T. N. THE TRANSLA-TOR TO THE READER.

Good Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English, M. Caluines booke of the Institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluine first wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of small volume, & since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new encreases still protesting at euery edition himself to be one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing do growe in profiting, & with their profiting do proceede in writing. At length hauing in many his other workes trauailed about exposition of sundry bookes of the Scriptures, & in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places & matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him & not in any other methode, were not so ready for the readers use, he therefore entred into this purpose, to enlarge this booke of Institutions, & therein to treat of all those titles and common places largely, with this entent, that whensoever any occasion fel in his other bookes to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplyfie his bookes of Commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholly to this storehouse & treasure of that sort of diuine learning. As age and weaknesse grew upon him, so hee hastened his labour, and according to his petition to God, he in manner ended his life with his worke, for he liued not long after. So great a iewell was meete to be made most beneficiall, that is to say, applied to most common use. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queenes Maiesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English for the commoditie of the church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deere friends of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitchurch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greeke, & Latine tongues the other her Highnes Printer of the bookes of common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my saide friende Edward Whitchurch, a man well known of upright hearte and dealing, an auncient zelous Gospeller, as plaine and true a friende as euer I knew liuing, and as desirous to do any thing to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my said first edition of this booke, I considered how the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plentie of matter in small roome of wordes, yea and those so circumspectly and precisely ordered, to auoyde the cauillations of such, as for enmitie to the truth therein conteyned, woulde gladly seeke & abuse all aduantages which might be found by any oversight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothing might well be added with out idle superfluiy, & againe so nicly pared that nothing could be minished without taking away some necessarie substance of matter therein expressed. This manner of writing, beside the peculiar scarmes of artes and figures, & the difficulty of the matters themselves, being throughout enterlaced with the schoolemens controuersies, made a great hardnes in the authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwise he is both plentifull and ease, insomuch that it suffiseth not to read him once, vnlesse you can be content to reade in vaine. This consideration encombred me with great doubtfulness for the whole order and fraise of my translation. If I should followe the wordes, I saw that of necessity the hardnes in the translation must needs be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I should leaue the course of wordes, and graunt my selfe liberty after the naturall manner of my owne tongue, to say that in English which I conceaued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceined how hardly I might escape error, and on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, how perrilous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his wordes. And they that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, doe knowe that not the onely grammaticall construction of words suffiseth, but the very building and order to obserue all advantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of wordes, maketh much to the true setting forth of a writers minde. In the ende, I rested vpon this determination, to followe the wordes so neere as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper & letter as the Latine is, it should not exceede the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefite is moreouer provided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be wished in many of those men for whose profession this booke most fitly serueth) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withall, except in such fewe places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profitt in good matter, and furnish themselves with vnderstanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing hereof, I did not onely trust mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from sentence to sentence throughout the whole booke with conference and ouerlooking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their indgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truly, and their approouing of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be deliuered him but sound, vnmixed and vncorrupted doctrine, euen in such sort as the author himselfe had first framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned and vertuous man M. David Whiehed (whome I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining euery sentence throughout the whole booke. Beside all this, I primatchly required many, and generally all men with whom I euer had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amende it. Since which time I haue not bene aduertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied, any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause, why not onely at the second and third time but also at this impression, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In deede I perceiued many men well minded and studious of this booke, so require a table for their ease and furtherance. Their honest desire I haue fulfilled in the second edition, and haue added thereto a plentifull table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters discoursed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, & vnder euery title is set forth a

briefe summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke, concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, & Section or diuision of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed & proued. And for the redier finding thereof, I haue caused the number of the Chapters to be set upon euery leafe in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsuall figures of Algorisme. And now at this last publishing, my friendes by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romaine letter & smaller volume, with diuerse other Tables, which since my seconde edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefite. Moreouer, whereas in the first edition the euill maner of my scribling hande, the enterlining of my Copy, and some other causes wel known among workemen of that faculty, made very many faults to passe the Printer, I haue in the second impresson caused the booke to be composed by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needes be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my selfe do knowe aboue three hundred faultes amended. And now at this last Printing, the composing after a printed copy bringeth some ease, and the diligence used about the correction, hauing bene right faithfully looked vnto, it cannot be but much more truly set forth. This also is performed, that the volume being smaller, with a letter fayre and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, & guiding of their duties. Thus on the printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commoditie (good Readers) is provided for. Now resteth your owne diligence for your owne profit in studying it. To spend many wordes in commending the worke it selfe, were needelesse: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vnto and not vainly say, that though many great learned men haue written bookes of common places of our religion, as Melancthon, Sarceuius, and other, whose workes are very good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the consenting iudgement of those that vnderstand the same, there is none to be compared to this work of Caluine, both for his substantiall sufficiencie of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deepe and strong confutation of all olde & new heresies: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the most profitable bookes for all students of Christian diuinitie. Wherin (good Readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefite, that you may haue this profite of my trauel, so I beseech you let me haue this use of your gentleness, that my doinges may be construed to such good end as I haue meant them: & that if any thing mislike you by reason of hardnes, or any other cause that may seeme to be my default, you will not forthwith condemne the worke, but read it ofter: in which doing you will finde (as manie haue confessed to me that they haue found by experience) that those things which at the first reading shal displease you for hardnes, shal be found so easie as so hard matter would suffer, & for the most part more easie than some other phrasie which should with greater loosenes & smother sliding away deceiue your vnderstanding. I cōfesse indede it is not finely & pleasantly writtē, nor carrieth with it such delitefull grace of speech as some great wise men haue bestowed upon some folisher things, yet it containeth sound trueth set foorth with faithful plainnes without wrong done to the authors meaning: and so if you accept and use it, you shall not faile to haue great profite thereby, and I shal thinke my labour very well employcd.

Thomas Norton.

French King his soueraigne Lord, Iohn Cal-
uation in Christ.

WHEN I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble King) than to write any thing that afterward should be presented to your maiestie. Onely my minde was to teache certaine introductions, whereby they that are touched with some zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlinesse. And this trauaile I tooke principally for my contriemen the Frenchmen, of whom I vnderstood very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I sawe very fewe that had rightly receiued so much as any litle knowledge of him. And y^e this was my meaning, the boke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceiued, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre preuailed in your realme, that in it there is no rounce for sound doctrine: I thought I should do a thing worth my trauaile, all in one worke both to giue an instruction for them, & to declare a confession to you: whereby ye may learne what manner of doctrine that is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sworde and fier. For I wil not feare to confesse, that I haue in this worke comprehended in manner the summe of that selfe same doctrine, against which they cry out, that it ought to be punished with prisonment, banishment, cōdemnation without iudgement, and with fier, that it ought to be chased away by land and sea. I knowe in deede with how hainous informations they haue filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to wey, y^e there shalbe no innocence, neither in wordes nor deedes, if it may be enough to accuse. Truly if any, to bring the same in hatred, shall allege that this Doctrine whereof I nowe go about to yeld account vnto you, hath bene long ago condemned by cōsent of all degrees, and atteinted by many iudgements already giuen in iudicial courts: all that he sayth shal amount to no more but that it hath partly bin violently throwen downe by the banding and power of the aduersaries thereof, and partly bene traiterously and fraudulently oppressed with their lies and suttile practises and sclaunders. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause, bloody sentences are pronounced against it: herein is fraude, that it is without deseruing accused of sedition and euil doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these thinges, you your selfe can beare vs witnesse, most noble king, with how lieng sclaunders it is dayly accused vnto you: as, that it tendeth to no other end but to writh from kings their scepters out of their handes, to throwe downe all iudges seates and iudgements, to subuete all orders and ciuil governments, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to abolish all lawes, to vndoe all proprieties and possessions, finally to turne all things vpside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible things they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole worlde might worthily iudge it with the maintainers thereof, worthy of a thousand fiers and gallowes. Who can now maruell that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleueed? Lo, this is the cause y^e all degrees agree & conspire to the condemning of vs & our doctrine. They that sit to iudge, being rauished with this affection pronounce for sentences their foreconceiued determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they haue well enough discharged their duties, if they commaund no man to be drawn to execution, but such as are found guilty either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnessse. But of what fault? of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what lawe condemned? Herein should haue stand the succor of defence for them, not to denie the doctrine it selfe, but to mainteine it for true. But here is all libertie once to mutter, vtterly cut of from vs.

Wherefore I doe not vniustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your own hand the whole hearing of the cause which hitherto hath bene troublesomely handled or rather carelesly tossed without all order of lawe, more by outrageous heat than iudiciall grauitie. Neither yet thinke, that I here goe about to make mine owne priuate defense, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my natieue contrie, to which although I beare such affection of natural loue as becommeth me: yet as the case now is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take vpon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day hauing bene by all meanes torne & troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that in deede rather by the tyrannie of certeine Pharisees, than by your owne knowledge. But howe that cometh to passe, it is not here needfull to tell: truely it lieth in great distress. For thus farre haue the vngodly preuailed, that the trueth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vnregarded: as for the silly poore Church, it is either wasted with cruell slaughters, and so driuen away with banishments, or dismayed with threatens & terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet stil they continue with such rage & fiercenes as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending & the ruine which theselues haue made. In the meane time no man steppeth forth, to set him selfe in defense against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fauour the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskilfulnesse of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error & vnskilfulnesse which they know to be the most certaine trueth of God: calling them ignorant men, whose wit they see that Christ hath not so despised but that he hath vouchefaued to communicate to them the mysteries of his heauenly wisdom. So much are all ashamed of the Gospel. It shalbe your office (most noble King) not to turne away shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them doe plenteously glut themselues, & other some liue with gnawing of poore crustes; yet they liue all of one pot, which without these warming helps should not onely waxe cold, but also throughly freeze. Therefore howe much more euery of the is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrier he is for their faith. Finally they all endeuer themselues to this, to kepe still either both kingdome safe, and their belly full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth any token, be it neuer so litle. Neither yet so do they cease to slander our doctrine, and by al the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, wherby they may bring it into hatred or suspiciō. They call it new, & lately forged: they cauil that it is doubtful, & vncerteine: they demaunde by what miracles it is cōfirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it shold preuaile against the consent of so many holy Fathers, and the most auncient custome: they presse vpon vs to confes it to be schismatical, which moueth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in many ages in which no such thing hath beene hearde of. Last of all they say, that there neede no arguments, for (say they) it may by the frutes be iudged of what sort it is, namely which hath bredde so huge a heape of sectes, so many turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Truly ful easy it is for them, to triumph vpon a forsaken cause before the light beleeting and ignorant multitude. But if we might also haue our turne likewise allowed vs to speake, verily this sharpe heate would sone be cooled wherewith they do so with full mouth and as licentiously as vnpunishedly some against vs.

Rom. 4. 25.

First, whereas they call it newe, they do great wrong to God, whose holy word deserued not to be accused of newnesse. To them in deede I nothing dout that it is new, to whom Christ is newe, and his Gospel is new. But they which knewe that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Iesus Christe died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification, shall finde nothing newe among vs. Whereas it hath long lien hidden vnknown, and buried: that is the fault of the vngodlines of men. Nowe sith it is by the bountifulnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receiue againe the title of auncientie.

Esa. 1 3.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they rake it for doubtfull and vncertaine. This verily is it which the Lord by his Prophet complaineth, that the oxew knewe his owner, and the asse his maisters stall, but his people knewe not him. But howefouer they mocke at the vncertaintie of it: if they were driuen to seale their owne doctrine with their own bloud, & with losse of their life, men might see how much they set by it. But farre other is our affiance, which dreadeth neither the terrors of death, nor yet the very iudgement feare of God.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale vnreasonably with vs. For we coyne no new Gospell, but hold fast the selfe same Gospell for confirming of the truth whereof all the miracles doe serue that cuer Christ and his Apostles haue done. But this thing they haue special about vs, that they can euen to this day confirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they aleadge miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwise well stabil-

stablished: they are so either trifling and worthy to be laughed at, or vaine and lying. And yet, although they were neuer so monstrous, they ought not to haue ben of any value against the word of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in euery place & at euery time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by natural order of things. This false colour might par-adventure haue made the better shewe, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawfull end and vse of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the signes which folowed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the confirming of it: Likewise Luke also saith that the Lord did beare witness to y^e word of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the handes of the Apostles. Wherwith wholly agreeth that saying of the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, saluation was confirmed by this, that the Lorde did beare witness to it with signes, and wonders, and diuerse powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroying of the credit of the Gospell? those things which are appointed onely to stablish the trueth, shall we apply to confirming of lyes? Therefore it is meete that the doctrine, which (as the Euangelist saith) goeth before miracles, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marke, if it tende not to the seeking of the glorie of men, but of God. Sith Christ affirmeth this to be the prooffe of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully esteemed which are drawn to any other ende than to glorifie y^e name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Sathan hath his miracles, which although they be juggling deceites rather than true powers, yet are such as may deceiue the ignorant & vnskillful. Magicians & enchanter haue bin alway famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles haue nourished idolatrie: which yet doe not proue to vs, that the superstition of Magicians and idolaters is lawfull. And with this battning ramme in olde time the Donatistes did shake the simplicitie of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we doe nowe make the same aunswere to our ad-uersaries, which Augustine then made to the Donatistes: that the Lord hath made vs ware against such miracle workers, when he foretolde that there should come false prophetes, which with lying signes and diuerse wonders, should, if it were possible, bring the elect into error. And Paul hath giuen warning that the kingdome of Antichrist should be with all power, & signes, and lying wonders. But these miracles (say they) are done not of idols, not of forserers, not of false prophetes, but of the Saintes. As though we knewe not that this is the craft of Satan, to transfigure himselfe into an Angell of light. In olde time the Egyptians worshipped Ieremy which was buried among them, with sacrifices and other diuine honors. Did not they abuse the holy Prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshipping of his tombe, they obtained that they thought the healing of the stinging of the serpents to be the iust rewarde thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath bin and euer shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that haue not receiued the loue of truth, that they may beleue lying?

lations . As for miracles which they bring forth for themselves, they are meere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanitie.

Moreouer, they doe slanderously set the Fathers against vs (I meane the auncient Fathers & the writers of y^e age as yet more vncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of their vngodlinesse: by whose authoritie if the debate were to be ended, the better part of the victory (to speake euen most modestly) would bend to our side . But whereas many things haue bin excellently wel & wisely writen of those Fathers, & in some things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good natural children forsooth, according to the rightnes that they haue, both of wit, iudgement, and minde, do worship only their faultes and errours: & those things which are well spoken, they either marke not, or faine as if they knew them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dunge in of the golde of the Fathers . Then they oppresse vs with importunate crying out against vs, as despisers and enemies of the Fathers. But we do so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easily proue by their consenting voices, the greater parte of these things that we say at this day . But we so reade their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, to serue vs, not to haue dominion ouer vs: and that we are Christes alone, whome wee must obey in all things without exception. Who so kepeth not this choise, shall haue nothing certaine in religion: forasmuch as those holy men were ignorant of many things, do oftentimes striue one with another, yea and sometimes fight with themselves. Not without cause (say they) we are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the olde boundes which our Fathers haue set . But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fieldes, and the obedience of faith, which ought to be so framed that it forget her people & the house of her Father. If they haue so great delite to vse allegories, why do they not rather expounde the Apostles, than any other, to be their Fathers, whose appointed boundes it is not lawfull to plucke vp? for so did Hierom expounde it, whose wordes they haue registred among their Canons. But if they wil haue the boundes of the same Fathers, whom they meane, to be stedfastly kept: why do they, so oft as they list, so licentiously passe them? Of the ũmber of the Fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, and that therefore he needeth neither cuppes nor dishes: the other said, y^e the holy things require not gold, and that those thinges please not with gold which are not bought with gold. Therefore they passe the bounde, which are in the holy things somuch delited with golde, siluer, iuorie, marble, precious stones and silkes, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipped, vnlesse altogether they be dissolutely set out with exquisite gorgeoufnes, or rather with outragiuous excessse. A Father was he, which said, y^e he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they passe the boundes, when they accurse the soule that tasteth fleshe in Lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said y^e a Monke which laboureth

not with his handes, is iudged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you wil) a robber: The other said, that it is not lawfull for Monkes to liue of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplations, in prayers, in studie. This bounde also they haue passed, when they placed the sale and barrell bellies of Monks in stewes and brothelhouses to be fatted with other mens substance. A Father was he, which saide, that it is a horrible abomination to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any Saint in the temples of Christians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but also decreed by an Ecclesiasticall Councell, that that which is worshipped should not be painted on walles. They are farre from holding themselves within these boundes, when they leaue not one corner without images. An other Father counselled, that hauing done the duetie of natural kindenesse toward the dead in burying them, we should let them rest. These boundes they breake, when they cast into men a continuall carefullnesse of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which testified that the substance of bread and wine in the sacrament of the Supper so remaineth and ceaseth not, as in the Lord Christ remaineth the substance and nature of man ioyned with the substance of God. Therefore they passe measure, which saine that after the words of the Lord rehearsed, the substance of bread and wine ceaseth, that it may be transubstantiate into his holy and blood. Fathers were they which as they deliuered to the whole Church but one Sacrament of Thankesgiuing, and as they debarred from it wicked and hainous euill doers: so did greuously condemne all those which being present, did not communicate of it. How farre haue they removed those bounds, when they fill not only Churches, but also priuate houses with their masses, and admit all men to looke vpon them, and euery man so much more gladly as hee more largely payeth, howe vnclane and wicked so euer they be: but allure no man to faith in Christ and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe boastingly set out to sale their owne worke for the grace and merite of Christ: Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they should be altogether debarred from y^e vse of the holy Supper of Christ, which holding themselves contented with partaking of the one kinde; abstained from the other: And the other Father stoutly maintaineth, that to the christian people the blood of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confession whereof they are commaunded to shedde their owne blood. These bounds also they haue taken away, when they haue by an inuolable lawe commanded the selfe same thing which the one of these Fathers punished with excommunication, and the other reprobud with a strong reason. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be rashnes to determine any thing of a doubtfull matter on the one side or the other, without cleare and euident witnessings of the Scripture. This bounde they forgot, when they stablished so many constitutions, so many canons, so many maisterly determinations, without any word of God. A Father was he, which among other heresies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the first that had charged men with lawes of fastings. This bound also they haue farre passed, when they commanded fasting with most straight lawes. A Father was he, which denied that marriage age ought to be forbidden to ministers of the Church, and pronounced a mans lying with his owne wife to be chastic: and Fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritic. Beyond these bounds haue they gone, when they seuerely enioyned vnmarried life to their sacrificers. A Father was he which iudged, that onely Christ ought to be hearde, of whom it is said, Hearc him: and that we ought not to haue regarde, what other men which were before vs, haue sayde or done, but what Christ (which is the first of all) hath commaunded. This bounde neither do they appoint to themselues, nor do suffer other to haue it appointed them, when they set both ouer themselues & other any maisters whatsoeuer they be, rather than Christ. A Father was he, which affirmed that y^e Church ought not to set it selfe before Christ, because he alway iudged truely: but the iudges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceaued. They breaking through this bound also, sticke not to affirme that the whole authority of the Scripture, hangeth vpon the awardment of the Church. All the Fathers haue with one heart accursed, and with one mouth pronounced it abominable, that the holy word of God should be entangled with the subtilties of Sophisters, & brawlings of Logitians. Do they holde themselues within these boundes, when they goe about nothing else in their whole life, but with endles struiues, and more than Sophisticall brablings to wrap & encombre the simplicitie of the Scripture? so that if the Fathers were now raised to life againe, & should heare such an art of brawling, which these men cal Speculatiue Diuinitie, they would beleue that nothing lesse is done than any disputation had of God. But my talke should spread it selfe beyond due boundes, if I would reckon vp how boldly these men shake of the yoke of the Fathers, whose obedient children they would seeme to be. Truely both monethes & yeares would be too litle for me. And yet they are of so extreme and desperat shamelesnesse, that they dare blame vs for that we sticke not to passe the auncient boundes.

But now whereas they call vs to custome, they nothing preuaile. For we should be most vniustly dealt with, if we should be driuen to yeld to custom. Truely if the iudgements of men were right, Custome should be taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwise. For, that which is seene to be done of many, by and by obtaineth the right of a Custome. But the state of men hath scarcely at any time bin in so good case, that the better things pleased the greater number. Therefore for the most part of the priuate vices of many hath bin made a publike errour, or rather a common consent of vices, which now these good men would haue to stand for a lawe. Who so haue eyes do see that not only one sea of euils hath overflowed, many poysonous pestilences haue inuaded the world, that al things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be vtterly despeired, or we must lay hande vnto, or rather vse violence vpon so great euils. And remedy is by no other reason driuen away, but because we haue now long time accustomed vs to euils. But be it that publike errour haue place in matters of common weale: yet in the kingdome of God his onely truth is to be hearde and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeares, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in olde time Esay taught the electe of God, that they shoulde not say Conspiring, to all thinges in which the people saide Conspiring: that is to say, that they shoulde not conspire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor shoulde feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they shoulde sanctifie the Lorde of hostes, and he should be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list obiect against vs both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lord of hostes, we wil not be much afraid For whether it be y^e manie ages haue consented to like vngodlines, he is strong to take vengeance to the third & fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe same wickednes, hee hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offend with y^e multitude, when he did with a generall ouerflowing destroy the whole kinde of men, preserving Noe with a small household, which shoulde by his faith being but one man condemne the whole worlde. Finally an euil custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they do neuertheless dye that die with company of a multitude. Moreo uer they ought to haue considered that which Cyprian saith in certaine places, that they which sinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themselves from all fault, yet may seeme after some maner excusable: but who so obstinately refuse y^e truth offred by the grace of God, they haue nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they doe not driue vs to so hard a streight with it, to compel vs to confesse, that either the Church hath lyen dead a certain time, or that we haue controuersie against the Church. Truly the Church of Christ hath liued & shal liue, so long as Christ shal reigne at the right hande of the Father: by whose hande she is vpholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safetie. For he will vndoubtedly performe that which hee hath once promised, that he will be present with his euen vntill the ending of the world. Against it now we haue no warre at all. For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithful honor and worship the one God and Christ the Lorde, in like sort as he hath alway bene worshipped of all the godlie. But they themselves not a litle way erre from the truth, when they acknowledge no Church, but which they see with present eie, and go about to compass it about with those bounds in which it is not enclosed. Vpon these points hangeth our controuersie: first that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appearing and to be seene: then, that they set the same forme in the see of the Church of Rome, & in the order of their prelat. We on the contrary side affirme, both that the Church may consist of no appearing forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shewe, which they foolishly haue in admiration, but hath a far other mark, namely the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministration of Sacraments. They are in a rage, vnlesse the Church may be alwayes pointed out with a finger. But how oft happened it in the people of the Iewes to be so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to haue shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since y^e comming of Christ hath it lien hidden without forme? How since that time

hath it bene so oppressed with warres, seditions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liued at that time, woulde they haue beleued that there was any Church? But it was sayde to Helias, that there were preferred seuen thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baall. Neither ought it to be doubtfull to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable forme with their eyes, should they not by and by haue bin discouraged? And verily Hylarie accounted it euen already in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of Bishops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that visor. For thus he sayth: Oae thing I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the loue of wals: ye do ill worship the Church of God in houses and buildinges: vnder them ye do ill thrust in the name of Peace. It is doubtfull that in those Antichrist shall sitte? Mountaines and woods, and lakes, and prisons, and caues are safer for me. For in these the Prophets, when they were either abiding or throwen into them, did propheticie. But what doth the world at this day honour in his horned Bishoppes, but that it thinketh them to be holy prelates of religion, whom it seeth to be heades ouer great cities? Away therefore with such foolish esteeming. But rather let vs leaue this to the Lorde, forasmuch as he alone knoweth who be his, and sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the ouuarde knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeance of God vpon the earth. But if the wickednes of men so deserue, why do we seeke to withstand the iust vengeance of God? In such wise the Lorde hath in times past taken vengeance of the vnthankfulnessse of men. For because they would not receiue his trueth, and had quenched his light, he suffred them being blinded in sense, both to be mocked with lyes full of absurditie, and to be drowned in deepe darkenes, so that there was no face of the true Church to be seene. Yet in the meane time he saued his both being scattered abroad and lying hidden in the middest of errors and darkenesse, from destruction. And no maruell. For he can skill to saue both in the very confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they woulde haue the forme of the Church to be iudged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: howe perilous that is, I will rather point vnto than declare, least I should drawe out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike see, and the Bishoppes that are annointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and miters, doe represent the Church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they can not erre. How so? because they are pastors of the church, & consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israel also Pastors? But Aaron and his sonnes after that they were made priestes, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the foure hundred Prophets which lyed to Achab, haue represented the Church? But the Church was on Micheas side, being indeede but one man alone, and vnregarded, but out of whose mouth came trueth. Did not the false prophets in resemblance beate both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise vp against Ieremie, and with threatenng boasted that it was not possible that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Ieremie alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophetes, to declare from the Lord, that it should come to passe, that the lawe should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the word from the Prophet. Did not such a glistring shew shine in that Councell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sticke fast in the outward visour, that they may make Christ and all the Prophetes of God, schismatikes: and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answere me, in what nation & place they thinke that the Church remained since the time y by the decree of the Councell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and deprivied from the estate of pope, and Aymee set in his place. They can not, though they would burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellio, and obstinacie, with the whole stocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him practised the desolation of the Councell. Yet afterward being borne vp by the fauour of Princes, he recovered his papacy safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had bin orderly made by the authoritie of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauing that he himselfe was appeased with a Cardinals hat, as it were a barking dog with a peece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebels, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots and priestes that haue bin since. Here they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the Church? Wil they deny that the Councell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outwad maiestie: namely, which being solemnely summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all thinges, continued in the same dignity to the last ende? Wil they confesse Eugenius with al his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the Church, or they all as many as are of them shalbe of vs accounted schismatikes, which wittingly and willingly haue bin ordered of heretikes. If it had neuer before bin knowne, y the Church is not bound to outward pomps, they themselues may be to vs a large prooffe, which vnder that glorious title of the Church haue so long so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragick doinges wherwith their whole life swarmeth full: because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to read our writings, you shall plainly know that the very doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the church is a deadly butchery of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally they doe not vprightly enough, when they do spitefully rehearse

howe great troubles, vproes, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawne with it, & what fruits it now beareth in many. For the blame of these euils is vnworthily laide vpon it, which ought rather to haue bin imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall propertie of the word of God, that whensoever it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easily shew foorth themselves when they are receiued with fauourable eares of al men, and are heard of y world reioying at them. So in certaine ages past, when al things were drowned in deepe darknes, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in manner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sounde peace. For, what should he else doe but laugh and play being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when y light shining from about somewhat scattered abroad his darknes, when y strong man troubled & assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his wonted drowfines, & hastily to arme himself. And first he stirred vp the force of men, whereby he might violently oppresse y truth beginning to shine. By which whē he nothing preuailed, he turned to subtile entrappings. He stirred vp dissentions & disagreements of doctrines by his Catapartists, & other monstrous lewde men, wherby he might darken it and at length vtterly quench it. And nowe he continueth to assaile it with both engines. For he traueileth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede, and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craftes vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, and hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But how great maliciousnes is it to lay vpon the worde of God, the hatred either of y seditions, which noughty & rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceiuers doe raise against it? Yet it is no newe example. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditious man. The Apostles were accused of making a commotion among the people. What other thing doe they which at this day doe father vpon vs all the troubles, vproes and contentions that boyle vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namely that it is not we that scatter errors or stirre vp vproes: but it is they themselves that wastle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to bear backe their rashnes, so againe we ought to meete with the weakenes of other, who oftentimes happen to be moued with such offences, and in their dismaying to wauer. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discouraged, know that the Apostles in their time felte by experience the same things that nowe happen vnto vs. There were vnlearned and vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those things that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were dispisers of God, which when they heard that sinne abounded to the end that grace might more abound, by & by obiected, We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faith-

faithfull are not vnder the lawe, they by and by answered, We wil then sin, because we are not vnder the law, but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to euill. There entred priuily many false Apostles to destroy the churches which he had builded. Some by enuy and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospel, thinking to adde more affliction to his bandes. Somewhere the Gospel not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the things of Iesus Christ. Some went backward, dogges to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the liberty of the Spirit to the licentiousnes of the flesh. Many brethren crept in, by whome there came afterward great dangers to the godly. Among the brethren themselues were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles haue done in this case? Should they not either haue dissembled for a time, or rather altogether haue giuen ouer and forsaken the Gospel, which they sawe to be y^e seedplot of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for help in such distresses this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set vnto the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which assurance they being armed, went forward boldly through al dangers of vprores & offences. With y^e same thought we also ought to be vpholden, for asmuch as Paul testifieth that this is the perpetual propertie of y^e Gospel, to be the saueur of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordeined to this vse, that it should be the saueur of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the saluation of the faithfull: which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vnthankfulnes corrupt this so singular a benifite of God, and turne that to our own destruction which ought to haue bin to vs the onely defence of our safetic.

2. Cor. 2. 16.

But now I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reportes nothing moue you, by which our aduersaries trauel to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this newe Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the author of diuision, but of peace: and the sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Diuell. And wee are vnworthily accused of such desires, whereof wee neuer gaue any suspicion were it neuer so small. It is likely that wee forsooth doe practise the ouerthrowing of kingdomes, of whome there hath neuer bene heard any one seditious worde, whose life hath euer bene knowne quiet and simple, when wee liued vnder you, and which nowe being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your kingdom. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behauiours although many things may be found faulty, yet there is nothing worthy of so great reproching: neither haue we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospel, but that our life may bee to these backbyters an examplar of chastitie, liberality, mercy, temperance, patience, modesty, & whatsoeuer other vertue. Verily it is by the prooffe it selfe euident y^e we do vnfaignedly feare and worship God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life and our death, and enuie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witness of innocence and ciuile vprightnesse, in whom this onely thing was punished with death, which ought to haue bin accounted for a singular praise. But if any vnder pretence of the Gospell doe stirre vp tumultes (as hitherto it hath not bin founde that there haue bin any such in your Realme) if any pretende the libertie of the grace of God to defend the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I haue knowne many) there bee lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their desertings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not euill spoken of for the wickednes of naughty men. Thus haue you (O King) the venomous iniustice of the sleaunders largely enough declared, that you may not with an care of too easie beliefe bende to their reports. I feare me also least it be too largely set out, for asmuch as this preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole booke of defense, whereby I entended not to make a defense indeede, but onely to mollifie your minde aforehand to giue audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shalbe able to recouer the fauour thereof, if you shall once haue without displeasure and troublous affection red ouer this our confession, which we will to bee in steede of a defense for vs to your maiestie. But if the whisperinges of the malicious doe so possesse your cares, that there is no place for accused men to speake for them selues: and if those outragious furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise crueltie with prisoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shall indeede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to al extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and waite for the strong hande of the Lorde: which shall without doubt bee present in time, and stretch forth it selfe armed, both to deliuer the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the dispisers, which nowe triumph with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kinges stablishe your throne with rightcousnesse, and your seate with equitie, most noble King.

IOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

*T*he first setting out of this worke, because I did not looke for that success, which the Lorde of his unmeasurable goodnes hath given, I had (as men use to doe in small workes) for the more part lightly passed it over. But when I understood that it was received with that favor of all the godly, which I never durst have desired, much lesse have hoped for: as I verily felt in my heart that much more was given to me than I had deserved, so I thought it should be a great unthankfulness if I should not at the least after my slender abilitie enduor to answer so favorable affections toward me, and which of them selues prouoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onely in the second setting forth of it: but howe oft since that time the worke hath bin imprimed, so oft hath it bin enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labor that I had employed: yet I neuer held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I haue given you that which may be allowed by all your iudgements. Truly with how great enduor I haue applied my selfe to the doing of this seruice to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an euident witness, that this last winter, when I thought that the feur Quatane had summoned me to death, how much more the sicknes enforced upon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to ouerline me, which might make some part of thankfull recompence to so gentle prouoking of the godly. I had rather in deede it had bin done sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroade in good season, when I shall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentifull fruite than it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely desire. And truly full ill it were with me, if I did not, holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the iudgements of men, whether they be the foolish and forward iudgements of the unskillfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly seild my minde to the enduor both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleare in mine owne conscience, and haue himselfe and the Angels to witness with me, that since I tooke upon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I haue tended to none other purpose but that I might profit the Church in mainteining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath bin snatched at, bitten, and torne in sunder with moe slaunders than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly enformed that at Augsburgh where the assembly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my resoluing to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily receiued in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulness who are not ignorant of many trialls had of my steadfastnes, which trialls as they shake off so foule a sclander, so they shoulde with all indifferent and gentle iudges haue defended me from it. But the Diuell with his whole route is deceiued if in oppressing me with filthy lies, he thinke that by his vniust dealing I shalbe either the more discouraged or made the lesse diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his vnmearurable goodnes will grant me that I may with euen sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I giue to the godly readers a new prooffe in this setting forth of this booke. Now in this trauell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy Diuinitie to the reading of the word of God, that they may both haue an easie entrie into it, & go forward in it without stumbling: for I think that I haue in all poynts so knit vp together the summe of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoeuer shall well haue it in mind, it shall not be hard for him to determine both what hee ought chiefly to seeke in the Scripture: and to what marke to apply whatsoeuer is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plaine, if I shall hereafter set forth any expofitions of Scripture, because I shall not neede to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I will alway knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shalbe eased of great paine and tediousnes, so that he come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessary instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clearely as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare indeede what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Fare well frendly Reader, and if thou receiue any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the know- ledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

*That the knowledge of God, and of our selues, are things conioyned:
and how they be linked the one vwith the other.*

THE whole summe in a maner of all our wisdom, which onely ought to be accompted true and perfect wisdom, consisteth in two partes, that is to say, the knowledge of God, & of our selues. But whereas these two knowledges be with many bondes linked together: yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discern. For first no man can looke vpon himselfe, but he must needes by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whome he liueth & is moued: because it is plaine, that those gifts wherewith we be indued, are not of our selues, yea euen that that we haue being is nothing els but an essence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by drop-meale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certain streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereinto the fall of the first man hath thrown vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes, not onely being foodeles and hungry, to craue from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humilitie. For as there is found in man a certeine world of all miseries, & since we haue bene spoyled of the diuine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinite heape of filthie disgracements: it must needes be that euery man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his owne unhappinesse to make him come at y least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the vnderstanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggery, weaknes, perversenes, and corruption, wee learne to reknowledge that no where else but in the Lorde abideth the true light of wisdom, sound vertue, perfect abundance, of all good things, and puritie of righteousnes. And so by our own euils we are stirred to consider the good things of God: and we cannot earnestly aspire towards him, vntill we beginne to mislike our selues. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in him selfe: yea who doth not rest, so long as he knoweth not himselfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne giftes, and ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne misery? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of him selfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

of himselfe, vnlesse he hath first beholden the face of God, and from beholding therof do descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntill that with manifest proues we be conuinced of our vnrighteousnesse, filthines, follie and vncleannes. But we are not conuinced therof, if we looke vpon our selues only, and not vpon God also, who is the only rule wherby this iudgement ought to be tryed. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisse, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousness doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousness in deede. And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, y^e is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthy pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we holde our selues within the bounds of mans vncleannes. Like as the eye that is vsed to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discern by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at midday we either looke downe vpon the ground, or behold those things that rounde about ly open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to haue very assured and pearcing force of sight: but when we looke vp to the sunne, and beholde it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpenes that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightnes by and by daseled and confounded, that we are compelled to cōfessiō the same sharp sight which we had in considering earthly things, when it commeth to the sunne, is but meere dulnes. Euen so commeth it to passe in weying our spirituall good things. For while we looke no further than the earth, so long being well contented with our owne righteousness, wisdom and strength, we do sweetely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner halfe gods. But if wee once beginne to raise vp our thought vnto God, and to wey what a one he is, and howe exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisdom and power, after the rule whereof we ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousness, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednesse: then that which did marueilously deceiue vs vnder colour of wisdom, shall stink before vs as extreme folly: then y^e which did beare the face of strength, shall be proued to be most miserable weakenes. So slenderly doth y^e which in vs seemeth euen most perfect, answer in proportion to the purenes of God.

3 Hereof proceedeth that trembling & amasednes, wherewith the scripture in manie places reciteth that the holy men were stricken & astonished so oft as they perceiued the presence of God. For when we see y^e they which in his absence did stand assured & vmoued, so sone as he discloseth his glory, begin so to quake and are so dismayd, y^e they fall downe, yea are swallowed vp, & in maner as destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered therby that man is neuer sufficiently touched & inwardly moued with knowledge of his owne basenes, vntill he haue compared himselfe to y^e maiestie of God. But of such disinaying we haue often examples both in the Iudges & in y^e Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall dye because the Lorde hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the history of Iob, to throwe men downe with knowledge of their owne folly, weaknes, and vncleannes, bringeth alway his principall prooffe from describing Gods wisdom, strength & clenness. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the nerer that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowledged himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tary his comming to him with vncouered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man do that is but corruption and a worme, when euen the Cherubins for very feare must hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Esay speaketh of: The Sunne shall blush, and the Moone shalbe ashamed, when the Lord of hostes shall raigne, that is to say, when he displayeth his brightures, and bringeth it nearer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brightest thing of all shall be darkened. But howsoeuer the knowledge of God and of our selues, are with mutuall knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth that first we intreat of the knowledge of God, & after come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selues.

The second Chapter.

What it is to knowe God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not only that knowledge, whereby we conceiue that there is some God, but also that, wherby we learne so much as behoueth vs to know of him, and as is profitable for his glory, finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we can not say that God is known where there is no religion nor godlinesse. But here I doe not yet touch that special kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed do conceiue God the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake only of y^e first and simple maner of knowledge, whereunto the very order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocencie. For although no man, sith mankinde is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be eyther a father, or author of saluation, or in any wise fauourable, vnles Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towarde vs: yet it is one thing to feele that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence gouerne vs, by his goodnes nourish vs, and endue vs with all kindes of blessings: and an other thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the scripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Christ to be the redeemer: hereupon arise two sortes of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other shal orderly folow in the place fit for it. For although our mind cannot conceiue y^e knowledge of God, but y^e it must giue to him some kind of worship, yet shal it not be sufficient simply to know that it is he only that ought to be honored & worshipped of all men, vnles we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of al good things, to the end that we should seeke for no thing elsewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, so by his infinite power hee sustaineth it, by his wisdom he gouerneth it, by his goodnes hee preserueth it, and

and specially mankind he ruleth by his righteousness & iudgement, suffreth by his mercy, and sauegardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisdom, or of light, or of righteousness, or of power, or of vprightnes, or of sincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verely, that we should learne to looke for & craue all these things at his hand, & with thanksgueing account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a meere scholemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion: Godlines I cal a reuerence of God ioined with loue of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefites. For men will neuer with willing obedience submit themselues to God, vntill they perceiue that they owe al things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewhere than in him. Yea they will neuer yeld themselues truely & with all their hart wholly to him, vnles they assuredly belecue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

2 Therefore they do but trifle with vaine speculations, which in entreating of this question, do make it their purpose to discusse, what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to know what maner one he is, & what agreeth with his nature. For to what end serueth it to confesse as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth onely delight him selfe with idleness, hauing no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know such a God with whom we may haue nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serue to this end, first to frame vs to feare and reuerence: then that by it guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hand, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou must therewithall by & by thinke, that forasmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subiect & bound to his authoritie, that thou owest him thy life, y whatsoeuer thou enterprisest, whatsoeuer thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it foloweth that thy life is peruersely corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our law to liue by. Againe, y canst not cleerely see him, but that thou must needs know that he is the fountaine and originall of all good things, whereupon should growe both a desire to cleaue vnto him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptnes did not drawe his minde from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly mind doth not as by a dreame imagine to her self any God at aduventure, but stedfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doeth not falsely forge of him whatsoeuer her selfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, & doth alway with great diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse she passe not beyond his will, and so wander out of the way. And when she so knoweth him, because she vnderstandeth that he governeth all things, she assuredly trusteth that he is her safe keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth her selfe to his faith, because she vnderstandeth that he is the author of al good things; therefore if any thing trouble her, or if she want any thing, by & by she flyeth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because she is perswaded ded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence shee resteth on him, and doubteth not in al her euils to find ready remedie in his merciful kindnesse. Because she knoweth him to be her Lord & father, therefore she determineth that he is worthy that she should in all things haue regard to his authoritie, reuerence his maiestie, procure the aduancement of his glorie, and obey his commaundements. Because she seeth that he is a righteous Iudge, and armed with his seueritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his iudgement seate before her eyes, & with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth her selfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is she not so affraide with the feeling of his iudgement, that she would conuey her selfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather shee doeth no lesse loue him, while he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, than while he is beneficiall to the godly, forasmuch as she vnderstandeth that it doth no lesse belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euill doers, than that he hath reward of eternall life for the righteous. Moreouer she doth not for onely feare of punishment refraine her selfe from sinning: but because shee loueth and reuerenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lorde, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet shee dreadeth his onely displeasure. Nowe beholde what is the pure and true religion, euen faith ioyned with an earnest feare of God: so that feare may containe in it a willing reuerence, & drawe with it a right forme of worshipping such as is appoynted in the lawe. And this is the more heedfullie to be noted, because al men generally do worship God, but fewe do reuerence him, while ech where is great pompous shewe in ceremonies, but the purenes of heart is rare to be found.

3 Truly, they that iudge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is grauen in the minds of men a certaine feeling of y^e Godhead, which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this perswasion, that there is a God, is euen from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the very obstinacie of the wicked is a substantiall witnes, which with their furious striuing yet can neuer winde themselues out of the feare of God. Although Dirigoras and such other do iest and laugh at all that hath in all ages bene beleueed concerning religion: although Dionysius doe scoffe at the heauenly iudgement: yet y^e is but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the worme of conscience gnaweth them much more sharpely than al hot searing irons. I alleage not this y^e Cicero saith, that errors by continuance of time growe out of vse, & religion daily more & more encrease & waxeth better. For the world (as a litle hereafter we shal haue occasion to shew) traucileth as much as in it lieth to shake off all knowledge of God, & by al meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dul hardnes, which the wicked doe desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doeth lye pyningly in their heartes, yet the same feeling of God, which they would most of all desire to haue vtterly destroyed, lueth still, and sometime doth vtter it selfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in scholes, but such a one whereof eueriy man is a teacher to himselfe euen from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bend all their endeouore to shake it out of their minde. Nowe, if all men be borne and doe liue to this ende, to knowe God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanissheth away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is euident, that they all swarue out of kinde from the lawe of their creation, that do not direct to this marke al the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselues were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likeneffe of God, when the soule hauing throughly conceiued the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore very aptly doth Grillus reason in Plutarche, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not only nothing better thā brute beasts, but also many waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to so many sortes of euils they continually drawe forth a troublesome vnquiet life: and that therefore y worshiping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brute bestes, by which alone they aspire to immortalitie.

The third Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is naturallie planted in the mindes of men.

WHE holde it out of controuersie, that there is in the mind of man, euen by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the end that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in al men a certaine vnderstanding of his diuine maiesty: the remembrance whereof, with powring in now and then as it were newe droppes, he continually reneweth: that when al, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truly if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more than among the grossest sorts of peoples & fardest from ciuil order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man saith) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so sauage, in whom resteth not this persuasion that there is a God. And euen they that in other partes of their life seeme very litle to differ from brute beasts, yet do continually kepe a certaine seede of religion. So throughly hath this common principle possessed all mens mindes, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bin no coutrie, no Citie, yea no house, that cold be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of the Godheade is written in the hearts of al men. Yea & idolatrie it selfe is a substantiall profe of this persuasion. For we know how vnwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honor other creatures about himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted persuasion of God is of most great force, which is impossible to be raced out of y minde of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as in deede it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will stoupeth downe

In Phedro-
ne & thee-
tero,

downe euen to the basest creatures to honor God.

2 Wherefore it is most vaine which some do say, that religion was deuised by the sutteltie and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they themselues that procured other to worship God, belceued nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I graunt in deede that suttle men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reuerence, and cast them in a feare, to make their mindes the more pliable to obedience: But this they could neuer haue brought to passe, vnlesse the mindes of men had bene already before haue persuaded that there was a God, out of which persuasion as out of seede springeth that ready inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that euen they which suttelly deceiued the simple sort with colour of religion, were them selues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue bene some, and at this day there arise vp many, that denie that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We reade of none that euer did break forth into more presumptuous and vnbridled despising of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so against his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endeouored to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the very noyse of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods maiestie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their consciences as they more labor to flie away from it? They do in deede looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide them selues from the presence of $\ddot{\text{y}}$ Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tyed. For howsoeuer sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a momēt, yet it oft returneth againe, and with newe assault doth runne vppon them: so that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which euen while they sleepe do not quietly rest, because they are at euery moment vexed with horrible & dreadfull dreames. Therefore the very vngodly themselues serue for an example to proue that there alway lueth in all mens mindes some knowledge of God.

The iiij. Chapter.

That the same knowledge is either choked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

BVt as experience teacheth that God hath sowen $\ddot{\text{y}}$ seede of religion in all men, so scarcely may be found the hundreth man, that hauing it conceiued in his heart doth cherish it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, so far is it of that any frute appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in their owne superstitions, or that some doe of set purpose maliciously reuolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So cometh it to passe that there remaineth no true godlinesse in the worlde. But whereas I sayd that some by error fall into superstitution, I meane not thereby as though their simplicitie might excuse them from blame, because the blindness that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proude vanitie, & with stubbornesse. Vanitie and the same ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not climbe about these lues as they ought to haue done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshy dulnesse, and also neglecting the sound manner of searching for him, do curiously fly to vaine speculations. And so they conceiue him not such a one as he offereth himselfe, but do imagine him such a one as of their own rash presumption they haue forged him. Which gulfe being once opened, what way soeuer they stirre their feete, they must needs alway runne headlong into destruction. For whatsoeuer afterwarde they go about toward the worshiping or seruice of God, they can not account it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the deuise of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in stead of him. This peruerenes doth Paul expressly touch, where he sayth, that they were made fooles when they coueted to be wise. He had before sayd, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobrietie, but presumptuously taking vpon themselues more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkenesse vpon them, yea with vaine & froward pride do make themselues fooles. Whereupon followeth, that their foolishnes is not excusable, whereof the cause is not onely vaine curiositie, but also a greedines to know more than is meete for them, ioyned with a false confidence.

2 As for this that Dauid sayth, that y wicked & mad men thinke in their heartes, that there is no God: First that is meant only of those that choking the light of nature, doe of purpose make themselues senselesse, as we shall see againe a litle hereafter. Euen as we see that many after that they haue bin hardened with boldnesse and custome of sinning, doe furiously put from them all the remembrance of God which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their mindes. Now Dauid, to make their madnes the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his iudgement and prouidence, they shut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing lesse agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the gouernement of the world, and leaue it to fortune, to winke at the sinnes of men, so as they may liue in licentious outrage vnpunished: whosoever he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly iudgement, doth carelesly folowe his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the iust vengeance of God, to drawe a fatnes ouer their hearts, so y the wicked when they haue once closed their eyes, euen in seeing may not see. And Dauid in an other place is y best expounder of his owne meaning, where he sayth: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Again, that in their euill doings they proudly reioyce at themselues, because they persuaade themselues that God doth not loke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they do rob him of his glorie, glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) 2. Tim. 1. 13.

cannot denie himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so is it truly sayd, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, doe deny god. Morouer it is to be noted that although they wrastle against their owne naturall feeling, and doe desire not onely to shake out GOD from thence, but also to destroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardenesse can neuer so farre preuaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his iudgement seate. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any feare from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutish forgetfulnes of God, so long as that blinde pang of rage dorth so forcible carie them.

3 So is that vaine defense ouerthrown, which many are wont to pre-tende for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any deuotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoever it be, though it be neuer so much contrarie to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: & that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, & is no imagined Ghost or fantasie, y^e may be diuersly fashioned after euery mans liking. And truly we may plainly see with how lying deceites superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a maner only, which God hath testified that he careth not for, she either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and sayth to be pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoeuer do set vp new inuented formes of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne doting deuises: because they durst not so trifle with God, vnles they had first sained a God, agreeing with the follies of the trifling toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vnstaied and wandering opinion of the maicstie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (sayeth he) ye knewe not God, Ga. 4. 8.
ye serued them that in nature were no gods. And in another place he saith Ep. 2. 12.
that y^e Ephesians were without a God at such time as they strayed from the right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleecue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from & forsakest the true God: whom when thou hast once forsak-ken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therfore, that we must determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

4 There is also a second fault, that they neither haue at any time any consideration of God, but against their wils, nor do approach towarde him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawn to him: and euen then also they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maicstie, but only a seruile & constraigned feare, which y^e iudgement of God wringeth out of them: which iudgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithal they abhorre it. And so that saying of Stadius, y^e feare first made gods in the worlde, may be fitly spoken of vngodlinesse, & of this kinde of vngodlines only. They that haue a mind abhorring from the iustice of God, doe heartily wish to haue his throne of C 2 iudge-

iudgement ouerthrowne, which they know to stand for punishmēt of offences against his iustice by which affection they warre against God, who can not be without his iudgement. But when they vnderstand that his power impossible to be auoyded, hangeth ouer them: because they can neyther by force remoue it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they feare it. So least they should in all things seeme to despise him, whose maiestie still presseth vpon them, they vse a certaine outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the meane time they cease not to defile them selues with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outragious mischeues to mischeues, vntil they haue in all points violated y^e holy lawe of the Lord, & destroyed his whole righteousnes or at least they are not so holden back with that fained feare of God, but y^e they sweetly rest in their sinnes, and flatter themselues, & had rather to followe the intemperance of their flesh than restrain it with the bridle of y^e holy Ghost. But forasmuch as the same is but a voyde and lying shadow of religion, yea scarcely worthy to be called a shadow: hereby againe is easily gathered how much the true godlines, which is powred onely into the hearts of the faithfull, I meane that out of which religion springeth, doth differ from this confuse knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses to seeme nigh vnto God, whom they fly from. For whereas there ought to haue bin one continuall vnbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a maner in al their doings carelessly rebelling against him labour with a few sacrifices to appease him. Whereas they ought to haue serued him with holines of life & syncerenesse of heart, they inuent triflings & obseruances of no value, to procure his fauour withal: yea they doe y^e more licentiouslie lie dul in their owne dregges, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propiciatory satisfactions. Finally whereas their assiance ought to haue bin fastened in him, they neglecting him doe rest in themselues, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselues with such a heape of errors, that the darke mist of malice doth choke, & at last vtterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see y^e glory of God. Yet y^e seede still remaineth which can by no meane be plucked vp by the roote, to belecue that there is a certaine godhead: but y^e same seede is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but very euil fruites. Yea therby is that which I trauaile to proue more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in y^e heartes of men, forasmuch as the very reprobate themselues are of necessity enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperitie they pleasantly mocke at God, yea they are full of talke and prating to diminish the greatnes of his power: but if once any desperation touch them, it stirreth them vp to seeke the same God, and ministreth them sodaine short prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not vtterly ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to haue beene vttered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledge of God doth shinnylie appeare in the the making of the worlde and in the continuall government thereof.

Morcouer

Moreouer because the furthest end of blessed life standeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicitie shoulde be stopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the mindes of men that seede of religion which we haue spoken of, but also hath so disclosed himselfe in the whole workemanshippe of the worlde, and daylie so manifestly presenteth himself, that men can not open their eyes but they must needs behold him. His substance in deede is incomprehensible, so that his diuine maiestie farre surmounteth al mens senses: but he hath in al his workes grauen certaine markes of his glorie, & those so plaine and notably discernable, that y^e excuse of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer so grosse and dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfully cryeth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should haue sayde, that then he first began to come forth to be seene in visible apparel, since the time that he first displaid his ensignes in the creation of y^e world, by which euen now what way soeuer we turne our eyes, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the same place also the same Prophet aptly compareth the heauens as they be displaid abroad, to his royal pauillion: he saith that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth vpon the wings of the winds, y^e the winds & lightnings are his swift messengers: And because the glory of his power & wisdom doth more fully shine about, therefore commonly the heauen is called his pallace. And first of al, what way soeuer thou turne thy eyes, there is no peece of the world be it neuer so small, wherein are not seene at least some sparkles of his glory to shine. But as for this most large & beautiful frame, thou canst not with one viewe peruse the wide compasse of it, but that thou must needs be on euery side ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth very well call the ages of the worlde the spectacle of inuisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the world serueth vs for a mirrour wherein we may beholde God which otherwise is inuisible. For which cause the Propriet assigneth to y^e heauenly creatures a language that all nations vnderstand, for that in them there is a more euident testification of the Godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the Apostle declaring more plainly sayth that there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behoueful to be knowen concerning God: because al men without exception, do throughly see his inuisible things euen to his very power and Godhead, which they vnderstande by the creation of the world.

Ro. 1. 19.

2 As for his wonderfull wisdom, there are innumerable proues both in heauen and in earth that witness it: I meane not onely that secreter sort of things, for the nerer marking wherof Astrologie, Phisicke, & all naturall Philosophy serueth, but euen those things that thrust themselues in sight of euery one, euen of y^e rudest vnlearned man, so that men can not open their eyes but they must needs be witnesses of them. But truely they that haue digested, yea or but tasted the liberall arts, being holpen by the ayde thereof, do proceed much further to loke into y^e secrets of Gods wisdom. Yet is there no man so hindred by lacke of knowledge of those arts, but that he through-ly seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods workes, to bring him in admiration of the workeman thereof. As for example: to the searching out of the mouings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth art and an exacter diligence: by which being throughly perceiued, as the prouidence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is conuenient, that the mind rise somewhat the hier thereby to behold his glory. But forasmuch as the vnlearned people, yea & the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the only helpe of their eyes, can not be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable & yet so seuerally wel ordered & disposed variety doth of it selfe shew forth it self: it is euident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisdom. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpnes of wit, to wey with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportionall agreement, the beautie, & vse in the frame of mans body: but by al mens confession, the body of man doth vtter in very shew of it selfe so cunning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be iudged wonderfull.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in olde time did not without cause call man a litle worlde, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnes & wisdom of God, and containeth in him selfe miracles enough to occupie our mindes, if we wil be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had sayd that the very blind men may finde out God by groping for him, by & by sayth further, y he is not to be sought farre of, because all men doe feelee vndoubtedly within themselues the heauenly grace wherewith they be quickned. But if we neede to go no further than our selues, to find and take holde of God: what pardon shall his slouthfulnes deserue that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to find God? And the same is the reason why Dauid, when he had shortly spoken in y aduancement of the wonderfull name & honor of God y do euery where gloriously shine, by & by cryeth out: What is man y thou art mindful of him? Againe, Out of the mouth of infants and sucking babes thou hast stablished strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kind of man is a mirror of the works of God, but also that the very infantes while they yet hang on their mothers brestes, haue tongues eloquent enough to preach his glory, so that there needeth no other orators. And therefore he douteth not to set their mouthes in the vauuarde, as beeing strongly armed to subdue their madnes that would according to their diuelish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul allegeth out of Aratus, that we are the ofspring of God: because hee garnishing vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as cuen by common reason, & as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truely no man will assentingly & willingly yeelde him selfe to serue God, but he that hauing tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

4 And here is disclosed the foule vnthankfulness of men, which while they haue within them selues a workhouse gloriously furnished with innumerable

merable workes of God, & also a shop stuffed with inestimable plentie of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praying of him, are contrariwise puffed vp & doe swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diuersly in marueilous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of gifts they possesse by his liberalitie: whether they wil or no, they are enforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppress it close within them. Truely they neede not to go out of them selues, so y^e they would not in presumptuously taking vpon them selues that which is giuen from heauen, bury within the ground that which brightly giueth light to their minds to see God. But euen at this day the earth beareth many monsterous spirites, which sticke not to abuse the whole seede of godhead that is sowen in mans nature, & to employ it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madnes, that man finding God a hundred times in his body and & his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellencie deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from brute beastes. But they pretende a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth & their eyes euen to the nailes of their toaes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare giftes of the soule, do represent a diuine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giauntes Cyclopes would bearing themselues bold vpon this hie degree outrageously make warre against God. Doe the whole treasures of the heauenly wisdomes so meete together, to rule a worme of five feete long: and shall the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde bee without this prerogatiue? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that aunswereth to all the partes of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, thut it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure aunswere me, what meeting of vndiuisible bodies, boyling the meat and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrementes and part into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeavoring to doe their office, euen as if so many seuerall soules did by common aduise rule one bodie.

5 But I haue not now to do with that stie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being giuen to suttelties, would by crooked conuicance writh that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bind the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, & with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being enclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the starres, to learne the greatnesse of one, to knowe what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or y^e way? I grant in deede that there is some vse of Astrologic: but my meaning is onely to shewe that in this so deepe searching out of heavenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe seueral from y^e body. I haue shewed one example, by which it shalbe easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truly the manifold nimbleness of the soule, by which it surueieth both heauen & earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, & expresseth ech thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniousnes by which it inuenteth things incredible, & which is y^e mother of so many maruelous arts, are sure tokens of diuine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleeping it doth not only roll & turne it selfe, but also conceiueth many things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophecieth of things to come. What shall we in this case say, but that the signes of immortality that are imprinted in man, can not be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shalbe of diuine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall we forsooth by iudgement that is put into vs discern betweene right and wrong, & shall there be no iudge in heauen? Shall we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of vnderstanding, & shal no God be waking in governing the worlde? Shall we be so couⁿted the inuenters of so many artes and profitable thinges, that God shalbe defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from an other and not from our selues, all that we haue, is in diuerse wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some doe babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelines to the worlde, it is not onely weake, but also vngodly. They like well that famous saying of Vergil:

Aen. 6.

*First heauen and earth, and flowing fieldes of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars,
Spirits feedes within, and throughout all the lums,
Infused minde the whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large bigge bodie mixe it selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beastes,
And liues of flying soules, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A fire liuelinesse and heavenly race there is Within those feedes. &c.*

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the creator of it selfe. So in an other place the same author folowing the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, sayth:

Geo. 4.

*Some say that bees haue parte of minde diuine,
And heavenly draughtes. For eke they say that God
Goeth through the coastes of land, and creeks of sea,
And through deepe skie. And hence the flocks and herdes,
And men, and all the kindes of savage beastes
Ech at their birth receiue their subtle liues.
And thereto are they rendered all at last,
And all resolued are resournd againe.
No place there is for death: but liuely they,*

*Flie into number of the starres aboue,
And take their place within the loſie ſkie.*

Loc, what that hungry ſpeculation of the vniuerſall minde that giueth ſoule and liuelineſſe to the world, auaieth to engender & nourish godlines in the hearts of men. Which doth alſo better appeare by the blaſphemous ſayings of the filthy dogg Lucretius, which are deriued from the ſame principle. Euen this is it, to make a ſhadowiſh God, to driue farre away the true God whome we ought to feare and worſhip. I graunt in deede that this may be godlily ſaid, ſo that it proceede from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but becauſe it is a hard and an vnproper maner of ſpeech, forasmuch as Nature is rather an order preſcribed by God: therefore in things of ſo great weight and to which is due a ſingular religiousneſſe, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confuſedly with the inferior courſe of his workes. Let vs therefore remember, ſo oft as any man conſidereth his owne nature, that there is one God which ſo gouerneth all natures, that his will is to haue vs to looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worſhipped and called vpon of vs: becauſe there is nothing more againſt conueniencce of reaſon than for vs to enioy thoſe excellent gifts that ſauour of diuine nature in vs, and to deſpiſe the author that freely doth giue them vnto vs: Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceably drawe vs to conſider it vnleſſe perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a ſtrength it is with his only worde to vphold this infinite maſſe of heauen and earth, with his only beck, ſometime to ſhake the heauen with noiſe of thunders, to burne vp eche thing with lightning, to ſet the aire on fire with lightning flames, ſometime to trouble it with diuers ſorts of tempeſtes, and by and by the ſame God when he liſt in one moment to make faire weather: to holde in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his height ſeemeth to threaten continuall deſtruction to the earth, ſometime in horrible wiſe to raiſe it vp with outrageous violence of windes, and ſometime to appeaſe the waues and make it calme againe. For prooſe hereof do ſerue all the praifes of God gathered of the teſtimonies of nature. ſpecially in the booke of Iob and in Eſay, which nowe of purpoſe I ouerpaffe, becauſe they ſhal els where haue an other place fitter for them, where I ſhall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both ſtrangers & they of the houſehold of God haue this way of ſeeking God common to them both, that is, to follow theſe firſt draughts which both aboue and beneath do as in a ſhadow ſet forth a liuely image of him. And now the ſame power leadeth vs to conſider his eternitie. For it muſt needes be that he from whome all things haue their beginning, is of eternal continuance, and hath his beginning, of himſelfe. But nowe if any man enquire the cauſe whereby he both was once lead to create all theſe things, & is now moued to preſerue them: we ſhal finde that his onely goodnes was it that cauſed him. Yea and although this onely be the cauſe, yet ought the ſame abundantly to ſuffice to allure vs to the loue of him, for aſmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet ſayth) vppon which his mercy is not poured out.

6 Also in the second sort of his workes, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinarie course of nature, there doth appeare no lesse euident profe of his powers. For in gouerning the fellowship of men hee so ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and dayly tokens he declareth his fauorable kindnes to the godly, and his seuerity to the wicked and euill doers. For nor doubtful are the punishments that he layeth vpon hainous offences: like as he doth openly shewe himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocency, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessity, asswagereth and comforteth their sorowes, relieueth their calamities, & by all meanes prouideth for their safety. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his iustice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euill doers for a time to reioyce vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be rossed with many aduersities, yea & to be oppressed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrary consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shewe of his wrath he punisheth one sin, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sins to passe vnpunished, we should therevpon thinke that there shalbe an other iudgement to which they are differred to be then punished. Likewise howe great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercy, while he oftentimes ceaseth not to shew his vnwearied bountifulnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, vntill he haue subdued their frowardnes with doing them good?

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, howe God in cases past hope, doth suddenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in misery and in a maner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wilder nesse from the wilde beastes and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth foode to the needy and hungry, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dongeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in peril of shipwrack safe into the hauen, or healeth the half dead of diseases, or scorseth y^e earth with heat & drines, or maketh it fruitful with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the basest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the hie degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed forth he gathereth that those things which are iudged chaunces happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specially of his fatherly kindenes, and that therby is giuen matter of reioycing to the godly, and the wicked & reprobate haue their mouthes stopped. But because the greater part infected with their errors are blind in so cleare a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdome, wisely to wey these workes of God: by sight wherof they nothing profit that otherwise seeme most clere sighted. And truly howe much soeuer y^e glory of God doth apparantly shine before them, yet scarcely the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power & wisdom are no more hid in darknes: wherof the one, his power, doth notably appeare, when the fierce outragiousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion vn-conquerable, is beaten flat in one momēt, their arrogancie tamed, their strō-gest holdes rased, their weapons & armour broken in pieces, their strengthes subdued, their deuises ouerthrowen, and themselues fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldnesse, y auanced it self about the heauens is throwen down euen to the bottome point of the earth: againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, & the needie raised from y donghill, the oppressed & afflicted are drawn out of extreme distresse, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, the vnarmed beare away the victorie from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the strong. As for his wisdom, it self sheweth it self manifestly excellent, while it disposeth euery thing in fittest oportunitie, confoundeth the wisdom of the world be it neuer so pearcing, findeth out y subtile in their subtiltie, finally gouerneth al things by most conueniēt order.

Psa. 113. 7.

1. Cor. 3. 19.

8 We see that it needeth no long or laborfome demonstration, to fetch our testimonies, to serue for the glorious declaration & prooffe of Gods maiestie: for by these few that we haue touched it appeareth that which way so euer a man chauce to looke, they are so common & readie that they may be easily marked, with eye, & pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but stre about in the braine, but such as shal-be found & fruitfull, if it be rightly conceiued & take roote in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whereof because we feele within vs, & do enioy the benefits of them, it must needes be that we be inwardly moued much more liuely with such a knowledge, than if we should imagine God to be such one, of whom we should haue no feeling. Wherby we vnder-stand that this is the rightest way & fittest order to seek God, not to attempt to enter depely with presumptuous curiositie throughly to discusse his substance, which is rather to be reuerently worshipped than scrupuloufely serched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himsefse nere & familiar, & doth in a maner communicate himsefse vnto vs. And this the Apostle meant, when he said, that God is not to be sought a farre of, for-asmuch as he with his most present power dwelleth within euery one of vs.

9 Then such a knowledge ought not onely to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, & raise vs to hope of the life to come.
For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mer-cifulnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we must thinke, that herein he doth but make a shewe afore hande of those things, whereof the open disclosing & full deliurance is differred vnto another life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by y vngodly

griued with afflictions, troubled with iniuries, oppressed with sclanders, and vexed with dispitfull dealings and reproches: contrarywise that wicked doers doe flourish, prosper and obtaine quiet with honor, yea and that vnpunished: we must by and by gather that there shalbe an other life, wherein is layd vp in store both due reuenge for wickednes, and rewarde for righteousnes. Moreover when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rodde of the Lord, we may most certainely determine that much lesse the vngodly shall escape his scourges. For very well is that spoken of Augustine. If euerie sinne should now be punished with open paine, it would be thought that nothing were reserued to the last iudgement. Againe, If God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleeued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euery particular worke of God, but principally in the vniuersal generalitie of them, the powers of God are set foorth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas these his powers doe in his woorkes most brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what valoure they be, and to what ende wee ought to wey them: this we then onely attaine to vnderstand when we discende into our selues, and doe consider by what meanes God doth thewe forth in vs his life, wisdom, and power, and doth vse towardes vs his righteousnesse, goodnesse, and mercifull kindenesse. For though Dauid iustly complaineth, that the vnbeleeuing do dote in folly, because they wey not the deepe counsailes of God in his gouernance of mankind; yet that is also most true, which he saith in an other place, that the wonderful wisdom of God in that behalf exceedeth y^e heares of our head. But because this point shal hereafter in place conuenient be more largely entreated, therefore I do at this time passe it ouer.

10 But with howe greate brightnes soeuer God doth in the mirror of his woorkes shewe by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdom: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stand dully amased at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without profit. For, as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the worlde, how many a one is there of vs, that when hee either listeth vp his eyes to heauen, or casteth them about on the diuerse countries of the earth, doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, & doth not rather rest in beholding the woorkes without hauing regard of the workeman. But as touching those things that dayly happen beside the order of naturall course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about & rowled by blinde vnaduisednesse of fortune, than gouerned by prouidence of God. But if at any time we be by the guiding & direction of these things driuen to the consideration of God (as all men must needes be) yet so soone as we haue without aduisement conceiued a feeling of some Godhead, we by & by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inuentions of our flesh, & with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein in dede we differ one frō another, that euery man priuately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error: but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wittes are subiect: but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpness of vnderstanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dullnes and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe ouer all the rest, which are much more vnreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainely erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to giue light to the rest, doe themselues so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods gouernance of mens matters doth so plainly proue his prouidence, that it cannot be denied, yet this doth no more preuaile with men, than if they beleued that all things are tossed vp and downe with the rash will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanity and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnes hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

II Hereof proceedeth that vmeasurable sinck of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bin filled and ouerflowne. For ech mans wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no maruell that euery seuerall nation was diuersly drawne into seuerall deuises, and not that onely, but also that ech seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonneffe was ioyned to ignorance and darkensse, there hath bin scarcely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idole or fansie in steede of God. Truly euen as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of the wit of mā, while euery man ouer licentiously straying, erroneously deuisech this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not here to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath bin entangled: because both in so doing I should neuer haue end, and also though I speake not one word of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth howe horrible is the blindness of mans minde. I passe ouer the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pearce into heauen, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoickes seemed in their owne conceite to speake very wisely, that out of al the parts of nature may be gathered diuerse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in sūder. As though we were not already more thā enough enclined to vanity, vnlesse a manifold plenty of gods set before vs shoulde further and more violently draw vs into error. Also the Ægyptians mystical science of diuinity sheweth, that they al diligētly endeouored to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceiue the simple & ignorant: but no mortal mā euer inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not bin fowly corrupted.

And

And this so cōfufe diuersity emboldned the Epicures & other grosse dispisers of godlineſſe, by little and little to caſt of al feeling of God. For when they ſaw the wiſeſt of all to ſtriuē in contrary opinions, they ſticked not out of their diſagreements, & out of the fooliſh or apparently erroneous doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themſelues while they ſearch for God, which is none at al. And this they thought that they might freely doe without puniſhment, becauſe it was better briefly to deny vtterly, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine Gods, and ſo to raiſe vp contentions that neuer ſhould haue end. And too much fondly doe they reaſon, or rather caſt a miſt, to hide their vngodlines by ignorance of men, wherby it is no reaſon that any thing ſhould be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all doe confeſſe, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnllearned doe ſo much diſagree thereupon is gathered that the wittes of men are more than dull and blinde in heavenly myſteries, that doe ſo erre in ſeeking out of God. Some other doe praife that anſwere of Symonides, which being demanded of King Hieron what God was, deſired to haue a dayes reſpite graunted him to ſtudy vpon it. And when the next day following, the king demanded the ſame queſtion, he required two dayes reſpite, and ſo oftentimes doubling the number of dayes at length he answered: Howe much the more I conſider it, ſo much the harder the matter ſeemeth vnto me. But graunting that hee did wiſely to ſuſpend his ſentence of ſo darke a matter, yet herby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, ſoundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to conſuſed principles to worſhip an vnknoſne God.

12 Now we muſt alſo hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they muſt needes doe that are giuen to their owne opinion) doe depart frō the one God. They wil boalt that their meaning is otherwiſe: but what they meane, or what they perſwade thēſelues maketh not much to the matter, ſiſh the holy ghoſt pronounceth, y al they are Apoſtates, that according to the darknes of their own mind do thruſt diuels in the place of God. For this reaſon, Paule pronounceth that the Ephēſians were without a God, til they had learned by the goſpel, what it was to worſhip the true God. And we muſt not thinke this to be spokē of one nation only, for as much as he generally aſſirmeth in an other place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, ſince that in the creation of the world, the Maieſty of the creator was diſcloſed vnto them. And therefore the ſcripture, to make place for the true and one only God, condemneth of falſehood and lying, what ſocuer godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at al, but in the mount Sion, where flouriſhed y peculiar knowledge of God. Truly among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Chriſtes time ſeemed to approach nigheſt to true godlines: and yet we heare it ſpoken by Chriſtes owne mouth, that they knew not what they worſhipped. Wherupon ſoloweth, that they were deceiued with vaine error. Finally although they were not al infected with groſſe faultes, or ſel into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approued religion that was groundēd only vpon cōmon reaſon. For albeit, that there were a few \bar{y} were not so mad as the comon people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world conceiue not the wisdom of God. Now if the most excellent haue wandred in darknesse, what is to be saide of the very dregges? Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the holy Ghost doe refuse as bastird worshippings all formes of worshipping deuised by the wil of men. Because in heauenly mysteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it doe not alway breed a heape of errors, yet is alway the mother of error. And though there come no wise of it, yet is this no small fault, at aduventure, to worship an vnknowne God: of which fault, al they by Christs own mouth are pronounced guilty, \bar{y} are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best law-makers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to saye that religion was grounded vpon comon consent. Yea and in Xenophon Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherein he willed that euery man should worship gods after the maner of the countrey, and the custome of his owne city. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authority to determine that which farre surmounteth the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receiue without doubting a God deliuered by mans deuise? Euery man rather will stande to his owne iudgement, than yeelde himselfe to the will of an other. Sith therefore it is too weake & feeble a bond of godlines, in worshipping of God to follow either a custome of a citie or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

1. Cor. 2. 8.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightned do shine in the edifice of the world, to shew foorth the glory of the creator, which doe so euery way display their beames vpon vs, that yet of themselues they cannot bring vs into the right way. In deede they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as bee choked vp before that they can spread abroad any ful brightnes. Therefore \bar{y} Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world images of things inuisible, saith further, that by faith is perceiued, that they were framed by the word of God: meaning thereby that the inuisible godhead is in deede represented by such shewes, but that we haue no eyes to see the same throughly, vnles they be enlightned by \bar{y} reuelatiō of god through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be known concerning God, doth not meane such a disclosing as may be cōprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth, \bar{y} the same proceedeth no further but to make them vnexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he saith, that god is not to be sought a far of, as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in an other place teacheth to what ende that necrenesse auayleth. In the ages past (saith he) God suffered the nations to walke in their owne wayes: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, giuing showers and fruitfull seasons, filling the hearts of men with foode & gladnesse. Howsoeuer therefore the Lord be not without testimony, while with his great and manifold bountifullnesse he sweetly allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cesse not to followe their owne wayes, that is to say, their damnable errors.

Heb. 11. 3.

Act. 17. 27

14 But although we want naturall power, whereby we cannot climbe vp vnto the pure and cleare knowledge of God, yet because the faulte of our dulnesse is in our selues, therefore all coulour of excuse is cut away from vs. For we cannot so pretend ignorance, but that euen our conscience doth still condemne vs of slouthfulnesse and vnthankfulnesse. It is a defence forsooth right worthy to be receiued, if man will alleage that he wanted eares to hear the truth, for the publishing whereof the very dumbe creatures haue lowde voices: if man shall say that he cannot see those things with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes doe shew him: if man shall lay for his excuse the feeblenesse of his wit, where all creatures without reason doe instruct him: Wherefore sith all things do shew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandering and straying out of the way. But howsoeuer it is to be imputed to the faulte of men, that they doe by and by corrupt the seede of the knowledge of God, sowne in their mindes by maruelous workmanthip of nature, so that it groweth not to good and cleane fruite: yet it is most true, that we are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple testimony, that the creatures doe honorably declare of Gods glorie. For so soone as we haue taken by the beholding of the world a small taste of the Godhead, we leauing the true God doe in stead of him raise vp dreames and fantasies of our owne braine, and doe conuey hither and thither from the true fountaine the praise of righteousnes, wisdom, goodnesse and power. Moreouer we doe so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, depraue his dayly doinges, that we take away both from them their glory, and from the Author his due praise.

The vj. Chapter.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needfull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maistresse.

Therefore although that same brightnesse, which both in heauen and earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, euen so as God, to wrap all mankinde in one guiltinesse, doth shew his diuine maestic to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it necessarie that we haue also an other and a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the very Creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine hec hath added the light of his word, that thereby he might be knowne to saluation. And this prerogatiue he hath vouchsafed to giue vs, whom it pleased him more nerely and more familiarly to draw together to himself. For because he sawe the mindes of al men to be caried about with wandering and vnstedfast morion, after he had chosn the Iewes to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with bars, that they should not wander out in vanity as other did. And not without cause he holdeth vs with the same meane in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise euen they should quickly swarue away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of other. For as olde men, or poore blinde, or they whose eyes are dimme sighted, if you laye a faire booke before them, though they perceiue that there is somewhat written therein, therein, yet can they not read two wordes together: but being holpen with spectacles set betwene them & it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our mindes the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remoue the mist, & plainly shew vs y^e true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church god vseth not only dumme teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not only publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithal pronounceth that he himself is the same God whom we ought to worship: & doth not only teache the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth him selfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to giue them also his word. Which is the righter & certainer marke to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham & the rest of the fathers by this help attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were seuerally different from the vnbeleuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternal life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needeful for them to knowe God not only to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubtlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kind of knowledge whereby was giuen to vnderstand who is the God by whom the world was made & is gouerned, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adioyned, which only quicknerh dead soules, wherby God is knowen not only to be the maker of the world & the only author & iudge of al things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of y^e mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedie therof. Therefore let the readers remeber that I do not yet speake of the couenant whereby God hath adopted to him self the children of Abraham, & of that special part of doctrine whereby the faithful haue alway bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake howe we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine markes seuerally discerned from y^e counterfaiit multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shal conueniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall alleage many testimonies out of the newe Testament, and some also out of the law & the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this end, to proue that in the Scripture is disclosed vnto vs God the creator of the world, & in the Scripture is set forth what we ought to think of him, to the ende that we should not seeke about the bush for an vncertaine godhead.

2 But whether God were knowen to the fathers by oracles & visions, or whether by y^e mean & ministratation of men he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliuer to their posteritie: yet it is vndoubtedly true that in their harts was engrauen a stedfast certcintie of doctrine, so as they might be perswaded & vnderstand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwayes made vndoubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded al vncertein opinion. At length that by continual proceeding of doctrine, the truest suruiuing in all ages might still remaine in y^e world, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to haue as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this entent was y^e law published, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expositors. For though there were diuerse vses of the law, as hereafter shal better appeare in place conuenient: and specially the principal purpose of Moses & al y^e prophets was to teach y^e maner of reconciliation betwene god & men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside y^e proper doctrine of faith & repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediatur, the Scripture doth by certaine markes & tokens paint out y^e only & true God, in that that he hath created & doth gouerne the world, to the end he should be seuerally knowne & not reckned in the false number of fained gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the works of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit therby. And therefore it is no maruell y^e they which are borne in darknesse do more & more waxe hard in their amased dulnes, because very few of them do giue themselues pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to kepe them within their boundes, but they rather reioyce in their own vanitie. Thus then ought we to hold, that to y^e ende true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heauenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any tast be it neuer so little of true & sound doctrine, vnlesse he haue bin scholer to the Scripture. And frō hence groweth the originall of true vnderstanding, that wee reuerently embrace whatsoeuer it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not onely the perfect & in all points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springerth from obedience. And truely in this behalfe God of his singular prouidence hath prouided for men in and for all ages.

3 For if we consider how slippery an inclination mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulness of God, how great a readines to fall into all kinde of errors, howe great a lust to forge oftentimes new & counterfait religions, wee may thereby perceiue how necessary it was to haue the heauenly doctrine so put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vaine by error, or be corrupted by boldnes of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alway vsed the helpe of his word, toward al those whom it pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because he foresaw that his image emprinted in y^e most beautiful forme of the world was not sufficiently effectual: Therefore it behoueth vs to trauaile this straight way, if we earnestly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his worde, wherein God is wel & liuely set out by his workes, when his workes be weyed not after the peruersnesse of our own iudgement, but according to the rule of y^e eternal trueth. If we swarue from that word, as I said euen now, although we runne neuer so fast, yet we shal neuer attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must think, y^e the brightnessse of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be attained vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which we cannot vnwrap our selues, vnlesse

Rom. 10. 4.

vnlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to run neuer so fast in an other. And therefore Dauid oftentimes when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but y^e doctrine whereby he chalengeth to himselfe a lawfull government: because errours can neuer be rooted out of the hearts of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4 Therefore the same Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glory of God, that the firmament sheweth forth the workes of his handes, that the orderly succeeding course of daies & nightes preacheth his maiesty, then descendeth to make mention of his word. The lawe of the Lord (saith he) is vndefiled, cōuerting soules: the witness of the Lord is faithfull, giuing wisdom to little ones: the righteousnes of y^e Lord are vpright, making hartes cheareful: the cōmandement of the Lord is bright, giuing light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the law, yet in generality he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth, therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the xxix. Psalme, where the prophet hauing preached of y^e terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, showers, whirlwindes and stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the cedar trees: in the end at last he goeth further and saith, that his praises are song in the sanctuary, because the vnbeleeuers are deafe and heare not all the voyces of God that resound in the aire. And in like maner in an other Psalme, after y^e he had described the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus cōcludeth: thy testimonies are verified, the beauty of thy temple is holines for euer. And out of this meaning also proceeded that which Christ said to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did honor that which they knew not, and that onely the Iewes did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the feeblenes thereof can by no meane attaine vnto God, but being holpen and listened vp by his holy word, it folowed of necessity, that all men, except the Iewes, did wander in vanitie & errour, because they sought God without his word.

The vij. Chapter.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witness of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

BVt before I go any further, it is needfull to say somewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens mindes to reuerence it, but also to take away all doubt therof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there set forth, there is no man of so desperate boldnesse, vnlesse he bee voide of all common sense and naturall witte of man, that dare derogate the credite of him that speaketh it.

But because there are not dayly oracles giuen from heauen, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherein it hath pleased to preserue his truth to perpetual memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credit among the faithful, but in that they doe belecue that it is as verily come from heauen as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therein. This matter indeede is right worthy both to be largely entreated of and diligently weyed. But the readers shal pardon me if herein I rather regarde what y^e proportiō of the worke which I haue begon may beare, than what the largenes of the matter requireth. There is growne vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authority as by common consent of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuolable truth of God did rest vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy ghost, they ask of vs who can assure vs that these scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine vs that they haue continued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently receiued, and that other to be striken out of the number of scripture, vnlesse the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these thinges? It hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, and what bookes are to be reckened in the canon therof. So these robbers of Gods honor, while they seeke vnder colour of the church to bring in an vnbrideled tyranny, care nothing with what absurdities they snare both themselues and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleued among y^e simple, that the Church can doe all thinges. But if it be so: what shall become of the poore consciences that seeke stedfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine therof stand and be staied onely vpon the iudgement of men? When they receiue such answer, shall they cease to wauer and tremble? Again to what scorn of the vngodly is our faith made subiect? into how great suspicion with all men is it brought, if this be beleued that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the fauour of men?

2 But such bablers are well confuted euen with one word of the Apostle. Eph. 2. 20. He testifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundatiō of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needes be, that the same doctrine stoode in stedfast certainty, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well cauil, that although the Church take her first beginning therof, yet it remaineth doubtful what is to be said of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the iudgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets and preaching of the Apostles: whersoever that doctrine shalbe found, the allowed credit therof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had neuer bin. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuise, that the Church hath power to iudge the scripture, so as the certainty of the scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore when the Church doth receiue the Scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should.

should be in controuersie, make it autentike and of credit : but because she acknowledgeth it to be the trueth of her God, according to her duetic of godlinesse without delay she doth honor it. Whereas they demaund, how shall we be perswaded that it came from God, vnlesse we resort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should aske, how shall we learne to knowe light from darkenesse, white from blacke, or sweete from sower. For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no lesse apparant sense of her trueth, than white and blacke things doe of their colour, or sweete and sower things of tast.

3 I know that they commonly alleage the saying of Augustine, where he saith that he would not beleue the Gospell, saue that the authoritie of the church moued him thereto. But how vntruely and cauillously it is alleaged for such a meaning, by y whole tenor of his writing it is easie to perceiue. He had to doe with the Manichees, which required to be beleueed without gaine saying, when they vaunted y they had the truth on their side, but proued it nor. And to make their Manicheus to be beleueed, they pretended the Gospell. Now Augustine asketh the what they would do, if they did light vpon a man that would not beleue the gospel it selfe, with what manner of perswasion they would drawe him to their opinion. Afterward he saith : I my selfe would not beleue the Gospell, &c. saue that the authority of the church moued me thereto. Meaning that he himselfe, when he was a stranger from the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the gospel for the assured truth of God, but by this that he was ouercome with the authority of the church. And what maruell is it, if a man not yet knowing Christ, haue regard to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the church, nor meaneth that the certainty of y gospel doth hang therupon: but simply & only, that there should be no assurednes of the gospel to the infidels, wherby they might be won to Christ, vnlesse y consent of the church did driue them vnto it. And the same meaning a little before he doth plainly confirme in this saying. When I shall praise that which I beleuee, & scorne that which thou beleueest, what thinkest thou mete for vs to iudge or do? but that we forsake such men as first call vs to come and knowe certaine truethes and after commaund vs to beleuee things vncertaine : and that we follow them that require vs first to beleuee that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strong by beleueing we may attaine to vnderstand the thing that we beleuee : not men nowe, but God himselfe inwardly strengthening and giuing light to our mind. These are the very words of Augustine: wherby euery man may easely gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credite that we haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awardement of the church, but onely to shewe this, (which we our selues also doe confesse to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the spirite of God, are brought by the reuerence of the church vnto a willingnes to be taught, so as they can finde in their hearts to learne the faith of Christ by the Gospell : and that thus by this meane the authoritie of the Church is an introduction, wherby we are prepared to beleuee the Gospell. For, as we see, his minde is that the assurance of the godly be stayed vpon a far other foundation. Otherwise I doe not deny but that he often presseth the Manichies with the consent of the whole church, when he seeketh to proue the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproched Faustus for that he did not yeld himself to the truth of the gospel so grounded, so stablished, so gloriously rencumed and from the very time of the Apostles by certaine successions perpetually commended. But he neuer traueileth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter y^e he disposed of, he bringeth forth y^e vniuersal iudgement of the church, wherein he had the auantage of his aduersaries. If any desire a fuller prooffe herof, let him read his booke concerning the profit of beleeuing. Where he shall find that there is no other readines of beleefe commended vnto vs by him, but that which onely giueth vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a conuenient beginning to enquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and found truth.

4 We ought to hold, as I before said, that the credit of this doctrine, is not established in vs, vntill such time as we be vndoubtedly perswaded y^e God is the author therof. Therefore the principall prooffe of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophets and Apostles boast not of their owne sharp wit or any such things as procure credit to men that speake: neither stand they vpō proues by reason, but they bring forth the holy name of God, therby to compel the whole world to obedience. Now we haue to see how not only by probable opinion, but by a parant truth it is euident, that in this behalf the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we wil prouide wel for consciences, y^e they be not continually caried about with vnstedfast doubting, nor may wauer, nor stay at euery smal stop, this maner of perswasion must be fetched deeper than from either the reasons, iudgements or the coniectures of men, euen from the secret testimonie of the holy Ghost. True in deede it is, that if we list to worke by way of arguments, many things might be alledged that may easily proue, if there be any God in heauē, that the law, the prophecies and the gospel came from him. Yea although men learned and of deepe iudgement would stand vp to the contrary, & would employ & shew foorth y^e whole force of their wits in this disputatiō: yet if they be not so hardned as to become desperately shamelesse, they would be cōpelled to confesse, that there are seene in the scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appere that the doctrine therof is from heauen. And shortly hereafter we shall see, y^e all the books of y^e holy Scripture do far excell al other writings what soeuer they be. Yea if we bring thither pure eyes and vncorrupted senses, we shall forthwith finde there the maiesty of God, which shall subdue all hardnes of gaine saying and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they doe disorderly, that by disputation trauel to establish the perfect credit of the scripture. And truely although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the most subtile despisers of God, that haue a desire to shew themselues witty and pleasant in febling the autho-

authority of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for mee to put to silence their babblings. And if it were profitable to spend labour in confuting their cauellations, I would with no great busines shake in sunder the bragges that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliuer the sound worde of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not soorthwith to fasten in their heartes that assurednesse that godlines requireth. Prophane men because they thinke religion standeth onely in opinion, to the ende they would belecue nothing fondly or lightly, doe couet and require to haue it proued to them by reason, that Moses and the Prophetes spake from God. But I answer that the testimonie of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as onely God is a conuenient witnessse of himselfe in his owne word, so shall the same word neuer finde credit in the hearts of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward witness of the holy ghost. It behoueth therefore of necessitie that the same holy Ghost which spake by the mouth of the Prophetes, doe enter into our heartes to perswade vs that they faithfully vterred that which was by God commanded them. And this order is very aptly set forth by Esai in these words: My spirit which is in thee, & the words that I haue put in my mouth and in the mouth of thy seede, shall not faile for euer. It greueth some good men, that they haue not ready at hand some cleare prooue to alleage, when the wicked do without punishmēt murmur against the word of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seale and a pledge, because vntill he doe lighten mens mindes they doe alway wauer among many doutinges.

5 Let this therefore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghost hath inwardly taught, doe wholly rest vpon the scripture, and y^e the same scripture is to be credited for it self sake, & ought not to be made subiect to demonstration and reasons: but yet the certainty which it getteth among vs, it attaineth by the witness of the holy Ghost. For though by the onely maiestie of it selfe it procureth reuerence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it throughly pearceth our affectionis, when it is sealed in our heartes by the holy Ghost. So being lightned by his vertue, we doe then belecue, not by our owne iudgement, or other mens, that the scripture is from God: but aboue all mans iudgement we hold it most certainly determined, euen as if we beheld the maiesty of God himselfe there present, that by the ministry of men it came to vs from the very mouth of God. We seeke not for arguments and likelihodes to rest our iudgement vpon: but as to a thing without al compasse of consideratiō, we submit our iudgement & wit vnto it. And that not in such sort as some are wont sometime hastily to take hold of a thing vnknowne, wh ch after being throughly perceiued displeaseth them: but because we are in our consciēces well assured that we hold an intiuincible truth. Neither in such sort, as silly mē are wont to yeld their mind in thraldome to superstitions: but because we vndoubtedly perceiue therein the strength & breathing of the diuine maiesty, wherwith we are drawne & stirred to obey, both wittingly & willingly, & yet more liuely & effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophetes with the whole people doe beare him

witnes, because being taught by prophecies they did vndoubtedly beleue without guile or vncertainty that God himselſe had ſpoken. Such therefore is our perſwaſion, as requireth no reaſons: ſuch is our knowledge, as hath a right good reaſon to maintaine it, euen ſuch a one, wherein the mind more aſſuredly & ſtedfaſtly reſteth than vpon any reaſons: ſuch is our feeling, as cannot proceede but by reuelation from heauen. I ſpeake nowe of none other thing but that which euery one of the faithfull doth by experience find in himſelf, ſaying that my words doe much want of a full declaration of it. I leaue here many thinges vnſpoken, because there wilbe elſwhere againe a conuenient place to entreate of this matter. Onely now let vs know, that only that is the true faith which the ſpिरite of God doth ſeale in our hearts. Yea with this only reaſon will the ſober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Eſai promiſeth, that all the children of the reuened church ſhalbe the ſcholars of God. A ſingular priuiledge therein doth God vouchſafe to grant to his elect onely, whom he ſeuereth from all the reſt of mankind. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cherefulnes to hear the voyce of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moſes, as it is written: Say not in thy hart, who ſhall aſcend into heauen, or who ſhall deſcend into the deepe? the word is euen in thine owne mouth. If it be y^e pleaſure of God that this treaſure of vnderſtanding be layde vp in ſtore for his children, it is no maruell nor vnlikely, that in the common multitude of men is ſcene ſuch ignorance and dulneſſe. The comon multitude I calue the moſt excellent the, vntil ſuch time as they be graſſed into y^e body of the church. Moreouer Eſai giuing warning that the prophets doctrine ſhould ſeeme incredible not only to ſtrangers but alſo to the Iewes that would be accounted of the houſehold of God, addeth this reaſon: because the arme of God ſhall not be reueiled to all men. So oft therefore as the ſmalneſſe of number of the beleeuers doth trouble vs, on the other ſide let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the myſteries of God but they to whome it is giuen.

Eſa. 53. 1.

The viij. Chapter.

That ſo farre as mans reaſon may leaue, there are ſufficient proues to ſtabliſh the credit of Scripture.

VNleſſe we haue this aſſurance, which is both more excellent & of more force than any iudgement of man, in vaine ſhall the authority of ſcripture either be ſtrengthened with arguments, or ſtabliſhed with conſent of y^e church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For vnleſſe this foundation be layd, it ſtill remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other ſide when exempting it from the common ſtate of thinges, we haue embraced it deuoutly and according to the worthineſſe of it: then theſe thinges become very fit helps which before were but of ſmale force to graſſe and faſten the aſſurance thereof in our mindes. For it is marueilous, howe great eſtabliſhment groweth hereof, when with earneſt ſtudy wee conſider howe orderly and well framed a diuine wiſedome appeareth therein, howe heauenly a doctrine in currey place of it, and nothing thing fauouring of earthlineſſe, howe beautifull an agreement of all the partes among them ſelues, and ſuch other things as auaille to procure a maieſtie to writings. But more perfectly are our heartes confirmed when we conſider, how we are euen violently caried to an admiration of it rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of wordes. For this alſo was not done without the ſingular prouidence of God, that the hie myſteries of y^e heauēly kingdome ſhould for the moſt part be vttered vnder a contemptible baſeneſſe of wordes, leaſt if it had bene beautified with more glorious ſpeech, the wicked ſhould cauſe that the onely force of eloquence doeth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a maner rude ſimplicity doth raiſe vp a greater reuerence of it ſelfe than any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we iudge, but that there is a more mightie ſtrength of trueth in the holy Scripture, than that it needeth any art of wordes? Not without cauſe therefore the Apoſtle maketh his argument, to proue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wiſdome, becauſe his preaching among them was ſet forth not with entifiſing ſpeech of mans wiſdome, but in plaine euidence of the ſpirite and of power. For the trueth is then ſet free from all douting, when not vpholden by foraigne aids it ſelfe alone ſufficeth to ſuſtaine it ſelfe. But how this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they neuer ſo cunningly garniſhed, no one is ſo farre able to pearce our affections. Reade Demofthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that ſorte: I graunt they ſhall marueiloſly allure, delite, moue, and rauiſh thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it ſhall ſo liuely moue thy affections, it ſhall ſo pearce thy heart, it ſhall ſo ſettle within thy bones, that in compariſon of the efficacy of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philoſophers ſhall in manner vniſh away: ſo that it is eaſie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all giſtes and graces of mans induſtrie: doe in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie.

1. Cor. 2. 4.

2 I graunt in dede, that ſome of the Prophets haue an elegant cleare yea and a beautifull phraſe of ſpeech, ſo as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane writers: and by ſuch examples it pleaſed the holie Ghoſt to ſhewe that he wanted not eloquence, though in the reſt he vſed a rude and groſſe ſtyle. But whether a man read Dauid, Eſay, and ſuch like, who haue a ſweete and pleaſant flowing ſpeech, or Amos, the heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whoſe rougher talke ſaoureth of cōtrie rudeneſſe: in euerie one of them ſhall appeare that maieſtie of the holy Ghoſt that I ſpake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfaiſer of God, that with deceitfull reſemblance he might y^e better creepe into ſimple mēſ mindes: ſo hath he craftilie ſpread abroad with rude and in manner barbarous ſpeech, thoſe wicked errors wherewith he deceiued ſilly men, & hath oft times vſed diſcontinued phraſes, that vnder ſuch viſour he might hide his deceites. But how vaine and vncleanlie is that curious counterfaiſing, all men that haue but meane vnderſtanding doe plainly ſee. As for the holie Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceived by man. Let all the Prophets be looked vpon, there shall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in such sorte that those are to bee thought, to haue no iudgement of tast to whome their doctrine is vsfauorie.

3 Other men haue largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a few things, y^e chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Beside these points that I haue already touched the very antiquitie of y^e Scripture is of great weight. For howsoever y^e Greek writers tel many fables of the Ægyptian diuinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is far inferiour to the age of Moses. And Moses deuifeth not a new God, but setteth forth the same thing which the Israelites had receiued in long proesse of time, conueied to them by their fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the euerlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the couenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing neuer heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needs be y^e the deliuerance from bondage, wherein they were detained, was a thing well & commonly knowen among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did forthwith raise vp all their minds. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC. yeares. Nowe it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the originall deliuerance of his doctrine: how much the holy Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie.

4 Vnlesse perhaps some list to belecue the Ægyptians, that stretch their auntienty to sixe thousand yeares before the creation of the worlde. But sith their vaine babling hath bin alway scorned euen of all y^e prophane writers themselues, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Appion, alleageth testimonies worthy to be remembered out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath bin famous euen from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truely knowen. Nowe, that neither there should remaine to the malicious any cause of suspicion, nor to the wicked any occasion to cauill, God hath for both these daungers prouided good remedies. When Moyses rehearseth what Iacob almost three hundred yeares before had by heauenle inspiration pronounced vpon his owne posteritie, how doth he set forth his owne tribe? yea in the person of Leui he sporteth it with eternall infamie. Symeon (sayth he) and Leui the vessels of wickednesse. My soule come not into their counsel, nor my tongue into their secret. Truely he might haue passed ouer that blotte with silence, in so doing not onely to please his father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole family with part of the same shame. Howe can that writer be suspected, which vnconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the holy Ghost, that the principall auncester of the family wherof him selfe descended was an abominable doer, neither priuately prouided for his owne honor, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kinsmen, whome vndoubtedly this matter greued? When also he rehearseth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Marie his sister: shall wee saie that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreouer sith himselfe was hyest in authoritie, why did he not leaue at least y^e office of the hie priest-hode to his own sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touche here onely a fewe thinges of many. But in the lawe it selfe a man shall eche where meete with many argumentes that are able to bring full prooffe to make men beleue that Moses without all question commeth from heauen as an Angell of God. Num. 12. 1.

5 Now these so many and so notable miracles that he recounteth, are euen as many establishments of the lawe that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was caried in a cloud vp into the mountaine: that there euen to the fortieth day he continued without companie of men: that in the very publishing of the lawe his face did shine as it were besette with sunne beames: that lightnings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard eche where in the ayre: that a trumpet sounded being not blowen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude sette betwene was kept from the sight of the people: that his authority was so miraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore, Dathan and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the rock striken with a rodde did by and by powre forth a riuer: that at his prayer it rayned Manna from heauen: did not God herein commend him from heauen as an vndouted Prophet? If any man obiekt agaynst me, that I take these thinges as confessed, which are not out of controuersie, it is easie to answere this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these thinges; what place was there to fayne before those witnesses that had them selues seene the thinges done? It is likely forsoth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelity, stubbornes, vnthankfulnes and other sinnes, would haue boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne sight with such miracles, which in deede they neuer sawe. Exo. 24. 18.
Exo. 34. 29.
Exo. 19. 16.
Exo. 40. 34.

6 For this is also worthy to be noted, so oft as he telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiouly ioyneth such thinges as might stirre the whole people to crie out against him, if there had bin neuer so litle occasion: Whereby appeareth, y^e they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were euer more than sufficiently conuincid by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier knowen, than y^e the prophane coulde denie that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them an other cauillation, saying, that they were done by Magicall artes and sorcerie. But what likely prooffe haue they to accuse him for a sorcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, y^e he commandeth to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsell of sorcerers and soothsaiers? Truely no such deceiuer vseth his juggling castes, but that he studieth to amase the mindes of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth only execute those thinges that God hath appointed, Num. 16. 24.

he doth sufficiently wipe away all blottes of thinking euil of him. Nowe if the thinges themfelues be considered, what enchantement could bring to passe that Manna daily raining from heauen, should suffice to feede y^e people? and if any man keep in store more than his iust measure, by the verie rotting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great proues God suffred his seruant so to be tried, y^e now the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proude and impudently make insurrections, sometime diuers of them cōspiring among themfelues went about to ouerthrowe the holy seruant of God: how could he haue begiled their furor with illusions? And the ende that followed plainly sheweth, that by this meane his doctrine was stablished to continue to the ende of all ages.

Gen. 49.

7 Moreouer where he assigneth the chiefe gouernement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarche Iacob, who can denie that this was done by spirite of prophecie, specially if we wey in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it proued true? Imagine Moses to haue bin the first author of this prophecie: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed fower hundred yeares wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome shoulde rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When Dauid was annointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritance of the kingdome should be chaunged? who would haue looked that there should haue come a king out of the base house of a heardman? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour shold light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this annointment was gouerned by any arte, trauaile or policy of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of y^e heauenly prophecie? Likewise those things that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkely, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into y^e couenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousande yeres after, doe they not make it plaine that he spake by the inspiration of God? Iouerskippe his other tellinges aforehand of things, which do so euidently fauour of the reuelation of God, that all men that haue their sounde wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a cleare looking glasse, wherein God euidently appeareth.

Sam. 16.

Deuter. 32.

8 But in the other prophetes the same is yet also much more plainelie scene. I will choose out only a few examples, because to gather them all together were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdome of Iuda was in peace, yea when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esaias prophecie of the destruction of the citie and exile of the people. But admit that, yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such thinges as at y^e time seemed false, and afterward proued true: yet those prophecies that he vttereth concerning their deliuerance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whome the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than an hundred dred yeares from the time that Eſaie ſo prophecied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeare or thereabouts after the death of Eſaie. No man could then geſſe that there ſhould be any ſuch Cyrus, that ſhould haue warre with the Babylonians, that ſhould bring ſubiect ſo mightie a monarchie vnder his dominion, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Iſtaell. Doth not this bare telling without any garniſhment of wordes euidently ſhew, that the things that Eſaie ſpeaketh, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and nor the coniectures of men? Againe, when Ieremie a lide before that the people was caried away, did determine the ende of the captiuitie within threescore & ten yeares, and promiſed returne and libertie, muſt it not needes be that his tongue was governed by the ſpirit of God? What ſhameleſſneſſe ſhall it be to denie, that the credite of the prophetes was ſtabliſhed by ſuch prooues, and that the ſame thing was fulfilled in deede, which they them ſelues do reporte to make their ſayings to be beleued? Behold, the former things are come to paſſe, and new things do I declare: before they come forth, I tell you of them. I leaue to ſpeake how Hieremie and Ezechiell being ſo farre aſunder, yet prophecying both at one time, they ſo agreed in all their ſayings as if either one of them had ended the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the ſpace of ſixe hundred yeares after, in ſuch ſort as if he had compiled an hſtorie of things already done and commonly knowne? Theſe things if godly men haue well conſidered, they ſhall be ſufficiently well furniſhed, to appeaſe the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine prooffe hereof is too cleare to be ſubiecte to any cauillations at all.

9 I know what ſome learned men do prate in corners, to ſhew the quicknes of their wit in aſſaulting the truth of God. For they demande, who hath aſſured vs that theſe things which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moſes and the prophetes. Yea, they are ſo hardy to moue this queſtion, whether there were any ſuch Moſes or no. But if a man ſhould call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Ariſtode, or Cicero: who would not ſay, that ſuch madneſſe were worthy to be corrected with ſtrokes and ſtripes? The law of Moſes hath bin marueiloſly preſerued rather by heauenly prouidence than by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Prieſtes it laie buried a little while: yet ſince the time that the godly king Ioſias found it, it hath ſtill by continual ſucceſſion from age to age bin vſed in the handes of men. Neither did Ioſias bring it forth as an vnknown or new thing, but ſuch a thing as had bin euer commonlie publiſhed, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it ſelſe was appointed to be ſacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out therof, to remaine with the keepers of the kings Records. Only this had happened, that the Prieſtes had ceaſſed to publiſh the law according to the olde accuſtomed maner, and the people themſelues had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea there in maner paſſed no age wherein the eſtabliſhment thereof was not confirmed and renewed. They that had Dauid in their handes, knewe they not of Moſes? But to ſpeake of them all at once, it is most certaine that their writings came to posteritie none other-wise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeres deliuered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, & partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

2. Mac. 1. 59.

10 As for that which they obiect out of the historie of the Machabees, to minish the credite of scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deuised more fitte to stablish the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, & then let vs turne vpon them selues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commaunded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that we now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so sone be made? It is euident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediatly abroade againe, and were without controuersie knowne to be the same of all godly men, that hauing bene brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly knowe them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conspired together, did insolently triumphe with reproches vpon the Jewes, yet neuer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For whatsoeuer they thinke the Jewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the authour of it. What then doe these praters else, but bewray their owne more then doggish frowardnesse, while they falsely say that these bookes are changed, and newe put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approued by consent of all histories? But to spende no more labour vainly in confuting such foolish cauillations: let vs rather hereby consider how greate a care God had for the preseruacion of his worde, when beyond the hope of all men, he saued it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endewed the godly priestes & other with so great constancie, y^e they sticked not to redeeme this booke euen with losse of their life if need were, & so to conuey it ouer to posteritie: that he disappointed y^e narrow search of so many gouernors & souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable & miraculous worke of God, y^e these sacred monumentes which the wicked verily thought to haue bene vtterly destroyed, by and by came abroade againe as fully restored, & that with a great deale more honour? For by & by folowed y^e translating of them into Greeke, to publish them through out the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous working, that God preserued the tables of his couenant from the bloody proclamations of Antiochus: but also that among so manifold miserable afflictions of y^e Jewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a fewe & wasted, & last of all, brought in maner to vtter destruction, yet they remained still safe and extant. The Hebrue tongue lay not onely vnesteemed, but almost vnknown. And surely had not bene Gods pleasure to haue his religion prouided for, it had perished altogether. For howe much the Jewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarued from the naturall vse of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophetes, that liued in that age, which is therefore worrhie to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the lawe and the prophetes is the more plainly perceiued. And by whome whom hath God preferued for vs the doctrine of saluation contained in the law and the prophetes, to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? euen by the most cruelly bent enemies of Christ, y^e Iewes whom Saint Augustine doth therefore worthily call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian Church, because they haue ministred vnto vs that thing, to reade whereof, themselues haue no vse.

11 Nowe if we come to the new Testament, with how sounde pillars is the trueth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelistes write the historie in base and simple speache. Many proud men do lothe that simplicitie, because they take no heede to the cheife pointes of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they entreate of heauenly mysteries aboute mans capacitie. Surely whosoeuer haue but one droppe of honest shame will be ashamed if they reade the first chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly comprised by these three Euangelists, do easly deliuer their writing from all contempte. But Iohn thundering from on hic, those whome he compelleth not to obedience of faith, hee throweth down their stubburnes more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come foorth all these sharpnosed faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them reade Iohns Gospell: Wil they or no, they shall there finde a thousande sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea that may print a horrible brande in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to bee thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more parte be blinde, yet the verie heauenly maiestie in them holdeth all men bounde, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doeth sufficientlic aduance their doctrine aboute the worlde, that Mathew being before all giuen to the gaine of his monie boorde, Peter and Iohn brought vp in their fisher boates, all grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paul, not only from a professed, but also from a cruell and bloody enemy conuerted to a newe man, with sodaine and vnhoped change doth shewe, that being compelled by heauenly authoritic he now mainteineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogges deny, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredit the historie: yet still the trueth it selfe openly cryeth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the raskall people, sodenly began so gloriously to entreate of heauenly mysteries.

12 There be yet also furthermore many very good reasons, why the cōsente of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no smal matter, that since the Scripture was first published, y^e willes of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And y^e howsoeuer Sathan with all the worlde hath trauailed by marueilous meanes, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrowe it, or vtterly to blotte & deface it out of mens remembrance, yet euer still like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained inuincible. For there hath not lightly bin in olde time any sophister or Rhetorician y^e had any more excellent wit thā other, but he hath bent his force against this Scripture: yet they all haue nothing preuailed: The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, & yet al their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it haue resisted being so mightily on eche side assailed, if it had had none other defence but mans? Yea rather it is hereby proued, that it came from God himselfe, that all the trauales of men striuing against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen vp. Beside that, not one citie alone, nor one only nation hath agreed to receiue and embrace it: but so farre as the worlde extendeth in length & breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of diuers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so diuers & disagreeing in manner in all things els, ought much to moue vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heauenly maiestie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I meane not of them all, but onely of those, with whome as with lightes it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assurednesse of minde ought we to submitte vs to that doctrine which we see stablished and witnessed with the bloude of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldly without feare, yea and with great chearefulnes to die for it: howe should it then come to passe, that we, hauing it conueied to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and vn moueable persuasion take holde of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath bene sealed with the bloud of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witness of their faith: and not of a frantike distemperance of braine, as sometime the erroneous spirites are wont to doe, but with a firme and constant and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maiestie not onely ascertained vnto godly hartes, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of cauellers, yet be they such as be not of them selues sufficiently auaylable to bring stedfast credite vnto it, vntill the heauenly father disclosing therein his maiestie, doth bring the reuerence therof out of al controuersie. Wherefore then only the scripture shall suffice to y^e knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certentie thereof shall be grounded vpon the inwarde persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as seconde helpes of our weaknesse they follow that cheefe and hiest testimony. But they do fondly that will haue it perswaded by prooffe to the vnfaithfull, that the scripture is the worde of God, which can not be knowen but by faith. For good reason therefore doth Augustine giue warning, that godlinesse and peace of minde ought to goe before, to make a man vnderstand somewhat of so great matters.

The ix. Chapter.

doe overthrowe all the principles of godlinesse.*

Nowe

Now they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with errour, as to be caried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certeine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirite, both them selues do forsake all reading, and also doe scorne their simplicitie which still follow the dead & staving letter, as they call it. But I would faine knowe of these men, what spirite that is, by whose inspiration they are caried vp so hie, that they dare despise the doctrine of the Scripture as childish and base. For if they answer that it is the spirite of Christ, then such carelesnesse is worthie to be laughed at. For I thinke they will graunt, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitiue Church were lightned with none other spirite. But none of them did learne of that spirite to despise the worde of God: but rather euery one was moued more to reuerence it, as their writings do most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Esaie. For where he saith, My spirite that is vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the olde people to the outwarde doctrine as though they were set to learne to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true & perfect felicitie of the newe church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, than by the spirite of God. Whereby wee gather, that these lewde men with wicked sacrilege doe seuer afunder those things that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inuiolable knot. Moreover, Paul being rauished vp into the third heauen, yet ceased not to go forward in the doctrine of the law and the Prophets, euen so as he exhorteth Timothie, a doctour of singular excellencie to apply reading. And worthie is that commendation to be remembered, wherewith he setteth foorth the Scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprove, that the seruants of God may be made perfect. How diuclish a madnesse is it to faine, that the vse of Scripture is but transitorie, and lasteth but for a while, which in deede guideth the children of God euen to the last ende? Againe, I would haue them answer me this: whether they haue tasted of another spirit than that, which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not caried with such giddinesse, that they dare so boast. But what manner of spirite did he speak of in his promise? euen that spirite which should not speake of it selfe, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those thinges, which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his worde. It is not therefore the office of the spirite, which is promised vs, to faine new and vnheard of reuelations, or to coine a newe kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospel, but to seale in our minds the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospel.

2 Whereby we plainly vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we list to take any vse and fruite of the spirite of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedefull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to haue giuen boundes. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heauen and earth doth gouerne the worlde by him created. Euery where is renoumed both his fatherly bountie and enclined wil to do good, & there are also examples rehearsed of his seueritie, which shewe him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doinges, specially where his sufferance nothing preuaileth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set foorth more plaine descriptions wherein his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seen. For in the place where
 Exo. 34. 6. Moses describeth it, it semeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to vnderstand of God. The Lord (sayth he) the Lord, a mercifull God, and gracious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercy, vnto thousandes which takest away iniquitie & wicked doinges, before whome the innocent shall not bee innocent, which redrest the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the wise repeting of that honorable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feeling, than in an empty and supernatural speculation. And here we do heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercy, iustice, iudgement and trueth. For might and power are contained vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the Prophets set him forth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heape vp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalme suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened vp, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceiue God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde. In Psa. 145. 3. Jeremie where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. He that glorieth, saith he, let him glory in this that he knoweth me to be the Lord that do mercy, iustice, and iudgement on the earth. Surly these three things are very necessary for vs to know: mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Iudgement, which is daily executed vpon euil doers, & more greuous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Iustice, whereby the faithfull are preserved & most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophecy saith thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou maiest glory in God. And yet here are not omitted either his trueth or his power, or his holines or goodnes. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is here required of his iustice, mercy and iudgement, vnles it did rest vpon his vn moueable trueth? And how should we beleue that he doth gouerne the earth with iustice and iudgement, but vnderstanding his power? And whence cometh his mercy but of his goodnes? If then al his waies be mercy, iudgement & iustice, in them must holines also needes be scene. And to none other end is directed y^e knowledge of God that is set fourth vnto vs in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth imprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the ende we may learne first to honour him with perfect innocency of life and vnfained obedience, and then to hang altogether vpon his goodnesse.

3 But here I meane to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the end to direct vs to y^e true God, doth expressly exclude and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath bin corrupted. True it is in deed that the name of one God was euery where knowen and renoumed. For euen they that worshipped a great number of Gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iustine the Martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the Monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth y^e this, that there is but one God, was engrauen in the heartes of al men. The same thing also doth Tertullian proue by the common phrase of speech. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawn or fallen to false forged deuises, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that euer they naturally vnderstoode of the being but one God, auailed no further but to make them inexcusable. For euen the wisest of them doe plainly shewe the wandering error of their mind, when they wish some god to assist them, and so in their prayers doe call vpon vncertaine gods. Moreouer in this that they imagined God to haue many natures although they thought somewhat lesse absurdely than the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerua and other: yet were they not free from the deceites of Satan, and as we haue already sayde els where, whatsoeuer wayes of escape the Philosophers haue suttely inuented, they cannot purge theselues of rebellion but that they al haue corrupted the truth of God. For this reason, Habucuc after he had condemned all idoles biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admitte him to be any other than such as he had disclosed himselfe by his word.

The xj. Chapter

That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, and that generally they forsake God, so many as do erect to themselues any images.

BVt as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and grosse wit of man vseth to speake after the common maner: so when it meaneth to make scuerally knowen the true God from the false gods, it chiefly compareth him with idoles: not that it doth allow these inuentions that are more suttelike and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlier to disclose the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madnesse in seeking God so long as they cleaue euery one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusive definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought al that maner of Godhead that men frame to themselves by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the onely conuenient witness of himselfe. In the meane time, sith this brutish grossenesse hath possessed the whole world, to couer visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselves Gods of timber, stone, gold, siluer, and other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to hold this principle, that with wicked falshod the glorie of God is corrupted so oft as any shape is fained to represent him. Therefore God in γ law, after he had once chalenged the glorie of his deitie to himself alone, meaning to teach vs what manner of worshipping him hee alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediately:

Thou shalt make thee no grauen image, nor any similitude, in which wordes he restraineth our liberty, that wee attempt not to represent him with anie visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the formes wherewith of long time before, superstition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the sunne, yea & so many stars as the foolish nations sawe in the skie, so many goddes they fained them. And scarce was there any liuing creature which was not among γ Egyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser than the rest, because they worshipped God in γ shape of a man. But God cōpareth not images one with an other, as though one were more & an other lesse meet to be vsed, but without any exception he reiecteth all images, pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to haue God neere vnto them.

2 This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which hee ioyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou heardest a voyce, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take heede to thy selfe, least peradventure thou be deceiued and make to thy selfe any likenesse. &c. We see how openly God setteth his voyce against all counterfait shapes, that we may know that they forsake God whosoeuer do couer to haue visible formes of him. Of the Prophetes onely Esay shalbe enough which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the maiestie of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish counterfaying, when he being without body is likened to bodily matter: being inuisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lumpe of timber, stone or gold. In like manner reasoneth Paul: For as-much as we are the generation of G O D, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone grauen by art and the inuention of man. Whereby it certainly appeareth, whatsoeuer images are erected or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simply displease him as certaine dishonours of his maiestie. And what maruel is it if the holic Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blind idolaters themselves to confesse this in earth? It is known how Seneca complained as it is to read in Augustin. They dedicate (saith he) the holy inmortall and inuiolable Gods in most vile & base stuffe, and put vpon them the shapes of men and beastes, and some of them with kinde of man & woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, and such they call Gods which if they should receiue breath & meete them, would be reckened monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is fond caullation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing pertained to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenienses when he confuted their error in counterfaiting a shape of God.

3 God in deede, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath giuen a presence of his godhead, so as hee was sayde to bee beholden face to face, but all these signes that euer he shewed did aptly serue for meanes to teach, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloud and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heavenly glory, yet did they as it were bridle and reftaine the mindes of men that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore not Moles himselfe, to whome God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but receiued this answer that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared vnder the likenesse of a doue, but sith he immediatly vanished away, who doth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment the faithfull are put in minde that they ought to belecue him to be an inuisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the reueiling that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselues a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercy seate wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the lawe, was so made as it might teache that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens mindes are carried beyond the selues with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their wings stretched abroad did coner it, the veile did hide it, & the place it selfe being set faire inward did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is very plaine that they be very mad that go about to defende y^e images of God and of S^aints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these litle images, but to shewe that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpose, that hyding the mercy seate with their wings they should not onely keepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it that the Prophetes described the Seraphins shewed them in vision, with their face vncouered: wherby they signifie, that so great is the brightnes of y^e glory of God y^e the Angels themselues are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly iudge, do acknowledge that the Cherubins of whome we now speake, pertained onely to the olde maner of introduction as it were of children vsed in the lawe. So to draw them now for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For y^e childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudimentes were appointed. And it is much shame, that the painime writers are better expounders of the lawe of God than the Papistes are . Iuuenal reprocheth the Iewes as it were in scorne that they honor the white cloudes and the deitie of heauen. I grant he speaketh peruerfly & wickedly : and yet he speaketh more truely in saying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papistes do which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hote hastinesse, brake out oftentimes to seeke them idoles, euen as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force : hereby rather let vs learne how great is y^e inclination of our nature to idolatry, lest throwing vpon the Iewes the blame of that fault which is common to al, we sleepe a deadly sleepe vnder vaine allurementes to sinne.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying : The idoles of the Gentiles are gold and siluer, euen the workes of mens handes . Because the Prophet doth gather of the stuffe it selfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or siluer image : and he taketh it for confessed trueth , that it is a foolish fained inuention whatsoeuer we conceiue of our owne sense concerning God . He nameth rather gold and siluer than clay or stone, that the beautie or y^e price should not serue to bring a reuerence to idols. But he concludeth generally that nothing is lesse allowable, than gods to be made of dead stuffe . And in the meane while he standeth as much vpon this point , that men are caried away with too mad a rashnes , which themselues bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, readie to vanishe away at euery momente , yet dare giue the honor of God to idoles . Man must needes confesse that himselfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he will haue a peece of metall to be counted God to which himselfe gaue the beginning to bee a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the wil of men? Very iustly doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt :

Horat. ferm.
1. sat. 8.

I was sometime a fig tree log, a blocke that serud for nought:

The workeman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:

A fourme to sit vpon, or els a Priap God so be.

As length he thought she better was a God to make of me.

Esa. 44. 15.

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in maner euery moment, by his workmanship shall conuey the name and honour of God to a dead stock. But forasmuch as Epicure in scoffingly iesting hath cared for no religion, let vs leaue the tauntes of him and such as he is , and let the rebuking of the Prophet pricke vs or rather thrust vs through where he saith, that they are too much beastly witted y^e with one selfe peece of woode do make a fire and warme themselues, doe heat the ouen to bake bread, doe rost or seeth flesh, & do make them a God before which they fal down humbly to pray. Therefore in an other place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they haue not learned of y^e foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse conuenient than to bring God to the measure of siue foote which is about all measure and incomprehensible. And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against y^e order of nature, custome sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreouer hold in mind , that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speech, that they are the workes of mens hand which want the authority of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men doe deuise of themselves are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are endued with understanding, that they should know that all thinges are moued with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to thinges dead and senselesse. But because the corruption of nature carieth as well all nations, as each man priuately to so great madnes, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond suttily of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not onely to be made by the grauer but also to be counterfayted by any other workeman, because such counterfaying is euill and to the dishonor of his maiestie.

5 I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregory so said, but the spirite of God pronouñceth far otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregory had bin taught, he woulde neuer so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremy plainly saith that the stocke is a doctrine of vanity: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a general doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoeuer men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophetes reprove them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papistes take for an assured principle, that images are in steede of bookes. For they doe in comparison set images against God as thinges directly contrary and such as neuer can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alledged. Sith there is but one true God whome the Iewes did worship, it is amisse and falsely done to forge visble shapcs to represent God, and men are miserably deceiued, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally if it were not true that it is a deceitful and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophetes would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I winne of them when we shew that it is vanity and lying that men doe attempt to represent God with images, we doe nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophetes haue taught.

6 Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius haue written of this matter which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall of whome images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without douting pronounceth that it is vnlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet saith he none other thing but the same which many yeares before was decreed by the Elibertine Councell, whereof this is the xxxvi. Chapter. It is ordeined that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honoured and worshipped be not painted on the walles. But most notable is that which in an other place Augustine alledgeth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both took away the feare of God, & brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peradventure it shoulde be but of small authority. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed that a heathen man groping in darkenesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmeet for the maiesty of God, because they diminish the feare of God and encrease error in men. The prooffe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truely than wisely spoken. But Augustine hauing borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it foorth as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, y^e the first errors wherwith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added encreased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore diminished or rather taken away therby, because his maiesty may easily in the foolishnesse and in the fond and absurd forging of images growe to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by prooffe finde to be so true. Whosoever therefore will couet to be rightly taught, let him else where learne than of images, what is meete to be knowne concerning God.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes haue any shame, let them no more vse this shift to say that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I grant them so much, yet should they not much get therby for defense of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is wel knowne. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot and vncleanesse, wherunto if any would fashion himselfe, he were worthy to be beaten with stauers? Surely y^e brothelhowes, can shew harlots more chastly and soberly attyred, than their temples shew images of these whome they would haue called virgins. Euen as vncomly array giue they to the Martyrs. Let the therfore fashion their idols at least to some honest shewe of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lye in saying, that they are the bookes of some holinesse. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not y^e right way to teach the faithful people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with far other doctrine than with these trifles. God commanded in the churches a cōmon doctrine to be set foorth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: whereunto they shew themselues to haue a mind not very heedfull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papistes call lay and vnlearned men whose vnskilfulness may beare to be taught onely by images? forsooth euen those whom y^e Lord knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom he vouchsafeth to reueile y^e heauenly wisdome, whome he willet to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdome. I graunt indeede as the matter standeth that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I pray you groweth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause that they which had the cure of churches gaue ouer their office of teaching to idols, but because themselues were dūmme. Paul testi-

fieth that Christ is in y^e true preaching of the gospel, painted out in a maner crucified before our eyes. To what purpose then were it to haue commonly set vp in churches so many crosses of wood, stone, siluer and gold, if this were wel & faithfully beatē into the peoples heads, that Christ died to bear our curse vpon the crosse, to cleanse our sinnes with the Sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his blood, and finally to reconcile vs to God the father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For perhaps the couetous do set their mindes and eyes faster vpon the golden & siluer crosses than vpon any wordes of God. Gal. 3. 1.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by cōmon consent thought to be true which is written in the booke of wisdome, that they were the first authors of them, which gaue this honor to the dead, superstitiously to worship their memorie. And truly I graunt that this euill custome was very ancient, & I deny not that it was the fierbrand wherwith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry, did more & more burne therein. Yet do I not graunt that this was the first originall of this mischiefe. For it appeareth by Moses that images were vsed before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, wherof the prophane writers make often mention, were come in vre. When he telleth that Rachell had stolen her fathers idols, he speaketh it as of a cōmon fault. Wherby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continuall worship of idols. After the generall floud, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many years, but that mē according to their owne lust faigned them gods. And it is likely, that the holy Patriarch yet liuing, his childrens children were giuen to idolatry, so that to his bitter grief he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible iudgemēt. For Thare, and Nachor euen before the birth of Abrahā were worshippers of false gods, as Iosue testifieth. Seing the generation of Sem so sone swarued, what shal we iudge of y^e posterity of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The mind of men, as it is full of pride & rash boldnes, presumeth to imagine God according to her owne conceit: & as it is possessed wth dulnes, yea ouerwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it conceiueth vanity & a fond iantafie in stede of God. And in these euils is added a new mischiefe, that man attēpreth to expresse in workmanship such a God as he inwardly conceiueth. Thus the mind begetteth the idole, & the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israclites proueth that this was y^e beginning of idolatry, that men do not beleue that God is among them vnlesse he shew himself carnally present. We know not (said they) what is become of this Moses: make vs gods y^e may goe before vs. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not beleue y^e he was nie vnto thē vnlesse they did see with their eyes a corporal representation of his face to be a witnes vnto them of the God that gouerned them. Their minde was therefore to know by y^e image going before them, that God was the guide of their journey. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfaite deuise like it selfe, wherein it may vainely delight as in an image of God. In a maner in al ages since the crecreation of the worlde, men to obey this blinde desire haue erected signes wherein they imagined God to be present before their carnall eyes.

9 After such inuention forged, by and by followeth worshipping. For when men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in them. At length being both with mindes and eyes altogether fastned theron, they began to waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and haue them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were perswaded in some grosse opinion: not to thinke the images to be gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godhead abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou fallest downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expresse a likenesse of him, but also any titles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to bee worshipped. And for the same reason also in the commandement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so sone as they haue forged a visible forme for God, they also tye the power of God vnto it. So beattly foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfaite him, and therefore must they needes worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idole, or God in y^e idole. This is alway idolatry, when honours due to God are giuē to an idole, vnder what colour so euer it be. And because God will not bee worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoever is giuen to idols is taken from him. Let them take heede hereunto that seeke for pretenses to defende the abominable idolatry, wherwith these many ages past, true religion hath bin drowned and ouerthrowne. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes themselues so vnaduised to forget that it was God by whose hand they had bin brought out of Ægypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron said, that those were the Gods by whome they were deliuered out of the land of Ægypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plaine token of their meaning, that they would still keepe that God y^e was their deliuerer, so that they might see him goe before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleueed that the heathen were so grosse as to belecue, that God was no other thing but stockes and stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but stil they kept the same Gods in their minde: and there were many images of one God, & yet they did not according to the multitude of images faigne them many Gods. Beside that they did dayly consecrate new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new Gods. Let the excuses be read which Augustine saith were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common sort answered, that they did not worship that visible thing, but the deity that did in it inuisibly dwel. And they that were of somewhat better religion, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worshippe the image nor the spirite in it, but by the corporall image they did beholde the signe of that thing which they ought to worship. How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the gentiles were none otherwise minded than as I haue saide: being not contented with a spirituall vnderstanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure and neerer imprinted in them. After once that such disordered counterfaiting of God well liked them, they neuer ended, till dayly more and more deluded with newe deceites they imagined that God did shewe foorth his power in images. And neuerthelesse, both the Iewes were perswaded that vnder such images they did worship the one true Lord of heauen and earth: and likewise the gentiles, their false gods, whome yet they faigned to dwell in heauen.

10 Whosoever deny that it hath thus bin done in time past, yea within our owne remembrance, they impudently lye. For, why fall they down before them? And when they pray, why turne they toward them as to the cares of God? For it is true that Augustine saith, that no man prayeth or worshippeth when he so beholdeth an image. but he is so affected in mind that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it will doe for him what he desireth. Why is there such difference betweene the images of one God, that passing by one image with little reuerence or none done to it, they honor an other solemnly? Why doe they weary themselues with vowed pilgrimages to visite those images wherof they haue like at home? Why doe they at this day in defense of them as it were for their religion & countrey, fight to slaughter and destruction, in such sort as they would better suffer to haue the one onely God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I doe not reckon vp the grosse errors of the common people, which are almost infinite, and doe in maner possesse the hearts of all men. I doe onely shewe what themselues doe confesse when they meane most of all to excuse themselues of idolatrie. We doe not call them (say they) our Gods. No more did the Iewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: and yet the Prophets ech where cease not to cast in the ir teeth their fornicatiō with stockes and stones, for doing no more but such thinges as are dayly done by them that would be counted Christians, that is to say, that they carnally worshipped God in stockes and stones.

In Psal. 113.

11 Although I am not ignorant, nor thinke good to passe it ouer as if I knewe it not, how they seeke to escape with a more suttle distinction, wherof I shall againe make mention more at large hereafter. For they pretende that the worship which they giue to images, is Idolodulia, which is seruice of images, & not Idololatria which is worship of Images. For so they terme it when they reach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God giue vnto images and pictures that worship which they call Doulia or seruice. And so they thinke themselues without blame if they be but the seruants and not also the worshippers of idoles: as though it were not a litle lighter matter to worship than to serue. And yet while they seeke a hole to hide them in the Greeke word, they childishly disagree with themselues. For seeing Latreuein in Greeke signifieth nothing but to worship, their saying cometh but to this effect, as if they would say that they worship in dede their images, but without any worshipping. And there is no cause why they should say that I seeke to catch them in wordes: but they themselues while they

they seeke to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, do bewray their owne ignorance. And yet though they be neuer so eloquent, they shall not attaine by their eloquence to proue vnto vs that one selfe same thing is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shewe me a difference in the thing it selfe whereby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer or a murderer cannot escape guiltinesse of his fault, by giuing his sinne a newe deuised name: so it is a very absurditie to thinke that these men be quit by new deuise of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ from those idolaters whome they themselues are compelled to condemne. But so farre are they from prouing that their case differeth from the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole mischiefe is an vnorderly counterfaiting, wherein they haue striued with them while both with their owne wit they deuise, & with their owne hands they frame them signifying formes to expresse them a fashion of God.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffered at all. But forasmuch as caruing and painting are the giftes of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vsed. Least these things which God hath giuen vs for his glorie & for our owne benefit, be not onely defiled by disordered abuse, but also turned to our owne destruction. We thinke it vnlawfull to haue God fashioned out in visible forme, because himselfe hath forbidden it, & because it cannot be done without some defacement of his glory. And least they thinke that it is only we that are in this opinion, they that haue bene trauelled in their workes shal finde that all sound writers did alway reprove the same thing. If then it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse shall it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that only those things be painted & grauen wherof our eyes are capable: but that the maiestie of God which is farre aboue the sense of our eyes, be not abused with yncomly deuised shapes. Of this sort are partly histories & things done, partly images & fashions of bodies, without expressing of any things done by them. The first of these haue some vse in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profit the second can bring saue only delectation, I see not. And yet it is euident, that euen such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stande vp in churches. Whereby we may iudge that they were there set vp not by discrete iudgement or choise, but by foolish and vnadvised desire. I speake not how much amisse & yncomely they were for the most parte fashioned, nor how licentious Painters & Caruers haue in this point shewed their wantonnesse, which thing I haue already touched. Only I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet do they nothing auaille to teach.

13 But leauing also that difference, let vs by the way consider whether it be expedient in Christian temples to haue any images at all, that do expresse either things done or the bodies of men. First if the authoritie of the ancient church do any thing moue vs, let vs remember that for about v. C. yeres together, while religion yet better flourished, & sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian churches were vniuersally without images. So they were then first brought in for the garnishment of churches, when the sinceritie of mi-

nistration was not a litle altered. I wil not now dispute what reason they had with them y were the first authors therof. But if a man cōpare age with age, he shal see that they were much swarued from that vprightnes of them that were without images. What do we thinke y those holy fathers would haue suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they iudged profitable & good for them? But rather because they saw either litle or no profit in it, & much danger to lurk vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose & aduisedly reiect it, than by ignorance or negligence omit it. Which thing Augustine doth also in expresse words testifie: When they be set in such places (saith he) honorably on hve, to be seene of them that pray & do Sacrifice, although they want both sense & life, yet with the very likenesse y they haue of liuely members & senses, they so moue the weake mindes, that they seem to liue & breath, &c. And in another place: For that shape of members doeth worke & in maner enforce thus much, that the mindē liuing within a bōdy doth thinke that body to haue sense, which he seeth like vnto his own. And a litle after: Images do more auaille to bow downē an vnhappy soule, by this that they haue mouth, eyes, eares, & fecte, than to amend it by this that they neither speake nor see nor heare nor go. This truely seemeth to be y cause why Iohn willed vs to beware not only of worshipping of images, but also of images themselues. And we haue found it too much in experience, y through the horrible madnesse which hath heretofore possessed the worlde, to the destruction in maner of all godlinesse, so soone as images be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatrie, because the folly of men cannot refraine it selfe, but it must forthwith runne on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much danger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vse temples are ordeined, me thinkes it is very ill besecming the holinesse thereof to receiue any other images than these liuely & naturall images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrate. I meane Baptisimē and the Lords supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to be occupied & more liuely to be moued, than that they should needē any other images framed by the wit of men. Loe this is the incomparable commoditie of images, which can by no value be recompensed, if we beleue the Papistes.

14 I thinke I had spoken enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce mee to speake more. I meane not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eyght hundred yeares agoe, by the commaundement and authority of Irene the empresse. For that Synode decreed, that images should not only be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoeuer I should say, the autoritie of the Synode would make a great preiudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much moue me, as make it appeare to the readers how farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images than became Christians. But first let vs dispatche this. They that at this day maintaine y vse of images, allege the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defense. But there is extant a booke of confutatiō bearing the name of Charles y Great, which by y phrase we may gather gather to haue bin written at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the Bishops that were present at that Council, and the arguments wherewith they contended. Iohn the Legate of the east partes said: God created man after his owne image: and thereupon gathered that we ought to haue images. The same man thought that images were commended vnto vs in this sentence: shewe me thy face because it is beautifull. An other to proue that images ought to be set vpon altars, cited this testimony: no man lighteth a candle and putteth it vnder a bushell. An other, to shewe that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought forth a verse out of the Psalmie: the light of thy countenance is sealed vpon vs. An other tooke this similitude: As the Patriarches vsed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles, so must Christian men haue the images of Saintes in steade of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose haue they writted this saying: Lord, I haue loued the beauty of thy house. But specially witty is the exposition of this place, As we haue heard so haue we seene, that God is not knowne by onely hearing of his worde, but also by looking vpon images. Like is the sharpe deuise of Bishop Theodore. Marueilous (saith he) is God in his Saintes. And in another place: In the Saintes that are in the earth: therefore this ought to be referred to images. Finally so filthy are their vnfauorie follies that it greueth me to rehearse them.

In ps. 113.

1. Joh. 5. 21.

15 When they talke of the worshipping: then are brought forth the worshipping of Pharao, and of the rod of Ioseph, and of the pillar that Iacob set vp. Albeit in this last example, they doe not onely depraue the meaning of the Scripture, but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seeme to them marueilous strong and meete proues. Worship his foote stole. Againe, worship on his holy hill. Againe, all the rich men of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scorne put the personage of a riding foole vpon the patrones of Images, coulde he gather together greater and grosser follies? But to put all out of doute, Theodosius Bishop of Mira, doth so earnestly confirme by the dreames of his Archdeacon, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heauen to shew for it. Now let the faouers of images goe and presse vs with the decree of that Synode. As though those reuerend fathers doe not altogether discredit themselues, in either so childishly hādling, or so vngodly and fowly tearing the Scriptures.

