

GIFT OF JUCKSCH

EX LIBRIS

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE
AN INTERPRETATION
AND AN ANALYSIS

•The M Co. •

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

AN INTERPRETATION
AND AN ANALYSIS

BY

HERBERT FRIEDENWALD, PH.D.

New York

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

LONDON: MACMILLAN & CO., LTD.

1904

E 221
.F8

JUCKSCH

1100

COPYRIGHT, 1904

By HERBERT FRIEDENWALD

PRESS OF
THE NEW ERA PRINTING COMPANY
LANCASTER, PA.

TO MY MOTHER

215197

PREFACE

It has been my endeavor to show, in the first five chapters, the close interrelation between the development of the authority and jurisdiction of the Continental Congress and the evolution of the sentiment for independence. The gradual, though occasionally rapid manner in which the Congress acquired power, and the ways in which this was exercised, went side by side with the growth of the idea that independence was a necessary outcome of the controversy between England and America, that had been raging for nearly fifteen years. As the authority and jurisdiction of the Congress were extended, it adopted various means to further the desire for independence. Also, as this desire became more widely spread, the Congress, the embodiment of the union sentiment, acting for all and in behalf of all, gained additional strength. The highest point of its power was reached on July 4, 1776. It was never again so powerful as on the day it declared independence of England. The decline of its authority dates from this time, when the first steps were taken to define the limits to its jurisdiction, by means of the Articles of Confederation. The states then began to acquire power at the cost of the Congress, ultimately culminating in its complete overthrow and the establishment of a new federal government under the Constitution.

In order to describe the beginnings of the Congress and of independence it has not been thought necessary to go over again the oft-told, though as yet inadequately told story of the rise of the American revolutionary movement. A familiarity with the main facts of that history is assumed. Only such of the earlier phases of the controversy, as bear immediately upon independence, have been touched upon in the opening chapter. In one sense Chalmers was correct in dating independence from the first days of the settlement of the colonies. In another, the events preceding the Congress of 1774, are to be differentiated from those happening after that date, when ideas of establishing independence first had their rise. There is no evidence of a conscious striving for independence in the earlier period; there is none even previous to November, 1775, but after that date it appears on every hand with a force that rendered the final outcome inevitable.

In the explanation of the meaning of the various clauses of the Declaration, embodied in chapters X and XI, I have not attempted to deal with every example of a colonial grievance that might with propriety be assumed to have been held in mind by the framers of that document. Only the grievances of particular significance, and those that had attained greatest prominence are referred to. The limit (1763) fixed by the Congress of 1774 as the starting point of the controversy, has been adhered to in the main; not, however, because it is any part of my intention to hold that the causes of the revolution had their origin at so late a period, but for the reason that the principal grievances complained of reached their most aggravating development after that date.

The earlier chapters are in some respects a preliminary study, in part an abstract of a larger, more detailed work on this subject for which I have been collecting material for some years. The first incentive to undertake it was received under the guidance of Professor John Bach McMaster, to whom is owing a debt which it is a pleasure to acknowledge here. He has put me under additional obligation by his kindness in reviewing a portion of the manuscript, and for encouragement given me to push the work to completion.

For helpful criticism of some of the manuscript and all of the proofs, I am indebted to Prof. John L. Stewart. And I have to thank my kind friends, Miss Henrietta Szold, Mr. Joseph Jacobs, Dr. Cyrus Adler, and Mr. C. L. Sulzberger, for reading the proofs and for many valuable suggestions.

For purposes of convenience I have throughout cited Peter Force's well-known American Archives as Force. The references to Jefferson's Writings are to Ford's edition, and those to Mass. State Papers to Bradford's Speeches of the Governors of Massachusetts, from 1765 to 1775; and the Answers of the House of Representatives to the same, etc., Boston, 1818.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

THE POPULAR UPRISING.....	1-29
---------------------------	------

CHAPTER II

THE CONGRESS FINDING ITSELF.....	30-49
----------------------------------	-------

CHAPTER III

THE IDEA OF INDEPENDENCE TAKES ROOT, AND THE CONGRESS PREVAILS.....	50-76
--	-------

CHAPTER IV

THE CONGRESS AND THE DEMOCRACY.....	77-98
-------------------------------------	-------

CHAPTER V

INDEPENDENCE IN THE MAKING.....	99-120
---------------------------------	--------

CHAPTER VI

ADOPTING AND SIGNING THE DECLARATION.....	121-151
---	---------

CHAPTER VII

THE DECLARATION AND ITS CRITICS.....	152-171
--------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER VIII

THE PURPOSE OF THE DECLARATION.....	172-183
-------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER IX

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE DECLARATION..... 184-207

CHAPTER X

(1) THE "FACTS SUBMITTED TO A CANDID WORLD". 208-239

CHAPTER XI

(2) THE "FACTS SUBMITTED TO A CANDID WORLD". 240-259

APPENDIX

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE..... 261-279

INDEX 281-299

THE
DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE
AN INTERPRETATION AND AN ANALYSIS

CHAPTER I

THE POPULAR UPRISING

During the period of more than one hundred years preceding the Declaration of Independence, repeated occasion offered for differences of opinion to arise between the crown and the colonies, over questions of policy and the interpretation of constitutional law. Beginning in controversy over governmental methods, earnest discussion led on to serious dispute that finally culminated in engendering much bitterness of feeling. Owing, however, to the lack of a definite British colonial policy consistently carried out, or, more exactly, the failure to carry out consistently the existing policy, the colonies were in large measure allowed to grow up neglected. When laws were passed by Parliament designed, in pursuance of the mercantile theories of the age, to control the commerce and productions of the colonies, for the benefit of England, they were either not enforced at all, or enforced with such laxity, as practically to nullify their intended purpose.¹ This neglect had a double effect: it deprived the home country of the commercial rewards that would have been hers had these acts been enforced rigidly, and it allowed the colonists to develop their commerce largely on the lines suggested by an intelligent perception of the natural advantages of their geographical relation to the West Indies. In like manner, the control of their political affairs by the crown was exercised with such leniency, in the main, as ultimately to produce a condition that has been admirably described as "virtual independence with relations of mutual good-will."²

Upon the accession of Grenville to power in 1763, the attempt was made to accomplish the impossible task of subverting peacefully the multiform customs and precedents that a century of license had permitted to be established. If at this time King, ministry and Parliament could have fashioned a statesman in whose mind would be found a combination of the wisdom of a Moses and a Solomon, with the philosophy of a Plato and an Aristotle, he might have carried through to success the policy which

¹ The number of British acts of Parliament affecting the commerce and industry of the colonies in force at this time, footed up a total of thirty.

² C. F. Adams, Life and Works of John Adams, I, 133.

Grenville undertook to initiate. But nothing short of some such superhuman aggregate of mental resources could have accomplished it. On the other hand, it would appear as if Grenville and his successors endeavored to carry out their plans in a manner pre-designed to create as much irritation as the circumstances would allow. If, instead, the British authorities had, in dealing with the colonies, exercised some of the tactful diplomacy which has won so many triumphs in the larger field of international affairs, the separation might have been postponed for a considerable term of years.¹

Further, a serious tactical blunder was made, by yielding to the clamor of the colonies against the Stamp Act, by reason of which it was repealed on March 17, 1766. At the same time the act since generally known as the Declaratory Act was made into law.² It was unwise to pass laws and then allow them to be annulled by non-enforcement. It was in the highest degree injudicious to enact a measure containing many of the provisions of the Stamp Act. But the crowning act of folly came with the repeal of an obnoxious act upon the occasion of the first show of resistance to it, by means of the revolutionary memorials of the Stamp Act Congress of 1765. Had the Grenville ministry or its successor, the

¹ This was Franklin's view.

² See Chapter XI.

Rockingham Whigs,¹ determined at all hazards to enforce the law with a high hand, for this purpose calling in the military arm of the government, there would have been an end to resistance, and the revolution would have been postponed for many years. When troops were finally sent over they availed little, for they were few in number, were utilized in no spirited manner, and served only to raise the issue of quartering troops without consent, in time of peace, causing the additional irritation which culminated in the clash at Boston on March 5, 1770. But in the beginning a large force would have had a decided effect. For no sort of extra-legal, intercolonial political organizations existed as yet, nor any sufficient feeling of the necessity for united action, such as grew up during the first ten years of the controversy. At the end of that time the ramifications of the newly created committees of correspondence and the like, were so widely extended as to touch the popular mind at every point. This is evidenced by the fact that only nine colonies were represented at the Stamp Act Congress, all but three of the delegations having been elected by the respective legal assemblies. Ten years later, when but one colony failed to respond,¹ only five of the delegations to the Congress of 1774 were elected by the assemblies. The revolutionary organization was by this time so complete that it mattered little whether or not assemblies were in session; delegates were elected none the less in a regular and orderly manner throughout the colonies.²

¹The fact that the Rockingham Whigs were of a different political complexion from the Grenville ministry, and consequently had no interest in enforcing the unwelcome acts of its predecessors, does not affect the case. For they immediately proceeded to pass the Declaratory Act, which (though little attention was paid to it at the time by the colonists) ultimately proved more serious in its consequences than was anticipated, when an attempt was made to live up to its provisions. The colonists at first regarded it as but another British act passed with no intention of being enforced.

If anything approaching an adequate conception respecting the temper and attitude of mind of the colonies existed in England, it was not shown in any of the legislation enacted, beginning with the passage of the Townshend Acts of 1767;³ nor is there any evidence of the existence of an appreciation of the extraordinary ability for dialectics that had developed in the minds of the foremost Americans. Moreover, through the Stamp Act Congress, by its successful resistance to the Stamp Act, the colonists had their first taste of the efficiency of united action against Great Britain, when the interests of all were thought to be at stake. It had been the custom for a colony to appeal by petition to the King when any grievance weighed too heavily upon it, and often with success. It was natural, therefore, that they should appeal in common when all were concerned alike.

¹ Georgia.

² New Hampshire, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia were not represented at the Stamp Act Congress because their respective assemblies were not in session and there was no other organization to supply the deficiency.

³ See Chapter XI.

But by adopting memorials to Lords and Commons, at the Stamp Act Congress, at the same time as a petition to the King was formulated, they went further than they had any idea of going, and took the first step on the road to independence. For this marks the beginning of an entire change in the character of the controversy. Hitherto dispute had always been with the crown. But Parliament, by the Sugar Act¹ and the Stamp Act, had projected itself into American affairs, by passing laws having the purpose of raising revenue by direct taxation, and the colonists were not slow to make that branch of the British government a party to their disputes. This, however, is the only occasion on which the colonists as a body addressed Parliament directly, and demonstrates the unformed character of the colonial opposition. After opportunity had been given for an interchange of views respecting the grounds of the colonial contentions, and a definite stand had been taken, the tactical error of appealing to Parliament was not repeated. As the controversy advanced, though Parliament was held at fault, the doctrine was consistently maintained that the King had it within his power to right their wrongs, and to him must all appeals be made. The colonists gradually renounced all consideration of parliamentary control, and they would stultify themselves by appealing for redress to a power whose authority they would not recognize.

¹ April 5, 1764. See Chapter XI.

Further, an examination of the declaration of rights and of the petition and memorials of the Stamp Act Congress discloses a fundamental difference between them and the documents issued subsequently. The theory of the natural right of Englishmen to enjoy the blessings of the British constitution, to representation, to taxation only by representatives, and to trial by jury, figure conspicuously, it is true, in the state papers of the Stamp Act Congress. But, side by side with these, and raised to equal importance, were put the economic reasons why the enforcement of the Stamp Act and the recently revised trade laws would prove burdensome. The colonies would be drained of specie, they held, rendering it impossible to pay the debts due England's merchants; the profits Great Britain would derive from her trade with the colonies would be decreased materially, because they would be made so poor as to be unable to purchase needed commodities; and they would, therefore, be unable to bear the burden of paying the taxes imposed by the Stamp Act, short of absolute ruin. Another point should be noted: the tone of these appeals is far more moderate. Rights are asserted with much less vehemence, and there is much more show of a conciliatory spirit than is evident in any of the documents produced by the next congress.¹

But a new phase was entered upon with the repeal of the Stamp Act and the passage of the Declaratory Act. In this the assertion of the colonists that their own assemblies had the sole and exclusive right of imposing duties and taxes was denounced, and it was specifically declared that the colonies "have been, are, and of right ought to be, subordinate unto, and dependent upon the imperial crown of Great Britain; and that the King's majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, had, hath, and of right ought to have, full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies and people of America, subjects of the crown of Great Britain, in all cases whatsoever."² The economic burdens of which the colonies complained having been removed, they were led to hope that since the change in the ministry, and the return to power of the Whigs, Rockingham would not enforce the revised trade regulations. Their economic grievances being practically at an end, the Declaratory Act, another of Great Britain's measures of unwisdom, was made the means of carrying on the controversy, whose entire character was now transformed from one in which economic and political elements played an equal part to one having almost exclusively a political basis. Complaint respecting the effects and workings of any of the subsequent British acts, is never again based on grounds that may be regarded as primarily economic. The only economic phase of the subsequent controversy is found when non-importation agreements are entered into, with the view to oppressing British merchants engaged in colonial commerce to such an extent as to induce them to espouse the cause of the colonists, and make them work to have the obnoxious acts repealed to save themselves from ruin.

¹The proceedings of the Stamp Act Congress are to be found in Niles' Principles and Acts of the Revolution, 1822, 451 et seq.

²The text of the act can be found most conveniently in MacDonald's Select Charters Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775, 316.

The repressive measures of Hillsborough of 1768, and the retention of the duty on tea in April, 1770, when the other Townshend taxes of 1767¹ were repealed, are of a piece with the Declaratory Act in their effect in emphasizing the transformation of the character of the dispute. The tea duty was retained for the same reason that prompted the passage of the Declaratory Act—to maintain the principle of parliamentary authority—and was but another in the long list of deeds of unwisdom of the British government. By repealing the other duties Parliament yielded to popular clamor, as in the repeal of the Stamp Act, but retained an obnoxious measure that was to prove a fruitful source of further irritation. A partial repeal, with the retention of one duty designed for a purpose only too well known in America, was folly worse confounded, and showed that there was no real conception in England of the earnestness and determination of the Americans, nor of the nature of the independent development of political institutions produced by a century of experience. The events that had transpired in the five years succeeding the passage of the Stamp Act were productive of great results, so that by 1770 the controversy had been pushed to the point from which must issue either complete submission of the colonies to England, or else independence.

¹The nature and effect of these several acts are described in chapters X and XI.

In Great Britain at the end of the hundred years subsequent to the Puritan Revolution, the reaction had reproduced a virtual kingly autocracy, though within certain legal and constitutional bounds. By force of his dominating personality, the King, though nominally guided by his ministers, had made himself the directing head of the nation's affairs, and practically controlled his cabinet and Parliament as he saw fit. In America, where the structure of society was far simpler, there had been no such reaction. On the contrary, there had been a constant development along the democratic lines made familiar by the popular uprisings under Cromwell. In consequence the political ideas of Locke passed current not alone in the Puritan colonies of New England, but were received at their face value in the other colonies which at their foundation had nothing in common with the Puritan ideals. By reason of the extent to which the colonists participated in their political affairs throughout the colonies, the laxity with which parliamentary enactments were enforced, and the leniency shown by the crown, a complete administrative machinery of their own was developed in many respects far in advance of anything of a similar nature existing in Great Britain. In other words they had brought over with them a perfect familiarity with British constitutional and administrative forms, which, owing to the more democratic nature of the conditions under which they lived, produced a body politic in which practically every property owner had a stake. Out of this was evolved an attachment for their own methods, as strong as that of any parent for its child.

The questions at issue previous to 1763 had been argued with the crown, either directly or through the royal governors, often with great earnestness, though only on occasion with a show of heat. But with the change in the nature of the dispute from one between King and colonies, in which the points of disagreement were localised, were peculiar to each colony, and did not permit of any united opposition, to one between Parliament and colonies, in which, among others, the principle of taxation was at issue, affecting all alike, the natural passions were aroused that are ordinarily engendered when the attempt is made by an outsider to appropriate and convert to his own use what one believes to be his own property, the fruit of his toil. Their point of view was admirably stated by Burke when he said "a great people who have their property, without any reserve, disposed of by another people at an immense distance from them, will not think themselves in the enjoyment of liberty."¹ That taxation without representation was tyranny, and nothing less, became the doctrine universally held. It was repeatedly reiterated that, by the nature of their location, they had and could have representation only in their assemblies, by which alone they would therefore consent to be taxed.² As one man they flung back and would have none of the British idea of virtual representation, which was that the colonies were not less represented than the people of Great Britain, five-sixths of whom had no share in the election of members of Parliament, by reason of the corrupt and inefficient British system. That a member of Parliament was as much a member for the whole empire as for the constituency which sent him, was the theory held as largely then as now. But it did not appeal to the colonists, grown accustomed to the benefits of actual representation.

¹ Speech on "State of the Nation," Works II, 170.

² It is true that Otis in his pamphlet The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted, 1764, advocated colonial representation in Parliament, but this idea did not attain to gen-

The unanimity of the acceptance of the idea of the interrelation of representation and taxation, as also the wide extent of the belief in the theories that man was born with certain natural, inalienable rights, and that government derived its origin from a compact for mutual protection, was due to the remarkable series of disquisitions on the rights of the colonies, the nature and extent of these rights, and the constitutional limitations to parliamentary control, which the five years of discussion had produced. Every man who was ready with the pen,—and the number of these indicated an unusual diffusion of skill in political debate,—contributed his share, though the productions of men like James Otis, eral adoption. In the Declaration of Rights of 1774 it was specifically stated as the colonial contention that the colonies could be represented only in the colonial legislatures. See Declaration of Rights, article 4.

Samuel and John Adams, Richard Bland, Daniel Dulany, John Dickinson, and Stephen Hopkins, stand out in especial prominence. Without going into an examination of the merits of their arguments, it suffices to draw attention to the fact that they served to familiarize the public, in the widest possible degree, with a reasonable theory of the origins of government, and of the constitutional relations between the colonies and Great Britain. They made every freeholder believe and maintain that he possessed certain rights and privileges which were far too sacred to permit of being infringed by any acts of King or Parliament, and for which it was his duty to contend, with all the power that in him lay. The men who wrote these often stirring pamphlets were the same who in legislative assemblies embodied their thoughts in the form of resolutions and memorials, and thus gave them not only the widest circulation, but a semi-legal character as well, making them the acts of the people. There were able counterblasts, too, notably from the well-attuned trumpet of Jonathan Boucher, proclaimer of the sacred rights of kings and government. But they were not sufficiently harmonious in these preliminary stages to make any strong impression. Not until the later point was reached of the practical denial of parliamentary authority, dating from 1774, does this opposition become in any way important.

In fact, one of the most striking elements in the preliminary stages of the revolution, is the extraordinary unanimity of opinion as to the existence of rights and of serious infringements of them prevailing throughout the colonies.

Not much more was required, therefore, to make the parties at issue fall farther and farther apart. Nor was there a question as to whether the colonies or the home government had the greater weight of authoritative legal opinion on its side. It has come to be admitted that the preponderance of constitutional law was with those favoring the parliamentary contention, and that both English political parties were at one in their belief in the legality of parliamentary dominance over the colonies as embodied in the Declaratory Act, whatever may have been their differences on other points. No one had firmer faith in this doctrine than Pitt himself, the idol of America, under whose ministry the Act was passed. The extent of administrative development in America through the legislative assemblies, and the firmness of the faith that full justification for the colonists' attitude was found in the current interpretation of the origin and ends of government, should not have been overlooked by the British statesmen. That there was a power above the constitution from which rights were derived, was an idea as generally diffused as that Americans were free-born English subjects and entitled to all their rights and privileges. In contests over the interpretation of constitutional and political theories, the question is ultimately decided not by the weight of legal precedents, but by the sacrifices which the parties at issue are willing to make when points of difference prove irreconcilable. In fundamentals, as has been well said, all constitutional questions are "questions of power, and not of law."¹ The theories of America and England were so much at variance by this time that nothing short of absolute submission of the one or the other could bring about a peaceful solution. That the latter was not to result, the events of the four years succeeding 1770 made inevitable. Clashes between soldiery and populace were succeeded by repeated acts of violence in resistance to authority in which the military arm played little or no part. A spirit of lawlessness, so far as the enforcement of British acts was concerned, was manifested side by side with the most perfect respect for legislative acts of the colonists' own creation.

In the meantime, as assemblies were being prorogued throughout the colonies, and as this administrative machinery was in danger of breaking down, recourse was had to a new expedient for political control, the Committees of Correspondence. At first appointed by the assemblies, they gradually came into existence almost everywhere by original authority of the people, and their variety of forms made necessary by difference of conditions, is a striking witness to the wide diffusion of, familiarity with, and capacity for political organization.¹ They served to keep the colonists in touch with each other, by extending their activities even beyond the bounds of the individual colonies. They thus performed the function of an intercolonial clearing house, through which the inhabitants of one colony were made familiar with the occurrences taking place in another. When, therefore, Great Britain in 1774 began her policy of attempting to coerce the colonies into submission, it was too late to meet with success, for an effective instrument for resistance had been developed as the result of the previous ten years of discussion. Moreover, as was ultimately proved, the colonists were willing to sacrifice their all for the maintenance of the principles which they firmly believed were involved. Familiarity with the uses to which their extra-legal committee organizations could be put, for purposes of colonial and intercolonial communication, made it natural that still greater reliance should be placed upon them when the question of convening a continental congress for mutual support was before them. Thus it happened, that of the twelve colonies sending delegates to the Congress but five acted through their assemblies, though three¹ of these were so completely in control of the revolutionists as scarcely to be of significance in this connection. All of the remaining delegations were chosen by some form of committee organization.

¹ Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, Horæ Sabbaticæ, III, 120.

¹ On Committees of Correspondence and their significance, see the able treatment which they receive at the hand of Dr. Edward D. Collins, in Rep't American Hist. Assn., 1901, I, 243.

The Congress which convened at Carpenter's Hall in Philadelphia, on September 5, 1774, had, therefore, a much more popular basis than any Congress heretofore called together. And whereas recourse was had in the past to the various committees of correspondence for purposes of united action, under the more difficult and complex conditions that had arisen, their place was now to be taken by this new engine of political organization. The Congress and the local committees bore to each other relations of interdependence: the committees created the Congress, and the Congress in turn looked to the committees to enforce its recommendations. The voice that the committees had in calling the Congress into being, thereby giving it a popular character, spoke out even to the extent of outlining the work that it was to undertake.

In their instructions, either to delegates directly, or to committees that were to have a share in the election of delegates, the people gave expression to their desires in not uncertain tones. The credentials which the delegates bore to this first Continental Congress were in the main of the same character. They were authorized in general to devise measures that would extricate the colonies from the difficulties with which they were beset, to state the rights and privileges to which on constitutional grounds they were entitled, and to endeavor to restore harmony, mutual confidence, and union.¹ Behind these credentials, however, and of a much more specific character, were the instructions issued to the delegates by their constituent bodies. Three days after the Boston Port Bill reached that town her citizens gave expression to their view that the salvation of North America depended on the other colonies coming to a general agreement to stop all importation.² It was on this hint that the colonies spoke for a general Congress. At the same time, the suggestion of obtaining redress by the adoption of commercial restrictions was taken up by no less than six of the colonies. Definitive resolutions were passed in Maryland,³ Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, and North Carolina, authorizing their representatives to enter into non-importation and non-exportation agreements if the representatives of the other colonies were of the same mind. South Carolina alone had considered the matter and voted it down, substituting general instructions, and proved later on the stumbling block over which the Congress came near falling.¹ Maryland and Virginia went even further and embodied their views respecting commercial aggression, in the credentials to their delegates, while New Jersey and Delaware pledged themselves in advance to support the Congress in whatever action it might take in addition to these measures.

¹ Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Massachusetts.

¹ The credentials are to be found in Journal of Congress for 1774.

² May 13, 1774, Force, 4th, I, 331.

³ Maryland's resolutions were passed June 22, 1774, Force, 4th, I, 439; Pennsylvania's on July 15, ibid., 555; New Jersey's July 21, ibid., 624; Delaware's August 2, ibid., 668; Virginia's

Thus the Congress before it met was committed to issuing a statement of the rights and grievances of the colonists and to the adoption of the only powerful and efficient means at hand to effect the repeal of the obnoxious acts—a non-importation and non-exportation agreement. It was generally appreciated that their objects could not be attained without some form of central organization which should extend beyond any hitherto known. The Congress, therefore, was the natural advance from August 1-6, ibid., 689; North Carolina's August 27, ibid., 689. In Rhode Island especially, the town meetings expressed similar views, as was the case in many instances elsewhere.

¹ See John Adams' Diary, Works, II, 382 et seq., 393 et seq.; McCrady, South Carolina under Royal Gov't., 762 et seq.

the committee organizations, and served as the expression of the popular desire for united action and for the creation of a policy on which such action might be based.

The Congress in turn showed its appreciation of the fact that it was the creature of the popular will and dependent on it for the success of its resolves by three acts of striking significance. The first was the unanimous and immediate endorsement of the resolutions of the Suffolk County Committee, recommending "a perseverance in the same firm and temperate conduct as expressed in the resolutions."¹ Firm they undoubtedly were, but a perusal will disclose that "temperate" is scarcely the other adjective by which they should, in truth, be described.² The pledge of Suffolk County, to support whatever the Congress determined on, went a long way toward influencing it in taking this radical action. Their assurance was the first information of this nature officially conveyed, as the resolutions of the Congress thereon were the first public expression of the fact that the colonies would support each other and stand as one man in the contest. By the endorsement of these resolutions the Congress gave the sanction of its authority to the most recent American view respecting the constitutional relations of Parliament and the colonies, that of no legislation without representation. From this to war for independence was inevitably but a short step.

¹ Journal of Congress, September 17, 1774.

² The Suffolk Resolutions are to be found in the Journal of Congress, September 17, 1774.

Secondly, came the letter to General Gage¹ demanding the cessation of activity on the part of his troops, in which the Congress proclaims that its members are "appointed the guardians" of the rights and liberties of the colonies. And, lastly, we have the clauses of the Articles of Association, (practically an ordinance of nullification, and the expression of the previously announced popular desire), by which enforcement of its provisions was to be ensured, and which mark a still further development in government by committee. These Articles as finally adopted and signed on October 20, prohibited the importation of British products after December 1, 1774, as also of certain enumerated commodities from the West Indies, and of East India tea no matter whence derived; nor were any slaves to be brought in after that date nor the trade in them continued. No tea was to be used or purchased on which any duty had been paid, and none whatever after the first of March, 1775. After September 10, 1775, unless all the acts complained of had been repealed in the interval, no commodities, excepting "rice to Europe," were to be exported to Great Britain, Ireland, or the West Indies. Committees were to be chosen in every county, city, and town, by those qualified to vote for representatives in the legislature. Their business was to see that the Association was not violated, and that violators of it should be practically boycotted. The Committees of Correspondence, further, were given plenary instructions to examine entries at the custom houses to obtain evidence of the violation of the Association. In addition to the Articles of Association, this Congress adopted a Declaration of Rights, a petition to the King, and issued addresses to the people of Great Britain, to the inhabitants of the colonies, and a special one to those of Quebec.

¹ October 11, 1774.

Among the very earliest of the important acts of the first Congress was the decision, reached only after much discussion, to limit any statement of rights to such "as have been infringed by acts of the British parliament since the year 1763, postponing the further consideration of the general state of American rights to a future day."¹ This is self-explanatory and gave a definitiveness to the controversy that would not otherwise have been obtained.

To frame a declaration of rights was one of the principal duties of this Congress, thereby to fix a common ground upon which all could stand. But at the outset a stumbling block was met with, when consideration was given to the extent to which the authority of Parliament was to be recognized in this declaration. Upon this point there was wide divergence of opinion, and various propositions were advanced. Some proposed drawing the distinction between internal and external taxation, some advocated the denial of the applicability to the colonies of any statute wherein taxation was intended, and some even the disavowal of any parliamentary authority whatever. Finally John Adams came forward with his equivocal compromise proposition. In this, while claiming the exclusive power to legislate in their own representative assemblies upon all matters of taxation and internal polity, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, the willingness was expressed, from the necessity of the case and for the purpose of "securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country," to consent to the operation of all laws regulating commerce with other countries, "excluding every idea of taxation, internal or external, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America without their consent."¹ This forms the fourth of the rights embodied in this declaration, and with the sixth is the only one which did not meet with unanimous approval. The preamble of the Declaration of Rights, as passed on October 14, contains a summary of all the acts of Parliament passed "since the close of the last war" which are viewed as infringing rights, and enacted with a view to subjecting the colonists to a jurisdiction and control which they cannot recognize. Added to this their assemblies have been frequently dissolved, and their "dutiful, humble, loyal, and reasonable" petitions treated with contempt. In consequence, they, the duly appointed, elected, and constituted representatives of the colonies have come together "in order to obtain such establishment, as that their religion, laws and liberties may not be subverted." Following comes an enumeration of the rights and privileges to which, "by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters and compacts," they are entitled. These are (1) the right to life, liberty and property; (2) the rights, liberties and immunities of natural born Englishmen, (3) none of which was lost by emigration; (4) representation in their own legislatures and taxation by them only; (5) enjoyment of the benefits of the common law of England, trial by jury, and (6) the English statutes in existence at the time of colonization and applicable to their condition; (7) the immunities and privileges granted in the charters and secured by the codes of provincial laws; (8) the right to assemble, to consider grievances, and to petition; (9) that it is against law to keep a standing army in the colonies in time of peace; (10) and that it is destructive of the freedom of America for legislative power to be exercised by a council appointed to hold office during pleasure of the crown. An enumeration of the thirteen specific laws in which these rights and privileges are infringed follows, with the demand for their repeal if harmony is to be restored. Submission to them is declared out of the question, and to ensure their repeal an agreement for non-impotation, non-consumption and non-exportation is to be entered into, and addresses to the people of Great Britain and America, as also a loyal petition to the King to be prepared.

¹ Journal of Congress, September 24; John Adams, Works, I, 160; II, 370 et seq.

¹ John Adams, Works, II, 397; Journal of Congress.

The place of the address to Parliament of the Stamp Act Congress, was now taken by the address to the people of Great Britain, (the work of John Jay), and illustrates the point adverted to before respecting the development of the controversy. What aim it was hoped to further by this address is not quite clear, for the addressors were as familiar as we now are with the little influence the people at large had upon England's politics. But it was thought well to cherish the fiction that the people were responsible for the character of the Parliament they supposedly elected, as the assemblies represented the people of the colonies. And they were, therefore, appealed to in the hope "that the magnanimity and justice of the British nation will furnish a parliament of such wisdom, independence, and public spirit, as may save the violated rights of the whole empire, from the devices of wicked ministers and evil counsellors, whether in or out of office; and thereby restore that harmony, friendship, and fraternal affection, between all the inhabitants of His Majesty's kingdoms and territories so ardently wished for, by every true and honest American."

The address to the people of the colonies, the handiwork of Richard Henry Lee, served as an explanation and justification of the proceedings of the Congress, and is a remarkably calm and well-written recital of rights and grievances and of the proposals for redress. The humble though firm petition to the King, bearing the impress of Dickinson's able mind, was an admirably conceived document, and might have impressed a more obstinate king had he been open to reason. The address to the people of Quebec was an attempt to draw them into the controversy, but had no better success than the more energetic measures of the spring of 1776.¹

Naturally, the revolutionary measures that had been adopted met with the disapproval of large numbers of people, who now voiced their dissenting

¹ See pp. 83-84.

views in the public prints. They saw that if persisted in, civil war would be the end, and while they were willing to follow the leaders to the verge of the precipice, they stopped in horror at the sight of the chaotic abyss beyond. An opposition party now sprang into existence, destined to have a serious influence upon the conduct of affairs within as well as without the Congress.

Spirited and outspoken as were the resolutions of the Congress of 1774 in stating their demands, there is no sign among them all that can rightly be interpreted as indicating a wish for the establishment, even remotely, of an independent government. Nor could there have been. For the instructions to the delegates, and their credentials as well, were practically unanimous in expressing the desire that such measures as were passed, should be not less in the interest of the restoration of harmony and union than for the redress of grievances.

It is questionable, also, whether such avowed radicals as John and Samuel Adams, Jefferson, and Patrick Henry, would have advocated independence in earnest at this time, had the opportunity been favorable. To speak loosely as they did, to the effect that if matters did not take a turn for the better, independence was the inevitable outcome, was far different from establishing a definite concerted plan having that aim in view. They were too skilled as politicians to be the upholders of a policy that would have damned at the outset the cause into which they had thrown themselves body and soul. Many months had to pass, and many irritating events occur during the year following the adjournment of the Congress of 1774, before we find the tide changing, and the country drifting at first, and then guided skillfully, into the swift current of independence.¹

Having performed the functions for which it was called into being, the Congress dissolved on October 26, to meet again, if occasion required, in May of the following year.

¹ See in this connection Sparks' Washington, II, Appendix X, and Winsor, Narrative and Critical History, VI, 248-251, 255.

CHAPTER II

THE CONGRESS FINDING ITSELF

Practically the same men who had separated in October of the previous year, and representing the same politically organized bodies, found themselves once more entrusted with the affairs of America, when they reconvened at Philadelphia on May 10, 1775. They had used the interval to good purpose, and throughout the colonies had been instrumental in having the acts of the previous Congress supported by resolutions of assemblies, conventions, and committees. So that they were reassured, if any reassurance were needed, that so far as they had gone, they had properly given expression to the desires of their electors. But they were now face to face with new and far different problems. By the accident of circumstance, the clash at arms at Lexington and Concord, duties and responsibilities were thrust upon them that none had given thought to a few months before. And in undertaking these new activities, the Congress had no precedent to guide it, nor any instructions even from its constituents to follow as before. It was, therefore, free and untrammled so long as it kept within the bounds of popular support.

All the country was drifting about hopelessly, looking for some pilot to show the way. For now that the controversy had been pushed to the breaking point, real parties were forming. Many who were willing to follow so long as peaceful measures alone were resorted to, became hearty conservatives as soon as they saw civil war imminent. Others, seeing the consequences of the denial of parliamentary authority staring them in the face, had not made up their minds which side to join. These two groups formed probably a majority of the inhabitants, and in some districts of New York and Pennsylvania were greatly in preponderance. But their influence was weakened since they lacked not only an organization, but seemingly, even the power to organize,¹ though they were not backward in keeping their pens busy writing pamphlets and taking active part in the heated discussions in the gazettes. Consequently the well-organized revolutionary party, represented for America at large by the Congress, controlled affairs. The Congress, therefore, was compelled to assume the directing hand and provide the rule of conduct, the more so as the revolutionary organizations, in colony after colony, were looking to it for advice and direction, especially in all that concerned military affairs. This dependence on the Congress and the authority it derived therefrom, carried with them a gradual development of a spirit of subordination to its will, on the part of those controlling the revolutionary movement. The Congress thus grew, from an impotent body with vague powers designed at first to prepare petitions and addresses, into one having practically complete control of the affairs of a people engaged in a war of revolution, with all that such control implies. Though this evolution is the most important civil and political phenomenon of the period, it was a perfectly natural development, since the leading spirits and ablest men were in Philadelphia, and they saw to it that the new power assumed its authority with caution and wielded it with skill.

¹ See Van Tyne, Loyalists in Am. Revolution, 85, 87.

For the understanding of the events of the next year it is all-important that the growth of the power and authority of the Congress, the manner of their exercise, and the method of enforcing its decisions upon points of policy, be clearly held in mind. Actually the creature of the colonies, representing the united sentiment of them all, the Congress was much stronger than any one colony. It stood for union and was, therefore, compelled to pursue every measure looking to the tightening of the chains. By so doing and by frowning upon every individual action that might lead to disunion and consequent weakening of its own powers, it succeeded in ever strengthening itself. So that by the time it reached its highest point of authority (July 4, 1776) we have unfolded before us the phenomenon of a politically organized body, the creature of individual political organizations, deriving all its strength and sanction from them, dependent for its existence upon their good will, yet with no limits to its authority other than those of the reason and good sense of its members. Gradually it procured so much power as to be able to dictate to the colonies how to shape their own administrative organizations, and finally was able to advance to the extreme point of declaring them independent of the government that had always controlled them. The successful manner in which this was consummated is demonstrated by the support given to its acts throughout the colonies. In all this the Congress relied on and fostered the democratic elements of which, in large measure, it was the revolutionary outcome. Without so doing the revolution would never have attained so much of success as it did before outside aid was called upon. It suited the purposes of those who fostered the revolution to emphasize the natural rights to which they believed themselves entitled. This very emphasis aroused the minds of "the multitude," (as it was generally termed) to a knowledge that they too had rights which had been denied them hitherto,—that by the restrictions upon the franchise, upon representation, and by other means, they had been deprived of participation in the government. It required many years of agitation before they finally came into full possession of their own, but the beginnings were made now. The Congress saw plainly that if it was to rely on the democracy to fight its battles in the field, the democracy must be shown certain favors in return. Only the first moves had been made toward the creation of a continental army, when the Congress pronounced as its policy this reliance on the people for support. In its most definite form it was embodied in the advice given, in November and December, 1775, to the colonies of New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Virginia, respecting the creation of new forms of government. In each instance the Congress recommends the calling of "a full and free representation of the people,"¹ to establish the form of government by which they are to be controlled. This is far different in character from the earlier advice given to Massachusetts,² when she was simply told to nullify the act abrogating her charter, and to organize government on the old familiar lines "until a governor, of his Majesty's appointment, will consent to govern the colony according to its charter." The Congress could take the more advanced attitude in the later instances because it had the experience of nearly five months to aid it in outlining a policy, and because it regarded itself as the chosen agency of the people, with authority derived from them "according to the purest maxims of representation."¹

¹ Journal of Congress, November 3, 5, December 4, 1775.

² June 9, 1775, ibid.

