mr. Allen votes with the Republican party, and has served as road supervisor for four terms, while for ten years he has been a school director. That he has lived peaceably with all men is shown by the fact that he has never been engaged in a law-suit. He has never had a fight nor a fire, has paid his debts promptly, has fulfilled other obligations and has been true to every trust reposed in him. Such a life record is well worthy of emulation, and with pleasure we present his history to the readers of this volume.

ABSALOM BYERLEY. A pioneer entitled to great credit for his part in the development of Oregon, who is enumerated among the pioneers of 1851, and among those courageous Indian fighters who brought about the pacification of the northwest, is Absalom Byerley, formerly an extensive farmer and miller, but since 1901 a retired citizen of Dallas. As his name indicates, Mr. Byerley is of German extraction, and is a native of Polk county, Ind., where he was born February 27, 1833, a son of Martin and Elizabeth (Sears) Byerley; the latter, a daughter of Henry Sears, of Indiana, died in 1852. The family were numerously represented in the southern states, especially in North Carolina, where the paternal grandfather died, and where he owned considerable land.

Martin Byerley settled in Indiana and in 1835 removed to Knox county, Ill., where he engaged in farming, and also ran a distillery. About 1840 he took up his residence in the vicinity of Fairfield, Jefferson county, Iowa, where he farmed on land for which he paid but $1.25 an acre. In common with other agriculturists in that thinly settled region, he planned to better his condition by removing to the west, and after selling his farm at a reasonable profit, crossed the plains with his wife and six children. The journey was not without its adventures or sorrows, for one of the children died just before reaching Portland. The father settled on a farm of one hundred and sixty acres on Salt creek, improved his property to the best of his ability.

Eventually he lived for twelve years in Dallas. His death occurred at Newport, at the age of eighty-three years. Of the children born to this pioneer couple Henry is a farmer at Perrydale; Absalom, the subject of this sketch; Jane, the wife of John Vernon, of Polk county; Michael, who died in 1852; Jefferson, who lives at Newport; and Adelaide, who is the wife of Mr. Powell, of Grant's pass, Ore.

The youth of Absalom Byerley contained much of hard work and responsibility, especially in Iowa, where he helped to break prairie and to establish a paying farming industry. In both Illinois and Iowa the acquiring of an education had its disadvantages, for the early subscription schools were far apart, and the roads almost impassable during certain seasons of the year. The first really interesting happening in his life was when the family got together their possessions and prepared to emigrate to the west. They had a two-horse carriage, twelve yoke of cattle and three wagons, and May 10 left their home, arriving at Council Bluffs on May 27th. They came by the old Oregon trail, arriving in Dallas September 15th, and on the way had light loads and made good time. Mr. Byerley remained at home with his family until his twenty-sixth year, but began to work on surrounding farms when quite a small boy. He bought a farm of one hundred and sixty acres on Salt creek, which he improved and farmed, and in 1853 went down into Siskiyou county, Cal., where he planned to mine. However, the Indians soon cleared him out, and he returned overland to Oregon. As an Indian fighter he is known to possess unusual courage, and to have participated in about all of the bouts of his time in this section. He was in the Yakima war of 1855-56, as a soldier in Company B, First Oregon National Guard, under Captain Burt, and after the end of the war returned to his home, a little later purchasing two hundred acres of land at Eola. This land proving unsatisfactory he sold it and bought a farm of four hundred acres on the Luckiamute, where he engaged extensively in stock-raising. To his original land he added and in time had four hundred and eighty acres, a portion of which was heavily wooded. This condition suggested an additional source of revenue, and he built a steam saw-mill, and engaged in the manufacture of lumber for about nine years. Having used up all the timber around him, he sold his property in the spring of 1901, and, locating in Dallas, bought his present pleasant and comfortable home.

In Polk county, Ore., Mr. Byerley married Mary Florence Allen, who was born in Iowa, and died in Oregon, leaving ten children, nine of whom attained maturity. Of the children, Henry is in Perryville; Leroy is in Arlie; Arabella is now Mrs. Blake, of Dallas; Frank, Otto and Eugene are in Dallas; Edward and William are deceased; Maude is a resident of Salem; and Mary died in Oregon. For a second wife Mr. Byerley married, in Polk county, Mrs. Dolly Crow, widow of Mack Crow, who came to Oregon in 1872. Politically, Mr. Byerley is a Democrat, but further than the formality of casting his vote has never identified himself with local political affairs. He is a member of the War Veterans Association, and in his religious life is a member of the Christian Church, his wife being identified with the Evangelical Association.

T. L. BONNEY. Those who are interested in the growth and progress of Oregon, and who have studied the causes which have led up thereto, will readily recognize the fact that the men who have come here and laid the foundation for her success and development have been men of versatility, men of enterprise and men who can not only till the soil, thus inducing nature to bring forth her richest gifts, but who can also turn their hands to many industries, taking part in manufacturing the different articles of commercial use which are very necessary in a new country and which when brought from a distance become very expensive.

Numbered among the men who have aided substantially in the upbuilding of Marion county is T. L. Bonney, who has followed the coopering business practically all his life, and who is now living somewhat retired, following his trade during the winter season and leaving the supervision of a large farm, which he owns, to his sons. Mr. Bonney was born February 14, 1835, in Ashtabula county, Ohio, and is a son of Jarius Bonney, a native of Canada, who removed to Ohio with his people when a young man and learned the cooper's trade in the latter state. In that state also Mr. Bonney became acquainted with Miss Larned and made her his wife. Four children were born unto them, all of whom are now deceased. After the death of his first wife Mr. Bonney married Jane Elkins, a native of New York. They made their home in Ohio until 1836, when they removed to Illinois, settling in Fulton county, where they continued to live until 1845. Mr. Bonney then decided to bring his family to the northwest. They therefore started across the plains, joining a company under the conduct of Captain Welch, of Oregon City. At that time the country was very wild and Indians were numerous, and very often hostile, but the company were unmolested during this journey, which occupied six months. Arriving on the Pacific coast the Bonney family first took up their abode in California, where they remained through the following winter and spring. In 1846 they came by pack train to Oregon, taking up a donation claim on French Prairie, two miles east of Hubbard. This tract consisted of three hundred and twenty acres, mostly of wild and unimproved land. Mr. Bonney, senior, made many improvements upon this farm, building a large and substantial log house, in which he lived until his death, in 1856. In addition to his agricultural pursuits he followed the cooper's trade for about thirty years, and was the first cooper on French Prairie, making the first barrels and kegs ever made in this vicinity. After the father's death the mother took up her residence with Mr. Bonney, of this review, with whom she lived for several years, removing thence to the home of her daughter in eastern Oregon, where she died at the age of seventy-eight years.

T. L. Bonney received his education in the district schools and in the early years of his manhood took up the cooper's trade, assisting his father and remaining upon the farm until his marriage in 1860, the lady of his choice being Tennessee Baker. She was born in Missouri and with her parents came to Oregon in 1852, settling in Clackamas county. Her brothers are now living in Albany. Mr. Bonney and his bride began their housekeeping on the old home farm, she proving a faithful helpmate to her husband, and as the years have gone by has aided in acquiring a competency through her industry and economy. Mr. Bonney, too, has spent his life in an energetic and painstaking way, making varied improvements and adding all modern equipments and accessories to his farm until it is now one of the most attractive and highly cultivated in the vicinity. It comprises seventy-five acres, forty acres of which is under cultivation and used in raising grain, while fourteen acres are devoted to the growing of hops.

Mr. Bonney has left the care and management of his farm to his sons, who, having been reared upon the home farm have become fitted for its conduct and supervision. On the home place are found good frame dwellings, comfortably and commodiously built, as well as other out-buildings necessary for the protection of grain and stock, and the home of Mr. Bonney and his family has every appearance of comfort and happiness. He has been blessed with the following children: Preston L. and Edward L., now deceased; Mary E., wife of M. H. Lee, of Canby; William H., of Redland; Jane O., the wife of M. Pulley, a resident of Marion county, in the vicinity of Hubbard; Lawrence, now residing in Oak Point, Wash.; Ira A. and Albert E., of Hubbard; and Charles, at home.

Although Mr. Bonney has ever been a busy man, he has yet found time to be of public service to the community in which he resides. As a member of the school board for many years, his influence has always been extended in behalf of education, while his religious views are shown by his membership since 1860 with the United Brethren Church, in which he is trustee. In politics he is a Republican. A man of integrity and honor, the life record of T. L. Bonney forms an interesting chapter in the annals of Marion county, and the methods by which he has achieved success are well worthy of emulation.

EMMANUEL NORTHUP, A. B., B. D., who is dean of McMinnville College and also occupies the chair of mathematics and Greek, has been a representative of educational interests of the northwest since 1882. He was born in West Oneonta, Otsego county, N. Y., July 3, 1851, the eldest living of the seven children of Isaac G. and Phoebe Elizabeth (Saunders) Northup. The family is of English descent and was established at an early epoch in American history in the colony of Rhode Island, and later was planted on Connecticut soil. The grandfather, Josiah Northup, was born in Connecticut and removing to Otsego county, N. Y., there carried on farming and also served as a justice of the peace for many years. His father was the Rev. Emmanuel Northup, a Baptist minister, who was born in New England and removed from Connecticut to New York, where he did missionary work, preaching without financial remuneration, while in order to support his family he carried on agricultural pursuits.

Isaac G. Northup, the father of Professor Northup of McMinnville, was born in Otsego county, N. Y., and throughout his life followed farming. He wedded Phoebe Elizabeth Saunders, who was born in Unadilla, Otsego county, N. Y., in 1819, a daughter of Ziba Saunders, who was a mason and builder, and died in Owego, Tioga county, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. Northup became the parents of seven children, five of whom reached adult age and three are yet living. The parents held membership in the Baptist Church. The father died at the age of sixty-seven years, but the mother is still living at the old homestead in New York.

On the home farm Professor Northup remained through the period of his minority, attending the district schools in his youth. In 1872 he entered Colgate Academy, at Hamilton, N. Y., and after three years there became a student in Colgate University, in which he was graduated in 1879, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The same year he was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist church and accepted the pastorate of the church at Lake Mills, Wis., where he remained for a year. In 1880 he went to Chicago, Ill., where he entered the Baptist Union Theological Seminary, and was therein graduated in 1883, with the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He then returned to the old home farm in New York and was pastor of the Baptist Church in West Oneonta until July, 1888, when he came to Oregon, having been elected to the chair of mathematics in McMinnville College, and on arriving here he was also assigned to the chair of Greek. He has since been instructor in both of these departments and for the past five years has been dean of the faculty, while since 1888 he has been librarian of the institution. Throughout the years of his residence here he has continued his pastoral labors to a large extent, preaching in many different churches in Yamhill county and vicinity and also occupying different pastorates here.

Professor Northup was married in West Oneonta, N. Y., in 1886, to Miss Maud Galer, a native of that place and a daughter of James B. Galer, a builder there. They had seven children, but Frederick, the third, died at the age of nine months. The others are: Truman, Charlotte E., Fleeta, Lucy Maud, Emmanuel and Osa.

About 1897 Professor Northup became a member of the Oregon Fire Relief Association, in 1900 was made one of its directors, and upon the death of President O. H. Irvine, he was elected president and has since been an active factor in the successful control of the enterprise which is now, a most important business concern of the state. Although Professor Northup has been a resident of McMinnville for little more than twelve years, he has been so closely and prominently connected with the educational and moral interests of the city and state that it is imperative that he be represented in this history. Christian instruction is having an influence over the world that few can estimate, for it is in youth that the life of the man is marked out, his future course decided and his choice as to the good or evil made. It is to the work of instructing the young that Professor Northup devotes his time, energies and thought and the result of his labors is far-reaching.

AUGUSTUS YERGEN. It was a merry golden wedding celebration that took place on the farm of Augustus Yergen, three miles from Aurora, March 28, 1902, for he and his companionable wife were held in high esteem in the neighborhood, and many came with gifts and heartfelt wishes to speed them upon the second half century of wedded happiness. May 24, 1902, the scene took on a different aspect, for the fine old pioneer, whose industry had laid low the surrounding timber, and caused the land to produce in abund-

Born in Meilheim, Germany, November 28, 1831, Mr. Yergen was ten years of age when his father secured passage on an outgoing sailing vessel, thereafter spending many weeks on the waste of waters with his little family. Arriving in New York, he came at once to St. Clair county, Ill., where the son grew to manhood, and was reared on a farm of moderate size. As opportunity permitted he attended the public schools and, in St. Louis, March 28, 1852, was united in marriage with Elizabeth Griffin, a native of St. Clair county, and daughter of an Illinois pioneer, George A. Griffin. After two weeks the young couple carried out their long-planned trip across the plains, the details of which they had talked over during the winter months by the fire glow, and for which they had prepared on an elaborate scale. They had two yoke of oxen and one yoke of cows to one wagon, and were about six months in making the trip, having on the way a fairly pleasant time. The first winter was spent near Washougal, Wash., and this was a trying time, indeed, for feed of all kinds was scarce, and in consequence they lost all of their stock. The next spring Mr. Yergen took up a donation claim of three hundred and twenty acres on the line between Marion and Clackamas counties, and here the new owner erected a little log house containing but one room, and in this started up housekeeping on a small scale, enduring many hardships ere their land was rendered productive. With slight exception the property was covered with a heavy growth of timber, and much effort was required to clear even a small space. Nevertheless, this early pioneer prospered exceedingly, and left to his heirs a valuable and productive farm. Of the six children born to himself and wife, Adelbert is a resident of Butteville; George W. is a hop-grower of Marion county; Mary E. is the wife of John V. Swan of Portland; Frank E. lives on a farm near Aurora, Marion county; Frederick also lives near Aurora; and Henry F. is operating the old homestead. Mr. Yergen was an extensive hop-grower and general farmer, and his methods of work were progressive and practical. He was also interested especially in horticulture, and during the early years of his career in Oregon accumulated considerable money as the result of his prosecution of this branch of agriculture. In politics a Democrat, he never took an active interest in the political agitations of his neighborhood, but rather chose the quiet and retired life of the unostentatious agriculturist. He was a member of the Lutheran Church, and contributed generously of his means towards the support of that organization. No more honored man tilled the soil of this well-favored locality, and his death was deeply deplored.