16 Now come I to those monstrous impieties, which it is maruell that euer they durst vomit, and twise marueilous that they were not cried out against with hie detestation of all men. And it is good that this outragiously wicked madnesse be bewrayed, that at least the false colour of antiquity may be takē away, which y papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Amorū pronounceth curse against al them that wil not haue images worshipped. An other imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the East part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophetes, the Apostles and Martyrs worthy to suffer in whose time there were no images? They adde further: If the Emperours image be met with perfume and censing: much more is this honor due to the the images of Saints. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Ciprus, professeth that he reuerently embraceth images, and affirmeth that he will giue to the same honorable maner of worship that is due to the Trinity that giueth life. And who soeuer refuseth so to doe, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And, that ye should not thinke that this was the priuate sentence of one man, they did all assent vnto it. Yea Iohn the Legate of the east parts being further caried with heat, said it were better to bring all brothelhouses into the city than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all Heretikes are the Samaritans, and worse than the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemne farewell, this clause was added, let them be glad and reioyce that hauing the image of Christ doe offer Sacrifice vnto it. Where is now the distinction of Latria and Dulia, wherewith they are wont to seeke to blinde the eyes both of God and men? For the councill without any exception doth giue euen as much vnto images as vnto the liuing God himselfe.

The xij. Chapter.

That God is seuerally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

WE sayde in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched howe he is rightly worshipped, which point shalbe in other places more largely to be set forth. Nowe I doe but shortly repeate, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one GOD, it striueth not for the bare name of GOD, but withall commaundeth this, that whatsoeuer belongeth to the Godhead, be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doeth differ from superstition. Eusebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway euen the blinde themselues groping in darkenesse haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God bee not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly and well deriueth from religere, to recorde, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre set, that good worshippers did often record and diligently wey what was the truth. I rather thinke that that name is set as a contrary to wandering liberty, because the greater part of the worlde vnadvisedly taketh hold of that which they first meete withall, and flieth about hither and thither: but true godlinesse, to the ende it may stand in stedfast state, Relegit, that is to say doth gather vp it selfe together within her bonds. Like as I thinke superstition to haue her name hereof, that not being contented, with the maner & order prescribed, she heapeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine things. But to leaue the words it hath alway bin agreed by the consent of all ages, that religion is with false errors corrupted and peruered. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious doe pretend, when with vndiscrete zeale we giue our selues leaue to doe all thinges. And although this confession found in the

mouthes of all men: yet herein a shameful ignorance bewrayeth it selfe, that neither they cleaue to the one God, nor haue any regarde of order in the worshipping of him, as we haue already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is ielous, and that he will be a seuerer reuenger if he be mingled with any fained God. And then he setteth foorth the lawfull maner of worshipping, to hold mankinde in obedience. He conteineth both these points in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he only may be their lawmaker: and then he prescribeth a rule wherby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses & endes therof are many, I will entreat in place fit for it. Now I only touch this point, that thereby men are bridlede that they run not out of the way to wrong worshippings. Now as I first said, we must hold in mind, that if all y^e euer properly belongeth to godhead doe not rest in God alone, he is spoiled of his honour, & his worship broken. And there must we somewhat heedfully marke with what subtleties superstition deceiueth. For it doth not so reuolte vnto strange gods that it seemeth to forsake the highest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but while she graunteth vnto him the highest place, she setteth round about him a number of lesser gods, among whom she diuideth his offices. And so (albeit clokedly & craftely) y^e glory of the godhead is cut in parts, that it remaineth not whole in him. So in the olde time, as wel they of the Iewes as of the Gētiles did set beneath the father and iudge of gods a great route of gods which should euery one according to his degree in common haue with the highest God the gouernment of the heauen and earth. So the Saints that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduanced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vpon, and honored in stead of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the maiesty of God is not so much as diuided, when in deede it is a great part suppressed and extinguished, sauing that we retaine stil a poore opinion of his supreme power: and in the meane time deceiued with entangled subtleties, we are sunderly caried to diuers gods.

2 For this purpose also was inuented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worship and seruice, whereby they might freely seeme to giue away the honours of God to Angels and dead men. For it is euident, that the worship which the Papistes giue vnto Saintes differeth nothing indeede from the worship of God. For all alike without diuersity they worship both God and them: sauing that when they be charged with it, they winde away with this exception, that they keepe still for God the honour that is due vnto him inuiolate, because they leaue vnto him the worship that they call Latria. But sith the question standeth vpon the matter, and not the word, who would permit them so carelesly to mocke in a matter of all matters most weighty? But to let that also passe, yet winne they nothing by this distinction, but to proue, that they giue worship to one God and seruice to another. For Latria in Greeke signifieth as much as in Latine Cultus, and in Englishe worship. Dulia, properly signifieth seruice. And yet sometime in Scripture this difference is confounded together without diuersitie. But graunt it be a perpetuall difference, then muste we search

what both the wordes may meane. Dulia is seruice, Latria is worship. Now no man douteth that to serue, is more then to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare to serue him whome he would not stick to worship. So is it an vnegall dealing to giue to the saints that which is the greater, & to leaue to God that which is the lesser. But many of the auncient authors haue vsed this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men do perceiue: it to be not onely vnfit, but altogether very fond?

3 Now leauing nice fittleties, let vs wey the matter it selfe. When Paul putteth the Galathians in remembrance what they were before that they were lighened in the knowledge of God, he saith that they gaue Duliam seruice to those that of nature were no gods. Although he name not Latriam or worship, is therefore their superstition excusable? He doth neuertheless condemne their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia seruice, than if he had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And when Christ repulseth the assault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is written, thou shalt worship \bar{y} Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Sathan required but an adoration. Likewise when the Angel reproved Iohn, because he fell downe on his knees before him, wee ought not to thinke that Iohn was so madde that he would giue vnto the Angell the honor that was due onely to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is ioyned with religion sauoureth somewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the Angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glory of God. We read in deede often, that men haue bene honoured: but that was a ciuil honor, as I may so call it. But religion hath an other rule, which so soone as it is ioyned with wotship, bringeth with it a prophane abuse of the honor of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so sclenderly profited in godlinesse; but that he had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning to worship him in \bar{y} steede of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to doe that which he did. And why so? but because men do neuer so narrowly put difference betwene the worship of God and of his creatures: but that without diuersitie they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we must remember that nothing be it neuer so little must be taken away from his glorie, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zachary when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine words expresseth: That there shal not only be one God, but also \bar{y} there shalbe one name of that God, to the end that he haue nothing in common with Idols. What maner of worship God requireth, we shal see in another place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his law to prescribe vnto men what is lawful & right, & so to binde them to a certaine rule, that euery man should not giue himself leaue to deuise what form of worship he list. But because: it is not expedient to load the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touche that point yet. Onely let it suffice for this time to keepe in minde, that euery carying away of the dutifull behauiours of Godlinesse to any other than to God alone, is not without robbery.

of God. And first superstition deuised to giue diuine honours to the Sunne, or other starres or idoles: then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoiles taken from God, presumed to prophane all that cuer was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honour the soueraigne deitie, yet grewe it in vse indifferently to offer sacrifices to spirites, lesser gods, or dead men of honour. So slippery is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number y^e which God seuerely chalengeth to himselfe alone.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence consisteth in it three persons.

THAT which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spirituall essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to ouerthrowe the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine subtelties of prophane Philosophie. One of the olde writers seemed to haue saide very well, That God is all that we doe see, and all that we doe not see. But by this meane he hath imagined the godheade to be powred into all the partes of the worlde. Although God, to the intent to keepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparsely of his owne essence, yet by those two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away al grosse imaginations, and also repressie the presumptuous boldnes of mans minde. For surely his immeasurable greatnesse ought to make vs afraide, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: & his spirituall nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he filleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our mindes by reason of their dulnes to lye still in the earth, for good cause he listeth vs vp about the world, to shake off our slouth and sluggishnesse. And here fallerth to ground the error of the Manichees, which in appoynting two originall beginnings haue made the diuell in a maner egall with God. Surely this was as much as to breake the vnity of God and restraine his vnmearurableness. For where they haue presumed to abuse certain testimonies: that sheweth a fowle ignorance, as their error it selfe sheweth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphites are also easily confuted which haue imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth vnto him a mouth, eares, eyes, hands, and feete. For what man yea though he be scenderly witted doeth not vnderstand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses doe with their babes? Therefore such maners of speech doe not so plainly expresse what God is, as they doe apply the vnderstanding of him to our scender capacity. Which to doe, it behooued of necessitie that hee descended a great way beneath his owne height.

2 But he also setteth out himselfe by an other speciall marke wherby he may be more neerely knowne. For he so declarerth himselfe to be but one, that he yet giueth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except we learne, a bare and empty name of God without any true God siteth in our braine. And y^e no man should thinke that he is a threefold God, or that the one essence of God is diuided in three persons, we must here seeke a short and easie definition to deliuer vs from al errour. But because many doe make much a doe about this word Person, as a thing inuented by man: how iustly they doe so, it is best first to see. The Apostle naming the sonne the engraued forme of the Hypostasis of his father, he vndoubtedly meaneth, that the Father hath some being, wherein he differeth from the sonne. For to take it for essence (as some expositours haue done, as if Christ like a peece of waxe printed with a seale did represent the substance of the father) were not onely hard but also an absurdity. For sith the Essence of God is single or one and vndiuisible, he that in himselfe conteineth it all and not by peece-meale, or by deriuation, but in whole perfection, should very vnproperly yea fondly be called the engraued forme of him. But because the father although he be in his owne property distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholly in his sonne, it is for good cause said, that he hath giuen his Hypostasis, to be seene in him. Wherewith aptly agreeeth that which by and by followeth, that he is y^e brightnes of his glory. Surely by the Apostles words we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the father, that shineth in the sonne: whereby also againe is easly perceiued the Hypostasis of the sonne that distinguisheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy ghost. For we shall by and by proue him to be God, and yet he must needes be other than the father. Yet this distinction is not of the essence, which it is vnlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apostles testimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypostases. This terme seeing the Latines haue expressed with the name of Person, it were too much pride & waywardnes to braule about so clear a matter. But if we list word for word to translate, we may call it Subsistence. Many in the same sense haue called it substance. And the name of Person hath not bin in vse among the Latines onely: but also the Grecians, perhaps to declare a consent, haue taught that there are three Prosopa, that is to say Persōs in God. But they, whether they be Greekes or Latines that differ one from an other in the word, doe very well agree in the summe of the matter.

3 Now howsoeuer the heretikes barke at the name of person, or some ouermuch precise men doe carpe that they like not the word fained by deuise of men: sith they cannot get of vs to say, that there be three, whereof euery one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many gods: what vnreasonableness is this, to mislike words, which expresse none other thing but that which is testified & approued by the Scriptures? It were better (say they) to reſtraine not onely our meanings but also our words within the boundes of Scripture, than to deuise strange names that may be the beginnings of disagreement and brawling: so doe wee tyer our selues with strife about wordes: so the truth is lost in contending: so charity is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a strange worde, which cannot be shewed in Scripture, as it is written in number of sillables: then they binde vs to a hard law, wherby is condemned all exposition that is not peeced together, with bare laying together of textes of Scripture. But if they meane that to be strange, which being curiously deuised, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaptly, or to no profite vsed, which withdraweth from the simplicitie of the worde of God, then with all my heart I embrace their sober minde. For I iudge that wee ought with no lesse deuout reuerence to talke of God than to thinke of him, for as much as whatsoeuer we do of our selues thinke of him, is foolish, and whatsoeuer we speake is vsfauourie. But there is a certeine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke & speake, whereby to examine all the thoughts of our minde and wordes of our mouth. But what withstādeth vs, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacitie doubtful and entangled, we may in plainer wordes expresse them, being yet such wordes as do reuerently & faithfully serue the trueth of the Scripture, & be vsed sparsely, modestly, & not without occasion? Of which sort there are examples enow. And where as it shal by prooffe appeare y^e the Church of great necessitie was enforced to vse the names of Trinitie, & Persons, if any shall then finde fault with the newnesse of wordes, shall he not be iustly thought to be grieued at the light of the trueth, as he that blameth only this that the trueth is made so plaine and cleare to discernē?

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vse, when the trueth is to be defended against wranglers that do mocke it out with cauillations. Which thing we haue at this day too much in experience, who haue great businesse in vanquishing the enemies of true & sound doctrine. With such folding & crooked winding these slipperie snakes doe slide away, ynlesse they be strongly griped & holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meanings in exquisite plainnesse, least they should leaue any crooked bywayes to the wicked, to whome the doubtful constructions of wordes were hiding holes of errors. Arius confessed Christ to be God, & the sonne of God, because he could not againsay the euident wordes of God, and as if he had beene so sufficiently discharged did faine a certeine consent with the rest. But in the meane while he ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was create, & had a beginning as other creatures. But to the end they might draw forth his winding subtletie out of his denne, the ancient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternall sonne of the father & consubstantiall with the father. Hereat wickednes began to boile, when the Arrians began to hate & detest the name Omoousson, consubstantiall. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now haue denied him to be consubstantiall with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as brawlers and contentious, because for one litle wordes sake, they were so whote in disputation, and troubled the quiet of the Church? But that litle worde shewed the difference betweene the true beleeuing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accompted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, y^e Sonne, & the Holy ghoist, saying in disputation y^e they were not made to shewe any maner of distinction, but onely were several additions of God, of which sort there are many. If he came to disputation, he confessed, that he beleueed the father God, the Sonne God, the Holy ghost God. But afterward he would readily slip away with saying that he had in no otherwise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, iust God, & wise God: and so he song another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the Holy ghost is the father, without any order, without any distinction. The good doctours which then had care of godlines, to subdue his wickednes, cried out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three properties. And to the end to sense themselues against the croked writthen subtleties with plaine & simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truly subsist in one God, or (which came al to one effect) that there did subsist in the vnity of God a Trinity of persons.

5 If then the names haue not bin without cause inuented, we ought to take heede, that in reiecting them wee bee not iustly blamed of proude presumptuousnes. I would to God they were buried indeede, so that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father and the Sonne, and the Holy ghost bee one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the Holy ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine property. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my heart to striue for bare wordes. For I note, that the olde fathers, which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not euerywhere agree one with an other, nor euery one with himselfe. For what formes of speech vsed by the counsels doth Hilary excuse? To how great liberty doth Augustine somtime breake foorth? How vnlike are the Greekes to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. When the Latins ment to expresse the word Omoouision, they called it Consubstanti- all, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so vsing the word substance for essence. Wherupon Hierome to Damascus saith, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substāces in God: & yet aboute a hūdred times you shal find in Hilary, y there are three substāces in God. In the word Hypostasis, how is Hierome accombred? For he suspecteth that there lurketh poyson in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man doe vse this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that is an improper speech, if he spake vnfaignedly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seeke to charge the Bishops of the Eastlandes, whom he sought to charge with an vniust sclander. Sure this one thing he speaketh not very truely, that in all prophane schooles, ouisia, essence is nothing else by hypostasis, which is proued false by the common and accustomed vse. Augustine is more modest and gentle, which although he say, that the word hypostasis in that sense is strange to latine eares, yet so far is it of that he taketh from the Greekes their vsuall manner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Greeke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the sixt booke of the Tripartite history, tendeth to this end, as though he ment that he had by vnskilful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hillary himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretikes charge, that by their waiwardnes he is compelled, to put those things in peril of the speech of mē, which ought to haue bin kept in the religiousnes of minds plainly cō-

fessing that this is to doe things vnlawfull, to speake that ought not to bee spoken, to attempt things not licenced. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many wordes, for that he was so bold to vtter new names. For after he had vsed the naturall names Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, he addeth that whatsoeuer is sought further, is beyond the compasse of speach, beyond the reach of sense, and beyond the capacitie of vnderstanding. And in another place he saith, that happy are the Bishops of Gallia, which neither had nor receiued nor knew any other confession, but that olde and simple one, which frō the time of the Apostles was receiued in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this word was wrong out of necessitie by reason of the imperfection of mens language in so great a matter: not to expresse that which is, but that it should not be vnspoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost are three. This modestie of the holy men ought to warne vs, that we doe not forthwith so seuerely like Censors, note them with infamy that refuse to subscribe & sweare to such words as we propound them: so that they doe it not of pride, of frowardnes, or of malicious craft. But let them againe cōsider, by how great necessity we are driuen to speake so, that by little and little they may be enured with that profitable maner of speach. Let the also learne to beware, lest sith we must meete on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut off occasion from them both to cauill, they bring themselues in suspition, that they be the disciples either of Arrius or of Sabellius. Arrius saith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was create, and had a beginning. He saith Christ is one with the Father, but secretly he whispereth in the eares of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithful be, although by singular prerogatiue. Say once that Christ is Consubstantial with his father, then pluck you of his visour from the dissembler, & yet you adde nothing to the Scripture. Sabellius saith, that the seueral names, Father, Son, and Holy ghost signifie nothing in God seuerally distinct: say that they are three: & he will cry out y^e you name three gods. Say y^e there is in one essence a Trinity of persons, then shall you in one word both say, what the Scripture speaketh, and stop their vaine babbling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstition, that they cannot abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would neuer so faine, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must vnderstand an vnity of substance: when we heare of three in one essence, that it is ment of the persons of the trinitie. Which thing being without fraude confessed, we stay no longer vpon wordes. But I haue long ago found, and that often, that whosoever doe obstinately quarell about words, doe keepe within them a secret poyson: so that it is better willingly to prouoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkely.

6 But leauing disputation of wordes, I will now begin to speake of the matter it selfe. I call therefore a Person, a subsistence in the essence of God, which hauing relation to the other is distinguished from them with vncommunicable property. By the name of the Subsistence we mean another thing than the essence. For if y^e word had simply bin God, & in the mean time had nothing seuerally proper to it selfe, Iohn had said amisse y^e it was with God.

Where-

Where he forthwith addeth, that God himselfe was the same worde, he calleth vs backe againe to the one single essence. But because it could not bee with God, but that it must rest in the father: hereof ariseth that subsistence, which though it be ioyned to the essence with an vnseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall marke, whereby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistences, I say that each hauing relation to other is in proprietie distinguished. Relation is here expressly mentioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mention made of God, this name belongeth no lesse to the Sonne and the Holy Ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the seueral property of either doth discern him from the other. Thirdly, whatsoever is proper vnto euery of them is vncommunicable. For that which is giuen to the Father for a marke of difference, can not agree with, nor be giuen to the Sonne. And I mislike not the definition of Tertulian, so that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine disposition or distribution, which yet chaungeth nothing of the vnitie of the essence.

Lib. contra Praxcam.

7 But before that I goe any further, it is good that I proue the Godhead of the Sonne and of the holy ghost. Then after we shall see, how they differ one from an other. Surely when the worde of God is spoken of in the Scripture: it were a very great absurditie to imagine it onely a fading and vanishing voyce, which sent into the aire, cometh out of God himselfe, of which sort were the oracles giuen to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the worde is ment to be the perpetuall wisdome abiding with the Father, from whence all the oracles and prophecies proceeded. For as Peter testifieth, no lesse did the old prophets speake with the spirit of Christ, than did the Apostles and al they that after them did distribute the heauenly doctrine. But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must vnderstand that the Word was before all worldes begotten of the Father. And if the Spirit was of the word, whose instrumentes were the prophets, we doe vndoubtedly gather that he was true God. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the worlde, when he setteth the worde as the meane. For why doth he expressly tell, that God in creating of all his works sayd, Be this done: or that done: but that the vnsercheable glorie of God may shiningly appeare in his images? The suttlenosed and babbling men do easily mocke out this, with saying that the name Worde, is there taken for his bidding or commaundement. But better expositors are the apostles, which teach that the worldes were made by the same, and that he susteineth them all with his mightie Worde. For here we see that the Worde is taken for the bidding or commaundement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eternall and essentiall Word to the Father. And to the wise and sober it is not darke that Salomon saith, where he bringeth in Wisdome begotten of God before all worldes, and bearing rule in the creation of thinges, and in all the workes of God. For to say that it was a certaine commaundement of God, seruing but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: where as in deede it was Gods pleasure at that time to shewe forth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secreete. To which intente also maketh that saying of Christ: My Father and I do worke euen to this daie. For in saying,

Iohn. 5. 17.

Iohn. 1. 3.

That from the beginning of the worlde he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses had more shortly touched. We gather then y^e the meaning of Gods speaking was this, that the Word had his office in the doing of things, & so they both had a common working together. But most plainly of all doeth Iohn speake, when he sheweth that the same Worde, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all thinges. For hee both giueth to the Worde a perfecte and abiding essence, and also assigneth vnto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainly sheweth howe God in speaking was the creator of the worlde. Therefore as all reuelations proceeding from God doe wel beare the name of the word of God, so ought we yet to set in the hyest place that substantiall Worde, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subiecte to no alteration, abideth alwayes one & the selfe same with God, and is God himselfe.

Gen. 1. 3.

Ioh. 17. 5.

8 Here manie dogges doe barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, doe secretly steale from him his Eternitie. For they say, that the Worde then beganne first to be, when God in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But verie vndiscreetly do they to imagine a certaine innouation of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relation to his outwarde worke, began to be giuen vnto him after the being of his worke, as for example, this that hee is called the creator of heauen and earth: so doeth Godlinesse knowe or admit no name that shoulde signifie any newe thing in himselfe to haue chanced vnto God. For if any shoulde come to him from else where than in him selfe, the this saying of Iames shoulde faile, y^e euery good giuing and euery perfect giste is from aboue, and commeth downe from the Father of lightes, with whome is no variableness neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is lesse to be suffred, than to faine a beginning of that Word, which both alwaies was God, and afterwarde was creator of the worlde. But full futelely forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shewe that there was no Worde in him before. Which is a most tryfling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had neuer any being before. But I conclude farre otherwise and say: seeing that in the same moment that God saide, let light be made, the power of the word appeared and shewed it selfe: the same Worde was long before: but if a mā aske howe long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when himselfe saide: Father, glorifie mee with the glorie which I had with thee before the worlde was. And this thing Iohn also lette not vntouched, because hee first sheweth that in the beginning the worde was with God, before that hee commeth to the creation of the worlde. Wee say therefore againe, that the Worde which was conceived of G O D before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Whereby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.

9 Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but do defer it it to that place where we shall specially entreate of the Redemption : yet because it ought to be certainly holden without controuersie among all men, that Christ is the same Word clad with flesh, in this place will be very fit to recite all those testimonies that proue Christ to be God . When it is said in the xlv. Psalme ; thy throne O God is for euer and euer. the Iewes do cauill and say, that the name Elohim is also applyed to the Angels and soveraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternall throne to any creature . For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternall Lorde. Againe, this title is giuen to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shalbe for a God to Pharao. Some read it in the Genitiue case which is very foolish . I graunt in deede that oftentimes a thing is called Diuine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were harde and forced, and will not agree . But if their stubbornesse will not so yelde: In Esaie is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the ^{so}ueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (sayeth he) is the name whereby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the Iewes barke againe, and turne the text thus : this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the worlde to come shall call him : so that they leaue this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace . But to what purpose should so many names of addition in this place bee heaped vpon God the Father, seeing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorn Christ with such speciall notes as may builde our Faith vpon him ? Wherefore it is out of dout that he is here in like sort called the strong God, as he is a litle before called Immanuel . But nothing can be founde plainer than that place of Hieremie where he sayth, that this shall be the name whereby the seede of Dauid shall be called Iehouah our righteousnesse . For where the Iewes themselues do teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addition, and that this onely name Iehouah which they call vn-speakable is a substantiue name to expresse his essence: wee gather that the Son is the onely and eternall God, which saith in an other place that he wil not giue his glorie to an other . But here also they seecke to scape away because that Moses gaue that name to the Altar that hee builded, & Ezechiel gaue it to the newe citie Hierusalem . But who doth not see that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the auancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but onely to testifie the presence of God? For thus sayth the Prophete: The name of the citie from that day shalbe Iehouah there. And Moses saith thus: He builded an altar and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltation . But more businesse ariseth by an other place of Hieremie, where the same title is applyed to Hierusalem in these wordes : this is the name whereby they shall call her Iehouah our righteousnesse . But this testimonie is so faire from making against the trueth which wee defende, that it rather confirmeth it . For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Iehouah from whom floweth righteousnesse, nowe hee pronounceth that the Church shall so

10 Now if this do not satisfie the Iewes, that Iehouah is so oft presented in the person of an Angell, I see not with what cauillations they can mocke it out. It is sayed that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell chalengeth to him selfe the name of the eternal God. If any take exception and say, that this is spoken in respect of the Person that hee representeth: this knot is not thus losed. For being a seruant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate breade, commaundeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then he proueth that himselfe in deede was the same Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not only an Angell but God. And thence came it that he sayd: we shall die because we haue seene God. And when his wife aunswereth, if Iehouah would haue slayned ^{the} hee would not haue receiued Sacrifice at our handes: in this she doth confesse that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the aunswere of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why doest thou aske me of my name, which is maruellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Seruetto, when hee affirmed that God neuer appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctors of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the word of God, which then as aforehande began to execute the office of Mediatour. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time hee retained that which was his owne, to be the God of vspeakeable glory. The same thing meaneth Oseas, which after he had recited the wrastling of Iacob with the Angell, saith: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthy of memorie is his name. Here againe Seruetto carpeth, y^e God did beare y^e person of an Angel. As though the Prophet did not cōfirme y^e which Moses had said: why doest thou aske me of my name? And the confession of the holy Patriarche doth sufficiently declare y^e he was not a created Angel, but one in whome the ful godhead was resident, when he said: I haue seen God face to face. And for this cause Paul saith, that Christe was guide of the people in the wilderness. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall worde shewed a figure of that office to which hee was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be weyed without contention, the Angel that sent an other Angell was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omitte innumerable testimonies on y^e which our Faith safely resteth, although they doe not much moue the Iewes. For when it is saide in Esaie: Behold, this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shall waite vpon him, and he shall saue vs, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is ment God which raiseth vp for the salua-

tion of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twice repeated suffer it to be drawn no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie where he promiseth that hee shall come the Lorde that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the onely soveraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the same God that was euer honored among the Iewes.

II As for the new Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauaile rather shortly to choose out fewe, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediator in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth shall aptly serue to proue his godhead. First this is worthy to be singularly marked, y^e those thinges which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles doe shew y^e they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esaie prophecieth that the Lorde of hostes shalbe to the Iewes and Israelites a stumbling stone and a rocke to fall vpon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in an other place, We must all (saith he) once be brought to appeare before the iudgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shal all tongues sweare. Seeing God in Esaie speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deede performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe same God whose glory may not be withdrawn to an other. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeth out of the Psalmes, is eident that it can be applied to none but to God alone. Ascending on hie he hath caried captiuitie captiue, meaning y^e such ascending was in shadow shewed, whē God in notable victory against forein nations did shew forth his power, but he declareth that in Christe it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was reueiled to Esay by a vision, whereas in deed y^e Prophet himselfe writeth that the maiestie of God appeared vnto him. And it is eident that those thinges which the Apostle writing to the Hebrues applieth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didest laie the foundations of heauen and earth. &c. Againe, worship him al ye his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when hee draweth them to Christ. For all those thinges that are spoken of in those Psalmes, hee himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercy on Sion. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations & ilandes. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the maiestie of God to Christ which in his preface had sayd that the worde was alway God? Why should Paul feare to set Christ in the iudgement throne of God, hauing before with so open proclamation declared his Godheade, where he sayed that he was God blessed to the ende of worldes? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be prayesd to the ende of worldes, then he is the same to whom in an other place hee affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainly cryeth out, that he woulde haue counted it no robberie if he had shewed himselfe egall with God, but that he willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked shoulde not carpe that hee is some made God, Iohn goeth further and saith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought abundantly to satisfie vs, that he is called God, specially of that witnesse which expressly affirmeth vnto vs that there are no more Gods but one. That same witnesse is Paul, which saith thus: Howe manie soeuer be called gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whome are all things. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne bloode purchased the Church to himselfe: why shoulde we imagine a seconde God which he himselfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lorde and his God, doth professe that he is that onely one God whome hee had alwayes worshipped.

12 Nowe if wee esteeme his Godhead by the workes that in the Scripture are ascribed vnto him, it shall therby more evidently appeare. For whē he saide that from the beginning hee was thither to working with his Father: the Iewes which were most dull in vnderstanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceiued that hee tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore, as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not onely breake the Sabbath, but also did call God his father, making himselfe egall with God. Howe dull shall wee be then, if wee doe not perceiue that his Godheade is herein plainly affirmed? And truely to order the worlde with prouidence and power, & to gouerne all things with the authoritie of his owne might, which y^e Apostle ascribeth vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteneth the gouernement of the worlde with his Father, but also all other offices which can not be made common to God with his creatures. The Lorde crieth out, by the Prophete: I am hee, I am he, that doe awaye thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence when the Iewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgiue sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in wordes but also proued by miracle that this power belonged vnto himselfe. Wee see therefore that hee hath, not the ministracion, but the power of forgiuencesse of sinnes, which the Lord saith hee will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shal we say of searching, & pearcing the secreete thoughts of harts? is it not the propertie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

13 Now, in his miracles howe plainly and clearly doth he appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophetes as the Apostles did egall & like miracles to these that hee did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministracion disposed the gifts of God, hee shewed forth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the ende to giue glorie vnto his Father. But we see for the most part his owne power shewed vnto vs. And how could it otherwise be but y^e he was y^e verie author of miracles that by his owne authoritie gaue power to other to deale miracles abroad? For y^e E. uangelist declarcth that he gaue power to the Apostles to raise vp y^e dead, to heale heale the leprous, to cast out deuils. &c. And they so vsed the ministracion thereof that they sufficiently shewed y^e this power came not from els where but from Christ. In the name of Iesus Christ (sayeth Peter) rise and walke. It is therefore no maruell if Christ alleged his miracles to confound the vnbelleuungnesse of the Iewes: forasmuch as they were such as being done by his owne power did giue a most plaine testimonie of his godhead. If else where then in God there is no saluation, no righteousnesse, no life: & Christ conteineth all these things in him, surely he is thereby declared to be God. And no man can obiekt against me and say, that life and saluation is powred into him by God: for it is not saied that he receiued saluation, but that he is saluation himselfe. And if none be good but only God: how can he be onely man, being I will not say good and iust, but selfe goodnes and iustice? Yea from the first beginning of the creation as the Euangeliste witnesseth, in him was life: and he euen then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being supported with such proues we are bolde to repose our faith and hope in him: when yet we know that it is an vngodlinesse that robbeth God for any man to fasten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God? sayth he. Beleeue then also in me. And so doth Paul expound those two places of Esay, Whosoever trusteth in him, thal not be put to shame. Againe, Out of the roote of Isay shall he come that shall rise to rule peoples, in him the nations shall trust. And why should we seeke out more testimonies of Scripture for this matter, when we so often meete with this sentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternal life. Moreouer the inuocation which hangeth vpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the maiestie of God if he haue any thing at all proper to himselfe. For one Prophet sayth: Whosoever calleth vpon the name of Iehouah shalbe saued: and another sayth: a most strong toure is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous shall flee and hee shalbe saued, but the name of Christ is called vpon for saluation: it followeth therefore that he is Iehouah. As for inuocation, we haue an example of it in Stephen, when he sayeth, Lorde Iesu receiue my spirite. Againe in the whole Church, as Ananias testifieth in the same booke. Lord (saith he) thou knowest how great euils this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly vnderstanded that the whole fulnesse of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doeth confesse that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthyans but the knowledge of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and howe great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs whome he willet to glory in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare say that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Beside that, the salutations set before the Epistles of Paul, wish the same benefites from the Sonne which they do from the Father, whereby we are taught not only that those things which the Father giueth vs do come vnto vs by his intercession, but also by communitie of power, he is the authour of them. Which knowledge by practise is without dout more certaine and perfect than any idle speculation. For there the godly minde doth beholde God most present, and in

14 Wherefore out of the same fountaines we must fetch our meane of prouing to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghost. Verie plaine is the testimonie of Moses in the historie of the creation, that the spirite of God was vpon the depthes, or vpon the vnfashioned heap: because he sheweth that not only the beautie of the world that is now to be seene is preserued by the power of the Spirite, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirite was then busied in preseruing that confused lump of things. And that saying of Esai cannot be cauilled against, And now Iehouah and his Spirite hath sent me. For he communicateth with the Holy ghost his chiefe power in sending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the diuine maiestie of the Holy ghost. But our best prooffe, as I haue said, shalbe by familiar vs. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the proprietie of creatures, and such a thing as we our selues doe learne by assured experience of godlinesse. For he it is y being eche where poured abroade, doth sustaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heauen and in earth. And by this point he is proued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his liuely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the verie worke of God. Moreouer, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any present quickening: what shall we iudge of him from whose power the same proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, so vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For he searcheth the deepe secretes of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsell. He giueth wisdome and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lorde pronounceth to Moses that it is onely his worke to do it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that we may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our iustification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, trueth, grace, & what good thing soeuer may be thought of, because it is the Holy ghost onely from whome proceedeth all kinde of giftes. For that sentence of Paul is right worthie to be noted. Although there be diuerse giftes, and manifolde and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirite: because he maketh him not onely the originall or beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these wordes. One & the same Spirite distributeth all thinges as he will. For if he were not something subsisting in God, he would not attribute vnto him choise of minde and will. Therefore most evidently doeth Paul giue to the Holy ghost diuine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that wee are the temple of God, because his spirite dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed ouer. For whereas God so often promisseth that he will choose vs for a temple temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirite dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustine very well sayeth: if we were commanded to make vnto the Holy ghost a temple of timber & stone because such worship is due to God only, it were a cleare argument that he is God: now therefore how much clearer is this, that we ought not to make a temple, but our selues to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the Holy ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to y^e Holy ghost, said that he lied not vnto men but vnto god. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the Holy ghost that speaketh. Yea, where cōmonly the Prophets say, that the words which they vtter are the wordes of the Lord of hostes, Christ & the Apostles doe referre them to the Holy ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Iehouah that is the chiefe author of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that he was prouoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people, in steede of that Esay saith that his holy Spirite was grieved. Last of all, if blasphemie against the Holy ghost be not forgiuen in this worlde nor in the worlde to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his diuine maiestie is here plainly prooued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an vnardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpose omit many testimonies that the auncient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a maruellous meete place to alleage out of Dauid: with the worde of the Lord the heauens were stablished, and all the power of them with the spirite of his mouth, to prooue that the worlde was no lesse the worke of the Holy ghost than of the Sonne. But for as much as it is cōmonly vsed in y^e Psalmes to repete one thing twise: and in Esay the spirite of his mouth is as much to say as his worde, that reason is very weake. Therefore I thought good to touche a fewe such things as godly mindes might soundly rest vpon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly knowen. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitte these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby prooueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needs think him the true God in whose name we are baptised. And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solempne protestation, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was already deliuered, when he sayd: Baptise them in y^e name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of y^e one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost. Whereby is euident that in the essence of God abide three Persons in which the one God is knowen. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diuersly to wander about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, & to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily proued, that if there be diuerse kindes of faith, there must also be many gods. Nowe whereas baptisme is a Sacrament of faith: it proueth vnto vs the vnitie of God, because it is but one. And hereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, because we embrace the Faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What ment Christ then, when he commanded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to beleue in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Word and the Spirite are nothing els but the verie selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arrians prate, which confessing the godhead of the Sonne did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would haue to be vnderstanded by the Spirite, onely the giftes of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisdom, vnderstanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God do proceede from him: so he only is the spirit of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godlinesse. Yet is not he diuided according to the distribution of his graces: but how soeuer they be diuersely dealt abroade, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith.

1. Cor. 12. 11.

17 Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Word, and of the Word from the Spirite. In discussing whereof, how greate religiousnesse and sobrietic we ought to vse, the greatnesse of the mystery it selfe doth admonish vs. And I very wel like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I can not thinke vpon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I can not seuerally discern the three, but I am sodeinly driuen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may holde our thought withdrawn into seueralties, and doeth not forthwith bring vs againe to that vnitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost, doe proue a true distinction, that no man shoulde thinke them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diuersly entituled: but yet it is a distinction, not a diuision. The places that we haue already cited, do shewe that the sonne hath a property distinct from the Father, because the Word had not bin with God, if he had not bin an other thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he saith, that there is an other which beareth him witness. And for this purpose maketh that which in an other place is saide, that the Father created all thinges by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certaine maner distinct frō him. Morcouer y^e Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not nor rose again, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction begin at the taking of flesh: but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to say, that then the Sonne entred into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heauen to take manhode vpon him? Hee was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enioyed his glory with the Father. As for the distinction of the holy ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shewe it to be an other beside himselfe? as when he promiseth that he will sende an other comforter, and often in other places. Iohn. 14. 16

18 But to borrow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I know not whether it be expedient. In deede the old fathers are wont so to do sometime: but withall they doe confesse, that whatsoever they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much affraide to be any way bold, least if I bring forth any thing vnwisely, it should giue occasion either to the malicious to cauill, or to the vnskillfull to be deceiued. Yet such distinction as we haue marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giuen the beginning of working, the fountaine & spring of al thinges: to the Sonne wisdom, counsell, & the very disposition in \bar{y} doing of thinges: to the holy ghost is assigned power and effectuall working. And although eternitie belong vnto the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue bin without his wisdom and power, and in eternitie is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this obseruation of order is not vaine or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the Holy ghost. For euery mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisdom rising out of him, and last of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort \bar{y} Son is said to be of the Father onely, and the Holy ghost both of the Father and the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viii. Chapter to the Romanes, where the same Spirit is without difference sometime called the Spirit of Christ, and sometime of him \bar{y} raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testifie that it was the Spirit of Christ wherewith the Prophetes did prophecy, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirit of God the Father.

19 Now this distinction doth not so stand against the single vnyty of God, that thereby we may proue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one Spirit with him, & that the Holy Spirit is not a thing diuers from the Father and the Sonne. For in each Hypostasis is vnderstanded the whole substance, with this that euery one hath his owne property. The Father is whole in the Sonne, & the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth, I am in the Father and the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiasticall writets do not graunt the one to be seuered from the other by any difference of essence. By these names \bar{y} betoken distinctiō (saith Augustine) \bar{y} is ment wherby they haue relation one to an other, & not \bar{y} very substance wherby they are al one. By which meaning are the sayings of \bar{y} old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a litle to disagree. For sometime they say \bar{y} the Father is the beginning of the Son, & sometime that the Son hath both godhead & essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with \bar{y} Father. The cause of this diuersity Augustine doth in an other place wel & plainly declare, whē he saith: Christ hauing respect to himselfe, is called Iohn. 14. 10.

God, and to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Son is called the Father, where hauing respect to the Son he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: & where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: & where he is called as to himselfe the Father, & as to himselfe the Son: it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne. without hauing respect to the Father, we do well and properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betwene him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinity doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too subtly pearcing vnto the hie mystery to wander abroad by many vaine speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with sobernesse, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be known: that is, when we professe that we beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, we vnderstande the one only and single essence in which we comprehend three Persons or Hypostases. And therefore so oft as we do indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no lesse the Sonne and the holy ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is ioyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction betwene the Persons. And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them, so as y beginning and original is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the Holy ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly giuen to y Father. By this meane is retained the vnitie of the essence, & regard is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. And whereas we haue already seene that the Apostles doe affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whom Moses and the Prophetes do testifie to be Ichouah the Lord, wee must of necessitie alway come to the vnitie of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacriledge for vs to call the Sonne a scuerall God from the Father, because the simple name of G O D, doth admitte no relation, and God in respect of himselfe can not be sayd to be this or that. Now, that the name of Ichonah the Lord indefinitely taken is applied to Christe, appeareth by the wordes of Paul, where he sayth: Therefore I haue thrise prayed the Lorde, because that after he had receiued the aunswere of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he sayth by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certeine that the name Lord is there sette for Ichouah, and therefore to restraine it to the person of the Mediatour were very fonde and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we knowe that after the accustomed maner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly sette the word Kyrios, Lord, in steede of Ichouah. And, not to fetch an example farre of, Paul did in no other sense pray to the Lorde, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Iocell: whosoever calleth vpon the name of the Lorde shall be saued. But where this name is peculiarly giuen to the Sonne, we shal see that there is another other reason thereof, when we come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is enough to haue in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, hee by and by bringeth in the name of Christ. Euen so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirite. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father, the Sonne & the Holy Ghost be comprehended. Which is very plaine by this Scripture. For euen as there we heare God to be made a Spirite: so we do heare the Holy Ghost, for so much as it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to bee called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Sathan, to the end to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the diuine essence of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of Persons: And as in a maner in all ages he hath stirred vp wicked spirites to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he trauaileth out of the old embers to kindle a newe fire: therefore here it is good to answer the peruerse foolish errours of some. Hir herto it hath bene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to striue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the truth which we haue already peaceably shewed, must be reskued from the cauillations of the wicked: All be it my chiefe trauaile shall yet be applyed to this ende, that they which giue gentle and open eares to the worde of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secreete mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great heede that neither our thought nor our tounge proceede any further than the bourdes of Gods word do extend. For howe may the minde of man by his capacity define the immeasurable essence of God, which neuer yet could certainly determine how great is the body of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea how may she by her own guiding attaine to discusse the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her owne substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarie sayth, is a conuenient witnessse to himselfe, which is not known but by himselfe. We shal giue it ouer vnto him, if we shal both conceiue him to be such as he hath opened himself vnto vs, & shal not else where search to know of him, than by his own word. There are to this ende written fise homelies of Chrysofome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not bee restrayned by them from babling vnbridledly. For they haue behaued themselves in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the unhappie successe of which vndiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selues to trauaile in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and neuer haue in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his Worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same Worde: The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is verie harde to know, so doeth it bring more businesse and combrance to some wittes than is expedient . Let them remember that the mindes of men do enter into a maze when they followe their owne curiositie, and so let them suffer themselues to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, how soeuer they cannot attaine the height of the mystery.

22 To make a register of the errours, wherewith the purenesse of Faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past bene assailed, were too long & full of vnprofitable tediousnesse: and the most parte of heretikes haue so attempted to ouerwhelme the glory of God with grosse doing errours, that they haue thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vn-skillfull. And from a fewe men haue sprong vp many sectes, whereof some doe teare in sunder the essence of God, some doe confounde the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if wee holde fast that which is already sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that y^e essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost, is single & vndiuided: Againe, that the Father by a certeine properie differeth from the Sonne, & the Sonne from the Holy ghost: we shall stop vp the gate not onely against Arrius & Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errours. But because in our time there be risen vp certaine phrentike men, as Seruetto & other like, which haue encombred all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discusse their falshodes. The name of the Trinitie was so hatefull, yea so detestable to Seruetto, that he sayd, that all the Trinitaries, as hee called them, were vtterly godlesse. I omit the foolish words that he had deuised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and y^e this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeeth with the vnitie of God. In the meane time the Persons he would haue to be certeine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truly subsisting in the essence of God, but do represent God vnto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning y^e there was in God nothing distinct because once the Word & the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy Ghost sprong also an other God out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he saith, that the eternall Word of God was the spirire of Christ with God, & the bright shining of his forme: Againe, that the Holy ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distributiō there is both in the Sonne and in the holic Spirite a part of God, euen as the same Spirite in vs, & also in wood & stones is substantially a portion of God. What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediatour, we shal hereafter see in place conueniēt. But this monstrous forged deuise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation. For where as John pronounceth, that the Word was God before the world was yet creat, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, and from farthest Eternitie of time, that Worde which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glorie with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abyde in God. And although there there be no mention made of the Spirite, but in the historie of the creation of the worlde: yet he is not there brought in as a shadowe, but an essentiall power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very vnfashioned lump was susteined in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternall Spirite was alwayes in God, when he preferred and susteined y^e confused matter of heauen & earth, vntill beautie & order were added vnto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or representatiō of God as Seructo dreameth. But in other pointes he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednesse, in saying that God by his eternall purpose appointing to himselfe a visibler Sonne, did by this meane shewe himselfe visibler. For if that bee true there is no other godhead left vnto Christ, but so far as he is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his Sonne. Moreouer he so transformeth those imagined shapes y^e he sticketh not to faine new accidents in God. But this of all other is most abhominable, that he confusely mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the holy ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the essence of God, of which euery portion is God. And namely he saith, that the Spirites of the faithfull are coeternall and consubstantiall with God: albeit in an other place he assigneth the substantiall Deitie, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

23 Out of this sinke came forth an other like monster. For certeine leud men meaning to escape the hatred and shame of the wickednesse of Seructo, haue in dede confessed, that there are three Persons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which truly and properly is the one onely God, informing the Sonne & the holy ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbear not this horrible maner of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the holy ghost, that he is the onely essentiatior or maker of the essence. First they pretend this colour, that Christ is eche where called the Sonne of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometime giuen to the Father onely, because he is the fountaine and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpose, to make the single vnirie of the essence to be thereby noted. They take exception & say: If he be truly the Sonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckned the Sonne of a Person. I answere that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worlde (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediatour) and yet for explications sake we ought to haue regarde of the Person, that the name of God simply be not taken, but for the Father onely. For if we meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throwe down the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so oft as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly the God that appeared to Esai was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Esai testified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Iewes, was the onely God;

 Psa. 97.7. belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he sayeth, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this cauillation is nothing worth, that that is giuen to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightnesse of his glory. For because in ech of these places is set y^e name of Iehouah, it followeth, that it is so sayd in respect that he is God of himself.
 Esa. 44.6. For if he be Iehouah, it can not be denied that he is the same God that in an other place cryeth out by Esay: I, I am, and beside me there is no G O D.
 Iere. 10.11. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremie: The gods that haue not made the heauen and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is vnder the heauen. Whereas on the other side we must needes confesse, that the Sonne of God is he, whose godhead is oft proued in Esay by the creation of the worlde. And how can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borowe his being of another? For who-focuer saith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy ghost sayth the contrary, naming him Iehouah. Now if we graunt that the whole essence is in the Father only, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoyled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title.
 The essence of God, if we beleue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essence maker of the Sonne.
 And so shall the godhead of the Sonne bee an abstract from the essence of God, or a deriuation of a part out of y^e whole. Now must they needes graunt by their owne principle, that the holy ghost is the Spirite of the Father only. For if he be a deriuation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he can not be accounted the Spirit of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimonie of Paul, where hee maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreouer if the person of the Father be wip-ped out of the Trinitie, wherein shal he differ from the Sonne and the holy ghost, but in this, that he onely is God? They confesse Christ to be God, & yet they say he differeth from the Father. Againe, there must be some mark of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true godhead of Christ to nothing, which can not be without essence, yea and y^e the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnlesse hee haue something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in y^e essence, let them answere if he haue not communicated the same to y^e Son.
 But that could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meane they do fowly teare in sunder the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whiole, and perfectly cōmon to the Father & the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the essence
 there

there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say that the Father in giuing his essence, remayneth neuerthelesse the onely God, with whome the essence abideth: then Christ shall be a figuratiue God, and a God onely in shew and in name but not in deed: because nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent mee Exo. 5. 13.

24 It is easie by many places to prooue that it is false which they hold, that so oft as there is in scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant therby but the Father. And in those places that they themselues do alleadge, they sowlly bewray their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatiuely taken, and therefore restrayned to the Person of the Father. And their obiection where they say, If the Father were not onely the true God, he shoulde himselfe be his owne Father, is answered with one worde. It is not inconuenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisdom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For sith Christ was openly shewed in the fleshe, he is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respecte that he was the eternall Worde before all worldes begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke vpon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to ioyne vs vnto God. And because they do so boldly exclude the Sonne from the honour of God, I woulde faync knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from himselfe? I doe not speake of his humane nature, least perhappes they shoulde take exception, and say, that whatsoeuer goodnesse was in it, it came of free gifte. I aske whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they say nay, then wee holde their vngodlinesse sufficiently conuincid: in saying yea, they confounde themselues. But where as at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of Good, that doth y more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common manner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, hee did admonishe them, that the goodnesse wherein hee excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath. I aske also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is Mat. 19. 17.
immortall, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish, and false? Shall not he then be immortall, that from the beginning was life to giue immortality to Angels? Shall not hee be wise, that is the eternall wisdom of God? Shall not the Tim. 1. 17.
trueth it selfe be true? I aske furthermore, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For he claimeth this vnto himselfe, to haue all knees bowe before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will haue that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against themselues, forasmuch as wee see, that whatsoeuer pertayneth to God is giuen to Christ. And their caullation hath no Phil. 2. 10.
place, that Christe was exalted in the fleshe, wherein hee had beene Esai. 44. 6.

abased, and that in respect of the flesh, all authoritie is giuen him in heauen & in earth. because although the maiestie of king & Iudge extend to the whole Person of the Mediatour, yet if he had not beene God, openly shewed in flesh, he could not haue been aduanced to such height, but that God shoulde haue disagreed with himselfe. But this controuerfie Paul doth well take away, teaching that he was egall with God before hee did abase himselfe vnder the shape of a seruaunt. Nowe howe could this equalitie haue stande together, vnlesse hee had beene the same God whose name is Iah & Iehouah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is king of all the earth and Lorde of the worldes? Nowe howsoever they babble against it, it cannot be taken from Christ which Esaie saith in another place: He, he, is our God, for him wee haue wayted, whereas in these wordes he describeth the coming of God the Redeemer, not onely that shoulde bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all pointes restore the Church. And with their other cauillation they nothing preuaile, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though wee confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the Godhead is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable inuention to saye that the essence is onely proper to the Father, as though hee were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either hee shoulde haue moe essences than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Christe is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfashioned. I knowe that many quicke nosed men doe laugh at this that wee gather the distinction of Persons out of the wordes of Moses, where hee bringeth in God speaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers doe see howe vainely and fondly Moses shoulde bring in this as a talke of diuerse together, if there were not in God moe Persons than one. Nowe certaine is it, that they whome the Father spake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe, yea the one onely G O D. Nowe therefore vnlesse they grant that the power of creating was common, & the authoritie of commaunding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost: it shall followe that God did not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speach to other foreyne workemen. Finally one place shall easily aunswere two of their obiections. For where as Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a Spirite, this were not conuenient to be restrained to the Father onely, as if the Worde himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirite doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worshippe him in Spirite and truth, wherevpon followeth an other thinge, because Christe doeth vnder a heade execute the office of a teacher, hee doeth giue the name of G O D to the Father, not to the entente to destroye his owne Godhead, but by degrees to liste vs vppe vnto it.

Phil. 2.7.

Esaie. 25.9.

Gen. 1.26.

Iohn. 4.24.

25 But in this they are deceived, that they dreame of certaine vndiuided singular things whereof each haue a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentially God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his wisdom, therefore rightfully as is aboue saide, he is counted the originall and fountaine of all the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsely and caullously they ascribe vnto vs a deuise of their owne braine, as though we did saie that by deriuation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is euident by our writings that we doe not draw the persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the Persons were seuered from the essence, then peradventure their reason were like to be true. But by that meane it should be a Trinity of gods and not of Persons, which one God containeth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinity as though we did imagine that there descend three gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnesse where they say, that then the Trinity should be without God. For though it meete not to make vp the distinction as a parte or a member, yet neither are the Persons without it nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we grant that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in old time haue spoken of the Trinity, haue onely applied this name to the Persons, for so much as it were not onely an absurde error but also a grosse vngodlinesse to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will haue these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the Holy ghost, for else the partes ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in euery distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing should remaine in the Sonne but a shadowe, and the Trinity should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

26 Whereas they object, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Sonne, to that we haue already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father onely, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as the madde men doe fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the

Iohn. 17. 3. the eternall life, that men belecue in thee the one true God, and Iesus Christ whome thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediatour, he keepeth the degree that is meane betweene God and men: and yet is not his maiestie thereby diminished. For though he abased himselfe, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the Person of the Mediator speaketh to the Father, vnder this name of God is comprehended the godhead which is his also. So when he sayd to the Apostles: It is profitable that I goe vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: He gueth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of godhead to be as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because hauing obtained the heauenly glory, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He setteth his Father in the higher degree, insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightnes that appeareth in heauē, differeth from that measure of glory that was scene in him being clothed with flesh. After like maner in another place Paul saith: that Christ shall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternall continuance from the godhead of Christ. If he shall neuer cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that vnder the name of the Father is comprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that listing vs vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vs vp vnto himselfe, inasmuch as he is al one w his Father. It is therefore neither lawfull nor right so exclusiuely to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, Iohn doth for this cause affirme that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he resteth in a second degree of godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of newe Gods doe meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they forthwith exclude him from the godhead of his Father. As though there coulde any bee a true God but he that is the one God: or as though the godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

27 Whereas they heape vp many places out of Ireneus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreeme wickednes. For they ought to haue considered, that then the holy man had to do in disputation with those frantike men that denied that the Father of Christ was the same God that in olde time spake by Moses and the Prophetes, but that he was I wot not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether trauaileth in this point, to make it plaine that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to deuise any other, and therefore it is no maruel if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken spoken of by Christ and the Apostles . And in like maner now , whereas we are to stand against an other sort of error , we may truly say that the God which in olde time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any man obiect that it was the Father , our answeere is in readinesse , that when we striue to defend the godhead of the Sonne , we exclude not the Father . If the readers take heede to this purpose of Ireneus, all that contenti- on shall cease . And also by the sixt Chapter of the thirde booke , this whole strife is ended, where the good mā standeth al vpon this point, to proue that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God : is verily the one onely GOD, and that Christ is absolutely called God . Let vs re- member that this was the principall point whereupon stooode all his dispu- ration , as by the whole processe thereof doth appeare : and specially the 46. Chapter of the second booke , that he is not called the Father by darke similitude or parable, which is not very God in deede . Moreouer in an o- ther place he saith , that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioyntly called God by the Prophets and Apostles . Afterwarde he defineth howe Christ which is Lord of all , and king, and God , and iudge, receiued power from him which is the God of all , that is to say in respect of his subiection , be- cause he was humbled euento y death of the crosse. And a little after he affir- meth , that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gaue the lawe by the hand of Moses and appeared to the Fathers . Nowe if any man do prate that with Ireneus only the Father is the God of Israel, I will turne againe vpon him that which the same writer plainely teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same : as also he applieth vnto him the Prophecie of Ha- bacuc . God shall come out of the South . To the same purpose serueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke . Christ himselte therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing . And in the twelue Chap- ter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleueed God, because Christ is the maker of heauen and earth and the onely God .

28 And with no more trueth doe they bring in Tertullian for their de- fender . For though he be rough sometime and crabbed in his maner of speech , yet doeth he plainely teach the summe of that doctrine that we de- fende . That is to say , where as he is the one God , yet by diposition and order he is his Worde : that there is but one God in vnitie of substance, and yet that the same vnitie by mysterie of orderly distribution is disposed into Trinitie , that there are three , not in state, but in degree , not in substance, but in forme ; not in power , but in order . He saith that hee defendeth the Sonne to bee a seconde next to the Father , but he meaneth him to bee none other than the Father , bur by way of distinction . In some places he sayeth that the Sonne is visible . But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is inuisible in so much as hee is the Worde . Fi- nallie where he affirmeth that the Father is determined in his owne person , he proueth himselte farre from that error which we confute . And though he doeth acknowledge none other God but the Father , yet in the nexte peece of his writing expounding himselte , he saith , that he speaketh not exclusiue in respect of the Sonne , because he denieth that the Sonne is any other God beside the Father, and that therefore their sole government is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his wordes. For hee disputeth against Praxeas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many gods nor the vnitie torne in sunder. And because by the imagination of Praxeas Christ coulde not be God, but hee must also be the Father, therefore hee somuch labourerth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Worde and the Spirit a portion of the whole although it be a hard kinde of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but only sheweth the disposition and order y^e belongeth only to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth. And hereof hangeth that: How many persons thinkest thou there are, O most froward Praxeas, but euen so many as there be names? And so a litle after y^e, they may beleeue the Father and the son ech in their names & Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently confuted their impudencie that seeke to beguile the simple with colour of Tertullians authoritie.

29 And surely whosocuer shall diligently compare together y^e writings of the old authors, shall find no other thing in Ireneus, than that which hath bene taught by other that came after. Iustine is one of the auncientest, and he in all things doeth agree with vs. Yet let them obiekt that hee as the rest do, calleth the Father of Christ the onely God. The same thing doeth Hilarie teach, yea, and speaketh more hardly, that the eternitie is in y^e Father. But doth hee that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet is hee altogether in defence of the same Faith that we follow. Yet are they not ashamed to picke out certaine mangled sentences whereby they woulde perswade that Hilarie is a Patrone of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius: if they will haue that to bee of any authoritie, let them prooue that the Apostles made a lawe for lent and such like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vsfauerie than those sonde trifles that are published vnder y^e name of Ignatius, Wherefore their impudencie is somuch lesse tolerable that disguise theselues with such visers to deceiue. Moreover the consent of the auncient Fathers is plainly perceiued by this, that at y^e council of Nice, Arius neuer durst alledge for himselfe y^e authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Grekes or Latines doth excuse himself and say, that he dissenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken how Augustine, whome these loselles doe most hate, hath diligently searched the writings of them all, and howe reuerently hee did embrace them. Truely euen in matters of least weight hee vseth to shewe what compelleth him to dissent from them. And in this matter, if he haue read any thing doubtfull or darke in other, hee hydeth it not. But the doctrine that these men striue against, hee taketh it as confessed, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath bene without controuersie received. And by one worde it appeareth that hee was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where hee saith that in the Father is vnitie, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that hee then forgate himselfe? But in an other place hee purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where hee calleth calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, because hee is of none: considering in deede wisely that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if the beginning shoulde not be reckened at him, the single vnitie of God cannot be conceyued. By this I trust the godly reader will perceiue that all the cauillations are confuted wherewith Sathan hath hitherto attempted to peruert or darken the pure trueth of doctrine. Finally I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this poynte is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiositie, and not more greedily than met is seeke for combersome and entangled disputations. For I take not in hande to please them, that doe delight in an vtemperate desire of speculation. Truly I haue omitted nothing of suttle purpose that I thought to make against mee. But while I studie to edifie the Church, I thought it best, to leaue many things vntouched which both smally profited, and woulde greue the readers with superfluous tediousnesse. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father doe alwayes beget? For asmuch as it is follie to faine a continuall acte of begetting, sith it is euident that from eternitie there haue bene three Persons in God.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That the Scripture euen in the creation of the world and of all things: doth by certaine markes put difference betwene the true God, and fained Gods.

ALthough Esay doth worthily reproche the worshippers of false Gods with slouthfulnesse, for that they haue not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and rounde compasse of the heauens, which is the true God: yet such is the dulnesse & grossenes of our wit, y^e leasty^e faythfull should fall away to the inuentions of the Gentiles, it was necessarie to haue God more expressly painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the worlde, which is compted the most tollerable description that is founde among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behoueth vs more familiarly to knowe him, least wee alwayes wauer in doubtfulnesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to haue a historie of the creation remaining, wherevpon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seeke for none other God but him, whome Moses hath declared to be the maker and buylder of the worlde. There is first set foorth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeres the faithfull might come to the first original of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is verie necessarie, not onely to confute those monstrous fables that sometime were spred in Egypte and other partes of the worlde, but also, that the beginning of the worlde once being knowen, y^e eternitie of God may more clearly shine foorth and raiushe vs in admiration of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moued with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, sith hec might haue made it many thousande ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the worlde that nowe draweth to an ende, is not yet come to sixe thousande yeares. For why God so long differred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because cause if mans minde will trauaile to attaine therevnto, it shall fayle an hundred times by the way, neyther were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himselfe to prooue the modestie of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godlie olde man speake, which when a wanton fellowe did in scorne demaunde of him, what God had done before the creation of the worlde, answered that hee buylded Hell for curious fooles. Let this graue and seuerer warning repress the wantonnesse that tickleth many yea and driueth them to cuill and hurtfull speculations. Finally let vs remember that the same inuisible God whose wisdome, power and iustice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the historie of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his luely image appeareth. For as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age or dulled with anie disease, doe not discern any thing plainly vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so, such is our weakenesse, that vnlesse the Scripture direct vs in seeking of God, we doe fourthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that followe their owne wantonnesse, because they be nowe warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, howe much it had beene better for them reuerently to receiue the secrete counsels of God, than to vomite out blasphemies, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightly doeth Augustine com-

 plaine that wrong is done to God when further cause of thinges is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in an other place doth wisely warne vs, that it is no lesse euill to moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For howe brode foecer the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Nowe if one shoulde quarell with God for that the emptinesse wherein nothing is conteyned, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Inro like madnesse runne they that busie themselues about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the worlde innumerable ages sooner. To satisfie their owne greedinesse of mind, they couet to passe without the compasse of y world, as though in so large a circuite of heauen, and earth, they coulde not finde things enough that with their inestimable brightnesse may ouerwhelme all our senses: as though in sixe thousande yeares God hath not shewed examples in continuall consideration, whereof our mindes may be exercised. Let vs therefore willingly abide enclosed within those boundes wherewith it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes that they should not stray abrode with libertie of wandring.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in sixe dayes. For by this circumstance we are withdrawn from forged inuentions to the one onely God that deuided his worke into sixe dayes, that it should not greeue vs to be occupied all y time of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way foecer wee turne them, are compelled to looke vpon the workes of God, yet see we howe fickle our hede is, and if any godly thoughts, do touch vs, how soone they passe away. Here againe mans reason murmureth as though such proceedings were disagreeing from the power of God, vntill such time as being made subiect to y obediēce of faith, the learne to keep y rest wherunto y hal-

lowing of y^e ſeuenth day calleth vs. But in the very order of things, is diligently to be considered the Fatherly loue of God toward mankind, in this: that he did not creat Adam vntil he had stored the world with all plentie of good things. For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren & emptie, if he had giuen him life before that there was any light, he should haue seemed not so well to prouide for his commoditie. But now where he first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the vse of man, and furnished the earth, the waters and the aire with liuing creatures, & brought forth abundance of fruites to suffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident householder, he shewed his marueilous bountie toward vs. If a man do more heedfully wey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse & publisser of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I haue already declared, that he speaketh not there onely of the bare essence of God, but also setteth forth vnto vs his eternall Wisdome & Spiritie, to the end we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be knowen by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenessse of the common people reciteth in his historie of the creation no other workes of God but such as are scene with our eyes, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easily gather that he was the creator of them in whose seruice they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacite of y^e people doeth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrary, but that we may plainly & expressly speake those thinges of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his works, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that this point of doctrine is verie necessarie for the confuting of many errors. The excellencie of the nature of Angels hath so daseled the mindes of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subiect to the authoritie of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And here vpon were they fained to be Gods. There rose vp also one Manicheus with his sect, which made themselves two originall beginnings of things, God, & the Diuel, and to God he assigned the beginning of good things, & of things of euil nature he determined the diuel to be the author. If our minds should be entangled with this error, God should not keepe whole his glory in the creation of the world. For where as nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which giue that vnto the diuel, do they not in a maner giue him the title of godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authoritie be granted to the diuel, that he may put in execution what he wil though God say nay & withstand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees haue, that it is unlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euil: that nothing hurteth the true Faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euill in the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man and the deuill, nor the sins that proceede thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and iustice. Therefore to answer these peruerse deuises: it behoueth vs to lift vp our mindes hier than our eyes can attaine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creede God is called the creator of all things, things inuisible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godlinesse appointeth, least the readers with searching to vnderstand further than is expedient, should wander abroade, being ledde away from the simplicitie of Faith. And surely for as much as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alwaie for our profite, and such things as are smally auaylable to edifie, hee doeth either leaue wholly vnspoken, or but lightly, and as it were ouerrunningly touch them: it shalbe also our duetie to be content not to knowe those things that do not profit vs.

4 That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commandementes, are also his creatures, it ought to be certeinly our of all question. To moue dout of the time and order that they were created in, should it nor rather be a busse waiwardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to searche, what day the other more secret armies of heauen beside the starres and planettes first began to be? But, because I will not be long: let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that we ought to keepe one rule of modestie & sobriety, that of obscure things we neither speak, nor thinke, nor yet desire to knowe any other things than that hath bin taught vs by the word of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest vpon the searching and studying of such things as pertaine to edification, & not giue our selues to curiosity or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in sound godlinesse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holines: let vs rest vpon such knowledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, wee must leaue those vanities that idle men haue taught without warrant of the word of God, concerning the nature, degrees, and multitude of Angels. I knowe that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken hold of, & are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in daily vse. But if it greeue vs not to be the scholars of Christ, let it not greeue vs to folowe that order of learning y^e he hath appointed. So shal it so come to passe, that being contented with his scholing, we shal not onely forbear but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Denyse, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both subtilly & wittily in his Hierarchie of heauen: but if a man examine it more neerely, he shal finde that for the most part it is but meere babbling. But the dutifull purpose of a diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to stablsh consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable.

If one should reade that booke, he would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heauen, & did tell of things not y he had learned by hearefay, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was rauished aboute the third heauen, hath vttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawfull for man to speake the secretes that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that triflyng wisdom, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs knowe concerning his Angels.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that y Angels are heauenly Spirites, whose ministracion and seruice God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shewe himselfe vnto men. And vpon like reason are deriued the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a gard enuir on their prince, & do adorne & set forth the honorable shew of his maiestie, and like souldiers they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their captaine, and are euer so prepared & in readines to do his commandements, that so soone as he doth but becken to them, they prepare themselues to worke, or rather be at their worke already. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other prophets do describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God sare him downe in his throne of iudgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them maruailously shew forth & declare y might and strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he exerciseth and vseth his authority in y world by them, therefore they are sometime called principalities, sometime powers, sometime Dominions. Finally because in them as it were sitteth the glory of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because an other exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the Holy ghost often vseth those other former names to auance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels: For it were not reason y those instruments should be let passe without honor by whom God doth specially shewe the presence of his maiestie. Yea for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministry as in a loking glasse, they partly represent vnto vs the godhead. Although in deede I mislike not this that the old writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, where the Scripture, saith, that the Angel of God appeared to Abraham, Iacob, Moses, & other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels in deede this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no meruile. For if this honour be giuen to princes and gouernours, that in their office they stande in the steede of God that is soueraigne king & iudge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnes of the glory of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the scriptre standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comforte and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributors & administratours of Gods bountie toward vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie:

1. Cor. 13. 2.

Dan. 7. 10.

Coloss. 1. 10.
Eph. 1. 21.Ge. 18 1. 32.
Ios. 5. 14.
Iudi. 6. 14. &

they take vpon them the defence of vs, they direct our waies, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vniuersall, which principally pertaine to Christ the heade of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath giuen his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy wayes. They shall beare thee vp in their handes, least thou chaunce to hit thy feete against a stone. Againe, The Angel of the Lord standeth rounde about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Wherby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, & commandeth her to be reconciled to her maistres. God promised to Abraham his seruant an Angel to be the guide of his iourney. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim & Manasses prayeth, that the Angel of the Lord by whom he himselfe had bin deliuered from all euill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defende the tentes of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskue Israel out of the handes of thir enemies, he raised vp reuengers by ſ ministerie of Angels. So finally (to ſ end I neede not to rehearse many mo) the Angels ministred to Christ and were ready assistent to him in all necessities. They brought tidings to the women of his resurrection, & to ſ disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the deuill and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vpon them, that are bene against vs. As we reade that the Angell of God to deliuer Hierusalem from ſ siege, slew in one night a hundred sower score and fise thousand in ſ campe of the king Assyria.

7 But whether to euery of the faithfull be a seuerall Angell assigned for their defence, I dare not certainly affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angel of the Persians, and the Angel of the Grecians, hee sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdoms and prouinces certaine Angels appointed as gouernours. And when Christ saith ſ the Angels of Children do alway beholde the face of the Father, he seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whome the preseruation of them is giuen in charge. But I can not tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euery one hath his Angell set ouer him. But this is to be holden for certeintie, that not one Angel only hath care of euery one of vs, but that they all by one consent do watch for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more reioyce of one sinner conuerted to repentance, than of nyntie & nine iust that haue stand stil in their righteousness. And it is said of mo Angels thā one, that they conueyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elizeus shewe to his seruant so many fierie chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is ſ seemeth more plaiue than the rest to proue this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at ſ doores of the house, where the brethren were assembled, whē they could not imagine that it was he, they said it was his Angel. It should seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, ſ to euery of the faithfull are assigned their Angels for gouernours. Albe it yet here it may be answered ſ it may well be, notwithstanding any thing thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whome God had giuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continual keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to euery one two Angels, as it were diuerse ghostes, a good Angel and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiously to search for that which doeth not much import vs to know. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heauen do watch for his safetie, I doe not see what hee can be the better, if he vnderstand that there is one Angel peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which restraints vnto one Angel y care that God hath to euery one of vs, do great wrong to themselues, & to al the members of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had bene vainly promised vs, wherewith being enuironed and defended, wee shoulde fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, & with Iude, the Archangel. And Paul saith, it shal be an Archangel that shal with sound of trumpet call men to y iudgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angels, or discern one from another by speciall markes, & appoint euery one his place & standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael, & Gabriel: and if you list to adde the third out of the historie of Thobie, may by their signification seeme to be giuen to the Angels, according to the capacite of our weakenesse, although I had rather leaue that exposition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Christes mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thousands, the seruant of Elizeus saw many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, they do camp round about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certeine, that Spirites haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacite of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs out Angels with wings, to the intent we should not dout that they will be cuer with incredible swiftnesse, readie to succour vs, so soone as neede shall require, as if the lightning sent from heauen should fly vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. Whatsoeuer more than this may be sought of both these points, let vs beleue it to be of that sort of mysteries; whereof the full reuelation is deferred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curiositie in serching & to much boldnes in speking.

9 But this one thing which many troublesome do call in doubt, is to be holden for certieintie, that Angels are ministring spirits, whose seruice God vseth for the defence of his, and by whome he both distributeth his benefits among men, and also putteth his other workes in execution. It was in the olde time the opinion of the Sadduces, that by Angels is meant nothing els; but either the motions that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this errour crie out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is maruile that so grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before alleged, where are recited thousands & Legions of Angels: where ioy is giuen vnto them: where it is sayd that they vphold the faithfull with their hands, & cary their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places whereby is clearly proued, that they are in deede spirites of a nature that hath substance. For where as Stephen & Paul do say, that the law was giuen by the hand of Angels, and Christ saith, y^e the elect after the resurrection shalbe like vnto Angels: that the day of iudgement is not known to the very Angels: that he shal then come with his holy Angels: how soeuer they be writhed, yet must they so be vnderstanded. Likewise when Paul charged Timothie before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his cōmandements, he meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance but very spirites. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subiect vnto them: that Christ tooke vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not y^e blessed spirites, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of y^e Epistle expouñdeth himselfe where he placeth in the kingdome of heauen the soules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we haue already alleged, that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our safetie, that they maruell at the manifolde grace of God in the Church, that they are subiect to Christ, the heade. To the same purpose serueth this, that they so oft appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ himselfe for the principal preeminence that he hath in the person of the Mediatour, is called an Angel. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that manie ages agoe raised by Sathan do now and then spring vp againe.

10 Now it resteth, that we seeke to meeete with that superstition which is commonly wont to creepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers and deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by and by mans reason falleth to this point, to thinke y^e therefore all honour ought to be giuen them. So commeth it to passe that those things which belong only to God & Christ, are conuicied away to Angels. By this meane we see that in certaine ages past, the glory of Christ hath bin many wayes obscured, when Angels without warrant of Gods word were loden with immeasurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more auintent than this. For it appeareth, that Paul himself had much to do with some which so auanced Angels, that they in manner would haue brought Christ vnder subiection. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the authour of all the good things that they haue: to the end we should not forsake him and turne vnto them, which can not sufficiently helpe them selues, but are faine to drawe out of the same fountaine that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in the a certain brightness of the maicesty of God, there is nothing whereunto we are more easily enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, & to giue vnto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing

John in the Revelation confesseth to haue chaunted to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this answer. See thou doe it not. For I am thy fellowe seruant, Worship God.

11 But this daunger we shall well beware of, if we doe consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to prouide for the safery of the faithfull, and to communicate y gifts of his liberality among them. Surely he doth not this of necessity, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an only becke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to ease him of the hardnesse therof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weakenes, so that we want nothing that may auaille our mindes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth y he is our protector. But while we see our selues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull thinges, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weakenesse and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, vnlesse the Lord after the proportion of our capacity do make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meane he not onely promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whom he hath giuen in charge to trauaile for our safetic, and that so long as we be compassed with the garrison & support of them, whatsoeuer danger betideth, we be without all reach of hurte. I graunt we do amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, we still looke about from whence other help may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentlenes to helpe this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefit. An example thereof we haue in the seruant of Elizeus, which when he sawe the hill besieged with the army of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was stricken downe with feare, as if his maister and hee were then vterly destroyed. Then Elizeus praied God to open his seruants eies, and by & by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and fiery chariotes, that is with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his heart againe, & was able with a dreedelesse mind to looke downe vpon his enemies, with sight of whome he was before in a maner driuen out of his witte.

2. Kin. 6. 17.

12 Wherefore whatsoeuer is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that ouercomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are herefore prouided vs of God, that we shold not be made afraid with multitude of enemies, as though they could preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be mo on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that we should be ledde away from God by Angels which are ordeined for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among vs? But they doe leade vs away in deede, if they do not streight lead vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eye vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his hands

Gen. 28. 13. that moue themselves to no worke but by his direction : if they do not holde vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that wee may hang wholly of him, leane all vpon him, be caried to him and rest in him . For that which is described in the vision of Iacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our mindes, how Angels descend downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe go vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lord of hostes . Whereby is ment, that by the only intercession of Christ it cometh to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter ye shal see the heauens open & the Angels descending to y^e Sonne of man. Ioh. 1. 51. Therefore the seruant of Abraham being committed to the custody of the Angel, doth not therefore call vpon the Angel to helpe him, but holpen with y^e commendation, he praicth to the Lord, and beseecheth him to shewe his mercy to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them ministers of his power & goodnes, to the intent to part his glory with them : so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministracion, that we should diuide our confidence betweene him & them . Let vs therefore forsake that Platonicall philosophie, to seeke y^e way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose that they may make God more gentle vnto vs: which superstitious and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

Gen. 24. 7. Plato in E-pynonide & Cratilo.

13 As for such thinges as the Scripture teacheth concerning deuils, they rende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be carefull to beware afore hand of their awaites and preparations, & furnish our selues with such weapons as are strong & sure enough to driue away euen the strongest enemies. For whereas Sathan is called the God and prince of the worlde, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring lion: these descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more ware and watchfull, and readier to enter in battaile with him. Which is also sometime set out in expresse wordes . For Peter after he had sayde, that the deuill goeth about like a roaring lyon, seeking whome hee may deuour, by & by addeth this exhortation, y^ewe strongly resist him by Faith. And Paul after he had giuen warning that we wastle not with flesh & blood, but with the princes of the ayre, the powers of darkenesse, and spirituall wickednesses, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great and dangerous a battaile . Wherefore let vs also applie all to this ende, that being warned howe there doeth continually approach vpon vs an enemy, yea an enemy that is in courage most hardy, in strength most mightie, in policies most sutable, in diligence and celeritie vnweariable, with all sortes of engins plenteously furnished, in skill of warre most ready, we suffer not our selues by slouth and cowardise to be surprisid, but on the other side with bolde and hardy mindes set our foote to resist him: and (because this warre is onely ended by Death) encourage our selues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weakenesse and vnskilfulnesse, let vs call vpon the helpe of God and enterprise nothing but vpon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, strength, courage and armour.

14 And that we should be the more stirred vp and enforced so to do, the Scripture

Scripture warneth vs, that there are not one or two or a few enemies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is saide, that Mary Magdalene was deliuered from seuen diuels, wherewith she was possessed. And Christ saith, that it is y^e ordinary custome, that if after a diuel be once cast out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth seuen spirites worse than himselfe, and returneth into his possession, finding it empty. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that wee must fight with an infinite multitude of enemies, least despising the fewenesse of them we should be more slacke to enter in battaile, or thinking that we haue some respite in the meane time graunted, we should giue our selues to idleness. Where as many times Satan or the diuell is named in the singular number, thereby is ment that power of wickednes which standeth against the kingdome of Iustice. For as the Church and y^e fellowship of Saints haue Christ to their head, so the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, that hath the chiefe authority among them. After which manner this is spoken. Goe ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the diuell and his angels.

15 Here also this ought to stirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diuell, for that he is euery where called the enemy of God and of vs. For if we haue regarde of Gods glory, as it is meete we should, then ought we with all our force to bend our selues against him, that goeth about to extinguishe it. If we be affectioned to mainetaine the kingdome of Christ as we ought, then must we needes haue an vnappeasable warre with him that conspireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne safetie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in waite for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the 3. chap. of Genesis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honor, and throweth man himselfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Euangelistes, where he is called an enemy, and is saide to scatter rates, to corrupt the seede of eternall life. In summe, that which Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murderer, and a lyer, we finde by experience in all his doings. For he assaileth the truth of God with lyes, obscureth the light with darkenesse, entangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiseth vp hatredes, kindleth contentions and strifes, doeth all things to this end to ouerthrow the kingdome of God and drowne men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Wherby appeareth, that he is of nature frowarde, spitefull & malicious. For needs must there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to assaile the glory of God and saluation of men. And that doth Iohn speake of in his epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the authour, captaine and principall workeman of all malice and wickednesse.

16 But forasmuch as the diuell was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which we assigne in his nature, is not by creation but by deprauation. For what so euer damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne reuolting and fall. Which the scripture therefore giueth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, wee shoulde ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him: For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lyes, and addeth a cause why, for that he stode not still in the truth. Now when he saith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had bene in the truth. And when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this frō him, that he cannot lay that fault to God whereof hee himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose to deliuer the maiestie of God from all sclaunder. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning deuils? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doeth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things doe nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to bee but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not be seeming for y^e holy ghost to feed curiositie with vaine histories without any fruit: and wee see that it was the Lords purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but y^e which we should learne to edification. Therefore, least we our selues shoulde tarie long vpon things superfluous, let vs be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of Deuils, y^e at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by swaruing out of kinde they both destroyed themselues and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to be knowen, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude. God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels doeth without doubt secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

17 As for the discorde & strife that we say is betweene God & Satan, we must so take it y^e still wee hold this for certaine, that hee can doe nothing but by the wil & sufferance of God. For we read in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receyue his cōmandements, & durst not go forward to do any enterprife til he had obtained licence. So when Achab to be deceiued he tooke vpon him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, and so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the euill spirite of the Lord y^e tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sins of the wicked king were punished. And in an other place it is written, y^e the plagues were laid vpon y^e Egyptians by y^e euill angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testifie, y^e the blinding of y^e wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is euident therefore y^e Satan is vnder the power of God, & so gouerned by his authoritie y^e he is compelled to doe him seruice. Now when we say that Satan resisteth God, y^e the works of Satan disagree with the workes of God, wee doe therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the sufferance of God. I speake not nowe of his will, nor of his endeuor, but of the effecte onely. For sith the deuill is wicked of nature, he is not enclined to obey the wil of God, but is wholly caried to stubbornesse stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickednesse he is stirred vp to the enterprising of those things that hee knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tyed & restrayned with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those things that are graunted him from God. And so doeth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to applie his seruice whither soeuer God compelleth him.

18 Nowe because God boweth the vncleane Spirites hither & thither, as pleaseth him, he so tempereth this gouernment, that they exercise the faithfull with battell, they set vpon them out of ambushes, they assaile them with inuasions, they presse them with fighting, and oftentimes wearie them, trouble them, make them affraide, and sometime wounde them, but neuer ouercome nor oppresse them. But y^e wicked they subdue & draw away, they raigne vpon their soules and bodies, & abuse them as bondslaves to all mischeuous doings. As for the faithfull, because they are vnquieted of such enimies, therefore they heare these exhortations. Doe not giue place to the Deuill. The deuill your enimie goeth about as a roaring lyon seeking whom hee may deuoure, whome resist yee being strong in faith, and such like. Paul confesseth that he himselfe was not free from this kinde of strife, when hee saith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whome he might be humbled. This exercise therefore is common to all the children of God. But because that same promise of the breaking of Sarahs heade pertaineth generally to Christ and to all his members, therefore I say that the faithfull can neuer be ouercome nor oppressed by him. They are many times stricken downe, but they are neuer so astonied withall but that they recouer themselues. They fall downe many times with violence of strokes, but they are after raised vp againe: they are wounded but not deadly. Finally they so labour in all the course of their life that in y^e end they obteyne the victorie: but I speake not this of euerie doing of theirs. For we knowe y^e by the iust vengeance of God Dauid was for a time giuen ouer to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cause. Paul saith there is hope of pardon, least if any haue bene entangled with y^e snares of the deuill. Therefore in an other place the same Paul saith, that the promise aboue alleaged is begonne in this life, wherein we must wrastle, and is performed after our wrastling ended: when he saith the God of peace shall shortly beate downe Satan vnder your feete. This victorie hath alway fully bene in our heade Christ, because the Prince of the worlde had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doeth now partly appeare and shall be persfited, when being vnclouted of our flesh by which wee are yet subiect to weakenesse, we shall be full of the power of the Holy ghost. In this manner when the kingdome of Christ is raised vp and aduanced, Satan with his power falleth downe as the Lord himselfe saith. I sawe Satan fall as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this aunswere hee confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Againe, I Luk. 10. 18. are are in peace, but when there commeth a stronger, he is throwen out &c. And to this ende Christ in dying ouercame Sathan which had the power of death, and triumphed vpon all his armies that they shoulde not hurte the Church, for otherwise they woulde euerie moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakenesse, and what is his furious strength) howe coulde we stande, yea neuer so little time against his manifolde and continuall assautes, but being supported by the victorie of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuell to raigne ouer the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked and vnbeleeuing to gouerne, whome God doeth not vouchsafe to haue reckened in his flocke. For it is saide that hee possesseth this worlde without controuersie till he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that hee doeth blinde all them that beleuee not the Gospell, againe, that hee performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and worthilie, for all the wicked are the vesselles of his wrathe. Therefore to whome shoulde they be rather subiect then to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally they are sayde to bee of their Father the Deuil, because as the faithfull are hereby knowen to bee the children of God, because they beare his image: so they by the image of Sathan into which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children.

19 As wee haue before confuted that trifling Philosophie concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth vp in the mindes of men: so in this place must wee confute them that fondly say that deuils are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of minde, that are thrust into vs by our flethe. That may we shortly doe, because there bee many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vpon this pointe. First where the vnclene Spirites are called, Angels, Apottataes, which haue swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the verie names doe sufficiently expresse that they are not motions or affections of mindes, but rather in deede as they bee called mindes or Spirites endued with sense and vnderstanding.

1. Iohn. 3. 8. Likewise whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Deuill: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of y^e Deuill signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plainely, that the diuill sinneth from the beginning. Likewise when Iude bringeth in Michael y^e Archangel fighting with y^e deuill, doubtles he setteth against y^e good Angel an euill & rebellious Angel. Where with agreeeth that which is read in the historie of Iob, that Sathan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the iudgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Sonne of Dauid, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Agayne, Goe ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the Deuill and his Angels. Againe, If hee spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into cheines of darkenesse to bee kept vnto damnation, &c. Howe sonde shoulde these speeches bee, that the Deuilles are ordeyned to eternall iudgement, that fire is prepared for for them, that they are nowe already tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleue the worde of the Lord, and litte good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new: I suppose I haue performed that which I purposed, that is that the godlie minds should be furnished against such fond errors, wherwith vnquiet men do trouble both themselves and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they thinke they haue none to stand against them, should waxe more slowe and vnprouided to resist.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearisome vnto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinary workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere already saide, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember that what way soeuer we turne our eyes, all that we see are \dot{y} workes of God, and with godly consideration to wey for what ende God did make them. Therefore that we may conceiue by Faith so much as behoueth vs to knowe of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the worlde, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterwarde more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his word and Spirite created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought foorth all liuing creatures and thinges without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of thinges, to euerie thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidinges, and where all thinges are subiect to corruption, yet hath he so prouided that of all sortes some shalbe preferued to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secrete meanes, and powreth nowe and then as it were a newe liuelinesse into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to encrease by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not dye together. So hath he marueilously garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plenty, variety and beauty of all thinges as possibly might be, as it were a large & gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stuffe, last of all howe in framing man and adorning him with so goodly beauty, & with so many and so great giftes, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set foorth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to haue ouce againe touched these fewe thinges by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller vnderstanding of this matter out of Moses and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conueied the historie of the world by writing to perpetuall memorie.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much a doe in disputing, to what ende the consideration of the workes of God ought to tende, or to what marke it ought to be applied: forasmuch as in other places already a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe wordes be ended. Truely if we were minded to set out as it is worthie, how inestimable wisdom, power, iustice and goodnes of God appeareth in the framing of the worlde, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech, could suffice the largenes of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure y^e we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditation, that while we beholde in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite richesse of his wisdom, iustice, bountie and power, we should not runne ouer them as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandring looke as I may so call it, but that wee should with consideration rest long vpon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeat them with remembrance. But because we are nowe busied in y^e kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is met that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short, let the readers know, that then they haue conceiued by Faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniuersall rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to applie themselues that they may therewith bee thoroughly moued in their hartes. The first of those we do when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was to place & aptly set in so well disposed order the multitude of y^e starres that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautifull to behold: to set & fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot moue, and to othe. some to graunt a free course, but so that in mouing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all that it may diuide in measure the dayes and nightes, monethes, yeares, and seasons of the yeare, and to bring this inequalitye of dayes which we dayly see to such a tempered order y^e it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we mark his power in susteyning so great a body, in gouerning the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, and such like. For these fewe examples do sufficiently declare what it is to recorde the power of God in the creation of the worlde. For else if I should trauell as I saide to expresse it all in wordes I shoulde neuer make an end, for asmuch as there are so manie miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisdom, as there be formes of thinges in the world, yea as there be things either great or small.

22 Now remaineth the other part which cometh neerer to Faith, that while we consider that God hath ordayned al things for our guard & safety, and therewithall do feele his power and grace in our selues, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby stirre vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, prayse and loue of him. Nowe as I haue before saide, God himselfe hath shewed in the verie order of creation, that for mans sake he created all thinges. For it is not without cause that he diuided the making of the world into sixe dayes, whereas it had ben as easie for him in one moment to haue in all pointes accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to y^e end of it. But then it pleased him to shewe his prouidence & fatherly carefulnesse toward vs, y^e before he made man he prepared all that he foresaw should be profitable for him him and fit for this preservation. Howe great vnthankfulnesse now should it be to doubt whether this good Father doe care for vs, whome wee see to haue ben careful for vs ere that we were borne? How wicked were it to trebble for distrust least his goodnesse woulde at anie time leaue vs destitute in necessitie, which we see was displayed for vs being not yet borne, with great abundance of all good things? Beside that we heare by Moses that by his liberalitie all that euer is in the worlde is made subiect to vs. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an emptie name of gift. Therefore wee shall neuer lacke any thing, so far as it shall be auailable for our preservation. Finally to make an end, so oft as we name God the creator of heauen & earth, let this come in our mindes withall, that the disposition of all things which he hath create, is in his hande and power, and that we are his children who he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring vp: that we may looke for all good things at his hande, and assuredly that he wil neuer suffer vs to lacke things needfull for our safetie, to the ende our hope should hang vpon none other: y whatsoeuer we desire our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing soeuer wee receiue profite we may acknowledge it to be his benefite, and confesse it with thanks giuing: that being allured with so great sweetnesse of his goodnesse and liberaltie, we may study to loue and honour him with all our heart.

The xv. Chapter.

What a one man was created. wherein there is entreated of the powers of the soule, of the image of God, of free will and of the first inegritie of nature.

NOwe must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the workes of God the most noble and most excellent example of his iustice, wise dome and goodnes: but also because as we haue saide in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, vnlesse wee haue withall a mutuall knowledge of our selues. Although the same knowledge be of two sortes, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to bee after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profite for vs to know our creation, vnlesse wee did also in this lamentable fall knowe what is the corruption and deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time we will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before wee descende to this miserable estate wherevnto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take heed that in precisely declaring onely the naturall euils of man, we seeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh her selfe to haue sufficient defense in this colour, if it may lay for herselfe that whatsoeuer fault she hath, the same did after a certaine manner proceede from G O D, and sticketh not if shee be accused, to quarrell with G O D, and to lay the fault vpon him whereof she is worthily accused. And they that woulde seeme to speake somewhat more reuerently of y maiestie of God, yet do willingly seeke to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein though not openly they blame God also, to whose reproch it shoulde fall if it were proued that there is any fault in nature. Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the wayes to escape, whereby shee thinketh the blame of her owne euils may any way be put of from her, wee must diligently trauell to meet with this mischeefe. Therefore wee must so handle the calamitie of mankinde that wee cut off all excuse, and deliuer the iustice of God from all accusation. Afterwarde in place conuenient wee shall see howe far men be nowe from that purenesse that was giuen to Adam. And first wee must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and claye, a bridle was put vpon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, than for them to glorie in their excellencie that doe not onely dwell in a cotege of claye, but also are themselues in parte but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vessell, but also it was his pleasure that it shoulde bee the dwelling house of an immortall Spirit, Adam might iustly glorie in so great liberalitie of his maker.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule & body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortall essence, and yet created, which is the nobler part of hum. Sometime it is called the Spirit. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirit are ioyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirit is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, saith that then the spirit returneth to him that gaue it. And Christ commending his Spirit to his Father, and Stephen his Spirit to Christ doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is deliuered from the prison of the fleshe, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essence: both the thing it selfe and all the Scripture sheweth that they doe too much grossly erre. True it is that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to bee, they waxe dull, yea because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darkenesse, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliuie after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkenesse, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortalitie. Surely the conscience which discerning betweene good and euill answereth the iudgement of God, is an vndoubted signe of an immortall Spirit. For howe coule a motion without essence attaine to come to the iudgement seate of God, and throwe it selfe into feare by finding her owne guiltinesse? For the bodie is not moued with feare of a Spirituall paine, but that falleth onely vpon the Soule. Whereby it followeth that the soule hath an essence. Moreouer the verie knowledge of God doeth prouue that the soules which ascende vp about the worlde are immortall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attaine to the fountayne of life. Finally forasmuch as so many excellent giftes wherewith mans minde is endued, do crie out that there is some diuine thing engrauen in it, there are euē so many testimonies of an immortall essence. For y sense which is in brute beastes, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimbleness of the minde of man which veweth the heauen and earth and secrets of nature, and comprehending all ages in vnderstanding and memory, digesteth euery thing in order and gathereth things to come by things past, doth plainly shew that there lyeth hidden in man a certaine thing seueral from the body. We conceiue by vnderstanding the inuisible God and Angels, which the body can not do. We knowe things that be right, iust, and honest, which are hidden from y^e bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the Spirit is the seat of this vnderstanding. Yea and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witnesse of immortality, forasmuch as it doth not onely minister vnto vs, thoughtes of those things that neuer were done, but also foreknowinges of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers do excellently set out with more gorgeous garnishment of wordes: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by it self seueral from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death wee remove out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put of that which is corruptible, y^e finally at the last day we may receiue reward euery man as he hath behaued himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we do ech where cōmonly light vpon, do not only manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giuing to the soule the name of man do shew that it is the principall part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithful to cleanse themselues from al defiling of the flesh and the Spirite, he maketh two partes of man wherein abiderth the filthiness of sin. And Peter where he calleth Christ y^e shepheard and bishop of soules, should haue spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conueniently stande together which he sayeth of the eternall saluation of soules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he sayth that euill desires doe fight against the soule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues sayth, that the Pastors do watch that they may yelde account for our soules, vnlesse it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witnesse to his owne soule, because it coulde not bee called in iudgement before God vnlesse it were subiect to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to feare him which after that hee hath killed the body, can throwe the soule into hell fier. Now where the author of the Epistle to y^e Hebrues doth distinguish y^e Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the only Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirme y^e essence of soules. Moreouer, if the soules remained not aloue being deliuered from the prisons of their bodies, Christ should very fondly haue brought in the soule of Lazarus ioying in the bosome of Abraham, and againe the soule of the rich man subiect to horrible tormentes. The same thing doth Paul confirme when he teacheth that wee wander abraode from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enjoy his presence being out of the fleshe.

But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will adde onely that this out of Luke, that it is reckened among the errorrs of the Sadduces that they did not beleue that there were any Spirits and Angels.

Gen. 1.27.

3 Also a strong prooffe hereof may be gathered of this where it is sayde, that man is create like to the image of God. For although the glory of God do appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no dout that the proper seate of the image of God is in the soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape, in asmuch as the same doth distinguish and seuer vs from brute beastes, we doe also therein more neerely approach to God than they: neither will I much stand against them which thinke y^e this is to be accounted of the image of God, that where all other liuing creatures doe grow: llingwise behold the ground, to man is giuen an vpright face, & he is commanded to looke vpon the heauen, & to aduance his countenance toward the starres: so that this remaine certaine, y^e the image of God which is seene appeareth in these outward signes, is spirituall. For Oslander (whome his writings declare to haue bin in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the image of God without difference as well to the body as to y^e soule, minglet heauen and earth together. For he sayth, that the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stand without falling, yet should Christ haue become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But where shall he finde that Christ is the image of the Spirite? I grant in deede y^e in the Person of the Mediator shineth the glory of the whole Godhead. But how shall the eternall word be called the image of the Spirite whom he goeth before in order? Finally it ouerthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne & the Holy ghost, if he do here call him his image. Moreouer I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy ghost in the flesh that he tooke vpon him, and by what markes & features he doth expresse y^e likenesse of him.

Gen. 1.16.

And whereas this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe: which is against all reason. Beside that, if Oslanders inuention be beleueed, man was fashioned onely after the figure and paterne of Christ in that he was man, & so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, where as the Scripture in a farre other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their suttile inuention is more colourable which do thus expounde it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the onely image of God. But that exposition also is not founde. Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenes, while they seeke a difference betweene those two wordes, where is no difference at all, saying that this word Likenes is added to expound the other. First we know that among the Hebrues such repetitions are common, wherein they expresse one thing twise: and in the thing it selfe there is no doubt, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Wherby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which do so suttely argue about the wordes, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of the soule, or Demuth, that is to say, Likeneſſe in the qualities, or what other thing ſoever it be that they teach. For where as God determined to create man after his owne image, this being ſomewhat darkely ſpoken, he doth as by way of explication repete it in this ſaying, After his likeneſſe, as if he would haue ſayd, that he would make man, in whom he would represent himſelfe, as in an image, becauſe of the markes of likeneſſe grauen in him. And therefore Moſes a litle after reciting the ſame thing, doeth repete the Image of God twiſe, leauing out the name of Likenes. And it is a trifling obiection that Oſiander maketh, y^e not a part of man, or the ſoule onely with the giſtes thereof, is called the Image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuen him of the earth, from whence hee was taken. Trifling, I ſay, wil all readers that haue their found wit iudge this obiection. For whee whole man is called mortall, yet is not the ſoule thereby made ſubieſt to mortality. Again, where he is called a liuing creature endued with reaſon, it is not therby ment y^e the body hath reaſon & vnderſtanding. Although therfore the ſoule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconuenient, that man in reſpect of the ſoule be called the image of God, albeit I hold ſtill that principle which I haue before ſtabliſhed, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellence, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kindes of liuing creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integrity that man had when he was endued with right vnderſtanding, when he had his affection framed according to reaſon, and all his ſenſes gouerned in right order, and when in excellent giſtes he did truly reſemble the excellence of his Creator. And though the principall ſeate of the image of God were in the minde and heart, or in the ſoule and the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, nor ſo much as the body, wherein did not ſome ſparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is that alſo in all the partes of the worlde, there do ſhine ſome reſemblance of the glorie of God: whereby we may gather that where it is ſayde, that his Image is in man, there is in ſo ſaying a certaine ſecret compariſon, that auanceth man about all other creatures, and doth as it were ſeuer him from the common fort. Neither is it to be denied, that the Angels were create after the likeneſſe of God, ſith (as Chriſt himſelfe teſtifieth) our chiefe perfection ſhall be to become like vnto them. But not without cauſe doth Moſes by that peculiar title ſet forth the grace of God toward vs, ſpecially where he compareth onely viſible creatures with man.

Mat. 22. 30.

4 But yet it ſeemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, vnleſſe it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: & whereby he ought to be counted a glaſſe, reſembling the glory of God. But y^e can be by no other thing better knowen, than by the repaying of mans corrupted nature. Firſt it is doubtleſſe, y^e when Adam fell from his eſtate, he was by that departure eſtranged from God. Wherefore although we grant y^e the Image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it ſo corrupted, that all that remaineth, is but vgly deformity. Therefore the beginning of recouery of ſafety for vs, is in that reſtoring which we obtaine by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored vs vnto true and perfect integrity. For although where Paul doth in comparison set the quickning Spirit that Christ giueth to the faithfull, against the liuing soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principal point, that this is the ende of our regeneration, that Christ should new fashion vs to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renewed according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeth this saying: put on the new man which is create according to God. Nowe it is to be seene what Paul doth principally cōprehend vnder this renewing. First he speaketh of knowledge, and after of pure righteousnesse and holinesse. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the minde, in the vprightnesse of heart, and soundnesse of all the partes. For although I graunt that this is a figuratiue phrasē of speech to set the part for the whole: yet can not this principle be ouerthrowen, that that thing which is y^e chiefe in the renewing of the image of God, was also y^e principall in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in another place he teacheth, that we beholding the glorie of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Nowe do we se how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to the which we being fashioned are so restored, that in true godlinesse, righteousnesse, purenesse and vnderstanding, we beare the image of God. Which principle being established, Oslanders imagination of the shape of our body doth easily vanish away of it selfe. Where as the man alone is in Paul called the Image and glory of God, & the woman is excluded from that degree of honor, it appeareth by the rest of the text, y^e same is to be applied only to ciuile order of policy. But that vnder the name of image, whereof we speake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spirituall and eternall life, I thinke it be already sufficiently proued. And the same thing doth Iohn confirme in other words: saying that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall word of God was y^e light of men. For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, wherby man excelleth all liuing creatures to seuer him from the common sorte, because he hath attained no common life, but ioyned with the light of vnderstanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore sith the image of God is the vncorrupted excellence of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted: and almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but disordered, mangled, and filthily spotted: yet y^e same doth in some part appeare in the elect, insomuch as they are regenerate, & shal obtaine her ful brightnes in heauen. But y^e we may know en what partes it consisteth, it shall be good to entreate of the powers of the soule. For that speculatiue deuise of Augustine is not sounde, where he saith that the soule is a glasse of the Trinity, because that there are in it vnderstanding, wil, and memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approued, which set the Image of God in the power of dominion giuen vnto him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed lord and possessor of all things, where as in deede the Image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

5 But before I goe any further, it is needeful that I meet with the doting error of the Manichees, which Seructo hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is sayd, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie euen shortly to shewe how many grosse and foule absurdities this deuill^{is}the error draweth with it. For if the soule be by deriuation part of the essence of God, it shall follow that the nature of God is subiect, not only to change and passions, but also to ignorance, euill lustes, weakenesse, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do tosse and diuersly drawe his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yeldeth as vanquished euen to smal tentations, and we knowe that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receiuer of al filthines, al which thinges we must ascribe to the nature of God, if we graunt that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secret inflowing of godheade. Who would not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truly in deede doth Paul alledge out of Aratus, that we are the ofspring of God, but in quality and not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly giftes. But in the meane time to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that euery man doth possesse a part of it, is too much madnes. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created then the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirite of man came from God, and in departing out of the flethe returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be saide, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this point also Osiander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly error, not acknowledging y^e image of God to be in man without his essential iustice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirite could not make vs like vnto him selfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially powre himselfe into vs. With whatsoever colour many do goe about to disguise these deceites, yet shal they neuer so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wittes, but that they will easily see that these thinges fauour of the Manichees error. And where saint Paul entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his wordes, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his Spirite. For he sayeth, that in beholding the glory of Christ we are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spirite of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs of one substance with God.

6 It were but folly to borow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortal substance. In deede some other also, y^e is the Socratics, do touch it, but so as none doth plainly reach y^e to other, which himself was not perswaded. But therefore is Plato of the better iudgement, because he doth in y^e soule consider the image of God. Some other do so bind the powers & vertues of y^e soule to this present life, y^e being out of the body they leaue to it nothing. Now we haue already taught by the Scripture, y^e it is a bodilesse substance: now must we adde y^e although properly it is not cōprehended in place, yet it is set in y^e body, & doth there dwel as in a house, not only to minister life to all y^e partes of y^e body, & to make the instruments thereof mere & fitly seruing for the actions y^e they are appointed for, but also to beare y^e chief office in governing the life of man, and y^e not only about the dueties in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the seruice of God. Although this later point in this corruptiō is not plainly perceived, yet euen in y^e vices theselues there remaine emprinted some leauings thereof. For whence cōmeth it but of shame, y^e men haue so great care what be reported of the? And whence cōmeth shame, but of regard of honestie? Wherof the beginning & cause is, y^e they vnderstād that they are naturally borne to obserue Iustice, in which perswasion is enclosed y^e seede of religion. For as wout all controuersie man was made to meditation of y^e heauenly life: so is it certain y^e the knowledge thereof was engrauen in his soule. And surely man should want the principal vse of his vnderstanding, if he should be ignorant of his own felicity, whereof the perfection is y^e he be ioyned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire therunto. And so the more y^e euery man studieth to approach vnto God, y^e more he thereby proueth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them y^e would haue diuers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, & a reasonable soule, although they seme to say sō what by reason prouable, yet because there is no stedfast certainty in their reasons, wee must reiect thē, vnlesse we list to accōber our selues in things trifling & vnprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betwene y^e instrumentall motions & the part of the soule endued wth reaso. As though reason it selfe did not also dissent frō it self, & some deuise of it do striue with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as y^e troublesomnes proceedeth of y^e corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather thereby, y^e there are two soules, because the powers of the soule do not agree together, in such wel framed order as they ought. But as for more futtle disputatiō of y^e Powers theselues, I leaue y^e to the Philosophers. A simple definition shal suffice vs for edification of godlines. I grāt y^e the things that they teach are true, & not only pleasant but also profitable to be knowen, and wel gathered of them, & I forbid not such as are desirous to learn to study them. First therefore I admir y^e there are fiue Senses, which Plato better liked to call Instrumentes, whereby all objects, are powred into Cōmon sense, as into a place of receipt: then foloweth Phāntasie, which iudgeth those things one from other y^e Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belongeth y^e vniuersal iudgement of things: last, is y^e Vnderstanding mind, which with earnestly bent & quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse vpon, & consider. And to the Vnderstanding mind, Reason, & Phantasie, which are y^e three powers of the soule, y^e rest in knowledge, there do answer three other y^e do rest in Appetite, that is to say, Wil, the parts wherof are to coact those things y^e the Vnderstanding mind & Reason do lay before it: y^e power of Anger, which catcheth those things y^e Reason & Phantasie do minister vnto it.

The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of those things y^e Phansie and Sense, presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at least likely to be true, yet because I feare y^e they shall more entangle vs with obscurenes than further vs, I thinke it best to ouerpasse them. If any man list otherwise to diuide the powers of the soule, & to cal the one y^e power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meane directed, & to call the other the power of vnderstanding, which is by it selfe partaker of reason, I am not much against it, neither wil I confute this opinion, y^e there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Vnderstanding, & Appetite. But let vs rather choose a diuision, that is within y^e capacitie of all men, which can not be had of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speak most plainly, do diuide the soule into Appetite & Vnderstanding, but either of these they make of two sortes. Vnderstanding, they say, is sometime Cōtemplatiue, which being contented with only knowledg, hath no mouing of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingeniu, wit. Sometime they say it is practicall, which by conceiuing of good or euill doth diuersly moue the Will. And appetite they do diuide into Wil, & Lust. Wil they cal y^e when Appetite which they cal Horne, obeyeth to reason, and Lust they call that when the appetite shaking off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, wherby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

7. But we are constayned somewhat to swarue from this manner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not y^e corruption of mans nature, which came for punishmēt of his fall, do wrongfully confound y^e two very diuerse states of man. Let vs therefore thus thinke of it, y^e there are in y^e soul of man two parts, which shal serue at this time for our present purpose, y^e is to say, Vnderstanding and Will. And let it be the office of Vnderstanding, to discern betweene objects, or things set before it, as ech of the shal seem worthy to be liked or disliked: and the office of Will to chose & follow that which vnderstanding saith to be good, and to refuse and flee y^e which Vnderstanding shall disallowe. Let vs not here be stayed at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotle, that the minde hath of it selfe no mouing, but that it is choise which moueth it, which choise he calleth the desiring vnderstanding. But to the ende we be not entangled with superfluous questions, let this suffice vs, that the Vnderstanding is as it were the guide and gouernour of the soule, and that Wil hath alwayes regard to the appointment of Vnderstanding, and abideth the iudgement thereof in her desires. According wherunto, Aristotle himselfe hath truely sayd, y^e fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thinge, as in y^e vnderstanding minde is affirming and denying. Now how certaine the gouernment of Vnderstanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in an other place. Here we meane onely to shewe that there can be found no power in the soule but that may well be sayde to belong to the one of these two members. And in this sort vnder Vnderstanding we comprehend Sense, which other doe so distinguish, that they say Sense is enclined to pleasure, for which Vnderstanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the Appetite of sense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of vnderstanding is Will. Againe in steede of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly vsed.

8 God therefore hath furnished the soule of man with an vnderstanding minde, whereby he might discern good from euill, and right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers haue called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adioyned Will, to which belongeth choise. With these noble giftes the first state of man excelled, so that he not onely had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisdom, and iudgement, for the gouernement of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euen to God & to eternall felicity. Then to haue Choise added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, & order all the instrumental motions, and that so y^e Wil might be altogether agreeable to the gouernement of reason. In this Integritie, man had freewill, whereby if he would he might haue attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to moue question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to discuss what might haue chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might haue stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not giuen him constancy to continue, therefore he so easily fel. Yet his Choise of good and euil was free. And not that only, but also in his vnderstanding minde, and in his will was most great vprightnesse, & al his instrumental partes orderly framed to obedience, vntil by destroying himselfe he corrupted y^e good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, and for strong ioyns in an vnioynted ouerthrowe. This principle they helde, that man could not be a liuing creature, endned with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good and euill: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betweene vertues and vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his owne aduise. Thus farre had they sayd well if there had bin no change in man, which chaunge because they knewe not of, it is no maruile though they confounde heauen and earth together. But as for them which professing themselves to be the disciples of Christ, doe yet seeke for freewill in man, that hath bin lost and drowned in spirituall destruction, they in going meane between the Philosophers opinions and heauenly doctrine are plainely deceiued, so that they touche neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shall better speake in place fitte for them: now onely this we haue to holde in minde, that man at his first creation was far other than his posteritie cuer since, which taking their beginning from him beeing corrupted, hath from him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritance. For then all the partes of his soule were framed to right order; then stode safe the soundnesse of his vnderstanding minde, and his will free to chchose the good. If any do obiekt that it stode but in slippery state, because his power was but weake, I answere that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restrayne God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I graunt such a nature had bene better, but therefore precisely to quarell with God, as though it had bin his duetie to haue giuen that vnto man, is too much vniustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choise to giue howe much pleased him. But why hee did not vpholde him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secreete counsell: it is our part onely to bee so farre wise as with sobrietie we may. Man receaued in deede to bee able if hee would, but hee had not to will that hee might be able. For of this will shoulde haue followed stedfast continuance. Yet is hee not excuseable, which receued so much that of his owne will he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessitie to compell God to giue him any other than a meane will and a frayle will, that of mans fall hee might gather matter for his owne glorie.

The xvj. Chapter.

*That God by his pouuer doth nourish and maintaine the worlde, vvhich himselſe hath created, and by his prouidence doth gouerne
all the partes thereof.*

BUt it were verie fonde and bare to make God a creatour for a moment, which doeth nothing since hee hath once made an ende of his worke. And in this point principally ought wee to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the worlde, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the verie wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth are compelled to rise vp vnto the creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar maner by it selfe wherby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serueth that saying of the Apostle, which wee before alleaged, that wee doe not vnderstande but by faith, that the worlde was made by the word of God. For vnlesse wee passe forwarde euen vnto his prouidence, we doe not yet rightlie conceiue what this meaneth that God is the creator, howe soeuer we doe seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the fleshe hath once set before it the power of God in the verie creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth further of all, it doeth nothing but wey and consider the wisdom, power, & goodnesse of the workeman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thrust them selues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certayne generall doing in preseruing and gouerning the same, vpon which dependeth the power of mouing. Finally it thinketh y the liuely force at the beginning put into all things by God, doth suffice to susteyne them. But faith ought to percee deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to bee the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernor and preseruer of them: and that, not by stirring with an vniuersall motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the partes thereof, but by susteyning, cherishing and caring for, with singular prouidence euerie one of those things that hee hath created euen to the least sparowe. So Dauid after hee had first saide that the worlde was created by God, by & by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the worde of the Lorde (sayth hee) the heauens were stablished, and all the power thereof by the spirite of his mouth. By and by hee addeth, The

Lorde looked downe vpon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that he saith further to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleueed that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse hee were the maker of the worlde, nor any man doeth earnestly beleue that God made the worlde, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doeth by good order conuey vs from the one to the other. Generally indeed both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens mindes do conceiue that all partes of the world are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they arteine not so farre as Dauid both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying: all thinges waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them foode in due season. Thou giuest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hande and they are filled with good thinges. But if thou hide thy face, they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou sende fourth thy Spirit, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our being and are moued, and doe liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they tast not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is knowen.

Psa. 104. 27.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be knowen, that the Prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by aduenture. Nowe forasmuch as it hath bene commonly beleueed in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a maner in all men, that al things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue bene beleueed concerning Prouidence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beastes, if by winde sodenly rising hee suffer shipwracke on the sea, if hee bee killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if an other wandring in deserte places finde remedie for his pouertie, if hauing bene tossed with the waues, he atteyne to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduersitie the reason of the fleshe doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Christe, that all the heares of his head are numbred, wil seek for a cause further of, & will firmly beleue that all chaunces are governed by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although euery one of them haue his owne proprietie naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so far, as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therefore nothing else but instruments, whereby God continually poureth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his wil boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more miruellous or more glorious than of the sunne. For besides that it giueth light to the whole worlde with his brightnes, howe great a thing is this that he cherisheth and quickeneth all liuing creatures with his heate: y hee breatheth fruitfulnessse into the earth with his beames: that out of seedes warmed in the bosome of the ground, he draweth a budding greenesse, and sustaining the same with new nourishmentes doth encrease and strengthen it, til it rise vp in stalkes? That hee feedeth it with continuall vapour till it growe to a flower, and from a flower to fruite? That then also with baking it he bringeth it to ripenesse? That trees likewise and vines being warmed by him, do first bud and shoot forth braunches, & after send out a flower & of a flower doe engender fruite? But the Lorde because hee would chime the whole glorie of all these things to himselfe, made the light first to bee, and the earth to be furnished with all kindes of hearbes and fruits before y he created the sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the sunne to be either a principall or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of the sunne, but onely an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leaue it and doe all things as easily by himselfe. Then when we read that the sunne stode still two dayes in one degree at the prayer of Iosua, and that the shadow thereof went backe ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the sunne doth not dayly so rise and goe downe by blind instinct of nature, but that he to renue the remembrance of his fatherly fauor toward vs, doth gouerne the course thereof. Nothing is more naturall than spring tide to come immediatelie after winter, sommer after spring, & haruest in course after sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so greate and so vnegall diuerstie, that it may easily appeare that euerie yeare, moneth & day, is gouerned by a newe and speciall Prouidence of God.

3 And truly God doeth claime and will haue vs giue vnto him an almightinesse, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleeping, but waking, effectual, working and busied in continuall doing. Nor such a one as is onely a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if hee woulde commaunde a riuer to floue by his appointed chanel, but such a one as is bent and readie at all his particular mouinges. For he is therefore called almightie, not because hee can doe and yet sitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct onely continueth the order of nature that hee hath before appointed: but because he governing both heauen and earth, by his Prouidence so ordereth all things that nothing chaunceth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalme that he doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine and determined will. For it were verie sonde to expounde the Prophets wordes after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning & cause of all mouing: whereas the faithfull ought rather in aduersitie to ease themselves with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinaunce and commaundement of God, because they are vnder his hand. If then the gouernment of God do so extend to all his workes, it is a verie childish caualation to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraud God of his glorie than theselues of a most profitable doctrine, whofoeuer do restrain y Prouidence of God within so narrow bounds, as if he suffred all things to be caried with an vngouerned course according to a perpetuall law of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if hee shoulde be left subiect to euery motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth, & the waters.

Gen. 1. 3.

2. Kin. 20. 11.

Psal. 8. 3.

Beside that by that meane the singular goodnesse of God towards euery man is too much vn honorably diminished. Dauid crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers brestes are eloquent enough to magnifie the glorie of God, because euen so soone as they be come out of the wombe, they finde foode prepared for them by his heauenly care. This is in deed generally true, so that yet our eyes & senses ouerpasse not that vnmarked which experience plainly sheweth, that some mothers haue full and plentifull brestes, some other almost drie, as it pleaseth God to feede one more liberally, and an other more scarcely. But they which giue the due prayse to y^e almightinesse of God, doe receiue double profite thereby, the one that hee hath sufficiently large abilitie to do them good, in whose possession are both heauen and earth, and to whose becke all creatures do attende vpon, to yeelde themselues to his obedience: the other that they may safely rest in his protection, to whose will are subiect all these hurtefull things that may any way be feared, by whose authoritie as with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his furies and all his preparation, vpon whose backe doth hang all that euer is against our safetic. And no other way but this can the immeasurable and superstitious feares be corrected or appeased, which wee oftentimes conceyue by daungers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearefull I say we bee, if where creatures doe threaten vs or giue vs any cause of feare, we be so afraide thereof, as if they had of themselues any force or power to doe vs harme, or did vnforeseene or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against the hurtes that they doe, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophete forbiddeth the children of God that they shoulde not feare the starres and signes of the heauen, as the vnbeleeuers are wont to doe. Hee condemneeth not euery kinde of feare. But when the vnbeleeuers to giue away the government of the worlde from God vnto Planets, doe faine that their felicitie or misery doeth hang on the decrees and foreshewings of the starres, and not of the will of God, so commeth it to passe that their feare is withdrawn away from that onely one, whome they ought to haue regarded, vnto the starres and comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulnesse, let him keepe alwayes in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandring power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the secrete counsell of G O D, so that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it so to bee.

Ier. 10. 2.

4 First therefore let the readers learne, that Prouidence is called that, not wherewith God idley beholdeth from heauen what is done in the world, but wherewith as guiding the sterne hee setteth and ordreth all things that come to passe. So doeth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his eyes. For When Abraham sayde vnto his sonne, God shall prouide, hee meant not onely that God did forknowe the successe then to come, but that hee did cast the care of a thing to him vnknown vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confused to a certaine ende. Wherby followeth that Prouidence consisteth in doing: for too much fondely do many trifle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether so grosse which giue vnto God a government but disordered, and without aduised aduised choise, (as I haue before sayde,) that is to say such as whirlth and driueth about with a generall motion the frame of the world with all y parts thereof, but doeth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tollerable. For as they teach, it may bee (notwithstanding this Prouidence which they call vniuersall) that all creatures may bee moued by chaunce, or man may turne himselfe hither or thither by free choise of his will. And so doe they parte the gouernment betweene God and man, that God by his power inspireth into man a motion whereby hee may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doings by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefly they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themselues are gouerned by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicureans (which pestilence the worlde hath alwayes beene filled with) which dreame of an idle and slouthfull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did so rule about the middle region of the ayre, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For against so euident madnesse the dumme creatures themselues doe sufficiently crie out. For nowe my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly belceued, which giuing to God a certaine blind, and I wot not what vncertaine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is by his incomprehensible wisdome to direct and dispose all things to their ende: and so in name onely and not in deede it maketh God a ruler of the worlde, because it taketh from him the gouernment of it. For what (I beseech you) is it else to gouerne, but so to bee ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maiest rule them by appointed order? Yet doe I not altogether reiect that which is spoken of the vniuersall Prouidence: so that they will againe graunt mee this, that y world is ruled by God, not onely because hee mainteyneth the order of nature which himselfe hath set, but also because hee hath a peculiar care of euery one of his workes. True it is that all sortes of things are moued by a secrete instinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternall commaundement of God, and that that which God hath once determined doeth of it selfe proceede forward. And hereunto may that be applied which Christ saith, that hee and his Father were euen from the beginning alwayes working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him wee liue, are moued and haue our being, and that which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, meaning to prooue the Godhead of Christ, saith, that by his mightie commaundement all things are susteyned. But they doe wrong which by this colour doe hide and darken the speciall Prouidence, which is confirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture, that it is meruell that any man could doubt of it. And surely they themselues that drawe the same veile which I speake of to hide it, are compelled by way of correction to adde, that many things are done by the peculiar care of God, but then they do wrongfully restrayne the same only to peculiar doings. Wherefore we must prooue that God doeth so giue heede to the gouernement of the successes of all things, and that they all doe so proceed from his determinate counsell that nothing happeneth by chaunce.

Gen. 20. 8.

5 If we graunt that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselves or by chance caried whither the inclination of nature driueth them, the mutual succeeding by turnes of days and nights, of winter and somer, shalbe the worke of God, in somuch as he appoynting to euery one their duties hath set them a certaine law, that is if they should alway kepe one measure in egall proportion, as well the dayes y come after the nights, the monethes after monethes, & yeres after yeres. But whē sometimes immoderate heats with diuines do burne vp all y graine, sometime vnseasonable raines doe marre the corne, when sodaine harme commeth by haile and tempestes: that shal not be the worke of God, vnlesse perhap it be because the clouds or faire whether or colde or heate haue their beginning of the meting of the planetes or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no roume lefte, neither for the fatherly fauour nor for the iudgements of God. If they say that God is beneficiall enough to mankind because hee powreth into the heauen and earth an ordinarie power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine and prophane an inuention, as though the fruitfulnessse of one yere were not the singular blessing of God, and dearth and famine were not his curse and vengeance? But because it were too long to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritic of God himself suffice vs. In the law and in the Prophets hee doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with dew and raine, he declareth his fauour, and that when by his commaundement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blasting & other harmes, when the fieldes are stricken with haile and tempestes, it is a token of his certaine and speciall vengeance. If we graunt these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a droppe of raine but by the certaine commaundement of God. Dauid prayseth the generall Providence of God, that he giueth meat to the rauens birdes, that call vpon him: but when G O D himselfe threateneth famine to liuing creatures, doeth he not sufficiently declare that he sedeth all lyuing things sometime with scarce and sometime with more plentifull portion as hee thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparow of neuer so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his Father. Surely if the flying of birdes be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we needs confesse with the Prophet, that hee so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke vpon all things that chance in heauen and earth.

6 But because we knowe that the worlde was made principally for mākinde sake, we must therefore consider this end in the gouernance of man. The Prophete Hieremie crieth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steppes. And Salomon saith, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lorde, and howe shall a man dispose his owne way? Nowe let them say that man is moued by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that mouing whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truly saide, then should man haue the free choise of his owne wayes. Paraduerture they wil denie denie that, because he can doe nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certaine that the Prophet and Salomon doe giue vnto God, not onely power but also choise and appoyntment, they can not so escape away. But Salomon in an other place doeth finely rebuke this rashnesse of men, that appoint vnto themselues an other end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hande. The preparations (saith he) of the hart are in man, but the aunswere of the tongne is of the Lord. It is a fonde madnesse that men will take vpon them to doe things without God, which cannot so much as speake but what hee will. And the Scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at all is done in the worlde but by his appointment, sheweth that those things which seeme most happening by chaunce are subiect to him. For what can you more ascribe to chaunce, than when a broken bowe falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lorde saith farre otherwise, which confesseth that hee hath deliuered him into the hande of the slayer. Likewise who doeth not leaue the happening of lettes to the blindnesse of fortune? But the Lorde suffereth it not which clameth the iudgement of them to himselfe: for he saith that it cometh not to passe by a mans owne power that stones are cast into y lap and drawn out againe, but that thing which onely might be saide to come of chaunce he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon, The poore man and the vsurer meet together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men & rich be mingled together in the world, while euery one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which giueth light to all men is not blinde, and so he exhorteth the poore to patience, because whosoeuer are not contented with their owne state, they seeke to shake of the burthen that God hath laide vpon them. So an other Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lie in miserie and some arise vp to honour. To come to preferment is neither from the east nor from the west nor from the South, for God is the iudge, he maketh low and he maketh hie. Because God cannot put of the office of a iudge, therevpon the Prophet proueth that by his secreete purpose some are in honour, & other some remaine in contempt.

7 And also I say that the very particular successes are generally witnesses of Gods singular providence. God raised in the deserte a south winde to bring y people plentie of fowles: when his pleasure was to haue Ionas thrown into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tempest. But they y thinke y God gouerneth not y world, wil say y this chaunced beside comon vse. But therby I do garher y neuer any wind doeth rise or encrease but by y speciall cōmandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, y he maketh the winds his messengers, & fire flames his ministers, that he maketh the clouds his chariots and rideth vpon the wings of the winde, vnlesse he did by his will driue about the cloudes and windes, and shew in them the singular presence of his power. So in an other place wee are taught that so oft as y sea swelleth with blast of winds, those violences do testifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth & raiseth vp y stormie winds & it listeth vp the waues thereof thercof, and then hee turneth the storme to calme, so that the waues thereof are still. As in an other place hee saith, that hee scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendring is naturally giuen to men, yet God willeth it to bee imputed to his speciall grace, that he leaueth some in barrenesse, and vouchsafeth to graunt issue to other some, y^e fruite of the wombe is his gift. Therefore saide Iacob to his wife, am I as God that I can giue thee children? But to make an ende: there is nothing more ordinarie in nature than that wee be fed with breade. But the Holy Ghost pronounceth that not onely the growing of the fruites of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men liue not by onely bread, because it is not the verie full feeding that nourisheth, but the secreete blessing of God: as on the other side: hee threateneth that hee will breake the stay of breade. Neither coude wee earnestly pray for our dayly bread, vnesse God did giue vs foode with his fatherly hande. Therefore the Prophete, to perswade the faithfull, that God in feeding them doeth fulfill the office of a good father of householde, doeth put them in minde that hee giueth meate to all flesh. Finally when wee haue on the one side: The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his eares bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eye of the Lorde is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: let vs know that all creatures both aboue and beneath are ready to obedience that he may applie them to what vsf soeuer he will, wherevpon is gathered that not onely his generall providence remayneth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his meruellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper end.

8 They which woulde bring this doctrine in hatred, do cauill that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Destenie, which also was once layde for reproch to Augustine. As for vs, although wee bee loth to striue about wordes, yet wee allowe not this worde Fatum, both because it is one of those whose prophane noueltie Saint Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men do goe about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods trueth in haired. As for the verie opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laide to our charge. For wee doe not, as the Stoikes doe, imagine a necessitie by a certayne perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is conteyned in nature: but wee make God the iudge and gouernour of all things, which according to his wisdom hath euen from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what hee woulde doe, and nowe by his power putteth in execution that which hee hath decreed. Wherevpon we affirme that not onely the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and willes of men are so gouerned by his Providence, that they bee directly carried to the ende that it appointeth. What then? wil one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I answer that Basilius Magnus hath truly saide that fortune and chaunce are heathen mens wordes, with the signification whereof the mindes of the godly ought not to bee occupied. For if euery good successe be the blessing of God, and euerie calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, nowe is there in mens matters no place lefte for fortune or chaunce. Wee ought also to bee moued with this saying of Augustine. In his bookes against the Academikes he saith: It doth displeas me that I haue so oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant thereby, but only a chanceable happening in outward things either good or euil. Of which word Fortune are deriued those wordes which no religion forbiddeth vs to vse, forte, forsan, forsitán, fortasse, fortuito, that is parhap, paraduventure, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet must all be applyed to the Prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue vnspoken when I said, for parchance euen the same ȳ is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we call chance in things nothing els but ȳ whereof the reason and cause is vnknowen. I said this in dede, but it repenteth me that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men haue a very euill custome, ȳ where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased fortune. Finally he doth commonly in his bookes teach, that the world should be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in an other place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, & partly by the Prouidence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subiect vnto & ruled by Prouidence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against conuenience of reason, than to say that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for els it should happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hangeth vpon the will of men: and by & by after he plainlier saith that we ought not to seeke a cause of the wil of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be vnderstanded, shal very wel appeare by one place where he prooueth that the will of God is the soueraigne and first cause of all things, because nothing happeneth but by his commandement or sufferance. Surely he faineth not God to sit still idle in a watch toure, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he vseth an actuall wil (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

9 But forasmuch as the dulnesse of our vnderstanding can not by a great way attaine to the height of Gods prouidence, wee must vse a distinction to helpe to list it vp. I say therefore, how soeuer all things are ordeined by the purpose and certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chanceable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world & men, and vnadvisedly tosseth al things vp & downe (for such beastlinesse ought to be farre from a Christian heart) but because the order, meane, ende and necessity of those things that happen, doth for the most part lie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chanceable, which yet it is certaine to come to passe by the wil of God. For they seme no otherwise, whether we consider them in their own nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge & iudgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, ȳ a marchant being entred into a woode in companie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his felowes, & in his wandering chanceth vpon a den of robbers, lighteth among theues & is killed, his death was not onely foreseene with gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre ech mans life should extende, but that hee hath set and appointed markes which can not be passed. And yet so farre as the capacitie of our minde conceiueth, all things herein seeme happening by chaunce. What shall a Christian here thinke? euen this, what soeuer happened in such a death, he will thinke it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in deede, but yet he will not doubt that the prouidence of God did gouerne to direct fortune to her end. In like manner are the happenings of things to come. For as all things that be to come are vncerteine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either parte, yet this remaineth settled in our hearts, that nothing shall happen but that which God hath already foreseene. In this meaning is the name of chaunce oft repeted in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men do not attaine to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet y^e which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret prouidence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the hearts of men, but that euen in the darknesse there alway shined some sparkes therof. So the soothsayers of the Philistians, although they wauer in doubtfulnesse, yet they ascribe aduersitie partly to God, partly to fortune. If (say they) the arke go that way, we shall know that it is God that hath striken vs: but if it go the other way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deed they did foolishly, when their cunning of soothsaying deceiued them, to flee to fortune, but in the meane while wee see them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the cuill hap which chaunced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his prouidence turneth all successes whither pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold euen at one momēt of time, when Dauid was found out & neere taken in the desert of Mahon, euen then the Philistines inuaded the land, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to prouide for the safetie of his seruant did cast this let in Saules way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sodein, & beside the expectatiō of men, yet may we not say that it came by chance. But those things that seeme to vs to happen by chance, faith wil acknowledge to haue beene a secret mouing of God. I grant there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but vndoubtedly we ought to beleue that whatsoeuer changes of things are seen in y^e world, they come by the secret stirring of y^e hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely nor by the nature of it self. As thercof is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a bodie like vnto ours, no wise man wil deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible y^e they should be broken: whereby wee see againe y^e not without cause were in scholes inuented the distinctions of necessitie in respect, & necessitie absolute, of consequent and consequence, whereas God had subiect to bricklenesse the bones of his sonne, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessitie by reason of his own purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue bin.

The xvij. Chapter.

Whereto and to what ende this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

NOW forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious fittleties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encomber themselues with entangled

entangled doubts, whosoever doe not knowe the true and right vse of this Doctrin. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly to what ende the Scripture teacheth, that all thinges are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the providence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondarily that the same is in such sorte the governour of all thinges, that sometime it worketh by meanes, sometime without meanes, and sometime against all meanes. Last of all, that it tendeth to this ende, that God may shewe that hee hath care of all mankinde, but specially that hee doth watch in ruling of his Church, which he vouchsafeth more neerely to looke vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly fauour and bountifullnesse of God, or oftentimes the seueritie of his iudgement do brightly appeare in the whole course of his Providence: yet somtime the causes of those thinges that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our mindes, that mens matters are turned and whirled about with the blinde sway of fortune, or so that the flesh stirreth vs to murmure, as if God did to make himselfe pastime tosse them like tennise balles. True it is that if we were with quiet and still mindes ready to learne, the very successe it selfe would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to patience, or to correct their euill affections, or tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselues, or to awake their drowsinesse: on the other side to ouerthrowe the proude, to disappoint the suttletie of the wicked, to confounde their deuises. But whosoever the causes be secret and vnknownen to vs: wee must assuredly holde that they are layde vp in hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to cry out with Dauid, God, thou hast made thy wonderful works so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughtes toward vs. I woulde declare & speake of them, but they are more than I am able to expresse. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to thinke vpon our sins, that y^e very punishment may moue vs to repentaunce, yet doe we see how Christ giueth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish euery one according to his deseruing. For of him that was borne blinde he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but y^e the glory of God may be shewed in him. For here natural sense murmureth when calamitie commeth euen before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserued it. But Christ doth testifie y^e in this looking glasse the glory of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eyes to beholde it. But we must keepe modestie, that wee drawe not God to yelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret iudgements, that his wil be vnto vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thicke clouds do couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heauisome mystinesse is cast before our eyes, and the thunder troubleth our eares, & al our senses are amased with terrour, we thinke that al things are confounded and tumbled together: and yet all the while there remaineth in y^e heauen the same quietnesse and calmnesse, that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of things in y^e world taketh from vs abilitie to iudge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doeth in well framed order gouerne & dispose euen those very troublesome motions themselves to a right end. And surely very mostrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the workes of God to account and examine his secret meanings, and to giue vnaduised sentence of things vnknown, than they will doe of the deedes of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modestie toward our egals, that we had rather suspende our iudgement than to incurre the blame of rashnesse, and on the other side proudly to triumph vpon the darke iudgements of God, which it became vs to regarde with reuerence?

Psa. 40.

2 Therefore no man shal wel and profitably wey the Prouidence of God but he that considering that he hath to do with his creator and the maker of the worlde, doth with such humility as he ought submitte himselfe to feare and reuerence. Hereby it commeth to passe, that so many dogs at this day do with venimed bitings, or at lest barking assail this doctrine, because they will haue no more to be lawfull for God, than their owne reason informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefulnesse that they are able, for that not contented with the commandementes of the lawe, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, that the world is ruled by his secret counsels. As though the thing that we teach were an inuention of our owne braine, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth euey where expressly say the same, and repeteth it with innumerable formes of speech. But because some shame restraineth them, that they dare not vomit out their blasphemies against the heauen: they faine that they contend with vs, to the end they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what soeuer happeneth in the world, is gouerned by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them answere to what end the Scripture saith, that his iudgementes are a deepe bottomlesse deapth. For whereas Moses crieth out that the will of God is not to bee sought as farre of in the cloudes, or in the depthes, because it is familiarly set forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse deapth. Of which Paul also saith: O deapth of the richnesse & of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his iudgementes, & his waies past finding out? for who hath knowen the mind of the Lorde, or who hath bin his counsellour? And it is in deede true, that in the Gospell and in the lawe are contained mysteries which are farre aboue the capacity of our sense: but forasmuch as God for the comprehending of these mysteries which he hath vouchsafed to open by his word, doth lighten the mindes of them that bee his, with the Spirit of Vnderstanding: now is therein no bottomlesse deapth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candle to guide our feete, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainly discernable trueth. But his maruailous order of gouerning this world is worthily called a bottomlesse deapth: because while it is hidden from vs, we ought reuerently to worshippe it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in fewe wordes. The secret thinges (saith he) belong to the Lorde our God: but the thinges reueiled belong to vs and to our children for euer. We see how he biddeth vs not onely to studie in meditation of the law, but also reuerently to looke vpon vnto the secreete Prouidence of God. And in the booke of Iob is

Psa. 36.7.

Rom. 11.33.

rehearsed one title of this deapth, that it humbleth our mindes. For after that the author of that booke in surueying vp and downe the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the workes of God, at length he addeth: Iob. 26. 14. Loe, these be part of his wayes, but how little a portion heere wee of him? According to which reason in an other place he maketh difference between the wisdome that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisdome that he hath appoynted for men. For after he hath preached of the secretes of nature, he sayeth that wisdome is knowne to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all liuing creatures. Iob. 28. 12. But by and by after he sayth further, Lib. 8. 3. quæst cap. 23. y it is published to the end it should be searched out, because it is sayd vnto man, behold the feare of God is wisdom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in only good will we doe according to the law, because his Providence is an vnchangeable lawe. Therefore sith God doth claime vnto himselfe the power to rule the worlde, which is to vs vnknown, let this be to vs a lawe of sobernesse and modesty, quietly to obey his soueraigne authoritic, that his wil may be to vs the onely rule of iustice, and the most iust cause of all things. I meane not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters do babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his iustice from his power, but I mean that Providence, which is the gouernesse of all things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes thereof be hidden from vs.

3 Whosoeuer shalbe framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past will murmure against God for their aduersities, nor lay vpon him the blame of wicked doinges, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the cause, but Iupiter and Destenie: nor yet againe as caried away with Destenies, they will by desperation throwe themselues into destruction, as that yong man in Plautus which sayd: Vnstable is the chance of things: the Destenies driue men at their pleasure, I wil get me to some rocke there to make an end of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretende the name of God to couer their owne mischicuous doinges: for so saith Lyconides in an other comedie: God was the mouer. I beleuee it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I knowe it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by y guiding of the Holy ghost they may trauaile to attaine thereunto. And also becing ready to followe God, whither soeuer he calleth, they shewe in decde that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Very foolishly do prophane men turmoile with their fondnesses, so that they in maner confound heauen and earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we can not escape it: then it is labour vainly lost in taking heed to our selues: Therefore whereas one man dareth not venture to go the way y he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murdered of theues: an other sendeth for Phisitions, and wearieith himselfe with medicines to succour his life: an other forbearreth grosse meates for feare of appeiring his feeble health: an other dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house: Finally where as men deuise al wayes and endeouour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or els life and death, health and sickenes, peace and warre, and other things, which men as they couet or hate them, do by their trauaile endeouour to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the prayers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherein petition is made that it will please the Lorde to prouide for those things which he hath already decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy all counsels that men doe take for time to come as things against the Prouidence of God, which hath determined what he would haue done, without calling them to counsel. And then what soeuer is already happened, they so impure it to the Prouidence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to haue done it. As, hath a ruffian slaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that was foresene and ordeined by the Lorde, he is a minister of his Prouidence. Hath the sonne carelesly, neglecting all remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not resist God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So all mischeuous doinges they call vertues because they obey the ordinance of God.