Moreover, with each enlargement of the powers of the Congress, the common aim of a firm union was more nearly consummated. Every increase of the continental army, every act enforcing the Association or regulating trade, every issue of bills of credit, every means toward getting into relations with a foreign power, in short, every one of the countless instances by which it extended its own authority and made it more complex, by so much increased the necessity that this should be done in such manner as would be supported throughout the colonies, and consequently strengthen the union. The political acumen required was of a high order, in that it was necessary not alone to conduct the Congress so as not to get too far ahead of popular opinion, but to keep a guiding hand on the course of events in the colonies as well. This was done through correspondence between the delegates and their constituents, by resolutions of the Congress, and, when the occasion demanded, by personal visits of the members of the Congress.²

¹ Declaration of Congress, December 6, 1775, Journal.

² Notably in the case of sending a committee to New Jersey on December 4, 1775. See below, pp. 45-46.

The union sentiment was greatly fostered by one principle in the conduct of affairs which the Congress followed out with consistent purpose to the end. This was never to perform an act of consequence, nor issue a document designed to influence the popular mind, without stating the causes for it. Statements were invariably so framed as to put the acts of Great Britain always in the wrong, and to make it appear plausible that the course pursued by the Congress was rendered necessary by specified instances of British aggression, coercion, or infringement of what were believed to be undoubted rights, and was the only one possible under the circumstances. Naturally the British side gained nothing by the manner in which it was stated by the Congress. Amid all the vacillation that characterized the earliest period of the activity of the Congress, that is, until the beginning of 1776 (often caused by the very necessity of yielding a little here and a little there, to unite the wishes of individuals and localities in order that the larger movement might not be stayed), this is one point of policy that was carried through with absolute consistency. Consequently, if we search deeply enough, the causal origin of every important resolution or series of resolutions affecting the continental concerns may be found in some previous British action. By carrying out this deep-laid design, confidence was inspired in the minds of the supporters of the Congress, and they were made to believe in its ability and rectitude.

Inseparable from the growth of the authority of the Congress and the resultant strengthening of the union, was the advance toward independence. Before November, 1775, though many acts had been committed that assisted in making the separation inevitable, the Congress can hardly be considered as working consciously to bring about that end. There was too great a want of uniformity of design in its acts, too much of profession of loyalty to Great Britain and denial of any planning for independence, side by side with the passage of resolutions that appear now as having no other possible ultimate conclusion. But this was due to the large conservative element in the Congress, which held the small radical minority strongly in check and forced through concessions. The period between May 10 and November 1, 1775, was one, therefore, which taxed the ingenuity of the members of the Congress to the utmost. For they had to steer a middle course between the desires of the small, aggressive, minority body of radicals on the one side, and those of the large number of conservatives on the other. If they yielded to the former they were in danger of dashing to pieces on the rocks of civil war, if to the latter they might be stranded on the shoals of indecision. There is, therefore, at this time no evidence of a conscious determination to achieve independence, though many acts were adopted—notably those relating to military affairs—which led inevitably in that direction. The conservatives insisted on sending another petition, in spite of the failure of the first. This was a wise move, though the full wisdom of it was not seen even by many of its promoters and opponents. If the conservatives could, at the price of agreeing to send another petition, be got to acquiesce in all the other measures of the Congress, many of them warlike in the extreme and casting reflection upon all their professions of loyalty and allegiance to the crown, the cost was not too great to pay. If the petition failed, as the radicals all believed it must, and was therefore useless, it was good policy none the less; for it put the Congress in position to say that it had left no stone unturned to bring about a peaceful solution of the controversy, and that no other course was open except war, for every overture had been rejected. With the rejection of the petition in hand the Congress was far stronger before the country than if none had been sent and no opportunity for rejection given.

✓ Having agreed to send the petition,¹ whatever else was done, a due and proper period had to be given for answer to be made. During the four months that elapsed before the reply was received, a waiting policy had to be pursued, and the conservatives saw to it that no act out of keeping with this policy was committed. But this did not prevent the Congress from fostering the union sentiment in every way possible. The most important opportunity for doing this arose out of the indecision of the colonies as to the course to pursue respecting Lord North's plan of conciliation and concession.¹ Three colonies² had transmitted the plan to the Congress with the request for directions as to their conduct respecting it, while the remainder waited, before taking any action, to hear what the Congress would advise. The reply of the Congress, the last important act before taking a recess during the month of September, was an unequivocal rejection, and, though it contained no new thought, was a forcible statement in denunciation of submission to parliamentary taxation and parliamentary legislation. The latter point was now carried to its farthest extreme, and by implication, England's right even to control the commerce of the colonies upon the terms stated by the first Congress, and repeated in the address to the inhabitants of Great Britain, agreed to on the same day as the petition to the

¹ July 8, 1775.

¹ February 20-27, 1775. Lord North's motion is to be found in Journal of Congress, July 31, 1775.

² New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

King, was renounced.¹ No colony gave the resolution further consideration so that this attempt to break up the union had no other result than to strengthen it.

The adjournment for the month of August served the double purpose of enabling the members to return among their constituents, and so keep in touch with them, and of consuming time while waiting for the reply to the petition to arrive. When they reconvened in September² no answer had yet come, and the policy, therefore, had still to be a waiting one. The next six weeks are mainly devoted to a consideration of the commerce and trade of the colonies, and to military affairs, which still have a defensive cast. The non-exportation part of the Association went into effect on September 10. Appeals to the Congress from various quarters necessitated some interpretation of its provisions.³ No colony would act on its own responsibility. On no other point, except in directing military affairs, was there such general acquiescence in allowing the Congress a full and free hand. There was need, too, that the Congress should express its opinion of the Restraining Acts¹ of March and April, since four colonies² were favored as against the rest, and if they took advantage of their exception, they could break up the union. Though no disposition to do so was shown, this was a matter of continental concern and a word from the Congress was awaited. Some of the radicals would have had the ports opened to trade with the world at large.³ But as such a proposition meant virtual independence it found few followers. The debate had about run its course when the announcement was received, on the last day of October, that not only had the petition been given no consideration, but that on the very day when the King was to have received it, he had issued a proclamation declaring the colonists in rebellion. The first reply made by the Congress was issued the next day. All exportation without the permission or order of the Congress was to be stopped until the first of the following March; even the export of rice, allowed by the provisions of the Association to be shipped to Great Britain, was prohibited. Further, the four colonies exempted from the provisions of the Restraining Acts were told not to avail themselves of the benefits to be derived therefrom and were thanked for not having previously done so.¹

¹ July 8, 1775.

² September 5, 1775.

³ See Journal of Congress, September 15, 27, 1775; John Adams' Works, II, 451; Diary of Richard Smith, Am. Hist. Rev., I, 290, 292.

¹ The provisions of these acts are given in Chapter XI.

² New York, Delaware, North Carolina, and Georgia.

³ John Adams' Works, II, 451-484.

Dating from November first, we can discern the beginning of the conscious movement having independence as its aim. There was from that time no further talk of petitioning, but there were many expressions within the Congress and many more without that no other course was left, than either to work for independence, or to adopt the impossible alternative of absolute submission and renunciation of all that had been striven for during the past fourteen years. But in proceeding along the road toward independence as much caution and skill were required as previously had been shown in steering the middle course. It was necessary never to go a step further than popular opinion could be made to take, and on this account many concessions had to be made to the large body of conservatives within and without the Congress. In the latter, though their numbers from now on began to decrease, they still held the upper hand and continued to for months to come.

The policy of always putting Great Britain in the wrong and making the acts of the Congress appear as still defensive or retaliatory had to be continued. Though the Congress was unable to go forward with the rapidity that would have pleased the radicals, no backward step was taken. For the next month gave the opportunities for stirring up the democracy already adverted to,¹ which were eagerly seized upon as likely to aid the forward movement. The radicals were for going much further.² They would have taken advantage of the application of New Hampshire, for advice respecting establishing her government, to recommend a general abolition of the old forms. Fortunately for the success of the revolutionary movement they were not sufficiently strong to make their opinions prevail, for the Congress as a body saw that the ground was not yet prepared for it to act except when appealed to directly. But it was certainly due to the radicals, and probably as a concession to them, that the advice given during the months of November and December had so markedly a democratic character.

¹ Journal of Congress, November 1, 1775.

Even so much of progress caused a reaction in the colonies where the conservative spirit had the upper hand. The numerous radical expressions, favoring independence and the adoption of measures leading thereto, which now (November to December) began to appear in the public prints, caused the conservatives who still believed there might be some other way out, to attempt to frustrate the designs of the radicals. The Pennsylvania conservatives, with

¹ See pp. 33-35.

² John Adams' Works, III, 19, 20.

Dickinson at their head, were actively supporting the moderate attitude, all the more because of the sympathies with the democracy displayed by the Congress. The salvation of the conservative party in Pennsylvania depended upon keeping the people, "the multitude," from getting control of the government there. The old-line conservatives believed in all sincerity that if the people were allowed to come into power, nothing short of anarchy would be the outcome. Dickinson and his followers, controlling Pennsylvania politics, advocated united action by the colonies, and even fighting for their rights, but did not favor an aggressive policy. Great as was his interest in the affairs of the continent, they were to him secondary to the necessity for preserving the management of Pennsylvania politics in the hands of those who had always governed. So much of a desire for independence as was in existence in his colony at this time was confined, with a few exceptions, to the radicals, who had little share in political affairs. If they should acquire control, they would not only overturn the whole fabric of government, but, by sending representatives of their own views to the Congress, greatly strengthen the independence party. This was to be prevented at all hazards, and one means to this end was to issue new instructions to Pennsylvania's delegates in the Congress which would keep them from taking part in any of the schemes of the radicals, especially such as would change the existing form of the Pennsylvania government.¹ It was fully appreciated, too, that as Pennsylvania led, the other middle colonies where the conservatives were in control, would follow, so that within two months after Pennsylvania's² instructions against independence were passed, similar instructions were issued to their delegates by the governing organizations of New Jersey, New York, Delaware and Maryland. One element aiding in the establishment of this attitude, was the hope of the leaders in these colonies that despite the rejection of the petition and the King's proclamation of rebellion, some pressure might still be brought to bear on Parliament to reverse its position. Though the likelihood was not great that such a change of purpose would prevail, the conservatives were for giving a chance of embracing it to the new Parliament, that was to assemble in October.

But the Congress, compelled to listen to instructions against independence, would not sit idly by, if a colony brought up again the idea of sending a petition to the King. This was no time for further petitioning, and no such proposition had been made in the Congress since the last had proved so barren of results. Therefore, when New Jersey took up the matter, there was serious business. By force of circumstances it had been necessary to keep hands off when New York sent her petition some months back, and for her pains was rewarded by being exempted from the effects of the Restraining Acts. But now the face of things had changed and a solid front must be presented at all costs. A resolution was passed expressing the view that it would be "dangerous to the liberties and welfare of America, if any colony should separately petition the King or either house of parliament,"¹ and a committee was appointed to confer with New Jersey on the subject. Care was taken to put Dickinson, the author of the last petition of the Congress, at its head. His companions were Wythe and Jay, a radical and a conservative, and their efforts were so successful as to cause New Jersey to abandon all thought of sending a new petition. If New Jersey had not yielded so promptly to this gentle persuasion, there is no doubt that stronger measures, even to the employment of force, would have been resorted to to overthrow its government.²

¹ See Lincoln, Revolutionary Movement in Pennsylvania, Chap. XII; Reed's Life and Corr. of Joseph Reed, and Stillé's Dickinson.

² Pennsylvania's instructions were issued on November 9; New Jersey's, November 28; New York's on December 14, 1775, and Maryland's, January 11, 1776, though the committee to prepare the last was appointed on December 9, 1775.

¹ Journal of Congress, December 4, 1775.

² New Jersey Archives, 1st Series, X, 677-678, 689-691; Force, 4th, III, 1871-1874.

Almost a month had passed since the Congress had obtained official information of the failure of its petition, and no statement had been issued in reply. It was time, therefore, to speak out, the more so as Lord Howe had also published a proclamation prohibiting the people of Boston from leaving the town without permission. The answer to these was made on December 6, in a proclamation sent forth in the name of "the delegates of the thirteen United Colonies of North America," and the most defiant of all the documents so far emanating from the Congress. All allegiance to Parliament is specifically disavowed, even that to the King is brought into question somewhat in the argument. And in reply to that part of the King's proclamation announcing the punishment to be meted out to those caught aiding and abetting the rebellion, the Congress boldly announces that it will retaliate in kind and degree. All this is done "in the name of the people of the United Colonies, and by authority, according to the purest maxims of representation." No convention or committee is to intervene to aid in carrying out this threat, Congress itself assumes the burden and will bear it. This is the highest point of authority which the Congress had yet reached, but, since in the last resort military force would be invoked, it could thus speak out without exciting the jealousy of any colony.

The last two months of the year 1775 saw many acts committed by the Congress that occasioned an increase of its power, and at the same time strengthened the union and made for independence. The beginnings were made in three points of sovereign policy that ultimately had far reaching consequences. These were the initial attempts at suppressing the loyalist sympathizers; the first steps toward inviting foreign intervention; and those toward laying the foundations of a continental navy.¹ Along with these is to be noticed a far stiffer tone in military affairs, and less talk of acting only on the defensive, the while actions were belying professions. All these acts paved the way for the more vigorous policy that was to be ushered in with the New Year. After November there begins a gradual weakening of the power of the conservatives, and we see developing the conscious aim toward independence. The end of the waiting policy that had characterized the proceedings of the previous five months was at hand. For two months at least the advance is not rapid, but after that it gets full headway and goes forward with a rush that nothing can stop. Every act that can foster it is committed, and every opposition to it is borne down, by gentle means if possible, by force if necessary. By each step the authority of the ¹ The issuance of bills of credit may also be regarded as tending in this direction.

Congress is increased, the necessity for united action made more urgent, and the sentiment for declaring independence so aroused, that he who is not for it is made to appear as an enemy of his country.

CHAPTER III

THE IDEA OF INDEPENDENCE TAKES ROOT, AND THE CONGRESS PREVAILS

At the opening of the most notable year in American history, though the radical advocates of an independence policy had made much progress in perfecting the revolutionary organization, they had not succeeded in winning to their support any considerable numbers in the Congress. But a scant third of the thirty-five or forty men, controlling the political destinies of the colonies, were as yet open advocates of measures leading to a definitive break with the home government. So strong was the conservative spirit still prevailing that of them all one colony alone, Virginia, could at a roll call muster a majority of her delegates on the side of an avowal of independence.¹ The conservative majority, still favored a waiting policy, with military movements mainly of defensive character; a course rendered the more necessary by the failure of several colonies² to keep delegations in Congress sufficiently large to enable them to cast a vote. But the current began to set more strongly in the direction of independence as each day passed. The public prints throughout the colonies were beginning to contain, more and more, arguments favoring it, while in their private correspondence the leaders of thought, who were also prolific contributors to the gazettes, were more outspoken than they dared be in public. At the same time, there is discernible a constant increase in the power and authority of the Congress, made necessary by the more offensive character which the war gradually assumed, and the resultant change in the nature of the struggle. The Congress came to be accepted generally as the directing head of affairs, "the supreme superintending power,"¹ and each extension of jurisdiction was so skilfully managed as to meet with welcome as the logical outcome of events.

¹ See pp. 84-85.

² North Carolina and Georgia were not represented at this time, nor South Carolina for a brief period a little later on.

The time was ready for some event that would give impetus to the thought that independence was inevitable, and, by playing into the hands of the Congress, give the opportunity to direct affairs with the purpose of achieving independence in mind, to be carried through by the constant extension of its own authority. To the good fortune of the revolutionary movement, the uprising in America had led the King to call Parliament to meet on October 26, 1775, to consider the situation. In his brief speech on opening the session he left no doubt as to the force of his determination. The colonies were in rebellion, he declared, and were conspiring, in spite of their outspoken protests to the contrary, to establish an independent government. To prevent this all the resources of the British empire would be drawn on if necessary, and as a first step the army and navy had been increased. Also "most friendly offers of foreign assistance" had been received, and his Electoral troops had been sent to the garrisons of Gibraltar and Port Mahon, in order to free the British troops of these garrisons for service elsewhere. In closing he made reference to the intention to give power to agents on the spot, to grant pardons and to receive the submission of such provinces and colonies as were disposed to return to their allegiance.¹ Though rumors were current in America before the year 1775 was out, that a speech of this nature had been delivered by the King, the speech itself did not reach Boston until the fourth of January, and Philadelphia until three days later. On the eighth it was known by every man in the Congress, as also that large reinforcements to the British army had arrived, and that Norfolk had been destroyed by Lord Dunmore. On the next day Paine's Common Sense made its appearance.

¹ Rhode Island Col. Records, VII, 448-449.

¹ Force, 4th, VI, 1.

Such a favorable concurrence of historical accidents was of inestimable value to the radical side. The King's speech and the burning of Norfolk were welcomed as grist for their mill, for which Common Sense furnished the much needed propelling force. No arguments from the leaders were so convincing, as the sight of a substantial town in ashes, the news that the British redcoats would overrun the land, and that a British navy would invest it from the sea. But even these, in view of the King's proposal to send agents to America with power to act, might have failed to stir up the dissatisfied elements, if Common Sense had not made its appearance. It is no longer necessary to enter into details respecting its vast influence. All scholars are at one in giving this unusual pamphlet credit for a large share in the popularization of the newly arisen ideas of independence, and, in a measure, for shaping the whole movement. But its influence would not have been so great had it not been published at so opportune a time.

And the thought therefore arises, is it likely that such a pamphlet, which was a considerable time in preparation, and with whose author many of the men of the Congress were on terms of familiar relation, was sent out on its message at this precise time by grace of providential dispensation? We know well that the men who were controlling the revolutionary movement were far-seeing statesmen, many of them, unaccustomed and unwilling to trust vital affairs to the uncertain favors of fortune. They were naturally keen to take advantage of every means that might aid them, for their lives and fortunes were staked with their reputations. So far, on the part of the Congress in its official documents, there had been a distinct disavowal of any purposed striving for independence, though its acts were hardly always in keeping with its avowals. The conservatives, still in control, saw to it that no other policy was pursued. But in the aggressive minority, among whom Franklin was an active spirit, were those who were working to influence public opinion in the direction of independence, thereby aiming to react on the Congress itself. For it was perfectly understood that, though the Congress should be always kept a little ahead of the trend of the popular ideas, and outline the course of action, it must do this in so subtle a manner as never to appear actually to lead, merely to direct. Since the early part of November the more radical spirits had decided that independence was the goal to strive for. Particularly with the view of breaking up the old conservative party in Pennsylvania, it is altogether probable that Franklin, with the connivance of others of his way of thinking, made preparation to further their side of the cause by having a pamphlet written which could be used to counteract the effects of the King's speech, or any measures that Parliament might adopt, in the unlikely event that they would be conciliatory, and to fan the flame of discontent if they were of the character they proved to be. The date of the meeting of Parliament was well known in America, as also the fact that it took about two months for information to reach from the other side. Paine was accordingly employed, in the autumn of 1775, to write a pamphlet which might be issued at nearly the same time as the first news of the proceedings in Parliament was made known, and thereby aid those who were now the avowed advocates of an independence policy, and who still had the inertia of the conservatives to overcome. The preparation of Common Sense was conceived with deliberation, and for a definite object. It would have appeared about this time had there been no speech from the King. But the large measure of its success, was due to the careful foresight that caused its preparation for publication at the psychological moment best calculated to give it currency, and render it of most effect in shaping opinion.¹

Its appearance, too, was intimately associated with the contest going on in Pennsylvania, in whose

¹ For the details respecting the negotiations with Paine see Conway's Life of Paine.

affairs the Congress found opportunity to take ever greater and greater part. The radicals by reason of the share they were having in raising troops, were gaining largely in power though still unable to direct affairs. Franklin had allied himself with them, and was a powerful factor on their side. They were now making such rapid strides as to be held in check with ever increasing difficulty. Unquestionably, because of his desire to influence opinion in Pennsylvania in favor of the moderates, James Wilson, on the very day that Common Sense appeared, made his motion that the Congress issue an address in reply to the King's speech, wherein denial should be made that the colonies were aiming at independence, and should "declare to their constituents and the World their present intentions respecting an Independency."¹ His motion, though strongly supported, was under the rules postponed, and another day assigned for its consideration. When taken up again on the twenty-fourth, it was passed, and a conservative committee² was selected to prepare the address. And, as if wishing to make display of the ultimate futility of such procedure, its opponents were on the very same day sufficiently powerful to have a committee appointed to consider the equally important matter of the propriety of establishing a war office. Three weeks passed before Wilson was ready with his address, which Richard Smith describes as "very long, badly written, and full against Independency."¹

¹ Diary of Richard Smith, January 9, 1776, American Hist. Rev., I, No. 2, 307. For a lucid account of the complex political struggle in Pennsylvania, see Lincoln's The Revolutionary Movement in Pennsylvania.

² The committee consisted of Dickinson, Wilson, Hooper, Duane, and Alexander. The Address as reported is among the Papers of the Continental Congress, and is entirely in Wilson's handwriting. It has been printed in Am. Hist. Rev., I, 684-696.

But in these three weeks events had moved rapidly, and the Congress was now in no mood to listen to, much less adopt and issue such a document as expressing its attitude. The military measures made necessary by the fall of Quebec and the death of Montgomery; the general quickening of mind and act that they had brought about; the resolutions adopted to suppress Tories; the rumors that foreign troops were to be engaged by Great Britain for service in America; the constantly recurring arguments in the gazettes favoring independence, all combined to render it unlikely that the Congress would now stop to issue any pronouncement on the subject of independence, and least of all one putting it in opposition to a course which it was tacitly favoring on every possible occasion. But an element aiding in the defeat of Wilson's proposal that must not be ignored, was the arrival of two new delegations from New England, and of Chase of Maryland. Fresh from home they could tell of the spirit animating the people, and in their journeying to the Congress had the opportunity to get in touch with public sentiment from Boston to Baltimore. Sherman, Wolcott, and Huntington of Connecticut arrived on January 16, Chase about February 3, and John Adams and Gerry of Massachusetts on February 9. The last two together with Samuel Adams now formed a majority of the Massachusetts delegation, and could therefore completely control the vote of that colony. As the Connecticut delegates were not less ardently radical in their views than those of Massachusetts, together they had great weight in determining the course of events, both by argument and by the example of their vote, winning over a majority of the colonies. They opposed all measures that obstructed independence, and though as yet unable to dominate completely the actions of the Congress, they of course stood in the way of the adoption and issuance of Wilson's proposed address. Able support was received, too, from Franklin and Chase, who, though bound by instructions against voting for independence, worked to further every measure that might bring it about. As the result of their combined activities and exertions, the address, after its report to the Congress, is not heard of again. If the radicals could not force the Congress to advance, at least they could prevent any backward step from being taken. And the noticeable stiffening of the attitude of the Congress, which dates from this period, is in large measure due to the influence exerted by these two new delegations, whose persistency in turn brought about a gradual accession of numbers to their ranks. Both the Adamses were working strenuously also, without the doors of the Congress, to make converts to their views. Samuel Adams bent his energies upon arousing the democracy of Pennsylvania, and began to contribute arguments favoring independence to the Philadelphia newspapers. These were much needed, particularly in Philadelphia, where in spite of the presence of the Congress a strong conservative element still held predominance.

¹ Diary, February 13, 1776.

A further insight into the increasing strength of the more advanced party is obtained, from a view of the incidents happening about the same time and attending the oration delivered by the Reverend Doctor William Smith on the occasion of the public services, held by order of the Congress, in memory of the death of General Montgomery. Smith's oration, breathing throughout its length the spirit of loyalty and allegiance to the King, was little to the liking of the majority of the Congress who, while not seeing their way clear to announcing independence, listened with scant patience to a preaching about their duty as loyal subjects of King George. Accordingly, when a few days later William Livingston moved that a vote of thanks be extended to Doctor Smith with a request that he print his oration, it was objected to because the "Dr. declared the sentiments of the Congress to continue in a Dependency on Great Britain which Doctrine the Congress cannot now approve."¹ To every one approving Livingston's proposition two voices spoke against it, and so strong was the opposition, that foreseeing failure, he withdrew the motion. The main value of this occurrence lies in the light it throws upon the attitude of the Congress as a body toward independence. The leading speakers and writers were advocating the adoption of measures leading to it at every opportunity, and so unimportant an episode as the introduction of Livingston's motion, was not allowed to pass before Chase, John Adams, Wythe, Edward Rutledge, Wolcott, and Sherman had given expression to their views against it. The nature of the instructions of five colonies to their delegates, however, acted as an estoppel upon their assenting to any open avowal in favor of independence. Until they were withdrawn or revised, these delegations could not vote for any measure having independence as its object. But this did not prevent them as individuals from speaking and working for it, so long as they halted short of casting the vote of their colony contrary to instructions.

¹ Diary of Richard Smith, February 21, 1776.

In the six or seven weeks that intervened between the arrival of the King's speech and the two occasions on which the Congress uttered its opposition to taking any action that would stand in the way of ultimate independence, Common Sense was being disseminated throughout the land, ably supported by productions of lesser distinction, many taking their cue from it. The people were growing familiar gradually with the thought of an independent government, and the Congress, marvelously in touch with every phase of this development, kept pace with it. So that by the end of February, the question in the minds of many of those in the Congress who are still to be classed as conservatives, was not one of the advisability or inadvisability of independence, but of the means and measures by which it should be brought about; of the preparations that should be made in advance of its declaration, and above all of the readiness of the people for it. For without the support of the democracy the whole of the revolutionary organizations would collapse. These, it is true, were being strengthened with every increase in the continental army, but even the lengths which the Congress could go in adding to it, depended entirely upon the extent to which the populace would follow in enlisting for the armed struggle. The Congress had thus all the while to feel its way and, by keeping in careful touch with the people, to know how far it might advance.

Yet, notwithstanding the many arguments that had appeared favoring independence, and the almost equally frequent advocacy of opening the ports of the country to trade with the world, as a preliminary step, many still had misgivings, and until these were overcome any too radical action might compass the downfall of the whole movement. Combined with the natural disinclination from the overturn of a constitutional authority that had always been recognized in some form, and which, even the most radical admitted, conferred mutual advantages of no mean order, was that other deterring element, of aversion at the thought of the cost at which independence of England might be procured. Would not after all more be lost thereby than by continuing the attempt at obtaining the desired reforms within the empire? What guarantees could be offered that they would have more liberty under a new order than under the old? Would they ever be able to stand alone? Was there not danger, if they brought about a separation from England, that another power, France, the traditional enemy, might step in and take advantage of their weakness for her own aggrandizement? As has been well said, "so strong was the love for the old country, so great was the pride of being a part of the British dominion, and entitled to the glories of her history, that many shrank from an explicit recognition and declaration of the fact that the colonies were indeed independent States, no longer a part of their old country.”¹ Thoughts such as these coursed through the minds of many, giving them pause, and were as often the considerations blocking hasty action in Virginia and South Carolina, as in more conservative Pennsylvania and New York. Numbers were unwilling to take the final leap until they had carefully gone over the ground on which they would alight, and were assured that it was not sown with pitfalls.

The vague mention in the King’s speech, of his intention to send to America agents with indefinite power to accommodate the differences, and this too in despite of the not uncertain character of the remainder of the speech, fostered markedly this reluctant sentiment, both within and without the Congress. There was a very wide diffusion of the idea that all radical measures should halt until the opportunity was given to learn something definite about these “commissioners,” as they were very generally called.² The discerning Joseph Reed could not fail to wonder at the “strange reluctance in the minds of many to cut the knot." "Though no man of understanding expects any good from the commissioners, yet they are for waiting to hear their proposals before they declare off." This was particularly the case in Pennsylvania "and to the southward."¹

¹ McCrady, South Carolina in the Revolution, 175-176.

² Stevens’ Facsimiles, 890¹.

That a bill embracing the clause authorizing the appointment of such a commission was under consideration and likely to pass, was known in America in the early part of February. Some of the very persons active in perfecting the revolutionary organizations were influenced by the possibilities for reconciliation that might lie with these commissioners. Wordy discussions respecting their aims and their powers for good and evil, filled the gazettes during the months of March and April. One of the principal arguments hurled against waiting to hear the propositions that they might have to make, was that they would be similar to Lord North's conciliatory motion of the year before, designed merely to divide the colonies by playing off one against the other. The correspondence of every man of importance contains some reference to these expected agents of conciliation, and they are all in agreement upon their effect in blocking the independence movement. Washington had no patience with the thought of waiting for them and considered the idea as insulting as Lord North's motion.¹ Reed was more in fear of them than of the British generals and armies. He was fearful "if their propositions are plausible, and behaviour artful," that they would "divide us." "There is so much suspicion in Congress," he informed Washington, "and so much party on this subject, that very little more fuel is required to kindle the flame."² John Adams of course placed no store by them, "a messiah that will never come," and he "laughed, . . . scolded, . . . grieved and . . . rip'd" at the story of their coming, and stormed against what he termed "as arrant an illusion as ever was hatched in the brain of an enthusiast, a politician, or a maniac."³ The views of the more conservative members of the Congress are well expressed in a letter of Thomas Stone, of Maryland. "If the Commissioners do not arrive shortly and conduct themselves with great candor and uprightness," he wrote towards the end of April to Jenifer, "to effect a reconciliation, a separation will most undoubtedly take place." He wished "to conduct affairs so that a just & honorable reconciliation should take place, or that we should be pretty unanimous in a resolution to fight it out for Independence. . . ."⁴

¹ Reed's Reed, I, 163, March 3, 1776.

¹ Reed's Reed, I, 170.

² Ibid., I, 173.

³ Letters to his Wife, I, 98.

⁴ Journal and Corr. Md. Council of Safety, 383.

Anxiously on the lookout for any sign that might indicate a show of a conciliatory spirit on the part of Great Britain, all those not already committed to independence pinned their hopes to these commissioners. But as days and weeks went by and their arrival was delayed, and rumors about them still remained indefinite and conflicting, even those most sanguine in the expectation of the good they would accomplish gradually lost confidence, and listened to the persuasive oratory of those who placed no trust in either the commissioners or their mission. After the momentous month of March those who still had faith in commissioners were inconsiderable in numbers and devoid of influence. After the sixth of May,¹ until independence was already more than two months old, no attention was again given to them. And when they finally arrived and negotiations with them were begun, the unsatisfactory powers with which they were clothed, and the new spirit infused by the fact that independence had been declared, rendered the negotiations abortive.

But no one influence was of such effect in silencing those who still advocated further temporizing, and in convincing them that longer delay on the score of prospective commissioners was useless, as the information which reached America early in May, that Great Britain had actually engaged foreign mercenaries, then on their way over sea, to fight her battles in America.¹ Up till now there had been many vague rumors floating about respecting England's bid for Russians and Hessians and Hanoverians, but nothing specific had been learned. The thought that England would be forced to seek outside aid was of early origin,² and that application had been made to Russia with no success was known in America early in December. In January information more definite was obtained from the reference to offers of foreign assistance in the King's speech. And throughout the next three months the pamphleteers let pass no opportunity to harp upon this additional witness to England's cruel intentions. When, therefore, on May 10,³ unquestioned evidence was put before the eyes of the Congress that 12,000 Hessians were about to be sent on their way, nay, were even then at sea, the effect in vivifying the acts of the Congress was, in its intensity, unequaled by any occurrence since the arrival of the King's speech four months before.

¹ See Journal of Congress, May 6, 1776.

In order to preserve a continuity of narrative, it has been necessary to run a little ahead and pass

¹ The story of the British negotiations for foreign assistance has been often told; the details can be found in Bancroft, Chapters L and LVII.

² See Force, 4th, III, 819, 944, 1592.

³ Journal of Congress. Thos. Cushing's letter conveying the intelligence is to be found in Force, 4th, V, 1184.

by some affairs in which the constantly increasing authority of the Congress is displayed. Of these none is more important than the regulation of the colonial commercial relations. From the day that the Articles of Association went into effect, the Congress was the recognized interpreter for the continent in all affairs having to do with its foreign commerce. The view was general that this affair was the Congress's; that its importance to the welfare of America was such that no colony could act solely on its own responsibility; that all must conduct themselves in this respect in accordance with the rules laid down by the general body. Because of this the power and jurisdiction of the Congress were extended, and its influence came to be felt far and wide. Where so many were merchants and traders, when such numbers found the advance of their interests, even their means of existence, dependent upon a word from the Congress, that body found it could keep in close touch with the economic life of the continent, by the control of its trade. The influence, therefore, was reciprocal: the people, acting through the assemblies, the conventions, the committees of safety, looked to the Congress for direction; the Congress in turn gave this in accordance with the best light it had. And by a judicious permission granted now here, now there, to break its own rules, it did much to relieve the severity of the non-intercourse agreement and to establish itself, not as a mere autocratic dictator, but rather as the mild ruler acting for the good of all, upon consultation with all, and after careful consideration of all interests involved. When the day came finally for declaring the ports open to trade with all parts of the world,¹ the Congress with one stroke abolished one of the most potent means it had established for maintaining dominance in continental affairs. By that time there was no need to adopt measures designed merely to increase its power. It was strong enough to do practically anything it willed, short of declaring independence. And the energies of all the aggressive members were henceforth bent upon forcing through independence and creating a military organization that could support it when declared.

The ink was scarcely dry on the trade compromise of November first² when exceptions to its general provisions were found to be necessary, and during the next four months these increased with the pass of every day. But however much these infractions of its rules, made under the Congress's own authority, differed in character, they had all the same end in view: to procure arms, ammunition, and other much-needed warlike supplies.³ Throughout, the attitude of the Congress is far bolder than is assumed on other occasions, and a dictatorial tone is adopted repeatedly. Though it left the enforcement of its resolutions to the assemblies, conventions, and committees of safety, the Congress fixed the terms under which individuals might be permitted to export; the amount and character of the bonds to be entered and to whom to be given; the tonnage of the cargoes, and the destination of the vessels; the time and place of sailing, and the period within which, as evidence of good faith, return must be made to some friendly American port. Unless these stipulations were complied with in advance, no permits to trade were issued. And the Congress was careful to state, in several cases, that the permission was by reason of particular circumstances, and was not to be "drawn into precedent," thus leaving open the door for refusal when it deemed such action wise.¹

¹ April 6, 1776.

² See pp. 41-42.

³ Journal of Congress, November 22, December 11, 14, 1775.

But the time was approaching (March 1) when, unless some other action was taken, the ports under the terms of the Articles of Association would be opened, and trade with Great Britain might be resumed. The first two months of the new year saw consideration given to this knotty problem whenever the other multifarious questions which so engrossed the attention of the Congress allowed. Earnest and serious discussion of the question began in the middle of February. By that time the public prints were teeming with all manner of arguments favoring and opposing independence. And the reiterated advocacy of open ports and free trade with all parts of the world, now in conjunction with independence, again as a precedent to it, did much to reassure those in Congress who favored the most radical measures. It was well understood that open ports and independence were inseparably connected, but the conservatives were not yet ready for this step. For such action meant the nullification by act of the Congress of the various trade laws enacted by the Parliament of England.

¹ Journal of Congress, December 15, 1775, January 27, February 2, 1776.

Towards the end of February, it was seen that no conclusion could be reached before the first of March, and inasmuch as merchants in Philadelphia and elsewhere were preparing to make the most of their opportunities beginning with March first, recourse was had to another temporary expedient. On the twenty-sixth of February it was resolved that no vessel laden for Great Britain, Ireland, or the West Indies should be permitted to sail without further order of the Congress, and the committees of inspection and observation were called on to see to the enforcement of this resolution. The very next day Robert Morris came into the Congress bearing in his hand the "very long and cruel"¹ act prohibiting trade and intercourse with America, which had been signed by the King on December 22, 1775. This put a new face on affairs. The first reply was issued on the fourth of March, when the resolution of the twenty-sixth of February was rescinded, and trade with Great Britain and Ireland and the British West Indies was legalized, if engaged in for the purpose of procuring arms and ammunition.

These were the days, it will be remembered, when there was still much talk of commissioners and the good that might flow from them. But when the very act which made provision for their appointment was found to contain clauses which authorized the British officers and seamen to share in the prizes which they captured, and to seize and force to serve under the British flag all persons found on board these ships, a resentful desire to retaliate in kind took the place of the patient waiting upon the hoped-for chance of reconciliation with Great Britain. The next few weeks were big with events of the greatest importance to America. The radicals were growing more and more aggressive, and as each successive act was disclosed, showing the unconciliatory spirit of Great Britain, the conservatives had the ground more and more cut from under them.

¹ Diary of Richard Smith, Am. Hist. Rev., I, 506.

On the twenty-third of March the first real reply to the Prohibitory Act was made in the resolutions authorizing the equipment of privateers. Almost immediately the details providing how these resolutions were to be carried into effect were passed, the Congress in every particular demonstrating its authority over those who would take advantage of the privileges now allowed. Within a few days there was general exultation throughout the land over the evacuation of Boston, and almost equal dejection was occasioned by the news that foreign troops were being hired by England for service in America. The Congress, taking advantage of the general and widely diffused enthusiasm aroused by Washington's success, felt that the time had come when, without losing prestige among the people, it could adopt a measure that from the point of view of independence was the most important yet passed. Therefore, on April 6, the ports of the colonies were thrown open to trade to all parts of the world, except Great Britain. But in so doing the Congress also reserved the right to enact any commercial regulations that future necessity might require, re-enacted those parts of the Association not inconsistent with the new resolutions, made recommendations to the colonies as to the manner of enforcing these regulations, directed the seizure of all goods imported from British dominions, and prohibited absolutely the importation of slaves.¹ Thus was ended the contest that had been on for three months.

The extent of the power and authority which the Congress had acquired, is demonstrated by the passing and the general support accorded this act, whereby virtually one of the most powerful means for controlling general continental affairs was given up. Its jurisdiction in respect of trade had till now been maintained, and through it the Congress could influence colonial action and keep in touch with the condition of public thought throughout the country. But the question henceforth was not one of acquiring additional powers, but of forcing through a unanimous resolution of independence.