HON. MARION B. HENDRICK. Among the pioneers of '52 who have worked their way up from comparative obscurity to prominence in the business and political affairs of Yamhill county, may be mentioned Hon. Marion B. Hendrick, extensive grain merchant and member of the furniture and undertaking firm of Hendrick & Briedwell of McMinnville. The Hendrick family was established in Virginia long before the Revolutionary war, and members bearing the name participated in the memorable struggle for independence. In Virginia was born the paternal grandfather, Benjamin, who removed with his family to Barren county, Ky., where William A. Hendrick, the father of Marion B., was born. The family is of German descent, and the most desirable traits of that industrious and frugal nation have not been lost through transmittance.

William A. Hendrick was a farmer for the greater part of his active life, and about 1832 removed from his native state of Kentucky to Marshall county, Ill., of which he was one of the pioneer settlers. The region was wild and frontier at the time, and as a means of safety he lived in the fort until purchasing his farm in the wilderness. Eventually he removed to Iowa, and his death occurred on his farm in the vicinity of Osceola. In his young manhood he married Maria Bird, who was born in Kentucky, a daughter of Robert Bird, a native of Virginia, and pioneer of both Kentucky and Illinois. In the latter state Mr. Bird settled in Marshall county, from where he removed in 1847 to Oregon, coming by way of the plains with his own family and the families of his three sons. Settling within a few miles of Oregon City, he improved a farm of large dimensions, where his death occurred, and also that of his wife, who was a Miss Mary Haley of Kentucky. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hendrick, of whom Marion B. is the oldest. Rachel, Sarah and Martha died in Illinois.

Born near Glasgow, Barren county, Ky., August 14, 1828, Mr. Hendrick was educated in the public schools of Marshall, and at the academy of Eureka. Having accumulated a keen interest in the far west, he was glad of the opportunity to hire out as driver in crossing the plains in 1852, but this arrangement seems not to have been entirely satisfactory, for upon arriving at Salmon Falls on the Snake river, himself and a companion left the emigrant train and started out afoot, accomplishing the rest of their journey per shank's express. Notwithstanding this slow means of locomotion, he made good time, for, having started out April 15th, he arrived at the Dalles August 20, being six weeks ahead of the train. For some time Mr. Hendrick worked at odd jobs around Oregon City, and even tried his luck in the mines in the southern part of the state. Convinced that he was not among the elect in the latter calling, he returned to Yamhill county and engaged in raising wheat, which proved a profitable venture, for the land produced about forty bushels to the acre and sold at ninety-five cents per bushel. As he had twelve hundred bushels to sell the profit was considerable to a youth with depleted finances, and permitted him to carry out the long-considered project of becoming a land owner. Going to Marion county, Ore., he took up a quarter section of land in the Mission Bottom, and after cultivating it for three years, disposed of it at a profit. Returning to Yamhill county, he bought a store in Wheatland and engaged in a general merchandise business, and also began to deal in wheat, which proved so successful that in 1862 he put up the first warehouse at Wheatland. In the vicinity also he built a flouring mill, which, after many years of prosperity, burned to the ground, entailing heavy loss.

About this time Mr. Hendrick increased his responsibilities by purchasing land and engaging in hop culture. He also leased a warehouse at Independence, and in 1888, with his son, Miles, he started a general store at Amity. The great flood of 1890 destroyed the Wheatland warehouse, containing twenty-five thousand bushels of wheat, but, nothing daunted, he rebuilt, and proceeded with as great courage as before. For thirty-one years he engaged in the general merchandise business, and at the same time was continually increasing his wheat business, which finally assumed very large proportions. After locating in Amity in 1893, he continued the warehouse business, and at the same time had warehouses along different points of the railroad. His store at Amity, of which his son had charge, was run under the firm name of M. E. Hendrick & Company until 1897, when they sold out, and in 1899 opened a store in McMinnville under the same firm name, and that as well as the furniture and undertaking business of Hendrick & Briedwell are sources of gratifying profit, and reflect the sagacity and far-sighted business judgment of their founder.

Ever since he was old enough to appreciate the distinctions in politics, Mr. Hendrick has allied his forces with the Democratic party. He has served for one term as county assessor, and in 1878 was elected to the state legislature, serving in session of 1878-79. He was active in working for the election of United States Senator Slater. Mr. Hendrick has been a member of the county committee, and was chairman of the same in 1900. He is a member of the County and State Pioneer Associations. In Wheatland, the laying out of which town was due to his enterprise, Mr. Hendrick was united in marriage, April 19, 1855, with Ellis Sawyer, who was born in Marshall county, Ill., a daughter of Mark Sawyer, a native of North Carolina. Mr. Sawyer removed to Marshall county, Ill., with his father, Jesse, and in 1847 crossed the plains with ox teams, settling after a six months' jaunt on a donation claim of six hundred and forty acres one-half mile north of Wheatland. Here he lived for many years, but finally retired to McMinnville, where his death occurred. He married Susan James, a native of Tennessee, who removed to Illinois with her parents in the early days. Of the twelve children in the family ten attained maturity, and nine are living, Mrs. Hendrick being the oldest in the family, and nine years of age when she crossed the plains. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hendrick—Miles E., of the firm of M. E. Hendrick & Co.; Ella, living with her parents; Eleanora, now Mrs. Briedwell of McMinnville; and Lovie, now Mrs. Arlington Watt of Amity. Mr. Hendrick is a member of the United Evangelical Association, while his wife is identified with the United Brethren Church. He is possessed of unquestioned integrity, oft-evinced public spiritedness, and the faculty to grasp opportunity by the forelock. Mr. Hendrick enjoys the fullest confidence of the communities which have benefited by his upbuilding ability, and he is to an unusual extent, one of those large souled, generous pioneers whom it is always a pleasure to meet.

A. F. ARTHUR, who is a well-known and successful contractor and builder of McMinnville, is one of the native sons of the Golden West, his birth having occurred in this city May 23, 1865. That seemed an early epoch in the history of this section of the country, and yet, twenty-two years before that time, his father, William Arthur, had come to the Sunset state. He was born in Missouri and is a brother of Mrs. Mahala Cozine of this place. It was in the year 1843 that William Arthur crossed the plains, accompanying his parents. In early life he learned the carpenter's trade and for many years followed the building business. In the early '60s he was a farmer in Clackamas county, Ore., and then came to McMinnville, where he began contracting and building, and many of the substantial structures of the city are the visible evidence of his life of thrift and industry. He is now living retired in McMinnville, enjoying a rest which he has truly earned. His wife bore the maiden name of Margaret Easton and died when A. F. Arthur was but a year old, leaving two children, the elder being Milton, who is a carpenter of Ione, Ore. The father is a member of the Baptist Church and his Christian faith has been manifest throughout his upright career. As an honored pioneer he certainly deserves mention in this volume for he belongs to that class of heroic early settlers who laid broad and deep the foundation for the present prosperity and development of this section of the country.

In the public schools, A. F. Arthur acquired his early education and afterward spent a short time as a student in McMinnville College. From early youth he worked at the carpenter's trade, which he learned under the direction of his father, and he has always followed this pursuit, with the exception of a few years spent in farming. He owned a place of four hundred and eighty acres four miles west of McMinnville and thereon engaged in the raising of stock, making a specialty of sheep and cattle. In 1894 he returned to McMinnville and rented his farm, which in 1899 he sold. Upon again locating in his native city he began contracting and building and has erected many fine residences here. He is now in partnership with J. W. Cook, under the firm style of Cook & Arthur, and they rank among the leading builders of this part of the state, having a liberal patronage, which is indicative of their excellent workmanship and their enterprise. They live faithfully up to the spirit as well as to the letter of the contract and in the execution of the work entrusted to them they show that they are masters of the building art.

Mr. Arthur is a man of resourceful business ability, who has not confined his attention alone to one line, for in the summer seasons he is engaged in threshing, being a partner of C. J. Skinner in that enterprise. They operate the Russell thresher, which is run by steam, Mr. Arthur having been in this business for fifteen years. In all branches of his work he is progressive, keeping abreast with the latest improvements.

In this county Mr. Arthur was united in marriage to Miss Emma Huguelett, a native of Virginia City, Nev., and unto them have been born five children—Austin, Roy, Clara, Walter and Ernest. Fraternally Mr. Arthur is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and with the Woodmen of the World, and he belongs to the Baptist Church. His political support is given to the Democracy and he has served as a member of the Democratic county central committee, doing everything in his power to advance the growth and success of the principles in which he believes. In business he has achieved success through honorable effort, untiring energy and capable management, while in social life he has gained friendship and favor because of qualities which everywhere command respect—a genial disposition, and deference for the opinions of others.

FREDERICK J. J. HURST. More than forty years have passed since Mr. Hurst came to Oregon, and within this time he has risen to success in the business world, at the same time gaining an untarnished reputation. He was born in Pommern, Prussia, Germany, March 29, 1842, a son of Christian and Caroline (Kingrün) Hurst. The father was also a native of Prussia and belonged to one of the old families of that kingdom. By trade he was a wagon-maker and followed that pursuit throughout his entire life, which was passed in Germany. His wife was a daughter of Jacob Kingrün, a native of Sweden, who removed to Prussia and there followed farming. Mrs. Hurst, however, was born in Germany, and after the death of her first husband she married again and spent her last days in the United States. Mr. Hurst of this review was one of a family of four sons and two daughters. His brother, John D. Hurst, made his way across the plains with him and followed the miller's trade in Oregon. However, he did not confine his attention alone to milling, for he became recognized as the best stone dresser in Oregon and his activity along that line contributed to his success. He died in Aurora, this state, in 1900.

Frederick J. J. Hurst spent his boyhood days in his native country, and in accordance with the laws of that land attended school between the ages of six and fourteen years. He afterward obtained practical training in business life by working upon a farm and in a mill. He was a youth of fifteen when he crossed the briny deep to America, sailing in 1857 on the vessel Ocean Home, which left Hamburg bound for New York. After a voyage of one hundred and two days, anchor was dropped in the American port and Mr. Hurst made his way from the eastern metropolis to Bureau county, Ill. In that locality he secured employment on a farm and later he worked in the old Tiskilwa mill for his brother in order to learn the trade. Subsequently he became a resident of Blue Grass, Iowa, where he followed the miller's trade and later was employed in the same capacity in Davenport. He next removed to Lyons, Iowa, where he rented and operated a mill until 1862, but in that year, attracted by the growing west with its varied opportunities and business openings, he came to Oregon, making the journey with a horse team and wagon. In the month of April he left his old home, crossed the Missouri river at Council Bluffs, followed the Oregon trail and came by way of the Landis cutoff. The Indians at that time were a constant menace to the emigrants, causing much trouble and annoyance. Subsequently the party with which Mr. Hurst traveled served as a target for the guns of the red men, but the party returned the fire and kept the savages at a distance. Eventually they were gladdened by the sight of the fertile fields of Oregon, reaching their destination in October. Mr. Hurst went to the mines on the Powder river and afterward to the Boise basin, which was then a part of Utah. Subsequently he was engaged in mining in Montana, and in this way he gained a start. In 1869 he located in the Willamette valley and in partnership with his brother purchased the Corvallis Mill and turned his attention to the manufacture of flour. They had sold the mill, but before turning it over it was burned down and they rebuilt the plant. The new mill was then operated by the brothers until they sold to the firm of Gray & Kouthauer. At that time they purchased the Champoeg Mill, and this was conducted by Mr. Hurst until he disposed of it and purchased the North Salem Mill. Later he became a member of the Capital Milling Company, in which he was associated with William Reed and others. His brother was manager while Mr. Hurst of this review was head miller. Finally he sold his interest in this concern and removed to Lincoln, where he conducted a saw and grist mill for five years. Having opportunity to sell to an advantage he then returned to Salem where he began speculating, and since 1893 he has been engaged in real estate operations in this city. He both buys and sells real estate, and has a comprehensive knowledge of realty values and of good business opportunities in this direction. He laid out the Hurst Addition to North Salem, comprising three acres, and upon this he has built a number of good residences. He also owns the North Salem brick store and other buildings, including the one in which the steam laundry is conducted.

Mr. Hurst was married in Clackamas county to Miss Emma Daue, who was born in Wisconsin, and they now have four children—Albert, of Salem, and Carrie, Stella and Fred, who are yet under the parental roof. Since becoming an American citizen Mr. Hurst has given his political support to the Republican party, and socially he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, while his wife is a member of the Unitarian Church. In 1873 he made a trip to his old home in Germany, visiting the scenes of his boyhood and renewing the acquaintances of his youth. He was content to return to America, however, for he has much love and admiration for the land of his adoption. He has never been disappointed in this country, nor had occasion to regret his determination to cast in his lot with its citizens, for here he has found good business opportunities and through the improvement of these he has become a successful man of good financial standing in Salem. He has justly won the proud American title of a self-made man, for his advancement is the direct outcome of persistent labor.

THOMAS J. GRAVES. To be a native son of one of the most productive counties in Oregon presupposes a more than ordinary interest in its affairs, and when the expectations are justified and maintained for many years with indefatigable industry, upright living and practical progressiveness, the community's well being may be said to rest in good hands. This is the case with Thomas J. Graves, around whom is centered a thrifty agricultural enterprise, and from whom emanates a world of good-fellowship and practical participation in the general advancement of the county. Born upon the farm upon which he now lives while his parents were on a visit to his maternal grandfather, Glenn O. Burnett, October 24, 1855, Mr. Graves is a son of Charles B. and Mary H. (Burnett) Graves, natives of Kentucky, and the former born January 28, 1824. Mr. Burnett was of Scotch descent, and was born in the state of Virginia, whence he started across the plains as early as 1845. He was a minister of the Christian Church, and after locating on the claim of six hundred and forty acres spent his days in farming and preaching, in time becoming noted for his good works throughout the entire Willamette valley. He engaged in stock-raising, as the care of the same required less time than general farming, and his laborious and well-directed career resulted in his health becoming impaired in 1861. In the hope of benefiting by the genial climate and inspiring surroundings of California he moved there, intending, however, to remain for a time only, but was so charmed with life among the sunshine and roses that he remained there until his death in 1888.