4 But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purposes of men with the Prouidence of God. For as he laugheth to scorne their folly, which boldly doe enterprise any thing without the Lord, as though they were not ruled by his hande: so in another place he speaketh in this maner: The heart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steppes, meaning that we are not hindered by the eternall Decrees of God, but that vnder his will wee may both prouide for our selues, & dispose all things belonging to vs. And y^e is not without a manifest reason. For he y^e hath limited our life within appointed boundes, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes & helpes to preferue it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hand of dangers, & that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath giuen vs prouisions & remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our duetic: that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our duetic is to defende it. If he offer vs helpes, our duetic is to vse them. If he shew vs dangers before, our duetic is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our duetic is not to neglect them. But no daunger shall hurte, vnlesse it be fatal, which by all remedies can not be ouercome. But what if dangers bee therefore not fatal, because God hath assigned thee remedies to repulse and ouercome them? See howe thy maner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that daunger is not to be taken heede of, because forasmuch as it is not fatal, we shal escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heede of it, because he will not haue it fatal vnto thee. These madde men do not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skil of taking counsell and heede is inspired into men by God, whereby they may serue his Prouidence in preferuing of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence and slouth they procure to themselues those euils that he hath appointed for the. For how commeth it to passe, that a circumspect man while he prouideth for himselfe, doth winde himselfe out of euils that hang ouer him, and the foole perisheth by vnaduised rashnesse, but for that both folly and wisdom are the instruments of Gods disposition on both partes? Therefore it pleased God to hide from vs all things to come, to this ende that wee should meete with them as things doubtful, and not ceasse to set prepared remedies against them, til either they be ouercome or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished that the Prouidence of God doeth not alway shewe it selfe naked, but as God by vsing of meanes doeth in a certaine manner clothe it.

5 The same men do vnorderly & vnaduisedly draw the chaunces of time past to the naked prouidence of God. For because vpon it do hang al things whatsoeuer happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies nor adulteries, nor manslaughters are committed without the wil of God. Why then (say they) shall a thiefe be punished, for that hee spoyled him whome the Lordes will was to punish with pouerty? Why shall the murderher be punished which hath slaine him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe serue the will of God, why shall they be punished? But I deny that they serue the will of God. For we may not say that he which is caried with an euil mind doeth seruice vnto God as commaunder of it, where in deede hee doeth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which beeing enformed of his will doth labour to that ende, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his worde? Therefore in doing of things wee must see that same will of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs onely that which he commaundeth. If we do any thing against his commaundement, it is not obedience but obstinacie and transgression. But vnlesse he would, we should not do it. I grant. But do we euill things to this end to obey him? But he doth not command vs to do them, but rather we run on headlong, not minding what hee willeth, but so raging with the intemperance of our owne lust, that of set purpose we bende our trauaile against him. And by these meanes in euill doing wee serue his iust ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnes of his wisdom he hath good skill to vse euill instrumentes to do good. And see howe foolish is their maner of arguing. They would haue the doers vnpunished for mischeuous acts, because they are not comitted but by y disposition of God. I grant more: that theeues and murderers & other euil doers are the instrumentes of Gods Prouidence, whom y Lord doth vse to execute those iudgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse therby. For why? shall they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shall they couer their naughtinesse with his righteousnes? They can do neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse theselues, they are accused by their own conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they find all the euill in themselves, & in him nothing but a lawful vse of their euilnes. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead cartion, which hath bin both rotted & disclosed by heat of the sunne? All men do see that it is raised by the beames of the sunne.

say, that the sunbeames do stinke. So when there resteth in an euil man, the matter and guiltinesse of euill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vse their seruice at his pleasure? Away therefore with this doggish frowardnesse, which may in deede a farre ofbarke at the iustice of God, but can not touch it.

6 But these cauillations or rather doting errors of phrenetike men, shal easily be shaken away, by godly and holy ineditation of the Prouidence; which the rule of godlinesse teacheth vs, so that thereof may growe vnto vs a good and most pleasant fruite. Therefore a Christian heart when it is most assuredly persuaded, that all things come to passe by the disposition of God, & that nothing happeneth by chance, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cause of things, and yet will consider the inferiour causes in their place. Then he will not doubt that the singular prouidence of God doth watch for his preseruation, which Prouidence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shal turne to his good and saluation. And because he hath to do first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, hee will assure himself that Gods Prouidence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that al their counselles, willes, enterprises and powers are vnder the hande of God, so that it is in Gods will to bowe them whether he list, and to restraine them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular Prouidence of God doth keepe watch for the safetie of the faithfull, there are many and most euident promises to witnes.

Zac. 28.
Esa. 26. 2.

Cast thy burden vpon the Lord, and he shal nourish thee, and shal not suffer the righteous to fall for euer, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the helpe of the hiest, shall abide in the protection of the God of heauen. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I will be thy shield, a brasen wall: I will be enemie to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principall entent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lorde doth with such diligence keepe the waies of the Saintes, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore as a litle before we haue rightfully reiected their opinion which do imagine an vniuersal Prouidence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care of euery creature: yet principally it shalbe good to reknowledge y^e same speciall care toward our selues. Whereupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparowe of least value, doth fall to the ground without the wil of the Father, doth by & by apply it to this end, y^e we should consider that how much we be more worth than sparowes, with so much neere care doth God prouide for vs, and he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to trust that the heares of our head are numbered. What can we wish our selues more, if not so much, as a heare can fall from our head but by his will? I speake not onely of all mankind, but because God hath chosen his church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doth by singular examples shew his care in gouerning of it.

Mat. 10. 29.

7 The seruant of God being strengthened with these both promises and examples, will ioyn with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their mindes to good will, or to refrayne their malice that it may doe no hurt. For it is the Lorde that that giueth vs fauour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the malicioufnesse of our enemies, he knoweth how by diuerse wayes to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceiue no sounde or sober aduise, like as hee sent forth Satan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rechabam made by the young mens counsell, that hee might bee spoiled of his kingdome by his owne follie. Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet hee maketh them so afraide and astonished, that they cannot will or goe about that which they haue conceyued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to goe about that which lust and rage did counsell them, hee doeth in conuenient time breake of their violences, and suffereth them not to proceede to the end that they purposed. So did hee before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophell that shoulde haue ben to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne al his creatures for the benefite and safetie of them that be his, yea and to gotterne the deuil himselfe, which as wee see durst enterprife nothing against Iob without his sufferance and commaundement. Of this knowledge necessarily ensueth both a thankfulness of mind in prosperous successe of thinges, and also patience in aduersitie, and an incredible assurednesse against the time to come. Whatsoeuer therefore shall betide vnto him prosperously and according to his heartes desire, all that hee will ascribe vnto God, whether hee feele the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by luellesse creatures. For thus hee will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lorde which hath enclined their minds to me, which hath ioyned the vnto me to bee instrumentes of his goodnesse towardes me. In plentie of the fruites of the earth, thus hee will thinke, that it is the Lorde which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruites. In other thinges hee will not doubt that it is the onely blessing of the Lorde, whereby all thinges prosper, and being put in mind by so many causes he will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If anie aduersitie happen, hee will by and by therein also liste vp his minde to God, whose hande auayleth much to imprint in vs a patience and quiete moderation of heart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the falsehoode of his brethren, hee coulde neuer haue taken a brotherly minde towardes them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lord, he forgate the iniurie, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farrefoorth that of his owne accorde hee comforted his brethren and saide: It is not you that soule me into Egypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your liues. You in deede thought euil of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whome hee was troubled, hee woulde forthwith haue bene kindled to reuenge. But because hee did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, hee comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, the Lordes name be blessed. So Dauid: when Semci had rayled and cast stones at him, if hee had looked vpon man, hee would haue in-that Semei did it not without the mouing of the Lorde, hee rather appeased them. Let him alone (saide he) for the Lord hath commaunded him to curse. With the same bridle in an other place doth he restrain the intemperance of sorowe. I helde my peace (saith hee) and became as dumme, because thou O Lorde, diddest it. If there bee more effectuall remedie against wrath and impatience: surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the Prouidence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this point. It is the Lordes will, therefore it must bee suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to striue against it, but also because hee willet nothing but that which is both iust and expedient. In summe this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, wee leauing their malice (which woulde doe nothing but enforce our sorrowe, and whet our mindes to reuenge) shoulde remember to climbe vpon God, & learne to beleue assuredly, that whatsoeuer our enemy hath mischeuously done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refrain vs from recompensing of iniuries doth wisely put vs in minde, y^e we are not to wraastle with fleshe and blood, but with the spirituall enemy the Deuill, that we may prepare our selues to striue with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the deuill as all wicked men to striue with vs, and that hee sitteth as iudge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes and miseries that oppresse vs, doe chauce without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the law: whatsoeuer is prosperous floweth from y^e fountaine of Gods blessing, and that all aduersities are his cursings: and let that most terrible warning make vs afraide: If ye walke stubbornly against mee, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishnesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting al to be but chance that happeneth of both sortes we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This same is the reason, why Hieremie, & Amos did so sharply rebuke the Iewes, because they thought that things as wel good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To the same purpose serueth y^e sermon of Esay. I the God that create light and fashion darkenes, that make peace and create euill: I God do make all these things.

9 And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferior causes. Neither will he, because hee thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whome he hath receiued benefite, therefore let them passe vnderconsidered, as though they had deserued no thanke by their gentlenes: but he will hartily thinke himselfe bound vnto them, and will willingly confesse his bonde, and trauell as hee shall bee able and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefites receyued hee will reuerence and praise God as the principall author, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the truth is indeede hee will vnderstande that hee is by the will of God bounde to them, by whose hande it was Gods will to bee beneficiall vnto him. If hee suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, hee will determine in his mind that the same was done in deed with the will of GOD, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sicknes whome

he hath negligently handled, whereas of duetie he should haue taken good heede vnto him although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet will he not thereby lessen his offence, but because he had not faithfully discharged his dutie toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is vsed any fraude, and conceiued malice of minde in committing either murther or theft, will he excuse it vnder prerence of Gods prouidence, but he will in one selfe euill act seuerally behold both the righteousnes of God and the wickednes of man, as both doth manifestly shewe themselves. But principally in things to come he will haue consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helps of men which he may vse for his safetic. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slouthfull in crauing their help whom he seeth to haue sufficient whereof he may be succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing profite him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vse as the lawfull instruments of Gods prouidence. And because he doth not certainly knowe what successe the buisines will haue that he goeth about, (sauiug that in all things he knoweth that the Lord wil prouide for his benefit) he will with studie trauaile to that which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so far as he can conceiue in minde and vnderstanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be caried on by his owne wit, but wil commit & yeeld himselfe to the wisdom of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shal not so stay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he wil carelesly rest vpon them, or if he wāt them he wil be afraid as left destitute, for he wil haue his minde alway fastened vpon the Prouidence of God, neither wil he suffer himselfe to be drawen away from the stedfast beholding thereof, by consideration of present things. So though Ioab acknowledged that the successe of battail is in y will & hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slouthfulnes but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaueth it vnto the Lord to gouerne the end. We wil stand valiāt (saith he) for our nation, and for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his cies. This knowledge shall despoile vs of rashnes & wrongful confidence, & shal driue vs to continual calling vpon God: & also shal vphold our minds w good hope, so as we may not dout assuredly & boldly to despise those dāgers y cōpasse vs about.

10 In this point doeth the inestimable felicitie of a godly minde shewe forth it selfe. Innumerable are the euils that doe beseege mans life, and do threaten him so many deaths. As, not to go further than our selues: forasmuch as our bodie is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea hath enclosed & doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not carie himselfe but he must needs also carie about with him many formes of his owne destruction, & draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweateth without peril? Nowe whithersoever y turne thee, al things y are about thee are not only vntrusty friends to thee, but do in maner openly threaten & seeme to shew thee present death. Go into a ship, there is but a foot thicknes betwene thee & death.

Sit

Sit on horsebacke, in the slipping of one foote thy life is in daunger. Goe through the streetes of the citie: euen howe many tyles are vppon the houses, to so many perils art thou subiect. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friendes, thy harme is readie prepared. Howe many wilde beastes thou seest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shutte vp thy selfe, euen in a garden well fenced, where may appeare nothing but pleasauntnesse of ayre and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fire doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertie, and in the night time with falling vppon thy head. Thy feele forasmuch as it lyeth open to hayle, frost, drowth and other tempestes, it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speak not of prisonnings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which parte doe beseege vs at home, and part doe followe vs abroad. In these streightes must not man neede bee most miserable, which euen in life halfe deade doeth plainly drawe forth a carefull and fainting breath as if hee had a sworde continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say that these thinges chaunce seldome, or at the least not alwayes, nor to all men, and neuer all at once. I graunt, but seeing wee are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same thinges may happen to our selues, and that our life ought of duetic no more to bee free than theirs, it can not bee but that we must dreade and feare them as thinges that may light vppon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearefulnesse? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproch of God to say, that hee hath set open man the noblest of all his creatures to their blind and vnaduised stroks of fortune. But here my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which hee shoulde feele if he shoulde be brought subiecte vnder Fortunes dominion.

II But when that light of Gods Prouidence hath once shined vppon a godly man: hee is nowe releued and deliuered not onely from y extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from al care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comforte to vnderstande that the heauenly father doeth so holde in all thinges with his power, so ruleth them with his authoritie and countenance, so ordereth them with his wisdom, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that hee is receiued into Gods tuition, & committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the gouernour to giue them place. For so is it song in the Psalme. For hee shall deliuer thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysome pestilence. He will couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt bee sure vnder his fethers. His trueth shall be thy shielde and buckler. Thou shalt not bee afraide of the feare of the night, nor of the arrowe that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saintes to glorie: The Lorde is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to mee. The Lorde is my protector, why shall I be afraid? If whole camps stand vp against mee, if I walke in the middest of the shadow of death, I wil not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assure dness is neuer shaken away from them? but hereby, that where the worlde seemeth in shewe to be without order whirled about, they knowe that God worketh euerie where, whose worke they trust shall bee for their preseruacion. Nowe if their safetie be assailed either by the deuill or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembraunce and meditation of Prouidence, they must needes by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the deuill and all the rout of the wicked, are so euerie way holden in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceiue any mischief against vs, nor goe about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they goe neuer so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so farre as hee shall suffer, yea so farre as hee shall commaund, and that they are not onely holden fast bounde with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to doe seruice: here haue they abundantly wherewith to comfort themselues. For as it is the Lordes worke to arme their furie and to turne and directe it which er it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and ende, that they doe not after their owne will licentiously triumph. With which perswasion Paul being stablished, did by the sufferance of God appoint his iourney in another place which hee saide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely sayde that hee had bene stopped by Satan, hee should haue seemed to giue him too much power, as if it had bene in Satans hande: to ouerthrow the verie purposes of God: but when hee maketh God the iudge, vpon whose sufferance all iourneies do hang: he doeth therewithall shewe, that Satan whatsoeuer hee goe about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doeth Dauid, because for the sundrie chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were whirled about, hee doeth flie to this sanctuarie, saith that his times are in y hand of God. Hee might haue saide either y course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the worde Times, hee meant to expresse that howsoeuer the state of man bee vnstedfast, whatsoeuer alterations doe nowe and then happen, they are gouerned by God. For which cause Rafin and the king of Israel, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as firebrandes kindeled to wast and consume the lande, are called by the Prophete smoking brandes, which can doe nothing but breath out a little smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his richesse, strength and number of men, hee himselve is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his armie to fishes. Therefore God saith that hee will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither hee list. Finally because I will not tarie long vpon this poynt, if a man marke it hee shall easly see that the extremitie of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Prouidence, and the chiefe blessednesse standeth in the knoweledge thereof.

hath not stedfast and stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of inferiour things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of G O D, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancing of Saul to the kingdome. And that he will repent him of the euill that he had determined to lay vpon his people, so soone as hee perceiueth any conuersion of them. Againe there are rehearsed diuers repelles of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Ninuities that after 40. dayes once past Ninuie should be destroyed, but by & by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronouced death to Ezechias, which he was moued by his teares and prayers to deferre. Hereupon many doe make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yerely, daily and hourelly appointeth this or that, as euery mans deseruings are, or as he thinketh it equitie & iustice. Concerning his repentaunce this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignoraunce errour and weakenesse. For if no man doe wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the case that he neede to repent, we can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, y God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he cannot auoide it, or that he headlong & vnadvisedly runneth into a purpose wherof he by & by forethinketh him. But y it is so far from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in y very mention making of repentaunce he denieth that God had any repenting at al, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted that in y same chapter they are both so ioyned together, that the comparison doeth very wel bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratiuely spoken, y God repented that he had made Saul king, by & by after it is added: The strength of Israel shal not ly, nor shalbe moued with repēting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which words his vnchangeableness is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall and aboue al repentance. And y his constance shold not be doubtful, his very aduersaries haue bin compelled to beare him witness. For Balaā whether he would or no, could not chuse but burst out into this saying: that he is not like a man to lye: nor as a son of man to be changed, & that it is not possible that hee should not do that he hath said, & not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken.

13 What meaneth then this name of Repentance? euen in the same sort that all the other phrascs of speache which do describe God vnto vs after the maner of men. For, because our weakenesse doth not reach to his highnes, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed low to our capacitie that we might vnderstande it. And this is the manner how to frame it lowe for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as hee is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceiued of vs. Where as he himselfe is without al mouing of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth y he is angry with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any mouing at all in him, but rather to consider that this speach is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angry so oft as hee exerciseth iudgement: so ought we to vnderstand nothing els by this worde of Repentaunce but a chan-changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes are wont to declare that they mislike them. Because then every change among men is an amendement of that which misliketh them, and amendement commeth of repentance: therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God chaungeth in his works. In the meane time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but hee followeth on with one continuall course that which he had from eternitie foreseene, allowed and decreed, howsoever the alteration seeme sodeyne in the eyes of men.

14 Neither doeth the holy historie shewe that Gods décrees were repealed when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Niniuites which had bene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that so construe it are deceived in vnderstanding of threatninges: which although they doe simply affirme, yet by the successe it shall be perceiued that they conteyned a secrete condition in them. For why did God sende Ionas to the Ninuites to tell them aforehande of the ruine of their citie? Why did he by Isay giue Ezechias warning of death? For he might haue brought to nought both him and them without sending them any worde of their destruction. He meant therefore an other thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it comming a farre of. Euen this he meant: not to haue them destroyed, but to haue them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ionas prophecied that Niniue should fall after 40. dayes, was done to this ende that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that hee might obtaine longer life. Nowe who doeth not see that God meant by such threatninges to awake them to repentaunce, whome hee made afraide to the ende that they might escape the iudgement which they had deserued by their sinns? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselues doeth lead vs to this, to vnderstande in the simple threatning a secrete emplied condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lorde rebuking the king Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, vseth these wordes: Beholde thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for shee hath a husbände. But after hee had excused himselfe, God saide thus: Restore the wife to her husbände, for he is a Prophete and shall pray for thee that thou maist liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou hast. You see howe in his first sentence he vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedefully bent to make amends, & in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawn from the firste purpose of God, by this that hee made voide the thing which hee had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternall ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishment he moueth those to repentance, whome his will is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his worde, sauing that he doth not expresse the same thing in sillables which it is yet easie to vnderstand. For that saying of Isay must needs remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoe it: His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

The xviii. Chapter.

*That God doeth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so borroweth their mindes
so put his iudgements in execution, that yee still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.*

THere ariseth a harde question out of other places, where it is saide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the fleshe scarcely conceyueth howe hee working by them, should not gather some spot of their faulte, yea in his common working bee free from all fault, and iustly condemne his ministers. Vpon this was deuised the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering: because many haue thought this doubt vnpossible to bee dissolued: that both Satan & all the wicked are so vnder the hande and power of God, that hee directeth their malice vnto what end it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked doings to the executing of his iudgementes. And their modestie were peradventure excusable, whome the shewe of absurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they do wrongefully with a lying defence goe about to deliuer the iustice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them vnreasonable, that man shoulde by the will and commaundement of God be made blinde, and so by and by bee punished for his blindnesse. Therefore they seeke to scape by this shifte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But hee himselfe plainly pronouncing that hee doeth it, doeth reiect that shift. As for this that men doe nothing but by the secrete commaundement of God, and doe trouble themselues in vaine with deliberating, vnlesse hee doe by his secrete direction stablish that which hee hath before determined, it is proued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certayne that this which wee before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doeth all thinges that hee will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God bee the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there saide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are caried causelessly with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples will bee more lightsome plainnes. By the first Chapter of Iob we know, that Satan doeth no lesse appeare before God to receeiuie his commaundementes than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In deede it is after a diuerse manner and for a diuerse ende: but yet so that hee can not goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterwarde to bee added a bare sufferance of him to afflict the holy man: yet because that saying is true: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken awaye, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that triall of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theecues were ministers. Satan goeth about to driue the holy man by desperation to madnesse. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly doe inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob knowledgeth that he was by God stripped of al his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoeuer men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their trauelles to the executing of his iudgementes. It was Gods will to haue the false king king Achab deceiued: the diuell offered his seruice thereunto: he was sent with a certaine commandement, to be a lying spirite in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madnes of Achab be the iudgement of God, then the deuise of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the iudge doth onely suffer and not also decree what he wil haue done, and command the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Iewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the souldiers do follow their raging lust, & yet in a solemne prayer the disciples do confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hande and counsell of God had determined: euen as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose & foreknowledge of God deliuered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly & willingly appoint that which the Iewes did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets y^e Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Absolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adulterie, committed detestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the wordes are these: Thou hast done it secretly, but I will do it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vsed in Iury, was the worke of God. For which cause Nabucadnezer is called the seruant of God, God euery where crieth out that with his hissing, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commandement y^e wicked are stirred vp to warre. He calleth the Assirian the rod of his wrath, & the axe that he moueth with his hand. The destruction of the holy citie & ruine of the Tēple he calleth his worke. Dauid not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous iudge, yet confesseth that the cursings of Semei proceeded of the commandement of God. The Lord (saith he) commanded him to curse. We often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoeuer happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sonnes of Hely, & very many things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in y^e Scriptures do see, that for shortnesse sake, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle & talke fondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferance in place of the Prouidence of God, as though God sate in a watch tower wayting for the chaunces of Fortune, & so his iudgements should hang vpon the will of men.

2 Now as concerning secret motions, that which Salomon speaketh of the heart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surely to all mankin d, & is as much in effect as if he had said. whatsoeuer we conceiue in minde, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to this end. And truly if he did not worke in the mindes of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, & wisdom from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander wher is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearfull so farre forth as their hearts be taken with his feare. So Dauid went out of the campe of Saul & none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that he

blindeth the eyes of men, & striketh them with giddinesse, that he maketh them drunke with the spirite of drowfinesse, casteth them into madnes, and hardneth their hearts. These things also many do referre to Sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate, he suffred them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is too round, forasmuch as the Holy ghost in plaine wordes expresseth, that they are striken with blindnesse & madnesse by the iust iudgement of God. It is said, that he hardned the heart of Pharao, also that he did make dul and strenthen it. Some do with an vnfauiory cauillation mock out these phrascs of speech, because wherin an other place it is said, Pharao did harden his owne heart, there is his own wil set for the cause of his hardning. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in diuers maners, that man while he is moued in working by God, doeth also worke himselfe. And I do turne backe their obiection against themselues. For, if to harden do signifie but a bare sufferance, then y very motion of obstinacie shall not be properly in Pharao. Now how weake & foolish were it so to expound, as if Pharao did only suffer himself to be hardened? Moreouer the Scripture cutteth of all occasions from such cauillations. For God saith, I will hold his heart. So of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan Moses saith, that they went forth to battaile, because the Lorde had hardned their hearts. Which same thing is repeted by another Prophet, saying: He turned their hearts that they should hate his people. Again in Esay he saith, that he will send the Assirians against the deceitful nation, & wil command them to cary away the spoyles, & violently take the pray, not meaning that he wil teache wicked & obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he wil bow them to execute his iudgements as if they did beare his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were moued by the certeine appointment of God. I grant that God doth often times worke in the reprobate by Satans seruice as a meane, but yet so that Satan doeth his office by Gods mouing, and proceedeth so farre as is giuen him. The euill Spiritie troubled Saul, but it is said that it was of God, that wee may knowe that the madnesse of Saul, came of the iust vengeance of God. It is also said, that the same Satan doth blind the mindes of the vnfaithful: but how so, but only because the effectual working of error commeth from God himselfe, to make them belecue lyes that refuse to obey the truth? After the first maner of speaking it is said, If any Prophet shal speake lyingly, I God haue deceiued him. According to the other maner of speech it is sayd, that he giueth men into a reprobate mind: & to cast them into filthie desires, because he is the chiefe author of his owne iust vengeance, & Satan is but onely a minister therof. But because we must entreat of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shal discourse of free or bond wil of man, I thinke I haue alreadie shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the wil of God is said to be the cause of all things, his Prouidence is thought the gouerneisse in all purposes & workes of men, so as it sheweth foorth her force not only in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirit, but also compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

3 Forasmuch as hitherto I haue recited only such things as are written in y Scriptures, plainly & not doubtfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to slander the heavenly oracles, take heede what maner of iudgement they take vpon them. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they seke a praise of modestie, what can be imagined more proudly done, than that to set one small worde against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to haue this touched. But if they openly speake euill, what preuaile they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no new example of waywardnes, because there haue bin in all ages wicked and vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thing in deede to be true, which long agoe the holy Ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that God may overcome when he is iudged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbridled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they do not onely argue against God, but also take vpon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomit vp against the heauen do not reach vnto God, but that he driuing away the cloudes of cauillations, doth brightly shewe forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded vpon the word of God, it is aboue all the world) doth from her hie place contemptuously looke downe vpon these mystes. For first where they obiekt, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrary willes, because he decreeth those things by secret purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is easily wiped away. But before I answere it, I wil once againe giue the readers warning that this cauillation is thrown out not against me, but against the holy Ghost, which raught the holy man Iob this confession: As it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theeues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurte that they did him, the iust scourge of God. What saith the Scripture in other places? The sonnes of Hely obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also an other Prophet crieth out, that God which sitteth in heauen doth whatsoever he will. And now I haue shewed plainly enough that God is the author of all those things which these iudges would haue to happen onely by his idle sufferance. Hee testifieth that he createth light and darkenesse, that he formeth good and euil, that no euill happeneth which he himselve hath not made. Let them tell me, I beseech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne iudgements? But as Moses teacheth, y^e he which is slain by the falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole church sayth in Luke, that Herode and Pilate conspired to doe those things, which the hand and purpose of God had decreed. And truly if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth striue with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and simple in him, it seemeth to vs manifolde, because according to the weaknesse of our witte we conceiue not howe God in diuers maner willeth and willeth not one selfe thing. Paul, after that he hath said, that y^e calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a litle after saith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifolde wisdome of God: because for the dulnesse of our witte the wisdome of G O D seemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpretour hath translated it) of many fashions: shal we therefore dreame that there is any variety in God himselfe, as though he either chaungeth his purpose, or dissenteth from himselfe? Rather when we conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let vs call to mind our owne weaknesse, and therewithall consider that the light wherein he dwelleth, is not without cause called Inaccessible, because it is couered with darknesse. Therefore all godly and sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will willethe y^e which God willethe not. As if a good sonne willethe to haue his father to liue, whom God will haue to die. Againe, it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euill will, which God willethe with a good will. As if an euill sonne willethe to haue his father to die, and God also willethe the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willethe that which God willethe not, and the other sonne willethe that which God also willethe, and yet the naturalnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although hee willethe a contrary thing, than the vnnaturalnesse of the other sonne that willethe y^e same thing. So great a difference is there what to wil doth belong to man, & what to God, and to what end the will of euery one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or disallowed. For those things which God willethe well he bringeth to passe by the euill willes of euill men. But a litle before he had said, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and al the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselues, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no meanes so do, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done vpon them. Whereupon he crieth out: Great are the works of God, & ought to be sought out of al them that loue them: that in maruiculous maner y^e same thing is not done without his will which is also done against his will, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euill, vnlesse for that he is omnipotent, he could of euill make good.

4 In the same maner is assoiled or rather vanisheth away the other objection: that if God do not onely vse the seruice of wicked men, but also gouerneth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, & therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute y^e which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his wil & commandement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre a sunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wiues, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonor: yet did he not therefore commande the wicked sonne to committe incest, vnlesse perhap you meane it in respect of Dauid, as he speaketh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, he doth not therein commende his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be y^e scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by y^e wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret iudgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deede of their

owne euil lust they do purposely breake. Now how that thing is of God, & is ruled by his secrete Providence, which men do wickedly, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is seuerely condemned, for that they peruerted the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of Dauid, and yet we know it was his will that he should be annointed. Whereupon in the verie wordes of Osee there appeareth a certeine shewe of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in another place he sayeth, that he gaue the kingdome to Iarobeam in his rage. How shall these sayings agree? that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, because neither could the people fall from the house of Dauid, but that they must shake off the yoke which God had layed vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vnthankfulness of Salomon. We see therefore how God in not willing false breach of allegiance, yet to another end iustly willeth a falling away from their prince, wherupon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holy annointing driuen to be king. After this maner doeth the holy historie say, that there was an enemy raised vp to spoile Salomons sonne of part of his kingdome. Let the readers diligently wey both these things, because it had pleased God to haue y^e people gouerned vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two partes, it was done against his will. And yet the diuision tooke beginning of his will. For surely, where as the Prophet both by words & ceremonie of anointing did moue Iarobeam whē he thought of no such thing, to hope of y^e kingdome, this was not done without the knowlege or against the will of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people iustly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of Dauid. In this maner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the request of the people, this was done by God to confirme the worde which he had spoken by the hande of Ahiha, his seruant. Lo howe against Gods wil the sacred vnitie is torne in sunder, & yet with the will of the same God tenne tribes do forsake Salomons sonne. Let vs adde another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their hands vnto it, the sonnes of Ahab were slaine, & all his offspring rooted out: Iehu said in deede truly, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hand of his seruant Elias. And yet not vniustly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are ye righteous, saith he? If I haue conspired against my lord, who hath killed al these? I haue before (as I think) already declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousnes of God gloriously appeareth. And for modest wittes this answere of Augustine shall alway suffice: where as the father deliuered the sonne, & Christ deliuered his body, and Iudas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we nowe saye, that there is no consent of God with man, where man by the righteous mouing of God doeth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine saith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these iudgements, where God worketh euen in the hearts of euil men whatsoeuer he will, and yet rendreth to them according to their deseruings? And truely in the falshood of Iudas, it shalbe no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deede to God, because he himselfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, than it shalbe to giue away the praise of our redemption to Iudas. Therefore the same writer doeth in an other place truely tel vs, that in this examination God doeth not enquire what men might haue done, or what they haue done, but what their wil was to doe, that purpose and will may come into the accompt. They that think this harde, let them a litle while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacitie, and do finde fault that those things are vterred, which God, vnlesse he had knowen them profitable to be knowen, would neuer haue commanded to be taught by his Prophets & Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meeke willingnesse to learne, and that without exception whatsoeuer is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more frowardly outrage in prating against it, sith it is euident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer confutation.

OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION,

which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, which knowledge was first opened to the Fathers in the time of the Lawe, &
then to vs in the Gospel.

The first Chapter.

That by Adams sinne and falling arway, mankinde became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: vvherein a intreated of Original sinne.

NOT without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe been in the olde prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all thinges that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our selues, whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsell of any thing necessarie, we be miserably daseled, yea, altogether blinded.

ded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heede, that we do not disorderly vse it, as we see some of the Philosophers haue done. For they in exhorting man to knowe himselfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he should knowe himselfe, that he should not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing els doe they will him to behold in himselfe, but that whereby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this point, that considering what was giuen vs in creation, and how bountifully God continueth his gracious fauour toward vs, we may knowe how great had bin the excellencie of our nature, if it had continued vncorrupted: and we may withall thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed vpon vs, that we may alwayes hang vpon him. Then, that we call to mind our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling whereof may throw downe all glorying & trust of our selues, ouerwhelme vs with shame and truly humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his owne image, to the end to raise vp our mindes both to the studie of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so least the so great noblenesse of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beasts, should be drowned with our slothfulnes, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reason & vnderstanding, that in keeping a holy & honest life, we should proceede on forward to the appointed end of blessed immortalitie. But the first dignitie can not come in our minde, but by and by on y other side the heavy sight of our filthines & shame doth thrust it selfe in presence, since we in the person of y first man are fallen from our first estate, where vpon groweth the hatred and lothing of our selues, & true humilitie, and there is kindled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom euery of vs may recover those good things, whereof we are found altogether void and empiric.

2 This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of our selues, I meane, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs destitute of all matter to glory vpon, may bring vs to submission. Which rule it behooueth vs to keepe, if we wil attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good things, than to looke vpon our miserable needinesse and dishonour, which ought to ouerwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more couereth, than to be stroked with flattery: and therefore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lightnesse of beleefe: whereby it is so much lesse to be marueiled, that herein the greatest part of men haue perniciously erred. For sith there is naturally planted in al mortall men a more than blind loue of themselves, they doe most willingly perswade themselves, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hare. So without any maintenance of other, this most vaine opinion doth ech where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of him selfe to make him selfe liue well and blessedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, howe soeuer they graunt somewhat to God, least they should seeme arrogantly to take all to themselves, yet they so part it, that the principall matter of glorie and confidence alway remaineth with themselves. Now if there come talke, that with her allurementes tickleth the pride that already of it selfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most fauourably advanced the excellency of mans nature, so hath he bin excepted with the well liking reioycement in maner of all ages. But whatsoeuer such commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to rest in himselfe, it doth nothing but delite with that her sweetnesse, and in deede so deceiueth, that it bringeth to most wretched destruction all them that assent vnto it. For to what purpose auaieth it for vs, standing vpon al vaine confidence to deuise, appoint, attempt and goe about those thinges that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our first beginning of enterprife to be forsaken & destitute of sound vnderstanding and true strength, and yet to goe on boldely till we fall downe into destruction? But it can not otherwise happen to them that haue affiance that they can do any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man giue heede to such teachers that holde vs in considering onely our owne good thinges, he shal not profite in learning to knowe himselfe, but shall be caried violently away into the worse kinde of ignorance.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the seconde parte of wisdom consisteth in the knowledge of our selues, yet in the very maner of knowing there is much disagreement. For by the iudgement of the fleshe, a man thinketh that he hath then well searched himselfe, when trusting vpon his owne vnderstanding and integrity, he taketh boldnesse, and encourageth himselfe to doing the duties of vertue and bidding battell to vices, trauaileth with all his studie to bende himselfe to that which is comely and honest. But he that looketh vpon and trieth himselfe by the rule of Gods iudgement, findeth nothing that may raise vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himselfe, the more he is discouraged, till being altogether spoiled of all confidence, he leaueth to himselfe nothing toward the well ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the first noblenes that he gaue to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteoufnesse and goodnesse. For we can not consider either our owne first estate, or to what end we are created, but we shalbe pricked forward to studie vpon immortalitie, and to desire the kingdome of God. But that consideration is so farre from putting vs in courage, that rather discouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humblenesse. For what is that first estate of ours? euen that from whence we are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euen the same from which we are altogether turned away: so that lothing our owne miserable estate, wee may grone for sorrowe, and in groning may also sigh for the losse of that dignitie. But nowe when wee say that man ought to behold nothing in himselfe that may make him of bolde courage; wee meane that there is nothing in him vpon affiance whereof he ought to be proude.

Wherfore, if any list to heare what knowledge mā ought to haue of himself, let vs thus diuide it, that first hee consider to what ende he is created, and endued with giftes that are not to be dispised, by which thought hee may be stirred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God & of the life to come. Then let him way his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiuing wherof he may lie in extreme confusion, as one vtterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that hee may knowe what is his ductie: and the other, howe much hee is able to do towards the performing of it. Wee will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But because it must needes be that it was not a light negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so seuerely punished, wee muste consider the verie forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindeled the horrible vengeance of God vpon al mankinde. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly beene receyued, concerning the intemperance of gluttonie, as though the summe and heade of all vertues consisted in the forebearing of one onely fruite, when there flowed on euery side store of all sortes of deinties y were to be desired, & when in that blessed fruitfulness of y earth, there was not onely plentie, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therefore wee must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of y knowledge of good and euill, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proue that hee was willingly subiect to the government of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commaundement was giuen for none other ende, than for this that hee contented with his owne estate shoulde not with wicked lust aduaunce himselfe higher. But the promise whereby hee was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as hee did not eate of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatening of Death so soone as hee shoulde tast of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, serued to prouue and exercise his faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what meanes Adam prouoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine indeede saith not amisse, when hee saith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not listied vp man higher than was lawfull & than was permitted him, he might haue continued in his estate: but wee muste fetch a more full definition from the maner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For sith the woman was with the deceite of the Serpent led away by infidelitie, nowe it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning of y fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that all men were lost by one mans disobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the first man fell from y subiection of God, for that hee not only was taken with the entisements of Satan, but also despising the trueth, did turne out of the way to lying. And surely Gods worde being once despised, all reuerence of God is shaken off. Because his maiestie doeth no other wayes abide in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inuiolate, but while we hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the roote of that falling away. But there vpon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulness, for that Adam in coueting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently dispise the so great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that hee was made after the likenesse of God, vnlesse he might also be made egall with God. If Apostasie bee a filthie and detestable offence, whereby man draweth himselfe from the alleageance of his creatour, yea outrageously shaketh of his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the sin of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apostasie, but ioyned with shamefull reproches against God, while they assented to the sclauanders of Satan, wherein he accused God of lying enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidelitie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the feare of God, & throw the selues whither their lust caried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of saluation is opened vnto vs, when at this day wee receiue the Gospell by our cares: euen as by the same windowes, when they stood open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam woulde neuer haue beene so bolde, as to do against the commaundement of God, but for this that hee did not beleue his worde. Truly this was the best bridle for the right keeping of al affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe righteoufnesse in obeying the commaundements of God, and then that the cheefe end of happie life is to be beloued of him. Hee therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the Deuill, did (as much as in him lay) extinguishe y whole glorie of God.

Rom. 8.

5 As the spirituall life of Adam was, to abide ioyned and bounde to his creatour, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it maruell if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posteritie, which peruerted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures doe grone, saith Paul, being made subiect to corruption against their will. If one shoulde aske the cause: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that punishment y man deserued, for whose vse they were created. Sith then the curse that goeth throughout all the coastes of the world proceeded from his fault both vpward and downewarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abroad into all his issue. Therefore after that the heauenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wisdome, strength, holinesse, trueth, and iustice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the most horrible pestilences, blindness, weakenesse, filthinesse, falsehode, and iniustice, but also hee entangled & drowned his whole offspring in the same miseries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called originall sinne, meaning by this worde sinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they haue had much contention, because there is nothing farther off from common reason, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which seemeth to haue beene the cause why the oldest Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the least did not set it out so plainly as was conuenient. And yet that fearefulnesse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophane inuention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne losse, and hurted not his posteritie. So through this suttletie, Satan went about by hiding the disease, to make it incurable. But when it was proued by manifest testimonie of Scrip.

Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, hee brought this cauillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men trauailed in this point, and aboue all other Augustine, to shewe that we are corrupted not by forein wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to denie was too great shamelesnesse. But the rashnes of the Pelagians and Celestians wil not seeme maruellous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shal perceiue, howe shamelesse beasts they were in all other things. Surely it is not doubtfully spoken that Dauid confesseth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceiued in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodnesse of God toward him, hee beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begetting. Forasmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to Dauid alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted vnder his example. All we therefore that descend of vncleane seede, are borne infected which the contagiõ of sin, yea before that we see the light of this life, we be in the sight of God filthy and spotted. For who could giue cleane of the vncleannesse? not one: as it is in the booke of Iob. Psal. 51. 7.

6 We heare that the vncleannesse of the parentes so passeth into the children, that al without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning vnlesse we go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was al mankinde worthily corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he) by one man sin Rom. 5. 12. entered into the whole worlde, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteousness and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians here prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue wee no other profite by the righteousnesse of Christ, but that hee is an example set before vs to follow? Who can abide such robbie of Gods honour? If it be out of question that Christes righteousnesse is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth also that they both were so lost in Adam, as they be recovered in Christ: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The words are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him, and Christe with his grace restored vs to saluation. In so cleare light of truth, I thinke wee neede not a longer or more laborious prooffe. So also in the 1. Epistle to the Corin. 2. Cor. 15. 22 when he goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of ys resurrection, he sheweth ys the life is couered in Christ, ys was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that we all are dead in Adam, doth also therewithal plainly testifie, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation could not reache vnto them ys were touched wth no gultines of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier vnderstanded what he meaneth than by relation of ys other mēbers of of the sentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well inough known that the same is done no other way, than when by maruellous maner of communicating, Christ poureth into vs the force of his righteoufnesse. As it is written in an other place, that the spirite is life vnto vs, for righteoufnesse sake. Therefore we may not otherwise expound that which is saide that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischiefe and ruine to himselfe, but also threwe downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himselfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected al his seed with the same corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paul could not stand true, that all are by nature the sonnes of wrath, if they were not already accursed in the wombe. And it is easily gathered that nature is there meant not such as it were create by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not conuenient, that God should be made the author of death. Adam therefore so corrupted himselfe, that the infection passed from him into all his offspring. And the heauenly iudge himselfe Christ, doth also plainly inough pronounce, that all are borne euill and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatsoeuer is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

7 Neither for the vnderstanding thereof is any curious disputation needefull, which not a litle combred the old writers, whether the soule of the sonne doe proceede by deriuation from the soule of the father, because in it the infection principally resteth. We must be content with this, that such giftes as it pleased the Lord to haue bestowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after hee had receiued them, he lost them not onely from himselfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be carefull of a coneuiance from soule to soule, when hee shall heare that Adam receiued these ornamets which he lost, no lesse for vs than for himselfe? that they were not giuen to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not against reason, if he being spoiled, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with sinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottenesse into the other twigges that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in y^e father, y^e they also were infectiue to their children: y^e is to say, so was y^e beginning of corruptiō in Adam, that by continuall flowing from one to another, it is conueied from the ancestors into the posteritie. For the infection hath not her cause in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was so ordeined of God, that such giftes as he had giuen to the first man, man should both haue them, and lose them as well for himselfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians doe cauill, that it is not likely that the children doe take corruption from godly parentes, sith they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleanness, that is easily confuted. For they descend not of their spirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation. Therefore as Augustine saith, whether the vnbeleueer be condemned as guiltie, and the beleueer quitte as innocent, they both do beget not innocents, but guiltie, because they beget of the corrupted rupted nature. Nowe where as they doe in manner partake of the parentes holinesse, that is the speciall blessing of the people of God, which proueth not but that the first and vniuersall curse of mankinde went before. For of nature is guiltinesse, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8 And to the end that these things be not spoken of a thing vncertaine and vnknown, let vs define Originall sinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to bee most agreable with trueth. Originall sin therefore seemeth to be the inheritably descending peruersnesse and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the partes of the soule, which first maketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the fleshe: & that is it properly that Paul oftentimes calleth sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, thestes, hatreds, murders, banketinges, after the same manner hee calleth the fruites of sinne, albeit they are likewise called sinnes both commonly in the Scripture, & also by the same Paul himselfe. Therefore these two things are distinctly to bee noted: that is, that being so in all partes of our nature corrupted and peruerted, wee are nowe euen for such corruption onely holden worthily damned and conuicted before God, to whome is nothing acceptable but righteousness, innocencie and purenesse. And yet is not that bonde in respecte of an others fault. For where it is saide, that by the sinne of Adam wee are made subiect to the iudgement of God, it is not so to bee taken, as if wee innocent and vnderferuing did beare the blame of his faulte. But because by his offending wee are all clothed with the curse, therefore is it saide that hee hath bounde vs. Neuerthelesse, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection distilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is iustly due. Wherefore howe so euer Augustine doeth oftentimes call it an others sinne, (to shew the more plainly, that it is conueyed into vs by propagation) yet doeth hee also affirme withall that it is proper to euerie one. And the Apostle himselfe expressly witnesseth, that therefore death came vpon all men, because all men haue sinned, and are wrapped in Originall sinne, and defiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the verie infantes them selues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by an others, but by their owne faulte. For though they haue not as yet brought forth the fruites of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the seed thereof enclosed within them: yea their whole nature is a certaine seede of sinne: therefore it cannot be but hatefull and abominable to God. Wherevpon foloweth, that it is properly accounted sinne before God: for there coulde bee no giltinesse without sinne. The other point is, that this peruersnesse neuer ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth newe fruites, euen the same workes of the fleshe that wee haue before described: like as a burning fornace bloweth out flame and sparcles, or as a spring doeth without ceassing cast out water. Therefore they which haue defined Originall sinne, to bee a lacking of Originall righteousness which ought to haue beene in vs, although indeede they comprehend all that is in the thing it selfe: yet they haue not fully enough expressed the force and efficacy thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodnesse, but also is so plenteous and fruitfull of all euilles, that it cannot bee idle. They that haue saide, that it is a concupiscence, haue vsed a worde not verie farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not graunted by the most part, that whatsoeuer is in man, euen from the vnderstanding to the will, from the soule to the fleshe, is corrupted and stuffed full with this concupiscence: or, to ende it shortlier, that whole man is of himselfe nothing else but concupiscence.

9 Wherefore, I haue saide that all the partes of the soule are possessed of sinne, sith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteousness. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possessed the very castle of his minde, and pride pearced to the innermost part of his hart. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restrain the corruption that proceeded from thence, onely to the sensuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture, that allureth, stirreth and draweth to sinne onely that parte, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombarde hath disclosed his grosse ignorance, which seeking and searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paul witnesseth not properly in deede, but because it more appeareth in the fleshe, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace. And Paul there taketh away al doubt: teaching that corruption resteth not in one parte alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, hee doeth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but specially trauelleth to prooue that the vnderstanding minde is subiect to blindnesse, and the hearte to peruersnesse. And the same thirde chapter to the Romanes is nothing else but a description of originall sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirite which is compared with the old man and the flesh, doth not only signifie the grace whereby the inferiour or sensuall parte of the soule is amended, but also conteyneth a full reformation of all the parts. And therefore Paul doth commaunde, not onely that our grosse appetites be brought to naught, but also that we our selues be renewed in the spirit of our mind, as likewise in an other place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newnesse of minde. Wherevpon followeth, that the same part, wherein most of all shineth the excellencie and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to bee healed, but in manner so put on a newe nature. Howe farre sinne possesseth both the vnderstanding minde and the hearte, wee will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortly to touch that the whole man from the heade to the foote is so ouerwhelmed as with an ouerflowing of water, that no parte of him is free from sinne, and that therefore whatsoeuer proceedeth from him is accompted for sinne, as Paul sayth, that all the affections of the fleshe or thoughtes, are enmities against GOD, and therefore death.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sins, because wee say that men are naturally sinnefull. They doe wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthinesse, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sounde and vn-corrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne fleshe and not of God, forasmuch as we perished by no other meane but by this, that we degendred from our first estate. But yet let not any man here murmure and say, that God might haue better foreseene for our saluation, if he had prouided that Adam should not haue fallen. For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godly mindes, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination which shal after be entreated of in place conuenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that wee accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in deede it is, that the same deadly wound sticketh fast in nature: but it is much materiall to knowe, whether it came into nature from else where, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is euident that the wounde was giuen by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why we should cōplaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This haue I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they haue sought many inuentions. Ecc1. 7. 13. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as hauing gotten vprightnesse by the goodnesse of God, hee by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

11 We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. Wee denie that it proceeded from nature, to make appeare that it is rather a qualitic come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall propertie that hath bin put into him from the beginning. Yet we call it Natural, that no man should think yeuery man getteth it by euil custom, whereas it holdeth al men bound by inheritably descending right. And this we do not of our own heads without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are al by nature the children of wrath. How could God, whom al his meanest workes do please, be wrathful against the noblest of al his creatures? But he is rather wrathful against y corruptiō of his work, than against his work it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly saide to bee by nature abhominable to God, it shalbe also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the finnes naturall, which doe necessarily reigne in our fleshe where the grace of God is absent. So vanisheth away the foolish trifling deuise of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse hauing substance in man, presumed to forge for him a newe Creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous God the cause and beginning of euill. Eph. 2. 3.

The ij. Chapter.

subject to miserable bondage.*

Sith we haue seene, that the dominion of sinne, since the time that it helde the first man bound vnto it, doth not onely reigne in all mankind, but also wholly possesseth euery soule: nowe must wee more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoiled of all Freedome or no: and if yet there remaine any parcel, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the end that the truth of this question may more easily appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shalbe the best way to auoid errour, if the daungers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from al vprightnesse, by and by he thereby taketh occasion of slouthfulness: and because it is said, that by himselfe he can do nothing to the studie of righteousnes, forthwith he neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertained nothing vnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it neuer so litle, but that both Gods honour shalbe thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be ouerthrowen with rash confidence. Therefore to the end we strike not vpon these rocks, this course is to be kept, that man being enforced that there remaineth in him no goodnes, & being on euery side compassed about with most miserable necessitie, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is voide, and to the libertie whereof he is deprived, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulness, than if it were fained that he is furnished with greatest power. Howe necessary this second point is, euery man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stand for trueth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as farre as it behoueth that he be throwen downe from false boasting of himselfe. For if it were not granted to man to glory in himselfe euen at that time, when by the bountifullnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornamentes, how much ought he now to be humbled, sith for his vnthankfulness hee is thrust downe from hie glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I say) when he was aduanced to the hiest degree of honour, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that hee was created after the image of God, wherby it secretly teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his own good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth nowe, but that he being naked and destitute of all glorie, doe acknowledge G O D, to whose liberalitie he could not be thankfull when hee flowed full of the riches of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne povertie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profite, that all praise of wisdom & strength be taken from vs as it pertaineth to the glorie of G O D that they ioine our ruine with the robbrie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when wee are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on hie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men haue imagined and do babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather throwen downe headlong, than stablished by them that defend it. This I thought needfull to speake before, as by way of preface for many mens sakes, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowen from the ground, that the power of God may be buylded in man, do much hate this maner of disputing as dangerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion necessarie, & for vs most profitable.

2 Whereas we haue a litle before said, that in the vnderstanding minde, & in the heart are placed the powers of the soule, now let vs consider what they both are able to do. The Philosophers in deede with great consent do imagine that in the vnderstanding minde sitteth reason, which like a lampe giueth light to all counsels, & like a Queene gouerneth the will, for they say that it is so endued with diuine light, that it can giue good counsel, & so excelleth in liuely force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other side, that sense is dull & bleare eyed, that it alway creepeth on y^e ground, & walloweth in grosse objects, and neuer listeth yp it selfe to true insight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yield it selfe to sense to be subdued, is caried on to the studie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into will: but if it giue it selfe subiect into the bondage of sense, it is by it corrupted and peruerced, so that it dependeth into lust. And whereas by their opinion there do sir in the soule those powers that I haue spoken of before, vnderstanding, sense, appetite or will, which worde will is nowe more commonly vsed, they say that vnderstanding is endued with reason, the best gouernesse toward good and blessed life, so that it do hold it selfe within his owne excellencie, & shew forth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferiour motion of it, which is called sense, wherewith man is drawen to error & deceit, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason, & by litle & litle be vanquished. They place will in the midst betweene reason & sense, as a thing at her own ordering, & hauing libertie whether it list to obey to reason, or giue forth it selfe to be rauished by sense.

3 Sometime in deede they do not deny, being ouercome by verie experience, how hardly man stablisheth reason to raigne as Queene within him selfe, while sometime he is tickled with entisements of pleasures, sometime deceiuéd with false semblance of good things, sometime importunately stricken with immoderate affections, and violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or strings of sinowes, as Plato sayth. For which reason Cicero saith, that these sparkes giuen by nature, are with peruerse opinions & euill maners by and by quenched: But when such diseases haue once gotten places in the mindes of men: they grant that they doe more outragiously ouerflow, than that they easily may be restrained: and they sticke not to compare them to wild horses which throwing away reason as it were casting y^e Chariot diuen, do range vnrulely & without measure. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (say they) it be in our choise to do this or that, then is it also in our choise not to do. Now if it be in our choise not to do, then is it also to do, but of free choise we seeme to do those things that we do, and to forbear those things that we forbear. Therefore if we do any good thing when we list, we may likewise leaue it vndone: if we do any euil, we may also eschew the same. Yet

Some of them haue burst forth into so great licentiousnesse, that they haue boasted that it is in deede Gods gift that we liue, but our owne that we liue well & holily. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta: because euery man himselfe getteth vertue to himselfe, therefore neuer any of the wise men did thanke God for it. For (saith he) for vertue wee be praised, & in vertue we glorie, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our selues. And a litle after: This is the iudgement of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisdom to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers, that the reason of mans vnderstanding is sufficient for right gouernance: that Will being subiect to it, is in deede moued by Sense to euil things. But euen as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4 Among the Ecclesiasticall writers, albeit there haue bene none that did not acknowledge both that the soundnesse of reason in man hath bene sore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much assented to the Philosophers, of which the ancient, as I thinke, did so much aduance the strength of man, vpon this consideration, lest if they should haue expressly confessed his weakenesse, first they should haue made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then lest they should giue to \bar{y} flesh, which of it selfe was dull to goodnes, a new occasion of slouthfulness. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurditie in the common iudgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that seconde point, not to make place for slothfulness, appeareth by their owne wordes. Chrysostom hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill things in our owne power, hee hath giuen vs Freedom of election, and he withholdeth not the vnwilling, but embraceth the willing. Againe, Oftentimes he that is euill, if he will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slouthfulness falleth and commeth euill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layth not necessitie vpon vs, but giuing conuenient remedies, suffreth all to lye in the mynde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse wee be holpen by the grace of God, wee can neuer doe any thing well: so vnlesse wee bring that which is our owne, wee cannot obtaine the fauour of God. And hee had saide before, that it shoulde not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierom sayeth, that it is our parte to begin, but Gods to make an ende: our parte to offer what we can, his to fulfill what wee cannot. You see nowe that in these sayings they gaue to man towards the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in vs, but if they did proue that in it onely wee sinned. With what apt handeling they haue done the same, we shal after see. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shal by and by apere. Now although \bar{y} Grecians more than other and

and among them principally Chrystostome haue passed measure in aduancing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, do in this poynt so either vary, or wauer, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certainty can be gathered of their writings. Therefore we wil not tary vpon exact reckening of euery one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of euery one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them y^e followed after, while euery one for him selfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by lide and litle one after an other into worse and worse, till it came so fare, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his sensuall parte, and to haue reason altogether, and wil for the more part vn-corrupted. In the meane time this slewe about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundreth man did euen sleightly vnderstand. As for my part, if I would plainely shew of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be heedefully weyed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoiled of his supernaturall giftes, is able to doe. They therefore which boasted themselues to be the Disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill still remained among the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vn-corrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the worde much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power of himselfe. Because therfore al, euen to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Free will, & many of them that would seeme excellent, can not tel how far it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, & then let vs proceede on by the simplicity of the Scripture, to shewe what man is able to do of his own nature, toward good or euill. What Free will is, where as it is a word commonly found in all mens writings, yet few haue defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he sayd, that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euill, and a power of will to choose either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth that it is a power of reason and will, wherby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euill when grace ceaseth. Bernarde, while he meaneth to speake more suttly, speaketh more darkely, which saith, that it is a consent by reason of the liberty of will that can not be lost, & the iudgement of reason that can not be auoyded. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar enough, which saith that it is a power to kepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Scholemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they sawe that wil was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of their owne such thinges as they ought either to be better, or to serue for playner declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to be referred to reason, whose part is to discerne betweene good and euil things: and the adiectiue Free, pertayneth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore sith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas saith that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of vnderstanding & appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue we in what thinges they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to say, in reason and will. Nowe remaineth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

5 They are commonly wont to make subiect to the free determination of man, thinges meane, y^e is which belong not to the kingdome of God: but they doe referre true righteousnesse to the special grace of God and spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the author of y^e booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shewe, he reckoneth vp three sortes of Willes, the first Sensitiue, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he sayth, that man hath the first two at his owne libertie, the last is the worke of the holy ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shalbe enreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it cometh to passe, that when writers speake of free will, they principally seeke not what it is able to do to ciuil or outward doinges, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shewe a good reason. There hath bin a distinction receiued in Schooles, that reckoneth vp three sortes of freedomes, the first from necessitie, the second from sinne, the third from miserie. Of which the first so naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sinne. This distinction I willingly receiue, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfully confounded with compulsion: betweene which two how much difference there is, and how necessaric that difference is to be considered, shal appeare in another place.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controuersie that man hath not free will to do good workes, vnlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe vpon these phrenetike men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether deprived of power to doe well, or whether he haue yet some power, although it be but litle & weake, which by it selfe in deede can do nothing, but by helpe of grace doth also her part. While the Maister of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he sayeth there are two sortes of grace necessaric for vs, whereby we may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a Working grace, whereby wee effectually will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good wil in helping it. In which diuision this I milke, that while he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly sheweth his meaning that man already of his owne nature, after a certaine maner, desireth good though vneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is in deede the worke of God, yet this he graunteth to man, that of his owne motion he desireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Lombard would seeme to haue borrowed this diuision. In the second part of the diuision, the doubtfulness of speach offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore worke together with the Second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make voyde the First grace by refusing it, or to confirme it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, Amb. lib. 2. cap. 4. doth thus expresse it, that it is free for them that vse the iudgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be worthy reward not to haue departed, & that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merites, by whose wil it was possible to haue not bin done. These two things I had wil to note by the way, that nowe, reader, thou mayest see howe much I dissent from the soundest sorte of the schoolemen. For I do much farther differ from the later Sophisters, euen so much as they be farther gone from the auncient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sorte as it is, we perceiue by this diuision, after what maner they haue giuen Free will to man. For at length Lombard saith, Libr. 2. dist. 25. that we haue not free will therfore, because we are alike able either to do or to thinke good and euill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedome is not hindered, although wee be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, and can doe nothing but sinne.

7 Therefore, man shalbe sayd to haue free wil after this sort, not because he hath a free choise as well of good as of euill, but because he doth euil by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very wel said: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proude a title? A goodly libertie forsooth, if man be not compelled to serue sinne: so is he yet a willing seruant that his will is holden fast bounde with the fetters of sinne. Truly I do abhorre striuing about wordes wherewith the Church is vainely wearied: but I thinke that such wordes are with great religious carefulnesse to be taken heede of, which sounde of any absurdity, specially where the error is hurtfull. Howe fewe I pray you, are there, which when they heare that Free will is assigned to man, do not by and by conceiue, that he is lord both of his owne minde and will, and that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether part he will? But some one will say: that peril shalbe taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsity, he will sooner conceiue an error of one litle word, than a trueth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in maner that came after, while they sticke vpon the naturall signification of the word, haue bin caried into a trust of themselues that bringeth them to destruction.

8 But if the authority of the fathers do moue vs, they haue in deed continually y word in their mouth: but they do withall declare, how much they esteeme y vse of it. First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to cal it Bonde will. In one place he is angry with them that denie free wil: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he sayeth onely, Let not any man be so bolde to deny the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in an other place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do binde and conquire it. Lib. 7. cōtra Iul. Hom. 53. in Ioan. Ad Anast. cap. 44.

Deperfect. Againe, that when will was ouercome with sinne wherinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Againe, that man hauing ill vsed his free will, lost both himself & it. Againe, free will is become captiue, that it can do nothing toward righteousnes. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that the iustice of God is not fulfilled when the law commandeth, and man doth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendereth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man receiued great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that he had shewed that free will is established by grace, he sharply inueyeth against them that take it vpon them without grace. Why therefore (saith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the verie name of free will, is mention of freedome. But where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedome. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whome a man is ouercome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondseruants, which saith: Without me ye can do nothing? Beside that also in another place he seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he sayde, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to righteousness, but the bondseruant of sinne. Which saying in another place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousness, but by choyse of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Saviour. He that doeth testifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousness, seemeth trimly to mock at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by mee for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it shoulde turne to a great benefite to the church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would wish other, if they aske me counsell, to forbear it.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great preiudice against my self, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doutfully or diuersly in this matter, that no certieintie can be had out of their writings. For some will so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giuing any voyce herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wittes prouided for, which if they waite vpon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway wauer vncertaine. In such sort do they sometime teach, man being spoyled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doutfulness of speech, they nothing, or verie litle esteeming mans strength, haue giuen the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certain sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so oft repeateth, that we ought to glory of nothing, because we haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoiled in himselfe, may learne to hang al vpon God. What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shal liue? and y^e the tree of knowledge of good & euil, is the free choise of will, wherof whoso tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shal dye? What meaneth that of Chrysostom, that euery man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we haue no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sin: if it be not lawfull to attempt how much the power of free will is able to doe, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God & man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should cauill, that I choose out those things only that make for my purpose, and do craftily leaue out such things as make against mee, therefore I doe forbear such rehearfall. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoeuer they be somtime too busie in aduancing free will, y^e this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man beeing altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strength reposed in God alone. Nowe come I to the simple setting foorth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

10 But I am here constrayned to reapeate that, which in the beginning of this chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and throwen downe with conscience of his owne miserie, needinesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath hee best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, least man will take too much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recouered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his own right, be it neuer so litle, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conueying the honor of God to himselfe, become guilty of hainous sacriledge. And truly so oft as this lust inuadeth our minde, y^e we desire to haue somewhat of our own, which may rest in our selues rather then in God, let vs know y^e this thought is ministred vs by no other counseller, but by him that perswaded our first parentes, to haue a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. If it be the word of the deuill that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vnlesse we list to take counsell of our enemy. It is pleasant in deede, for a man to haue so much strength of his own, y^e he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many fore sentences make vs afraide, by which we be throwen downe: as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in man, & setteth flesh to be his arme. Again, y^e God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, & attend vpon his mercy. Againe, that it is he which giueth strength vnto him that fainteth, & vnto him y^e hath no strength, he encreaseth power, euen the young men shall faint and be weary, and the yong men shall stumble and fall, but they that wait vpon the Lord, shall renew their strength. All which sayings tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strength, be it neuer so litle, if wee meane to haue God fauorable vnto vs, which resisteth the proud, & giueth grace to the humble. And then againe, let these promises come into our remembrance. I will poure out water vpon the thirstie, and Floudes vpon the dry ground. Againe, All ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises do testifie, that none are admitted to receive the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne pouerty. And such promises are not to be passed ouer, as is that of Esay: Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine euerlasting light, & the God thy glory. The Lord in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his seruantes, but because he will himselfe alone appeare glorious in them, hee calleth their confidence far away, euen from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

II Truly, that saying of Chrystome hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisedome is humility: but yet more that saying of Augustine, As (sayth he) that same Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the second, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the thirde, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske mee of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Second, and Thirde time, and alwayes I would answer Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some litle vertue to be in himselfe, absteineth from pride and haughtinesse of minde, but when he truly feeleth himselfe to bee such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in an other place he declareth. Lette no man (sayth he) flatter himselfe: of his owne he is a deuill. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteousnesse is Gods. Againe, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maymed, troubled and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defence. Againe, when euery man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe he hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the warres are ceased. But it is needefull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shiuered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. Howe much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receiueh thee. So vpon the three score and tenne Psalme hec forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteousnesse, that wee may acknowledge the righteousnesse of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commend his grace vnto vs, that we may knowe our selues to be nothing, that we stande onely by the mercie of G O D, when of our selues we are nothing but euill. Let vs not therefore striue here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawn from our saluation which is giuen to him. For as our humblenesse is his hiennesse, so the confession of our humblenes hath his mercy ready for remedy. Neither yet do I require that man not conuincd should willingly yelde himselfe: nor if he hath any power, that he should turne his minde from it, to bee subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the disease of selfeloue and desire of victorie, wherewith beeing blinded, hee thinketh too highly of himselfe, he shoulde well consider himselfe in the true looking glasse of the Scripture. And the common saying which they haue borrowed out of Augustine pleaseth me well, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made emptie. For in this latter part of supernaturall giftes, they vnderstand as well the light of faith as of righteousness, which were sufficient to the attaining of heauenly life and eternal felicitie. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdome of God, he was also, deprivied of the spirituall giftes, where with he had bin furnished to the hope of eternall saluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdome of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, vntill by grace of regeneration hee recover them. Of that sort are faith, the loue of God, charitie toward our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteousness. All these things, because Christ restoreth them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Again, soundnesse of the vnderstanding minde and vprightnesse of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall giftes. For though there remaine somewhat left of vnderstanding and iudgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our vnderstanding is found and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesses. And as for our will, the peruersenes thereof is more than sufficiently knowen. Sith therefore reason, wherby a man discerneth betweene good and euill, wherby he vnderstandeth and iudgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether destroid, but it was partly weakened; partly corrupted, so that soule ruines thereof appeare. In this sense doth Iohn say, that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not: In which words both things are plainly expressed, that in y^e perverted & degendred nature of man, there shine yet some sparks that shew that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from brute beastes, because he is endued with vnderstanding: and yet that this light is choaked with great thicknesse of ignoraunce, that it can not effectually gette abroad. So will, because it is vnseparable from the nature of man, perished not, but was bound to peruerse desires, that it can couer no good thing. This in deede is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceede according to that first distinction, wher in we deuided the soule of man into vnderstanding and will: let vs first examine the force of vnderstanding. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindenesse, that a man leaue vnto it no manner of skill in any kinde of thinges, is not onely against the worde of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For we see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to searche out trueti, to which he would not aspire at all, but hauing felt some fauour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans vnderstanding, that he is naturally drawn with loue of trueti, the neglecting whereof, in brute beastes proueth a grosse sense without reason, albeit, this litle desire, such as it is, faimeth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the witte of man can not for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out truth, but strayeth in diuerse errors, and as it were groping in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanisheth away, so in seeking trueth, it doeth bewray howe vnfitte it is to seeke and finde truth. And then it is sore troubled with an other vanitie, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with fonde curiositie, in searching out things superfluous and nothing worth: and to things most necessary to be knownen, it either taketh no heede, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarce at any time applieth her studie earnestly vnto them. Of which petuersenesse, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is founde, that all men haue entangled themselues with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all these studies, in which men thinke themselues to bee very wise, yet he pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

13 Yet doe not all trauailes of Witte so alway become voide, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferiour things. Yea and it is not so blockishe, but that it tasteth also some litle of the huer things, howsoever it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vppe about the compasse of this present life, then is it principally conuincd of her owne weakenesse. Wherefore, that we may the better seee howe farre according to the degrees of her abilitie it proceedeth in euery thing, it is good that I putte soorth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one vnderstanding of earthly things, an other of heauenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concerne God and his Kingdome, true righteousnesse, and the blessednesse of eternall life, but haue all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were contained within the bounds thereof. Heauenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heauenly kingdome. Of the first sort are policie, gouernaunce of householde, all handy craftes, and liberrall Sciences. Of the second sorte are the knowlege of G O D and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies together: he is also by naturall instinctio bent to cherishe and to preserue the fellowshippe of these companies, therefore wee seee that there are in the mindes of all men vniuersal imprcssions of a certaine ciuill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that vnderstandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiue not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of al men vnto lawes, because the seeds thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weye not the disensions and fightinges that afterward arise while some desire to peruert lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernement of Kinges, that lust straieth abroad in steade of right, as thecues and robbers, some (which is a faulte more than common) thinke that to be vniust, which other haue stablished for iust: and on the other side stiffely say, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men doe not therefore hate lawes, because they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie lust, doe fight against manifest reason, and for their fantasie doe abhorre that, which in vnderstanding of minde they allowe. The latter sorte of it striuing in such, that taketh not away the first conceiuing of equitie. For when men do striue among themselues, concerning the pointes of lawes, they agree together in a certaine summe of equitie. Wherein is proued the weakenes of mans wit, which euen then when it seemeth to follow the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but stil this remaineth true, that there is sownen in all men a certaine seede of politike order. And that is a large prooffe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is voide of the light of reason.

14 Now doe followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handy craftes, in learning whereof, because there is in vs all a certaine aptnesse, in them also doeth appeare the force of mans witte: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certayne enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no man founde, whose conceite of witte doeth not in some arte or other shewe foorth it selfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facilitie to learne, but also to deuise in euerie art some newe thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath bene learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it moued Plato erroneously to teach, that such conceiuing is nothing else, but a calling to remembraunce, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confesse, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. These poyntes therefore doe plainely testifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuersall conceiuing of reason and of vnderstanding. Yet is it so an vniuersall benefite, that therein euerie man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of G. O. D. To which thankfulnessse the creator himselfe doeth sufficiently awake vs, when hee createth naturall fooles, in whome hee maketh vs to see with what giftes mans soule excelleth, if it bee not endued with his lighre, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free giste of his liberalitie towardes euerie man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the same artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a fewe, is no perfecte argument of the common conceiuing of wit, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godlic and vngodlic, it is rightfully reckened among naturall giftes.

15 So ofte therefore as wee fight vpon prophane writers, let vs bee put in minde by that maruellous light of trueth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, howe much soeuer it be peruerted and fallen from the first integritie, is yet stil clothed and garnished with excellent giftes of God. If we consider that the spirite of God is the onely fountaine of trueth, wee will neither refuse nor dispise the truth it selfe, wheresoeuer it shall appeare, except we will dishonourable vse the spirite of God: for the giftes of the holy Ghost cannot bee set light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe: And what? Shall wee denie that the truth shined to the olde Lawyers, which haue set foorth Ciuil order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blinde both in thar exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall wee say that they had no wit, which by setting in order the art of speach, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which in setting foorth Physicke, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall wee thinke them doring errors of madde men? no, rather wee can not reade the writing of the olde men, concerning these things, without great admiration of their wit. But shall wee thinke any thing praise worthie or excellent, which we doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs bee ashamed of so great vnthankfulness into which the heathen Poetes fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good artes, were the inuentions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whonie the scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searching out of inferiour things, let vs learne by such examples, howe many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath beene spoiled of the true God.
Ghoſt

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good giftes of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankind hee dealeth abroad to whome it pleaseth him. For if it be houghed, that the vnderstanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, shoulde bee powred into Beseleel and Oliab by the spirit of God, it is no maruell if the knowledge of those things which are moste excellent in mans life, be sayde to bee communicated vnto vs by the spirite of God. Neither is there cause why any man should aske, what haue ywicked to doe with Gods spirite, which are altogether estraunged from God. For where it is saide that the spirite of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely, that is to be vnderstanded of the spirit of sanctification, by the which we are consecrate to God himselfe, to bee his temples: yet doeth hee neuertheles fill, mooue and quicken all things with the vertue of the same spirite, and that according to the propertie of euerie kinde which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue beene the Lordes will that wee shoulde bee holpen by the trauell and seruice of the wicked in naturall Philosophie, Dialecticke, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let vs vse it, leaste if wee neglect the giftes of God, willingly offered in them, wee suffer iuste punishment for our slouthfulness. But least any shoulde thinke a man to bee blessed, when vnder the elementes of this worlde there is granted vnto him so great an abilitie to conceiue truth, it is also to bee added that all this power to vnderstande, and the vnderstanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where is not a steedefast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truelic, whome (as we haue saide) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Scholmen are compelled to assent vnto, as the free giftes were taken from man after his fall, so these naturall giftes which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselves in asmuch as they come from God, but because

17 Let this be the summe: that it is seene that in all mankinde is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beasts, as brute beastes doe differ in sense from thinges without life. For whereas there be borne certaine natural fooles and idiots, that default obscureth not the generall grace of God But rather by such sight we are put in minde, that what is left vnto our selues, ought iustly to bee ascribed to the kindenesse of God, because if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawē with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpnesse of conceiuing, some other doe passe in iudgement, some haue a quicker wit to learne this or that arte: in this varietie G O D setteth foorth his grace vnto vs, that no man should claime to himselfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becommeth one more excellent than an other, but that in common nature might appeare. aboute other the speciall grace of God; which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bounde to none. Beside that, God poureth in singular motions, according to the calling of euery man. Of which thing we meete with many examples in the bookes of the Iudges, where it is saide, that the spirite of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose hearts the Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdom was prophesied of, Samuel saide thus: The spirite of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be an other man. And this was continued to the whole course of gouernement: as after it is spoken of Dauid, that the spirit of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in an other place as touching particular morions: yea in Homer men are saide to excell in witte, not onely as Iupiter hath dealt to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased as were most sharp and deepe witted; that the wittes of men are in the hande and will of God to rule them at euery moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some markes of the Image of God, which doe make difference betweene al mankinde and other creatures.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdome of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, where in our saluation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his lawe. Both in the first two, and in the second, properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than molles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many thinges well and aply spoken, but yet such as doe alway fauour of a certaine eiddie imagination. The Lord gaue them in deed, as is aboue said, a litle tast of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodlinesse: and many times he moued them to speake many thinges, by confession whereof themselves might be conuincid: But they so saue the things that they saw, that by such seeing they were not directed to y truth, much lesse did attaine vnto vnto it, like as a wayfaring man in the middelt of the fieldē, for a sodaine moment, seeth faire and wide the glistering of lightening in the night time, but with such a quickely vanishing sight, that hee is sooner couered againe with the darkenesse of the night, than he can stīre his foot, so far is it of that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small droppes of truth, wherewith as it were by chaunce, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good will toward vs, without which mans witte must needes be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approacheth, nor goeth toward, nor once directeth sight vnto this truth, to vnderstand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

19 But because we being drunke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, doe very hardly suffer our selues to be persuaded, that in matters of God it is vtterly blinde and dul: I think it shalbe better to confirme it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doth Iohn very wel teach in that place which I euen now alleaged, when hee writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should bee the lighte of men, and that the light did shine in darkenesse, and the darkenesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deede, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparcle of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehendeth not God. And why so? because mans quicknesse of witte, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darkenesse. For when the holy Ghost calleth men darkenesse, he at once spoileth them of all abilitie of spirituall vnderstanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloud, or of the will of the fleshe, or of man, but of God. As if he should say: flesh is not capable of so hie wisdom to conceiue God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirit of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall reuelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

20 If we were persuaded of this which ought to be out of all controuersie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heauenly father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt vpon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when he saith y no man can call Iesus the Lord, but in y holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, cryeth out, that no man can receiue any thing, vnlesse it bee giuen him from aboue. And that he meaneth by giste a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, y he complaineth that in so many words as he had spoken to commend Christ to his Disciples, he preuailed nothing. I see (saith he) that wordes are nothing to informe mens mindes concerning diuine thinges, vnlesse the Lord giue vnderstanding by his spirite. Yea and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefite of G.O.D. Thine eies (saith hee) haue seene those those great tokens and wonders, and, The Lord hath not giuen thee a heart to vnderstand, nor eares to heare, nor eyes to see. What should he expresse more, if hee called vs blockes in considering the workes of God? Wherevpon the Lorde by the Prophete promisseth for a great grace, that hee will giue the Israelites a heart, that they may knowe him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spiritually wise, as it is lightened by him. Ier. 24. 7. and this Christ plainly confirmed with his owne mouth, when hee sayth, that no man can come to him, but hee to whome it shall be giuen from the Father. What? is not hee himselfe the luely Image of the Father in whome the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed vnto vs? Therefore he coulde not better shew what our power is to knowe GOD, than when hee saith, that wee haue no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will vnto men? And did hee not faithfully doe his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inwarde scholemaster, the holy Ghost, set open the way to our minds. Therefore none come to him, but they that haue hearde and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Euen, when the holy Ghost by maruellous and singular vertue formeth the eares to heare, and the mindes to vnderstande. And least that shoulde seeme straunge, hee alleageth the Prophecie of Esay, where when he promisseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shall be gathered together to saluation, shall be taught of the Lorde. If God there foresheweth some peculiar thing concerning his electes, it is euident that hee speaketh not of y^e kinde of learning that was also common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that wee must vnderstande it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whome the holy ghost by his enlightening shal make a new minde. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entring into discourse of this matter, after hee had condemned all mens wisdom of follie and vanitie, & vtterly brought it to naught, at the last concludeth thus: that y^e naturall man can not perceiue those things that are of the spirite of God: they are foolishnes vnto him, and he cannot vnderstande them, because they are spiritually iudged. Whome doeth he call naturall? euen him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. Hee I say comprehendeth nothing in the spirituall mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by slouthfulnesse he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he woulde trauell neuer so much, hee can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually iudged. What meaneth that? because being vtterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely reuelation of the spirite: so that they are reckened for follie where the spirite of God giueth not light. Before he had auauced those things that God hath prepared for them that loue him, aboue the capacitie of eyes, eares & mindes. Yea he testifieth that mans wisdom was as a certaine veile, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God, What meane wee? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdom of this worlde is made follie by God: & shal we forsooth giue vnto it sharpenes of vnderstanding, whereby it may pearce to the secrete places of y^e heauenly kingdome? Farre be such beastlines fro vs. 1. Cor. 2. 14. 1. Cor. 1. 20.

21 And so that which here he taketh away from men, in an other place in a prayer, hee giueth it to God alone. God (saith he) and the father of glorie, giue to you the spirite of wisdom and reuelation. Nowe thou hearest that all wisdom and reuelation is the gifte of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your minde. Surely if they neede a newe reuelation, then are they blinde of themselues. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling. &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wittes of men are not capable of so great vnderstanding, to knowe their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, y^e God doth remedie that dulnesse or vnskilfullnesse, when by the doctrine of his worde hee directeth mans vnderstanding, whither without a guide hee coulde not haue atteyned. For Dauid had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisdom that may bee desired, and yet not contented with that, hee requireth to haue his eyes opened, that hee may consider the mysteries of the same lawe. By which speech truly he secretly saith, that the sunne riseth vpon the earth where the worde of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntill hee himselfe, that is therefore called the father of lightes, doe giue them or open their eyes, because where so euer he shineth not with his spirite, all things are possessed with darkenesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best scholemaster: yet if they had not needed the spirit of truth to instruct their mindes in that same doctrine which they had heard before, hee woulde not haue bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we do thereby confesse that we want: and God in that that hee promisseth it vs, doeth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to vnderstande the mysteries of God as he is enlightened with his grace. He that giueth to himselfe more vnderstanding, is so much the more blinde, for that hee doeth not acknowledge his owne blindnesse.

22 Nowe remaineth the thirde pointe, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which wee doe rightly call the knowledge of the workes of righteousness, wherein mans wit seemeth to bee of somewhat more sharpe sight, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the gentiles which haue no lawe, while they doe the workes of the lawe, are to themselues in steede of a lawe, and doe shewe the lawe written in their hartes, their consciences bearing them witnes, and their thoughtes accusing them within themselues or excusing them before the iudgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteousness naturally grauen in their mindes, surely we can not say that wee are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more common, than that man by the law naturall, of which y^e Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the lawe is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, howe farre it bringeth them towards the marke of reason and truth. The same is also euident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. Hee had saide a litle before, that they which sinned in the lawe, are iudged by the lawe, they that haue sinned without lawe doe perishe without lawe. Because this might seeme vnreasonable, that the Gentils should perish without any iudgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in steede of a law, and therefore is sufficient for their iust damnation. Therefore the ende of the law naturall is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shal be defined not ill after this sort, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently discerneth between iust and vniust, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proued guiltie by their owne testimonie. Such is the tenderesse of man toward him selfe, that in doing of euils, he alway turneth away his minde so much as he may from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it seemeth that Plato was moued to thinke that there is no sin done but by ignorance. That in deede were fitly sayd of him, if mens hypocrisie went so farre in hiding of euils, that the minde might not knowe it selfe guiltie before God. But when the sinner seeking to eschue the iudgement empinted in him, is now & then drawn backe vnto it, and not suffered so to winke, but that he be compelled whether he wil or no, sometime to open his eyes: it is falsely said that he sinneth onely by ignorance.

In Protagora.

23 Themistius saith more truely, which teacheth y^e vnderstanding is selfe deceiued: that it is blindness when it goeth any further, that is, when he commeth down to the speciall case. Euery man, if it be generally asked, wil affirme, that manslaughter is euil: but he y^e conspireth to kil his enimies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, priuately he will flatter himselfe. This is ignorance, when a man coming to the special case forgetteth the rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the generall question. Of which thing Augustine discourses very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the lviij. Psalme: albeit the same thing is not continuall. For sometime the shamefulnessse of the euil deede so presseth the conscience, that not deceiuing him selfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly & willingly he runneth into euil. Out of which affection came these sayings: I see the better & allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me think, Aristotle hath very aptly made distinction betweene Incontinence and Temperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he saith, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euil in his owne act, which it generally seeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediatly followeth. But intemperance is not extinguished or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceiued choise of euill.

Paraph. in lib. 3. de anima. cap. 46.

24 Now when thou hearest iudgement vniuersally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not euery sound and perfect iudgement. For if mens heartes are furnished with choise of iust and vniust, only to this end, that they should not pretend ignorance, it is not then needeful to see the trueth in euery thing. But it is enough & more, that they vnderstand so farre that they cannot escape away, but being conuict by witnessse of their conscience, they euen now alreadie begin to tremble at the iudgement seat of God. And if we wil trie our reason by the law of God, which is the exemplar of true righteousness, we shal find how many wayes it is blind. Truely it attaineth not at all to those that are the chiefe things in the First table, as of confidence in God, of giuing to him the praise of strength and right-teoufnesse, of calling vpon his name, of the true keeping of Sabbath. What soule euer by naturall sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these & like things? For when prophane men wil worship God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway slide backe thither againe. They denie in deede that sacrifices do please God, vnlesse there be adioyned a purenesse of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceiue somewhat of the spirituall worshipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with false inuentions. For it can neuer be perswaded them, that all is true that the law prescribeth of it. Shal I say, that that wit excelleth in any sharp vnderstanding, which can neither of it selfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commaundments of the Second table it hath some more vnderstanding, by so much as they came neerer to the preferuation of ciuil felowship among men. Albeit euen herein also it is found many times to faile. To euery excellent nature it seemeth most vnreasonable, to suffer an vniust, & too imperious a maner of gouerning ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the iudgement of mans reason is none other, but that it is the part of a seruile & base courage, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the parte of an honest & free borne heart, to shake it off. And reuenge of iniuries is reckened for no fault among the Philosophers. But the Lord condemning that too much noblenesse of courage, commaundeth his to keepe the same patience that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our vnderstanding marketh not desire of minde at all. For a natural man suffereth not himselfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderate motions of minde for faults, they meane those motions that appere and shewe forth themselues by grosse tokens, but they make no accompt of those euill desires that do gently tickle the minde.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all sinnes to ignorance, so is their opinion to be reiected, which teach that purposed malice and frowardnesse is vsed in all sinnes. For we finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is cuerwhelmed with so many sortes of being deceiued, is subiect to so many errours, stumbleth at so many stayes, is entangled with so many streightes, that it is farre from sure directing. But how litle it is esteemed before the Lord in all partes of our life, Paul sheweth when he sayeth, that we are not sufficient to think any thing of our selues, as of our selues. Hee speaketh not of wil or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that we should not thinke that it can come in our mindes how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, vnderstanding, and heede so corrupted, that it can deuise or think vpon nothing that is right before the Lord? that seemeth too hard to vs, that do vnwillingly suffer our selues to be spoyled of the sharpnesse of reason, which we accompt a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it seemeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wise men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that all the inuention of mans heart is onely euill. If all that our witt conceiued, deuifeth vpon, purpofeth and goeth about, is alway euill, how can it come in our minde to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whome onely holines and righteousnesse is acceptable? So is it to be feene, that the reason of our mind, which way so euer it turne it selfe, is miserably subiect to vanitie. Dauid knew this weaknesse in himselfe, when he prayed to haue vnderstanding giuen him, to learne the Lordes commandementes aright. For he secretly sayth therein, that his owne wit sufficeth him not, which desireth to haue a new giuen him. And that he doth not onely once, but almost tenne times, in one Psalm, he repeteth the same prayer. By which repeting hee priuily declareth, with how great neede he is driuen to pray it. And that which he prayeth for himselfe alone, Paul commonly vseth to pray for the Churches. We cease nor (saith he) to pray for you, and to desire that ye may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisdome and spirituall vnderstanding, that ye may walke worthily of God. &c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember y^e he doth withall testifie, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine so far acknowledged this default of reason to vnderstand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be nolesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eyes. And not content with y^e, he addeth a correction of that, saying, that we list vp our eyes to see the light: but the eies of our mind lie shut, vnlesse the Lord open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightned one day alone, that they may after ward see by themselues: for that which I euen now alleged out of Paul, belongeth to continual proceedinges and increasings. And this doth Dauid expressly set out in these wordes: With my whole heart I haue sought thee, make me not to stia y from thy commandementes. For when he had bene regenerated, and had not slenderly profited in true Godlinesse, yet he confesseth, that for euery moment he needeth continual direction, least he should swarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in an other place he prayeth to haue the right spirite renued, which he had lost by his owne faulte, because it belongeth to the same GOD to restore vnto vs the same thing beeing lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

26 Nowe is will to be examined, wherin standeth the cheefe libertie of free choise, for it hath bin already seene, that choise doeth rather belong to will, than to vnderstanding. First, y^e this thing which the Philosophers haue taught, & is receiued with common consent, that is, y^e all thinges by naturall instinctio desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to y^e vprightnesse of mans will: Let vs marke that the force of free wil, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather proceedeth of y^e inclination of the essence, than of the aduifement of the vnderstanding minde. For euen the schoolemen doe confesse, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selfe to objects, wherby they meane that the object of appetite must be such, as may be subiect to choise, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truely, if a man consider what is the naturall desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beastes. For they also desire to be well, and when any shewe of good appeareth that moueth their sense, they followe it. But man doth neither chose by reason, y^e he may follow with diligence that thing which is in deede good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortall nature, nor taketh reason to counsel, nor bendeth his minde, but without reason, without counsel, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, if a man by sense of nature be caried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discern good by right reason, and when he hath knowen it, that he chose it, and when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But least any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophisticall argument. For appetite is not here called the proper maner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or iustice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do neuer so much desire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternal bleesse dneesse is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspireth vnto it, but by the mouing of the holy Ghost. Wherefore, sith the naturall desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to proue the freedome of will, no more than in metalls and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other thinges, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euill: or whether it keepeth stil any parcel unhurt, from whence do growe good desires.

27 They that do attribute to the first grace of God, that we will effectually, seeme on the other side to say secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it can not growe to a perfect affection, or raise vp any endeouour. And there is no doubt that the scholemen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the olde writers: for so much as they are wont to consider man in pure narurall thinges, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these wordes: I do not the good y I would, but the euill that I would not, that I doe. To will is present vnto me, but to performe it, I find not. But after this maner is the discourse y Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully peruered. For he entreateth of the Christian wrastling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithfull continually feele within themselues, in the battell of the flesh & the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, y when he had sayd, that there dwelleth no goodnesse in him, he addeth an exposition, y he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore he saith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, in my flesh? Euen as much as if he had saide thus: God dwelleth not in me of my selfe, for there is no good to be founde in my flesh. Herevpon followeth that maner of excuse: I my selfe doe not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which doe with the cheife part of their soule tende vnto good. Nowe, the conclusion that is adioyned after, declareth all this matter euidently. I am delited (saith he) with the lawe, according to the inward man. But I see an other lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a striuing in himself, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God,

carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therefore Augustine, whereas once he had thought, that that had beene spoken of the nature of man, reuoked his exposition as false, and ill agreeing together. And truly, if we allow this, that men without grace haue some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we answere to the Apostle which sayeth, that wee are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall wee answere to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that euery inuention of mans heart is onely euill? Wherefore, sith they haue stumbled by false taking of one place, there is no cause why we should staye vpon their iudgement. Let rather this saying of Christ preuaile. He that doeth sinne, is the seruant of sinne. We are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all holden vnder the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole man be subiect to the dominion of sinne, then must it needes be, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, be bound fast with most streight bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paul would not stande together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did go before the grace of the Holy ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triflingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull do praye to haue their heart formed to the obedience of the lawe, as Dauid doeth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that euen that desire of praying is from God. Which we may gather of his wordes, for when he wisheth to haue a cleane heart created within him, surely he taketh not on him selfe the beginning of creation. Therefore let rather this saying of Augustine haue place with vs: God will preuent thee in all things: And sometime preuent thou his wrath. Howe? Confesse that thou hast all these thinges of God, that what so euer good thou hast, is of him: what soeuer euill, it is of thy selfe. And a litle after: Nothing is ours but sinne.

The iij. Chapter.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.

BUT man cannot be any way better knowen in either part of his soule, than if he come forth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doeth set him out. If he be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to prooue, then is he prooued to be a verie miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimitie against God, and so is not subiect, nor can be subiect to the law of God. Is flesh so peruerse, that with all her affection shee continually vseth enimitie against God? that shee cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the law of God? Finally, that shee can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Nowe, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not the higher parte of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must be borne againe, because he is flesh. He commandeth not to be borne againe according to the body. But in minde he is not borne againe, if a parte of

Ioh. 3. 6.

Ioh. 3. 6.

it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doeth the comparison, set in both places, confirme. For the spirite is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betwee ne them. Therefore whatsoeuer is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But wee haue nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoeuer wee haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we could haue any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paul, where after he had described the olde man, whom he had said to be corrupt with concupiscences of errour, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the spirite of our minde: you see he doth not place vnlawfull and euill lustes onely in the sensitiue part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truly a lide before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shewe that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruered: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in vnderstanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindenesse of their heart: it is no dout that this is spoken of al them whom the Lorde hath not reformed to the vprightnesse both of his wisdome and iustice: which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned, where hee putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these wordes we gather, that the grace of Christ is the onely remedie wherby we be deliuered from that blindenesse, and the euils that ensue thereof. For so had Esaie also prophecied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, y^e the Lorde should be an euerlasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse couered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truly without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkenesse and blindenesse. I wil not rehearse particularly such thinges as are written euery where, specially in the Psalmes and in the Prophetes against the vanitie of man. It is a greate thing that Dauid writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall be vayner than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a greuous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifling, madde and peruerse.

2 No easier is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and peruerse about all thing: but because I studie to be short, I will be contente with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright looking glasse, wherein we may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throw down y^e arrogance of mankind, doth it by these testimonies: That there is not one righteous man, There is not one man that vnderstandeth or that seeketh God, Al are gone out of the way, they are made vaprofitable together, there is none that doeth good, no not one: their throte is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poyson of Serpentes is vnder their lippes, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitternesse: whose feete are swift to shedde bloude, in whose wayes is sorrowe and unhappinesse, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes: With these thunderboltes hee inueyeth, not against certaine men, but against the whole nation of the sonnes of Adam. Neither declineth he against the corrupt manners of one or two

ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to reach rather that all men are oppressed with calamitie, impossible to bee overcome, from which they can not get vp againe, vnlesse they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not be proued vnlesse it had beene by the ouerthrowe and destruction of nature, he brought forth these testimonies whereby is proued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they be here described, not onely by faulre of euill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument can not stand, that there is no saluation for man but by the mercie of GOD, because he is in him selfe vtterly lost and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in prouing the applying of these testimonies that no man shoulde thinke them vnfitly vsed. I will so take them as if they had bin first spoken by Paule, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man righteousnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then vnderstanding. The wante of vnderstanding, he proueth by Apostasie or departing from GOD, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisdome. But that want must needs happen to them that are fallen away from God. He sayth further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doth good, and then he adioyneth the haynous faultes, wherewith they defile their members that are once let lose into wickednesse. Last of all he testifieth that they are voyde of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should haue bin directed. If these be the inheritable gistes of mankinde, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I grant that not all these faultes doe appeare in euery man: yet can not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the heartes of all men. For as the body while it already soffreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, can not be called healthy: no more can the soule be reckned sounde, while it swarmeth ful of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all points. For in the body be it neuer so much diseased, there remaineth a quickenesse of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulfe of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath bin before assoyled, nowe riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there haue bin some, which by guiding of nature haue bin bent to vertue in all their life. And I regarde it not, though many slippings may be noted in their manners: yet by the very study of honestie they haue shewed a prooffe, that there was some purenesse in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merites of workes, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that we should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupte, for that by her instruction some men haue not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselues most honestly. But here we must thinke, howe in this corruption of nature there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restrain it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with lose reines to runne wildly into all sortes of lustes, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleecue, that al those euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truely sayde of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose feete are swift to shed bloude, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throtes like vnto open Sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lippes venimous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruersenes, whose eyes are bent to entrappinges, their heartes liste vp dispiteously to triumph ouer other, and all the partes of them applied to infinite mischeues. If euery soule be subiect to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldly pronounceth, truely we see what would come to passe, if the Lorde would suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beast that is so hedlong caried away, there is no streame be it neuer so swift and strong, whereof the ouerflowing is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that we will by and by sette forth. In some he only restraineth them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so farre as he foreseeeth to be expedient for preferuing of the vniuersity of things. Hereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vncleanesse. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sorte aspire toward it. Some rise vp about the common sorte, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their duetie. So God by his prouidence bridleth the peruersnesse of nature, that it breake not forth into doying: but he cleanseth it not within.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolued. For either we must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or els in Camillus we shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I graunt in deede that those goodly giftes which were in Camillus both were the giftes of G O D and seeme worthy to be commended, if they be weyed by themselves, but howe shall they be proues of naturall goodnesse in him? must we not returne to the minde, and frame our argumente in this sorte? If a naturall man excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power towards the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and following any thing rather than vprights streightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that he was a naturall man. Nowe what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto mee in this behalfe, if in the greatest shewe of purenesse it be founde that he is alway carried to corruption? Therefore, least ye commend a man for vertue, whose vices deceiue you vnder vertues Image, do not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in his owne peruersenesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that these are not common gifts of nature, but special graces of God, which he diuersly & to a certaine certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vn godlie. For which reason wee feare not in common speech to call one man well natured, and an other of euill nature, and yet wee cease not to include them both vnder the vniuersall state of mans corruption, but we shewe what speciall grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which hee hath not vouchsafed to giue to the other, when his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him as a newe man: and that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, sayth that Kinges sonnes are created notable by some singular marke, because God prouiding for mankinde, furnisheth these with a princely nature whome hee appointeth to beare gouernment: and out of this store house came all the great Captaines yare renoumed in histories. The same is also to be thought of priuate men. But because as euerie man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moued him forward (with which spotte all vertues are defiled, so that they lose all fauour before God) it is to bee accompted nothing worth, whatsoeuer seemeth praise worthie in vngodly men, beside that the cheife part of vprighteousnes faileth, where there is no studie to aduance the glorie of God, which all they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vainely spoken in Esay, that vpon Christ resteth the spirite of the feare of God, whereby we are taught, y so many as are strange fro Christ are without y feare of God, which is the beginning of wisedome. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine shew, I grant they shal haue praise in the court of policie, & in the common fame of men, but before the heauenly iudgement seate, they shalbe of no value to deserue righteousness.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is deteyned, it cannot once moue it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse applie it selfe. For such mouing is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Ieremie prayeth to the Lorde to turne him, if he wil haue him turned. Wherevpon the Prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spirituall redemption of the faithfull people, saith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with howe streight fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lorde, hee liueth vnder the yoke of the Deuill. Yet Will still remaineth, which with most bent affection is both inclined and hasteth to sinne. For man was not depriued of Will when he did cast himselfe into this necessitie, but of the soundnesse of Will. And Bernard saith not vnaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simply to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill, of corrupte nature: to will well, of grace. Nowe whereas I say, that will put from libertie is by necessitie drawe or led into euill, it is meruell if that should seeme a hard speech vnto any mā, which neither hath any absurdity in it, nor varieth from the vse of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene necessitie and compulsion. But if a man aske them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the diuell of necessitie euill? what can they aunswere? For so is goodnesse knit with gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessarie that he bee God than that hee bee good. And the diuell is by his fal so estraunged from partaking of goodnesse, y he can do nothing but euill. But nowe if any robber of God

doe barke against this and say, that God deserueth small prayse for his goodnesse, which hee is compelled to keepe: shall not this be a readie aunswere to him, that it cometh to passe by his infinite goodnesse and not by violent impulsion, that he can not do euill. Therefore if this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the deuill which cannot doe but euill yet willingly sinneth, who shall then say that a man doeth therefore lesse willingly sinne for this that hee is subiect to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine ech where speaketh of it, euen then also when he was enuiously prested with the cauil- lation of Celestius, hee sticked not to affirme in these wordes, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but nowe the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as hee falleth into mention thereof, he douteth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kepte, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth in deede willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by for- ren constraint: but yet of such peruersenesse of nature as he is, hee cannot but be moued and driuen to euill. If this bee true, then surely it is plainly expressed that he is subiect to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Au- gustine writeth thus, onely man among all liuing creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, hee also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will & not of nature, that euen thereby also he shoulde not be depriued of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will beeing changed in it selfe into worse, by I wot not what corrupt & maruellous maner, so maketh necessitie. y very necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, & wil forasmuch as it is drawn by alluremen, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine maner willing. Afterward he saith y we are prested down with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bon- dage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will wee are inexcusable, because will when it was free, made it selfe the bondseruaunt of sinne. At length hee concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine maruellous and euill manner holden both a bond seruant & free, vnder this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bondseruaunt by rea- son of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more maruelous and more miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond where- in it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the rea- ders doe perceiue that I bring no newe thing, which long agoe Augustine brought forth out of the consent of al godly men, & almost a thousand yeres after was kept stil in monkes Cloysters. But Lombard when he coule not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gaue matter to a pernicious er- rour.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what manner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended & healed. For whereas the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which wee want, when we shall know what his worke is in vs, it will streight way appeare on the other side what is our needinesse. When the Apostle saith to the Phi-

Philippians, that he trusteth that he which began a good worke in them, wil performe it vnto the day of Iesus Christ: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good worke, hee meaneth the very beginning of conuersion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stirring vp in our heartes the loue, desire and endeouour of righteousnesse, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our heartes to righteousnesse: he endeth it in confirming vs to perseuerance. And that no man should cauill that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of it selfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghost in an other place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it selfe. I will giue you (saith he) a newe heart. I will put a newe spirite in the middes of you. And I will take away the stonie heart from your fleshe, and I will giue you a heart of Eze. 36. 16. fleshe. And I will put my spirite in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commaundementes. Who shall say that the weakenes of mans will is strengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aspire to the choise of that that is good, when it must be whole transformed and renewed? If there be any softenesse in a stone, which by some helpe being made tenderer wil abide to be bowed euery way, then wil I grant that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, so that that which in it is perfect, be supplied by the grace of God. But if he meant to shewe by this similitude, that no goodnesse could euer be wrung out of our heart vnlesse it be made throughly newe: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which he chalengeth to himselfe alone. If therefore a stone be transformed into flesh, when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of G O D. I say that will is taken away, not in that it is will, because in the conuersion of man, that which was of the first nature abideth whole: also I say that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to bee, but that it be turned from an euill wil into a good. And this I affirme to be wholly done by God, because we are not able so much as to thinke, as the same Apostle witnesseth: therefore in an other place he saith, that G O D doth not onely helpe our weake will, or amend our peruerse will, but that he worketh in vs to will. 2. Cor. 8. 6. Wherevpon is easily gathered, that which I said before, that whatsoeuer good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace. In which sense in an other place he saith, that it is God that worketh all in all. 2. Cor. 12. 6. Neither doth he there intreate of the vniuersall gouernement, but giueth vnto G O D alone the praise of all good thinges that the faithfull haue. And in saying, all, truly he maketh God the author of spirituall life, euen from the beginning to the ende. Which selfe same thing he had taught before in other wordes, saying that the faithfull are of God in Christ, where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is destroyed. For there is to be vnderstanded a comparison betweene Adam and Christ, which in an other place he more plainly expresseth, where he teacheth that we are the work of God created in Christ to good workes, which he hath prepared that wee should walke in them. For he goeth about by this reason to prooue, that our saluation is of free gift, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the second creation, which

which we obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our selues, were it neuer so small, we should haue also some portion of merite. But hee to prooue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we haue deserued nothing, because we are create in Christ to good workes, which God hath prepared. In which wordes he signifieth againe, that all partes of good workes euen from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had saide in the Psalme that we are the workmanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, We made not our selues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spirituall life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now, how he not contented simply to haue giuen to God the praise of our saluation, doth expressly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if hee would say, that there resteth no peece, be it neuer so litle, for man to glorie in, because it is all of God.

7 But there be some peradventure that will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is conuerted by the onely power of the Lord; but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before euery good worke, but so, that will doth accompanie it and not leade it, as a wayting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doth disorderly writhe to this purpose. But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two thinges be plainly signified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is preuented by grace, in that respect I giue you leaue to call it a wayting maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lorde, this is wrongfully giuen to man that hee doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not well written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well it seife, as euen now we haue seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the wayting maide of grace, to assigne vnto her a certaine second office in doing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principal cause of saluation in mans deseruing: therefore he stooode onely vpon this point, that grace was before all deseruing: which was sufficient for the matter y^e he then had in hand, nor meddling in the meane time with y^e other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in an other place he excellently well handleth. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doth preuent the willing that he may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, hee maketh him altogether the whole authour of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any longe arguing vpon them. Men (saith he) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but howe it may be found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expound that saying of Christ, Euery one that hath heard of my father commeth to mee, he saith: Freewill is so holpen not onely that it may knowe what is to be done, but also may doe it when it hath knowen it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by y grace of the spirite, hee so teacheth, that hee that hath learned, doeth not onely see it in knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing. Iohn. 6. 45.

8 And because wee are now in hande with the chiefe point wherevpon the matter hangeth, let vs goe forward and proue the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a few and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, least any man shoulde accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the Scripture, let vs shewe that the trueth which wee affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimonie of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the thinges be rehearsed that may bee brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shall bee brought foorth, the way may bee prepared to vnderstande all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And again, I thinke it shall not be vnfitely done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whome worthilie the consent of godly men doth much esteeme. Surely it is euident by plaine and certaine prooffe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there can not be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Wherevpon followeth, that man hath not right Will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the worlde. There is also another reason not vnlike vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to bee scene whence faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free giste of God, it followeth, that it is of the mere grace of God, when we, which are with al our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lorde, when he nameth these two things in the conuersion of his people, to take away from them a stonie heart, and to giue them a heart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must bee done away, that we may be conuerted to righteousnesse: and that whatsoeuer commeth in place thereof, is frō himselfe. And he vtereth not this in one place only. For he saith in Ieremie: I will giue them one heart and one way, that they may feare me all their dayes. And a little after, I will giue the feare of my name into their heart, that they depart not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I wil giue them one heart, and I wil giue a newe spirite in their bowels. I will take away the stonie heart out of their flesh, and I will giue them a heart of fleshe. Hee could not more euidently claime to himselfe, & take from vs whatsoeuer is good and right in our will, than when he declareth that our conuersion is a creation of a new spirite, and of a new heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse till it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs. Ier. 32. 39.

9 And so read wee the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde encline our hearte to him (saith Salomon) that we may keepe his commaundementes. He sheweth the frowardnesse of our heart which naturally reioyceth to rebell against the Lawe of God if it bee not bowed. Eze. 11. 19.

Psal. 119.

And the same thing is in the Psalme: Lord incline my hearte to thy testimonies. For the comparison of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the peruerse motion of the hearte whereby it is caried to obstinacie, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When Dauid feeling himselfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a newe heart within him, to reue a right spirite within his bowelles: doth he not acknowledge that all the partes of his heart are full of vncleannesse, and his spirite writhen with crooked perueseness? and in calling the cleanness which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doeth he not attribute it wholly to God? But if any man take exception and say, that the verie prayer is a token of a godly & holy affection: our aunswere is readie, that though

Psal. 51. 12.

Dauid were by that time somewhat come to amendement, yet doeth hee still compare his first state with that sorowfull fall that hee had felt. Therefore taking vpon him the person of a man estranged from God, he for good cause praieth to haue giuen him all these things y^e God giueth to his elect in regeneratiō. And so being like a dead man, he wisheth himselfe to be created of newe; that of the bondslauē of Sathan, he may be made the instrument of the holy Ghost. Maruelous and monstrous surely is the lust of our pride. God requireth nothing more earnestly, than that we shoulde most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obeyned, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If sluggishness hindred not, Christe hath giuen testimonie eident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuiously suppressed. I am (saith he) the Vine, you be the branches:

Ioh. 15. 1.

My father is a husbandman. As the branche cannot beare fruite of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in mee. For without me you can doe nothing. If we beare fruite none otherwise thā a branch buddeth being plucked out of the grounde and without moisture: wee neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnes. And this is a plaine conclusion: Without me you can do nothing. He doth not say that we are too weake to be sufficient for our selues: but in bringing vs to nothing, hee excludeth all opinion of power be it neuer so little. If we being grafted in Christ, beare fruite like a Vine, which taketh her efficacy of liuelinesse both from the moysture of the earth, and from the dewe of heauen, and from the cherishing of the sunne: I see nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if wee keepe whole for G O D that which is his. The sonde sittle deuise is alleaged in vayne, that there is iuyce already enclosed within the branche, and a certayne power to bring forth fruite, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the firste roote, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christe doeth meane nothing else, but that wee are a drie sticke and nothing worth, when wee bee sauered from him, because by our selues beeing separate, wee haue no power to doe well: as also in another place hee saith:

Mat. 15. 13.

Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted shall bee rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle scribeth all the whole vnto him in the place already alleaged. It is God (saith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe.

Phili. 2. 13.

The

The first part of a good worke is will: the second is a strong endeouour in doing it: the author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from G O D, if wee take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectually working. If it were saide that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is said that he maketh wil, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good wil is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it can not rise vp: He said further, that to ouercome the hardnesse of that bartell, there is ministred vnto vs stedfastnesse of endeouour, euen to the effect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in an other place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all thinges in all, wherein we haue before taught that the whole course of spiritual life is comprehended. For which reason, Dauid, after he had praied to haue the waies of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walke in his trueth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my heart to feare thy name. In which wordes he signifieth, that euen they that are well minded, are subiect to so many withdrawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in an other place, after he had praied to haue his steppes directed to keepe the worde of God, hee requireth also to haue strength giuen him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (saith he) beare rule ouer me. After this sort therefore doth the Lorde both beginne and ende a good work in vs: that it may al be his work, that wil conceiueth a loue of that which is right, that it is enclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp & moued to endeouour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeouour faint not, but do proceede euen to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

1. Cor. 12. 6.

Psal. 100. 19.

100. 33.

10 And hee moueth the wil, not in such sort as hath in many ages bin taught & beleueed that it is after ward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthning it. Therefore that must be reiected which Chrysofom so oft repeateth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his aide. We grant that such was the state of man while he yet stode, that he might bow to either part. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, vnlesse God both wil and can in vs: what shal become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather wee doe obscure and extenuate it with our vnthankfulness. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good wil is offered vs, if we do accept it, but y he wil performe it in vs: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his spirit doth direct, bowe and gouerne our heart, & reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiell, that he will giue to the elect a new spirite onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commaundementes, but to make them walke in deede. Neither can Christs saying, (Euery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise taken, than to teach that the grace of G O D is effectually of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchsafeth not to giue to all men generally without regarde; as that saying (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him y doth what lieth in him. Men are in deede

deed to be taught y^e Gods goodnes is laid open for al men, w^out exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely begin to seeke for it, whom the heauenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as this litle peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truly this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirite of God, they are moued and gouerned by his guiding. I herefore Augustine doth worthily as wel mock them, that claime any part of willing them to themselves, as he doth reprehend other which thinke that, that is generally giuen to all men, which is the speciall testimonie of free election. Nature, (saith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a brickle subtletie of witte like glasse, that glistreth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whom it pleaseth him. And in an other place: Howe camest thou by beleeuing. Feare thou, least while thou takest vpon thee that thou hast found the iust way, thou perish out of the iust way. I came (saiest thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Heare euen him that calleth: No man commeth to me vnlesse my Father draw him. And it is without controuersie gathered out of Iohns wordes, that the heartes of the godly are so effectually gouerned by Gods working, that they follow with an vchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (saith he) can not sinne, because the seede of God abideth in him. For we see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which we at our libertie may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuall constancie to continue is affirmed.

11 Of continuance there should no more doubt haue bin made, but that it should haue bin taken for the free gift of God vnlesse the most wicked error had growen in force, that it is distributed according to the desert of men, as euery man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankful to the first grace. But forasmuch as this error hath growen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receiue the grace of God offered, that opinion being diuened away, this other doth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they erre two manner of wayes. For beside this that they teache that our vnthankfulnesse toward the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof, are rewarded with the latter gistes: they adde also, that nowe grace alone doth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the first this we ought to beleeuue, that the Lord while he daily enricheth & heapeth his seruants with newe gistes of his grace, because he liketh and fauoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestowe greater graces. And here to serue those sayings, To him that hath, shall be giuen. Againe: Oh, good seruant, because thou hast bin faithfull in fewe things, I will set thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawfull vse of the first grace be saide to be rewarded with the later graces, nor it bee so counted a rewarding, that it cease to be reckoned the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this blessing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that howe much the better they haue vsed the first graces, they shall bee encreased with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of the Lorde, and that this rewarding is of his free good wil. And they vse no lesse wrongfully than vnhappily that olde destruction of working and together working grace. Augustine vsed the same in deede, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth ende, that which in working he beginneth, & that it is stil the same grace but changeth name, according to the diuerse maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it betweene God & vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but only noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in an other place he teacheth, that many giftes of God do goe before the good will of man, amonge the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaueth nothing that it may claime to it self. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had sayd \bar{y} it is God, which worketh in vs both to wil & to performe, he by & by addeth, \bar{y} he doth them both of his good wil, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnesse. Whereas they are wont to say, that after we haue once giuen place to the first grace, our owne endeouours do now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I answer: If they meane that we, after we haue ben once by the power of the Lord broken to \bar{y} obedience of righteousness, do of our own accord go forward, and are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speake nothing against it. For it is most certain, that there is such a readines of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth. But whence commeth that, but from this, that the spirite of God alway agreing with it selfe, doth cherish and confirme to stedfastnesse of continuing the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himselfe somewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pestilently deceiued.

12 And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I haue laboured more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himself before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of god, but yet so, that he calleth himself a worker together with grace. It is maruell that so many which otherwise were not cuil men, haue stumbled at this straw. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away al the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (saith he): hat haue laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulnesse of the speach deceiued them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greeke article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that \bar{y} grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkly, though shortly, where he thus saith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: Psa. 13. 6. His mercy hath preuented me: And his mercy shal folow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him wil: and it foloweth him willing, \bar{y} he wil not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking thus: Cant.

Drawe me in a maner vnwilling, that thou maist make me willing: drawe me lying slouthful, that thou maist make me runne.

13 Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne wordes, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, should as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whome long ago Augustine was drawn forth into the same contention. In his booke of Correption & Grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet do it in his owne wordes: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he would: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to ouercome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And least he should be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortalitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after he plucketh out this dout. For (saith he) the will of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so wil: they therefore wil, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weaknesse, in which yet behoueth the power to be made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnto them, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doeth not worke in them to wil: then among so many temptations wil should needes fall downe for weaknesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weaknesse of mans will, that it should be moued without swaruing or seuering by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint howe weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our heartes do of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he saith, that the Lord doth draw men in deede with their owne willes, but with such as he himselve hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not onely offered by God to be receiued or refused at euery mans Free electiō, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election & wil in the heart: so that euery good worke that followeth after, is the fruite and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his wordes out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euery good worke in vs.

14 But whereas he saith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euill will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meaneth onely that man is not so drawn, that without any motion of heart he is caried as by an outward impulsio, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: We knowe that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whome it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merites of workes, nor according to the merites of wil, but of free fauour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the iust iudgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen is giuen to the desertinges of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselues worthy. For he will haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessarie to vs for euery of our doings, and is not giuen in recompense to workes, that it may be grace in deede. But the matter can not be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of y^e eight chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by liberty, but liberty by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delite printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with inuincible force: that while grace gouerneth, it neuer falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tombleth downe. Epist. 46.

That by the free mercy of God it both is conuerted to good, and being conuerted abideth in it, that the direction of mans wil to good, and stedfastnes after direction, hangeth vpon the onely will of God, and not vpon any merite of his owne. And so to man is left such a free wil, if we list so to call it, as he writeth of in an other place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able.

The iiij. Chapter.

How God vworketh in the heartes of men.

IT is sufficiently proued, as I thinke, that man is so holden captiue with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor trauaile by endeuour to goodnesse: beside that, wee haue rehearsed a distinction betweene compulsion and necessity, whereby it might appeare, that when hee sinneth of necessitie, yet neuertheless he sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subiect in bondage to the Deuill, he seemeth rather to be ledde by the deuils will than his owne, it resteth nowe to bee declared of what sort are both kindes of working. And then is this question to be assoiled, whether in euill workes there bee any thing to be attributed to G O D: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some working of his. In one place Augustine compareth mans will to a horse, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the Duill he compareth to riders. If God (sayth he) sit vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperatly, spurreth it forward if it be too slowe, plucketh it backe if it be too quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse and wildnesse of it, tameth the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Denill haue possessed it, he like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steepe places, spurreth it forward to stubbornnesse and fearcenesse: which similitude we will for this time be contented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is sayde that the will of naturall man is subiect to the rule of the Deuill, so bee stirred by him, it is not ment thereby that man as it were striuing against it, and resisting is cōpelled to obey, as we compel bondslaves against their wil, by reason of being their lordes, to do our commandementes: but that being bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of necessity yeldeth it selfe obedient to euery leading of him. For whome the Lorde vouchsafueth not to rule with his spirite, them by iust iudgement he sendeth away to be moued of Satan. Wherefore the Apostle saith, that the God of this worlde hath blinded the mindes of the vnbeleeuers ordained to destruction, that they should not see the light of the Gospell. And in an other place: That he worketh in the disobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, & all the wicked deedes that follow thereupon, are called the workes of Sathan, of which yet the cause is not to be sought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the roote of euill, wherein resteth the foundation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is Sinne.

2 But farre other is the order of Gods doing in such thinges. And that the same may appeare more certainly vnto vs: let the hurt done to the holy man Iob by y Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his herdmen, and like enemies in warre, droue away his cattell for booties. Now is their wicked deede plainly scene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, from whom the Historie saith, that all this did proceede. But Iob himselfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lorde in it, whom he sayth to haue taken away from him those thinges, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we referre the selfe same worke to God, as author, to Sathan as author, and to man as author of it, but y we must either excuse Satan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of euill? Very easily: if first we looke vpon the end, why it was done, and then the maner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamity to exercise the patience of his seruant: The deuill goeth about to driue him to despire. The Chaldees against right & lawe, seeke gaine of that which is an other mans. Such diuersity in purposes, maketh greate difference in the worke. And in the maner of doing there is no lesse diuersity. The Lord leaueth his seruant to Sathan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to execute it, he did leaue & deliuer to him to be driuen to it. Sathan with his venemous stings, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of themselues to do y mischief: they furiously runne to do wrong, and do binde & defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly said, that Sathan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdome: that is to say, the kingdome of wickednesse. It is also said that God worketh in them after his maner, because Sathan himselfe, forasmuch as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his bidding and commandement, turneth himselfe hither and thither to execute his iust iudgements. I speake not here of Gods vniuersall mouing, whereby as all creatures are susteined, so frō thence they take their effectuall power of doing any thing. I speake onely of that special doing, which appeareth in euery special act. We see therefore that it is no absurdity, that one selfe act be ascribed to God, to Sathan, and to man: but the diuersity in the end and maner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the iustice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednesse of Sathan and man, bewrayeth it selfe to their reproch.

3 The old writers in this point also, are sometime precisely afraid, simply to confesse the truth, because they feare least they should so open a window to wickednesse, to speake irreuerently of the workes of God. Which sobriety as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing dangerous, if we simply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himselfe sometime was not free frō the superstition, as where he saith, that hardning & blinding, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his foreknowledge. But the phrasēs of Scripture allow not these subtleties, which phrasēs do plainly shewe that there is therein somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himself in his fift booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long processe to proue that sinnes are not only of the permission or sufferance of God, but also of his power, that so former sinnes might be punished. Likewise, that which they bring forth, concerning permission, is too weake to stand. It is oftentimes said, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that hee turneth, boweth, & moueth their heartes as I haue else where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is neuer expressed, if wee flee to free foreknowledge or sufferance. Therefore we answer that it is done after two manners, For first, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darknesse & blindnes: whereas when his spirite is takē away, our hearts wax hard & become stones: where as when his direction cesseth, they are wrested into crookednes, it is wel said that he doth blind, harden & bow them from whom he taketh away the power to see, obey & do rightly. The second maner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his iudgements by Sathan the minister of his wrath, he both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth vp their willes, & strengtheneth their endeouours. So when Moses rehearseth that king Schon did not giue passage to the people, because God had hardened his spirit, & made his heart obstinate, he by and by adioyneth the end of his purpose: that he might (saith he) giue him into our hands. Therefore because it was Gods will to haue him destroyed, the making of his heart obstinate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4 After the first manner this seemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of trueth, and taketh away reason from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are set ouer the people, hee maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord why hast thou made vs mad, and hardened our heart, that we should not feare thee? Because they iudge rather of what sort God maketh men by forsaking them, than howe he perfourmeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharao. I wil harden the heart of Pharao, that he do not heare you, & let the people go. Afterward he saith, that he hath made heauy & hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not sustaining it? That is true in deede: but he did somewhat more, that he committed his heart to Sathan to be confirmed with obstinacy. Whereupon he had before said: I wil hold his heart. The people went out of Aegypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth & met them like enimies. By whom were they stirred vp? Truly Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lord that had hardened their hearts. And the Prophet reciting the same history, saith, that he turned their hearts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stumbled being left without the counsell of God. For if they be hardened & turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. Moreouer so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressours of the people, how did he performe his worke in the reprobate? so as a man may see, that the effectualnes of working was in him, and they onely did seruice as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to entangle them, & sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed & driuen by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse appoint it after this sort: that inasmuch as they sinne, it is their owne: inasmuch as in sinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that deuided the darkenesse as pleaseth him.

5 Now that the ministerie of Sathan is vsed pricke forward the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his prouidence apointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proued, though it were but by one place onely. For it is oftentimes said in Samuel, that the euil spirit of the Lord, and an euil spirite from the Lord, did either violently cary or leaue Saul. To say that this spirit was the holy Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the vncléane spirit is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his commandement & power, being rather his instrument in doing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacie of errour & deceiuing is sent by God, that they which haue not obeyed the trueth, may beleue lies. But there is alway great difference in one self same worke; betwene that which the Lord doth, and that which Sathan & the wicked goe about. He maketh the euil instruments that he hath vnder his hand, & may turne whither he list, to serue his iustice. They, in as much as they are euill, do bring forth in effect the wickednesse that they haue conceiued by corruptnesse of nature. The rest, of such things as serue for to deliuer the maiestie of God from slander, & to cut off all shifting from the wicked, are already set forth in the chapter concerning Prouidence. For in this place my purpose was only to shewe how Sathan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

2. Thef. 2.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those doings, which are neither iust nor faultie of them selues, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirituall life. Some in such things haue graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not striue about a matter of no great importãce, than that they minded certainly to proue the same thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confesse that they which do hold that they haue no power to righteousnesse, do hold the thing that is principally necessarie to saluation: yet I doe thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it commeth in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth thereunto: a gaine, so oft as our wit & mind eschueeth that which elsé would haue hurt vs. And the force of Gods prouidence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shal foresee to be expedient, but also to make the willes of men to tend therunto. Truly, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, wee shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shal giue credit to so many testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doth in these things also rule the heartes of men, they shal compell vs to yelde our will subiect to the special mouing of God. Who did procure the good willes of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lende them all their most precious iewels? They would neuer haue found in their heartes to haue so done of their owne accord. Therefore their heartes were more subiect to the Lord, than ruled by them selues. And truely if Iacob had not bene perswaded that God put into men diuerse afflictions as pleaseth him, he would not haue said of his sonne Ioseph, whom he thought to be some Heathen Egyptian: God graunt you to finde mercy before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, that when it pleased God to haue mercy vpon it, he meekened the heartes of the cruell nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that he prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde, from embracing the counsel of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to be perswaded with the yong mens aduise? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the comming of Isaac? Truely the harlot Rahab confessed, that it was done by God. Againe, who threwe downe the heartes of Israel with dread and fearefulnesse, but he that in the lawe threatened that he would giue them a fearefull heart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things vniuersally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his prouidence, euen in outward things doth bow and turne the willes of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods wil beareth rule ouer the freedome therof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mouing of God, than vpon the freedome of thine owne choise, this dayly experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy iudgement and wit oft faileth thee; in things not hard to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present aduise is offered thee: in things great and perillous, thou hast a courage ouercomming all difficultie. And so do I expound that which Salomon saith: That the eare may heare, that the eye may see, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that hee speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whether he will the heart of the king as the streames of waters: truely vnder the example of one speciall sort, he comprehendeth the whole generaltie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the willes of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hande of God, no more shal our wil be exempted from y same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine: The Scripture if it be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good willes of men which he of euil maketh good, and so being made by him selfe doth direct to good doinges and to eternall life, but also these willes that preserue the creature of the world, are so in the power of G O D, that hee maketh them to be inclined whether he will & when he will, either to do benefices, or to execute punishments, by a iudgement most secret in deede, but the same most righteous.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans will is not to be weyed by the successe of things, which some vnskilful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they seeme to them selues to proue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because euen the hiest Monarches haue not all thinges flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of freewill, this is not to the question, whether man may for outward impedimentes, performe and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of iudgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Atilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrownesse of a tonne, set ful of sharpe prickes, shall no lesse haue free will than Augustus Cæsar, gouerning a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

The v. Chapter.

A confutation of the obiections that are vpon to be brought for defence of Free will.

IT might seeme that we haue saide enough already, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throw it down hedlong, did not on the contrarie part pretend certain reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heap vp together diuerse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from common reason: afterwarde they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then cesseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoyded. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I deny therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I deny againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be auoyded, because it is voluntarie. For if any man wil dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his iudgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise do: God hath that answer ready which we in an other place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaues to sinne, can will nothing but euil. For whence cometh this want of power which y^e wicked would gladly pretend, but vpon this, y^e Adam of his owne accord made himselfe subiect to y^e tyranny of the Deuil? Hereupon therefore grew the corruption, with the bonds whereof wee are holden fast tyed, for that the first man fel from his creator. If al men be iustly holden guilty of his falling away, let them not thinke themselues excused by necessity, in which it selfe they haue a most euident cause of their damnatiō. And this I haue aboue plainly set forth, and I haue giuen an example in the Deuill himselfe, whereby it might appeare, y^e he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuerthelesse willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, where as their will can not decline from good, yet it ceaseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also Ser. 81. in Can. aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable, because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs so subiect vnto it, that wee bee the bondslaves of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second part of their argument is faultie, because from voluntarie it straight way leapeth to free: but we haue before proued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subiect to free election.

2 They further say: that if both vertues and vices proceede not of free choise of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laide vpon man or reward giuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, yet I graunt is in some places vsed by Chrysostome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himselfe hideth not, & also rehearseth it in their owne words. If the grace of God work In. Episto. ad Ctesiphon & Diacon. 10. in vs: then it, not we that labour, shalbe crowned. Of punishments I answer, that they are iustly laid vpon vs from whom the guiltines of sin proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sinne bee done by free or bond iudgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially sith man is hereby proued a sinner, for that he is vnder the bondage of sinne? As to the rewards of righteoufnesse: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifullnesse, than vpon our owne deseruings. Howe oft finde we this thing repeated in Augustine: that God crowneth not our deseruings, but his owne giftes: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our deseruings, but such as are rendred to the graces already bestowed vpon vs: Wisely in deede they note this, that nowe there remaineth no place for deseruings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we say so far differing from truth, they are much deceiued. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to teach for necessarie, that which they thinke so vnlawful to confesse, as where he saith: What bee the merites of any men whatsoeuer they be? when hee commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners'. In Psal. 31 Againe, If that shall be rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be punished: what is done then? In Psal. 70. G O D hath not giuen thee punishment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estraunged from grace, boast of thy deseruings. Againe: Thou art nothing of thy selfe. Sinnes are thine, but deseruings are Gods, punishment is due to thee: and when reward commeth, hee shall crowne his owne giftes, and not thy deseruings. And in the same meaning Epist. 52. De verbis Aposto. Ser. 4. 7. in an other place, he teacheth that grace is not of deseruing, but deseruing of grace. And a litle after he concludeth, that God with his giftes goeth before all deseruings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deseruings, and doth giue altogether freely, because he findeth nothing wherevpon to saue. But what neede is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often found in his writings? But the Apostle shall yet better deli- 1. Cor. 4. 7. uer them from this error, if they heare from what beginning he conueieth y^e glorie of the Saintes: Whome he hath chosen, them he hath called, whome he hath called, them he hath iustified: whome he hath iustified, them hee hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned because by the Lords mercie and not by their owne endeouour they are both chosen and called and iustified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shall no more be any deseruings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (saith he) thou hast receiued al things, why gloriest thou, as if thou haddest not receiued them? Thou seest that for the same cause he taketh all things from free will, to leaue no place for deseruings: but as the bountifulnesse and liberalitie of God is manifold, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which he bestoweth on vs, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

3 Moreouer they bring soorth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chrysostome: If this be not the power of our will, to choose good or euil, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is he, whatsoeuer he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, when he maketh this argument, that no man should euer depart from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is maruell that so excellent men fell beside themselues. For how chanceth it came not in Chrysostoms minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that al together are peruerse and giuen to wickednes: but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercie it commeth to passe that al abide not in peruerseness. Therefore whereas naturally we are all sicke of one disease, they onely recouer health vpon whom it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by iust iudgement he passeth ouer, pine away in their owne rottennesse till they be consumed. Neither is it of any other cause, that some continue to the end, and some fall in their course begunne. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to al indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaseth himselfe. If a man aske for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnstedfastnes, we know none other cause but that God susteineth the one sort strengthened with his power that they perish not, and doth not giue the same strength to the other sort, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

4 Further they presse vs, saying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hande, that the vse of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fond thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were objected against Augustine he was compelled to write the booke of Correction & Grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this summe: O man, in the commaundement learne what thou oughtest to doe: in correction learne that by thine owne faulte thou hast it not: in praier learne whence thou maist receiue that which thou wouldest haue. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirite and Letter, where he teacheth that God measureth not the commaundementes of his lawe by the strength of man, but when he hath commended that which is right, hee freely gueth to his elect power power to fulfill it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First wee are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Nowe let the other looke howe they will get the maisterie in striuing, that match themselves with such aduersaries. Doeth Christ, which testifieth that we can do nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chaſtice them, y^e without him did euill? Doeth he lesse exhort euery man to applie himselfe to good workes? Howe seuerely doeth Paul inuey againſt the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie: and yet hee prayeth for charitie to bee giuen to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God y^e hath mercie, and yet hee ceaseth not afterwarde to admonishe, to exhorde and to rebuke. Why doe they not therefore speake to the Lord, that hee doe not lose his labour in requiring of men those things which hee himselfe alone can giue, & in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why doe they not admonishe Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercie of God, going before them which nowe hath forsaken them? As if the Lorde had not a verie good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readily to be founde of them that reuerently seeke it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselves, to the chaunging of the minde, Paul declareth, when hee writeth, that neither hee that planteth is any thing, nor hee that watereth, but the Lorde that giueth the increase onely, effectually worketh. So wee see that Moses seuerally stablissheth the commaundementes of the Law, and the Prophetes doe sharply call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men do then onely waxe wise, when a hart is giuen them to vnderstande, that it is the proper worke of God to circumsise the heartes, and in steede of stonie heartes to giue heartes of fleſhe, to write his lawe in the bowelles of men: finally, in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuell.

5 Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose: if they be despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shall be for a witnesse vnto them when they shall come to the iudgement seate of the Lorde, yea and euen now alreadie they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoeuer the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disproue them: but thou wilt say, what may sillie miserable man do, if the softnesse of hart, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doeth he excuse himselfe, when hee can impute the hardnes of hearte to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are throwen downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the cheefe profite towards the faithfull is to be considered: in whome as the Lord worketh all things by his spirit, so he leaueth not the instrument: of his word, and vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stande which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I will giue them a new hart, y^e they may walke in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duetie, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? why are they moued with exhortation, sith they can make no more hast than the stirring forward of the holy ghost worketh? why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, sith they fell by the necessarie weakenesse of the fleshe? O man, what arte thou to appoint a lawe for God? If it be his pleasure, that wee be prepared by exhortation to receiue the selfe same grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing else profit with the godlie, but to reprove them of sinne, they were euen for that thing onely to be compted not altogether vnprofitable. Nowe, for asmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much auaille to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake of sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasure and venomous sweetnesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engender a hatred of irkesomnesse thereof: who dare cauell that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer answer, let him take this: God worketh after two sortes in his elect, inwardly by his spirite, outwardly by his worde: By his spirite, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their heartes to the loue and keeping of iustice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, he stirreth them to desire, to seeke & atteine the same reuening: by them both he sheweth foorth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his distribution. When hee sendeth the same worde to the reprobate, though not for their amendment, yet he maketh it to serue for an other vse: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witnesse of conscience, and may against the day of iudgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man cometh to him, but whome the father draweth, and that the elect doe come when they haue hearde and learned of the Father: yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whome it necessarily behoueth to bee inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, because it is to them the fauour of death to death, but a sweete fauour to God.

Iohn. 6. 44.

6 They be verie laborious in heaping together of testimonies of scripture: and that they doe of purpose, that when they can not oppresse vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it cometh to hande strokes, the weaker multitude howe much pompe and shewe soeuer it hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it be verie easie for vs to ouerthrowe them with all their route. For, because the places that they abuse against vs, when they are once diuided into their orders, doe meete vpon a fewe speciall pointes, wee shall with one aunswere satisfie many of them: therefore it shall not bee needfull to tarrie vpon dissoluing euerie one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commaundementes, which they thinke to be so tempered to our strengthes, that what soeuer is proued to bee required by the one, it necessarily followeth that it may be performed by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the commaundementes, and by them doe measure the proportion of our strength. For (say they) either God mocketh vs when hee chargeth vs with holinesse, godlinesse, obedience, chastitie, loue and meekenesse: and when hee forbiddeth vs vncleannesse, idolatrie, vnchastnesse, ness, wrath, robbrie, pride, and such like: or he requireth only those things that are in our power. Nowe, we may deuide into three sorts in maner all the commandementes that they heape together. Some require our first conuersion to God, some speake simply of the keeping of the law: some command vs to continue in the grace of God that we haue receiued. First let vs speake of them all in generaltie, and then descend to the speciall sortes. To extend the power of man to the commaundementes of the lawe, hath in deed long ago begun to be common, & hath some shew: but it proceeded from most rude ignorauce of the lawe. For they y^e thinke it a heinous offence, if it be saide that the keeping of the lawe is impossible, doe rest forth vpon this most strong argument, that else the law was giuen in vaine. For they speake in such sorte, as if Paul had no where spoken of the lawe. For, I beseeche them, what meane these sayinges, that the lawe was set because of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: That the lawe maketh sinne: that the lawe entred, that sinne might abound: was it meant that the lawe was to be limited to our strengthes, least it should be giuen in vaine? or rather that it was set farre aboue vs to conuince our weakenesse? Truly by the same mans definition, the end and fulfilling of the law is Charitie. But when he wisheth the mindes of the Thessalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the law soundeth in our eares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our hartes.

7 Truly, if the Scripture did teache nothing else, but that the law is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeouour, I would also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainly declare vnto vs the manifold vse of the lawe: it is conuenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For so much as concerneth this present cause: it teacheth that so soone as it hath appointed what we ought to do, the power to obey commeth of the goodnesse of God, and therefore moueth vs to prayer, whereby wee may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundement and no promise, then were our strength to be tried whether they were sufficient to answer the commaundement, but sith there are promises ioyned withall, which crie out, y^e not onely our aide, but also al our whole power consisteth in y^e help of Gods grace, they doe testifie ynough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more insufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengthes with the commaundementes of Gods lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of iustice, which he purposed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakenesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how vnready we are of our selues which in euery behalfe do so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shalbee perswaded that it is like to be true, that the Lorde appointed his lawe to stocks and stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stocks nor stones, when being taught by the lawe that their lustes doe striue against God, they are prooued guiltie by their owne witness. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakenes they flee vnto grace. For which purpose serue these sayings of Augustine. The Lorde commandeth those things that we can not doe, that we may knowe what we ought to aske of him. Great is the profite of the commaundements, if so much be giuen to free will, that the grace of God bee the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commandeth, yea the lawe therefore commandeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commaunded by the lawe: yea God requireth faith it selfe of vs, and findeth not what to require, vnlesse he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what he commaundeth, and command what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be seene in rehearsing the three sortes of commaundements which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commaundeth both in the lawe and in the Prophetes, that we be conuerted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Conuert me, Lord, and I shall be conuerted: for after that thou didst conuert me, I repented, &c. He commaundeth vs to circumeise the vncircumcised skinne of our heart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hande. He each where requireth newnesse of heart, but in an other place he testifieth that it is giuē by himselfe. That which God promiseth (saith Augustine) we do not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note that hee himselfe rehearseth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betweene the lawe and the promises, or betweene the commaundements and grace. Now let them goe, that gather by the commaundements whether man be able to do any thing toward obediēces in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commaundements themselues are fulfilled. The commaundements of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serue and cleaue vnto his will, to keepe his commaundements, to followe his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gifte what-foeuerrighteousnesse, holinesse, godlinesse or puritie may be had: Of the thirde sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paule teacheth in an other place. That remaineth, saith he, brethrē, be ye strong thorough the Lorde. In an other place he forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieue the spirite of God, wherewith we are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that he there requireth, could not be performed by men, therefore he wisheth it to the Thessalonians, from God, namely that he would reckon them worthy of his holy calling, & fulfil al the purpose of his goodnes, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, hee oftentimes commaundeth their good and godly will, yet a litle after, he thanketh God that put it in the heart of Titus, to take vpon him to giue exhortation. If Titus could not so much as vse the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so far as God did put vnto him, how should other haue bin willing to do, vnlesse God himselfe had directed their hearts?