While this discussion over the issuance of some public announcement respecting trading with foreign countries was under consideration, the Congress was secretly planning to carry on such trade on its own account, intent upon procuring from abroad, notably from France, all manner of warlike supplies, though it veiled its intentions under the guise of procuring articles suitable for the Indians.²

As early as the nineteenth of February a contract had been entered into with Silas Deane to engage in an enterprise of this nature, to carry out which two hundred thousand dollars was put at the disposal of the committee having the matter in charge. From them Deane received his instructions upon the first of March. Within the next two days the Committee of Secret Correspondence gave him credentials to go to France "there to transact such Business, commercial and political as we have committed to his Care, in Behalf and by Authority of the Congress of the thirteen united Colonies," and provided him with elaborate instructions how to enter into negotiations with the French government.¹

¹ Journal of Congress, April 6, 1776.

² Deane Papers (N. Y. Hist. Soc.), I, 116; Journal of Congress, January 27, 1776.

If we examine the personnel of the committee having charge of the relations of the colonies with foreign countries, the Committee of Secret Correspondence as it was called, we discover one of the most interesting facts that a close study of any of the affairs of this period discloses. Of the five members composing the committee, three, Franklin, Dickinson, and Morris, were from Pennsylvania. Harrison was from Virginia, and Jay represented New York. Strangely enough, no New England member was added to the committee until many days after independence had been declared. Moreover, of this committee Franklin was the only openly avowed radical. Harrison, to say the least, had decided conservative proclivities, while Dickinson, Morris, and Jay were the most forceful leaders on the conservative side. They were the ardent opponents of every measure that appeared to have independence for its object, and until the restrictions which their respective colonies had placed upon their actions respecting independence, were removed, their voice and vote were always in opposition. And yet, in secret, they were willing to make themselves parties to a policy that had as its aim the nullification of British laws respecting the colonies, a policy that was more nearly allied to actual independence than anything previously undertaken by act of the Congress, and to do this a month in advance of the time when the Congress adopted the first of its most radical resolutions. This discloses their real attitude, therefore, not only to independence, but to the colonies which they represented. Moreover it demonstrates how necessary it was, before independence could be made an accomplished fact, to have the instructions against independence repealed. Perfectly willing to do secretly what they dared not do openly, the actions of these men have the appearance of inconsistency. But they become quite comprehensible when we bear in mind the local conditions which colored all their public acts.

¹ Deane Papers, 117-119, 123 et seq.

CHAPTER IV

THE CONGRESS AND THE DEMOCRACY

The Congress was the representative of the colonies, in a way having some of the attributes of our Senate. The members were elected, not directly by the people, but by what then corresponded to the legislatures of our day—the conventions or provincial congresses or assemblies. They were, therefore, under the control of these revolutionary political organizations and responsible to them. When, therefore, an election to the Congress was accepted, the delegate was of necessity bound by whatever instructions it was thought meet and proper to give him. Until these were withdrawn they must be followed, no matter what individual opinions were held. It was consequently impossible for the delegations representing New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, or New Jersey, to cast their votes in favor of independence until new instructions were issued to them rescinding the old.¹ In fact it was with difficulty that they could be persuaded to support the resolutions for issuing letters of marque and reprisal² and opening the ports, for their radical character was well appreciated. But for doing this they could plead extenuation in the harsh terms of the Prohibitory Act, and they took the chances that their action would meet with the support of their constituents, now flushed by the success at Boston, though the delegates had many misgivings as to the nature of the reception their decidedly conservative communities would accord such radical measures.

¹ For prior reference to these instructions see p. 45.

² March 23, 1776, Journal of Congress.

During the next three months,¹ the aggressive radicals bent their energies toward compelling the colonies to withdraw their anti-independence instructions, and lost no opportunity to further their ends. With the possible exception of New York, no colony had been more persistent in maintaining the old order than Pennsylvania, and into the political upheaval going on in that colony the Congress was about to project itself with vigor, knowing full well that if Pennsylvania could be brought into line, the cause was won, for she still controlled the policy of the middle colonies.

John Jay, not less than John Dickinson and Robert Morris, represented the old-line aristocrats whose ascendancy in New York, as in Pennsylvania, was being undermined by the rise to power of the democracy. These men were not a whit less patriots, in the sense current at that time, than Franklin or the Adamses or Jefferson. But independence meant to the former the overthrow of the administrative organizations with which they had always been allied, and which saw to it that the democracy was held in check. They had been among the leaders in disseminating ideas of the rights of man and of the equality of men, and in so doing were perfectly consistent. These abstract theories, as they viewed it, were to serve as a basis for stating the American attitude in the controversy with England. Little thought had been given to their possible application to conditions in the colonies, and to their destructive effect upon conservative traditions. But when the people at large had been fed for ten years and more upon such a diet, and, moreover, were called upon to enlist and fight for the rights which they had been led to believe were theirs, what more natural than that they should demand their full share when the time came for distribution? Upon their shoulders, in large measure, rested the burden of the war, and they would dictate how it was to be carried.

¹ April, May, and June.

Consequently, in an especial degree in the middle colonies, but to no less an extent in South Carolina,¹ political revolutions were taking place side by side with the larger struggle, in which all were concerned alike. The democracy was fighting there not only for the general cause, but for itself, and the peaceful clashes between radicals and conservatives, though little less frequent and determined, are not heard in the din of the rattle of musketry and the roar of artillery. But unless they be taken into account a full appreciation of the motives underlying the retarding influences on independence cannot be obtained. The contest for independence in its later stages, that is just before July 4, 1776, in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, North and South Carolina, and to almost an equal extent in New York, Delaware, and Maryland, became virtually not less one between the people and the aristocrats for control, than one between the United Colonies and Great Britain for the establishment of a separate government. In all of these contests the influence of the Congress, whenever possible, was cast on the side of the democracy. The early sympathy displayed with it in November and December, in the resolutions advising New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Virginia to establish governments by calling a "full and free representation of the people," though not going so far as a few extreme radicals desired,¹ went too far for the conservatives. In the reaction that followed (in bringing about which Dickinson was the prime mover) instructions were issued to the delegations of five colonies preventing them from assenting to any resolutions favoring independence. These were designed as much to prevent the overthrow of the existing governmental machinery still in conservative control, as to bind the hand of the Congress. For it was well understood that if independence were declared, each colony would of necessity have to devise a new form of government. In this process the conservatives feared that the democracy might gain the upper hand, and overturn the old established order, and the wisdom of their caution was justified by subsequent events.

¹ See the notable study of Dr. Wm. A. Schaper on Sectionalism and Representation in S. C. in Rep. Am. Hist. Assn., 1900, Vol. I, especially pp. 338 et seq. and 354 et seq.

¹ John Adams would have had the Congress issue instructions to all the colonies to form new governments. See pp. 34-35, 43, supra.

But the Congress, a revolutionary organization, itself in large measure the creature of the democratic revolutionary organizations, had no occasion to stand in fear of the people. In fact the radicals in the Congress saw clearly that dependence must in the main be placed upon them. And as the conservatives could control the votes of only five colonies (the votes being always taken by colonies and not by individuals), they could not hold the radicals in check when there was a full representation of the colonies in the Congress.¹ Accordingly the ¹ The Congress was always a fluctuating body, and in the last months of 1775 and the first months of 1776, when affairs at home were of extreme importance, members came and went constantly, so that frequently a colony was not represented.

Congress took advantage of every occasion that offered to stir up the democracy, and this phenomenon of a representative body taking more radical action than a number of its constituent parts would have had it, is one of the interesting developments of the time. It serves also to show the complex nature of the controversy.

The measures the Congress resorted to in order to accomplish its ends were various. Perhaps that of most consequence was the increase of the continental army, judiciously distributed throughout the colonies, now by request, again as the exigencies made requisite. Through it the Congress made its own existence a real entity, and supported the often weak revolutionary organizations. Philadelphia was a great distance from the seat of many of the colonial activities, and news traveled with painful slowness. The presence, therefore, of the army, the outward demonstration of the majesty and power of the Congress, had an effect in overawing the opposition to it that is not now easily discernible, though not less potent on that account. When the Congress saw fit to take measures to support the weak credit of its issues of paper money,¹ to promote the signing of associations, or to suppress the activities of Tories, the continental army was ready to hand to assist, if the committees of safety were inclined to call upon it.¹ When, by taking part in the Pennsylvania-Connecticut dispute at Wyoming, it could let the dissatisfied elements of the western counties of Pennsylvania know that their interests were being guarded by it, the Congress did not hesitate to project itself into this controversy, even though it thereby aroused the resentment of the Pennsylvania Assembly. But the Congress, bent on establishing itself with the people, cared little for this Assembly, controlled as it was by the aristocrats who could be moved only by force, and ignored its existence consistently from the day that the Pennsylvania Committee of Safety came into power. When the committee was sent to Canada in the hope that the people of that country might be induced to join their forces in the struggle, they were authorized to explain the "method of collecting the sense of the People, and conducting our Affairs regularly by Committees of Observation and Inspection in the several Districts, and by Conventions and Committees of Safety in the several Colonies." And they were further to "press them to have a complete representation of the People assembled in Convention, with all possible expedition, to deliberate concerning the establishment of a Form of Government, and Union with the United Colonies.”¹ And, finally, when the Congress was sufficiently strong to permit privateering, it adopted one of its most popular measures. For, though the risks were great, the returns were so large as to interfere seriously with enlistments in the army—the pomp, and circumstance, and glory of war seemingly making weaker appeal to the patriots of those days, than the fortunes to be gained by the less poetic, but more remunerative preying upon England’s commerce.

¹ Journal of Congress, January 11, 1776.

¹ Ibid., January 2, 3, 5, 30, February 5, 8, March 8, 9, 14. In one instance this was done, however, without any reference to any committee of safety, assembly, or convention. The Tories of Queen's County, New York, were moved against by direct action of the Congress by means of the continental army.

The carrying through of the resolutions outlined above was made possible only by the never-tiring aggressiveness of the radical minority, who made up for the slimness of their numbers by the stoutness of their intellects. At the beginning of the year 1776 the outspoken advocates of independence then in the Congress were George Wythe of Virginia, Gadsen of South Carolina, McKean of Delaware, Franklin of Pennsylvania, Ward of Rhode Island, Deane of Connecticut, and Samuel Adams of Massachusetts. The accession of the new Connecticut delegation, which arrived on January 16, followed by Samuel Chase, John Adams, and Elbridge Gerry shortly after, gave strength to their ranks, by way of ability, far in excess of their numbers. There were some losses as well, for Gadsen left about the middle of January to take part in the affairs of his own colony, and Ward died on March 25. But the loss of the latter was more than made good by the arrival of Richard Henry Lee, in the second week of March. Until the end of April they had no important additions to their numbers. Upon the shoulders of these few men rested the burden of the fight for independence in the Congress, and that it was carried on with such skill and with ultimate success, was due to the inexhaustible resourcefulness of their sharp wits. Largely through their exertions the Congress had established itself. For the next two months (May and June) they bent their energies to forcing their way through to their ultimate goal—a unanimous declaration of independence.

¹ Journal of Congress, March 20, 1776, Bradford edition.

But with all their aggressiveness and alertness and ability, in spite of the great encouragement they were giving to the popular party in Philadelphia, and the pressure they could bring to bear on individual members, they had not been able to make any impression on the Pennsylvania Assembly as a whole. The local fight, now of several months duration, to have that body agree to a material increase in the representation of the western counties and of the city of Philadelphia, and to an extension of the suffrage qualifications, proved almost barren of result, except to incense further the popular party.

Yet the Assembly was so blind as not to see the extent and force of this popular uprising; and sitting in the room above that in which the Congress held its sessions, on the very day that the Congress was opening the ports of the country, the Assembly was obstinately voting, by a large majority, not to alter the instructions to the delegates on the subject of independence.¹ But the Congress, grown somewhat arbitrary by the rapid advances toward independence it saw making elsewhere, would not sit idly by without taking some measure to show its sympathy with the disappointed democracy of Pennsylvania. To the much dissatisfied elements in the western counties it had been responsive on a previous occasion,² as if to let the people there know that, though the Assembly was against them, the stronger arm of the Congress would be raised in their behalf whenever expedient. The border warfare between the Pennsylvania and the Connecticut settlers at Wyoming still continued, and an opportunity arose in the middle of April for the Congress again to take a hand.³ It did this now with the more readiness, because it could thereby make known that the welfare of no part of the country was being overlooked, and that the inhabitants of the western counties in their dispute with the Pennsylvania Assembly would continue to find a sturdy advocate before the Congress.

¹ See Lincoln, op. cit., Chap. XIII.

² Journal of Congress, December 20, 1775.

³ Journal of Congress, April 15, 1776.

In the full flush of its new-found strength the Congress went further afield and seeing, as it thought, an opportunity to advance the interests of the independence party in Maryland, proceeded to attempt to lay down the rule of conduct for that colony. The conditions were in some respects not dissimilar from those in Pennsylvania, and the presence of a most amiable, respected, and popular governor, Eden, still exercising some of his functions, served to complicate matters. He had been able, in great measure, to keep control of the Convention and Council of Safety, though the Baltimore Committee had not proved so tractable. It was largely due to his influence that Maryland had taken her stand against independence, and though his authority was waning at this time (the middle of April) it was as yet far from gone. When, therefore, the Congress had put before it, by the Baltimore Committee, a batch of Eden's correspondence with the home authorities, it immediately responded by calling upon the Maryland Council of Safety to seize and secure the governor and have his papers relating "to the American dispute, without delay conveyed safely to Congress."¹ But the Congress had reckoned without its host.

¹ Journal of Congress, April 16, 1776.

Without delay, it is true, the Council of Safety took up the cause, but in a manner far different from what had been anticipated. Its members considered their dignity offended by the Congress acting at once upon the information provided by the Baltimore Committee, without first referring the matter to the Council of Safety. They denounced the Baltimore Committee, and especially its president, for exercising an authority which went far beyond the bounds to which it was considered they should have been limited, and the echoes of the controversy resounded in the halls of the Maryland Convention when it met a few weeks later.¹ Instead of seizing Governor Eden, they considered his case for several weeks, and finally advised him to depart in peace with his possessions.² When, therefore, the resolution of the Congress on the subject of forming new governments and putting an end to all authority derived from the crown,³ came before them, they were still smarting under what they believed to be the insult put upon them by the Congress. Despite that they had less than a week before absolved all persons from taking the usual oaths to the government, upon assuming office, they now not only passed long resolutions expressing their opinion that the necessity had not yet arisen for suppressing the exercise of every kind of authority under the crown, and in its place having all the powers of government exercised under the authority of the people, but went further, and specifically notified the delegates in the Congress to follow the old instructions directing them not to vote for independence, "in the same manner as if the said instructions were particularly repeated."¹ In this instance the intrusion of the Congress into Maryland's affairs had retarded instead of advanced the cause of independence, and the effects of the friction engendered between the Congress and the Convention, and between Maryland's delegates and the President, Hancock, and other delegates, did not wear off before six weeks had passed away.

¹ May 8, 1776, Proc. of Md. Conventions, Baltimore, 1836, 125.

² May 24, 1776, Ibid., 150-152.

³ See pp. 91-94.

But a set-back of this nature did not daunt the radicals, who were now finding popular support throughout the colonies. The measures that the Congress had so far adopted were looked upon everywhere as warranted by the necessities of the situation. From all sides information was coming in that the popularity of independence was growing apace. The correspondence of the time, the gazettes, the resolutions of local committees, all were viewing with marked favor the idea that six months before had found scarcely an advocate.¹ These gave courage to the radicals in the Congress, and furnished the incentive to pursue bolder measures still. The inertia of the conservative middle colonies had to be overcome, and if they would not of themselves withdraw the instructions against independence, the Congress would give them the occasion. This reasoning applied with particular force to Pennsylvania, whose Assembly still stood as a stone wall against all pressure brought to bear on it, for as has been well said, "Pennsylvania was the battle-ground of the movement at this time."² Some direct appeal must be made which if not replied to by the conservatives in a manner satisfactory to the independence party in Pennsylvania, as elsewhere, would result in the overthrow of the old order.

¹ Proc. of Md. Conventions, May 21, 142.

As if to provide the radicals with a lever with which to raise out of their depths of doubt and hesitation the many still hoping for commissioners or other means of reconciliation, came the definite news, early in May,³ that great numbers of Hanoverian and Hessian soldiers were being sent over. The cry against resorting to the aid of foreign mercenaries, who could have no interest in the contest, and would, therefore, be certain to carry on the war with a cruelty not to be expected of those speaking their own language and having much in common with them, resounded through the land; and while serving to give pause to many who halted at the thought of the seeming impossibility of withstanding such an overwhelming force, aroused the spirit of a far greater number to meet the oncoming hosts with all the strength and determination within them.

¹ See Austin's Gerry, I, 179.

² John Adams' Works, III, 45, note.

³ See p. 67.

John Adams, always ready for some bold stroke, now came forward and sought to force matters. He would have had the colonies that had put limitations upon the actions of their delegates, requested to repeal their instructions, giving as reason the present state of America and "the cruel efforts of our enemies" which rendered it necessary that a perfect union be formed to preserve and establish our liberties.¹ But largely because of the feeling that prevailed in the minds of the more conservative that this was going too far for the time, and that the ultimate aim might be attained the better in another way, this motion in the form finally adopted was toned down considerably. It made a recommendation to the assemblies and conventions, "where no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs hath been hitherto established, to adopt such government as shall in the opinion of the representatives of the people best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular and America in general.”¹ And this was followed by the selection of a radical committee to prepare a preamble intended to state the reason for advising such action.

¹ Probably on May 6, 1776. See Works, II, 489.

In the interval between their appointment and the adoption of the preamble which they reported, two important incidents occurred, which could not have been without influence in shaping the course of the Congress' action. On the day before the final vote on the preamble was taken, Jefferson, fresh from his labors in Virginia, took his seat in the Congress, from which he had been absent for more than four months; and Ellery arrived from Rhode Island bringing with him new instructions, but just issued to her delegates by that colony, permitting them to vote for independence if joined by others.² Though Jefferson bore no new instructions, he was perfectly in touch with affairs in his own colony, knew how county upon county was demanding that the recently called convention should renounce allegiance to Great Britain, and was therefore ready to aid in every way in furthering such views. The Rhode Island instructions, though not mentioning independence (because in the phrasing of the astute governor of that colony, "dependency is a word of so equivocal a meaning, and hath been used to such ill purposes, and independency, with many honest and ignorant people carrying the idea of eternal warfare"),¹ were so general in their character as to give the delegation full powers to do or vote as they wished. With two such accessions to the ranks of the radicals in the Congress the preamble was carried through with a rush.

¹ Journal of Congress, May 10, 1776.

² These instructions are in Journal of Congress, May 14, 1776.

As usual, the occasion for giving the authority of the Congress to the recommendation now made to the colonies is sought in some British acts of aggression or shortcoming. These are stated to be the exclusion by the King, in conjunction with the Lords and Commons, of the colonies from the protection of his crown; the failure to answer the petition, and the use of the full force of the kingdom, combined with foreign mercenaries, to accomplish the subjugation of America. Under such circumstances "it appears absolutely unreconcilable to reason and good conscience, for the people of these colonies now to take the oaths and affirmations necessary for the support of any government under the crown of Great Britain." Instead, every kind of authority under the crown should be totally suppressed, and all the powers of government exerted by authority of the people of the colonies "for the preservation of internal peace virtue and good order, as well as for the defence of their lives, liberties and properties, against the hostile invasions and cruel depredations of their enemies."¹

¹ Staples, Rhode Island in the Continental Congress, 68.

To stay the passage of this preamble, to them more offensive even than the resolution for which it furnished the pretext, Duane of New York, and Wilson of Pennsylvania uttered loud and earnest protest. They were fully cognizant that the intent of its clauses was to compass the overthrow of the tottering Pennsylvania Assembly, and bring pressure to bear upon the conservative elements of New York and the other hesitating colonies. This could be done only by an appeal to the people, and the Congress had not dared as yet to go so far in proclaiming its reliance upon them. But it was foreseen that an appeal of another sort must shortly be made to them to come forth in large numbers to fight the greater future battles for liberty, compared with which all the clashes that had already occurred were as preliminary skirmishes. And to ensure the success of its extensive plans the Congress was more than willing to give the democracy, whenever it might, some show to procure the rights which it was clamoring for in louder and ever louder degree.

¹ Journal of Congress, May 15, 1776, Aitken edition, 1777.

Having been instrumental in accomplishing so much, John Adams could with good grace unbosom himself to his wife to this effect: "Great Britain has at last driven America to the last step, a complete separation from her; a total absolute independence, not only of her Parliament, but of her Crown, for such is the amount of the resolve of the 15th, . . . This is effected by extinguishing all authority under the crown, Parliament, and nation, as the resolution for instituting governments has done, to all intents and purposes."¹ In those few words John Adams touched upon the salient point of the resolution—the renouncement of the jurisdiction of the crown. Hitherto this had not been brought seriously into question, in any of the public documents of the Congress.² And the form this now took but foreshadowed the terms in which would be couched the definite Declaration of Independence itself.

The latter end of the month of May and the first week of June had crowded into these few days events, the bigness of which by far transcended anything that had gone before. The Congress was approaching rapidly to the highest point of its authority. It had already assumed to give a committee full power, in carrying out its investigations, to send for persons and papers.¹ This was an extension of jurisdiction that would not until now have been acquiesced in for a moment. The arrival on the twentieth of May of Button Gwinnett and Lyman Hall from Georgia, bringing with them broad instructions to agree to any of the acts of the Congress, was an important accession to the ranks of the radicals, even though these two represented few more than a handful of the revolutionists of Savannah. Thus strengthened, the Congress could, with the greater complacency, studiously ignore Maryland's reactionary resolutions, which were read in the Congress on the twenty-fourth.² Within a few days the consideration of plans for retrieving the miscarriages and blunders in Canada, and carrying on the war with determined energy was entered upon with enthusiasm. For this purpose Washington and Gates were called to the councils of the Congress from New York, where they were awaiting and preparing to meet the expected reinforcements to the British arms.

¹ Letters to his Wife, I, 109-110.

² See Chapter VII.

Under these circumstances, the instructions laid before the Congress by the North Carolina and Virginia delegates on May 27, proved welcome reading. North Carolina's provincial Congress had passed the resolution empowering her representatives to join with the delegates from the other colonies in declaring independence, on the twelfth of the month preceding. For some reason, not fully to be accounted for, its presentation had been thus long delayed. It was probably not sent off with promptness, and when received was held back by Hewes who, unaided, had born the brunt of guarding North Carolina's interests in Philadelphia, for several months past. Before presenting it he had thought well to wait a while in the hope that another delegate might arrive to share with him the heavy responsibility of taking so momentous a step. But no such considerations weighed with the Virginia delegation. Their instructions were more explicit than any hitherto passed. They were not merely to join with others in declaring independence when the Congress saw fit to adopt such a measure, but were to make the first move by presenting a specific proposal to that end. Only the multiplicity of affairs receiving consideration at this time, prevented the Congress from at once giving a hearing to Virginia's proposition.

¹ Journal of Congress, May 8, 1776.

² See p. 89 supra.

The Congress was now on the point of making a call for greater numbers of troops than any hitherto sent out. Some attempt must be made to retrieve the miscarriages and disasters in Canada, and a bold front must be put on to meet the serious situation in New York.¹ To do this without stating publicly the reasons, so that all might be made familiar with them would arouse criticism, might even cause dissension. To avoid this possibility, it was decided to have the call for troops accompanied by a stirring address that would "impress the minds of the people with the necessity of now stepping forward to save their country, their freedom and property."¹ Moreover it was well understood that independence was now a question, at most, of only a few weeks, and once declared, the Congress must be in a position to sustain it by force of arms if need be. For none appreciated better than the members of the Congress, the necessity of being prepared to suppress with determination the dissenters from the measures for which it stood sponsor, from the day when it renounced all connection with Great Britain. The time was at hand when all must declare either for the Congress or against it—and those who followed the latter course must be ready to pay the full cost of their tenacity of opinion.

¹ Journal of Congress, June 1, 3, 1776.

¹ Secret Journal of Congress, Domestic, May 29, 1776. The address intended was never issued, as the Declaration of Independence more than took its place.

CHAPTER V

INDEPENDENCE IN THE MAKING

A brief survey of the status of the independence sentiment throughout the colonies at the opening of the month of June, as mirrored in the instructions to the delegates in the Congress, discloses the fact that but one colony, Virginia, had given unequivocal expression to its views. Excepting only that colony, none had directed that a definite proposal upon the subject of independence should be made; the five middle colonies had not rescinded their resolutions against it, and the instructions of only one other, North Carolina, mentioned the word. But throughout New England, the resolutions of the towns spoke as with one voice in favor of a declaration by the Congress. Massachusetts, carrying out her policy, laid down nearly two years before, had not officially come forward to demand what was the overwhelming desire of her inhabitants. She had made so many advances in the past, had seen so many of her grievances taken up and made common issue of, that she thought it well to let the great renouncement take its origin elsewhere. She would be content to show her mettle after the die was cast.

The middle colonies had not yet spoken; but they were in a ferment of discussion, and the day for deciding the all-important question could not long be put off. Of the southern colonies, the action of South Carolina alone was doubtful. The instructions to her delegates, issued by the revolutionary organization, which had overthrown the old form of government and substituted a new in its place, were comprehensive. But scarcely half a dozen of the men who were the leaders in the local revolutionary movement favored independence. The instructions could not, therefore, accurately be construed as authorizing a vote for independence. At most the delegates could use their best judgment as to the right course to follow.¹

Such was the situation when on June 7, in accordance with the terms of Virginia's instructions, Richard Henry Lee, speaking for his colleagues, introduced the resolutions, written in his own hand and reading: "Resolved, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved.

"That it is expedient to take the most effectual measures for forming foreign alliances.

¹ McCrady, S. C. in the Revolution, Chapter VI.

“That a plan of confederation be prepared and transmitted to the respective Colonies for their consideration and approbation.”¹ That Virginia’s delegation would propose the adoption of some such statements, was foreseen ten days before when the Congress had listened to the formal reading of the resolves of the Virginia Convention. And if anything more were needed to strengthen the conviction that it was useless to hope for a change of policy on the part of Great Britain, and that Virginia’s move was, therefore, timely and appropriate, this was furnished by the King’s brief answer, just to hand, delivered in reply to the address and petition of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London on March 22.² But even with the action of Virginia’s delegation fully expected, and with the determined words of the King before them, there must have been something at least approaching a shock in Independence Chamber when this “hobgobling of so frightful a mien"¹ actually stalked into their midst. This may account for the unsatisfactory entry on the Journal of Congress, which fails to inform us who were the mover and seconder, though it duly records that the resolutions obtained a second, and from other sources we learn that it was John Adams who thus spoke out.

¹ The original MS of these resolutions is among the Papers of the Continental Congress recently transferred from the Department of State to the Library of Congress. The sheet on which they are written has had added to it, partly in the hand of Benjamin Harrison and partly in that of Charles Thomson and another not identified, the determination of Congress thereupon, as afterwards entered in the journal. It also bears an endorsement in Thomson’s hand. A facsimile is in Force, 4th, VI, facing 1700.

² See Force, 4th, VI, 462-463.

For all that they had been long demanding action, even the radicals entered upon the discussion of this momentous subject not unmindful of the seriousness of the consequences involved. They were aggressive and persistent still, had advocated a reckless course in times past, and were eager that a conclusion should be reached, but above all they perceived the necessity for unanimity, now more than ever. They were entirely willing, therefore, that consideration should be postponed for a day, the members being enjoined to attend punctually at ten o'clock the next morning. As if to foreshadow the great part he was to play in fashioning the document in which independence is proclaimed, Jefferson, and he alone, made notes of the great debates held on the eighth and tenth of June, and on July 1.² The main burden of the opposition fell upon the shoulders of Wilson, Robert R. Livingston, Dickinson, and Edward Rutledge, all but the last representing the middle colonies. They held that, though friendly to the measure, with them it was a question of its opportuneness; there had always been delay in taking any important step until the voice of the people demanded it; the middle colonies were "not yet ripe for bidding adieu to British connection, but they were fast ripening and in a short time would join in the general voice of America," and the dissensions created by the resolution of May 15, demonstrated this; that some delegations had not the authority to consent to such a declaration, and certainly the delegates of the other colonies had no power to answer for them; that as the assembly of Pennsylvania, and the New York convention were then in session, and conventions would meet in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey in a few days, and would probably take up the question of their attitude toward independence, they should wait until they could be heard from; that there was danger if such a declaration was made now, the instructed delegates must retire, and possibly their colonies might secede from the union. Taking up the matter of foreign alliances, they argued that it would be best to wait until they learned from the agent sent to Paris as to the disposition of the French court; that by waiting, if the ensuing campaign was successful, they could make an alliance on better terms, and that they should agree among themselves upon the terms on which to form an alliance, before declaring to form one at all events. It is probable, too, that some stress was laid, at least by Dickinson, upon the desirability of forming a confederation before declaring independence, as this was a point on which he is reported to have laid particular emphasis during the preceding months.¹

¹ John Adams.

² Works, Ford edition, I, 18-28.

Against these contentions "the Power of all New England, Virginia and Georgia" was thrown,² though the principal spokesmen were John Adams, Wythe, and Lee until his departure for Virginia on June 10. They held that the arguments of the opposition were not against the proposition itself but its timeliness; that the question was not one of announcing something new, but by a declaration of independence of announcing a fact which already existed; they had never acknowledged the dominance of the people or Parliament of England, and the restraints which they had imposed on trade, derived effect only from acquiescence in them; their allegiance to the King was now dissolved by his assent to the late act of Parliament declaring them out of his protection and by levying war upon them; that James II had not formally declared the English people out of his protection and "yet his action proved it & the parliament declared it," and this was their position. They argued that the prohibitory instructions, particularly of Pennsylvania, were drawn a long time back, when conditions were different; that the people were waiting for the Congress to lead the way, and were in favor of the measure though some of their representatives were not. Attacking the "proprietary powers" (in which we hear the voice of John Adams) as responsible for this backward attitude of Pennsylvania and Maryland, they held that the conduct of some colonies from the beginning gave rise to the suspicion that it was their policy to lag behind the rest in order that "their particular prospect might be better, even in the worst event," that the colonies which had come forward in the beginning and hazarded all must do so now, and "put all again to their own hazard." As to secession, they had no fears, and even if the dissatisfied colonies seceded

¹ Stillé's Dickinson. On July 21, 1775, Franklin brought forward his plan of a confederation, which appears to have been read in Congress but received no further consideration. Secret Journal, Domestic, 283 et seq. A plan was considered by the Congress, January 16, 1776 (Diary of Richard Smith), but was opposed by Dickinson and Hooper among others. This was probably a modification of Franklin's original plan, which he had transmitted to various colonies for examination. In all likelihood this was the plan published in the Penna. Evening Post, for March 5, 1776, and it may have been published then in order to answer the objection that confederation should precede independence.

² Jefferson's Works, I, 19, note.

(and here again the sound of John Adams's voice is unmistakable) "the history of the Dutch revolution proved that a secession of some colonists would not be so dangerous as some apprehended." Respecting foreign alliances, no nation of Europe would treat with us or receive an ambassador from us unless we were first independent, that they might not even afterward, but we should never know without trying; that the ensuing campaign might prove unsuccessful, and that an alliance had better be proposed "while our affairs wear a hopeful aspect."

It becomes clear from an examination of these debates, (which took place in committee of the whole with Harrison of Virginia in the chair), even in the fragmentary form in which they have come down to us, that all energies had to be concentrated on the middle colonies if they were to be won over to acquiesce in the determination reached by the seven other colonies, and that the opposing conventions and assemblies must be informed of the attitude of the majority of the Congress. A compromise involving delay was, therefore, a welcome proposal. So that when Edward Rutledge, on behalf of his colony, moved on the tenth that the consideration of the first resolution be postponed for three weeks, it was passed with the proviso that in order that no time might be lost in case the Congress finally agreed thereto, a committee should be selected to prepare a declaration which should serve as a preamble to the resolution.¹ On the next day Jefferson, John Adams, Franklin, Sherman, and R. R. Livingston were chosen as the committee to have charge of preparing this important document. And in the hope of influencing Dickinson and Morris, who contended for the making of foreign alliances and a confederation in advance of declaring independence, committees to prepare a plan of treaties to be proposed to foreign powers, and to draft articles of confederation, were selected on the twelfth. Significant of the great awakening in the Congress that these debates occasioned, as of the necessity for a more orderly conduct of military affairs, which passing events disclosed, is the institution on this same day of the most important permanent organization within the Congress, the board of war and ordnance—a proposal for the creation of which had laid on the desk unacted upon for nearly two months.²

Turning now to what was happening in the middle colonies, we discover everywhere discussion of and action on the great question. The resolution of the Congress of May 15 had proved, as was intended, of immediate effect in Philadelphia in spurring on the elements dissatisfied with the unchanged attitude of the Pennsylvania Assembly. On the twentieth of that month a general gathering of the inhabitants of the City and Liberties, to the number, it is said, of 7,000, presided over by one of the most disgruntled and influential of the radicals, Col. Daniel Roberdeau, protested against the Assembly's competency to form a new government, and resolved that a convention should be chosen by the people for that purpose.¹ These resolutions were sent out to the committees of the counties of the province, and June 18 was named as the day on which a provincial conference should meet in Philadelphia to determine upon the method of electing members to a convention to establish the new form of government, recommended by the Continental Congress. The tottering Assembly in the meantime was having difficulty in getting a quorum together, though this was finally obtained on May 22. They did little more for the next few days than listen to elaborate addresses presented by the radical and conservative inhabitants respectively, the one demanding that no action be taken upon the resolution of the Congress of May 15, and the other that the old instructions to the delegates against independence be adhered to. On the fifth of June they listened to the reading of Virginia's resolutions transmitted by the convention of that colony, and, by a large majority, decided to appoint a committee, with Dickinson as chairman, to prepare new instructions to the delegates in the Congress. These were adopted on the eighth, but not signed by the speaker until the day, June 14, on which the old Assembly passed forever out of existence, by reason of the impossibility of reconciling the conservative spirit of its members with the revolutionary ideas prevailing among large numbers of the people, who had taken affairs into their own hands. The instructions tried to effect a compromise when the time for compromises was long past, and consequently displeased the conservatives who thought they went too far, and were unsatisfactory to the radicals, because they did not go far enough. While specifically authorizing the delegates to enter into a confederation and to make treaties with foreign powers, they dodged the main issue, independence, by merely bestowing the power to concur in adopting such other measures as were judged necessary. In such a crisis plain speaking was required, and no resort to subterfuges would answer. Accordingly, when the Conference of Committees came together on the eighteenth of June, under the presidency of the active Thomas McKean, a member of the Congress, though having no power to instruct the delegates, they unanimously expressed the willingness to concur in a vote of the Congress declaring the colonies free and independent states.¹ Thus ended the struggle for authority to declare independence in Pennsylvania, as a result of which the colony was so rent asunder that it took many years to recover from the effects.

¹ Journal of Congress, June 10, 1776.

² The Committee on establishing a War Office had reported on April 18, Journal of Congress.

¹ Lincoln, Revolutionary Movement in Pennsylvania, 255.

We miss from this record the familiar name of Franklin, who throughout the first six months had been as much the leader of the radicals as Dickinson of the moderates. He was not now holding aloof from choice, but fallen a victim to the racking twinges of the gout, was kept from "Congress & Company" for nearly all of the first three weeks of June. If the void left by his absence could have been filled, Thomas McKean was at hand for this. Not content with taking a leading part in fashioning Pennsylvania's affairs, he went through the counties of Delaware and by his personal exertions swung her into line for independence on June 14,² the wording of the Philadelphia conference, with which he had so much to do, being used. It must be remembered, when we wonder how a Pennsylvanian could have been permitted to interfere in Delaware, that Pennsylvania men and measures were not then so separated from Delaware's politics as now.

Some measure of the extent of the changes wrought in New Jersey by the revolution, is revealed

¹ Force, 4th, VI, 963.

² Life and Correspondence of George Read, 165; Force, 4th, VI, 884; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 523.

by the fact that of the men who met in Provincial Congress at Burlington on June 10, but six had been members of the assembly of that colony which had met for the last time in November of the previous year. There as in Maryland, matters were complicated by the presence of a popular governor, William Franklin, who, though out of touch with the Provincial Congress, still had the support of a large body of the population. To deprive him of further influence to delay agreement upon independence it was thought best to get him out of the colony, but he and his party were so strong that the Provincial Congress were not willing to undertake his banishment without the authority and assistance of the Continental Congress, as "the countenance and approbation of the Continental Congress would satisfy some persons who might otherwise be disposed to blame" them.¹ The Congress, on the lookout for a chance to shape the course of events, especially in a colony that had not yet rescinded its old instructions against independence, responded immediately upon the receipt of this appeal. Directing the examination of the governor, if as a result it was decided that he should be confined, the Congress stood ready to name the place, "they concurring in the sentiment . . . that it would be improper to confine him in that colony." Before another week went round, Governor Franklin was ordered, by the Congress, to be sent to Connecticut.¹ Four days after New Jersey's first appeal, the Provincial Congress—having, one June 21, declared itself in favor of forming a new government pursuant to the recommendation of the Congress—voted new instructions to the delegates in the Congress, by which they were authorized to join in declaring independence, in making a confederation, and in contracting foreign alliances. In all this the hand of Jonathan D. Sergeant is visible. He, like McKean, was also a member of the Congress and knew well the temper of the majority of that body, though he had not for some weeks been in his place in Independence Chamber. His personality looms almost as large in the events that brought about the adhesion of New Jersey to the new doctrine, as McKean's in Pennsylvania and Delaware, Jay's in New York, and Chase's in Maryland.

¹ Letter of the New Jersey Congress to Continental Congress, June 18, 1776, Force, 4th, VI, 1624.