Grandfather James B. Graves was born in Kentucky and crossed the plains with his family in 1847, taking up a large claim near Sheridan, Yamhill county, Ore. He became prominent in Republican politics, and among other honors conferred upon him by his fellow-townsmen was that of legislator, which he maintained with great credit to himself and benefit to those who had placed him in power. He died on his claim near Sheridan in 1881, at the age of seventy-eight years. His son, Charles B., the father of Thomas J., was a young man when he moved with his family to Woodruff county, Mo., and he was one of the most enthusiastic of the party that crossed the plains in 1846. Like his father he took up a donation claim of a section near Sheridan, settled thereon, and proceeded to make it profitable and home-like. In 1849 he went over the mountains to the California mines, an expedition which had its happy side, for he returned about $2,000 richer than when he departed. In 1851 he wedded Mary H. Burnett, and in 1864 he bought the old Burnett homestead, and lived thereon until a short time before his death in Monmouth, January 23, 1892, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

The oldest of the three sons and ten daughters born to his parents, Thomas J. Graves, was educated in the public schools, at Bethel Academy, and at the Christian College at Monmouth, from which latter institution he was graduated in 1874 with the degree of B. S. His student life over, he returned to the old place, and has since devoted his energies to improving it. Two hundred and eighty acres of the original property belongs to his brother in Portland, but he operates the whole farm, besides renting forty acres for hop culture, which he runs independent of his brother. He is engaged in general farming and stock-raising, and his property is equipped with the modern aids which facilitate not only scientific but extensive operations. In 1878 Mr. Graves married Martha E. Shelton, who was born in Yamhill county in 1854. She was the daughter of John W. Shelton, who crossed the plains in 1846, locating on a claim near Carlton, Yamhill county, but who is now living in Sherman county, Ore. Mrs. Graves died on the farm near Bethel, July 7, 1881, the mother of one son, Herbert Garfield, who was a soldier in the Spanish-American war, serving throughout as a private in Company A, Second Oregon Volunteer Infantry, from McMinnville, and he now resides in California. In 1885 Mr. Graves married Mrs. Mary E. Wilcox, born in Polk county, June 21, 1861, and daughter of Jesse Newbill, who crossed the plains in the early days and located at Ballston. By her first marriage Mrs. Graves became the mother of two children, of whom Belle is the wife of E. E. Shields, of Perrydale, and Mattie is a teacher in the public schools of Ballston. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Graves, Edith, Cecil and Glenn.

Like his forefathers, Mr. Graves is a staunch supporter of Republicanism, and has held many positions of trust and responsibility in his neighborhood. From 1880 until 1882 he served as assessor of Polk county and besides has officiated as justice of the peace, as school clerk for ten years, and as school director for nine years. Fraternaly he is one of the most widely known men in the county, being associated with the Blue Lodge of Masons at Amity; Ainsworth Chapter No. 17, R. A. M., at Dallas; the Woodmen of the World of the same place; the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and the Rebekahs of McCoy, of which he has been secretary of the subordinates for twelve years. He is a broad-minded, well-informed and more than ordinarily progressive man, in touch with general happenings beyond his immediate borders. All efforts at improvement of his locality receive his substantial support, and his opinion is sought on all important questions which arise from time to time.

NELS C. CHRISTENSON. No more capable official ever occupied the position of mayor of Newberg than its present incumbent, Nels C. Christenson. Not only has he labored for the material progress of the city, but also for its moral advancement, and the impress of his individuality upon the town has been one for good. He has established and controlled many important and extensive successful business enterprises in this locality and his labors have ever been effective, not only in securing his own prosperity, but also in promoting commercial activity whereon rests the growth and upbuilding of every community.

Mr. Christenson has been a resident of Oregon since 1874. His birth occurred August 19, 1860, in Waushara county, Wis. His father, Hans Christenson, was a native of Denmark, and in the '50s crossed the broad Atlantic to the United States, settling in Waushara county, Wis., where he purchased two hundred acres of land, continuing its cultivation until 1867, when he sold that property and removed to Iowa, settling in Grundy county. There he purchased eighty acres of land, and in 1874 he resumed his westward journey, traveling until he had reached the Sunset state. Here he took up his abode near Carlton, Yamhill county, where he remained for two years, and then located at Lafayette. About that time he purchased land four miles northwest of Newberg, although the town had not been established at that time. He became the owner of three hundred and twenty acres of improved land and for a number of years he was actively engaged in farming pursuits, his richly cultivated fields winning for him prosperity. At the present time he is living a retired life in Newberg and his rest is well merited. He married Stena Anderson, a native of Denmark, and with her husband she came to the United States. Seven children were born of this union, of whom five are living, the subject of this review being the youngest son.

Nels C. Christenson is indebted to the public school system of Iowa and Oregon for the early educational privileges which he enjoyed, and for a short period he was a student in McMinnville College, after which he entered the Portland Business College, from which he was graduated May 3, 1887. Thus well equipped for the duties of a business career, he secured the position of a bookkeeper in the grain warehouse in Carlton, Ore., there remaining for two seasons. In 1889, in company with his brother, George Christenson, he purchased the grain elevator in Newberg and later he became sole proprietor. With the exception of a period of two years he has been continuously connected with the warehouse interests of this place since he left school. He also owns a third interest in the Chehalem Valley Mills, which were erected in 1901, and are the best equipped mills in this portion of the county, being supplied with all modern accessories, including the latest improved machinery. The mills have a capacity of one hundred barrels of flour per day and the product is of such an excellent quality that it finds a ready sale upon the market.

In Newberg Mr. Christenson was united in marriage to Miss Josephine Larkin, a native of Minnesota. Her father, John S. Larkin, was born in Maine, and removing westward took up his abode in Wisconsin, whence he afterward went to Minnesota. Throughout his entire business career he carried on agricultural pursuits, but at the present time he is living retired at his pleasant home in Newberg. He owns an orchard a quarter of a mile northwest of this town and is the possessor of a comfortable competence, which was gained through his labors in former years. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Christenson has been blessed with two daughters and a son: Alice, Harold and Mildred. Mr. Christenson holds membership with the Woodmen of the World, the United Artisans and the Knights of the Maccabees, and he belongs to the regular Missionary Baptist Church, to the support of which he contributes liberally, and in its work he is active and influential. He is now serving as one of the deacons of the church and does everything in his power to promote its growth and insure its welfare. His political support is given to the Prohibition party and he has been honored with several local offices, having served as school clerk, trustee and as city treasurer for one term. In January, 1902, he was elected mayor of Newberg and no more capable officer could have been chosen for this office. There are no saloons in the town, and he has exercised his official prerogatives to suppress gambling, lawlessness and vice of every character; in fact, his administration has been so practical and beneficial that Newberg may well be regarded as an ideal town. In the field of political life and commercial and industrial activity, Mr. Christenson has won distinction and to-day is numbered among the leading, influential and honored citizens of Yauhill county. A young man, he possesses the enterprising spirit of the west, which has been a dominant factor in producing the wonderful development of this section of the country. Brooking no obstacles that honest effort could overcome, he has steadily worked his way upward, and having long since left the ranks of the many he to-day stands among the successful few.

GIDEON STOLZ. The manufacturing interests of Salem are well represented by Gideon Stolz, who has risen to the enviable position of president of the Gideon Stolz Company of Salem. He was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, December 9, 1844, being one of the ten children of Jacob and Mary Stolz. Both parents were natives of Germany, the father born in Wurtemberg, near Stuttgart, in 1832. He came to America and followed farming in Columbiana county, Ohio. He afterward secured government land in Scioto valley, residing thereon for a few years and subsequently he took up his abode in Montgomery county, Ohio, near Dayton, where his remaining days were passed. He died at the age of eighty-six years and his wife died in Dayton at the age of seventy-eight years. Both were members of the Lutheran Church. Of their family five sons and one daughter reached mature years. Dr. John Stolz, the eldest, was a surgeon of the Ninety-second Ohio Regiment during the Civil war and is now a practicing physician of Reading, Pa. Jacob, who was a member of the Ninety-third Ohio Infantry, was killed at the battle of Murfreesboro. David, who joined the Fifteenth United States Infantry for three years' service, was captured at the time of Rosecrans' retreat at Chickamauga and after eleven months' imprisonment in Andersonville died and was buried there. Gideon is the next of the family. William G. is now a retired dairyman of Dayton, Ohio, and Mrs. Mary Kuhn is residing at Gallion, Ohio.

Reared in Dayton, Gideon Stolz pursued a common-school education and in May, 1864, when nineteen years of age, he volunteered for service in the Union army, becoming a member of Company B, One Hundred and Thirty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He was mustered in at Columbus, Ohio, stationed at Baltimore, and was honorably discharged in the following September. In October of the same year he re-enlisted in the quartermaster's department and did duty principally in the vicinity of Memphis, Tenn., until after the cessation of hostilities, when he was mustered out in 1865 and returned to his home.

For a few years following his military service Mr. Stolz was engaged in the dairy business at Dayton and in 1873 he disposed of his business interests in Ohio in order to come to the northwest, establishing his home in Salem. His capital was limited to $100 at that time, and, looking about for a business opportunity that would yield him a good living, he turned his attention to gardening, conducting the old Dickenson Seed Garden under contract for six years. In 1879 he began dealing in cider and vinegar at the corner of Trade and Cottage streets and within a short period he built up a good business there. In 1886 he incorporated the business under the name of the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Company and became the president. The enterprise was conducted in Salem until 1891, when, on account of the majority of the stockholders being residents of Portland, the plant was removed to East Portland. Mr. Stolz, however, continued to reside in Salem and in 1894 sold his interest in the Portland business and lived retired here until after the inauguration of President McKinley, when he recognized the change in times, believing that a period of prosperity was dawning upon the country. Accordingly, in the spring of 1897, he began the business of manufacturing cider and cider vinegar and extended the enterprise until it reached a very important industry in the city.

In February, 1903, Mr. Stolz perfected a plan whereby his business was incorporated under the laws of Oregon, as The Gideon Stolz Company. Realizing that the most successful business enterprises of to-day are managed by young men, with possibly a few older men, having had years of experience, at the helm, Mr. Stolz gathered around him, in perfecting the corporation, a corps of young men who had long served him in various capacities, such as John B. Hileman, who is vice-president and general manager of the factory; W. T. Stolz, his son, who is secretary; C. D. and E. W. Purvine, both of whom are young men of excellent qualities, constituting the balance of the stockholders.

The new company starts with a well-equipped factory, modern machinery appliances, and a capacity of double their former output, and we feel safe in predicting that, as the years roll on, this company will rank among the foremost of its kind in the northwest. The firm does a large bottling business, bottling mineral water, root beer and all kinds of soda, and also manufacture and prepare for the market cider, cider vinegar, fruit butter, jellies and pickles of all kinds. The business is profitable in all the departments and the trade is gradually growing. They now manufacture over $50,000 worth of cider vinegar each year, and in 1902 utilized more than five hundred tons of apples. They also used the product of fifteen acres of land for pickles and seventy-five tons of cabbage were manufactured into kraut. The enterprise is the second in point of importance in the manufacture of raw materials in Salem. The company contracts for all its raw material locally and this furnishes an excellent market to the producer in this section. For the soda he has a local trade, but for other outputs of the plant there is a large foreign demand, his goods being shipped all over the coast and to Alaska. They employ a number of men and women throughout the year at the Salem plant, which is located at the corner of Mill and Summer streets, the factory and warehouse covering a quarter of a block. The building is supplied with steam power and modern machinery of improved workmanship, while system, neatness and cleanliness are marked characteristics of the entire establishment.

Mr. Stolz was married in Dayton, Ohio, in 1868, to Miss Margaret Whittinger, who was born in Chillicothe, Ohio, and they have two children: Walter T., a wholesale and retail confectioner of Salem; and Lenta D., the widow of W. G. Westacott. Mrs. Westacott conducts a restaurant in Salem. Mr. Stolz is a valued and popular member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he has held office; the Woodmen of the World; and the Knights of the Maccabees. In his political views, especially on state and national questions, he gives an earnest and unfaltering support to the Republican party. In December, 1901, he was the nominee on both the Republican and Citizens' tickets for the office of councilman from the Third ward and was elected by a very large and flattering majority. He is now serving as a member and chairman of the committee on health and police and is a member of the accounts and current expense committee and the fire and water committee. He belongs to the Greater Salem Commercial Club and is one of the leaders of the Civic Improvement Society, having for its object the improvement of Salem in its municipal affairs and its substantial upbuilding. Mr. Stolz is a very pleasant man, always approachable and willing to accord to any the courtesy of an interview. In manner he is kindly and genial and in all life's relations he commands the respect and regard of those with whom he has been associated. In his treatment of his employes he has always been fair and just and in trade circles the house of which he is the head sustains an unimpeachable reputation.

HERMAN POHLE, one of the influential and representative citizens of Salem now serving as a member of the city council, was born in Germany near Bendc, October 29, 1849. His father; Henry Pohle, was a farmer of that country and married a Miss Kemper, by whom he had five children, the subject of this review being the second in order of birth. Four of the number are still living, and three are residents of America, while the other is living at the old home in Germany.

Herman Pohle was reared in the Fatherland and continued his education there until twelve years of age, when he was apprenticed to learn the blacksmith's trade near the old home, serving for a term of two years. He then came to America in company with his cousin, Kemper Pohle, who had previously been to the new world and had returned to Germany on a visit. Mr. Pohle arrived in the United States in 1865 and took up his abode in Aurora, Ind., where he was employed at blacksmithing. Subsequently he engaged in conducting a blacksmith and carriage shop on his own account near that place, and later, thinking that the rapidly growing west would furnish him a better field of labor, he came to Oregon in 1879 and has since been a resident of Salem. He worked at his trade until 1882 and then established a carriage business of his own on Commerce street. Subsequently he removed to the corner of State and Front streets, and in 1901 he purchased a lot at the corner of Liberty and Ferry streets and built for himself a fine shop 48x82 feet, and three stories in height together with a basement. This entire building is utilized by Mr. Pohle in his business. The basement and the first floor are used for the manufacture of carriages and for the blacksmithing business and the upper floors constitute the painting departments. He carries the Moline and Bain wagons and carriages, and has built up a growing business, which has long since reached profitable proportions.