9 The craftier sort of them do cauill at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that wee may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weake endeouours. They bring also places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conuersion seemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne ye to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lorde bringeth vs, wee haue aboue shewed, and it is not needefull here to repete it. This one thing I woulde haue graunted mee, that it is vainely gathered that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the law, because God doth commaunde the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the cōmandements of God, the grace of the law giuer is both necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby the it appeareth, that at the least there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie can not bee wiped away with any cauillations: that the couenaunt of God made with the auncient people was voide, because it was onely literall, and that it coulde no otherwise be stablised, than when the spirite commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither doeth that saying, Turne ye to me, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their errour. For their is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he renueth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by prosperitie of thinges doth declare himselfe fauorable and mercifull: as by aduersitie he sometime sheweth his displeasure. Where as therefore the people being vexed with manie sorts of miseries, and calamities, did complaine that God was turned away from them: he aunswereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they returne to vprightnesse of life, and to him selfe that is the paterne of righteousnesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawn to this purpose, that the worke of our conuersion shoulde seeme to bee parted betweene God and men. These things we haue comprehended so much the shortlier, because the proper place for this matter shall be where we entreat of the law.

10 The seconde sort of their argumentes is much like vnto the first. They alleadge the promises whereby God doeth couenaunt with our wil, of which sorte are: Seeke good and not euill, and yee shall liue. If ye will and doe heare, yee shall eate the good thinges of the earth: but if yee will not, the sworde shall deuoure you, because the Lords mouth hath spoken it. Againe, If thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not bee driuen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and do all his commaundementes which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God will set thee on hie aboue all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefites which the Lorde doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablsh them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplify this matter with eloquent complaintes, that the Lord doeth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vppon our will, if the same will bee not in our power: And that this liberalitie of G O D shoulde bee a goodly thing forsooth, if hee so set his benefites before vs that wee haue no power to vse them: and a meruellous assurednesse of his promises, which hange vppon a thing impossible, so as they might neuer bee fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adioyned, wee will speake in an other place: so that it shall bee playne, that that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I denie that God doeth vnghently mocke vs, when hee moueth vs to deserue his benefites, whome he knoweth to be vterly vnable to do it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they haue their vse with both sortes. As God with his commaundementes pricketh the consciences of the wicked, that they shoulde not too sweetly take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his iudgementes: so in his promises hee doth in a manner take them to witnesse, howe vnworthie they are of his goodnesse. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and conuenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whome hee is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Maiestic, according to his seueritie? Therefore God doeth well and orderly when in his promises he adioineth this condition to the wicked that are bound with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then onely enioy his benefites, if they depart from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they maye vnderstande that they are worthily excluded from these thinges, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because hee seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not bee inconuenient, if hee attempt the same thing also by promises, which we haue shewed that he hath done to great profite with commaundementes towarde them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commaundementes, wee are put in minde of our miserie, which doe withall our heart too farre dissent from the same, and we be therewithall pricked forward to call vpon his spirit, whereby we may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commaundementes, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetnesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that wee haue of righteousnesse, wee may be the more feruent to seeke the fauour of God. Loe howe in these requestes, (If you will : If you shall heare,) the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

II The thirde sorte of their argumentes, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring forth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthankfull people, and saith that they themselues onely were the cause that they receiued not of his tender loue all kinde of good thinges.

Num. 14. 43 Of which sort are the places: Amaleck and the Chananee are before you, with whose sworde you shall fall, because yec woulde not obey the Lorde, because I called and ye aunswered not, I will doe to this house as I did to Iere. 31. 13. Silo. Againe, this nation hath not hearde the voyce of the Lord their God, nor hath receyued discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde.

Iere. 32. Againe, because ye haue hardened your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euilles are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) coulde such reproches be laide against them which might readily aunswere? As for vs, wee loued prosperitie, and feared aduersitie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoide the other wee obeyed not the Lord, nor hearkened to his voyce: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, because we were subiect to to the dominion of sinne. Vainely

ly therefore are these euils layde to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoide. But leauing the pretence of necessitie, wherein they haue but a weake and sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge them selues of all fault. For if they be found gilty of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cause reproche them, that it came to passe by their peruersnes, that they felt not the fruite of his clemencie. Let them aunswere therefore, whether they can denie, that their froward will was the cause of their stubbornesse. If they finde the spring head of the euill within themselues, why gape they to finde out foreine causes, that they might seeme not to haue bene authors of their owne destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both deprived of the benefites of God, & chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinately forwarde in their faults, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vniust crueltie: that if they haue not cast off all willingnesse to learne, they may be wery of their sinnes, by the deseruings whereof they see themselues miserable & vndone, and may retourne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lord rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the soleme prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleged, did auaille with the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Iewes, to whome Hieremie is commaunded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not haue fallen otherwise than the Lord had foresaide. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these words, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not answere thee. To what ende then did they sing to deafe men? that being euen loth and vnwilling, yet they shoulde vnderstand y^t it was true that they heard, that it were wicked sacrilege if they should lay vpon God the blame of their euils which rested in themselues. By these fewe solutions thou maist easily deliuer thy selfe from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to crect an image of free wil, the enimies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as wel out of y^e cōmandments as out of the protestations against y^e professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalm concerning y^e Iewes: A froward generation that haue not made their heart streight. Also in another Psalm, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hartes, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the peruersnesse of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is onely of God. The Prophet saith: I haue enclined my heart to keepe thy commaundements: because he had willingly and with a cherefull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet he doeth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Psalm to be the gift of God. Therefore wee must holde in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne saluation with feare and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the performing. In deede he assigneth them offices, to be dooing, that they should not giue themselues to sluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that he commandeth them to haue feare & carefulnesse, he so humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commanded to do, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worke, passiuely, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heauen, that they shoulde claime nothing at all to themselues. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we should adde power in faith, he granteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing seuerally by our selues, but onely he awaketh the slothfulnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paul: Extinguish not the spirit, for slothfulnesse doth oftentimes creepe vpon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their own choise to cherish the light being offered them, his ignorance shall be easily confuted: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, commeth onely from God. For wee are also oftentimes commaunded to purge our selues from all filthinesse: whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conueyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plaine by the wordes of Iohn: Whosoever is of God, saueh himselfe. The aduancers of freewill take holde of this saying, as if we were saued partly by the power of God, & partly by our owne: as though we had not from heauen the very same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to saue vs from euil, and wee knowe that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armour and weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God. Wherefore when Peter commaunded vs, to purifie our soules in the obedience of truth, hee by & by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength are of no force in the spirituall battell, Iohn briefly sheweth, when he sayeth, that they which are begotten of God, cannot sinne, because the seede of God abideth in them. And in another place, he rendereth a reason why: for that our faith is the victorie that ouercommeth the world.

12 Yet there is alleged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of the lawe, he protesteth vnto the people in this maner. The commaundement that I commaunde thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre of: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest do it. Truly if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commaundementes, I graunt they be of no smal weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse and readinesse of obseruation, but of knowledge: yet euen so, peraduenture it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtful expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospel. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, y they might be drawn to the Gospel, although his boldnes so to say shall not be without impietic, yet is there sufficient matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to conuince him withal. For if Moses speake of the commandementes onely, then he puffed vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they els haue done, but throwen them selues downe hedlong, if they had taken vpon them the keeping of the law by their own strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the law, where there is no accessse vnto it, but by a hedlong fall to destruction? Wherefore there is nothing more certain, than that Moses in these wordes did meane the couenant of mercy, which he had published together with the streight requiring of the lawe. For in a fewe verses before he had taught, that our hartes must be circumcised by y^e hand of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed that easinesse, whereof he streightway after speaketh, not in the strength of man, but in the helpe & succor of y^e holy Ghost, which performeth his worke mightely in our weakenes. Albeit y^e place is not simply to be vnderstanded of the cōmandements, but rather of the promises of the Gospel, which are so farre from stablishing a power in vs to obtaine righteousnesse, y^e they vtterly ouerthrowe it. Paul considering that same, proueth by this testimony, that saluation is offred vs in the Gospel, not vnder that hard and impossible condition, wherewith the lawe dealeth with vs, that is, that they onely shall attaine it which haue fulfilled all the commandementes, but vnder a condition that is easie, ready, and plaine to come vnto. Therefore this testimony maketh nothing to challenge freedome to the will of man.

Deu. 30. 8.

13 There are also certaine other places wont to be objected, whereby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing the succor of his grace, trieth men, and waiteth to see to what ende they will apply their endeouours, as is that place in Osee: I will go to my place till they put it in their heart & seeke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seeke his face, vnlesse their mindes were pliable that they might after their own wil incline themselues to y^e one side or the other. As though this were not a thing commonly vsed with God in the Prophetes, to make a shewe as if he did despise and cast away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduersaries gather out of such threatninges? If they meane to gather, that the people being forsaken of God, may purpose their owne saluation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessarie to conuersion, why striue they with vs? But they so graunt it necessary, that still they will haue mans power preserued vnto him. Howe proue they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will do being giuen ouer and left to himselfe, and an other thing to helpe his litle strength after the measure of his weakenesse. What then (will some man say) do these maners of speaking meane? I answere that they are asmuch in effect, as if God had sayde: Forasmuch as I preuaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdrawe my selfe a while: and sitte still and suffer them to bee afflicted: I will seee if at length, after long miseries, they will begin to remember me, to seeke my face. The Lordes going farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecy: his looking what men will doe, signifieth that hee keeping silence, and as it were hiding himselfe, doeth for a time exercise them with diuerse afflictions. Both these things he doth to humble vs the more. For we should sooner be dilled than amended with the scourges of aduersity, vnlesse he did frame vs to that tractablenesse by his Spirite. Now whereas the Lorde being offended, and in a maner wearied with our obstinate stubbornesse, doth not for a time leaue vs (that is by taking away his word in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine presence of himselfe) & doth make a proufe what we would doe in his absence, it is falsely gathered hereof that there is any strength of free wil that he should beholde and trie, forasmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to driue vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

14 They bring also for their defence the continuall manner of speaking, that is vsed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good workes are called ours, and it is no lesse sayde that wee doe the thing that is holy and pleasing to God, than that we committe sinnes. But if sinnes be iustly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truly in righteous doinges also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned vnto vs. For it were against reason that it should be sayd that we doe those things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our own motion, we are moued by God like stones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking doe shewe that our endeouour hath also yet a second parte. If that thing onely were still enforced, that good workes are called ours, I would obiect againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to haue giuen vs of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifullnesse and free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which otherwise is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the same absurdity in the Lordes prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no property, but by the liberalitie of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our selues do worship God, obey y^e lawe and apply good workes. Sith these are the duties properly belonging to y^e minde and will: how could it agree that these things are both referred to the holy Ghost, and also attributed to vs, vnlesse there were a certaine communicating of our endeouour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily vnwinde our selues, if we wel consider the manner howe the spirite of the Lord worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherwith they enuiously presse vs is from the purpose, for who is so fond to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thing followe of our doctrine. We reckon among the naturall powers of man, to allowe and refuse, to will and not wil, to endeouour and to resist, that is, to allowe vanity and to refuse perfect goodnesse, to wil euil and to be vnwilling to good, to endeouour our selues to wickednes and to resist righteoufnesse. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vse that peruersenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that he by an euil hand may execute his good worke. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so serueth the power of God, whē he laboureth onely to obey his owne lust, to a stone that being throwen by the violence of an other, is caried neither with mouing nor sense nor will of his owne?

We see how much difference there is. But what doth he in good things, of which is our principall question? when he creteth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restraineth mans will, that it be not caried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousnesse, he boweth, frameth, fashioeneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousnes: and y^e it should not stumble or fall, he doth stablish and confirme it with y^e strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine saith: Thou wilt say vnto me: then are we wrought & worke not. Yea, thou both workest & art wrought, and thou workest wel when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirite of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first parte he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the moouing of the Holy ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of help, may be gathered that wee also doe worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing seuerally to vs: but because he would not cherish slouthfulnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to wil well of grace. Therefore he said a litle before, Vnlesse God help vs, wee shall not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct & gouerne the will of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnlesse it correct it, reforme it, and renewe it (from whence we say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and vnlesse it moue it, stirre it, driue it forward, cary it and hold it. Whereupon we do truely say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholly the onely worke of the same grace. In the meane time we denie not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things do stand very well together: that mens will be said to be restored, when the faultinesse and peruerfnesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of iustice: and also that a new will be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth vtterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrary, but that we may well be said to do the same thing that the spirit of God doeth in vs, although our own will do of it selfe giue vs toward it nothing at all, that may be seuered from his grace. And therefore we must keepe that in minde, which wee haue elsewhere alleged out of Augustine, that some do in vaine trauaile to find in the will of man some good thing that is properly her owne. For whatsoeuer mixture men study to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoeuer good is in the wil of man, it proceedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to will, it is not without cause said, that we doe those things whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoeuer by his goodnesse he worketh in vs, so that we vnderstande it to be not of our selues: and then because the mind is ours, the will is ours,

16 Those other testimonies beside these, that they scrape together here and there, shall not much trouble euen meane wittes that haue well conceiued onely the solutions aboue said. They allege that saying out of Genesis, Thine appetite shall be vnder thee, and thou shalt beare rule ouer it. Which they expound of sinne, as if the Lord did promise to Cain, that the force of sinne should not get the vpper hand in his minde, if he would labour in subduing of it. But we say that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be spoken of Abel. For there Gods purpose was to reprove the wickednes of y enuy that Cain had conceiued against his brother. And that he doth two wayes. One, that in vaine he imagined mischief to excel his brother in Gods sight, before whom no honor is giuen but vnto righteousnesse: the other, that he was too much vnthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him subiect vnder his authoritic. But least we should seeme therefore to embrace this exposition, because the other is against vs: let vs admit that God spake of sinne. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he commandeth, then haue wee already shewed that thereby followeth no prooffe of the power of man. If he promiseth, where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subiect to sinne, ouer which he should haue had dominion. They wil say, that in the promise was included a secret condition, as if it had ben said, that he should haue the victory if he would striue for it. But who will receiue these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sinne, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be aboue our power. Albeit both the matter it selfe and the order of Grammar do require, that there be a comparison made of Caine and Abel, because the elder brother should not haue ben set behind the yonger, vnlesse he had become worse by his owne wicked doing.

17 They vse also the testimony of the Apostle, which saith, that it is not of him y willeth, nor of him y runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Whereby they gather that there is somewhat by mans will and endeouour, which of it selfe though it be weake, being holpen by the mercy of God, is not without prosperous successe. But if they did soberly wey what matter Paul there intreateth of, they would not so vnadvisedly abuse this sentence. I knowe that they may bring forth Origen and Hierome for mainteiners of their exposition: and I could on the other side set Augustine against them. But what they haue thought, it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that saluation is prepared onely for them, to whom the Lord vouchsaferh to graunt his mercy: and that ruine & destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosē. He had vnder the example of Pharao declared the state of the reprobate, and had also confirmed the assurednes of free election by the testimony of Moses, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. If it be thus vnderstanded, y will or endeouour are not sufficient, because they are too weake for

So great a weight, that which Paul sayth, had not bin aptly spoken: Therefore away with these subtleties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running y get vs the way to saluation, herein is onely the mercy of God. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that y goodnesse and kindnesse of God appeareth not by the workes of righteousnesse, which we haue done, but for his infinite mercy. They themselues that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he said, y it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not giue me leaue to reason after the same fashion, that we haue done some good workes, because Paul sayth, that we haue not attained the goodnesse of God by y good works y we haue done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shal perceiue that their own is not without the like deceite. For that is a sure reason that Augustine resteth vpon, If it were therefore sayd that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient: Then it may be turned on the contrary part that it is not of the mercy of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurdity, Augustine doth rightfully conclude, that this is spoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to wil and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs. No lesse vnaptly do some wrest that saying of Paul: Wee are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be restrayned onely to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselues, but because God vseth their seruice, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie giftes.

18 They bring foorth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not vnknownen, is a writer of whose authority is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he testifie for free will? He sayth, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hande of his owne counsell: that commandementes were giuen him, which if he obserued, he should againe be preserued by them: that before man was set life and death, good & euill: that whatsoever he would, should be giuen him. Be it, y man receiued from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if on the other side we answer that he lost it? Truly my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create vpriight, and he forged vnto himself many inuentions. But because man in swaruing, lost as it were by shipwracke both himselfe and all his good things, it foloweth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answer, not to them only, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoever he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine saluation, thy authoritie is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any preiudice, be it neuer so small, against y vndoubted word of God. But if thou only study to restrain the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euills vpon God, vseth to seeke a vaine defence for it selfe, and therefore thou answerest that vprightnesse was giuen vnto men, wherby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree vnto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornamentes, wherwith God had clothed him at the beginning: & that so we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisitian than a defender.

 Luk. 10. 30. Christ of the wayfaring man, whom theues laid abroad halfe dead in y way. I know y it is common almost with all writers, that the calamity of mankind is represented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon doe our aduersaries gather an argument, that man is not so maymed with y robberie of sin and the Deuil, but that he keepeth still remaining the leauings of his former good things, forasmuch as it is said, that he was left halfe alieue. For where is y halfe life, vnlesse some portion both of right reason and wil remained? First if I would not giue place to their allegory, I beseech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was deuised by the fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lords wordes. Allegories ought to go no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before them: so farre is it of, that they be by them selues sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, ouerthrow this deuise, for the word of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is vtterly dead, forasmuch as concerneth blessed life. And Paul when he speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, when we were halfe dead & halfe alieue, but that we were raised vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe alieue to receiue the light of Christ, but them
 Eph. 2. 5. that sleepe and are buried. And in like maner speaketh the Lorde himselfe, Iohn. 5. 25. when he sayth, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voyce. With what face would they set this light allusion against so many plaine sentences? But let this allegory haue the force of a certaine testimonie, yet what shall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe alieue, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I graunt: he hath a wit capable of vnderstanding, although it pearce not to the heauerly and spirituall wisdom: he hath true iudgement of honesty: he hath some feeling of the godhead howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these things? Truly they bring not to passe y the same saying of Augustine be taken from vs, which is also approued by common consent of y Scholes: that after mans fall the freely giuen good things, whereupon saluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his natural giftes are corrupted & defiled. Lette therefore this trueth remaine with vs vndoubted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged from the righteousnesse of GOD, that it conceiueth, coueteth, and enterpriseth all wickednesse, filthinesse, vncleannesse, and mischiefe: that his heart is so thoroughly loked in poyson of sinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they doe vtter any goodnesse in shewe, yet still the minde remaineth alway wrapped in hypocrisie and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart entangled with inward peruerfenesse.

The vj. Chapter.

Sith all mankinde hath perished in the Person of Adam, that excellence and nobilitie of beginning which wee haue spoken of woulde so litle profite vs, that it woulde rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeare theredeemer in the person of his onely begotten sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sinne to bee his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creatour wherof we haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting forth God a father vnto vs in Christ. Truly this was the naturall order that the frame of the worlde shoulde be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godlinesse, from whence might be made a passage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but since our falling away, whether soeuer we turne our eyes, vpperward & downeward, the curse of God still presenteth it selfe vnto our sight, which while it possesseth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needes ouerwhelme our owne soules with desperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly fauour toward vs doe still many wayes appeare: yet by beholding of the worlde wee cannot gather that hee is our Father when our conscience inwardly pricketh vs, & sheweth that there is in sin iust cause of forsaking, why God should not accompt or reckon vs for his children. Beside that there is in vs both slouthfulnessse and vnthankfulnessse: because both our mindes, as they bee blinded, doe not see the trueth, and also as all our senses be peruerse, we maliciously defraude God of his glorie. Therefore wee must come to that saying of Paul: because in the wisdome of God, the worlde knewe not God 1. Cor. 1. 22.
by wisdome, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preaching to saue them that beleeeue. The wisdome of God hee calleth this honourable stage of heauen and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholding whereof wee ought wisely to haue knowen God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the faith of Christ, which for that it seemeth foolish, the vnbeleeuers do disdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the crosse do not agre with mans wit, yet ought we humblie to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator and maker, that he may beginne againe to be our father. Truly since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God auailed to saluation, without the Mediatour. For Christ speaketh not of his owne age onely, but comprehendeth all ages, when he saith that this is the eternall life, to knowe the father the one true God, and him whome he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their sluggishnesse, which take vpon them to set open heauen to all prophane & vnbeleeuing men, without his grace, whom the Scripture ech where teacheth to be the onely gate whereby wee enter into saluation. But if any will restraine that saying of Christ onely to the publishing of the Gospell, wee haue in readinesse wherewith to confute him. For this hath bene a common sentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliatiō they that are estranged from God, and pronounced accursed, & the children of wrath, can not please God. And here may be also alleaged that which Christ answered to the woman of Samaria: Ye worship what ye knowe not, but we worship that which we know: because the saluation is from the Iewes. In which wordes he both condemneth of falschod all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redeciner was promised vnder the lawe to the only chosen people. Whereupon it foloweth, that no worship cuer pleased God, but that which had respect vnto Christ. For which cause also Paule affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and voyd of the hope of life. Now where as Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that al the world fel from it, we must returne to the same fountaine Christ. And therefore Christ, in so much as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himselfe to be the life. And truly the entrance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accepted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the body of the only begotten sonne. And Iohn plainly testifieth, that they which beleaue in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of fayth in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to haue touched it by the way.

2 And therefore God neuer shewed himselfe mercifull to the olde people, nor cuer did put them in any hope of grace without the Mediatour. I omit to speake of the sacrifices of the lawe, wherein y^e faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that saluation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was performed by Christ alone. Only this I say, y^e the blessed and happy state of the church hath ben alway grounded vpon the person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his co-
 Gal. 3. 16. uenant, yet doeth Paul wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seede in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we knowe that not all they were reckened his seede that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Ismael and other) howe came it to passe that of the two sonnes of Isaac, that is Esau and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen, the other refused? Yea howe came it to passe that the elder was reiected and the yonger only tooke place? And howe also came it to passe, that the greater parte should be forsaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckened in one person, and that the promised saluation did neuer stande sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the thinges that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang vpon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it be not in so plaine wordes expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knowen to al the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hanna
 1. Sam. 3. 10. the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicitie of the godly, euen then saide thus in her song: God shall giue strength to his king, and shall exalt y^e horne of his anointed. In which wordes she meaneth that God shall blesse his Church. Wherewith also agreeth y^e oracle that is within a litle after adioyned: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walke before mine anointed.

Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly father was to haue the liuely image of Christ to be seene in Dauid & his posteritie. Therefore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kisse the Sonne. Wherewith this saying of the Gospel also agreeth: He that honoureth not the sonne, honoureth not the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdome decayed: yet it behooued the covenant to stand which God had made in Dauid and his successours: as also he saide by the Prophets: I wil not altogether cut of the kingdom, for Dauid my seruantes sake, and for Hierusalems iake, whom I haue chosē: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressly added: I will afflict the seede of Dauid, but not for euer. Within a litle space of time after, it is saide: For Dauid his seruantes sake God hath giuen a light in Hierusalem, to raise vppē a sonne and to keepe Hierusalem in safetic. Now when the state grew toward destruction, it was saide againe: God would not scatter Iuda for Dauid his seruantes sake, because he had spoken that he would giue a light to him and his sons for euer. Finally this is the summe, that al other being passed ouer, only Dauid was chosē, vpon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in an other place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Ioseph, and he hath not chosē the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosē the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. Hee hath chosē his seruauant Dauid to feede Iacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to saue his church, that y safetic and preseruatiō thereof should hang vpon that one head, and therefore Dauid crieth out, The Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a praier: Saue thy people & blesse thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with vnseparable knot ioy ned to the government of Christ. And in the same meaning in an other place: Lord saue vs: Let the king heare vs in the day that we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, y the faithfull did vpon none other confidence flee to y helpe of God, but because they were hidden vnder y succour of the king. Which is gathered by an other Psalm. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he y commeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plainly enough, y the faithfull are called back vnto Christ, that they may hope y they shalbe saued by y hand of God. The same respect hath y other praier, where al the Church calleth vpon the mercie of God. Let thy hand be vpon y man of thy right hand, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou hast preserued (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the psalme bewaileth y scattering abroad of y whole people, yet he praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, and all things to mans seruing destroyed, Ieremy lamenteth the ouerthrowe of the Church, he doth principally complain that by destruction of the kingdome all hope was cut off from the faithfull. Christe (saith hee) the spirite of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom we said: In thy shadowe we shall liue among the nations. Hereby now it sufficiently appeareth that because God can not be merciful to mankinde without the Mediatour, therefore Christe was alway set before the holy fathers in time of

of the law to whom they might direct their faith.

- 3 Nowe, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliuerance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is auanced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, saith Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophetes make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to Dauid, concerning the euerlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no maruell. For otherwise there had bin no assurance of the couenant. For which purpose serueth that notable answer of Esay. For when he sawe that y^e vnbelceuing king Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safetie, as it were suddenly, he passed ouer to Messias. Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a son, meaning indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselues to discredite the trueth of God, yet the couenant should not be voide, but that the Redeemer should come at his appointed time. Finally it was the care of all the Prophetes, to the ende they might shewe that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdome of Dauid, wherupon hanged the redemption and euerlasting saluation. So Esay saith: I will make a couenant with you the faithfull mercies of Dauid. Behold I haue giuen him for a witnessse vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise haue any hope, but by the meanes of him being witnessse, that God would bee appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremy, to raise them vp being in despaire, saith: Beholde the daies come, wherein I will raise vp vnto Dauid a righteous branche, and then shall Iuda be saued, and Israel shall dwell in safetie. And Ezc. 34. 23. Ezechiel saith, I wil raise vp one shepheard ouer my sheepe, euen Dauid my seruant. I the Lord wil be a God to them, and my seruant Dauid for a shepheard. And I wil make a couenant of peace with them. Also in an other place, after he had entreated of the incredible reuening, he saith: my seruant Dauid shall be their king, and there shalbe one shepheard ouer all, and I will make an euerlasting couenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places out of many, because I onely meane to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophetes also speake agreeably hereunto, as it is saide in Osee. The children of Iuda and the children of Israel shalbee gathered together, and shall appoint to themselues one head. Which he afterward more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall seeke for the Lord their God and Dauid their king. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressly saith, Amos 9. 11. The king shall go before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the reuening of the people, saith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of Dauid that is fallen downe, and I will hedge vp the gappes, and raise vp the places ouerthrowen, euen because that was the onely standard of saluation, to haue the royall glorie to rise vp againe on hie in the stocke of Dauid, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doth he more plainly crie out: be glad his glorie. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, doe wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christe but a portion of the godheade deriued from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone.

1. Iohn. 2. 31 That saying of Iohn hath alwayes bene true: He that hath not the son, neither hath he the Father. For though in old time many did boast y they worshipped the soueraigne God, y maker of heauē & earth: yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible y they should truly taste of y mercie of God, & so be perswaded y he was their father. Therefore because they knewe not the heade that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them: whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into grosse and filthie superstitions, they bewrayed their owne ignorance. As at this day y Turkes although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heauen & earth is their God, yet do they thrust an idol in place of the true God while they swarue from Christ.

The vij. Chapter.

That the lawe was giuen, not to holde still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ, vntill his comming.

BY this continuall processe that wee haue rehearsed, may bee gathered, that the Law was added about foure hundred yeres after the death of Abraham, not for this entent to lead away the chosen people from Christe: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kinde a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, y they should not waxe faint with long tariance. I meane by this worde Law, not only the ten commaundementes, which prescribe a rule howe to liue godly and righteously, but also the forme of religion deliuered by the hand of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawgiuer to abolishe the blessing promised to the kinred of Abraham: but rather wee see howe euery where he putteth the Iewes in remembrance of that free couenant made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if he had bene sent to reneue the same. That was most plainly set forth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine & fonde, than for men to offer vp lothsome stinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themselues to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloude to wash away their filthinesse? Finally, all the seruice of God appointed in y lawe (if it bee considered by it selfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the truth should answer vnto) shalbe but a verie mockerie. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, & in the Epistle to the Hebrewes is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commaundeth Moses to make al thinges pertaining to the tabernacle, according to y paterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spirituall thing appointed y they should tend vnto, the Iewes shoulde no lesse haue fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men y neuer earnestly applied the study of godlines, cānot without lothsome tediousnes abide to heare so many sundrie fashions of vsages: & they not only maruel why God wearied his people with such a heape of heape of ceremonies, but also they despise & scorn them as childrens plays. And the cause is, for that they consider not the end, from which if the figures of the law be severed, they must needs be condemned of vanitie. But that same figure sheweth, that G O D did not therefore commaund sacrifices because he would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their mindes hier. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delited with no other worshipping but spirituall. This doe the sayings of the Prophetes testifye, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of sluggishnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expositours of the law, so they would by this meane haue mens eies directed to y^e mark from which the common people straid. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes it is certainly gathered, that the law was not voide of Christ. For Moses did set forth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they should become a priestly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine vnles there were had for the meane thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation, than by the blood of beastes. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondslaves of sinne, to be aduanced to royal dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glorie of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefite should come vnto them frō else where thā from themselues? Also how could y^e right of priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthines of sins were abominable to God, vnles they had bin consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turn y^e saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fulnes of grace, the tast whereof the Iewes had taken vnder the lawe, was giuen in Christ: Yee are (saith hee) a chosen kindred, a kingly priesthoode. For to this end tendeth that turning of y^e words, to shew that they, to whom Christ appeared by the Gospel, haue obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both with priestly and kingly honour, that trusting vpon their mediatour, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God. Exod. 10, 6.

Exod. 25. 40

1. Pet. 2. 9.

2 And here by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdome which at length was erected in the house of Dauid, is part of the law, & contained vnder the ministry of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that as wel in al the kindred of the Leuites as in the posteritie of Dauid Christ was set before y^e eies of the old people as in a double looking glasse. For, as I said euen now, they could not otherwise be before God either kings or priestes, which were both the bondslaves of sinne and of death, and defiled by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, y^e the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a Schoolemaster, til y^e seed came for whose sake the promise was giuen. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly known, they were like vnto children, whose weakenesse could not yet beare a full knowledge of heauenly things, but how they were by ceremonies as it were lead by the hand to Christ, is spoken before, and may bee better vnderstanded by many testimonies of the Prophetes. For although it was commanded them to come daily with newe sacrifices to appease G O D: yet Esay. Gal. 3, 24.

promiseth that all their sinnes shalbee cleansed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniel agreeably saith: The Priestes appointed of the tribe of Leui, did enter into the Sanctuarie: but of the onely priest it was once saide, that by an oath he was chosen of God to be a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oile was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shalbe an other manner of anointing. And because I will not tarie vpon many examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues euen from the 4. chapter to the 11. doth largely and plainly ynough shewe, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth and vaine till we come to Christ. As concerning the ten commaundementes: that lesson of Paul is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the ende of the lawe vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueth: And an other lesson, that Christ is the Spirite that quickeneth the letter which of it selfe slaieth. For in the first of these two, he meaneth that righteousnes is vainly taught by commandements, vntill Christ doe giue it both by free imputation and by the spirite of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it should nothing profite vs to knowe what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did succour vs fainting and oppressed vnder the yoke and vntollerable burden. In an other place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie being prooued guiltie of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to seeke Christ, whatsoeuer hee teacheth in diuerse wordes doe all very wel agree together. But because he then was in contention with peruerse teachers, which fained that we doe deserue righteousnesse by the workes of the lawe, to confute their error, he was compelled sometime to speake precisely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is cloathed with the couenant of free adoption.

3 But now it is good to know, how being taught by the moral lawe, we are made more inexcusable, that our owne guiltinesse may mooue vs to craue pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousnes in the lawe: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousnesse before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heauenly throne of iudgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the law, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had set before Israel life and death, good and euill. And we may not denie, but that the reward of eternall saluation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promised it. Againe yet it is good to examine, whether wee performe that obedience, vpon desert whereof we may conceiue a trust of that reward. For to what small purpose is it, to see the reward of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse wee further knowe whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But herein the weakenesse of the lawe doth shewe it selfe. For because that keeping of the lawe is found in none of vs all, we are excluded from the promises of life, and doe fall into curse onely. I doe not nowe tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must so come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre aboue the power of man, he may in deede a far of, looke at the promises, but yet not gather any fruite of them. Therefore this one thing thing remaineth, that by the goodnesse of them he may the better weye his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of saluation being cut off, death doth certainly hang ouer him. On the other side doe presse vs terrible penall lawes, which do hold entangled and fast bound not only a fewe of vs, but euery one without exception : they presse vs, I say, and doe pursue vs, with an vnapeasable rigour, so that wee may see most present death in the lawe.

4 Therefore if we looke only vpon the law, wee can doe nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and dispeire, forasmuch as by it we are all damned & cursed, & kept farre off from the blessednesse that he offereth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how finally doeth it differ from mocking, to shew forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhorte men vnto it, to protest that it is layed open for vs, when in the meane season the entrie vnto it is forclosed and impossible to be come to? I answere : although the promises of the lawe, in so much as they are conditionall, do hang vpon the perfect obedience of the lawe, which can nowhere be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they shalbe voyd and of no effect vnto vs, vnlesse God embrace vs with his free goodnesse without regard of our works, & vnlesse we do imbrace by faith the same goodnesse giue vs by the gospel, then want they not their effectualnes, yea with their condition annexed. For the he doth so freely giue al things vnto vs, that he addeth this also to the heape of his bountifullnesse, y not refusing our halfe full obedience, & remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he so maketh vs to enioy the fruite of the promises of y law, as if we our selues had fulfilled the condition. But we wil at this present procede no further in this matter, because it shalbe more largely to be entreated of, when we shall speake of the Iustification of faith.

5 Whereas we saide that it is impossible to kepe the lawe, that is in fewe wordes to bee both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accompted an opinion of great absurditie, so farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed : what Hierome thought, I do nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is truth. I will not here make long circumstances of diuerse sortes of possibilities. I call that impossible, which both neuer hath beene, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If wee record from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power : Againe, that there hath byn none that hath not ben troubled with concupiscence. Who can say Nay? I see in deed what maner holy men foolish superstition doth imagine vnto vs, euen such whose purenesse the heauenly Angels do scarcely counteruaile : but against both the Scripture and proofe of experience. I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the marke of true perfection, vnlesse he be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are opon testimonies of Scripture. Salomon said, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that sinneth not. And Dauid saide : euery liuing man shall not bee

- Gal. 3. 10. justified in thy sight. Job in many places affirmeth the same. But Paul most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the flesh. And by no other reason he proueth that, all that are vnder the law, are subiect to the curse. But because it is written, that cursed are al they that do not abide in all the commaundements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And whatsoeuer is forespoken by the Scriptures, that must be holden for perpetuall, yea and necessarie. With such suttletie did the Pelagians trouble Augustine, saying that there is wrong done to God, to say that he doeth commaund more than the faithfull are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to auoide their cauillation confessed, that the Lorde might in deede, if he would, aduance a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will do, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that do I also not denie. But I adde further, that it is inconuenient to dispute of his power against his trueth, and that therefore this sentence is not subiect to cauillations if a man should say, that that thing is impossible to be, wherof the Scriptures doe pronounce that it shal not be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lord, who may be saued, he answered: with men in deede it is impossible, but with God all things are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stiffely defendeth, that in this flesh we neuer yelde to God the due loue that wee owe him. Loue (saith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath first fully knowen his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this worlde, see by a glasse and in a darke speech: it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controuersie, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfil the lawe, if wee behold the weaknesse of our owne nature, as it shal yet also in another place be proued by Paul.

- Mat. 19. 25. Lib. de spiritu & litera.
- Rom. 8. 3.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vse of the lawe which they call Moral. Now, as farre as I vnderstand, it is contained in these three partes. The first is, that while it sheweth to euery man the righteousnes of God, that is, the righteousnesse which only is acceptable to God, it admonish, certifie, proue giltie, yea & condemne euery man of his own vnrighteousnesse. For so is it needefull that man blinded & drunke with loue of himselfe, be driuen both to the knowledge & the confession of his owne weaknesse & vncleannesse: for asmuch as if his vanitie be not evidently conuincd, he swelleth with mad affiance of his owne strength, and can neuer be brought to thinke of the slenderesse therof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his own will. But so soone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howsoeuer he before conceived a great opinion of it, yet by & by he feeleth it to pant vnder so great a burden, & then to shake & solter, at last euen to fall down & faint. So being taught by the scholing of the law, he putteth off that arrogancie wherwith before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of another disease of pride, wherof wee haue saide that he is sicke, so long as he is suffered to stande to his owne iudgement, hee deuifeth

Hypocrisie in steede of righteousnesse, wherwith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wote not, what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so soone as he is compelled to trie his life by the balance of the lawe, then leauing the presumption of the counterfaite righteousnesse, he seeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holinesse: Againe, that he sheweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he seemed cleane. For the euils of lust are hidden in so deepe and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceiue the sight of man. And not without cause the Apostle saith, that he knewe not lust, except the lawe had sayd: Thou shalt not luste: because except it be by the lawe disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroyeth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadly darte thereof.

Rom. 7. 7.

7 So the lawe is like a certaine looking glasse wherem we beholde, first our weakenesse, and by that our wickednesse, and last of all by them both our accursednesse, euen as a glasse representeth vnto vs the sportes of our face. For when power faileth man to follow righteousnesse, then must hee needes sticke fast in the mire of sinnes. And after sinne by and by followeth curse. And of how much the greater transgression the lawe holdeth vs guilty and conuict, with so much the more greuous iudgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the saying of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne. For there he speaketh only of the first office of the lawe, the prooffe wherof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayings, that the lawe entred that sinne might abound, & therfore that it is the ministracion of death that worketh wrath and slaieth. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquity, with how much more vnderstanding of sinne the conscience is stricken, because vnto breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, because of it selfe it can doe nothing but accuse, condemne and destroy. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirit of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, onely to this end, to accuse vs and kil vs. And yet when this is sayd, neither is y^e lawe dishonored thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to saluation. But forasmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemy with the spirituall lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for saluation, (if it had found fit bearers) turneth to the occasion of sinne and death. For sith wee are all proued transgressors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it discloseth our iniquitie: the more surely that it confirmeth the rewarde of life and saluation laid vp for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it of therefore that these sayings should be to the dishonour of the lawe, that they much auaille to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruersenes, that wee enioy not the blessednesse of life set openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the succour of the lawe, is made so much the sweeter, & the mercy more louely that giueth it vnto vs, whereby we learne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping newe giftes vpon vs.

8 And whereas the iniquity and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimony of the lawe, it is not done for this purpose (if at least we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with despeire, or with discouraged mindes to tumble downe headlong. In deede the reprobate are amased after that manner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoueth to be an other ende of instruction. I grant the Apostle testifieth that wee are all condemned by iudgement of the lawe, that euery mouth may be stopped, and that all the worlde may become bounde vnto

Rom. 3. 19. God: but yet the same Apostle in an other place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbeliefe, not to destroy al, or to suffer all to perish, but that he might haue mercy of all, that leauing the foolish opinion of their owne strength, they might vnderstand, that they stand and are vpholden by the only hande of God: that they being naked and empty, may flee to his mercy, that they may rest themselues wholly vpon it, hide themselues wholly in it, take holde of it alone in steede of righteousnesse and merites, which is laide open in Christ for al men who soeuer they be that with true faith do desire and looke for it. For God in the commandementes of the lawe appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteousnesse, whereof we all are destitute, and on the other side a rigorous iudge of euill doinges. But in Christ, his face shineth full of grace and lenity, euen towarde the wretched and vnworthy sinners.

9 Of profiting, to craue the grace of his helpe, Augustine speaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The lawe commandeth that endeouering to doe the thinges commanded, and being wearied with our weakenesse vnder the lawe, we should learne to aske the helpe of grace. Againe to Aselius:

Epistol. 200. The profit of the lawe is to conuince man of his owne weakenesse, and compell him to craue the Physicke of grace that is in Christ. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The law commandeth, & grace ministreth strength to do. Againe to Valentine: God commaundeth those thinges that we can not doe,

Epistol. 95. that we may learne to knowe what to aske of him. Againe: The lawe was giuen to accuse you, that being accused you should feare, that fearing you should craue pardon, and not presume of your owne strengthes. Againe:

In Psa. 118. The lawe was giuen for this purpose, of great to make litle, to shewe that thou hast no strength of thine owne to righteousnesse, that thou as poore, vnworthy and needy, shouldest flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his speech to God and sayth: Doe so Lord, do so mercifull Lord, commande that which can not be fulfilled: yea, commaunde that which can not but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men can not fulfill it by their owne strength, euery mouth may be stopped, and no man may thinke him selfe great. Let al be little ones, and let all the worlde be guilty before thee. But I am not wise to heap vp so many testimonies, sith y^e holy man hath written a booke properly of that matter, which he hath intituled, Of the Spirite & Letter. The seconde profiting he doth not so lively describe, either because hee knewe that it did hang vpon the former, or because he did not so wel vnderstand it, or because he wanted words wherewith distinctly & plainly to expresse his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceiued: but this first office of the law is not idle euen in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus farre forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh they be renued & flourish againe in the inward man, but amased with the first terrour do lie still in desperation: yet it serueth to shewe forth the equitie of Gods iudgement, that their consciences be tossed with such wayes. For they euer willingly desire to make shift against the iudgement of God. Nowe while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonished with the testimonie of the lawe and their conscience do bewray in themselues what they haue deserued.

10 The seconde office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is iust & right, vnlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penal ordinances therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inward mind is moued or affected withall, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke, and doe keepe in their peruersnesse within them, which otherwise they would haue outragiously poured out.

Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practise which they haue conceiued in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare & obedience of God, yea the more that they holde backe them selues, so much the stronglier within they are kindled, they burn, they boile, readie to do any thing, & to break forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that only, but also they most spitefully hate the lawe, and do detest God the lawmaker, so that if they coulde, they would very faine take him away, whome they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth rightfull things, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the despisers of his maiestie. In some in deede more darkly, & in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the law not by willing submission, but resisting and against their willes, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteoufnes is necessary for the publike common state of men, the quiet wherof is herein prouided for, while order is taken that all thinges be not confounded with vpror, which would come to passe, if all thinges were lawful for all men. Yea, it is not vnprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Scholing, so long as they before their calling beeing yet destitute of the spirite of sanctification, are still wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outwarde licentiousnes, by the terrour of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet tamed in minde, they go for the present time but a litle forward, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and rawe to discipline, as to a thing vnknown. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to haue touched, when slayers of their parents, & murderers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, lyers & periured men, & whatsoeuer else is against sound doctrine. For he saith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

11 But to both may that be applyed which he saith in another place, that the law was to the Iewes a Scholemaster to Christ, for there are two sortes of men, whome with her schooling she leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort, of whome we first spake, because they are too full of assurance of their owne strength or righteousness, are not meete to receiue the grace of Christ, vnlesse they be first emptied, therefore the lawe bringeth them downe to humilitie by knowledge of themselues, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort neede a bridle to be holden backe, least they so giue loose y^e reines to the wantonnesse of their flesh, that they fall of altogether from all studie of righteousness. For where the spirite of God doth not yet gouerne, there sometime lustes do so boile, that it is in great perill least they throwe downe the soule that is subiect to them into the forgetfulnesse & despising of God: and so would it come to passe if God did not with this remedie prouide for it. Therefore those whom he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdom, if he do not by and by regenerate them, he keepeth them by the works of the lawe vnder feare, vntill the time of his visitation, not that chaste & pure feare such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlinesse. Of this we haue so many proues, that it needeth no example. For whosoever haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare & obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirite, they began heartily to loue him.

12 The third vse, which is also the principal vse, & more nearely loketh vnto the proper end of the law, concerneth the faithful, in whose hearts already liueth & reigneth the spirit of God. For although they haue the lawe written & grauen in their hearts by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned & minded by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two wayes profit in the lawe. For it is to them a very good meane, wherby they may daily better & more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto, & may be confirmed in y^e vnderstanding thereof. As if a seruant be already bent with all the affection of his heart, to please his Lord: yet hath he neede diligently to search out & marke the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame & apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt himself from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by daily instruction of the law get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because wee neede not only doctrine but also exhortation: this other profite shall the seruant of God take by the lawe, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slippery way of offending. For after this maner, must these holy ones driue forwarde them selues, which with howe great

cheerefulnesse so euer they trauaile to Godward according to the spirit, yet they are alway loden with the sluggishnesse of the flesh, that they proceede not with such full readines as they ought. To this flesh is the lawe giuen as a whippe, that like a slowe and dul Assie it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, because he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Euen to this vse Dauid had respect, when he did set forth the law with those notable praises: The lawe of the Lorde is vndefiled, conuerting soules: the iustices of the Lorde are vpriight, and chearing heartes: the commandement of the Lorde is bright, that giueth light to the eyes. &c. Againe: A lanterne to my feete is thy worde, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these things against the sayings of Paul, wherein is shewed, not what vse the lawe ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to giue to man of it selfe. But here the Prophete reporteth with howe great profite the Lord doth instruct them by reading of his lawe, to whome hee inwardely inspirereth a readinesse to obey. And he taketh holde not of the commaundementes onely, but also the promise of grace annexed to the things, which onely maketh the bitternesse to waxe sweete. For what were lesse amiable than the lawe, if it should onely with requiring & threarning trouble soules carefully with feare, and vexe them with terror? But specially Dauid sheweth, that he in the lawe conceiued the Mediatour, without whom there is no delite or sweetenesse.

Psa. 119. 8.

13 Which while some vnskillfull men can not discern, they boldly shake away all Moses, and bidde the two tables of the lawe farewell, because they thinke it is not agreeable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that containeth the ministratation of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently wel, that the same Lawe which with sinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to haue a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly saide to the people: Lay your heartes vpon al the wordes that I doe testifie to you this day, that ye may committe them to your children, that ye may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfill all the things that are written in the volume of this lawe, because they are not vainely commaunded you, but that euery one shoulde liue in them: but if no man can denie that there appeareth in it an absolute paterne of righteousnesse, then either wee must haue no rule at all to liue iustely and vpriightly, or else it is not lawefull for vs to departe from it. For there are not many but one rule of life which is perpetuall and can not bee bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous man continually busied in the meditation of the lawe, lette vs not referre that to one age onely, because it is most meete for all ages to the ende of the world: and let vs not therefore be frayed away, or flee from beeing instructed by it, because it appointeth a much more exacte holynesse than wee shall performe, while we shall carry about the person of our body. For now it executeth not against vs the office of a rigorous exacter, y wil not be satisfied, but with his sul taske performed: but in this perfection wherevnto it exhorteth

Deu. 31. 6.

vs, it sheweth vs a marke, towarde which in our life to endeour, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreeable with our dutie . In which endeour if we faile not, it is well . For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that marke, towarde which our endeouours do trauaile a farre of.

14. Nowe therefore , whereas the lawe hath toward the faithfull a power to exhort, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curse , but such as with often calling on , may shake of sluggishnesse and pinch imperfection to awake it : many when they meane to expresse this deliuerance from the curse thereof, do say , that the lawe is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yet of the lawe moral) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by makinge afraide and confounding their consciences, danne and destroy them . And truly such an abrogation of the lawe, Paul doeth plainely teach , and also that the Lorde himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this that he would not haue confuted that opinion that he should dissolue the lawe , vnlesse it had bene commonly receiued among the Iewes . But forasmuch as it could not rise causelesly and without any colour , it is likely that it grewe vpon false vnderstanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errours are wont to take occasion of trueth, but least wee should also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force . Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroy the lawe , but to fulfill it : and that till heauen and earth passe away, no one iote of the lawe should passe away, but that all should be fulfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his coming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the lawe . And for good cause : sith he came rather for this ende, to heale offences . Wherefore the doctrine of the lawe remaineth for all Christians, inuiolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to eery good worke.

15 As for those things that Paul speaketh of the curse, it is euident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience . For the law not only teacheth, but also with authoritie requireth that which it commandeth . If it be not performed, yea if dutie be slacked in any part, it bendeth her thunderbolte of curse . For this cause the Apostle sayth, that all they that are of the workes of the lawe , are subiect to the curse, because it is written : Cursed is eery one , that fulfilleth not all . And he saith, that they be vnder the works of the law , that do not set righteousnesse in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigor of the lawe . He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bondes of the lawe , vnlesse we will miserably perish vnder them . But from what bondes? the bondes of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the lawe, & suffreth not any offence vn-punished . From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeem vs, he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Cursed is eery one that hangeth vpon the tree . In the chapter following in deede he saith , that Christ was made subiect to the lawe, to redeem them that were vnder the lawe : but all in one meaning meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receiue the right of children. What is that: that we should not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that should holde our conscience fast strained with anguifhe of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshakē, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authoritie of the law, but that it ought stil to be receiued of vs with the same reuerence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which wec abrogate not in effect, but in vse onely. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an end of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should haue giuen but a vaine shewe to the olde people, vnlesse the power of y death and resurrection of Christ had bin shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discern to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to proue that the keeping of them nowe is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore howe in the abolishing of them, the trueth shineth better than if they did still a farre of, and as it were with a veile spred before, shewe a figure of Christ that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces and fell downe: because now the true & expresse image of the heauenly good things was come to light, which before had bin but vnperfectly begun with darke rude draughtes, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith. Hereunto serueth that saying of Christ, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forward, the kingdom of God begā to be ioyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of saluation, and of eternall life, but because a farre of, and vnder shadowes only they did behold that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behoued that the Church of God should climbe vp hier from those first instructions, Iohn the Baptist declareth, for that the lawe is giuen by Moses, but grace and trueth beganne by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truely promised in the olde sacrifices, and the Arke of the couenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauour of God, yet all this had beene but a shadowe, if it had not bin grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is found, perfect, and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremonial vsages of the law haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the ende of them it is the better knowen how great was the profite of them before Christs comming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paul noteth. And he hath renued you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgining you al your offences, blotting out y hand-writing that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse. &c. For he seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the law somewhat further that now we haue nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expound it of the lawe morall, whose vnappeasable rigor rather then doctrine thereof they

thinke to be taken away. Some more deeply waying the wordes of Paule, doe espie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremoniall, and doe shewe that this worde Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he saith thus : He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the law of commandementes consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one newe man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Iewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherfore I grant that those first expositors are rightly reprov'd by these : but yet me thinkes that these do not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to haue these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoptiō into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the vsages of washings and sacrifices, wherewith the Iewes were made holy vnto the Lord, do seuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a hyer mysterie ? In deede the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall obseruations whereunto the false Apostles did labour to driue the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galatians he fetcheth that controuersie further of, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you cōsider nothing els but a necessitie of y^e vse of the^e, to what purpose was it, to cal it a hand writing against vs? morcouer to set the whole summe in a manner of our redemption in this, y^e it should be cancelled ? Wherefore y^e matter it selfe trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be cōsidered. And I trust y^e I haue attained the natural vnderstāding of it if at least this be granted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine words of the Apostle, that in the Iewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sins. For what did they els by sacrifices, but confesse themselues in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleansings in their place ? What did they with their cleansing, but testifie themselues to be vncleane ? And so was the hand-writing of their sin & vncleannes oft renewed by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained vnder the old Testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily cal the ceremonies handwritings against those y^e obserue them: for asinuch as by them they did openly scale to their owne damnation and vncleannes. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doth seuer from Christ, because being at that time vsed, they did obscure the glorie of Christ. Thus learn we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselues, are well and fidly called handwritings against the saluation of men, because they were as solemne instruments y^e testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what pointe they should fall backe againe, if they suffered themselves in such sorte to bee yoked by them. For therewithall was the benefit of Christ wrested away from them, in asmuch as he hauing once performed the eternall cleansing, hath vtterly abolished those dayly obseruations which were onely of force to seale finnes, but coulede do nothing to the putting away of them.

The viij. Chapter.

An exposition of the Morall lawe.

HERE I thinke it shall not bee from the purpose, to enterlace the tenne commaundementes of the lawe with a shorte exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I haue touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then also we shall haue besides that a prooue of the second point, that the Iewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlinesse, but also by the terror of the iudgement; sith they sawe themselves vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they woulde or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Nowe in setting foorth the summe of those things that are required in y true knowledge of God, we haue alreadie taught, that wee cannot conceiue him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maiestic presenteth it selfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worshippe of him. In the knowledge of our selues wee haue set this for the cheife point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strength, and cleane stripped of the trust of our owne righteousnesse, and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with conscience of our owne needinesse, we shoulde learne perfect humilitie and abasement of our selues. The Lord setteth foorth both these pointes in his lawe, where first chalenging to himselfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reuerence of his diuine maiestic, and appointeth out vnto vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteousnesse, (against the righteousnesse whereof our nature as it is peruerse and crooked, doeth alway striue, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe it is weake & feeble to do good, lieth a great way below) he reproveth vs both of weakenes & vnrighteousnes. Moreouer y inward law which we haue before saide to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the heartes of all men, doth after a certaine maner enforme vs of the same things that are to bee learned of the two tables. For our conscience doeth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witnesse and admonisher of those things that wee owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and so accuseth vs when wee swarue from our dutie. But man being wrapped in such darkenesse of errours as he is, sckarfe euen slenderly tasteth by that law of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truly he is verie farre distant from y right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancy and ambition, and so blinded with selfe loue, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, descende into himselfe to learne to submit and humble himselfe, and confesse his owne miserie. Therefore (as it was necessary both for our

our dulnesse and stubbornesse) the Lorde hath set vs a lawe written, which shoulde both more certainly testifie that which in the lawe naturall was too obscure, and also shoulde shake away our drowsinesse, and more liuely touch our minde and remembrance.

2 Nowe it is easie to vnderstande what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our creator, so of right he hath the place of our father & Lorde, and that by this reason wee owe to him glorie, reuerence, loue & feare. Yea and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to follow whither soeuer that lust of our minde doeth moue vs, but that wee ought to hang vpon his becke, and to rest onely vpon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that hee delighteth in righteousnesse, that hee abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore that vnlesse wee will with wicked vnthankfulnes fall away from our creator, wee must necessarily obserue righteousnesse all our life long. For if then onely we yelde vnto him the reuerence that wee owe, when wee prefer his will before our owne, it foloweth, that there is no other due worshippe of him, but the obseruation of righteousnesse, holynesse and cleannesse. Neither may wee pretende this excuse that we want power, and like wasted debtors bee not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that wee shoulde measure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatsoeuer wee bee, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a louer of righteousnesse, a hater of wickednesse. Whatsoeuer he requireth of vs (because hee can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature we must of necessitie obey: but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if wee bee holden bounde of our owne lust wherein sinne reigneth, so that we are not lose at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why we shoulde alledge necessitie for our defence, the cuill whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our selues.

3 When we haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the lawe, then must wee by the teaching of the same lawe also descende vnto our selues: whereby at length wee may carrie away two thinges. The first is, by comparing the righteousnesse of the lawe with our life, to learne, that wee are farre off from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthie to haue place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckened among his children. The seconde is, in considering our strength, to learne that it is not onely insufficient to fulfill the law, but also vtterly none at all. Herevpon followeth both a distrust of our owne strength, and a care and fearefulness of minde. For conscience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the iudgement of God is present before it: and the iudgement of God cannot be felte, but that it striketh into vs a dreadfull horreur of death. And likewise being constrayned with prooues of her owne weakenesse, it cannot choose but by and by fall into dispaire of her owne strength. Both these affections doe engender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made afraide with feeling of eternall death, which he seeth to hang ouer him by the deserting of his owne righteousnesse, turneth himselfe to the onely mercie of God, as to the onely haue of saluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the law, despeiring in himselfe, hee may take take breath againe and beginne to craue and looke for helpe from else where.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reuerence of his righteousnes hath also added promises and threatnings to fill our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is too blinde, to be moued with the onely beautie of goodnesse, it pleased the most merciful Father of his tender kindenesse, to allure vs with sweetenesse of rewardes to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewardes laid vp for vertue, and that he shal not spend his labour in vaine, whosoever he be, that shall obey his commaundements. He proclaimeth on the other side, that he not onely abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, but also that it shal not escape vnpunished, for that he will be a reuenger of the contempt of his Maiestie. And to exhort vs by all meanes, hee promiseth as well the blessings of this present life as also eternall blessednesse, to their obedience that keepe his commaundements: and to the transgressours therof, he threatneth both present miseries and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (hee that doth these thinges, shall lue in them:) and also the threatening that answereth it, (the soule that sinneth, that same shal die) do without dout belong to the immortalitie or death that is to come, & shal neuer be ended. Albeit, wheresoever is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternal destruction. Of present blessings and curses there is a longer register rehearsed in the law. And in the penal ordinances appeareth the soueraigne cleanness of God, that can suffer no iniquitie: but in his promises, beside his great loue of righteousnesse, (which he cannot finde in his heart to defraud of her reward) there is also proued by his maruelous bountifulnes. For whereas we and all ours are indetted vnto his Maiestie, by good right whatsoeuer he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due det, but the paiement of det is not worthy of reward. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, when he offereth reward to our obediences, which we do not yeeld of our selues as things that were not due: but what those promises do bring vnto vs, is partly saide already, and partly shall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendation of righteousnesse, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleaseth God: that the penal ordinances are set for the more detestation of vnrighteousnesse, least the sinner delited with the sweete flattering of vices, should forget that the iudgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Now whereas the Lord giuing a rule of perfect righteousnesse, hath applied all the parts thereof to his owne wil, therin is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more ready to deuise now and then diuerse sortes of worshipping to winne his fauour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, because it is naturally planted in the witte of man, hath shewed & yet doth shew forth it selte, that men do alway delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteousnesse beside the word of God, wherby it commeth to passe that the commaundements of the law haue but small place among the workes that are commonly called good workes, while that innumerable route of mens workes occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses than to reſtraine ſuch licentiousneſſe, when after the publiſhing of the law he ſpake thus to the people: Giue heede, and heare all the things that I commande thee, that it may bee well to thee and to thy children after thee for euer, when thou ſhalt do that which is good and pleaſant before thy God. What I commande thee, that onely doe: adde not vnto it, nor diminiſh it. And before, when he had pro- teſted, that this was his wiſedome and vnderſtanding before other nations, that he had receiued iudgements, righteousneſſe and ceremonies of \bar{y} Lord, he ſaid further, Keepe therefore thy ſelf and thy ſoule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes haue ſeene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, becauſe God did foreſee, that the Iſraelites would not reſt, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beſide it trauaile in bringing forth new righteousneſſe, if they were not ſeuereſly holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteousneſſe, which ſhould haue bin the ſtrongeſt ſtay to hold them backe, and yet they did ceaſſe from that boldneſſe ſo much forbidden them. But what of vs? wee are ſurely comprehended, within the ſame charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth ſtill whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his law the abſolute doctrine of righteousneſſe, yet we not contented therewith, do monſtrouſly trauaile with forging & coyning of new good workes one vpon an other. For the healing of this fault, the beſt remedie ſhalbe, if this thought ſhalbe ſtedfaſtly ſettled in vs, that the law is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteousneſſe: that therein is taught no righteousneſſe, but the ſame that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of works are vainely attempted to winne the fauour of God, whoſe true worſhip ſtandeth in onely obedience: but rather that ſuch ſtudy of good works as wandreth out of \bar{y} law of God, is an intollerable deſiling of Gods righteousneſſe & of the true righteousneſſe. Auguſtine alſo ſaith moſt truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, ſometime the mother and keeper, ſometime the originall of all vertues.

6 But when we haue expounded the Lawe of the Lord, then more fitly and with more profite ſhall that bee confirmed which I haue before ſpoken of the office & uſe of the law. But before that I beginne to diſcuſſe euery ſeueral commaundement by it ſelfe, it ſhall be good now to giue ſuch leſſons as ſerue to the vniuerſall knowledge thereof. Firſt let vs hold for determined, that the life of man is inſtructed in the law not only to outward honeſty, but alſo to inward and ſpirituall righteousneſſe. Which thing wheras no man can denie, yet there be few that rightly marke it. That commeth to paſſe, becauſe they looke not vpon the lawmaker, by whoſe nature the nature of the law alſo ought to be weied. If any king do by proclamation forbid to com- mit fornication, to kill, or to ſteale: in this caſe I grant that if a man doe on- ly conceiue in his minde a luſt to commit fornication, to ſinne, or to ſteale, and doe not commit any of theſe things in deede, he is out of \bar{y} compaſſe of this prohibition. And the reaſon is, for that becauſe the foreſight of a mortal lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuilitie: his comaundements are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eye nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleanness of the heart) vnder the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, coueting of an other mā, guile, and whatsoeuer is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spirituall law-maker, he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule, are wrath and hatred: the these of the soule, is euill desire and couetousnesse: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man say) haue regarde to intentes and willes, and not to successes of fortune. I graunt, but yet they are such intentes and wils, as haue outwardly broken out. They weye with what intent euery outwarde acte hath beene done, but they search not the secreete thoughtes. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his handes from offending. On the other side, because the heauenly law is made for our minds, therefore the restraint of mindes is principally needefull to the keeping thereof. But the common sort of men, euen when they mightily dissemble there contempt of the lawe, doe frame their eyes, their feete, their handes, and all the partes of their bodies to some obseruation of the lawe, in the meane time they holde their heart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselues well discharged, if they keepe close from men that which they doe in the sight of God. They heare it saide: thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steale: they draw not out their sworde to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their handes vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole heartes they breath out murders they boile in lust, they cast their eyes aside at all mens goods, and deuoure them with coueting. Nowe wanteth that which was the cheefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leauing the lawemaker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their owne wit? Against these doeth Paul mightily crie out, affirming that the lawe is spirituall: whereby hee mea-

Rom. 7. 14.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the lawe, we thrust not in a newe exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expositor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected y^e people with a false opinion, that he performeth the lawe that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe, he reproveth this most perilous etrou, and pronounced that vnchast looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslaughterers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guiltie of iudgemēt that haue but conceiued wrath in their mind, and them guiltie of the counsell that in murmuring or grudging haue vttered any token of a displeasēd minde: & them guiltie of Heil fire, that with tauntes and railing breake forth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue fayned Christ to be an other Moses, the giuer of the law of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection of the law of Moses. Wherevpon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospell, which farre

Mat. 5. 21.

passeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where wee shall gather a summe of the commaundementes, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, howe reprochfully they dishonour the Lawe of God. Truely it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrisie, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteousnesse. But it is verie easie to confute that errour: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the lawe, whereas hee did but restore the lawe to her integritie, while he made it free, and clenfed it being obscured with lies, and defiled with leauen of the Pharises.

8 Let this bee our seconde note, that there is alway more contained in the commaundementes and prohibitions, than is by wordes expressed, which yet is so to bee tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentiously wresting the Scriptures, wee may make of euerie thing what wee list. For many bring to passe by this vnmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authoritie of Scripture groweth in contempt, and other some despeite of vnderstanding it. Therefore if it be possible, wee must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, wee must I say search howe farre our exposition may exceede the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeare that it is not an addition of mens gloses knit to the worde of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the lawgiuer is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commaundementes it is so manifest, that there are figuratiue speeches, meaning more in expressing part than hee may worthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober exposition doeth passe beyonde the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth harde to iudge, vnlesse there bee some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to bee the best measure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in euery commaundement bee weyed, why it was giuen vs. As for example: Euery commaundement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truth of both sortes shall forthwith bee founde, if wee consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the end of the fifth commaundement is, that honour is to bee giuen to them to whome God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commaundement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that we honour them to whome hee hath giuen any excellencie, and that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the first commaundement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commaundement shall bee, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worshippe of his maiestie pleaseth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euery commaundement wee must looke vpon what matter it treateth: then must wee search out the ende, till wee finde what the lawmaker doeth testifie therein properly to please or displease him: & last of all must we drawe an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this displeaseth him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he commaunde this, then he forbiddeth the contrarie, if he forbid this, then he commaunde the contrarie.

9 That which is now some what darkely touched,shal in expounding of the commaundements become very plaine by practice,wherfore it sufficeth to haue touched it,saung that this last point,is to be shortly confirmed with some prooffe therof, because otherwise either it should not be vnderstanded, or being vnderstande, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sounde like an absurdity. This needeth no prooffe, that when a good thing is commaunded, the euill is forbidden that is contrary to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it me. And common iudgement will not much stick to admit, that when euill things are forbidden, the contrarie dueties are commaunded. It is an vniuersal opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrary vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speech do signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrary to any vice, to be the abstaining from y same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrary dueties & doings. Therefore in this commaundement, Thou shalt not kill, the comon sense of men wil consider nothing else, but that wee must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to do hurt. I say that there is further contained, that wee should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I prouie it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or misused, because he willet that our neighbours life be deare & precious vnto vs: he doth therefore require with al those duties of loue y may be done by vs for the preseruatiō of it. And so may wee see how the end of the commaundement doth alway disclose vnto vs al that we are therein commaunded or forbidden to do.

10 But why God, in such as it were halfe commaundementes, hath by figures rather secretly signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reasons rendred therof, this one reason pleaseth me about the rest. Because the flesh alway endeuoreth to extenuate the filthinesse of sinne, & to colour it with faire pretenses, saung where it is euen palpable for grossenes, he hath set foorth for an example in euery kinde of offence that which was most wicked & abhominable, at the hearing whereof our very senses might be moued with horror, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more haynous detesting of euery sort of sinne. This many times deceiueth vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secrete, wee make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when he accustometh vs to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principal heads, which do best of al shew, how much euery kind is abhominable. As for example, wrath & hatred are not thought so haynous euils, when they are called by their own names, but when they are forbidden vs vnder the name of manslaughter, we better vnderstand how abhominable they are before god, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and wee moued by his iudgement, do accustome our selues better to way the haynousnes of those faultes that before seemed but light vnto vs.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will iudge that there is sometime mention made not vnfitly from the purpose, nor without cause.

And wee haue a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this matter. For God so deuided his law into two partes, in which is contained the whole righteoufnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the duties of religion that do peculiarly pertain to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the duties of Charitie which belong vnto men. The first foundation of righteoufnes is the worship of God: which being once ouerthrowē, all the other members of righteoufnes are torne in sunder and dissolued, like to the partes of an house vnioynted and fallen downe. For what maner of righteoufnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robbery & extortions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoylest Gods maiestie of his glory: that thou dehlest not thy body with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God: that thou murderest no man, if thou trauaile to destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteoufnesse is vainly boasted of without religion, and maketh no better shewe, than if a mangled body with the head cut off, should be brought forth for a beautiful sight. And religion is not onely the principall parte of righteoufnes, but also the very soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie & loue among them selues without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteoufnes, because when it is taken away, al the equitie, continence and temperance that men vse among them selues, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the springhead and liuely breath of righteoufnesse, because hereby men do learne to lue among them selues temperately & without hurt doing one to another, if they reuerence God as the iudge of right & wrong. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth vs to godlinesse & the proper duties of religion, wherewith his maiestie is to be worshipped: in the other he prescribeth howe for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Euangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall pointes, the one that we should loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that wee loue our neighbour as our selues. Thus thou seest howe of the two partes wherein he concludeth the whole law, he directeth the one toward God, and appointeth the other toward men.

Mat. 22. 37.
Luk. 10. 27.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principall points, yet, to the ende to take away all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God, to declare in the ten commandements more largely & plainly all things y belong both to the honor, feare & loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie which he commaundeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commaundements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein euery man ought to haue his iudgement free, for which wee ought not contentiously to striue with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, least the readers should either scorne or marueil at the diuision that we shall vse, as newe & lately deuised. That the law is deuided in ten words, because it is oft approued by the authoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controuersie, wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the manner of deuiding. They that so deuide them, that they giue three commaundements to the first table, & put other 7. into the seconde, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it vnder the first: whereas without dout it is feuerally set by the Lord for a commandement, & the tenth commandement of not coueting the thinges of his neighbour, they do fondly teare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to vnderstand, that such manner of deuiding was vnknownen in the purer age. Other do reckon, as we doe, fower feuerall commaundementes in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commandement. As for 11 c, because vnlesse I be conuincd by euident reasō, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandements, me thinks I see so many deuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allowe, that is, that the same which these later sort make the first commandement, shalbe in steede of a preface to the whole lawe, and then shall followe the commandements, foure of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shalbe rehearsed. Augustine also to Boniface agreeth with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God only be serued with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of y^e Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before feuerally spoken of the shadowish commandement of the Sabbat. In an other place in deede that first diuision pleaseth him, but for too sclender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandementes, the mysterie of y^e Trinity more plainly appeareth. Albeit in y^e same place he sticketh not to confesse y^e otherwise he rather liketh our deuision. Besids these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vpon Mathew is of our side. Iosephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table siue commandements. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charity, and also is confuted by the authority of the Lorde himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the commaundement of honouring our parents, in the number of the second table. Nowe let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

The first Commandement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of AEgypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt haue no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a parte of the first commaundement, or reade it feuerally, it is indifferent vnto me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth in steede of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heede to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the maiesty of y^e law that he shal make, may neuer at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of argumentes. First he chalengeth to himselfe power & right of dominion, wherby he may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessity obey him: then he setteth forth a promise of grace with sweetnes therof to allure the to study of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefit that he did for them, to reprove the Jewes of vnthankfulness, if they doe not with obedience answere his kindnes . Vnder the name of Iehouah, the Lord, is meant his authoritic and lawfull dominion. And if all things be of him and doe abide in him , it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith. Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of Gods maiety, because it were monstuous for vs to seeke to withdrawe our selues from vnder his gouernment, out of whome we can not be.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to draw by onely necessity, he also allureth with sweetenesse in pronouncing , that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutual relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to them a God, and they shalbe to me a people. Whereupon Christ proueth that Abraham , Isaac and Iacob haue immorrall life, by this that God testified that he is their God . Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I haue chosē you to be my people, not only to do you good in this present life, but also to giue you the blessednes of the life to come . But to what ende this tendeth, it is noted in diuerse places in y^e law. For when the Lord doth vouchsafe to deale thus mercifully with vs, to cal vs into the company of his people, he choseth vs (saith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people vnto himselfe, a holy people, and should keepe his commandementes. From whence also commeth this exhortation: Be ye holy, for I am holy . Now out of these two is deriued that protestation that is in the Prophet: The sonne honoreth the father, and the seruant honoreth his Lord . If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

15 Now followeth the rehearfall of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to moue vs, as the fault of vnthankfulnes is more detestable euen among men. He then did put Israell in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof being worthy to be had in remembraunce for euer , shoulde remaine in force with their posterity . Moreouer it is most agreeable for this present matter . For the Lord seemeth to say that they were deliuered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, y^e they should with obedience & readines of seruice honour him, the author of their deliuerance. He vseth also, (to the end to hold vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himselfe with certain titles, wherby he maketh his sacred maiesty to be differētly knownen from al idols & forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our ready inclination to vanity, ioyned wth rash boldnes, that so soone as God is named, our mind cannot take heede to it selfe but y^e it by & by falleth away to some vain inuention. Therefore, when y^e Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this mischiefe , he setteth out his own godhead with certain titles & so doth compasse vs in , as it were within certaine grates, least we should wander hither and thither and rashly forge our selues some new God, if forsaking the liuing God, we should erect an idole. For this cause, so oft as y^e Prophets meane properly to point out him, they cloth him , and as it were enclose him , within those markes, wherby he had opened himselfe to the people of Israell . And yet when he is called the God of Abraham , or the God of Israell , when he is set in the temple of

Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these & like formes of speech doe not binde him to one place or to one people, but are set onely for this purpose, to stay the thoughtes of the godly in that God, which by his couenant, that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himself, that it is no way lawfull to vary from such a paterne. But let this remaine stedfastly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliuerance to this ende, that the Iewes might the more cheerefully giue themselues to the God that doth by right claime them vnto him. And we (least wee should thinke that the same nothing belongeth to vs,) ought to consider, that the bondage of Aegypt is a figure of the spirituall captiuitie, wherein we are all holden bound, vntil our heauenly deliuerer do make vs free by the power of his arme, and conuey vs into the kingdome of libertie. As therefore, when in the olde time hee minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intollerable domination of Pharao, wherewith they were oppressed: so all those to whome at this day he professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliuer from the deadly power of the diuel, which was in a shadow signified by that corporal bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his minde ought to be inflamed to harken to the law which he heareth to haue proceeded from the soueraigne king. From whome as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they haue also their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say) but he ought to be rauished to embrace the lawmaker, to the keeping of whose commaundements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortall life: by whose marueilous power & mercy, he knoweth himselfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

16 After that he hath grounded & stablished the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commandement, That we haue no strange Gods before him. The ende of this commandement is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholly enjoy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may so be, he commandeth that there be farre from vs all vngodlinesse & superstition, wherby the glory of his godhead is either diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commaundeth, that wee worship & honour him with true endeuour of godlinesse. And the very simplicite of the words themselues do in a manner expresse the same. For we cannot haue God, but we must also comprehend therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we should not giue away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly they may be brought vnto four principall points: Adoration, wherunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioyned spiritual obedience of conscience: Affiance, Inuocation, & Thanksgiuing. Adoration I call the reuerence & worship which euery one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when hee submitteth himselfe vnto his greatnes: wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part thereof, that we yeld our consciences in subiection to his law. Affiance is an assurednes of resting in him by reknowledging of his powers, when reposing al wisdom, righteousness, power, trueth & goodnes in him, we thinke our selues blessed with only partaking of him. Inuocation, is a resorting of our minde to his faith and help as to our only succour, so oft as any necessity presseth vs. Thankesgiuing is a certaine thankfulness whereby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God suffereth nothing to be conueyed away else where, so he commaunded all to be wholly giuen to himselfe. Neither shall it be enough to abstaine from hauing any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy selfe in this, that many wicked contentners are wont, which thinke the readiest waye, to scorne all religions: but true religion must goe before, whereby our mindes may be dyrected to the liuing God, with knowledge whereof they beeing endued may aspire to reuerence, feare and worship his maiesty, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, euery where to seeke for his help, to reknowledge and aduaunce with confession of praise the magnificence of his workes, as to the only marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swauing from the true God, are drawen hither and thither as it were vnto diuerse gods. Wherefore, if we be contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before said, that all forged gods are to be driuen farre away, and that the worship is not be torne in sunder, which he alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glory, be it neuer so litle, but that all things that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The parcell of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hainousnes. for that God is prouoked to ielousie, so oft as we thrust our owne inuentions in his place, as if an vnchast woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes should the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power & grace he looked vpon the people that he had chosē, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giueth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is witnes & beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is encreased with much wickednes, that man thinketh that in his flynges away he can begile the eyes of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer we purpose, whatsoeuer we goe about, whatsoeuer we practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience be cleane euen from the most secret thoughtes of swauinge from him, if we will haue our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glory of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not only in outward confession, but also in his eyes, which do behold the most secret corners of hearts.

The second Commaundement.

Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heauen above, or in earth beneath, or in the waters vnder the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serue them.

As in the first commaundement be pronounced that he is the one God beside whom there are no other gods to be deuised or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kinde of worship he is to be honoured: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The end therefore of this commaundement is, that hee will not haue haue the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is wont to inuent, when it conceiueth God according to her owne grossness. And therefore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worshippe, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of the grossest fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there be two partes of this commandment. The first restrayneth our liberty, that we do not presume to make subiect to our senses or by any forme to represent God, which is incōprehensible. The second part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions sake. Moreover he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, and peradventure also birdes, as expressing his meaning in y^e fourth of Deuteronomy he meaneth as well birdes as stars. Which note I would not haue spoken of but that I sawe some vnskillfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other partes, because they are sufficiently knowen of themselues. And we haue already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible formes of God man doth inuent, they are directly contrary to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come foorth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

Deu. 4. 15.

18 The penal ordinance that foloweth ought not a litle to auaille to shake of our slouthfulness. For he threatneth: That he is the Lorde our God, a ielous God, that visiteth the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation, in them that hate his name, & sheweth mercy vnto thousandes to them that loue him and keepe his commandments. This is asmuch in effect, as if he should haue sayde, that it is he onely vpon whome we ought to sticke. And to bring vs thereunto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contemned or diminished. Here is in deede set the name El, which significth God. But because it is deriued of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himselfe ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly he affirmeth that he wil be a reuenger of his maiesty & glory if any do transerre it to creatures or to grauen images, and that not with a short or slender reuenge, but such as shal extend to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is such as shalbe followers of their fathers vngodlinesse: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercy and bountifulnesse vnto long continuance of posterity, to those that loue him and keepe his lawe. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the person of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiueth vs into the bosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stande by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the duties of a faithful and true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such loue and chastitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeelde not our soules to Satan, to lust, & to filthy desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throwe away chastitie, and were defiled with adulteries . Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaste that he himselfe is , the more is he kindled to anger if he see his wiues minde encline to a strange loue: so the Lorde that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in trueth, testifieth that he hath a most feruently burning ialousie, so oft as neglecting the purenesse of his holy mariage, wee are defiled with wicked lustes , but specially then when we transerre to any other , or doe infect with any superstition the worshippe of his name , which ought to bee most vncorrupted: Forasmuch as by this meane we do not only breake the faith giuen in wedlocke, but also do defile the very wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threatening is to be scene what he meaneth by this , when he saith, that he will visite the iniquity of the fathers vpon y^e children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equity of Gods iustice, to punish the innocent for an others offence. God himselfe also saith , that he will not make the sonne to beare the wickednesse of the father. But this sentence is more then once repeated, of prolonging the punishment of the sins of the auncesters vpon the generations to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that rendrest the iniquity of the fathers to y^e children, vnto the third & fourth generation. Likewise Jeremy: Thou y^e shewest mercy in thousands, that rendrest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them . Many, while they trauaile much in losing this knot , thinke that it is to be vnderstanded only of temporall punishmentes, which if the children suffer for the parents faults, it is no absurdity, forasmuch as they are oftentimes layed vpon them for their saluation, which is in deede true. For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonnes should be spoyled of the kingdome, and caried into exile for the sin that he had committed. The houses of Pharao and Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But whē that is alleged for assoiling of this question, it is rather a shifte than a true exposition. For here & in like places he threatneth a more greuous reuenge than y^e it may be limited within the boundes of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that y^e iust curse of the Lorde, lieth not only vpon the head of the wicked man himselfe , but also vpon his whole family : when the curse once lieth vpon them , what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, liue most wickedly, and the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lorde for the fathers fault , do follow the same way of destruction : and finally , the chilles child, and the child of the chilles childe, the cursed seede of detestable men do fall headlong after them ?

20 First let vs see, whether such reuenge be vnseemly for y^e iustice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know y^e destruction is prepared for them , to whom y^e lord vouchsafeth not to communicate his grace . Neuertheles they do perish by their own vnrighteousnes, & not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarell, why they be not holpē by y^e grace of God to saluatiō as other are. Whereas therefore this punishment is laid vpon wicked men and euil doers for their offences, y^e their houses be depriued of y^e grace of God during many generatiōs: who can accuse god for this most iust reuenge? But the Lord on the other side pronounceth, y^e the punishment of the fathers sinne shall not passe ouer vnto the sonne. Note what is there intreated off. When the Israelites had beene long and continually vexed with manie calamities, they began to vse for a Prouerbe, that their fathers had eaten a sower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deseruing it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeaseable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate seueritie. The Prophete pronounceth vnto them that it is not so: because they are punished for their owne offences, and that it standeth not with the iustice of God, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the Visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lorde taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his truth and other helpes of saluation: in this that the children being blinded and forsaken of him, doe go on in the steps of their fathers, they susteyne curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, and at last to eternall destruction, herein they are punished by the iust iudgement of God, not for the sinnes of other, but for their owne iniquitie.

21 On the otherside is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemne couenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hauing respect vnto, writeth that the children of the righteous shall be blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also not a little auaieth therevnto, but also for that blessing promised in the couenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Herevpon groweth great comfort to the faithfull, great terrour to the wicked. For if euen after death, the remembrance both of righteousnes and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posteritie, much more shall it light and rest vpon the heads of the doers themselues. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times commeth to good prooffe, and the issue of the faithfull swarveth out of kinde: because the lawmaker meant not here to stablish such a perpetual rule as should derogate his fre election. For it sufficeth for y comfort of the righteous and for the terrour of the sinner, that the penaltie is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For as the temporall punishments that are laide vpon a fewe wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the iudgement that shall one day be giuen vpon all sinners, although many escape vnpunished euen to y end of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifulesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a prooffe of his constant and perpetuall fauour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, hee sheweth what iudgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which assurednesse hee had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largenesse of his mercie, which hee extendeth vnto a thousande generations, whereas hee assigned but onely lower generations to vengeance.

The thirde commaundement.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

The ende of this commaundement is, that his will is to haue the maiestie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the summe shall bee that wee doe not defile it with contemptuously and irreuerently vsing it. With which prohibition the commaundement hangeth orderly together, that we take studie and care godlyly to reuerence it. Therefore wee ought so to order our selues both in our mindes and our tongues, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but reuerently and with much sobrietie: that in weying his workes, wee conceiue nothing but honorable towarde him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that what soeuer our minde conceiueth of him, whatsoeuer our tongue vttereth, it may sauiour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may serue to aduance his magnificence. That wee doe not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy worde and reuerende mysteries either to ambition, or to couetousnesse, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepe their honour and estimation among vs. Last of all, that wee doe not carpe against or speake euill of his workes, as these wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully against them: but that whatsoeuer wee rehearse done by him, wee reporte it with wordes of praise of his wisdom, righteousnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is defiled with vaine & peruerse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right vse wherevnto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by litle and litle brought to contempt. Now, if there bee so much euill in this rash readinesse to vse the name of God out of season, much more mischeefe is in this, if it bee employed to euill vses, as they doe that make it to serue the superstitions of Necromancie, cruell execrations, vnlawfull coniurations, and other wicked enchauntementes. But swearing is cheeflie mentioned in the commaundement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby we may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commaundement giuen of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the trueth and equitie that is to be kepte among men, appeareth by that that he afterwarde in the second table condemneth periurie and false witnessse, whereby hurte is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repeate it againe, if this commaundement intreated of the dutie of charitie. And also the diuision of the lawe it selfe requireth it, because as it is saide, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his law, whereby is gathered that in this commaundement he challengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holines of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

23 First is to be learned what is an othe. It is a taking of God to witnesse, to confirme the truth of that which we speake. For those cursed speeches that containe manifest reproches against God, are vnworthy to bee reckoned among othes. That such taking to witnesse, when it is rightly done, is a kinde of worshipping of God, is shewed in diuerse places of the Scripture. As when Esay prophecieth of the calling of the Assyrians and Ægyptians into fellowship of the couenant with Israel, They shall speake (saith hee) in the tongue of Chanaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lord That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shal yeeld a confession of his religion. Again when he speaketh of the enlargement of his kingdome, he saith: Whosoever shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithfull: and he that shall sweare in the land shal sweare in the true God. Ieremy saith, If they shall teache the people to sweare in my name as they haue taught them to sweare by Baal, they shal bee builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is saide, that when we call vpon the name of y Lord to witnesse, we doe witnesse our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall and vnchangeable trueth, whom wee call vpon, not onely as a most substantiall witnesse of truth aboue all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring foorth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of heartes. For where testimonies of men do faile, there we flee to God for witnesse, specially where any thing is to be proued that lieth secrete in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angry with them that sweare by strange gods, and he iudgeth that maner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue forsaken me, and do sweare by them that are no gods. And he declareth the hainousnesse of this offence by threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of y Lord, & sweare by Melchan.

24 Now when we vnderstand that it is the Lords will that there bee in our othes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent heede is to be taken, that in stead of worshipping they do not containe dishonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no small dishonour, when periurie is committed in swearing by him, wherfore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to y Lorde when he is spoiled of his truth: he shall then cease to be God. But truly he is spoiled therof, when he is made an affirmer & approouer of falthod. Wherfore, when Iosua minded to driue Achan to confesse y truth, he said: My Sonne, giue glorie to the Lord of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lord is grieuously dishonored if a man sweare falsly by him. And no maruel. For we do as much as in vs lieth, in a maner, to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this maner of speech was vsed among the Iewes so oft as any was called to take an oth, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospel of Iohn. To this heedfulnes the formes of othes that are vsed in the Scriptures do instruct vs: The Lord lieth, The Lord do these things vnto me, and adde these things, The Lord bee witnesse vpon my soule. Which do prouee, that we can not call God for witnesse of our sayings, but that we also wish him to take vengeance of our periurie, if we speak deceitfully.

in superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsly, valesse we doe also remember, that swearing was suffered and ordeined not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull vse thereof, that applie it to things not necessaric. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serue either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offend, & so much the more intollerably, for that by very custom it hath ceased to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the iudgement seate of God is not slenderly weyed. For euery where without regard, the name of God is defiled in trifling talkes, and it is not thought that they doe euill, because by long suffered and vnpunished boldnesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednesse. But the commandement of the Lord remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall reuenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commaundement is also transgressed in an other point, that in our othes we put the holy seruants of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodlinesse, for so we transferre the glorie of his godhead to them. Neither is it without cause, that the Lord hath giuen a speciall commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we should not bee heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing doe call vpon a hier than themselues, and that God which had none greater than his owne glorie to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, sweare not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoeuer is more than this, is of euill. But by this meane, they doe without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his father, and as if he had come downe from heauen to repeale his fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the law permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were ynough: but also in necessitie doeth command it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father: that hee bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commanded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterward forbidde and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commaunding it? But because there is some difficultie in the words of Christ, let vs a litle weye them. But herein we shall neuer attaine the truth, vnlesse wee bende our eyes vnto the entent of Christ, and take heede vnto the purpose that hee there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restraine the law, but to reduce it to the true and naturall vnderstanding, which had bene very much depraued by the false gloses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we hold in minde, we shall not thinke that Christ did vterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which do transgresse the rule of the law. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no maner of swearing ring but periuries, whereas the law doth not only forbid periuries, but also al idle and superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expositor of the lawe, doeth admonish them, that it is not onely euill to forswear, but also to sweare. But howe to sweare in vaine. But as for these othes that are commended in the law, he leaueth them safe and at libertie. They seme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest holde of this word At all, which yet is not referred to the word Sweare, but to y^e formes of swearing that are after reheased. For this was also part of their error, that when they did sweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of G O D. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence againste this commaundement, the Lorde doeth also cut of from them all byeshiftes that they shoulde not thinke that they haue escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witnesse. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet men by indirect formes doe sweare by him, as if they sweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme or other tokens of Gods liberalitie towarde them. Neither doth Christ in that place where hee forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophisticall suttelty, which thought it no fault babblingly to throwe out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benefites. But otherwise it is, where eyther a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deuised that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the king: for then the false making of Gods doeth obscure and minishe the glorie of the one onely G O D. But when wee meane onely, to procure credite to our saying by the holy name of God, although the same bee indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his maiestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentioufnesse, all pretense of excuse, in this that hee forbiddeth to sweare at all. And Iames tendeth to the same purpose, reciting the same wordes of Christ which I haue before alleaged, because the same rashe boldnesse hath alwayes bene in the Mat. 5. 34. worlde, which is a prophane misusing of the name of G O D. For if yee referre this worde, At all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare: wherefore serueth that exposition which is added afterward: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it sufficiently appeareth that those cauillations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excused.

27 Therefore it cannot nowe be doubtfull to sounde iudgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprocue those othes that were forbidden by the lawe. For he himselfe which shewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that he taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his disciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their maister in all things, followed the same example: who dare say that Paul woulde haue sworne, if swearing had bene vterly forbidden? but when the matter so required, he sware without any sticking at it, yea sometime adding an execration. But this question is not yet ended, because some do thinke y^e onely pub-

publike othes are excepted out of this prohibition, as those othes that we take when the Magistrate doeth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vse to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegiance to their Prince, or the Souldiar when he is put to an othe for his true seruice in the warre, and such like. And to this sorte they adioyne, and that rightfully, such othes, as are in Paul, to confirme the dignitie of the Gospell, for asmuch as the Apostles in their office are not priuate men but publike ministers of God. And truely I deny not that those are the safest othes, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commaunded in a doubtfull case to driue the witnesse to an othe, and hee on the other side to aunswere by othe: and the Apostle saith, that mens controuersies are by this meane ended. In this commaundement both these haue a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea and we may note, that among the old heathen men, y^e publike and solemne othe was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were vsually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or verie little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the maiestic of God at all. But yet it were too much daungerous to condemne priuate othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holily, & reuerently taken, which are maintained both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for priuate men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as iudge betweene them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endeourest to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and hee by no meanes will suffer himselfe to bee satisfied. If thy good name come in perill by his obstinate malicioufnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the iudgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie known. Now if the weight of the wordes be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case wee shoude affirme, that the calling him to witnesse is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech bee saide not to serue for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Iacob and Laban were priuate men, which stablished a couenaunt with mutuall othe betweene themselues. Booz was a priuate man, which by the same meane confirmed his promise of mariage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate mā, a iust man & fearing God, which affirmed vnto Elias by oth, the thing y^e he meant to perswade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that othes be so tempered, y^e they be not vnaduised, y^e they be not common without regard, that they be not vsed of raging luste, nor trifling, but that they serue iust necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commaundement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commaundement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Sabbath day. Sixe dayes shalt thou worke & doe all thy workes. But on the seuensh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no worke. &c.

1. Re. 18. 10.

28 The ende of this commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, should bee busied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to y^e same meditation should bee exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordeined. But because this commandement hath a peculiar and seuerall consideration from the rest, therefore it must haue also a seuerall maner of exposition. The olde writers vse to call it a shadowish commandement, for that it containeth the outward obseruatiō of the day, which by the coming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I graunt they say truely, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it farther of. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commaundement consisteth. For first the heauenly lawemaker meant vnder the rest of the seuenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel y^e spiritual rest, whereby the faithful ought to cease from their owne works, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondly, his wil was to haue one appointed day, wherein they shoulde meete together to heare the lawe, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlinesse. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest graunted to seruantes, and such as liued vnder the gouernement of other, wherein they might haue some ceasing from their labour.

29 But we are many wayes taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principall point in the Sabbat. For the Lorde required the keeping of no commaundement in a maner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is ouerthrowen, the he complaineth that his Sabbates are polluted, defiled, not kept, not sanctified: as though that peece of seruice being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honored. He did set forth the obseruing thereof with his prayes. For which cause the faithful did among other oracles maruellously esteeme the reueiling of the Sabbat. For in Nehemiah thus spake y^e Levites in a solemne conuocation, Thou hast shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbat, and hast giuen them the commaundementes and the ceremonies, and the lawe by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commaundements of the lawe. All which things doe serue to set forth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus. See that ye keepe my Sabbat day, because it is a token betweene me and you in your generations: that you may knowe that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabbat & celebrate it in their generations, it is an euerlasting couenant betweene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetual token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel shoulde knowe that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne wil, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne wil, we must resigne vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh.

Finally, we must cease from all the doings of our owne wit, that wee may haue God working in vs, y we may rest in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

Esa. 66. 23.

30 This perpetuall ceassing was represented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be obserued with greater deuotion, the Lord commaunded with his owne example. For it auaieth not a litle to stirre vp mans endeouour, that he may knowe that hee tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: Forasmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifie euerlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his workes, maketh an end of describing the succeeding of daies and nightes. There may bee also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shewe that the Sabbat should neuer be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we beginne our blessed rest, in it we doe daily proceede in profiting more and more. But because we haue still a continual warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntil that saying of Esaie be fulfilled, concerning y continuing of new Moone with new Moone, of Sabbat with Sabbat, euen then when God shall be all in all. It may seeme therefore that the Lord hath by the seuenth day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbat at the last day, that our whole life might by continual meditation of the Sabbat, aspire to this perfection.

1. Cor. 15. 28

31 If any man mislike this obseruation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lord ordeined one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the schooling of the law be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spirituall rest: And that he assigned the seuenth day, either because he thought it sufficient, or that by setting forth the likenesse of his owne example, he might y better moue the people to keepe it or at least to put them in minde, that the Sabbat tended to no other end, but that they should become like vnto their creatour. For it maketh small matter, so that the mysterie remaine which is therein principally set forth, concerning y perpetual rest of our workes. To consideration whereof the Prophetes did now and then call backe the Iewes that they should not thinke them selues discharged by carnall taking of their rest. Beside the places already alleaged, you haue thus in Esaie: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbat, that thou do not thine owne will in my holy day, and shalt call the Sabbat delicate and holy of the glorious Lorde, and shalt glorifie him while thou doest not thine owne wayes, & seekest not thine owne wil to speake y word, then shalt thou be delited in y Lord, &c. But it is no dout, that by the comming of our Lord Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures doe vanishe away: hee is the bodie at sight whereof the shadowes are left. He, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbat, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, wee may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in an other place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbat was a shadowe of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to say, the perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, vntill that we being vtterly dead to our selues, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious obseruing of dayes ought to be farre from Christians.

32 But forasmuch as the two later causes ought not to be reckened among the olde shadowes, but do belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbath is abrogate, yct this hath stil place with vs, that we should meete at appointed dayes to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mystical bread, and to publike prayer: and then, that to seruants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commaunding the Sabbath, the Lorde had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely vse of the Iewes to proue it. The second, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man seruant and thy maide seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Egypt. Againe in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Assc may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can deny that both these things doe serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commaunded vs by the worde of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knowen in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed and haue their ordinarie dayes, how can they be kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it of, that comlineffe & order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it be dissolued. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releefe whereof the Lorde appointed the Sabbath to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to prouide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt saye, why doe wee not rather daily meete together, that the difference of dayes may be taken away? I would to God, that were graunted, and truely spirituall wisdom was a thing worthy to haue daily a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot be obtained of the weakenesse of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see layed vpon vs by the will of God?

33 I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirites do raise trouble, concerning the Sunday. They erie out that the Christian people are nourished in Iewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of dayes. But I answer, that wee keepe those dayes without any Iewishnesse, because we do in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For we keepe it not with streight religion as a ceremonie, whercin we think a spiritual mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessary remedie to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be iudged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galathians, because they did still obserue dayes. And to the Romanes he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betweene day reuerence very nature ought in a manner to instruct vs. For they are monsters and not men, that breake the authoritie of parentes with dishonour or stubburnesse. Therefore the Lord commanded all the disobedient to their parentes, to be slaine, as men vnworthy to enioy the benefit of light, that doe not reknowledge by whose meanes they came into it. And by many additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reuerence, Obedience, and Thankfulness. The first of these the Lorde establisheth when hee commaundeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The seconde he confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the fiftenth of Matthew, that it is the commandement of God that we doe good to our parentes. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, he expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

38 Moreouer, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reuerence as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse hangeth ouer the stubborn and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: he pronounceth them by his lawe subiect to the iudgment of death, and comāndeth them to be put to execution: and if they escape that iudgement, he himselfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see howe great a number of that sort of men are slaine in battailes & in frayes, and some other tormented in strange vnaccustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a prooffe that this threatning is not vaine. But if any escape to olde age, sith in this life being deprived of the blessing of God, they do nothing but miserably languish, and are referued for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children. But this is also by the way to be noted, that wee are not commaunded to obey them but in the Lorde. And that is euident by the foundation before layed: for they sit on hie in that place whereunto the Lorde hath aduanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his hōnour. Therefore the submission that is vsed toward them, ought to be a steppe towards the honouring of that soueraigne Father. Wherefore, if they moue vs to transgress the lawe, then are they worthily not to bee accounted parents, but strangers that labour to withdraw vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lordes, and all sortes of superiours. For it is shamefull and against conuenience of reason, that their preeminence shoulde preuaile to presse downe his highnesse, sith theirs as it hangeth wholly vpon it, so ought onely to guide vs vnto it.

Thou shalt not kill.

39 The ende of this commaundement is, that forasmuch as God hath bounde together all mankind with a certeine vnitie, that euery man ought to regarde the safetic of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge. In sunime therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commaunded, if there be any power of succour in our trauaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that wee procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them frō hurt, and if they be in any danger, that we giue them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so saith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a sonde thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughtes of the heart, and principally resteth vpon them, should instuct nothing but the body to true righteousness. Therefore the manslaughter of the heart is also forbidden in this lawe, and an inward affection to preserue our brothers life is here giuen in commaundement. The hand in deede bringeth forth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiueth it, when it is infected with wrath & hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without burning in desire to do him hurte. If thou canst not be angrie with him, then canst thou not hate him, for asmuch as hatred is nothing but an olde rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurte. If thou most part of men are subiect to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subiect vnto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth al to y only remedy, wherwith vnchastity is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to heple their infirmity by this meane, they sinne euen in this that they obey not the cōmandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vnchastity, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardely with lust. For Paul defineth chastity to be a cleannes of the minde, ioyned with chastity of y body. A woman vnmarried (saith he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as she is holy both in body & in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commandement, he doth not onely say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe, with company of a harlot, but he sayth, that it is better to marry than to burne.

1. Cor. 6, 24.

Amb. lib. de
phil.

44 Now if married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are therby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust: For though the honesty of mariage do couer the filthines of incontinencie, yet it ought not forthwith to be prouocatiō thereof. Wherefore let not married folkes thinke, that all thinges are lawful vnto them, but let euery husband haue his owne wife soberly, and likewise the wife her husband, and so doing, let them committe nothing vnbecoming the honesty and temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrayned to measure and modesty, & not to ouerflow into euery kind of extreeme lasciuiousnes. This wantonnes Ambrose reproveth with a saying very fore in deede, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth y husband, the adulterer of his own wife, which in vse of wedlock hath no care of shamefastnes or honesty. Last of all, let vs consider what lawmaker doth here condemne fornication, euen he which sith of his own right he ought to possess vs wholly, requireth purenesse of the soule, spirit and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of body, with vncleane gestures, and with filthy talke to lay waite to trap an others chastity. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboute measure wantonly & deintely clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchast: if we haue a regard vnto God y abhorreth al filthines in whatsoeuer part either of our soul or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of dout, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastity. If the Lord require chastity of vs, then he condemneth all that euer is against it. Therefore if thou couet to shewe obedience, neither let thy minde burne inwardly with euill lust, nor lette thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurements, nor let thy tongue with filthy talke entise thy minde to like thoughtes, nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blottes, wherewith the purenesse of chastity is bespotted.

The eight Commandement.

Thou shalt not steale.

45 The end of this cōmandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteousnes

ousnesse, that euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The summe therefore shall be, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goods, and that therefore we are commanded euery man to employ his faithfull trauaile to preserue to each man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke that what euery man possesseth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the distribution of the soueraigne Lord of all things, and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by euil meanes, but that wrong be done to the disposition of God. But of thestes there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, when the goods of an other are by any manner of force and robbing licentiousnes bereaued. The other kinde consisteth in malicious deceite, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other sorte there is that standeth in a more hidden sutletie, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other sort in flatterie, where they are sucked away by pretence of gift. But least wee should tarie too long vppon renting of all the seuerall kindes of theft, lette vs knowe, that all craftie meanes whereby the possessions and money of our neighbours are conueied vnto vs, when they once goby crooked waies from syncerenes of heart, to a desire to beguile, or by any meane to do hurt, are to bee accounted for thestes. Although by pleading the law, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwise wey them. For hee seeth the long captious sutleties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simpler minde, till at length he drawe him into his nettes. He seeth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth downe the weaker. He seeth y^e allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh thee vnware. All which things are hidden from the iudgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in monie, in wares, or in landes, but in euery mans right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him those dueties which we are bound to do for him. If any idle facter or Baylie doe deuoure his masters substance, and is not heedfull to the care of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully spoile, or do riotously wast the substance committed vnto him, if a seruant doe mocke his master, if he disclose his secretes by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe if the Lord doe cruelly oppresse his household, they are before God guiltie of theft. For he both withholdeth and conueieth an other mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

46 We shal therefore rightly obey this commaundement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seeke to get no gaine but honest & lawfull, if we couet not to wax rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighbour of his goodes that our owne substance may encrease, if wee labour not to heape vp cruel riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together euery way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigalitie satisfied. But on y^e other side, let this bee our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsel and helpe to keepe their owne so farre as we may: but if we haue to do with false and deceitfull men, lette vs rather be ready to yeelde vp some of our owne, then to striue with them. And not that only, but let vs communicate to their necessities, and with our store releiue their neede, whom we see to be oppressed with hard & poore estate. Finally, let euery man looke how much he is by duetic bounde vnto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason let the people haue in honor all those that are set ouer them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commandements, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keeping God fauourable vnto the. Againe, let them take care of their people, preserue common peace, defend the good, restraîne the euil, and so order all things, as ready to giue account of their office to the soueraigne iudge. Let the Ministers of Churches faithfully applie their ministerie, and not corrupt the doctrine of saluation, but deliuer it pure and syncre to the people of God, and let them instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let them so be ouer them, as good shepheardes be ouer the sheepe. Let the people likewise receiue them for the messengers and Apostles of God, giue them that honor wherof the hiest maister hath vouchsafed them, and minister vnto them such thinges as are necessarie for their life. Let parentes take on them to feede, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, & grieue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cherish & embrace them with such lenitie and tendernesse, as becommeth their person. After which manner, we haue already said, that children owe to their parentes their obedience. Let yong men reuerence olde age, euen as y Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also gouerne the weakenes of youth with their wisdome and experience, wherein they excell yong men, not rating with rough & loude brawling, but tempering seueritie with mildnesse and gentlenesse. Let seruantes shewe themselues diligent and seruifable to obey: and that not to the eye, but from the heart, as seruing God himselfe. Also let maisters shewe themselues not testie and hard to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpnesse, nor reprochfully vse them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellowe seruantes vnder the heauenly Lorde, whom they ought mutually to loue and gently to intreate. After this manner, I say, let euery man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreouer our minde ought alwayes to haue respect to the lawmaker, that we may knowe that this lawe is made as well for our mindes, as for our handes, that men should studie to defend and further the commodities and profite of other.

Thou shalt not be a lying witness against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commandement is, that because God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to obserue trueth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall bee, that wee neither hurt any mans name eyther with slaunders or false reportes, nor hinder him in his goodes by lying: finally that wee offende no man, by lust to speake euill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is ioyned a conmaundement, that so farre as wee may, wee employ our faithfull endeuour for euery man in affirming the trueth,

to defende the safetie both of his name and goodes. It seemeth that y^e Lord purposed to expounde the meaning of his commaundement in the three & twentie Chapter of Exodus, in these wordes: Thou shalt not vse the voice of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hande to speake false witnessse for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in an other place hee doeth not onely call vs away from lying in this point that we bee no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceiue his brother, for hee forbiddeth them both in severall commaundements. Truly it is no doubt, but that as in the commaundements before, he hath forbidden crueltie, vnchastitie and couetousnesse, so in this he restraineth falshood. Whereof there are two partes as we haue noted before. For either wee offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backbite, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking wee hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be vnderstanded soleme and iudiciall testimonie, or comon testimonie that is vsed in priuate talkes. For wee must alwayes haue recourse to this principle, that of all the generall kindes of vices one speciall sort is set for an example, wherunto the rest may bee referred, and that that is cheefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the faulte is moste apparant. Albeit, it were conuenient to extende it more generally to slaunders and sinister backbitinges wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully greued, for that falsehoolde of witnesssing which is vsed in iudiciall courtes, is neuer without periurie. But periuries insomuch as they doe prophane and defile the name of God, are already sufficiently mette withall in the third commaundement. Wherefore the right vse of this commaundement is, that our tongue in affirming the truth doe serue both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name bee more pretious than any treasures, whatsoeuer they bee: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to bee spoyled of the goodnesse of his name than of his goods. And in bereauing his substance sometime false witnessse doeth as much as violence of handes.

Leui. 19. 15.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent carelesnesse men do commonly offende in this point, so that there are founde verie few that are not notably sicke of this disease: wee are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweetnesse both in searching out and in disclosing the euilles of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lie not. For he y^e forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willethe also y^e it be preferued vntouched so far as the truth will suffer. For howsoeuer he taketh heede to himselfe only, so that he tell no lie, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, y^e God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill speaking is vtterly condemned. But wee meane not by euill speaking, that rebuking which is vsed for chastisement: nor accusation, or iudiciall processe, whereby remedie is sought for an euill, nor publike reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safety it behooueth y^e they should be forwarned least they should be in danger by ignorance: but we meane only hateful accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnesse & of a wantō wil to backbite.

Also

Also this commaundement is extended to this point, that wee couet not to vse a scoffing kinde of a pleasauntnesse, but mingled with bitter tauntes, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faultes vnder pretence of pastime, as many doe that seeke praise of merie conceites with other mens shame yea and grieffe: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a little reproched. Nowe if wee bende our eyes to the lawmaker, which must according to his rightfull authoritie beare rule no lesse ouer the eares and minde than ouer the tongue: truely wee shall finde that greedinesse to heare backbitings, and a hastie readinesse to euill iudgements are no lesse forbidden. For it were verie fonde if a man shoulde thinke y God hateth the faulte of euill speaking in the tongue, and doeth not disallow the fault of euill malicioufnesse in the heart. Wherefore if there bee in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs indeuour so farre as wee may and as is expedient, and as charitie beareth, that wee giue neither our tongue, nor our eares to euill speakings, and bitter iestings, least wee rashly without cause yelde our mindes to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expositorous of all mens sayings and doings, let vs both in iudgement, eares, & tongue gently preferue their honour safe.

The tenth Commaundement.

49 The end of this commaundement is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule be wholly possessed with the affection of loue: all lust is to bee shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may moue our mindes with a concupiscence hurtfull and turning towarde an others losse: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commaundement, that whatsoeuer wee conceiue, purpose, will or studie vppon, bee ioyned with the benefite and commoditie of our neighbours. But here, as it seemeth, ariseth a harde and combersome difficultie. For if it bee truely saide of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are contained the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes shoulde afterwarde be seuerally forbidden vs. But the distinction betwene purpose and coueting, will easily lose vs this knot. For purpose (as wee haue meant in speaking of it in the other commaundementes before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but coueting may bee without any such either aduisement or assent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and peruerse obiectes. As therefore the Lorde hath heretofore commaunded, that the rule of charitie shoulde gouerne our willes, studies, and workes: so hee now commaunderth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde another way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robbetrie, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be moued therunto.

50 And not without cause doth he require so great vprightnesse. For who

who can denie that it is righteous, that all the powers of the soule be possessed with charitie? But if any of them do swarue from the marke of charitie, who can denie that it is diseased? Nowe whence commeth it that so many desires hurtfull to thy neighbour, doe enter into thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest onely for thy selfe? For if thy mind were altogether throughly foked with charitie, no part thereof should be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needs be void of charitie, so far as it receiueth concupiscence. But some man wil obiect, that yet it is not meete that fantasies that are without order tossed in mans wit, and at length do vanishe away, should be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the heart. I answere that here our question is of that kinde of fantasies, which while they are present before our mindes, doe together bite and strike our heart with desire, forasmuch as it neuer commeth in our minde, to wishe for any thing, but that our heart is stirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commadeth a maruelous feruentnes of loue which he willeth not to be entangled with neuer so smal snares of concupiscence. He requireth a maruelously framed minde, which he suffreth not so much as wth slight prouocations to be any thing stirred against the law of loue. To this expositiō Augustine did first open me y^e way: because thou shouldest not think y^e it is without consent of some graue authoritie. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs al wrongful coueting: yet in rehearsing y^e same, he hath brought forth for example those things that most commonly do deceiue vs with a false image of delight: because he would leaue nothing to concupiscence when he draweth it from these things, vpon the which it most of al rageth and triumpheth. Loc, here is the second Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what wee owe to men for Gods sake, vpon consideration whereof hangeth the rule of charitie. Wherefore you shall but vainely call vpon those duties that are contained in this Table, vnlesse your doctrine do stay vpon the feare and reuerence of God, as vpon her foundation. As for them which seeke for two commandments, in the prohibition of coueting, y^e wise reader, though I say nothing, will iudge that by wrong diuision, they teare in sunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing against vs, that this worde, Thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after y^e he had first set the house, then he renteth the partes thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainly appeareth, that (as the Hebrues do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that all that euery man possesseth, should remaine safe and vntouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraude them, but also from the very least desire that may moue our mindes.

51 But now to what ende the whole lawe tendeth, it shall not be hard to iudge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteousness, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deedes that which is there commanded, he shall in a manner expresse an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses meant to bring the summe thereof into the mindes of the Israelites, he said: And nowe Israel, what doth the Lorde thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and walke in his wayes: sione him and serue him in all thy heart, and in all thy soule, and keepe his commandements? And he ceased not still to sing the same song againe vnto them, so oft as he purposed to shewe the end of the lawe. The doctrine of the lawe hath such respect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moses in another place termeth it, maketh man to sticke fast to his God in holinesse of life. Nowe the perfection of that holinesse consisteth in the two principall points already rehearsed, That we loue y^e Lord God with al our heart, all our soule, and all our strength, and our neighbour as our selues. And the first indeede is, that our soule be in all parts filled with the loue of G O D. From that by and by of it selfe foorth floweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apostle sheweth when he writeth, that the end of the law is Loue out of a pure conscience, and a faith not fained. You see howe, as it were, in the head is set conscience and faith vnfained, that is to say in one word true godlinesse, and that from thence is charitie deriued. Therefore he is deceiued, whosoeuer thinketh that in the lawe are taught onely certaine rudimentes and first Introductions of righteousnesse, wherewith men became to be taught their first schooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good workes: whereas beyond that sentence of Moses, and this of Paule, you can desire nothing as wanting of the highest perfection. For howe farre, I pray you, will hee proceede that will not bee contented with this institution, whereby man is instructed to the feare of G O D, to spirituall worshipping, to obeying of the commaundementes, to follow the vprightnes of the way of the Lord: finally to purenesse of conscience, syncere faith and loue? Wherby is confirmed that exposition of the law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commandements thereof all the duties of godlinesse and loue. For they that followe onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods wil, knowe not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52 But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the law, Christ and the Apostle do sometime leaue out the first Table: many are deceiued therein while they would faine draw their words to both y^e Tables. Christ in Matthew calleth the chiefe points of the law, mercie, iudgement and faith: vnder y^e word Faith, it is not doubtful to me, but that he meaneth truth or vnfaithfulnesse toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole law, take it for religiousnes toward God. But they labour in vaine. For Christ speaketh of those works wherewith man ought to proue himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also cease to maruell why, when a yong man asked him what be the commandementes by keeping whereof we enter into life: he answered these things onely: Thou shalt not kil. Thou shalt not cōmit adultery. Thou shalt not steale. Thou shalt beare no false witnes. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually vse. But the workes of charitie are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousnesse. But this commeth eche where so oft in the prophets, that it must needs bee familiar to a reader, but meanelly exercised in them, For in a maner alway, whē they they exhort to repentance, they leaue out the first Table, and onely call vpon faith, Iudgement, Mercy and Equity. And thus they do not ouerskip the feare of God; but they enquire the earnest profe thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowne, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they do for the most part rest vpon the second Table, because therein the study of righteousnes & vprighnes is most openly scene. It is needles to rehearse y^e places; because euery man wil of himselfe easily mark y^e which Isay. ⁵³ But thou wilt say, is it then more anaileable to the perfection of righteousness, to liue innocently among men, than w^{ith} true godlines to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily kepe charity in all pointes, vnles he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby proued, that he hath godline also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifie by y^e Prophet: therefore he requireth not our duties to himselfe, but doth exercise vs in good workes toward our neighbour. Therefore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfection of y^e holy ones in charity. And not inconueniently in another place he calleth y^e same the fulfilling of the law: adding that hee hath performed the law that loueth his neighbour. Againe, That all the lawe is comprehended in one worde. Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doeth when he saith: Whatsoeuer ye will that men doe to you, doe yee the same to them. For this is the lawe and the Prophetes, It is certaine that in the lawe and the Prophetes Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, & that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lordes meaning is, that in the lawe is onely prescribed vnto vs an obseruation of right and equitie, wherein we be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Here therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall bee best framed to Gods will and the rule of his lawe, when it shall bee euery way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole law there is not reade one sillable that appointeth to man any rule of such things as hee shall doe or leaue vndone to the commoditie of his owne fleshe. And surely sith men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they bee too much caried all headlong to the loue of themselues, and howe much soeuer they fall from the truth yet still they keepe that selfe loue, there needed no lawe anye more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyonde measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the loue of our selues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the commaundements, and that he liueth best & most holily, that (so nere as may be) liueth & trauelleth least for himselfe, & that no man liueth worse & more wickedly than he y^e liueth and trauelleth for himselfe & only thinketh vpon & seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because hee had no other vehement or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner of speaking is diligently to bee weyed. For hee doeth not, as certaine Sophisters haue foolishly dreamed, giue the first degre to the loue of our selues, and the seconde to charitie; but rather that affection of loue which we doe all naturally drawe to our selues, he giueth away vnto other, 1. Cor. 13. 5. wherevpon the Apostile saith, that Charitie seeketh not her owne. And their reason is not to bee esteemed worth a haire that the thing ruled is euer inferiour to his Rule. For God doeth not make the loue of our selues, a rule wherevnto charitie towarde other shoulde be subiect, but whereas by peruerfnesse of nature, the affection of loue was wont to rest in our selues, he sheweth that nowe it ought to be elsewhere spread abroade, that we should with no lesse cheerefulnes, seruientnes, and carefulnes be readie to do good to our neighbour than to our selues.

Luc. 10. 36. 55 Nowe sith Christ hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour euerie man is contained bee hee neuer so strange vnto vs: there is no cause why wee shoulde restraine the commandement of loue within the boundes of our owne friendships and acquaintances. I denie not that the neerer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarlie hee is to bee holden with our indeuours to doe him good. For so the order of humanitie requireth, that so many moe dueties of friendship men shoulde communicate together, as they are bounde together with streighter bondes of kinred, familiaritie or neighbourhoode, and that without any offence of God, by whose prouidence wee are in a manner driuen therevnto. But I say that all mankind without exception is to bee imbraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, because they are to bee considered in God and not in themselues: from which consideration when wee turne away, it is no maruell if we bee entangled with manie errours. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of louing, we must not turne our eyes vnto man, the sight of whome would oster enforce vs to hate than to loue, but vnto God which commaundeth that the loue which wee offer him, be powred abroad among al men: that this bee a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoeuer the man bee, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent ignorance or malice, that the Scholemen of these commaundementes, touching not desiring of reuengement, and louing our enemies, which in the olde time both were giuen to the Iewes and at the same time were commonly giuen to all Christians, haue made Councils which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the necessarie obeying of them, they haue posted ouer to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forsooth more righteous than simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselues to keepe the Councils. And they render a reason why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they seeme too burdalous and heauie, specially for Christians that are vnder the lawe of grace. So dare they presume to repel the eternal law of God touching the louing of our neighbours? Is there any such difference in any lease of the lawe? and are not therein rather ech where founde commaundementes that doe most seuerely require of vs to loue our enemies? For Pro. 25. 21. what manner of saying is that, where wee are commaunded to feede our Exod. 23. 4. enemy when he is hungrie? to set into the right way his Oxen or Asses straying straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint vnder their burde? Shal we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good wil to himselfe? What is not the word of the Lord euerlasting: Leauē vengeance to me, and I wil requite it: Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place. Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindfull of the iniury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, & not lyingly faine that he was a counsell giuer.

57 And what I pray you meane these things that they haue presumed to mocke withall in their vnsauory glose? Loue your enemies, doe good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heauen. Who cannot here reason with Chrysostome, that by so necessarie a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commaundements? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God: But by their opinion, only Monkes shalbe the children of the heauenly father, they only shal be bold to call vpon God their Father: what shall y Church do in the meane season? it shal by like right be sent away to y Gentils & Publicans. For Christ saith: If ye be friendly to your friends, what fauour looke you for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shal be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be lest vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touche the wife of thine enemy than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leauē to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enimie. But these two, not to steale, & not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compass of the rule of loue, yea & teacheth that they are contained vnder this commandement, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expositor of the lawe, or it necessarily followeth hereby, y our enimies ought also to be loued, euen by commandemēt, like as our friends. Therefore they do truly bewray themselues to be the children of Satan, y do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of y children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine w more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of y old writers that do not pronounce as of a thing certaine, y these are mere commandemētts. And that euen in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his own affirmation, for he without controuersie taketh them for commandements. And how foolish do they reason? They say y they are too weightie a burden for Christians. As though there could be deuised. any thing more weightie than to loue God w al our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be compted easie, whether it be to loue our enimie, or to lay away all desire of reuenge out of our mind. In deed all things are hie & hard to our weaknes euen the least tittle of the lawe. It is the Lord in whom we vse strength. Let him giue what he commandeth, & command what he wil. Christian men to be vnder the lawe of grace, is not vnbridledly to wander without lawe, but to be graffed in Christ, by whose grace they are free frō the curse of the lawe, & by whose spirite they haue a law written in their hearts. This grace Paul vnproperly called a lawe, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men do in the name of the law, dispute vpon a matter of nothing.

58 Of like sort it is, that they called Venial sinne, both secrete vngodliness that is against the first table, & also the direct transgressing of the last commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without aduised assent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the lawe. We forbid to haue strange gods. When the minde shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere: when it is touched with a soden desire to remoue her blessednesse some other way: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule emptie, to receiue such tentations? And to the ende not to drawe out this argument to greater length, there is a commaundement giuen to loue God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the loue of God, we haue already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enimies that do therein arise against his kingdom, & interrupt his decrees, do proue that God hath not his throne wel stablished in our conscience. As for the last commandement, we haue already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guiltie of coueting, and therewithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lord doth forbid vs, not only to purpose & practise any thing that may be to anothers losse, but also to be pricked & swell with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang ouer the transgression of the law. We cannot therefore proue euen the very least desires free from iudgement of death. In weying of sinnes (sayth Augustine) let vs not bring false balances to wey what wee list and how wee list at our own pleasure, saying: this is heauie, & this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lordes treasure, and let vs therein wey what is heauie: rather let vs not wey, but reknowlege things already weyed by the Lord. But what saith the Scripture? Truly when Paul saith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this stinking distinction. Sith we are too much enclined to hypocrisie, this cherishment thereof ought not to haue been added to flatter our slothfull consciences.

59 I would to God, they would consider what y^e saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so, shall be counted none in the kingdom of heauen. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the lawe, as if it were not worthie of death? but they ought to haue considered, not onely what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authoritie is diminished in euery transgression, how little soeuer it be, of y^e lawe that he hath giuen in commandement. Is it a small matter with them, y^e Gods maiestie be offended in any thing? Moreover if God hath declared his will in the lawe, what soeuer is contrary to the lawe, displeaseth him. Will they imagin the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not forthwith follow vpon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voyce, than to trouble the cleare truth with their vnfaury subtleties of argument. The soule (sayth he) that sinneth, the same shall die. Againe, which Ieuen nowe alleaged: the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they grant it to be a sinne, because they can not denie it: yet they stand stiffe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they haue hitherto too much borne with their owne madnesse, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of G O D, which of necessity prouoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the lawe, vpon which the judgement of God is pronounted without exception: & that the sinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercy of God.

Eze. 18. 30.
Rom. 6. 23.

The ix. Chapter.

That Christ although he was knowne to the Iewes under the lawe, yet was deliuered onely by the Gospell.

BECAUSE it pleased God in the olde time not vainely by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vaine hee did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: euen then without dout he was knowne in the same Image, wherein hee nowe appeareth to vs with full brightness. Therefore Malachie, after that he had bidden the Iewes to take heede to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in study thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophetes) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a sonne of righteousnesse. In which wordes he teacheth, that the lawe auaieth to this purpose, to holde the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophetes did make search, & diligently enquire, of the saluation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was reueiled vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselues, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in olde time, or nothing auailed themselues: but because they enjoyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And wheras they did but a litle sippe of it, there is offered vnto vs a more plentifull enjoying thereof. Therefore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witness borne him by Moses, yet extollet the measure of grace whereby we excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eyes y^e see that which ye see, and blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many kinges and Prophetes haue wished it, & haue not obtained it. This is no smal commendation of the reueiling of the Gospell, that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place disagreeeth not, where it is sayde, that Abraham saue the day of Christ, and reioysed. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, ye he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that ioy which accompanied the holy Prophet, euen to his death. And that saying of Iohn Baptist: No man hath seene God at any time, the onely begotten that is in the bosome of the father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had ben dead before him, frō the fellowship of the vnderstanding and light that shineth in the person of Christ. But comparing their estate with ours, he teacheth that those mysteries, which they sawe but darkely vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the author of the epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diuersly & many wayes spake in olde time by the Prophets, but now by his beloued Son, Although therefore that only begotten one, which is at this day to vs y brightnesse of the glory, and the point of the substance of God the father, was in old time knowen to the Iewes, as we haue in an other place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the olde deliuerance: yet is it true, which the same Paul els where teacheth, that God which commanded y light to shine out of darkenesse, hath now shined vpon our heartes to set forth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Iesus Christ: because when hee appeared in this his image, he did in a manner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had bin of him before. And so much the more soule & detestable is their vnthankfulnes and pueruesnes, that are here so blind at midde day. And therefore Paul saith, y their minds are darkened by Sathan, that they should not see the glory of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

2 Nowe I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the mysterie of Christ. I grant truly, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the lawe, concerning the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, wherby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted parts thereof. For he compareth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be sought by workes. Wherupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it all the testimonies that God in olde time gaue to his fathers, of the mercie and fatherly fauour. But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applyed to the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ. And that meaning is not onely receiued by common vse, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Whereupon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospell of the kingdome. And Marke maketh his preface in this manner, The beginning of the Gospel of Iesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to proue a thing sufficiently knowen. Christ therefore by his coming hath made cleere the life and immortality by the Gospel. By which wordes Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but clayming this prerogatiue of honour to the Gospel, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kind of message, wherby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Sonne. For although the faithful haue alway found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their heartes: yet because he hath accomplished all partes of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that self liuely deliuering of the things rightfully obtained a newe and singular title of praise. Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ: Hereafter ye shal see the heauens open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending vpon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie thereof may stand familiarly open to all men. Iohn. 1. 51

3 But yet we must take heede of the diuelish imagination of Seruettus, which when he goeth about, or at least faineth that he goeth about, to extol the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, vtterly abolisheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betweene vs and Christ. I did in deed euen now declare that Christ left nothing vnperformed of the whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we doe already enioy the benefits purchaced by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our saluation is hidde in hope. I graunt in deede, that wee by beleeuing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the meane season we must holde this saying of Iohn, that although we knowe wee be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, til we shalbe like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enioying thereof lieth still hidde vnder the keeping of hope, til being vnclodded of the corruptible flesh, we be transfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holy Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthie dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that wee haue the same promises, which in the olde time were giuen to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that wee are sealed vp with the holy spirite of promise, but yet we do no otherwise enioy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he in deede dwelleth in our hearts, & yet we wander in iourney abroad from him: because we walke by faith & not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together: that wee possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing, which the law did shadow vnder figures. 1. Tim. 4. 8.

4 And hereby also is their errour conuincd, which do neuer otherwise compare the lawe with the Gospell, but as they compare the merites of workes with the free imputation of righteousnesse. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be reiected: because Paul doeth oftentimes vnderstand by the name of the law, a rule to liue righteously, wherin 2. Tim. 1.
2. Cor. 7.

God requireth of vs, that which is his, not giuing vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do neuer so litle swarue from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckened righteous, because the obseruation of the lawe, whereunto the rewarde is promised, is no where founde.

Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousnes of the law and of the Gospell, contrary the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succeed in place of the whole lawe, that it should bring any diuerse meane of saluation, but rather to confirme and proue to be of force, what so euer the lawe had promised, and to ioyne the body to the shadowes. For when Christ saith, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vntil Iohn: he maketh not the fathers subiect to the curse, which the bondseruantes of the law can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudimentes, so as they stayed a great way beneath the heighth of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paul calling th: Gospell the power of God, to saluation to eue-ry beleuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witnesse of the lawe and the Prophetes. But in the ende of the same Epistle, although he shewe that the title of prayse of Iesus Christ is the reuelation of the mysterie kept secret in the euerlasting times: yet he doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that he is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophetes. Whereupon we gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole lawe, the Gospell differeth from the lawe only in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath bene layed open for vs in Christ, it is now without cause sayd, that at his comming the heavenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

5 Now betwene the lawe and the Gospell came Iohn, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Christ the lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed forth the summe of the Gospell: yet because he did not expresse y same incomparable strength and glorie, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith, that he was not egal to the Apostles. For so do those words of his meane: that though Iohn excell among the sonnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater than he. Because he doth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred Iohn before all the Prophetes, he auanceth the preaching of the Gospell to the hiest degree: which preaching we see in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas Iohn himselfe doth answer that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophetes, he doeth not that for fained humilities sake, but meaneth to teache that the proper office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespokē by Malachie: Behold, I sende Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lorde doe come. And truly he did nothing else in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeuour to get disciples to Christ: as also Esaie prooueth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candel burning and shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but y he may be reckened among the publishers of the Gospel, like as he vsed the same Baptisme, which was afterward deliuered to the Apostles. But that which he beganne, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heauenly glorie.

Of the likeness of the olde and newe Testament.

BY the thinges aforesayde it may nowe appeare evidently, that all the men whom from the beginning of the worlde God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which nowe remaineth in force among vs, bound in conuenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I wil adioyne vnto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritaunce with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of all one Mediatour, howe farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for prooffe therof, do make it plaine that there was neuer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of GOD: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many thinges spoken of the difference of the olde and newe Testament, that may make the reader that is not of very sharpe iudgement to be in dout: therefore we shal rightfully appoint one peculiar place for the better & more exact discussing of this matter: Yea and that thing also, which otherwise should haue bene very profitable for vs, is nowe made necessarrie by that monstrous Iosel Seruettus, and by diuers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptistes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondely faine to haue bene fatted vp by the Lord here in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortality. Therefore that we may keepe away this pestilent errour from godly mindes, and also to plucke out of them all doubtles which are wont by and by to arise vpon hearing mention of the diuersity betweene the old and the newe Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what couenant the Lord made with the Israelites in the old time before the comming of Christ, and what couenant he hath nowe made with vs since Christ hath bene openly shewed.

2 And both these pointes may be made plaine with one worde. The couenant of all the fathers so differeth nothing from ours in substance and in the matter it selfe, that it is altogether one and the selfe same: but the ministration is diuerse. But because of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a certaine vnderstanding, we must needs proceede on with a longer declaration if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shall be superfluous to discourse again of new vpon all the special particulars that haue already bene declared: and it shalbe out of season to mingle those things together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest vpon three principall pointes: First, that wee holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the make appointed to the Iewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosen vnto the hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, and by the prophecies. Secondly, that the couenant whereby they were ioyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the onely mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the mediatur, by whom they should both be ioyned to God and enioy his promises. Of which pointes, because the seconde peradventure is not yet sufficiently knowen, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many & cleere testimonies of the Prophetes, that it was of his owne meere goodnes and tender fauour, whatsoeuer good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Iſraell. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declarations of it, and we haue not left the first altogether vntouched.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most controuersie about it, we wil employ the more earnest trauaile: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in conuenient place be added. Truly the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that God the Father long before by the Prophetes in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospell, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the righteousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospell it selfe, hath witness of the lawe and the Prophetes. For the Gospell doth not holde the heartes of men in the ioy of this present life, but listeth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not fasten them to earthly delites, but preaching to them a hope layd vp in heauen, doth in a manner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in an other place. Since that ye beleueed the Gospell, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesu, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is layde vp for you in heauen, wherof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospell. Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospell to the partaking of the glory of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called, both the word of saluation, and the power of God to saue the faithful, & the kingdome of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Gospell be spirituall, and openeth the entry to the possession of an incorruptible life: let vs not think that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe ouer and neglect the care of their soule, and lie dully like beastes in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here caull y^e the promises which are sealed in the lawe & the Prophetes, concerning the Gospell, were ordained for the new people. For within a litle after that which he spake of the Gospell promised in the lawe, he addeth, that all the thinges that the lawe conteineth, are without dout properly directed to them y^e are vnder the law. I grant in deede it is in an other argument. But he was not so forgetful, that when he had once said y^e al the things which the lawe conteineth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a fewe verses before he had affirmed of the Gospell promised in the lawe.

Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the olde Testament chiefly tended to the life to come, when he saith, that vnder it are conteyned the promises of the Gospel.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stood vpon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the verie preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are iustified by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne deseruing, and the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whome wee heare that the couenaunt of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation: Who dare make them straungers from the benefit of free saluation, to whom we heare that the doctrine of the righteousnesse of faith was ministred? But, that we dispute not long of an euident matter, we haue a notable sentence of y^e Lorde. Abraham reioyced that he might see my day, hee sawe it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was vniuersall in the faithfull people, when hee saith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for euer. For he speaketh not there onely of the eternall godheade of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed Virgin and and Zacharie in their songes, doe say, that the saluation reuealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in olde time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lorde in giuing his Christ, discharged his olde oth, it cannot be saide but that the ende thereof was alway in Christ an cuerlasting life.

5 Yea and the Apostle doeth make the Israelites egall with vs, not onely in the grace of the couenaunt, but also in signification of sacramentes. For meaning by examples of punishmentes, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the olde time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they should not runne into the like offences, hee beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why wee shoulde challenge any prerogatiue vnto our selues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they susteined, for asmuch as the Lorde did not onely graunt vnto them the same benefites, but hee hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if hee shoulde haue saide: If ye trust that ye bee out of peril, because both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye dayly receiue, haue excellent promises, and in the meane time despising the godnes of God, ye are licentiously wanton: Knowe ye, that the Iewes also were not without such sacramentes, against whome yet the Lord did most seuerely put his iudgementes in execution. They were baptized in passing ouer the Sea, and in the cloudes wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the sonne. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spiritual Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth here to haue this taken away from the Christians, y^e they thinke that they excel the Iewes by the prerogatiue of Baptisme. Neither is y^e which by and by after followeth, subiect to this cauillation: y^e they did eate the same spirituall meate that we eate, and dronke the same spirituall tuall drinke, which hee expoundeth to be Christ.

6 To ouerthrowe this sentence of Paul, they obiekt that which Christe saith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wildernesse, and are deade: hee that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer. Which two places are verie easily made to agree together. The Lord, because he then talked to hearers y^e sought onely to be filled with foode of their bellie, but cared not for the meate of the soule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacitie, but specially he frameth the comparison of Manna and of his bodie according to their sense. They required that hee, to get himselfe some credit, would approue his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the wildernesse, when he obteyned Manna from Heauen. But in Manna they conceiued nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they pearced not to that hier mysterie which Paul hath respect vnto: Christ therefore, to shewe howe much greater a benefit they ought to looke for at his hande, than that which they reported that Moses did bestowe vpon their fathers, frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthie to be remembred, that y^e Lord by Moses ministred foode from Heauen to his people, to susteyne them for a small time, that they shoulde not perish for hunger in the wildernesse: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meat that giueth immortality. We see why the Lord passed ouer that thing which was principal in Manna, and spake onely of the basest profite of it: euen because the Iewes as it were of purpose to reproch him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he answered that he is the minister of a much hier grace, in comparison whereof, the carnall feeding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because hee knew that the Lorde when hee rained Manna from heauen, did not onely poure it downe for the feeding of their bellie, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that parte that was most worthie of consideration. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heauenly life, which nowe the Lorde vouchsafueth to graunt vnto vs, were not onely communicated vnto the Iewes, but also sealed with verie spirituall Sacramentes. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Faustus the Manichee.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue testimonies alledged vnto them out of the lawe and the Prophetes, whereby they may perceiue y^e the spirituall couenant was common also to the fathers, as we heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also followe that desire, & so much the more willingly, because by that meane the aduersaries shall be more surely conuincd, so that they shal haue after ward no way to dallie. And I will begin at y^e prooffe, which although I know that the Anabaptistes pride will thinke verie fonde and in a manner to bee laughed at, yet shall much auaille with such readers as are willing to learne and haue their sounde wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the word of God, that whome so euer God vouchsafueth to bee partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For this saying of Peter hath alwaye bene of force, that it is the incorruptible seed which abideth for ever, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Now sith God in the old time bound the Jewes vnto him with this holy bond, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced the word, which should ioyne them nier to God, I take it for the manner of communicating it: not that generall maner, which is powred abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it doe quicken all things, euery one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliuer them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this special manner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a maner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the worde, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaued vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortal kingdome of God. For it was a sound partaking of God, which can not bee without the benefite of eternall life.

8 but if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the very forme of the couenant, which shall not onely satisfie sober wits, but also shall sufficiently conuince their ignorāce that bend themselues to speake against it. For God did alway thus couenant with his seruantes: I will be to you a God, & ye shall be to me a people. In which wordes the Prophets themselues are wont to expounde, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For Dauid doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lorde: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritaunce: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but because he deliuereth them from death, he preferueth them for ever, and continually sheweth them eternall mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophetes, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lord is our king, our lawmaker, he shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israel, because thou art saued in the Lord God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needelesse, this admonition is founde eche where in the Prophetes, that we shall want nothing toward all abundance of good things, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lord be our God. And rightfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation, to what man shall he openly shewe himselfe for his God, but that he will also open to him his treasure of saluation? For hee is our God with this condition, to dwell in the midst of vs: as hee testified by Moses. But such presence can not be obtained, but that life must bee also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spiritual life plain inough in these words: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principall; to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousnes remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring euerlasting saluation with it.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifie that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the ende that their hope not contented with present benefites, should bee extended to eternitie.

And

And many sayings doe shewe, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithful not onely in present euils, but also for the time to come, doe comfort themselues with this, that God wil neuer faile them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of G O D to be prolonged vnto them beyond the boundes of this life, in saying: I will be the God of your seede after you. For if he minded to declare his good wil toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his fauor not faile toward themselues. For God is not like vnto men, which doe therefore carie their loue to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so y they can not employ their friendly doings vpon them to whom they did beare good wil. But God, whose bountifullnesse is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the fruite of the mercie, which for their sakes hee poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lords will was by a notable prooffe to set forth vnto them the greatnesse and flowing plentie of his goodnesse, which they should feele after death, when hee described it to be such as should flowe ouer into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lord did then seale, and as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, long after their death. For, what had it not bene a fond naming, if they had vtterly perished? For then had it bene all one, as if hee had saide, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Euangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driuen to a streight, that they could not denie that Moses did testifie the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saintes were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whome hee that is the iudge of life and death had receiued into his safegard, custodie, and protection.