Chase returned from the mission he was sent on to Canada too late by one day to take part in the debates held in the Congress. But this enforced silence served to make his pen all the more active when he learned how necessary it was for the cause of independence, to turn Maryland about. The Convention of that colony had adjourned on May 25, in angry mood at the Congress for its interference in her affairs, and was not to reassemble until the following August. But the requisitions for troops, made by the Congress, rendered it necessary for the Council of Safety to call the Convention to meet at Annapolis on June 21. That same day they instructed their deputies in Philadelphia to ask for leave of absence to attend the Convention, and at the same time to make an agreement to postpone consideration of the questions of independence, foreign alliances and confederation until their return.¹ The Congress, however, would not listen to any proposal for deferring the vote, as it was public property that this would take place on July 1, and the country was expectant.² Meantime, Chase, as he put it, had "not been idle." He had appealed in writing to every county committee, and one after the other they were directing their representatives in the Convention to vote for new instructions to the delegates in the Congress. And in winning over the members of the Convention to his way of thinking he received able support from Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, his companion on the mission to Canada. Just a week after the Convention met, the fruit of their toil was manifested in the unanimous resolve, passed late at night, directing Maryland's delegates to join with the other colonies in voting in favor of independence.¹ Immediately after this decision was reached, Chase wrote to John Adams, in triumph: "I am this moment from the House to procure an Express to follow the Post with an Unan: vote of our Convention for Independence etc. etc.—see the glorious effects of County Instructions—our people have fire if not smothered."² Without his opportune exertions it is safe to say that Maryland would have lagged behind many weeks longer.

¹ Journal of Congress, June 19, 24, 1776.

¹ Proc. Md. Conventions, 166.

² John Adams' Works, IX, 413.

Excepting only New York, each of the middle colonies, spurred on by the persistent agitation of some member of the Congress, before the month was out, in one way or another had given to its delegates the authority that was so much desired, and which was all important, if independence was to be proclaimed as the unanimous act of the colonies. As for the remainder of the country there was doubt about only one other colony, South Carolina. For in response to the repeated demands of their delegates, Connecticut and New Hampshire had taken action on June 14 and 15 respectively³ And, though the assemblies of Massachusetts and Rhode Island⁴ had not instructed in precise terms, the

¹ Proc. Md. Conventions, 176.

² John Adams' Works, III, 56.

³ Force, 4th, VI, 868, 1030.

⁴ See p. 92 supra.

voice of the people within their borders was calling so loudly for the proclaiming of independence, that none could have any doubt how the votes of their representatives would be cast. All knew, also, how stood Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. But a question in the minds of many as the fateful day approached, was "How would South Carolina and New York decide?" No more definite word had issued from the former than that spoken more than three months before, when her delegates were empowered to join with a majority of the other colonies in executing such measures as would promote the best interests of that colony in particular, and America in general. None familiar with the political situation in South Carolina at the time these instructions were passed by her Provincial Congress can, in fairness, construe them as an authorization to vote for independence.¹ But in the three months interval the aggressive, efficient, local minority favoring independence had been as active in beating down the opposition (or at least in gaining control of the administrative machinery), as had been that other minority, with success so marked, in the Continental Congress. If her instructions had not been rendered more explicit, the conditions had certainly undergone a change, and it was for South Carolina's delegates in the Congress to determine whether these were so altered as to serve as warrant for joining their vote to that of the majority.

¹ See McCrady, South Carolina in the Revolution. Also p. 100 supra.

New York, much divided in her counsels by local political and religious dissensions of long standing, as by the presence of a large body of Tory sympathizers, the effects of which had colored all her acts in the past, had shown as yet no inclination to make haste in reaching a decision. It would well repay us to go into the history of the complex conditions in that colony, but we would thereby be carried too far afield.¹ And, though there was anxious waiting to hear what would be her attitude, it must be remembered that she occupied not nearly so large nor so critical a place as Pennsylvania, nor wielded so much influence. Therefore, after it was known how Pennsylvania would in all probability vote, New York's position was not so important in the councils of the Congress, so far as independence was concerned, as it would have been had there still been doubt of Pennsylvania. Reliance, too, was placed upon the influence that the large increases in the army soon to be gathered about New York, would have in shaping opinion in favor of the ¹ For the details of New York's complex political affairs see Flick, Loyalism in New York, passim, Van Tyne's Loyalists in the Am. Rev., Chapter V, and for the earlier period, Dr. Becker's valuable studies in Am. Hist. Rev. and Pol. Sci. Quarterly.

Congress's decrees. Suffice it, therefore, for our purposes to record that on May 31 resolutions were passed by her Provincial Congress respecting the recommendation of the Congress of May 15. They were to the effect that having doubts as to the authority of the Provincial Congress to deal with so important a subject as instituting a new form of government, the people were to be given the opportunity of determining this matter. The electors in the several counties of the colony were recommended to hold a special election of deputies (in the manner and form prescribed for the election of the existing Congress) to a Congress that should meet in New York on the second Monday in July. The deputies thus elected were to be understood as being thereby authorized to form a new government if they deemed it wise, which was "to continue in force until a future peace with Great Britain shall render the same unnecessary."¹ There was nothing in this that could seriously offend the sensibilities of those still conservatively inclined, for in spite of the declaration that the people should determine the question, the ultimate decision was left in the hands of the Provincial Congress.

Immediately after the vote in the Continental Congress on independence, on June 8, four of the New York delegates then in Philadelphia, sent an express to their Provincial Congress telling them that a vote on independence could be expected to be had soon and asking for instructions. Three days later the Provincial Congress passed resolutions recommending the electors and freeholders to instruct the representatives, for whom they were to vote at the ensuing election, respecting the attitude they should hold on the question of independence. But at the same time, with striking inconsistency, they voted not to publish these resolutions until after the election had taken place.¹ Desiring to explain this paradoxical action to the delegates at Philadelphia, the letter in which the information was conveyed served only to confuse them the more. They were told that the Provincial Congress was unanimously of the opinion that the instructions did not authorize them "to give the sense of this colony on the question of declaring it to be, and continue, an independent state,"—a fact that was so well understood by the delegates as not to need affirmation by the unanimous opinion of the Provincial Congress. Further, they said they did not feel inclined to instruct on that point, as the majority held they had no authority so to do; and they were fearful to ask the opinion of the people at that time, lest it might interfere with the elections that were to determine the question of a new form of government.¹ In plain words, they wanted to insure their own reelection to power, did not want to take any steps that might put this result in jeopardy, nor add to the numerous complications that already had arisen, and had, therefore, decided to postpone action on independence until the new convention met. The perplexed delegates in Philadelphia were thus left suspended in mid-air. And to add to their difficulties, they had doubts how to vote after independence was declared, when measures, the outcome of such action, were up for consideration.² In the meantime, the approach of the British army to New York caused the Provincial Congress to adjourn, on June 30, to meet at White Plains on July 8, so that at this crucial period, the delegates in Philadelphia were left without an authority to whom they might appeal for directions, until the vote on independence had taken place. On the tenth of July the deputies, just elected under the terms of the resolution of May 31, met at White Plains, resolved themselves into a convention and listened to the reading of the Declaration of Independence. The question of taking some stand was thus forced upon them, and a committee with Jay as chairman was selected to suggest suitable action. Since the discovery of Tryon's plot against

¹ Force, 4th, VI, 1352.

¹ Force, 4th, VI, 1396.

¹ Force, 4th, VI, 814.

² Ibid., 1212.

Washington a considerable change of opinion had come over enough of the members to form a majority, and they saw that only radical measures could counteract the influence of the Tories, and the presence of the British army. Therefore, on the afternoon of the same day they reported resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, approving the declaration of the Continental Congress and pledging themselves to support it; the final act being played on July 15, when these resolutions were read before the Continental Congress, thereby rendering it possible to give the engrossed copy the title of "The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States of America."

CHAPTER VI

ADOPTING AND SIGNING THE DECLARATION

While the colonies were thus preparing for the final day, the committee, to whom had been entrusted the difficult and exacting task of framing a declaration suitable to serve as introductory to and in justification of the resolution of independence, had concluded its work. On Friday, the twenty-eighth of June, the document in Jefferson's handwriting, after being read before the Congress, was laid on the table. Had Jefferson alone, without opportunity to consult his associates, received the mandate of the Congress to draw up such a paper, it would have differed in no essential detail from that handed in. For not only was it the product of his pen, but it bears the stamp of his master mind in every phrase. At the first meeting of the committee he had been requested to undertake the preparation of the document. Upon its completion he submitted it separately to Adams and Franklin, who made only a few verbal alterations, and it was then reported to the full committee. Sherman and Livingston apparently performed no service beyond lending their approval.¹ As chairman of the committee it was ¹I have followed Jefferson's account (Works, I, 24-27) as the only nearly contemporary version. It is but fair to add, Jefferson's right to draw up the report, and his colleagues' request overcame any reluctance he may have had to enter upon so important an undertaking.

The last two days of June happened to fall on Saturday and Sunday. As the Congress had decided a short time before, to hold no sessions on these days, in order that the hard pressed committees might have some leisure in which to consult upon the work given over to them, consideration of the Declaration went over until the next session, on July 1. At nine o'clock the Congress met, and, as if these events had been predesigned to render the day more solemn still, it heard from New Jersey's Convention that Howe was at Sandy Hook, and that some fifty British sail of the line had been sighted; and learned from Washington of the unearthing of a serious conspiracy instigated by the Mayor of New York and Governor Tryon. With his accustomed reserve, Washington intimated by no word that the danger to himself was of any consequence, though we may gather from other sources that nothing short of his own assassination was aimed at. But some slight relief was obtained from reflecting upon such de- however, that Adams in his autobiography, written many years later, differs as to details. Naturally, as a result of the greater clamor that by that time surrounded the Declaration, he exaggerated the part he had played in its preparation. See Works of John Adams, III, 512 et seq.

pressing intelligence, when the welcome resolution of Maryland's Convention was made known to all, disclosing that another vote was sure to be added to the majority favoring independence.¹

After reading the order of the day, the consideration of the resolution upon independence was proceeded with in committee of the whole, with Harrison of Virginia in the chair. The Declaration was referred to this committee also, but was not under discussion until the following day, July 2, when the resolution had been disposed of. As Hancock was the permanent president of the Congress, so Harrison may be regarded as its permanent chairman of the committee of the whole. He had served in that capacity for many months, the Congress by this means aiming to restore to Virginia her weight of prominence in the colonial balance, that had been lost to Massachusetts by Hancock's election to the presidency. Great debates were on once again, and for the final time, and engrossed the attention of the Congress for the entire day (July 1). Relying as we must, upon accounts written many years afterward, when memories proved treacherous, it would appear, nevertheless, that John Adams and John Dickinson again stepped forth as principal champions for and against the adoption of Lee's resolution declaring independence.

¹ Journal of Congress, July 1, 1776. See p. 113 supra.

John Adams tells us that he made his speech for the benefit and at the desire of the newly arrived New Jersey delegates, who had not been present on the seventh and eighth of June, and had therefore missed the earlier debates.¹ But of the words he then uttered no trace remains. In these circumstances we can only state that he recapitulated arguments made "twenty times before," all of which, he thought, was "an idle misspence of time, for nothing was said but what had been repeated and hackneyed in that room before, a hundred times for six months past."² That he delivered a speech, however, of unusual force and brilliancy is certain, and that it had considerable influence upon the minds of some who still were undecided how to act, is quite beyond doubt.

For the precise contribution of Dickinson on this important occasion, we are equally at a loss. But if there is no record of his words, we have by way of substitute the opinions he held at that time, set down by his own hand six years and a half later, which Bancroft has taken the liberty of dressing up to give them the appearance of the speech he is known to have delivered. Dickinson would have us believe that his opposition was based on the inadvisability of issuing a declaration of independence at that time. "The right and authority of Congress to make it, the justice of making it I acknowledged. The policy of then making it I disputed." He would have had the Congress await the result of some decisive battle, upon which, and not upon the Declaration, would depend procuring foreign aid; and he believed that "the formation of our governments, and an agreement upon the terms of our confederation, ought to precede the assumption of our station among sovereigns." To his mind the logical order was, first, the creation of local governments, to be followed by a confederation, and then independence. The importance of a confederation rested on the security it would give to the weaker colonies, against the dangers of having disadvantageous terms imposed on them by the stronger. These are the main points on which he based his arguments, as contained in the elaborate vindication of his career contributed, appropriately enough, to Freeman's Journal in 1783.¹

¹ Works, III, 58.

² Ibid., IX, 415.

It is altogether probable that others participated in the discussion on this day, for the sitting was protracted until late in the afternoon, but we have no authentic statements of anything that was said. The debate having run its course, and the vote being taken, it was discovered that all New England, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and

¹ This Vindication is to be found in Stillé's Dickinson, Appendix V.

Georgia favored the resolution, and South Carolina and Pennsylvania voted against it. Delaware's ballot went for naught, since McKean favored and George Read opposed it, and New York's delegates decided that the only course they could pursue was to refrain from voting. Nine colonies thus registered themselves as willing to cast off the yoke, an overwhelming majority to be sure, yet far from the unanimity which had been hoped for and worked for. As soon as Harrison, in his capacity of chairman of the committee of the whole, reported the decision to the Congress, Edward Rutledge of South Carolina again exercised the privilege of having the final determination postponed, which he had made use of on June 10. The members, however, were now so eager to conclude the consideration of this momentous subject that delay was voted but for a day.

The position of the South Carolina delegates was extremely embarrassing. That a majority of them, under Rutledge's guidance, favored independence, there can be no question. The issue now before them, however, was not that of giving expression to individual opinion, but of casting the vote of the colony of South Carolina as the majority of her people would have desired. If the view of the most recent historian of that state be correct, there was not only a decided opposition to independence in that colony, but there was nothing in the history of the relations between South Carolina and the home government to create a sentiment in its favor.¹ On the other hand, the South Carolina delegates in the Congress were confronted with the probability that when the final vote was taken no colony, unless it be their own, would be found voting in the negative. They were naturally reluctant to incur the responsibility of thus marking theirs as the only colony to stand in the way of practical unanimity. Therefore they took ready advantage of the opportunity for another day's delay, which the rules allowed. It would appear that Rutledge was the most forward among them and the boldest, that he bent the others to his will, and made them willing to cast in their lot with the rest and brave the consequences at home. Fortunately for them, we are told, "a battle had been fought, a British fleet had been repulsed, a British army held in check, and a victory won in Charlestown harbor, before the news of their action in Congress," was known among their fellows. All this changed the condition of parties and affairs, and gave welcome reception to the intelligence of the part the delegates had played in the drama at Philadelphia.²

During the day's interval, McKean of Delaware

¹ McCrady, S. C. in the Revolution, 172.

² Ibid., 173-174.

had been active in his endeavor to get an additional delegate from his colony to counterbalance George Read's opposition. He tells us that he sent an express-rider at his own expense for Caesar Rodney to Dover. Riding the eighty miles at post-haste, Rodney was met by McKean at the State House door and brought into Congress in his boots, just before the vote was taken.¹ At least three of Pennsylvania's delegates, Dickinson, Morris, and Wilson, were in as sore perplexity as those of South Carolina. Bearing credentials from the Pennsylvania Assembly, they had seen its authority diminish gradually, until a quorum could no longer be obtained, and it had now passed out of existence. In its stead a revolutionary organization, with which they had no sympathy, had assumed control of Pennsylvania's affairs. The Conference of Committees, just organizing into a convention to prepare a form of government, had given authority to vote for independence, but to Wilson, Dickinson, and Morris, this Conference had not itself the authority which it was conferring upon others. On the other hand, as far-seeing men, it was plain to them that the old order was overturned, its vitality gone, with little likelihood of its revival. Under these circumstances, but one of them, Wilson, rose to the occasion. As Dickinson and Morris stayed away from the Congress when the vote was taken, Wilson decided to go with the majority. His decision was all-important, for without his vote Pennsylvania's delegation would have been equally divided and her vote would have gone for naught. Dickinson in spite of his services in the field did not for many years recover the prestige which he lost at this time. Robert Morris, notwithstanding that he was in opposition to the popular desires, is the only member who was returned to the Congress. He was thus given the opportunity to serve his state and his country in so signal a manner in after years, as almost to obliterate all memory of his antagonism to independence.¹

¹ Buchanan's McKean Family.

Thus, when the final vote was taken on the resolution on the morning of July 2, but three votes, so far as we know, were cast against it—those of Willing and Humphreys of Pennsylvania, and Read's of Delaware. But Wilson, Franklin, and Morton outvoted Willing and Humphreys, and McKean and Rodney set Read's opposition at naught. All the other colonies, excepting only New York, whose delegates abstained from taking part, voted without a dissenting voice for the resolution.

This out of the way, the Congress now for the first time undertook to consider, in committee of the whole, Jefferson's Declaration which was to serve as justification for the resolution just adopted. For the remainder of that day and most of the next two, beginning at the early hour of nine o'clock, this the most picturesque and interesting of all of America's state documents was under consideration, paragraph by paragraph, what time the flying camp was ordered out both to protect New Jersey and stand ready to Washington's call, and rations of rum were being voted to shipwrights on Lake Champlain. The principal changes resolved upon by reason of this discussion are thus described by Jefferson: "The pusillanimous idea that we had friends in England worth making terms with, still haunted the minds of many. For this reason those passages which conveyed censures on the people of England were struck out, lest they should give them offence. The clause, too, reprobating the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa, was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who on the contrary still wished to continue it. Our Northern brethren also I believe felt a little tender under these censures; for though their people have very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others."¹ penning these words, reads: "and when occasions have been given them, by the regular course of their laws, of removing from their councils the disturbers of our harmony, they have by their free election re-established them in power. At this very time too they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch and foreign mercenaries to invade and destroy us. These facts have given the last stab to agonizing affection, and manly spirit bids us to renounce forever these unfeeling brethren. We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends. We might have been a free and a great people together; but a communication of grandeur and of freedom it seems is below their dignity. Be it so since they will have it. The road to happiness and to glory is open to us too, we will tread it apart from them. . . ." These sentences were intended to be inserted in the paragraph just before that beginning "We, therefore, the Representatives," and were to follow the sentence, "They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity." Their excision displays no pusillanimity, as Jefferson would have it, but rather a better appreciation of the necessity for the retention of essentials and the discarding of dispensable details.

¹ See, for Morris's own statement of his views, his letter to Joseph Reed, July 20, 1776, Reed's Reed, I, 201.

The first of the paragraphs he had in mind when

¹ Works, I, 28.

The other paragraph had reference to the slave-trade and was more denunciatory of the King than any of the remainder. It read: "he has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of this CHRISTIAN king of Great Britain determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold. He has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce. And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them: thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another." This is unquestionably one of the most forcible clauses that issued from Jefferson's pen, and its rejection, for the reasons which he ascribes, served to promote consistency of action on the part of the colonies, and prevent the forcing of an issue which the country was not yet in a position to face. But its omission was a serious blow to Jefferson, who all his days was a firm advocate of the suppression of the slave trade and of slavery.

The remaining changes that the Declaration underwent, were for the most part verbal and slight, and all tended in the direction of greater precision and terseness of expression. Thus concluded in committee of the whole on the afternoon of the fourth, it was reported to the Congress by Harrison, was read again, and received the final sanction of the Congress as the justification for the act that established a new nation among the powers of the world.

But¹ three of the many state documents that issued from the Continental Congress, during the nearly fifteen years of its existence, were regarded as of sufficient importance to have the signatures of the members appended: the Articles of Association, the Declaration of Independence, and the Articles of Confederation. Together they form the fundamental acts of union previous to the Constitution. The first two were of the nature of pledges on the part of the colonies to support one another in the fight against the common enemy, and the last was designed to be an instrument by which the federal relations of the states were to be regulated. Respecting the dates on which the Association and the Confederation were signed no question has ever been raised. It is to be regretted that the same statement does not hold regarding the Declaration of Independence. Ever rising in picturesque importance as the most familiar, and perhaps the most significant of the acts of the time, a wealth of tradition has grown up about its signing and promulgation. Unfortunately much of this is false and meaningless, notably that which connects the so-called Liberty Bell with the events of the day.¹ For the diffusion of the popular misconception respecting the signing there is ample warrant, in that the two principal sources of information which should be authoritative, are misleading.

¹ Much information has been derived in the preparation of the following pages, from Judge Mellen Chamberlain's essay on the Authentication of the Declaration of Independence in the volume, "John Adams, etc.," Boston, 1898. But the results have been arrived at by independent researches as well.

¹With the rehabilitation by which Independence Hall profited from the Centennial year, went the elevation of the bell to the position of unwarranted prominence which has since that time become more marked still. There is no shadow of authority even for associating the ringing of the bell with the announcement of the agreement upon independence. The mythical legend of the blue-eyed boy waiting outside the door to give the signal to the man in the bell tower is the product of the fertile imagination of one of Philadelphia's early romancers, George Lippard, who first gave currency to it in his appropriately called "Legends of the Revolution,—The 4th of July, 1776," 391 et seq.

They are an incorrectly printed journal of the proceedings of the Congress, and a carelessly composed heading to the engrossed document.

To understand how the errors crept in and what they signify, it is necessary to have before us the paragraphs of the printed Journal. And it must also be borne in mind that the proceedings of the Congress for the year 1776 were first printed, by order of the Congress, by Robert Aitken, in the spring of 1777. After recording that the Declaration had been agreed to in committee of the whole, and was reported to the Congress, this sentence occurs in the Journal for July 4: "The declaration being read was agreed to as follows." The declaration is then printed in its proper place, but in larger type than that used for the remainder of the entries. After its conclusion and in the ordinary type, we find the sentence, "The foregoing declaration was by order of Congress engrossed and signed by the following members," followed by fifty-five names, headed by Hancock's, the remainder being arranged in single column,¹ in geographical order beginning with New Hampshire and ending with Georgia. This entry has been the occasion of most of the confusion of subsequent years. Though the statement is not made that the members signed on the date under which their names are entered, and it is a well-known fact that more than a fourth of the members whose names appear were not present on that day, some of them not even being members at that time, none the less the fact that the names appear with the proceedings of July 4, has caused the popular error to creep in which couples the signing and the adoption of the document as events of the same date.

¹ This is the arrangement in the Aitken edition of the Journal, Philadelphia, 1777. In some of the later editions the signatures were in double columns.

For a full elucidation of this matter, it is necessary to reproduce the subsequent entries bearing upon the signing and official promulgation of the document. On the same day (July 4) the printed Journal informs us that a resolution was adopted to send copies of the document to the several assemblies, conventions, and committees or councils of safety, to the commanding officers of the continental troops; and to have it proclaimed in each of the United States¹ and at the head of the army. On the 19th, four days after it was made known to the Congress that New York had given her tardy assent to the wishes of the remainder, it was determined to have the Declaration "passed on the 4th, . . . fairly engrossed on parchment, with the title and style of 'The Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America'; and that the same, when engrossed, be signed by every member of Congress." On the second of August the Journal records that "The Declaration of Independence, being engrossed, and compared at the table, was signed by the members." These last two entries appear in print only in the Secret Journal, first published in 1821, as if it was the intention thereby to protect for a time the members who subscribed their names to an act that would have rendered them liable to trial for treason, if the revolution had been suppressed by the British government. And, further, the first official reference to signing the Declaration, coming as it does two weeks after its adoption, would seem to indicate, also, that the idea of thus consummating the act was an afterthought. On the 8th of January of the following year, when the approach of the British to Philadelphia had rendered it necessary to transfer temporarily the scene of activities to Baltimore, the Congress agreed for the first time to have an authentic copy of the Declaration printed with the names of the members who had subscribed it, and to send one to each of the states with the request "to have the same put upon record."¹ The records as reproduced above are the only references to the Declaration in the printed Journal subsequent to July 4.

¹ This is the first use of the phrase "United States" after the Declaration.

¹This was the first issue of the Declaration giving the names of the signers. It was printed at "Baltimore in Maryland, by Mary Katharine Goddard." Copies of this broadside are very rare, the only known copies being in the New York Public Library (Lenox), the Boston Public Library, and among the archives of the state of Massachusetts, cxlii, 23.

Turning now to the original manuscripts, we find in the entry for July 4 a significant disagreement with the printed Journal. In the first place there are two manuscript Journals among the volumes of the Continental Congress papers, now deposited in the Library of Congress, covering the proceedings of that day. One is known as the Rough Journal, and the other as the Transcript. From the latter, as indicated by a note in the handwriting of Charles Thomson, the Journal was printed. But in neither is to be found a copy of the Declaration with the signatures of the members appended, nor any copy of the signatures. In the Rough Journal, we find a blank space over which has been placed a printed broadside of the Declaration, attached to the page by red wafers. Following this, on the next page, we read: "Ordered that the Declaration be authenticated and printed. That the committee appointed to prepare the Declaration superintend and correct the press." This entry occurs in no other manuscript nor in any printed Journal, and its omission is to be explained only upon the supposition that in copying the proceedings of the day for the printer these sentences were overlooked by the usually careful Secretary, Thomson. For, had there been any desire to withhold them from publication, they would have appeared upon the pages of the Secret Journal, upon which they are not to be found. In the other manuscript, the Transcript, the Declaration is copied out in full in its proper place in Thomson's handwriting. From this it would appear that a copy of the manuscript of the Declaration was sent to Dunlap, the printer, immediately after the adoption of the resolution providing for its authentication and printing, and that performing his work with all possible alacrity, he had copies struck off not later than the day following that on which it was received, namely on the 5th. The authentication of this broadside, as required by vote of the Congress, was accomplished by affixing the signatures of Hancock, President, and Charles Thomson, Secretary, the words "by Order and in Behalf of the Congress," being added.

With this evidence both from print and manuscript before us, we are now in position to enter upon an examination of the question of the date of the signing. And if we are to arrive at anything approaching accuracy, all statements not strictly contemporary with the actual event must be disregarded. Nothing but additional confusion has resulted from placing reliance upon the recollections of the participants, as embodied in letters written more than forty years after the occurrences to which they refer. The memories of the Fathers are not to be trusted for details, after the lapse of so long a period, any more than those of ordinary mortals. In attempting to marshal the evidence of real weight then, we are at once struck by the fact that there are extremely few statements of value on which reliance can be placed. And the further point is revealed, that diligent search has not discovered any account of the signing which we know took place on August 2, except the formal record in the Journal.

We have seen that the authority of prime importance, the original manuscript Journal, contains no reference to any act of signing on July 4. The only entries respecting such an act are those bearing date of July 19 and August 2, as given above. Next in importance may be considered Jefferson's entry in his autobiography (written certainly within a very short time after the events which he makes note of, and perhaps even as he states "whilst these things were going on") wherein he records that after the Declaration had been agreed to it was "signed by every member present except Mr. Dickinson."¹ This is the only direct statement to be found that the signing took place on this day, and as will be shown, it is manifestly incorrect. Suffice it to state here that Robert Morris, in addition to Dickinson, could not have signed on that day, as he also absented himself in order that the vote of Pennsylvania might be cast for independence.

¹ Jefferson's Works, I, 28.

As against Jefferson's assertion we have three contemporary references of signal importance. Samuel Chase of Maryland signed on August 2. On July 5, when still absent from Philadelphia for the purpose of keeping Maryland in line, he wrote from Annapolis to John Adams, asking, "How shall I transmit to posterity that I gave my assent?" To this John Adams sent the well known reply on July 9, "As soon as an American Seal is prepared, I conjecture the Declaration will be subscribed by all the members, which will give you the opportunity you wish for, of transmitting your name among the votaries of independence."¹ Again, Elbridge Gerry, who had left Philadelphia on account of ill-health, twelve days after the Declaration was adopted, wrote to John and Samuel Adams from Kingsbridge, New York, on July 21, as follows: "Pray subscribe for me y^e Declaration of Independency if y^e same is to be signed as proposed. I think we ought to have y^e privilege, when necessarily absent, of voting and signing by proxy."² These statements are to be interpreted in only one way, namely, that there could have been no signing on July 4, even on paper, as Jefferson contended many years later when driven into a corner.³ No scrap or trace of such a document has ever been discovered, nor any reference to it except this one of Jefferson's. As all the other documents of importance to which signatures are attached are in existence, having been carefully preserved by Secretary Thomson, he would certainly not have allowed an original of such value to have been destroyed. Taken in connection with Chase's query and John Adams's reply, the words of Gerry "to be signed as proposed," and "signing by proxy" practically preclude the possibility of a signing on July 4.

¹ J. Adams, Works, IX, 421, and note.

² MS. Letter in Lenox Library, N. Y., Samuel Adams Papers.

³ Works, I, 38.

Turning now to a consideration of individual delegates who were present and might have signed on July 4, we are confronted by the fact that had a signing then taken place, the list would have been strikingly different from that with which we are familiar. New Hampshire's interests were then looked after by Josiah Bartlett and William Whipple. Those of Massachusetts by John Hancock, the two Adamses, Robert Treat Paine and Elbridge Gerry. Stephen Hopkins and William Ellery represented Rhode Island, while Roger Sherman and Samuel Huntington served Connecticut. The delegates from New York in Congress on that day were William Floyd, Francis Lewis, George Clinton, Henry Wisner, John Alsop, Robert R. Livingston, Philip Livingston, and possibly, Lewis Morris. Those from New Jersey were Richard Stockton, John Witherspoon, Francis Hopkinson, Abraham Clark, and probably John Hart. Disturbed Pennsylvania had to put her reliance on James Wilson, Benjamin Franklin, John Morton, Thomas Willing and Charles Humphreys; and little Delaware upon Caesar Rodney, George Read, and Thomas McKean. Maryland had in Congress William Paca, Thomas Stone, and John Rogers; Virginia, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Harrison, Carter Braxton, and probably also Thomas Nelson, Jr., and Francis Lightfoot Lee; North Carolina, Joseph Hewes and John Penn; South Carolina, Edward Rutledge, Thomas Heyward, Jr., Thomas Lynch, Jr., and Arthur Middleton; and finally, Georgia's delegation was made up of Button Gwinnett, Lyman Hall, and George Walton. It has been possible to determine definitely that of these forty-nine men all but forty-five were in Philadelphia on July 4. As to the remaining four, though no evidence has been discovered to show that they were absent, no positive statement has been found indicating their presence. These were the men in Congress on July 4, who voted for the Declaration, and whose names would have been affixed to the paper if it had been signed on that day. Comparing them with the list of those who signed on or after August 2, marked discrepancies appear.

In the first place, as has already been stated, New York's entire delegation, for lack of instructions, even abstained from voting upon the question of independence, and assuredly would not have signed a document for which they had not voted; and George Clinton, John Alsop, R. R. Livingston, and Henry Wisner, who were in Philadelphia on July 4, but not on August 2, never affixed their signatures, though Livingston might have done so, as he attended the Congress later on for several terms. Secondly, on July 20, Pennsylvania's entire membership was rearranged, and only four of those who had represented her previous to that time, Franklin, Morris, Morton, and Wilson, were re-elected. Similar changes occurred in many of the other delegations. Passing over for the moment the names of those who were not in the Congress on August 2, when the general signing took place, we are enabled to determine that some of those whose signatures are affixed to the Declaration, could not have signed on July 4, by showing that either they were then not members of the Congress, or, if members, were absent from their posts. Thus William Williams, whose name appears among Connecticut's signers, did not reach Philadelphia until towards the end of July, having been directed to repair to that city on the eleventh, by the Council of Safety of his state.¹ Of Pennsylvania's signers, Rush, Clymer, Smith, Taylor, and Ross were not members until July 20.¹ Chase and Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, were in attendance upon the Maryland Convention at Annapolis, and were being re-elected delegates on the very day when some suppose them to have been in Philadelphia, signing the Declaration.² Similarly George Wythe, on that day, was chairman of the committee of the whole of the Virginia Convention,³ and with him was Richard Henry Lee, who because of sickness in his family had left Philadelphia on June 13.⁴ Again, on July 8 Hewes of North Carolina asks solicitously about the welfare of Hooper, whom he had expected in Philadelphia long before.⁵

¹ Mass. Hist. Soc. Proc., 2d Series, III, 375; Force, 5th, I, 244.

Attempting now to determine the names of some of those who were present on the day officially appointed for signing the engrossed document (August 2), we reach the conclusion that a far greater number than has generally been supposed were not in Philadelphia on that day either. Attention has been repeatedly drawn to the absence of Matthew Thornton and Thomas McKean. Thornton was not elected a member until September 2, and did not take his seat in Congress until the fourth of the following

¹ Journal of Congress.

² Journal of Congress, July 18.

³ Force, 4th, VI, 1608.

⁴ Ibid., 834.

⁵ Ibid., 5th, I, 117.

November.¹ He is differentiated from all the other signers, in that he is the only one who took no part in the discussion and vote on independence, and did not arrive in Philadelphia until more than three months after the general signing had taken place. His signing is to be explained only by an unusually liberal interpretation of the resolution of July 19, which provided that after engrossment the document should be signed by every member of the Congress. But this resolution could not have intended that all members subsequently elected should sign, or else a series of extra sheets would have had to be provided for the purpose. Colonel McKean was for a long period absent from the Congress with his regiment, and he is himself authority for the statement that he signed some time in 1781.² And the first published list of signers, in 1777, omits his name.

But little notice has, however, been taken of no less significant absences than these. Oliver Wolcott, broken in health, did not remain in Philadelphia for the final decision on independence. He knew how his colleagues would cast the vote of their colony, and that his continued attendance was not therefore requisite, so he left about the end of June, and could not have been back in Philadelphia again before the end of September.¹ In the meantime William Williams, his substitute, had signed, and there was in reality no occasion for Wolcott to append his signature. But having taken part in the early agitation and debates he was allowed to sign under the general rule.

¹ Journal of Congress.

² Buchanan's McKean Family.

Elbridge Gerry, too, so important a factor in the early days of the discussion about asserting independence, who had left Philadelphia for rest and recuperation on July 16,² did not return until September 3,³ a month after he is supposed to have signed. On August 24, he was at Hartford, Connecticut, and in a letter to General Gates writes that he is on his way to Philadelphia, "from which I have been absent for about a month for health."⁴ The two famous Virginians, George Wythe and Richard Henry Lee, we have seen, were in Virginia on July 4. They remained there for a considerable period after that date, and were also absent from Philadelphia on August 2. On July 20, Jefferson mentions in a letter that he intends to set out on his return home not later than August 11, to visit his wife who is extremely ill, and adds that he hopes to see Lee and ¹ He was in New York on July 1 and at his home at Litchfield on July 15. Mass. Hist. Soc. Proc., 2d Series, III, 374, and Force, 5th, I, 970.

² Force, 5th, I, 348.

³ John Adams, Letters to His Wife, I, 161.

⁴ Force, 5th, I, 1146.

Wythe in Philadelphia before he departs. On the fifth of August he deplors the fact that Lee is unable to attend until the twentieth, as it prevents his visiting Mrs. Jefferson.¹ Examining the Journal, we find that Lee's name first reappears there on August 27, and Wythe's not until nearly a month later. Lee after the earlier date and Wythe after September 23 are repeatedly selected to serve on important committees. Had they been present before, it is entirely probable that they would have been chosen for similar service, as their counsel was much sought in those days, when attendance on the Congress was slim. Lee, therefore, must have signed some time after the end of August, and Wythe probably a month later, though their signatures lead Virginia's column on the document. It is altogether likely, too, that Pennsylvania's large delegation did not all affix their signatures on the same day, as it was unusual for so many delegates from one state to be in attendance at one time. As they came and went at intervals, they probably signed whenever, after the second of August, they happened to be in attendance on the Congress.

The engrossed document is itself largely responsible for the erroneous views which have been held respecting the date of the signing. Being headed by the legend, "In Congress, July 4, 1776," and ending with the fifty-six signatures, the natural inference to be made, until better information was obtainable, was that this official document was signed on that day. It is further misinforming, not only as regards the date of signing, but in its title, "The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States," under the date July 4. For on that day, as has been shown, New York's delegates had no authority to vote, so that unanimity was procured by their silence, but twelve colonies, therefore, taking part in the final ballot. And again, seven of the names that are affixed are those of men who were not members of the Congress on July 4—Thornton, Williams, Rush, Clymer, Smith, Taylor and Ross; while exactly the same number were in the Congress on that date but never signed at any time—Clinton, Alsop, R. R. Livingston, Wisner, Willing, Humphreys and Rogers.

¹ Works, II, 72, 74.

With all these data before us the inference is allowable that to but few men did the actual act of signing assume the large importance that it has since attained. The unanimous adoption of the Declaration was the important event, the signing a mere final touch, an after-thought. But two men, Chase and Gerry have recorded any anxiety respecting permission to sign. The others signed in accordance with the resolution passed on July 19, as a matter of course, and all except McKean, had signed when the copies of the Declaration, with the signatures of the members, were printed and distributed in accordance with the resolution of January 18, 1777.

Finally, a word may be added respecting the location of the signatures on the engrossed document. They are arranged in six columns in geographical order. Beginning at the left hand, the generous space of an entire column is given to Georgia—a treatment quite out of keeping with the extent of her efforts to support and advance independence at this time. In the next are those of North and South Carolina, followed by those of Maryland and Virginia, Pennsylvania and Delaware, New York and New Jersey. The representatives of these states having all signed, but one column more was left for all of New England, and the thirteen signatures from that region are crowded into the remaining space. When Thornton signed, there was no place for him to write his name with the New Hampshire delegation, so he was compelled to put it at the very end of the document, below the representatives of Connecticut. Nor was there room to allow for the grouping, with a space between each state, as is the case in all the other columns, except where great Pennsylvania's overwhelming numbers invade little Delaware's small allotment of territory.

If, as has been shown, there could have been no signing on July 4, this does not militate against the fact that the men who signed, and their successors in the Congress, had a full appreciation of the importance of the day. Beginning with 1777, each succeeding anniversary, during the whole period of the existence of the Continental Congress, was observed in appropriate manner with a banquet, toasts, fireworks and bonfires, and, much as we do in our time, committees were always appointed to see to it that no fitting detail was omitted that might render the occasion one of proper festivity and rejoicing.