In Indiana occurred the marriage of Mr. Pohle and Miss Mary E. Tekeneier, a native of that state, and their union has been blessed with six children, namely: Ella, wife of William McGowan, of Portland, who is assistant cashier in the Wells-Fargo Bank; Mrs. Grace Atwood, of Salem; Warren, who is in the railway mail service; and Alma, Edna and Frances, who are at home. The parents hold membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Mr. Pohle is a member of the board of trustees. His political support is given to the Republican party and he is unfaltering in his adherence to its principles, for he believes that in their adoption lies the safety and perpetuation of the American government. In 1901 he was nominated on the Citizens' ticket for councilman of the second ward and was elected to the position. He is now serving in the committee on streets and public property, on ways and means and is chairman of the license committee. Socially he is identified with the Ancient Order of the United Workmen and the Knights of the Maccabees. Mr. Polle is a man of much influence and prominence here and in matters relating to the city's welfare he has proved himself practical and helpful. During the years of his residence in America he has never had occasion to regret his determination to come to the new world, for he has found here the business opportunities he sought and has also established a good home and gained many warm friends.

JOHN McCROW. To the inheritance of sturdy qualities, coupled with patient determination and energy, John McCrow owes the success which has crowned his efforts since coming to Oregon, December 17, 1873. His parents were both natives of Scotland, the father, Hugh, and the mother, Margaret (Richardson) McCrow, being born near Edinburgh. The father was a man of energy and ability and chose to leave his native land for the sake of the broad opportunities of the western world. He emigrated to America when about thirty years old, settling in Canada, where he engaged in farming until his death in 1881. His wife died in the Canadian home in 1884. Of the children born of this union, William is located in Canada; John is the subject of this review; Eliza, the wife of James Richardson, and Mary are residents of Oxford county, Canada.

John McGrow was born in Oxford county, Canada, August 2, 1842, remaining on his father's farm until twenty-three years of age. He received a limited education in the old log schoolhouse in the vicinity of his home until he was fourteen years of age, at which time he began work on his father's farm. On reaching his majority he began farming for himself on rented land. In 1866 he was united in marriage with Catherine Ferguson, a native of Oxford county, Canada, and they continued to reside on their farm until 1873, when they removed to the United States, settling in the Waldo Hills, in Marion county, Ore. Here he purchased a farm of three hundred and forty-five acres and entered upon its cultivation, where he remained until 1898. In the meantime, in 1887, he entered into the butchering business in Salem, conducting this enterprise in conjunction with his farm until 1898, when he traded his farm in the Waldo Hills for stock in the Capital National Bank of Salem. In that year also he disposed of the butcher business in Salem and moved to his farm one and a half miles southwest of McCoy, which he had previously purchased in 1896. Here he owns a farm of three hundred and forty acres all in cultivation and is engaged extensively in general farming and stock-raising.

Mr. McCrow has erected one of the finest residences in this section of the county, situated on a hill near the center of his farm, commanding an excellent view of his entire possessions and the country for miles around.

Mrs. Catherine McCrow died in Marion county in 1878, leaving four children: Hugh, who died one month later at the age of twelve years; Christina; Robert, a butcher in Goldendale, Wash., who married Delia B. Hasey, by whom he has one child, Hughretta N.; and Margaret, the wife of Joseph Fischer of Stayton, and they have one son, John Norval. In 1880 Mr. McCrow married for his second wife, Mrs. Jane (Law) Anderson, daughter of James Law, of Scotland. Mrs. McCrow has one daughter by her first marriage, Violet A. A. by name, and of the second three children were born, Hughretta I., Garnet E., and Clarence A.

Mr. McCrow is a member of the Presbyterian Church of McCoy and politically he votes with the Republican party. He has always been a stanch advocate of those measures calculated to advance the material interests of the community in which he has long been a resident, and is known by his fellow-men as a broad-gauged, liberal man of affairs and his life has been an exemplification of the Golden Rule.

JOHN F. COOK, M. D., a botanical specialist who has been most successful in the work of alleviating human suffering, is now practicing in Salem, where he has resided for six years. He was born in Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, December 5, 1843, a son of John Koch, who was also a native of that locality. In 1854 he brought his family to America, settling at Williamsburg, since included within the corporate limits of New York City. He was a fresco painter and gardener. In 1865 he removed to Minnesota, settling in Dakota county, where he carried on agricultural pursuits until his death. He held membership in the Baptist Church and was a man of marked strength of character. He married Catherine Bonschier, who was born in Frankfort, Germany, but was of French descent, and they became the parents of five children, of whom two are now living. The doctor, who is the youngest of the family, was eleven years of age when his parents crossed the Atlantic to the New World, sailing on the Robert Caley from Havre and reaching New York after a voyage of thirty-six days. He attended the public schools of Williamsburg until twenty-one years of age, and while in that city he also learned the business of manufacturing musical instruments. In 1865 he went with the family to Dakota county, Minn., where he further continued his education in an academy. Several members of the Cook family had been physicians, and the doctor became interested in the subject of medical science and determined to prepare for the practice of the profession. He accordingly began studying under a physician of Dakota county, and later continued his reading in St. Croix county, Wis., under the direction of Dr. Gilliman.

Dr. Cook began the practice of medicine in Pierce county, Wis., as early as 1875, and, in 1896, was graduated in the Chicago Independent Medical College and Health University with the degree of M. D. He practiced in Wisconsin until 1887, when he removed to Omaha, Neb., where he continued in practice for ten years, meeting with splendid success. In fact his practice became so extensive that it made too heavy demands upon his strength, and he came to Salem, hoping that a change of climate would enable him rapidly to recuperate. Here he opened his office, and during the six years of his residence here he has gained a very extensive patronage. The doctor has a broad knowledge of medical principles, but has always made a specialty of botanical practice and does not believe in the use of the knife. As a specialist in the treatment of chronic diseases he has been remarkably successful and particularly so in the treatment of cancer. His office is located at No. 301 Liberty street and many come to him there not only from Salem, but from other parts of the country, demanding his services in the cure of long standing diseases. That the doctor has accomplished many remarkable cures is indicated by the large number of testimonials which have come to him unsolicited from grateful patients who feel that they owe to him health and life.

In Dakota county, Minn., the doctor was united in marriage to Miss Henrietta Sittkus, who was born in Germany and was brought to America when nine years of age. She has deep sympathy with the doctor in his work and has been of much assistance to him. They attend the Baptist Church, in which they hold membership, and the doctor is now serving as chairman of its board of trustees. He is a man of fine physique, with an intellectual forehead, a firm mouth and honest eyes, and moreover a kindly expression which indicates his broad humanitarian spirit.

A. S. BIBLE. Almost every state of the Union has furnished a quota of citizens to Oregon who have aided in the settlement and improvement of the northwest. Mr. Bible comes from Tennessee, his birth having occurred near Warrensburg, in Greene county, that state, March 16, 1834. There he was reared upon a farm and the common schools of his home neighborhood provided him with his educational privileges. When twenty-one years of age he started out in life on his own account and whatever success he has achieved is the direct result of his enterprising efforts. He followed farming in his native state until the fall of 1862, when he enlisted as a private in the Fifth Tennessee Cavalry and participated in the campaign from Knoxville to Cumberland Gap. For a year longer he continued in the service and was then taken ill with typhoid fever, which unfitted him for further military duty during the remainder of the war.

Soon after the close of hostilities Mr. Bible began merchandising in Warrensburg, Tenn., carrying on business in that vicinity until 1879, when, believing that the opportunities of the northwest exceeded those of his native state, he came to Oregon, settling in Sheridan. Here he again established a store and continued in merchandising until 1898, when he sold out. For one year he also conducted a store in Willamina. Soon after his arrival in the northwest he began dealing in cattle and now owns a ranch of four hundred and forty acres together with other land. Aside from the supervision of his invested interests, Mr. Bible is now retired from active business cares.

On the 10th of April, 1865, occurred the marriage of Mr. Bible and Miss Mary J. Mendenhall, of Jefferson county, Tenn. They have no children. Mr. Bible votes with the Democracy and believes in the gold standard. He has firm faith in the northwest and its future possibilities and has allied his interests with this section of the state, becoming a valued factor in the work of progress and improvement here.

RILEY Y. FENDALL. A native son of Oregon, Riley Y. Fendall has improved the opportunities which were his from the earliest years of his boyhood, making a success for himself through the cultivation of the soil, being the life to which he was reared. He was born on the old donation land claim taken up by his father in the pioneer days of Oregon, September 17, 1852, and was there reared to a practical and useful life, interspersing his home duties with an attendance at the common schools. Later he attended the public schools at Willamina, a considerable distance from his home, sometimes riding, but oftener walking to and fro in his efforts to add to his knowledge of the life of a farmer the education that enables a farmer to be an exception to the general average.

When twenty-two years of age he and his brother bought a part of the land adjoining that where Mr. Fendall now lives, and two years later, December 6, 1876, he married Miss Susie E. Campbell, the daughter of Peter and Sophronia Campbell. For two years after his marriage he remained on the home place, at the close of that period moving upon a part of his present property. Ten years later he removed to his present location, this having been his home since. Mr. Fendall has put upon his property nearly all of the improvements of which it boasts, and has given to the cultivation careful thought and an earnest effort to excel in that to which he has devoted his time and attention. He now owns three hundred and twenty-seven acres, principally located in the valley, and is at present engaged in carrying on general farming and stock-raising, and for twelve years was interested in hop cultivation.

Of the children which blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Fendall, Roxie M. is now the wife of C. E. Mendenhall; and Guy H., Claude S., Carrie E., Lucia E. and Cullie make their home with their parents. Politically Mr. Fendall adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party.

MERRITT MCKINLEY is a native son and successful farmer of Yamhill county. He was born near Wheatland, September 18, 1853, and is a son of James McKinley, whose birth occurred on the 2d of March, 1827, in Indiana. When a boy the father accompanied his parents to Missouri and in 1845 he crossed the plains to the coast, driving an ox team. The succeeding year he returned by water route to his home in the east, but in 1847, accompanied by his father, Alexander McKinley, he again made the trip. There were six sons and four daughters in the grandfather's family and all of the boys and one of the daughters came at that time. The grandfather secured a donation claim in Yamhill county near where our subject was born. He then became the owner of two hundred and forty acres which he developed into a good farm and thereon spent his remaining days, passing away at an advanced age.

James McKinley was married in Yamhill county in 1845 to Charlotte Johnson, who was born in Germany, and the same year he secured a donation claim near McMinnville, while in 1847 he became the owner of another donation claim of one hundred and twenty acres near Wheatland. It was upon the latter farm that the birth of his son Merritt occurred. James McKinley remained upon that farm until 1874, when he removed to Perrydale and in 1877 he came to the place upon which our subject is now living in the Gopher valley. In 1892, however, he removed to Sheridan, where he died in June, 1893. He was a member of the United Brethren Church and was a man of strong character, sterling purposes and of honorable life. His wife passed away upon the farm upon which her son Merritt is now living, her death occurring in the year 1885. They were the parents of five children: Angeline, the deceased wife of Calvin Miller; Merritt; Mark, who died in childhood; Mary, the wife of A. J. Sawyer; and Henry, who died at the age of eighteen months.

Mr. McKinley of this review was reared in Yamhill county and after attending the common schools near his home he further continued his studies in the public schools of Salem. In his youth he assisted his father in the work of the home farm and when his education was completed he became his father's associate in agricultural pursuits, the business relation between them being maintained until the death of James McKinley. In 1895 Mr. McKinley returned to the farm upon which he is now living. He owns here six hundred and seventy-four acres of valuable land, pleasantly located on Deer creek, about two miles northeast of Sheridan. Here he carries on general farming and stock-raising, keeping on hand large herds of cattle, sheep and goats. He has a fine ranch well equipped for the purposes used and his thorough and practical understanding of his business has made him one of the prosperous citizens of his community.

On the 28th of October, 1886, Mr. McKinley was united in marriage to Miss Emma Cox, who was born in Chehalis county, Wash., a daughter of William A. Cox, one of the pioneer settlers of that state. They had four children; Hilda, Andrew, Laurin and one that died in infancy. In his political views Mr. McKinley is a Democrat, but has never been a politician in the sense of office seeking, preferring to devote his energies to his business affairs, which, having been capably conducted, have brought to him a gratifying financial return.

ARIEL H. LEIGHTON. One of the most handsomely improved and best cultivated farms in Yamhill county, Ore., is the one known as Highland Lodge, consisting of four hundred and eighty-five acres, and located four miles from Willamina on the Willamina creek. The place is supplied with a handsome residence and good barns and outbuildings of all descriptions, all furnished with running water, supplied by pipes which connect with springs. The ranch was originally owned and improved by Lord Oswald Grosser, a German nobleman, who disposed of his interests here in 1899 to Mr. Leighton. Much of the land is devoted to an apple and prune orchard, three thousand prune trees yielding a large harvest each year, the cost of preparing for market being greatly lessened by his owning a prune dryer. He is also largely engaged in stock-raising, being principally interested in cattle, sheep and hogs.

The birth of Mr. Leighton occurred in Hyde-park, Vt., September 29, 1834, and in that state he was reared to manhood, with the exception of a few years spent in Massachusetts, receiving his education in the public schools and academies of these two states. At the age of fifteen years he began working at the trade of tinning, in which he continued until 1861, when he enlisted as a private in Company I, First Vermont Cavalry, for a term of three years in the service of the Union army. After serving a little over one year, while with General Banks in the Shenandoah Valley, he was wounded while on horse guard by the accidental discharge of his own pistol, which entailed his discharge on account of disability. Returning to Vermont he remained there until 1866, when he removed to Iowa, and settled upon a farm near Fort Dodge, making a purchase of the land, and for two years engaged in tilling the soil. At the close of that period he changed his location to the town of Fort Dodge, where for three years he followed his trade, making such a success of the business that he was enabled to open a hardware store, in connection with which he carried on plumbing. For twenty years he carried on this business, receiving sufficient remuneration to warrant his continuing in the work. At the close of that time he again moved to a farm near Fort Dodge, but six years later, in 1899, he came to Oregon, in search of more pleasant surroundings, being more than ordinarily successful in his selection of Highland Lodge.