10 Nowe (which is the principall point whereupon this controuersie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithful themselues haue not bene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceiued that they should haue a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enioyned them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most unhappie, euen with onely remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painefull labours hardly susteine his needines, and that he should not be pressed with the curse of God, in the onely labours of his hands, euen there receyued he extreme sorrowe of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other hee had left aliue, whose sight he worthily detested & abhorred. Abel cruelly murdered in the very floure of his age, became an example of y wretchednesse of men. Noe, while the whole world carelesly liued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearinesse in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should haue died an hundred deaths. For beside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne moneths, there is nothing more vnpleasant than to be holden so long in manner drowned in dounge of beasts. When he had passed ouer so great difficulties, hee fell into newe matter of greefe, he sawe himselfe scorned of his owne sonne, & was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whome by the great benefit of God he had receiued safe from the generall flood.

11 Abraham in deed may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousande, if we consider his faith, which is set foorth vnto vs for the best rule of beleeuing, of whose kinred we must bee accounted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the finest corner among them? but he cannot be throwen downe out of the number, no not from the most honorable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Nowe as touching the experiences of his life: When hee was first called by the commaundment of God, he was plucked away from his countrie, his parentes and his friendes, in whome men thinke to bee the cheefe swetenesse of life: euen as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoyle him of all the pleasures of life. So soone as hee came into the lande where he was commaunded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to saue himselfe, hee was compelled to deliuer out his wife to bee abused, which wee know not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deaths. When he was returned into the lande of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that lande, wherein a man must so ofte be hungrie, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewithall hee was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, y he must needes redeeme his life with the losse of his wife, while many yeares long he wandred vncertainly lither and thither, hee was compelled by the continuall brawlinges of his seruantes to put away his nephew, whome hee loued as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt hee did no otherwise take, than if he had suffered the cutting of one of his limmes. A little after, he hearde that hee was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whither so euer he went, he founde neighbours outragiously barbarous, which woulde not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the welles that him selfe had digged with great labour. For he woulde not haue redeemed y vse of them at the hande of King Gerar, if hee had not first beene forbidden. Nowe when he came to olde age, hee sawe the thing which is the most vnpleasaut and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismael, whose birth yet hee payed deere for, when he was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if he in maintaining the stubbornesse of his bondwoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his householde. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismaell must, as forsaken, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whome the wried age of the sillie good man might rest, within a little after he was commaunded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any sickenesse, who would not haue thought y old man most miserable, y had a son giuen him in mock-age, for whome his greefe of want of children should be doubled? If he had beene slaine by some straunger, the unhappinesse of the thing would haue much increased his miserie. But this passeth al examples of miserie, to haue him slaine with his fathers owne hande. Finally, hee was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit, than this of Abraham. And let no man obiekt that he was not altogether unhappy, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempestes. For we cannot say that hee liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painefully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enjoyeth present good things.

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euils, yet scarce euer tooke any tast of sweetenesse. He also felt the same vexations, that doe not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chased him out of the land of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that hee was faine to straine for his water: at home in his owne house, hee suffred much troublesomnes by his childrens wiues, he was greeued with disagreements of his sonnes, and could not remedie that so great a mischeefe, but by the banishment of him whome he had blessed. But as for Iacob, hee is nothing else but a notable example of extreeme infelicitie. Hee passed his childehood most vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to giue place. When he was fledde from his parentes and his natiue countrie, beside that it was a greeuous thing to liue in banishmēt, he was nothing more kindly or gently receiued of his vnclē Laban. Then it sufficed not that hee had serued seuen yeare a harde and cruell seruice, but that also must bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wiues sake he was driuen into new seruice, where he was all the day fried with heate of the sunne, & all the night lay waking and pained with frost and colde, as himselfe complained. While hee by the space of twentie yeares suffred so hard a life, he was dayly vexed with new iniuries of his father in lawe. Neither was hee quiet in his owne house, seeing it diuided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enuie of his wiues. When he was commanded to returne into his countrie, hee was compelled to watch an aduantage to take his iourney, much like a shamefull running away: and yet could hee not so escape the vniust dealing of his Father in Lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his iourney. Then fell hee into a much more cruell distresse. For when he come neere to his brother, hee had so manie deaths before his eyes, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemy. So was hee about measure tormented and as it were drawn in sunder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers comming; when hee came once in his sight, hee fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, vntill he founde him more fauourable than he durst haue hoped. Beside y, at his first entrie into the land, he lost Rachel his dearly beloued wife. Afterward he heard word that y son which he had by her, & who therefore he loued aboute the rest, was torne with wilde beastes: by whose death howe great greefe he conceyued, hee himselfe declared in this that after long weeping hee obstinately stopped vp all wayes whereby comfort might come to him, leauing himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his sonne wayling into the graue. In the meane time howe great causes of griefe, wayting and wearinesse were the rauishment and desflouring of his daughter, and the boldenesse of his sonnes in reuenging it, which not only made him to be abhorred in sight of al the inhabitants of y^e countrey, but also procured him most present peril of vtter destruction? Then followed that horrible outrageous offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as there could not chaunce a more grieuous. For whereas the defiling of a mans wife is reckoned among the hiest ill fortunes: what is to be saide of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a litle while after, his house is spotted with an other vnnaturall adulteric: so that so many shames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while he sought to prouide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tydings of a newe misfortune, vnderstanding that an other of his sonnes was kept in prison, for recouering of whome he was compelled to leaue to the rest Benjamin his onely darling. Who can thinke, that in such a heape of mischiefes he had any one moment giuen him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the best witness of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his daies were short & euil vpon the earth. Now truly he that declareth that he hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperitie which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindely and vnthankfully wey the grace of God, or he truly professed that he had bin miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened vpon earthly things.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as vndoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truly they both thought and sawe it to be an other maner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doth shewe excellently wel: Abraham (saith hee) direct by faith in the land of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with Isaac and Iacob parteners with him of the same inheritance. For they looked for a citie set vpon a good foundation, the maker & builder whereof is God. Al these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promised, but looking at them a far off, and beleeuing & confessing that they were gesses and strangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare y^e they sought for a coutric, and if they had bene moued with desire of that lande from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they sought for a better, that is the heauenly countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bene duller than blockes, to followe promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vnlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them els where. But this he chiefly enforceth, and that not without good reason, y^e they called this life a iourney from home, euen as Moses reporteth. For if they were strangers & foreners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lordes promise wherby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therefore, that the Lordes promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a further respect: Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receiue the fruite of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his sonne Ioseph to promise it him, & to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be remoued thither.

Gen. 50. 25.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the trauailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Iacob haue so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a maner to be cast off from being his childe: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a hier blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the wordes which he spake among his last breathings: Lord, I will looke for thy saluation. What saluation could he haue looked for, when he saw that he laie readie to giue vp the Ghost, vnlesse he had seen in death the beginning of a newe life? But what dispute we of the holy ones & children of God, when euen he was not without a tast of such vnderstanding, which otherwise was enemie to the trueth? For what meant Balaam when he saide: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like vnto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that Dauid afterward vttered, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sighte of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is very euil? If the furthest bound and end were in death, there could in it bee noted no difference betweene the righteous and vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diuersitie of the estates that after death shall befall to them both.

Num. 23. 10.
Psal. 34. 22.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitefulnessse of the ground and plentie of al things. And yet (vnlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall couenant. But if we come downe to the Prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life euerlasting and the kingdome of Christ doe vtter themselues. And first of al Dauid, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, hee shewed the heauenly mysteries in shadowes more darkely than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forreiner and stranger, as all my fathers were. Euery liuing man is vanitie, euery one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lorde? euen to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnes of hope in God, considereth his felicitie laide vp in an other place. To such consideration is hee wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truely. For in an other place after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitorie and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: but y mercie of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred and second Psalm. At the beginning Lord thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the workes of thy handes. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remain the selfe same, & thy yeares shall not faile: the sons of thy seruantes shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be stablished before thee. If the godly cease not for the decay of heauen and earth to be stablished before the Lorde, it followeth, that their saluation is ioyned with the eternity of God. But that hope can not stande at all, vlesse it rest vpon the promise that is set forth in Esay: The heauens (sayeth the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth shall be worne out like a garment, and the inhabitantes of it shall perish like those things: But my saluation shall be for euer, and my righteousnesse shall not faile: where euerlastingnes is giuen to righteousnes and saluation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither may wee otherwise take those things, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous successe of the faithfull, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heauenly glory. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliuer them from y^e hande of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and ioy to the vpright in heart. The righteousness of the godly man abideth for euer: his horne shall be exalted in glory, the desire of the sinner shall perish. Againe: but the righteous shall confesse vnto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous shall be in eternall remembrance. Againe: the Lorde shall redeeme the soules of his seruantes. For the Lord oftentimes leaueth his seruantes to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to be torne in peeces and destroyed: he suffereth y^e good to lie languishing in darknes and filth, while the wicked do in a maner shine among the stars. And he doth not so chere thē with the brightnes of his countenance, that they enioy long continuing gladnes. Wherefore euen he also hideth not, that if the faithful fasten their eyes vpon the present state of things, they shall be stricken with a sore temptation, as though there were no fauor or rewarde of innocency with God. So much doth wickednes for y^e most part prosper & flourish, while the company of the godly is oppressed with shame, pouerty, contempt & al kinds of crosses. It wanted but litle (saith he) that my foote slipped not, and my steppes fell not abroade, while the fortune of fooles grieueth mee, and while I see the prosperity of the wicked. At length after recheerfall of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could vnderstand these things. But it is a torment to my spirite, till I enter into the sanctuary of the Lord, and vnderstand the last end of them.

17 Let vs therfore learne yet by this confession of Dauid, that the holy fathers vnder y^e old testament were not ignorant, how seldom or neuer God doth in this world performe to his seruantes those things that he promiseth thē, and that therfore they did lift vp their minds to Gods sanctuary, wherein they had that laid vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last iudgement of God, which when they could not see with eyes, they were content to vnderstand by faith. Trusting vpon which affiance, whatsoeuer happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings do witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousness: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Again: I as a greene Oliue tree in the house of the Lord. Again, The righteous shall flourish as a Date tree, & shall spread in branches like the Cedar of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They shall still beare frute, they shall be fat and greene in their old age. When he had sayd a litle before: How deepe are thy thoughtes? O Lord, while the wicked doe flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for euer. Where is y^e faire shewe and beauty of the faithful, but when the face of this world shall be turned inwarde by disclosing of the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternity, they despised the hardnes enduring but a moment of present miseries, and boldly burst forth into these words: Thou shalt not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw down the wicked hedlong into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternal destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicities, this is also reckned in an other place, that they close vp the end of their life in a moment, without long languishing. Where is y^e so great stedfastnes of the holy ones, whom Dauid himselfe ech where complaineth, not only to be shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, & vtterly broken in peeces: Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is vnstable and more vnstedfast than the ebbing & flowing of tides, but what the Lord will do, when he shall one day sit for the eternall settling of heauen and earth. As in an other place he excellently wel describeth it: The foolish do stay vpon their welthines, & are proud because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flourish in neuer so great dignity, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransom, but wheras they see that both the wise do die, and y^e the wicked also & fooles do perish and leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke y^e their houses shall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the end of ages, and they aduaunce their names vpon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shall be like to the beastes that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their posterity do greedily follow. They shall be placed like a focke in Hell, and death shall haue rule ouer them. When the light ariseth, the vpright shall haue dominion ouer them, the beauty of them shall perish, Hell is their dwelling house. First this laughing to scorne of the foolish for that they rest on the slippery & rolling good thinges of the worlde, doth shewe that the wise must seeke a farre other felicity. But there he more euidently discloseth the mystery of the resurrection, where after the destruction and extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of y^e godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shall we call that, but the reuiciling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

18 From thence did spring vp that consideration, which the faithful oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miseries and remedy of patience: It is but a moment in the Lordes displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to ende in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods

kindnes, whereof they scarcely felt any little taste? If they had stuck fast vpon the earth, they could haue found no such thing, but because they looked vpon heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the crosse, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do last the worldes age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and neuer ending destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shalbe in blessing, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, most euill. Againe in Samuel: The Lord shall keepe the feete of the holy, & the wicked shall be put to silence in darkenes. Which do declare that they well knewe, that howsoeuer the holy were diuersly carried about, yet their last end is life and saluation: and that the prosperity of the wicked is a pleasant way, whereby they by little and little slide forward into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called y^e death of such, the destruction of the vncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore Dauid could not deuise a more greuous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not be written with the righteous.

19 But aboute all other, notable is that saying of Iob: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the last day I shall rise againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my sauour: This hope is layd vp in my bosom. Some that haue a minde to make a shew of their sharpe wit, doe cauill that this is not to be vnderstanded of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Iob looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Iob could not haue come to that largeness of hope, if he had rested his thought vpon the earth. Therefore we must needs confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortality to come, which sawe, that his redeemer would be present with him euen lying in his graue. For to them y^e thinke only of this present life, death is their vttermost desperation: which very death could not cut of Iobs hope. Yea though he kill me (said he) neuerthelesse I wil still hope in him. And let no trisler here carpe against me and say, that these were the sayings but of a few, whereby is not proued y^e such doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by & by answer him, y^e these fewe did not in these sayings vtter any secret wisdom, whereunto onely certaine excellent wittes were seuerally and priuately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of y^e people, so they openly published those mysteries of God that were to be vniuersally learned, and ought to be the principles of the comon religion among y^e people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spirituall life so clearly & plainly in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of vntolerable stubbornnes to send them away onely to the fleshy couenant, wherein is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthinesse.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophetes, there we may freely walke as in our owne felde. For if it were not harde for vs to get the vpper hande in Dauid, Iob, and Samuel, here it shall be much more easie. For God kept this this distribution and order in disposing the covenant of his mercy, that how much the nearer it drew on in proceſſe of time to the full performance thereof, with ſo much greater increaſementes of reuelation he did day by day more brightly ſhewe it. Therefore at the beginning when the firſt promiſe of ſaluation was made vnto Adam, there glistered out but as it were ſmall ſparkles of it. After, hauing more added vnto it, a greater largeneſſe of light began to be put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and diſplayed her brightneſſe farther abroade, till at length all the cloudes were driuen away, and Chriſt the ſonne of righteouſnes fully lightened the whole worlde. We neede not therefore to feare that we faile of teſtimonies of the Prophets, if we ſeek them to proue our cauſe, but becauſe I ſee that there will ariſe a huge deale of matter, wherupon it ſhould be conſtrained of neceſſity to tary longer than the proportion of my purpoſe may beare, for it would ſo growe to a worke of a great volume, and alſo becauſe I haue already, by thoſe things that I haue ſayde before, made plaine the way, euen for a reader of meane capacity, ſo as he may goe forward without ſtumbling: therefore I will at this preſent abſtaine from long tediousneſſe: which to doe is no leſſe neceſſary: but giuing the readers warning before hande, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that wee haue firſt giuen them in their hande. That is, that ſo oft as the Prophetes ſpeake of the bleſſedneſſe of the faithfull people, whereof ſcarſely the leaſt ſteppes are ſeene in this preſent life, they may reſort to this diſtinction: that the Prophetes, the better to expreſſe the goodneſſe of God, did as in a ſhadowe expreſſe it to the people by temporall benefites, as by certaine rough drawing of the portrayture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they haue painted therof, was ſuch as might rauish mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elementes of this worlde, and of the age that ſhall periſh, and of neceſſity raiſe it vp to the conſidering of the felicity of the life that is to come and ſpirituall.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Iſraelites beeing caried away to Babylon, ſawe their ſcattering abroade to be like vnto death, they could hardly be remoued from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophecied of their reſtitution: becauſe they reckened it euen all one as if he had tolde them that rotten carcaſes ſhould be reſtored againe to life. The Lorde to ſhewe, that euen that ſame difficulty could not ſtop him from bringing his benefit to effect, ſhewed to the Prophet in a viſion a ſielde full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onely power of his word he reſtored breath and liuelineſſe. The viſion in deede ſerued to correct the incredulity at that preſent time: but in the meane ſeaſon he did put the Iewes in minde how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the account of the people, which ſo eaſily quickened with his onely becke, bones already rotten and ſcattered abroad: wherefore you ſhall compare that with an other ſaying of Eſay. The dead ſhall riſe, my carcaſe, they ſhall riſe againe. Awake ye and reioyce that dwell in the duſt, becauſe the dewe of y greene field is thy dew, and thou ſhalt plucke down the land of the Giances into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: ſhut thy dores vpon thee: hide thee a litle while, till my diſpleaſure paſſe ouer. For beholde behold, the Lord shal go out of his place, to visit the iniquitie of the dweller vpon the earth against him, and the earth shal shew foorth her blood, & shal no longer hide her slaine.

22 Albeit a man should doe fondly, that would goe about to drawe all to such a rule. For there be some places that without any couering doe shewe the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdome of God, of which fort we haue recited some, & of like fort are the most parte of the rest, specially these two, the one in Esay. As a newe heauen, & a newe earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your seede stand, and there shalbe moneth of moneth, and Sabbath of Sabbath: all flesh shal come to worship before my face, saith the Lorde. And they shall go out & see the dead carcases of the men that haue offended against mee, that their worme shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shal rise vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sonnes of his people, and there shall come a time of distresse, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people be saued that shal be found written in thy booke. And of those y^e sleepe in the dust of the earth, there shal awake some to eternal life, & some to euerlasting shame.

23 Now, as for prouing the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their couenant, & that they reposed in him all their affiance of blessing, I wil not trauaile therein at all, because they haue both lesse controuersie & more plainnesse. Let vs therefore boldly determine this, which by no engines of the deuil may be remoued, that the old Testament or couenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also contained the promise of the spirituall & eternall life: the expectation wherof must needes haue bene imprinted in all their mindes that truly consented to the couenant. But let vs put farre away this mad & pernicious opinion, that either God did set foorth in his promise to the Iewes nothing else, or y^e the Iewes sought nothing else but filling of their belly, delites of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outward power, frutefulnessse of children, & whatsoeuer a natural man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdom of heauen to his, but where they shal rest with Abraham, Isaac, & Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Iewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospel, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the couenant, which the Lorde had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not be witnessed wth words only, the Lord also approued it by deede. For in the very moment y^e he rose againe, he vouchsafed to haue many of the holy men to rise againe in company with him, & made them to be seene in the Citie: so giuing an assured token, y^e whatsoeuer he did & suffered for the purchasing of eternal saluation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithful of the olde testament, than vnto vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued wth the same spirit of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparcle of immortalitie, whereupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Whereby it is so much the more maruell, y^e in the old time the Sadduces fel to such grosse-ness of error, that they denyed both the resurrection & also the substance of soules, both which points they sawe sealed with so cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no lesse to be maruiled at, euen at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdome of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should haue that punishment for refusing the Gospel. For so it behoued, by the iust iudgement of God, to strike those mindes with blindnes, which in refusing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themselues into darknesse. Therefore they read and continually turne ouer Moses, but they are stopped with a veile set betwene them and him, that they cannot see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shal it remaine couered & hidden from them, til he be turned to Christ, from whome now they trauaile to leade and drawe him away so much as in them lieth.

2. Cor. 3. 14.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

WHAT then wilt thou say: shall there be no difference left betwene the old Testament and the New? & to what purpose serue all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things moste contrary? I do willingly allowe those differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the vnicitie already established, as it shalbe plaine to see when wee shall haue entreated of them in order. Those differences are (as farre as euer I could marke or can remember) chiefly foure in number, to the which if you list to adioyne the fifth, I am not against it. I say and trust to prooue that they are all such as rather belong to the manner of ministration, than to the substance of them. And by this meane they shall nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the olde and newe testament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, euen in the old time also, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raised vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gaue it to be seene or rather to be tasted of, vnder earthly benefits: but nowe hauing reuealed the grace of the life to come, by the Gospel, he more clearly and plainly directeth our mindes the streight way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferiour manner of exercising which he vsed with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any hier than to the good things promised to the body. They so often heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather only reward for the keepers of Gods law. They heare that God threatneth nothing more seuerely to the transgressors of the same law, than that they shalbe driuen out of the possession of the same land, & scattered abroad into strange regions. They see y in a maner to this effect come all the blessings & curses that are pronounced by Moses. Hereby they do vndoubtedly determine, y the Iewes not for their owne sakes; but for others, were seuered from other nations, y is, that the Church of Christ might haue an image, in whole outward forme

she might see examples of spirituall things. But sith the Scripture doth sometimes shewe, that God himselfe directed al the earthly benefites that he did for them to this ende, that so he might leade them by the hand to the hope of heavenly benefites: it was too much vnskillfulness, I wil not say blockishnes, nor to consider this order of dispositiō. The issue or point of our controuersie with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of y^e lande of Chanaan was to the Israelites their cheife & last blessednes, and that to vs after the reueling of Christ, it doth but figuratiuely signifie the heavenly inheritance. On the other side we affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enjoyed, as in a looking glasse beholde the inheritance to come, which they beleeued to be prepared for them in heauen.

2 That shal better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galathians. He compareth the nation of the Iewes to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himselfe, followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolemaister, to whose custody he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindereth but that it may also very fitly serue to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter vpon and vse. The same Church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lorde kept them vnder this schooling, that he gaue them not the spirituall promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, and their posterity vnto hope of immortality, he promised them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirme themselues in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceiued, there was giuen them a hier promise to testifie, y^e that land was not the hiest benefite of God. So Abraham was not suffred to lie slouthfull in the promise receiued of the lande, but his minde was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this sayde vnto him: I am thy protector, and thy rewarde exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his rewarde set forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transitory and slippery rewarde in the elementes of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adioyneth the promise of the lande to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good wil of God, and a figure of the heavenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayings do declare. So Dauid riseth vpward from temporal blessings, to that same hiest and last blessing, My heart (sayth he) and my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, The Lord is the part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that sauest mine heritage for me. Againe, I haue cried vnto thee, O Lord, I haue said, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the liuing. Truely they that dare so speake, doe without dout professe that with their hope they climbe aboute the worlde, and all the good things here present. But the Prophetes doe oft describe this blessednes of the worlde to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstanded. That the godly shall possesse the lande by inheritance, and the wicked shalbe destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kind of riches, and Sion ouerflow with plenty of all things. All which we see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Ierusalem, but of the true country of the faithful, and that heavenly citie wherein the Lord hath commanded blessing and life for euer.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the old testament, did esteeme the mortall life and the blessings thereof more than is now meete to do. For although they knew wel that they should not rest in it, as in y^e end of their race, yet when they called to minde, what markes of his grace the lord had pointed therein, to exercise thē according to the smal rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetnes of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as y^e Lord in testifying his good wil toward y^e faithful, by present good things, did as in shadow expresse the spirituall felicity, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his iudgement against the reprobate. Therefore, as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishmentes. While the vnskilfull do not weye this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishmentes and the rewards, they maruel at so much alteration in God, that in olde time was so sodenly ready to take vengeance on euery offence of man with sterne and horrible punishmentes, and nowe as if he had laid away y^e affectiō of his old angrines, he punisheth both much more gentlie & seldomer, yea & for the same cause they do almost imagine feuerall gods of the old & new testament: which y^e Manichees did in dede. But we shal easily be deliuered from such douts, if we lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie and set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporall benefites, and the greuousnes of the spiritual death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded vp.

4 An other difference of the olde and newe Testament is sayde to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew only an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in steede of the body. But the new testament giueth the truth present, and the sounde body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wherefoeuer the newe testament is in comparison set against the olde: but it is more largely entreated of in the epistle to the Hebrewes than any where else. There the Apostle disputeth against them, which thought y^e the obseruation of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they should also drawe with them the ruine of all religion. To confute this errour, he vseth that which had bin forespoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthoolde of Christ. For whereas there is giuen him an eternall priesthooche, it is certaine, that that priesthooche is taken away, wherein new successours were dayly put in, one after an other. But he proueth y^e the institution of this new priesthooche is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an orth. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthooche, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessarie so to be, he proueth by this reason: for that the weakenes of the lawe was such that it could help nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakenes, euen this, that it had certaine outward righteoulines of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beastes, it could neyther wipe away sins, nor purchase true holinesse. He concludeth therefore that there was in it a shadowe of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the things themselues: and that therefore it had no other office, but to bee as an introduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospel. Here is to be seen, in what point the couenant of the law is compared with the couenant of the Gospel: and the ministerie of Christ with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two testaments: but sith the point of our case leadeth vs an other way, we must tend to this ende, to finde out the truth. Let vs then set forth here the couenant which he hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lorde did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Nowe this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the law ought to giue place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verily additions & things adioyned, or (as the people call them) accessory things to the couenant, yet because they were instruments or meanes of the administration therof, they beare the name of the couenant it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in sum: the old Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the couenant, contained in ceremonies and sacrifices. The Apostle saith, that because in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behoued that they should be discontinued and abrogate, that place might be giuen to Christ the assurer & mediatour of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or, if you like it better, thus: That the old testament of the Lord was that, which was deliuered, wrapped vp in the shadowish & effectual obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hãg in suspẽse vntil it might stay vpon a more stedfast & substantial confirmation: and that then onely it was made new and eternal, after that it was consecrate & stablished by the blood of Christ. Wherevpon Christ calleth the cup that he gaue at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new testament in his blood: to signifie y^e then the testament of God attaineth his truth: by which it becommeth new and eternal, when it is sealed with his blood. Mat. 26. 20.

5 Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle saide: that in the schooling of the law, the Iewes were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolemaster. For it behoued, that ere the sonne of righteousnes was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnesse of reuelation, nor so great deepe sight of vnderstanding. Therefore God so gaue them in measure Ga. 3. 24. & 4

wordes the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison betweene the lawe and the Gospell, that hee called the lawe a literall, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, he saide, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in heartes: that the lawe was the preaching of death, y Gospell the preaching of life: the lawe the Preaching of damnation, the Gospell the preaching of righteousnesse: that the lawe is made void, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it shall bee sufficient that wee wey the wordes of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some vnlikenes betweene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doeth: and that not in simple respect of the lawe, but because there were certaine naughtie men, hauing a wrong zeale to the lawe, which did with peruerse loue of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the lawe, according to their error and foolish affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they doe by comparison set the old and the newe testament, the one against the other: doe consider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The law doeth commonly in euery place containe promises of mercie, but because they are borrowed from elsewhere, therefore they are not reckened as part of the lawe, when the meere nature of the lawe is spoken off. The only thing they ascribe vnto it, to commaunde thinges that are right, and to forbid wicked doinges: to promise reward to the followers of righteousnes, and to threaten punishment to the transgressours: but in the meane time neither to change nor amend the peruersefnesse of heart, that is naturally in all men.

8 Now let vs expound y Apostles comparison, one peece after another. The old testament is literal, because it was published without y effectuall working of y spirit: The new is spiritual which y Lord hath spiritually graue in y hearts of men: Therefore the second diuersitie is as it were a declaration of y first. The old is deadly, because it can do nothing but wrap all mankind within the curse: The newe is the instrument of life, because it deliuereth from curse, and restoreth into fauour with God. The olde is the ministerie of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vnrighteousnesse: The newe is the ministerie of righteoussesse, because it reuealeth the mercie of God, by which wee are made righteous. The last diuersitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the olde testament had an image of thinges absent, it behoued that it should in time decay and vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giueth y true bodie in deede, keepeth still a firme and perpetuall stedfastnesse. Ieremie indeed calleth euen the morall lawes, a weake and fraile couenant: but that is for an other reason, because by y sodaine falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by & by broken, but forasmuch as such breaking of it was y fault of y people, it cannot properly be laid vpon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their own weakenesse were dissolved by the comming of Christ, had the cause of their weakenes within themselues. Now, that differēce of the letter & spirit is not so to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his laws to the Iewes without any fruite at all, hauing none of them conuerted vnto him : But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduance the aboundance of grace, where-with the same lawmaker as it were putting on a newe personage, did honorable set fourth the preaching of the Gospell. For if wee reckon vp the multitude of these whome the Lorde out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospell regenerate with his spirite, and gathered into the communion of his Church, wee shall say, that there were verie fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israell, that with affection of minde and entirely from their heart embraced the couenant of the Lord: who yet were verie manie, if they bee reckened in their owne number without comparison.

9. Out of the third difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the olde testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the newe testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and assurednes. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romains. Yee haue not receiued the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirit of adoption, by which wee crie Abba, father. Herevnto serueth that in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the faithfull are not nowe come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlwinde, darkenesse and tempest, where nothing can bee hearde or scene but that st. iketh mens mindes with terrour, insomuch that Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they al besought, that they might not heare: But that wee are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the liuing God, the heauenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that wee haue alleaged out of the Epistle to the Romanes, hee setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galathians, when he maketh an allegorie of the two sonnes of Abraham, after this maner, that Agar the bondwoman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Israell receiued the lawe: Sara the freewoman is a figure of the heauenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which may neuer come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the lawe wee are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospell onely wee are regenerate into freedom. But the summe commeth to this effect that the olde testament did strike into consciences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made ioyfull. The olde did holde consciences bounde vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedom. But if out of the people of Israel they object against vs the holy fathers, who sith it is euident, that they were endued with the same spirite that wee are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfe same freedom and ioye. Wee aunswere, that neither of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themselues by the law to bee both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with vnquietnesse of conscience, they fledde to the succour of the Gospell, and y therefore it was a peculiar fruite of the newe testament, that beside the common lawe of the old testament they were exempted from these euils. More-

ouer, wee will denie that they were so endued with the spirite of freedome and assurednesse, that they did not in some part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howsoeuer they enioyed that prerogatiue which they had obteyned by grace of the Gospel, yet were they subiecte to the same bondes and burdens of obseruation, that the common people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to y^e carefull keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like vnto bondage, and the hand writinges whereby they confessed themselues guiltie of sinne, did not discharge them from being bonde: it may rightfully be said, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while wee haue respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vsed with the people of Israell.

10 The three last comparisions that wee haue recited, are of the lawe and the Gospel. Wherefore in them by the name of the Olde Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the Newe testament is meant the Gospel. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckened vnder the name of y^e old testament, Lib. 3. ad Boni. cap. 4. therein hee thought verie well, and meant euen the same thing that we doe nowe teach, for he had regarde to those sayinges of Hieremie and Paul, where the olde testament is seuered from the worde of mercie and grace. And this also hee verie aptly adioyneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith working through loue haue obeyed the commaundementes, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the Newe testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly and temporall, but spirituall, heauenly, and eternall good thinges, principally beleeuing in the Mediatour, by whome they doubted not that the spirit was nor ministred vnto them, both to doe good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Sainctes whome the Scripture rehearseth to haue beene from the beginning of the worlde chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betwene our diuision and Augustines: that ours (according to that saying of Christe: Mat. 11. 13. The lawe and the Prophetes were vnto Iohn: from thence forth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction betwene the cleerenesse of the Gospel, and the darker distribution of the worde that went before: and Augustine doth onely seuer the weakenesse of the law from the strength of the Gospel. And here also is to bee noted concerning the holy fathers, that they so liued vnder the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and embraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednes, which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seeke for the clesing of the soule in outwarde sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though hee were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that

sticke fast in the obseruations of the law without respect of Christ.

11 The fifth difference that we may add, lieth in this: that vntil the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe seueral the couenant of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he diuided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fell to his possession: Iacob the corde of his inheritance. In an other place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heauen and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy Gods. He cleaued only to thy fathers, he loued them, to chose their seede after them euen your selues out of al nations. Therefore he vouch saued to graunt the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they only of all men belonged vnto him: he laide his couenant as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatiues. But (to omit the rest of his benefites, & speak that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by y^e communicating of his worde, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to do with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, giue them that which was only the remedie, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sonne that was his darling, other were strangers: Israel was knowen to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honoured with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nie vnto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was deliuered in deede, the particion was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercy of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to them that were farre off, euen as to them that were neere adioyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherefore, now there is no respect of Greeke or Iewe, circumcision or vncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whome the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniuersally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the riuers to the vttermost endes of the worlde.

12 Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is clearly shewed the excellencie of the newe Testament aboue the olde. It had in deede been before testified by many, & most plaine oracles of y^e Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still differred vnto the kingdom of Messias. And Christ himself did not proceed vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but differred it so long vntil y^e all the partes of our redemption being perfourmed, & the time of his abasement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is aboue all names, before whome al knees should bowe. For which cause when this conueniēce of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to y^e woman of Chanaan, y^e he was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And he suffred not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye, (saith he) into y^e way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to y^e lost sheepe of the house house of Israell. But howe soeuer it was before vttered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to beginne it, it seemed so newe and straunge a thing vnto them, that they were afraide of it, as of some monster. Truly verie fearefully and not without sticking at it, they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lord which by so many ages had chosen out Israell from all other nations, should nowe vndoē that choise, as it were, sodenly changing his purpose. It was in deede spoken of afore by prophecies: but they could not giue so great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing mouued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lord had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that shoulde one day come to passe, were not sufficient to moue them. For beside this that hee had called verie fewe, hee did after a certaine manner ingrasse them into the householde of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as parcel of them: but by this general calling, the Gentiles were not onely made egall with the Iewes, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Iewes, that were become deade. And yet all those straungers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made egall with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extoll his mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which hee also saith to be maruellous to the verie Angels.

Col. 1. 16.

13 In these foure or fiue pointes, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set forth the whole difference of the olde and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching. But because many report this varietie in gouerning the Church, this diuerse manner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may bee done shortly, because the obiections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alway stedfastly agree with himselfe, shoulde suffer so great an alteration, as afterwarde to disalowe the same thing, which he had before both commaunded and commended. I answer, that God ought not therefore to be compted inmutable, for that hee applied diuerse formes to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expedient for euery one. If the husbandman appoint to his householde one sort of businesse in winter, and an other in sommer, shal we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swarueth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continual order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household doe instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childhoode, of an other in youth, and of an other in mans state, wee cannot therefore say that hee is fickle and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore doe we charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath seuered the diuersitie of times, with fit & agreeable markes? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Iewes like vnto children and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this gouernment of God? he helde them in their childish lessons, which according to y^e capacite of their age were fit for the, & instructed vs with stronger &

it were more manly discipline? Therefore herein appeareth the constancie of God, that he taught one selfe same doctrine in al ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commaunded from the beginning. But wheras he changed the outward forme and manner thereof, in that he shewed not himselfe subiect to change: but so farre he tempered him selfe to the capacite of man, which is diuers and changeable.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diuersitie, but bicause God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the coming of Christ, reucale the eternal life in plaine wordes without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacraments and easy to perceauce, giue his holy spirite, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole worlde? This is euen like as if they should quarel with God for that he hath created the worlde so late, sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his wil was to haue enterchanged courses betwene winter and sommer, betwene day and night. But as for vs, euen as all godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubt that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to haue been done. For that were to take presumptuously too much vpon vs, not to giue God leaue to haue the causes of his owne purpose secreat to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beastes, and all that furniture of the Levitical priesthood, wherwith in the olde time he was delighted: As though these outward and transitorie things did delite God, or any way moue affectiō in him. We haue already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of men. If a Phisicion do heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, & afterward do vse another maner of healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same, he hath consideration of age? So behoued it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by another sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is meete that now being already deliuered, he be represented by other signes. But as concerning Gods calling, now at the coming of Christ more largely spread abroad among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holy ghost more plenteously powred out: who, I pray you, can deny it to be right, that that God haue in his owne hande and will the disposing of his owne graces, to giue light to what nations it pleaseth him? to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to giue what doctrine & how great profiting & successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he wil, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulnes? & again when he wil to restore it for his owne mercy? We see therefore, that the cauillations are too much vnmeeete, wherwith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make them call either the righteoufnesse of God, or the faith of the Scripture into doubt.

The xij. Chapter.

That is behoued, that Christ, so performing his office of the Mediator, should be made man.

Now

NOwe, it much behoued vs that he should be both God and man, which should be our Mediatour. If a man aske of the necessitie, it was not in deede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceeded from the heauenly decree, whereupon hanged al the saluation of men. But the most mercifull father appointed that which shoulde bee best for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were, cast a cloud betweene him and vs, & vtterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that coulde attaine vnto God. But who could haue attained vnto him? could any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers shunne the sight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly & vnseuerably cleaue vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very maiestie of God would descende vnto vs, for we could not ascend vnto it. So it behoued that the sonne of God should become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither could the neerenes be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betweene our filthines, and the most pure cleannes of God. Although man had stand vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate too base to attaine to God without a Mediatour. What could he then do being plunged downe into death and hel with deadly fall, defiled with so many sportes, stinking with his owne corruption, and ouerwhelmed with all accursednesse? Therefore not without cause, Paul meaning to set forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (saith he) of God and man, the man Iesus Christ. He might haue sayde, God: or at the leaste he might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But because the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knewe our weakenesse: therefore to prouide for it in time, he vsed a most fit remedy, setting among vs the sonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man should trouble himselfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be sought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, hee putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea so neere that he toucheth vs, for as much as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there euen the same thing that in an other place is set out with moe wordes: that we haue not a bishop that can not haue compassion of our infirmities, forasmuch as he was in all things tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

Hebr. 4. 15.

2 That shall also appeare more plainly, if wee consider howe it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, so to restore vs into the fauour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hel, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could do that, vnlesse the sonne of God were made also the sonne of man, and so take ours vpon him to conuey his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earnest we trust, that we are the children of God, because the naturall sonne of God hath shapen for him selfe a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. Hee disdayned not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himself, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of GOD and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhoode which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he sayth: I go vp to my father and your father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen assured vnto vs: for that the onely sonne of God, to whome it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreouer it was for the same cause very profitable, that hee which should be our redeemer, should be both very GOD and very man. It was his office to swallowe vp death: who could doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to ouercome sinne: who could doe that but righteousness it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the worlde and of the ayre: who could doe that but a power aboue both worlde and ayre? Nowe in whose possession is life, or righteousness, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onely begotten sonne, made himselfe our redeemer, when his wil was to haue vs redeemed.

Iohn 10. 17.

3 An other principal point of our reconciliatiō with God was this, y man which had lost himself by his disobedience, should for remedy set obedience against it, should satisfie the iudgement of God, and pay the penalty of sin. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lorde, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his steede in obeying his father, to yelde our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the iust iudgement of God, & in the same flesh suffer the paine that we had deserued. For asmuch as therefore neither being onely God he could feele death, nor being onely man he could ouercome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yelde the one subiect to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by the power of the other he might wastle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore that spoyle Christ either of his godhead or of his manhood, do indeede either diminish his maiestie and glory, or obscure his goodnes: but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they do therby weaken & ouerthrowe, which can not stand but resting vpon this foundation. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and Dauid, which God had promised in the lawe and the Prophetes. Whereby the godly mindes doe gather this other frute, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to Dauid and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I euen now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature between him and vs is a pledge of our fellowship with the sonne of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death & sinne together, that the victorie so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he receiued of vs, that hauing made satisfaction he might wipe away our guiltinesse, and appease the iust wrath of his father.

4 He that shalbe diligently heedefull in considering these thinges as hee ought, will easily neglect these wandring speculations that rauish vnto them.

light spirites and desirous of noueltie: of which sort is, that Christ should haue been man, although there had beene no neede of remedie to redeeme mankinde. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vncorrupted, he was set as head ouer Angels and men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But sith al^y Scripture crieth out, that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagin any other cause or end. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is wel enough known: euen to restore the world fallen in ruine, & to succour men being lost. Therefore vnder the law, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God would be mercifull to them, when after satisfi-tion made for sinne, he should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euen when the lawe was not yet published, the Mediatour was neuer promised without blood: we gather that he was appointed by the eternall counsell of god to purge the filthinesse of men, for that the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testi-quities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, who so euer passeth beyond these bounds, he doeth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himself was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his coming, to appease God, & gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So y in likenesse of the flesh of sinne he should satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the

goodnesse of God and his infinite goodnesse toward men, when Christ was giuen to be the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture euery where assigneth no other ende, why the sonne of God would take vpon him our flesh, and also receiued this commandement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father toward vs. So it is written, and so it behoued that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loueth me, because I giue my life for the sheepe, this commaundement he gaue me. As Moses lifted vp the Serpent in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In another place: Father, saue me from this houre. But I am therefore come euen to this howre. Father, glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainly speaketh of the ende why he tooke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sorte doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise giuen to the fathers, to giue light to them that sat in the shadow of death. Let vs remember that all these things are spoken of the sonne of God: in whom Paul in another place testifieth, that all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden, and by side whom he glorieth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception and say, that none of all these things proueth the contrary, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testifie his loue toward them, being preferred and safe. The answer is short, that for asmuch as the holy ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two things were ioyned together, that Christ should be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawful for vs to search any further. For who so euer is tickled with desire to know any more, he being not contented with the vnchangeable ordinance of God, doth shew also that he is not contented with the same Christ that was giuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearseth to what ende he was sent, but also climbing to the high mysterie of predestination, he very fitly represseth all wantonnesse and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the world, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloued sonne, in whom we haue redemption by his blood. Truly here is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were foremost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his will was to helpe the miserie of mankind. If the aduersarie obiekt againe, that this purpose of God did hange vpon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say, that they with wicked boldnesse breake forth to faine them a new Christ, who so euer suffer themselves to search for more, or hope to know more of Christ than God hath foreappointed them by his secreete decree. And for good cause did Paul, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirite of vnderstanding, to comprehend what is the length height, bredth, and depth, euen the loue of Christ that surmounteth all knowledge: euen as if of purpose he would set barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it neuer so litle, swarue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sith this is a faithfull saying (as Paul testifieth) that Christ is come to saue sinners, I doe gladly rest in the same. And whereas in an other place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is now disclosed by the Gospell, was giuen vs in Christ before the times of the worlde : I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the ende. Against this modestie Oslander carpeth vniustly which hath againe in this time vnhappy stirred this question before lightly moued by a few. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the sonne of God should not haue appeared in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, because this inuention is confuted by no testimony of scripture. As though Paul did not bridle frowarde curiositie, when after he had spoken of redemption purchased by Christ, he by and by commaundeth to auoide foolish questions. The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly co-Tim. 3.9ueted to seeme witty, they moued this question, whether the Sonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Ass. This monstrousnes which all the godly do worthily abhorre as detestable, let Oslander confute with this pretense, that it is neuer expressly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paule accompreth nothing precious or worthy to be knowne, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Ass to be the author of saluation. Therefore he that in an other place reporteth, that Christ by the eter-Eph. 4.22nall counsell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather all things together: will neuer the more acknowledge an other that hath no office of redeeming appointed him.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it, that man was created after the image of God, because he was fashioned after the paterne of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whom the father had already decreed to clothe with our flesh. Whervpon he gathereth, that if Adam had neuer fallen from his first and vncorrupted originall state, yet Christ should haue been man. How trifling this is and wrested, all men that haue sound iudgement, doe easily perceiue of themselues. In the meane time first he thinketh that he hath seene what was the image of God, that forsoth the glory of God did not onely shine in those excellent gistes wherwith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I graunt that Adā did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true and highest perfection of dignitie) yet I say, that the likenesse of God is no where els to be sought, but in those markes of excellencie wherwith he had garnished Adam aboute other liuing creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men do graunt with one consent, and therefore that what so euer excellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approached to the glorie of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whom the creators will was to haue his glory seene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honor was he aduanced by the benefit of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same sonne was a common head as wel to Angels as to men, so that the same dignity that was bestowed vpon man, did also belong vnto angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to deny, that there is somthing in them wherin they resemble their father. Nowe if his will was to haue his glorie to be represented as well in Angels as in men, and to be seene in both natures, Osiander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behind men, because they did not beare the image of Christ. For they could not continually enjoy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleaue together vnder one head. Finally, if we beleuee Christ, this shalbe our last felicitie, to be made of like fourme to the Angels, when wee shalbe receiued vp into heauen. But if Osiander will conclude, that the originall paterne of the image of God was in Christ as he is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needs haue bene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth also to them.

7 Therefore, Osiander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a lier, vnlesse it had bene first stedfastly and vnchangeably decreed in his minde, to haue his sonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he should with the Angels haue bene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore haue bene necessarie, that the sonne of God should be made either man or Angel. And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the vnchangeable counsell of God had ben before the creation of man that Christ should be borne, not as the redeemer but as the first man, he should haue lost his prerogatiue: for asmuch as now he should be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is to restore mankind being lost, and so it might be gathered therevpon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should he so much abhorre that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that he was made like vnto vs in all thinges, except sinne? Wherevpon Luke doubteth not to reckon him the sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine knowe why Paul calleth Christ the seconde Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should haue ben called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was alreadie before knowen man in the minde of God, men were formed after the same paterne. But Paul in naming him the second Adam, setteth meane betwene the first beginning of man and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to haue nature restored to her first degree. Wherevpon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander reasoneth ill & vsauourily, that Adam, so long as he had stand without falling, should haue bene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answere by the contrary, because though y sonne of God had neuer put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body and in the soule of man should haue shined the image of God, in the bright beams whereof it alway appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the so-ueraigne supremacie in all. And so is that foolish subteltie assoiled, which Osiander bloweth abroade, that the Angels shoulde haue lacked this head, vnlesse it had bene purposed by God to clothe his sonne with fleshe, yea, though there had bene no fault of Adam. For he doeth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath no supremacie ouer Angels, that they should haue him for their Prince, but in so much as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the wordes of Paul, Col. 1. 15. that in as much as he is the eternall word of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures: not that he is create, or ought to bee reckened among creatures: but because the state of the worlde in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beauty, had no other originall: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For y^e Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all things were create by the sonne, that he might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might beginne to be the redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he sayth, that men should not haue had Christ to their king, if he had not bene man. As though the kingdome of God could not stande, if the eternall sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the felowshippe of his heauenly glorie and life, should himselfe beare the soueraintie. But in this false principle he is alway deceiued, or rather deceiueth himselfe, that the Church should haue bene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, euen as the Angels enioyed him their head, he could not likewise by his diuine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirite quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enioy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Osiander accounteth for most strong oracles: euen so as being dronke with the sweetnesse of his owne speculations, he vseth to blowe out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he sayth is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this now is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But howe proueth hee that to be a prophecie? Because in Matthew Christ giueth the same saying to God. As though that what soeuer God hath spoken by men, conteineth some prophecie. Let Osiander seeke prophecies in euery commandement of the lawe, which, it is certaine to haue come from G O D the author of them. Beside that, Christ should haue bene grosse and earthly, if he had rested vpon the literall sense. Because he speaketh not of the mysticall vni-

on wherunto he hath vouchsafed to receiue his Church, but only of faithfulnessse betweene man and wife: for this cause he reacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shalbe one fleshe, that no man shoulde attempt to breake that insoluble knot by diuorce. If Osiander loth this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his disciples further to a mysterie, in more suttely expounding the saying of his father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his error, which after he had sayd that we are flesh of the fleshe of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great mystery, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure & similitude of mariage to set forth the holy coupling together, that maketh vs one with Christ. And so doe the wordes found. Because when he giueth warning y^e he speaketh this of Christ & his church, he doth as it were by way of correction, seuer the spirituall ioyning of Christ and his Church from the lawe of mariage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I thinke

I neede no more to shake vp any more of that sort of chaffe, because the variety of them all his soone found out by this shORTE confutation. But this sobrietie shall abundantly suffice to feede soundly the children of G O D: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the sonne of God was sent, made of woman, made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That Christ toke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

NOwe, vnlesse I be deceiued, it were superfluous to entreate againe of the Godhead of Christ, which hath already in an other place bene proued with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seene, howe he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediatour. The trueth of his humane nature hath in the olde time bene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whome, the Marcionites fained a ghost in steed of the body of Christe, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heauenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture doe stande against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heauenly seed, nor in the counterfaiit shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the soone of Dauid and to the frut of his wombe. Therefore being deliuered in the flesh, he is called the sonne of Dauid and Abraham: not because he is onely borne of the wombe of the Virgine, and create in the aire, but because (as Paul expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seede of Dauid: as in an other place y^e Apostle reacheth, that he descended of the Iewes. For which cause the Lorde himselfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himself the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plainely that he was man truly issued of the seede of mankinde. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft, by so many meanes, with so great diligence and simplicity declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who woulde haue thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet we haue other testimonies at hande, if we list to heape vp more of them. As is that saying of Paul: that God sent his sonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, where by appeareth that he was subiect to hunger, thirst, colde, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be chosen, that may most auaille to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gaue not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him: but tooke our nature, that in flesh and bloud he might, by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Againe, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckned his brethren. Again, that he ought to haue bin made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull and faithful intercessour: that we haue not a Bishoppe that can not be compatiour of our infirmities. And such like. And for the same purpose serueth that which wee touched a litle before, that it behoued that the sinnes of the worlde should be cleansed in our fleshe: Which Paul plainely affirmeth. And truly, what so euer

the father hath giuen to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to vs, because he is the heade, from which the whole bodie being knitte together, groweth into one. Yea and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the Spirite was giuen him without measure, that all wee shoulde drawe of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidentall gifte. And for this cause Christ saith in an other place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them.

2 As for the places that they bring foorth to confirme their errour, they do too vnaptly wrest them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling subtleties, when they goe about to wipe away those things that I haue alleged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastickall bodie in steede of a true bodie: because in some places it is saide, that hee was made after the likenesse of a man, and that hee was founde in shape as a man. But so he nothing weieth what is Paules purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ tooke vppon him, but that whereas he might haue shewed foorth his godheade, hee made no other shewe of himselfe, but as of an abiect and vnregarded man. For, to exhorte vs by his example to submission, hee sheweth that forasmuch as he was God, he might haue by and by set forth his glorie to be seene to the worlde: but yet that hee gaue ouer some of his owne right, and of his owne accorde abased him selfe, because he did put on the image of a seruauit & contended with that humilitie, suffred his godheade to bee hidden with the veile of the fleshe. Hee doeth not here teach what Christ was, but how he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the text it is easily gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in shape hee was founde as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not shine foorth, but onely the shape of man appeared in base and abiect estate? For otherwise that place of Peter coulde not stande together, that he was deade in the fleshe, but quickened in the spirite, if the sonne of God had not bene weake in the nature of man: which Paul expresseth more plainely in saying, that hee suffred by reason of the weaknesse of the fleshe. And herevnto serueth the exaltation: because it is expressly saide, that Christ attained a newe glorie after that hee abased himselfe, which coulde not well agree to bee spoken of any, but of a man hating fleshe and soule. Manichees framed Christ a bodie of aire, because Christ is called the seconde Adam, heauenly of heauen. But neither in that place doeth the Apostle bring in a heauenly essence of the bodie, but a spirituall force which being powred abroad by Christ, doeth quicken vs. Now, as wee haue alreadie seene, Peter and Paul do seuer the same from his flesh. But rather that doctrine which is received among the true teachers, concerning the fleshe of Christ, is verie well proued by that place. For if Christe had not all one nature of bodie with vs, it were a verie vaine argument, that Paul with such vehemencie followeth: that if Christ bee risen againe, we shall also rise againe: and if wee do not rise, then that Christ also is not risen. By what cauillations so euer either the old Manichees or their newe Disciples goe about to escape, they shall not winde themselues away. It is a foule shifte, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sonne of man, in so much as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, verie man in deede is called the sonne of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to be vnderstanded by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles applic to Christ, shall bee sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindfull of him, or the sonne of man, that thou visitest him? In this figure is expressed the true manhood: of Christ. For though hee were not immediatly begotten of a mortall father, yet his race came from Adam. For else that place coule not stande which wee haue alreadie alleaged that Christe is made partaker of fleshe and blood, that he might gather to him yong children to the seruice of God. In which wordes it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellow and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning also hee saith, that both the author of holinesse and they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is prooued by the proesse of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowshipp of nature: because he by and by addeth, Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if hee had saide before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignitie, what cause shoulde there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioine himselfe to the base and vnnoble, therefore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they obiekt, that by this meane the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because wee knowe that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely fleshe maketh not a brotherly ioyning. But although the Apostle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when we say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meane which spirituallly graffeth vs into the body of Christ. Also they foolishly moue a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ shoulde haue bene borne of Adam streight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, & excellence of power. And more colour hath that which they bable, y^e Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankinde into fauour. For, to set out more largely the honor which God vouchsaued to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe set behinde vs. And if the testimonie of Moses be well weied, where hee saith that the seede of the woman shall breake the serpens heade, it shall vtterly end the controuersie. For onely Christ is not there spoken of, but all mankinde. Because the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, hee generally pronounceth that the posteritie of the woman should get the vpper hande of the deuiill. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankinde, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Eue, whome he spake vnto with good hope, that she should not faint with sorrow.

of the wombe of Dauid. For if the name of Seede had ben spoken in an allegorie, truly Paul woulde not haue left it vntolde, where hee plainly & without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sonnes of Abraham redeemers, but one Christ. Of like sorte is it that they alleadge: that hee is no otherwise called the sonne Dauid, but because he was promised and at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the sonne of God: in that he by and by addeth, According to the flesh, hee truly meaneth of nature. And so in the ninth Chapter calling him the blessed God, he saith seuerally beside, that according to the fleshe hee descended of the Iewes. Nowe if he were not truly begotten of the seede of Dauid, to what purpose shall be this saying, that he is the fruite of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loines shall hee descende, that shall abide in thy seate. Nowe in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Mattheu, they doe Sophistically mocke. For though he do not rehearse the parents of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowen abroad among the people, hee reckoneth it enough to shewe that Ioseph came of the seede of Dauid, when it was well knowen y Marie was of the same stocke. But Luke more presseeth them in teaching that saluation brought by Christ, is common to all mankind: because Christ the author of saluation proceeded from Adā the common parent of all. I graunt in deede, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered y Christ was the sonne of Dauid, but in so much as hee was begotten of the Virgine. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly, in this y to prooue that Christ tooke his bodie of nothing, they affirme that women are seedeles, and so they ouerthrowe the principles of nature. But because that is no question of diuinitie, and the reasons that they bring are so fickle, that they may verie easily be confuted: therefore I will not touch those thinges that belong to Philosophie and Phisike, and will hold me contented to wipe away those thinges that they alleadge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioiahad tooke wiues of the tribe of Iehudah, and so the difference of tribes had then beene confounded, if woman had engendring seed in her. But it is wel ynough knowen that as touching ciuill order, the kindreds are reckened by the seede of the man, and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man aboue woman proueth not the contrarie, but that in generation the seede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men onely: shall we therfore say, that the women are nothing? But verie children do know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this sort is said, that women bring forth to their husbands, because the name of the householde alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnnoble, according to the estate of their fathers: so also in y state of bondage the issue foloweth y wombe, according to the iudgement of the Ciuill lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is engendred of the seede of the woman. And it hath of long time ben receiued in common vse of all nations, y the mothers are called Genetrices, y is engenders. Wherewith Gods lawe also agreeth, which else should wrongfully forbid y marriage.

marriage of the vncke with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinitie betwene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marrie his sister by the mothers side, so that shee were begotten of an other father. But as I graunt that there is a passiue power ascribed to women, so do I answere that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not saide to bee made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their companie shaking of all shame doe too leudly aske, whether wee will say that Christ was engendred of the menstruall seede of the Virgine, for I will likewise aske of them, whether hee did not congele in the bloude of his mother, which they shall bee constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Marie, he was engendred of her seed: as a like engendring is meant when it is saide, that Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgine as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but hee seuereth this meruellous manner of generation from the common manner, for y^e by her was Christ begotten of the seed of Dauid. For euen in the same sort, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Ioseph of Iacob, likewise it is said that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Euangelist so frameth the order of his speech, and willing to prooue that Christ came of Dauid, is contented with this one reason, that hee was begotten of Marie. Whereby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Marie was of kinne to Ioseph.

4 The absurdities wherewith they woulde charge vs, are stuffed full of childish caullations. They thinke it a shame and dishonour to Christ, if he shoulde haue taken his originall of men: because hee so coulde not bee exempt from the vniuersall lawe that encloseth all the offspring of Adam with out exception, vnder sinne. But the comparison that wee reade in Paul doth easily assoile this doubt: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnesse of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeth an other comparison of his: the first Adam of earth, earthly and naturall, the seconde of heauen, heavenly. Therefore in an other place, the same Apostle, where hee teacheth that Christ was sent in the likenes of sinnefull fleshe to satisfie the lawe, doeth so expressely seuer him from the common estate of men, that he bee verie man without fault and corruption. But verie childishly they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ bee free from al spot, and was by the secrete working of the holy Ghost begotten of the seede of Marie, then is not the womans seede, but onely the mans seede vnclane. For wee doe not make Christ free from all spot, for this cause that he is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because hee is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and vncorrupted, such as shoulde haue beene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained stedfastly determined with vs, that so ofte as the scripture putteth vs in minde of the cleannes of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhoode: because it were superfluous to say that God is cleane. Also the sanctification that hee speaketh of in the seeuenteenth of Iohn, coulde haue no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of man is not vnclane or vitious of it selfe, but accidental by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Christ, by whome the estate of innocencie was to bee restored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas also they thrust this vpon vs for an absurditie, that if the Word of God did put on fleshe, then was it inclosed in a narrowe prison of an earthly bodie: this is but meere waywardnesse: because although the infinite essence of the worde did growe together into one person which the nature of man: yet doe wee faine no inclosing of it. For the sonne of God descended maruellously from heauen, so as yet hee left not heauen, it was his will to bee maruellously borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conuerfaunt in earth, and hange vpon the crosse, yet that hee alway filled the worlde euen as at the beginning.

The xiiij. Chapter.

Howe the two natures of the mediator doe make one person.

NOwe where it is saide, that the Worde was made fleshe: that is not so to be vnderstanded, as though it were either turned into fleshe, or confusedly mingled with fleshe, but because hee chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in: he that was the sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by vnitie of person. For we so affirme the godhead ioyned and vnited to the manhoode, that either of them haue their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fitte, whome wee see to consist of two substaunces, whereof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the bodie, nor the bodie the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be seuerally spoken of the soule; which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewise of the bodie that thing may be saide, which can by no meane agree with the soule: and that may bee saide of the whole man, which can be but vnfitlie taken neither of the soule nor of the bodie seuerally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the body sometime to the soule: and yet he that consisteth of them is but one man and not many. But such formes of speach doth signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diuerse natures which doe make the same person. And so do the Scriptures speake of Christ: Sometime they giue vnto him those things that ought singularly to bee referred to his manhood, & sometime those things that doe peculiarly belong to his godhead, and sometime those things that doe comprehend both natures, and do agree with neither of them seuerally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Christ, they doe with such religiousnesse expresse, that sometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the old authors called Communicating of properties.

2 These things were but weak, vnlesse many phrases of scripture, and such such as bee echwhere readie to finde, did prooue that nothing hereof hath bene deuised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was far disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what caullation the erroneous spirites doe deprauce this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was already foreknownen the Redeemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the mindes of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, and of purpose pronounceth vnto himselfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth aboute Abraham, he doth vndoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to y^e Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that hee is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whom all things keepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glorie with the Father before the creation of the worlde, and that hee worketh together with the father these things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these and such like are peculiarly ascribed to y^e godhead. But whereas he is called the seruant of the Father: and whereas it is saide, that he grew in age, wisdom and fauour with God and men: that he seeketh not his owne glorie: that hee knoweth not the last day: that hee speaketh not of himselfe: that he doeth not his owne will: where it is saide, that he was scene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his owne manhood. For in respect y^e he is God, neither can he increase in any thing, & hee worketh all things for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, hee doth all things according to the free choise of his owne wil, and can neither be scene nor felt. And yet he doth not seuerally ascribe these things to his nature of man onely, but taketh them vpon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul saith, that God did by his owne bloude purchase vnto him a Church: and the Lorde of glorie crucified. Again, where Iohn saith, y^e the Word of life was felt. Truly God neither hath blood, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with handes. But because he which was both verie God & man, Christ being crucified, did shed his blood for vs: those things y^e were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, & yet not without reason giuen to his god head. A like example is, where Iohn teacheth y^e God gaue his soule for vs: therefore there also y^e propertie of the manhood is communicate with the other nature. Again, when Christ saide being yet conuersant in earth, that no man haue ascended into heauen, but the sonne of man that was in heauen: truly according to his manhood, & in the flesh y^e he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himselfe was both God & man, by reason of the vnite of both natures, he gaue to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of al doe these places set forth the true substance of Christ, which doe comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in y^e Gospel of him. For y^e which is there red is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhood, but both together, y^e he hath receiued of his father power to forgive sins, to raise vp whome he will, to giue righteousnes, holines and saluation, to be made iudge ouer y^e quicke & the dead, to be honoured euen as the father is: Finally, that hee is called the

the light of the world, the good shepheard, the onely dore, the true Vine. For such prerogatiues had the sonne of god, when he was shewed in y flesh, which although he enioyed with his father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the same maner or the same respect, & which could not be giuen to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the iudgement ended, shal yelde vp the kingdom to God & the father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall haue any ending: but euen as hee lay hid vnder the baseness of the flesh, & abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, & laying aside the porte of maiestic, he shewed himself obedient to his father: & hauing performed all such subiection, at length is crowned with honor & glory, & auanced to the highest dominion, that all knees shall bow before him: so shall he then yeeld vp to his father both that name & crowne of glory, & whatsoeuer he hath receiued of his father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpose is power & dominion giuen him, but that the father should gouerne vs by his hand? In which sense it is also said, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, til we may enioy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they tooke no heed to the person of the Mediatour, haue obscured the natural meaning of almost all the doctrine y is read in the gospel of Iohn, & haue entangled them selues in many snares. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right vnderstanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediatour, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore, Christ shal reigne til he come forth to iudge y worlde, in so much as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the small measure of our weaknesse. But when we being made partakers of the heavenly glory, shal see God such as he is, then he hauing performed the office of Mediatour, shal cease to be y embassadour of his father, & shalbe contented with that glory which he enioyed before the making of the world. And the name of Lord doeth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the persō of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the meane degree betweene God & vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whome are all thinges, and one Lorde, by whom are all thinges, euen he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntil his diuine maiestic be to be seene face to face. From whom so farre is it of that any thing shal decay, by yelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shal become so much the more glorious. For then shal God also cease to be the head of Christ because Christes godhead shal then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certeine veile.

deuout reuerence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and phrentike spirits trouble not. They catch holde of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the Godhead; and likewise of those things that are spoken of his Godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are so ioyntly spoken of both natures, that they seuerally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, vnited, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true sonne of God, euen according to this manhood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driuen far away from vs, which when he went about rather to draw in sunder, than to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture crieth out with loude voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin her selfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while we go about to shew the vinity of the person, we destroy either nature. For we haue already alleaged so many testimonies, & there are euery where so many other to be alleaged, where his Godhead is distinguished from his manhood, as may stop the mouthes euen of the most contentious. And a litle hereafter I wil adioyne some testimonies, to confute better that fained deuise, but at this present, one place shal content vs. Christ would not haue called his body a Temple, vnlesse the Godhead did distinctly dwell therein. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lesse pestilent a monster, Michael Seruettus which did thrust in place of y^e sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vncreate. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of god, but in this, that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this ende tenderh his suttlety, that the distinction of the two natures being once ouerthrowne, Christ might be thought to be a certain thing mingled of God and man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole processe he trauaileth towarde this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were onely certain shadowish figures in God, wherof the truth or effect then at length was in being, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the sonne of God. And we in deede do confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable fauour of God, vnlesse this dignity were giuen him to be, and be called the onely begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is compted the sonne of God, because he beeing the Word begotten of the father before all worldes, did by hypostaticall vnion take vpon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall postatical vnion is called with the olde fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speech was deuised to ouerthrowe the doting errour of Nestorius, because he fained that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Seruettus slandereth vs, y^e we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternal Word was alreadye the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doeth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new god. And no more absurditie it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the Sonne, which the Angels wordes to Mary do secretly shewe, That holy thing that shalbe borne of thee, shalbe called the sonne of God: as if he shuld haue said, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the lawe, shoulde now become famous & euery where knowen abroad. Wherewith agreeth y^e saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, frely & with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the olde time also accompted among the children of God? Yea: & bearing them bold vpon that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into y^e world, the heauenly fatherhood is become more plainly knowen: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a priuilege to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, y^e God neuer was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten sonne: and that men specially, whome their own wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Seruettus should cauill, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becoming a sonne, which God had determined wth himselfe, because our purpose is not here to speake of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beastes: but because they could not in deede be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take y^e from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Wher as the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignitie did not hang vpon the redemption to come: yet must it needes be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I wil repeat it againe shortly, & adde the same of mankind. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels & men were created with this conditiō, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head & the first begotten of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: I think I doe rightly gather that he was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shal followe, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruettus & other such frantike men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he could not be called by that name. Nowe let them answere mee whether he be the sonne according to both natures, & in respect of both. So in deed they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. Wee graunt in deede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption only and grace, but the true and naturall, and therefore only sonne, y by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God vouchsaue to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a newe life: but the name of the true and onely begotten sonne, he giueth to Christ onely.

How can he be the onely sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which we haue receiued by gift? And the honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediatour, that he be truly & properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgine, & offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father vpon the crosse: but yet in respect of his

Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he saith, he was seuered out to preach the Gospel of God, which he had before promised of his sonne, which was begotten of the seede of Dauid according to his flesh, and declared the sonne of God in power. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he seuerally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, vnlesse he meant to shewe that this did hang vpon some other thing, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he saith, that he suffered by the weakenesse of the flesh, & rose againe by the power of the spirite, euen so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs graunt, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the Sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is an other thing & seuerall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here & there sometimes the Sonne of God, & sometimes y sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moued: but according to the common vse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the Sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrary I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead & eternal essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that hee is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Sonne of man. Againe, in the same place y I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the Sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, y Christ which according to y flesh descended of y Iewes, is God blessed for cuer. Now if in both places y distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right wil they say, y he which according to the flesh is the sonne of man, is not also y sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

Angel commanded, that the very same he that should be borne of the Virgine, should be called the Sonne of the highest. But, least they should glorie in so fickle an obiection, let them wey with vs a litle, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, y from his conception he began to be the Sonne of God, because he y is conceiued is called the Sonne of God, then shal it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because Iohn saith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Worde of life, which his handes haue handeled.

Likewise that, which is reade in the Prophet: Thou

Thou Bethleem in the lande of Iuda, art a litle one in thousandes of Iuda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israell, and his comming forth from the beginning, from the dayes of eternity. How will they be compelled to expounde this, if they will be content to followe such manner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we do not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly cōioyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to beholde the marueilous and singular fauour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserue. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellencie euen according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnity of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away y^e which is proper to the godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternal word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures vnited into one person, be diuerse wayes called the Sonne of God, than that hee be according to diuerse respectes, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the Sonne of Man. And no more doth that other cauillation of Seruettus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the describing of him, then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already clerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the worde begotten of the eternal father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediatour which he hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not bene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutuall relation to the Sonne, by whome all kinred or fatherhoode is reckned in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euen in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, he was the Son of God, before that this name was cōmonly known in the Church. But if they striue only about the onely word, Salomon discourfing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (sayth he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this testimony will not be of sufficient force: neither do I much ground vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they doe maliciously cauill, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent haue openly testified the same: so that their shamelesnesse is no lesse worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred, which dare obiect Ireneus and Tertullian against vs, both which doe confesse that the Sonne of God was inuisible, which afterward appeared visible.

Eph. 3. 15.

8. But although Seruettus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuises, which paraduerture the other would not allowe: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to be the son of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichees in olde time did foolishly affirme, that man hath his soule (as it were) by deriuation from God, because they reade that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast holde of the name of Sonne, that they leaue no difference betweene the natures, but babble disorderly, that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisedom, that Solomon

Eccl. 24. 14. speaketh of, is destroyed, and there is no account made of the Godhead in the Mediatour, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhoode. It were in deede profitable to confute the grosser deceites of Seruettus, where-with he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the ende that the godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselues within the compasse of sobernesse and modesty: sauing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I haue already done it in a booke by it self. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and euen then hee was before appointed to bee man that should be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other Word of God, but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a wil to begette a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time he confoundeth the Spirit with the Worde, for that God distributed the inuisible Word and the Spirit into flesh & soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, y he which then was but a shadowish sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the worde, to which he assigneth the office of seede. Whereby it shall followe that hogges & dogges are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seede of the worde of God. For although he compound Christ of three vncreate elementes to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he saineth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And lest he should seeme to strippe Christ out of his godheade, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantiall with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the flesh into God. So while he can not conceiue Christ to be the Son of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Worde to nothing, and taketh from vs the sonne of Dauid, that was promised to be the Redeemer. He oft repeteth this, that the Sonne was begotten of G O D by knowledge and predestination, & that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elementes, which afterward appeared in the first light of the worlde, in the cloude and in the pillar of fire. Nowe how shamefully he sometime disagreeeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this short recitall the readers that haue their sound witte may gather, that with the circumstances of this vnclane dog the hope of saluation is vtterly extinguished. For if the fleshe were the godheade it selfe, it shoulde cease to be the temple thereof. And none can be our redeemer, but he that begotten of the seede of Abraham and Dauid, is according to the flesh, truly made man. And he wrongfully standeth vpon the wordes of John, that the Worde was made flesh for as they resist the error of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked inuention, whercof Eutiches was author, forasmuch as the onely purpose of the Euangelist was to defend the vnitie of persons in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That vs we may knowe, to what end Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his kingdom, and his Priesthood.

AVgustine saith rightly; that although the Heretikes do bragge of the name of Christ, yet they haue not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ. Christ shall be found among them onely in name, and not in very deede. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the worlde; founde in their mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretense of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul may be well spoken of them, that they haue not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde sound matter of saluation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be stablished, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes. For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, & a priest. Albeit, it were but small profite to know those names, without knowledge of the ende and vse of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profite, where it is not known what eche of these titles containeth in it. We haue said before, howe, though God sending Prophets by continual course one after another, did neuer leaue his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to saluation; that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this persuasion, that full light of vnderstanding was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritans, who yet neuer knewe the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman; When Messias commeth, he shall teach vs all things. And the Iewes had not rashly gathered this vpon presumptions in their mindes: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleued. Notable among the other is that saying of E say: Beholde, I haue made him a witnesse to peoples, I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaster to peoples: euen as in another place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counsel. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the Gospel, after that he had saide, that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diuersly, and vnder manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloued Sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to kepe the Church in suspense, & to vphold it vntil the comming of the Mediator, therfore we read that in their scattering abroad, the faithful complained that they were depriued of that ordinarie benefite, saying: We see not our tokens: there is not a Prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to seale vp the vision and the Prophet, not only that the Prophecie, which is there spoken of, should be stablished in assured credit, but also that the faithfull should learne with contented minde to want the Prophets for a time, because the fulnesse and closing vp of all reuelations was at hand.

2 Now it is to be noted, that the title of cōmendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the law, as well the Prophets as Priestes and Kings were anoynted with holy oyle. For which cause the renoumed name of Messias was giuen to the promised Mediatour. But though in deede I confesse, (as I haue also declared in an other place,) that he was called Messias by peculiar consideration & respect of his kingdome: yet the annoyntings in respect of the office of Prophet & of priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in E say, in these words: The spirite of the Lorde Iehoua vpon me. Therefore the Lord hath anointed me, that I should preach to the meeke, should bring health to the contrite in heart, shoulde declare deliuerance to captiues, should publish the yere of good will, &c. Wee see y he was annoynted with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witnesse of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is seuered from other teachers, that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that he tooke not the annointing for himselfe alone, that he might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole body, that in his continuall preaching of the Gospel, the vertue of the Spirit should ioyne withall. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, y by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an ende is made of all prophecies: so that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospel, doe patche any foraine thing vnto it. For that voice which thundered from heauen, saying: This is my beloued sonne, heare him: hath auanced him by singular priuilege about the degrees of all other. Then, this oyntment is poured abroad from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Joel. Your children shal prophesie, & your daughters shal see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was giuen vs vnto wisdom: and in another place, y in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge & vnderstanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceiue what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitenesse of heauenly good things. For which cause he writeth in another place: I haue counted it precious to knowe nothing, but Iesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospel. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that we might knowe y in the summe of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained al points of perfect wisdom.

3 Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vaine to speake, if y readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spiritual. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serueth, and what it auaileth vs, and y whole force and eternitie therof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angel doeth attribute to the person of Christ: and againe the Angel in Luke doeth worthily applic to the saluation of the people. But that is also double or of two sortes, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is proper to euery member. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalme: I haue once sworne by my holinesse to Dauid, I will not lie, his seede shall abide for euer, his seate shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be stablished as the Moone for euer, and a faithfull witness in heauen. Neither is it doubtful, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hande of his sonne an eternall gouerner and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophetic can be founde no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediatly after y^e death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignitie of the kingdome fell away, & was to the dishonour of the house of Dauid. conueyed ouer to a priuat man, and afterwarde by litle and litle was diminished, till at length it came to vter decay, with heauy & shamful destruction. And the same meaning hath y^e exclamation of Esaie: Who shall shew forth his generation? For he so pronounceth that Christ shall remaine aliue after death, that he ioyneth him with his members. Therefore, so oft as wee heare that Christe is armed with eternall power, let vs remember that the euerlasting continuance of the Church is vpholden by this supporte, to remaine still safe among the troublesome tossings, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the greuous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when Dauid scorneth the boldnesse of his enemies, that go about to breake the yoke of GOD and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kinges and peoples raged in vaine, because hee that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assaultes: he assureth the Godly of the continuall preservation of the Church, and encourageth them to hope wel so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in an other place, when he sayth in the person of God: sit at my right hande, till I make thine enemies thy footstool: he warneth vs, that how many and strong enemies so euer doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to preuaile against that vchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: wherupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the worlde, may be able at any time to destroye the Church, which is grounded vpon the eternall seat of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the special vse of euery one; the very same eternal continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we see, that whatsoeuer is earthly and of the worlde, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounceth that his kingdome is not of this worlde. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spiritual, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is nowe defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full frute of this grace in the worlde to come.

4 That, as we haue saide, the force and profit of the kingdome of Christ can not otherwise be perceiued by vs, but when we knowe it to be spiritual: appeareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must liue in warfare vnder the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is harde and miserable: what then should it profit vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenly king, vnlesse we were certaine to enioy

the frute thereof out of the state of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be knowen, that whatsoeuer felicity is promised vs in Christ, it consisteth not in outwarde commodities, that we should leade a merry and quiet life, flourish in wealth, be assured from all harmies, and flowe full of those delitefull thinges that the flesh is wont to desire: but that it wholly belongeth to the heauenly life. But as in the worlde the prosperous and desired state of the people is partly maintayned by plentie of good thinges and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences; wherby it may be safe against outwarde violence: so Christ also doth enrich his with all thinges necessarie to eternall saluation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength; by which they may stande inuincible against all assaults of principal enemies. Wherby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs than for himselfe, and that both within and without: that being furnished, so farre as God knoweth to be expedient for vs, with the gifts of the spirit, wherof we are naturally emptie, we may by these first frutes perceiue that we are truly ioyned to God vnto perfect blessednes. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the same spirit, wee may not doubt that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Deuill, the worlde, and euery kinde of hurtfull thing. To this purpose tenderth the answer of Christ to the Pharisees, that because the kingdome of God is within vs, it shall not come with obseruation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same king vnder whom the soueraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in scorne required him to shewe forth his signes. But he, because they (who otherwise are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest vpon worldly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their own consciences, because the kingdom of God is righteoufnes, peace & ioy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdome of Christ auaieth vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subiect to corruption, but spirituall: he listeth vs vp euen to eternall life, that we may patiently passe ouer this life in miseries, hunger, colde, contempt, reproches, and other grieues, contented with this one thing, that our king will neuer leaue vs destitute, but succour vs in our necessities, til hauing ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his maner of reigning, to communicate with vs al that he hath receiued of his father. Now wheras he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnisheth vs with beauty and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministred vnto vs most plentifull matter to glorie vpon, & also bolde courage to fight without feare against the Deuill, sinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteoufnesse, we may valiantly ouercome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally filleth vs with his gifts, so we again for our part, may bring forth frute to his glorie.

5 Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vnto vs, not done with oile or ointmentes made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God, because vpon him hath rested the spirit of wisdome, vnderstanding, counsell, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalme reporteth that he was anointed aboue his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needy & hungry. For, as plenty vpon vs being hungry and dry. For as it is saide, that the father gaue the spirite to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, Iohn. 1. 16. that all we should receiue of his fulnesse, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall giuing, whereof Paul maketh mention, where- Eph. 4. 7. by grace is diuersely distributed to the faithfull, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I saide, sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdom of Christ consisteth in y^e spirit, not in earthly delits or pompes, and therefore we must forsake the worlde that we may be partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptilme of Christe, Iohn. 1. 33. when the holy Ghost rested vpon him in the likenesse of a doue. Luk. 3. 22. That the holy Ghost and his giftes are meant by the word Anointing, ought to seeme neither noueltie nor absurditie. For we are none other way quickned, specially for so much as concerneth the heauenly life: there is no droppe of liuely force in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his seat in Christ, that from thence the heauenly riches might largely flowe out vnto vs, whereof wee are so needy. And whereas both the faithfull stande inuincible by the strength of their king, and also his spiritual riches plentifully flowe out vnto them, they are not vnworthily called Christians: But this eternitie whereof we haue spoken, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paul: Then he shall yelde vp the kingdome to God and the Father. 1. Cor. 15. 24. Againe: The sonne him selfe shall be made subiect, that 1. Cor. 15. 28. God may be all in all things: for his meaning is nothing els, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingdome shall not be such as it is now. For the father hath giuen al power to the sonne, that by the sonnes hande he may gouerne, cherish and sustaine vs, defend vs vnder his sauegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a litle time we are waucring abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and vs, by litle and litle to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truely, whereas he sitteth on the right hande of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the fathers deputie, vnder whom is the whole power of his dominion, because it is Gods will to rule and defende his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paul doth expounde it in the first chapiter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hande of the father, to be the head of the Church, which is his body. And to noe other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is giuen him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Iesus all knees should bow, and all tongues confesse that it is to the glorie of G O D the Father. For euen in the same wordes also he setteth out in the kingdome of Christe an order necessarie for our present weakenesse. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God shall then be by himselfe the only head of the Church, because Christes office in defending of the Church, shall be fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lorde, because his Father did sette him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lordely power by him. For though there be many lordeshippes in the worlde, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whome are all things and we in him, and one Lorde Christ, by whome are all things and we by him sayth Paul. Wherevpon is rightly gathered that he is the selfe same G O D, which by the mouth of Esay affirmed himselfe to be the king and the lawe maker of the Church. For though he do euery where call al the power that he hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing else, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediator, that descending from the bosome & incomprehensible glory of the father, he might approach nie vnto vs. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, & that with great cherefulness we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he ioyneth the offices of king and pastor toward them that willingly yeelde themselues obedient: so on the other side we heare that he beareth an yron scepter, to breake and broose all the obstinate like potters vessels: wee heare also that he shalbe the iudge of nations, to couer the earth with dead corpses, and to ouerthrowe the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples scene at this day: but the full proufe thereof shalbe at the last iudgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome.

Psa. 2. 9.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the end and vse of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from all spotte, that should by his holinelle reconcile vs to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entry, and God according to his office of iudge is bent against vs, it is necessarie that some expiation be vsed, that he being a priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoued that he should come forth with a sacrifice. For in the lawe it was not lawefull for the priest to enter into the sanctuarie without bloud, that the faithfull might knowe, that though there were a priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Vpon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the epistle to the Hebrues, from the seuenth chapter almost to the ende of the tenth. But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of priesthoode can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our guiltines, and satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemn oth of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall point, which he knewe to be the chiefe ioynte whereupon our saluation hanged. For, as it is sayde, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the priestes do sanctifie vs and obtain grace for vs, from which the vncleanesse of our wicked doings and sinnes doth debarre vs. So doe we see, that we must beginne at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profite of his Priesthoode may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that he is an eternal intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godly consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tendernesse of God, and are certainly perswaded that it pleaseth him, whatsoeuer is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the lawe, God commanded sacrifices of beastes to be offered to him: there was an other and an new order in

Psa. 110. 4.

Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the priest: because there neither could be founde any other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthie so great honour to offer vp to God his onely begotten sonne. Nowe Christ beareth the person of a Priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father fauorable and mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the felowship of so great an honour. For wee that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priestes in him doe offer vp our selues, & all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heauenly sanctuarie, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, may bee acceptable and sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre doeth that saying of Christ extende: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, hauing his holinesse powred vpon vs, in as much as hee hath offered vs with himselfe to his father, we that otherwise doe stinke before him, doe please him as pure & cleane, yea & holy. Herevnto serueth the anointing of the sanctuarie, whereof mention is made in Daniel. For the cōparison of contrarietie is to be noted betwene this anointing, and that shadowish anointing that then was in vse: as if the Angell should haue saide, that the shadowes being driuen away, there should be a cleere priesthōode in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their inuention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, haue presumed to thrust in themselues to kill him: which is dayly interprised among the Papistes, where the Masse is reckened a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvj. Chapter.

Howe Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, wherein is intreated of his death, and Resurrection, and his Ascending vnto Heauen.

AL that we haue hetherto saide of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, we may seeke for righteousnes, deliuerance, life and saluation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen giuen to men where in they must be saued. Neither was the name of Iesus giuen him vnadvisedly, or at chaunfable aduenture, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angel the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to saue the people from their sins. In which words y is to be noted, which we haue touched in an other place, y the office of redeemer was appointed him, y he should be our Sauour: but in the meane time our redemption should be but vnperfect, vnles he should by continual proceedings conuey vs forward to y vttermost marke of saluation. Therefore, so soone as we swarte nener so little from him, our saluation by litle & litle vanisheth away, which wholly resteth in him: so y all they wilfully spoile the selues of all grace, y rest not in him. And y admonition of Bernard is worthie to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not only light, but also meat, yea & oile also, without which all the meat of y soule is drie, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vnfauoric. Finally, that it is honye in the mouth, melodie in the eare and and ioyfulnesse in the hearte, and also medicine, and that whatsoeuer is spoken in disputation is vnfauoric, but where this name soundeth. But here it behoueth to wey diligently how saluation is purchased by him for vs: that wee may not onely bee perswaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast vpholding of our faith, wee may refuse all such things as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For sith no man can descende into himselfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demaundeth satisfaction: there is no common assurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lyeth alwaye vpon sinners, till they bee loose from their guiltinesse: who, as hee is a righteous iudge, suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

2. But before we goe any further, it is to be scene by the way, how it agreeth together, that God which preuented vs with his mercie, was our enimie vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For howe coulde he haue giuen vs in his onely begotten Sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse hee had alreadye before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Because therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vndoe this knotte. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this manner in the scriptures, that God was enimie to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were seuered from God, till they were receiued into a conioyning by his bodie. Such manner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that wee may the better vnderstand howe miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse wordes, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and euerlasting death did rest vpon vs, wee woulde lesse acknowledge howe miserable wee shoulde bee without Gods mercie, and woulde lesse regarde the benefite of deliuerance. As for example. If a man heare this spoken to him: If God at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserued, thou shouldest haue suffered horrible destruction: but because hee hath willingly and of his owne free kindnesse kept thee in fauour, and not suffred thee to bee estraunged from him, hee hath so deliuered thee from that perill: truely he will bee moued with, and in some parteele howe much hee oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that hee was by sinne estraunged from God, the heir of wrath, subiect to the curse of eternall death, excluded from all hope of saluation, a straunger from all blessing of God, the bondslaue of Satan, captiue vnder the yoke of sinne: Finally, ordeyned vnto and alreadye entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreate for him, that Christ tooke vpon him and suffered the punishment which by the iust iudgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that hee hath purged with his bloode those euils that made them hatefull to God, that by this expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the father, that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betweene God and men:

men: that vpon this bonde is contained his good will toward them: shall not he be so much the more moued with these, as it is more liuely represented, out of howe great miserie hee hath beene deliuered? In a summe: because our minde can neither desirously enough take hold of life in the mercie of God, nor receiue it with such thankfulness as we ought, but when it is before stricken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dread of eternall death, we are so taught by holy scripture, that without Christ wee may see God in manner wrathfully bent against vs, and his hand armed to our destruction: and that wee may inbrace his good will and fatherly kindnes no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weakenesse of our capacitie, yet it is not falsely saide. For God which is the highest righteousness, can not loue wickednesse which hee seeth in vs all. Therefore we all haue in vs that, which is worthie of the hatred of GOD. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truely we are all in displeasure of God, guiltie in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lorde will not loose that which is his in vs, hee findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue: For howsoever we be sinners by our owne fault, yet wee remayne his creatres. Howsoever we haue purchased death to our selues, yet hee made vs vnto life. So is hee moued by meere and free louing of vs, to receiue vs into fauour. But sith there is a perpetuall and vnappesable disagreement betweene righteousness and iniquitie, so long as wee remaine sinners, hee cannot receiue vs wholie. Therefore; that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholy reconcile vs vnto him, hee doeth by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoeuer euill is in vs; that we, which before were vncleane and vnpure, may nowe appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doeth with his loue preuent and goe before our reconciliation in Christ, yea, because hee first loued vs, therefore he afterwarde doeth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But because, vntill Christ with his death come to succour vs, there remaineth wickednes in vs, which deserueth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore we are not fully and firmly ioyned to God, vntill Christ doe ioyne vs. Therefore if we will assure our selues to haue God made well pleased and fauourable vnto vs, wee must fasten our eyes and mindes vpon Christ onely: as in deed we obtaine by him onely, that our finnes bee not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paul saith, that the same loue, wherewith GOD embraced vs before the creation of the worlde, was stayed and grounded vpon Christ. These things are plaine and agreeable with the scripture, and doe make those places of Scripture. to accorde verie well together, where it is said: that God declared his loue toward vs in this, that hee gaue his onely begotten sonne to death: and yet that hee was our enimie till he was made fauourable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly proued to them that require the testament of the old Church I will alleadge one place of Augustine, where hee teacheth the verie same that wee doe. The loue of God (saith he) is incomprehensible and vnchan-

is alleaged by the Euangelist. He was accounted among the wicked. And why so? euen to take vpon him the stede of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, because hee suffered death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when wee heare that hee was acquitted by the same mouth whereby hee was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more than once to beare witness of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other Prophet: y^e he repayed that which he had not taken away. And so wee shall beholde the person of a sinner and euill doer represented in Christ: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. Hee suffered therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the solemne sentence of the President, was reckned in y^e number of wicked doers: but yet not so, but y^e he was by the same iudge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquittall, that the guiltinesse which made vs subiect to punishment, is remoued vpon the heade of the sonne of God. For this setting of one against the other, wee ought principally to holde fast, least wee tremble and bee carefull all our life long, as though the iust vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the sonne of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

6 Beside that, the verie manner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accursed, not onely by opinion of men, but also by decree of the lawe of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Crosse, hee made himselfe subiect to the curse. And so it behocued to be done, that when the curse was remoued from vs to him, we might be deliuered from all curse y^e for our sins was prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadowe expressed in the law. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offered for sinnes, were called Ashemoth. Which worde properly signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figuratine change of name, the holy Ghost meant to shew, that they were like vnto cleansing playsters to draw out to themselues, and beare the curse due to sinne. But that same which was figuratiuely represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is indeede deliuered in Christ the originall paterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gaue his owne soule to be an asham, that is a satisfactorie oblation as the Prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so cease to be imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainely, where he teacheth, that he which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that wee might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the son of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put vpon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side couered vs with his cleanness. It seemeth that he meant the same when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the Father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remoued and laide vpon the fleshe of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offered vp to his Father for a satisfactorie sacrifice; that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, wee might cease to dread

the wrath of God. Now is it plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs all were lay d vpon him, that is, that he intending to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enterchanged imputation, couered with them. Of this, the crosse whereunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) redeemed vs from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is euery one that hangeth on the tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where he teacheth that Christ did beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Because by the very token of the curse wee doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstanded, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerloden, but rather that in taking it vpon him, he did treade downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueth acquitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doeth not without a cause honourably report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he sayth, that the hand writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the Princely powers were spoyled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp him selfe by the eternall spirite. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of things. But that these things may take stedfast roote, and be throughly settled in our heartes, let vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For wee could not certainly beleue that Christ was the ransome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therefore there is so often mention made of bloud, where the Scripture sheweth the maner of our redeeming. Albeit the bloud of Christ that was shed, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to cleanse away our filthinesse.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where again it is to be seene, howe he did euery where put himselfe in our steede, to paye the price of our redemption. Death held vs bounde vnder his yoke, Christ in our steede did yeeld himselfe into the power of death, to deliuer vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs. But in this he differed frō vs, that he gaue himselfe to death, as it were to be deuoured, not that hee should be swallowed vp with the gulfes of it, but rather that he should swallowe vp it, of which we should haue been presently swallowed: that he gaue himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with y power thereof, but rather that he should ouerthrowe death which approached neere vs, yea, and had alreadie beaten vs downe and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuel: and might deliuer them that by feare of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of himselfe with vs, he mortiſieth our earthly members, that they ſhould no more hereafter uſe their owne workes: and killeth our olde man, that it ſhould no more liue & beare fruite. And to the ſame purpoſe pertaineth his burial, that wee being partakers thereof, ſhould alſo be buried to ſinne. For when the Apoſtle teacheth that wee are graſſed into the likenesse of the death of Chriſt, and buried with him to the death of ſinne, that by his croſſe the worlde was crucified to vs, and wee to the worlde, that wee are dead together with him, he doeth not onely exhorte vs to expreſſe the example of Chriſtes death, but hee declareth that there is ſuch effectualneſſe in it, as ought to appeare in all Chriſtians, vnleſſe they will make his death vnprofitable and fruiteleſſe. Therefore in the death and buriall of Chriſt, there is offered vs a double benefite to bee enjoyed, that is deliuerance from death, wherevnto wee were become bonde, and the mortifying of our fleſh.

8 But it is not meete to ouerpaffe his going down to the helles, wherein is no ſmall importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the olde fathers, that that parte which is read in the Creed was not in olde time ſo much uſed in the Churches: yet in entreating of the ſumme of our doctrine, it is neceſſarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a verie profitable and not to be deſpiſed myſterie of a right weightie matter. And there are alſo ſome of the olde writers that do not leaue it out. Whereby wee may geſſe, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not preſently but by litle & litle growe in uſe in the Churches. But this certainly is out of queſtion, that it proceeded of the common iudgement of all the godly: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doeth not in his writings make mention of Chriſtes going downe to the helles, although after diuerſe maner of expoſition. But by whome, or at what time it was firſt added, maketh litle to the purpoſe. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heede vnto, that we therein certainly haue a full and in all pointes perfect ſumme of our faith, wherein nothing may be thruſt, but that which is taken out of the moſte pure worde of God. Nowe, if any will not for precise curioſitie admit it into the Creede, yet ſhall it ſtreight way be made to appeare plainely, that it is of ſo great importance to the ſumme of our redemption, that if it be left out, there is loſt a great parte of the fruite of the death of Chriſt. There are againe ſome that thinke, that there is no newe thing ſpoken in this article, but that in other wordes the ſame thing is repeated which was ſpoken before of his buriall: for as much as the worde Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture often times uſed for the graue. I graunt that to be true which they alleage of the ſignification of the worde, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue: but there are againſt their opinion two reaſons, by which I am eaſily perſuaded to diſſent from them. For what an idleneſſe were it, when a thing not harde to vnderſtand, hath once beene ſet out in plaine & eaſie wordes, afterwarde with darker implication of wordes, rather to point towarde it than to declare it. For when two maners of ſpeaking that expreſſe one thing be ioyned together, it behoueth that the later be an expoſition of the former. But what an expoſition were this, if a man ſhould say thus: Whereas it is sayd that Christ was buried, thereby is meant that he went downe to hell? Againe, it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition could haue crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe points of our faith are summarily noted in as fewe wordes as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shall haue somewhat diligently weyed the matter it selfe, will easily agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christe went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the lawe, to carry them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliuer them out of the prison wherein they were kept enclosed: & to the prooffe hereof they do wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalme, that he brake the brasen geates and yron barres. Againe out of Zacharie, that he redeemed them that were bounde, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalme speaketh of their deliuerances that in far countries are cast captiue into bondes, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonicall ouerthrowe, wherein the people was oppressed, to a dry pit or bottomlesse deapth, and therewithal teacheth that the saluation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepe helles. I wot not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place vnder the earth whereunto they haue fained the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authours, and at this day many doe earnestly defende it for a truth: is yet nothing els but a fable. For, to enclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is very childish. And what neede was it that Christes soule should goe downe thither to set them at libertie? I doe in deede willingly confesse, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might know that the grace which they had onely tasted of by hope, was then deliuered to the worlde. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he sayth, that Christ came and preached to the spirites that were in a dongeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the very processe of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace y^e we were: because he doth thereby amplifie the force of Christs death, for that it pearced euen to the dead, when the godly soules enioyed y^e present sight of that visitation which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all saluation. But whereas Peter in his saying maketh no distinction between them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but only he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

10 But concerning Christes going downe to the hels, beside the consideration of the Crede, we must seeke for a more certaine exposition, and wee assuredly haue such a one out of the word of God, as it not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death had bin to no effect, if he had suffred only a corporal death: but it behoued also y^e he should feele the rigor of Gods vengeance: that he might both appease his wrath and satisfie his iust iudgement. For which cause also it behoued that he should as it were hande to hande wrastle with the armies of the hels and the horrou of eternall death. We haue euen now alleaged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon him: that he was striken of his father for our sinnes, and broused for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the steede of wicked doers, as surety and pledge, yea & as the very guilty person himselfe, to abide and suffer all the punishments that shold haue beene layde vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden still of the sorrowes of death. Therefore it is no marueile if it be said that he went downe to the hels, sith he suffered that death wherewith God in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea & to be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is peruerted, because it were an absurdity to set \dot{y} after his buriall which went before it. For after the setting foorth of those things that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order foloweth that inuisible and incomprehensible iudgment which he suffered in the sight of God: that we should knowe that not onely the body of Christ was giuen to be the price of our redemption, but that there was an other greater and more excellent price payed in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible tormentes of a damned and forsaken man.

II According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe hauing loosed the sorowes of death, of which it was impossible that he should be holden, or ouercome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expreseth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the sorowes of death, which proceeded from the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For howe small a matter had it bin, carelessly and as it were, in sporte to come foorth to suffer death? But this was a true proufe of his infinite mercy, not to shun that death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrues, where he wryteth: that Christ was hearde of his owne Feare: some translate it Reuerence or piety, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the very maner of speaking proueth. Christ therefore praying with teares & mighty crie, is heard of his own feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place hee had but our person vpon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomlesse depth, than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken and estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euen as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Euen thither we see that Christ was throwne downe, so farre \dot{y} by enforcement of distresse he was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himselfe: that is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is euident, that this saying proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottom of his heart. Yet doe we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemy or angry with him. For howe could he be angry with his beloued son, vpon whō his mind rested: Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himselfe? But this is our meaning: \dot{y} he suffred the grieuouse esse of Gods rigour, for \dot{y} he being striken & tormented with the hand of God, did feele all the tokens of God when he is angrie & punisheth. Whereupon Hylary argueth thus, that by this going downe we haue obtained this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeth with our iudgement, as where he saith: The crosse, death, & hels are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of god is in the hels, but man is caried vp to heauen. But why do I alleage the testimony of a priuate man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruit of his victorie, that they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage: It behoued therefore, that he shall ouercome that feare, that naturally doeth continually torment & oppresse all mortall men: which coulde not be done but by fighting with it. Moreouer, that his feare was no common feare or conceiued vpon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the diuel, with the horror of death with the paines of the hels, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed ouer them, that we now in death should no more feare those thinges, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some leud men, although vnlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I do a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against conueniencie of reason, that he should be fearefull for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauillation wth saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperation, which is contrary to faith. First they do but maliciously moue controuersie of Christs feare and trembling, which the Euangelists do so plainly report. For a litle before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirit & passioneth with heauinesse, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfeit, that is too foule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truely teacheth, boldly confesse the sorrowfulness of Christ, vnlesse wee be ashamed of his crosse. And truely, if his soule had not bene partaker of paine, he had bene only a redeemer for bodies. But it behoued that he should wrastle, to raise vp them that laye thrown down. And his heavenly glory is so nothing appaired therby, that euen herein gloriously shineth his goodnesse which is neuer sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weaknesse vpon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorrowes, which the Apostle setteth before vs: that this Mediatour did feele our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in misery. They say: that that thing which is euil of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which ioyneth these two thinges together, that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that hee was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakenes of Christ should make vs affrayde, whereunto he was not by violence or necessitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercy was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoeuer he of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backbiters deceiued, that they do not perceiue in Christ an infirmite cleane and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience. For whereas there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affections do with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they do wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his vncorrupted state, then there was a moderatiō hauing force in all his affections, to restraine excesse. Whereby it might well be that hee was like vnto vs in sorrow, dread, & fearfulness, and yet that by this marke he differed from vs. Being so confuted, they leape to another cauillation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse & wrath of God fro which he knewe himselfe to be safe. But let the godly readers weye how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more fearefull than the most part of the very rascall sort of men. Theeues & other euil doers do obstinately hast to death, many do with hautie courage despise it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it, for the soune of God to be astonished and in a manner striken dead with feare of it? For euen that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemencie of grieffe, very drops of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shewe to the eies of other, but when in a secret corner whither he was gone out of company, he groned vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all dout, that it was needeful that he should haue Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted maner of comforting. How shameful a tendernes, as I said, should this haue bene, to be so farre tormented for feare of cōmon death, as to melt in bloudie sweate, & not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of Angels? What? doth not that prayer thrise repeated, (Father, if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitternesse of heart, shew that Christ had a more cruel & harder batrel than with common death? Wherby appeareth that those triflers against whome I now dispute, do boldly babble vpon thinges that they knowe not, because they neuer earnestly considered what it is, or of howe great importance it is that we be redeemed from the iudgement of God. But this is our wisdom, wel to vnderstand how deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man should aske me, if Christ went then down to hel, when he prayed to escape that death: I answere, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grieuous & terrible tormentes hee suffered, when he knew himselfe to stand to be arained for our cause before the iudgement seat of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the spirit did hide it selfe, to giue place to the weaknesse of the flesh: yet must we know, y^e the tentation by feeling of sorrow & feare was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the Sermon of Peter, y^e he could not be holden of the sorrowes of death, because when he felt himself as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue from the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that his notable calling vpo God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? For though he was aboute measure grieued, yet he cesseth not to call him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confuted as well the errour of Apollinaris, as theirs y^e were called Monothelites. Apollinaris fained that Christ had an eternall spirite in steade of a soule, so that he was only but halfe a man. As though he could cleanse our finnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is affection or wil of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we knowe was troubled for this purpose, to driue away feare, & bring peace & quietnes to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrary affection. For herein is a plaine shewe of contrarietie. Father deliuer me from this houre. But euen therefore I came euen into this houre. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in vs, euen then when we most of all endeouour to subdue our selues.

Ioh. 11. 27.

13 Nowe followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that wee haue hitherto, were but vnperfect. For sith there appeareth in the crosse, death, and buriall of Christ nothing but weakenesse: faith must passe beyond all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although wee haue in his death a full accomplishment of saluation, because by it both wee are reconciled to God, and his iust iudgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penaltie fully payde: yet wee are saide to be regenerate into a liuing hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the very resurrection: but how this is, is better expressed in the wordes of Paul. For he sayeth, that Christ died for our finnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue sayde: that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousnesse was renewed and restored. For howe coulde he by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselve had lyen still ouercome by death? How coulde he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himselve had bene vanquished in fight? wherefore wee do so parte the matter of our saluation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death wee say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousnesse was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meane of his resurrection, his death doeth shewe foorth her force and effect vnto vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his very resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vttered his heauenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and a stedfast stay of our faith. As also in another place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirite. And in the same meaning in another, where he entreateth of perfection, he sayth: that I may knowe him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith beeing ypholden by his death shoulde wauer, but that the power of God which kepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shew it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death only, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it is vsed seuerally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtained the crowne of conquest, so that there should be both resurrection and life: therefore Paul doth for good cause affirme that faith is destroyed, and the Gospel is become vaine & deceitful, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our hearts. Therefore in an other place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ against all the terrours of damnation, to amplify the same, he saith further: Yea, the same He which dyed, is risen vp againe, and now standeth a Mediatour for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that vpon the partaking of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh: so is it to be vnderstanded, that by his resurrection we obtaine an other commoditie which answereth that mortification. For (saith the Apostle) we are therefore grafted into the likenesse of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to prooue that wee ought to mortifie our members vpon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to seeke for those things y^e are aboue, & not those that are vpon the earth. By which wordes we are not only exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to follow a newnesse of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power that we are regenerate in to righteousness. Wee obtaine also a third fruit of his resurrection, that wee are, as by an earnest deliuered vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we knowe that his resurrection is a most certeine argument. Whereof hee disputeth more at large in the fiftene chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is saide, that he rose againe from the dead: in which saying is expressed the truth both of his death & of his resurrection: as if it had bene said, that he did both dye the same death that other men naturally do dye, and receiued immortalitie in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

14 To his resurrection is not vnfitly adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ began more fully to set forth his glory & power by rising againe, for that he had now layd away that base & vnnoble estate of mortal life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascending vp into heauen only, he truly began his kingdome. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfil all things. Where in seeming of repugnancie he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed from vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had bene penned in a base lodging of the flesh, while he was conuersant in earth. And therefore Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by saith, that the holy Ghost was not yet giuen to the faithful, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lorde himselve also did testifie to the Disciples, saying: It is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not goe away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But he giueth them a comfort for his corporal absence, that he will not leaue them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine manner, in deede inuisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were then then taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enioyneth, and the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not onely to make them liue blessedly, but also to die happily. And truly we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, howe much more royally he then aduanced his kingdome, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in ouerthrowing his enemies: Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he toke away the presence of his body out of our sight: not to cease to be present with the faithfull that yet wandered in the earth, but with more present power to gouerne both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the end of the worlde, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his bodie was lifted vp about all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and spred abroad beyonde all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christe (sayth he) was to go by death to the right hand of the father, from whence he is to come to iudge the quicke and the dead: and that like wise in bodily presence according to the sounde doctrin and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with thē, he was to come after his ascension. And in an other place more largely and plainly: According to an vnspeakable & vnuisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spokē: behold I am with you al y daies, euen to the end of the world. But accordinge to the flesh which the worde tooke vpon him, accordinge to that that he was borne of the virgin, accordinge to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that hee was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was layde in the graue, that he was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alway haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuersant according to the presence of his body fourty dayes with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen and is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hande of his Father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of maicstie. Therefore according to the presence of his maicstie, we alway haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truely sayde to his disciples: but me ye shall not alway haue. For the Church had him a few daies according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

15 Wherefore, it by & by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hande of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule and gouerne in their steede. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father wil be exalted & reigne by his hande: was receiued to sit at his right hand: as if it had ben said, that he was inuested in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred vpon the possession of the gouernement committed vnto him, and that he not only entred vpon it, but also continueth in it til he come downe to iudgement. For so doth the Apostle expounde it, when he saieth thus: The father hath set him at his right hand, about all principality and power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not onely in this worlde, but in the worlde to come. &c. He hath put all thinges vnder his

Now you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that al creatures both heauenly and earthly may with admiration looke vpon his maiestie, be gouerned with his hande, behold his countenance, and be subject to his power.

Heb. 1. 7. And the Apostles meane nothing else; when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all thinges are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednesse is onely meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Actes, Stephen testifieth that he sawe him standing, because wee speake not here of the gesture of his body, but of the maiestie of his dominion: so that to Sit is nothing else, but to be chiefe iudge in the heauely iudgement seate.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifolde fruit: For it learneth, that the Lord by his ascending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kingdome, which before had bin stopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our flesh as in our name, thereupon followeth that which the Apostle sayth, that we doe already in him after a certaine maner sit in heauen. For that we do not with bare hope looke for heauen, but already in our head we possesse it. Moreouer faith perceiueth that he sitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a sanctuarie not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the father a continuall aduocate and intercessor for vs: he so turneth the fathers eyes to his righteousness, that he turneth them away from our sinnes: Hee so reconciletli his minde vnto vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs a way and passage to his throne, filling it with grace & mercifulnes, which otherwise would haue bin full of horror to wretched sinners. Thirdly, faith conceiueth his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, wealth, and glorying against the hels. For ascending into heauen he led captiuity captiue, and spoyling his enemies he enriched his people, & dayly filleth them with heapes of spirituall riches. He sitteth therefore on hie, that from thence pouring out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a spiritual life, sanctifie with his spirit, & garnish his church with the diuerse giftes of his grace, preferue it safe against all hurtes by his protection, restraints with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crosse and of our saluation: finally, holde all power, both in heauen and in earth, till he haue ouerthrowen all his enemies which are also our enemies, & made perfect y building vp of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdome: this is the power that his father hath giuen him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to iudge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doeth in deede here shewe to them that be his, plaine prooues of his power present among them: but because vnder the basenes of flesh his kingdome doth in a maner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke vpon that visible presence, which he will openly shewe at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come down from heauen, euen such as he was seene to go vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnspeakeable maiestie of his kingdome, with bright glistering of immortality, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to loke for him to come our redemer at that day, when he shal seuer the Lambes from the Goates, the chosen from the forsakē: & there shalbe none of all either the quicke or the deade, that shall escape his iudgement. For from the furthest corners of the world shal be heard the sound of the trumpet, wherewith all shall bee called to his iudgement seate, both they that shall bee founde aliue at that day, and they whome death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there bee that in this place expounde the words of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the old writers did sticke in doubt vpon the construction of this article. But as the aforesaide meaning is plaine and easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Creede which is euident that it was written according to the capacitie of the common people. And herewith nothing disagreeeth that which y^e Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at y^e last iudgement shall not die after a natural maner and order: yet that change which they shal suffer, because it shalbe like a death, is not vnproperly called death. It is indeede certaine, that not all shall sleepe, but all shalbe changed. What meaneth y^e? In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vtterly transformed into a new nature. This perishing of y^e flesh no man can denie to be a death: and yet in y^e meane time, it remaineth true, that the quicke and the dead shal be summoned to the iudgment: because y^e dead that are in Christ shall first rise, and then they y^e shal remaine and be liuing, shal with them bee sodenly taken vp into the aire to meete the Lord. And truely it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of y^e solemne protestation of Paul to Timothee.

18 Hereypon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is iudge, which hath alreadie appointed vs parteners with him in iudging: so far is it of, that he will goe vp into the iudgement seate to condemne vs. For howe shoulde the most mercifull prince destroye his owne people? howe shoulde the head scatter abroad his owne members? how should the patrone condemne his owne clientes? For if the Apostle dare crie out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come forth that can condemne vs: it is much more true, that Christ himselfe being our intercessour, will not condemne them whome hee hath receiued into his charge and tuition. It is truely no small assurednesse, that we shall be brought before no other iudgement seate, but of our owne redeemer, from whome our saluation is to be looked for: moreover that he which nowe by the Gospell promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sitting in iudgement performe his promise. Therefore to this ende the father hath honoured the sonne, in giuing him all iudgement, that so hee hath provided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the iudgement. Hitherto I haue followed y^e order of the Apostles Creede, because whereas it shortly in fewe wordes containeth the cheefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a table, wherein we doe distinctly and seuerally see those thinges that are in Christ worthie to be taken heede vnto. I call it the Apostles Creede, not carefullly regarding who were the authour of it. It is truely by great consent of y^e olde writers ascribed to the Apostles, either because they thought that it was by common trauell written and set out by the Apostles, or for that they iudged that this abridgement being faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, deliuered by the handes of the Apostles, was worthie to bee confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whence so euer it proceeded at the first, it hath euen from the first beginning of the Church, and from the verie time of the Apostles, ben vsed as a publike confession, and receiued by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not priuately written by any one man, forasmuch as it is euident that euen from the farthest age it hath alway continued of sacred authoritie and credite among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to bee cared for, wee haue wholly out of controuersie, that the whole Historie of our faith is shortly and well in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothing conteyned in it that is not sealed with sounde testimonies of Scripture. Which being vnderstanded, it is to no purpose either curiously to doubt, or to striue with any man who were the authour of it: vnlesse perhappe it be not enough for some mā to bee assured of the truth of the holy Ghost, but if hee doe also vnderstande eyther by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hande it was written.

19 But forasmuch as wee doe see, that the whole summe of our saluation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, we must beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any part thereof bee it neuer so little. If wee seeke for saluation, wee are taught by the verie name of Iesus, that is it in him. If wee seeke for any other giftes of the spirit, they are to bee founde in his anoynting. If we seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if wee seeke for cleanness, it is in his conception. If wee seeke for tender kindnesse, it sheweth it selfe in his birth, whereby hee was made in all things like vnto vs, that he might learne to sorrowe with vs: if we seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if wee seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if wee seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse: if we seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if wee seeke for cleansing, it is in his blood: if we seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hels: if wee seeke for mortification of the fleshe, it is in his buriall: if wee seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if wee seeke for immortallitie, it is in the same, if wee seeke for the inheritaunce of the kingdome of heauen, it is in his entrance into heauen: if wee seeke for defense, for assurednesse, for plentie and store of all good things, it is in his kingdome: if wee seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the iudgement, it is in the power giue to him to iudge. Finally, sith the treasures of all sortes of good things are in him, let vs draw thence and from no where else, euen till we be full withall. For they which being not content with him alone, are caried hither & thither into diuerse hopes, although they haue principal regard to him, yet euen in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust can not creepe in, where the aboundaunce of his good giftes hath once bene well known.

The xvij. Chapter.

That is truly and properly said, that Christ hath deserved Gods fauour and saluation for vs.

This

THis question is also to be assoyled for an addition. For there are some suttle men after a wrong manner, which although they confesse that we obtaine saluation by Christ, yet can not abide to here the name of deseruing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will haue Christ to be onely the instrument, or minister, not the author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deede I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the iudgement of GOD, then there shalbe no roome for deseruing: because there can not be founde in man any worthinesse that may deserue the fauour of God: But, as Augustine most truely wryteth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Sauour himselfe, the man Christ Iesus, which hath obtayned so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deseruinges of workes or of sayth going before. I beseech you let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserued to be taken vp by the Worde that is coeternall with the father into one prison, and so to be the onely begotten sonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom according to the measure of euery one, it floweth abroade into all his members. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that same man from his beginning was made Christ. Againe in an other place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediatour himselfe. For he that made of the seede of Dauid a man righteous y^e neuer should be vnrighteous, without any deseruing of his will going before, euen the same hee doeth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that heade: and so foorth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Christes deseruing, we doe not say that in him is the beginning of deseruing, but we climbe vp to the ordinance of GOD, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediatour, to purchase saluation for vs. And so is y^e deseruing of Christ vnfitly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one vnder an other doe not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans iustification is free by y^e meere mercy of God, and that there also the deseruing of Christ come betweene which is contained vnder the mercy of God. But against our workes are aptly set, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserue any thing but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because y^e deseruing of Christ hangeh vpon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deseruing, as that grace, is fitly set against all the workes of men.

- 2 This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loued the worlde, y^e he gaue his only begotten son, that whosocuer beleeueth in him, shall not perish. We see how y^e loue of God holdeth y^e first place, as the soueraigne cause or originall, and then followeth faith in Christ, as the second or neerer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the wordes

may beare. For if we obtaine righteousnesse by faith that resteth vpon him, then is the matter of our saluation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly proued. Not that we first loued him, but he first loued vs, and sent his sonne to be the appeasing for our sinnes. In these wordes is clerely shewed, that God to the ende that nothing should withstande his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this worde Appeasing, is of great weight: because God, after a certaine vnspeakeable maner, euen the same time that he loued vs, was also angry with vs, vntil he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose serue all those sayings: He is the satisfaction for our sinnes. Againe: It pleased God by him to reconcile all thinges to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the Crosse by him, &c. Againe, God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes. Againe: He accepted vs in his beloved sonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by y^e crosse. The reason of this mysterie is to be fetched out of the first chapter to the Ephesians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, addeth therewithall, that we haue obtained fauour in him. How did God beginne to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the making of the worlde, but because he vttered his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Christ? For sith God is the fountaine of all righteousnesse, it must needes be, that man so long as he is a sinner, haue God his enemy and his iudge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousness, such as is described by Paul: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtayned free righteousnesse by that sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also meant so oft as the grace of Christ is ioyned to the loue of God. Whereupon foloweth, that he giueth vs of his owne y^e which he hath purchased: For otherwise it would not agree with him, that this praise is giuen him seuerally from his father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

3 But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchased vs fauour with his father. For this I take for a thing confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our sinnes, if he hath suffered the punishment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appealed God, finally, if he being righteous, hath suffered for the vnrighteous, then is saluation purchased for vs by his righteousnesse: which is as much in effect as to deserue it. But, as Paul witnesseth, we are reconciled and haue receiued reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hatefull by reason of sinne, is by the death of his sonne appeased, so that he might be fauourable vnto vs. And the comparison of contraries that followeth a litle after, is diligently to be noted as by the transgression of one man, many were made sinners: so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adam we were estranged from God and ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are receiued into fauour as righteous.

And the future time of the verbe doeth not exclude present righteoufnesse, as appeareth by the proesse of the text: For hee had saide before, that the free gifte was of manie sinnes vnto iustification.

4 But when we say, that grace is purchased vs by the deseruing of Christ, we meane this, that we are cleansed by his blood, and that his death was a satisfaction for our sinnes. His blood cleanseth vs from sinne. This blood is it that is shed for remission of sinne. If this bee the effect of his blood shed, that sinnes bee not imputed vnto vs: it followeth, that with that price the iudgemēt of God is satisfied. To which purpose serueth that saying of Iohn the Baptist: Beholde the Lambe of God that taketh away the sinne of the worlde. For hee setteth in comparison Christ against all the sacrifices of the lawe, to teache that in him onely was fulfilled that whiche those figures shewed. And we know, what Moses ech where saith: Iniquitie shall be cleansed, sinne shall be put away and forgiven. Finally wee are verie well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Christ. And this point the Apostle setteth out in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, very fitly taking this principle, that remission is not wrought without shedding of blood. Wherevpon he gathereth, that Christ for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Again: that he was offered vp to take away the sinnes of many. And he had saide before, that not by the blood of goates or of calues, but by his owne blood he once entred into y^e holy place, finding eternall redemption. Nowe when he thus reasoneth: If the blood of a calfe doe sanctifie, according to the cleanness of the fleshe, that much more consciences are cleansed by the blood of Christ from dead workes: it easily appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, vnles wee grant vnto his sacrifice the power of cleansing, appeasing & satisfying. As a litle after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new testament, that they which are called, may receiue the promise of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of sins going before, which remained vnder the law. But specially it is conuenient to wey the relation which Paul describeth, that he became curse for vs. &c. For it were superfluous, yea & an absurditie, that Christ should bee charged with curse, but for this intent, that he paying that which other did owe, shoulde purchase righteoufnesse for them. Also the testimonie of Esay is plaine that the chastisement of our peace was laid vpon Christ, and that we obtined health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our sinnes, it coulde not haue beene said, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the paine wherevnto we were subiect. Wherewith agreeth y^e which foloweth in the same place: For y^e sin of my people I haue stricken him. Let vs also recite the exposition of Peter, which shal leaue nothing doubtful: that he did beare our sin, vpon y^e tree. For he saith, y^e burthen of damnation frō which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Christ.

5 And the Apostles doe plainly pronounce, that he payed the price of ransome to redeeme vs from the guiltinesse of death. Being iustified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whome God hath set to be the propitiatorie by faith which is in his blood. Paul commendeth y^e grace of God in this point, because hee hath giuen the price of redemption in the death of Christ: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his blood, that hahauing obtained righteoufneffe, wee may stande boldly before the iudgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that we are redeemed not by gold and filuer, but by the pretious blood of the vnspotted Lambe. For the comparison also woulde not agree, vnlesse with that price satisfaction had beene made for sinnes: for which reason Paul saith, that we are preciously bought. Also that other saying of his woulde not stand together. There is one mediator that gaue himselfe to bee a redemption, vnlesse the paine had beene cast vpon him which wee had deserued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the blood of Christ is the forgiuenesse of sinnes: as if hee shoulde haue saide, that wee are iustified or acquitted before God, because that blood aunswereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hande writing which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant y^e payment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. There is also great weight in these wordes of Paul: If wee be iustified by the workes of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For hereby wee gather, that wee must fetch from Christ that which the lawe woulde giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obteyne by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he saide: Hee that doth these things, shall liue in them. Which hee no lesse plainly confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleeuing in Christ wee are iustified from all those things, from which wee coulde not bee iustified in the lawe of Moses. For if the keeping of the lawe bee righteoufnesse, who can denie that Christ deserued fauour for vs, when taking that burden vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if we our selues had kept the lawe? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward writeth to the Galathians: God sent his son subiect to the law, y^e he might redeeme those that were vnder the lawe. For to what ende serued that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteoufnesse, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteoufnes without works, wherof Paul speaketh, because the righteoufnes is reckened to vs which was founde in Christ only. And truely for no other cause is the fleshe of Christ called our meate, but because wee find in him the substance of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the

 Gal. 4. 4.

Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteoufnesse. As Paul saith, that he gaue himselfe a sacrifice of sweete fauour. And in other place: Hee died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our iustification. Herevpon is gathered, that not onely saluation is giuen vs by Christe, but also for that his sake his father is nowe fauourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt that y^e is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esay, saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for Dauid my seruauntes sake. Wherof the Apostle is a right good witness, where hee saith: Your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet Iohn after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronoune He. In which sense also the Lorde pronounceth: As I liue because of my father, so shall ye also liue because of mee. Wherewith agreeth mination when they affirme it. For what needed the sonne of God to come downe to purchase any new thing for him selfe? And the Lord declaring, his own counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the father prouided for the commoditie of his sonne in his deseriings, but that Rom. 8.

he deliuered him to death, & spared him not, because he loued the worlde.
And the Prophets manners of speaking are to be noted, as, A child is borne. Ef. 1. 9. 6.

out, that Christ suffered death for his enimies. For there vpon wee gather, y^e Ioh. 17.
he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying, I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruite of his holines vnto other, doth thereby testifie that he purchaceth nothing for himselfe.
And truely this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to giue himselfe wholy to saue vs, did after a certaine maner forget himselfe. But to this purpose they do wrongfully draw this testimonie of Paul: Therefore the father Phil. 2. 9. hath exalted him, and giuen him a name, &c. For by what deseriings could man obtaine to be iudge of the world, & the heade of the Angels, & to enioy the foueraigne dominion of God, & that in him should rest that same maiestie, the thousandth parte wherof all the powers of men & Angels can Luc. 24. 26 not reach vnto? But the solution therof is easie & plaine, that Paul doth not there entreat of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely to shew the effect ensuing thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is spoken in another place, that it behouoeth that Christ should suffer, and so enter into the glorie of his Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE

OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, WHICH intreateth of the manner howe to re- ceiue the grace of Christ, and what profits do growe vnto vs, & what effectes ensue therof.

The first Chapter.

That those things which are spoken of Christ, do profite vs by secrete vworking of the holy Ghost.

NOwe it is to be seen how those good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his only begotten Sonne, not for his own priuate vse, but to enrich them that were without them & needed

them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoeuer he suffered or did for the saluation of mankind, is vnprofitable and nothing auaieth for vs. Therefore that hee may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behoueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is saide, that we are grafted into him, and did put on him. For (as I haue before said) all that euer he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we growe together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine this by faith: yet forasmuch as wee see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by y^e Gospel, therefore very reason teacheth vs to climbe vp hier, and to enquire of the secret effectuall working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enioy Christ and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternall godhead and essence of the Spirit, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and bloude that the Spirit should testifie of him, least the saluation that he hath purchased, should slip away from vs. For as there are alleged three witnesss in heauen, the Father, the Worde, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Bloud, and the Spirit. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twise repeted, which we feele to be engrauen in our hearts in steede of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing & sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithful are chosen in sanctification of the spirit vnto obedience and sprinkling of the bloud of Christ. By which wordes he telleth vs, that to the entent the shedding of that holy bloud should not become voide, our soules are cleansed with it by the secret watering of the holy Spirit. According wherevnto Paul also speaking of cleansing and iustification, sayeth that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ & in the Spirit of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy Spirit is the bonde wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For prooffe wherof also do serue all that wee haue taught in the last booke before this, concerning his anointing.

- 2 But that this, being a matter specially worthie to be knownen, may be made more certainly eident, wee must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirit after a certeine peculiar maner, to the end that he might seuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirit of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankinde as in all other liuing creatures, but also is in vs the roote and seede of heavenly life. Therefore the Prophets do principally commend the kingdome of Christ by this title of prerogatiue, that then should flourish more plentifull abundance of the Spirit. And notable about all the rest is that place of Ioe: In that day I will powre of my Spirit vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seem to restrain the gifts of the Spirit to the office of prophecying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightning of his Spirit will make those

those his scholers which before were vnskillfull and voide of all heauenly doctrine. Now for as much as God the Father doth for his sonnes sake giue vs his holy Spirite, and yet hath left with him the whole fulnesse thereof, to the end that he should be a minister and distributor of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the spirite of the Father, and sometime the Spirite of the Sonne. Ye are not (saith Paul) in the flesh, but in the Spirite, for the Spirite of God dwelleth in you. But if any haue not the spirite of Christ, he is not his. And herevpon he putteth vs in hope of full reuening, for that he which raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicken our mortall bodies because of his Spirite dwelling in vs. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father be ascribed the praise of his owne giftes, whereof he is the author: and yet that the same be ascribed to Christ, with whome the giftes of the Spirite are left, that he may giue them to those that be his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirite is distributed to euery one, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. And it is to be known, that he is called the Spirite of Christ, not only in respect that the eternall Worde of God is with the same Spirite ioyned with y^e Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam giuen from heauen, to be a quickening Spirit: whereby Paul compareth the singular life that the sonne of God breatheth into the that be his that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he wisheth to the faithfull the fauour of Christ and the loue of God, he ioyneth withall the common partaking of the Spirite, without which no man can taste neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifulnesse of Christ. As also he saith in another place: The loue of God is powred out into our heartes by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs.

3 And here it shalbe profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth our the holy Spirite, where it entreateth of beginning & whole restoring of our saluation. First, he is called the Spirite of adoption, because he is a witness vnto vs of the free goodwill of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloued onely begotten Sonne, y^e he might be a father vnto vs, and doeth encourage vs to pray boldly, yea and doth minister vs wordes to crie without feare, Abba, Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest pledge, and seale of our inheritance, because he so giueth life from heauen to vs wandring in the worlde, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soule is in safegard vnder the faithfull keeping of God: for which cause he is also called life, by reason of righteousnes. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring forth the buddes of righteousnesse, he is oftentimes called water, as in Esaie: Al ye that thirst come to the waters. Againe: I wil poure out my spiriz vpon y^e thirstie, & floods vpon the drie land: wherwith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did euen now allege. If any thirst let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezechuell where the Lord promiseth cleane waters wherwith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as hee restoreth and nourisheth into liuely quicknes, them vpon whome he hath powred y liquor of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oile and anoyntment. Againe becaufe in continually seething out & burning vp the vices of our lust, he setteth our hearts on fire with the loue of God and zeale of godlinesse, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, he is described vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence doe flowe vnto vs all heauenly riches, or the hand of God, wherewith he vseth his power: becaufe by the breath of his power he so breatheth diuine life into vs, that we are not now stirred by our selues, but ruled by his stirring & mouing: so that if there be any good things in vs, they be the fruites of his grace: but our owne giftes without him, be darknesse of minde, & peruerfnesse of heart. This point is set out plainly ynough, that til our mindes be bent vpon the holy Ghost, Christ lyeth in a maner idle, becaufe we coldly espie him without vs, yea & farre away from vs. But wee knowe that he profiteth none other but them whose head he is, and the first begotten among brethren, and them which haue put on Him. This conioyning only maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not vnprofitably with the name of Sauour. And for prooffe hercof serueth that holy mariage, whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, & bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirite onely he maketh him selfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same Spirite wee are made his members, so that he containeth vs vnder him, and wee againe possesse him.

4 But forasmuch as faith is his principal worke, to it are for the moste part referred all those things, that wee commonly finde spoken to expresse his force & working: becaufe he bringeth vs into the light of the Gospel by nothing but by faith: as Iohn Baptist teacheth, that this prerogatiue is giue to them that beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh and bloud, but of God: where setting God against flesh and bloud, he affirmeth it to be a supernaturall gift that they receiue Christ by faith, who otherwise should remaine subiect to their owne infidelitic.

Like where vnto is that aunswere of Christ: Flesh and bloud hath not reuealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heauen. These things I doe now but shortly touche, becaufe I haue already intreated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paul, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy Spirite of promise. For Paul sheweth that he is an inward teacher, by whose working the promise of saluation pearceth into our minds; which otherwise shoulde but beate the aire or our eares. Likewise, when he sayeth, that the Thessalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the spirite and beleeuing of the trueth: by which ioyning of them together, he briefly admonisheth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing else but from the holy spirite: which thing Iohn setteth out more plainly, saying: Wee knowe that there abideth in vs of the spirite which he hath giuen vs. Againe, By this we knowe that we dwell in him; and he in vs, becaufe he hath giuen vs of his spirite. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the Spirite of trueth which the worlde cannot receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heauenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same spirite this proper office, to put them in minde of those things that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should \bar{y} light shewe it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirite of vnderstanding should open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirite, the keye by which the treasures of the heauenly kingdome are opened vnto vs: and may call his enlightening, the eyesight of our minde to see. Therefore doth Saint Paul so much commend the ministerie of the spirite: because teachers should crie without profiting, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inward master should draw them with his spirite that are giuen him by his Father. Therefore as we haue saide, that perfect saluation is found in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirite and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospel, and so newe begetting vs, that wee may be newe creatures: and purging vs from vnholly filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

Luk. 3. 16.

The ij. Chapter.

Of faith, wherein both is see the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

BVt all these things shalbe easie to vnderstande, when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the readers may knowe the force & nature thereof. But first it is conuenient to call to minde againe these things that haue bene already spoken, that sith God doeth appoint vs by his lawe what we ought to do, if wee fall in any point thereof, the same terrible iudgement of eternall death that he pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Againe, that forasmuch as it is not onely heard but altogether about our strength and beyond all our power to fulfil the law, if wee onely behold our selues, and weye what estate is worthie for our desertings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast away from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdly, this hath bene declared, that there is but one meane of deliuerance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hand it pleased the heauenly father, hauing mercy vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, so that wee with sounde faith embrace this mercy, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is conuenient for vs to weye this, what maner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenly kingdome; forasmuch as it is certaine \bar{y} not euery opinion nor yet euery perswasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and study must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall propertie of faith, by howe much the more hurtful at this day is the errour of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiueth no hier thing, but a certeine common assent to the historie of the gospel, Yea when they dispute of faith in the scholes, in barely calling God the obiect of faith; they do nothing but (as we haue said in another place) by vain speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to \bar{y} true marke. For wheras God dwelleth in a light \bar{y} none can attaine to, it behoueth of necess-

fitic that Christ become meane betweene vs & it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, The way, the truth, and the Life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountaine of life) but by him: because he only knoweth the Father, & by him the faithful to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason, Paul affirmeth, that he accounteth nothing excellent to be knowen, but Christ: and in the xx. chapter of the Actes he saith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Christ speaking after this maner, I will send thee among the Gentiles, that they may receiue forgiveness of sinnes, & portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in mee. And Paul testifieth, y^e the glory of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glorie shineth in his face. It is true in deede y^e faith hath respect onely to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whome hee hath sent, euen Iesus Christ. Because God himselfe should haue lyen secret & hidden farre from vs, vnlesse the brightnes of Christ did cast his beames vpon vs. For this entent the father left all y^e he had with his onely begotten sonne, euen by the communicating of good things with him to expresse the true image of his glorie. For as it is saide, that we must be drawn by y^e spirit, that we may be stirred to seeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the inuisible father is no where else to be sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently wel, which intreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, saith that we must knowe whether we must go and which way: and then by and by after he gathereth that the safest way against all errors is he that is both God and man. For it is God to whome we goe, & man by whome we go: and both these are founde no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul when he speketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrowe that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay vpon Christ. And Peter doth most fully ioyne them both together, saying that by him we beleue in God.

2 Therefore this euil, euen as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which haue hidden Christ as it were with a veile drawn before him, to the beholding of whome vnlesse we be directly bent, we shall alway wander in many vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they do deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance do with great hurte deceiue the silly people, yea (to say truly and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuise doth not only burie but vtterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleue, to vnderstand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not only of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obtaine saluation by this that we either are readie to embrace for true whatsoeuer y^e Church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when wee acknowledge God to be a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is giuen vs vnto righteousness, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submit-submitting of our sense, we attaine an entrie into the kingdome of heauen. For when the Apostle saith, that with the heart we beleue to righteousnes, Rom. 10. 10. and with the mouth confession is made to saluation, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressedly beleue that which he vnderstandeth not, nor seeketh to learne : but hee requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodnesse, in which consisteth our righteousnesse.

3 In deede I deny not (such is the ignorance wherewith we are compassed) that there now be and hereafter shalbe many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till hauing put of the burden of our flesh we come neerer to the presence of God: in which very thinges that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our iudgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to keepe vnitie with the Church. But vnder this colour to intitule ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God and of Christ, not in reuerence of y^e Church. And we see what a maze they haue framed with this their hidden implicatiō, that any thing whatsoever it be without any choise, so that it be thrust in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea sometime also most monstrous errorres. Which vnaduised lightnesse of beliefe, whereas it is a most certaine downfall to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueth nothing determinately, but with this condition adioyned, If the faith of the Church be such. So do they faine, that truth is holden in error, light in blindnes, true knowledge in ignorance. But because we will not tarry long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very plainesse of the trueth it selfe will of it selfe minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether sayth be yet wrapped with many remnantes of ignorance, but they definitiuely say that they beleue a right, which stande amased in their ignorance, yea and do flatter themselues therein, so that they doe agree to y^e authority and iudgement of the Church, concerning thinges vnknown. As though the Scripture did not euery where teach, that with faith is ioyned knowledge. Iohn. 17. 3.

4 But we do grant, that so long as we wander from home in this worlde, our faith is not fully expressed, not onely because many thinges are yet hidden from vs, but because being compassed with many mistes of errorres, we attaine not all thinges. For the highest wisdom of the most perfect is this, to profit more and proceede on further forward with gentle willingnesse to learne. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from an other, to abide for reuelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vnclodded of our flesh, we attaine to knowe lesse than were to be wished, and dayly in reading wee light vpon many darke places which doe conuince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle GOD holdeth vs in modestie, assigning to euery one a measure of faith, that euen the very best teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpressed faith, we may marke in the Disciples of Christ, before y^e they had obtained to be fully enlightned. We see, howe they hardly tasted the very first introductions, how they did sticke euen in the smallest points, how they hanging at the mouth of their maister did not yet much proceede, yea when Phil. 3. 15.

at the womens information they ranne to the graue, the resurrection of their master was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witness of their faith, we may not say that they were vtterly without faith: but rather, if they had not bene perswaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him would haue perished in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpes of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleued his wordes whome they knewe to be a speaker of truth, yet the grosseesse that still possessed their mindes so wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a maner amafed at it. Whereupon it is sayd, that they then at the last beleued when they had by triall of the thing it selfe proued y^e truth of the words of Christ, not that they then beganne to beleue, but because the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their heartes, then receiuing liuelinesse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christe for their onely teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to seeke any more familiar prooffe hereof than this, that in all things alway vnbeleefe is mingled with faith.

5 We may also call it an vnexpressed faith, which yet in deed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelists do rehearse that many beleued, which only being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but y^e Christ was the Messias which had bin promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subiection willingly to submit theselues to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deede but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christs promise, concerning the healing of his sonne when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth, beleued againe: because he receiued as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, & then submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receiue his doctrine. Albeit it is to be knowen, that he was so tractable and ready to learne, that yet in the first place the word of the beleeuing signifieth a particular beleefe: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the scholars of Christ. A like example doth Iohn set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleued the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleue not because of thy report, but we haue heard him, and we know that he is the Sauour of the world. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so y^e they be disposed to obedience, are called faithfull, in deede nor properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection, but this willingness to learne, with a desire to proceede further, differeth farre from that grosse ignorance, wherein they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papistes haue imagined. For if Paul seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet neuer come to the knowledge of truth, howe much more greuous reproche doe they deserue that of purpose

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if wee receiue him such as hee is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appoin ted to bee the marke of our faith, so we can not goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide vs. And truly there are opened to vs y^e treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ shold litle profit vs. So Paul ioyneth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Ye haue not so learned Christ, for yee haue bene taught what is the trueth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath bene so much taught by Moses and the Prophetes, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath bene deliuered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthilie called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also hee saith in an other place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this worde faith, the newe and vnaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our scholemaster, hath more plainly set foorth the mercie of his father, and more certainly testified of our saluation. Albeit it shalbe y^e more easie and more conuenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generaltie to the specialtie. First wee must bee put in minde that there is a generall relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the worde, than the sunne beames from the sunne from whome they proceede. Therefore in Esay God crieth our: Heare me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, Iohn sheweth in these wordes: these thinges are written that yee may beleue. And the Prophete meaning to exhort the people to beleefe, saith: This day if yee shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beleue. Moreouer, God doeth not without cause in Esay set this marke of difference betweene the children of the Church and straungers, that hee will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefite vniuersall to all, why shoulde hee directe his wordes to a fewe? Wherewith agreeth this that the Euangelistes doe commonly vse y^e words Faithfull, and Disciples, as feveral words expressing one thing, and specially Luke verie oft in the Actes of the Apostles. Yea and he stretcheth that name euen to a woman in the ninth chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith doe swarue neuer so litle from this marke, to which it ought to bee directly leuelled, it keepeth not her owne nature, but becōmeth an vncertaine lightnesse of beleefe and wandring error of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and susteined, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remayne no faith. Wee doe not here dispute whether the ministerie of man be necessarie to sowe the worde of God that faith may bee conceiued thereby, which question we will else where intreate of: but we say that the worde it selfe, howe soeuer it bee conueied to vs, is like a mirrour when faith may beholde God. Whether God doeth therein vse the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne onely power, yet he doeth alway shewe himselfe by his worde to those, whome his will is to drawe vnto him: Wherypon Paul defineth faith to bee an obedience that is giuen to the Gospell. And in an other place he prayseth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the only purpose in the vnderstanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we vnderstand what will hee beareth vs. For it not so much behooueth vs to knowe what hee is in himselfe, but what a one he will bee to vs. Nowe therefore wee are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceiued by the worde. And the foundation hereof is a foreconceiued persuasion of the trueth of God. Of the assurednesse whereof so long as thy minde shall dispute with it selfe, the worde shall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credite at all. But also it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnlesse thou further holde this for vndoubtedly determined, that whatsoever proceedeth from him, is the sacred and inuiolable trueth.