CHAPTER VII

THE DECLARATION AND ITS CRITICS

When Thomas Jefferson penned the Declaration of Independence he could have had little notion of the fame that would be his in consequence. Nor could he have had more than a slight conception, far-seeing statesman though he was, of the ultimate influence that it was to have, not only upon the political ideas of America, but of the world as well. To say that, at home and abroad it is the most famous and familiar of our state documents, is but to record a platitude. But to seek the explanation of this fact is quite a different matter. Nor is it too much to state that, in spite of the familiar terms in which we speak of it, of the many occasions on which it has been read in public and in private, of the criticism to which it has been subjected on the one hand and the honeyed words of praise that have been heaped upon it on the other, it is within the mark, I repeat, to say that it is the least comprehended of all the great documents produced as a result of our political development.

The reason for this is not far to seek. To the people of the generation for whom it was written, it required no interpreters to make its meaning clear. It dealt with affairs that were so much of every day concern as to be entirely intelligible to all, to be thoroughly understood of the people. But as time went by, the men to whom the Declaration made this direct, forcible, appeal passed away, leaving no precise interpretation of the commonplaces which they comprehended so clearly as to lead them to believe that all who came after must understand with like readiness. Subsequent generations assuming to understand what they did not, have thoughtlessly taken it at but a part of its full value, and even then have derived a return far in excess of the outlay of time required for its perusal. My task will be, therefore, to endeavor to put before the reader of these pages something of the aspect that the Declaration had in 1776, and the meaning it conveyed to the men of the time; in the full belief, that such an analysis will add largely to our understanding of the origin of its enormous influence, and greatly enhance rather than diminish our appreciation of it.

In the words of Professor Tyler, the endeavor to reach a right estimate of the Declaration has been hindered by the two opposite states of mind with which its consideration is approached: "on the one hand, a condition of hereditary, uncritical awe and worship of the American Revolution and of this state paper as its absolutely perfect and glorious expression; on the other hand, a later condition of cultivated distrust of the Declaration, as a piece of writing lifted up into inordinate renown by the passionate and heroic circumstances of its origin, and ever since extolled beyond reason by the blind energy of patriotic enthusiasm."¹

Of the criticism to which it has been subjected there has been no lack, almost from the very day of its publication. "It has been attacked again and again, either in anger or contempt, by friends as well as by enemies of the American Revolution, by liberals in politics as well as by conservatives. It has been censured for its substance, it has been censured for its form; for its misstatements of fact, for its fallacies in reasoning; for its audacious novelties and paradoxes, for its total lack of all novelty, for its repetition of old and threadbare statements, even for its downright plagiarisms; finally for its grandiose and vapping style."²

All the strictures passed upon the Declaration, however, meriting attention may be grouped under the heads of want of originality; of being but a mass of "glittering generalities" founded upon an impossible political philosophy, not actually believed in by the men who gave currency to it, and now a

¹ Tyler's Literary Hist. of American Revolution, I, 498.

² Ibid., 499.

“creed outworn”; and, finally, of attacking the King with unwarranted severity, of holding him alone responsible for the commission of acts of which he was but the instrument, denouncing him without warrant as a “prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant” desiring to establish an absolute tyranny over the colonists.

The all-embracing reply to be made at this point is that the Declaration has not only survived the criticism of its enemies and the adulation of its friends, but still lives a vigorous life capable of influencing unknown future generations. No document has ever been put to such severe, intimate, popular use and service. And in that use and service, had it been incapable of withstanding the test, had it contained inherent defects of serious consequence, distortions of facts as well as fallacies of reasoning, inadequency in general and in detail, it would long since have been relegated to the curiosity cabinet of the antiquarians, together with many another state paper, the product of the same time.

By the accident of circumstance it became at one and the same time the herald proclaiming the birth of our nation, and the justification for that birth as well. Combining in itself two such mighty functions, it could never have survived the severe test of time had it not been provided with human elements of a profound character. Possessing these in large degree,—far larger than we now appreciate,—throbbing with life in each of its nervous sentences, it is by this inherent vitality that it has made its appeal to the masses and the classes of men, who, not fully understanding it, yet instinctively have a respect and regard for it transcending all else in American political history. The manner of teaching our history has had some effect in crystallizing this sentiment, but no amount of teaching could have produced this had the doctrine not been worthy of its teachers. In brief, it has been put to almost every-day use, and as yet gives no evidence of suffering attrition from the contact, even though temporarily injured in one of its most vital parts as the result of the political developments of recent years.

Considering in detail the criticisms mentioned above, we find that as respects its claim to originality it was first wounded in the house of its friends. John Adams was among the earliest to find fault with it on this ground, though he could never have composed a document so terse and brief. In the evening of his days, he still smarted from a knowledge of the greater popularity of Jefferson as compared with his own. He could never get over that this idol of the people should receive so much more of the credit for his share in the events of the revolution than himself. Accordingly, when the Declaration had withstood nearly a half century of assault, and reflected something of the lustre of renown gained by its distinguished author during his later political career, Adams thought to accomplish the impossible by trying to minimize its importance from the point of view of originality. He thought to condemn it by charging that it contained "not an idea . . . but what had been hackneyed in Congress for two years before. The substance of it is contained in the declaration of rights and the violation of those rights, in the Journals of Congress, in 1774. Indeed the essence of it is contained in a pamphlet . . . composed by James Otis."¹ He was entirely unaware, that in writing these words he had missed the point completely, and was unwittingly according the Declaration the highest praise that has ever been bestowed upon it. His criticism, which betrays a failing strength, for in his earlier and more vigorous years he could not have made so commonplace an observation, is one for which we should nevertheless be grateful, since it gave Jefferson the opportunity of penning that dignified, comprehensive, and telling reply in which, admitting that all that Adams said might be true, of which he was no judge, he adds: "Richard Henry Lee charged it as copied from Locke's treatise on government. Otis' pamphlet I never saw, and whether I had gathered my ideas from reading or reflection I do not know. I know only that I turned to neither book nor pamphlet while writing it. I did not consider it as any part of my charge to invent new ideas altogether, and to offer no sentiment which had ever been expressed before. Had Mr. Adams been so restrained, Congress would have lost the benefit of his bold and impressive advocations of the rights of Revolution. For no man's confident and fervent addresses, more than Mr. Adams's, encouraged and supported us through the difficulties surrounding us, which, like the ceaseless action of gravity, weighed on us by night and by day. Yet, on the same ground, we may ask what of these elevated thoughts were new, or can be affirmed never before to have entered the conceptions of man.

¹ The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved, 1764. For Adams' letter see Works, II, 514 note.

"Whether, also, the sentiments of Independence and the reasons for declaring it, which make so great a portion of the instrument, had been hackneyed in Congress for two years before the fourth of July, '76, . . . let history say. This, however, I will say for Mr. Adams, that he supported the Declaration with zeal and ability, fighting fearlessly for every word of it. As to myself, I thought it a duty to be, on that occasion, a passive auditor of the opinions of others, more impartial judges than I could be, of its merits or demerits. During the debate I was sitting by Doctor Franklin, and he observed that I was writhing a little under the acrimonious criticisms on some of its parts; and it was on that occasion, that by way of comfort, he told me the story of John Thompson the hatter and his new sign.”¹

No words by way of explanation or in addition can diminish or increase the force of this calm presentation of Jefferson's conception of the task before him, nor any serve as completer answer to the charge made. Originality of substance was the last quality the Declaration should have had if it was adequately to subserve its purpose.

Of the utter failure to comprehend the true significance and meaning of the Declaration, on the part of the later generations, no better example exists than that furnished by the renowned advocate Rufus Choate, who in 1856 first spoke of “the glittering and sounding generalities of natural right which make up the Declaration of Independence.”² This high-sounding phrase, as rhetorical as any part of the instrument which it seeks to criticise, has been quoted with such constant repetition and approval as to have contributed an idiom to our language. For that service alone it should be welcomed. If, however, this characterization is to be regarded as giving in any degree an adequate summary of the Declaration, as is assumed by the author of the most substantial of the recent histories of American literature,¹ its falsity will become apparent from a reading of the analysis supplied in the succeeding chapters. In the sense, however, that by the glitter of its golden phrases the Declaration to some extent blinded the men of the time, and prevented them from perceiving the full magnitude of the contest in which they were about to engage, Mr. Choate's words are measurably true. But such was not the idea he wished to convey, and such is not the understanding of those who have given his thought a currency that no counterfeit should have procured. He viewed it from its rhetorical side alone, overlooking the deep underlying basis of fact that it contained. In so doing he failed to discern that the leaders in the Congress at that time, had other occupations than signing their names to documents that were mere pieces of rhetoric. That the Declaration contains rhetorical passages none can deny, but that it is all idle vapping no one familiar with the history of the antecedent controversy, and the pointed references of each of its clauses, can admit. Moreover, the constant use and service to which the Declaration has been put, have caused its fundamental concepts to assume something of the nature of generalities to the masses of men. This is the natural consequence from the universal acceptance of maxims which at one time had to prove their quality before obtaining standing.

¹ Jefferson's Works, X, 267-268.

² Letter to the Whigs of Maine, 1856.

¹ Wendell's Literary History of America, 106.

By the vast advances made in recent years in scientific method, many old and cherished theories of past ages have been uprooted. The political ideas of the Fathers seem no more likely to survive than any other part of the philosophy of their time. This is natural, since in a dynamic society the discovery of new phenomena must give rise to new interpretations of them. But so far little conscious, discernible impress has been made by the latter-day doctrines of political science upon our political life. The whole body of the science is as yet too new to have done so, and until it has proved its mettle through trial, the masses of men will continue, certainly in this country, to adhere with tenacity to the old doctrines that have served as inspiration to so many generations. And just as the political philosophy of the eighteenth century now seems outworn, and has been supplanted by the evolutionary philosophy, so the latter will in all likelihood prove to be no more the final word upon the subject than its predecessor.

The answer to the charge of indicting merely the King when Parliament was as much to blame for the maladministration of American affairs as himself, has to some extent been given in the earlier pages. To have now held Parliament, or Parliament and King jointly, and not the King alone, responsible for the act which they were driven to commit, would have been to stultify the whole course of procedure of the colonies in the controversy. From its inception it was based on opposition to the ministry and Parliament, and on the assumption that the King and his acts were to be differentiated from the former.¹ It began with the denial of the right of Parliament to have control over the colonies, not only in matters of taxation but in general affairs as well, except so far as was necessary to promote the welfare of the British empire. Fundamentally it had its origin in the concept that the rights to life, liberty, and property, and "the rights, liberties and immunities of free and natural born subjects,"² were the colonists' by inheritance, and had been guaranteed to them "by the plighted faith of government and the most solemn compacts with British sovereigns"—not, it is to be noted, with the British Parliament.³ They held further, that the "foundation of English liberty, and of all free government, is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council: and as the English colonists are not represented, and from their local and other circumstances, cannot properly be represented in the British Parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in the several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal polity, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed." But from the necessity of the case, they would submit to the regulation of their external commerce "for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire, to the mother country . . . excluding every idea of taxation internal or external, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America, without their consent."¹

¹ See in this connection the early attempts in Pennsylvania to overthrow the proprietary government with the object of having the colony converted into a royal province under the crown. Sheperd, Hist. of Prop. Govt. in Penna. passim, Lincoln, op. cit., Chapter VI.

² Declaration of Rights, 1774.

³ Address to People of Great Britain, Oct. 21, 1774.

This then was their theory: the social contract idea of the origin of government, on which their relations with the British empire were based; the right to representation, and through their representatives the control of their property, subject only to a limited, vague, ill-defined, parliamentary supervision. A considerable number of the more logical, among them notably Jefferson, prior to the meeting of the Congress of 1774, had gone further, and disclaiming the authority of Parliament to bind the colonies in any respect whatever, spoke of the "acts of power, assumed by a body of men, foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws."¹ But since they admitted that full allegiance was owing to the crown, by reason of solemn compact, this was not seriously called in question in any document, except in one paragraph of the address to the colonies of October, 1774,²—and this may be assumed to be a slip. Going further, they stated explicitly in their first petition that they desired no diminution of the royal prerogative. Though how they could reconcile this with some of the passages in the address to the colonies of 1774, is not quite clear. However, entire consistency was never a characteristic of any revolution.

¹ Declaration of Rights, 1774, Article 4.

On the other hand the "legislature," "parliament," "the ministry," and "administration," are repeatedly denounced and held responsible for the ills from which they are suffering.³ As has been shown, the first occasion on which official expression was given to the grounds on which the United Colonies would base their contentions, and the lengths to which Parliament was to be allowed to go in exercising control, was in the Declaration of Rights of 1774. The very fact of determining then to issue addresses to the King, and to the people of Great Britain and America, with studied care ignoring Parliament from now on, except to denounce it, was in itself a renunciation of parliamentary supremacy more bold than any of the Congress' other measures. Nine months later, after again professing a willingness to submit to the acts of trade and navigation passed before 1763, the position of Congress was restated in the very words used before.¹ In the official answer to Lord North's motion, in the main the handiwork of Jefferson,² made a few weeks later, such paragraphs as this are found: "As the colonies possess a right of appropriating their gifts, so are they entitled at all times to inquire into their application. . . . To propose, therefore, as this resolution does, that the moneys given by the colonies shall be subject to the disposal of parliament alone, is to propose that they shall relinquish this right of inquiry, and put it in the power of others to render their gifts ruinous, in proportion as they are liberal." Again: "We conceive that the British parliament has no right to intermeddle with our provisions for the support of civil government, or administration of justice. . . . While parliament pursues their plan of civil government within their own jurisdiction, we also hope to pursue ours without molestation." And a little further on in the same document we find an enumeration of the acts which can never be submitted to since they evince a desire for "the exercise of indiscriminate legislation over us."

¹ Summary View, Ford's Jefferson, I, 439.

² Journal, October 21, 1774. The sentence begins, "By order of the King."

³ Address to People of Great Britain, and Address to Colonies, 1774. Declaration of Causes of Taking up Arms, July 6, 1775, etc.

¹ July 8, 1775, Address to the Inhabitants of Great Britain.

² Works, I, 18, 476. See p. 39, supra. Journal of Congress, July 31, 1775.

Side by side with these disclaimers of parliamentary supremacy went protests of the most absolute loyalty to the King.¹ And as if to render them the more forcible, they are accompanied by unequivocal denials that their conduct is actuated by a desire to separate from the British union and establish an independent government.² The unprepared condition of the country for war, is the best proof of the truth of these assertions, as well as the strongest answer to those who maintain that the whole agitation was but a veil to cloak a movement having as its ultimate object the establishment of independence. The country was not more prepared for independence than it was for war, at this time, a year before the final act was consummated, and had any idea of separation from the mother country been definitely announced, it would have wrecked the whole revolutionary organization. Scarcely half a dozen of the members of the Congress favored it, and they were the radicals among radicals, and their weakness was demonstrated by the overwhelming manner in which their opposition to sending a second petition was brushed aside.

¹ Petitions of 1774 and 1775.

² Journal, July 6, 1775.

The definite renunciation of all idea of parliamentary control of any kind came in December, 1775, in answer to the King's proclamation of August 23¹—the sole reply ever accorded to their last petition. In this we find also the most definite statement of the colonial view of the relations between the crown and the colonies, as yet put forward. Moreover, the wager of battle thrown down by the King is taken up, and now for the first time the rights of the crown are seriously called into question. In the King's proclamation the colonists were accused of "forgetting the allegiance which they owe to the power that has protected and maintained them." To this the reply is made: "What allegiance is it that we forgot? Allegiance to parliament? We never owed—we never owned it. . . . We condemn, and with arms in our hands, a resource which freemen will never part with, we oppose the claim and exercise of unconstitutional powers, to which neither the crown nor parliament were ever entitled. . . . We know of no laws binding on us, but such as have been transmitted to us by our ancestors, and such as have been consented to by ourselves."

¹ See p. 47.

The time had arrived, now, to take a further step in the enunciation of the theory on which the opposition to the British contentions was based. This was done in the document cited above in the following specific and thoroughly adequate terms from the point of view of English constitutional history: "We view him [the king] as the constitution represents him. That tells us he can do no wrong. The cruel and illegal attacks, which we oppose, have no foundation in the royal authority. We will not on our part lose the distinction between the King and his ministers; happy would it have been for some former princes, had it always been preserved on the part of the crown."¹ And in thus emphasizing the view that Parliament and the ministry were distinct from the crown, they were but giving voice to the doctrine of the separation of powers first announced by Locke, and more recently made familiar in the well-known work of Montesquieu, which every political thinker of this time had at his elbow.

Thus, having constantly drawn the distinction between the King on the one hand, and the ministry and Parliament on the other, and having already repudiated the ministry and Parliament in the terms recorded in the last few pages, there was nothing left for the colonies but to renounce, at the last stage, their allegiance to the crown. This was done for the first time in the resolutions of May 15, 1776,¹ and finally, and for all time, in the Declaration of Independence. By way of concluding the discussion of this point the words of Daniel Webster, who has so clearly interpreted the colonial position, may well be reproduced here: "The inhabitants of all the colonies, while colonies, admitted themselves bound by their allegiance to the King; but they disclaimed altogether, the authority of Parliament; holding themselves, in this respect to resemble the condition of Scotland and Ireland, before the respective unions of those kingdoms with England, when they acknowledged allegiance to the same King, but each had its separate legislature. The tie therefore, which our revolution was to break, did not subsist between us and the British government, in the aggregate; but directly between us and the King himself. The colonists had never admitted themselves subject to Parliament. That was precisely the point of the original controversy. They had uniformly denied that Parliament had authority to make laws for them. There was, therefore, no subjection to Parliament to be thrown off. But allegiance to the King did exist, and had been uniformly acknowledged; and down to 1775, the most solemn assurances had been given that it was not intended to break that allegiance, or to throw it off. Therefore, as the direct object, and only effect of the Declaration, according to the principles on which the controversy had been maintained, was to sever the tie of allegiance which bound us to the King, it was properly and necessarily founded on acts of the crown itself, as its justifying causes. . . . Consistency with the principles upon which resistance began, and with all the previous state papers issued by Congress required that the Declaration should be bottomed on the misgovernment of the King; and therefore it was properly framed with that aim and to that end. The King was known indeed, to have acted, as in other cases, by his ministers, and with his Parliament; but as our ancestors had never admitted themselves subject either to ministers or Parliament, there were no reasons to be given for now refusing obedience to their authority. This clear and obvious necessity of founding the Declaration on the misconduct of the King himself, gives to that instrument its personal application, and its character of direct and pointed accusation.”¹

¹ This remarkably strong paper was drawn up by R. H. Lee, Wilson, and W. Livingston.

¹ See p. 91.

To so much as concerns the charges in the Declaration respecting the establishment of an ab-

¹ Speech in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Aug. 2, 1826.

solite tyranny, and of a conduct, "marked by every act which may define a tyrant," but few words, in passing, are necessary. If the charges against the king had any basis in fact, they assuredly displayed a desire to establish a tyranny, as that term is understood in English constitutional history, and as it is defined by Locke. And the personal dominance which George III established over his Parliament and ministers, dating from 1768, by the most corrupt methods debauching the whole of the ruling classes for his own purposes,¹ was marked, if not "by every act which may define a tyrant," at least by sufficient to warrant recourse to that rhetorical characterization, when the exigencies of the occasion made requisite.

¹ See Lecky, Hist. of England in 18th Century, and Green, Short Hist. of English People. Also Donne's Correspondence of George III with Lord North.

CHAPTER VIII

THE PURPOSE OF THE DECLARATION

Consideration having been given to the erroneous conceptions respecting the Declaration, that have arisen as the result of approaching it with inadequate preparation for its proper understanding, it is necessary at this point to give attention to the purpose it was intended to subserve, and to regard it from the point of view of the success with which this was attained. For the accomplishment of this object it is requisite that so far as possible it be interpreted, not in terms of twentieth century philosophy or politics, but from the standpoint of the men who had a share in the events from which the Declaration arose, and of which it was, to an extent, the outward expression. No part of the writing of history is more difficult than that which aims to put ourselves in the place of the men participating in great historic movements, and to attempt to view the results of their achievements from their own attitude of mind, to penetrate the well-springs of their motives. Yet, unless this be undertaken, no substantially correct results can be achieved. Accordingly it is for us to consider now the motives actuating Jefferson's selection to prepare the Declaration, and the nature of the task put before him.

The stupendous magnitude of the work was appreciated by none so well as by him, and might readily have caused even a greater man to hesitate long before engaging in it. Yet the choice of the Congress, and of the committee fell upon him, with singular unanimity, as the one best fitted by his attainments to produce a document of the character desired. This was no mere chance, for, though his voice was silent, his pen had given full expression to his thoughts. He was no orator, but, "a silent member in Congress," yet "prompt, frank, explicit, and decisive upon committees and in conversation."¹

Among all the countless disquisitions upon the rights of the colonies, and the wrongs to which the colonists believed they had been subjected, produced during the previous fifteen years of controversy, one, written in 1774, and given the title A Summary View of the Rights of British America,² stood out in especial prominence, marking its author as a greater among great men. Jefferson designed it to serve the double purpose of furnishing instructions to the Virginia delegates to the first

¹ J. Adams' Works, II, 514, note.

² Ford's Jefferson, I, 421 et seq.

Continental Congress, and to give that body a common ground on which to establish its statement of grievances and demands for redress. That in some of its contentions it was too advanced to be suitable to the exigencies of the time and failed of its object, is not of importance in this connection. But it is to the point, that it displayed a scholarly knowledge of the history of the various colonies, a depth of insight into the essentials of the controversy, framed withal with a felicity and lucidity of expression, such as was possessed by none of his contemporaries. In the brief twenty-three pages of this essay he touched upon every phase of the colonial contentions, and thereby established his reputation as a forceful, sagacious, philosophical thinker.¹

To prepare a Declaration of Independence, however, was a far different task. That document, in a few lines, had to cover not only all the ground of the Summary View, but to recapitulate as well the rapid developments of the two full years that had elapsed since its production. (As it was designed to appeal to all the colonies, it had to treat not only of the grievances common to all, but of those that bore most heavily upon any particular colony, were peculiar to that colony, and consequently of transcending importance to itself. Yet in so doing the balance of the whole had to be carefully preserved, that no single part might rise to undue prominence by the over-weight of any other. But it could not stop here. It had to be couched in such terms as would serve as justification, to the world at large no less than to the inhabitants of the colonies, for the act which it proclaimed. Dealing with things familiar to every frequenter of the taverns, to every reader of the gazettes and pamphlets, it had to make its appeal to the thoughtful as well as to the unthinking, to the philosophers as well as to the groundlings, and in such a manner that they would not be wearied by its perusal, but stirred to enthusiasm as they proceeded. It had to include the best of the previous productions, but only their essentials. Not less a party platform of national scope than a political manifesto, the warmth of its phraseology must win over the wavering and fire the more advanced with a desire to come forward to enlist and fight for their rights and liberties, since troops were at this time much more needed than wordy rhetoric. As such it took the place of the "animated address," resolved upon at the end of May, which was "to impress the minds of the people with the necessity of now stepping forward to save their country, their freedom, and property," but which never saw the light, since the issuance of the Declaration made this unnecessary.¹

¹ See also his proposed constitution for Virginia, Works, II, 7 et seq.

All these qualities it must have and more besides. It must foster the rapidly advancing though far from strong sentiment of union, so that those who once gave assent to it would support each other no matter what the future had in store for them. And it must needs do this in such manner that no other course should appear practicable. It was to be the expression of a minority party, but of so well-organized a minority, that it could hope ultimately to effect the conversion of that party, by accessions to its ranks, into an unquestioned, dominating majority. It could not, therefore, be non-partisan, yet it must convince by argument as well as drive by force of its inherent power. And no slight portion of its strength was to be gained from couching it in a phraseology made familiar during the fifteen years of controversy, and having a basis in the whole of English and colonial constitutional development. It had to make charges, but none that could not be reasonably supported; and in indicting a King and a nation it had to word this indictment in such terms that it would not be thrown out of court by the country and the world. The position of the revolutionists had to be fortified so that it could withstand attack, and, having the choice of situation, it had to make the most of the enemy's weakness, nor yet disregard its strength.

¹ Secret Journal of Congress, Domestic, May 29, 1776. The committee to prepare this address consisted of Jefferson, Wythe, S. Adams and Rutledge.

Since it was to be, as has been well said by Professor Tyler, "an impassioned manifesto of one party, and that the weaker party in a violent race quarrel; of a party resolved, at last, upon the extremity of a revolution, and already menaced by the inconceivable disaster of being defeated in the very act of armed rebellion against the mightiest power on earth," it "is not to be censured because being avowedly a statement of its side of the quarrel, it does not also contain a moderate and judicial statement of the opposite side; or because, being necessarily partisan in method, it is likewise both partisan and vehement in tone."¹ Jefferson's position was that of advocate, and he so regards himself, and it was his duty, therefore, to present his case in the strongest possible terms, leaving his opponent to take care of himself.

But above all, had the Declaration comprised all the qualities which have been mentioned as necessary to its fulfilling the objects for which it was designed, it would never have survived as it has, and attained to its vast influence upon our political life, had it been lacking in three essential characteristics. These are its underlying philosophy, its human elements, and its literary form. Of the philosophy more will be said presently. Suffice it now to call attention to the fact that it had been preached to such an extent, that through the Declaration it could make its appeal direct to the mind of even the most unthinking. The human element of the Declaration appears in almost every phrase, from the first respecting the refusal of assent to laws most wholesome and necessary for the public good, to the last of exciting domestic insurrection and endeavoring to bring on the inhabitants of the frontiers, the merciless Indian savages. Had it not been possible thus to address the emotions of the individual and make him feel that his all was at stake, and had it not been done in such forceful, stirring, convincing manner, the revolution could never have been carried to a successful conclusion.

¹*Literary Hist. of American Revolution*, I, 509.

No one is better qualified to speak of the literary form of the Declaration than Professor Tyler. The praise he accords it is of the highest, but none familiar with his scholarly attainments will regard it as indiscriminating or lavish. "Most writings," he holds, "have had the misfortune of being read too little. There is however a misfortune—perhaps a greater misfortune—which has overtaken some literary compositions, and these not necessarily the noblest and best, of being read too much. At any rate, the writer of a piece of literature which has been neglected, need not be refused the consolation he may get from reflecting that he is, at least, not the writer of a piece of literature that has become hackneyed. Just this is the sort of calamity which seems to have befallen the Declaration of Independence. . . .

“ Had the Declaration of Independence, been, what many a revolutionary state paper is, a clumsy, verbose and vapid production, not even the robust literary taste and the all-forgiving patriotism of the American people could have endured the weariness, the nausea, of hearing its repetition, in ten thousand different places, at least once every year for so long a period. Nothing which has not supreme literary merit has ever triumphantly endured such an ordeal, or ever been subjected to it. No man can adequately explain the persistent fascination which this state paper has had, and which it still has, for the American people, or for its undiminishing power over them, without taking into account its extraordinary literary merits—its possession of the witchery of true substance wedded to perfect form: its massiveness and incisiveness of thought, its art in the marshalling of the topics with which it deals, its symmetry, its energy, the definiteness and limpidity of its statements, its exquisite diction—at once terse, musical, and electrical; and as an essential part of this literary outfit, many of those spiritual notes which can attract and enthrall our hearts, veneration for God, veneration for man, veneration for principle, respect for public opinion, moral earnestness, moral courage, optimism, a stately and noble pathos, finally, self-sacrificing devotion to a cause so great as to be herein identified with the happiness, not of one people only, or of one race only, but of human nature itself.”¹

If the Declaration be adjudged as reaching the high standards, and fulfilling the variety of purposes here set forth, with success even measurable, it will be admitted that few other public documents can be subjected to such a trial and emerge in triumph. Yet as the attempt is being made to view it from the aspect of the men to whom it was intended to appeal, so their opinion of it is of primary value. Amid the general chorus of approval with which it was acclaimed by the leaders, not less than by the rank and file of the party to whom it was directed, but one voice of strength in opposition is raised sufficiently loud to be heard. Robert Morris, in a letter to his friend Joseph Reed, gave as his reason for voting against and opposing the Declaration that “it was an improper time, and will neither promote the interests nor redound to the honor of America; for it has caused division when we wanted union, and will be ascribed to very different principles than those which sought to give rise to such an important measure.”¹ And here, it may be added, the opposition rests upon the opportuneness of the act, rather than the manner of its consummation. As against this, we may put the calm opinion of Washington, expressed in acknowledging to Hancock the receipt of the Declaration: “It is certain that it is not with us to determine in many instances what consequences will flow from our counsels; but yet it behooves us to adopt such, as, under the smiles of a gracious and all-kind Providence will be most likely to promote our happiness. I trust the late decisive part they have taken is calculated to that end, and will secure to us that freedom and those privileges, which have been and are refused to us, contrary to the voice of nature and the British constitution.” When proclaimed before all the army under his command, the Declaration received “their most hearty assent: the expressions and behaviour of both officers and men, testifying their warmest approbation of it.”² To Schuyler he spoke of it as an act “impelled by necessity, and a repetition of injuries no longer sufferable, and being without the most distant prospect of relief, they [Congress] have asserted the claims of the colonies to the rights of humanity, absolved them from all allegiance to the British crown, and declared them Free and Independent States.”¹ And in his orders to the army, he spoke of it as having been impelled “by the dictates of duty, policy, and necessity.”² The more enthusiastic Samuel Adams declared it “has given vigour to the spirits of the people.”³ His younger kinsman, John Adams, spoke of it as “a Declaration setting forth the causes which have impelled us to this mighty revolution, and the reasons which will justify it in the sight of God and man,”⁴ and again, as likely to “cement the Union, and avoid those heats, and perhaps convulsions, which might have been occasioned by such a declaration six months ago.”⁵ And William Whipple tells us that “This declaration has had a glorious effect—has made these colonies all alive: all the Colonies forming Governments, as you will see by the papers.” And in another letter, dated a few days later, he writes: “This Colony⁶ and New Jersey are all alive . . . men of fortune don’t think themselves too good to march in the character of private soldiers . . . —in short the Declaration of Independ-

¹ Tyler, I, 519-521.

¹ Reed's Reed, I, 201, July 20, 1776.

² Sparks' Washington, III, 457.

¹ Ibid., 464.

² Ibid., 458.

³ Force, 5th, I, 347.

⁴ Works, IX, 418.

⁵ Ibid., 420.

⁶ Pennsylvania.

ence has done wonders.”¹ Josiah Bartlett, in coming the adoption of the Declaration by New York, rejoiced that it now had “the sanction of the Thirteen United States,” adding, that “the unparalleled conduct of our enemies have united the colonies more firmly than ever.”²

Such was the high esteem in which both the act and the expression of it were held by the leaders of the time, and if to them it seemed adequate to the great occasion, we should accept their opinion as the final word. True, the Declaration of Independence and the ultimate acknowledgment of our national existence were separated by many trying years of weary contest, and the issue seemed more than once suspended in the balance by a mere thread. But this does not alter the fact that the Declaration of Independence was regarded as an opportune and comprehensive statement of the reasons impelling to that act at the time, that without it open assistance from France was not to be procured, and that after its proclamation no overtures looking to a conclusion of the struggle were for a moment considered, that were not based on public acknowledgment of the United States as an independent nation.

¹ Langdon-Elwyn Papers, Lenox Library, New York, 139-140. The letter is dated July 22, 1776.

² Force, 5th, I, 348.

I

to all

CHAPTER IX

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE DECLARATION

“Happy is the nation,” writes Sir Leslie Stephen, “which has no political philosophy, for such a philosophy is generally the offspring of a recent or the symptom of an approaching revolution.”¹ The philosophy of the American Revolution, though representative of the latter concept, has underlying it the story of a political development that has its roots deep down in English history of the seventeenth century. That was the age of intellectual and political revolt in England, which attained its final fruition in the following century in America. The Puritan Revolution stirred the political sense of the nation not less than its religious emotions. The intensive study which the Old Testament received in consequence, reacted in marked degree upon the political ideas of the time. As Borgeaud aptly puts it, “the first political manifestoes of modern democracy were formulated in England in the seventeenth century and they were the fruit of the religious revolutions caused by the Reformation.”²

¹ English Thought in the 18th Century, 3d ed., II, 131. ✓

² Rise of Modern Democracy in Old and New England, 105.

The theories of natural rights and the origin of government in contract had their rise at this time. Men were then more prone than now to seek for evidences of the Divine Hand in the institution of mundane affairs. And as ideas of government, lay and clerical, were receiving earnest study and new application, their origins were sought for in the sacred books. In these were to be found the earliest recorded instances of the genesis of government. With minds open to interpretations that fell in with preconceived views, the covenants recorded as made between God and the Jewish people, were seized upon as proof-positive of the contractual nature of the first governmental forms.¹ With circumstances arising to give their thoughts ready employment, it is not to be wondered that the contract theory was applied on the one side by Hobbes to bolster up the divine authority of kings, on the other by Locke to give warrant to the supremacy of the legislative arm of the government as the direct representative of the people.

If, therefore, we would seek out the immediate sources of the political philosophy of the American Revolution, we must look for them in the history of ¹ I am aware of the learned treatise by Dr. Sullivan (Rept. Am. Hist. Assn., 1903, Vol. I, 67 et seq.) tracing the social compact idea through classical and mediæval authors. But they did not have so immediate an effect at this time as the Old Testament.

English thought in the seventeenth century, and in the great state papers which clothed it in constitutional form.¹ The principal expounders of the political philosophy of this period were Hooker, Hobbes and Locke, and their very names are indicative of the historical events to which they gave literary expression. All of them based the origin of government upon a social contract, the outgrowth of a time when life in a state of nature no more proved feasible. To Hooker and Hobbes the state of nature was a condition of anarchy, of warfare and constant strife, to end which men established forms of government. To Locke, ~~on the contrary~~, it was a "golden age," and political societies were created to protect and secure persons and property, when men became corrupt and no longer respected each other's rights.

As Hobbes reflected the spirit of the Puritan Revolution,² so Locke "expounded the principles of the Revolution of 1688, and his writings became the political bible of the following century, the source from which later writers drew their arguments, and the authority to which they appealed in default of arguments."¹ And just as the events of 1688 and the final establishment of the supremacy of Parliament could not have occurred without the previous period of revolution and reaction, so Locke's Treatises on Government (issued in 1690), it may safely be said, would never have seen the light of day had he not lived through this formative time, and had the thoughts of Hooker and Hobbes and Sir Robert Filmer not been set down to spur him on to the expression of his views. Since Locke proved the "formal expounder of Whiggism"² in America to a greater extent even than in England, it is to his ideas that it will prove most profitable to devote attention. "His chief influence," it has been well said, "was in popularizing a convenient formula for enforcing the responsibility of governors,"³ and his arguments were not less familiar to every political thinker and writer in America, than was the Old Testament to the Old and New England Puritans.

¹ See in this connection, besides the works of Hooker, Hobbes, Locke, Sydney, and the political writings of Milton, the excellent and suggestive study by A. L. Lowell in his Essays on Government, Merriam's Am. Pol. Theories, Sir Leslie Stephens' English Thought in the 18th Century, Sir James Fitzjames Stephens' Horæ Sabbaticæ, Vols. II and III, Bryce's Studies in History and Jurisprudence, McLaughlin in Am. Hist. Rev., Vol. V, No. 3, 467 et seq., and Ritchie's Natural Rights.

² The Leviathan appeared in 1651.

Beginning in his second Treatise (the first being entirely devoted to a labored refutation of Filmer's Patriarcha) with a consideration of the state of nature, he proceeds to discuss the purposes of political or civil society and their beginnings, the forms of commonwealths, the powers of the several branches of governments (placing the treatment of the legislative power in advance of that of the executive), and then, after treating in order such subjects as the prerogative, conquest, usurpation and tyranny, he concludes most appropriately with an elaborate chapter on the dissolution of governments.

¹ Sir Leslie Stephen, op. cit., II, 135.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., 143.

In the state of nature, men are in a condition of "perfect freedom to order their actions and dispose of their possessions and persons as they think fit, within the bounds of the law of nature." Further, "it is a state of equality wherein all the power and jurisdiction is reciprocal, no one having more than another." This state, however, "though a state of liberty, is not a state of license." "It has a law to govern it which obliges every one, and reason, which is that law, teaches all mankind who will but consult it, that being all equal and independent no one ought to harm another in his life, health, property, or possessions,"—the "unalienable rights" of the Declaration of Independence. The law of nature confers upon man, therefore, all the rights of person and property. It is not to acquire property rights that man enters into political society, but in order to protect and secure those he already has, to avoid the destructive state of war that may arise at any time, and to remedy the inconveniences that have grown up in the state of nature.

Thus "men being by nature all free, equal, and independent, no one can be put out of this estate, and subjected to the political power of another, without his own consent." As soon as men agree to associate to form a political society, they enter into a social compact with each other, and consent to be guided by the will of the majority to make and execute laws for the general good. "Property," in Locke's conception, is used in a very extensive sense; it comprises all rights of any nature, especially those of a personal character, and it is the product of man's own labor.

As to the forms of government, he makes the familiar classification into monarchies, aristocracies and democracies, and then gives consideration to the various branches of government. Of these the legislative is all-important, mirroring thus the Whig view of the supremacy of Parliament as against the Stuart contention of the divine right of kings. "This legislative is not only the supreme power of the commonwealth, but sacred and unalterable in the hands where community have once placed it." But, though the legislative is supreme, "and therefore all obedience, which by the most solemn ties any one can be obliged to pay, ultimately terminates in this supreme power, and is directed by those laws which it enacts," it is none the less subject to four limitations. First, it can not be "absolutely arbitrary over the lives and fortunes of the people," since "nobody can transfer to another more power than he has in himself, and nobody has an absolute arbitrary power over himself, or over any other, to destroy his own life, or take away the life or property of another." "Secondly, the legislative or supreme authority cannot assume to itself a power to rule by extemporary, arbitrary decrees, but is bound to dispense justice and decide the rights of the subject by promulgated standing laws, and known authorized judges." For "absolute arbitrary power, or governing without settled standing laws, can neither of them consist with the ends of society and government, which men would not quit the state of nature for, and tie themselves up under, were it not to preserve their lives, liberties and fortunes." "Thirdly, the supreme power cannot take from any man any part of his property without his own consent," since the very aim of government is to preserve property, and if it be taken away without consent "they have no property at all." This idea of the consent to the appropriation of property as fundamental, is elaborated with much particularity, and in his recapitulation is re-stated thus: "They must not raise taxes on the property of the people without the consent of the people, given by themselves or their deputies." "Fourthly, the legislative cannot transfer the power of making laws to any other hands, for it being but a delegated power from the people, they who have it can not pass it over to others . . . nor can they be bound by any laws but such as are enacted by those whom they have chosen and authorized to make laws for them."