Mr. Leighton has been married three times, and has had twelve children, seven of whom are living: Dora, the wife of J. W. Leighton; Carrie B., the wife of Thomas Adams; Lee, residing in Ogden, Iowa; Bessie, a teacher in North Dakota; and Robert, Almyra and Dixie, the three latter at home. Mr. Leighton is a Republican, and fraternally has been a member of the Masonic order for thirty years.

JAMES McCAIN, who has attained distinction in both the civil and criminal departments of law practice, and is now a member of the well-known law firm of McCain & Vinton, was born March 30, 1844, in Delphi, Carroll county, Ind. His father, James McCain, Sr., was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, and was of Scotch-Irish descent. The paternal grandfather was a soldier of the war of 1812 and a prominent land owner and farmer of the vicinity of Cincinnati, and his old homestead has been divided into town lots, and is now incorporated within the limits of the city. His death occurred in the Buckeye state.

In 1851, after residing in Delphi, Ind., for a number of years, James McCain brought his family to Oregon, his eldest son, Paris, having preceded him to the northwest in 1847. With oxen and horse teams the family made the journey overland, and in Iowa the father purchased some fine stock, which he drove to Oregon. He traveled with a large and well-equipped train, all the men being armed, and having left Indiana in early April, they arrived in the Willamette valley early in November. Mr. McCain secured a donation land claim of three hundred and twenty acres on the boundary line of Polk and Yamhill counties, three miles east of Sheridan, and this he cultivated and improved, making it a valuable tract, upon which he lived until his death, which occurred in 1874. His political allegiance was given the Republican party, and he belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church. In early manhood he had wedded Miss Sarah Earnest, who was born and married near Cincinnati, Ohio, and was of Scotch descent. Her death occurred when she was seventy years of age. In the family were ten children, of whom nine came to Oregon: Paris, who died in Seattle, Wash.; William, who died in Linn county, Ore.; Mrs. Maria Martin, of McMinnville; Mrs. Clarissa Foster, who died in California; Mrs. Agnes Stauffer, who died in Polk county, this state; Mrs. Ellen Graves, of Yamhill county; John, a resident of southern Oregon; Mrs. Sarah A. Osborne, who died in Polk county, and James.

Judge McCain was but seven years of age when the family came to the northwest, and upon the home farm he was reared, while in the district schools he pursued his education, which was supplemented by a short period of study in McMinnville College, and Willamette University, but though he resumed his studies several times, each time illness or accident forced him to put aside his books. Later he went to Dallas, and spent over two years in La Creole Academy, and subsequently he began the study of law under the direction of P. C. Sullivan, and was admitted to the bar in 1868. He then began practice at Dallas, and later entered into partnership with Mr. Sullivan, continuing the relation with him until June, 1871, when he located in La Fayette, Yamhill county, where he remained until 1889, when the county seat was removed to McMinnville, and here he has since made his home. In 1892 he was elected district attorney for the third judicial district, embracing Marion, Linn, Yamhill, Polk and Tillamook counties, and in 1894 he was re-elected, each time on the Republican ticket. From the beginning of his professional career he enjoyed considerable distinction as an able criminal lawyer, and since 1885 he has won equal fame as a practitioner of civil law. He has not only practiced successfully in various counties in Oregon, but has also been entrusted with important litigation in Idaho and other states. He is strong in argument, forceful in his presentation of a cause, and his deductions follow in logical sequence. He is now the senior member of the firm of McCain & Vinton, which is regarded as one of the strong legal combinations at the Yamhill county bar. In May, 1898, he became postmaster of McMinnville, to which position he had been appointed by President McKinley, and for four years he acceptably filled the office.

In Dallas, Ore., Mr. McCain married Miss Electa C. Sullivan, a native of Michigan, and a daughter of P. C. Sullivan, who came to this state in 1862, and here successfully practiced law. They now have three children: Mrs. Mabel Parker, Mrs. Ivaline Wells and Mrs. Ethel Grinnold, all of McMinnville. Mr. McCain belongs to the Knights of Pythias fraternity, to the Elks Lodge of Salem and to the State Bar Association. Since attaining his majority he has given his support to the Republican party, and since locating in McMinnville has served as a member of the state central committee, and was chairman of the county central committee of his party. In his law practice he has been very successful, and enjoys a high reputation as a representative of the legal fraternity of the county.

JOHN GEISENDORFER. Through his own efforts, entirely, has John Geisendorfer made himself a position of prominence among the prosperous farmers of Linn county, Ore., coming empty handed from his native land, Germany, into a strange country, where a strange language was spoken and entirely different customs prevailed, with no promise of his future success save in his own sturdy characteristics, inherited from his German forefathers. With the prosperity of the country before him, as evidenced in the thriving cities and well tilled farms, Mr. Geisendorfer recalls the days of privation and inconveniences of Oregon, his first impressions of the now busy and populous city of Portland being of three cabins on the banks of the river, in one of which he secured board and lodging, paying for the former at the rate of $1 a meal, and in the latter furnishing his own blankets.

John Geisendorfer was born in Bavaria, Germany, November 19, 1826, and started for America in 1845, the sailing vessel on which he took passage being forty-five days in making the trip. Landing at Baltimore, Md., he later settled at Pittsfield, Ill., engaging as a farm hand in that locality, with a remuneration of $90 per year, his pay, however, not being in money, receiving instead, articles from the store, and live stock as well, consisting of cows. He remained at this employment for four years, and in the spring of 1849 he started with ox-teams for California, going by way of Oregon. After five months he arrived in Oregon City, where he was ill for some time with Oregon fever. Upon his recovery he went to work in a saw-mill at Milwaukee, this being his first employment in the west. In the fall of 1849 he continued the interrupted journey, finishing the trip to California by water. On his arrival he went to the mines at Hangtown, now called Placerville, and in partnership with another man, he mined there for five weeks. Having had an opportunity to see both the southern and northwestern portions of the Pacific slope, Mr. Geisendorfer chose the latter in which to make his permanent residence, and, returning to Oregon, he spent the first winter there at Milton, Columbia county. In the spring of 1851 he took up a claim near Oakpoint, Wash., which consisted of three hundred and twenty acres of timber land, and there engaged in the timber business for twelve years. In 1862 he returned to Oregon, and the following year he bought his present farm of one hundred and eighty acres, located near Albany, Linn county, and upon which he has since remained. He has since added to his property, until he now owns three hundred acres, the well cultivated fields, upon which he carries on general farming and stock-raising, and the many handsome improvements which he has made, being indisputable evidence of the success which has crowned his unceasing efforts.

The marriage of Mr. Geisendorfer occurred May 1, 1854, and united him with Mary Crook Creecy, who was born near Pulaski, Gales county, Tenn., daughter of Bennett and Martha (Brown) Creecy, January 9, 1827, and died at her home near Albany, Ore., June 22, 1903, aged seventy-six years. She crossed the plains with her parents (who had resided in Illinois since 1830), in 1853, coming by way of the South Pass, Fort Boise and the Columbia river route. Mrs. Geisendorfer was a lifelong member of the Methodist Church. Her family history contains some things of unusual interest. Her parents were natives of Buckingham county, Va. Her maternal great-great-grandfather was Peter Brown, who came over in the Mayflower, and her maternal grandfather, Isham Brown, was a Revolutionary soldier of the American army. Her paternal great-great-grandmother, Tabitha Pledge, daughter of a Scottish chieftain, was sentenced, according to the custom of the time, to transportation to the colonies for taking a windfallen apple. On her arrival in America a Mr. McKinney paid her passage fare with four hundred pounds of tobacco, secured her release from the ship master and married her.

Mrs. Geisendorfer was highly respected and greatly beloved. She became the mother of seven children: George, who is located at Cascadia; Anna, who is the wife of Prof. W. C. Hawley, of Salem; Emily, wife of H. D. Burkhardt, living near Albany, and to whom have been born Leander K., John G. and Verna K.; Margaret, living at home; Elizabeth, wedded to Frank Lyons, and residing near Albany, Ore., who are the parents of five children, Donald J., Mary J., Ruth J., George L. and Rachel B., all born in Oregon; John, who is practicing medicine at The Dalles, and Daisy, who is the wife of John M. Davis, Kansas City, Mo., to whom have been born two children, Morton C., who died when eight months of age, and Nelson H.

Mr. Geisendorfer has in his possession a number of chairs which were the first made in Oregon, and also a table which was made of native wild cherry very early in the history of the territory. In his early pioneer days Mr. Geisendorfer was associated in a business way with Governor Abernethy and the latter's brother, Alexander; and also with John McLoughlin and Senator Mitchell.

JOSEPH F. SCOTT, one of the very successful farmer of Yamhill county, has been a resident of the state since one year old. He was born in Tennessee, February 10, 1869, and comes of farming ancestry identified with the south for many years. His father, James Hervey Scott, born in Sullivan county, Tenn., was reared in his native state, and conducted farming there during his early manhood. He married Elizabeth J. McCauley, and there were born to them but two children, of whom Walter F., the younger, is a resident of Sheridan, and a mechanic by trade.

The Scott family removed from Tennessee to Oregon in 1870, settling near Salem, where they farmed for three years. The father then bought land near Grand Ronde and in 1883 moved to Gopher Valley, where he lived for two years. His next home was on the farm now occupied by his son, Joseph F., and a portion of which is owned by the other son and wife. Here Mr. Scott died January 23, 1897, at the age of seventy years. He was successful as a farmer and stock-raiser, and left to his family a well improved and valuable farm.

Until the death of the older man Joseph F. Scott remained with his father, profiting by the experience of his sire, and attending the public schools as opportunity offered. In 1899 he was united in marriage with Mary Jane Ivy and of this union there has been born one son, Robert E. On his two hundred and twenty-five acres of rented land Mr. Scott carries on general farming and stock-raising, in which he is very successful, and at the same time his efforts give promise of future prominent participation in the general affairs of his neighborhood. He also owns two hundred and seventy acres in Yamhill county, near the Highlands. He is a Democrat in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Woodmen of the World. Like his father, Mr. Scott bears an honored name in the community, and his tact and agreeable nature have won him many friends.

WILLIAM PAUL BABCOCK, who is agent for the Salem Flouring Mills Company, was born in Salem, January 17, 1876. His father, Freedom Jesse Babcock, was a native of Burlington, Vt., and was of an old New England family of Puritan ancestry. He was reared in Burlington, but in 1861, when a mere lad, he ran away from home in order to enter the army, joining a Vermont regiment of infantry, with which he valiantly served for four years. Three times he was wounded, but each time he returned to active duty as soon as his injuries permitted, and he rose from the ranks to a captaincy, being commander of his company at the time the war closed, and receiving an honorable discharge. Although but a boy when he entered the army the hardships of war soon developed in him the spirit of a man and no veteran of twice his years excelled him in patriotism and bravery.

After visiting his old home in the Green Mountain state Captain Babcock came to Oregon, by way of the Panama route to Salem. He was a cabinetmaker by trade, and soon he engaged in the manufacture of furniture and the undertaking business here. In 1888 he was elected county clerk of Marion county, entering upon the duties of his office in July of that year, and in 1890 he was re-elected, serving in that capacity until his death, which occurred November 2, 1891. Prominent and honored in public and private life, he was also a distinguished member of the Masonic fraternity of Oregon, holding membership in Pacific Lodge No. 50, A. F. & A. M., in which he was past master. He was also the grand secretary of the Grand Lodge of Oregon from 1880 until 1888, when he resigned in order to enter upon the duties of the political office to which he had been chosen. He likewise held membership in Salem Chapter No. 3, R. A. M., and DeMolay Commandery No. 5, K. T., while in the Scottish Rite he took all of the degrees up to and including the thirty-second in the consistory at Portland. In the Grand Army of the Republic he was prominent and honored, and he also belonged to the Loyal Legion. In politics he was an unfaltering Republican, standing by the party which was the support of the Union during the dark days of the Civil war. His religious faith was indicated by his membership in the Congregational Church.

In Salem, Ore., Captain Babcock married Ida M. Pratt, who was born in Rhode Island, a daughter of Lucian E. Pratt, a member of an old Rhode Island family, who came to Oregon in the pioneer days of the state. He was captain on a river steamer on the Willamette and under Captain Babcock he served as deputy county clerk. Fraternally he was connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His daughter, Mrs. Babcock, is still living and resides in Salem. She had four children: Pratt, who died at the age of five years; William Paul, of this review; and Grace N. and Mary, at home.

William P. Babcock was reared in Salem and after attending the public schools here continued his education in Willamette University for three years. He is a graduate of the Capital Business College, of Salem, in the class of 1895, and after his education was completed he acted as book-keeper for different firms of this city. In 1899 he became bookkeeper for the Salem Flouring Mills Company, and September 1, 1902, was made agent of the mills, having charge of the Salem mills, for which his business capacity and enterprise well qualify him.

In Salem, October 20, 1897, Mr. Babcock was married to Miss Rose Woodruff, who was born and educated in Indiana. They have one child, Amelia. They are members of the Christian Church. Mr. Babcock was made a Mason in Pacific Lodge No. 50, A. F. & A. M. In politics he is an earnest Republican and he served as deputy sheriff under F. T. Wrightman for two years and as deputy county clerk under William W. Hall. A wide awake and enterprising young man, and a representative of prominent families of the northwest, he is destined for a successful career, if the signs of the times speak truly.