4. 10.

7 But because not at euerie worde of God mans hearte is raised vp to faith, wee must yet further search what this faith in the word hath properly respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The bloode of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet these are such sayings as of them selues can doe nothing but shake faith, so much lesse are they able to stablish faith. We denie not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the trueth of God, how oft soeuer, what soeuer, and in what sort soeuer it speaketh: but now our question is onely, what faith findeth in the worde of the Lorde to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation & vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how should it but flee God, of whome it is afraide? But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we haue not yet a full definition of faith, because it is not to be accompted for faith to know the will of God, of what sorte soeuer it be: But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the message is sorrowfull and the declaration dreadful, we put kindnesse or mercie? Truely so wee shall come neerer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that we haue learned that saluation is laide vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that hee hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may testifie that he is our merciful father, for that otherwise we cannot approach vnto him, and vpon that alone the heart of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Psalmes these two things Mercie & Truth do cleaue together, because neither should it any thing profit vs to knowe that God is true, vnlesse hee did mercifully allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnlesse he did with his owne mouth offer it. I haue reported thy truth and thy saluation, I haue not hidden thy goodnes and thy trueth. Thy goodnes and thy truth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heauens, thy truth euen to the cloudes. Againe: Al the wayes of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his couenant. Againe, His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the trueth of the Lorde abideth for euer. Againe: I will sing to thy name vpon thy mercie and trueth. I omit that which is in the Prophetes to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For we shall shall rashly determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe doe reſtifie of himselfe, and preuent vs with his calling, leaſt his will ſhould bee doubtfull and vnknowne. But we haue alreadie ſcene, that Chriſt is the on-ly pledge of his loue, without whome on euery ſide appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Nowe forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodneſſe ſhall not much preuaile, vnlesse hee make vs to reſt in it, therefore ſuch an vnderſtanding is to be baniſhed as is mingled with doubting, and doth not ſoundely agree in it ſelfe, but as it were, diſputeth with it ſelfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkened, is far from attaining and climbing vp to perceiue the verie will of God: and alſo the heart of man, as it wauereth with perpetuall doubting, is farre from reſting aſſured in that perſuaſion. Therefore it behooueth both that our wit bee lightened, and our hearte ſtrengthened by ſome other meane, that the worde of God may be of full credite with vs. Nowe wee ſhall haue a perfect definition of faith, if wee ſay, that it is a ſtedfaſte and aſſured knowledge of Gods kindeneſſe towarde vs, which being grounded vpon the trueth of the free promiſe in Chriſt, is both reueiled to our mindes, and ſealed in our heartes by the holy Ghoſt.

8 But before I proceed any further, it ſhall bee neceſſarie, that I make ſome preambles to diſſolue certaine doubttes that otherwiſe might make ſome ſtoppe to the readers. And firſt I muſt confute that diſtinction y^e ſlicth about in the ſcholes, betweene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that ſuch as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlineſſe, doe beleeuē all that is neceſſarie to ſaluation. Aſthough the holy Ghoſt in lightening our hartes vnto faith, were not a witneſſe to vs of our adoption. And yet preſumptuouſly, when all the Scripture crieth out againſt it, they giue the name of faith to ſuch perſuaſion voide of the feare of God. Wee neede to ſtriuē no further with their definition, but ſimply to rehearſe the nature of faith, ſuch as it is declared by the worde of God. Whereby ſhall plainly appeare howe vnſkilfully and fooliſhly they rather make a noiſe than ſpeake of it. I haue alreadie touched parte; the reſt I will adde hereafter as place ſhall ſerue. At this preſent I ſay, that there cannot bee imagined a greater abſurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They wil haue faith to bee an aſſent, whereby euery deſpiſer of God may receiue y^e which is vttered out of the Scripture. But firſt they ſhoulde haue ſcene whether euery man of his owne power do bring faith to himſelfe, or whether the holy Ghoſt be by it a witneſſe of adoption. Therefore they do childiſhly plaie the fooles, in demanding, whether faith, which qualitie addeth doth forme, be the ſame faith or an other and a newe faith. Whereby appeareth certainly, that in ſo babling they neuer thought of the ſingular gift of the holy Ghoſt. For the beginning of beleeuing doeth alreadie conteine in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weye that ſaying of Paul: With the heart is beleeued to righteouſneſſe, they woulde cease to ſaine that ſame cold qualitie. If we had but this one reaſon, it ſhould be ſufficient to ende this contention: that the verie ſame aſſent (as I haue alreadie touched, and will againe more largely reapeate) is rather of the hearte than of the braine, rather of affection than of vnderſtanding.

Rom. 1. 5.

For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, which is such as \ddot{y} Lorde preferreth no kinde of obedience about it: and that worthily, forasmuch as nothing is more pretious to him than his trueth, which as Iohn the Baptist witnesseth, the beleeuers doe as it were subscribe and seale vnto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull wee doe in one worde determinately say, that they speake fondly when they say that faith is formed by adding of godly affection vnto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is an other plainer argument that offereth it selfe to bee alleaged. For whereas faith embraceth Christ as hee is offered vs of the Father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteoufnesse, forgiuenesse of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of liuing water: without doubt no man can euer truly knowe him, vnlesse hee doe therewithall receiue the sanctification of the Spirite. Or, if any man desire to haue it more plainly spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ can not be knowne, but with sanctification of his spirite: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be seuered from godly affection.

Ioh. 3. 25.

1. Co. 12. 10.

9 Whereas they are wont to lay this against vs, that Paul saith: If a man haue all faith, so that hee remoue mountaines: if he haue not charitie, he is nothing: whereby they woulde deforme faith, in spoyling it of charitie: they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth, by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the diuerse gifts of the holy Ghost, among the which hee had reckned the diuerse kinds of languages, power and prophetic, and had exhorted the Corinthians to followe the best of these giftes, that is to say, such giftes whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole body of the Church: hee streightway saide further, that he woulde shewe them yet a more excellent way. That all such giftes, howe excellent soeuer they bee of them selues, yet are nothing to bee esteemed, vnlesse they serue charitie. For they were giuen to the edifying of the Church, and vnlesse they be applied therevnto, they loose their grace. For prooffe of this he particularly rehearseth them repeting the selfe same giftes that hee had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gifte of God, which euery vngodly man may both haue and abuse, as the gifte of tongues, as prophetic and other giftes of grace: it is no maruell if it bee seuered from charitie. But all the error of these men standeth in this, that where this worde Faith, hath diuerse significations, they not considering the diuersitie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of Iames which they alleage for mainteinaunce of the same error, shall bee else where discussed. But although for teachings sake, when wee meane to shew what manner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are diuerse sortes of faith: yet wee acknowledge and speake of but one faith of the godly, as the Scripture teacheth. Many in deede doe beleue that there is a God, they thinke that the Historie of the Gospell & other partes of the Scripture are true (as commonly wee are wont to iudge of such things, as either are reported being done long ago, or such as we our selues haue beene present at and seene.) There be also some that goe further, for both they beleue the word of God to be a most assured oracle, and they doe not altogether despise his commaundementes, and they somewhat after a sorte are moued with his threatninges and promises. It is in deede testified that such hath saich: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they do not with open vngodlines fight against the worde of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shewe of obedience.

10 But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthy of the name of faith. From the sounde trueth whereof howe farre it differeth, although it shall be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to y contrary, why it should not now be touched by the way. It is sayde that Simon Magus beleueed, which yet within a litle after bewrayed his own vnbeleife. And wheras it is sayde that he beleueed, we doe not vnderstande it as some doe, that he fayned a beleife when hee had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being ouercome with the maicesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is sayde in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleuee for a time, in whome the seede of the worde is choked vp before it bring forth fruite, or before it take any roote at all, it by and by withereth away and perissheth: we dout not that such delited with a certain tast of the word doe greedily receiue it, and begin to feele the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfaying of faith, they beguile not onely other mens eyes, but also their owne mindes. For they perswade themselues, that that reuerence which they shewe to the word of GOD, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no vngodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his worde. But what maner of assent soeuer that be, it pearceth not to the very heart to remaine there stablished: and though sometime it seemeth to haue taken rootes, yet those are not liuely roots. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guileful hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueh himself. But let them that glory in such shadowes of faith vnderstand, that therein they are no better than the Deuill. But that first sort of men are farre worse than the Deuill, which doe senselesly heare and vnderstand those things for knowledge whereof the Deuills doe tremble. And the other are in this point equall with the Deuill, that the feeling such as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and discouragement.

11 I knowe that some thinke it heard, that we assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to be the frute of election. Which dout yet is easily dissolued: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor doe truly feele the effectuall working of the Gospell, but they that are fore-ordained to saluation: yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime moued with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne iudgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no absurdity, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the tast of the heauenly giftes, that

Christ

Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceiue the spiritual force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lorde, the more to condemne them and make them inexcusable, conueyeth himselfe into their mindes so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If any obiect, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certainly their adoption: I answer that though there be a great likenes and affinitie betweene y^e elect of God, and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect onely that affiance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seede for euer, so y^e seede of life planted in their harts neuer perissheth: so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it may be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferiour working of the Spirit may haue his course, euen in the reprobate. In the meane season y^e faithfull are taught, carefully and humbly to examine themselues, least in steede of assurednes of faith, do creepe in carelesse confidence of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobate do neuer conceiue but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow thā of the founde body, because the holy Spirite doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect only, so that they apply it by special faith to their vse. But yet it is truly said, that the reprobate beleue God to be mercifull vnto thē, because they receiue the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the selfe same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, vnder a cloke of Hypocrisie. And I deny not, that God doth so farre giue light vnto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimony which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the founde effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shewe himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that he hauing truly deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his safegarde, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercy. But he vouchsafeth to grant to the only elect y^e liuely roote of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that obiection answered, if God do truly shewe his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually stablished, for that there is no cause to the contrarie, but that God may enlighten some with a present feeling of his grace, which afterwarde vanisheth away.

12 Allō though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindenesse towarde vs, and an assured perswasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no maruel that the feeling of Gods loue in temporall thinges doth vanish away: which although it haue an affinitie with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I graunt, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the truth thereof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I denie that the reprobate doe proceede so farre as to attayne vnto that secreete reuelation, which the Scripture sayeth to belong to the electe onely. Therefore I denie that they doe either conceiue the will of GOD as it is vnchangeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away:

Like

Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take liuely rootes, in proceffe of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeares it bringeth forth not onely blossomes and leaues but also fruit. Finally, as by the fall of the first man, the Image of God might haue been blotted out of his minde, & soule, so it is no maruell, if God doe shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterwarde he suffereth to be quenched. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that hee may lightly ouerwash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to be holden for trueth, that howe small and weake soeuer faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the spirite of God, and a seale of their adoption, the printe thereof can neuer bee blotted out of their heartes: as for the reprobate, that they are ouerspred with such a light as afterwarde comineth to nought. And yet the Sprite is not deceitefull, because he giueth not life to the seede that hee casteth in their heartes, to make it abide alwayes incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is euident by the teaching of y Scripture and by dayly experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needes be that there is raised in their heartes a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time their liued in Saul a godly affection to loue God, by whome he knewe himselfe to be fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetnesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so doe they not soundly loue him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired seruantes. For to Christ onely was the spirite of loue giuen, to this ende, that he should poure it into his members. And truly that saying of Paul extendeth no further, Rom. 5. 5. but to the elect onely: The loue of God is poured abroad into our hearts by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs, euen the same loue that ingendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrarie side we see God to be maruellously angrie with his children, whome yet he ceaffeth not to loue: not that in himselfe hee hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abare their pride of fleshe, to shake of their drousinesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore al at one time they conceiue him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not fainedly doe pray to appease his wrath, to whome yet they flee with quiete assured trust. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some doe counterfaite a shewe of faith, whiche yet doe lacke the true fayth, but while they are caried with a so-dayne violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishnesse so possesseth them, that they doe not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is likely that they were such to whome (as Iohn witnesseth) Christ did not committe him selfe when yet they beleued in him: because hee knewe them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fall from the common faith (I call it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likeness and affinitie with the liuely & continuing faith) Christ would not haue John 2. 24. saide

Ioh. 8. 31. saide to his Disciples: If ye abide in my worde, then are ye truly my Disciples, and yee shall knowe the trueth, and the trueth shall make you free. For hee speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishness quench the light that is giuen them. Therefore doeth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they haue not taken liuely roote. Like as Christ also saith in Mattheu: every tree that my father hath not planted, shall bee rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kinde of lying, y^e are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. Iames inueieth against that kinde of men, that with deceitfull pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither woulde Paul require of the children of God a faith vnfayned, but in respect that manie doe presumptuously challenge vnto themselues that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deccite do beguile other or sometime themselues. Therefore he compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein fayth is kept, because manie in falling from good conscience, haue suffered shipwracke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtfull signification of the word faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sounde doctrine of religion, as in the place that we nowe alleadge, and in the same Epistle where Paul will haue Deacons to holde fast the mysterie of faith in a pure conscience. Againe, where he publisheth the falling away of certaine from the faith. But on the other side hee saith that Timothie was nourished vp with the wordes of faith. Againe, where hee saith that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that manie depaite from the faith: whome in an other place he calleth reprobate touching faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, saying, Warne them that they be found in the faith. By soundenesse he meaneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easly corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Euen because in Christ, whome faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: therefore faith is worthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heauenly doctrine, from which it can not be seuered. Contrariwise sometime it is restrained to signifie some particular object, as when Matthew saith, that Christ sawe the faith of them that did let downe the man sicke of the palse through the tiles and Christ himselfe crieth out that hee founde not in Israell so great faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likly that the Centurion was earnestlie bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onely assent and aunswere of Christ, hee required not Christes bodilie presence, therefore in respect of this circumstance his faith was so much commended. And a litle here before wee haue shewed, that Paul taketh faith for the gift of working miracles, which gifte they haue y^e neither are regenerate by the Spirite of God, nor do hartily worship him. Also in an other place he setteth faith for the doctrine whereby wee are instructed in faith. For where hee writeth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministerie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weaknesse. In these formes of speech standeth a proportiportional relation. But when the name of faith is vnproperly remoued, to signifie a false profession, or a lying title of faith, that should seeme to be as harde a figuratiue abuse, as when the feare of God is set for a corrupt and wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes said in the holy History, that the foraine nations which had beene transplanted into Samaria and the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods & the God of Israel: which is as much, as to mingle heauen and earth together. But now our question is, What is that faith which maketh the children of God different from the vnbeleeuers, by which we call vpon God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall saluation and life dwelleth in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I haue shortly and plainly declared.

14 Now let vs againe go through all the partes of it, euen from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doutfull. When in defining faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men vse to haue of those things that are subiect to mans vnderstanding. For it is so farre about it, that mans wit must go beyond & surmount it self to come vnto it, yea, & when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it feeleth, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiueth not, it vnderstandeth more by the very assurednesse of persuasion, than if it did with mans owne capacitie throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith very well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, bredth, depth, & heighth, & to know the loue of Christ that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiueth by faith, is euery way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is fare hyer than all vnderstanding. But yet because the Lorde hath disclosed to his Saintes the secrete of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledging: and Iohn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he testifieth, that the faithfull do certainly know that they are the children of God. And vndoubtedly they knowe it assuredly: but rather by beeing confirmed by persuasion of Gods trueth, than by being informed by naturall demonstration. And this also the words of Paul do declare saying, that while wee dwell in the bodie, wee are wandering abroad from the Lord, because we walke by faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we vnderstand by faith, are yet absent from vs and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of faith standeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

15 We further call it, a sure and stedfast knowledge, to expresse thereby a more sound constancie of persuasion. For as faith is not contented with a doutfull and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke & entangled vnderstanding: but requireth a full & fixed assurednes, such as men are wont to haue of things found by experience and proued. For vnbeleefe sticketh so fast and is so decepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is faithfull, no man is without great contention perswaded in his heart. Specially cially when he commeth to the prooffe, then the wauering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation mainteineth the authoritie of the word of God, but endeuoreth to giue remedy for the aforesaid disease, that God may obtaine to be fully beleueed of vs in his promises. The words of the Lord (saith Dauid) are pure wordes, as the Siluer tried in a fornace of earth, fined seuen times. Againe, The word of the Lorde fined is a shield to all that trust in him. And Salomon confirming the same, & in a maner in the same words, saith: Euery word of God is pure. But sith the whole 119. Psalm entreateth only in a manner vpon the same, it were superfluous to alleage any mo places. Truly so oft as God doth so commend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the way reproche vs with our vnbeleuingnesse: because that commendation tendeth to no other ende, but to roote vp al peruerse doutings out of our hearts. There bee also many which so conceiue the mercy of God, that they take litle comfort therof. For they be euen therewithall pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they dout whether hee will be merciful to them or no, because they enclose within too narrowe bounds the very same mercifulnesse, of which they thinke themselues most assuredly perswaded. For thus they think with themselues, that his mercie is in deede great & plentiful poured out vpon many, offering it selfe & readie for al men: but that it is not certaine whether it wil extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an half. Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with assured quietnes, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doubtfulnesse. But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to faith, euen such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of dout. And that cannot be, but that we must needes truly feele & proue in our selues the sweetenesse thereof. And therefore the Apostle out of faith deriueth assured confidence, & out of it againe boldnesse. For thus he saith, that by Christ we haue boldnesse, and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which wordes truly he sheweth, that it is no right faith, but when wee are bolde with quiet minds to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnesse proceedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good wil & our saluatiō. Which is so true, y^e many times this word Faith, is vsed for Cōfidence.

16 But hereupon hangerh the chiefe stay of our faith, that wee doe not thinke the promises of mercie which the Lord offereth to be true onely in o-ther beside vs, & not at al in our selues: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our own. From hence proceedeth that confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, vnlesse som had rather say, that peace is deriued of it. It is an assurednes that maketh y^e conscience quiet & chereful before God, without which the conscience must of necessitie be vexed, & in a maner torne in pieces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it do forget God & it selfe, and so slumber a litle while. And I may truly say, For a litle while, for it doth not long enioy that miserable forgetfulnesse, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods iudgement sharply tormented. Briefely, there is none truly faithfull, but hee that being persuaded with a sound assurednesse that God is his merciful and louing father, doth promise him selfe all things vpon trust of Gods goodnesse: and none but he that trusting vpon the promises of Gods good will toward him, conceiueth an vndouted looking for of saluation: as the Apostle sheweth in these wordes: if we keepe sure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kindgome of heauen. There is none (I say) faithfull, but he that leaning vpon the assurednesse of his owne saluation, doth confidently triumph vpon the Deuill and death, as we are taught by that notable concluding sentence of Paul: I am persuaded (saith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shalbe able to separate vs from y^e loue of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Iesu. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane wel lightened, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And ech where his common maner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no other wise we doe not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, vnlesse we gather of it the frute of greate assurednesse.

Heb. 3. 13.

Eph. 1. 18.

17 But (some man will say) y^e faithfull do find by experience a farre other thing within themselves, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not only tempted with vnquietnesse, which oftentimes chaunceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grieuous terrours: so great is the vehemency of temptations to throwe downe their mindes: which thing seemeth not sufficiently well to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therefore this doubt must be answered, if we will haue our aforesayde doctrine to stand. But truely, when we teach that faith ought to be certaine and assured, wee doe not imagine such a certaintie as is touched with no doubting, nor such an assurednesse as is assailed with no carefulnesse: but rather wee say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfulnesse. So farre be we from settling their consciences in such a peaseable quietnesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sorte soeuer they be afflicted, they do neuer fal and depart from that assured confidence which they haue conceiued of the mercy of God. The Scripture setteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, specially if a man beholde the whole continuall course of his life. But yet howe he was not alway of quiete minde, himselfe declareth by innumerable complaintes, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reprocheth his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angry with his owne vnbeleeuingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (sayth he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truly y^e same discouragement was a plaine token of destruction, euen as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in an other place we reade a larger confession thereof, where he sayth: I sayd in my ouerthrowe, I am cast out from the sight of thy eyes. Also in an other place he wth disputeth himselfe in carefull & miserable perplexity yea and quarelleth of the very nature of God, saying: Hath

Psa. 42. 68.

Psa. 31. 22.

Psa. 77. 10. God forgotten to haue mercy? will he cast of for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue sayde, To die is mine: charges are of the right hande of the hieft. For, as in despaire he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not only confesseth himselfe to be tossed with douting, but as if he were vanquished in battel, he leaueth nothing to himselfe, because God hath forsaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhortheth his soule to returne to her quietnesse, because he had founde by experience, that he was tossed among troublesome waues. And yet (which is marueilous) in all these assaultes, faith vpholdeth the heartes of the godly, and is truely like vnto a Date tree to endeouour and rise vpward against all burdens, how great foeuer they be: as Dauid when he might seeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, ceaseth not to rise vp to God. And truely he that struiuing with his owne weakenesse, resorteth to faith in his troubles, is already in a maner conquerour. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lorde, be strong, he shall strengthen thy heart: wait for the Lord. He reprocheth himselfe of fearefulness, and in repeating y same twise, confesseth himselfe to be somtimes subiect to many troublesome motions. And in the meane time he doth not onely become displeased with himselfe in these faultes, but earnestly endeouureth to amendement. Truly if wee will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achaz, there shalbe found greate difference. Esay was sent to bring remedy to the carefull grieue of the wicked king & hypocrite, and spake vnto him in these wordes: Be in safegarde and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before sayde, that his heart was moued as the trees of the wood are shaken with winde, though he heard the promise, yet he ceased not to quake for feare. This therefore is the proper reward and punishment of vnbeliefe, so to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himselfe away from God, y doth not open to himselfe the gate by faith. Contrariwise the faithful whom the weighty burden of temptations maketh to stoupe, and in a maner oppresseth, do constantly rise vp, although not without trouble and hardnesse. And because they know their owne weakenesse, they pray withe the Prophet: Take not the worde of trueth away from my mouth continually. By which wordes we are taught, that sometime they become dumme as though their faith were vtterly ouerthrown, yet they faint not, nor turne their backs, but proceede in their battell, & with praier do encourage their slouthfulness, least by fauouring themselues they should growe to vn sensible dulnesse.

18 For the vnderstanding thereof, it is needefull to returne to that diuision of the flesh and the spirite, whereof we made mention in an other place, which doth in this behalfe most clearely appeare. The godly heart therefore feeleth a diuision in it self, which is partly delited with sweetnes by acknowledging of the goodnes of God, and partely griued w bitterness by feeling of his owne misery, partly resteth vpon the promise of the Gospell, and partly trembleth by reason of the testimony of his owne wickednesse: partly reioyseth with conceiuing of life, and partely quaketh for feare of death. Which variation commeth by imperfection of faith, forasmuch as we neuer be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulnesse to be altogether filled and possessed with faith. Hereupon proceede those battels, when the distrustfulnesse that abideth in the remnants of the flesh, riseth vp to assaile the faith that is inwardly conceiued. But if in a faithfull minde assurednesse be mixed with doubtfulnesse, come we not then alway to this point, that faith standeth not in a certaine & cleare knowledge, but in a darke & doubtfully entangled knowledge of Gods wil toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diuersly drawn with sundrie thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by seuered from faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp & downe of distrustfulnes, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomlesse depth thereof: and though wee be shaken, yet be we not thrust down out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battel, that faith doth at length with wrastring ouercome those harde troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it neuer so small, is poured into our hearts, wee by and by begin to beholde the face of God milde and pleasant, and louing toward vs: yet the same wee see from a farre of, & farre distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we knowe we are not deceiued. From thense forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, wee come vnto so much the neerer, & therefore certainer beholding of him, & by very continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by litle & litle is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some thinges, or by darkely seeing y^e which she seeth, but that she enioyeth a cleare knowledge of Gods wil toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shining in, sidelong at a narrow window, or as it were but halfe glumming, he wanteth in deede the free beholding of the Sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an vndouted brightnesse thereof, and receiue the vse of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoeuer wee be on eche side shadowed with much darkenes, yet we are sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect assurednesse, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it be but a litle, to shewe forth his mercie.

20 Both these pointes the Apostle very well teacheth in diuerse places. 1. Cor. 13, 9. For when he saith, that we know vnperfectly, and prophetic vnperfectly, & see by a darke speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a litle portion of the true godly wisdom is giuen vs in this present life. For though those wordes do not expressly shewe that our faith is vnperfect so long as wee grone vnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection y^e we haue need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, cannot be comprehended by our small capacite, and narrow compasse. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dulnesse is an hinderance and stay that he cannot come so neere as were to be wished. But how sure and vndeceivable a taste of it selfe, euen a small drop of faith doth make vs feele, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where hee affirmeth, that by the Gospel wee beholde the glorie of God with vncouered face, hauing no veile betweene vs and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglements of ignorance there must needes be wrapped together both much douting and fearfull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selfe, is enclined to vnbeleeuingnesse. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and diuerse in kinde, do oftentimes with great sodaine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauy burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament and grone wth it selfe, and sometime accufeth it selfe: sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduersities doe shewe an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it selfe any prooffe or matter of his wrath, from thense vnbeleefe doth take weapons & engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this ende, y^e wee thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, should both not hope for any helpe at his hande, and also be afraid of him as of our deadly enimie.

21 To beare these assaults, faith doth arme and fortifie her selfe with y^e worde of God. And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enimy, because he is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he punisheth he is also merciful, because his chastisement commeth rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that god is a reneger of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardon ready for all offences, so oft as the sinner resorteth to the mercifulnesse of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoeuer it be in meruailous wise tossed & vexed, yet at length riseth vp aboue all dangers, & neuer suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatsoeuer contentions do trouble & wearie it, in the end they turne to the assurednes of this confidence. And hereof this is a proff: that the holy ones, when they think themselues most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet euen then do make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then neuerthelesse they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their moane to him from whome they hoped for no comfort: truly they would neuer finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleued that there were some helpe at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smalnesse of faith, complained in deed that they perished, but yet they called to him for helpe. And when he rebuketh them for their small faith, yet he doeth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleeuers, but stirreth them to shake off y^e fault. Therefore we affirme againe y^e which wee haue aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoeuer it be shaken & seeme to bend this way or that way, the light thereof is so neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidden vnder some crabbers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the worde which is an vncorruptible seeede, bringeth soorth fruite like to it selfe, the spring whereof doeth

neuer wither and vtterly perish. For whereas this is the extreemest matter of despeire to the holy ones, to feele according to the consideration of present thinges, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Iob affirmeth that his hope shall proceede so farre, that though God do kill him, yet hee will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the truth therefore: Vnbeliefe reigneth not within the heartes of the godly, but outwardly assaileth them: neither doth she deadly wound them with her weapons, but onely troubleth them, or so hurteeth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, serueth vs for a shield that being holden vp against weapons, doth so receiue the force of them, that it either vtterly driueth them backe, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they can not pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souldiour with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remoue his foote, and giue ground a litle: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not stricken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rise thus hie as to say with Dauid, If I walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is in deed terrible to walke in the darkenes of death, & it can not be but that the faithfull, how much strength soeuer they haue, must be afraide of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, y they haue God present with them, and prouiding for their safery, that feare is ouercome with assurednesse. For (as Augustine sayth) howe great engines soeuer the deuill raiseth vp against vs, so long as he possesseth not the place of the heart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if wee may iudge by the successe, the faithfull not only escape safe from euery battell, so that by and by receiuing fresh courage they are ready to come again into the fiede: but also that is fulfilled which Iohn saith in his canonically Epistle: This is the victorie that ouercommeth the worlde, euen your sayth. For he affirmeth that it shal not onely win the victory in one or few batels, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the ouerhand of y whole world, although it be a thousand times assailed.

22 There is an other kind of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assurednesse of faith is so nothing at all diminished, that therby it is the more soundly stablished. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learne by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselues with the same offences: or recording with themselues their own misery, do learne to hange altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselues to be more sickell and sooner vanishing than any blast of winde. For when the Apostle, in setting forth the scourges wherewith the Lorde in olde time had punished the people of Israel, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they entangle not themselues with like euils: he doth not therby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dulnes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strengthened. And when he taketh occasion of the Iewes fall to exhorte him that standeth, to take heede y he fall not, he doth not therby bid vs to wauer, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnes, but only he taketh away arrogant presumption and rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles beeing receiued into their place, should not too much outrageously triumph against them. Albeit he speaketh there not only to the faithfull, but also in y^e same saying cōprehendeth the Hypocrites y^e gloried only in outward shewe. For neither doth he admonish euery man particularly, but making a comparison between y^e Iewes and the Gentils, after that he had shewed y^e the Iewes in this that they were reiected, did suffer iust iudgemēt for their vnbeliefe & vnthankfulness, he also exhorted the Gentils that they should not, by being proud and extolling themselves, loose the grace of adoption lately conueyed into them. But as in that generall reiecting of the Iewes, there remained yet some y^e were not fallen from the couenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed vp onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, & so abuse Gods louing kindnes to their own destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect and faithfull, yet thereupon shall follow no inconuenience. For it is one thing to hold downe the rash presumption which out of the remnantes of the flesh creepeth sometime euen into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outrageously wanton: and an other thing to strik the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednes in the mercy of God.

23 Then, when he teacheth, y^e with feare and trembling we should worke our owne saluation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustome vs with much abacing of our selues, reuerently to looke vp vnto the mightines of God. For truly nothing doth so much awake vs to cast all our confidence and assurance of mind vpon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selues and carefulnesse conceiued by knowledge in conscience of our own wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophete to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where he comly conioyneth the boldnes of faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent feare, which we must needs feele so oft as comming into the sight of Gods maiefty, we perceiue by the glorious brightnesse thereof, how great is our owne filthines.

Psa. 5.8.

Pro. 28.14.

And Salomon sayth truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne heart afraide, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into cuil. But such feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedefull, not such wherby we should be troubled and vtterly fal: euen such a feare as when the mind confounded in it selfe, doth recouer it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it reuiuet by trust in him. Therefore there is no cause to the contrary, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enioy most assured comfort, in respect y^e sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanity, and sometime they cast the thought of their minde vpon the truth of God. But how (will some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? euen thus, as contrarily vn sensible dulnesse, and carefulnesse. For wheras the wicked trauaile to procure to themselves a want of grief, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the iudgement of God so preffeth them, that they can not attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstand, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that that in fighting valiantly, they may reſtraine themſelues vnder the bridle of modeſty. And by the proceſſe of the text it appeareth, that this was the intent of the Apoſtle, where he aſſigneth the cauſe of feare, and trembling to be the good pleaſure of God, whereby he giueth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that ſaying of the Prophete: The children of Iſrael ſhal feare God and his goodnes: becauſe not only, godlines engendreth the reuerence of God, but the very ſweetneſſe and pleaſant taſt of grace, filleth man being diſcouraged in himſelfe with feare and admiration, to make him hang vpon God, and humbly yeelde himſelfe ſubiect to his power.

24 Yet we do not hereby make roome to that moſt peſtilent Philoſophy, which many halfe papiftes at this day beginne to coyne in corners. For, becauſe they can not defende that groſſe doubtfulnes which hath bin taught in ſchooles, they ſie to an other deuife, to make a confidence mingled with diſtruſtfulneſſe. They confeſſe, that ſo oft as we looke vnto Chriſte, wee finde in him full matter to hope well: but becauſe we are alwayes vnworthy of thoſe good things that are offered vs in Chriſt, they woulde haue vs to wauer and ſtagger in beholding of our own vnworthines. Briefly, they place conſcience ſo betweene hope and feare, that it altereth from the one to the other, by enterchangeable times and courſes: & they ſo compare faith and hope together, that when the one ſpringeth vp, the other is preſſed downe, when the one ariſeth, the other againe falleth. So when Satan ſeeth y^e thoſe open engines wherewith before time he was wont to deſtroy the aſſurednes of faith, do now nothing preuaile, he endeuoreth by crooked vnderminings to ouerthrowe it. But what maner of confidence ſhall that be, which ſhall now and then yeeld to deſperation? If (ſay they) thou conſider Chriſt, there is aſſured ſaluation: but if thou returne to thy ſelfe, there is aſſured damnation. Therefore of neceſſite diſtruſt and good hope muſt by enterchangeable courſes reigne in thy minde: As though wee ought to imagine Chriſt ſtanding a farre off, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for ſaluation at his hande, not becauſe he appeareth a farre off vnto vs, but becauſe he hath graſſed vs into his body, & ſo maketh vs partakers not only of all his good things, but alſo of himſelfe. Therefore I thus turne this their argument againſt themſelues: If thou conſider thy ſelfe, there is certaine damnation. But becauſe Chriſt with all his good things is by way of communicating ſo giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteouſneſſe drowneth thy finnes, his ſaluation taketh away thy damnation: hee by his worthines commeth betweene thee and God, that thy vnworthineſſe come not in the ſight of God. Briefly, this is the truth: we ought neither to ſeparate Chriſt from vs, nor vs from him, but with both handes to hold faſt that fellowſhip whereby he hath coupled himſelfe vnto vs. So the Apoſtle teacheth vs: The body in deede (ſayth he) is dead by reaſon of ſinne: but the Spirit of Chriſt that dwelleth in you, is life for righteouſneſſe. According to theſe mens triſeling deuife he ſhould haue ſayde, Chriſte in deede hath life with himſelfe: but you, as you be ſinners, remaine ſubiect to death and damnation. But he ſaith farre otherwiſe. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deserue of our selues, is swallowed vp by the saluation of Christ, and to proue it, he vseth the same reason that I haue alleaged, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaueth vnto vs not onely with vndiuidable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine marueilous communion dayly more and more groweth with vs into one body, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue sayde a litle before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weaknes therof is among violent sodeine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thicke mist of tentation the light therof is choked, but what so euer happeneth, it ceaseth not from endeouour to seeke God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposely intreateth of this question in his fift Homely in the Dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying vpon the soule, me thinke I find in it two things as it were contrary. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is vtterly brought to naught. What neede I now to recken vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, covered with darkenesse, entangled with deceitfull entisements, itching with lustes, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway enclined to euill, bente to all kindes of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnes of it being looked vpon by the light of truth be found like a cloth stained with floures, then what shall the vnrighteousnes thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darkenesse, how great shall the very darkenesse be? What then? without doubt man is made like vnto vanity: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But howe then is he vtterly nothing, whome God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, towarde whom Gods heart is set? Brethren, let vs take heart againe. Though we be nothing in our owne heartes, peraduenture there may somewhat of vs lie hidden in the heart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, how doest thou set thy heart toward vs? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if thy were not, they shalbe reputed as nothing. Euen before thee, not within thee: so in the iudgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, and also they are because thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of theselues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the workes of righteousness, but of him that calleth. And then he saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is maruellous. Truly those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainely declareth in these wordes. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke vpon our selues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peraduenture it is more encreased. Truly it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our selues but in the Lorde. If we thinke thus: if he hath determined to saue vs, we shall by and by be deliuered: now in this we may take courage. But let vs climbe vp into a hier watche toure, & seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, wee I say be but in the heart of God. Wee be, but by his allowing as worthie, not by our owne worthines.

26 Nowe, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in euerie place witnesse is borne to al the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisdom, and in some places wisdom it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reuerence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore hee that will truly worshipping him, will endeuour to shewe himselfe both an obedient sonne and a seruisable seruaunt vnto him. The obedience that is giuen to him as to a father, The Lord by the Prophete calleth honour: the seruice that is done to him as to a lord, he calleth feare. The sonne (saith he) honoureth the father, and the seruaunt the lorde. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a lorde, where is my feare? But howe soeuer hee putteth difference betwene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the Lord be vnto vs a reuerence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one minde receiue both those affections. For hee that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, hath cause enough, although there were no hels at al, why he should dread his displeasure more greuously than any death. But also (such is the wantonnesse of our fleshe to runne to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restrain the same by all meanes, wee ought therewithall to take holde of this thought, that the Lorde vnder whose power wee liue, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in liuing wickedly doe prouoke his wrath against themselues.

27 But that which Iohn saith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfecte charitie casteth out feare, because feare conteyneth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might doe it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they thinke that it hangeth ouer them, for y they looke euerie moment when it shall fall vpon their heads. As for the faithfull: they (as is aboue saide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang ouer their neckes, but they are made the more ware not to procure it. So saith the Apostle, when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceiued: for this cometh y wrath of God vpon the children of vnbelleefe. He threatneth not y Gods wrath wil come vpon the, but putteth the in mind to think vpon this, y the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doings as he had recited, y they theselues should not be willing also to proue it. Albeit it seldome happeneth that the reprobate be awakened with onely and bare threatenings, but rather being already grosse and vn sensible dul with their owne hardenes, so oft as God thundreth from heauen they harden theselues to obstinacie, but but when they are once stricken with his hande, then whether they will or no, they bee enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a seruile feare: and in comparison set it for contrarie to free natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other doe suttely thrust in a middle kinde, because that same seruile and constrained affection sometime so subdueth mens mindes, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Nowe wee vnderstande, that in the good will of God, wherevnto faith is said to haue respect, the possession of saluation and eternall life is obtained. For if wee can want no good thing, while God is fauourable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of saluation, when he him selfe doerh assure vs of his loue. Let him shewe his face (saith the Prophet) and wee shall bee safe. Wherevpon the Scriptures determine this to bee the summe of our saluation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, y when God is reconciled vnto vs there remaineth no perill, but that all things shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, hauing taken hold of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either y length or honor or welth of his life, for asmuch as God willed none of these things to bee appointed vnto vs, but is contented with this assurednes, y God wil neuer faile how so euer many things faile vs that perraine to the maintenance of this present life. But the cheefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the worde of God. But what soeuer miseries and calamities betide vnto them whome God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when wee did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, wee named the fauour of God, out of which spring doe flowe vnto vs all kindes of good things. And this wee may commonly note through out the Scriptures, that when soeuer mention is made not onely of eternall saluation, but also of any good thing in vs, wee bee alway called backe to the loue of God. For which cause Dauid saith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all things else doe flowe vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and wee bee vncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shalbe accursed, and therefore miserable: But if the fauourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, euen our verie miseries shall bee blessed, because they are turned to helpes of our saluation. As Paul, when hee heapeth vp a rehearfall of all aduersities, yet hee glorieth that hee was not by them seuered from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alway beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewise Dauid serterh the onely fauour of God against all the terrors that trouble vs. If (saith hee) I shall walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes doe wauer, vnlesse being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is saide in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose GOD is the

29 Wee make the foundation of faith to bee the free promise of God, because faith properly stayeth vpon it. For though faith doe beleue God to bee true in all things, whether hee commaunde or forbid, whether hee promise or threaten, and also obediently receiueh his commaundements, and bewareth of things that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and therevpon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not founde in commaundementes or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely giuen. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doeth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stand in our selues. Therefore if we will nor haue our faith to tremble and wauer, we must stay it with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offred vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witness of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he raketh both from the commaundementes and also from the promises of the lawe, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberall embassage, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospell together, when hee teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospel was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleueth: that in it is reuealed the righteousnes of God from faith to faith. And no maruel. For sith the Gospel is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is no other testimonie sure enough of Gods good wil toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, wee doe not denie but that the faithfull doe euerie way embrace and receiue the word of God, but wee appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Euen as the faithfull ought indeede to acknowledge God to bee the iudge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regarde vnto his mercifull kindenesse: for asmuch as hee is described to them to bee considered such a one as is louing and mercifull, farre from wrath, of much goodnesse, gentle vnto all, powring foorth his mercy vpon all his workes.

30 Neither yet doe I regarde the barkinges of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they finde fault with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith it did take holde but of one peece thereof. I graunt (as I haue already said) that the generall obiekt of faith (as they tearme it) is the truth of God, whether hee threaten or pur vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the worlde, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatnings to bee excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeede true. But the cauillers doe vniustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the worde of God. For our meaning is onely to shewe those two things, first, that faith neuer steadfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to bee reconciled to God, but because cause it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those pointes are worthy to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God and the reprobate, betwene y^e faithfull and the vnbeleuing. If a man do beleue that God both iustly commaundeth all that he commaundeth, and truly threatneth, shall hee bee therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no stedfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercie of God. But nowe to what ende doe we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the bodie of Christ? Therefore there is no inconuenience, if in the definition we doe enforce the principall effect thereof, and do ioine vnto the generall name, in stede of a difference y^e marke y^e seuereth the faithfull from the vnbeleuing. Finally, the malicious haue nothing to find fault withal in this doctrin, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in y^e same blame, which calleth the Gospel properly the word of faith.

Rom. 10. 8.

31 But herevpon againe we gather that which wee haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the worde than the fruite doth neede the liuely roote of the tree, because no other (as Dauid testifieth) can trust in the Lord, but they that knowe his name. But this knowledge is not according to euerie mans imagination, but so far as God himselfe is witness of his owne goodnes. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in another place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy worde. Againe, I haue trusted in thy worde, saue mee, Where is to be noted the relation of faith to the word, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the meane time we doe not exclude the power of God, with beholding whereof, vnles faith susteine it selfe, it can neuer giue vnto God his due honour. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that he beleued that God which had promised him y^e blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of him selfe: I know whome I haue beleued, and I am sure that he is able to keep that which I haue left with him vntill that day. But if a man wey with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God do oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shal well perceiue that they which doe highly esteeme it as it is worthie, haue not a litle profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to doe whatsoeuer he will, but when euen the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amazeth vs with horreur, therby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer aboue it those things, y^e Satan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esay, meaning to print into the harts of the people y^e assurednes of saluation, doth so honorably in-treate of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by tourneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how maruellously hee Lorde gouerneth the frame of heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is here nothing that serueth not fitly for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to doe all things be presently set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the worde, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, here is declared his effectieffectuall power, because godlineſſe (as wee haue already ſhewed in an other place) doeth alway applie the power of God to uſe and worke, ſpecially it ſetteth before it ſelfe thoſe workes of God, whereby hee hath teſtified himſelfe to be a father. Herevpon commeth that in the Scriptures is ſo often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Iſraelites might haue learned that God which was once the author of ſaluation, will bee an euerlaſting preſeruer thereof. And Dauid putteth vs in minde by his owne example, that thoſe benefites which God hath particularly beſtowed vpon eue-ry man, doe afterwarde auaille to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God ſeemeth to haue forſaken vs, it behoueth vs to ſtretch our wits further, that his auncient benefites may recomfort vs, as it is ſaid in an other Pſalme, I haue bene mindfull of olde dayes. I haue ſtudied vpon all thy workes. &c. Again, I will remember the workes of the Lorde, and his meruelles from the beginning. But becauſe without the word all quickly vaniſheth away that we conceiue of the power of God and of his workes, therefore we doe not without cauſe affirme that there is no faith, vnleſſe God giue light vnto it with teſtimonie of his grace. But here a queſtion might be moued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it ſeemeth with zeale of faith, paſſed beyonde the bondes of the worde. Sara, when ſhe feruently deſired the promiſed iſſue, gaue her bondmaide to her huſbande. It can not be denied but y^e ſhe many wayes ſinned: but nowe I touch only this faulte, that being carried away with her zeale, ſhee did not reſtraine herſelfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certayne that that deſire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the oracle of God of the election of her ſonne Iacob, procured his bleſſing by euil craftie means: ſhe deceiued her huſband the witneſſe and miniſter of the grace of God: ſhee compelled her ſonne to lie: ſhe by diuerſe guiles and deceits corrupted the truth of God: Finally in making a ſcorne of his promiſe, ſhe did as much as in her lay, deſtroye it. And yet this act, howe much ſoeuer it was euill, and worthie of blame, was not without faith, for it was neceſſarie that ſhe ſhoulde ouercome many offences, that ſhe might ſo earnestly endeour to attein that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and daungers. As we may not ſay that the holy Patriarch Iſaac was altogether without faith, becauſe he being by the ſame oracle of God admo- niſhed of the honour transferred to the younger ſonne, yet ceaſed not to be more fauourably bent to his firſt begotten ſonne Eſau. Truly theſe exam- ples doe teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet ſo that faith if it bee a true faith, hath alway the vpper hande. For as the particu- lar error of Rebecca did not make voide the effecte of the bleſ- ſing, ſo neither did it make voyde her faith which generally reigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cauſe of that doing. Neuer- theleſſe therein Rebecca vttered howe readie mans minde is to fall ſo ſoone as hee giueth himſelfe, neuer ſo little libertie. But though mans defaulte and weakeneſſe doeth darken Faith, yet it doeth not quenche it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, howe carefully wee ought to hange vpon the mouth of G O D, and alſo confirmeth that whiche wee haue taught, that Faith vaniſheth away, vnleſſe it bee vpholden by the worde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Iſaac and Rebecca

had become wayne in their crooked wanderings out of the waye, vnlesse they had bene by Gods secrete bridle holden in obedience of the word.

32 Againe, not without cause wee include all the promises in Christe, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospell: and in an other place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is readie to be shewed. For if God promise any thing, hee therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimonie of his loue. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continuall benefites of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, doe thereby wrap, them selues in so much the more greuous iudgement. For sith they doe neither thinke nor acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they do not with them selues consider his goodness, therefore they can not thereby bee better taught of his mercie than bruit beastes, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receiue the same fruite of Gods libelalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doeth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to themselues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises do then onely appeare, when they haue founde faith with vs, yet y force and naturall proprietie of them is neuer extinguished by our vnbeleefe or vnthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lord by his promises doth prouoke man not onely to receiue, but also to thinke vpon the fruites of his bountifulnes, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Wherevpon we must returne to this point, that euery promise is a testifying of Gods loue toward vs. But it is out of question, y no man is loued of God but in Christ, he is the beloued Sonne, in whome the loue of the father abideth & resteth, & then from him powreth it selfe abroad vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that wee haue obtained fauour in the beloued one. Therefore it must needs bee deriued and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in an other place calleth him our peace: in an other place he setteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly natural kindnes bounde vnto vs. It followeth then y we must cast our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs. And that Paul teacheth no absurditie, y al Gods promises whatsoeuer they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. Therebe certaine examples y make for the contrarie, For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when hee required of the Prophet the maner how to worship God aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlines is praysed. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romane, could scarcely vnderstand that which was knowen not to all the Iewes, yea & that very darkely: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God. And the sacrifice of Naaman, by the Prophets answeare allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whom Philip was carried, which if hee had not had some faith, would not haue taken vpon him the trauel & expenses of so long a journey, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, howe he bewraied his ignorance of the Mediator. And truly I grant that their faith was partly vnexpressed, not only concerning Christs person, but also concerning his his power & the office committed vnto him of the Father. Yet in the meane time it is certain, that they were instructed in such principles, as gaue them some tast of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither would y^e Eunuch haue come in hast to Ierusalem from a farre cuntry to worship an vnknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Iewish religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrin. As for Naaman, it had bene too fond an absurditie for Elizeus when he taught him of smal things, to haue said nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a dark knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vse themselues in the sacrifices of the lawe, which must haue bene discerned by the very ende of them, that is Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare & outward declaration of the worde of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it be beleued, if our owne blindnesse & stubbornnesse did not withstand it. But our minde hath such an inclination to vanitie, y^e it can neuer cleaue fast vnto the trueth of God, & hath such a dulnes, y^e it is alway blind & cannot see the light therof. Therefore there is nothing auailably done by the worde without the enlightning of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is farre above mans vnderstanding. Neither shal it be sufficient that the minde be lightened with the spirite of God, vnlesse the heart be also strengthened & stablished with his power. Wherein the Schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith, do only take hold of a bare & simple assent by knowledge, leauing out y^e confidence & assurednesse of the heart. Therefore faith is both wayes a singular gift of God, both y^e the mind of man is clenfed to tast the trueth of God, & that his heart is stablished therein. For the holy Ghost not only is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees encreaseth it, vntil by it he bring vs to the heauenly kingdom. That good thing (saith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But howe Paul saith y^e the holy Ghost is giuen by the hearing of faith, wee may easily dissolue it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an absurditie for him to call the holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author & cause of faith. But when hee maketh report of the giftes wherewith God garnisheth his Church, & by encreasings of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no meruaile if he ascribe those thinges to faith which maketh vs fit to receive them. This is reckened a most strange conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whom it is giuen, can beleue in Christ. But that is partly because they do not consider either how secret & hie the heauenly wisdome is, or how great mans dulnesse is in conceiuing the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not vnto that assured & stedfast constantnesse of heart, that is to say, the chiefe part of faith.

34 But if (as Paul preacheth) no man is witnesse of the will of man, but ¹Cor. 2. 11. the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the wil of God? And if the trueth of God be vncertaine among vs, in those thinges y^e we presently behold with our eye, howe should it be assured and stedfast among vs there where the Lord promiseth such thinges as neither eye seeth, nor wit comprehendeth. But herein mans sharpnesse of vnderstanding is so ouerthrowen and faileth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schoole, is to forsake his owne wit. For by it as by a veile cast before vs, wee are hindered that we cannot atteine the mysteries of God, which are not disclosed but to litle ones. For neither doth flesh and bloud disclose, nor naturall man perceiue those things that are of the Spirite, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spirituallly to be iudged. Therefore herein the helpe of the holy ghost is necessarrie, or rather herein his force only reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the mind of God, or hath ben his counsellor: but the holy spirit searcheth out all thinges, euen the deepe secretes of God, by whome it is brought to passe, that we knowe the minde of Christ. No man (saith he) can come to me: vnlesse my father that sent me, drawe him. Euery one therefore that hath hearde and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Euen as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but beeing drawn by the Spirite of God: so when wee be drawn, wee are lifted vp in wit & mind about our vnderstanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a newe sharpnesse of vnderstanding, wherewith it may beholde heauenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before daseled in it selfe. And so mans vnderstanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doeth neuer til then truely begin to taste of those thinges that belong to the kingdome of God, being before altogether vnfaourie & without iudgement of taste to take assay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set out vnto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing preuailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might vnderstande the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirite of trueth must bee sent vnto them, to poure into their mindes the same doctrine which they had hearde with their eares. The worde of GOD is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whome it is preached, but to no profite among blinde men. But wee are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot pearce into our minde but by the inward master the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entrie for it.

35 In another place, when wee had to entreat of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnfit men are to beleue. Therefore I wil not wearie the readers with repeting the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spirit of faith is called of Paul faith it self, which the spirite giueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth y it is of mans own motion: and not contented therewith he addeth further, y it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdom of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh in deed of outward miracles: but because y reprobate are blind at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth also that inwarde seale, whereof he maketh mention in an other place. And God, the more gloriously to set forth his liberality in so noble a gift; vouchsafeth not to graunt it to all vniuersally without difference, but by singular priuilege giueth it to whom he wil. For prooffe whereof we haue alleaged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expositor, crieth out that it would please the Sauiour to teach him, and that the very beleeuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deseruing. No man (saith he) commeth to me, vnlesse my father drawe him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two doe heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it vnto himselfe: lette him that ascendeth, not arrogantly asigne it to himselfe. In an other place. Why is it giuen to one and not to an other? It greueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wote not what depth of the iudgements of God which we may not search, proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may cry out with wondering, but not shewe it in disputing. Finally the summe commeth to this, that Christ when hee enlightneth vs vnto faith by the power of his Spirit, doeth therewithall graffe vs into his bodie, that wee may be made partakers of all good thinges.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may be further conueyed into y heart. For the word of God is not throughly receiued by faith, if it swimme in the toppe of the braine, but when it hath taken roote in the bottome of the heart y it may be an inuincible defence to beare and repulse al the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that y true vnderstanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more evidently appeareth, euen by so much as the distrustfulnesse of the heart is greater than the blindnesse of the wit: and as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assurednesse, than y wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seale, to seale vp in our hearts those same promises, the assurance whereof it first emprinted in our wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirme and stablsh them. Sith ye beleued (sayth the Apostle) ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the spirit the heartes of the faithfull are grauen as with a seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratifieth the Gospell vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he sayth: God which annointed vs, which hath also sealed vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our heartes. And in an other place when he speaketh of confidence and boldenesse of hoping well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I saide before, the remembrance whereof experiance cōtinually reneweth, that is, that faith is tossed with diuerse doubtings, so that the mindes of the godly are seldom quiet, or at last do not alway enioy a peaseable state: but with whatsoeuer engine they be shaken, either they rise vp out of the very gulf of temptations, or doe abide fast in their standing. Truly this assurednesse onely nourisheth and defendeth faith, when we holde fast that which is sayd in the Psalme: The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therefore we wil not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leape into the heart of the sea . Also this most sweete quietnesse is spoken of in an other place: I lay downe and slept, and rose againe, because the Lorde hath susteined me . It is not meant therby that Dauid was alway with one vndisturbed course framed to a merry cheerefulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God, according to his proportion of faith, therefore he glorieth that he without feare despiseth al that euer might desquiet the peace of his mind. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to faith, biddeth vs to be quiet . In Esaie it is sayde: In hope and silence shall be your strength . In the Psalme: Holde thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrues: Patience is needefull. &c.

Esa. 30. 15.

Psa. 37. 7.

Heb. 10. 36.

38 Hereby we may iudge howe pestilent is that doctrine of the Scholemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall coniecture as euery man thinketh himself worthy of it. Truly if we shall wey by our workes how God is minded toward vs, I grant that we can attaine it with any coniecture, be it neuer so slender: but sith faith ought to haue relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall wee be armed, if we say that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, so that the purenesse of our life doe deserue it? But because I haue appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrary to faith, than either coniecture or any thing nere vnto doubting. And they do very ill writh to this purpose that testimony of the preacher which they haue oft in their mouths: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or loue. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the common translatiō corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such wordes: that is, that if any man will iudge by the present state of thinges, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboreth in vaine, & troubleth himselfe to no profit for his paines: sith all thinges happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witnesse his loue to them to whome he maketh all thinges happen prosperously, nor doeth alwayes vtter the hatred to them whom he punisheth. And that he doth to condemne the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in thinges most needefull to be knowen. As he had written a litle before, that it can not be discerned what the soule of a man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to dy in like manner. If any man will gather thereof, that the opinion that we holde of the immortality of soules, standeth vpon coniecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wittes which gather that there is no certainty of Gods grace, because wee can conceiue none by the carnall beholding of present thinges?

Ecc. 3. 9.

39 But they alleage that it is a point of rash presumption, to take vpon vs an vndoubted knowledge of Gods will. I woulde in dede graunt it

vnto them, if we did take so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subiect to the slenderesse of our witte. But when we simply say with Paul, that we haue receiued not the spirite of this world, but the Spirite that is of God, by whose teaching we may knowe those things that are giuen vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible robbetrie of God to accuse the reuelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassured or doutfull, what do wee offende in affirming that it is assured? But they say, that this also is not without great presumptuousnesse, that we dare so glorie of the Spirite of Christ. Who would think that their dulnesse were so great that would be counted masters of y^e world, that they so fowly stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vnlesse their owne writings that are abroad did testifie it. Paul pronounceth that they onely are the children of God, that are moued with his spirite: and these men would haue them that be the children of God, to be moued with their owne spirite, and to be without y^e Spirite of God. Paul teacheth that we cal God our Father, as the holy ghost ministreth that worde vnto vs, which onely can beare witnesse to our spirite that we are the children of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vpon God, yet doe take away his Spirite, by whose guiding hee should haue bene rightly called vpon. Paul denyeth that they are the seruants of Christ, that are not moued with the Spirite of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirite of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnlesse wee feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without any such feeling. But peradventure they will answer, that they do not deny that wee ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie & humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whither they be in the faith, to proue themselues whither they haue Christ, whome vnlesse a man do acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath giuen vs (saith Iohn) we know that he abideth in vs. And what do we else but call the promises of Christ in dout, when wee wil be counted the seruants of God without his Spirite, which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out vpon all his? Beside that, wee doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which do seperate from him faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godly religion, it is a token of miserable blindnesse, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glorie of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorying Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truly Christ saide, that his Spirit is vnknown to the worlde, & is onely known of them with whome he abideth.

40 And because they will not go about to ouerthrowe the stedfastnesse of faith with digging onely of one mine, they assaile it also otherwise. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousness, wee may gather a iudgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseuerance to the end abideth in suspense. A goodly confidence of saluation forsooth is left vnto vs, if we iudge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment we be in fauour, and what shal become of vs to morrow we cannot tel. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise: I am surely persuaded (saith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death, nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shal seuer vs from the loue wherwith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, prating that the Apostle had that by speciall reuelation. But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things y^e commonly come by faith to the faithfull, not those that he himself specially feeleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weaknesse & vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby we should be ouerthrowen, but wherby we may learne to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and trueth is it to limit the assurednesse of faith to a moment of time, whose proprietie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortalitie to come? Sith therefore the faithfull do impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his spirite they do by faith enioy the beholding of the heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulnes, in vnkindly hiding Gods goodnes, than he doth declare his modestie or submission.

41 Because it seemed that the nature of faith could not otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substance of the promise vpon which it resteth as vpon her proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheth away: therefore wee tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applyeth to his discourse, where he saith that faith is a substance of things to be hoped for, & a certaintie of things that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he useth) he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, wher vpon the godly mind leaneth and resteth. As if he should say y^e faith is a certaine & assured possession of those things y^e are promised vs of god, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for assurance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonly received. Againe, to signifie that euen to the last day when the booke shal be opened, they are hier than those things that may be perceiued with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handled with our hands, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by vs, but if we go beyond the capacity of our owne wit, & bend our vnderstanding about all things y^e are in the worlde, yea and climbe about our selues, he hath therefore added that this assurednes of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therefore are not seene. For plaine appearance (as Paul writeth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certaintie or prooffe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a coniunction of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he saith as much as if he did say, that it is an euident shewing of things not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of daire things, a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they be that pertain to our saluation, cannot be seene in themselues & in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whose truth we ought to be so fully persuaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done & fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it self to receiue such a tast of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholly kindled to loue God againe? For that flowing plentie of sweetenes which God hath layde vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truly knowen, but that it must therewithal vehemently moue affection: and whose affection it once moueth, it vtterly rauisheth & carrieth him beyond himselfe. Therefore it is no marueile, if into a peruerse & crooked heart neuer entred this affection, by which being conueyed vp into y very heauen, we are suffred to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of god, & the most sacred priuie places of his kingdome, which may not be defiled with the entrance of an vnclane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnes. For it is faith onely that first engendreth charitie in vs. Howe much more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleeue (saith he) that the testimonie of conscience, which Paul calleth the glorie of the godly, consisteth in three things. For first of all it is necessarie to beleeue y thou canst not haue forgiuenes of sins, by y pardon of God: then y thou canst haue no good worke at all, vnlesse he also giue it: last of all y thou canst by no works deserue eternal life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A litle after he addeth y these things suffice not, but y there is a certeine beginning of faith, because in beleeuing y sinnes cannot be forgiuen but of God, we ought also to beleeue y they are not forgiuen vs, til also we be persuaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, y saluation is layd vp in store for vs: because God forgiuerh sinnes, he himself giueth merites, & he himselfe also giueth rewards, that we may not stay stil in this beginning. But these & other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

42 Nowe whersoever this liuely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but y it hath with it the hope of eternal saluation: as an vndiuidable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it forth out of it selfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriously soeuer we talke of faith, yet we are conuicted to haue no faith at all, for if faith (as is abouesaid) be an assured persuasion of Gods truth, that it cannot lye vnto vs nor deceiue vs, nor become void, then they that haue conceiued this assurednesse, truly doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God shall perfourme his promises, which in their persuasion cannot be but true: so that briefely, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath believed to be truly promised of God. So faith beleeueth y God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his truth in conuenient time. Faith beleeueth y he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shewe himselfe such a one toward vs. Faith beleeueth y eternal life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reuiled. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nourisheth & sustaineth faith. For as no man can looke for any thing at Gods hande, but he y hath first believed his promises: so againe the weaknesse of our faith must with patient hope & expectation bee sustained and cherished, that it fall not as fainting for wearinesse. For which reason Paul doeth well place our saluation in hope. For hope, while it in silence looketh for y^e Lord, restraineth faith that it fall not headlong with too much hast: hope strengthneth faith, that it wauer not in Gods promises, nor begin to doubt of the trueth of them: hope refresheth faith that it waxe not wearie: Hope stretcheth faith to the vttermost bounde, that it faint not in the mid course, nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continually reuuing and restoring, it maketh it nowe and then to rise vp fresher than it selfe to continuance. But how many wayes the helps of hope are necessaric to the strengthening of faith, shal better appeare, if we consider with howe many sortes of temptations they are assailed and shaken, that haue embraced the worde of God. First, the Lord in deferring his promises doeth oftentimes holde our mindes longer in suspense than we would wish: here it is the office of hope to perfourme, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his promises do tary, yet we should waite stil for them. Sometime he suffereth vs not onely to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeas'd: here it is much more necessaric to haue hope to helpe vs, that according to the saying of an other Prophet, wee may still looke for the Lorde that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There rise vp all scorners (as Peter saith) that aske: where is his promise or his comming? for as much as since the fathers slept, all things so continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the flesh & the world do whisper the same thing in our eares. Here must faith stayed with sufferance of hope be holden fast fixed in beholding of eternitie y^e it may accompt a thousand yeres like as one day.

43 For this conioyning and alliance the Scripture sometimes confoundeth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that wee are by the power of God preserued through faith, vnto the disclosing of saluation, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we haue already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment & strength of faith. Sometimes they are ioyned together: as in the same Epistle. That your faith & hope should be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith deriueth expectation, because in patiently hoping, we hold our desires in suspense, til Gods conuenient oportunitie be opened. All which matter we may better vnderstand by y^e tenth chapter to the Hebrues, which I haue already alleaged. Paul in another place, although he speake vnproperly, yet meaneth the same thing in these words: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousness, euen because we embracing the testimonie of the Gospel concerning his free loue, do looke for the time when God shal openly shewe that which is nowe hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard layeth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, & the deseruing of workes. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: & wee haue already declared y^e faith hath one onely marke the mercie of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a liuely reason he bringeth. If (saith he) thou darst hope for any thing without deseruings, y^e shal not be worthie to be called hope, but presumption. Who (gentle reader) wil not worthily abhorre such beastes, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his worde? For where the Lorde willeth vs to looke for all things at his goodnesse, they say it is presumption to learne and rest vpon it. A maister meete for such scholers as he founde in the mad schoole of filthy bablers. But as for vs, when we see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceiue a hope of saluation, let vs gladly presume so much vpon his trueth, as trusting vpon his only mercy, casting away the confidence of workes, to be bolde to hope well. He will not deceiue that sayde: Be it vnto you according to your faith. at. 9. 29.

The iij. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

Albeit wee haue already partely taught howe faith possesseth Christ, & howe by it we enioy his benefites: neuerthelesse this were yet darke, vnlesse we did also make declaration of the effectes that we feele thereby. Not without cause it is sayde, that the sum of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiueneffe of sinnes. Therefore leauing out these two pointes, whatsoeuer we shall say of faith, shalbe but a hungry and vnperfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and wee obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shalbe to Repentance, because when this article is well perceiued, it shall the better appeare how man is iustified by only faith and meere pardon, and yet how real holines of life (as I may so call it) is not seuered from free imputatiō of righteousness. Now it ought to be out of question, that Repentance doth not only immediatly follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon & forgiuenes is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being deliuered from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdome of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but he must returne from the errorrs of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring soorth of it, as a fruite out of a trec, they neuer knew the force thereof, and are moued with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2 Christ (say they) and Iohn in their preachings doe first exhort the people to repentance, and then they afterward say that the kingdom of heauen is at hande. Such commandement to preach, the Apostles receiued, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the ioyning together of sillables, they marke not in what meaning the wordes hang together. For when y^e Lorde Christ & Iohn do preach in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hande: do they not fetch the cause of repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their wordes are asmuch in effect as if they had sayde: because the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand, therefore repent yee . For Matthew, when he hath shewed that Iohn so preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophetic of Esay , concerning the voyce crying in the wildernesse , Prepare the way of the Lorde, make streight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tidings . Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dreame a certaine meane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out: but we dreame to shewe that a man can not earnestly apply himselfe to repentance, vnlesse he know himselfe to be of God . But no man is truly perswaded that he is of God, but he that hath first receiued his grace. But these thinges shalbe more plainly discussed in the processe following. Paraduerture this deceiued them, that many are first by terrours of conscience tamed, or framed to obedience , before that they haue throughly digested, yea before they haue tasted the knowledge of grace . And this is the feare at the beginning, which some account among vertues , because they see that it is neere to true and iust obedience . But our question is not here how diuersly Christ draweth vs vnto him , or prepareth vs to the endeuour of godlinesse: only this I say, that there can be no vprightnesse found where reigneth not the Spirit which Christ receiued to communicate the same to his members . Then according to that saying of the Psalme : With thee is mercifulnesse, that thou mayest be feared . No man shall euer reuerently feare God, but he that trusteth that God is mercifull vnto him : no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the lawe, but he that is perswaded that his seruices please him : which tendernesse in pardoning and bearing with faultes, is a signe of fatherly fauour . Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, because he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs; he hath striken vs , and he will cure vs , because the hope of pardon is vsed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their sinnes. But their doting errour is without all colour of reason, which to beginne at repentance do appoint certaine dayes to their newe conuertes, during the which they must exercise theselues in penance : and when those dayes are once past, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Gospell. I speake of many of the Anabaptistes, specially those that maruelously reioyce to be counted spiritual, and their companions the Iesuits, and such other dregs. Such fruits forsooth that spirit of giddines bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compasse of a few dayes, which a Christian man ought to extende in continuance throughout his whole life.

3 But certaine learned men, euen long before these times, meaning to speake simply & syncerely of repentance, according to the trueth of Scripture, haue said that it consisteth of two parts, mortification, and viuificatiō. Mortification they expounde to be a sorow of the soule and feare conceiued of the acknowledging of sinne, and of the feeling of the iudgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of sinne, then he truly beginneth to hate and abhorre sinne : then he heartily misliketh himselfe, confesseth himselfe to be miserable and lost, and wisheth himselfe to be an other man . Further, when hee is touched with some feeling of the iudgement of G O D (for the one immediatly followeth vpon the other) then he lieth striken and ouerthrowen, then he trembleth, humbled and cast downe, downe, then hee is discouraged and despaireth. This is the first part of repentance, which they haue commonly called contrition. Viuification they expounde to be the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man ouerthrowne with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterwarde vnto the goodnes of God, vnto the mercy, fauour and saluation, that is though Christ, raiseth vp him selfe, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were from death to life. And these words, if they haue a right exposition, do aptly enough expresse the nature of repentance. But where they take Viuification for the cheerefulnesse, which the mind receiue being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: forasmuch it rather signifieth a desire to liue holily and godly which groweth of regeneration, as if it were said, that man dieth to him selfe, to begin to liue to God.

4 Some other, because they sawe this word diuersly taken in Scripture, haue made two sortes of repentance: and because they shoulde make them differently knowen by some marke, they haue called the one Repentance of the Law, by which the sinner wounded with the searing iron of sinne, & worne away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble & can not wind him selfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of y^e Gospell, by which the sinner is in deede greuously vexed with him selfe, but he riseth vp higher, and taketh holde of Christ, the salue of his sore, the comfort of his feare, the haue of his miserie. Of the repentance of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whose repentance when the scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greuousnesse of their sinne, were afraide of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onely as a reuenger and iudge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entrie of hell, whereinto they being entred into this present life beganne already to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maiestie. The repentance of the Gospell, wee see in all them, that being galled with the spur of sinne in themselves, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lorde. Ezechias was stricken with feare, when he receiued the message of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, hee tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Niniuites were troubled with the horrible threatning of destruction. But they clothed themselves in sackcloth and ashes & praied, hoping that the Lord might be turned to the & turned from the furor of his wrath. Dauid confessed y^e he had too much sinned in numbring y^e people: but he saide further, Lorde take away the wickednesse of thy seruant. Hee acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, & did cast himselfe downe before the Lorde, but therewithall he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart: but trusting vpon the goodnes of God, they saide furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we do? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeede bitterly, but he ceased not to hope well.

5 Although all these things be true, yet the verie name of repentance (fo

(so far as I can learne by the Scriptures) is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend faith vnder repētance, it disagreeth with that which Paul saith in the Actes, that he testified to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and faith in Iesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance & faith as two diuerse things. What then? Can true repentance stande without faith? No: But though they can not bee seuered, yet they must bee distinguished. As faith is not without hope, and yet faith and hope are diuerse things: so repentance and faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bonde, yet they rather woulde bee conioyned than confounded. And truly I am not ignoraunt, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easily appeare when the force and nature thereof shall bee declared: The name of repentance in Hebrewē is deriued of conuerting or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing it selfe doeth not ill agree with eyther deriuations, where of the summe is, that we departing from our felues shoulde turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, shoulde put on a newe. Wherefore in my iudgement, repentance may thus not amisse bee defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the spirit. In this sense are to bee taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophetes in olde time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onely thing they trauelled to perswade, that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lordes iudgement, they shoulde fall downe and bee humbled before him, against whome they had offended, and with true amendement returne into his right way. Therefore these wordes, To be turned or returne vnto the Lorde, To repent, or doe penance, are among them vsed without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy historie saith, that men repent after the Lorde, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe beginne to followe his worde, and are readie at their captaines commaundement to goe whither hee calleth them. And Iohn and Paul vsed these wordes, to bring forth fruites worthie of repentance, for, to lead such a life as may represent and testifye such an amendement in al their doinges.

6 But before wee goe any further, It shall bee profitable that wee doe more plainely set out at large the definition that we haue made. Wherein there bee chiefly three pointes to bee considered. First when wee call it a turning of life vnto God, wee require a transforming, not onely in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put of her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring forth the fruites of workes agreeable to her renewing. Which when the Prophete goeth about to expresse, he commaundeth them whome hee calleth to repentance, to make them a newe hearte. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew howe the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned vnto y^e Lorde, teacheth that it bee done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which manner of speaking king we see often repeated of the Prophetes) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inwarde affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceiue what is the naturall propriety of repentance than the fourth Chapter of Ieremy. If thou returne to me, O Israell, (saith the Lord) returne to me, plow vp your arable land and sowe not vpon thornes. Be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the vncircumcised skinned of your heartes. See how he pronounceth that they shall nothing preuaile in taking vpon them the following of righteousnes; vnlesse wickednes be first plucked out of the bottome of their heartes. And to moue them throughly, he warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whome there is nothing gotten by dalyng, because he hateth a double heart. Therefore Esay laugheth to scorne the foolish endeouours of hypocrites, which did in deede busily go about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednes wherewith they helde poore men fast tied. Where also he very well sheweth in what duties vnfeined repentance properly standeth.

7 The seconde point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the minde of a sinner be enclined to repentaunce, it must be stirred vp with thinking vpon the iudgement of God. But when this thought is once throughly settled, that God wil one day go vp into his iudgement seate, to require an account of all sayings and doings: it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him vp to thinke vpon a newe trade of life, wherby he may safely appeare at that iudgement. Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorreth to repentance maketh mention of the iudgement: as in Ieremy: least peraduenture my wrath go out as fire, and there be none to quench it, because of the naughtines of your workes. In Pauls sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with y times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euery where may repent them, because he hath appointed the day wherein he wil iudge the worlde in equity. And in many other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a iudge, that sinners should thinke with themselues, that worse thinges hang ouer them if they doe not repent in time. You haue an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring & hatred of sinne, therefore the Apostle maketh sorowfulness, such as is according to God, the cause of repentance. And he calleth sorowfulness according to God, when we are not only afraine of punishment, but do hate & abhorre sin it selfe, forasmuch as we vnderstand y it displeaseth God. And no maruel. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, y slouthfulness of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for y dulnes and slouthfulness therof, vnles God in stretching out his roddes should pearce more deeply. This is also an obstinacie which must be beaten downe as it were with bectles. Therefore the perversnes of our nature enforceth God to the seuerity that he vseth in threatening, because he should in vaine call vs alluringly with faire speech while we lie a sleepe. I recite not the testimonies y commonly offer theselues to be found.

The feare of God is in an other manner also the beginning of repentance.

For

For though mans life were absolutely furnished with al points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may in deede be praised of the worlde, but in heauen it shalbe meere abomination, forasmuch as y^e chiefe part of our righteousnesse is to giue God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our selues to yeelde vs subiect to his gouernment.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that wee say, that Repentance consisteth in two partes, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickning of the spirit. The Prophets do plainly expresse it, although somewhat simply and grossly according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they say: Cease from euill and do goodnes. Again: Be washed, be cleane, take away the euill of your works from mine eyes: Cease to doe peruersly, learne to doe well, seeke iudgement, helpe the oppressed, &c. For when they call men away from wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednesse and peruersenes. It is in deede an vneacie and hard thing to put of our selues, and to depart from our natural disposition. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly deade, vnlesse all that we haue of our selues be abolished. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enemy against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expresse the reuiuing by the frutes that follow thereof, as righteousnesse, iudgement and mercy. For it were not enough to do those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the heart haue first put on the affection of righteousnes, iudgement and mercy. That is done when y^e spirit of God hath so soked in new thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holines, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truely as we are naturally turned away from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our selues do goe before, we can neuer go towards that which is right. Therefore we are so oft commanded to put of the olde man, to forsake the worlde and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, & to be reued in the spirit of our minde. Moreouer the very name of mortification doth put vs in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we therby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the feare of God, nor do learne the principles of godlines, but when we are violently slaine with the word of the Spirit, and so brought to nought euen as though God should pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

9 Both these things do happen vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we do truly cōmunicate of his death, by y^e power thereof our old man is crucified, and the body of sin dieth, y^e corruption of our former nature may lue no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection, by it we are raised vp into a newnes of life, that may agree with the righteousnes of God. In one worde I expounde repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke wherunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence sowlly defaced and in a maner vtterly blotted out, may be reued in vs. So the Apostle teacheth, when he saith: but we representing the glory of God with vncouered face are transformed into the same image, out of glory into glory, as by the spirit of the Lord. Again: Be ye reued in the spirit of your minde and put on the newe man, which is created according to God in righteoufnesse and holinesse of trueth. Againe in an other place: putting on the newe man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration wee bee by the benefit of Christ restored into y^e righteoufnes of God, from which we were fallen by Adam. After which maner it pleaseth the Lord wholly to restore all those who he adōpteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one year, but by continuall, yea and sometimes slowe proceedings God taketh away the corruptions of the fleshe in his elect, cleanseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renewing all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselues all their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthie railer & apostata Staphilus, which foolishly saith that I confounde the state of this present life with the heauenly glorie, when I expounde by Paul, the image of God to be holinesse and true righteoufnesse. As though when any thing is desired, we shoulde not seeke the whole fulnes & perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increases: but I say that how neere any man approacheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine herevnto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run all their life long.

10 The children of God therefore are so deliuered by regeneration frō the bondage of sin, nor that hauing nowe obtined the full possession of libertie, they shoulde feele no more trouble by their fleshe, but that they shoulde haue remaining a continual matter of strife, wherewith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learne their owne weaknes. And in this point all writers of sound iudgement agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeding of euill, from whence continually spring desires that allure & stir him to sin. They confesse also that the holy ones are still so holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot withstand but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to couetousnes, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it needful to labour much in searching what the olde writers haue thought herein, forasmuch as only Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered all their iudgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certantie as they shall desire to learne of y^e opinion of antiquitie. But there may seeme to be this difference between him and vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lustes, y^e they cannot but lust, yet dareth not cal that disease sin: but being content to expresse it by y^e name of weaknes, he teacheth y^e then only it becōmeth sin, when either work or cōsent is added to cōceit or receiuing. y^e is, whē wil yeldeth to y^e first desire: but we account y^e very same for sin, y^e man is tickled with any desire at al against the law of God, Yea we affirme that y^e very corruption that ingendreth such desires in vs, is sinne. We teach therefore y^e there is alway sinne in the holy ones, vntill they be vnclōthed of the mortall body, because there remaineth in their fleshe y^e peruersnes of lusting that fighteth against vprightnes.

And

And yet he doth not alway forbear to vie the name of Sinne, as when he saith: This Paule calleth by the name of sinne, from whence springe all sins vnto a fleshly concupiscence. Thus asmuch as pertaineth to the holy ones, loofeth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which words he confesseth, y^e the faithfull are guilty of sinne, in asmuch as they are subiect to the lustes of the flesh.

Eph. 5. 16.

II But this that is saide, that God purgeth his Church from all sinne, that he promisseth that grace of deliuerance by baptisme, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we referre rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the verie matter of sinne. God truly performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the vpper hande and are conquerours in the battel) but it ceaseth onely to reigne & not so to dwell in them.

Rom. 6. 6.

Therefore we so say, that the olde man is crucified, and the lawe of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauinges, not to haue dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenes. And wee confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but wee affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercie of God, that the holy ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise shoulde iustly bee reckened sinners and guiltie before God. And this sentence it shall not be harde for vs to confirme, forasmuch as their are euident testimonies of the Scripture vpon their matter. For what would we haue more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romanes chapter 7? First both wee haue in an other place shewed, and Augustine proueth by strong reasons, that Paul their speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that hee vseth these wordes Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not cauell againste those wordes; but who canne denye, that a striuing against the law of God is euill; who can deny a withstanding of Iustice to be sinne? Finally, who will not graunt that there is a fault, where is a spirituall miserie? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, wee haue an assured demonstration by the Lawe, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For wee are commaunded to loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the commaundement that conceiue in their heart any desire be it neuer so litle, or suffer any such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie. For what are not these the powers of the soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these doe open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughtes to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euen so much voide of the loue of God? Wherefore, who so confesseth not that all the luste of the fleshe are sinnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they call a feeding, is the well spring of sinne, hee must needs denie that the transgression of the lawe is sinne.

Rom. 7. 6.

12 If any man thinke it an absurditie, that all the desires wherewith man is naturally moued in affection, are vniuersally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answer, that we do not condemne those desires that God hath so engrauen into the minde of man at the first creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroying the verie nature of man, but only outragious & vnbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now sith by reason of the peruerfenes of nature all her powers are infected & corrupted, that in all her doings appeareth a continual disorder & intemperance, because the desires cannot be fettered from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in fewer wordes) we teach that all the desires of men are euil: and we accuse them to be gilty of sinne, not in y that they are naturall, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt & vncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as Ad Bonif. he appeareth in shewe, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he sometime forbearth to vse the name of sinne. Yet where he writeth that the law of sinne stil remaining in the holy ones, the onely giltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We will alleage some other sentences, whereby shal better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Iulian: This lawe of sinne is both releaseth by the spirituall regeneration, & abideth in the mortall flesh, releaseth herein, because the giltines is taken away in the sacrament whereby the faithfull are regenerate: & it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sinne (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is releaseth in baptisme, but not ended. Againe. The law of sinne (of which yet remaining the giltinesse, is in baptisme discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flesh to lust against the Spirit. Againe. Sinne is dead in respect of y giltines wherein it held vs, & euen being dead, it stil rebelleth til it be healed with perfection of burial, And yet plainer in the fifth book. As the blindness of heart is both a sinne, whereby man beleueth not in God: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud heart is chasticed with worthie correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart: so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sinne, because there is in it disobedience against the government of y mind: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is giuen for recompence to the deseruings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he consenteth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Here without any doubtfull speach he calleth it sinne, because when error was once ouerthrowen, and the trueth confirmed, he lesse feared slanderous reportes. As in the 41. Homely vpon Iohn, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he saith: If in the flesh thou serue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselfe saith: let not sinne reigne in your mortall body to obey the desires thereof. He sayeth not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needes be in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defende that lust is no sinne, are wont to obiect that saying of Iames: Lust, after that it hath conceiued, bringeth fourth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnlesse wee thinke that he speaketh of onely ill workes or actual sinnes, euil wil it selfe, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischieuous deedes & wicked offences y^e offspringes of sin, & giueth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euil thing & damnable before God.

14 Certaine Anabaptistes in this age, deuise I wote not what phrantike intemperance in steede of spirituall regeneration: saying that the children of god restored into the state of innotencie, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirite is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they neuer go out of the way. It were incredible that mans minde coulde fal to so great madnesse, vnlesse they did openly & prouidly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monstrous. But it is meete y^e such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnesse, y^e so haue persuaded their minde to turne the trueth of God into a lie. Shall all the choise of honestie & dishonestie, right & wrong, good and euill, vertue & vice, be taken away? Such difference (say they) commeth of the cursednesse of old Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So nowe there shalbe no difference betwene fornication & chastitie, plaine dealing & suttletie, trueth & lying, iustice & extortion. Take away vaine feare, say they, the Spirite wil commaund thee no euil thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yelde thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous things? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lustes, haue put off all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spirite do they belch out? For we reknowlege one Christ, & his only Spirit whom the Prophets haue commended, whom the Gospell giuen vs doeth preach, of whome we there heare no such thing. That Spirit is no patrone of manslaughter, whoredom, drunkennes, pride, contention, couctousnesse, & guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and trueth. It is not a giddie spirit, & runneth headlong without consideration through right & wrong, but is full of wisdom & vnderstanding, that discerneth rightly betweene iust & vniust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute & vnbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betweene lawfull and vnlawfull, and teacheth to keepe measure and temperance: but why do we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome phantasie, which either themselues haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue receiued being forged of other: but they reuerently seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things bee taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that hee might bring vs into the obedience of Gods wil, being purged from vncleannesse & defilings, which obedience cannot stand, vnlesse lustes be tamed & subdued, whereunto these men would giue the bridle at libertie. Secondly we are taught that wee are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are still besieged with many vices & much weakenesse, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant from perfection, we haue neede alway to encrease somewhat, and being entangled rangled in vices, we haue neede daily to wraastle with them. Wherupon also followeth, that shaking of sloth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedful mindes, that wee be not compassed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peradventure we thinke that we haue proceeded further than \bar{y} Apostle, which yet was wried of the Angel of Saran, that his strength might be made perfect with weakenes: and which did vnfaignedly represent in his flesh that diuision of the flesh & of the spirit.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth seuen either causes or effectes or partes thereof, he doeth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeuour or carefulnesse, excusing, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurditie, \bar{y} I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted causes or effectes. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affectiones ioyned with repentance: but because, leauing out those questions, we may vnderstand what Paul meaneth, wee shalbe content with a simple declaration of them. He saith therefore, that of the heauinesse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he \bar{y} is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure because he hath sinned against his God, is therewithal stirred vp to diligence & heedefulnes, to winde himselfe clearly out of the snares of the diuel, to take better heede of his snares, to fall no more from the gouernance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with securitie. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defence, whereby a sinner to escape the iudgement of God, either doeth denie that he hath offended, or diminisheth the hainousnesse of his fault, but a purgation which standeth rather in crauing of pardon, than in defence of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confesse their faultes, do yet vse entreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they haue not cast away the reuerence \bar{y} they owe to their parents. Finally, they so excuse them, as they go not about to prouoe themselues righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth Indignation, whereby the sinner fretteth inwardly with himselfe, quarelleth with himselfe, is angrie with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne peruerfnesse and his owne vnthankfulnesse to God. By the name of feare, he meaneth that trembling that is striken into our mindes so oft as wee thinke both what wee haue descrued, and how horrible is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For we must needs then be vexed with a meruailous vnquietnesse, which both instructeth vs to humilitie, and maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Now if out of feare do spring that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then wee see with what linking they hang together. It seemeth to mee that he hath vsed this worde Desire for diligence in our ductie and readie ehearfulnesse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of our owne faultes ought chiefly to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he ioyneth immediatly next vnto it. For it signifieth a fearefulnesse, wherwith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughts: what haue I done? whither had I thrown my self hedlong, if the mercie of God did not help me? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigor that wee be to our selues, & the straightyer that we examine our owne finnes, so much the more we ought to trust that God is fauour able and merciful vnto vs. And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being striken with horror of the iudgement of God must needs do some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly do feele what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselves, & other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of finnes. But let vs remember that there is a measure to be kept, that sorrowe do not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to fearefull consciences than falling to dispaire. And also by that craftie meane whome so euer Satan findeth ouerthrowen with dread of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulfes of sorrowe, that they may neuer rise vp againe. Truely the feare cannot be too great which endeth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he moue himselfe to the loathing of himselfe, he dispaire not, oppressed with too great feare, for so do we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Vpon which point this lesson of Bernard is verie profitable: Sorrow for finnes is necessarie, if it be not continuall. I counsell you sometime to returne your faute from grieuous and painfull remembrance of your owne wayes, and to climbe vp to the plaine grounde of chearefull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle hony with wormewood, that the holosome bitternesse may bring vs health, when it shalbe dronke tempered with sweetnesse. And if ye thinke of your selues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lorde in goodnesse.

16 Now it may be also perceiued what be the fruits of repentance, euen the duties of godlinesse toward God, and of charitie toward men, & therewithall a holines and purenesse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the commandements of the law, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vncleannesse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterwarde to outward testimonies y do set out true repentance: of which thing I wil hereafter set before the readers eyes a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partly scorne at their follies y go about to appease God with ceremonies, & do shewe that they be meere mockeries, and partly do teache that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart: who so euer is euen meanly exercised in the scripture, shall perceiue of himselfe without any other mans putting in minde, that when we haue to doe with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Ioel shall not a litle helpe to the vnderstanding of the rest, where he sayth: Teare your hearts and not your garments. Also both those pointes are expressed in these wordes of Iames: Ye wicked doers, cleanse your hands: ye double men, purge your heartes. Where in dede there is an addition ioyned to the firste parte, but after is shewed

the verie fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secrete filthinesse, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises which wee vse priuately as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, & publikely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to be in lothsomenesse, mourning & weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse & all trimming, and to forsake all delites. Then he that seeleth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreouer he that well bethinketh him how grieuous a thing it is to haue offended the iustice of God, cannot rest vntil he haue in his owne humilitie giuen glorie to God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruites of repentance. But albeit they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shal pardon me, if I speake what I think: it seemeth vnto me that they stand too much vpon them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I trust he will agree with mee, that they haue two wayes gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, & with immeasurable commendations aduanced that bodily discipline, this in deede they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a maner darkened that, which ought to haue beene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giuing punishments they were somewhat more rigorous than ecclesiasticall mildnesse may beare, as we shal haue occasion to shewe in an other place.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting & ashes spoken of, both often in other places & specially in Iael, they measure the chiefe part of repentance by fasting & weeping: therefore their errour is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentance: but weeping & fasting are not ioyned as continuall or necessarie effectes thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a special circumstance. Because he had prophecied, that thier hanged ouer the Iewes a most grieuous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to prevent the wrath of God, not only in repenting, but also in vntering tokens of their sorrowe. For as a man standing to be arraigned, vseth humbly to abace himselfe with an ouergrown beard, vncombed haire & black apparel, to moue the iudge to pitie: so it behoued them when they stooode accused before the iudgement seate of God in piteous array to beseech him not to extend his rigor. But although ashes and sackcloth did paraduenture mote fitly agree with those times: Yet it is certaine, that weeping and fasting should be to a very conuenient good vse among vs, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamitie. For when he maketh any danger to appeare, he doth after a certaine manner giue warning, that he is prepared or armed to reuenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his contremen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a litle before, were had in examination. Euen as the Pastors of the Church should not doe ill at this daye, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they woulde cry out vpon them to make hast to fasting and weeping: so that they woulde with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principal point, that they must cut their heartes and not their garmentes. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway ioyned with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ ioyneth it with wayling, when he acquiteth the Apostles from neede thereof, vntill the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. I speake of solemne fasting. For the priuate life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing & sobrietie, that in the whole course thereof there may appeare a certaine kind of fasting. But because all this matter shalbe to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreate of the discipline of the Church, therefore I do now the more slenderly touch it. But this one thing I wil adde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applyed to this outward profession, then it is vnproperly turned from the naturall meaning which I haue aboue set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning vnto God as a confession of fault, with a beseeching of God not to charge them with the paine & giltnesse. So to do penance in ashes & sackcloth is nothing else, than to viter a displeasidnes when God is angry with vs for grievous offences. And this is a publike kinde of confession, whereby we condemning our selues before the Angels & the worlde, do preuent the iudgement of god. For Paul rebuking their slouthfulnes that tenderly beare with their own faults, saith: if we did iudge our selues, wee should not be iudged of God. But it is not alway necessaric to make men openly of counsell and witnesses of our repentance: but to confesse priuately to God is a parte of true repentance which cannot bee omitted. For there is nothing more vnreasonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the sinnes in which we flatter our selues and do hide them by Hypocrisie, leaist he should bring them to light. And it behoueth vs not onely to confesse those sinnes which we daily commit, but more grievous offences ought to drawe vs further, & to call againe into our remembrance things that seeme long ago buried. Which lesson Dauid giueth vs by his example. For beeing touched with shame of his newly committed fault, hee examineth himselfe euen to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, & confesseth that euen then hee was corrupted & infected with the filthinesse of the flesh. And this he doth not to diminish the haynousnes of his fault, as many hide themselues in the multitude, and seeke to escape punishment by wrapping other wth them. But Dauid doeth farre otherwise which with simple plainnes enforceth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancie, he hath not cessed to heape euils vpon euils. Also in another place he likewise so examineth his passed life, that he craueth the mercie of God for the sins of his youth. And truly then onely shall wee prooue our drowines to be shaken away from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, wee aske reliefe of God. It is moreouer to be noted, that the repentance which we are commaunded continually to apply, differeth from that repentance, that listeth vp as it were from death, them that eyther haue filthily fallen, or with vnbridled licentiousnesse haue throwen foorth themselues to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious reuolting, haue shaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it rehearseth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threateneth mourning vnto sinners that haue not done penance for their wantonnesse, fornication and vnchastity. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare y^e few are called to penance, a more than carelesse assurednesse should crepe vpon vs, as though the mortifying of the fleshe did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, do not suffer vs to release. Therefore the speciall repentance which is required but of some, whom the Deuill hath violently carried away from the feare of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Nowe if that be true, which is most evidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes: do we not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely iustifie them that be his, that he may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousnesse? Iohn the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his wayes, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand. In calling them to repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselues sinners; & al that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lorde, that they might with all their heartes desire the mortifying of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he called them to faith. For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hande, he meant forgiuenesse of sinnes, saluation, and life, and all that euer we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Euangelistes it is written, Iohn came preaching the Baptisme of repentance vnto forgiuenesse of sinnes. And what is that els, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lorde, and conceiue good hope of forgiuenesse and saliation? So Christ also beganne his preachings: The kingdom of God is come neere at hand: repent ye and beleue the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then hee requireth repentaunce, and last of al confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when hee meant briefly to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he sayde that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that repentance and forgiuenesse of sins must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised vp by God, to giue to Israell repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospel that all their thoughtes, their affections, and their endeouours are corrupt and faulty, and that therefore it is necessarie that they be borne againe if they will enter into the kingdome of God. Forgiuenesse of sinnes is preached when men are taught y^e Christ is made to them redemption, righteousnes, saluation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocent in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are received by faith, as I have in an other place declared: yet because the goodnes of God whereby finnes are forgiven, is the prooffe object of faith, therefore it shall be good that it be diligently distinguished from repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of repentance, openeth vs the first entrie vnto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labour, are laden, are hungry and thirsty, and pine away with sorrow and miserie: so must wee endeavour toward repentance, throughout all our life apply it, and follow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to repentance: he was sent to blesse the vnworthy, but so that euery one should turne himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiveness of finnes, he likewise vseth to require on our part repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them. Doe (sayth he) iudgement and righteousness, because saluation is come neere at hande. Againe, There shall come to Si-on a redeemer, and to them that in Iacob repent from their finnes. Againe, Seeke the Lord while he may be found: call vpon him while he is neere. Let y wicked leaue his way & the wickednes of his thoughts, & be turned to the Lord, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe. Turne ye and repent. that your finnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our repentance were a foundation to deserue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to haue mercy vpon men to this end that they should repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauaile if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wastle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our own naturall soule. Plato saith in certain places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall studie and exercise of mortifying the flesh, till it being vtterly slaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in vs. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire and goe no further, but rather that he should hast and long towarde God, that being grafted into the death and life of Christ, he should studie vpon a continuall repentance: as truly they can not otherwise do, that haue a naturall hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sinne, vnlesse hee were first in loue with righteousness. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well known by the doctrine aboue taught, that I neede not to repete a long discourse to proue it againe. Therefore the Church prayseth and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that he hath giuen the Gentiles repentance vnto saluation. And Paul commaunding Timothee to be patient and milde towarde the vnbeleeuers, saith: If at any time G O D giue them repentance that they may repent from the snares of the Deuill. God in deede affirmeth that he willethe the conuersion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectual working thereof hangeth vpon the

Spirite of regeneration. Because it were more easie to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration wee are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which hee hath prepared that wee shoulde walke in them. Whom soeuer the Lords will is to deliuer from death, those he quickeneth with the spirite of regeneration: not that repentance is properly y^e cause of saluation, but because it is already seene that it is vnseparable from faith and from the mercie of God: sith (as Esay testifieth) that there is a redeemer come to him, and to those that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truly standeth stedfastly determined, that where soeuer liueth the feare of God, there the spirite hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore, in Esay, when the faithfull complaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their heartes were hardened by God. The Apostle also meaning to exclude apostataes from hope of saluatiō, appointeth this reasoⁿ, that it is impossible for them to bee renewed vnto repentance: because God in renewing them whome he will not haue perishe, sheweth a token of his fatherly fauour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with y^e beames of his cheerefull and merie countenance: on the other side with hardening them, he thundereth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is unpardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threateneth to wilfull apostataes, which when they depart from the faith of the Gospell, doe make a scorne of God, reprochfully dispise his grace, and defile and tread vnder feet the blood of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doeth not (as some fondly rigorous men woulde haue it) cut of hope of pardon from all wilfull sinnes: but teacheth that apostasie is vnworthie of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that G O D doeth punish a contempte of himselfe so full of sacriledge, with vnapeasable rigor. For he saith that it is impossible, that they which haue once beene enlightened, haue tasted of the heauenly gift, haue beene made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tasted of the good worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come, if they fall, shoulde be renewed to repentance, crucifying againe of newe, and making a scorne of the sonne of God. Againe in another place: If (saith hee) wee willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth receiued, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. These also bee the places, out of the wrong vnderstanding whereof, the Nouatians in old time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleued this to be a counterfaite Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes doe truly fauour of an Apostolike spirit. But because we contende with none but with them that allowe it, it is easie to shewe, how these sentences doe nothing maintaine their error. First it is necessarie that the Apostle agree with his maister, which affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemie shall be forgien, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgien neither in this worlde nor in the worlde to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnlesse wee will make him an aduersarie to the grace of Christ. Wherevpon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weakenes, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of the Deuill.

22 But to discusse this, it behoueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall haue no forgiuencesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffenes euen vnto death; with despeire of pardon, that doeth not well agree with the verie wordes of Christ, that it shall not be forgiuen in this worlde. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definition be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue euen vnto death. Whereas some other say that hee sinneth against the holy Ghost, that enuieith the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is ferched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once proued with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe ouerthrowe all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the truth of God, with brightnesse whercof they are so daseled, that they can not pretende ignorance: which they doe onely to this end to resist. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had saide, immediatly addeth: He y^e speaketh a worde against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiuen him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgiuen. And Matthew for the blasphemie against the holy Spirit, putteth the spirite of blasphemie. But how can a man speake a reproch against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost. They that stumble vnware against the trueth of God, not knowing it, which doe ignorantly speake euill of Christ, hauing yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the trueth of God disclosed vnto them, or once with one worde offend him, whome they had knownen to be the Lordes anointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe most hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be y^e doctrine of y^e Gospel, they wold be ready to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is conuincid, that it is the worde of God which they forsake and fight againste, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holy Ghost: forasmuch as they wrastle against the enlightening that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Iewes, which when they coulde not resist the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet indeuoured to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were caried vnto it with zeale of the lawe, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage againste God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignorant to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whome the Lord inuieith, which to ouerthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the spirit of blasphemie, when mans boldnes of set purpose, leapeth foorth to reproch of the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercie, because he had ignorantly committed those things through vnbeleefe, for which otherwise he had bene vnworthie of Gods fauour. If ignorance ioyned with vnbeleefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, therevpon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is ioyned to vnbeleefe.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shalt perceiue that the Apostle speaketh keth not of one or other particular fall, but of y^e vniuersall departing whereby the reprobate doe forsake saluation. And it is no maruell, that they who Iohn in his canonically Epistle affirmeth not to haue bene of the elect, from whom they went out, doe feele God vnappeasable. For hee directeth his speach against them, that imagined, that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling the from this false and pestilent opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that wittingly and willingly haue cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnes of life transgresse the worde of the Lord, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceite is in these wordes of falling and sinning. Because the Nouatians expounde Falling to be, if a man being taught by the lawe of the Lorde, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, absteineeth not from stealing or fornication.

 But contrariwise I affirme, that there is a secret comparison of contraries, wherein ought to be repeted all things contrarie to that whiche was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular faulte, but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when he saith, they which haue fallen after y^e they haue once bene enlightened, and haue tasted the heauenly gift, and bene made partakers of the holy Ghost, and also tasted the good worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come: it is to bee vnderstanded of them, that with aduised vngodlinesse haue choked the light of the holy spirite, haue spit out againe the tast of the heauenly gift, haue enstraunged themselves from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnder foot the word of God and the powers of the worlde to come. And y^e more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednes, in an other place afterward hee addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he saith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that sinne willingly after knowlege of the truth receiued, he doth not deny, that Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the who'e Epistle, where he declareth the priesthoode of Christ) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when y^e is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospell is of set purpose renounced.

24 But whereas some doe thinke it too harde and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lorde: that is easily aunswered. For he doeth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lorde: but hee vtterly denieth, that they can rise vnto repentance, because they are by the iust iudgement of God stricken with eternall blindness for their vnthankfulness. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie that afterwarde he applieth to this purpose the example of Esau, which in vaine attempted with howling & weeping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophete, when they crie, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speech is meant neither the true conuersion, nor calling vpon God, but that carelesnes of the wicked wherewith being bounde, they are compelled in extremitie to looke vnto that which before they carelesly neglected, that

that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords helpe. But this they do not so much call vpon, as they moune that it is taken from them. Therefore the Prophete meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by Weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophete that he will be mercifull so soone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue already saide, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preuenting it. Also his promise concerning calling vpon him, will neuer deceiue. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuersly drawn, when they see that they must needs seeke God, that they may finde remedie for their euils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Conuersion and prayer.

25 But a question is moued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained repentance, howe Achab obtained pardon & turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whome yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to haue bene onely stricken amased with souden feare. Hee did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the grounde, and (as it is testified of him) hee was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garmentes when his hart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet wee see howe God is turned to mercie. I aunswere that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euer the wrath of God lieth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got hee thereby, but that he shoulde not feele it a liue in earth? Therefore the course of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to bee scene in Esau.

Gen. 27. 18. For though hee had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was graunted him at his weeping. But because the spirituall inheritance, by the oracle of God coule not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercie of God: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that hee shoulde bee far with the fat of the earth and the deawe of Heauen. And this is it that I said euen now, that it ought to bee referred to the example of the other, that wee shoulde learne the more chearefully to applie our minds and endeuours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truly and hartily turned, God will bee readie to forgiue vs, whose mercifulnesse extendeth it selfe euen to the vnworthie, so long as they shewe any greefe at all. And therewithall wee bee also taught, howe terrible iudgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sporte with no lesse shamelesse face than yron hearte to despise and set nought by the threatninges of God. After this manner hee ofentimes reached out his hande to the children of Israell, to releue their miseries, although their crimes were counterfait, and their heartes double and false, as himselfe in the Psalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conuersion, or to make them vnexcusable. Yet in releasing punishments for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetuall lawe thereby, but rather riseth sometimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their peines, that thereby may appeare how much faining displeaseth him. But (as I haue sayd) he sheweth some examples of his readines to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendement of life, & their pride may be the more greuously condemned, that stubbornely kick against the pricke.

The iiii. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their schooles of Penance, is far from the purenesse of the Gospel. Where is entreated of Confession and satisfaction.

NOwe I come to discusse those thinge, which the Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will runne ouer in as fewe words as may be, because I mind not to go through all, least this booke, which I labour to drawe into a short abridgement, should growe to a huge greatnesse. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, beeing a matter otherwise not very harde, that a man shall hardly finde howe to get out, if he once fall into their dregges. First, in defining it, they shewe that they neuer vnderstoode what repentance was. For they take holde of certaine sayings of the old writers, which doe nothing at all expesse that nature of repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils passed, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sorry to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorrowe of heart, and bitterness of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to grant these things well sayd of the fathers, (which a contentious man might easily enough denie) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe repentance, but only to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall again into the same offences, out of which they had bene drawne. But if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adioyned as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysostome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift giuen from heauen, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the lawe. Yea and the doctrine which they afterwarde teach, is somewhat worse than these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outwarde exercises, that a man can gather nothing els out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigorousnesse that serueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastice and punish vices: but they keepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is in deede much talke among them of Contrition and Attrition, they torment soules with many doubtles, and do thrust into them much trouble and caurefulness: but when they seeme to haue thoroughly wounded the hearts; they heale the bitterness with a light sprinkling of ceremonies.

And

And when they haue thus curiously defined repentance, they diuide it into contrition of heart, confession of mounth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically than they defined it, although they woulde seeme to haue wasted all their age in framing of syllogismes. But if a man will goe about to proue by the definition (which kinde of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may weepe for his sinnes passed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaile his euils passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may punish himselfe for that which he was sorry to haue committed, &c. although he doe not confesse with his mouth: how will they mainraine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect that it is a sacramēt, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame mee, but let them lay the fault in themselues that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truly (according to my grosseness) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admitte that to be their masterlike licence. Nowe let vs particularly consider all the partes in order. Whereas I do negligently leape ouer as trifles those things that they with great grauity of countenance do publish for mysteries, I do it not vnwittingly, (neither were it very painefull for me to confute all y^e they thinke theselues to haue deeply & suttly disputed) but I would thinke it against conscience to weary the readers with such trifles without any profit. Truly it is easie to knowe by the questions which they moue and tossē, and wherewith they miserably encomber themselues, that they prate of things that they knowe not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sinne pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in o^rther. Againe: whether the punishments layed vpon man by God, do auaille to satisfaction. Againe: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sinnes: where they fowly and wickedly define, that penaunce is daily done but for veniall sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselues with a grosse errour, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentance is a second board after shipwracke. Wherin they shew that they neuer waked from their brutish dulnes, to feele so much as a farre of the thousandth part of their faultes.

2 But I would the readers should note, that here is not a quarel about the shadowe of an asse, but the most earnest matter of all other is entreated of, that is to say, forgiueneffe of sinnes. For whereas they require three things to repentaunce, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they doe therewithall teach that those three things are necessarie to the obreyning of forgiueneffe of sinnes. But if it behoue vs to knowe any thing at all in all our religion, this truly behoueth vs most of all, I meane to vnderstande and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, vpon what condition, with what easinesse or hardenesse the forgiueneffe of sinnes is obtained. If this knowledge stand not plaine and certaine, the conscience shal haue no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednesse, but continually trembleth, wauereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgiuenesse of finnes hang vppon those conditions to whiche they doe binde it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Conitricion the firste parte of obteyning pardon, and they require that to bee a true contritricion, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meane time they do not determine when a man may be assured, that hee hath to the full measure perfectly performed this contritricion. Truely I graunt that euery man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his finnes, to whet himselfe more and more to a lothing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrowe not to bee repented, that breedeth repentance vnto saluation. But when there is such a bitterness of sorrowe required as may proportionally aunswere the greatnesse of the fault, and such as may in balance counterpaife with the trust of pardon, here the pure consciences are maruellously tormented and troubled, when they see them selues changed with a due conitricion of sins, and doe not so atteine the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselues, y they haue duely performed so much as they duely ought. If they say that wee must doe as much as lieth in vs, then come wee still to the same point that we were at before: for how dare any man assure himselfe that hee hath employed all his force to bewaile his finnes? So when the consciences hauing long wrestled with themselues, and long beene exercised with battels, doe at length finde no hauen to rest in, yet somewhat to ease themselues, they enforce themselues to a sorrowe, and wring out teares to make perfect their contritricion.

3 But if they say that I flander them: Let them come forth and shewe any one man, that by such doctrine of contritricion hath not either bene driuen to despeire, or hath not set for his defense a counterfaiting of sorrowe in steede of true sorrowe, against the iudgement of God. Wee haue also our selues saide in one place, that forgiuenesse of sins neuer commeth without repentance, because none but the afflicted and wounded with conscience of finnes, can syncerely call vpon the mercie of God: but wee haue therewithall further saide, that repentance is not the cause of the forgiuenesse of finnes. As for those tormentes of soules, which they say must bee performed of duetic, wee haue taken them away: wee haue taught the sinner not to looke vppon his owne contritricion nor his owne teares, but to fasten both his eyes vpon the onely mercie of God. Wee haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the laboring and loden, when hee was sent to publishe glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in hart, to preach remission to captiues, to deliuer prisoners, and to comfort them y mourne. From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, y filled with their owne righteousness, doe not acknowledge their owne pouertie, and also the despisers that carelesse of Gods wrath doe seeke no remedie for their euils. For such doe not labour, nor are loden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captiue. But there is great difference betweene teaching a man to deserue forgiuenes of sins with due and full contritricion, which the sinner can neuer performe: and instructing him to hunger and thriste for the mercie of GOD, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne vnquietnesse, wearinesse and captiuitie, it may bee shewed him, where hee ought to seeke for releefe, rest and libertie: and finally, he may bee taught in the humbling of himselfe, to giue gorie to God.

4 Concerning confession, there hath beene alwayes great strife betweene the Canonistes and Scholediuiues: while the one sorte affirme, that confession is commaunded by the speciall commaundement of God, and the other sorte denie it and say, that it is commaunded onely by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesnes of the diuines, that haue corrupted and violently wrested as many places of Scripture, as they alleadged for their purpose. And when they saw that they could not so obtaine y^e which they required, they which would be thought more suttle than the rest escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the lawe of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterwarde receiued forme of the lawe Positiue. Euen as the foolishest fort among the lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is saide: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gauest me. &c. But that both citations and exceptions receiued forme giuen them by the Ciuill lawe. But let vs see by what argumentes they proue this confession, either Formed or Vnformed to bee the commaundement of God. The Lord (say they) sent the leproous men to the Priestes, But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer hearde it spoken, that the Leuiticall priestes were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, And say: It was commaunded by the Law of Moses, that the priestes shoulde discerne betweene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spirituall leprosie: therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce vpon it. Before that I aunswere them, I aske this by the way, If this place make them iudges of the spirituall leprosie, why do they drawe to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshly leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The lawe giueth to the Leuiticall Priestes the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpon vs. Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Nowe I aunswere: sith the priesthoode is remoued, it is necessarie that the Lawe be remoued also. All priesthoodes are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthoode is also remoued. If they loue so well to followe allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely prieste, and heape vpon his iudgement seate the free iurisdiction of all thinges: this wee can easily bee contentent to suffer. Moreouer their allegorie is verie vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is merely politike. Why then did Christe sende the leproous men to the Priestes? That the Priestes shoulde not cauill that he did breake the lawe that commaunded the man healed of the leprosie, to bee shewed before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commaunded the leproous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the lawe. Goe (saith hee) and shewe your selues to the priest, and offer the gifte that Moses hath commaunded in the Lawe that it shoulde bee for a witnessse vnto them. And truly this miracle shoulde haue bene a witnessse vnto them, for they

they had pronounced them leprous, & now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christes miracles: Christ leaueth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still dally with it, therefore this worke is for a witness vnto them. So in another place: This Gospel shalbe preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations. Again: Ye shalbe led before kings & gouernours, for a witness to them, that is: that in the iudgement of God they may be more strongly conuincid. But if they had rather folow Chrysofome: he also teacheth that Christ did this for the Iewes sake, y^e he should not be accounted a breaker of the law. Albeit in so cleare a matter I am ashamed to alleage the witness of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth y^e he leaueth the right of the law whole to the priesstes as to the professed enemies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not bene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priesstes may stil keepe this possession, let them openly take partes with them which must of necessitie be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not prooue that I can make a fairer shewe of them for my side, than they can for theirs. They say, The Lorde commanded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they shoulde vnbind & loose him from his bonds. Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he said it to the Iewes that stooode by him, that the miracle might be made the more eident without suspicion of fraud, & his power appeare the greater, y^e without any touching, with his only worde he raised vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away al wrongful opinion from the Iewes, willed them to roll away the stone, to feele the sinke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the onely power of his worde, and them first to feele him liuing. And this is the iudgement of Chrysofome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get thereby? That the Lord gaue his Apostles power to loose. But howe much more fitly & more handsomly might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lorde meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose them that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sinnes that he had forgotten: that they should not condemne them for sinners whome he had acquitted: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiuen: that they should not be rigorous to punish, & lightly offended, where he is merciful & easily entreated to spare: Truly, nothing ought to moue vs more to readinesse to forgiue, than the example of the Iudge that threateneth that he wil be vnapeasable to them that be too rigorous & vngentle. Now let them goe and boast of their allegories.

6 But nowe they ioyne more neere hande with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to Iohns baptisime, did confesse their sinnes, and Iames willeth that wee confesse our sinnes one to an other. No marueile if they that woulde be baptised did confesse their finnes, for it was said before that Iohn preached y^e baptisme of repentance, and baptised in water vnto repentance. Whome should he then haue baptised, but them that had confessed themselues sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiuenesse of finnes: and who shoulde be admitted to this token but sinners, & they that acknowledge themselues to be such? Therefore they confessed their finnes, that they might be baptised. And not without a cause doth Iames bid vs confesse one to another. But if they did marke what followeth next after, they woulde vnderstande, that this also maketh litle for them. Confesse (saith he) one to another your finnes, & pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutual confession & mutual prayer. If we must confesse to priestes only, then must we also pray for priestes only. Yea, What and if it might follow of the wordes of Iames that onely priestes might confesse? for when he willeth that we should confesse one to another, he speaketh onely to them that may heare the confessions of other: his worde is in Greeke Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turnes, or (if they so like best to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But so interchangeably none can confesse, but they that are meete to heare confessions. Which prerogatiue sith they vouchsaue to grant onely to priestes, we do also put ouer the office of confessing ro them only. Therefore away with such triflings, & let vs take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple & plaine: that is, that we should lay our weakenes one in anothers bosome to receiue mutual counsel, mutuall compassion, & mutuall comfort one of another: then that we being naturally priuie to the weakenesse of our brethren, should pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then alleage Iames against vs, which do so earnestly require the confession of the mercy of God? but no man can confesse Gods mercie, vnlesse he haue first confessed his owne misery. Yea we rather pronounce him accursed that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himselfe a sinner. For the Lorde hath concluded all vnder finnes, that all mouthes might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he onely iustified and exalted.

7 But I marueile with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the lawe of God: the vse whereof wee graunt in deede to be very auncient, but such as wee are able to proue in olde time to haue bene at libertie. Truely euen their owne cronicles declare, that there was no certaine law or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the thirde. Surely, if they had had a more ancient lawe, they would rather haue taken hold therof, than haue bene contented with the decree of the counsel of Laterane, and so made themselues to be laughed at, euen of children. In other things they sticke not to make forged decrees, which they father vpon the most auncient Councels, that they may with verie reuerence of antiquitie dasel the eyes of y^e simple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a false pack. Therefore by their own witnessse, there are not yett passed three hundred yeres since Innocent the third laid y^e snare vpon men, & charged them with necessitie of Confession. But, to speake nothing of the time: the very barbarousnes of the wordes minissheth the credite of that

Lawe. For where these good fathers commaund euery one of both kindes, male and female, once euery yeare to confesse al his sinns to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merily take exception, that in this commaundement are contayned onely Hermaphrodites, and say that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female only. Since that time, a more grosse beastlines hath bewraied it self in their scholers, y^e can not expound what is meant by his own priest. Whatsoeuer al the Popes hyred babblers do prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the author of this lawe that compelleth men to reckon vp their sinnes, and also that there passed a thousand & two hundred yeares from the resurrection of Christ before that any such lawe was made. And so, that this tyranny was then first brought in, when all godlinesse and learning being destroyed, the visiors of Pastors had without choise taken all licentiouinesse vpon them. Moreouer there are euident testimonies both in histories and other auncient writers, which teach that this confession was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a lawe made by Christ or his Apostles. I wil alleage but one out of many, which shalbe a plaine proufe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitutiō of bishops was diligently kept in all the west Churches, but specially at Rome. Whereby he sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all Churches. But he sayth that there was one of the priestes peculiarly appointed to serue for this office. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men do falsly say of the keyes giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthoode. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the speciall dutie of some one that was chosen thereunto by the bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall Churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hainons offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he sayth immediatly after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certine woman faining that she came to confession, was found so to haue coloured vnder that pretence the vn honest company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these asses lift vp their eares. If auricular confession were the lawe of God, how durst Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and chismaticke Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voyces of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not only let slip for a time, but also discontinued euen till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of apostasie not only the Church of Constantinople, but also all the east Churches which haue neglected that lawe, which (if they say true) is inuiolable and commanded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation Chrysofome, which was also bishop of Constantinople, doth in so many places euidently testifie, that it is maruell y^e these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (saith he) thy sinns that thou maiest do them a way, if thou be ashamed to tell any man the sinns that thou hast done, tel the daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sinns vpon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognise her euils. Againe: But now it is not necessary to confesse when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy sinnes be done with thy thought: let this iudgement be without witness: let only God see thee confessing. Againe: I do not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow seruants, I do not compel thee to disclose thy sinnes to men, rehearse & vtter thy conscience before God. Shew thy wounds to the Lord the best surgion, and aske salue of him. Shew to him that wil reproch thee with nothing, but will most gently heale thee. Againe: Tell not man, least he reproch thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellowe seruant, that may vtter it abroade, but to the Lord. To the Lord shewe thy woundes which hath care of thee, that is both gentle and a Phisition. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compell thee not to come into the mids of a stage, and call many witnesses, tel thy sinne to me alone priuately, that I may heale thy fore. Shall we say that Chrysofome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like things, that he would deliuer mens consciences from these bonds wherwith they be bound by the law of God? not so. But he dare not require that as of necessitie, which he doth not vnderstande to be commaunded by the word of God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer & easier, first we wil faithfully rehearse, what kind of confession is taught by the word of God: & then we will also declare their inuentions, but not all (for who could drawe drie such an infinite sea?) but onely those wherein they comprehend the sum of their secret confession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the olde translator hath giuen in translation this word Confes in steede of Praise: which the grossest vnlearned men commonly know: sauing that it is good to haue their presumptuousnesse bewraied, that doe giue away that which was written of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannicall commandement. To proue that confession auaieth to cheare the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psalme: In the voice of reioysing and confession. But if such chang may serue, then we shall haue what we list, proued by what we list. But seing they are so become past shame, let the godly readers remember that by the iust vengeance of God they haue bin cast into a reprobate minde, that their presumption should be the more detestable. But if we will rest in the simple doctrine of y Scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceits to beguile vs. For therein is appointed one order of conf. fting, that forasmuch as it is the Lord y forgiueth, forgetteth, and putteth away sins, therefore we should confesse our sinnes to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Phisician, therefore let vs shewe our diseases vnto him. It is he y is grieved & offended, therefore let vs seeke peace at his hand. He is the knower of hearts, and priuie to all thoughts, therefore let vs make hast to powre out our hearts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him. I haue (saich Dauid) made my sinne knowen vnto thee, and haue not hidden my vnrighteousnes. I haue said, I wil confesse against me my vnrighteousnes to y Lord, and thou hast forgiuen y wickednes of my heart. Such is the other confession of Dauid. Haue mercy vpon me O God, according to thy great mercie. And such is the confession of Daniell: We haue sinned, Lorde we haue done peruersly, we haue committed iniquities, and haue bin rebellious in swauing from thy commandements. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in the Scriptures, the rehearsal whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnes (saith Iohn) the Lord is faithfull to forgiue vs our sinnes. To whome should we confesse: euen to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled & humbled heart before him, if heartily accusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodnes and mercy.

Wad. 9. 5.

1. Ioh. 1. 9.

to He that heartily & before God shall embrace this confession, shall vndoubtedly haue both a tongue readie to confesse, so oft as it shalbe needfull for him to publish the mercy of God before men, & not onely to whisper the secret of his heart to one man, & once & in his eare: but oft & openly, & in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificence & glory of God. After this maner when Dauid was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the sting of conscience, & confesse d his sinne before both God & man. I haue (saith he) sinned to the Lorde, that is to say, now I alleage nothing for my excuse, I vse no shiftes, but that al men may iudge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would haue had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glorie of God or for the humbling of our selues. For this reason the Lord in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speake the words, and the people saying after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he foresaw y this help was necessary for them that euery man might be y better brought to a iust reknowledging of himselfe. And meete it is that with the confessiō of our owne misery wee should among our selues, & before all the worlde glorifie the goodnes and mercy of our God.

It And it is conuenient that this kinde of confession be both ordinary in the church, & also extraordinarily vsed in special maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guilty of any generall fault. Of this seconde kinde wee haue an example in that solemne confession which al the people vsed by the meanes and guiding of Esdras & of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City & Temple, the dissoluing of religion, was the punishment of the common reuolting of the al: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliuerance in such sort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselues. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some fewe sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulnesse. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselues gather some infection & beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barennesse or any other plague: if it be our duety to fly to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of gikinesse: then confession it self, wherupon all these things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confession, beside that it is commended by the Lordes owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit therof, dare disalow it. For where as in all holy assemblies we make our apparance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknowledging of vnworthinesse? But that (some man wil say) is done by euery prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our finnes. I graunt. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or drouinesse, or sluggishnes, you wil graunt me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemne vse of confession, the Christian common people should be exercised to humbling themselues. For though the ceremonie that y^e Lorde commanded the Israelites, was parcel of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in wel ordered churches profitably obserued, that euery Sunday the minister shoulde rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe & of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lord. Finally with this keye the gate to prayer is opened as well priuately to euery man, as vniuersally to all men.

Iac. 5. 16.

12 Moreouer the Scripture alloweth two formes of priuate confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that saying of Iames is spoken, that we shoulde confesse our finnes one to another, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesses one to another, wee should one helpe another with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme, that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if he haue in any thing bene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although Iames in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should vnload our selues, leaueth vs a free choise, to confesse to him y^e shall seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the church: yet wee ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most parte in comparison of the other to be iudged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lorde appointeth them by the very calling of their ministerie, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue & correct our finnes, and also may receiue comfort by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutuall admonishment & reprouing is committed to all men, yet it is specially enioyned to the ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort & confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercy: yet wee see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the forgiuenes of finnes, are ordeyned as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be saide to forgiue finnes and loose soules. When thou hearest this to be ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let euery one of the faithfull remember this to be his duetic, if he be priuately, so vexed & troubled with the feeling of finnes that he cannot winde out himselfe without help of another, not to neglect the remedie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to vse the priuate confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the priuate helpe of him, whose duetic it is both publicly and priuately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospel. But alway this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certentie, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those onely that shall vnderstande themselues to haue neede of it. Then that euen they y^e vse it for their neede, shoulde not be compelled by any commaundement, or trayned by any

deceite, to reckon vp all their finnes, but so farre as they shall thinke it be-houefull for them, that they may receiue sounde frute of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leaue this liberty to y^e churches, but also to main-taine it, and stoutly stande in defence of it, if they will haue tyranny absent from their ministrie and superstition from the people.

13 Of the other sort of confession Christ speaketh in Mattheue. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembrest that thy brother hath any thing against thee, leaue thy gift there, and go, & first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity y^e hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and crauing pardon of the offence that we haue committed. Vnder this kinde is contained their confession that haue sinned euen to the offending of the whole church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the priuate offence of one man, to forbid from holy mysteries all them that haue sinned against their brother, til they be with iust amendes reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euill example, should recouer the fauour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian receiued againe to the cōmunion, when he had yelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vs'd in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (saith he) in due time, & then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hands of the bishop and y^e Clergy, they receiue leaue to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture vtterly knoweth not, & it is not our dutie to bind consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I do so much not speake against it that the sheep should present themselues to their shepheard when they meane to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladly haue it euery where obserued. For both they that haue an encombred conscience, may from thence receiue singular profit, & they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

14 In these three kinds of confession, y^e power of the keyes hath place: that is, either when the whole church with soleimne reknowledging of their faultes craueth pardon: or when a priuate man, y^e by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloseth his weaknes vnto him. But there are diuerse wayes of taking away offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is prouided for, yet the principall end is, y^e hatred should be taken away, and mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this vse that I haue spoken of, is not to be dispised, that we may the more willingly confesse our finnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the iudgement seate of God, confesseth it selfe guilty, and hath one onely refuge vnto the mercy of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christs embassadour, ha-uing cōmandement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitableness of the keyes is worthily commēded, whē this embassage is performed rightly, & with such order & religiousnes

as becometh it. Likewise when he that had in a manner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiveth pardon and is restored into brotherly vnity: how great a benefit is it that he vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgiuen by them, to whom Christ hath sayde: To whomsoever ye forgiue sinnes in earth, they shall be forgiuen in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnes and profit is priuate absolution, when it is asked by them that haue neede of speciall remedy to reliefe their weakenes. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth neuertheles in some dout, and hath stil an vnquiet mind, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: and y^e same man, if he haue disclosed to his person the secret sore of his mind, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospel, Thy sins are forgiuen thee, be of good hope, stablisheth his minde vnto assurednesse and is deliuered from y^e trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of y^e keyes, we must take heede that we dreame not of a certain power seuered from the preaching of the Gospel. In an other place we shall haue occasion more fully to declare this matter againe, where we shall entreate of the gouernment of the church: and there shall we see that all the power to bind and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mystery of the keyes, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospell be publicly and priuately sealed vp in the heartes of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordeined: which can not be done but by onely preaching.

15 But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euery one of either kinde, so soone as they come to the yeres of discretion, must yearly once at the least confesse all their sins to their own priest: and that their sin is not forgiuen, vnlesse they haue firmly conceived an entent to confesse it: which intent if they perform not when occasion is offered that they may do it, there is now no more entry open for them into Paradise. And y^e the priest hath y^e power of the keyes, wherewith he may loose and bind a sinner: because y^e word of Christ is not in vaine. Whatsoever ye binde, &c. About this power they stoutly fight among themselues. Some say that there is but one keye in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is in deede requisite for a good vse, but that it is onely as an accessary and is not essentially ioyned with the other. Some other, because they sawe this to be too much an vnbridled licence, haue reckned vp two keyes, discretion & power. Other again, when they saw the leud boldnes of priests to be restrained by this moderation, haue forged other keyes, that is to say, authority of discerning which they should vse in giuing determinate sentence: & power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: and y^e knowlege standeth by as a counseller. But they dare not simply expound this binding and loosing to be to forgiue and put away sinnes, because they heare the Lorde crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy sinnes, O Israel, But they say it is the priestes office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare whole sins are forgiuen or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolucth and retained sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicated and receiueth againe to partaking of y Sacraments. Finally, when they vnderstande that they be not yet out of this doubt, but that it still may be obiected against them, that oftentimes their priestes do binde and loose men vnworthy, which are not therefore bound or loosed in heauen: then (which is their last refuge) they answer that the giuing of the keyes, must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his iudgement seat such sentence of the Priest shalbe allowed as hath bin iustly pronounced, according as the deseruings of him that is bounde or loosed, did require. Moreouer they say, y these keyes are giuen by Christ to all Priests, and are deliuered to them by their Bishoppes, at the time of their promoting to priesthoode: but the free vse of them, remaineth onely with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended Priestes haue in deede the keyes, but rusty and bound vp. And they that say these things may wel seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which vpon a newe anuielde haue forged new keyes with which they say the treasure of the church is locked vp. These keyes we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16 Now I will in fewe wordes answer to euery one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, forasmuch as wee will consider that when place serueth. But where they charge men with a lawe of reckning vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiuen but vpon condition, if there be an intent conceiued to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all sinnes be reckned vp? But Dauid, (Who as I thinke) had well studied vpon the confession of his sinnes, Psa. 19. 13. yet cryed out: who shall vnderstand his errours? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in an other place. My iniquities haue passed about my head, & like a weightie burden haue waxed heauie about my strength. Psa. 38. 5. Truly he vnderstoode how great was the bottomelesse depth of our sinnes: how many were y sortes of our mischieuous doings, how many heades this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon vp a register of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cryed vnto the Lord: I am ouerwhelmed, I am buried and choked, the gates of hels haue compassed me, let thy hand drawe me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may thinke vpon the numbring of his sinnes, when he seeth that Dauid can make no number of his?

17 With this butcherie, the soules that haue bin touched with any feeling of God, haue bin more cruelly vexed. First they called themselues to account: then they deuided sinnes into armes, into boowes, into branches, and into twigges, according to these mens rules: then they weyed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a litle forward. But when they had proceeded a litle further, than was on eche side skie, and on eche side sea, no hauen, no safe roade: the mo that they had passed ouer, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as hie mountaines, & there appeared no hope, not so much as after long compassings, any way to escape. And so they did sticke fast betweene the sacrifice and the stone, & at last was found no other issue but desperation. Then these cruel butchers, to ease the woundes that themselues had made, laide certaine gentle plaisters, y^e euery man should do as much as he could. But new cares again rose vp, yea new torments did flea the silly soules, as to thinke: I haue not employed time enough, I haue not endeouored my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I haue passed ouer many things by negligēce, and the forgetfulness y^e cometh by negligēce is not excusable. Then were there ministred other plaisters to assuage such paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligēce: if it be not altogether carelesse, it shalbe pardoned. But al these things can not close vp the wound, and are not so much easment of the euil, as poyson covered with honie, that they should not with their bitternesse offend the first tast but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth vpon them & foundeth in their cares: Confesse all thy sinnes. And this horrour can not be appeased but by assured comfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yere, and to gather together what sins they haue done euery day: forasmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at euening he shall reckon vp the faultes but of one day, his memory is confounded therewith, so great a multitude and diuersity presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse and blockish hypocrits y^e thinke they haue done sufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greatest sins: but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which when they see themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, do adde also this saying of Iohn: If our owne heart do accuse vs, God is greater then our hearte: and so they quake for feare at the sight of that iudge, whose knowledge farre surmounteth our vnderstanding.

1. Ioh. 3. 20.

18 But whereas a great part of the worlde rested them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleeued that God was satisfied, or because they themselues were fully satisfied: but y^e the anchor cast as it were in the midde sea, should rest a litle from sayling, or as a wayfaring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For euery man may be witness to himselfe. I will in a short summe shewe, what manner of lawe this was. First simply it is impossible, and therefore it can do nothing but destroy, damne, confound, and cast in ruine & desperation. And then when it hath ledde sinners from the true feeling of their sinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselues. For while they are wholly busied in reckning vp of their sinnes, in the meane time they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthines, by knowledge whereof they should chiefly haue weyed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our euill to be so great as passeth our vnderstanding. After this rule we see that the Publicanes confession was made. Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner: as if he should say: All that euer I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I can not attayne with witte or expresse with tongue the greatnesse of my sinnes: let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercy swallowe vp the bottomlesse bottomlesse depth of my sin. But then thou wilt say, what? are not all our finnes to bee confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knitte vp in these two wordes, I am a sinner? No, but rather wee muste endeouour our selues as much as in vs lieth, to powre out our hearte before y^e Lorde, and not onely in one worde confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and heartily acknowledge our selues to be such: and with all our thought recorde, howe great and diuerse is our filth of finnes, not onely that wee bee vnclane, but what, howe great, and in howe many partes is our vnclannesse: not onely that wee be detters, but with howe great dettes we be loden, and howe many wayes charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with howe many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholic powred out himselfe before God, let him earnestly & sincerely thinke, that yet there remaine moe sins, and y^e the secret corners of their euils are so deepe, that they cannot be throughly disclosed. And he crieth out with Dauid: Who vnderstandeth his errors? Lord cleanse me from my hidden finnes. Nowe where they affirme that finnes are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmly conceiued, and that the gate of paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuenesse of finnes, than alwayes hath beene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their finnes in the care of some priest, y^e we read to haue obtained forgiuenes of finnes at Christs hand. And truely they coulde not confesse, where there were neither any priestes confessors, nor any confessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time finnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtrfull matter, the word of God is plaine, which abideth for euer: When soeuer the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this word, bindeth not finnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that iudgement can not be giuen but when the cause is hearde, we haue a solution in readinesse, that they doe presumptuously take that vpon themselues, which haue made themselues iudges. And it is a maruel that they do so boldly frame to themselues such principles, as no man in his right wit will graunt. They boast that the office of Binding & Loosung is committed to them, as though it were a certaine iurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Moreouer their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was vnknown to the Apostles. Neither doeth it belong to the priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be looscd or no: forasmuch as hee that heareth can neuer knowe whether the reckening be iust and perfecte. So shoulde there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his wordes that is to be iudged. Moreouer the whole order of loosung standeth of faith and repentance, which two things are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen vpon an other man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of binding and loosung is not subiect to the iudgement of an earthly iudge: because the minister of the worde, when he doeth his office, can not giue absolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the finnes sake,

Whose

Whose finnes ye forgiue,&c. that they shoulde not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the commaundement and worde of God, shalbe ratified in heauen.

19 Therefore it is no meruell, if wee condemne and desire to haue vterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so many wayes hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath giuen cause to so many wickednesses, sacrileges and errours, who wil not thinke that it ought to bee presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vses, which they boast vpon as verie profitable, but these either false or of no value at al. One onely they commend with a singular prerogatiue, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made warer, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though wee did not humble a man with shamefastnes enough when wee call him to that hie iudgement seate of heauen, I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth verie well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge wee cease to sinne, and bee not ashamed to haue God witnes of our euill conscience. Although the verie same is also moste false, for it is to bee seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when men hauing made confession to a priest, thinke they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not only they are made all the yeare long the boulder to sinne: but all the rest of the yere bearing themselues bolde vpon confession, they neuer sigh vnto God, they neuer returne to themselues, but heape finnes vpon finnes till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke them selues discharged of there burden, and that they haue taken away from God the iudgement that they haue giuen to the priest, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulnessse when they haue made the prieste priuie. Moreouer who doth merily see the day of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull hearte, and commeth not to it rather against his will, and as it were drawing backwarde, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawn to prison? vnlesse peraduenture it be the verie priestes, that vse ioyfully to delight themselues with mutuall rehearsals of their doings, as it were with meric tales? I wil not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth full. Onely this I say, If that holy man did not vnwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confession out of the Church, yea out of the remembraunce of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needfull to bee done at this day vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incestes, and bawderies.

20 Where the Confessioners alleadge for this purpose the power of the keyes, and doe thereupon set the peupe and proue of their kingdome, as the prouerbe is: it is to be seene howe much they ought to auail. Then (say they) are the keyes giuen without cause? Is it saide without cause: Whatsoeuer you loose vpon earth, shall be also loosed in heauen? Doe we then make the worde of Christe void? I aunswere there was a weightie cause why the keyes shoulde bee giuen, as both I haue euen nowe alreadie

declared, and shall more plainly shewe againe when I come to entreate of Excommunication. But what if I do with one swerd cut of the hold of all y they require, that is with saying, that sacrificing priestes are not the vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also bee to be intreated of in an other place: but nowe they raise vp an engine whereby they woulde most of all defende themselues, and thereby may all their buildinges bee ouerthrowen. For Christ did not giue his Apostles the power to binde and loose, before that hee gaue them the holy Ghost. Therefore I say, that none haue the power of the keys that haue not firste receiued the holy Ghost. I denie that any man can vse the keys, but hauing the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to bee done. They trifling say, that they haue the holy Ghost. But indeede they denie it, vnlesse peraduenture they faine (as they doe faine indeede) the holy Ghost to bee a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they shal not be beleued. And by this engine they are vtterly ouerthrowen, that of whatsoeuer dore they boast that they haue the keye, a man may alway aske them whether they haue the holy Ghost which is the iudge and gouernour of the keys. If they aunswere that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghost may erre. This they will not be glad to speake expressly, although they cokedly vtter the same by their doctrine. It is therefore to bee gathered, that no priestes haue power of the keys which doe commonly without consideration loose those things that the Lorde woulde haue to bee bounde, and binde those things that the Lorde commaunded to be loosed.