Next he discusses the relations of the legislative and the executive to the people. The executive he makes dependent upon the legislative, and over them both "there remains still in the people a supreme power to remove or alter the legislative, when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them." The prerogative of the executive, though necessarily extensive, has bounds set to it by the laws made by the legislative; since "prerogative can be nothing but the people's permitting their rulers to do several things of their own free choice where the law was silent, . . . for the public good and their acquiescing in it when so done." Having next put limits to the right of conquest which he calls "a foreign usurpation," he considers usurpation which "is a kind of domestic conquest, with this difference—that an usurper can never have right on his side, it being no usurpation but when one is got into the possession of what another has right to." Of tyranny, he says, "whosoever in authority exceeds the power given him by the law, and makes use of the forces he has under his command, to compass that upon the subject which the law allows not, ceases in that to be a magistrate; and acting without authority, may be opposed as any other man who by force invades the right of another."

The concluding chapter on the "dissolution of governments" is thus led up to. For this two causes may be assigned. The first occurs when by the arbitrary will of "a single person or prince," the legislative is altered, by setting up his own will in its place, by hindering its time and place of meeting and freedom of action, or by changing the "ways of election . . . without the consent or contrary to the common interest of the people." The alternative cause of dissolution occurs when the legislative and the prince act contrary to their trust, "when they endeavor to invade the property of the subject, and to make themselves, or any part of the community masters or arbitrary disposers of the lives, liberties or fortunes of the people." "Whenever the legislators endeavor to take away and destroy the property of the people, or to reduce them to slavery under arbitrary power, they put themselves into a state of war with the people, who are thereupon absolved from any further obedience, and are left to the common refuge which God hath provided for all men against force and violence. Whenever, therefore, the legislative shall transgress this fundamental rule of society, and either by ambition, fear, folly, or corruption, endeavor to grasp themselves, or put into the hands of any other, an absolute power over the lives, liberties and estates of the people; by this breach of trust they forfeit the power the people had put into their hands for quite contrary ends, and it devolves to the people, who have a right to resume their original liberty, and by the establishment of a new legislative (such as they shall think fit), provide for their own safety and security, which is the end for which they are in society."

Such is, in outline, the theory of government as expounded by John Locke. It displays in almost every part the doctrines made familiar by the Revolution of 1688. Moreover, as the political excitement died down in England with the settlement in 1689 of the great question that had agitated the country for half a century, and as the Whigs, the exponents of these ideas, were in almost constant power until the accession of George III, contributing so greatly to the ascendancy of the country, there naturally ensued a period of political contentment. During this, as the supremacy of Parliament had been established, the theory of the social compact and of the division of the powers of government was gradually lost sight of, so that when a forceful monarch like George III came to the throne, he was able by his dominating personality and his easy conscience to make himself practical dictator, within the bounds of the British constitution.

But in America other conditions produced different results. In the nearly seventy years succeeding the Revolution of 1688, great problems of government were being worked out anew. That period saw the evolution of the legislature in all the colonies to a position of authority greater almost within its confined limits, than had been attained by Parliament at home. And whereas the conditions in England allowed of the predominance of a forceful individual over the will of the nation, the more democratic character of political institutions in America saw the ever-increasing strengthening of the will of the people through their legislatures. During all this period parliamentary authority was little exercised over the colonies, while, on the other hand, much controversy arose between the King, as one party to a compact (of which the charters were the outward expression), and the colonists through their legislatures as the other. The colonists came to ignore the British Parliament in large measure, to look upon their own legislatures as taking its place in their life, and to view the crown, from which had issued their charters and privileges, as the connecting bond between them and the home government. When, therefore, the attempt was made to revive some of the lost authority of Parliament, under Grenville in 1763, it met first with remonstrance, then with opposition, and later with revolution. But the authority of the crown, even though it might be thought to be abused, was not seriously questioned. The limits to it, it was assumed, had been set by the Revolution of 1688, and it was only when these were believed to have been exceeded that the final stage of opposition to what was regarded as the unconstitutional aggression of the crown, was entered upon.

In this contest the theories of the origin and end of government, and the relations of the colonies to Great Britain were threshed over to such an extent that every thinking man knew the value of the grain winnowed out. Otis, the Adamases, Stephen Hopkins, Daniel Dulany, Richard Bland, Dickinson, Wilson, Hamilton, and Jefferson, to mention only the more important, all lent a helping hand. And though they differed in details and occasionally in results, they were in substantial agreement upon the following points. Before the time of the institution of government men were in a state of nature, and in possession of certain natural rights, life, liberty and property, which are antecedent to all rights acquired under government, and hence transcend them. In this state each man is perfectly free and independent, and no man is born ruler of others, but all are created free and equal in the right to rule themselves.

As certain inconveniences arise under these conditions, however, men enter into a social contract, by their own consent agreeing to form governments and give up certain of their inherent rights, that they may thereby ensure others to themselves and to the body politic which they institute, but especially that they may be rendered the more secure in the possession of their property. As their consent is necessary to this action, it follows that none of their property can be taken without this consent, given in person or by representatives chosen for that purpose. Hence "taxation without representation is tyranny." The right to representation, and of determination as to the disposal of property, was not one derived from the British constitution, but is one of the inherent rights of man which no authority can take away. Taxation without representation was slavery, taxation with representation was freedom. They had grown accustomed to the latter and would not submit to the former. Underlying the theory of natural rights and of the consent of the governed was the doctrine of popular sovereignty. "That the people are the basis of all legitimate political authority was a proposition which was little disputed at this time. . . . The inherent and inalienable sovereignty of the people was therefore assumed as a political principle of incontestable validity,—a premise which could not be assailed. Although frequent reference was made to this doctrine, there was little attempt at scientific discussion of the idea: it seemed, indeed, to be so generally recognized that elaborate argument upon the question was superfluous."¹ Side by side with these views went that of the sacredness of the right of revolution, which was accepted with no less unanimity than that of popular sovereignty. To defend their property against aggression was not only a right but a duty, and if in that defense governments were overturned, it was but the alternative to submission and slavery.

But brief consideration of this analysis of the views of the Fathers is requisite to discern in how much they breathe the spirit of Locke throughout. By them none was more often quoted, none more frequently appealed to, to justify the rectitude of their convictions. To no writer was he unfamiliar, and his very words were reproduced by many to help make a telling point. And of no one are these statements so true as of Jefferson, to whose metaphysical mind Locke seems to have made an especial appeal. Hooker and Hobbes and Sydney, too, receive their fair share of attention, but in no sense to the same extent as Locke. There was a time, now happily gone forever, when it was the fashion sneeringly to pass by the philosophy of the Declaration with a brief reference to its French origin.

¹ Merriam, op. cit., 53-4.

But this was the result of a superficial confusion of apparent similarity with derivation. A year before Rousseau's Contrat Social made its appearance, Otis had produced the first of his pamphlets, and before Rousseau's work was known in this country, had issued his Rights of the Colonists Asserted. These two works, full of the English political thought of the seventeenth century, were the direct antecedents to all the polemics of the following years, and contained the substance of the ideas that grew to be the familiars of the people. Montesquieu, it is true, was well-known and often cited in their arguments, but the views he held distinctly showed the influence of his visit to England and of the philosophy of Locke. In fact, the doctrine of the separation of powers, upon which Montesquieu laid so much stress, and which is perhaps the best known of his contributions to political science, is not much more than a reproduction of the gist of Locke's twelfth chapter. But we search the American pamphlets of the time in vain for any references to Rousseau's theories. And why should they have been resorted to when in their own language their own views were expressed to such good purpose and effect?

But it would never have been possible to base a revolution in large measure upon a political philosophy, had the principles of that philosophy not been so frequently reiterated as to become the common property of the people, and if its application to English history had not been so well understood. The contentions of the colonial leaders of thought were voiced in some sixty pamphlets, to mention only the more important, produced between the years 1761 and 1776. Not one failed to ground its argument as much upon theories of natural right and social compact, as upon rights possessed under the British constitution. This does not take into account the great multitude of contributions that filled the gazettes, from the days of Otis's stand against Writs of Assistance to those of 1776, when discussions favoring and opposing independence crowded the columns of every number of every issue. But this was not all. Petitions and resolutions of colonial assemblies and committees, drawn by the very men who were disseminating their views by means of pamphlets, served but to echo the sentiments of the disputants, making them resound throughout the land. Interpretations of the British constitution and of its relation to the colonies, went side by side with the assumption of natural rights, especially in the earlier stages, as witness the Declaration of Rights of 1774. [Therefore, when the time was ripe to state the reasons for it and to declare independence, the popular mind had been well prepared for its reception. Every man knew, or thought he knew perfectly, what were his rights by nature as well as those which were his by reason of his understanding of the British constitution. And every man knew, or thought he knew, how in the previous fifteen years these rights had been infringed upon. When the time for independence came he could therefore be appealed to for support upon philosophic as well as upon constitutional grounds, with the full assurance that these appeals would fall upon welcoming ears.]

} x 60

} x

In stating the case finally, it had to be put upon the highest plane that the exigencies would allow, to intermingle with a maximum of fact a modicum of idealism. The opening paragraphs of the Declaration of Independence represent this idealistic philosophy. Jefferson, practical man that he was, no more pretended to believe that the ideals which he was giving voice to were attainable, or were attained, at the time he was writing the Declaration, than he later believed that the constitution was the most perfect instrument of government that could be devised. But this was no reason for not setting down the current high-minded conceptions of the origin and end of government. When, therefore, he wrote of the self-evident truths, "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights; that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,—That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness,” he was but giving terse expression to the widely diffused convictions of the period. And in doing this he sought out the best model, and repeated the concepts, often even the very phraseology and arguments, of his master John Locke.¹

And as Jefferson was stating a political and not a moral philosophy, when he wrote that all men are created equal,² he conceived equality in the sense of political equality, which was the general understanding. Not of equality in every respect, but of equality before the law, in rights, privileges, and legal capacities. Here again he followed Locke, who held, "Though I have said 'that all men by nature are equal,' I cannot be supposed to understand all sorts of 'equality.' Age or virtue may give men a just precedency. Excellency of parts and merit may place others above the common level . . . and yet all this consists with the equality which all men are in respect of jurisdiction or dominion one over another, which was the equality I there spoke of as proper to the business in hand, being that every man hath his natural freedom without being subjected to the will or authority of any other man."¹ And Jefferson in his later life put these theories into practice in his battles for the democracy,² as Lincoln did in his fight against slavery.³

¹ A reading of Locke's second Treatise will show how thoroughly every sentence and expression in it were graven on Jefferson's mind. Note especially paragraphs 4, 54, 220, 222, 225, 230.

² No error is more common than to quote this clause “all men are created free and equal.” In the preparation of his careful summary, Jefferson aimed to include no terms over which controversy might arise unnecessarily. To a slaveholding people the inclusion of the word “free” might have occasioned this. Accordingly we find in his original manuscript draft the words “& independent” following “equal,” crossed out.

It is, however, when Jefferson comes to give the reasons for overturning the existing form of government that we find ourselves in the immediate presence of Locke, listening to his very voice. The third and fourth sentences of the second paragraph of the Declaration⁴ are, in remarkable phraseology,

¹ Second Treatise, § 54.

² For Jefferson's later views see Works, IX, 425, 426, and Merriam, op. cit., Chapter IV.

³ Works, I, 232.

⁴ "Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient an epitome of the salient points of Locke's last chapter. It was necessary to assume the establishment of a tyranny that abolished the freedom which was theirs by natural right, or else there was no justification for a revolution, since government should be dissolved only by reason of the specific usurpations already cited.

The investigation into the adequacy of the facts which Jefferson next proceeds to submit to a candid world, to prove the righteousness of his reasoning, will form the subject of the next chapters. And bound up with these facts are the colonial contentions respecting the constitutional relations between the colonies and the home government, and the rights and privileges to which by their charters they were entitled as free-born English citizens, as announced in the declaration of rights of 1774.

The influence of the Declaration upon our political institutions (or rather the influence of the ideas causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government."

of which is was the summary expression) has been profound. The concepts outlined above were the fundamental ideas of the men who were given the task of establishing the plans of government fashioned during and immediately following the revolution. And inasmuch as no small part of their preaching was that the ultimate seat of power was in the people, to the people was given a greater share in the control of government than the world had ever before been witness to.¹ No constitution failed to include the philosophy of the Declaration in some form, though it was not adopted to the same extent by all. It appears in those of Massachusetts and Virginia, in respect of the reasons for instituting governments, and in them all in respect of the looseness of government, since it was held that government was a necessary evil and the less of it there was the better for the happiness of the individual and society. This idea was given its most striking expression in the Articles of Confederation, which soon proved to be but the "rope of sand" its framers designed.

Again, the separation of powers, made familiar by Montesquieu, was characteristic of all, though the legislature, so much exalted by Locke as the exponent of the popular will, was now given as great prominence as Parliament had acquired in England. Coincident to this was the jealousy of the executive, and his power was consequently restricted in many ways, and made practically subordinate to the will of the legislature, the immediate representative of the sovereign people. Further, to render the people as nearly supreme as possible, the frequency of elections was repeatedly insisted on.¹

¹ See the constitutions of Massachusetts, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Pennsylvania, in Poore's Charters and Constitutions.

But it is not to the constitutions of the period of the revolution alone, that the philosophy of the Declaration has been limited. It has affected the whole fabric of our constitutional and legal development, and to an especial degree in its social compact phases. Notably this was the case at the time of the formation of the constitution, when men thought and spoke constantly of agreement and consent in the terms of the compact philosophy.² It has pervaded all our law,³ so that "in reading Locke we cannot fail to be struck with the resemblance between some of his deductions and the doctrines of our own jurists; and we might almost suppose that the 'Treatises on Government' were intended to be a commentary on the principles of American Constitutional Law." And it is only within comparatively recent times that the judiciary is beginning to free itself from these concepts, fundamental in the establishment of our political institutions.

¹ Merriam, op. cit., 74 et seq.

² See the brilliant article of Professor A. C. McLaughlin in Am. Hist. Rev., Vol. V, 467 et seq.

³ A. L. Lowell, Essays on Government, 155-156.

The impress made by the theory of natural rights and the social compact on our political and legal history has been so deep, that many more years of development will be required before these ideas can be completely superseded. And if this is ever successfully done, it will be accomplished by an unconscious rather than by any conscious process. They furnished the incentive to the revolution, as well as the argument for the contest against slavery. The roots of this theory are so deeply imbedded in the political history of England and America, underlying which is a stratum of the Old Testament teaching derived through the Puritan Revolution, that it will continue to be popular until that day, when the Declaration of Independence is no longer taught in the schools and ceases to be read before admiring throngs.

Nor can the evolutionary theory of the origin of government and society, now generally accepted in some form by teachers of political science, be made the basis for any such popular uprisings as have been the outcome of the older philosophy. The latter is instinct with life and can therefore readily be made to appeal to the emotions of men, through which alone great movements are achieved. The organic philosophy appeals only to man's reason, and as yet only to that of the higher thinkers. Upon such a foundation no great social or political movement ever was nor ever yet can be builded. Future generations will have recourse, in their uprisings, to the old guide, or else will seek a new, as yet not in evidence.

CHAPTER X

(1) THE "FACTS SUBMITTED TO A CANDID WORLD"

BEFORE undertaking an explanation of the grievances recited in the Declaration, it may be well to pass in review the method by which the British government exercised supervision over the colonies. The commercial policy inaugurated by Charles I in 1645, and extended in the Navigation Act of October, 1651, was continued under Cromwell and his successors.¹ By December, 1660, the trade of the American colonies had become of sufficient importance to induce Charles II to put its superintendence and management in the hands of a standing Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations.²

¹ Beer, Commercial Policy of England toward the American Colonies, Columbia College Studies, III, No. 2, 29, 37. The Navigation Acts are in MacDonald, Select Charters Ill. of Am. Hist., 1606-1775.

² Board of Trade Journals, I, fo. 1. The copy of the minutes of the Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, cited in these pages under the caption, "Board of Trade Journals," is that recently copied for the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, an exact reproduction, page for page, of the originals. The statements respecting the various councils and committees, known generally as the Board of Trade, have been procured from the volumes just mentioned, and from Documents Relating to the Colonial History of New York, I, xxviii-xxix.

Fourteen years later, by reason of political considerations, the commission of the existing council was revoked, and their books and papers were ordered to be delivered to the clerk of the Privy Council.¹ On March 12 of the following year (1675), Charles II, by order in council, referred the affairs, of which the old council had taken cognizance, to a committee of the Privy Council consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord Privy Seal, and others, who were to meet once a week and report their proceedings from time to time to the King in council. This arrangement was continued under James II and William III, though the latter gave to the committee the title of Board for Trade and Foreign Plantations. The importance which the trade of the colonies assumed, during the first few years of the reign of the last mentioned monarch, caused him to issue a commission, on May 15, 1696, establishing a permanent organization for this Board. The principal officers of state, including the Keeper of the Great Seal, the President of the Privy Council, and others, were created Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. Virtually without further change, they continued to control colonial affairs until March 11, 1752, when their functions were extended to include the recommendation of persons to fill vacancies in colonial gov-ernorships and other offices, and they were made practically the sole medium for correspondence with the colonies. On August 8, 1766, the board, which had acquired a position of quasi-independence, had its prerogatives somewhat curtailed by an order in council requiring that letters of instructions should be issued to the governors of the colonies directing them to correspond with the Secretary of State, sending duplicates to the Board of Trade. On January 20, 1768, the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies was instituted, and Hillsborough became its first incumbent. No further change was made in the method of carrying on official relations with the colonies until 1782, when the secretaryship for the colonies was abolished.

¹ December 21, 1674.

The usual procedure, during the period of the revolutionary agitation, was for the governors to transmit reports, the acts passed by the legislatures, together with the journals of the assemblies and councils, and any petitions that may have been formulated, to the Board of Trade. By that body they were given careful consideration, the acts being referred invariably to the solicitor-general for an opinion as to their consonance with the laws of England and with the provisions of the colonial charters. His report was usually final, and recommendations by the Board respecting the allowance or disallowance of acts of the colonial legislatures, in the latter case accompanied by the reasons therefor, with suggestions for amendment or alteration, were transmitted to the King in council. The King in conjunction with the Lords of the Committee of Council for Plantation Affairs made the final disposition, and the results were transmitted to the colonial governors, in the earlier period by the Board of Trade, and later by the Secretary for the Colonies.

This elaborate machinery for the supervision of colonial affairs worked sometimes with considerable smoothness, at others with great difficulty, for the control thus exercised was far from being nominal in character. The proceedings in the colonies were often given minute examination, and the royal prerogative of disallowing a colonial act was put in practice on frequent occasions. In reaching their determinations the Board was aided by the agents whom practically all the colonies maintained in London to look after their affairs. These agents, among whom Franklin and Burke were the most noted, often represented several colonies, and appeared before the Board whenever they could thereby advance the interests of the colonies. At times they were given hearings extending over a number of sessions. But the process of transmitting all laws to England was a tedious requirement occasioning much delay, was a never-ending source of irritation to the colonies, and caused them to resort to various subterfuges to circumvent it.

The deeds that led directly to the revolution are easy to discover, as they lie upon the surface of events, and are not readily to be overlooked. But beneath these were more deep-seated causes, that may be said to have taken their origin with the founding of the colonies. The Navigation Acts aimed to control the colonial commerce for the benefit of England. By restrictions on such colonial manufactures as woolens, hats, and the products of iron, it was intended to make the colonies "the vent of England's manufactures."¹ The bounties granted for the production of naval stores and related products, and the later concessions designed to render submission to taxation by Parliament palatable, were by no means a compensation, either in degree or in kind, for the unwelcome restrictions.² As long as the colonies were in their infancy they stood in need of the tutelage of the home government. As they grew to manhood they found it possible to stand by themselves, were able in most respects to safeguard their own welfare. During this period of development, and largely aiding in it, control by the British authorities was most lax. At the very time when the fostering care of the home government came no longer to be required, the turn in the tide of the British colonial policy set in under Grenville. Close supervision then succeeded gross neglect. It was as if a parent had allowed his offspring to attain majority without any serious attempt at influencing the formation of his character, and then suddenly undertook to enforce the authority that had been kept so long in abeyance.

¹ Beer, op. cit., 66.

² Ibid., passim.

Again, just when this stage of development was reached, the requirement that all laws be sent to England for revision, and for allowance or disallowance, proved most irksome and worked inevitably towards disunion. The exercise of close supervision over practically every colonial enactment, though recognized as a perfectly legal exaction, was one that readily gave rise to many abuses and much controversy.

It was not without reason, therefore, that emphasis was put upon this serious grievance in the Declaration, that it was given the position of honor in the opening paragraphs, and that in the first two charges against the King,¹ Jefferson leaps at once into the thick of the controversy. In the terse words of these two grievances he has included the whole of the great question of the constitutional relations of the colonies to the crown, that agitated England and America for all of a century.

¹ "He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good."

"He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended has utterly neglected to attend to them."

(1) Excepting only Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Maryland, all the colonies had fully experienced what it meant to enact laws "wholesome and necessary for the public good," only to have them repeatedly rejected by the King in council. In addition, the royal governors were often specifically instructed to withhold assent from certain kinds of legislation. Every man had felt the strong arm of the home government interfering, not only in the public, but in his private affairs as well. To such an extent had this been carried, that after 1773 not even a divorce could be granted in any of the colonies, for the penalty was instant dismissal to the governor who gave countenance to such a law. That same year witnessed at least twenty important colonial laws rejected by the King upon various pretexts.¹ The leading men in America were keenly alive to the irritating effects of this course, and Jefferson had already given expression to the feeling existing, when he wrote, in 1774, "for the most trifling reasons, and sometimes for no conceivable reason at all, his majesty has rejected laws of the most salutary tendency."² What Jefferson had in mind, however, was the repeated disallowance of certain laws passed by the colonies to promote their welfare, but which came into conflict with the policy of the home authorities. Such were the laws of Virginia, and other Southern colonies, designed to prohibit the slave-trade and the introduction of convicts, and those of nearly all the colonies for issuing bills of credit and for naturalizing aliens. Massachusetts, as is well known, had her great disputes over laws relating to the question of compensating, in her own way, the sufferers from the Stamp Act riots, as well as over methods of taxation and the appropriation of money for salaries of government officials.

¹ Board of Trade Journal, 1773.

² Works, I, 440.

Steps to restrict the importation of slaves were taken at an early date, but every law of this nature was disallowed by the crown, on the ground that an important branch of British trade would thereby be interfered with.¹ Thus fared the acts framed in South Carolina in 1760, in New Jersey in 1763, and in Virginia in 1772. The rejection of Virginia's law caused particular irritation, since it was the latest in a long series of similar ineffectual acts, and had been accompanied by an especial appeal to the King that the governor might be allowed to assent to it. A royal instruction was issued to the governor of New Hampshire, upon his appointment in

¹ Dubois, Suppression of the Slave Trade.

1761, preventing him from signing any law imposing duties on negroes imported into that colony, and subsequent royal instructions required the colonists to desist from their opposition to the slave-trade. The strength of feeling on this subject is exhibited in the stand taken by the Congress of 1774, which by the Articles of Association prohibited the importation of slaves, and the slave-trade after December 1, of that year. And again, on April 6, 1776, when the ports of the country were thrown open to trade with the world, the only qualification was the resolve to import no slaves into any of the colonies.

(2) The attempts to prevent the entrance of convicts, regarded, if possible, with even less favor than slaves, met with no greater success. Many of this class, under the English law which allowed those convicted of crime the option, in some cases, between imprisonment, death, or transportation to America, preferred to leave England. Their arrival met with opposition, particularly in Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania, which colonies endeavored by laws passed early in their history, to restrict the entrance of this undesirable class. But every such act was disallowed. Franklin spoke of this in 1768 as having "long been a great grievance to the plantations in general,"¹ and John Dickinson wrote in the same year, "the emptying their jails upon us and making the Colonies a Receptacle for the Rogues and Villains: an Insult and Indignity not to be thought of, much less borne without Indignation and Resentment.”¹

¹ Works, Sparks' ed., II, 496, IV, 252.

Also, owing to the scarcity of specie, bills of credit were then an absolute necessity in order that the colonists might be enabled to carry on trade by means other than those of mere barter. But the policy of King and Parliament was against the allowance of any issues of paper money. First came the breaking up of the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania land bank schemes,² by an act of Parliament in 1751, which restrained the northern colonies from making any new issues or reissuing old bills, except in sudden emergencies. Then in September, 1764, basing its action on a report of Lord Hillsborough, president of the Board of Trade, Parliament passed an act prohibiting any issues of bills of credit from being made legal tender, and placing restrictions upon them in other respects. Frequent petitions against this act effected no result.³ In 1765, when Governor Moore was sent to New York, he received a royal instruction to assent to no law whatever for striking bills of credit, though this was modified

(4)

¹ Almon's Prior Docs., 224. Life and Writings of Dickinson, II, 413. Address of Philadelphia Merchants, April 25, 1768.

² Shepherd, Penna. under Proprietary Govt., 422.

³ Franklin's Works, VII, 429-430.

somewhat in the following year when permission was granted to issue bills under certain restrictions, and if not in contravention of the act of 1764. Laws of New Jersey¹ (1758 and 1769), of Pennsylvania (1759), and of New York (1769 and 1770)² for issuing these bills were disallowed by the King in spite of urgent petitions in their favor.

(5) When Massachusetts, in 1766, compensated those who suffered from the riots occasioned by the attempted enforcement of the Stamp Act, pardoning the offenders at the same time, the law was promptly disallowed. Not only this, but the King by order in council, May 13, 1767, required the governor to have a law passed compensating the sufferers, "unmixed with any other matter whatsoever."³ A few years later, when the controversy thickened, the Governor of Massachusetts and the Assembly of that colony were continually at loggerheads. The disallowance by the former of the bill passed in 1771,⁴ taxing the new Customs Commissioners, created by the Townshend Act, served not only to increase the existing feeling of irritation at having such a body of foreign and uncontrolled officers in their midst, but also tended to interfere

¹ N. J. Archives, 1st ser., X, 115.

² Docs. Rel. Col. Hist. of N. Y., VIII, 202-205, 215.

³ Almon's Prior Docs., 141-142; Mass. Hist. Coll., 6th Series, IX, 82 et seq.

⁴ Mass. State Papers, 306-307.

seriously with the necessary legislation of the colony. The disallowance of naturalization laws need not detain us here, for we shall have occasion to speak of them below.

Passing to the second charge, we find it but a refinement, or rather an elaboration, of the preceding. The first intimation that a closer control over colonial legislation was intended, came when Parliament addressed the King, in 1740,¹ requesting that governors of the colonies be instructed to assent to no law that failed to contain a clause suspending its action until transmitted to England for consideration. This was followed by a royal instruction of March, 1752, requiring a revision of the laws in force in all the royal provinces, and ordering at the same time their transmission to England, and the insertion in each of a clause "suspending and deferring the execution thereof until the royal will and pleasure may be known thereon."² A case in point arose in New York, in 1759, when Governor De Lancey was instructed to assent to no law empowering justices of the peace to try minor causes, unless such act contained the suspending clause.³ The endeavor to suppress lotteries, then so great a factor

¹ Answer to the Declaration of Independence, 5th ed., London, 1776, p. 21. Commons Journal, XXIII, 528.

² Docs. Rel. Col. Hist. N. Y., VI, 755-756.

³ Ibid., VII, 406.

(2) in the economic and social life of the colonies, was a stroke of policy that made its effects felt seriously in all the colonies. Down to 1769 they flourished unrestricted, but in June of that year the royal governors were enjoined from assenting to any law creating them that lacked the suspending clause,—a practical veto upon all attempts at raising funds by such means.¹ Special instructions (1771) prohibited Governor Martin of Virginia from signing any law of this character, on the reasonable ground that the practice “doth tend to disengage those who become adventurers therein from that spirit of industry and attention to their proper callings and occupations on which the public welfare so greatly depends.”²

(3) As respects the latter portion of this second charge,—the neglect of laws suspended in their action until the royal assent was obtained,—we have a typical instance in four laws passed in Virginia, in 1770, and transmitted to England at once. They were not even considered by the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations until nearly three years after their enactment.³ Three were then confirmed, but a fourth was set aside for final action at a later date, until more information respecting it could be obtained from the governor of Virginia. Jefferson gave expression to the feeling in Virginia when he wrote, in 1774, "his Majesty permitted our laws to lie neglected in England for years, neither confirming them by his assent, nor annulling them by his negative; so that such of them as suspend themselves until his majesty's assent be obtained, we have feared, might be called into existence at some future and distant period, when the time and change of circumstances shall have rendered them destructive to his people here. . . . his majesty by his instruction has laid his governors under such restrictions that they can pass no law of any moment unless it have such suspending clause; so that, however immediate may be the call for legislative interposition, the law cannot be executed until it has twice crossed the Atlantic, by which time the evil may have spent its whole force."¹

¹ Ibid., VIII, 174-175.

² N. C. Col. Recs., VIII, 515.

³ Board of Trade Journal, 1773, Vol. 81, 49-50.

Closely related to this grievance was the opposition created by the increase, after 1770, in the number of royal instructions issued to the governors. Every royal governor, moreover, upon setting out for his post, was furnished with instructions by which he was to be guided in the conduct of his office. New policies were frequently initiated in this way, and gave rise to many clashes between the governors and the legislatures. The veto power of the governor, under his instructions, was always a source of irritation, and was looked upon as an infringement upon the legislative independence of the assemblies.¹ So far as regards Massachusetts, Samuel Adams contended that instructions were given the force of laws, and thus came to be subversive of charter privileges.² And Pownall held that "in some cases of emergency, and in the cases of the concerns of individuals, the instruction has been submitted to, but the principle never."³

¹ Summary View, Works, I, 440-441.

3 With the third charge,⁴ however, we reach the first grievance in the list that meant much to the men of the days of the revolution, but which conveys no message to us. It has to do with the erection of additional counties out of newly-settled districts, and with their representation in the colonial assemblies. As the population spread out from the centers into the more remote regions, the inhabitants demanded representation in the legislatures. The colonists claimed this power as a right. But the crown, in accordance with the English law, regarded the issuance of writs for representation as a preroga-

¹ Greene, The Provincial Governor, 162-163.

² Mass. State Papers, 307.

³ Administration of the Colonies, 39.

⁴ "He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only."

tive of the sovereign, to be exercised in the colonies through the royal governors. Holding such conflicting views, clashes were inevitable. They came in New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, and Virginia, the colonies most actively engaged in peopling their western lands. New York tried to give representation to two newly erected counties, Cumberland¹ (1766) and Albany (1768), but was prevented in each case. More than that, in the latter instance the King graciously consented to the division of the county and the election of two members from it to the Assembly, but only on condition that in the law establishing the new county no mention should be made of representation.² The year 1767 witnessed the issuance of a royal instruction embodying, in most stringent form, the design to control absolutely the whole matter of representation in the assemblies, and the qualifications of electors and the elected as well.³ Virginia felt this bore with particular severity upon her, and her leading men knew well that Governor Martin had, in 1771, received explicit orders to carry out this instruction to the letter. Jefferson regarded it as a great grievance and an infringement on the rights of freemen.

¹ Docs. Rel. Col. Hist. of N. Y., VII, 918. Journal of N. Y. Legislative Council, II, 1594-1596.

² Docs. Rel. Col. Hist. of N. Y., VIII, 100.

³ Ibid., 946.

According to his view, the people living on the western borders and having no local courts, nor any local government, found the administration of justice almost an impossibility. "Does his Majesty seriously wish," wrote he, "and publish it to the world, that his subjects should give up the glorious right of representation, with all the benefits derived from that, and submit themselves the absolute slaves of his sovereign will?"¹

(2) In New Hampshire the dispute was of early origin, and resulted for a time in the defeat of the contention of the assembly which aimed to give to that body the control over representation. But in the last days of the old order the controversy was revived, when rights of various kinds were being examined with careful scrutiny and were being asserted with vigor, if not always with discretion. Upon this very point, of the admission of new members from the towns of Plymouth, Orford, and Lime, "called in" by the King's writ by Governor Wentworth, the assembly made its final stand, and it breathed its last breath, on July 18, 1775, with this contention on its lips.²

We come next to the three charges³ respecting the

¹ Works, I, 441.

² Force, 4th, II, 1175, 1678-1679. The reply of Governor Wentworth to the claims of the Assembly is an able document, and thoroughly sound in its reasoning.

³ "He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their removal of assemblies, their dissolution, and the failure to convoke them after long periods. These need detain us but a moment, since the details of the removal of the Massachusetts Assembly to Cambridge¹ and Salem,² and that of South Carolina to Beaufort,³ are many and varied, and are to be found in all histories of the times. Moreover, all accounts tell of the dissolution of the Virginia Assembly, in 1765, after the passage of Patrick Henry's famous resolutions; of that of Massachusetts, in 1768, for refusing to review the action on the Circular Letter; and of those of South Carolina and Georgia for daring to withstand Lord Hillsborough's order to treat that letter "with the contempt it deserves." In like manner, the passage of the ringing Virginia Resolves, in May, 1769, against the revival of the statute of Henry VIII, permitting of the transporta- public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures."

"He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people."

"He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers from invasion from without, and convulsions within."

¹ 1769-1772.

² 1774.

³ 1772.

(7) tion to England for trial of persons accused of treason, led to another dissolution. And when a Continental Congress was being called together, in 1774, all but three of the colonies had to elect delegates by means of provincial conventions or committees of correspondence, because their assemblies had been dissolved by the governors. The last of the charges relates undoubtedly to the calling of the Boston town meeting of September, 1768, to urge upon the governor the necessity for convening the Assembly, which had been dissolved because of its action on the Circular Letter, while troops, but recently ordered to Boston to quell the disturbances there, "exposed the citizens to all the dangers of invasion from without and convulsions from within." And in New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Virginia, in the autumn of 1775, affairs of government had come to such a pass that an appeal to the Congress was made for advice. The answer came to establish governments that will "best promote the happiness of the people," and "most effectually secure peace and good order."¹

7 We turn now from the familiar details of dissolved assemblies to the little known affairs of land grants and naturalization.² The proclamation of

¹ See p. 34.

² "He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws of Naturaliza-the autumn of 1763,¹ in which the King expressed his intention to erect new colonies out of lands that the colonists claimed by right of charter, meant the serious curtailment of these claims and the obstruction of the migration westward, and marked the initiation of a new policy. It restricted the limits of the colonies claiming rights to the South Seas to "the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean." Beyond the "heads or sources" was a reserved domain, out of which the governors were prohibited from making any grants whatever. Worse still, those who had settled in these regions were peremptorily ordered to vacate, on the pretext that the lands were reserved for the Indians. But the movement had already set toward the west, and no such restrictions could check it. Land companies, in which Franklin and men of his stamp were interested, made petition for the right to found colonies, but met only with refusal. Yet the westward migration could not be stayed, although this was attempted by means of an Order in Council of 1773,² prohibiting the royal governors from issuing any patents until further instructions tion of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands."

¹ MacDonald, Sel. Charters, 1606-1775, 267.

² April 7, 1773. N. C. Col. Recs., IX, 632-3.

(3) were given. These followed a year later,¹ and were even more grievous, in that they raised the "conditions of new appropriations of lands." The royal lands were to be sold at specified times to the highest bidders, at the upset price of sixpence per acre, and with the reservation of an annual quit-rent of one half-penny an acre to the King. No lands were to be disposed of except in this way. Jefferson had this in mind when he wrote the Declaration, and when he said, in 1774, "His Majesty has lately taken on him to advance the terms of purchase, and of holding to the double of what they were, by which means the acquisition of lands being rendered difficult, the population of our country is likely to be checked."² Only the advance of the revolution prevented the carrying out of these provisions, which were everywhere regarded as harsh and unjust.

(1) Closely allied to the question of granting lands was that of the naturalization of aliens. This was very generally practiced by the colonies, not so much with a view to conferring political rights as for the purpose of attracting desirable immigrants to open up their undeveloped territory. Where the right to transmit his property to posterity was accorded him, there would the immigrant settle. Such acts of naturalization met with no comment from the home government till the proclamation of 1763 was issued. From that time on, however, few of these acts passed the ordeal of the Commissioners for Trade and Plantations without recommendation for disallowance. Finally, in November, 1773, came the royal instruction prohibiting absolutely the naturalization of any aliens, and the passage of any acts to that end. It was a heavy blow to the prosperity of the larger land-holding colonies, Virginia, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, the settlement of which bade fair now to be seriously interfered with.

¹ February 3, 1774. Docs. Rel. Col. Hist. N. Y., VIII, 410-412.

² Works, I, 444. See also on "raising the conditions of new Appropriations of lands," ibid., 452-453.

That part of the same charge mentioning the refusal to assent to laws encouraging immigration, has reference to an act passed in North Carolina in 1771. It exempted persons coming immediately from Europe from all forms of taxation for four years. It was disallowed, however, by the King, in February, 1772, on the ground that it related especially to certain Scotch immigrants, since its provisions applied only to persons coming immediately from Europe, and thus might have an evil effect upon the "landed Interests and Manufacturers of Great Britain and Ireland."¹ (2)

¹ N. C. Col. Recs., IX, 251-252.

4 We come next to the complaint of the interference with the administration of justice by the refusal of assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.¹ The man whose mind evolved the Declaration knew that in such a state paper the most crying wrongs of each colony must, in some measure, be enumerated. Though it would be best, for the most part, to confine the charges to those restrictive measures that concerned all alike, the most serious local grievances of each colony must not be disregarded. The colony whose cause is here advocated is North Carolina. (11) And unquestionably the political consideration that she had been the earliest to declare in favor of independence, was the occasion for this signal recognition of her wrongs. Beyond the pages of local histories we seek in vain for the explanation of this important episode in her history, even though it attained a prominence so great as to find a place in the Declaration.