MRS. MARY TERESA SCHOETTLE, D. O. One of the most important discoveries of the scientific world in recent years is the value of osteopathy, and its practice is steadily and rapidly increasing as its value is recognized by the public. The lady whose name introduces this review is a graduated osteopathist and is now enjoying a good practice in Salem where she has a large circle of friends. She was born in DeWitt, Clinton county, Iowa, a daughter of J. G. Barr, whose birth occurred in Baden, Germany, in which country he learned the trade of a watch and clock-maker and was engaged in the manufacture of the large time-piece, known as the "grandfathers'" clocks. Crossing the Atlantic to America when seventeen years of age, he took up his abode in West Virginia and afterward removed to Ohio, where he followed his trade. Subsequently he became a resident of DeWitt, Iowa, where he was engaged in business for nearly thirty years as a jeweler and watch-maker. In 1885 he came to Oregon, locating in Salem, where he again established a jewelry store, which he conducted with success until his death, which occurred September 13, 1899. He was a man of excellent business and executive ability and in the control of his interests he manifested perseverance, diligence and laudable ambition. He married Miss Margaret L. Stenger, who was born in Bavaria, Germany, a daughter of Sebastian Stenger, who was also a native of that locality and on emigrating to America took up his abode in Ohio. He was a miller by trade and followed that pursuit in the Buckeye state until his death. Unto Mr. and Mrs. Barr were born thirteen children. Further record of the family is given in connection with the sketch of Herman W. Barr on another page of this work. The parents were both communicants of the Catholic Church.

Mrs. Schoettle, the eldest of the family, was educated in a convent at DeWitt, Iowa, and in 1885 came to Oregon with her parents. She assisted her father in the store until she was married in Salem, July 19, 1887, to Emil Schoettle, a native of Baden. He was a merchant tailor who located in Salem in 1885 and began business here in the line of his chosen trade. Soon he gained a liberal patronage which was accorded him up to the time of his death. He died in Texas while on a business trip in 1894, and his loss was deeply mourned not only by his immediate family, but also by many friends, for he was a man possessing many excellent traits of character that had gained for him the warm regard of those with whom he had been associated.

Mrs. Schoettle has continued to reside in Salem. In 1899 she became interested in osteopathy. In February, 1900, she went to Kirksville, Mo., where she entered the American School of Osteopathy and was graduated therefrom in January, 1902, with the degree of D. O. Returning at once to Salem she began practice here and has now a good patronage. Osteopathy has made rapid strides into favor with the public. Judged by its results it has certainly accomplished much toward alleviating human suffering and Mrs. Schoettle is well qualified for the practice of the science. She had two children, Mary T. and M. Josephine, the latter of whom died May 22, 1903. Mrs. Schoettle attends the St. Joseph Catholic Church, of which she is a member. She is also identified with the Altar Society. A lady of superior culture and intelligence, of refinement and genuine worth, she occupies a leading position socially and is rapidly winning her way to a foremost place in professional ranks.

JAMES H. BROWN. No more enterprising farmer is maintaining the excellent standard established by a pioneer father than James H. Brown, one of the three sons occupying the original donation claim of their father, the elder James H. Brown. The latter was born in Virginia November 10, 1796, his remote ancestors having pursued their various occupations in the German empire. From Virginia Mr. Brown removed to Illinois, where he engaged in farming, and where he married Sophia Hussey, a native of that state. He was an ambitious man and readily absorbed the glowing accounts of superior chance in the west, and finally sold his Illinois farm and outfitted for the transportation of his wife and children to the coast. The journey was accomplished with three wagons and six yoke of oxen, a team of horses and a spring wagon for the family, and the train moved along leisurely and without incident until after the Missouri river was crossed. About that time cholera broke out in the hopeful little party, and Mr. Brown was sorely afflicted, barely coming through the ordeal alive. Their misfortunes were further added to by one of their children, James H., having both legs broken, but as far as the Indians were concerned there was no particular trouble from them.

For a short time Mr. Brown lived in Gopher valley, but the first winter in the state was spent with Nathan Hussey, one of the very early settlers in the west. In the spring Mr. Brown bought the donation claim upon which he spent the remainder of his life, and which consists of six hundred and forty acres along the Yamhill river. So successful was he that in time his interests demanded more property, and by frequent purchases he increased his possessions to seventeen hundred acres. His death, May 30, 1875, removed a useful and capable citizen, one devoted to the Methodist Church and to the Republican party. Originally a Whig, he naturally stepped into Republican ranks and among the offices held by him with distinct credit was that of county commissioner, which he held for two years. He is buried in the little cemetery in Willamina, as is also his wife, who died November 8, 1894.

Coming to Yamhill at the age of eight, James H. Brown remembers but little of his father's farm in Illinois, where he was born, near Springfield, Sangamon county, June 14, 1842. He early evinced habits of industry and thrift, and as opportunity offered he attended the district schools. November 30, 1865, he was united in marriage with Evelyn Yocom, daughter of Franklin Yocom, and soon after came into his share of the family claim, which has since been his home. In addition to the one hundred and forty-five acres of the home place he has seventy-five acres adjoining, besides eight hundred acres in another place, and enough more land to make up fifteen hundred acres. The entire donation claim is owned by the three brothers, all of whom are enterprising and prosperous members of the community. Mr. Brown has extensive interests both as to general farming and stock-raising, and in the latter capacity has Cotswold sheep, Hereford cattle and horses. The farm is located three miles west of Sheridan, and the improvements thereon are of the most modern kind, both as to buildings and implements. For many years the owner has derived a substantial income from the purchase and sale of all kinds of stock, and is one of the best judges and experienced men in the business in Yamhill county.

A chief avenue of interest to Mr. Brown has been the promoting of the educational opportunities of his district, and in this capacity he has been a member of the school board for twenty years. Like his father and brothers he is a Republican. His family consists of his wife and the following children: Wilbur N., Minnie, Henry H., Franklin Y., Dudley (deceased), Althea, Bertha, Lloyd L., and Pearl. Lloyd L. and Pearl were twins, but the latter died in infancy.

WILLIAM R. ELLIS. That popular and successful merchant, William R. Ellis, has been a resident of Oregon since his thirteenth year, and in the meantime has assisted in the upbuilding of more than one part of the state. From ancestors represented among the trades and tillers of the soil, Mr. Ellis inherits thrift and industry, traits fostered in an orderly home atmosphere, where there were also seven other children. His father, Henry Ellis, was born in Ohio, and in his youth married Henrietta Rowell, the latter at present a resident of Salem, and seventy-five years of age. Henry Ellis was a tailor and farmer by occupation, and whatever he acquired of success in life was due to his untiring devotion and ability to overcome the obstacles of his youth. At the age of nine years he was apprenticed to a tailor, and, having completed his trade, worked thereat for many years in Ohio and continuing in the same after taking up his residence in Iowa. From the latter state he brought his family to Oregon in 1865, settling at first near McMinnville, Yamhill county, but finally locating on a farm near Perrydale, where his death occurred in 1900, at the age of seventy-six years. Mr. Ellis was a Democrat in political preference, and was fraternally connected with the Masons.

Like most of the upbuilders of this state, William R. Ellis gained his first impressions of life and work on a farm. In time he became of practical assistance to his father, and remained under the home roof until his twenty-first year. For a couple of years he rented land in Polk county, following which he went down into California and engaged in manipulating a threshing machine, at the same time profiting somewhat by the mining possibilities of that great state. At the expiration of a year he returned to Oregon and settled at Grand Ronde, where he ran a sawmill for four years, and then engaged in the stock business near the town for eight years. Thus finally established in two lines of activity, Mr. Ellis branched out into the mercantile business, a line of activity for which he was especially fitted, and in which he achieved marked success. After twelve years of catering to a general mercantile trade, he sold out his interests in May, 1902, and purchased the store of J. R. Mendenhall, of Sheridan, which business he is now building up and improving, and which is being conducted under the firm name of Ellis Brothers.

In politics a Republican, Mr. Ellis has taken a keen interest in promoting the welfare of his party, and has held many minor offices in the communities in which he has lived. Like his father he is well known among the Masons, and a member of the Lodge at Sheridan. Through his marriage, March 26, 1890, with Ella J. Elgin, two children have been born into the Ellis family, Henrietta T. and Mildred J. Though a comparatively recent acquisition to the mercantile ranks of Sheridan, Mr. Ellis has already impressed his worth upon the community, and his former extended success is bound to be duplicated in his adopted town.

LORENZO ROOT. With the thrifty blood of New England coursing through his veins and the broad training of the middle west to incite him to wider thought and action, there can be no surprise expressed at the success achieved in the life of Lorenzo Root. His parents and grandparents, both paternal and maternal, owe their nativity to that part of the United States noted for the habits of thrift and industry inculcated in the lives of its sons and daughters. The Root family came originally from England, and locating in New England, east in their lot with this struggling country, several of the name serving in the Revolutionary war. John Root, the father of Lorenzo, was born August 3, 1796, being raised to the life of a farmer, and in young manhood went to Ohio where he met a pioneer family with whom he became united by the ties of marriage, Sylvia Wilbur, daughter of Reed Wilbur, born in Vermont, September 11, 1798, becoming the wife of John Root. Of this union eight children were born, three of whom are now living: Sidney, a farmer of West Chehalem; Lucinda, of Dysart, Iowa; and Lorenzo, who was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, October 19, 1825.

John Root, in his desire to find a more suitable home, left Ohio in 1837, locating in Iowa, and later in Whiteside county, Ill., remaining in the latter place the rest of his life, and thus giving the educational advantages of three states to young Lorenzo. At twenty years of age he left home, finding work among the farmers of the neighborhood, and by economy and thrift he was able to purchase a little land two years later, upon which he farmed for himself. In 1850 he married Miss Martha Bedder, who was born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., November 15, 1829, the second oldest of thirteen children born to Ven Vlaek and Maria (Heaton) Bedder. The father was born in Mohawk county, N. Y., in April, 1800; and the mother was a native of Vermont. After two years of quiet and profitable farming, the young people decided to emigrate, not to the land where gold was the inducement, but where the land itself held out hopes of speedy riches. With four yoke of oxen drawing a wagon containing their worldly store, they set out on the long journey, reaching Portland, Ore., safely October 1, 1852. From Portland they went to Astoria, where Mr. Root secured work in a sawmill, and there remained for a year and a half, spending the next four and a half years in keeping a boarding house, in which business he was very successful. But with his early training strong upon him, he wished to possess himself of some of the broad lands of Oregon, and he now left the town, going to West Chehalem, where he invested in four hundred acres of land, remaining upon this property from 1858 to 1879.

In the last named year Mr. Root removed to McMinnville, Yamhill county, and in 1882 again tested his ability in the business world, entering the list as a grocer, and meeting with the same success that has rewarded his efforts in other fields. After five years he retired from this business on account of ill health, continuing since in this retirement in a pleasant home, located on First and C streets, of this city, where he takes the part of an intelligent and interested citizen, being the possessor of four dwellings, and considerable other city property. He casts his ballot with the Republican party, and finds in the Methodist Episcopal Church his religious home.

SYLVESTER POTTER. The present standing of Sheridan among the foremost and most promising towns in Yamhill county is due as much to the pioneer and later efforts of Sylvester Potter, as to that of any other of its honored citizens. Mr. Potter was born in Cortland county, N. Y., April 3, 1836, a son of Erastus Potter, also born in New York state, and grandson of Hardin Potter, a native of Rhode Island, and of English descent.

Erastus Potter lived in his native state until 1844, and then took his family to the vicinity of Waukesha, Wis., where he took up government land, and where he lived for three years. He then removed to near Oshkosh, the same state, and upon one hundred and sixty acres of very wild land erected a little log cabin, and proceeded to make a home and competence. He was one of the very early pioneers of Wisconsin, and he became one of the upbuilding factors in his neighborhood, where he lived continuously until 1892. He then made his home in Sheridan, Ore., for three years, returning eventually to Oshkosh county, Wis., where his death occurred at the age of eighty-three. Through his marriage with Martha Durkee, a native of Vermont, the following children were born: Sylvester; Lester, living at Gopher, Ore.; Lavina, the wife of Henry Dolton, who was killed in the war; and Jane, the wife of Andrew Ripple, of Oshkosh. His wife survives him and is at present ninety years of age.

Although early inured to hard work on his father's farm in Wisconsin, Sylvester Potter realized the necessity of a good education, and such leisure as came his way was utilized for the acquiring of the same. Having gone as far as the district schools permitted he attended the academy at Oshkosh, and, having qualified for educational work was thus engaged at the beginning of his nineteenth year. In 1859 he took advantage of the Pike's Peak excitement and journeyed thither with ox-teams, but not realizing his expectations, tarried but a short time and then continued his jaunt across the plains to Oregon, arriving in Portland October 1, 1859. At once he became associated with the means of livelihood which has started many a pioneer upon the road to wealth and which has had more to do in the upbuilding of the state than any other resource here represented. He began to saw logs during the winter season, and then turned his attention to hauling wood for the steamers, for this purpose having his own teams. That the industry was a paying one is evidenced by the fact that Mr. Potter continued thereat for seven years, and at the expiration of that time was able to buy a farm in Gopher valley, where he and his brother owned eleven hundred acres. For ten years the brothers conducted extensive stockraising operations, and their combined energy and business ability resulted in large financial returns.

Following on his stock-raising experience Mr. Potter engaged in the warehouse business in Sheridan with which he is still connected, and some years later he also became interested in a mercantile business in the same town. In the meantime he has been foremost in promoting all worthy attempts at general improvement, and has given liberally of his stock of good advice and financial support to the charities and other institutions here represented. A staunch Republican, and a devoted admirer of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Potter cast his first presidential vote for the great emancipator, and has since taken a keen interest in local and other undertakings of his party. In his home district he has been mayor of Sheridan for four years, has several times served as a member of the city council, and for many years has promoted the cause of education as a member of the school board. He is a member of the Congregational Church, which he has attended regularly for many years, and to which he contributes generously of his honestly gotten means. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and has been financier of his lodge for many years.