21 Whereas they see themselues conuincid by moste cleere experimentes, that they do without choise loose & bind the worthie and vnworthie, they vsurpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not denie that knowledge is requisite for a good vse, yet they write that the verie power is giuen to euill disposers of it. But this is the power, whatsoeuer thou bindest or loosest in earth, shall bee bounde or loosed in heauen. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that haue this power doe well binde and loose. Neither may they dally and say, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the deseruings of him that is bounde or loosed. And wee also confesse, that none can bee bounde or loosed, but they that are worthie to bee bound or loosed. But the messengers of the Gospel and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this worde the messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgiueneesse of sinnes in Christ by faith, they may proclaime damnation into all and vpon all that embrace not Christ. In this worde the Church pronounceth that fornicatours, adulterers, theeues, mansleyers, couetous men, vniust men, haue no part in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with moste sure bondes. With the same worde the Church looseth them whome it comforteth being repentant. But what power shall this bee, not to knowe what is to bee bounde or loosed, and not to bee able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then doe they say that they lose by authoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vncertaine? What haue wee to do with this imaginatiue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it already die proued that either there is no vse of it, or so vncertaine an vse as may be accompted for none at all. For whereas they confesse y^e there is a great part of Priestes that doe not rightly vse the keyes, and that the power without lawfull vse is of no effecte. Who shall assure mee that he of whom I am loosed is a good vsfer of the keyes? if he be an euill vsfer of it, what hath he else but such a voide disposing of them, as to say, what is to be bounde or loosed in thee I know not, forasmuch as I lacke the right vse of the keyes, but if thou deserue I loose thee. But so much might doe, I will not say a lay man (for they could not beare that with patient eares) but a Turke or a Deuill. For it is as much as to say, I haue not the word of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power giuen mee to loose thee, if thy deseruings bee so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keyes to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing: and that knowledge is adioyned for a counseller, and like a counseller serueth for a good vse: vndoubtedly euen they desired to raigne at their owne wil, licentiously without God and his word.

22 If any man take exception and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, because the absolution that hangerh vpon faith shall alway remayne doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a colde comfort, because the minister himselve which is no competent iudge of their faith, cannot be assured of their absolution: wee haue aunswere thereunto in readinesse. For they say that no sinnes are forgiuen by the prieste, but such whereof himselve hath bene the hearer: so by their opinion, the forgiuenes hangerh vpon the iudgemēt of the priest, and if he doe not wisely discern who be worthie of pardon, y^e whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power wherof they speak, is a iurisdiction adioyned to examination, whereunto pardon and absolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomlesse depth. For where the confession is not founde, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the priest himselve must needs sticke in suspense while he can not tell, whether the sinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the euill deedes. Finally (such is the ignorance and rudenesse of priestes) the most part are no fitter to doe this office, than a shoemaker to plowe the ground, and the rest in a maner all ought worthily to suspect themselues. Herevpon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulnessse of the Popes absolution, because they will haue it grounded vpon the person of y^e Priest, and not only that, but also vpon knowledge, y^e he may iudge only of things informed, examined and proued. Nowe if a man should aske of these good docters, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgiuen: I see not what they haue to aunswere, but that they shall bee compelled to confesse that all is vnprofitable, that the priest pronounceth of the forgiuenes of those sinnes that he hath hearde rehearsed, so long as the other sins are not deliuered frō condemnation. On the behalfe of him that confesseth howe hurtful carefulnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appeareth hereby that when he resteth vpon the priestes discretion, as they call it, hee can determine nothing certainly by the worde of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleare from all these absurdities. For the absolution is condiditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that hee syncerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, & obey the grace offered him. So he can not erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is giuen him in instructions by the worde of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Mat. 9. 29. Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the maister himselfe, Bee it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath bene wickedly despised in the Papacie:

23 How foolishly they confounde those thinges that the Scripture teacheth of the power of keyes, I haue promised that I will speake in another place, and there shall be a more conuenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the gouernment of the Church. But let the readers remember that those thinges are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secrete confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, & partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they object that the power of loosing is giuen to the Apostles, which priestes may vse in forgiuing sins acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fonde principle, because the absolution that serueth faith, is nothing else but a witnessse of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangerth vpon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secrete sinnes, but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But whereas they scrape together here and there testimonies, to proue that it sufficeth not to confesse sins either to God onely or to lay men, vnlesse a priest be the hearer of them, their trauell therein is but lewde, and such as they may bee ashamed of. For when the ancient fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselves to their owne pastour, it can not be expounded of particular rehearfall which then was not in vse. Then, Lumbard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme offer purpose to haue giuen themselves to fained books, by pretence wherof they might deceiue the simple. They doe indeede truly confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although he haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the priest doeth not so much forgiue sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiuen. Albeit in the word of declaring they fliey bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremonie in steede of doctrine. But whereas they patche vnto it, that he is absolved in the face of \bar{s} Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they do inconueniently draw to the peculiar vse of euerie particular man, that whiche wee haue already sayde to bee appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to bee taken away. But by and by after, they depraue and corrupt moderation, adding another manner of forgiuing, with an enioyning of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to parte that in halves, which G O D hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when hee simple requireth repentaunce and faith, this partition or exception is a verie robbrie of God. For it is in effect asmuch as if the priest taking vpon him the person of a Tribune, should become intercessour to God and woulde not suffer God of his meere liberalitie to receiue him into fauour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seats and there hath bene punished.

24 The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they will make God the authour of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falsehood condemned, as I haue prooued them false forgers in the fewe places that they alleadge. But sith it is euident that it is a lawe made by men, I say y^e it is both tyrannicall and made iniuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his worde, will haue them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obteneing of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lorde woulde to bee free, I say that this is a sacrilege not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgiue sinnes, wherein consisteth saluation for vs. Moreouer I haue shewed that this tyrannie was first brought in, when the worlde was oppressed with filthie barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent lawe, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore soules in whome soeuer abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carelesnes, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, and so maketh the duller. Last of all I haue declared, that whatsoeuer mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and depraue pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitful colors.

25 The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that euer they babble may bee ouerthowen with one worde. They say that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to absteine from his former euils, and change his behauiour into better, vnlesse he make satisfaction to God for those things that hee hath done: And that there bee many helpes by which wee may redeeme sinnes, as weepings, fastinges, oblations and the workes of charitie. With these we must winne the Lorde to bee fauorable, with these wee must pay our debtes to the righteousnes of God, with these wee must make amendes for our defaultes, with these wee muste deserue pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercie hee hath forgiuen our fault, yet by the discipline of his iustice he reteineth the peine, & that this is the paine that must bee redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they say commeth to this point, that wee doe in deede obtene pardon of our sinnes at the mercifulnesse of God, but by meanes of the deseruing of our works, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may bee fully made to Gods righteousnes. Against such lies, I set the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, than which there is nothing more euidently spoken of in the scripture. First, what is forgiuenes, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgiue, y^e acknowledgeth by acquitance that the mony is paid, but he y^e without any payment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancellerth the debtors bond. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away al opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mightie a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Esay, It is I, it is I, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will

will not be mindfull of thy finnes: doeth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause & fundation of forgiueneſſe onely from his owne goodnes? Moreouer whereas the whole Scripture beareth this witneſſe of Christ, that forgiueneſſe of finnes is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then do they teache that it is receiued by the name of ſatisfactions? Neither can they denie that they giue this to ſatisfactions, although they ſay that the ſame be vſed as helps by way of meanes. For whereas the Scripture ſaith By the name of Christ, it meaneth that wee bring nothing, we allege nothing of our owne, but reſt vpon the onely commendation of Christ. As Paul, where he affirmeth that God is reconciling \bar{y} world to him ſelfe in Christ, for his ſake not imputing to men their finnes, he immediatly ſheweth the meane & maner how: becauſe he that was without ſinne, was made ſinne for vs.

26 But (ſuch is their peruerſneſſe) they ſay that both forgiueneſſe of finnes and reconciliation are perſourmed both at one time, when we are in Baptiſme receined into the fauour of God by Christ: that after baptiſme we muſt riſe againe by ſatisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profiteth nothing, but ſo far as it is diſtributed by the keyes of the Church. Neither do I ſpeake of a doubtful matter, for aſmuch as they haue in moſt euident writings bewrayed their owne filthineſſe, & not one or two of them, but al \bar{y} Schoolemen vniuerſally. For their maſter after that he had confeſſed that Christ had payed the penaltrie of finnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediatly correcteth his ſaying with adding this exception, that in baptiſme all temporal penalties of finnes are releaſed, but after baptiſme they are miniſhed by the helpe of penance, that ſo the croſſe of Christ and our penance may worke together. But Iohn ſaith farre otherwiſe, if any ſin, wee haue an aduocate with the Father, euen Ieſus Christ, which is the propitiation for our finnes. I write vnto you children, becauſe your finnes are forgiuen you for his names ſake. Truely, he ſpeaketh to the faithfull, to whome when he ſetteth forth Christ to be the propitiation of finnes, he ſheweth that there is no other ſatisfaction, by which God beeing diſpleaſed, may be made fauourable and appeaſed. He doeth not ſay: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, nowe ſeek you other meanes, but he maketh him a perpetuall aduocate, alway to reſtore vs by his interceſſion into the fauour of his father: a perpetuall propitiation, by which our finnes may be cleaſed away. For this is euer true that the other Iohn ſaide: Beholde, the Lambe of God, beholde him that taketh away the finnes of the world. He taketh them away (ſaith he) himſelfe and none other, that is to ſay: for aſmuch as he alone is the Lambe of God, he alone alſo is the oblation for finnes, he alone the propitiation ſacrifice, he alone the ſatisfaction. For wher as the right and power to forgiue belongeth properly to the father, in the reſpect that he is diſtinguiſhed from the ſonne, as wee haue already ſcene: Christ is here ſet in another degree, that taking vpon himſelfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our guiltineſſe before the iudgement of God. Whereupon ſoloweth, that we ſhall no otherwiſe be partakers of the ſatisfaction made by Christ, vnleſſe the ſame honour remaine whole with him, which they doe wrongfully take to themſelues that goe about to appeaſe

27 And here it is good to consider two things : that Christ may haue his due honour kepte vnto him whole and vnminished : and that the consciences being assured of the forgiuennesse of sinne, may haue peace with God. Esay saith, that the father hath layed the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that we shoulde be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes saith: that Christ did in his body bear our sinnes vpon the tree. Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sinne for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was giuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sins with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadfull iudgement of God, and condemnation of death should be cast. Here those triflings are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, euery one of vs doth none otherwise feele the effectualnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the onely satisfaction of Christ. Nowe set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuennesse of sinnes: that if we afterwarde fall, to the obtaining of a seconde forgiuennesse our workes doe worke with it. If these things may haue place, do these things that are here before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It his a meruellous great difference, between this that our iniquities are layed vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, and this that they are cleansed by our own workes: betwene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if we speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mannes conscience, to heare that his sinnes are redemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly knowe the measure of his satisfaction? Therefore he shal alway dout whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shall alway be vexed, and alway quake for feare. For they that rest vpon light petie satisfactions, doe too contemptuously esteeme the iudgement of God, and doe litle consider howe great is the grieuousnesse of sinne, as we shall declare in another place. But although we graunt them to redeeme some sinnes with iust satisfaction: yet what will they doe when they are oppressed with so many sinnes, for satisfaction whereof an hundred liues although they were wholly applyed thereunto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuennesse of sinnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yonglinges, but to the already regenerate children of GOD, and them that haue bene long nourished in the bo-some of the Church. That embassage which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had bene already regenerate. But hee, bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ. So when Coloss. 1. 20. he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the blood of the crosse hath pacified all things in heauen or in earth, he restraineth not this to the onely moment wherein we are received into the Church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easily appeareth by the processe of the text, where he saith, y the faithful haue a redemption by y blood of Christ, that is forgiuennesse of sinnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together mo places, that

28 Here they flee to the sanctuary of the foolish distinction, that some sinnes are venial, and some deadly: that for deadly sinnes is great satisfaction due, that venial sinnes are purged with more easie remedies, as with saying of the Lordes prayer, with sprinkling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and trifle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth venial and deadly sinne, yet they could neuer discern the one from the other, sauing that they make vngodlinesse and vncleannes of heart a veniall sinne. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) doe pronounce, that the rewarde of sinne is death, and that the soule that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the sinnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they doe not deserue death, but because by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, because they are not imputed: because they are taken away by pardon. I know how vniustly they slaunder this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoikes strange conclusion, concerning the equalitie of sinnes. But they shall easily be conuincd by their owne mouth. Fo I demaunde of them, whether among the very same sinnes that they cōfesse to be deadly, they do not acknowledge one to be greater than an other. It doth not therefore immediatly followe, that sinnes are equall, because they are altogether deadly. When the Scripture definitiuely saith, that the rewarde of sinne is death, that the obedience of the lawe is the way of life, and that the transgression of the law is death, they can not escape this sentence. What ende of satisfiing then will they finde in so great a heape of sinnes? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sinne, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrappe themselves in many sinnes, sith the iustest man passeth no one day wherein he falleth not many times. Now when they shal prepare themselves to make satisfaction for these sins, they shall heape vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfiing being cut of, what do they stay vpon? how dare they still thinke of satisfiing?

29 They goe about to winde out themselves: but (as the prouerbe is) the water still cleaueth vpon them. They forge a distinction of fault and penaltie. They confesse that the fault is forgiuen by the mercie of God, but that when the fault is forgiuen, the penaltie remaineth which the righteousness of God requireth to be payed: and that satisfactions doe properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God, what a skipping lightnesse is this? now they confesse that the forgiuenesse of the fault lieth freely open for men, which sometime they teach men to deserue with prayers and weepings, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet still all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgiuenesse of sinnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I haue alreadie more than sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherwith these winding snakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not bee able once to folde in the toppe of their taile. This is the newe Testament which the Lorde hath couenanted with vs in his Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learne by an other Prophet, where the Lorde sayth: If the righteous turne away from his righteousness,

Ier. 31. 31.

Esa. 38. 17.

I will not remember all his righteoufnesses. If the wicked departe from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he sayth that he will not remember their righteoufnesse, this is asmuch to say, that he wil haue no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember sinnes, is asmuch as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in an other place, to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to lude it. By such maners of spech the holy Ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing eares to learne. Truly if God do punish sins, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembereth them: if he call them to iudgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine them, he doth not cast them behinde his backe: if hee looke vpon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloud: if he sift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expounde it in plaine wordes. If God haue couered sinnes, then he woulde not looke vpon them: if he would not looke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they should not be seene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of an other place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lorde forgiueth sinnes. If (sayth he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shalbe made white as snow: if they be red like crimosin, they shalbe as woll. And in Jeremy we reade thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shalbe sought for, and shall not be founde: the sinne of Iudah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remnantes that I shall preferue. Wilt thou briefly vnderstand what is the meaning of those wordes? Weye on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth bind vpon iniquities in a sack, doth gather them into a bundell and lay them vpon, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an Adamant stone. If they signifie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shalbe giuen for recompense, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompensing of vengeance. Here I must beseech the readers not to harken to my glosses, but onely that they wil suffer the worde of God to take some place.

30 What, I pray you, had Christ don for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did beare all our sins in his body vpon the tree, we meane nothing else thereby, but that he suffered all the paine and punishment that was due vnto our sinnes. And y same hath Esaye more liuely declared where he sayth: the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vpon him. What is the correction of our peace but the paine due to sinnes? and which we should haue suffred before that we could be reconciled to God, vnlesse y he had entred into our steed? Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffred the paines of sinnes, to deliuer them that be his from them. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption performed by Christ, hee vseth to call it in Greeke Apolutrosin, whereby hee meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the very price price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gaue himselfe Antilyron, a price of ransome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lord (saith Auguſtine) but sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death of Christ? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of sinnes, ministreth vs a strong battell ramme. For the Lord doeth not there appoint this or that maner of satisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doeth most diligently and in most exact order set out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe commeth it to passe, that he commaundeth to recompence faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely sacrifices for satisfaction: but because his will is so to declare, that there is onely one kinde of satisfaction, whereby his iudgement is appeased? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weyed by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their truth, that is to say, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what maner of recompence the Lorde receiueth of vs, Osee hath very well expressed in few wordes. Thou shalt (sayth he) take away iniquitic, O God. Loe, here is forgiuenesse of sinnes. And wee shall pay thee values of our lippes: Loe, here is satisfaction. I knowe that they yet doe suttly slip away, when they make distinction betweene euerlasting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kinde of punishment that god taketh as well of the body as of the soule; except onely euerlasting death; this restraining of it doeth litle helpe them. For the places that wee haue aboue recited, do expressly meane this, that God receiueth vs into fauour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the peine whatsoeuer we had thereby deserued. And so oft as Dauid or the other Prophets do craue pardon of sinnes, they do also therewithall pray to be releas'd of the peine. Yea, the very feeling of Gods iudgement doeth driue them thereunto. Againe, when they promise mercie at the Lords hand, they do in manner alway of purpose preach of the peines and the forgiuenesse thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he wil make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his own sake, not for the Iewes sake, he doeth sufficiently shewe that both are of free gift. Finally, if wee be deliuered by Christ from giltinesse of fault, the peines that come thereof, must needs cease.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arme themselues with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of argumentes those be that they alleage. Dauid (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adultrie & manslaughter, receiued pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterwarde punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. Wee are taught to redeeme with satisfactions such peines as were to be extended after forgiuenesse of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeeme his sinnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlines, iniquities are forgiuen. And in another place, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is couered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth. Againe, in Luke the Lorde sayeth of the woman that was a sinner, that many sinnes are forgiuen her, because shee hath loued much. Howe peruersly and wrongfully they euer wey the doings of God. But if they had marked (as they should not haue oucrpassed it) that there are two kinds of Gods iudgement, they would haue seene in this rebuking of Dauid, a farre other maner of punishment, than such as might be thought to tende to reuengement. But because, it not a litle behoueth vs all to vnderstand whereunto the chasticements haue respect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our sinnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth y wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shalbe not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs cal the one kinde of iudgement, the iudgement of Reuenge, the other of Chastisement. It is to be vnderstanded, that God so punisheth his enimies with the iudgement of reuenge, that he vseth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is ioyned with his indignation: with the iudgement of chastisement he dealeth not so cruelly, as to be angrie: nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a iudge, the other of a father. For the iudge when he punisheth an euil doer, he hath regarde to the offence, and punisheth the very fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his child, he doeth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teache him, & make him warier in time to come. Chrysostome in a certaine place vseth a similitude somewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the same point. The sonne (saith he) is beaten, and the seruant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bondseruant, because he hath offended, and the other is chasticed as a free man and as a sonne, needing correction. To the one his correction serueth for prooffe & amendement, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter shortly & in a readie summe, let this be the first of two distinctions. Wheresoever punishment is to reuenge, there sheweth it selfe the curse and wrath of God; which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwise, Chastisement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimonie of his loue, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commonly euery where sufficiently expressed in y worde of God. For whatsoeuer afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out vnto vs as it were a certaine entrie of hell, fro whence they do alreadie see a farre off their eternall damnation: and they are so far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginnings they are prepared to the most cruel hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chasticing chasticeth his seruants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confesse that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vnto true instruction. But as we read euery where that the holy ones suffer such punishments with quiet mind, so they haue alway prayed to escape the first kind of scourges. Chastice me Lorde (saith Ieremie) but in thy iudgement, not in thy wrath, least thou destroy mee. Poure out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowen thee, and vpon the kingdomes kingdomes that haue not called vpon thy name. And Dauid sayeth: Lorde Psa. 6. 2. & 38. 2. rebuke mee not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrary, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lorde is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth their sinnes. As in Esay: I wil confesse to thee O Lord, because thou hast benee angry with me: thy wrath is turned, & thou hast comforted me. Esa. 12. 7. Againe Abacuc. Thou that hast benee angry shall remember mercie. And Michee: I wil beare the wrath of the Lord, because I haue sinned against him. Hab. 3. 2. Mich. 7. 9. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull haue asswagement of their sorrowe, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that he doeth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he wil neuer defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheth, but of the vehement feeling of sorrowe which they feele that suffer any of his seueritie whatsoeuer it be. But he not onely pricketh his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselues not farre from the damnation of hel. So he testifieth that they haue deserued his wrath, and so it behoueth that they should loath themselues in their euils, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make hast to craue pardon. But euen in the very same doing he sheweth a more eident testimonie of his fauourable kindnesse than of his wrath. For the couenant continueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the trueth wherof he that cannot decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall neuer be made void. If (saith he) his children forsake my law, & walke not in my iudgements: if they defile my statutes, and keepe not my commaundements. I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie from him. Psa. 89. 31. Of which mercie to make vs assured, he sayeth, that the rodde wherewith he will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shall be of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreme and deadly horror, that feele the hand of God to be against them. How great regard he hath of this lenitie in chastising his Israel, he sheweth in the Prophet: I haue purged thee (saith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou shouldest haue benee all consumed. Albeit he teacheth that chasticementes serue him for to cleanse him, but he further sayeth, that he vseth the same so temperatly, that he bee not too much consumed by them. 2 Sam. 7. 14. And that is needefull. Esa. 48. 10. For the more that euery man reuerently feareth GOD, and giueth himselfe to followe godlinesse, so much the tenderer he is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groane vnder his scourges, yet for that they weye not the cause, but rather turne their backe both to their owne sinnes and to the iudgement of GOD, by that slouthfulnesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmure and kicke against him, and do make an vprore against their iudge, that furious sudden rage astonieth them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descend to consider their sinnes, and being striken with dread and horror, they slee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, vnlesse the Lorde did aswage these sorrowes wherewith the poore soules torment themselves, they woulde faint a hundred times euen in small tokens of his wrath.

33 Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are stricken with the scourges of God, they doe already after a certaine maner begin to suffer peines by his iudgement, and though they shall not escape vnpunished, for that they haue not taken heede to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they shoulde prooue God to be a iudge and reuenger. But children are beaten with roddes, not y they should thereby be punished of God for their sinnes, but that they shoulde thereby profit to amendment. Therefore wee take it that they rather haue respect to y time to come, than to the time past. This I had rather expresse in Chrysostomes wordes than mine owne. For this (saith he) God doth lay peine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so saith Augustine: That which thou sufferest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no peine, a chastisement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Knowe ye brethren that all this miserie of mankinde when the world groneth is a medicinall sorrowe, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I haue therefore thought good to alleage, that the maner of speach that I haue aboute written, should not seeme to any man newe and vnused. And hereunto serue all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lorde oftentimes doeth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffely despised all punishments. In Esay he saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to y crowne of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shalbe sufficient to haue briefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdome, he punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from Dauid his yong sonne, he corrected him to amendement. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul saith, when we are iudged of the Lorde, wee are corrected, y we should not be damned with this worlde. That is, when wee that be the children of God are afflicted with the hande of our heauenly father, this is no peine wherewith we should be confounded, but onely a chastisement wherewith we should be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainly on our side. For he teacheth that the peines wherewith men are a like chasticed by God, are diuersly to be considered: because to the holy ones they are batels and exercises after the forgiuenesse of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiuenesse peines of wickednesse. In which place hee rehearseth how peines were layde vpon Dauid and other godly men, and saith, that the same tended to this end, that their godlinesse should by such humbling of them, be exercised and prooued. And where Esay saith, that the Iewish people had their iniquitie forgiuen them, because they had receiued full chastisement at the Lords hand: this prooueth not that y pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the ful payment of the peine: but it is in effect asmuch as if he had sayde: Because ye haue already suffred paines enough, and by the greuoufnesse and multitude thereof haue ben now pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is now time that receiuing the tidings of full mercy, your heartes should reioyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the person of a father, which repenteth him euen of his iust seueritie, when hee was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessarie that the faithfull be furnished in bitterness of afflictions. It is time that the iudgement beganne at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called vpon. What should the children of God doe, if they did beleene the seueritie of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For he that being striken with the hande of God, imagineth God a punishing iudge, cannot conceiue him but angrie and enemie vnto him, and detest the very scourge of God as a curse & damnation. Finally, he can neuer be perswaded that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is stil minded to punish him. But he only profiteth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angrie with his sinnes, but mercifull and louing to himselfe. For otherwise that must needes happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where he saith: Thy wrathes; O God haue passed ouer me: thy terrors haue oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, because we haue fainted in thy wrath: and we haue ben troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secretes in the light of thy countenance: because all our dayes are gone away in thy wrath: our yeres are consumed as the worde that is passed out of a mouth. On the other side Dauid saith thus of his fatherly chastisements, to teach that the faithfull are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lorde, and hast instructed in thy law, to giue him quiet from euill dayes, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a harde tentation, when God sparing the vnbeleeuers and winking at their faultes, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gaue them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they should learn, that it is done to prouide for their saluation when they are called again into the way, and the wicked are caried hedlong into their errors, whose ende is the pit. And it is no difference whether the peinc be euerlasting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and sicknes, as the iudgement of eternall death are y curses of God, when they are layd vpon men to this end, to be instrumentes of the Lordes wrath & vengeance against the probate.

35 Now (as I thinke) all men doe perceiue whereunto tended that chastisement of the Lord vpon Dauid: euen to be an instruction that God is greuously displeas'd with manslaughter and adulterie, against which hee had shewed so great an indignation in his beloued and faithful seruant: that Dauid should be taught to be no more so bold to doe the like deede: and not to be a paine whereby he should make a certaine recompence to God. And so is to be iudged of the other kind of correction, whereby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Dauids disobedience whereunto he was fallen in numbring the people. For he did in deede freely forgie to

she hath loued much. In which wordes (as you see) hee maketh not her loue the cause, but the prooue of the forgiuenes of her sinnes. For they are deriued vpon a similitude of that dettour, to whome fise hundred was forgiuen, to whome he did not say that therefore it was forgiuen, because hee had loued much: but therefore loued much, because it was forgiuen. And herevnto must that similitude be applied in this sort: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner: but thou oughtest to knowe that she is none such, forasmuch as her sinnes be forgiuen her. And that her sinnes be forgiuen her, her loue ought to prooue vnto thee, whereby shee rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is proued by signes ensuing. By what meane shee obtained forgiuenesse of sinnes, the Lorde openly testifieth: Thy faith, saith hee, hath saued thee. Therefore wee obtaine forgiuenesse by faith: By charitie we giue thanks, and testifie the bountifullnes of the Lorde.

38. As for those things that are commonly found in the bookes of old writers concerning satisfaction, they litle mooue me. I see in deed that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a manner all whose bookes remaine, haue either erred in this point, or spoken too crabbedly and hardlie: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and vnskilfull as to haue written those things in that sense that the newe Satisfactionars doe reade them. Chrysofome in one place writeth thus: where mercie is required, examination ceaseth: where mercie is asked, iudgement is not rigorous: where mercie is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercie, there is no inquisition. Where is mercie, the aunswere is pardoned. Which wordes howsoever they be wrested; yet they can neuer be made to agre with y Scholers doctines. In the booke of Ecclesiasticall doctines, which is fathered vpon Augustine, is red thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was saide to bee giuen in recompence of sinnes committed, was euen in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedefulnesse in abstaining from sinnes in time to come. I will not alleadge that which the same Chrysofome saith, that hee requireth of vs no more, but that wee shoulde confesse our sinnes vnto him with teares sith such sentences are manie times found in his writings and others. Augustine indeede in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obtaine forgiuenesse of sinnes: but because no man shoulde stumble at that litle worde, hee himselfe preuenteth it in an other place. The flesh of Christ (saith hee) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not only these sinnes that are wholly put away in baptisme, but also these that afterwarde creepe in by weakenesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgiue vs our trespasses. And they are forgiuen by that singular sacrifice.

39 They haue for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to be rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had bene excommunicate when they woulde be receiued againe to the communion, did ascertain the Church of their repentaunce. For there were ioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings and other things, whereby they might perswade men that they were truly and heartily weary of their former life, or rather blotte out the remembrance of their former doings: and so they were sayde to make satisfaction not to GOD, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these wordes in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that auncient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day vsed, tooke their beginning. Truly very vipers birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadowe of that better forme. I know that the olde writers do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I sayd euen now, I do not deny that parauenture they erred herein. But those things that were besprinkled with a few spots, when they are once handled with these mens vnwashed handes, are altogether defiled. And if we must contende with the authoritie of old writers: good God, what old writers do they thrust vnto vs? A good part of those wherewith Peter Lombarde their champion hath botched vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of y vnfaury dotages of certain monks that are carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine, and Chrysofome. As about this present question he taketh in a maner al out of Augustines booke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth in deede the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man being but meanelly learned, would vouchsafe to acknowledge for his. But Wheras I do not so narrowly examine their follies, lette the readers pardon me whome I would ease of that tediousnesse. For to me it should not be very laboursome, and yet very pausible to bewray to their great shame those things that they haue heretofore boasted vpon as mysteries, but because my purpose is to teach frutefully, therefore I passe them ouer.

Cap. 65. and is rehearsed in the Decrets, Cap. in actionibus de pœnit. distin. 1.

The v. Chapter.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatorie.

OVt of this doctrine of satisfactions do flowe indulgences or pardons. For they say that y which our power wanteth to make satisfactiō, is supplied by these pardons. And they runne so farte foorth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merites of Christ and of the martyres, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his bulles. But although they haue more neede of Helleborus to purge their frenlike braine, than argumentes to aunswere them, so that it is not much worthie the trauayle to stande vpon confuting such trifling errors, which are already shaken with many battelrammes, and of themselues growe into decayed age, and bend toward falling: yet because a short confutation of them shalbe profitable for some that be ignorant, I will not altogether omitte it. As for this that pardons haue so long stand safe, and haue so long bene vn-punished, hauing bene vsed with so outragious and furious licentiousnesse: this may serue to teach vs in howe darke a night of errors, men in certaine ages past haue bin drowned. They sawe themselues to be openly and vn-colouredly scorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainefull markets to be made made of the saluation of their soules, the price of saluation to be valued at a few pence, & nothing set out to be freely giuen: that by this colour they be wyped of offerings to be filthily spent vpon brothels, bawdes and banquetings, that the greatest blowers abroad of pardons are the greatest dispisers of them: that this monster doth daily more and more with greater licentiousnesse ouerrunne the world, and growe into outrage, and that there is no ende, new leade daily brought, and new mony gotten. Yet with hyc reuerence they receiued, they worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest sawe somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceits, whereby men might be beguiled with some profit. At the length, since the worlde suffred it selfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, and by litle and litle become frosen, till they vtterly vanish away.

2 But forasmuch as many that see the filthy gaminges, the deceites, theftes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners haue heretofore mocked & beguiled vs, yet see not the very fountain of vngodlines from whence they spring: it is good to shewe not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped from all spottes. They call the treasure of the church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principall custody of this barme (as I haue already touched) they faine to be deliuered to the bishop of Rome, that he should haue the distribution of so great giftes, that he might both giue them by himselfe, and also graunt iurisdiction to other to giue them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred dayes: from Bishops, pardons for fourty dayes. But they be (as I may naturally describe them) y^e profaning of the bloud of Christ, Satans mockery, to leade away the christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of saluation. For how could the bloud of Christ be more filthily prophaned, than when it is denied to suffice the remission of sinnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, vnlesse the want thereof as being withered and wasted, should be otherwise supplied and profited? The law and all the Prophets (saith Peter) beare witnessse of Christ, that by him forgiueneffe of sinne is to be receiued; Pardons giue remission of sinnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The bloud of Christ (sayth Iohn) cleanseth vs from sinne: Pardons do make the bloud of Martyrs the washing away of sins. Christ (sayth Paul) which knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that is, the satisfaction of sin, that wee might be made the righteousnesse of God in him: Pardons doe sette the satisfaction of sins in the bloud of Martyrs. Paul cryed out and testified to the Corinthians, that onely Christ was crucified and died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul and other died for vs. In another place he sayth that Christ purchased the church with his bloud: the pardons appoint an other price of purchase in the bloud of Martyrs. The Apostle sayth, that Christ with one oblation made perfect for euer them that were sanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrary and say, that sanctification is made perfect by the Martyrs, which otherwise were not sufficient. Iohn sayth that all the saintes washed their gownes in the bloud of the lambe: the pardons teach men to wash their gownes in bloud of saintes.

3 Leo Bishoppe of Rome, writeth notable wel to the Palestines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of manie saintes hath bene precious in the sight of the Lorde, yet the killing of no innocent hath bene the propitiation of the world. The righteous receiued, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithfull are grauen examples of patience, not giftes of righteoufnesse. For their deathes were euerie one singular to themselues, and none of them did by his ende pay the dette of an other, for asmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthie to bee remembered) he repeated in an other place. There can nothing bee required more plaine to destroye this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no lesse fidly to the same effect. Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the bloude of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiuenesse of sinnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that wee shoulde followe him, but hath giuen vs a thing to reioyce vpon. Againe in an other place, As onely the sonne of God was made the sonne of man, to make vs with him the sonnes of God; so he alone for vs hath taken vpon him punishment without euil deseruings, y we by him might without good deseruings obtaine grace not due vnto vs. Truly whereas al their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacrileges & blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselues, whether these be not their decrees y the Martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and deserued more, than was needful for themselues: and y they had remaining so great a plentie of deseruings, as did also ouerflow vnto other: and y therefore, least so great goodnesse should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, and of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission and satisfaction of sinnes. And that so is the saying of Paul to bee taken: I supplie in my bodie those thinges that want of the sufferings of Christ for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this else but to leaue Christ onely his name, otherwise to make him but a common petie saint, y may scarcely among the multitude be knowne from the rest: He onely, only should haue bene preached, he only set forth, he only named, he only ben looked vnto, when the obtaining of forgiuenesse of sin, satisfaction, and sanctification are entreated of: But let vs heare their curtalled arguments. Least the bloude of y Martyrs should be shed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefite of the Church. Is it so? was it no profite to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their bloude? by despising this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by their steadfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, & ouercome the stubbornnesse of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profite of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely be the propitiator, if hee onely dyed for our sinnes if he only was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might neuer thelesse haue obtained the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beddes. And whereas they haue fought euen to the shedding of their bloude, it woulde not agree with the iustice of God to leaue y same barren and fruitles. As though God could not tell how to encrease in his seruants their glorie, according to the measure of his giftes. But the Church receiueth in common together profite enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

4 But howe maliciously doe they wrest that place of Paul where hee saith, that hee supplieth in his bodie those thinges that wanted of the sufferings of Christ? for hee referreth not the default of supplying, to y^e worke of redemption, satisfaction, and expiation: but to those afflictions where-with all the members of Christ, that is to say, all the faithfull must be exercised so long as they shall be in this fleshe. He saith therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that hee dayly suffereth in his members the same that hee once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsafueth to doe vs so great honour, to reckon and accompt our afflictions his owne. Whereas Paul addeth these wordes, For the Church, hee meaneth not for y^e redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the Church, but for the edifying and profite of the Church. As in an other place he saith, that hee suffereth all thinges for the electes sake, that hee may obtaine the saluation which is in Christ Iesu. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that hee suffered all the troubles that hee suffred, for their comfort and saluation. And immediately in the same place expoundeth himselfe, when he saith further, that hee was made a minister of the Church, not for redemption, but according to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospel of Christ. If they yet require an other expositour, let them heare Augustine. The sufferings of Christ (saith hee) are in Christ onely as in the heade: & both in Christ and the Church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member saith, I supplic in my bodie that which wanteth in the sufferings of Christ. Therefore if thou what soeuer thou bee that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoeuer thou sufferest of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wanted in the sufferings of Christ. But wherevnto the sufferings of y^e Apostles taken for the Church of Christ doe tende, hee expoundeth in an other place where hee saith: Christ is to me the gate vnto you: because yee are the sheepe of Christ bought with his blood: acknowledging your price, which is not giuen of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth. As he hath giuen his soule, so ought wee to giue our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and to confirme faith. These are Augustine wordes. But God forbid, that Paul shoulde haue thought that any thing wanted in the sufferings of Christ, as concerning all fulnes of righteousnesse, saluation and life: or that hee meant to adde any thing therevnto, which so plainly and honorablie preacheth, that y^e abundance of grace was so largely powred out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it onely all the saintes haue bene saued, and not by the merite of their owne life or death, as Peter expressly testified: so that hee shoulde bee slanderous against God and Christ, that shoulde repose the worthines of any faint any where else than in the onely mercy of God. But why doe I tarie herevpon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doubtfull, sith the verie bewraying of such monstrous errours is a sufficient confutation of them?

5 Nowe (to passe ouer such abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose

enclose in lead and parchement the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the worde of the Gospel? Truly either the Gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospel, with all abundance of heavenly benefits, with all his merites, wth all his righteousnes, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deliuered to the ministers, wherby they might vse this forme of message, as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: we beseech you, be ye so reconciled to God. Hee hath made him that knewe no sinne, to be made sinne for vs, that wee might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. And the faithfull knowe of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offered vs to be enjoyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardons do bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, and fasten it to lead, parchement, yea and to a certaine place, and seuer it from the word of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to haue proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all coulde beare, they which felt themselues aboute measure oppressed with penance enjoyned them, required of the church a release. The mitigation that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardone. But when they turned satisfactions from the Church to God, and said that they were recompenses wherby men may redeeme themselues from the iudgement of God, then they therewithal did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatorie remedies, to deliuer vs from deserued punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can haue no colour at al.

6 Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed down, & ouerthrowen from the very foundations. For I do not agree to some men, y^e think best to dissemble in this point, & make no mention at all of Purgatorie, wherupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my selfe would also think such trifles worthie to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatorie is builded of many blasphemies, & is daily vpholden with newe blasphemies, & raiseth vp many & grieuous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This paradventure might after a sort haue bene dissembled for a time, that it was inuented by curious and bold rashnes without the worde of God: that men beleueed of it by I wot not what reuelations, fained by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lorde giueth not leaue to mans presumptuousnes so to breake into the secret places of his iudgements, and hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for trueth at dead men, neglecting his worde, and permitteth not his worde to be so vnreuerently defiled. But let vs graunt, that all those thinges might for a while haue bene borne with, as thinges of no great importance. But when the cleansing of finnes is sought else where than in the bloude of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is moste perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must crie out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throate and sides: that Purgatorie is the damnable deuise of Sathan, that it maketh void the Croffe of Christ, that it layeth an intollerable slander vpon the mercie of God, that it feebleth and ouerthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that ouerthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediatly ouerthrowen by the verie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfaction, propitiatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the finnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that purgatorie is a mere & horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe ouer the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the saame spring of vngodlinesse.

7 But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they haue falsely & wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lorde affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost shoulde not bee forgien in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he sheweth that there is a forgienesse of some finnes in the worlde to come. But who seeth not that the Lorde there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Nowe if it be so, what is that to their purgatorie, forasmuch as by their opinion the paine is there suffred of those finnes, wherof they deny not the fault to be forgien in this present life? But y they may no more carp against vs, they shal haue yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon from so hainous wickednesse, he thought it not ynough to say that it should neuer be forgien: but the more to amplify it, he vsed a diuision, wherin he comprehended both the iudgement y euery mans conscience feeleth in this life, & the last iudgement y shalbe openly pronounced at the resurrection: as though hee should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of most present damnation. For he that of set purpose shal endeouour to quench the light of y holy Ghost, shal not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to sinners for their conuersion, nor in the last day when the lambs shalbe seuered by the Angels of God from the goates, & the kingdome of heauen shalbe clensted from all offences. Then they bring forth y parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine aduersarie, least he deliuer thee to the Iudge, & the Iudge to the Sargeant, & the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, vntil thou hast payed the vtermost farthing. If in this place y iudge do signifie God, & the aduersarie plaintife the Diuel, the Sargeant the Angel, & the prison purgatorie, I wil gladly yeld vnto them. But if it be euident to all men, y Christ meant there to shewe into howe many daungers & mischieues they cast themselues, that had rather obstinately pursue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equitie & good right, to the end to exhort his disciples the more earnestly to agreement with equitie: where then I pray you shal Purgatorie be found?

8 They fetch an argument out of the saying of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heauen, earth & hels, shall bowe to Christ. For they take it as confessed, that hels cannot there be meant of those that are adjudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatorie. They did not reason verie euill, if the

Apostle did by kneeling meane the true godly worshipping . But sith hee reacheth only, that there is a dominion giuen to Christ, wherby all creatures are to be subdued, what prooffe is there to the contrary , but that we may by hels vnderstande the Deuils , that shalbe brought before the iudgement of God, to acknowledge him their iudge with feare & trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expoundeth the same prophecy in another place. All (sayeth he) Rom. 13. 10. shalbe brought before the iudgement seat of Christ. For it is written: So truly as I liue, euery knee shall bowe to me. &c. But we may not so expounde that which is in the Reuelation : I haue heard al creatures, both these things that are in heauen, and those that are vpon the earth, & these that are vnder the earth, and those that are in the sea, and all those y^e are in them, I haue heard them al say to him that sitteth on the Throne and to the Lambe, Blessing, & honor, and glory, & power, for euer & euer. That I do in deede easily grant, but what creatures doe they thinke to be here rehearsed? For it is most certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reason and without sense. Whereby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the partes of the world, from the hiest top of the heauens, to the very middle point of the earth, do in their maner declare y^e glory of their creator. As for that which they alleage out of the hystory of the Machabees, I will not vouchsafe to answer it, least I should seem to reckon that work in the number of the holy books . But Augustine receiued it for Canonical. But first, of what sure credit did he receiue it? The Iewes (saith he) esteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they do the lawe , the Prophetes and the Psalmes , of which the Lorde himselfe hath witnessed as of his witnesses , saying : It was necessarie, that al thinges should be fulfilled that are written in the lawe, and the Psalmes , and Prophetes concerning me. But it hath bin receiued of the Church not vnprofitably, if it be soberly read or heard. And Hierom teacheth without any doubting that the authority thereof is of no force to prouing of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that olde booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creede, that it had no place at all in the olde Church. But why do I here striue without cause ? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, when in y^e end he craueth pardon, if he haue spoken any thing not well. Truly he that confesseth his writings to neede pardon , sayth playnely that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost . Beside that, the godlinesse of Iudas is prayed for none other cause , but for that hee had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem . Neither doeth the wryter of that hystorie referre that which Iudas did to bee a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithfull, that had dyed for their country and religion. This doing was indeede not without superstition and preposterous zeale , but they are more than fooles, that drawe a sacrifice of the lawe so farre as vnto vs : forasmuch as we knowe that thinges do cease by the comming of Christ , that then were in vse.

9 But they haue an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which can not so easily be battered . If any man (sayth he) builde vpon this foundation, gold, siluer, precious stones, timber, heye, stubble , the Lord shall shewe euery mans worke

what it is: because it shalbe reuealed in fire, & the fire shall trie euery mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it shal suffer losse, but he shalbe safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of Purgatorie? by which the filthinesse of sinne are clenfed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdome of God? But the most part of the olde writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the crosse, by which the Lorde trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filthines of the flesh: & that is much more probable, than in faining purgatorie. Albeit I do neither agree with these men, because I thinke I haue attained a certaine and much plainer vnderstanding of that place. But before y I vtter it, I would haue them answere me, whether the Apostles and all the saintes must haue gone through this fire of Purgatorie? I knowe they will say, nay. For it were too much inconuenient that they must haue needed to be purged, whose merites they dreame to ouerflow aboue measure to all the members of the church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doeth not say y the worke of some shalbe proued, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argument, but Augustines, which so confuteth that exposition. And (which is more absurditie) he doth not say, that they shal passe through the fire for all works: but if they haue faithfully builded the church, they shall receiue reward when their worke is examined with fire. First we see that the Apostle vsed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines inuented by mans braines, wood, hey, & stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant rescue: that as wood so soone as it is put in the fire, consumeth & wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant y such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to followe the true cause of his metaphore, & match the partes together with iust relation, hee called the triall of the holy Ghost, fire. For euen as the neerer that gold and siluer are put to the fire, so much the surer prooffe they haue of their goodnes & finenesse: so the Lords trueth, the more exactly it is weyed with spirituall examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiuet. As hey, wood, & stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudden consuming, so the inuentions of men not stablished by the worde of God, cannot beare y triall of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fal away & perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and stubble, because like wood, hey, and stubble, they are burned with fire & destroyed: but they are not destroyed or driuen away but by y spirit of the Lord: it followeth y the holy Ghost is the fire wherewith they shalbe proued, whose prooffe Paul, according to y common vse of the Scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called y day of the Lord, whensoever he doeth any way shewe his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his trueth shineth vpon vs. Nowe haue we proued, that Paul meneth no other fire, but the trial of y holy ghost. But how are they saued by y fire, y suffer losse of their work? That shal not be hard to vnderstand, if we consider of what kind of men he speaketh. For he toucheth those builders of the church, that keeping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swariung from the chief & necessary articles of faith, do erre in points that be smaller and lesse perillous, mingling their owne deuises with the worde of God. Such I say, must suffer losse of their worke, hauing their deuises destroyed. But themselves are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance & error is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore, whosoever haue defiled the golden finesse of Gods word with this dong of purgatorie, they must needs suffer losse of their worke.

10 But they wil say, it hath beene an ancient vsage of the church. Paul answered this obiection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where he saith, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the church, doe lay any thing vpon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therefore when the aduersaries object against me, that it hath bene vsed aboue a thousand & three hundred yeares, to haue prayers made for the dead: I aske them againe, by what word of God, by what Reuelation, by what example it was done. For here they doe not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also all y^e examples of holy men that there are red, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning & order of funerals there are sometimes found many & long tales: but of prayers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue bene expressly spoken. But the very olde fathers themselves that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commandement of God, & lawful example. Why then durst they so do? In this I say, they did suffer somewhat as men: & therefore I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawn into example. For where as the faithful ought to enterprise the doing of nothing, but vpon assured conscience, as Paul teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieue their sorrowe: and it seemed vnnatural not to shewe before God some testimonie of their loue toward the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also y^e received custome was like a burning brand to set many mens mindes on fier. We know that with all nations & in all ages there were funerals done for the dead, & their soules yerely purged. For though Sathan beguiled foolish men with these deceits: yet he tooke occasion so to begile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but that euen very superstition condemneth y^e Gentiles before the iudgement seat of God, for neglecting the care of y^e life to come, which they professed themselves to belecue. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were vtterly destroyed. Hereupon came y^e ill aduised diligence: because if they were slowe in looking to the funerals, in bankettings and offerings, they thought that they had put themselves in danger of a great reproche. And that which first proceeded from a wrongful following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the principall holinesse of Papistrie, to helpe the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministreth another much better & perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lorde. And it addeth a reason: because from thenceforth they rest from their labours. And we ought not so much tenderly to followe our owne affection of loue, to set

vp a wrongful maner of praying in the church. Truly he y^e hath but meane wisdom, doth soone perceiue that all that is red hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vsage, & the ignorance of the people. They themselues also, I grant, were caried away into errour euen as vnadvised lightnes of beliefe is wont to rob mens wits of iudgement. But in y^e meane time the verie reading of them doth shew, howe doutingly they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that she might be remembered in celebrating the ministeries at the Altar. An old wifes request, which the sonne neuer exanuned by the rule of the Scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doutings, that of right it ought with the coldnes therof to quench the heate of a foolish zeale: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truly with cold likelihoodes it will bring them out of care that were before careful. For this is one piller of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growen in vse, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I grant to the old writers of the church, y^e it is a charitable vse to help the dead: yet wee must still hold one rule which cannot deceiue: that it is not lawfull for vs in our prayers to vse any thing of our own, but our requestes must be made subiect to the worde of God: because it is in his wil to appoint what he wil haue to be asked. Now where as the whole law and the Gospel do not so much as in one syllable giue libertie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inuocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they haue the ancient church companion of their errour: I say there is great difference betweene them & it. They vsed a memoriall of the dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse y^e they doubted of their state. As for purgatory, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing vncertaine. These men require to haue y^e which they haue dreamed of purgatorie, to be holden w^out question for an article of faith. They slenderly & only to passe it lightly ouer, did in the communion of the holy supper commend their dead to God: These do continually call vpon the care of the dead, & with importunate praising it, do make it to be preferred aboue all dutiful works of charitie. Yea, and it were not hard for vs to bring forth some testimonies of the old writers, y^e do manifestly ouerthrow all those prayers for the dead, which then were vsed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men looke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glorie, and that euery man then receiue the rest that followeth after death, if he be worthe when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that all the godly do immediatly after death enioy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you, shal our prayers auaille them? I passe ouer the grosser superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the mindes of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most parte so monstrous, that they can haue no honest coulour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthie byings and sellings that they haue vsed, while the worlde was in such grosse senselesse ignorance. For both I shoulde neuer make an ende, and also the readers shall without any rehearfall of them, haue here sufficient, whereupon they may stablish their consciences.

The vj. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first by what arguments the Scripture exhorteeth vs therunto.

WE haue already sayde, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth, is that in the life of the faithfull there should appeare an agreement and consent betwene the righteousness of GOD and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his lawe containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of GOD is restored in vs, yet because our dulnesse hath neede both of many prickings forward and helpes, therefore it shall be profitable to gather out of diuerse places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that haue a desirous minde of amending, may not wander out of the way in their endeuour. Nowe when I take vpon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifold and plenteous argument, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fil a long volume, if I would absolutely entreat of it in al points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of olde writers, made onely euery one of one seuerall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For what so euer vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plentie of matter, that a man can not seeme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse he haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teache, as peculiarly to goe through euery speciall vertue, and wander abroad into exhortations. Lette such thinges be fetched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homelies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shewe an orderly trade, whereby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to appoint out a certaine vniuersal rule, by which he may well trie what be his duties. There shall paradventure at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe. I doe naturally loue shortnesse, and paradventure if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with mee. And if a longer manner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue minde to put it in proofe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as greate shortenesse as I may. As the Phylosophers haue their certaine endes of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the companie of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Phylosophers orders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vaine-glorious men) haue diligently endeouored to attaine an exquisite plainenes of order, to shewe forth the ready aptnesse of their witte. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affectation, hath not so exactly

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly vpon two partes. The first, that there be powred & brought into our mindes a loue of righteousness, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing enclined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousness. In commendation of righteousness it hath both very many and very good reasons: of which we haue herebefore in diuerse places spoken of some, and other some we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better beginne, than when it putteth vs in minde that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sheepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathered vs together againe, to ioyne vs in one flocke with himselfe. When we heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holinesse must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleaue vnto him, that being endued with his holinesse, we may followe whither he calleth) but because it greatly perreineth to his glory, that he haue no felowshippe with wickednesse and vncleannesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the ende of our calling, which we ought alway to haue respect vnto, if we will answere God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawn out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the worlde, if we giue our selues leaue all our life long to wallowe in them still? Moreouer it also admonisheth vs that to the end we may be reckned among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy city Hierusalem. Which as he hath halowed to himselfe, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholily profaned by the vncleannesse of the inhabitantes. From hence came these sayings, that they shall haue a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and study to followe righteousness, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, shoulde bee like a stable ful of filthinesse.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in his Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would haue vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophic concerning manners, is in them onely orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should liue agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true welspring, when it not onely teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whome it is bonde: but also when she hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true originall and state of our creation, shee immediatly addeth, that Christ by whome wee came againe into fauour with God, it set before vs for an example, that we should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectually then this one thing? Yea what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lorde hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life should resemble Christ the bonde of our adoption: if wee doe not giue and auowe our selues to righteouſnes, wee doe not onely with moſt wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creatour, but alſo we forſweare him to be our ſauour. Then the ſcripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of G O D, which ſhee rehearſeth vnto vs, and all the partes of our ſaluation. And ſheweth that ſith God hath ſhewed himſelfe a father vnto vs, we are worthie to be condemned of extreme vnthankfulneſſe, if we doe not likewise in our behalfe ſhewe our ſelues children vnto him. Sith Chriſt hath cleaſed vs with the waſhing of his bloode, and hath made vs partakers of this cleaſing by baptiſme, it is not ſeemely that wee ſhould be spotted with new filthineſſe. Sith he hath graſſed vs into his bodie, we muſt carefully take heede that we ſprinckle not any ſpot or blot vpon vs that are his members. Sith he himſelfe that is our heade, is aſcended into heauen, it behooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we do with all our heart aſpire to heauenwarde: Sith the holy Ghoſt hath dedicated vs temples to God, we muſt indeuour that Gods glorie may bee honourable ſet out by vs, and muſt not doe any thing whereby we may bee prophaned with filthines of ſinne: Sith both our ſoule and our bodie are ordeined to heauenly incorruption and an vnperishing crowne, we muſt diligently trauele, that the ſame may be kept pure and vncorruptd vnto the day of y Lord. Theſe (I ſay) be the beſt layde foundations to builde a mans life, and ſuch as the like are not to bee founde among the Phyloſophers, which in commendation of vertue do neuer climbe aboute the naturall dignitie of man.

4 And here is a fit place to ſpeake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Chriſt, yet woulde be named Chriſtians. But with what face doe they boaſt of his holy name: ſith none haue any fellowſhip with Chriſt, but they that haue receiued a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Goſpell? But the Apoſtle ſaith, that al they haue not rightly learned Chriſt, that are not taught that they muſt caſt away the old man which is corrupted according to the deſire of error, and haue not put on Chriſt. Therefore it is prooued that they falſely, yea and wrongfully pre-tende the knowledge of Chriſt, although they can eloquently and roundly talke of the Goſpell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceited as other learnings be, with onely vnderſtanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it poſſeſſeth the whole ſoule, and findeth a ſeate and place to holde it in the moſt inward affection of y hart. Therefore either let them ceaſe, to the ſlauder of God, to boaſt of that which they are not, or let them ſhewe themſelues not vnworthie ſchoolers for Chriſt their maiſter. Wee haue giuen the firſt place to the doctrine wherein our religion is contained, becauſe our ſaluation beginneth at it: but the ſame muſt bee powred into our heart, and paſſe into our manners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Phyloſophers doe iuſtly chaſe againſt them, and doe with ſhamefull reproche driue them from their companie, that profeſſing an arte that ought to be ſchoolemaſters of life, doe turne it into a Sophiſticall babbling: with howe much better reaſon ſhall wee deteſt theſe trifling Sophiſters, that are contented to role the Goſpell vpon the toppe of their tongues, the effectuall working whereof ought to pearce into the innermoſt affections of the hart, to rest in the soule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortations of Phylosophers?

5 Yet doe I not require that the manners of a Christian man sauour of nothing but the absolute Gospell: which neuerthelſſe both were to bee wiſhed and we muſt indeuour vs toward it. But I do not ſo ſeuèrly require a goſpellike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a Christian y^e hath not yet attained vnto it. For ſo ſhould all men be excluded from the church, ſith there is no man founde that is not by a great ſpace diſtant from it, and manie haue hitherto but a litle way proceeded towarde it, who yet ſhoulde be vniuſtly caſt away. What then? let that bee ſet for the marke before our eyes, to which alone all our endeuour may be directed. Let that bee appointed the goale for vs to run and trauell vnto. For it is not lawefull for thee ſo to make partition with God, to take vpon thee part of theſe things that are commaunded thee in his worde, and to leaue part at thine owne choiſe. For firſt of all he euerywhere commendeth integritie as the cheefe part of worſhipping him; by which worde he meaneth a pure ſimplicite of minde that is without all deceitfull colour and faining: againſt which a double heart is ſet as contrarie: as if it ſhoulde be ſaid, that the beginning of liuing vprightly is ſpirituall, when the inward affection of the mind is without faining dedicate to God to obſerue holineſſe and righteouſneſſe. But becauſe no man in this earthly priſon of the bodie hath ſo great ſtrength to haſt with ſuch freſhneſſe of running, as he perfectly ought to doe, and the greater number are ſo feeble, that with ſtaggering and halting, yea and creeping vpon the ground, they auance but ſlowly forward. Let vs euerie one goe according to the meaſure of his litle power, and proceede on our iourney begon. No man ſhal go ſo vntowardly, but he ſhal euery day get ſome ground, though it be but litle. Therefore let vs not ceaſe to trauel ſo, that we may continually proceed ſomewhat in the way of the Lorde. And let vs not deſpeire vpon the ſlenderneſſe of our going forward, for howſoeuer the ſucceſſe anſwere not our deſire, yet we haue not loſt our labour when this day paſſeth yeſterday; ſo that with pure ſimplicite we looke vnto our marke, and long towarde the ende of our courſe, not ſoothingly flattering our ſelues, nor tenderly bearing with our owne euils, but with continual endeuour trauelling to this, that wee may ſtill become better than our ſelues, til we attaine to goodneſſe it ſelſe: which indeed we ſeek for and ſolow all our life long; but we ſhal then only attaine it, when being vncllothed of the weakenes of the fleſh, we ſhal be receiued into the full fellowſhip thereof.

The vij. Chapter.

The ſumme of a Chriſtian life: where in is untreated of the forſaking of our ſelues.

Albeit that the law of the Lorde haue a moſt aptly well diſpoſed order to frame a mans life, yet it ſeemed good to the heauenly ſchoolemaſter to inſtruct men yet with a more exact trade to the ſame rule y^e hee had ſet forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the duty of y^e faithfull to yeld there bodies to God a liuing, holy and acceptable ſacrifice vnto him; and that therein ſtandeth the true worſhipping of him. Here-

vpon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they do not apply themselves to the fashion of this worlde, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may prooue what the will of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we shoulde from thence forth thinke, speake, imagine, or doe nothing but to his glorie. For the thing that is consecrate, can not be applied to vnholly vses, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our owne, but the Lords, it appeareth what errour is to be auoided, and wherevnto all the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the ende for vs to tend vnto, to seeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selues and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs liue and die to him. Wee are Gods: therefore let his wisdom and will gouerne all our doings. Wee are Gods: therefore let all the partes of our life tend toward him as their onely lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from him selfe the rule and gouernment of himselfe to giue it to God? For as this is the most strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey themselves: so it is the onely haue of safetie, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but onely to followe God going before him. Let this therefore be the first steppe, that man depart from him selfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not onely that which standeth in obedience of the worde, but y^e whereby the minde of man, voide from his owne sensualitic of flesh, bendeth selfe wholly to the will of Gods spirite. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the minde) whereas it is the first entrie into life, all the Phylosophers were ignoraunt. For they make onely Reason the gouernesse of man: they thinke she onely ought to be heard: finally to her onely they greue & assigne the rule of maners. But the Christian Phylosophie biddeth her to giue place, and to yelde and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man now may not liue himselfe, but beare Christ liuing and reigning in him.

Rom. 14. 8.

Eph. 4. 23.

Gala. 1. 20.

2 Herevpon followeth also this other pointe, that wee seeke not the things that be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lorde, and that make to the aduancement of his glory. This is also a profe of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our selues, & altogether leauing the regard of our selues, we trauell to employ our study to God & his commandments. For when the scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuie regard of our selues, it doth not only race out of our minds y^e couetousnes of hauing, the greedy seeking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glorie, and other more secrete pestilences. Truly a Christian man must be so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to doe with God. In this sort, as hee shall examine all his doings by Gods will and iudgement: so hee shall reuently direct vnto him al the earnestly bent diligence of his mind. For hee that hath learned to looke vpon God in all things that hee hath to doe, is therewithall turned away from all vaine thoughtes. This is that forsaking of our selues, selues, which Christ euen frō their first beginning of instruction so earnestly gaue in charge to his Disciples: which when it once hath gotten possession in y heart leauerh no place at al, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulnesse, nor vaine glorious boasting, then neither for couetise, nor filthie lust, nor riotousnesse, nor deintinesse, nor for other euils that are engendered of the loue of our selues. Contrariwise, wheresocuer it reigneth not, there either most filthie vices doe rage without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glorie. For shewe me a man, if thou canst, that vnlesse he haue forsaken himselfe according to the commaundement of the Lorde, will of his owne free will vse goodnesse amonge men. For all they that haue not bene possessed with this feeling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at the least for praises sake. And all the Phylosophers that euer most of all affirmed that vertue was to be desired for it selves sake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appeared y they desired vertue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proude vpon. But God is so nothing at all delited, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beastes, that hee pronounceth that they haue already receiued their rewarde in the worlde, and maketh harlottes and publicanes neerer to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet wee haue not thoroughly declared with howe many and how great stoppes man is hindred from that which is right, so long as hee hath not forsaken him selfe. For it was truely saide in times past, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the soule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leauing regarde of thy selfe, to bende thy minde to seeke those thinges that the Lorde requireth of thee, and to seeke them therefore onely because they please him.

3 In an other place the same Paul doth more plainly, although shortly, goe through all the parts of a well ordered life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth saluation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that wee shoulde denie all vngodlinesse, and worldly lustes, and that we should liue sober minded, rightcoulsly and godly in this present worlde, looking for for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mightie G O D, and of our Sauour Iesus Christ, which gaue himselfe for vs to redeme vs from all vnrightcoulnesse, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himselfe feruently giuen vnto good workes. For after that hee hath set forth the grace of God to encourage them, to make readie the waye for vs to worshippe God, he taketh away two stoppes that doe most hinder vs, that is to say, vngodlinesse, whereunto we are naturally too much inclined, and Worldly desires, which extende further. And vnder the name of vngodlinesse, he not onely meaneth superstitions, but also comprehendeth all that disagreeeth with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lustes are in effecte as much as the affections of the fleshe. Therefore hee commaundeth vs in respect of both the tables of the lawe, to put off our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life hee bringeth into three partes, sobrietie, rightcoulnesse, & godlines: of the which sobrietie without doubt signifieth as wel chastitie and temperance, as a pure and measurable sparing vse of temporall thinges, and a patient sufferance of pouertie . Righteousnesse containeth all the duties of equitie, to giue euery man his owne . The third is Godlinesse, that seuereth vs from the defilinges of the worlde, and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfection . But forasmuch as nothing is more heard, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to giue our selues to GOD and our brethren, & to study for an angelike life in the filthy state of this earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth vs backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to striue in vaine. because as Christ hath once appeared the redeemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the fruit of the saluation that he hath purchased . And thus he driueth away the entisementes that blinde vs, & make vs not to aspire as we ought to the heavenly glorie: yea & he teacheth that we must trauaill as men being from home in this worlde, that the heavenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

4 Now in these wordes we perceiue, that the forsaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For wheras the scripture biddeth vs so to behaue our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that we faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it greueth such commandements as our mind is not able to receiue, but first being made voyde of naturall sense. For (with such blindenesse wee runne all into loue of our selues) euery man thinketh himselfe to haue a iust cause to aduance himselfe, and to dispise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God haue giuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold thereof, we list vpon our courage, and not onely swell, but in a manner burst with pride . The vices wherwith we abound, we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues . And if the same good gifts, which we prayse in our selues, or better do appeare in other, least we should be compelled to giue place to them, we do with our eniuousnesse deface them and finde faulte with them . If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented seuerely and sharpely to marke it, but wee also odiously amplifie it. Hereupon groweth that insolence, that euery one of vs, as though he were priuileged from the common estate, would be hier than the rest, and carelesly and proudly set light by euery man, or despise them as inferiours . The poore yeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, seruants to their masters, vnlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doeth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie . So euery man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his brest . For presumptuously taking vpon them somewhat whereby to please themselues, they iudge vpon the wittes and manners of other men . But if they come to contention, there bursteth out their poyson . For many doe make a shewe of great meekenesse, so long as they finde all thinges gentle and louely: but howe many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is pricked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedy hereof, but that the most hurtful pestilence of loue, of soueraigntie and selfeloue be rooted out of the bottome of their hartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of

of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that wee must remember that the good giftes that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good thinges, but the free giftes of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their owne vnthankfulnesse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul sayth, if thou hast receiued all thinges, why doest thou boast as if they were not giuen thee? Then, that wee must with continuall reknowledging of our faultes, call our selues backe to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there shalbe much matter to abace our selues. Againe, wee are commanded, whatsoeuer giftes of God we see in other men, so to reuerence and esteeme those giftes, that we also honour those men in whom they be. For it were a great leudnesse for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchsafed to giue them. As for their faultes, wee are taught to winke at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that we shoulde not by reason of those faultes triumphe against them, to whome wee ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man so euer wee haue to doe, we shal behaue our selues not onely temperately and modestly, but also gently and friendely. As a man shall neuer come any other way to true meekenesse, but if he haue a heart endued with abacing of himselfe, and reuerencing of other.

5 Now how hard is it, for thee to do thy dutie in seeking the profite of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herein labour in vaine, vnlesse thou depart from regarde of thy selfe, and in a maner put of thy selfe. For how canst thou performe these thinges that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnlesse thou forsake thy selfe, to giue thy selfe wholly to other? Charitie (sayth he) is patient and gentle, not proude, not disdainfull, enuieth not, swelleth not, seeketh not her owne, is not angry, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seeke not the thinges that are our owne, we shall doe no small violence to nature, which so bendeth vs to the onely loue of our selues, that it doeth not easily suffer vs negligently to passe ouer our selues and our own thinges, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to an other. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hande, warneth vs that what so euer gracious giftes we obtaine of the Lord, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they shold be bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true vse of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuised for the keeping of the same, than when we be taught that all the good giftes that we haue, are thinges of G O D deliuered, committed to our trust vpon this conditio, that they shoulde be disposed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans bodie are endued. No member hath his power for himselfe, nor applyeth it to his priuate vse: but poureth it abroad into the other members of the same body, and taketh no profit thereof, but such as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatsoeuer a godly man is able to doe, hee ought to be able to do it for his brethren, in prouiding none otherwise priuately for himselfe, but so that his minde be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoeuer God hath bestowed vpon vs, whereby wee may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailies thereof, and bounde to render accompr of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So shall it come to passe, that we shall alway not onely ioyne the trauell for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that we shoulde not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the giftes that wee receiue of God, he hath in y^e old time set the same lawe euen in the smallest giftes of his liberalitie. For he commaunded the first frutes of corne to be offered vnto him, by which the people might testifie that it was vnlawfull for them to take any fruite of the goods that were not first consecrate to him. If the giftes of God be so only then sanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our owne hande dedicated them to the authour thereof, it is euident that it is an vntrue abuse thereof that doeth not sauour of such dedication. But it shall bee vaine for thee to goe about to enrich the Lord with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore sith thy liberalitie can not extende vnto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must vse it toward his saints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may nowe be correspondent to these of the law.

Heb. 13. 16.

6. But that wee shoulde not be wearie with doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adioyned which the Apostle speaketh of, that charitie is patient and not moued to anger. The Lorde commaundeth to doe good to all vniuersally, of wh^o a great part are most vnworthie, if they be considered by their owne deseruing. But here the scripture helpeth with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we must not haue respect what men deserue of them selues, but that y^e image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honour and loue. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the householde of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed and restored by the spirit of Christ. Therefore whatsoeuer man thou light vpon, that needeth thy helpe, thou hast no cause to withdrawe thy selfe from doing him good. If thou saye that hee is a 'straunger: but the Lorde hath giuen him a marke, that ought to bee familiar vnto thee. by the reason that hee forbiddeth thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that he is base and naught worth: but y^e Lord sheweth him to be such a one, to wh^o he hath vouchsafed to giue y^e beautie of his image. If thou say y^e thou owest him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place in respect of whome, thou knowest so many and so great benefites wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou say that he is vnworthie that thou shouldest labour anie thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended to thee, is worthie that thou shouldest giue thy selfe and all that thou hast vnto it. But if he haue not onely deserued no good at thy hand, but also prouoked thee with wronges and euill doings: euen this is no iust cause why thou shouldest cease both to loue him and to doe for him the ductifull workes of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath farre otherwise deserued of me. But what hath the Lorde deserued? Which when he commaundeth thee thee to forgiue all wherein hee hath offended thee, truly he willett the same to bee inputed to him selfe. Truly this is that onely waye to come to that which is vtterly againste the nature of man, much more is it harde for man. I meane, to loue them that hate vs, to recompence euill with doing good, to render blessings for reproches: if wee remember that wee must not consider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faults, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to imbrace it.

7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when we performe the dueties of charitie. But it is not he that performeth them, that onely doeth all the duetifull workes of charitie, although hee leaue none of them vndone, but he that doeth them of a syncere affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to all men all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outward dueties: and yet he may bee farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that woulde seeme verie liberall, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnesse of wordes they vpbraide it. And wee be come to such wretchednesse in this vnhappie worlde, that almost no almes are giuen of anie men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproching. Which peruerfnesse shoulde not haue bene tollerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required than to shewe a cherefulness in countenance, and make their doinges louely with gentlenesse of wordes. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whome they see to neede their helpe, and then so pitie their case, as if themselues did feele and suffer it: so that they may be caried with feeling of mercie and gentlenesse euen as they would be to helpe themselues. Hee that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, will not onely not defile his doings with any arrogance or vpbraiding, but also neither will dispise his brother to whome hee doeth good as one needing his helpe, nor tread him vnder foot as one bound vnto him: no more than we vse to reproch a sicke member, for easing wherof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it specially bounde to the other members, because it hath drawen more helpe vnto it than it hath recompensed. For it is thought that the common interparting of dueties betweene members of one bodie, hath no free kinde of gifte, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the lawe of nature it were monstros to deny. And by this reason it shall followe, that hee may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of ductie, as it is commonly vsed, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, hee leaucth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euerie man shall thinke thus with himselfe, that hee is altogether detter to his neighbours, and that hee must determine none other ende of vsing his liberalitie, but when abilitie fayleth, which howe large soeuer it bee, must bee measured by the rule of charitie.

8 Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall parte of forsaking our selues, which wee saide to haue respect to God. Wee haue sayde much of it already, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall be sufficient to entreate of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and sufferance. First therefore in seeking the commodity or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lords will, we should yeeld vnto him the affections of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To couet wealth and honors, to compasse authoritie, to heape vp riches, to gather together all such follies as serue for royaltie & pompe, our lust is outragious, and our greedinesse infinite. On the other side of pouertie, ignobilitie, and base estate, wee haue a maruiculous feare and maruiculous hatred, that moue vs to traucile by all meanes to eschue them. Hercby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they haue, how many shiftes they attempt, with what studies they wearie their life, that frame their life after their owne deuise: to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or couetousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape pouertie & basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lorde: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselues vpon it.

For howsoeuer the flesh thinke it selfe sufficient of her selfe, when shee either trauaileth by her owne diligence, or endeuoureth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the fauour of men, to the attaining of honor & wealth: yet it is certaine, y al these things are nothing, & that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauaile, but in so much as the Lord shal prosper both. But on the other side his only blessing findeth a way through all stops, to make all things proceede with vs to a ioyful & luckie end. Then howsoeuer wee may most of all obtaine any glorie or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heaps of great honors & richesse) yet for as much as they vpon whom resteth the curse, do feele no parcel of felicitie, wee can obtaine nothing without his blessing y shal not turne vs to cuil. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

9 Therefore if we belecue that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamitie must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that wee do not greedily endeuour to wealth and honors standing vpon our owne finenesse of wit or diligence, not leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that wee alway looke vnto the Lord, to be led by his guiding to whatsoeuer lot he hath prouided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of richesse and inuading of honours, by wrong, by guile and euill craftie meanes, or extortion with doing iniurie to our neighbours, but shall onely followe those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hepe for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other suttile meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doeth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whome it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt doinges. Then wee shalbe bridled that wee burne not with vnmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that hee desireth against his worde? For God forbid that God shoulde giue the helpe of his bleſſing to that which he curſeth with his owne mouth. Laſt of all, if it ſucceede not according to our wiſh & hope, yet wee ſhalbe reſtrained from impatience, and from curſing our eſtate whatſoever it be: becauſe wee knowe that that is to murmure againſt God, at whoſe will richesse and pouertie, baſeneſſe and honours are diſpoſed. Briefely, he that reſteth himſelfe in ſuch ſort as is aforeſaide vpon the bleſſing of God, neither will by euill ſutures hunt for thoſe things that men are wont outragiouſly to couer, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he ſhall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen proſperouſly will inpute it to himſelfe, and to his owne diligence, endeuour or to fortune, but will aſſigne it to God the authour. But if while other mens eſtates do flouriſh, he go but ſlenderly forward, yea or ſlide backward, yet he wil beare his ill fortune with greater quietneſſe and moderation of minde, than a prophane man wil beare a meanly good ſucceſſe, which is not altogether ſo good as he deſired: becauſe he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly reſt, than vpon the hieſt toppe of wealth and authoritie: becauſe he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is auailable for his ſaluation. So we ſee that Dauid was minded, and yeldeth himſelfe to bee ruled by G O D, he declareth himſelfe to bee like to a weined childe, and that hee walketh not in high things or maruiculous aboute himſelfe.

10 And the godly mindes ought to haue that quietneſſe & ſufferance not onely conſiſting in this behalfe: but alſo it muſt extend to all chances whereunto our preſent life is ſubiect. Therefore no man hath rightly forſaken himſelfe, but he hath ſo reſigned himſelfe vp wholly to the Lord, that he ſuffreth all the partes of his life to be governed by his will. He that is ſo framed in minde, whatſoever happen, will neither thinke himſelfe miſerable, nor will with enuiouſneſſe againſt God complaine of his fortune. Howe neceſſarie this affection is, ſhal hereby appeare, if you conſider to how many chances we be ſubiect. Diuerſe kindes of diſeaſes do trouble vs, ſometime the peſtilence cruelly reigneth, ſometime wee are ſharply vexed with calamities of warre, ſometime froſt or haile deuouring the hope of the yere, bringeth barrenneſſe, that driueth vs to dearth: ſometime our wiſe, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our houſe is conſumed with fire: theſe be the things at chancing whereof men curſe their life, deteſt the day of their birth, haue heauen & light in execration, murmure againſt god, and (as they be eloquent in blaſphemies) accuſe him of vniuſtice & crueltie. But a faithfull man muſt euen in theſe chances beholde the mercifull kindeſſe and fatherly tenderneſſe of God. Therefore whether he ſee his houſe deſtroyed, his kinsfolke ſlaine, yet he wil not therefore ceaſe to praiſe God, but rather will turne himſelfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lord that dwelleth in my houſe, will not leaue it deſolate. Or if when his corne is blaſted or bitten, or conſumed with froſtes, or beaten downe with haile, he ſee famine at hand, yet he will not diſpaire, nor ſpeake hatefully of God, but wil remaine in this confidence, Wee are yet in the Lordes protection, and ſheepe brought vp in his paſtures: hee therefore will finde vs foode euen in extremeſt barrenneſſe. Or if he bee troubled with ſicke- neſſe, euen then hee will not bee discouraged with bitterneſſe of ſorrowe

to burst out into impatience and quarell thus with God: but considering the righteoufnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he will call himselfe backe to patience. Finally, what so euer shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hande of God, hee will take it with a well pleased and thankfull minde, least he should stubbornely resist his authoritie, into whose power he hath yelded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolishhe and most miserable comfort of the Heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against aduersities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because she was blind and vnaduised, that blindly wounded both the deseruing and vndereruing. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the onely hande of God is the iudge and gouernes of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forwarde with vnaduised sodaine rage, but with most orderly iustice dealeth among vs both good things and euill.

The viii. Chapter.

BVt a Godly minde must yet climbe vp hier, euen to that wherunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whome the Lorde hath chosē and vouchsafed to receiue into his companie, must prepare themselves to a harde, trauailesome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diuerse kindes of incommodities. So it is the will of the heauenly father, to exercise them in such sorte, that he may haue a true prooffe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceedeth with this order towarde all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloued sonne aboue the rest, and in whome the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see howe he was not tenderly and deintily handled: so that it may be truely sayde, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kinde of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoued that he should learne obedience by those things that he suffred. Why then should we priuelege our selues from that estate, wherunto it behoued Christ our head to be subiect, specially sith he became subiect thereunto for our cause, to shewe vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle sayeth that this is the appointed ende of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard & sharp chaunces, which are reckned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comforte vnto vs, that we communicate with the sufferings of Christ: that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we may by diuerse tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so sayth Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we doe also conceiue the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowshipe of his glorious rising againe. Howe much may this auaille to assuage all the painefulnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our fellowshipe with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferings are not onely made blessed vnto vs , but also do much helpe vs to the furtherance of our saluation.

2 Beside that,our Lord had no need to take vpon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie and proue his obedience to his father: but we for diuerse causes, haue neede to lead our life vnder a continuall crosse. First(as we be naturally bent to attribute all things to our flesh)vntlesse our weakenes be shewed vs as it were before our eyes, we doe easily esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure,and dout not that whatfoeuer happen,it wil continue vnbroken and vnouercome against all harde assaultes . Whereby we are caried into a foolish and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, we stubbornly waxe proude against G O D himselfe , as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate down, than when he proueth vnto vs by experience,not only how feeble, but also howe fraile we be . Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouerty, or losse of children,or sicknes,or other calamities,which we being vnable to beare in respect of our selues , do by and by sinke downe vnder them . Being so humbled we learne to call vpon his strength , which only maketh vs to stande vpright vnder the heauy burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well soeuer they knowe that they stande by the grace of God and not by their owne force , yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancy,vntlesse by the triall of the crosse,he bring them into a more inwarde knowledge of themselues. The slouthfulnes crept into Dauid: I sayde in my rest, I shall neuer be moued, Lorde, thou hadst stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was stricken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperity his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God , vpon which he shoulde haue hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetuall continuance . If this'chaunced to so great a Prophete:which of vs ought not to be fearefull, that we may be heedefull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancy and patience, when they are once humbled with aduersity , they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie . The faithfull(I say)being admonished by such examples of their diseases,do therby profit to humility,that being vnclouted of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may resort to y^e grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace,they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

Psa. 30. 8.

Rom. 5. 3.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth , that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience prooffe . For whereas God hath promised the faithful that he will be present with them in troubles,they feele the same to be true,when they stand patiently being vpholden by his hand,which by their own strength they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a proff by experience to the holy ones,that God when neede requireth, wil in deede performe the helpe that he hath promised . And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experience proued to be constant and sure . We see nowe how many good things do come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse . For,ouertrowning the opinion that we falsly presume presume of our owne strength, & disclosing our hypocrisie that deliteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God only, by which it commeth to passe, that we neither be oppressed nor fall downe. And after victory foloweth hope, inasmuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promised, stablisheth the credit of his truth for time to come. Truly, although there were no more reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of the crosse is necessary for vs. For it is a matter of no small importance, to haue the blinde loue of thy selfe wiped away, that thou maist well knowe thine owne weakenes. To feele thine owne weakenesse, that thou maist learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou maist remoue thy confidence from thy selfe vnto God: to rest with confidence of heart vpon God, that being vpholden by his helpe, thou maist continue vnouercome to the last ende: to stande fast by his grace, that thou maist vnderstande that he is true in his promises: to knowe by prooffe the truth of his promises, that thy hope may be strenched thereby.

4 The Lord hath also an other end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience towards him, other than the same that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approued by witnesses, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open shew y strength of suffrance and constancie, wherewith he hath furnished his seruants, it is saide that he trieth their pacience. And from hence came these sayings: that God tempted Abraham, & had prooffe of his godlinesse, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his own & only sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proued in troubles, as gold is tried in a furnace: And who can say that it is not expedient, that the moste noble gift of pacience, which a faithful man hath receiued of his God, should be brought forth into vse, that it may be made certainly knowen & manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himselfe doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stirre vp the vertues that he hath giuen to his faithfull, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable & perish: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their pacience should be nothing. I say also y by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne wish, but after the wil of God. Truly if all things should flowe vnto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an olde Prouerb, when they exhorted any man to suffer aduersities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only man truly entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yelded his hande and backe to Gods correction. Nowe if it be most righteous, that wee should shewe our selues in all things obedient to the heauenly father, then wee ought not to refuse, that he should by all meanes accustome vs to yeeld obedience vnto him.

5 But yet we perceiue not howe necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse wee do also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of

God, so soone as it hath been but a litle while deintily and tenderly handled. The same happeneth vnto it, that chaunceth to stubborn horses, which if they be a few dayes pampred idelley, they cannot afterwarde for fearcenesse be tamed, neither do knowe their rider, to whose gouernement they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to haue bene in the people of Israel, that being well fed & couered wth fatnesse, we kicke against him that fed & nourished vs. The liberalitie of god should in deede haue allured vs to consider and loue his goodnesse, but forasmuch as our euil nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender vsage, it is more than necessaric for vs, to be restrained by some discipline, that we runne not outragiously into such a stubborne wantonnesse. So that we should not grow fierce with vnmeasurable abundance of richesse, y^e we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that wee should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good giftes, either of the soule, bodie, or fortune, the Lorde himselfe, as he foreseeeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it, & with the remedie of the crosse subdueth & bridleth the fearcenesse of our flesh, & that diuerse ways, so much as is healthful for euery man. For all are not alike sicke of al one diseases, or do alike neede of hard healing. And thereupon is to be seene how some are exercised with one kind of crosse, and some with another. But whereas the heavenly Phisician handleth some more gently, & purgeth some with sharper remedies, when hee meaneth to prouide for the health of all: Yet he leaueth none free or vntouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

6 Moreouer, the most merciful father needeth not onely to preuent our weakenes, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to enter into our mind: so without dout we shal finde that wee haue don somewhat worthie of chasticement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to pacience vpon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministreth vs a farre better consideration, when it saith, that the Lorde correcteth vs with aduersities, y^e wee should not bee damned with this worlde. Therefore we ought euen in the very sharpnes of tribulatiōs to acknowledge the kindnes & goodnes of our father toward vs, forasmuch as euen then hee ceaseth not to further our saluation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliuer vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shal lead vs to that, which y^e Scripture teacheth in another place: My sonne, refuse not the Lords correction, nor be wearie when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loueth, he correcteth, & embraceth him as a father doth his child. When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our ductie rather to shewe our selues obedient children and willing to learne, than with obstinacie to doe like desperate men, that are hardened with cuill doings? The Lorde leaseth vs, vnlesse he call vs backe by correction when wee are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues rightly sayeth that wee are bastards, and not children if wee be out of correction. Therefore wee are moeste frowarde, if wee cannot suffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that he hath for our saluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene

the vnbeleeuers and the faithfull, that the vnbeleeuers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardned wickednes, are made the worse and more obstinate wth whipping: the faithfull, like children hauing an honest freedome of nature, do thereby profit to repentance. Now must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in an other place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an ende.

7 Moreouer it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousness. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchsafeth to grant vs, that he so garnisheth vs with y^e peculiar marke of his sculdours. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousness, not onely that suffer for defense of the Gospel, but also that are troubled for any defense of righteousness. Whether therefore in maintaining the trueth of God against the lies of Sathan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocentes against the wronges of the wicked, we be driuen to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the worlde, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in daunger: let it not be grieuous or loathsome vnto vs to employ our selues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in those things in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Po-uerty in deede, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: Finally, death is the vttermost of all calamities. But when the fauour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicity. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimony of Christe, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall reioyce as the Apostles did, when God shall account vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues cleere in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are in dede brought to pouerty thereby among men, but so riches do truly growe vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the household of God. If we be vexed and dispised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If we be noted with reproches and shame, we are infomuch the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If wee be slaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Lette vs be ashamed to esteeme lesse these thinges, vpon which the Lorde hath set so greate a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these and like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defense of righteousness, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly & cheerefully receiue them at the Lords hand: specially sith this is the kind of crosse, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more greuous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deathes: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not onely suffer persecutions, but also reproches, because we trust in the liuing God. As in an other place he teacheth vs after his example to walke through sclander and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheerefulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitterness and sorrowe, or else the patience of the holy ones in the crosse were no patience, vnlesse they should be both tormented with sorrowe and vexed with griefe. If there were no hardines in pouerty, no paine in sickenes, no griefe in shame, no horrour in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to beare them indifferently? But when euery one of these doth with the natural bitternes thereof bite the heartes of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithfull man shewe it selfe, if being assayed with the feeling of such bitternes, how grievously soeuer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting he ouercometh it, his patience vttereth it selfe herein, if being sharply prouoked, hee is yet so bridled with y^e feare of God, that he bursteth not out into any distemper. His cheerefulness appeareth herein, if being wounded with sadnes and sorrow, he resteth vpon the spirituall comfort of God.

Mat. 5. 15.

1. Tim. 4. 10

2. Cor. 6. 8.

2. Cor. 1. 8.

9 This conflict, which the faithful do sustaine against the naturall feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience and temperance, Paul hath very well described in these wordes. We are put to distresse in all things, but we are not made sorrowfull: we labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer persecution, but we are not forsaken in it: we are throwen downe, but we perish not. You see how to beare y^e crosse patiently, is not to be altogether astonished & without all feeling of sorrowe. As the Stoikes in olde time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such a one, as putting of all nature of mā, was a like moued in prosperitie and in aduersitic, in sorrowfull and ioyfull state, yea such a one as like a stone was moued with nothing. And what haue they profited with this hie wisdom? Forsooth they haue painted out such an image of wisdom as neuer was found, and neuer can hereafter be among men: But rather while they coueted to haue to exact and precise a patience, they haue taken away all the vse of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among christians there are new Stoiks, that reckon it a fault not onely to grone and weepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions doe commonly proceede from idle men, which busying themselues rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but breed vs such new found doctrines. But we haue nothing to do with that stony Phylosophie, which our maister and Lord hath condemned not onely by his word but also by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne & other mens aduersities. The word (sayth he) shall reioyce, but you shall mourne & weepe. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no maruel. For if all weeping be blamed, what shall we iudge of the Lorde himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody teares? If euery feare be noted of infidelity, what shal we iudge of that quaking feare, wherwith we read that he was not slenderly stricken. If all sadnes be misliked, howe shall we like this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad euen to the death.

Iohn. 17. 20

Luk. 22. 44

10 This I thought good to speake to this ende, to call godly mindes from despeire: that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not put of y^e naturall affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a senselesse dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a stocke. For the Scripture giueth to the holy ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of aduersities, that that yet they be not overcome nor thrown downe with it: when they be so pricked with bitterneffe, that they be also delited with spirituall ioye: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancie abideth still in their heartes, that naturall sense eschueeth and dreedeth those things that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godlinesse trauaileth euē through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnancie the Lorde expressed when he sayde thus to Peter: When thou wast young thou didst girde thy selfe and didst walke whither thou wouldest: But when thou art old, another shall girde thee and lead thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn vnwillingly and resisting vnto it. Else his martyrdom should haue but small prayse. But howsoeuer he did with greate cheerefulness of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put of the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sortes of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloody death that he should suffer, being striken with horrour therof, he would gladly haue escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering and treading downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerefully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must endeouour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our mindes be inwardly filled with so great a reuerence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinaunce all contrary affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoeuer kinde of crosse we be vexed, euē in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For aduersities shall haue their sharpnesse, wherewith we shalbe bitten: so when we are afflicted with sickenes, we shall both grone and be disquieted & desire health: so being pressed with pouerty, we shalbe pricked with the stinges of carefulnesse and sorrowe: so shall we be striken with griefe of shame, contempt and iniury: so shall we yelde due teares to nature at the buriall of our friendes: but this alway shalbe the conclusion, But the Lord willed so. Therefore let vs follow his wil. Yea euē in the midst of the prickings of sorrow, in the midst of mourning and teares, this thought must needes come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerefully the very same things, by reason whereof it is so moued.

II But forasmuch as we haue taken the chief cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in fewe wordes define what difference is betweene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Truly very fewe of the Philosophers climbed to so hie a reason, to vnderstand that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, & to thinke y^e God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeelde vnto God, because thou shalt trauaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessity: then if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first iustice and equitie, then the care of our saluation. These therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether pouerty, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sickenesse, or losse of parentes, or children, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these thinges doeth happen, but by the will and prouidence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most iust order: For why? do not our innumerable & dayly offences deserue to be chastised moresharply, and with more grieuous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God layeth vpon vs? Is it not most great equity, that our flesh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that shee doe not wantonly growe wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and truth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an vndoubted righteousnesse in our afflictions, we can not without vnrighteousnes either murmure or wrastle against it. Wee heare not now that colde songe: We must giue place, because we so must of necessitie, but we heare a liuely lesson and full of effectualnes: We must obey, because it is vnlawfull to resist: we must suffer patiently, because impatiencie is a stubbornnes against the righteousnesse of God. But now, because that thing onely is worthy to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our safety and benefit, the good father doth this way also comforte vs, when he affirmeth that euen in this that he afflicteth vs with the crosse, he prouideth for our safety. But if it be certaine that troubles are healthfull for vs, why should wee not receiue them with a thankfull and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we doe not forceably yelde to necessity, but quietly agree to our owne benefit. These thoughts (I say) do make that how much our minds are grieued in the crosse with naturall feeling of bitternessse, so much they be cheared with spirituall gladnes. Wherupon also followeth thankesgiuing, which can not be without ioy. But if the prayse of the Lorde and thankesgiuing proceedeth of nothing but of a cherefull and ioyfull heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praying of God and thankesgiuing in vs: hereby appeareth how necessary it is that the bitternessse of the crosse be tempered with spirituall ioye.

Of the meditation of the life to come.

BVt with whatsoeuer kinde of trouble we be distressed, we must alwaye looke to this ende, to vse our selues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because GOD knoweth well howe much wee be by nature inclined to the beastly loue of this worlde, he vseth a most fitte meane to drawe vs backe, and to shake off our sluggishnesse, that we shoulde not stucke too fast in that loue. There is none of vs that desireth not to seeme to aspire and endeuour all their life long to heauenly immortalitie. For we are ashamed to excell brute beastes in nothing: whose state shoulde be nothing inferiour to ours, vnlesse there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doinges of euery man, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that senselesse, that our minde beinge daseled with yaine glistening of richesse, power and

and honours, is so dulle that it cannot see farre. Our heart also being possessed with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weied downe, that it cannot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with inticementes of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lorde to remedie this euill, doeth with continuall examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therefore y they should not promise themselues in this life a sound and quiet peace, hee suffereth them to bee many times disquieted and troubled either with warres; or yprores, or robberies, or other iniuries. That they shoulde not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitorie richesse, or rest in the richesse that they alreadie possesse, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes hee bringeth them to pouertie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefits of Mariage, he either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnes of their wiuies, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these thinges he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glorie, or immeasurably reioyce with vaine confidence, he doeth by diseases & dangers set before their eyes, howe vnstable, and vanishing be all the goods that are subiect to mortalitie. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublesome and innumerable wayes miserable, and in no point fully blessed; and that all those that are reckened the good things thereof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with manie euils mixed with them. And hereuppon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be sought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleue. That our minde is neuer truly raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it haue first conceiued a contempt of this present life.

2 For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must eyther become vile in our sight, or holde vs bounde with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternitie, we must diligently endeouour to loose our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasauntnesse, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much behouefull for vs to be nowe and then called away, that we bee not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, would be done if we did here enjoy a continuall concourse of good thinges and felicitie, sith we cannot with continuall spurres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not onely the learned doe know, but also the common people haue no Proverbe more comon than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing verie profitable to be knowen, they haue set it out with manie notable sentences. But there is nothing that wee doe either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all thinges, as though we woulde frame to our selues an immortalitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall, or if wee walke among graues, then, because there is an image of death before our eyes, I graunt we do miserably lously well discourse like Philosophers vpon the vanitie of this life . Albeit we do not y continually , for many times al these things do nothing moue vs. But when it happeneth, our Philosophie lasteth but a while, which so soone as we turne our backes , vanisheth away , and leaueth no steppe at all of remembrance behind it : finally it passeth away as clapping of hands vpon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also that we be subiect to death, as though we had neuer heard any report thereof, fall to a carelesse assurednes of earthly immortalitie. If any man in the meane time tell vs of the Prouerb, that man is a creature of a dayes continuance, we gaunt it indeede : but so heedelesly, that still the thought of cuerlasting continuance resteth in our mind. Who therefore can denie, that it is a great profite to vs all, not onely to be admonished in words, but by al the examples of experience that may bee, to be conuincd of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as euen when wee are conuincd, we scarcely cease to stande amased with peruerse and foolish admiration of it , as though it contained the vttermost ende of good things. But if it bee necessarie that God instructe vs , it is our duetie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when hee calleth and awaketh our dulnesse, that dispising the worlde wee may with all our harts endeuour to the meditation of the life to come.

3 But let the faithfull accustome themselues to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoever it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckened among the not slender blessings of God . Therefore if wee acknowledge no benefite of God in it, wee are guiltie of no small vnthankfulness toward God him selfe . But specially it ought to be to y faithful a testimonie of Gods good wil, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their saluation . For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternal glory, his will is to shew him selfe a Father vnto vs by smaller exâples: and these be y benefites y are daily bestowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life serueth vs to vnderstand y goodness of God, shal we disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodness in it? We must therefore put on this feeling & affection, to reckon it among y gifts of goodness y are not to be refused. For though there wâted testimonies of scripture, of which there are both many most euident, very nature it selfe doth exhort vs to giue thanks to y Lord, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, y he granteth vs the vse of it, that hee giueth vs all necessarie succours for the preservation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine maner prepared to the glory of the heauenly kingdome . For so the Lorde hath ordeyned that they which in time to come shall bee crowned in heauen, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they should not triumphe, till they had ouercome the hard aduentures of the battell, and obtained the victorie. Then an other reason is, that wee doe by diuerse benefites beginne therein to tast the sweetnesse of Gods liberalitie, y our hope and desire should be whetted to long for the reueiling thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gifte of Gods clemencie, that we liue this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, so we ought to be mindfull and thankfull: then wee shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate estate thereof, to this end that wee may be deliuered from too much greedinesse of it, wherevnto as I haue before saide, we are of our selues naturally enclined.

4 Nowe whatsoeuer is taken from the wrongfull desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt indeede that they thought truely, that thought it best not to bee borne, and the next, to die quickelic. For what coulde they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vnhappie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friends, and solemnly reioysed at their burials, but they did it without profire, because, being without the right doctrine of faith, they did not see howe that may turne to good to the godlie, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their iudgement with desperation. Let this therefore bee the marke of the faithfull in iudging of mortall life, that when they vnderstande it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may resorte wholly the more freshly and readily to the eternall life to come. When wee come to this comparison, then this present life may not onely be safely neglected, but also vtterly despised and lothed in comparison of the other. For if heauen be our countrie, what is the earth else but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the worlde bee an entering into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to bee drowned in death? If to be deliuered from the bodie is to be set in perfect libertie, what is the bodie else but a prison? If to enioy the presence of God is the hiest summe of felicitie, is it not miserable to lack it? But til we be escaped out of \bar{y} world, we wander abrod from the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be cōpared with \bar{y} heavenly life, doubtles it ought to be despised & troden vnder foot. But it is neuer to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subiection to sinne, & yet \bar{y} hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must bee so moued either with wearinesse or hatred of it, that desiring the ende of it, wee may bee also readie at the will of the Lorde to abide in it, so that our wearinesse may be farre from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lorde hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he call vs away. Paul in deed lamenteth his state that he is holden bound in the bondes of the bodie longer than he wished, & sigheth with feruent desire of his redemption: neuerthelesse to obey the commaundement of the Lorde, he professed himselfe readie to both, because he acknowledgeth himselfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, eyther by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glorie. Therefore if wee must liue and die to the Lorde, let vs leaue to his will the time of our life and death: but so that wee bee still feruent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, and despise this life in comparison of the immortalite to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lorde because of the bondage of sinne.

5 But this is monstrous, that insteede of that desire of death, many that boast themselues to bee Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at euerie mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckily and vnhappy.

Truely it is no meruell, if naturall sense in vs doe quake for feare when wee heare of the dissoluing of vs. But this is in no wise tolerable, that there bee not in a Christian mans brest the light of godlinesse, that shoulde with greater comforte ouercome and suppress that feare, howe great soeuer it bee. For if we consider that this vnstedfast, faultie, corruptible, fraile withering, and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore dissolued, that it may afterwarde be restored againe into a stedfast, perfect, vncorruptible and heauenly glorie: shall not faith compell vs feruently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabite our countrie, as a heauenly countrie, shall we obtaine no comfort thereby? But there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that wee ought to looke vnto the immortalitie to come, where wee may attaine a stedfast state that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doeth verie well teach, that the faithfull ought to go cherefully to death: not because they would be vnclouted, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shall bruit beastes, yea and lifeles creatures; euen stockes and stones, knowing their present vanitie, be earnestly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrection, that they may with the children of God be deliuered from vanitie, and shall wee that are endued with the light of wit, and aboue wit enlightened with the spirite of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our mindes beyond this rottennes of earth? But it pertaineth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake against this peruersnesse. And in the beginning I haue already professed, that I would not here take vpon me the large handling of common places. I would counsell such feareful mindes to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, vnlesse they were meet to be sent to the Phylosophers, that they may begin to be ashamed when they see the contempt of death that those do shew. But this let vs holde for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christ his schoole, but he that doeth ioyfully looke for the day both of death and of the last resurrection. For both Paul describeth all the faithfull by this marke, and also it is common in the scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it will set foorth a ground of perfect gladnes. Reioyce (saith ihe Lord) and lift vp your heades, for your redemption commeth neere at hande. Is it reasonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of so great force to raise vp ioy and cheerefulness in vs, should breed nothing but sorrow and discouragement? If it be so, why doe we still boast of him as of our schoolemaister? Let vs therefore get a sounder minde, and howsoeuer the blinde and senselesse desire of the flesh do striue against it, let vs not doubt to wishe for the comming of the Lorde, not onely with wishing, but also with groning and sighing, as a thing most happie of all other. For he shall come a redeemer to vs, to draw vs out of the infinit gulfe of euils and miseries, and to lead vs into that blessed inheritance of his life and glorie.

6 This is certainly true: all the nation of the faithfull, so long as they dwel in earth, must be as sheep appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnles they had their mind raised vp into heauen, & surmounted al y is in the world, and passed ouer y present face of things. Contrariwise when they haue haue once lifted their heads aboue all earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enjoying quiet peace, if they see them proud in gorgiousnes & sumptuousnes of al things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delightes, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednesse, if they susteine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their couctousnesse, if they bee vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will easily vphold themselues in such aduersities. For that day shalbe before their eyes, when the Lord shal receiue his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdome, when he shal wipe al teares from their eyes, when he shall cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladnes, when he shall feed them with the vnspeakeable swetnesse of his deinties, when he shall aduance them to the fellowship of his hie estate: finally when he shall vouchsaue to interparten his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that haue flourished in the earth, he shall throw into extreme shame, he shall change their delightes into tormentes, their laughing and mirth into weeping and gnashing of teeth, he shall disquiet their peace with terrible torment of conscience, he shall punish their deintinesse with vnquenchable fire, & shall put their heades in subiection to those godly men, whose patience they haue abused. For this is rightcousnesse (as Paul testifieth) to giue release to the miserable and to them that are vniustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that doe afflict the godly, when the Lorde Iesus shall be reuealed from heauen. This truly is our onely comfort, which if it bee taken away, we must of necessitie either despire, or flatteringly delight our selues with the vaine comfortes of the worlde to our owne destruction. For euen y^e Prophet confesseth y^e his feet staggered, when he taried too long vpon considering the present prosperitie of the wicked: and that he could not otherwise stand stedfast, but when he entred into the sanctuarie of God, & bended his eyes to the last end of the godlie and the wicked. To conclude in one worde then onely the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the heartes of the faithfull vpon the Deuill, flesh, sinne, and the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the resurrection.

The x. Chapter.

Howe we ought to vse this present life, and the helpes shereof.

BY such introductions the Scripture doeth also well informe vs what is y^e right vse of earthly benefites: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we must liue we must also vse the necessarie helpes of life: neither can we eschew euen those things that seeme rather to serue for delight than for necessitie. Therefore we must keepe a measure, y^e we may vse them with a pure conscience, either for necessitie or for delight. That measure the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine iorney through a straunge countrey, by which they trauell towarde the kingdome of heauen. If wee must but passe through the earth, doubtlesse we ought so farre to vse the good things of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doeth not vnprofitably counsell vs so to vse this world, as though wee vsed it not: and to buy possessions with such a minde as they vse to bee sould. But because this place is slipperie, and so slope on both sides,

that it quickly maketh vs to fal, let vs labour to fasten our foote there, where wee may stande safely. For there haue beene some, that otherwise were good and holy men, which when they sawe intemperance and ryot continually to range with vnbridled lust, vnlesse it be sharply restrained, & were desirous to correct so great a mischeefe, they could find none other way, but suffered man to vse the benefites of the earth, so farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were to seuer. For (which is a verie perilous thing) they did put streighter bonds vpon consciences, than those wherewith they were bounde by the worde of God. And they expound necessitie, to abstaine from all things which a man may be without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarcely take any more food than bread & water. And some bee yet more seuer: as it is red of Crates the Thebanc, y^e did throw his goods into the sea, because if they were not destroyed, he thought that he shoulde bee destroyed by them. Many at this day, while they seeke a pretence whereby the intemperance of the fleshe in vse of outward things may be excused, and while they goe about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnesse, doe take that as a thing confessed, which I doe not graunt them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitation of measure, but that it is to be left to euerie mans conscience to vse as much as he seeth to be lawfull for him. Truly I confesse, that consciences neyther ought nor can in this pointe bee bounde by certaine and precise formes of lawes. But for asmuch as the Scripture teacheth generall rules of lawfull vse, wee must surely measure the vse according to thesē rules.

2 Let this be a principle: that the vse of Gods gites swarueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, wherevnto the author himselfe hath created and appointed them for vs, for as much as hee hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than hee that shall diligently looke vnto this ende. Nowe if wee consider to what ende hee hath created meates, wee shall finde that he meant to make prouision not onely for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie hee appointed an other ende, which is comlinesse and honestie. In herbes, trees, and fruites, beside diuerse profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetnesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophete woulde not reckon among the benefites of God that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that oyle maketh his face to shine: the Scripture woulde not cchewhere, to set soorth his liberalitie, rehearse that hee hath giuen all such things to men. And the verie naturall qualities of things doe sufficiently shewe, to what ende and howe farre wee may vse them. Shall the Lorde haue set in floures so greate a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eyes: shall he haue giuen so great a sweetnesse of sauour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it bee vnlawfull either for our eyes to take the vse of that beautie, or for our smelling to feele that sweetnesse of sauour: what? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that hee hath made some more acceptable than other? what? Hath hee not giuen to golde and siluer, to iuoric and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalles or stones? Finally, hath hee not made many things commendable

3 Therefore away with that vnnaturall Philosphie, which in granting vs of y^e creatures no vse but of necessitie, not only doth niggardly bereaue vs of the lawfull vse of Gods liberalitie, but also can not take place, vnlesse it first haue spoyled man of al his senses & made him a blocke. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence prouide a stay for the lust of the fleshe, which if it be not brought into order, ouerfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I haue said) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie do grant vnto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this ende, that wee should knowe the authour of them, and giue him thanks for his tender kindnesse towarde vs. Where is thy thanks giuing, if thou so gluttonously fill thy selfe with deintie meates or with wine, that thou either bee made senselesse, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by too great abundance boyling in filthie lust, doth with her vncleannesse infect thy minde, y^e thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulnessse to God, if with costly gorgeousnesse thereof we both fall in admiration of our selues and disdaine other? If with the trimnesse and cleannessse of it, we prepare our selues to vnchastitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gainnesse of our apparell? For many so giue all their senses to bodily delites, that the minde lieth ouerwhelmed. Many are so delited with marble, gold, and paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into metalles, and be like vnto painted images. The smell of the kitchen, or sweetenesse of fauour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licenciousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, & that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lustes therof, to which if we grant too much, they boile out aboue measure and temper.

Rom. 13. 14.

4 But there is no surer nor readier way than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heauenly immortalitie. For therupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vse this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that mary wiues, as though they did not mary: they y^e bye as though they did not bye, as Paul reacheth. The other, that they should learne as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. Hee that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not only the intemperance of gluttony in meat & drinke, & too much deintinesse, sumptuousnesse, pride, hautinesse, and nicenesse, in fare, building, & apparel, but also all care and affection that may either withdrawe thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heauenly life, or from studie to garnish thy soule. But this was long ago truely said of Cato: that there is great carefulnesse of trimming our body, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an olde prouerb, that they which are much busied in care of their body are commonly carelesse of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truely it must be subiect to this law, to beare verie little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon them selues with continually bent minde, to cut off all shewe of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excesse, & to take diligent heede, that they do not of helpes make to them selues hindrances.

5 The other rule shalbe, that they that haue but small and slender riches, may learne to lack patiently, that they be not carefully moued with immeasurable desire of them: which pacience they that keepe, haue not a litle profited in the Lords schole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to proue himself the scholar of Christ. For beside this that the most part of other vices do accompanie the desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which wilbe ashamed of a poore cote, wilbe proude of a costly cote: he that will not be content with a hungrie supper, will be disquieted with desire of a deintier, & woulde also in temperately abuse those deinties if he had them: he that hardly & vnquietly beareth a priuate and base estate, wil not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that haue an vnfained zeale of godlinesse, endeouour to learne by the Apostles example, to be ful and hungry, to haue store and suffer want.

The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of y^e precepts of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifulnes of God, and appointed for our commoditie, that they may be as thinges deliuered vs to keepe, whereof wee must one daye yeld an account. We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying may continually sound in our cares, yeld an account of thy bailiwike. Therewithal let this also come in our mind. Who it is that asketh such an account, euen he that hath so much commended abstinence, sobrietie, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnes, pride, ostentation and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is ioyned wth charitie: which hath already with his owne mouth condemned all those delitefull thinges that do withdraw a mans mind from chastitie and cleanness, or do dull his wit with darknesse.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth euery one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eye to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is caried hither and thither, howe greedie his ambition is to holde diuerse things at once. Therefore that all thinges shoulde not be confounded with our follie and rashnesse, he hath appointed to euery man his duties in seuerall kindes of life. And that no man rashly runne beyond his bonds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therefore euery mans seuerall kind of life is vnto him as it were his standing appointed him by GOD, that they should not all their life vncertainly wander about. And this diuision is so necessarie, that all our doings are measured thereby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the iudgement of mans reason & Philosophie. There is no deede accounted more noble, euen among the Philosophers, than for a man to deliuer his countrey from tyrannie : but by the voyce of Gods iudgement the priuate man is openly condemned that layeth hande vpon a tyrant. But I will not tarry vpon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we knowe that the calling of the Lord is in euery thing the beginning and foundation of well doing : to which he that doth not direct himselfe , shall neuer keepe a right way in his doings . Hee may peradventure sometime doe somewhat seeming worthy of prayse: but what so euer that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shall be reiected: moreouer there shall be no conuenient agreement in the partes of his life . Therfore our life shall then be best framed, when it shall be directed to this marke : For then, no man carried with his owne rashnes wil attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his boundes. He that shall be a man of base estate, shall contentedly liue a priuate life, least he should forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Againe this shall be no small reliefe to cares, labours, griefes, and other burdens, when a man shall know that in all these things, God is his guid . The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office : the housholder will binde himselfe to his dutie : euery man in his kind of life will beare and passe through the discommodities, cares , tediousnesse , and anguishes thereof : when they are perswaded that euery mans burden is layde vpon him by God. Hereupon also shall grow singular comfort, for as much as there shall be no worke so filthy and vile , (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the iustification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I Thinke I haue already sufficiently declared before , howe there remaineth for men being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recouer saluation : againe, what Faith is , and what benefites of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what frutes it bringeth forth in him . The summe of all was this, that Christ is giuen vs by the goodnesse of God , and conceiued and possessed of vs by fayth, by partaking of whome we receiue principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie , wee may nowe in steede of a iudge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the second, that beeing sanctified by his Spirite, wee may giue our selues to innocencie and purenesse of life . As for regeneration, which is the seconde grace , wee haue already spoken of it as much as seemed to be sufficient . The maner of iustification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to vnderstande both howe the Fayth by which alone we receiue freely giuen righteousness by the mercie of God, is not idle from good works: and also what be the good workes of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entreateth . Therefore they are first to be thoroughly discussed , and so discussed that we must remember that this is the chiefe stay of vpholding religion, that we may be the more careful and heedeful about it. For vnlesse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his iudgement is of thee: as thou hast no ground to stablish thy saluation, so hast thou also none to raise thy reuerent feare toward God. But the necessity of this knowledge shall better appeare by knowledge it selfe.

2 But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should doe if we shoulde enter disputation of a thing vnknown) let vs first declare what is meant by these speeches, Man to be iustified before God, To be iustified by faith or by workes. He is sayde to be iustified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iust and accepted for his owne righteousnes sake. For as wickednesse is abhominable before God, so a sinner can not finde fauour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accounted such a one. Therefore wheresoeuer sinne is, there also appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accounted in place of a sinner but of a iust man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the iudgement seate of God when all sinners fal. As if an innocent be brought to be arained before the seat of a righteous iudge, when iudgement is giuen according to his innocencie, he is said to be iustified before y iudge: so he is iustified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witnessse and affirmer of his righteousnesse. Therefore after the same manner a man shalbe sayde to be iustified by workes, in whose life there is founde such cleanness and holinesse, as may deserue the testimonie of righteousnes before the throne of God: or he that with the vprightnesse of his workes is able to answere and satisfie Gods iudgement. Contrariwise he shalbe sayde to be iustified by faith that being excluded from the righteousnes of workes, doth by faith take hold of the righteousnes of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expounde iustification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgiueneffe of sins, and imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ.

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it can not be denied, that this is the proper & most vsed signification of the word. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shalbe enough to put the readers in mind of the, for they may of themselues easily marke them. But I will bring forth some, where this iustification that we speake of is expressly entreated of by name. First where Luke sayeth that the people when they had hearde Christe did iustifie God. And where Christ pronounceth that wise dome is iustified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they doe giue righteousnesse, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the worlde goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of saluation righteous, which hath euer that of it selfe. But both these speeches are as much in effect, as to giue to God and his doctrine the praise that they deserue. Again when Christ reprocheth the Pharisees, that they iustifie themselues, hee doth not meane that they obtaine righteousnesse by well doing, but doe vaine gloriously seeke for the fame of righteousnesse, whereof in deede they be voyde. They that are skilfull of the Hebrue tongue doe better vnderstande the sense of this phrase: in which tongue they are not only called wicked doers, that are gilty in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of iudgement of condemnation. For when Berfabē saith that shee and Solomon shalbe wicked doers, she doeth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that she and her sonne shalbe put to shame, to be numbred among the reprobate and condemned. But by the procelle of the text it easly appeareth, that the same word in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signifie any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that wee are now in hand with: where Paul saith, that the scripture did foresee, that God iustificth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man vnderstande thereby, but that God doeth impute righteousness by faith? Againe, when he saith that God iustificth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefite of faith to deliuer them from the damnation which their wickednesse deserued? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when he cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustificth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he should say, Who shall accuse them whome God acquiteth? who shall condemne them whose patrone Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from giltynesse as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God doth iustifie vs by the intercession of Christ, he doeth acquite vs, not by allowance of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousness, that wee may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selues. So in the 13. Chapter of the Actes, in Paules sermon: by him is forgiuenesse of sinnes preached vnto you, and euery one that beleueth in him is iustified from all those things, from which you could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. You see that after forgiuenesse of sinnes, iustification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for absolution, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the law, you see that it is the meere beneficiall gift of Christ, you see that it is received by faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where he sayeth that wee are iustified from sinnes by Christ. So when it is saide that the Publicane came iustified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousness by any deseruing of workes. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his sinnes obtained, he was counted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approuing of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose saith very well, that calleth the confession of sinnes a lawfull iustification.

4 But to leaue striuing about the worde: If we looke vpon the thing it selfe, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truly Paul doeth expresse iustification by the name of acceptation, when he saith (Ephes. 1.5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christ, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious fauour, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in fauour. For the same is meant by it ŷ is said in another place, that God doth freely iustifie. In the 4. Chapter to the Romanes, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousness, and sticketh not to say that it consisteth in forgiueneſſe of finnes. That man (ſaid he) is called of Dauid a bleſſed man, to whom God accounteth or imputeth righteousneſſe without workes, as it is written: Bleſſed are they whoſe iniquities are forgiuen, &c. Truly he there doth entreate not of one part of iuſtification, but of all iuſtification wholly. And he teſtifieth that Dauid in y^e place maketh a definition of iuſtification, when he pronounceth that they are bleſſed to whome is giuen free forgiueneſſe of finnes. Whereby appeareth y^e this righteousnes whereof he ſpeaketh, is in compariſon ſimply ſet as contrarie to guiltineſſe. But for this purpoſe, that is the beſt place where he teacheth, that this is the ſumme of the meſſage of the Goſpel, that we ſhoulde be reconciled to God: becauſe it is his will to receiue vs into fauour through Chriſt, in not imputing finnes vnto vs. Let the readers diligently wey al the whole proceſſe of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of expoſition, that Chriſt which was without ſinne was made ſinne for vs, to expreſſe the maner of reconciliation, doubtleſſe he meaneth nothing els by the word reconciling but iuſtifying. And that which he ſayeth in another place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Chriſt, could not ſtand together, vnleſſe we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our ſelues.

5 But where as Oſiander hath brought in, I wote not what monſter of eſſentiall righteousneſſe, whereby, although his will was not to deſtroy free righteousnes, yet he hath wrapped it within ſuch a miſt, as darkeneth godly mindes, and bereaueth them of the earneſt feeling of the grace of Chriſt: therefore ere I paſſe further to other things, it is worth the labour to confute this doting error. Firſt this ſpeculation is but of mere & hungrie curioſitie. He doth in deede heape together many teſtimonies of Scripture, to proue y^e Chriſt is one with vs, & we one with him, which needeth no prooſe: but becauſe he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he ſnareth himſelfe. But wee which hold y^e we are made all one with Chriſt by the power of his Spirit, may eaſily vndo al his knottes. He had conceiued a certain thing very neare to the opinion of Manichees, to deſire to conuey the ſubſtance of God into men. Hereupon riſeth another inuention of his that Adam was fashioned after the image of God, becauſe euen before the fall Chriſt was ordained y^e paterne of the nature of man. But becauſe I would be ſhort, I will tarry vpon the matter that I haue preſently in hand. He ſaith y^e we are one with Chriſt. We grant. But we denie that the ſubſtance of Chriſt is mingled with ours. Moreouer wee ſay that this principle, that Chriſt is righteousneſſe to vs, becauſe he is an eternal God, the fountaine of righteousnes and the very ſelfe righteousnes of God, is wrongfully drawn to defend his deceits. The readers ſhal pardon mee, if I do now but touche theſe things that the order of teaching requireth to be differred into another place. But although he excuſe himſelfe from meaning nothing els by the name of eſſentiall righteousneſſe, but to reſiſt this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Chriſtes ſake: yet he plainly expreſſeth that he is not contented with that righteousnes y^e is purchaced for vs by the obedience and ſacrifice of Chriſt, but faineth that we are ſubſtancially righteous in God, as wel by ſubſtance as by qualitie poured into vs. For this is the reaſon why he ſo earneſtly affirmeth, that that not onely Christ, but also the father & the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs. Which although I grant to be true, yet I say that he wrongfully wresteth it. For he should haue considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the father & the holy Ghost are in Christ, & as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possess whole God in him. Therefore all that he saith seuerally of the father & the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other ende but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God pouring himself into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himself. For he reckoneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, y^e we growe into one with Christ, & y^e he is our head & we his members, vnlesse his very substance be mingled with vs. But in the father & the holy ghost (as I haue said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinketh, euē this, that we be iustified not by the only grace of the Mediator, & that righteoufnesse is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person, but that we are made partakers of the righteoufnes of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

6 If he did say no more, but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentiall conioyning made ours: and that not only he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is poured into vs: Hee should with lesse hurt feede himself deintily, & peraduenture so great a contention should not haue bene raised for this douting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke bloud hideth her many trailes, we must needes earnestly resist vnlesse wee wil wittingly & willingly suffer that righteoufnes to be taken from vs, which onely bringeth vs confidence to glory of saluation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteoufnesse, and this worde iustifying, extende to two partes: that to be iustified is not onely to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteoufnesse is not a free imputation but a holines and vprightnesse, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then he stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteoufnesse in respect that becing a priest he did with sauisfactorily purging sinnes appease his father towarde vs, but in respect that hee is eternall God and life. To prooue that first point, that God doeth iustifie not onely by forgiuing but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doth leaue them whome hee doth iustifie such as they were by nature, changing nothing of their vices. The answer hereof is very easie: that as Christ cannot be torne in partes, so these two things which we together and ioynly receiue in him, that is to say righteoufnesse and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore, whome soeuer God receiueh into fauour, he doeth also therewithall giue them the spirite of adoption, by the power wherof he newly fashioeneth them after his image. But if the brightnes of the sunne cannot be seuered from the heate thereof, shall wee therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude, The sunne with his heate giueth life & fruitfulnessse to the earth, with his beames he giueth light and brightnesse. Here is a mutuall and vnseparable conioyning: yet reason forbiddeth to conuey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osiander thrusteth in. For because God doth in deede renew them to the obseruing of righteoufnesse whome he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be all one & the selfesame thing: But the Scripture ioyning them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifolde grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that

1. Cor. i. 30. Christ was giuen vs vnto righteoufnes & sanctification. And whensoever he reasoneth to proue by the saluation purchased for vs by the fatherly loue of God, & by the grace of Christ. y we are called to holinesse & cleannesse, hee plainly declareth that it is one thing to be iustified, and another to be made newe creatures. But when Osiander commeth to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he allegeth. Where Paul saith that faith is accounted for righteoufnes to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him y iustificieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he depraueth all the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, & sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euen nowe alleged, Who shall accuse the elects of God? it is God that iustificieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of guiltinesse and acquiting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osiander is founde too fond a babler, as well in that reason as in alleging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doeth he speake of the name of righteoufnesse, in saying that faith was accounted to Abraham for righteoufnesse, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteoufnesse of God and God him selfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteoufnesse that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he receiued by faith the grace offered in the promise. Wherevpon followeth, that in iustification there is no place for works, as Paul very well affirmeth.

7 As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that the power of iustifying is not in faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiuerh Christ, I willingly grant it. For if faith did iustifie of it selfe, or by inwarde force, as they call it and as it is alway feeble and vnperfect, it could not work iustification but in part, so should the iustification be maimed, that should giue vs but a piece of saluation. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking do say that God onely iustificieth: and then we giue the same to Christ, because he was giuen vs vnto righteoufnesse: and faith we compare as it were to a vessel. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receiue Christ. Wherevpon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of iustifying, when wee teache that he is first receiued by faith, before that his righteoufnesse be receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when he sayeth that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because

gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not vnlike, but that faith although it be by it selfe of no worthinesse or price, may iustifie vs in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man rich. Therefore I say that faith, which is on-ly the instrument to receiue righteousnesse, is vnfitly mingled with Christe, which is the material cause and both author and minister of so great a benefifit. Now is this doubt also dissolued. How this worde Faith ought to be vn-derstanded when we entreate of iustification.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the in-warder worde is received by the ministracion of the outwarder worde, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthoode of Christ and the person of the Media-tour to his outwarder Godheade. As for vs, we deuide not Christ, but wee say that he is the same eternall worde of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousnesse: and we confesse that otherwise he could not haue fulfilled the office of Mediatour, and purchased vs righteousnesse, vnlesse he had bene eternall God. But this is Osianders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that he was made righteousnesse to vs, in respect of his nature of Godheade, and not of manhoode. But if this properly belong to the Godheade, then it shall not be peculiar to Christe, but common with the father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousnesse of the one, and an other of the other. Moreouer that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conueniently sayde to be made to vs. But although we graunt this, that God was made righteousnesse for vs: how shall it agree that that which is set betweene, is made of GOD?
Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godheade, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is seuerally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But he foolishly triumpheth in that one worde of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lorde Iehoua shalbe our righte-ousnesse, but out of that hee shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnesse, is God openly shewed in the fleshe. In an other place wee haue rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that GOD purchased to himselfe the Church with his bloude, if any man gather thereupon, that the bloud wherwith sinnes were purged was diuine, and of the nature of Godhead, who can abide so foule an errour? But Osiander thinketh that with this so childishe a cauillation he hath gotten all thinges, he swelleth, he leapeth for ioy, and stuffeth many leaues full with his bigge wordes: when yet there is a plaine and ready solution for it in saying that the worde Iehoua in deede when he is made the issue of Dauid shall be the righteousnesse of the godly: But Esaie teacheth in what sense, saying: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Lette vs note that the father speaketh: that he giueth to the sonne the office of iustifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setteth the manner or meane as they call it in the doctrine wher-by Christe is knowen. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this worde Daab knowledge passiuely. Hereupon I gather firste that Christ was made righteousnesse when he did put on the forme of a seruant:
secondely that he did iustifie vs in respect that hee shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore he doeth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed vnto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousness, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappy disagreement estranged from his righteousness, we must needs come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may iustifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

Ie. c. 15.

9 If he obiekt that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is about the nature of man, and therefore can not be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I grant: but in the seconde I say that he is vnwisely deceiued. For although Christ could neither cleanse our soules with his blood, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from guiltinesse, nor do the office of a priest, vnlesse he had bene true God, because the strength of the flesh had bene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certaine that he performed all these thinges according to his nature of manhood. For if it be demanded howe we be iustified, Paul answereth, by y obedience of Christ. But did he any otherwise obey than by taking vpon him the shape of a seruant? whereupon we gather that righteousness was giuen vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other wordes (which I maruell that Oslander is not ashamed to allege so often) he appointeth the fountaine of righteousness no where els but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousness of God in him. Oslander with full mouth aduanceth the righteousness of God, and triumpheth as though he had proued that it is his imaginatiue Ghost of essentiall righteousness: when the wordes sounde farre otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young beginners should not haue bene ignorant that the righteousness of God is taken for the righteousness that God alloweth, as in Iohn, where the glorie of God is compared with the glory of men. I knowe that sometime it is called the righteousness of God, whereof God is the author and which God giueth vs: but though I say nothing, the readers that haue their sound wit do perceiue that nothing els is meant in this place but that we stand vpright before the iudgment seate of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christes death. And there is not so great importance in the worde, so that Oslander do agree with vs in this point that we are iustified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propiciatorie sacrifice for vs, which can not agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sorte, when Christe meaneth to seale the righteousness and saluation that he hath brought vs, he setteth before vs an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. Hee doeth in deede call himselfe the liuely bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his blood is verily drinke. Which maner of teaching is seene in the sacramentes, which although they directe our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they do there with all teach that the matter of righteousness and saluation remaineth in his flesh: Not in that that hee is onely man, hee either iustificieth or quickneth of himselfe, but because it pleased G O D to shewe openly in the mediator that which was hidden and incomprehensible in him selfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for vs, out of which we may drawe that which otherwise should without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepe spring that riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the mediatour. In this manner and meaning, I doe not denie that Christ as he is God and man dorth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the father and the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousnesse whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, in the eternall righteousnesse of the eternall God, so that he yelde to the sure and plaine reasons that I haue alleged.

10 Nowe that he shoulde not with his cauillations deceiue the vnskillfull, I graunt that we want this incomparable benefite, till Christ bee made ours. Therefore we set that conioyning of the heade and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hearts, and that mystical vnion, in the hiest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore wee doe not beholde him a farre off out of our selues, that righteousnes may be imputed vnto vs, but because wee haue put on him, & are grafted into his body: finally because he hath vouchsafed to make vs one with him, therefore we glorie that we haue a fellowship of righteousnesse with him. So is Oslanders slaunderous cauillation confuted, where he saith that we count faith righteousnesse, as though wee spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith emptie to him, to giue rounge to his grace, that he onely may fill vs. But Oslander refusing this spirituall conioyning, enforceeth a grosse mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiously calleth all them Zuinglians that subscribe not to his fantastickall errour, concerning essentiall righteousnes: because they do not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lordes supper. As for me, I count it a great glorie to be so reproched of a proude man and giuen to his owne errors. Albeit he touched not me onely, but also other writers well knowne to the world, whome he ought to haue modestly reuerenced. It mooueth me nothing, which meddle not with mine owe priuate cause: & so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Where as therefore he so importunatley requireth essentiall righteousnesse, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this end: First y God should with a grosse mixture poure himselfe into vs, as he faineth a fleshly eating of Christ in the supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousnesse into vs, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteousnesse is as well God him selfe, as the goodnesse or holinesse, or purenesse of God. I will not spende much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heauenly life to this present state. Through Christ (saith Peter) are giuen vs y precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were nowe such as the Gospel promised that we shall be at the last comming of Christ: yea Iohn telleth vs, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shall be like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a small tast to the readers, that I doe of purpose passe ouer these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

1. Pet. 1. 4.

11 But in the seconde point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth y we are righteous together with God. I thinke I haue already sufficiently proued, that that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and fruitelesse, and of it selfe so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthilie to bee vnfauoric to sounde and godly Readers. But this is an vntollerable wickednesse, vnder pretense of double righteoufnesse, to enfeeble the earnest assurance of saluation, and to carie vs aboute the cloudes, that we shoulde not embrace by faith the grace of propiciation, & call vpon God with quiet mindes. Ofiander scorneth them, that teach that this worde Iustifying is a lawe terme: because, we must bee righteous indeede. And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that we be iustified by free imputation. But, if God do not iustifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the worlde to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for vs, that hee might bee the righteoufnesse of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be iudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner howe is declared, for that God iustifieth by forgiuing: as in another place iustification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of the as contraries, doeth clearely shew that it is a phrase borrowed from the vse of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanely practised in the Hebrew tongue, if hee haue a sober braine, that is ignoraunt that this phrase came from thence, and wherevnto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Nowe where Paul saith that Dauid described the righteoufnesse without workes, in these wordes, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiuen: Let Ofiander aunswere me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truly Paul bringeth not in the Prophete for a witnesse, as though he taught that forgiuenesse of sinnes is but a part of righteoufnesse, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the iustifying of man: But he includeth whole righteoufnesse in free forgiuenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whome God hath forgiuen iniquities, and to whome hee imputeth no transgressions. He doth measure and iudge such a mans felicitie therby, because hee is not this way righteous indeed, but by imputation. Ofiander taketh exception and saith, that this shoulde bee slaundersous to God, and contrarie to his nature, if he shoulde iustifie them that indeed remaine still wicked. But wee must remember, as I haue already saide, that the grace of iustifying is not scuered fro regeneration although they be scuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowen by experience, that there abide alwayes in the righteous some remnantes of sinne, it must needes bee that they be farre otherwise iustified than they bee reformed into newenes of life. For this latter point of reformation, God so beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by litle and litle, & sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seate in daunger of y iudgemēt of death, But he iustifieth them not by partmeale, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenesse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteoufnesse coulde appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because wee bee righteous in his sight without exception. Wherevpon followeth, that the doctrine of iustification is misturned, yea ouerturned from the verie foundation, when doubting is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken,

when the free and dreedelesse inuocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall ioy is not stablished. Wherupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to proue, that the inheritance is not by the lawe. For by this meane faith shoulde be made voyde, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrowen, because none of the most holy shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of iustifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander confounding together, calleth two sortes of righteoufnesse) is very well expressed by Paul: For speaking of his reall righteoufnes in deede, or of the vprightnes wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteoufnes) he lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am: who shal deliuer me frō the body of this death? But fleeing to the righteoufnes which is grounded vpon the onely mercy of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sworde, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the electes of God whom he iustifieth? For I am surely perswaded, that nothing shall seuer vs from his loue in Christ. He plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteoufnes which alone fully sufficeth to saluation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a litle before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glory. This diuersity is sufficiently knowen, & so familiar to all the holy ones, that grone vnder the burden of iniquities, and yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue al feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagreeeth with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holy ones with a double righteoufnes as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse y without forgiuenesse of sinnes they neuer pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous in deede, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how farre shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteoufnes? shall he measure it by ʒ pound or by the ounce? Truly he shall hang doutfull and wauering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteoufnesse as shalbe necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happy that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not iudge of this cause. But this shall stande stedfast, that thou mayest be iustified in thy sayings and overcome when thou art iudged. But how great presumption is it to condemne the chiefe iudge when he freely acquiteth, that this aunswere may not be in force, I will haue mercy vpon whom I wil haue mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this ende that he should spare none, but that hee should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offense. And we do say that they which were lost haue their sinnes buried and so are iustified before God: because, as God hateth sin, so he can loue none but them whom he iustifieth. But this is a maruellous manner of iustifying, that they being couered with the righteoufnesse of Christ stande not in feare of the iudgement which they haue deserued, and when they worthily condemn themselues are accounted righteous without themselues.

mysterie which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely trauailed to proue that wee doe not obtaine fauour with God by the only imputation of the righteousnes of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vse his owne wordes) at length hee concludeth that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse, not in respect of his nature of manhoode but of his nature of Godheade: and that although this righteousnesse can not be founde but in the person of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteousnesse not of man but of God, he doth nowe binde vp his rope made of two righteousneses, but he plainly taketh away the office of iustifying from Christes nature of manhoode. But it is good to see howe he disagreeeth. It is sayde in the same place, that Christ was made vnto wisdome, which belongeth to none but to the eternall worde. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisdome. I answere that the onely begotten sonne of God was in deede his eternall wisdome, but in Pauls wrytings that name is giuen him in diuerse wise, because all the treasures of wisdome and knowledge are layde vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he disclosed vnto vs: and so that which Paul saith is not referred vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our vse, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhoode: because although he shined a light in darkenes, before that he did put on flesh, yet it was a hidden light til the same Christ came forth in the nature of man, the shining sunne of righteousnesse, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the worlde. Also it is foolishly obiected of him, that the power of iustifying is farre aboute both Angels and men: forasmuch as this hangeth not vpon the worthinesse of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to satisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, because they are not appointed thereunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which was made subiect to the law, to redeem vs from the curse of the lawe. Also he doth sleaundersly cauill, that they which denie that Christ is our righteousnesse according to his nature of Godheade, doe leaue but one part of Christ, and (which is worse) do make two gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they say again that we are not righteous by the righteousnes of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we do not by & by take away y^e honor from whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in y^e flesh, but we only make a distinction how the righteousnes of God is conueied vnto vs, that we may enjoy it. In which point Oslander hath too sowlly erred. Neither do we deny that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, procedeth from the secret grace & power of God: and we striue not against this, that the righteousnesse which Christ giueth vs is the righteousnesse of God that procedeth from God: but we holde this stedfastly, that we haue righteousnesse and life in the death & resurrection of Christ. I ouerpasse that heaping together of places whereof he may wel be ashamed, wherewith he hath tediously combed the readers without choise and without common reason, to proue that wherefoeuer is made mention of righteousnes, there ought to be vnderstanded this essentiall righteousnesse. As where Dauid calleth vpon the righteousnes of God to helpe him: whereas hee doeth in same about a hundred times, Osiander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other obiection, y^e that is properly and rightly called righteousnesse, whereby we be moued to do rightly, but that God onely worketh in vs both to will and to performe. For we doe also not denie, but that God reformeth vs with his spirite vnto holinesse of life and righteousnesse: but we must first see whether hee doe this by him selfe & immediatly, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left al^l y^e fulnesse of his holy spirite, that with his abundant store he should supplie the neede of his members. Moreouer although righteousnesse come vnto vs out of the secreete fountaine of the godheade, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the fleshe for our sakes, was righteousnesse vnto vs according to his nature of godhead. No lesse sonde is y^e which he saith, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousnesse of God. Because vnlesse the wil of his father had moued him, he could not himselfe haue satisfied the office comitted vnto him. For though we haue in another place saide, that all the deseruings of Christ himselfe do proceede from the mere good will of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantastick thing, wherwith Osiander bewitcheth both his owne & simple mens eyes. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, y^e because God is the fountain & beginning of our righteousnes, therefore we be essentially righteous, and y^e essence of Gods righteousnesse dwelleth in vs? In redeeming y^e Church (saith Esay) God did put on his righteousnes as a harnessse: but did hee so to spoile Christ of his armure which he had giuen him, to make him to be no perfect redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other wordes, saying that he gaue vs saluation in the shewing of his righteousnes. But this doth not ouerthrow y^e which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whosoever wrappeth vp a double righteousnes, that poore soules may not rest in the meere only mercie of God, he doth in a mockerie crowne Christ with thornes.

13 But for asmuch as a great part of men, imagineth righteousnesse to bee made of faith and workes, let vs first shewe this also, that the righteousnes of faith and workes doe so differ, that when the one is stablished, the other must needes be ouerthrowen. The Apostle saith that hee esteemed all things as dong, that he might winne Christ and finde in him the righteousnes that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousnesse that which is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Iesu Christ. You see that here is also a comparison of contraries and y^e here is declared that he which will obtaine the righteousnes of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousnes. Therefore in another place he saith, y^e this was the cause of fal to the Iewes y^e going about to stablish their owne righteousnes, they were not subiect to the righteousnes of God. If in stablishing our owne righteousnes we shake away the righteousnes of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousnesse our owne must bee vtterly abolished. And hee sheweth the same thing, when hee sayth, that our glorying is not excluded by the lawe, but by faith. Wherevpon followeth that so long as there remayneth any righteousnesse of

Rom. 4. 1.

of workes, howe little soeuer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorie vpon. Nowe if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousnesse of workes can no wise be coupled with the righteousnesse of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romaines, that he leauech no rume for cauillations or shiftes: If (saith he) Abraham was iustified by workes, he hath glorie. And immediatly he addeth: but hee hath no glorie in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not iustified by workes. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when rewarde is rendered to workes, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deseruings of workes. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousnesse made of faith and workes mingled together.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they haue a subtle shifte, that make to themselves sport and pastime with wresting of Scripture and with vaine cauillations. For they expounde workes in that place to bee those which men not yet regenerate doe onely literally and by the endeouour of free wil with out the grace of Christ: and doe say that it belongeth not to spiritual workes. So by their opinion a man is iustified both by faith and by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the giftes of Christ and fruites of regeneration. For they say that Paul spake so for none other cause, but to conuince the Lewes, trusting vpon their owne workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousnesse to themselves, such the onely spirit of Christ doeth giue it vs, and not any indeouour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparison of the righteousnesse of the law & the righteousnesse of the Gospel, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title soeuer they be adorned. For hee teacheth that this is the righteousnesse of the lawe, that he should obtaine saluation that hath performed that which the lawe commaundeth: and that this is the righteousnesse of faith, if we beleue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreouer wee shall hereafter shewe in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteousnesse are seuerall benefites of Christ. Wherevpon followeth that the verie spirituall workes come not into the account, when the power of iustifying is ascribed to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen nowe alleadged) that Abraham had any thing wherevpon to glorie before God, because he was not made righteous by workes: this ought not to be restrained to the literall and outwarde kinde of vertues, or to the endeouour of free will. But although the life of the patriarch Abraham were spirituall and in maner Angellike, yet he had not sufficient deseruings of workes to purchase him righteousnes before God.