The controversy held in mind by Jefferson was an old one, and began when, in January, 1768, Governor Tyron signed a law, passed at a previous session of the Assembly of North Carolina, providing, among other things, for establishing superior courts of justice. The law was to be in force for five years only, and from then to the end of the next regular session of the Assembly For three years all went well, because the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations paid little attention, in the interval, to colonial laws. Fault was then found with this "superior court act," because of a clause that made the property of persons who had never been in the colony liable to attachment on the suit of the creditor. This was in contravention of the letter and the spirit of the laws of England. Though the Lords Commissioners considered it a serious departure from legal form, they agreed, nevertheless, that if the Assembly would amend the act in this particular, they would not recommend its disallowance.² No action, in response to this hint, was taken by the North Carolina Assembly, and after waiting a due season—about a year,—the King issued an instruction prohibiting his governor from giving assent to any law containing the attachment clause, unless it included a provision suspending its operation until the royal pleasure was made known.³ This had come in February, 1772, and was well timed, for the law was to expire by limitation the next year, and, consequently, if proper provision were not made by the Assembly, no superior courts would exist in the province. In February, 1773, therefore, when the Assembly passed a new court act, making provision for superior and inferior courts and retaining the objectionable attachment clause, the contest was on in bitter earnest. The first law enacted contained no suspending clause. This the governor, Martin, vetoed.¹ Then the Assembly yielded so far as to add the suspending clause, but retained the attachment provision. Though signed by the governor, it was, of course, disallowed by the King, and meanwhile, as there were no courts in the province, the governor was instructed to establish them on his own responsibility. This he did, but the Assembly refused to recognize his authority, and made no appropriation for the salaries of the judges. Persisting in their determination to have the kind of bill they wanted and to control their own affairs, they passed the one previously disallowed, when they convened again in March, 1774. They were then prorogued for their obstinacy, and practically did not sit again while North Carolina was under British rule. Thus, as a result of the controversy, not only was the Assembly dissolved, because it failed to do as it was bid, but from 1773 until North Carolina assumed State government in 1776, there were no courts in the province.¹

¹ "He has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers."

¹ Iredell's N. C. Laws, Edenton, 1791, 231. N. C. Col. Recs., VII, 551, 557, 573, 580, 588, 610, 623, 693, 921, No. 5.

² Ibid., VIII, 264-267.

³ Ibid., IX, 235.

¹ March 6, 1773. Ibid., 583. See also Raper's North Carolina, 157-158.

Our first thought, in endeavoring to account for the next charge,² is likely to be of the long-standing controversies in New York and Massachusetts over the payment of the salaries of the judiciary, and the conditions of their tenure of office. The question at issue, in both instances, hinged upon granting salaries by colonial appropriation, or permitting payment to be made by the crown. The policy, adopted by Great Britain at an early date (1761), was to refuse to permit judges to hold office during good behavior, as in England, and to insist, instead, that they hold only during the King's pleasure. Made to yield, with no good will, to this enforcement of the royal prerogative, the colonists resisted to the utmost the extension that made it possible to enforce obnoxious laws and decrees by the whole power of a judiciary dependent, not only for its tenure, but for its stipends as well, upon the absolute good will of the crown. The term of tenure established, to fix salaries was but a repressive step in advance, although the question did not develop till 1767. Then that ill-advised Townshend Act, known colloquially as the "glass, lead, and paint act," passed Parliament, and became the law of the realm.¹ The preamble stated boldly its design of raising a revenue to make "a more certain and adequate Provision for defraying the Charge of the Administration of Justice and the Support of Civil Government, in such Provinces where it shall be found necessary." A paragraph in the bill, explaining how this was to be carried out, showed that it was no idle declaration of intention merely. To the inhabitants of the colonies, already goaded nearly to the point of rebellion because of excessive control of their internal affairs, this meant an intolerable interference with their rights, and was not to be borne. The colonial contention was that inasmuch as judges held office during the King's pleasure, if they also received their salaries from any other source than the people to whom they were to dispense justice, all control over them would be lost, and no redress could be had, when corruption and incompetence displaced integrity and learning.

¹ N. C. Col. Recs., IX, xxvi. There were contests in South Carolina also, in respect of the erection of courts, but they were of minor importance to those in North Carolina. See McCrady, S. C. under Royal Government, 628; and S. C. in the Revolution, 120-121; Smith, S. C. as a Royal Prov., 134 et seq.

² "He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries."

Furthermore, the extension of the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts, in 1764 and 1768,¹ with great enlargement of their powers, foreshadowed, it was thought, the possible extinction of trial by jury in civil as well as in maritime causes.² The judges of these courts were royal appointees receiving their salaries, supposedly, from fines and the proceeds of the sale of condemned vessels; but, as this source failed to bring in any revenue, they were paid directly out of the royal exchequer. (2)

¹ June 29, 1767. 7 Geo. III, c. 46. The act is in MacDonald, Select Charters, 323.

The greatest of the controversies over judicial salaries, however, is the famous one begun in Massachusetts on that evil day in February, 1773, when Governor Hutchinson announced to the Assembly of the province that the King had made provision for the justices of the superior court, and that consequently no appropriation was necessary for their maintenance.³ The Assembly voiced their opposition in vigorous terms, at first in letters of remonstrance and finally in the well known resolutions of March 3, 1773.⁴ And reference was made to this grievance in the Declaration of Rights and the ad-

¹ See Address to Colonies, Oct. 21, 1774, Journal of Congress.

² The 41st paragraph of the Sugar Act of 1764 (4 Geo. III, c. 15) contained the provisions for enforcing the act, and the recourse to admiralty courts. A part of the act is in MacDonal, op. cit., 273 et seq.; the full text in Statutes at Large, XXVI, 33-52.

³ Mass. State Papers, 365.

⁴ Ibid., 396.

dress to the colonies of 1774, and redress demanded.¹

10 From the controversy over judges to that over commissioners for the enforcement of customs laws is but a step. Their appointment is made the basis of the grievance charging that a multitude of new officers had been sent to America "to harass the people and eat out their substance."² For, combined with the decision of Townshend to pass an act of taxation, was the determination to enforce it at all hazards. As there was no governmental machinery in America through which to act, a new engine of oppression was instituted by the first of the Townshend Acts.³ Its provisions were exceedingly modest in that the King was simply authorized to appoint commissioners of customs to reside in America, with power and jurisdiction similar to the British commissioners. They in turn were empowered to appoint an indefinite number of deputies, and it was this multiplication of officers that aroused the hostility of the colonists. Their salaries, moreover, were to be paid out of the receipts from the customs, and constituted the most serious aggression of this nature to which the colonists took exception.

¹ Journal of Congress, Oct. 14, 1774.

² "He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harrass our people, and eat out their substance."

³ June 29, 1767. The act is cited as 7 Geo. III, c. 41, and is in MacDonald, op. cit., 321.

But little less irritation was caused by the policy initiated by Grenville, in 1764, when he determined upon rigorously enforcing the existing trade laws with a view to putting an end to smuggling. In accordance with this intention, he placed Admiral Colville, naval commander-in-chief on the coasts of North America, virtually at the head of the revenue service. And each captain of a vessel was instructed to take the customs house oath, and aid in the seizure of those engaged in the illicit trade which had been connived at for years.¹ Further, as offences against the revenue act were to be tried in courts of admiralty or vice-admiralty, their increase with new officers became necessary. The first of the new courts with previously unheard-of jurisdiction was opened at Halifax, in 1764, and the act of 1768 made provision for their extension throughout the other colonies.

The next charge has to do with the maintenance of troops in the colonies without the consent of the legislatures.² To this may be joined that in which complaint is made of rendering the military independent of and superior to the civil power,³ as also

¹ Bancroft, original ed., V, 160-162.

² "He has kept among us in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures."

³ "He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power."

(2)

11412
4 13

(1) the later accusation of quartering troops upon the people.¹ After the peace of 1763, the troops that had been sent over were not withdrawn and provision had to be made for their support. This was done by the extension of the provisions of the recently passed Mutiny Act to the American colonies, in a separate act known as the "Quartering Act."² After the Stamp Act riots several companies of royal artillery reached Boston in the autumn of (2) 1766, and were quartered at the expense of the province, by order of Governor Bradford and the Council. Against this the Assembly remonstrated on the ground that they alone had the right to make appropriations for this purpose.³ In 1768, as trouble was anticipated over the enforcement of the Townshend Acts, large increases of troops were sent to Boston, New York, and elsewhere, and in each case gave rise to controversy about provision for their maintenance. The clash at Boston, in (3) March, 1770, known as the "Boston Massacre," was the culminating event of this dispute.

(4) The appointment of General Gage as governor of Massachusetts in 1774, under the Massachusetts Government Act,⁴ making him at the same time

¹ "For Quartering large bodies of armed troops among us."

² April, 1765. The provisions of this act are in MacDonald, op. cit., 306. The act is cited as 5 Geo. III, c. 33.

³ Winsor, Narr. and Crit. Hist., VI, 38. Mass. State Papers, 105-108.

⁴ 14 Geo. III, c. 45. MacDonald, op. cit., 343.

commander-in-chief of the troops in America and the supreme executive authority in the colony, was a combination of the military with the civil jurisdiction which aroused stern opposition throughout the colonies, as rendering "the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power." All of these acts were remonstrated against in the Declaration of Rights and the address to the colonies of 1774. With the accusation last referred to we come to the end of the first division of grievances.

CHAPTER XI

(2) "THE FACTS SUBMITTED TO A CANDID WORLD"

THE master mind of Jefferson perceived that for rhetorical effect he must adopt a manner sufficiently emphatic to inspire enthusiasm, and yet not weary with a long recital of "abuses and usurpations," recounted in the same monotonous style. Therefore, the form of indictment now undergoes a change for a few brief paragraphs. The King alone is now not held solely responsible, but is accused of combining "with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws: giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation,"—in part, the very words used by Jefferson two years before.¹ Though Parliament is thus made to bear a share of the burden, it is nowhere mentioned by name, and the principal weight is still put upon the shoulders of the King.

Of the first of the new order of grievances we have already spoken sufficiently.² The next, however, which complains of soldiers escaping by mock trials from the consequences of any murders that they might commit, needs further comment.¹ It can refer to no other law than that known generally as the act "for the impartial administration of justice," which passed Parliament on May 20, 1774.² This was one of the acts repeatedly decried in the state papers of the earlier Congress,³ and moved Jefferson to denounce those who would submit to the enforcement of its provisions as "cowards who would suffer a countryman to be torn from the bowels of their society, in order to be thus offered a sacrifice to parliamentary tyranny," meriting "that everlasting infamy now fixed on the authors of the act!"⁴ The act had been passed to provide for such contingencies as had arisen after the "Boston Massacre"—the trial of persons accused of murder while in the discharge of their official duties. By its terms those in His Majesty's service, military as well as civil, accused of murder committed while executing the laws of the realm in Massachusetts, might obtain a change of venue to some other province, or to Great Britain, "if it shall appear,

¹ Works, I, 439.

² "For Quartering large bodies of armed troops among us."

¹ "For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States."

² 14 Geo. III, c. 39. MacDonald, op. cit., 351. See also Answer to the Declaration of Independence, 5th ed., London, 1776, 60, 62.

³ Declaration of Rights. Address to the Colonies.

⁴ Works, I, 439.

to the satisfaction of the . . . governor, . . . that an indifferent trial cannot be had within the said province." Provision was made also for the transportation of witnesses as well, and, most grievous of all, the accused might be admitted to bail upon the order of the governor, it mattered not how flagrant the crime charged against him. As there was little likelihood that a British official, military or civil, would be brought to trial in England for committing the crime of executing the law in America, this was regarded as an unwarrantable invasion of colonial rights.

15 Having thus far dealt in the main with the political side of the grievances, Jefferson, in order that nothing of importance may be omitted, now turns to those oppressions that bore most heavily upon the economic life of the people. And if there be a weakness in the Declaration, it is the failure to dwell to any extent upon the narrow British economic policy toward the colonies, which meant using them for the benefit of the manufacturers and traders at home. In the beginning, as has been noted,¹ the opposition to the enforcement of trade laws, restrictions upon manufactures, and the right to taxation, was based as largely upon economic as upon political grounds. But the material economic grievances were soon lost to view in the eloquent maintenance of the right to political liberty that resounded through the land. Yet Jefferson had devoted no small part of his *Summary View*¹ to a consideration of the burdens put by law upon the commerce and manufactures of the colonies, in the interests of the British merchants.

¹ See p. 7.

To cut off the trade of the colonists with all parts of the world except Great Britain, as written in the Declaration,² was a policy first adopted in the days of Charles I and Cromwell, and persisted in to the end. But the particularly serious acts of aggression were those instituted by Grenville, in 1764, when he revived the Molasses Act of 1733, by which an end was intended to be put to the rum traffic of New England, and the rigorous measures already referred to for enforcing the existing though nearly obsolete trade laws. An idea of the full meaning of the last intention may be gathered when we recall that, all in all, about fifty acts had been passed by Parliament, between 1688 and 1765, for the purpose of binding the colonial trade. Coming down to a later day, we have the well-known acts of 1774, which closed the port of Boston, and the acts of March, April, and December, 1775,³ which effectuated ally prohibited all trade with the colonies, thereby cutting them off from all the world. The last mentioned act superseded the earlier, was most stringent in its provisions, and punished with confiscation as prizes all vessels caught contravening it.

¹ Works, I, 434.

² "For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world."

³ 14 Geo. III, c. 19. 15 Geo. III, c. 10. 16 Geo. III, c. 5. MacDonald, op. cit., 368, 391.

We come now to the consideration of that clause which has become the chiefest of the familiars of our history—taxation without consent.¹ Reference was here intended to (1) the Sugar Act of 1764, (2) the Stamp Act, (3) the Townshend Acts, and (4) the Tea Acts of 1770 and 1773. By the Sugar Act of 1764, the determination was announced to execute more strictly the trade laws, and, by raising a revenue from the colonies, to help pay off England's debt, more than doubled by the war just concluded. The Molasses Act of 1733,² the first of the revenue acts, was aimed to interdict the commerce between the French West Indies and the colonies of the continent, especially New England, and was directly in the interest of the British West Indies which lost in trade, it was claimed, what their French rivals gained. Though in form a revenue act, the duties on rum and spirits, molasses syrup, and sugar imported from the French West Indies to the other colonies, were placed so high as to be prohibitory, and therefore the act worked out in practice merely as a regulation of commerce.¹ Since, however, it was never strictly enforced, its provisions were constantly violated and smuggling was carried on openly. The wind thus sown was reaped in the whirlwind of disregard for laws, except those enacted by colonial legislatures, characteristic of the period of the revolution.

¹ "For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent."

² 6 Geo. II, c. 13. MacDonald, op. cit., 249.

The Sugar Act of 1764² revived the Molasses Act, but reduced the duties avowedly for revenue purposes and made it perpetual. Its title began with the words, "an act for granting certain duties in the British colonies and plantations in America," and the preamble proceeded: "Whereas it is expedient that new provisions and regulations should be established for improving the revenue of this Kingdom . . . ; and whereas it is just and necessary, that a revenue be raised, in your Majesty's said dominions in America, for defraying the expenses of defending, protecting, and rearing the same; . . . we, . . . the commons of Great Britain . . . have resolved to give and grant . . . the several rates of duties hereinafter mentioned."

In view of the recent colonial acquisitions by this country, and the methods adopted for their government, the tenth paragraph is of striking insignificance. It provides that all moneys arising from the operation of the act, after the expenses of levying and collection were paid, were to be turned into the royal exchequer, to be kept separate from all other funds, and to be "disposed of by parliament, towards defraying the necessary expenses of defending, protecting and securing the British Colonies and Plantations in America." If the Fathers ultimately came to rebel against such a provision, is it any more likely that the colonial Fathers of the future will not be similarly moved? The principle in both cases is the same, and though we may enforce our measures with more tact, they contain elements of grave danger to our political welfare.

¹ Beer, op. cit., 121.

² 4 Geo. III, c. 15. MacDonald, op. cit., 271.

The Stamp Act is so well known as to require but brief comment. The main opposition to it was drawn about its revenue clauses. But not the least objectionable of its features was the minuteness of its provisions by reason of which it touched upon the life of the colonists at every point, letting none escape. No man or woman who had business in the courts of law or before an ecclesiastical court, none engaged in trade, none who held public office, none who secured a grant or made a conveyance of land, none who read a pamphlet or an almanac or a newspaper, could fail to come in contact with this tax at some time. The idle were caught in the meshes of its net along with the industrious, for no man could indulge in a game of cards, or hazard a stake at dice, without having this unwelcome token of the power of Parliament rise up to greet him.

Only less irritating than the Stamp Act were the Townshend Acts of 1767, three in number, that establishing customs commissioners, already referred to, the revenue act, known as the "glass, lead and paint" act,¹ and the tea act.² As if the taxation feature of the revenue act was thought not to be sufficient to arouse the opposition of the colonists, the last paragraph of this act legalized writs of assistance in the colonies, over which the controversy with England had started in 1761. Thus antagonized, the colonists instituted non-importation agreements, which bore so heavily upon England's merchants that the revenue act was repealed in 1770. Served thus with the first taste of the results of effective opposition to unpalatable enactments, non-importation followed by non-exportation agreements were resorted to in 1774.

When the revenue act of 1767 was repealed in 1770,³ the duty on tea imported into America was retained, along with the provisions of the tea act of 1767, which granted a remission of the British duties paid on all teas exported to America and Ireland, and was obviously in the interests of the East India Tea Company. The retention of this duty in 1770, though Americans were enabled to procure tea more cheaply than it could be purchased in England, led to the well-known tea disturbances throughout the country, the most notorious and disorderly of which was the "Boston Tea Party." Elsewhere the landing of tea was opposed with equal efficacy, though not accompanied by such theatrical turbulence. As this tea act expired in 1772, another act was passed in May, 1773,¹ by which the cost of tea in America was still further reduced, but a small tax being retained. Franklin expressed the prevailing opinion when he wrote, "They [the ministry] have no idea that any people can act for any principle but that of interest; and they believe that three pence on a pound of tea, of which one does not perhaps drink ten pounds in a year, is sufficient to overcome all the patriotism of an American."²

¹ 7 Geo. III, c. 46, June 29, 1767.

² 7 Geo. III, c. 56, July 2, 1767. Both these acts are in MacDonald, 323, 327.

³ 10 Geo. III, c. 17.

The wide extension of the jurisdiction of admiralty courts in 1764 (to which were entrusted the enforcement of the Sugar Act), and their increase in numbers in 1768, are responsible for the idea contained in the next charge³ which is closely related to the succeeding.¹ No cause was ever tried in an admiralty court before a jury, and to authorize, besides, the transportation of offenders for trial was thought to add exile to injustice. Transportation for trial beyond the seas meant the revival of an old law, passed in the reign of Henry VIII,² by which it was made possible to send a person, accused of treason in any part of the realm, to England for trial. The first intimation that this act was to be extended to America came in 1769, after the failure of Massachusetts to rescind her Circular Letter, and the riots that took place upon the seizure of John Hancock's sloop, the "Liberty." Parliament early in that year, in an address to the King, made the suggestion that the time was favorable for the revival of the law just mentioned. Matters rested in this uncertain state until June, 1772, when, after the revenue vessel "Gaspee" was burned to the water's edge in Narragansett Bay, the determination to punish violators of the revenue acts, and these destructive rioters in particular, was greatly intensified. A commission was therefore instituted late in 1772 to investigate this offense. These commissioners had extensive powers, yet the weightiest part of their instructions was that which ordered them to transport the offenders to England for trial.¹

¹ 13 Geo. III, c. 44.

² Works, Sparks' ed., VIII, 49.

³ "For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury."

¹ "For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offenses."

² 35 Henry VIII.

(2) In the autumn of 1772, just previous to the appointment of this commission, and before the knowledge of the "Gaspee" incident had even reached England, an act had been passed "for the better securing and preserving His Majesty's Dock Yards, Magazines, Ships, Ammunition and Stores,"² which included the detested transportation provision. It aroused great opposition, for it deprived the colonists of their dearly cherished right of "a constitutional trial by a jury of the vicinage." The law, already referred to, "for the impartial administration of Justice," while designed to protect the revenue and other officials, also belongs to this category of ills, because of its transportation clauses.

19 # The possible enforcement of the Quebec Act of 1774,³ with its far-reaching provisions for extending the use of the civil as against the common law, was made the ground of the next grievance.⁴ As it never went into force in any respect, however, it is

¹ Winsor, Narr. and Crit. Hist., VI, 53.

² 12 Geo. III, c. 24.

³ 14 Geo. III, c. 83. MacDonald, op. cit., 355.

⁴ "For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighboring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies."

difficult to tell exactly what its effects might have been. Yet the extension of the limits of the province created by the proclamation of 1763, so as to include all the country west of the Alleghanies and south to the Ohio River, meant a further encroachment upon the territory of those colonies that claimed charter rights to much of the land thus included. The reasons already given, therefore, added to the opportunities for further aggression that the enforcement of this act might offer, rendered it one of the laws looked on with the greatest disfavor by the colonists. It appeared to them as but another unwarrantable extension of the royal prerogative, against which they had for so long been contending without avail.

What the Quebec Act lacked in definiteness, however, was more than supplied by the very evident intent of the bill regulating the government of Massachusetts.¹ If any acts of aggression may be set down as the immediate cause of the outbreak of the revolution this and its sister, the Boston Port Act, may be so regarded. None carried with them so much consternation and dismay. None aroused at the same time so much stern opposition. Their great importance, therefore, made it necessary that reference should be made to them in the Declaration. If the power to take away or alter a single charter was once recognized, the rights of no colony were safe from destruction. The principle, if carried to its logical conclusion, meant the possible abolition of all the laws developed by the English in America through a period of a hundred and fifty years, and the substitution in their stead of such manner and form of government as the will of an arbitrary sovereign might dictate. When, therefore, the first-mentioned act¹ abolished, with one stroke, the council as it had been developed; curtailed the power of the assembly; practically put an end to that great institution for the redress of grievances, the town meeting; made serious changes in the manner of selecting the judiciary and jurors; and virtually made the governor the supreme power in the province, we cannot wonder that this act of revenge upon Massachusetts, which foreshadowed what might be expected to happen elsewhere, aroused a spirit of opposition throughout the colonies such as had never before been called forth. Therein lay the main part of the grievance. Yet the earlier decision (1772) to sever the governor of Massachusetts completely from any dependence upon the assembly for his salary, and thereby to make his freedom of action 'the greater, was also an innovation in settled custom that was viewed with grave disfavor. Also, when the great contest was on in North Carolina, over the establishment of courts, the attempt of the governor to pay no heed to the recalcitrant assembly, by endeavoring to erect courts on his own responsibility, was likewise regarded as "altering fundamentally" an established form of government.

¹ "For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments."

¹ 14 Geo. III, c. 45. MacDonald, op. cit., 343.

Nor could the colonies ever become reconciled to that short-sighted policy which, because of the spirited resistance of the New York Assembly to the demands made upon it, could offer no other solution of the difficulty than the suspension of the legislature until it bent the knee and yielded.¹ The colonies were accustomed to the exercise of the governor's power of veto and prorogation. This had been submitted to from the beginning, and was regarded as a constitutional mode of enforcing royal authority. But to go much further, and, for so trivial an action on the part of the New York Assembly, as the failure to make what was considered adequate provision for the troops quartered there, to suspend indefinitely its legislative functions by act of Parliament,² was regarded as an exercise of unwarranted authority to which the colonists never became reconciled. Although New York was forced to yield, her cause was made the cause of all, and the voice of protest against this act resounded far and wide. It was, moreover, an enforcement of the Declaratory Act of 1766,¹ little heeded at first, but now seen to be fraught with the utmost danger to colonial rights. By the provisions of that act the imperial crown and Parliament of Great Britain were declared to have conjointly full power to make laws "to bind the colonies and people of America, subjects of the crown of Great Britain, in all cases whatever." And the Tea Acts of 1770 and 1773, were regarded as but other instances of the enforcement of the policy thus announced.

¹ "For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever."

² 7 Geo. III, c. 59, June 15, 1767. MacDonald, op. cit., 318.

We have come now to the end of the grievances that had their origin previous to the beginning of the armed struggle. For the last five² of all the long, unhappy list, the King is once more held to sole responsibility. They have to do with the harsh

¹ 6 Geo. III, c. 12. MacDonald, 316.

² "He has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us."

"He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the Lives of our people."

"He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty & perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation."

events of the beginning of the war—the skirmishes and battles; the proclamation of August 23, 1775, declaring the colonists in rebellion and announcing the intention to suppress the revolutionists with a high hand, and the speech from the throne in October of the same year breathing a like purpose. These led to war in earnest, and with its beginning the royal governors, ever in a perplexing situation, thought it necessary to flee, before the possible disgrace of capture fell to their lot. First Governor Dunmore of Virginia, in June, 1775, soon followed by Tryon of New York, Martin of North Carolina, and Campbell of South Carolina, “abdicated government,”—in the terms of the Act of Settlement of 1689—and left the inhabitants of those colonies to their own devices in creating new forms of government.

The other acts complained of need no explanation, for they all form part of the familiar history of the commencement of the war. The burning of Falmouth and Charlestown, Norfolk and Charleston; the employment of Hessians—“foreign mercenaries”—to fight the cause of England; and the act of Parliament of December, 1775,¹ which authorized the capture and condemnation of trading ships, and compelled “fellow Citizens taken captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands,"¹ require no comment to make their meaning clear.

¹ 16 Geo. III, c. 5. MacDonald, op. cit., 392.

76
(1)
The last grievance² refers to a possible condition of affairs, ever dreaded, and against which precautions had been taken by numerous acts of legislation. Those acquainted with life in the South are aware of the fear engendered by the thought of a servile war. Nothing more horrible could be imagined; only the letting loose of bands of well-armed Indians to plunder and devastate the country was to be compared with it. When, therefore, Dunmore, in the spring of 1775, in order to enforce his decrees, threatened to arm negroes and Indians, the alarm created was widespread, and it had much to do with bringing into existence a well-trained militia. The governors of North and South Carolina were known to be adopting similar measures, and the latter was denounced as "having used his utmost endeavors to destroy the lives, liberties and properties of the people." Along with this came the endeavor to engage the Indians as allies, and Gage issued instructions to that effect in the summer of 1775. The Indian agent Stuart, on the borders of South Carolina, made overtures and won to him the Creeks and Chicksaws, while Sir Guy Carleton was making similar progress with the Six Nations in the North.¹

¹ "He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands."

² "He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions."

If impartial consideration be given to the forceful recapitulation of the colonists' contentions in the Declaration, and to the analysis here set down, it must be admitted that the differences were serious, even though some may not regard them as sufficient to warrant recourse to arms. Moreover, they had reason and right,—if not entire reason nor all-convincing right,—to sustain them, amply adequate to justify the course they had pursued. Further, it must be allowed, that if, in the statement of the colonial side, the constitutional right of Great Britain to enact legislation for the government of the colonies is denied, full cause for such denial had been given in the earlier failure to exercise that right. The colonies had been allowed to work out their destinies in their own way with only trifling interference. This was in large measure due to England's neglect to make the most of her colonial possessions on the continent, ignoring them for the wealth that was more easily to be acquired from her West Indian possession. When she awoke to the possibilities lying in the development of the other colonies, the time had passed when they might be put to use mainly for her own advancement. The colonists had learned, during the period of neglect, in what directions lay the opportunities for their own development. They could not abandon them, short of a complete overturn of existing conditions, and to this they would not submit, since they were strong enough to make an effective resistance. Assertion of rights and recital of grievances had been met by determination to enforce submission. Memorials and resolutions appealing to the King, to Parliament, even to the English people, had been put aside and disregarded, or else had been succeeded by measures more obnoxious than those against which protest had been registered. In the Declaration of Rights and the other documents of the first Congress, repeal of practically all the acts, now cited as warrant for breaking off the connection with Great Britain, had been pleaded for in general as well as in specific terms. Every method known to the colonists to bring about the reforms desired had been tried with no results. They had now either to retreat or fight on to victory.

¹ Winsor, Narr. and Crit. Hist., VI, Chapter VIII.

The belief in their own strength, in the righteousness of their cause, is epitomized in the Declaration. The arguments had been made before, and the briefs submitted. The decision was now proclaimed that the time had arrived for them to stand up by themselves in the court of nations, "to acquiesce in the necessity" which caused the separation, and to hold Great Britain, as they held "the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends." Therefore, as petitions to the King and appeals to the people of Great Britain had proved fruitless of results, there was no other course for them, the "Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude" of their intentions, than, "in the Name and by authority of the good People" of the colonies to "solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do." And for the support of that Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, they mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

APPENDIX

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

The Declaration of Independence as drafted by Jefferson, and the engrossed copy, are printed in the succeeding pages for purposes of comparison. The originals are in the Department of State at Washington. The draft reproduced here is the one found among Jefferson's papers when they were acquired by the government. Facsimiles of it are in Randolph's Jefferson, and in Ford's, Writings, vol. II. This is apparently not the report of the committee, which has not been preserved, but appears to be the draft from which Jefferson may have made the final copy submitted by the committee as its report to the Congress. Jefferson made other copies, one of which is inserted in the manuscript of his Autobiography, and another is among the Madison papers, both in possession of the government. Still other copies are among the Richard Henry Lee papers, in the American Philosophical Society (reproduced in facsimile in Proc., vol. XXXVII), the Adams papers in the Massachusetts Historical Society (printed in Ford's Jefferson's Writings, vol. II), in the Emmet collection, Lenox Library, and a fragment is in the possession of Mrs. Washburn, of Boston.

The portions of the draft stricken out by the Congress are printed in italics, and those inserted are enclosed within brackets.

JEFFERSON'S DRAFT

A Declaration by the Representatives of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in General Congress assembled.

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature & of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect for the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with inherent & inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, & the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, & to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles & organising its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their

[In CONGRESS, July 4, 1776. The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united STATES of AMERICA,]

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with [certain unalienable] Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.—That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.—That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall safety & happiness. Prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light & transient causes: and accordingly all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses & usurpations, begun at a distinguished period, & pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism,¹ it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government & to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, & such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain² is a history of unremitting injuries and usurpations, among which appears no solitary fact to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, but all have in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this let fact be submitted to a candid world, for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood.

¹ The words "under absolute Despotism" are in Franklin's handwriting, and are in place of the words "to arbitrary power."

² The words "King of Great Britain" were substituted by Adams for "his present majesty."

seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. [Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.] But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security.—Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to [alter] their former Systems of Government. [The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of [repeated] injuries and usurpations, all [having] in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.—

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good :

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate & pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained, and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right, inestimable to them, & formidable to tyrants only :

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable & distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative houses repeatedly & continually for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people :

He has refused for a long time after such Dissolutions¹ to cause others to be elected whereby the legislative powers incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise, the state remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, & convulsions within :

¹ The words "after such Dissolutions" were suggested by Adams.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.—

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.—

He has refused pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.—

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.—

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.—

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.—

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states, for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, & raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has suffered the administration of justice totally to cease in some of these states, refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers:

He has made our judges dependant on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices and the amount & payment¹ of their salaries:

He has erected a multitude of new offices by a self-assumed power, & sent hither swarms of officers to harrass our people & eat out their substance:

He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies & ships of war without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military, independent of & superior to the civil power:

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation, for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for protecting them by a mock-trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of ¹The words "and payment" were suggested by Franklin.

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.—

He has [obstructed the Administration of Justice, by] refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers.—

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.—

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harrass our people, and eat out their substance.—

He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures.—

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power.—

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:—For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the In-

Resolved that the

these states; for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world; for imposing taxes on us without our consent; for depriving us of the benefits of trial by jury, for transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences; for abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its bounds so as to render it at once an example & fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies; for taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws,¹ and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments; for suspending our own legislatures & declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever :

He has abdicated government here, withdrawing his governors, & declaring us out of his allegiance & protection.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns & destroyed the lives of our people :

He is at this time transporting large armies of Scotch and other foreign mercenaries to compleat the works of death desolation & tyranny already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

¹ The words "abolishing our most valuable Laws" were added by Franklin.

habitants of these States :—For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world :—For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent :—For depriving us [in many cases], of the benefits of Trial by Jury :—For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences :—For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighboring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies :—For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments :—For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.—

He has abdicated Government here, [by] declaring us out of his Protection [and waging War against us].—

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the Lives of our people.—

He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty & perfidy [scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally] unworthy the Head of a civilized nation. ✓

He has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, & conditions of existence.

He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow-citizens with the allurements of forfeiture & confiscation of property.

He has constrained others taken captives on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends & brethren, or to fall themselves by their hand :

He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating it's most sacred rights of life & liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating & carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian king of Great Britain determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold. He has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce. And that this

He has constrained [our fellow Citizens] taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or fall themselves by their Hands.—

He has [excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has] endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting these very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of our people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another.

In every stage of these oppressions "we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms," our repeated petitions have been answered only¹ by repeated injuries. "A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant," is unfit to be the ruler of a people who mean to be free. "Future ages will scarce believe that the hardiness of one man adventured within the short compass of twelve years only" to build a foundation so broad & undisguised, for tyranny over a people fostered and fixed in principles of freedom.

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend a jurisdiction over these our states. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration & settlement here, no one of which could warrant so strange a pretension: that these were effected at the expence of our own blood & treasure, unassisted by the wealth or the strength of Great Britain: that in

¹ "Only" added by Franklin.

In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: ✓
Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a [free] people.

Nor have We been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend [an unwarrantable] jurisdiction over [us]. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We [have] appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and [we have conjured them by] the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which, [would in-constituting indeed our several forms of government, we had adopted one common king, thereby laying a foundation for perpetual league and amity with them: but that submission to their parliament was no part of our constitution, nor ever in idea of history may be credited; and we appealed to their native justice & magnanimity, as well as to the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which were likely to interrupt our connection & correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity, & when occasions have been given them, by the regular course of their laws, of removing from their councils the disturbers of our harmony, they have by their free election re-established them in power. At this very time too they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch & foreign mercenaries to invade & destroy us¹ these facts have given the last stab to agonizing affection, and manly spirit bids us to renounce for ever these unfeeling brethren. We must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and to hold them as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends. We might have been a free & a great people together; but a communication of grandeur & of freedom it seems is below their dignity. Be it so since they will have it. The road to happiness & to glory is open to us too, we will climb it apart from

¹ "And destroy us" added by Franklin.

evitably] interrupt our connections and correspondence

They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity.

[We must, therefore] acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we held the rest of mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace Friends.—

them, and acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our eternal separation.

We therefore the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled do in the name & by authority of the good people of these states reject and renounce all allegiance & subjection to the kings of Great Britain & all others who may hereafter claim by, through, or under them; we utterly dissolve all political connection which may heretofore have subsisted between us & the people or parliament of Great Britain; and finally we do assert and declare these colonies to be free and independant states and that as free & independant states they have full power to levy war conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, & to do all other acts and things which independant states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, & our sacred honour.

We, therefore the Representatives of the united States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, [appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions], do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, [solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved]; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do.—

And for the support of this Declaration, [with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence], we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor.

INDEX

- ACT of settlement (1689), 255.
- Adams, Charles Francis, Life and works of John Adams, 2.
- Adams, John, 20, 23, 24, 60, 79, 90, 113, 114, 141, 142, 173; Life of, by C. F. Adams, 2; on rights of the colonies, 14; Diary, 20; compromise proposition of, 24; on independence, 28, 29; in Congress, 58, 84; on the expected commissioners of the King, 65; on forming new governments, 80; endeavors to force union, 91; on renouncing jurisdiction of the crown, 95; Letters to his wife, 95; seconds motion for independence, 102; debate of, on adoption of resolutions of independence, 104-106; member of committee to prepare Declaration of Independence, 107; Declaration of Independence submitted to, 121; on resolutions for independence, 123; speech for independence, 124; criticises Declaration of Independence, 156, 157; reply of Jefferson to, 157-159; on the Declaration of Independence, 182; on government, 195; Works, 23, 24, 40, 41, 43, 90, 91, 102, 113, 114, 122, 124, 141, 173.
- Adams, Samuel, 58, 79, 142, 176; on rights of the colonies, 14; on independence, 28, 29, 59; in Congress, 84; on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 141; manuscript letter of, in Lenox library, 141; on the Declaration of Independence, 182; on government, 195; on royal instructions issued to governors, 222.
- Address, proposed, on independence, 175, 176.
- Address of Philadelphia merchants*, 1768, 218.
- Address to the colonies*, 1774, 164, 235.
- Address to the inhabitants of Great Britain*, 1775, 165.
- Address to the people of Great Britain*, 1774, 162, 164.
- Address to the people of Quebec*, 27.
- Admiralty courts, 248, 249; extension of jurisdiction of, 234, 235, 237.
- Agents, colonial, in London, 211.
- Aitken, Robert, proceedings of Congress for 1776 printed by, 135.
- Alexander, James, member of committee to prepare address against independence, 56.
- Aliens, naturalization of, 228.