Through his marriage, June 26, 1862, with Mrs. Ailcy Southmayd, widow of D. S. Southmayd, and daughter of Dr. William Caples, Mr. Potter became identified with a prominent pioneer family of Oregon, and one intimately connected with its fundamental growth. Dr. Caples was born in Baltimore, Md., March 5, 1806, and when six years of age was taken by his parents to Tuscarawas county, Ohio. His paternal grandfather was a large slave owner in the early days, but evidently a humane one, for at his death he gave all under him their freedom, and provided them with separate homes. Dr. Caples was reared on the Ohio farm, and in his youth received a common school education. He married Harriet Tracey, and seven children were born to them, the order of their birth being as follows: Nancy is the deceased wife of John Ward; Mrs. Potter is next; Hiantha married Seldon Murray, now deceased; Harriet is the deceased wife of Jacob French; La Fayette lives in St. John; and Susan is the wife of M. Roberts, of St. John. Mrs. Caples dying in 1845, the doctor married for a second wife Nancy Nowel, of which union there were born eleven children, of whom mention is made of Jane, the wife of Marion Dodge; Elizabeth, who lives in Vancouver, Wash.; Robert, who is a farmer of Marion county; and Ollie, who is the wife of Harry Hemlow, of British Columbia.

Dr. Caples was a merchant and farmer in Ohio, and in 1838 moved to Savannah, Mo., where he carried out a long intended project of studying medicine. Under the instruction of a brother physician he remained in Savannah until 1849, and then came west with his family. The outfit consisted of two wagons and ox-teams, and it was the intention to go to California in search of gold. However, the doctor changed his mind en route, as did so many others who heard adverse tales of gold while on the plains. The doctor unfortunately succumbed to mountain fever, and for a time his life was despaired of. Had it not been for his plucky daughter the party might have come to grief. Miss Caples was a very attractive woman, and one of the young men of the party became much enamored of her. He proved a rascal of deepest dye, for, knowing they were dependent upon him as guide and driver after the doctor was taken down with fever, he utilized his advantage by attempting to make the daughter promise to marry him when they should reach Portland. For his answer he received the butt of a heavy whip across his face, and thus convinced of the futility of his effort left the travelers to their own devices. The responsibility proved not too great for the courageous daughter, for she bravely set to the task of driving the oxen over the mountains, a difficult task even for a strong man in those days. From Portland the party went to Columbia City, and in the spring of 1850 Dr. Caples began practicing medicine in Portland. He was one of the best known of the early practitioners, and in his efforts to relieve the physical woes of his patients traveled many hundreds of miles on horseback, his territory extending into the remote mountains, and over vast areas of country. In 1854 he took up a donation claim where St. John's is now situated, and, moving his family there, continued his hard and but slightly remunerative practice in the district. This popular and efficient pioneer practitioner died in 1893, at the age of eighty-seven, leaving behind him a record of hundreds of worthy deeds, and innumerable unrewarded services. In early life he was a rabid Democrat, but in after years became more tolerant in his views, both as to religion and politics. In fact he was an active church worker, and his moral influence was unquestioned. Mrs. Potter inherits many of the sterling characteristics of her well-remembered father, as evidenced particularly in her children, who were trained in household and other arts, and taught to be useful and moral men and women. Marvin, the oldest of the sons, lives in Sheridan; Walter died in 1894; Ida is the wife of Edward Church, of Astoria; and Ada is the wife of Alfred Street, of San Francisco.

STEPHEN L. SCROGGIN. Though young in years, Stephen L. Scroggin has attained no small degree of success in the business affairs of Sheridan, Yamhill county, Ore., as manager of the Scroggin & Wortman banking firm, which has recently been changed to Scroggin Brothers, Mr. Wortman having disposed of his interests to Charles C. Scroggin. Since his entrance into the business world Stephen L. Scroggin has devoted his time and attention to the upbuilding of the interest with which he immediately became attached, proving an exceptional ability and rare judgment in his methods.

The father of Stephen L. Scroggin, P. M., was born in Logan county, Ill., in 1830, and was there reared on a farm and educated in the common schools. When a young man he removed to Iowa, where he engaged in farming, there marrying Sarah E. Howard, a native of that state, and until 1870 they made their home there, leaving at that date for Oregon. On arriving in the west Mr. Scroggin settled near McMinnville, Yamhill county, and after five months he purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres adjoining the town of Sheridan, where he passed the remainder of his life, dying here April 18, 1894. As a Democrat he served for two terms as county commissioner of Yamhill county. Fraternally he was a member of the Masonic order, having affiliated with them for many years. His wife survived him until 1895, dying then at the age of sixty-four years. Of the nine children born to them, seven are now living. Charles C. lives near Willamina; Mary died at the age of fourteen years; Stephen L., the subject of this review, makes his home in Sheridan; Ella is the wife of Clarence Jones, of Portland; Alice is the wife of G. A. Epperly, of Portland; Ida died at the age of twenty years; P. M., Jr., lives in Lebanon, Ore.; T. J. makes his home in Sheridan; and May is the wife of Clarence Irvin, of Portland.

Stephen L. Scroggin was born near Marshalltown, Iowa, August 21, 1865, and was but five years old at the time of the removal to Oregon and seven when his home was near enough to Sheridan to profit by the public schools of that city. As he grew to manhood he engaged with his father in farming, until 1893, when he went to McMinnville and worked in the First National Bank of that city, the next year returning to Sheridan to become a part of a banking firm here, which was established in the spring of 1894, under the firm name of Scroggin & Wortman, and of which he became manager. The banking interests are now controlled by Mr. Scroggin and his brother, Charles C. Mr. Scroggin is also interested in farming and stock-raising. He was married January 29, 1902, to Lena M. Keyt, a native of Polk county, Ore. Though interested in the welfare of his city, state and country, Mr. Scroggin is not a party man, nor does he aspire to political honors, satisfied to lead a successful business life and cast his ballot independent of party restrictions.

HON. W. A. CUSICK, M. D., who has represented his district in the state legislature, and has gained prestige in the practice of medicine and surgery in Oregon, now makes his home in Salem, while for half a century he has resided in the state. His life history began in Illinois, his birth having occurred near Quincy, in that state, March 21, 1839. His parents were Solomon and Maria (Hollemeak) Cusick, the former of Irish and the latter of German descent. Representatives of the Cusick family came from the Emerald Isle to America during the colonial period, settling in New York, and Dr. Cusick's grandfather removed from the Empire state to eastern Illinois, where his death occurred. His wife was a Miss Conkling, of New York, a member of the family which produced Roscoe Conkling, for many years United States senator from New York.

Solomon Cusick was born in New York, and was a farmer by occupation. After engaging in the tilling of the soil near Quincy, Ill., he crossed the plains with an ox train, being exactly six months on the way. Soon after reaching Oregon he purchased a farm in Linn county, near Scio, and seven years later he sold it and purchased land in Marion county, where he resided until his retirement from business cares. In religious faith he was a Baptist. His wife died on the old homestead. She was born in Kentucky, a daughter of Harry and Hannah Hollemeak, who removed from that state to Illinois, where he engaged in farming. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812. Unto Solomon and Maria Cusick were born four daughters and five sons. One of these, Harry, enlisted in the Fiftieth Illinois Infantry, served throughout the Civil war, and rose from the rank of lieutenant to that of captain. He died in Missouri. Seven of the children came to Oregon, and three sons and a daughter are yet living: J. W., a banker, of Albany, Ore.; W. A.; J. H., a stockman, of Washington, and Mrs. M. L. Trask, of Linn county, Ore. Another brother, G. W., who died in Washington county, Ore., was a graduate of the medical department of the University of Oregon.

Reared on the home farm in Illinois, during that period Dr. Cusick spent the winter months in the district schools, resuming farm work with the return of spring. In 1853 he came with the family to the northwest, he and his brothers driving the loose stock. They crossed the Missouri river at St. Joseph, proceeding up the Platte and over the Oregon trail. After reaching this state he remained with his father for two years, and then started out in life for himself. He attended the district schools and worked upon the farms of the locality; and in 1859, being desirous of obtaining a better education, he entered Dallas Academy. In 1860 he matriculated in Bethel College, in Bethel, Polk county, Ore. Later he engaged in teaching for eighteen months, after which he spent a similar period in the mines of Baker county, Ore. In 1864, having determined to make the practice of medicine his life work, he began studying under the direction of Dr. McAfee, of Salem, with whom he remained for two years, and then entered the Toland Medical College at San Francisco, the course in which he completed in 1867. He then became a member of the first class in the medical department of Willamette University, being graduated in the fall of 1867, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. There were but three members in the class of that year, and the name of Dr. Cusick appears first in the book of graduates in medicine in Oregon. Soon after the completion of his studies, he received an appointment as acting assistant surgeon and post-surgeon at Camp Lyon, Idaho, where he remained two years, after which he located at Gervais, or Waconda, where he was engaged continuously in the practice of his profession until 1882. In the latter year he located in Salem, where he has since maintained an office, enjoying a large and constantly increasing practice, which now makes heavy demands upon his time. He has had other business interests, to some extent. He was identified with the Capital National Bank for about ten years, and was its president for some time, but eventually disposed of his interest in that institution.

Dr. Cusick was married in Marion county to Miss Marcia L. Williams, a native of Illinois, who, in 1864, came to Oregon with her father, J. J. Williams, who followed farming. He and his wife have a daughter, Ethel E., who is now the wife of Dr. Willis B. Morse, a promising physician of Salem. His father, W. B. Morse, was born in Massachusetts, became a sea-faring man, and when twenty-one years of age was master of a vessel. In 1844 he made his first trip to the Columbia river, and settled permanently on the Pacific coast in 1849. His death occurred at St. Helens. On the maternal side Dr. Morse is a grandson of Dr. James McBride, who brought his family across the plains to Oregon in 1840, and became one of the most distinguished of the early physicians of the state. Dr. Morse is a graduate of the medical department of Willamette University, class of 1891, and of the Post-Graduate College of New York, class of 1893.

Dr. Cusick has long been recognized as an earnest and active Republican. In 1884 he was elected to the state legislature, in which he served during the regular session of that year, and the special session of 1885. During the regular session the first attempt was made to enact a law regulating the practice of medicine in the state, but, as several who were interested in the measure were called home about the time it was brought to a vote, it did not become a law. Dr. Cusick was instrumental in defeating certain measures which would have worked great detriment to the state, and he labored earnestly and effectively for the general good of the commonwealth. For four years he served on the United States Pension Board, for two years was visiting physician to the state asylum, and for four years has been the attending physician to the state prison. He is a member of the Marion County Medical Society, and for several years he was a member of the board of directors of the public schools of Salem. For a time he served as president of the board, and was acting in that capacity when the East Salem school was erected. He was made a Mason in Fidelity Lodge No. 54, A. F. & A. M., at Gervais, with which he is still identified, and he took the Royal Arch degree in Salem. His wife is a member of the Order of Eastern Star.

The contemporaries of Dr. Cusick freely accord him a place among the most distinguished exponents of the science of medicine in the Pacific northwest. His splendid equipment for the profession and the long years of his active practice, with its attendant success, naturally entitle him to a position of eminence. He has not rested content with the foundation of his early preparation, but has been a constant student in his chosen science, and has kept fully abreast of the best thought in the world of medicine and surgery. Among the laity he is recognized as a gentleman of sterling character, possessed of many of those personal attributes which endear a man most closely to thoughtful and discriminating judges of human nature. His position in the community as a man, as well as a physician, is unassailable, and from any viewpoint he is entitled to a permanent and prominent place in the historical literature of the Willamette valley.

HON. THOMAS B. KAY. The most important of the manufacturing institutions of Salem, Ore., is the Thomas Kay Woolen Mill, which stands as an industrial monument to the business ability, zeal and energy which characterized the elder man of that name in its organization and management, and the younger man in the executive talent and ability which have placed him in the position so long occupied by his father.

Thomas Kay, father of Hon. Thomas B. Kay, was born in Shipley, near Leeds, Yorkshire, England, in 1837. Having been left fatherless at the age of nine years, he was early forced into the industrial life which characterizes that country. Entering the woolen mills in the vicinity of his home, he thoroughly learned the business. When nineteen years of age he came to the United States, locating in Trenton, N. J., where he became boss weaver in a mill. In 1863 he came to Oregon and occupied a similar position in the Brownsville mill, remaining in that capacity until the loss of the mill by fire. He then went to Salem for a short time, after which he returned to Brownsville and worked in the woolen mills until they were closed down. He then took charge of the Ashland Woolen Mills, conducting them successfully for three years, when he returned again to Salem for about eight months. He then leased the Brownsville mills in connection with Darbish & Croft, and after conducting it for two years they organized a company known as the Brownsville Woolen Mill Company and purchased the property and as superintendent conducted the concern successfully for sixteen years.

Disposing of his interest in that institution, he came to Salem in 1889 and founded the mill which is known by his name, the building then erected being about half the size of the present property, containing fourteen rooms. The business was incorporated under the name of The Thomas Kay Woolen Mills Company, and Mr. Kay was made president and manager, serving in that capacity until the mill was destroyed by fire in 1895. Nothing daunted by what to many men would have meant an irremediable misfortune, Mr. Kay at once set about the reconstruction of the plant. Within a year a modern brick building had arisen to replace the old one. It had an initial capacity of twenty looms, this number being shortly increased to its present capacity of thirty-two looms in constant operation. The present output is being constantly increased by the addition of new machinery each year. The entire mill was equipped with the most approved modern machinery, and a sprinkler system was installed as a means of protection against fire. The motive power of the mill is water. A new forty-eight-inch Leffel wheel was recently placed within the works, which has increased the capacity to the extent of about twenty-five-horse power. The product includes casimeres, tweeds, blankets, flannels and robes, all the cloths manufactured being of the finest quality, and a considerable percentage of the output finding its way to the leading foreign markets of the world. The concern is capitalized at $100,000. The present president and manager is Thomas B. Kay, the vice-president is Squire Farrar, and the secretary and treasurer is Robert H. Coshow. The board of directors consists of Thomas B. Kay, Squire Farrar and T. L. Davidson of Salem; J. K. Weatherford of Albany, and O. P. Coshow of Roseburg.

Thomas Kay was also interested in what was known as the the Waterloo Development Company, of which he was president and manager. In 1892 this company built a woolen mill at Waterloo, Linn county, Ore., which Mr. Kay operated until it was burned in 1898. For four years previous to this time it had been in the possession of the Thomas Kay Woolen Mill Company.

The death of Mr. Kay, which occurred April 28, 1899, while he was in his sixty-third year, removed from the best citizenship of Salem a staunch and public-spirited man, who had always devoted his best efforts toward the promotion of all worthy enterprises, whether of a private or public nature. He was a member of the Baptist Church of Salem, to the maintenance of which he contributed liberally. His beneficences were numerous, but in the giving of money or aid of any nature he was invariably unostentatious. Many a needy man of Salem can look back to the happy day when the kindly hand of this noble man was freely extended to him with the relief which was vital to the beneficiary. In politics a Republican, he served in the city council, in which body he employed his best efforts toward the conservation of the highest interests of the municipality. In Masonry he was a member of the chapter and the commandery. He also affiliated with the Odd Fellows.

He was united in marriage in 1856 to Ann Slingsby, a native of Shipley, England, who survives him, making her home in Salem. Of the ten children born unto this estimable couple, five only are now living, namely: Fannie, wife of Charles P. Bishop, of Salem; Thomas B., of this review; Libbie, wife of O. P. Coshow, of Roseburg, Ore.; Leonora, wife of C. T. Roberts, of Portland; and Bertha, who resides with her mother.

Thomas B. Kay was born in Trenton, N. J., February 28, 1864. During the first year of his life he was brought to Oregon by his mother, who, with the other children in the family, joined his father in Brownsville. They made the journey hither by way of the Isthmus of Panama. He was educated in the public schools of Brownsville, though the years of his schooling were few. At the age of nine years he entered the Brownsville

Woolen Mills as a spooler, literally grew up in the business, and, like his father, learned the art of weaving in all its intricacies. When fourteen years of age he was taken from the mills and sent to the Baptist College at McMinnville, where he remained for three years, devoting his vacations to work in the mills. When nineteen years old he entered the Brownsville Woolen Mills store of Portland, where he remained for one year. In 1884 he went to McMinnville and engaged in the clothing business as a member of the firm of Bishop & Kay. Four years later Mr. Bishop disposed of his interest, and the firm became known as Kay & Todd. In 1898 Mr. Kay sold his interest in the concern. In the meantime he had become connected with the Thomas Kay Woolen Mill, for which he became salesman in 1895, a short time before the burning of the mill. In 1897, after it had been rebuilt, he went to New York as the eastern representative of the company, where he remained for one season. Upon his return to the west he located in Salem and became salesman and assistant manager of the mill. Upon the death of his father two years later he assumed his present important place as manager of the concern.

The marriage of Mr. Kay occurred in McMinnville January 15, 1888, and united him with Cora Wallace, who was born near the latter city, a daughter of C. A. Wallace, an extended reference to whose identification with Oregon appears elsewhere in this volume. They are the parents of three children, Ercel W. and Marjory and an infant who died at the age of three months.

While a resident of McMinnville Mr. Kay served as a member of the city council for one term and as a member of the school board for a similar period. He is a staunch adherent of the principles of the Republican party. In 1902 he was the nominee of that party for representative in the Twenty-second biennial session of the Oregon state legislature, and was elected by a large majority. In the performance of the labors devolving upon him in connection with this office, he upheld the prime interests of his constituents, and demonstrated his fitness for such a post, where integrity means so much to the welfare of the state and the community. He is a member of the Christian Church, in which he officiates as deacon. In his fraternal relations he is a member of Pacific Lodge No. 50, A. F. & A. M., of Salem; Chapter, R. A. M., of Salem, and of DeMolay Commandery K. T., of Salem. He is also a member of the Illihee Club, of which he is one of the board of managers, and of the Salem Commercial Club.

He is likewise identified with the Portland Manufacturers' Association, and is now on its directorate.

Though Mr. Kay is a comparatively young man, the conspicuous success which has attended his business career has caused him to be regarded by the discriminating citizens of Oregon as one of the most capable factors in the commercial world of the northwest. His excellent business judgment undoubtedly has been inherited to a degree from his father, though it has been developed in a great measure by reason of his varied experience in the liberal atmosphere of the west and among the more conservative influences of the east. He has taken a deep interest in the welfare of the two cities in which he has spent most of his life, both important commercial centers of the Willamette valley, and has shown himself to be a firm friend of such public movements or private enterprises as are calculated to promote the prosperity of the community or to elevate its moral or social status. It is with pleasure that the compilers of this work give a prominent place in the annals of humanity's best endeavor in the Willamette valley to this sapient son of an honored sire, for the name of Kay will always stand as the builder of one of the greatest monuments to industry in the northwest.

HON. JACOB WORTMAN. As chief executive of McMinnville, founder and president of the First National Bank of this city, and a pioneer of 1852, Hon. Jacob Wortman is one of the most virile and resourceful personalities who have contributed to the upbuilding of this section of Yamhill county. As the name implies, the Wortman forefathers pursued their vocations among the more conservative and history resplendent conditions of the Fatherland, and in Germany was born the paternal grandfather, Jacob, the establisher of the family in New Brunswick. From New Brunswick the elder Jacob removed to Ohio, and was numbered among the very early pioneers of the then wild and uninhabited region of Harrison county, which he reached with his family in 1828. There he farmed and raised stock, clearing his land from almost primeval uselessness, and rearing in comparative comfort his several children.

John Wortman, the father of Hon. Jacob, was born in St. Johns, New Brunswick, and eventually succeeded to independent farming in Ohio. In 1838 he removed to Iowa, via the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, conveying his family and possessions in wagons and locating about a hundred miles west of Keokuk, in Van Buren county, of which he was one of the very first settlers.

With his neighbors remote, and surrounded with deprivations incident to all pioneer life, he made many improvements upon his wild land, but lived only five years to profit by his new acquisitions, his death occurring in 1843. The wife, who died in Iowa in 1838, just after their arrival in that state, was a native of England, and before her marriage was Martha Cain. Of the five children born to her, the subject of this sketch is the only one living. Another son, Charles, died on his farm in Ohio. Through a second marriage of the father were born three sons, of whom Martin, a twin brother of John, is still living in Ohio. All three sons served in Ohio regiments during the Civil war. Henry died in Ohio in 1895, from wounds received at the battle of Antietam; and John still lives in Lawrence county, Mo.

Born near Cadiz, Harrison county, Ohio, March 19, 1826, Hon. Jacob Wortman received his principal training after the family removal to Iowa in 1838. In this wild Indian country he attended the pioneer school as opportunity offered, and after his father's death found himself entirely dependent on his own efforts. As a farm hand he received $8 a month, or $100 a year, yet with this small allowance he managed to save sufficient money to enable him to embark in housekeeping in 1850, his marriage occurring in Oskaloosa, Iowa, and uniting him with Eliza Ann Stumbo. In the spring of 1852, with his wife and infant son, John, he started out to conquer fate in the west, outfitting at Oskaloosa with ox teams and wagons. April 20, 1852, they crossed the Missouri river at Council Bluffs, where they had trouble with the Indians. As a matter of safety they formed themselves into a military company, Henry Evans being elected to the responsible position of captain. Thus equipped the company of forty wagons pushed on over the old Oregon trail via Fort Hall. Much danger was warded off owing to the constant guard maintained throughout the night, but the ravages of cholera desolated the little band, and many newly-made graves along the trail filled with grief those left to pursue their weary journey alone. Arriving at The Dalles the last of September, Mr. Wortman went in a flatboat down the river to the Cascades, and then arrived at Portland. In what is now one of the finest cities in the country, were illy defined streets filled with trees and stumps, and with very few evidences of present or future prosperity. During the first winter Mr. Wortman found employment in a livery stable at very fair wages, a most fortunate occurrence, for the expensive trip over the plains had made serious inroads in the family assets. In the spring of 1853 he took up a donation claim seven miles above Oregon City in what is now Clackamas county, and on the west banks of the Willamette, a place still known as Wortman's Landing. He improved his three hundred and twenty acres of land, and in the meantime started out the first fall in the steamboating business on the Willamette, first as deckhand and then as foreman, and finally as master of the Franklin. At a later period he became one of the owners of the Clinton, running between Oregon City and Dayton, yet all the time his home continued to be on the claim, where his leisure from steamboating was actively employed. In that early day the boats were run only during the winter season, for their crude and heavy construction rendered them unavailable for the more shallow waters in the summer. Thus it happened that the pleasantest part of the year found the crew busily employed in hewing timber on the donation claim, and two occupations were harmoniously and profitably blended.

In 1865 Mr. Wortman sold his farm and boat interests and bought a small grocery and merchandise store in Oregon City, conducting the same successfully for ten years. This interest also was disposed of in 1875, and during that year Mr. Wortman, his wife and four sons established a partnership in a general merchandise business at Junction City, Lane county. The same year they started a similar business at Monroe, Benton county, conducting the two stores, ten miles apart, under the firm name of Jacob Wortman & Sons. With years of practical experience behind him, and an intuitive knowledge of the demands of all growing localities, he came to McMinnville in 1883, and established the Bank of McMinnville, incorporated in 1885 as the First National Bank, the first bank in Yamhill county. Ever since Mr. Wortman has been the honored president of this financially strong and reliable institution, which has proved one of the greatest upbuilding factors in this county. All of his sons are interested in the bank, and this aggregation of business ability and integrity has resulted in really formidable influence. In the meantime he has accumulated large bank, real estate and country holdings, and was one of the chief stockholders in the Union Block, one of the first substantial buildings erected in McMinnville.

Ever since its organization Mr. Wortman has identified his political fortunes with the Republican party, and during the Civil war his sympathies were pronouncedly on the side of northern tolerance and humanity. Though never working for or desiring official recognition, his particular fitness for organization and municipal management resulted in the election of Mr. Wortman to the position of mayor of McMinnville, filling his first term in that office in 1887-88, and in November, 1901, he was again elected, creditably maintaining the position up to the present time, for five terms. He cast his first presidential vote for Zachary Taylor in 1848. A welcome member to the ranks of Masonry, he inaugurated his active service in this organization in 1856, as a member of Multnomah Lodge No. 1. While at Junction City he was identified with the lodge of that town and its treasurer, and is now a member of McMinnville Lodge No. 42, of which he has been treasurer for nineteen years. Also he was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1900 Mr. and Mrs. Wortman celebrated the golden anniversary of their wedding, and from near and far friends assembled to bid them God-speed upon the remainder of their life journey. No higher tribute to admirable personal characteristics, noble citizenship, or popular and helpful social attributes were required than the all-around good will evidenced on this memorable occasion.

Of the four sons born into this family of typical western enterprise, John is cashier of the First National Bank; Frank died in 1883, having qualified as a physician and surgeon at the Jefferson Medical College (Philadelphia), later engaging in post-graduate work for one year in London and one in Vienna; Jacob L. is a graduate of the University of Oregon, is a well known scientist, and fills the chair of Paleontology at Yale University, and H. C. is secretary and treasurer of the firm of Olds, Wortman & King, of Portland, Ore. The success of their sons has invested the life of these honored pioneers with a great deal of satisfaction and joy, and reflects vast credit upon the splendid home training in the early days, which inspired the best possible in their respective undertakings, and laid the foundation for strong and capable manhood. In 1893 Mr. and Mrs. Wortman made their first trip back to the old home in the east, and also visited the World's Fair, their journey being of a vastly different order because of latter day enterprise and accomplishment. Serenely they gazed at the splendidly developed farms and prosperous cities from the windows of a Pullman palace car, and it is surmised that many contrasts were drawn, and many references made to the ox trains of the very long ago. In 1895 also another trip was undertaken back to the old haunts so familiar in his experience of forty-five years before. Mr. Wortman represents the integrity and substantial growth of the west, and his is a kind of citizenship as ennobling as it is inspiring and helpful.

È. E. GOUCHER, M. D., is the pioneer physician and surgeon of McMinnville, having located here in 1883. No professional name in Yamhill county carries with it greater weight, or suggests more conscientious application of the highest tenets of medical and surgical science. A son of the country bordering on the western sea, Dr. Goucher was born near Healdsburg, Sonoma county, Cal., March 12, 1858, and from a very successful physician sire received his first inspiration towards his life calling.

Of fine Old Dominion stock, G. W., the father of E. E. Goucher, was born in Virginia, and practiced medicine for many years in the south. Reports of golden fortunes on the coast led him to temporarily abandon his profession in 1849 in favor of prospecting and mining in California, to which state he journeyed via Panama, and where he experienced the success of the average rather than the exceptional miner. Fortified with a calling for which there is invariable demand, he lived at times in Alameda, Santa Clara, and Sonoma counties, and in 1864 identified his fortunes with Yamhill county, Ore., where he combined practice and ministerial labors in the Methodist Episcopal Church south for some years. Eventually he located in Amity, where a successful practice was interrupted by his death in 1893. He was a stanch member of the Methodist Episcopal Church south, as was also his wife, Delilah Ann (Morrison) Goucher, who was born in Indiana, and came to California with her brothers at an early day. Of the five children born to these parents but two are living, the pioneer physician of McMinnville being the second oldest child in the family, and Mrs. Norah Springer.

At a very early age Dr. Goucher became interested in his father's profession, and from this reliable source received his first practical instruction. Primarily his education was received in the public schools of California and Yamhill county, and he eventually entered Willamette University, from which he was duly graduated from the medical department in 1882. After a year's practice in Yamhill county he located in McMinnville, as heretofore stated, and aside from a general practice of medicine has identified himself with horticulture, owning one of the very fine and productive fruit farms of the county. Since its establishment he has been a member of the pension board of Yamhill county. Fraternally the doctor is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he is past noble grand; the Encampment of McMinnville; the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Salem; and the Odd Fellows lodge of McMinnville. The family of Dr. Goucher consists of his wife, Hattie M. (Sherman) Goucher, a native of Minnesota, and two children, Rua and Norma.

REV. ROBERT ROBE. To the missionary of the early days Oregon owes a debt of gratitude which can never be repaid. Diametrically opposed to the hundreds who staked all