- Almon, John, Prior documents, 217, 218.
- Alsop, John, 142, 144.
- American Revolution, might have been postponed many years, 4; influence of Congress upon, 32, 33; preparation for, 69; political philosophy of, 184, 198-200; original causes that led to the, 212. See also War of Independence.
- Answer to the Declaration of Independence*, 5th ed., London, 1776, 219, 241.
- Army, standing, in the colonies, 26, 237.
- Army, continental, on the formation of a, 34; increase of, 61; distribution throughout colonies of the, 82.
- Assemblies, colonial, 12; administrative power of, 15; the proroguing of, 16; members of Congress elected by, 77; on representation of newly-settled districts in the, 222, 223, 224; removal and dissolution of, 225, 226.
- Association of 1774, Articles of, 22, 23, 68; non-exportation part of, goes into effect, 40; reenactment of parts of, 73; date of signing, 134; importation of slaves prohibited by, 216.
- Austin, James T., Gerry, 90.
- BALTIMORE Committee, places Eden's correspondence before Congress, 87; denounced by Maryland Council of Safety, 88.
- Bancroft, George, 124; History of the United States of America, 67, 237.
- Bartlett, Josiah, 142; on the Declaration of independence, 183.
- Bills of credit, issuance of, 48; British policy against issuance of, 217.
- Bland, Richard, on rights of the colonies, 14; on government, 195.
- Board of trade and foreign plantations, established as Council for Trade (1660), 208; reorganized (1765), 209; permanently established (1696), 209; prerogatives of, curtailed (1766), 210; method of procedure of, during revolutionary agitation, 210, 211.
- Board of trade journals*, 208, 214, 220.
- Borgeaud, Charles, Rise of modern democracy in Old and New England, 184.
- Boston, proclamation prohibiting people from leaving town of, 47; evacuation of, 73; town meeting of, 1768, 226.
- "Boston Massacre" (1770), 4, 238, 241.
- Boston Port Act, 243, 251; effect of, 19.
- "Boston tea party," 248.
- Boucher, Jonathan, on rights of kings and governments, 14.
- Bradford, William, 238.
- Buchanan, Thomas McKean, McKean family, 128, 146.
- Burke, Edmund, 211; on liberty, 12.

- Braxton, Carter, 143.
- Bryce, James, Studies in history and jurisprudence, 186.
- CAMPBELL, Governor William abdicates government, 255.
- Canada, invitation to unite with colonies, 83.
- Carleton, Sir Guy, engages Indians as allies, 257.
- Carroll, Charles, influence upon Maryland politics of, 113; on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 145.
- Chamberlain, Mellen, Authentication of the Declaration of Independence, 133.
- Charles I, 208.
- Charles II, 208, 209, 243.
- Charleston, burning of, 255.
- Charlestown, burning of, 255.
- Chase, Samuel, unofficially supports independence, 58; in Congress, 84; influence of, upon Maryland politics, 112-114; on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 141, 142, 145, 149.
- Choate, Rufus, on the Declaration of Independence, 159, 160.
- Clark, Abraham, 143.
- Clinton, George, 142, 144.
- Clymer, George, on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 144, 149.
- Collins, Edward D., on committees of correspondence, 17.
- Colonies, acts of Parliament affecting commerce and industry of, 1, 2; beginning of controversy between Parliament and, 6; Parliamentary control gradually renounced by, 7; removal of economic burdens of, 9; constant development along democratic lines of, 11;
administrative powers of, 11; change in the nature of the dispute of, 12;
rights of, 13, 14, 15, 23, 179, 199, 200; administrative development of, 15;
formation of parties in,
31; administrative bodies of, controlled by Congress, 33; decrease of conservatives in, 42; proclamation by Congress in name of United, 47; conservative spirit in, 50; declared by the King to be in rebellion, 52; commercial relations of, regulated by Congress, 68; foreign relations of,
75; political revolutions in,
79, 80; resolutions to declare independence of, 100; theories of, on government, 163; first official expression of contentions of, 164, 165; denial of the right of Parliament to control the, 162-167; protests by, of loyalty to the King, 162, 164, 166; answer of, to proclamation of the King, 167, 168; renounce allegiance to the crown, 169; increase of authority of the legislature in, 194, 204, 205; controversy between the King and the, 194; authority of the crown over, 195; political conceptions of leaders of thought of, 204;

- official relations of Great Britain with, 208-211; restrictions on commerce of, 212; constitutional relations to the crown of, 214; increase of royal instructions issued to the governors of, 221, 222; economic grievances of, 242, 243; denial by, on constitutional right of Great Britain to enact colonial legislation, 257. Rights of, See also Declaration of rights.
- Colonies, laws of, British supervision over, 213, 214; disallowance by the King of, 214-219; on restricting slave trade, 215; on restricting entrance of convicts, 215, 216; on issuing bills of credit, 217; first intimation in 1740 of closer British control over, 219; royal instructions in 1752 requiring revision of, 219; on suppression of lotteries, 219, 220; British neglect of, while suspended in action awaiting royal assent, 220.
- Colville, Admiral, placed at head of revenue service, 237.
- Commissioners of customs in America, 236.
- Commissioners of the King, prospective, 63-66.
- Committee of secret correspondence, personnel of, 75.
- Committee to prepare a Declaration of Independence, 106, 107; lays document before Congress, 121.
- Committees of correspondence, ramifications of, 4; origin of, 16, 17; Collins on, 17; Congress and the, 17, 18; violation of Association to be controlled by, 23.
- Concord, effect of hostilities at, 30.
- Confederation, plan of a, 104; committee to draft Articles of, 101; importance of, 125; date of signing Articles of, 134.
- Congress of 1765, revolutionary memorials of, 3; delegates to, elected by the assemblies, 5; proves efficacy of united action, 5; memorial to Lords and Commons and petition to the King, 6; state papers of, 7; moderation of the acts of, 8.
- Congress of 1774, five delegations to, elected by assemblies, 5; Committees of correspondence and, 17, 18; credentials of delegates to, 19, 20; committed to non-importation and non-exportation agreements, 20; Suffolk County resolves endorsed by, 21; on legislation without representation, 22; letter of, to Gen. Gage, 22; Declaration of rights adopted by, 23, 24; Address to the people of Great Britain by, 26; independent government not demanded by, 28; Address to the people of the colonies and Petition to the King by, 27; dissolved, 29; on the - slave trade, 216; election of delegates to, 226.

- Congress of 1775-76, convened, 30; responsibilities of, 30; assumes direction of colonial affairs, 31; growth of power and authority of, 32, 33; support of, by the colonies, 33; effect of the enlargement of the powers of, 35; emphasis of British aggression the continual policy of, 36, 41; unconscious working of, toward independence, 37, 38; second Petition to the King by, 38; rejects Lord North's plan of conciliation, 39; adjournment and reconvening of, 40; reply of, to proclamation of King declaring rebellion, 41; effect of proclamation upon, 42, 43; on sending a new petition, 46; proclamation of Dec. 6, 47; sovereign policy of, 48; strength of conservative in, 50; continued increase in power and authority of, 51; increasing strength of radical party in, 59; influence upon, of the engaging of foreign mercenaries, 67; regulates commercial relations of the colonies, 68-70, 74; increased power of, 69; on the question of open ports, 71; opens ports, 73; plans to secure supplies of war, 74, 75; attributes of, 77; instructions to delegates of, 77; casts influence on side of democracy, 80; reaction in, 81; revolutionary character of, 81, 82; measures resorted to by, 82; projects itself into Pennsylvania politics, 82, 83; antagonism of Pennsylvania Assembly to, 83, 85, 86; advocates of independence in, 84; takes measures to show sympathy with democracy of Pennsylvania, 86; Maryland feels the hand of, 87; arrest of Gov. Eden ordered by, 87; Maryland Council of Safety aroused to opposition to, 88; attempts to overcome inertia of conservative colonies, 89; recommends local governments, 91, 92, 93, 94; extension of jurisdiction of, 95; ignores Maryland's reactionary resolutions, 96; decides to call for more troops, 97, 98; Virginia resolutions to declare independence submitted to, 100, 101; debate on independence postponed one day, 102; debates in, on independence, 103-106; unimportant position of New York delegation in, 116; New York delegates to, given no instructions on independence, 118-119, 126, 143, 144; on resolutions for independence, 123-125; vote of, on resolutions, 125-129; Declaration of Independence adopted by, 133; state documents issued by, 133, 134; members of, who voted for

- Declaration of Independence, 142, 143.
- Congress, Journal of. See Journal of Congress.
- Connecticut, radical delegates of, control vote of colony, 58, 59; on independence, 114.
- Continental army. See Army, continental.
- Continental Congress. See Congress of 1774; Congress of 1775-76.
- Convicts, opposition of colonies to introduction of, 215, 216.
- Conway, Moncure Daniel, Life of Paine, 55.
- Cromwell, Oliver, 208, 243; popular uprisings under, 11.
- Cushing, Thomas, letter of, 67.
- DEANE, Silas, contract of Congress with, 74, 75; Deane papers, 74, 75; in Congress, 84.
- Declaration of causes of taking up arms*, July 1775, 164.
- Declaration of Independence, committee selected to prepare a, 106, 107; draft of, reported to Congress, 121; debate on, 130; omitted paragraphs from draft of, 131, 132; adoption by Congress of, 133; tradition about date of signing of, 134, 135; signing and promulgation of, 134-139; engrossment of, 136, 137; first official reference to signing of, 137; first authentic copy of, with names of signers, 137; manuscript of, 139; authentication of, 138, 139; date of signing of, 139-149; signers of, 140-149; on the engrossed copy of, 148-149; location of signatures on the engrossed copy of, 150; observance of anniversary of signing of, 151; lack of comprehension of, 152, 153, 159; on the criticism of, 154, 155; criticism of, by John Adams, 156, 157; inherent vitality of, 155, 156; rhetorical side of, 160; denies the right of Parliament to control the colonies, 163; purpose of, 172, 174-177; human elements of, 178; literary form of, 178-180; contemporary opinion of, 180-183; the "unalienable rights" of, 188; upon French origin of, 197; political philosophy of, 200-205; on the right to change form of government, 202, 203; influence of, upon American political institutions, 203; on British supervision over colonial laws, 213, 222; on representation, 222; on the removal and dissolution of assemblies, 224, 225; on naturalization, immigration, and lands, 226, 227; on interference with the administration of justice, 230; on the tenure of office and payment of salaries of the judiciary, 233; on erection of a multitude of offices, 236; on a standing army,

- 237; on rendering the military independent of civil power, 237; on quartering troops upon the people, 238; holds Parliament as well as King responsible for abuses, 240; on protection of soldiers from punishment, 241; on economic grievances of the colonies, 242; on trade, 243; on taxation, 244; on trial by jury, 247; on transportation of offenders, 248; on the Quebec Act of 1774, 250; on altering established forms of government, 251; on suspension of legislatures, 253; on the waging of war against the colonies, 254, 256; on inciting domestic insurrection, 256. See also Independence.
- Declaration of rights of 1774, 13, 165, 199; adopted by Congress, 23; on the authority of Parliament in the colonies, 24, 25; preamble of, 24, 25; features of, 25-27; cited, 162, 163; on the judiciary, 235.
- Declaratory act, 3; passed by the Rockingham ministry, 4; passage of, 8; political controversy carried on by means of, 9, 10; on the legality of Parliamentary dominance over the colonies, 15; enforcement of, 254.
- DeLancey, Governor James, 219.
- Delaware, resolutions of, on non-importation (1774), 19, 20; instructions of, against independence, 45, 77; contest for independence in, 80; McKean's influence upon the politics of, 110; loses vote on resolutions for independence, 125; vote on independence, 127, 128.
- Dickinson, John, 78, 107, 109; on the rights of the colonies, 14; petition to the King drafted by, 27; opposes an aggressive policy, 44; chairman of committee to confer with New Jersey, 46; member of committee to prepare address against independence, 56; on independence, 76, 79, 102, 103, 104, 128, 129; prime mover in reaction, 81; opposes plan of confederation, 104; against resolutions for independence, 123; speech against independence, 124, 125; vindication of, 125; on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 140; on government, 195; on introduction of convicts into the colonies, 216, 217; Life and writings of, 217.
- Documents relating to the colonial history of New York*, 208, 218, 219, 223, 228.
- Donne, Correspondence of George III with Lord North, 171.
- Duane, James, member of committee to prepare address against independence, 56; protests against local governments, 94.

- Dubois, William E. B., Suppression of the slave trade, 215.
- Dulany, Daniel, on rights of the colonies, 14; on government, 195.
- Dunlap, John, printer of the Declaration of Independence, 139.
- Dunmore, Governor, Norfolk destroyed by, 52; abdicates government, 255; threatens to arm Negroes and Indians, 256.
- EDEN, Robert, influence of, upon Maryland politics, 87-89; arrest of, ordered by Congress, 87; banishment of, by Maryland Council of safety, 88.
- Ellery, William, 142; enters Congress, 92.
- Equality, political, 201, 202.
- FALMOUTH, burning of, 255.
- Filmer, Sir Robert, 187; Patriarcha, 187.
- Flick, Alexander C., Loyalism in New York, 116.
- Floyd, William, 142.
- Ford, Jefferson, 164, 173.
- Franklin, Benjamin, 78, 129, 143, 144, 159, 211, 227; view of, concerning separation of colonies, 3; responsibility of, for Paine's Common Sense, 54; allies himself with radicals of Pennsylvania, 56; unofficially supports independence, 58; member of Committee of secret correspondence, 75; in Congress, 84; plan of, for a confederation, 104; member of committee to prepare Declaration of Independence, 107; absent from Congress in June, 110; Declaration of Independence submitted to, 121; on introduction of convicts into the colonies, 216; on the taxation of tea, 248.
- Franklin, William, relations of, with the Provincial congress of New Jersey, 111; banishment of, 112.
- Frothingham, Richard, Rise of the Republic, 110.
- GADSDEN, Christopher, in Congress, 84.
- Gage, Thomas, letter of Congress to, 22; as governor of Massachusetts and commander-in-chief of the army, 238, 239; engages Indians as allies, 257.
- Gaspee*, the revenue vessel, burned, 249.
- Gates, General, called to councils of Congress, 96.
- George III, 193; autocratic direction of England's affairs by, 10, 11; proclamation of, declaring rebellion in the colonies, 41, 255; speech of, on rebellion of the colonies, 51, 52; answer of, to the address and petition of the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, 101; denounced by Declaration of Independence, 132, 155; proclamation of, 167; answer of colonies to the proclamation, 167, 168; tyranny of, 170, 171; con-

- troversy between the colonies and, 194.
- Georgia, not represented at Stamp act congress, 5; nor Congress of 1774, 5; delegates absent from Congress in 1776, 50; instructions to delegates of, 96; favors adoption of the resolutions for independence, 104, 105; votes for resolutions of independence, 126; on slavery, 130; dissolution of Assembly of, 225.
- Gerry, Elbridge, 147; in Congress, 58, 84; on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 141, 142, 147, 149.
- "Glass, lead and paint act," 234, 247, 248.
- Goddard, Mary Katharine, Declaration of Independence printed by, 137.
- Government, theory of the origin of, 13, 14; theory of colonists on, 163; contractual theories of origin of, 185, 186; Locke on, 186, 193; legislative, 189-191; relations of the legislative and the executive to the people, 191; dissolution of, 192; theories of the origin and end of, 195; contractual, 196; evolutionary theory of the origin of, 206.
- Governments, local, authorized by Congress, 91-94.
- Great Britain, inconsistency of, in carrying out colonial policy, 1, 2; commercial relations of the colonies with, 7; negotiations of, with foreign mercenaries, 66, 67, 73; Prohibitory act of (1775), 72; reply of colonies to Prohibitory act, 73; acts of aggression of, 93; John Adams on separation from, 95; revolution of 1688, 193; colonial interpretation of the constitution of, 199, 200; official relations of the colonies with, 208-211; attitude of, toward slavery, 215, 216; on the constitutional right of, to enact legislation for the colonies, 257; neglect of colonial possessions, 257.
- Green, John Richard, Short history of the English people, 171.
- Greene, Evarts B., The provincial governor, 222.
- Grenville, George, 195, 213; colonial policy of, 2, 3; rigorous enforcement of trade laws by, 237; acts of aggression instituted by, 243.
- Gwinnet, Button, 96, 143.
- HALL, Lyman, 96, 143.
- Hamilton, Alexander, on government, 195.
- Hancock, John, 135, 139, 142, 181, 249; friction between Maryland delegates and, 89; president of Congress, 123.
- Harrison, Benjamin, 101, 106, 126, 133, 143; member of Committee of secret correspondence, 75; on independence, 76; manuscript notes by, on the original manuscript of the Virginia resolutions, 101.

- Hart, John, 143.
 Henry VIII, 249.
 Henry, Patrick, 225; on independence, 28, 29.
 Hessian troops, employment of, 67, 255.
 Heyward, Thomas, Jr., 143.
 Hewes, Joseph, 143, 145; North Carolina's interests guarded by, 97.
 Hillsborough, Lord, 217, 225; repressive measures of, 9; became first Secretary of state for the colonies, 210.
 Hobbes, Thomas, 185, 187, 197; on government, 186; Leviathan, 186.
 Hooker, Richard, 197; on government, 186, 187.
 Hooper, William, 104, 145; member of committee to prepare address against independence, 56; opposes plan of confederation, 104.
 Hopkins, Stephen, 142; on rights of the colonies, 14; on government, 195.
 Hopkinson, Francis, 143.
 Howe, Sir William, proclamation, concerning Boston, 47; at Sandy Hook, 122.
 Humphreys, Charles, votes against independence, 129, 143.
 Huntington, Samuel, 58, 142.
- INDEPENDENCE, first steps toward, 6; not advocated by Congress of 1774, 28; advance toward, 37; not publicly advocated by Congress, 37; popular movement toward, 42, 43; rapid development of sentiment of, 48, 49, 51; motion against, 56, 57; public sentiment for, 58; preparation for, 61; reluctance of colonists to declare for, 62, 63 and open ports, 71; instructions of five colonies against, 77, 78, 81; attitude of conservatives toward, 79; fight in Congress for, 85; increase in popularity of, 89; status of the sentiment of, the first of June, 1776, 99; motion in Congress for, 100; vote on, postponed one day, 102; debates on, 103-106; vote on, postponed three weeks, 106; New York on, 116; resolutions for, by New York, 120; consideration of resolutions for, 123; debates on resolutions for, 123; vote for, 125-129; denial by colonies of desire for, 166; popular mind prepared for reception of, 199, 200. See also Declaration of Independence.
- Independence Hall, Philadelphia, 134.
 Indians, threat to arm, 256.
 Iredell, James, North Carolina laws, 231.
- JAMES II, 105, 209.
 Jay, John, 112; address to the people of Great Britain prepared by, 26; member of committee to confer with New Jersey, 46; on independence, 76, 79.
 Jefferson, Thomas, 79, 143, 147, 152, 165, 176, 230, 240, 242; on independence, 28, 29; returns to Congress,

- 92; notes of debates on independence made by, 102; chairman of committee to prepare Declaration of Independence, 107; Declaration of Independence drafted by, 121, 122; on paragraphs omitted from Declaration of Independence, 130; on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 140; popularity of, 156; reply of, to John Adams' criticism, 157-159; disclaims authority of Parliament, 163, 164; position of, in relation to the Declaration of Independence, 173, 177; Summary view of the rights of British America, 173, 174, 243; proposed constitution for Virginia prepared by, 174; on government, 195; influence of Locke upon, 197, 201-203; on government as voiced in the Declaration of Independence, 200, 201; on equality, 201, 202; on disallowance by the King of colonial laws, 213, 214; on the King's neglect of Virginia laws, 221; on representation, 223, 224; Works, 104, 121, 130, 140, 148, 159, 165, 174, 202, 224, 228, 240, 241, 243.
- Journal of Congress*, 1774: 19, 21, 23, 24, 34, 164, 236; 1775: 34, 35, 39, 40, 42, 46, 69, 70, 86, 165, 166; 1776: 66, 67, 70, 74, 77, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 92, 94, 96, 97, 107, 112, 123, 145, 146, 235; July 4, 1776, upon the Declaration of Independence, 135, 136; manuscripts of, 138-140.
- Judiciary, on the establishment of, 230-233; on the tenure of office and payment of salaries of, 232-235.
- LAND companies refused the right to found colonies, 227.
- Land grants, restrictions of limits for, 227.
- Lands, acquisition of, 228.
- Langdon-Elwyn papers*, 183.
- Lecky, William E. H., History of England in the 18th century, 171.
- Lee, Francis Lightfoot, 143.
- Lee, Richard Henry, 168; address to the people of the colonies prepared by, 27; in Congress, 84; resolutions introduced by, 100; debate of, on adoption of resolutions for independence, 104-106; on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 145, 147, 148; charges of, against Jefferson, 158.
- Legislative assemblies. See Assemblies, colonial.
- Lewis, Francis, 142.
- Lexington, effect of hostilities at, 30.
- Liberty*, the sloop, riots upon seizure of, 249.
- Liberty Bell, unwarranted prominence of, 134.
- Lincoln, Abraham, 202.
- Lincoln, Revolutionary movement in Pennsylvania, 45, 56, 86, 108.

- Lippard, George, Legends of the revolution, 134.
- Livingston, Philip, 142.
- Livingston, Robert R., 121, 142, 144; opposes adoption of resolutions for independence, 102, 103, 104; member of committee to prepare Declaration of Independence, 107.
- Livingston, William, 168; motion of, 60.
- Locke, John, 185, 198; colonists' reception of political ideas of, 11; doctrine of, on the separation of powers, 168; on government, 186-193; Treatises on government, 187; influence of, upon the colonial Fathers, 197; influence of, upon Jefferson, 201; on equality, 202; resemblance between deductions of, and of modern jurists, 205, 206.
- Lords of the Committee of Council for Plantation affairs, 211.
- Lotteries, legislation respecting, 2.
- Lowell, Abbott Lawrence, Essays on government, 186, 205.
- Lynch, Thomas, Jr., 143.
- McCRAIDY, Edward, South Carolina under royal government, 20, 233; South Carolina in the revolution, 63, 100, 115, 127, 233.
- MacDonald, William, Select charters illustrative of American history, 8, 208, 227, 234-236, 238, 241, 243-245, 247, 250, 252-255.
- McKean, Thomas, 84, 112, 129, 143.
- McLaughlin, Andrew Cunningham, 186, 205.
- Martin, Alexander, 220, 223; abdicates government, 255.
- Maryland, resolutions of, on non-importation (1774), 19, 20; instructions of, against independence, 45, 77; contest for independence in, 80; controversy between the Council of safety of, and Congress, 87-89; reactionary resolutions of, 96; on independence, 113, 114, 123; votes for resolutions for independence, 125; effort of, to restrict entrance of convicts, 216.
- Maryland Convention, Proceedings of, 88, 89, 113, 114.
- Maryland Council of safety, Journal and correspondence of, 65.
- Massachusetts, advice by Congress respecting government, 34; radical delegates of, control vote of colony, 58, 59; on independence, 100, 114, 115; constitution of, 204, disputes over laws of, 215; breaking up of land bank schemes of, 217; laws of, disallowed by the King, 218; removal of Assembly of, 225; dissolution of Assembly of, 225, 226; on the judiciary, 233, 235; failure to rescind Circular letter of, 249; act regulating government of, 251, 252; salary of governor of, 252.

- Massachusetts historical society, Proceedings, 144, 147.
Massachusetts State papers, 218, 222, 235, 238.
- Merriam, Charles Edward, American political theories, 186, 197, 205; on sovereignty, 196, 197.
- Middleton, Arthur, 143.
- Military, independent of civil power, 237, 239.
- Milton, John, 186.
- Molasses act (1733), 243, 245; (1764), 243, 245.
- Montesquieu, Baron, on separation of powers, 198, 204.
- Montgomery, General, death of, 57; services in memory of, 59.
- Moore, Sir Henry, 217.
- Morris, Lewis, 142, 144.
- Morris, Robert, 71, 78, 107; on independence, 75, 76, 79, 129; letter of, to Joseph Reed, 129; on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 140; opposition of, to Declaration of Independence, 180.
- Morton, John, 129, 143, 144.
- Mutiny act, extension of provisions of, to the colonies, 238.
- NARRAGANSETT Bay, burning of the Gaspee in, 249.
- Naturalization, generally practiced by the colonies, 228; passage of acts of, prohibited, 229.
- Nature, law of, as related to government, 188, 189.
- Nature, state of, 186; defined by Locke, 188, 189.
- Navigation act (1651), 208; acts, 212.
- Negroes, threat to arm, 256.
- Nelson, Thomas, Jr., 143.
- New England, favors a declaration of independence by Congress, 99; favors the adoption of the resolutions for independence, 104, 105, 125.
- New Hampshire, not represented at Stamp act congress, 5; advised by Congress to form a government, 34, 43, 80, 226; appeal of, to Congress for advice on government, 49, 226; on independence, 114; royal instructions to, against opposition to slave trade, 215; on representation, 223, 224.
- New Jersey, resolutions of, on non-importation (1774), 19, 20; instructions of, against independence, 45, 77; proposes sending a new petition to the King, 46; contest for independence in, 80; revolutionary changes in, 110, 111; relations of Gov. Franklin and the Provincial Congress of, 111; declares for a new government and for independence, 112; votes for resolutions for independence, 125; laws of, designed to prohibit slave trade, 215; laws of, respecting bills of credit, 218; on representation, 223.
- New Jersey Archives*, 46, 218.
- New Jersey Congress, letter

- of, to the Continental Congress, 111.
- New York, instructions of, against independence, 45, 77; reluctance of, to declare for independence, 63; contest for independence in, 80; pressure of Congress upon conservative element of, 94; political and religious division in, 116; position in Congress of, of minor importance, 116; resolutions of Provincial Congress of, on forming new governments, 117; vacillation and inconsistency of Provincial Congress of, 118-120; delegates of, given no instructions on independence, 118-119, 126, 143, 144; Provincial Congress of, removed to White Plains, 119; adopts resolutions to support the Declaration of Independence, 120; Convention of, reports Howe at Sandy Hook, 122; laws of, respecting bills of credit, 217, 218; royal instructions to governors of, respecting legislation, 219; on representation, 223; on the judiciary of, 233; suspension of Assembly of, 253, 254.
- New York Legislative council, Journal of, 223.
- Niles, Hezekiah, Principles and acts of the revolution, 8.
- Non-exportation agreements, 20, 26, 40, 41, 247.
- Non-importation, Articles of Association upon, 22.
- Non-importation agreements, 9, 19, 20, 26, 247.
- Norfolk, burning of, 52, 255.
- North, Lord, 64, 65; on plan of conciliation of, 39; answer of colonies to motion of, 165.
- North Carolina, not represented at Stamp act congress, 5; resolutions on non-importation (1774), 20; delegates absent from Congress in 1776, 50; contest for independence in, 80; instructions of, in favor of independence, 96, 97, 99; votes for resolutions of independence, 125; constitution of, 204; on the establishment of superior courts of justice in, 230, 233, 253; on attachment of property in, 231; Assembly of, dissolved, 232; laws of, exempting immigrants from taxation, disallowed by the King, 229.
- North Carolina colonial records*, 220, 227, 229, 231, 233.
- OTIS, James, 199; Rights of the British colonies asserted and proved, 12, 157, 189; on the rights of the colonies, 13, 14; on government, 195.
- PACA, William, 143.
- Paine, Robert Treat, 142.
- Paine, Thomas, appearance of Common Sense by, 52; influence of Common Sense, 53; origin of Common - Sense*, 53-55; dissemination of Common Sense, 61.

- Paper money, 82. See also Bills of credit.
- Parliament, acts of, affecting commerce and industries of the colonies, 1, 2; projects itself into American affairs, 6; beginning of controversy between colonies and, 6; remonstrance against authority of, 7, 14; opposition of colonies to control by, 162-167; establishment of supremacy of, in England, 187; attempt of, to revive authority in colonies (1763), 194, 195; address King in 1740 upon colonial legislation, 219; act of, "for the impartial administration of justice" (1774), 241, 242; acts of, on colonial trade (1688-1765), 243, 244; act of, authorizing captives to bear arms against their country (1755), 255.
- Penn, John, 143.
- Pennsylvania, resolutions of, on non-importation (1774), 19, 20; attitude toward independence of conservatives of, 43; efforts of the conservative party to keep control of government of, 44, 45; instructions of, against independence, 45, 77; attempt to break up conservative party in, 54; radicals of, gain in power, 56; reluctance of, to declare for independence, 63; Conference of Committees of, 109; new instructions of, to delegates, 109; dissolution of Assembly of, 109; votes against resolutions for independence, 126; political situation of, 128; votes for independence, 129; attempts to overthrow proprietary government in, 162; constitution of, 204; effort of, to restrict entrance of convicts, 216; laws, respecting bills of credit, 218; conservative policy of, 78, 79, 90; contest for independence in, 80; antagonism of Assembly of, to Congress, 83, 85, 86; attempt to overthrow the Assembly of, 94; protestations of inhabitants of Philadelphia against the Assembly of, 107, 108; change of form of government of, 108, 109; on independence, 108-110, 128, 129; inhabitants of, protest against competency of the Pennsylvania Assembly, 107, 108.
- Pitt, William, on the Declaratory act, 15.
- Political organizations, inter-colonial, 4.
- Poore, Benjamin Perley, Charters and constitutions, 204.
- Ports, opening of, 62, 69, 70, 71, 73, 78.
- Pownall, Thomas, on royal instructions issued to governors, 222; Administration of the colonies, 222.
- Privateering, authorization of, 73, 84.
- "Prohibitory Act," 78, 244.
- Property, conception of, by

- Locke, 188, 189; power of disposal of, 196.
- "QUARTERING Act," 238.
- Quebec act (1774), 250, 251.
- Quebec, fall of (1776), 57.
- Queens county, N. Y., Tories of, 82, 83.
- RAPER, Charles Lee, North Carolina, 232.
- Read, George, 143; Life and correspondence of, 110; votes against independence, 126, 129.
- Reed, Joseph, 63, 180; Life and correspondence of, 45, 64, 65, 181; on the proposed commissioners of the King, 65; Letters to his wife, 65.
- "Restraining Acts" (1775), 41, 46, 243.
- Revenue officers, increase of, 237.
- Revolution, sacredness of the right of, 197. See also American revolution.
- Rhode Island, instructions of, to delegates, 92, 93; on independence, 114, 115.
- Rhode Island colonial records*, 51.
- Rights, natural, theory of, 13, 185, 188, 189.
- Roberdeau, Daniel, 108.
- Rockingham, Marquis of, ministry of, 4, 9.
- Rodney, Cæsar, 143; votes for independence, 128, 129.
- Rogers, John, 143.
- Ross, George, on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 144, 149.
- Rousseau, Jean Jacques, Contract social, 198.
- Rush, Benjamin, on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 144, 149.
- Rutledge, Edward, 60, 106, 126, 127, 143, 176; opposes adoption of resolutions for independence, 102, 103, 104; favors independence, 126; influence of, upon South Carolina politics, 127.
- SCHAPER, William A., Sectionalism and representation in South Carolina, 79.
- Schuyler, Philip, 181.
- Secret journal of Congress, Domestic*, 98, 104, 176; on the Declaration of Independence, 137, 139.
- Secretary of state for the colonies, 210, 211.
- Sergeant, Jonathan D., influence of, upon New Jersey politics, 112.
- Shepherd, William, History of proprietary government in Pennsylvania, 162, 217.
- Sherman, Roger, 60, 142; in Congress, 38; member of committee to prepare Declaration of Independence, 107; Declaration of Independence submitted to, 121.
- Slave trade, laws restricting, disallowed by the crown, 215; prohibited by Articles of Association, 74, 216.
- Slavery, draft of Declaration of Independence on, 130, 132.
- Smith, James, on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 144, 149.

- Smith, Richard, Diary, 40, 56, 57, 60, 72, 104.
- Smith, Dr. William, oration of, 59.
- Smuggling, 237.
- South Carolina, votes against non-importation agreement (1774), 28; advised by Congress to form a government, 34, 80, 226; delegates absent from Congress in 1776, 50; reluctance of, to declare for independence, 63; political revolutions in, 79, 80; contest for independence in, 80; on independence, 99, 115, 116; first vote of, against resolutions for independence, 127; final vote of, for independence, 127; on slavery, 130; constitution of, 204; laws of, designed to prohibit slave trade, 215; removal of Assembly of, 225; dissolution of Assembly of, 225; appeal to Congress of, for advice on government, 226; on the establishment of courts of justice in, 233.
- Southern colonies, laws of, 215.
- Sovereignty, the beginning of, 48; doctrine of popular, 196, 197.
- Sparks, Jared, Washington, 29, 181.
- Stamp act, 246; repeal of, 3, 8, 10; resistance by Congress to, 5; economic reasons for non-enforcement of, 7, 8; five years succeeding passage of, 10; on riots occasioned by, 218.
- Stamp act congress. See Congress of, 1765.
- Staples, Rhode Island in the Continental Congress, 93.
- Stephen, Sir Leslie, on political philosophy, 184; English thought in the 18th century, 184, 186, 187.
- Stephen, Sir James Fitz James, Horæ Sabbatica, 16, 186.
- Stevens, Benjamin Franklin, Facsimiles, 63.
- Stillé, Charles, Dickinson, 45, 104, 125.
- Stockton, Richard, 142.
- Stone, Thomas, 143; letter of, 65.
- Stuart, the Indian agent, makes overtures to Gen. Gage, 257.
- Suffolk county resolutions, endorsement by Congress of, 21.
- Sugar act (1764), 6, 235, 244, 245.
- Sullivan, William, on social compact, 185.
- Sydney, Algernon, 186, 197.
- TAYLOR, George, on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 144, 149.
- Taxation, acts of Parliament for raising revenue by direct, 6; principle of, at issue, 12; without consent, 163, 244-248.
- Taxation, without representation, 7, 12, 13, 25, 163, 196.
- Tea, non-importation of, 22; opposition to landing of, 248.

- Tea act of 1770, 9, 10, 247, 248, 254; of 1773, 248, 254.
- Thomson, Charles, 138, 142; the original manuscript of the Virginia resolutions endorsed by, 101; transcript of the Declaration of Independence by, 139.
- Thornton, Matthew, signing of Declaration of Independence by, 146, 149, 150.
- Trade compromise of Nov. 1, 1775, 69.
- Trade laws, economic reasons for non-enforcement of, 7; enforcement of, with view to end smuggling, 237; enforcement of, 243, 244.
- Treaties, committee to prepare a plan of, 107.
- Trial by jury, 7, 25, 248, 249, 250.
- Troops, quartering of, without consent of colonists, 4, 238.
- Tryon, William, 230; conspiracy against Washington instituted by, 119, 122; abdicates government, 255.
- Tories, resolutions to suppress, 57; suppression of, 82, 83; influence of, in New York politics, 116.
- Townshend acts (1767), passage of, 5; partial repeal of, 9, 10; on the Townshend revenue act, known as "Glass, lead and paint act," 234, 247, 248; on enforcement of taxation laws in the, 236. See also Tea act.
- Tyler, Moses Coit, Literary history of American revolution, 154, 179, 180; on the Declaration of Independence, 177, 178-180.
- Tyranny, 191, 192.
- UNION, effectiveness of, 5, 6; represented by Congress, 32; sentiment regarding, strengthened by Congress, 35, 36, 39; strengthened by Lord North's plan of conciliation, 40; fundamental acts of, 133, 134.
- United colonies. See colonies.
- United States, first use of the phrase, 136; relation of political science to the political life of, 161; constitutional and legal development of, 205, 206.
- Usurpation, 191.
- VIRGINIA, not represented at Stamp act congress, 5; resolutions of, on non-importation (1774), 19, 20; advised by Congress to form a government, 34, 80, 226; majority of delegates favor independence, 50; reluctance of, to declare for independence, 63; instructions of, to propose independence, 96, 97, 99; resolutions for independence by, 100, 101; manuscript of the resolutions, 101; facsimile of the resolutions, 101; on the accepting of the resolutions, 104, 105; vote for resolutions of independence, 125; constitution of, 204; laws of, designed to prohibit slave trade, 215; effort of, to restrict entrance of con-

- victs, 215, 216; royal instructions to government of, upon suppression of lotteries, 220; British neglect of laws of (1770), 220, 221; on representation, 223; dissolution of Assembly of, 225; appeal to Congress for advice on government of, 226.
- WALTON, George, 143.
- War of independence, early events of, 255, 256.
- War office, establishment of a, considered by Congress, 57; institution of a, 107.
- Ward, Henry, in Congress, 84; death of, 85.
- Washington, George, 65, 73; impatience of, at delay in declaring independence, 64; called to councils of Congress, 96; reports to Conspiracy in New York, 122; on the Declaration of independence, 181-182.
- Webster, Daniel, on allegiance of the colonies to the king, 169, 170.
- Wendell, Barrett, Literary history of America, 160.
- Wentworth, John, 224.
- West Indies, trade of, with the colonies, 244.
- Whigs, under Rockingham administration, 4; return to power of Rockingham, 9.
- Whiggism, expounded by Locke, 187.
- Whipple, William, 142; on the Declaration of Independence, 182.
- William III, establishes a permanent Board for trade and foreign plantations, 209.
- Williams, William, on the signing of the Declaration of Independence by, 144, 147, 149.
- Willing, William, 143; votes against independence, 129.
- Wilson, James, 143, 144, 168; motion by, 56; defeat of motion, 57, 58; protests against local governments, 94; opposes adoption of resolutions of independence, 102, 103, 104; on independence, 128; votes for independence, 129; on government, 195.
- Winsor, Justin, Narrative and critical history, 29, 238, 250, 257.
- Witherspoon, John, 143.
- Wolcott, Oliver, 60; in Congress, 58; on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 146, 147.
- Wyoming, border warfare of, 83, 86.
- Wythe, George, 60, 85, 176; member of committee to confer with New Jersey, 46; in Congress, 84; debate of, on adoption of the resolutions for independence, 104-106; on signing of Declaration of Independence by, 145, 147, 148.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

14 DAY USE

RETURN TO DESK FROM WHICH BORROWED

LOAN DEPT.

This book is due on the last date stamped below, or on the date to which renewed.

Renewed books are subject to immediate recall.

SANTA BARBARA

INTER-LIBRARY

LOAN

ONE MONTH AFTER RECEIPT

MAR 31 1966

DAVIS

INTER-LIBRARY

LOAN

FEB 7 1967

APR 30 1970 72

RECEIVED

APR 27 '70 - 9 AM

LOAN DEPT.

YB 44835

U. C. BERKELEY LIBRARIES

C057921772

215197

E

221

F8

THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