15 The Schoolemen teach a litle more grossly that mingle their preparations: but these doe lesse infect the simple and vnskilfull with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretence of Spirite and grace hiding the mercie of GOD which onely is able to appease trembling consciences. But we confesse with Paul that the doers of the lawe are iustified before God: but because we are all farre from the keeping of the lawe, herevpon wee gather, that the works which shoulde most of all haue auailed to righteousnesse, doe nothing help vs because we lacke them. As for the common Papistes or Scholemen, they are in this point doubly deceiued: both because they call faith an assurednesse of conscience in looking for rewarde at the hande of God for desertings, and also because they expounde the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousness, but the holy ghost helping to the endeuour of holinesse. They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first belieue y^e there is a God, & then that he is a render of rewarde to them that seeke him. But they marke not, what is the maner of seeking. And that they are deceiued in the name of grace, is plainly proued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iustification by Christ is giuen vs two wayes. First (saith he) the death of Christ doth iustifie vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Sathan helde vs captiue, so y^e now he hath not whereby to condemne vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in iustification, to be so farre as we are directed to good woorkes by the grace of the holy Ghost. He would forsooth haue followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a farre off, & goeth farre out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it, if there be any thing in Augustine not very vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen haue still strayed from worse to worse, til with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the verie sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be receiued. For though he singularly well taketh from man all praise of righteousness, and assigneth it wholly to y^e grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby we are renued into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

deth vs to a farre other ende, that is to say, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne woorkes, we should only looke vnto the mercie of God & perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of iustification, that first god vouchsaueth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere & free goodnes, considering nothing in him but miserie whereby he may be moued to mercie, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked & voide of good woorkes, fetching from himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which despairing vpon his owne woorkes casteth all the sunnne of his saluation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into possession of his saluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell y^e he is reconciled to God: y^e obtaining forgiveness of sinnes by meanes of the righte-ousnes of Christ, he is iustified: & although he be regenerate by the spirit of God, he thinketh vpon continuall righteousness layde vp for him not in the good woorkes to which he applyeth himselfe, but in the only righteousness of Christ. When these things shall be euery one particularly weyed, they shall giue a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth. But it maketh little matter, so that they hang together in such sort that we may haue the whole matter truely declared & surely proued.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that we haue before saide

to be betweene faith and the Gospel: because it is saide for this cause y^e faith iustificth, for that it receiueth & embraceth the righteousness offered in the Gospel. And whereas it is said to be offered by the Gospel, thereby all consideration of workes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times else where, but most plainly in two places. For, to the Romans, comparing the law and the gospel together he saith: the righteousness that is by the law is thus, the man that doth these things shall liue in them. But the righteousness that is of faith offereth saluation, if thou beleeue in thy heart & confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, & that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the lawe & the Gospel, that the law giueth righteousness to workes, and the gospel giueth free righteousness without helpe of workes? it is a notable place, and that may deliuer vs out of many hard doubtcs, if wee vnderstande that the same righteousness that is giuen vs by the gospel is free from al conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more then once with great seeming of contrarietie set the promise by way of opposition against the law, as if the inheritance be of the law, then is it not of the promise: and all the rest in the same chapter to the same effect. Truly the law it selfe hath also her promises. Therefore there must needs be in the promises of the gospel, something different and diuerse from the promises of the law, vnlesse we wil confesse that the comparison is very fond. But what diuersitie shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promises of the law hang vpon the condition of workes? Neither let any man here carpe against mee, and say, that in this place the righteousness is reiectcd which men of their owne force and freewill would compell God to receiue: forasmuch as Paul without exception teacheth that the law in commaunding profiteth nothing: because there is none not onely of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfillerh it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the law: when the Spirite of GOD frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteousnesse, but for that euen in the holy ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no rewardc.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is iustified by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall liue by faith. But the lawe is not of faith: but the man that doth these things shall liue in them. Howe could this argument otherwise stand together, vnlesse wee agree vpon this point, that workes come not into the account of faith, but are vtterly to be seuered from it? The law (saith he) differeth from faith. Why so? because workes are required to the righteousness therof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteousness of faith. By this relation it appeareth, that they which are iustified by faith are iustified beside the deseruing of workes, yea without the deseruing of workes, because faith receiueth that righteousness which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospel differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousness to workes, but setteth it in the only mercy of god. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glory vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteousness, & he addeth a confirmation, because then then there is place for the righteouſnes of faith, when there are no workes to which a reward is due. Where be workes (ſaith he) due reward is rendered vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the verie meaning of the words that he vſeth in that place ſerue to proue the ſame.

Whereas he adioyneth within a litle after, y therefore we obtaine the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, becauſe it is received by faith: and how commeth y, but becauſe faith without any help of workes leaneth wholly vpon y mercie of God? And in the ſame meaning, without doubt hee teacheth in another place, that the righteouſnes of God was openly ſhewed without the law, although it haue witneſſe borne of it by the law & the Prophets: becauſe excluding the law, he ſaith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come emptie that we may receiue it. Rom. 3. 21.

19 By this time the reader perceiueth with what equitie the Sophiſters do at this day cauil at our doctrine, when wee ſay, that man is iuſtified by faith only. They dare not deny that man is iuſtified by faith becauſe it is ſo often found in Scripture: but becauſe this word, Onely, is neuer expreſſed, they cannot abide to haue ſuch an addition made. Is it ſo? But what wil they anſwere to theſe words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteouſnes is not of faith except it be freely giuen? How can free gift agree with workes? And with what cauillations will they mocke out, that which he ſaith in another place, that the righteouſnes of God is manifeſtly ſhewed in the Goſpell? If righteouſnes be manifeſtly ſhewed in the Goſpel, ſurely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteouſnes, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they ſtande vpon not onely a falſe but alſo a fooliſh ſhift about this excluſiue word, Only. Doeth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onely faith, that taketh all thinges from workes? What, I pray you meane theſe ſayings: that righteouſneſſe was manifeſtly ſhewed without the lawe; that man is iuſtified freely and without y workes of the lawe? Here they haue a wittie ſhift to eſcape withall, which although they deuifed it not themſelues but borrowed it of Origen & certaine of the olde writers, yet is verie fooliſh. They prate that the ceremoniall workes of the lawe, not the morall, are excluded. They profit ſo with continuall brawling, that they knowe not the verie firſt rules of Logike. Do they thinke that the Apoſtle doted when he alleaged theſe places to proue his ſaying? The man that ſhall do theſe things ſhall liue in them: and, Cursed is euery one that fulfilleth not all thinges that are written in the volume of the lawe. Vnleſſe they be madde, they will not ſay that liſe was promiſed to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curſe threatened onely to the breakers of them. If theſe places be to be vnderſtanded of the morall law, it is no doubt that the morall workes alſo are excluded from the power of iuſtifying. To the ſame purpoſe ſerue theſe arguments y he vſeth: becauſe the knowledge of ſinne was by the lawe, therefore righteouſneſſe is not by the law. Becauſe the law worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteouſneſſe. Becauſe the lawe cannot make conſcience aſſured, therefore alſo it cannot giue righteouſneſſe. Becauſe faith is imputed vnto righteouſneſſe, therefore righteouſneſſe is not a reward of worke, but is giuen being not due. Rom. 4. 2. Rom. 1. 17. Gal. 3. 21. & 24.

Gal. 3.21.

Because we are iustified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had bene a law giuen that might giue life, then righteousness were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all vnder sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleeuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of manners: but verie children woulde hisse out so great shamelesnesse. Therefore let vs holde this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of iustifying is taken away from the law.

Gal. 3.7.

20 But if any man marueile why the Apostle vsed such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although workes be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousness of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claim any reward as due vnto them, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefore this of the bountifullnes of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name & rewarde of righteousness: & they be of value only for this cause, when the purpose of him y^e doeth them is by them to shewe his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to proue y^e Abraham could not be iustified by works, allegeth that the law was giuen, almost foure hundred & thirtie yeres after the couenant made. Vnlearned men would laugh at such an argument, because there might be righteous workes before the publishing of the lawe. But because he knewe that there was no such value in workes but by the testimonie and vouchsauing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the lawe they had no power to iustifie. Wee vnderstande why he namely expresseth the worke of the lawe, when he meaneth to take away iustification from any workes because controuersie may be moued of those & none other. Albeit sometime he excepteth all workes without any addition, as when he sayeth that by the testimonie of Dauid blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without workes. Therefore they can with no cauillations bring to passe, but y^e we shal get this general exclusiue, only. And they do in vaine seeke y^e trifling suttletie, that wee are iustified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousness must stande vpon loue. We grant in deede with Paul, y^e no other faith iustificieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of iustifying from that effectualnes of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane iustifie, but because it bringeth vs into the communicating of the righteousness of Christ. Or else al that which the Apostle so earnestly presleth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (saith he) the rewarde is not reckened according to grace, but according to det. But to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that iustificieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousness. Could he speake more evidently than in so saying? that there is no righteousness of faith but where there are no workes to which any rewarde is due: and that onely then faith is imputed vnto righteousness, when righteousness is giuen by grace that is not due.

Rom. 4.6.

Ga. 5.6.

Rom. 4.4.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is saide in the definition, that the righteousness of faith is the reconciliation with God, which consisteth

sisteth vpon the only forgiueneſſe of finnes. We muſt alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God reſteth vpon all men, ſo long as they continue to be ſinners. That hath Eſay excellently well ſet out in theſe words: The hand of the Lorde is not ſhortned, that he is not able to ſaue: nor his eare dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities haue made diſagreement betweene you and your God, & your finnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that ſinne is the diuiſion betweene man & God, & the turning away of Gods face from the ſinner. Neither can it otherwiſe be. For it is diſagreeing from his righteouſnes to haue any fellowſhip with ſin. Wherefore the Apoſtle teacheth y^e man is enimie to God til he be reſtored into fauour by Chriſt. Whom therefore the Lorde receiueth into ioyning with him, him he is ſaid to iuſtifie: becauſe he can neither receiue him into fauour nor ioyne him with himſelfe, but he muſt of a ſinner make him righteouſ. And we further ſay, that this is done by the forgiueneſſe of finnes. For if they whome the Lord hath reconciled to himſelfe be iudged by their works, they ſhalbe found ſtil ſinners in deede, who yet muſt be free & cleane from ſinne. It is certaine therefore that they whome God embraceth, are no otherwiſe made righteouſ, but becauſe they are cleaſed by hauing the ſportes of their finnes wiped away by forgiueneſſe, that ſuch a righteouſneſſe may in one worde be called the forgiueneſſe of finnes.

22 Both theſe are moſt clearly to be ſeene by theſe words of Paul, which I haue alreadie alleaged: God was in Chriſt reconciling the worlde to himſelfe, not imputing their finnes to man, and he hath left with vs the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the ſumme of his meſſage, y^e him which knewe no ſinne he made ſinne for vs, that we might be made the righteouſnes of God in him. Here he nameth righteouſnes and reconciliation without difference, that wee may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteouſneſſe to be when our finnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth iuſtifie vs, when thou heareſt that he doth reconcile vs to himſelfe by not imputing finnes. So to the Romanes he proueth by the teſtimonie of Dauid, that righteouſnes is imputed to man without works, becauſe Dauid pronounceth the man bleſſed whoſe iniquities are forgiuen, whoſe finnes are covered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without doubt by bleſſednes he there meaneth righteouſneſſe. As ſith he affirmeth the ſame to ſtand in the forgiueneſſe of finnes, there is no cauſe why we ſhould otherwiſe define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of Iohn the Bapriſt ſingeth that the knowledge of ſaluation conſiſteth in y^e forgiueneſſe of finnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerning the ſumme of ſaluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this manner: by him forgiueneſſe of finnes is preached vnto you, & euery one that belieueth in him is iuſtified from all theſe thinges, from which ye could not be iuſtified in the law of Moſes. The Apoſtle ſo knitteth the forgiueneſſe of finnes with righteouſnes, that he ſheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reaſoneth that the righteouſnes is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnes of God. Neither ought it to ſeeme a ſtrange vnused ſpeech, that the faithfull are righteous before God, not by workes, but by free acceptance: sith both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also doe sometime so speak. For Augustine saith thus in one place: The righteousness of y^e saintes in this worlde standeth rather in forgiuenesse of sinnes, than in perfection of vertues. Wherwith agreeth the notable sentences of Bernard: Not to sin is the righteousness of God: but the righteousness of man, is the mercifull kindnes of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to vs righteousness in absolution, and therefore that they only are righteous that haue obtained pardon by mercy.

23 Hereupon also followeth this, that by the onely meane of Christes righteousness, we obtaine to be iustified before God. Which is as much in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousness of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthie to be heede fully marked. For that trifling error vanisheth away, to say y^e man is therefore iustified by faith, because faith taketh parte of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine aboue taught, that they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is no dout y^e he is void of his own righteousness, that is taught to seeke righteousness without himself. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly wheⁿ he writeth y^e he which knew no sinne was made for vs a propitiatorie sacrifice to cleanse away sinne, y^e we might be made the righteousness of God in him. You see y^e our righteousness is not in vs but in Christ, & y^e it belongeth to vs onely by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because we possesse all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary that in another place he teacheth, y^e sinne was condemned of sinne in y^e flesh of Christ, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but y^e which we obtaine by imputation. For y^e Lord Christ doth in such sort communicate his righteousness with vs, that after a certain maruellous maner, he poureth the force thereof into vs, so much as pertaineth to the iudgement of God. It appeareth y^e he did no otherwise meane, by the other sentence which he had spoken a litle before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are iustified. What is it else to set our righteousness in the obedience of Christ, but to affirme y^e hereby only we are accounted righteous, because y^e obedience of Christ is imputed vnto vs as if it were our own? Therefore methinkes y^e Ambrose hath excellently well shewed, howe there is an example of this righteousness in the blessing of Iacob. For as Iacob hauing not of himselfe deserued the preeminencie of y^e first begotten sonne, hid himself in the apparel of his brother, & being clothed wth his brothers cote y^e sauoured of a most sweet smel, he crept into the fauor of his father, & receiued y^e blessing to his own comoditie vnder the person of another: so wee do lye hidden vnder the precious purenes of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimony of righteousness in the sight of God. The wordes of Ambrose are these: Whereas Isaac smelt the saueur of the garments, peradventure this is meant thereby, that we are not iustified by workes but by faith: because fleshy weakenesse hindereth workes, but the brightnes of faith which meriteth forgiuenesse of sinnes, ouershadoweth the error of deedes. And truely so it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto saluation, it is necessary for vs, to smell sweetely with his odour, and to haue our faultes couered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That, to the end we may be fully persuaded of the free iustification, we must lift up our mindes to the iudgement seat of God.

Although it appeareth by most euident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not clearely perceiue how necessaric they be, vntill we haue set before our eyes those things that ought to be the groudes of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that wee purpose not to speake of the righteousnes of a worldly iudiciall court, but of the heavenly iudgement.seate: that we shoulde not measure by our owne small portion, by what vprightnesse of workes Gods iudgement may be satisfied. But it is maruelous to see with what rashnes and boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be seene howe none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteousnesse of workes, than they that are either monstrously sicke of open outward diseases, to be readie to burst with inward vices. That cometh to passe because they thinke not vpon the righteousnesse of God, whereof if they had neuer so litle feeling, they would neuer make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such and so perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but euery way whole & absolute, & defiled with no vncleanes: such as neuer was and neuer shal be able to be found in man. It is in deede easie and ready for euery man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthinesse of workes to iustific men: But when they come iuto the sight of God, such dalliance must auoide, because there is earnest doing vsed, and no trifling strife about wordes. To this, to this I say, we must apply our mind, if we will profitably enquire of true righteousnesse: how we may answer the heavenly iudge when he calleth vs to accout. Let vs think him to be a iudge, not such a one as our owne vnderstandings doe of themselves imagine: but such a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whose brightnesse the starres shalbe darkened, by whose strength the hills doe melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wise are taken in their subtlety, by whose purenesse all things are proued vnpure, whose righteousnesse the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocent, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pearceth to the bottome of hel. If he (I say) sit to examine mens doinges, who shall appeare assured before his throne: who shall dwell with a deuouring fire: sayth the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burnings: he that walketh in righteousnesse and speaketh truth, &c. But let such a one come forth, whatsoeuer he be. But that answer maketh, that none commeth forth. For this terrible saying soundeth to the contrary: Lord if thou marke iniquities, Lord, who shall abide it? truely all must needes immediatly perish, as it is written in another place: Shall man be iustified if he be compared with GOD, or shall he be purer than his maker: Beholde they that serue him are not faithfull, and he hath found peruersnes in his Angels. How much more shal they that dwell in houses of clay, and that haue an earthly foundation, be consumed with moethes? they shalbe cut downe from the morning to the euening. Beholde among his Saintes there is none faithfull, & the heauens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abhominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt in deede that in the booke of Job, is mention made of a righteousnesse that is hyer than the keeping of the lawe. And it is good to vnderstande this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stande to the triall of that righteousnesse that passeth all senses. Therefore although Job be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amased, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angelike holinesse can not appease God, if he exactly weye their workes. But I therefore wil at this time ouerpasse that righteousnesse which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than senselesse if so many curses wherewith the Lorde hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, and among other this generall curse, Cursed is euery one that doeth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shalbe but vnfaury and cold, vnlesse euery man yelde himselfe guiltie before the heauenly iudge, and willingly throwe downe and abase himselfe, being carefull how he may be acquitted.

2 To this, to this I say, we should haue lifted vp our eyes, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainely to reioyce. It is in deede easie, so long as the comparison extendeth no further than men, for euery man to think himselfe to haue somewhat which other ought not to despise. But when we rise vp to haue respect vnto God then suddenly that confidence falleth to the ground and cometh to naught. And in y same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heauen. For the sight of the eye, so long as it continueth in vewing things that lie neere vnto it, doth shewe of what piercing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being daseled and dulled with the too great brightnes therof, it feeleth no lesse feblenes of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perceiued strength in beholding inferior things. Therefore let vs not deceiue our selues with vaine confidence, although we count our selues either equall or superiour to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose wil this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildenes can not be tamed with these admonitiōs, he will answere to vs as he sayd to the Pharisees: you be they that iustifie your selues before men: but that which is hie to men is abhominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boast of thy righteousnes among men, while God from heauen abhorreth it. But what say the seruantes of God that are truly instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, because euery liuing man shall not be justified in thy sight. An other faith, although in somewhat diuerse meaning: Man can not be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answere one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousnesse of God; euen such as can be satisfied with no workes of men, to whome when it examineth vs of a thousande offences, we can not purge our selues of one. Such a righteousnesse had had that same chosen instrument of God Paul conceiued, when he professed that hee knew himselfe gilty in nothing, but that he was not thereby ^{1. Cor. 4. 4.} justified.

3 And not only such exāples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly wryters do shewe that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine sayth. ^{Ad Boni. lib. 3. cap. 5.} All the godly that grone vnder this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weaknesse of life haue this onely hope that wee haue one mediator Iesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our sinnes. What saith he? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it onely, he leaueth none other. And Bernard saith. ^{Super can. ser. 61.} And indeed where is safe and stedfast rest and assurednesse for the weake, but in the woundes of our Sauour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as hee is mightier to saue. The worlde rageth, the bodie burdeneth, the deuill lieth in waite. I fall not, because I am buildd vpon the sure rocke. I haue sinned a greuous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shall not be ouertroubled, because I shall remember the woundes of the Lorde. And here vpon afterwarde he concludeth: Therefore my merite is the Lordes taking of mercie, I am not vtterly without merite, so long as hee is not without mercies. ^{In psal. qui habitat ser. 15.} But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also haue as many merites. Shall I sing mine owne righteousnesse? Lorde I will remember onely thy righteousness. For that is also my righteousnesse, for hee is made vnto mee righteousnesse of God. Againe in an other place, ^{In cant. ser. 13.} This is the whole merite of man, if hee put his whole hope in him that saucth whole man. Likewise where retaining peace to himselfe hee leaueth the glorie to God. To thee (saith hee) let glorie remaine vnminished: it shall bee well with mee, if I haue peace. I forswere glorie altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I loose also that which is offered me. And more plainly in an other place he saith: Why shoulde the Church be carefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer way to glorie vpon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites we hope for good thinges, specially when thou hearest in the Prophete, I will doe it, not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, saith the Lorde. ^{Eze. 36. 22. & 32.} It sufficeth for merite, to knowe that merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presume of merites, so to be without merits sufficeth to iudgement. Whereas hee freely vseth this worde Merites for good workes, wee must therein beare with the custome. But in the end his purpose was to make hipocrites afraid, that wildly range with licentiousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterwarde he expoundeth himselfe saying: Happie is the church that neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumption without merites. It hath where vpon to presume, but not merites. It hath merits, but to deserue, not to presume. Is not the verie not presuming a deseruing? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, hauing large matter to glorie vpon, euen the manie mercies of the Lorde.

4 This is the the truth. The exercised consciences perceiue this to bee the onely sanctuarie of safetie, wherein they may safely rest themselues when they haue to doe with the iudgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed seemed most bright in the night season, doe loose their brightnes, with sight of the sunne, what thinke we shalbe come euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shall be compared with the purenesse of God? For that shalbe a most seuerer examination, that shal pearce into the most hidden thoughts of the heart, and (as Paul saith) shall reueale the secretes of darkenes, and disclose the hidden thinges of the heart, which shall compell the lurking & unwilling conscience to vtter all thinges that now are fallen out of remembrance. The Deuill our accuser will presse vs, which is priuie to all the wicked dedes that he hath moued vs to doc. There the outwarde pompous shewes of good workes which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profit vs. Onely the purenesse of will shall be required. Wherefore the Hypocricie, not only whereby euerie man knowing himselfe guiltie before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherewith euery man deceiueth him selfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoeuer it nowe be proude with more than drunken boldnes. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may indeed for a short time sweetely and pleasantly frame a righteousnes to themselues, but it is such a righteousnesse as shall bee by and by shaken away from them at the iudgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnesse, shal certainly finde that all the workes of men, if they be iudged by their owne worthines, are nothing but defilings and filthines: that that which among the common people is accompted righteousnes, is before God mere wickednes: that that which is iudged puritie, is vnclennesse: that that which is reckened glory, is but shame.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not greue vs to descend to looke vpon our selues without flatterie or blind affection of loue. For it is no meruell if we be all so blinde in this behalfe, for asmuch as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tendernesse towarde himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs all. To euery man (saith Salomon) his owne way is right in his owne eyes. Againe. All the wayes of man seeme cleane in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquitted by this blindness? No, But (as he further saith in the same place) the Lorde weyeth the heartes, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outwarde visor or righteousnes that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lorde with his balance examineth the hidden vnclennes of the heart. Therefore sith we see nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our selues to our owne destruction. But that wee may trie our selues rightly, we must necessarily call backe our conscience to y^e iudgement seat of God. For we do altogether neede his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruersnesse, which otherwise lie too decpely hidden. For then and neuer till then, we shal clerely perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottennesse and a worme, abhominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednes as water is far from being iustified before God. For who shoulde make that cleane that is conceiued of vnclane seede? nor one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Iob saide of himselfe: If I will goe about to shewe my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: if I will shewe my selfe righteous, it will prooue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophete in old time complained of Israel, that all went astray like sheepe, that euery one turned aside to his owne way. For he there comprehendeth althē, to whom y grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examination ought to proceede so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwne downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For hee is deceiued that thinketh himselfe able to receiue the enoying of this grace, vntill hee haue first throwne downe all hawtinesse of minde. This is a known saying: that God confoundeth the proude, and giueth grace to the humble. Esay. 53. 6.

6 But what way is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needie and emprie, shoulde giue place to the mercie of God? For I doe not call it humblenesse, if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs. And hitherto they haue taught a very hurteful hypocritie that haue ioyned these two things together, that wee must thinke humbly of our selues before G O D, and that we must make some account of our owne righteousness. For if we confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we doe wickedly lie vnto him: but we can not thinke as we ought, but that by & by al that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared saluation for the humble people, and abacement for the eyes of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no entrie open to saluation, vntill thou haue laide away al pride and taken to thee perfect humblenesse: then, y the same humblenesse is not a certaine modestie wherby thou giuest ouer to the Lord a haire breedth of thine own right, as they are called humble before men that do neither presumptuously aduaunce themselues; nor reprochfully triumph ouer other, although they stand vpon some estimation of their owne excellencie: but an vnfeined submission of a mind throwne downe with feeling of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so echwhere described in the word of God. When the Lord saith thus in Zephanias: I will take away out of thee him that outragiously reioyseth, & I will leaue in the middes of thee the afflicted man & the poore man, and they shall trust in the Lorde: doeth he not there plainely shewe who be humble? euen they y lie afflicted with knowledge of their own pueritie. On the other side hee calleth the proude, outragious reioysers, because men ioying in prosperitie are wont to reioyce without measure. But to the humble whome he purposeth to saue, hee leaueth nothing but to trust in the Lorde. And likewise it is sayde in Esay: Whome shall I looke vnto, but to the poore and contrite in spirite, and him y feareth my words? Againe: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on hie, and in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirite, to quicken the spirite of the humble and the hearte of the contrite. When thou so oft hearest the name of contrition, vnderstand thereby the wound of the heart, that suffereth not a man thrown downe on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of G O D bec aduaunced with the hum- 1. Pet. 5. 5. humble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mighty hand of God to thy shame and disgracement.

7 And our best Schoolemaster thinking it not enough to shewe it out in wordes, hath also set out vnto vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth foorth a Publicane that standing a farr off, not daring to lift vp his eyes to heauen, with much knocking his brest, prayeth in this wise: Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner. Let vs not thinke these to be tokens of fained modestie, that hee dare not looke vp to heauen, nor to come nerer, that with knocking his brest he confesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs knowe that they bee testimonies of inwarde affection. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee, which thanketh God that he is not of the common sorte of men, either an oppresser, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fasted twise on the Sabbath, & gaue tithes of all that hee possessed. He doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousness which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfaouered and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednesse is iustified. Hereby we may see, howe great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the heart cannot be open to receiue his mercie, vnlesse it bee first void of all opinion of his owne worthinesse. When this opinion hath possessed the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercie to enter. And that no man shoulde doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach libertie to the captiue, & deliuerance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourne: to giue them glorie for ashes, oyle for mourning, the robe of praise for the spirite of sorrow. According to this commission, he callerh none but them that labour and are loden to take parte of his liberalitie. And in an other place he saith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8 Therefore if we will giue place to the calling of Christ, let al arrogancie & carelesnes depart far away frō vs. Arrogancie groweth of a folish persuasion of our owne righteousness, when a man thinketh himselfe to haue somewhat, by the deseruing whereof he may bee commended before God, carelesnesse may bee euen without any persuasion of workes. Form any sinners, because being dronke with sweetnesse of vices they thinke not vpon the iudgement of God, lie as it were senselesly amased with a disease of drouines, that they aspire not to the mercie offered them. But we must no lesse shake off such dull sluggishnesse, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our selues, that wee may without incombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empty and hungrie may be filled with his good things. For wee shall neuer sufficiently haue trust in him, vnlesse we vtterly distrust of our selues, wee shall neuer sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first throwne downe in our selues. Wee shall neuer sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse wee be first desolate in our selues. Therefore we be then mete to take holde of and obtaine the fauour of God, casting away all trust of our selues, but trusting vpon the onely assurednesse of his goodness, when (as Augustine saith) forgetung our owne deseruings, we imbrace the giftes of Christ.

Because if he sought deseruings in vs, we shoulde not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very wel accordeth, comparing proude men to vnfaithfull seruantes, that arrogantly claime any thing be it neuer so litle to their owne deseruings: because they do wrongfully keepe to themselues the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would say that it bringeth forth the sun-beame which it receiueh through a windowe. But, not to tary longer here-vpon, let vs take a short but a generall & sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath vtterly empyed himselfe, I will not say of righteousnesse, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windy image of righteousnes. Because euery man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he resteth in himselfe.

That there are two things to be marked in free iustification.

AND here are alway two things to be principally looked vnto: y^e is to say, that there may remaine to the Lorde his glory vnminished, & as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an vntroubled quietnes and calme tranquillitie before his iudgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to giue onely to God a confession of praise, when we entreate of righteousnes. And the Apostle testifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpose of giuing vs righteousnes in Christ, y^e he might shew his owne righteousnes. And what a shewing y^e shold be, he declareth immediatly after: that is, if he alone be knowen to be righteous, & that iustified him that is of the faith of Iesus Christ. Thou seest y^e the righteousnes of God is not sufficiently set out, vnlesse hee alone be accounted righteous, and do communicate the grace of righteousnes to them that deserue it not. By this meane he will haue euery mouth to be stopped, and the whole world to be made subiect to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somewhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much we glorifie his name by reknowledging of our owne wickednesse. You shall remember (sayth he) the wayes and all the wicked doings wherewith ye haue beene defiled. And ye shall be displeas'd with your selues in your owne sight, in all the euils that ye haue committed. And ye shall knowe that I am the Lord, when I shall do good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contained in the true knowledge of God, that we being broosed with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lorde any parcell be it neuer so small of the praise of his free goodnes? Likewise Ieremie when he cryeth out, Let not the wise man glorie in his wisdom, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorieth, glory in the Lord: doth he not there declare y^e somewhat is diminished from Gods glory, if man glory in himselfe? To this purpose truly doth Paul apply those wordes, when he teacheth that all the partes of our saluation are reposed in Christ, that wee should not glory but in the Lorde. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darkeneth his glory, whosoever thinketh that he hath any thing.

2. This is the truth, we neuer truly glory in him, vnlesse we be vtterly put from our owne glory. On the other side, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that all they glory against God that glory in themselues. For Paul iudgeth that onely by this meane the world is made subiect to God, when all matter to glory vpon is vtterly taken from men. Therefore Esaie, when he declareth that Israell shall haue their iustification in God, sayeth also that they shall there also haue their prayse: as though he shoulde say, that the Lorde to this ende iustificeth the elect that they should glorye in him and in nothing else. But how we ought to be praised in the Lorde, he had taught in the verse next before: that is, that we should sweare that our righteousnes and strength are in the Lorde. Not that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed with an othe, that a man shoulde not thinke that he shall be discharged with I wote not what fained humilitie. And let no man here allege for excuse that he doth not glory when without arrogance he reknowledgeth his owne righteousnesse: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it breedeth glory. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteousnesse wee must haue regarde to this ende, that the prayse thereof remaine with the Lorde whole and perfect. Forasmuch as for declaration of his righteousnes (as the Apostle testifieth) he hath poured out his grace vpon vs, that he might be iust and iustifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in an other place, when he had taught that the Lord gaue vs saluation, to set out the glory of his name, afterward as it were repeting the same thing he addeth: ye are saued by grace and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none shoulde glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of saluation that we should declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darkenesse into his maruelous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the onely prayses of God to sounde in the eares of the faithfull, that they shoulde with deepe silence oppresse all arrogancie of the flesh. In a summe, man can not without robbery of God challenge to himself any one crum of righteousness: because euen so much is plucked & taken away from the glory of Gods righteousness.

3 Now if we ask by what mean the conscience may be quited before God, wee shall finde no other meane but if free righteousness be giuen vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this saying of Salomon, Who shal say: I haue cleansed my heart, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truly there is no man that shall not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthinesse. Therefore let euen the perfectest man descende into his owne conscience, and call his doinges to account: what end shall he haue? Shall he sweetly rest as though all things were in good order betweene him and GOD? and shall he not rather be vexed with terrible tormentes, when he shall feele matter of damnation abiding in himselfe if he be iudged according to his workes? The conscience if it looke vpon God, must of necessitie either haue assured peace with his iudgement, or be beseeched with the terrours of hell. Therefore we profit nothing in disputing of righteousness vnlesse we stablish such a righteousness, with the stedfastnesse wherof our soule may be stayed in the iudgement

ment of God. When our soule shal haue whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receiue his iudgement, vnshaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue founde an vnfaigned righteousnes. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much vpon this point, with whose words I had rather expresse it than with mine owne. If (saith he) the promise of inheritaunce be of the law, faith is made voide, the promise is made abolished. Hee first inferreth that faith is disanulled and made void if the promise of righteousnesse haue respect to the deseruings of our works, or doe hang vpon the keeping of the lawe. For so coulde neuer any man assuredly rest in it: because it coulde neuer come to passe y any man might assuredly determine with him selfe that he had satisfied the lawe, as indee neuer any man doeth by workes fully satisfie it. Whereof, that we should not neede to seeke far for testimonies to prooue it, euerie man may be a witnessse to himselfe that will with a right eye behold himselfe. And hereby appeareth, in how deepe and darke corners hypocrisie buried the mindes of men, while they so carelesly beare with them selues, that they sticke not to set their own flatteries against y iudgemēt of God, as though they wold bind to a stay his iudiciall proceeding. But the faithfull that doe sincerely examine themselves, are greued and tormented with a farre other manner of carefulnes. Therefore there should so enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a verie despeire where ech man for himselfe should make account, with how great a burden of debt he is still ouerpressed, and how far he is frō the condition wherwith he is charged. Loec, how faith is by this meane alreadie expressed & extinguished. For to wauer, to varie, to be carried vp & down, to stick fast in douting, to be holden in suspense, to stagger, & at length to despeire, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy mind with cōstant certainty, and perfect assurednes, and to haue wherevpon to rest and fasten thy foote.

4 He adioyneth also an other thing, that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang vpon our deseruing, when shal we come thus far as to deserue the bountifullnes of God? Also this seconde point hangeth vpon the former: For the promise shall not be fulfilled but to them that beleue it. Therefore if faith be fallen, there shall remaine no force of the promise, Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to stablishe the promise. For it is abundantly wel stablised when it resteth vpon the onely mercie of God: because his mercie & trueth are with a perpetual knot ioyned together, that is to say, whatsoeuer God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So Dauid, before that he required saluation by the word of god first determineth y cause thereof to be in his mercie. Let thy mercies (saith he) come vnto me, thy saluation according to thy word. And rightfully: because God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise, but of his owne mere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten al our hope and not to looke to our owne workes, to seeke any helpe of them. And that you should not thinke that I herein speake any newe thing: Augustine doth also teache that wee ought so to doe. Christ (saith hee) shall reigne for euer in his seruantes, G O D hath promised it. God hath saide it, and if that bee not enough, G O D hath sworne it. Therefore forasmuch as the promise is stablised, not according to our deseruings, but according to his mercie, no man ought to speake fearfully of γ of which he can not dout. Bernard also saith: The disciples of Christ say, Who can be saued? But he answered: this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is al our cōfidence, this is our only cōfort, this is γ whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibilitie, what say we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthie of loue or hatred? Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath beene his counsellor? Here nowe faith must of necessitie helpe vs, here must his trueth succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be reueiled by the Spirite, and his Spirite testifying it may perswade our heartes that wee are the sonnes of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and iustifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternall predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefly let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of conscience: and wherefoeuer there is anie doubting or vncertaintie it pronounceth that they be void. Againe it pronounceth that they doe nothing but stagger and wauer, if they rest vpon our owne workes. Therefore wee must needes either lose righteousnesse, or wee must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lifte vp her eares & shut her eyes, that is to say, to bee heedfully bent to the promise onely, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse or deseruing. So is that notable prophetic of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednesse of the lande shall be done away, a man shall call his friende vnder his vine and vnder his figge tree, where the Prophete declareth that the faithfull do no otherwise enioy true peace but after obtaining of the forgiuenes of sinnes. For this cauillation is to bee remembered in the Prophetes, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outwarde blessings of God as figures of the spirituall things. Wherevpon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because hee appeaseth all the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seeke by what meane he doth it, wee must needes come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For hee shall neuer cease to tremble for feare that shall not determine that God is appeased by the onely satisfactorie cleansing wherein Christ hath susteyned his wrath. Finally peace is no where else to be sought for but in the terrors of Christe our redeemer.

5 But why doe I vse so darke a testimonie? Paul euery where denieth that there is peace or quiet ioye left to consciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be iustified by faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that assurednesse commeth, namely when the loue of G O D is powred into our heartes by the holy Ghost: as if he had saide, that our consciences cannot otherwise be quieted, vnlesse we be certainly perswaded that we please God. Wherevpon also in another place he crieth out in the person of al the godlie, Who shall seuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because wee shall tremble euen at euery litle breath, till wee be arriued into the haue: but wee shall be without care euen in the darkenesse of death, so long as the Lorde shall shewe himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoever liuing spiritually: they neuer tasted the sweetnesse of grace, to consider that God will be mercifull vnto them. Wherevpon also followeth, that they doe no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turkes and whatsoeuer other prophane Natiōs. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith vnlesse it reache & put vs in minde of that most sweete name of Father, yea vnlesse it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba father. Which in another place he Gal. 4. 6.

 more plainly expresseth, where he saith that in Christ we haue boldnesse & entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truly this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in it self manifold matter of douting. Wherefore we must of ne-cessitie come to this remedie, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heauenly kingdome, but because being grafted into the body of Christ they are freely accounted righteous. For as touching iustification, faith is a thing meereely passiue, bringing nothing of our owne to the recouering of the fauour of God, but receiuing of Christ that which we want.

The xiiij. Chapter.

What is the beginning of iustification, and the continuall proceedings thereof.

THAT the matter may be made more plaine, let vs search, what may be the righteousnes of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatrie: or beeing entred into profession by sacraments, denying God with vncleannesse of life, whome they confesse with mouth, they are Christes no further than in name: or they be hypocrites, which couer the wickednesse of their heartes, with vaine deceitfull colours:
 or being regenerate by the spirite of God, they endeouour themselues to true holynesse. Specially when they are to be iudged by their naturall gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be founde one sparle of goodnes, vnlesse peradventure we wil accuse the Scripture of falshod, when it setteth out all the sonnes of Adam with these titles, y they be of froward and stubborne heart, that al the imagination of their heart is euil from their infancie, that their thoughts be vaine, that they haue not the feare of God before their eyes, that none of them vnderstandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be flesh, by which worde are vnderstanded all those workes which Paul rehearseth, fornication, vncleannesse, vnchastitie, riot-ousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witchcraftes, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissentions, sectes, enuiues, manslaughters, and whatsoeuer filthinesse and abomination may be deuised. This forsooth is the worthi-nes, with confidence whereof they must be proued. But if any among them excell with such honestie of manners as may haue some shewe of holynesse among men: yet because wee knowe that God regardeth not the outwarde glistering, we must search the verie fountaine of workes if we will haue them to auaille any thing to righteousnesse. We must (I say) throughly looke into them, from what affection of heart these workes proceede. But although here lieth open a most large field to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very fewe wordes, I wil follow as much as I may a briefnes in teaching.

2 First I deny not that whatsoeuer excellent giftes appeare in the vnbelieuers, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I so differ from comon judgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betweene the iustice; temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, & the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthy lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Vespasian: and (that we may not tarric vpon some special vertues or vices) betweene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wrong, that it appeareth euen in the dead image thereof. For what thing shal there remaine wel ordered in the world, if we confound these together? Therefore such a difference betweene honest & vn honest doings, the Lorde hath not onely engrauen in the mindes of all men, but also doeth oft confirme it with the dispensation of his prouidence. For wee see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men do followe vertue. Not because that outward image of vertue deserueth so much as the least benefite of his: but so it pleaseth him to declare by prooffe howe much true righteousnes pleaseth him, when he suffreth euen outward & fained righteousnes not to be without reward. Whereupon followeth that which we euen now confessed, that these vertues, such as they be, or rather images of vertues, are the gifts of God, for asmuch as there is nothing in any wise praiseworthy, which proceedeth not from him.

3 But neuertheles it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are strangers from the true religion of the one God, howsoeuer they be accounted worthy of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthy of no reward, but rather are worthy of punishment, because they doe with defiling of their heart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God, to preserue the fellowship of men with iustice; continencie, temperance of mind, valiantnes, & wisdom: yet they do very euilly execute these good workes of God: because they are restrained from euil doing, not by sincere loue of goodnes, but either by only ambition, or by loue of themselves, or by some other crooked affection. Whereas therefore they are corrupt by the verie vncleannes of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckened among vertues, than those vices, which are wont to deceiue by reason of neerenes & likenesse of vertue. Finally when we remember, that the ende of that which is right, euer is that God be serued: whatsoeuer tendeth to any other end, forthwith worthily looseth the name of right. Because therefore they haue not respect to the marke which the wisdom of God appointeth: although the thing that they doe, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongful end it is sinne. He concludeth therefore that all the Fabricij, Scipioes, & Catoes, in all those excellent actes of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to haue applied them: and that for that cause, true righteousnes was not in them: forasmuch as dueties are not weyed by the doings, but by the endes.

4 Moreouer if it be true which Iohn sayeth, that there is no life without the sonne of God: who so haue no part in Christ, what maner of men so euer they be, whatsoeuer they doe or goe about, yet they runne forward with their whole course into destruction and the iudgement of eternal death. After this reason, is that sayde of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the vnrighteous, not by lawe of workes: but by the very lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good, workes are turned into sinnes. Wherefore the same Augustine saith very well in an other place, when he compareth the endeouour of such men to running out of the way. For how much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally it is certain that they are euil trees, forasmuch as without the communicating of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruites and beautifull to the eye, yea and sweete in tast, but in no wise good fruites. Herby we easily perceiue that whatsoeuer man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteousness, but of certaine deseruing to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doutfull thing, sith it is already proued by the witnessse of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God with out faith?

5 But there shall yet appeare a plainer prooffe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out euery where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodnes preuenteth him. For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when he lightneth vs with the knowledge of himselfe, he is said to raise vs from death, & to make vs a newe creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set forth vnto vs by this title, God (sayth he) which is rich in mercy, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euen when we were dead by sinnes, hath made vs aliuie together in Christ, &c. In an other place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the general calling of the faithfull, he sayth: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly beateth down this arrogancie, in the history of Iob, in these wordes: who preuenteth me, & I shall render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding applieth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lorde but meere shame of needines and emptines. Wherefore in the place aboue cited, to proue that wee are come into the hope of saluation by his grace alone, not by works, he alleageth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his righteousness, prouoked God, sith our first power to doe good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle shall sooner be wrong out of a stone, than a good worke out of vs. Truly it is wonderfull if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there

- remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindnes and loue of God our sauour towarde vs hath appeared, because he hath saued vs, not by the workes of righteousnesse which we haue done, but according to his owne mercy: that being iustified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confession we dispoil man of al righteousness euen to the least litle peece thereof, till he be by only mercy regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousness of workes do bring any thing toward the iustifying of vs, it is falsly said y^e we are iustified by grace. Truly the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed iustificatiō to be of free gift, which in an other place reasoneth that grace is now not grace, if workes do any thing auail. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he saith y^e he came not to cal righteous men but sinners? If only sinners are receiued, why seeke we an entry by fained righteousness?
- 6 Still this same thought hath now, and then recourse to my mind, that it is perill least I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully trauaile in prouing of this thing as though it were doubtful or darke. But because our enuiousnes is such, as vnles it be most straightly thrust out of place, it neuer yeeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to rary somewhat the longer vpon it. Yet forasmuch as y^e Scripture is clere enough in this matter, I wil in fighting rather vse the words therof then mine own. Esay, when he hath described y^e vniuersal destruction of mankind, doth immediatly after very fitly adioyn the order of restoring. The Lord hath seen, & it sened euil in his eyes. And he saw, that there is no man: and he marued that there is none that offereth himselfe: and he hath set saluation in his owne arme, and hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousness. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet saith: that there is no man that helpeth the Lord in recouering his saluation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discoursing of the reconciling of sinners to himself, saith: I will espouse thee to me for euer, in righteousness, iudgement, grace and mercie. I will say to her that hath not obtained mercie, thou hast obtained mercy. If such couenant, which it is certaine to be the first conioyning that we haue with God, standeth vpon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousness. And I would faine learne of those men which faine that man meeteth God with some righteousness of workes, whether they thinke that there is any righteousness at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madnesse to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceede from his enemies, whome he wholly abhorreth with all their doinges? That al we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it self testifieth, til being iustified, we are receiued into friendshippe. If iustification be the beginning of loue, what righteousness of workes shall go before it? So Iohn, to turne away that pestilent arrogance, doth diligently put in minde howe we did not first loue him. And the selfe same thing the Lord had long before taught by his Prophet: I wil loue them sayth he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loue is not prouoked by workes if it hath of his owne accorde inclined it selfe felfe vnto vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing els, but that no man hath deserued that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entering into the possession of redemption, wee be holpen by our owne workes. Yea but howsoeuer we be redeemed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father graffed into the communion of him, wee are both heires of darkeness and death, and the enimies of God. For Paul teacheth that wee are not cleansed and washed from our vncleanneses by the blood of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirit auaieth vnto obedience & the sprinkling of the blood of Christ. If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the blood of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering wee be any other than a sinner is without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our saluation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: because when for Christes sake it is giuen to vs to beleue in him, then we first begin to passe from death into life.

1. Pet. 1. 2.

7 Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision aboue set bene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleannesse of conscience proueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proueth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by faith. What can sinners being estranged from God bring forth, but that which is accursed in his iudgment: With this foolish boldnes in deed, both all wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrites, because howsoeuer they knowe that their whole hart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they do any works y haue a shew of goodnes, they think them worthe y God should not despise them. Hereof groweth y pernicious error, y being proued gilty of a wicked & mischieuous minde, yet they cannot be driuen to confesse themselues voide of righteousness: but euen when they acknowledge themselues vnrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousness vn to them. This vanitie y Lord excellently wel confuteth by the prophet: Aske (saith he) the priests, saying: if a man carrie sanctified flesh in y hem of his garment, & putteth to it bread or other meat, shal it be sanctified? The priestes answered: No. And Hagge said. If a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priests answered: it shalbe defiled. Hagge said: So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: & so all the works of their handes, and all things y they offer to mee shalbe defiled. I would to God y this saying might either get ful credit with vs, or wel be setled in our remembrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, y can abide to be perswaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtiest man, so soone as he hath performed one or two doubtful deeds of the law, douteth not y it shalbe accounted to him for righteousness. But y Lord crieth to the contrarie, y there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnlesse the heart be first wel cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that al the works whatsoever they be that proceede from sinners, as are defiled with vncleannes of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteousnes depart from these woorkes which are by the Lordes owne mouth condemned of filthines. And with how fit a similitude doth he shewe the same? For it might haue bene objected, that whatsoeuer the Lorde had commanded, was inuiolably holy. But he on y contrary side setteth against them, that it is no marueil, if those things, that are hallowed by the lawe of the Lord, are defiled with the filthinesse of naughtie men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneeth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The same matter he excellently well handleth in Esaye, Offer not (saith he) sacrifice in vaine: incense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calendes & solemnities. They are become tedious to me, and I haue bene wearie with bearing them: when you shall holde vp your hands I will turne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply prayer I will not heare: for your hands are full of bloud. Be washed, be cleane, take away the euil of your thoughts. What meaneth this y the Lorde so lotheth the obeying of his owne law? Yea, but he here refuseth nothing that is of the naturall obseruing of the law, the beginning wherof he euery where teacheth to bee the vnfained feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoeuer things are offered him are not onely trifles, but stinking and abominable filthinesse. Nowe let the hypocrites goe, and keeping peruerfnesse wrapped vp in their heart, endeouour to deserue the fauour of God with woorkes. But by this meane, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of wicked are abominable, and the onely prayer of vpright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold that out of dout, which ought to bee most commonly knowen to him, that is euen but meanly exercised in the Scriptures, that euen those woorkes that glister moste gloriously in men not yet truely sanctified, are so farre from righteousnes in the sight of the Lord, that they be iudged sinnes. And therefore they haue said moste truely that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by woorkes: but contrariwise that woorkes do then please, & neuer til then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hand. Moses writeth that the Lord had respect to Abel & to his woorkes. See you not how he declareth that God is fauourable to the men, before that he hath respect to their woorkes? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must go before, that the woorkes which come from vs, may be louingly received of God: because this saying of Ieremie is alway in force, that the woorkes of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is only faith by which the hearts of men are clenfed, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and liuely faith.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnes they haue, whome wee haue set in the fourth degree. We graunt that when God by the meane of the righteousnes of Christ, reconcileth vs to himselfe, and giuing vs free forgiuennesse of sinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercie is also conioyned this his beneficiall doing, that by his holy spirite he dwelleth in vs, by the power wherof the lustes of our flesh are daily more & more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lorde vnto true purenes of life, when our hartes are framed to the obedience of the lawe: that this may be our chiefe will, to serue his will, and by all meanes to aduance only his glory. But euen while by the guiding of the holy Ghost we walke in the wayes of the Lorde, least yet we forgetting our selues should waxe proude, there are left certaine remnantes of imperfektion, which may minister vs matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (saith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What maner of righteousness therfore will they yet get by their workes? First I say, that the best worke that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some vncleanesse of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregges mingled with it. I say, let a holy seruant of God choose out of all his life the most excellent thing that he shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the partes of it, without dout he shall finde somewhere somewhat fauoring of the rottennes of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well our cherefull quickenesse is neuer such as it ought to be, but in slackning our course our weakenes is much. Although we see that there are euident foule blots wherewith the workes of the holy are bespred, yet graunt that they be nothing but most litle spottes: shall they nothing offende the eies of God, before whome euen the starres are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be iudged in it selfe, deserueth not iust rewarde of shame.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible y we should haue some throughly pure and perfect workes, yet one sinne is enough to blotte out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousness, as the Prophet saith. With whom also Iames agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guilty of all. Now sith this mortall life is neuer pure or void from sinne, whatsoever righteousness we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it should not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousness. Finally when the righteousness of workes is entreated of, we must not haue respect to the worke of the lawe, but to the commaundement. Therefore if we seeke righteousness by the lawe, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two workes: but a perpetuall obedience of the lawe is there necessary. Wherefore the Lorde doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs for righteousness y same forgiveness of sinnes whereof we haue spoken, that hauing once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousness in the lawe: because he should so doe nothing else but bring vs into a false hope, and mocke and laugh vs to scorne. For sith no perfection could come to vs so long as we are clothed with this flesh, and sith the law threatneth death & iudgement to all them that performe not full righteousness in worke: it shal alway haue wherof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercie of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquite vs from time to time with continual forgiveness of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certain which we sayd at the beginning, that if we be weied by our owne worthinesse, whatsoever we purpose or go about, yet we with all our trauailes and endeouours are worthe of death and destruction.

neuer any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by ſeuere iudgment of God, was not damnable. Again, if there be any ſuch ſhewed, (which is not poſſible for man) yet being corrupted and deſiled with the ſins, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is loden, it looſerth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our diſputation. For about the beginning of iuſtification there is no ſtrife betweene vs and the ſounder ſorte of Scholemen, but that a ſinner being freely deliuered from damnation obtaineth righteousneſſe, and that by the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes: ſauing that they vnder the worde of iuſtification comprehend the reuening wherewith we are newly formed by the Spirit of God vnto the obedience of the lawe and they thus deſcribe the righteousnes of a man regenerate, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Chriſt, is by good workes iudged righteous before God, and by their deſeruing is accepted. But the Lord contrariwiſe pronounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteousneſſe, not at the time when he yet ſerued Idols, but when he had already many yeares excelled in holineſſe of life. Therefore Abraham had long worſhipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousneſſe reposed in fayth. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is ſayde in the Prophet: The righteous man ſhall liue by faith, it is not ſpoken of wicked & prophane men, whom the Lorde iuſtifieth by conuerting them to the faith, but the ſpeech is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promiſed life by fayth. Paul alſo taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that ſentence, he taketh this verſe of Dauid: Blessed are they whoſe iniquities are forgiuen. But it is certaine, that Dauid ſpeaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, ſuch as himſelfe was: becauſe he ſpake out of the feeling of his owne conſcience. Therefore this bleſſednes we muſt not haue once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Laſt of all he teſtifieth that the embaſſage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not publiſhed for one or two dayes, but is perpetuall in the church. Therefore the faithfull haue euen to the ende of their life no other righteousneſſe than that which is there ſet forth. For Chriſt euerlaſtingly remaineth the Mediatour to reconcile the father to vs, and the effectualneſſe of his death is euerlaſting: namely waſhing, ſatiſfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewith all our iniquities are couered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians ſay, that we haue ſ beginning of ſaluation out of grace, but that we are ſaued by grace, not of workes, that no man ſhold glory.

12 The ſtaring holes which the Scholemen do here ſeek to eſcape by, do not deliuer them. They ſay that good workes are not by inward worthines in themſelues of ſo great value, that they be ſufficient to purchaſe righteousnes: but this, that they be of ſo great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, becauſe they be driuen to confeſſe that the righteousneſſe of workes is in this life alway vnperfect, they graunt that we, ſo long as we liue, do neede forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, whereby the want of workes may be ſupplied: but that the defaults which are committed, are recompenced with workes of ſupererogation. For I anſwere, that that the accepting grace as thy call it, is none other than is free goodneſſe wherewith the father embraceth vs in Chriſt

Christ, when he clotheth vs with the innocencie of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficiall meane thereof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousnes of Christ (which as it only is perfect, so only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our steede, and be presented at the barre as a suerty. Herewith we being furnished, doe obtaine continuall forgiveness of sinnes in faith. With the purenesse hereof our filthinesse and vncleanesse of imperfections being couered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the iudgement of God, vntill the houre come, when the olde man being slaine and vtterly destroyed in vs, the goodnes of God shall receiue vs into blessed peace with the new Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lorde in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodies, we shalbe remoued into the glory of the heauenly kingdome.

13 If these things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themselues make vs acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the workes themselues please, but in respect that man being couered with the righteousnesse of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth forgiveness of his sinnes. For God hath not promised the rewarde of eternall life to some certaine workes, but only pronounceth that he which doth these thinges, shall liue: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all thinges. Whereby the deuiſe of righteousnesse in part is largely contuted, sith no other righteousnes is admitted into heauen, but a whole obseruing of the law. And no whit sounder is that which they are wont to babble of supplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not still returne to the same place from whence they are already shut out: that he which keepeth the law in part, is by workes so farre righteous? That which no man of sound iudgement will grant them, they do too shamelesly take for confessed. So oft the Lorde testifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousnesse of workes, but in the perfect obseruing of his lawe. What obstinacie is it, that we when we are destitute of that obseruing, least we should seeme spoyled of all glory, that is, to haue altogether giuen place to God, do boast our selues of I wot not what small peeces of a fewe workes, and go about by satisfactions to redeeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions haue already before bin sufficiētly ouerthrowen, that we ought not now so much as to dream of them. Onely this I say, that they which so play the fooles, do not wey how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truely they should vnderstande y^e the whole righteousnes of men being layde vpon a heape, is not sufficiēt to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall lost all meane to recouer saluation. Therefore the power of Satisfactiō is taken away, wherwith they flatter theselues, but surely shall neuer satisfie God, to whome nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purposeth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be couered and forgiven, before that the Lorde haue respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiveness of sinnes is of free grace which they do wickedly blaspheme that truit in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things y^e are behind vs, and hasting forwarde to those things that are before vs, run in our race, endeuouring to the price of the hie calling.

14 But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when wee haue done all thinges that are commaunded vs, we should say that we are vnprofitable seruantes, and that we haue done no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to faime or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lorde therefore commaunded vs vnfaingly to thinke and consider with our selues, that we doe not any free beneficial doinges to him, but to render due seruice. And worthily. For we are seruantes endetted in so many seruices, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughtes and al our members, were turned into dutifull deedes of the lawe. And therefore that which he sayth. When ye haue done all thinges that are commaunded you, &c. is asmuch in effect, as if the righteousnes of one man were more than al y righteousnesse of men. How therefore may we (of whome there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bolde as to boast that we haue added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception & say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeour may proceed beyond necessary duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessary. For this we must altogether holde, that we can imagine nothing that auaileth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not comprehended vnder the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessity.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleaged: That among the Corinthians he did of his own will yelde of his right, which otherwise he might haue vsed if he had would, & that he hath employed vpon them not onely so much as he ought of dutie, but also hath giuen them his free trauaill beyond the boundes of duties. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weak. For false and deceitfull workemen did boast them selues with this alluring shewe of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospel, so that Paul was driuen of necessity either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meeete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it, then I grant that the Apostle did somthing of Supererogation for the lord. But if this were by right required of a wise distributor of the Gospel, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to do. Finally although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrystome is alway true, that all our thinges are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the lawe to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath vttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thanke we will giue to a bondeferuant when hauing bene all the day trauailed with sundrie labours he returneth home to vs in the euening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage he ought, for hee with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogations are which these men will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as hee neither hath at any time commaunded, nor doth approue them, nor will allowe them when account shall be made before him. In this signification onely we will graunt that they are workes of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: Psal. 1. 12. who hath required these things at your handes? But let them remember what is in an other place also spoken of these things: Psal. 55. 2. Wherefore doe yee weye your siluer and not in bread? Ye spende your labour and not in being satisfied. It is indeede not verie harde for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadowe in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne iudge shall sit in his iudgement seate, such windy decrees shall of necessitie vanishe away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence wee may bring to his iudgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two pestilences to be driuen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnes of workes: And y we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The scriptures doe euerie where thrust vs from all manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteousneses doe stinke in y sight of God, vnles they receiue a good sauor from the innocencie of Christ, and that they can do nothing but prouoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be susteyned by the tendernes of his mercie. Moreouer they so leaue nothing to vs, but that wee shoulde craue the mercie of our iudge with that confession of Dauid, that none shall bee iustified before him, if he require account of his seruantes. But where Iob saith: If I haue done wickedly, woe to mee: but if I doe righteously, yet I will not so lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteousnesse of God, wherunto the verie Angels answere not: yet hee therewithall sheweth that when they come to the iudgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not onely to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeeld than daungerously striue with the rigorousnesse of God: but he meaneth that hee felt no other righteousnesse in himself, than such as at y first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen away, all glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteousnesse to these workes, the affiance wherof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whither Esa. 46. 20. Esa. 61. 3. say calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may be praised & glory in God: because it is most true which he saith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shall then rightly be purged, when it shall neither in any behalfe rest vppon the confidence of workes, nor reioyce in the glorie of them. But this error encouraged foolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in workes.

14 But if wee looke to the foure kindes of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shall finde that none of them doth accorde with workes in the stablissing of our saluation. For the scripture doth euerie where report, that the cause of procuring the eternall lyfe to vs, is the mercie of the heauenly Father and his free loue towards vs: that materiall cause is Christe with his obedience, by which hee purchased righteousnesse for vs. What also shall wee say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes Iohn comprehendeth together in one sentence, when hee saith, G O D so loued the worlde, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne, that euerie one which beleueth in him may not perish, but may haue euerlasting life. Now the final cause the Apostle testifieth to be both y^e shewing of the righteousnes of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where he rehearseth also the other three in expresse words. For he saith thus to the Romanes: all haue sinned and doe neede the glorie of God: but they are iustified freely by his grace. Here thou hast the head & first fountaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: By the redemption which is in Christ Iesu.

Rom. 3. 23.

Here thou hast as it were the matter whereof righteousnesse is made for vs through faith in his bloode. Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all hee ioyneth the ende, when hee saith, vnto the shewing of his righteousnesse that he may be righteous and the righteousmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousnesse standeth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name, that Christ was giuen to vs for reconciliation. So in the first chapter also to the Ephesians he teacheth that wee are receiued of God into fauour by mere mercie: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: receiued by faith: all to this ende, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we see that all the parts of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that wee should now either haue affiance or glorie in workes? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moue any controuersie with vs about the efficient or finall cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Materiall and Formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our workes haue a halfe place wth faith and the righteousnes of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simplie affirmeth both y^e Christ is to vs for righteousnesse and life, and that this benefite of righteousnesse is possessed by onely faith.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbear not to report of it with prayse, that is done two ways: either y^e in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceyue thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust and deserued condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison of other, while they recorde themselves before God, the purenes of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two wayes, wee shall see hereafter: nowe let vs briefly declare of the latter, how it agreeth with that which we haue aboue saide, that in the iudgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of workes, and glorie vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stablishing of their saluation, doe without respect of workes bend their eyes to the onlie goodnesse of God. And they doe not onely bend themselves to it afore all thinges as to the beginning of blessednesse, but do rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of workes: namely so farre as they are the witnessings of God dwelling and raigning in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of workes hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first cast the whole affiance of thy minde vpon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrarie to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when we exclude the affiance of workes, we meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bowe to the merite of works as to y^e succour of saluation, but should throughly rest in the free promise of righteousnesse. But we forbid it not to vnderprop & strengthen this faith with y^e signes of the good will of God toward it selfe. For if all the good giftes which God hath bestowed vpon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine manner as it were beames of the face of God, by which wee are enlightened: to beholde that soueraigne light of goodnesse: much more is the grace of good workes, which sheweth that the Spirite of adoption is giuen vs.

19 When therefore the holy ones doe by innocencie of conscience confirme their faith, and gather matter of reioycing, they do nothing but call to minde by the fruites of their calling, that they are adopted of y^e Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lorde is stedfast assurednesse: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightnesse and simplicitie: haue no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience; but are then onely of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assurednesse, and the holy ones are priue in their conscience of such an vprightnesse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnauntes of the fleshe. But forasmuch as of the fruites of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they do therby not slenderly strengthen themselues to look for the help of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their father in so great a matter. And euen this also they cannot doe, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodnesse of God, sealed with no other assurednesse, thā of the promise. For if they beginne to wey it by good workes, nothing shall be more vncertayne nor more weake: for asmuch as if workes be considered by themselues, they shall no lesse by their imperfection shewe prooffe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoever imperfecte purenesse testifie his good will. Finally they doe so set out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, depth, & hight of them: as if he should say, Whethersoever the senses of the godly doe turne themselues, howe hie soeuer they climbe, how farre and wide soeuer they extend them, yet they ought not to goe out of the loue of Christ, but holde themselues wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth al kindes of measures in it. And therefore he saith that it excelleth and surmounteth aboue all knowledge: & that when we acknowledge howe much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in an other place, when he glorieth that al the Godly are vanquishers in battel, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

Rom. 8. 37.

20 We see nowe that there is not in the holy ones y^e affiaunce of works; which either giueth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regarde them none otherwise than as the gifts of God, whereby they reknowledge his goodnesse none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may think vpon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing fro^e y^e free righteousnesse which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doeth Augustine in fewe wordes, but verie well set out where he writeth, I do not say to y^e Lord, despise not the workes of my handes, or I haue sought the Lorde with my handes and haue not beene deceiued. But, I do not commend the workes of my handes: for I feare, least when thou hast looked vpon them, thou shalt finde moe sinnes than merits. Only this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despise not the workes of thy handes, beholde in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest mee: if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoeuer good workes I haue, they are of thee. Hee setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his workes to God, because if he haue any good workes, he seeth therein nothing his owne: secondly, because the same is also ouerwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Wherupon commeth to passe that the conscience feeleth thereby more feare & dismayng than assurednes. Therefore he would haue God no otherwise to looke on his well doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, hee may make an end of the worke which he hath begonne.

21 But furthermore whereas y^e scripture sheweth that the good workes of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doeth good to them, that is so to be vnderstanded, that y^e which we haue before set may stand vnshaken, that y^e Effect of our saluation consisteth in the loue of God the Father: the Matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the iustrument, in the enlightning of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the end is the glorie of the so great kindnesse of God. These things withstande not, but that the Lorde may embrace workes as inferiour causes. Bnt whence commeth that? Namely whom the Lorde of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinarie dispensation he doth by good workes bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this manner he sometime deriueth eternall life from workes: not for that is to be ascribed to them: but because

Rom. 8. 30. whome he hath chosen, them he doth iustifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step towarde that which followeth, after a certaine maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, he biddeth vs not to flee to workes, but holdeth vs in the onely thinking vpon the mercie of God. For what manner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life euerlasting? Why doeth he not set righteousnesse in comparison against sinne, as hee setteth life against death? Why doeth he not make righteousnesse the cause of life, as he maketh sinne the cause of death? For so shoulde the comparison of contraries haue stande wel together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meant by this comparison to expresse that which was truth, that death is due to the deseruinges of men; that life is reposed in the onely mercie of God. Finally in these maners of speaking is rather expressed the order than y cause: because God in heaping graces vpon graces, taketh cause of the first to adde the seconde, that he may leaue nothing vndone to the enriching of his seruantes: and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet he would haue vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountaine & beginning of it. For although he loueth y giftes which he dayly giueth, insomuch as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to holde fast that free acceptation, which alone is able to vpholde our soules: as for such giftes of his Spirit as he afterwarde giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

The xv. Chapter.

That those shinges that are commonly boasted concerning the merites of workes, doe overthrow as well the praise of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednesse of saluation.

NOwe we haue declared that which is the cheefe point in this matter: that because if righteousnesse be vpholden with workes, it must needs by and by fal downe before the sight of God, it is contened in the onely mercie of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in onely faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe stay of the matter, least wee be entangled with that generall errour, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is moued of the iustification of faith and workes, they flee to those places which seeme to giue to workes some merite in the sight of God: as though the iustification of workes were fully wonne, if it be once proued that they be of any value with God. But wee haue aboue plainly shewed that the righteousnesse of workes consisteth onely in the perfect and keeping of the lawe. Wherevpon followeth that no man is iustified by workes, but he that hauing climbed vp to the hiest top of perfection cannot be proued guiltie of any offence be it neuer so litle. Therefore it is an other & a seueral question: Howsoever workes suffice not to iustifie a man, whether yet do they not deserue fauor with god?

2 First of the name of merite I must needs say this afore hande, that whosoever first applied it to workes of men compared to the iudgement of God, he did very ill prouide for the purenesse of faith. Truly I doe by my good will abstaine from struiues aboue wordes, but I woulde wish that this sobrietie had alway ben vsed among Christian writers, y they would not haue found in their harts to vse words strange from the scriptures, which ingendered much offence & no fruit. For whereto, I beseech you, was it needful to haue the name of merit brought in, when the price of good workes might be fitly expressed by an other name without offence? But howe much offence that worde containeth in it, is euident with the great hurt of the worlde. Surely as it is most proude it can doe nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with frowarde pride. The olde writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I woulde to God they had not with the abusing of one little worde giuen to posteritie matter of errour. Howbeit they them selues also doe in manie places testifie, howe in no case they meant to giue any periudice against the trueth. For thus saith Augustine in one place, Let merites of men here holde their peace, which haue perished by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Iesus Christ. Againe, The saintes giue nothing to their owne Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In another place, When man seeth that whatsoeuer good hee hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, he seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his own merits, but of the mercie of God. You see howe taking from men the power of doing well, he also throweth downe the dignitie of merite. And Chrysostome saith, Our workes, if there bee any, which followe the free calling of God, are repayment and debte: but y gifts of God are grace and bountifullnesse and the greatnesse of liberal giuing. But leauing the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing. I haue verily before alleadged a sentence out of Bernard, As it sufficeth to merite, not to presume of Merites: so to want Merites, sufficeth to iudgement. But by adding forth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnesse of the worde, where he saith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou hast them, knowe that they are giuen: hope for fruite, the mercie of God: and so thou hast escaped all danger, of pouertie, vnthankfulnes, and presumption. Happy is y church which neither wanteth merits without presumption, nor presumptiō without merits. And a litle before he had largely shewed, how godly a meaning he vsed. For of Merites, (saith hee) why should the Church bee carefull, which hath a stedfaster and surer cause to glorie of the purpose of God? God cannot denie himselfe, he will doe that which hee hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites may wee hope for good thinges? specially sith thou hearest it said, Not for your sakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to Merite, to know that Merites suffice not.

Eze. 36. 22.

3 What all our workes deserue, the Scripture sheweth when it saith that they cannot abide the sight of God, because they are full of vncleannesse: then, what the perfect obseruing of the lawe (if any such coule bee found) shall deserue, when it teacheth that wee shoulde thinke our selues vnprofitable seruantes when wee haue done all thinges that are commaunded vs: because wee shall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lorde, but onely haue performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good workes which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lorde both calleth ours and testifieth that they are not only acceptable to him, but also that they shall haue rewarde. It is our duetie againe for our part, to bee encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our heartes, that we bee not wearied with well doing, and to yeelde true thankfulnesse to so great bountifullnesse of G O D. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatsoeuer there is in workes that deserueth praise: that there is not one droppe, which wee ought properly to ascribe to our selues. This if wee doe truly and earnestly acknowledge, there vanisheth away not onely all affiaunce but also opinion of Merite. Wee (I say) doe not part the praise of good workes (as the Sophisters doe) betweenc G O D and man: but wee reserue it whole, perfecte, and vnminished to the Lorde. Onely this wee as-

figne to man, that euen the selfe same workes that were good hee by his vncleanness corrupteth and defleth. For nothing commeth out of man, howe perfect soeuer hee bee, that is not defiled with some spotte. Therefore let the Lorde call into iudgement euen these things that are best in the workes of men: he shall verily espie in them his owne righteoufnesse, but mans dishonesty and shame. Good workes therefore do please God and are not vnprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for rewarde the most large benefites of G O D: not because they so deserue, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price vnto them. But what spitefulnesse is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of God, which giueth vndue rewards to workes that deserue no such thing, do with ambition ful of sacriledge endeouour further, y that which is wholly of the liberalitie of God, may seeme to be rendered to y merites of men. Here I appeale to the common iudgement of euery man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a peece of ground by another mans liberall graunt, do also claime to himselfe the title of proprietie: doth he not by such vnthankfulnesse deserue to loose the very selfe possession which he had? Likewise, if a bondslauie being made free of his Lord, do hide the baseness of the estate of a Libertine, and boast himselfe to be a freeman borne: is he not worthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vse of enioying a benefite, if wee neither claime to our selues more than is giuen, nor do defraude the author of the benefite of his praise: but rather do so behaue our selues, that that which he hath giuen from him selfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine manner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and consider what maner of moderation is due to God.

4 I knowe that the Sophisters do abuse certaine places, to proue therby that the name of Merit toward God is founde in the Scriptures. They alleage a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shal make place to euery man, according to the Merite of his workes. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in resisting the authoritie of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully alleage that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoeuer writer he were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: πάση ἰδενμοσύνη ποιήσει τιπον, ἕκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ ἰσθήσει. He shal make place to euery mercie, & euery man shall finde according to his works. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in y Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these wordes, & by a longer ioyning together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrewes, there is no cause why they should snare vs in one litle worde, when in the Greeke wordes of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices doe please & be acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue & beate downe the outragioufnes of our pride, that wee faine not any worthines to workes beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that al our good workes are continually besprinkled with many filthie spottes, wherewith God may be worthily offended & be angry w vs: so farre is it off, y they be able to win him to vs, or to prouoke his liberalitie toward vs: Yet because he of his tender kindnesse doeth not examine them by extremitie of law, he taketh them as if they were moste pure, and therefore though without merite, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this present life and of the life to come. For I doe not allowe the distinction set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good workes deserue the graces that are giuen vs in this life, and that eternall life is the rewarde of faith alone. For the Lorde doeth commonly alway set in heauen the rewarde of labours and the crowne of battel. Againe, to giue it so to the merite of workes, that it be taken away from grace, that the Lorde heapeth vs with graces vpon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ saith that to him that hath, shalbe giuen, and that the faithful & good seruant which hath shewed himselfe faithfull in fewe things, shalbe set ouer many: yet he also sheweth in another place, that the increases of the faithfull are the giftes of his free goodnes. All ye that thirst (saith he) come to the waters: and ye that haue not money, come & byc milke and honie without money and without any exchange. Whatsoever therefore is nowe giuen to the faithfull for help of saluation, yea and blessednes it selfe, is the meere liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in those he testifieth that he hath consideration of workes: because, to testific the greatnesse of his loue toward vs, he vouchsafeth to grant such honor not only to vs, but also to the giftes which he hath giuen vs.

5 If these things had in the ages past bene handeled & disposed in such order as they ought to haue bene, there had neuer arisen so many troubles & dissensions. Paul saith, that in the building of Christian doctrine, we must keepe stil that foundation which he had layed among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be layed: and that the same foundation is Iesus Christe. What maner of foundation haue we in Christ? is it, that he was to vs the beginning of saluation: that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selues? & hath he but only opened the way, by which wee should go forwarde of our owne strength? Not so: but, as he said a litle before, when wee acknowledge him, he is giuen to vs for righteousnesse. No man therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousnesse in him: forasmuch as the Apostle saith not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtaine righteousnes, but that he himselfe might be our righteousnesse. Namely, that we are chosen in him from eternitie before the making of the worlde, by no deseruing of ours, but according to the purpose of the good pleasure of God: that by his death wee are redeemed from the damnation of death, and deliuered from destruction: that in him wee are adopted of the heauenly father into children and heires: that by his blood we are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him to be kept we are deliuered from peril of perishing and of being lost: that being so engrafted in him, wee are already after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdome of God by hope: and yet more: that hauing obtained such partaking of him, howsoever wee be yet fooles in our selues, he is wisdom for vs before God: howsoever wee be sinners, he is righteousnesse for vs: howsoever wee be vnclene, hee is cleannesse for vs: howsoever wee be weake, howsoever vnarmed and lying open in daunger of Satan, yet ours is the power which is giuen him in heauen and earth, whereby he may treade downe Satan for vs, and breake y gates of hels: howsoeuer we stil cary about with vs y body of death, yet he is life for vs: briefly that all his thinges are ours, & we in him haue all thinges, in our selues nothing. Vpon this foundation, I say, it behoueth that we be builded, if we will encrease into a holy temple to the Lorde.

Mat. 28, 18.

6 But the worlde hath a long time benee otherwise taught. For there haue benee found out I wot not what morall good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be grafted in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that they are all in death which haue not possessed the Sonne. If they be in death, howe shoulde they bring foorth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that whatsoeuer is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good fruites of an euill tree. But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherein he may shewe foorth his power? They say that hee hath deserued for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of deseruing: that it is nowe our parte not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesse of vngodlinesse. Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strippe him naked of his power, and in a maner tread him vnder foote? This testimonie is ech where spoken of him, that al they are iustified that beleue in him: these fellows teach, that there commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to euery man to iustifie himselfe. But I would to God they tasted what these sayings meane: that all they haue life that haue the Sonne of God: that whosoever beleueth, is already passed from death into life: that we are iustified by his grace, y we might be made heires of eternall life: that the faithfull haue Christe abiding in them, by whome they cleaue fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, do sit with him in heauenly places: that they are transplanted into the kingdom of God, and haue obtained saluation and innumerable other such. For they do not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obreine righteousnesse or saluation, but that they are both giuen to vs. Therefore so soone as thou art by faith engrafted into Christ, thou art already made the sonne of God, the heire of heauen, partaker of righteousnes, possessor of life, and (that their lies may be better confuted) thou hast not obtained the fit ability to deserue, but euen all the deseruings of Christ: for they are communicated to thee.

7 So the Sorbonicall scholes, the mothers of all errours, haue taken from vs the iustification of faith which is the summe of all godlinesse. They grant verily in worde, that man is iustified by formed faith: but this they afterwarde expound, because good workes haue of faith this that they auaille to righteousnesse: that they seeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, sith without great enuiousnesse it could not be passed ouer in silence, seeing it is so oft repeted of the Scripture. And not yet contented, they doe in the praise of good works priuily steale from God somewhat to giue away to man. Because they see that good workes litle auaille to aduance man, and that they can not be properly called Merits, if they be accounted the fruites of the grace of God: they picke them out of the strength of free will, oyle forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deede that the principall cause of them is in grace: but they affirme that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is all merite. And this not onely the latter Sophisters do teach, but also their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with these men, you may say to be sounde witted and sober. It was truly a pointe of maruellous blindenesse, that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth, they sawe not with how greate carefulnesse that man prouided that no peece of the glorie of good wotkes were it neuer so litle, should bee conueyed to men. Here before where we entreated of free will, we recited certaine testimonies of his to this purpose, of which sort there are oftentimes founde many like in his writings: as when he forbiddeth vs that we should no where boast of our merites, because euen they also are the giftes of God: And when he writeth, that al our merite is onely of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiencie, but is al made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombarde was blinde at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his disciples, than this word of the Apostle, For when he forbiddeth Christians all glorying, he adioyneth a reason why it is not lawful to glorie: because we are that handworke of God, created to all good wotkes, that we shoulde walke in them. Sith therefore there cometh out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is whole of God without exceptiō: there is no right why we should claime to our selues one ounce in good wotkes. Finally whereas they continually call vpon good wotkes, in the meane time they so instruct consciences, y they neuer dare haue affiance, that they haue God well pleased and fauourable to their wotkes. But contrariwise we, without making any mention of Merite, do yet by our doctrine raise vp the courages of the faithfull with singular comforte, when we teach them that in their wotkes they please God, and are vndoubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea and also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to say, vnlesse he doe first with assured confidence of minde determine that he shall please God.

8 Wherefore let vs not suffer our selues to be led so much as one haire bredth away from this onely foundation: which being layd, wise builders do afterwarde well and orderly builde vpon it. For if there be neede of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in minde, that the sonne of God hath appeared to this ende, that he might destroy the wotkes of the deuill: that they should not sinne which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercy chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthinesse. But all is spoken at once, when it is shewed that Christ will haue such disciples, which forsaking themselues, and taking vp their crosse, doe followe him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the roote of al euils, that he may no more seeke those things that are his own. He that hath taken vp his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildenesse. But the example of Christ conteineth both these and all other dueties of godlines & holinesse. He shewed himselfe obedient to his father, euen to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the wotkes of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glorie of Ius father: hee gaue his soule for his brethren: he both did good and wished good to his enemies. If there bee neede of comfort, these wil bring marueilous comfort, that we be in affliction, but wee are not made carefull: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: wee are brought low, but we are not confounded: we are thrown downe, but wee do not perish: alway bearing about with vs in our body the mortifying of Iesus Christ, that the life of Iesus may be manifestly shewed in vs; that if wee be dead with him, we shall also liue together with him: if we suffer with him, wee shall also reigne together with him: that we be so fashioned like to his sufferings, till wee attaine to the likenesse of his resurrection: For as much as the Father hath predestinate these to be fashioned like the image of his sonne, whome, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotten among all his brethren: and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue of God which is in Christ: but rather all things shall turne to vs to good and to saluation. Lo, we do not iustifie a man by workes before G O D: but we say, that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a newe creature, that they may passe out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteousness, and that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are iudged as trees by the fruites.

The xvj. Chapter.

WITH this one worde may the shamelesnesse of certaine vngodly men be confuted which slander vs with saying that wee destroye good woorkes, and do drawe men away from the following of them, when wee say that they are not iustified by workes, nor doe deserue saluation: and againe, that wee make too easie a way to righteousness, when wee teach that it lyeth in the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, and that wee doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much inclined thereto alreadie. These slanders (I say) are with that one worde sufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly aunswere to them both. They allege that by y^e iustification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leaue vnspoken, what manner of men be these zelous louers of good workes which do so backbite vs. Let them haue licence as freely to rayle as they doe licentiously infect the whole worlde with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they be griued, that when faith is so gloriously aduanced, workes are driuen downe out of their place. What if they be more raised vp, and stablished? For neither do wee dreame of a faith voide of good workes, nor a iustification that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when we confesse that faith and good workes do necessarily hang together, yet wee set iustification in faith, not in workes. For what reason we do so, we haue in readinesse easily to declare, if wee doe but turne to Christ vnto whome our faith is directed, and from whome it receiueh her whole strength. Why therefore are wee iustified by faith? because by faith wee take holde of the righteousness of Christ, by which alone wee are reconciled to God. But

1. Cor. 1. 30. this thou canst not take holde of, but that thou must also therewithall take holde of sanctification. For he was giuen to vs, for righteousness, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ iustificeth none whome he doeth not also sanctifie. For these benefites are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnseparable knot, that whome he enlighteneth with his wisdom, them he redeemeth: whome he redeemeth, he iustificeth: whome he iustificeth, he sanctifieth. But forasmuch as our question is onely of righteousness and sanctifying, let vs stay vpon these. We may put difference betwene them, yet Christ containeth them both vnseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousness in Christ? Thou must first possesse Christ: and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must be made partaker of his sanctification: because he cannot be torne in pieces. Sith therefore the Lorde doeth graunt vs these benefites to be enioyed none otherwise than in giuing himselfe, he giueth them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appeareth how true it is, that wee are iustified not without workes, and yet not by workes: because in the partaking of Christ, whereby wee are iustified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousness.

2 That also is most false, that the minds of men are withdrawn from the affection of wel-doing, when wee take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from rewarde to merite, as I shall afterwarde more plainly declare: namely, because they knowe not this principle, that God is no lesse liberall when he assigneth rewarde to workes, than when he giueth power to doe wel. But this I had rather differre to the place fit for it. Now it shalbe enough to touch how weake their obiection is: which shalbe don two wayes. For first whereas they say that there shalbe no care of well framing of life, but when hope of rewarde is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be entended when men serue God, that they looke to rewarde, or let out to hire or sell their labors to him, they litle preuaile: for God wil be freely worshipped, freely loued: he (I say) alloweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiuing rewarde is cut off, yet cesseth not to worship him. Moreouer, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurres vnto them, than those that are taken of the ende of our redemption and calling: such as the worde of God spurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked vnthankfulnes, not mutually to loue him againe which first loued vs: that by the blood of Christ our consciences are cleansed from dead workes, to serue the liuing God: that it is a hainous sacriledge, if being once cleansed, wee defile our selues with newe filthinesse, and prophane that holy blood: that wee are deliuered from the handes of our enemies, that wee may without feare serue him in holinesse and righteousness before him all the dayes of our life: that wee are made free from sinne, that we may with a free Spirit followe righteousness: that our olde man is crucified, that wee may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe, that if wee be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) we must seeke those things that are aboue, and must in the worlde be waifaring men from home, that wee may long towarde heauen where is our treasure: that the grace of God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking all vngodlineesse and worldly desires, we may liue soberly, holily, and godlyly in this world, loking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of the great G O D and sauour: therefore that wee are not appointed that wee should stirre vp wrath to our selues, but that we may obtaine saluation by Christ: that we are the temples of the holy Ghost, which it is not lawfull to be defiled: that we are not darknesse, but light in the Lorde, which must walke as children of light: that we are not called to vncleannesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of G O D, our sanctification, that we abstaine from vnlawful desires: that our calling is holy, that the same is not fulfilled but with purenesse of life: that we are for this purpose deliuered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousness. Can we be pricked forward to charity with any more liuely argument than that of Iohn, that we should mutually loue one another as God hath loued vs? that herein his children doe differ from the children of the Deuill, the children of light from the children of darknesse, because they abide in loue? Againe with that argument of Paul, that we if we cleaue to Christ, are the members of one body, which it is meete to be holpen one of another with mutuall duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holines than when wee heare againe of Iohn, that all they that haue this hope, doe sanctifie themselues, because their God is holy? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that hauing the promise of adoption, wee shoulde cleanse our selues from all the defiling of the fleshe and spirite? then when wee heare Christe setting foorth himselte for an example vnto vs that we shoulde followe his steppes?

3 And these fewe thinges I haue set forth for a tast. For if I should entend to goe through all, I should be driuen to make a long volume. The Apostles ate all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to euery good worke, & that without any mention of merite. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this that our saluation standeth vpon the onely mercie of G O D and vpon no merite of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for vs but in the righteousness of Christe, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, he beseecheth them by that mercie of God which he hath vouchsafed to extende to vs. And truly this one cause ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs. But if any be not so vehemently moued with the glorie of God, yet the remembrance of his benefites ought to haue bin, most sufficient, to stirre vp such men to do well. But these men, which doe paradventure with thrusting in of merites beate out some seruile and constrained obediences of the lawe, doe falsly say that we haue nothing whereby we may exhorte men to good workes, because we goe not the same way to worke. As though God were much delited with such obediences which protesteth that he loueth a cherefull giuer, and forbiddeth any thing to be giuen as it were of heauinesse or of necessity. Neither do I speake this for that I doe either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes vseth, that it may leaue no meane vnattempted euery way to stirre vp our mindes. For it rehearseth the rewarde which God will render to euery man according to his workes. But I denye that that is the onely thing, yea or the chiefe among many. And then I graunt not that wee ought to take beginning therat. Moreouer I affirme that it maketh nothing to the setting vp of such merites as these men boast of, as wee shall hereafter see. Last of all I say that is to no profitable vse, vnlesse this doctrine haue first taken place, that wee are iustified by the onely merite of Christ, which is concieued by faith but by no merites of our workes, because none can be fitte to the endeouour of holinesse, vnlesse they haue first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet verie well signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercie, that thou maist be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercie is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded and stablished. Which is verie worthie to be noted, that wee may knowe not onely that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the feare of God (which the Papistes will haue to be meritorious) cannot haue the name of merite, because it is grounded vpon the pardon and forgiueneffe of sinnes.

4 But it is a moste vaine slander, that men are allured to sinne, when wee affirme the free forgiueneffe of sinnes, in which we say that righteousnesse consisteth. For, wee say that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompensed, and that therefore it shoulde neuer be obtained, vnlesse it were freely giuen. Moreouer, that it is to vs in deede freely giuen, but not so to Christ which bought it so deerely, namely with his owne most holy blood, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be paid to the iudgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holy blood is not shed so oft as they sinne. Furthermore, wee learne, that our filthinesse is such, as is neuer washed away but with y^e fountaine of this most pure blood. Ought not they that heare these thinges, to conceiue a greater horroure of sinne, than if it were saide that it is wiped away with the sprinkling of good workes? And if they haue any thing of God, howe can they but dread being once cleansed, to wallowe themselues againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to trouble and infect the purenesse of this fountaine? I haue washed my feete (saith the faithful soule in Salomon) howe shall I againe defile them? Nowe it is euident, whether sort doe both more abace the forgiueneffe of sinnes, and do more make vile the dignitie of righteousnesse. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their dounge: Wee affirme that the guiltinesse of sinne is more gricuous than can be purged with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogatiue of the onely blood of Christ. They say that righteousnes (if it faile at any time) is restored and repaired by satisfactorie workes: wee thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof wee must flee to the onely mercie of God. As for the rest of those things that pertaine to the forgiueneffe of sinnes, let them be sought out of the next Chapter.

Cant. 3. 5.

NOwe let vs also go through the other argumentes wherewith Satan by the souldiers of his garde, goeth about either to ouerthrowe or batter the iustification of faith. This I thinke we haue already wrung from the sclaunders, that they can no more charge vs as enemies of good workes. For, iustification is taken away from good workes, not that no good workes should be done, or that those which be done should be denied to be good, but that we should not put affiurance in them, nor glorie in them, nor ascribe saluation vnto them. For this is our affiurance, this is our glory, and the onely author of our saluation, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him the sonnes of God, and heires of the heauenly kingdome, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse, into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they doe beside these assaile vs, as we haue sayde, with other engines, goe to, let vs go forwarde in beating away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the lawe, which the Lorde did set foorth to the keepers of his lawe: and they aske whether we will haue them to be vtterly voyde or effectuell. Because it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are voyde, they take it for confessed that they are of some effectualnesse. Hereupon they reason that we are not iustified by only faith. For thus saith the Lord: And it shalbe, if thou shalt here these commandements and iudgements, and shall keepe them and do them, the Lord also shall keepe with thee his couenant and mercy which he hath sworne to thy fathers, he shall loue thee and multiply thee, and blesse thee, &c. Againe, If ye shall well direct your wayes and your endeouours, if ye walk not after strange Gods, if ye do iudgement betweene man and man, and go not backe into malice, I will walke in the midst of you. I will not recite a thousande peeces of the same sort, which sith they nothing differ in sense, shalbe declared by the solution of these. In a summe, Moses testifieth that in the lawe is set forth blessing and curse, death and life. Thus therefore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and frutelesse, or that iustification is not of faith alone. We haue already before shewed, howe if we sticke fast in the lawe, ouer vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth onely curse which is threatned to al transgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his law, such as there is none found. This therefore remaineth, that all mankinde is by the lawe accused, and subiect to curse & the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needes goe out of the power of the lawe, and be as it were brought into libertie from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdrawe vs from the keeping of the lawe, should allure vs to thinke all thinges lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staies being broken and with loose reines to run at riot: but the spirituall libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a dismayed and ouerthrowen conscience, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the lawe helde it downe bounde and faste tyed. This deliuerance from the subiection of the lawe, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obtaine when by sayth wee take holde of the mercie of God in Christ, whereby we are certified and assured of the righteousnesse of finnes, with the feeling whercof the lawe did pricke and bite vs.

2 By this reason euen the promises that were offered vs in the law, should be all vneffectuall and voyde, vnlesse the goodnesse of God by the Gospell did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole lawe, vpon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, shal neuer be fulfilled. And the Lorde so helpeth, not by leauing part of righteousnes in our workes, and supplying parte by his mercifull bearing with vs, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousnesse. For the Apostle, when hē had before sayde that he and other Iewes beleueed in Iesus Christ, knowing that man is not iustified by the workes of the lawe, addeth a reason: not that they should be holpen to fulnesse of righteousnesse by the faith of Christ, but by it should be iustified, not by the workes of the lawe. If the faithfull remoue from the lawe into faith, that they may in faith finde righteousnesse which they see to be absent from the lawe: truly they forsake the righteousnesse of the lawe. Therefore now let him that list, amplify the rewardings which are saide to be prepared for the keeper of the law, so that he therewithall consider that it commeth to passe by our peruerfnesse, that we feele no fruite thereof till we haue obtained an other righteousnesse of faith. So Dauid, when he made mention of the rewarding which the Lorde hath prepared for his seruantes, by and by descendeth to the reknowledging of finnes, whereby that same rewarding is made voyde. Also in the xix. Psalme, he gloriously setteth foorth the benefites of the lawe, but he by and by crieth out: Who shall vnderstande his faults? Lord cleanse me from my secret faults. This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had sayd that all the wayes of the Lord are goodnes & truth to them that feare him, he addeth: For thy names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my peruersenesse, for it is much. So ought we also to reknowledge, that there is in deede the good wil of God set forth vnto vs in y lawe, if we might deserue it by workes, but that the same neuer commeth to vs by the deseruing of workes.

3 How then? Are they giuen that they should vanish away without fruit? I haue euen nowe already protested that the same is not my meaning. I say verily that they vter not their effectualnesse toward vs, so long as they haue respect to the merite of workes, and that therefore if they be considered in themselues, they be after a certaine manner abolished. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I haue giuen you commaundementes, which who so shall do shall liue in them, is of no value if we stand still in it, and shall neuer a whit more profit than if it had not beene giuen at all: because it belongeth not euen to the most holy seruantes of God, which are all far from the fulfilling of the lawe, but are compassed aboute with many transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospel are put in place of them, which do offer free forgiuenesse of finnes, they bring to passe that not onely we our selues be acceptable to God, but that our workes also haue their thanke: & not this only that the Lord accepteth them, but also extendeth to them the blessings which where by couenant due to the keeping of y law. I grant therefore, that those thinges which the Lorde hath promised in his lawe to the followers followers of righteoufnesse and holinesse, are rendred to the workes of the faithfull: but in this rendring, the cause is alwayes to be considered that pouereth grace to workes. Now causes we see y^e there be three. The first is, that God turning away his sight from the workes of his seruantes, which alway deserue rather reproch than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely meane of faith reconcileth them to himselfe without the meane of workes. The seconde, that of his fatherly kindnesse and tender mercifulnes, he listeth vp workes to so great honour, not weying the worthines of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiueth the verie same workes with pardon, not imputing the imperfection, wherw^{ch} they al being defiled, should otherwise be rather reckened among sinnes than vertues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters haue ben deceiued, which thought they had gaily escaped al absurdities when they said y^e workes do not of their owne inward goodnesse auaille to deserue saluation, but by y^e forme of the couenaut, because the Lord hath of his liberalitie so much esteemed them. But in the meane time they considered not, howe farre those workes which they woulde haue to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, vnles there went before both iustification grounded vpon onely faith, and the forgiuenes of sinnes, by which euen the good workes themselues haue neede to be wiped from spottes. Therefore of three causes of Gods liberalitie, by which it is brought to passe that the workes of y^e faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

4 These alledge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in y^e Actes: I finde in tructh that God is not an accepter of persons: but in euerie nation he that doth righteoufnesse is acceptable to him. And hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be vndoubted, that if man doeth by right endeouours get himselfe the fauour of God, it is not the beneficial giste of God alone that he obtieineth saluation: yea that God doeth so of his mercie helpe a sinner, that he is by workes bowed to mercie. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, vnlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him wherby he may be inclined to mercie, but onely miserie. If therefore it bee certaine that man is naked and needie of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loden with al kindes of euils, when God first receiueth them: for what qualitie, I pray you, shall we say that he is worthie of the heauenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merites, where God so euidently setreth out his free mercifulnesse. For, that which in the same place is saide by the voice of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lewdly wrested, that man by endeuour of good workes is prepared to receiue the grace of God. For it must needes be that Cornelius was alreadie enlightened with the spirit of wisdome, sith he was endued with true wisdome, namely with the feate of God: that he was sanctified with the same Spirite, sith he was a follower of righteoufnesse, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certaine fruit thereof. All these thinges therefore which are said to haue pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it of that he did by his owne endeuour prepare himselfe to receiue it. Truly there cannot one syllable of the scripture be brought forth, that agreeth not with this doctrine, that there is none other cause for God to accept man vnto him, but because hee seeth that mā should be euerie way lost, if hee be left to himselfe: but because hee will not haue him lost, he vseth his owne mercie in deliuering him. Nowe wee see howe this accepting hath not regarde to the righteousnesse of man, but is a mere token of the goodnesse of God towarde men being miserable & most vnworthie of so great a benefite.

5 But after that the Lorde hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and seuered him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath new begotten him and newly formed him into a newe life, he nowe embraceth him, as a newe creature with the giftes of his spirite. This is that accepting whereof Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of God euen in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but loue & kisse those good things which he worketh in them by his Spirite. But this is alway to be remembered, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of workes, but in as much as for their cause & for their sakes, whatsoever good workes he hath giuen them in encreasing of his liberalitie, he also vouchsafeth to accepte. For whence haue they good workes, but because the Lorde, as he hath chosen them for vessels vnto honour, so will garnish them with true godlinesse? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly graunth pardon to those deformities and spottes that cleaue to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and louely in whome he seeth the marks and features of his owne face. For we haue in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in vs. For as much as therefore wherefoeuer the Lord beholdeth his owne face, he both worthily loueth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause saide, that the life of the faithfull being framed to holines & righteousnes please him, but because the godly being clothed with mortall fleshe, are yet sinners, and their good workes are but begunne and fauouring of the faultinesse of the fleshe: he can not be fauourable neither to those nor to these, vnlesse hee more embrace them in Christe than in themselues. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testifie that G O D is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousnes. Moses saide to the Israelites, as in all the couenants of his mercie, the Lord likewise on their behalves requireth of his seruantes vprighteousnesse and holines of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaine reioysing by reason thereof shoulde blesse his owne soule, walking in the meane time in y^e pertuersnesse of his owne heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their ductie them that are admitted into the communion of the couenant: yet neuertheless the couenant it selfe is both made at the beginning free, and perpetually remaineth such. After this manner Dauid when he glorieth that there was rendred to him rewarde of the cleannesse of his handes, yet omitteth not that fountaine which I haue spoken of, that he was drawn out of the wombe, because God loued him: where he so setteth out the goodnes of his cause, that he abateth nothing from the freemercy which goeth before all giftes, whereof it is the beginning.

6 And here by the way it shalbe profitable to touch what these formes of speaking doe differ from the promises of the lawe. I call promises of the lawe, not those which are eche where commonly written in the booke of Moses: (for as much as in them also are found many promises of the Gospel) but those which properly belong to the ministerie of the law. Such promises, by what name so euer you list to call them, doe declare that there is rewarde ready vpon condition, if thou doe that which is commaunded thee. But when it is sayde, that the Lord keepeth the couenant of mercie to them which loue him, therein is rather shewed what maner of men be his seruants which haue faithfully receiued his couenaunt, than the cause is expressed why the Lorde should doe good to them. Nowe this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouchsafeth to graunt vs the grace of eternall life, to this ende that he should be loued, feared, and honored of vs: so whatsoeuer promises there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this, and that we should reuerence and worship the authour of the benefites. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that keepe his lawe, let vs remember that the children of God are there signified by the duetic which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cause adopted, that we should honour him for our Father. Therefore least we should disherite our selues from the right of adoption, we must alway endeuour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let vs againe keepe this in minde, that the accomplishment of the mercie of God hangeth not vpon the works of the faithfull: but that he therefore fulfilleth the promise of saluation to them which aunswere to their calling in vprightnesse of life, because in them he acknowledgeth the naturall tokens of his children which are ruled with his Spirit vnto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is in the xv. Psalm spoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lorde who shall dwell in thy tabernacle, and who shall rest in thy holy hill? The innocent in handes and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Esaie, Who shall dwell with deuouring fire? He that doth righteousnesse, he that speaketh right things, &c. For there is not described the stay whereupon the faithful may stand before the Lord, but the manner wherewith the most mercifull father bringeth them into his fellowship, and therein defendeth and strengthneth them. For, because he abhorreth sinne, he loueth righteousnesse: whome he ioyneth to himselfe, them he cleanseth with his spirit, that he may make them of like fashion to himselfe and his kingdome. Therefore if the question bee of the first cause whereby the entrie is made open to the holy ones into the kingdom of God, from whence they haue that they may stand fast & abide in it, we haue this aunswere ready, because the Lorde by his mercie both hath once adopted them, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the question be of the maner, then we must come downe to regeneration & the fruits thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalm.

7 But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good workes with the title of righteousness, and affirmeth that man is justified by them. Of the first sorte there be very manie places, where the obseruinges of the commaundementes are called iustifications or righteousnesses. Of the other sorte, that is an example which is in Moses, This shalbe our righteousness, if we keepe all these commaundementes. And if thou take exception and saye that this is a promise of the law, which being knit to a condition impossible, proueth nothing. There be other of which you can not make the same aunswere, as this: And that shalbe to thee for righteousness before the Lorde, to redeliuer to the poore man his pledge, &c. Again, that which the Prophete saieth, that the zeale in reuenging the shame of Israell, was imputed to Phinees for righteousness. Therefore the Pharisees of our time thinke that here they haue a large matter to triumphe vpon. For when we say, that when the righteousness of faith is set vp, the iustification of workes giueth place, by the same right they make this argument: If righteousness be of workes, then it is false that we are justified by faith onely. Though I graunt that the commaundementes of the lawe are called righteousnesses: it is no maruell: for they are so in deede. Howe be it we must warne the readers that the Grecians haue not fitly translated the Hebrue worde Huemi, Dikaiomata, righteousnesses for commaundements. But for the worde, I willingly release my quarell. For neither doe wee denie this to the lawe of GOD, that it containeth perfect righteousness. For although, because we are detters of all the things that it commaundeth, therefore euen when we haue performed full obedience thereof, we are vnprofitable seruants: yet because the Lorde vouchsafed to graunt it the honour of righteousness, we take not away that which he hath giuen. Therefore wee willingly confesse that the full obedience of the lawe is righteousness, that the keeping of euery commaundement, is a parte of righteousness, if so be that the whole summe of righteousness were had in the other partes also. But wee denie that there is any where any such forme of righteousness. And therefore we take away the righteousness of the lawe, not for that it is maimed and vnperfect of it selfe, but for that by reason of the weaknesse of our fleshe it is no where seene. But the Scripture not onely calleth simply the commaundementes of the Lord, righteousnesses: but it also giueth this name to the workes of the holy ones. As when it reporteth that Zacharie and his wife walked in the righteousnesses of the Lorde: truly when it so speaketh, it weyeth workes rather by the nature of the lawe, than by their owne proper state. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I euen now sayd, that of the negligence of the Greeke translatour is not a lawe to be made. But for asmuch as Luke would alter nothing in the receiued translation, I wil also not strue about it. For God hath commanded these things that are in the lawe to men for righteousness: but this righteousness we performe not but in keeping the whole lawe: for by euery transgression it is broken. Whereas therefore the lawe doth nothing but prescribe righteousness: if we

haue respect to it , all the seuerall commandementes thereof are righteousnesse : if we haue respect to men of whome they are done , they doe not obtaine the praise of righteousnesse by one worke , being trespassers in many, and by that same worke which is euer partly faultie by reason of imperfection.

8 But nowe I come to the seconde kinde, in which is the cheefe hardnesse . Paul hath nothing more strong to proue the righteousnesse of faith, than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousnesse . Sith therefore it is saide that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteousnesse: what Paul affirmeth of fayth, the same may we also conclude of workes. Wherevpon our aduersaries, as though they had wonne the victorie, determine that wee are indeede not iustified without faith, but that wee are also not iustified by it alone, and that workes accomplishe our righteousnesse. Therefore here I beseech the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteousnesse is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously and earnestly wey with mee, howe the scripture may without cauillations be rightly made to agree with it self. For as much as Paul knewe that the iustification of faith is the refuge for them that are destitute of their owne righteousnesse, hee doeth boldly conclude that all they that are iustified by faith, are excluded from the righteousness of workes . But sith it is certaine that the iustification of faith is common to all the faithfull, he doth thereof with like boldnesse conclude that no man is iustified by workes, but rather contrariwise that men are iustified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to dispute of what value workes are by themselves, and an other thing what account is to be made of them after the stablishing of the righteousnesse of faith. If wee shall set a price vpon workes according to their worthinesse, wee say that they are vnworthie to come into the sight of God : and therefore that man hath no workes whereof he may glorie before God: then , that being spoyled of all help of workes he is iustified by onely faith. Nowe wee define righteousnesse thus, that a sinner being receiued into the cōmunion of Christ, is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his bloode hee obtineth forgiveness of sinnes, & being clothed with his righteousness as with his owne, he standeth assured before the heauenly iudgement seat. When the forgiveness of sinnes is set before, the good workes which followe haue nowe another valuation than after their owne deseruing: because what soeuer is in them vnperfect, is couered with the perfection of Christ: whatsoever spots or filthinesse there is, it is wiped away with his cleannesse, that it may not come into the examination of the iudgement of God. Therefore when the guiltines of all trespasses is blotted out, whereby men are hindered that they can bring forth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to defile good workes: the good workes which the faithfull doe are compted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousnesse .

Psal. 106. 31.

Deut. 27. holy workes, being in the rest of the workes of his life a trespasser of the lawe. This is more than an absurditie. Then I will aske if hee be counted righteous for many good workes, if he be in any part founde guiltie. This also hee shall not bee so bolde to affirme, when the penall ordinance of the the lawe crieth out against it, and proclaimeth al them accursed which haue not fulfilled all the commaundementes of the lawe to the vttermost. Moreover, I will goe further and aske, whether there be any worke that deserueth to be accused of no vncleannesse or imperfection. And howe coulde there be any such before those eyes, to whom euen the verie starres are not cleane enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shal he be compelled to grant that there is no good worke which is not so defiled with transgressions adioyned with it, and with the corruptnesse of it selfe, that it can not haue the honour of righteousness. Nowe if it be certaine that it proceedeth from the righteousness of faith that works which are otherwise vnpure, vncleane, and but halfe workes, not worthy of the sight of God, much lesse of his loue, are imputed to righteousness, why doe they with boasting of the righteousness of workes destroy the iustification of faith, whereas if this iustification were not, they shoulde in vaine boast of that righteousness? Will they make a vipers birth? For thereto tend the saying of the vngoodly men. They can not denie that the iustification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousness of workes: yet they conclude that man is not iustified by faith, because good workes also are accounted for righteousness. Therefore let vs let passe these follies and confesse as the trueth is, that if the righteousness of workes of what sorte so euer it be accounted, hangeth vpon the iustification of faith, it is by this not onely nothing minished but also confirmed, namely whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mightie. Neither yet let vs thinke that workes are so commended after free iustification, that they also afterward come into the place of iustifying a man, or doe parte the office betweene them and faith. For vnlesse the iustification remaine alway whole, the vncleannes of workes shall be vncouered. And it is no absurditie, that a man is so iustified by faith that not only he himselfe is righteous, but also his workes are esteemed righteous about their worthines.

Iob. 4. 18. 10 After this manner we will graunt in workes not onely a righteousness in partes (as our aduersaries themselues would haue) but also that it is allowed of God as if it were a perfect & ful righteousness. But if we remember vpon what foundation it is vpholden, al the difficultie shall be dissolued. For then and not till then it beginneth to bee an acceptable worke, when it is receiued with pardon. Nowe whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both vs and all our things in Christ? Therefore as we, when we are grafted into Christ, doe therefore appeare righteous before God, because our wickedneses are couered with his innocence, so our workes are & be taken for righteous, because whatsoever faultinesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleanness of Christ, it is not imputed. So wee may rightfully say, that by onely faith not onely we but also our workes are iustified. Nowe if this righteousness of workes of what sorte soeuer it bee, hangeth vpon faith and free iustification, and is made of it: it ought to bee included ded vnder it, and to be set vnder it as the effect vnder the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it of that it ought to be raised vp either to destroy or darken it. So Paul to driue men to confesse that our blessednesse consisteth of the mercie of God, not of workes, chiefly enforceth that saying of Dauid, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgien, and whose sinnes are couered. Blessed is he to whome the Lorde hath not imputed sinne. If any man do thrust in to the contrary innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to be giuen to workes: as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pitie on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsell of the wicked, which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe iudgement, the vndefiled, the poore in Spirite, the meeke, the mercifull, &c. they shall not make but that it shalbe true which Paul saith, For because those things that are there commended are neuer so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miserable, vnlesse he be deliuered from miserie by forgienesse of sinnes. For asmuch as therefore all the kindes of blessednesse which are extolled in the Scriptures, do fall downe voide, so that man receiue th fruits of none of them, til he haue obtained blessednesse by forgienesse of sinnes, which may afterwarde make place for them: it followeth that this is not onely the hiest & the chiefe but also the only blessednesse: vnlesse paradventure you wil haue that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Nowe there is much lesse reason why the calling of men righteous shoulde trouble vs, which is commonly giuen to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holinesse of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeouour to the following of righteousness, than do fulfill righteousness it selfe, it is meeete that this righteousness such as it is, giue place to the iustification of faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

II But they say that we haue yet more businesse with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth against vs. For he teacheth both that Abraham was iustified by workes, and also that all we are iustified by workes, not by faith only. What then will they draw Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a minister of Christ, his saying must be so taken that it disagree not from Christ speaking by the mouth of Paul, The holy Ghost affirmeth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteousness by faith, not by workes: and we also do teache that all are iustified by faith without y workes of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by Iames that both Abrahams righteousness & ours consisteth of workes, not of only faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himselfe. What agreement shall there be therefore of these two? It is enough for the aduersaries, if they pluck the righteousness of faith which we would haue to be fastened with moste deepe rootes: but to render to consciences their quietnesse, they haue no great care. Whereby verily you may see that they gnawe the iustification of faith, but in the meane time do appoint no marke of righteousness where consciences may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they list, so that they may boast of no other victorie than that they haue taken away all certaintie of righteousness. And this wretched victorie they shall obtaine, where the light of truth being quenched, the Lord shal suffer them to ouer-spread the darknesse of lies. But wherefoeuer the truth of God shal stande, they shall nothing preuaile. I deny therefore that the saying of Iames which they stil continually hold vp against vs as it were the shield of Achilles doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plaine, first wee must looke at the marke that the Apostle shooteth at: and then we must note where they be deceiued. Because there were then many (which mischiefe is wont to be continual in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelitie, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithfull, and yet ceased not to boast of the false name of faith: Iames doeth here mock the foolish boldnes of such men. Therefore it is not his purpose in any point to diminish the force of true faith, but to shewe how fondly those triflers did challenge so much the vaine image of it, that being contented herewith they carelesly ranne dissolutely abroade into all licentiousnes of vices. This ground being conceiued, it shalbe easie to perceiue where our aduersaries do misse. For they fall into two deceits in the worde, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of iustifying. Whereas the Apostle nameth faith a vaine opinion farre distant from the truth of faith, it is spoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he sheweth at the beginning in these words. What profiteth it, my brethren, If any man say y he hath faith, & hath no works? He doth not say, if any haue faith without works, but, If any man boast. More plainly also he speaketh a litle after, where he in mockerie maketh it worse than the deuils knowledge: last of all, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may sufficiently perceiue what he meaneth. Thou belieuest (saith he) that there is a God. Truly, if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleue that there is a God, it is now no maruile if it do not iustifie. And when this is taken from it, let vs not thinke that any thing is abated from the Christian faith, the nature whereof is farre otherwise. For after what maner doeth true faith iustifie vs, but when it conioyneth vs with Christ, that being made one with him wee may enioy the partaking of his righteousness? It doth not therefore iustifie vs by this that it conceiueth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this that it resteth vpon the assurednes of the mercy of God.

12 We haue not yet the worke, vnlesse we examine also the other deceit in the word, forasmuch as Iames setteth part of iustification in works. If you will make Iames agteeing both with the rest of the Scriptures, & w himself, you must of necessitie take the worde of Iustifying in an other signification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul saith y wee are iustified, when the remembrance of our vnrighteousnesse being blotted out, we are accounted righteous. If Iames had meant of that raking, he had wrongfully alleaged that out of Moses: Abraham beleued God, &c. For he thus frameth it together. Abraham by works obtained righteousness, because he sticke not at y commandement of God, to offer vp his sonne. And so the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, that he beleued God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness. If it be an absurditie, that the effect is before his cause, either Moses doth in that place falsely testifie, that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness: or he deserued not righteousness by that obedience which he shewed in offering vp of Isaac. Abraham was iustified by his faith, when Ismaell was not yet conceiued, which was now growen past childhood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shal we say, that he got to himselfe righteousness by obedience which followed long after ward? Wherefore either James did wrongfully misturne the order (which it is a wickednesse to think) or he meant not to say y^e he was iustified, as though he deserued to be accounted righteous. How then? Truly it appeareth that he speaketh of the declaration of righteousness & not the imputation: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith, they do proue their righteousness with obedience & good works, not with a bare & imagelike visor of faith. In a summe, he disputeth not by what meane we are iustified, but he requireth of the faithful a working righteousness. And as Paul affirmeth that men be iustified without the help of works: so James doeth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good works. The considering of this end, shal deliuer vs out of all doubt. For our aduersaries are hereby chiefly deceiued, y^e they thinke that James defineth the manner of iustifying, whereas he trauaileth about nothing else but to overthrow their peruerse carelesnes, which did vainly pretend faith to excuse their despising of good workes. Therefore into how many wayes soeuer they wrest the words of James, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodilesse shewe of faith doth not iustifie, and that a faithfull man not contented with such an imaginatiue shewe, doth declare his righteousness by good workes.

13 As for that which they alleage out of Paul, the same meaning, that y^e doers of the law, not the hearers, are iustified, it nothing helpeth them. I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the law is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a mere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Iewes from foolish confidence, which boasted themselues of the onely knowledge of the lawe, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they should not stand so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the law, he warneth them, that if righteousness bee sought out of the lawe, not the knowledge but the obseruing of it is required. Wee verily make no doubt of this that the righteousness of the law standeth in workes: nor yet of this also, that the righteousness consisteth in the worthines and merites of workes. But it is not yet proued, that we are iustified by workes, vnlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging together of the text shalbee a sufficient testimonie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Iewes of vn-righteousnesse, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and faith, that they which sinned without the Lawe, doe perish without the Lawe: which is spoken of the Gentiles: but they which haue sinned in the lawe, are iudged by the lawe: which pertaineth to the Iewes. Now because they winking at their owne trespassings proudly gloried of the onely lawe: he adioyneth that which moste fitly agreed, that the law was not therefore made, that men should be made righteous by onely hearing of the voice therof: but then and not til then when they obeyed, as if he should say: Seekest thou righteousness in the law? alleage not y^e hearing of it, which of it self is of small importance, but bring workes, by which thou maist declare that the law was not set for thee in vaine. Of these workes because they were all destitute, it followed that they were spoyled of glorying of the law. Therefore we must of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrary argument. The righteousnesse of the law consisteth in the perfection of workes. No man can boast that he hath by workes satisfied the law. Therefore there is no righteousnes by the lawe.

14 Now they alleage also these places, wherein the faithfull doe boldly offer their righteousnes to the iudgement of God to be examined, & require that sentence be giuen of them according to it. Of which sort are these: Judge me O Lord according to my righteousnesse, & according to my innocencie, which are in mee. Againe, Heare my righteousnesse, O God. Thou hast proued my heart, & hast visited it in the night, & there was no wickednesse found in me. Againe, The Lorde shall render to mee according to my righteousnes, and he shall recompence mee according to the cleannesse of my hands. Because I haue kept the wayes of the Lord, & haue not wickedly departed from my God. And I shalbe vnspotted & shal keepe mee from my iniquitie. Againe, Iudge me, Lord, because I haue walked in mine innocencie. I haue not sit with lying men, I wil not enter in with them that doe wicked things. Destroy not my soule with the vngodly, my life wth men of blood: in whose hands are iniquities: whose right hand is filled wth giftes. But I haue walked innocently. I haue about spoken of the affiance which the holy ones do seeme simply to take to theselues of workes. As for these testimonies that we haue here alleaged, they shall not much accombre vs; if they be vnderstanded according to their compasse, or (as they commonly call it) their circumstance. Now the same is double. For neither would they haue them to be wholly examined y^t they should be either condemned or acquitted according to y^e continuall course of their whole life: but they bring into iudgement a speciall cause to be debated. Neither do they claime to themselues righteousnes in respect of the perfection of God, but by comparison of naughty & wicked men. First when the iustifying of man is entreated of, it is not onely required y^t he haue a good cause in some particular matter, but a certaine perpetuall agreement of righteousnes in his whole life. But the holy ones, when they call vpon the iudgement of God to approue their innocencie, do not offer themselues free from all guiltines & in euery behalfe faultlesse: but verily when they haue fastened their affiance of saluation in his goodnesse onely, yet trusting y^t he is the reuenger of the poore afflicted against right & equitie, they commend to him the cause wherein the innocent are oppressed. But when they set their aduersaries with them before the iudgement seat of God, they boast not of such an innocencie as shall answere to y^e purenesse of God if it be seuerely searched, but because in comparison of the malice, obstinacie, suttletie & wickednes of their aduersaries they know that their plainnesse, righteousnes, simplicitie, & cleannes is knowen & pleasing to God: they feare not to call vpon him to be iudge betweene themselues & them. So when Dauid said to Saul: The Lord render to euery man according to his righteousnes & trueth: he meant not that the Lorde should examine by himselfe and reward euery man according to his deseruings, but he tooke the Lord to witnesse, how great his innocencie was in comparison of the wickednes of Saul. And Paul himselfe, when he boasteth with this glorying that he hath a good witnes of conscience, that he hath trauailed with simplicitie and vprightnesse in the Church of God, meaneth not that he standeth vpon such glorying before GOD, but being compelled with the flanders of the wicked, he defendeth his faithfull and honest dealing, which he knewe to be pleasing to the mercifull kindnesse of God, against all euill speaking of men whatsoeuer it be. For wee see what he sayeth in another place, that he knoweth no euill by himselfe, but that he is not thereby iustified, namely because he knewe that the iudgement of God far surmounteth the blearied sight of men. Howsoeuer therefore the godly doe defende their innocencie against the hypo crisie of the vngodly, by the witnessing & iudgement of God; yet when they haue to doe with God alone, they all crie out with one mouth: If thou marke iniquitie, Lord, Lord who shal abide it? Enter not into iudgement with thy seruants: because euery one that liueth shall not be iustified in thy sight: and distrusting their owne workes, they gladly sing, Thy goodnesse is better than life.

15 There are also other places not vnlike to these before, in which a man may yet tary. Salomon saith, that he which walketh in his vprightnes, is righteous. Againe, That in the path of righteousness is life, and that in the same is not death. After which manner Ezechiel reporteth that he shall iue life that doth iudgement and righteousness. None of these doe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the sonnes of Adam with such an vprightnes. If there be none, either they must perish at the sight of God, or flee to the sanctuarie of mercie. Neither do wee in the meane time deny but that to the faithfull their vprightnes, though it be but halfe & vnperfect, is a step toward immortalitie. But whence commeth that but because whome the Lord hath taken into the couenant of grace, he searcheth not their workes according to their deseruings, but kisseth them with fatherly kindnesse: Whereby we do not only vnderstand that which the scholemen doe teache, that workes haue their value of the accepting grace. For they meane that workes which are otherwise insufficient to purchase righteousness by the couenant of the law, are by the accepting of God auanced to the value of equalitie. But I say that they being defiled both with other trespassings & with their owne spottes, are of no other value at all, than in so much as the Lord tenderly graunteth pardon to both: that is to say, giueth free righteousness to man. Neither are here those prayers of the Apostle seasonably thrust in place, where he wisheth so great perfection to the faithfull, that they may be faultles & vnblamable in the day of the Lorde. These wordes in deede the Celestines did in old time turmoile, to affirme a perfection of righteousness in this life. But, which wee thinke to be sufficient, wee answere briefly after Augustine, that all the godly ought in deede to endeavour toward this marke, that they may one day appeare spotles and faultles before the face of God: but because the best and most excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, wee shall then and not till then attaine to this marke, when being vncloued of this flesh of sinne wee shal fully cleaue to the Lorde. Yet will I not stiffely striue with him which will giue the title of perfection to the holy ones, so that hee also limitte the same with the wordes of Augustine him selfe. When (saith he) we wil call the vertue of the holy ones, perfect: to the same perfection also belongeth the acknowledging of imperfection both in trueth and in humilitie.

NOwe let vs passe ouer to those sayings which affirme, that God wil render to euery man according to his workes: of which sorte are these. Euery man shall beare away that which he hath done in the body, either good or euill. Glorie and honour to him that worketh good: trouble & distresse vpon euery soule of him that worketh euill. And they which haue done good things, shal go into the resurrection of life: they which haue done euill, into the resurrection of iudgement. Come ye blessed of my father: I haue hungred, and ye gaue mee meate: I haue thirsted, and ye gaue mee drinke, &c. And with them let vs also ioyne these sayings, which call eternal life the rewarde of workes. Of which sort are these. The rendering of y hands of a man shal be restored to him. He that feareth the commandment, shall be rewarded. Be glad and reioyce, beholde, your reward is plentiful in heauen. Euery man shall receiue reward according to his labor. Where it is said that God shall render to euery man according to his workes, the same is easily assoyled. For, that manner of speaking doeth rather shewe the order of following, than the cause. But it is out of dout, that the Lorde doeth accomplish our saluation by these degrees of his mercie, when those whome hee hath chosen he calleth to him: those whome he hath called, he iustificth: those whome he hath iustified, he glorifieth. Although therefore he do by his only mercie receiue them y be his into life, yet because he bringeth them into the possession therof by the race of good workes, that he may fulfill his worke in them by such order as he hath appointed: it is no marueile if it be said that they be crowned according to their workes, by which without dout they are prepared to receiue the crowne of immortalic. Yea and after this maner it is fidly saide that they worke their owne saluation, when in applying themselves to good workes, they practise themselves towarde eternall life: namely as in an other place they are commanded to worke the meate which perisheth not, when by belecuing in Christ they get to the selues life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the sonne of man shal giue you. Whereby appeareth y the worde of Working is not set as contrary to grace, but is referred to endeouour: and therefore it followeth not, y either y faithful are themselves authors of their own saluation, or that the same proceedeth from their workes. How then? So soone as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by the knowledge of the Gospel, and the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternall life is begon in them. Nowe the same good work which God hath begon in them, must also be made perfect vntill the day of the Lord Iesu. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heauenly father in righteousness and holines, they proue themselves to be his children

2. There is no cause why we should of the name of rewarde gather an argument that our workes are the cause of saluation. First let this be determined in our heartes, that the kingdome of heauen is not a reward of seruants, but an inheritance of children, which they onely shall enioy, that are adopted of the Lord to be his children: & for no other cause, but for this adoptiō. For, the sonne of the bondwoman shall not be heir, but the sonne of the free woman. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghost promiseth to workes eternall glory for rewarde; in expressing the inheritance by name; he sheweth y^e it commeth from else where. So Christ reherfeth works, which he recompenseth with the rewarding of heauen, when he calleth the elect to the possession thereof; but he therewithall adioyneth y^e it must be possessed by right of inheritance. So Paul biddeth seruantes, which do their duety faithfully, to hope for rewarde of the lord: but he addeth, of inheritance. We see how they do as it were by expresse wordes prouide that we impute not eternall blessednes to workes, but to the adoption of God. Why therfore do they therewithall together make mention of workes? This question shalbe made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Isaac, there was promised to Abraham a seede in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and a multiplying of his seede, which should match the starres of the skie, and the sands of the sea, and other like. In many yeares afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer vs his sonne in sacrifice. When he had performed this obedience, he receiued a promise, I haue sworne by my selfe (saith the Lord,) because thou hast done this thing, and hast not spared thine owne only begotten sonne, I will blesse thee and multiply thy seede as the starres of the skie, & the sandes of the sea: thy seede shall possesse the gates of their enemies, & all the nations of the earth shalbe blessed in thy seede, because thou hast obeyed my voyce. What heare we? Hath Abraham by his obedience deserued the blessing, the promise whereof he had receiued before that the commandement was giuen? Here verily we haue it without circumstances shewed, that y^e Lord rewardeth the workes of the faithfull with those benefits which he had already giuen them before that the workes were thought of, hauing yet no cause why he should do good to them but his owne mercy.

3. Yet doth the Lord not deceiue nor mock vs when he saith that he rendereth for rewarde to workes the same thing which he had before works freely giuen. For, because he will haue vs to be exercised with good workes, to think vpon the deliery or enioying (as I may so call it) of these thinges which he hath promised, and to runne through them to the blessed hope set before vs in heauen, the fruite of the promises is also rightly assigned to them, to the ripeness wherof they do not bring vs. The Apostle very fitly expressed both these pointes, when he said that the Colossians apply themselues to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laide vp for them in heauen, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospel. For when he sayeth that they knewe by the Gospell, that there was hope layde vp for them in heauen, he declareth that the same is by Christ only, not vnderproped with any workes. Wherewith accordeth that saying of Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, vnto the saluation which is ready to be manifestly shewed at the time appointed for it. When he saith y they labour for it, he signifieth that the faithful must runne al the time of their life, that they may attaine to it. But least we should thinke that the rewarde which the Lorde promifeth vs, is not reduced to the measure of merite, he did put sooth a parable, in which he made himselfe a housholder, which sent all them that he met, to the trimming of his vineyard, some at the first houre of the day, some at the second, some at the third, yea & some also at the 11. At euening he payed to eucry one equall wages. The exposition of which parable, that same old writer whatsoeuer he was, whose booke is caried abroade vnder the name of Ambrose of the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truely set out. I will vse rather his wordes than mine owne. The Lorde (sayth he) by the rule of this comparison hath stablished the diuersity of manyfolde calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let into the vineyard at the 11. houre, are made equall with them that had wrought the whole day, do represent the estate of them, whom for the aduancing of the excellencie of grace, the tender kindenesse of the Lord hath rewarded at the waning of the day, & at the ending of their life: not paying wages for their labour, but pouring out the riches of his goodnesse vpon them whom he hath chosen without workes, that euen they also which haue swer in great labour, & haue receiued no more than the last, may vnderstand y they haue receiued a gift of grace, not a reward of workes. Last of all, this also is worthy to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the reward of workes, that it is not simply taken for the communicating which we haue with God to blessed immortalitie, when he embraceth vs with fatherly good will in Christ: but for y possessing or enioying (as they call it) of blessednes, as also the very wordes of Christ do sounde, In time to come life euerlasting. And in an other place, Come & possesse the kingdom, &c. After this maner Paul calleth adoption, the reuealing of the adoption which shalbe made in the resurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our body. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternal death, so when man is receiued of God into fauour, that he may enioy the communicating of him and be made one with him, he is receiued from death to life: which is done by the beneficiall meane of adoption only. And if, as they are wont, they stify enforce the rewarde of workes, we may turne against them that saying of Peter, that eternally life is the reward of faith.

4 Therefore let vs not thinke, that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthinesse of our workes, as if they deserued such rewarde, For the Scripture leaueth nothing to vs, whereof we may be aduanced in the sight of God. But rather it wholly endeuoreth to beate down our arrogance, to humble vs, to throw vs downe, and altogether to breake vs in peeces. But our weakenesse is so succoured, which otherwise woulde by and by slippe and fall downe, vnlesse it did susteine it selfe with this expectation, & mitigate her tedious grieues with comfort. First how hard it is for a man to forsake and deny not only all his things, but also himself, let eucry man consider for himself. And yet with this introduction Christ traineth his scholers, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he so instructeth them vnder

the discipline of the crosse, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or confidence of present good things. Briefly he so handleth them for the most part, that which way soeuer they turne their eies throughout the whole wideness of the world, they haue on euery side nothing but desperation present before them: so that Paul saith, that we are more miserable than all men if our hope be only in this world. That they should not faint in these so great distresses, the lord is present with them, which putteth them in mind to lift vp their head higher, to cast their eies further, that they finde with him the blessednesse which they see not in the world. This blessednesse he calleth, 1. Cor. 15. 19 reward, wages, recompence, not weying the merit of workes, but signifying that it is a recompensing to their troubles, sufferings, slaunders. &c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but that we may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a rewarding, because in it the Lord receiuethe his from labors into rest, from affliction into prosperous and happy state, from sorrow into gladnes, from pouertie into flowing wealth, from shame into glory, and changeth all the euils which they haue suffered for greater good things. So it shal also be no inconuenience, if we thinke holinesse of life to be a way, not which openeth an entry into the glory of the heauenly kingdom, but whereby the elect are led of their God into the disclosing of it: forasmuch as this is his good will to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. Onely let vs not imagine a correllation of merit and rewarde, wherein the Sophisters do fondly sticke fast, because they consider not this end which we set forth. But how vnorderly is it, when the Lord calleth vs to one end, for vs to looke to another? Nothing is more euident, than that reward is promised to good works, to relieue the weaknesse of our flesh with some comfort, not to puffed vp our mindes with glorie. Whosoeuer therefore doth thereby gather the merite of workes, or doth in one balance wey worke with rewarde, hee erreth farre from the right marke of God.

5 Wherefore when the Scripture saith that God the iust iudge will one day render to his a crowne of righteousnesse, I doe not onely take exception with Augustine, and say: To whome shoulde hee being a iust iudge, render a crowne, if he had not being a merciful father giuen grace? and how shoulde there be righteousnes, vnlesse grace went before which iustificieth the vnrighteous? Howe shoulde these due thinges bee rendered, vnlesse these vndue thinges were first giuen? But also I ad an other thing. How shoulde he impute righteousnes to our works, vnlesse his tender mercifulnes did hide y vnrighteousnesse that is in them? Howe shoulde he iudge them worthie of reward, vnles he did by immeasureable bountifulnes take away that which is worthy of punishment? For he is wont to call eternall life, grace: because it is rendered to the free giftes of God when it is repaid to workes. But the scripture doth further humble vs, and therewithall raise vs vp. For besides this that it forbiddeth vs to glorie in workes, because they are the free giftes of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alwayes defiled with some dregs, that they can not satisfie G O D, if they bee examined by the rule of his iudgement: but least our courage shoulde faint, it teacheth that they please by only pardon. But although Augustine speakech somewhat otherwise than wee doe: yet that he doth not so disagree in the matter, shall appeare by his wordes in his thirde booke to Boniface: Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life euen miraculously holy and perfect, the other honest indeede and of vncorrupt manners, but not so perfect but that much wanteth in him: at the last hee concludeth thus. Euen this man which in manners seemeth much inferiour, by reason of y^e true faith in God whereof hee liueth and according to which he accuseth himselfe in al his offences, in all his good workes prayseth God; giuing to himselfe the shame, and to him glorie, and taking from himselfe both the pardon of sinnes, and the loue of weldoings, when he is to be deliuered out of this life, hee passeth into the fellowship of Christ: Wherefore, but because of faith? Which although it faue no man without works, (for it is it, which worketh by loue, not a reprobate faith) yet by it also sins are released; because the righteous man liueth of faith; but without it euen the same which seeme good workes are turned into sinnes. Here verily he doeth plainly confesse that which wee so much traue! to proue, that the righteousnes of good workes hangeth hereupon, that they are by pardon allowed of God.

A verio neere sense to the places aboue recited, haue these: Make to your selues friendes of the Mammon of wickednesse, y^e when you shal faile, they may receiue you into euerlasting tabernacles. Command the rich men of this worlde not to be proudly minded, nor to trust in vncertaine richesse but in the liuing G O D, to doe well, to become rich in good workes, to lay vp in store for themselues a good foundation against the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good workes are compared to y^e richesse, which wee may enioy in the blessednes of eternall life. I aunswere, that wee shal neuer come to the true vnderstanding of them, vnlesse we turne our eies to the marke wherevnto y^e holy Ghost directeth his words. If it be true which Christ saith y^e our minde abideth there where our treasure is, as the children of the world are wont to be earnestly bent to y^e getting of those things which serue for the delights of this present life: so the faithfull must looke, sith they haue learned that this life shal by and by vanishe away like a dreame, that they sende those things which they woulde enioy, thither where they shal haue perfect life. We must therefore doe as they doe which purpose to remooue into any place, where they haue chosen to rest their whole life. They send their goods before, and doe not discontentedly want them for a time: because they think themselues so much more happy, how much more goods they haue where they shal tary long. If we belecue that heauen is our countrie, it behoueth vs rather to sende away our richesse thither than to keepe them here where we must loose them with sudden remoouing. But how shall we send them thither? If we communicate to the necessities of the poore: to whome whatsoever is giuen, the Lorde accounteth it ginen to himselfe. Whereupon comieth that notable promise, Hee that giueth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lord. Againe, hee that liberally soweth, shall liberally reape. For those things are deliuered into the hande of the Lorde to keepe, which are bestowed vpon our brethren by the dutie of charitie. Hee, as he is a faithfull keeper of that which is deliuered to him, will one day restore it with plentifull gaine. Are then our dutifull doings of so great value with God, that they be as richesse laide vp in store for vs in his hand? Who shall feare so to say, when the scripture doth so oft and plainely witness it? But if any man will leape from the meere goodnes of God to the worthinesse of workes, he shall be nothing holpen by these testimonies to the stablishing of his error. For you can gather nothing rightly thereof but the meere inclination of Gods tendernes toward vs. For as much as to encourage vs to well doing although the seruices which wee doe to him are not worthie of so much as his only looking vpon them, yet he suffreth none of them to be lost.

7 But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when he comforteth y^e Thessalonians in troubles, teacheth that the same are sent to the, that they may be accounted worthie of the kingdome of God, for which they suffer. For (saith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you; but to you, rest with vs when the Lorde Iesus shall be shewed from heauen. But the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews saith, God is not vnrighteous, that he should forget your worke, and the loue, which you haue shewed in his name for that you haue ministred to the faintes. To the first place I answer, that there is no worthines of merites spoken of; but because God the father willeth that we whome he hath chosen to be his children, should be made like to Christ his first begotten sonne: as it behooued that he should first suffer; and then enter into the glorie appointed for him; so must we also by many tribulations enter into the kingdome of heauen. Therefore when we suffer tribulations for the name of Christ; there are as it were certaine marks printed vpon vs, wherwith God vseth to marke y^e sheepe of his flocke. After this manner therefore wee are accounted worthy of the kingdome of God, because we beare in our body the marks of our Lord and master which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make these sayings. That we beare about in our body the mortification of Iesus Christ that his life may be shewed in vs. That we be fashioned like to his sufferings, that we may come to the likenes of his resurrection from the dead. The reason which is adioyned serueth not to proue any worthines, but to confirm the hope of y^e kindome of God; as if he had said, As it agreeth with the iust iudgement of God, to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations that they haue done to you; so agreeth it also to giue to you release & rest fro vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it so becommeth y^e righteousness of God not to forget the obediences of them that bee his, that it declareth to be in a maner vnrighteous if hee should forget them, hath this meaning; God to quicken our slothfulnes, hath giuen vs assurance that the labour shall not be vaine which we shall take for his glorie. Let vs alway remember y^e this promise, as all other should bring vs no profit, vnlesse the free couenant of mercy went before, wherupon the whole assurednes of our saluation should rest. But standing vpon that couenant, wee ought assuredly to trust, there shall also not want reward of the liberalitie of God to our workes howsoeuer they be vnworthy. The Apostle to confirme vs in y^e expectation, affirmeth y^e God is not vnrighteous, but will stand to his promise once made. Therefore this righteousness is rather referred to the truth of Gods promise, than to his iustice of rendring due. According to which meaning there is a notable saying of Augustine, which as the holy man sticketh not to rehearse often as notable, so I thinke it not vnworthie that wee should continually remember it. The Lord (saith he) is faithfull, which hath made himselfe better to vs, not by receiuing any thing of vs, but by promising all things to vs.

8 There are also alledged these sayings of Paul. If I haue all faith, so y I remoue mountaines out of their place, but haue not charitie, I am nothing. Again, Nowe there remaine hope, faith and charitie, but the greatest among these is charitie. Again, Aboue all things haue charitie, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharisees affirme that we are rather iustified by charitie than by faith, namely by the cheefer vertue as they say. But this sonde argument is easly wiped away. For wee haue in another place already declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place we also expounded of true faith, than which he saith that Charitie is greater: not that it is more meritorious, but because it is more fruitfull, because it extendeth further, because it serueth moe, because it remaineth alway in force, whereas the vse of faith continueth but for a time. If we haue regard to excellence, the loue of God should worthily haue the cheefe place, of which Paul here speaketh not. For he enforceth this thing onely, that wee shoulde with mutuall charitie edifie one another in the Lorde, but let vs imagine that charitie doeth cuerie where excell faith: yet what man of sounde iudgement, yea of offounde braine, will gather thereof that it doeth more iustifie? The power of iustifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthinesse of the worke. Our iustification standeth vpon the onely mercie of God and the deseruing of Christ, which iustification when faith taketh holde of, it is saide to iustifie. Nowe if you aske your aduersaries in what sense they assigne iustification to charitie, they will aunswere that because it is a duetifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deseruing thereof righteousness is imputed to vs by the acceptation of the goodness of God. Here you see how wel the argument proceedeth. We say that faith iustificeth, not because by the worthinesse of it selfe it deserueth righteousness to vs, but because it is an instrument by which wee freely obtaine the righteousness of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, & passing ouer Christ, (where the summe of righteousness standeth) doe affirme that wee are iustified by the benefite of charitie because it excelleth aboue faith: euen as if a man shoulde reason that a king is fitter to make a shooe than is a shoemaker, because hee is an infinite way more excellent: This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sobornicall schooles doe not so much as tast with the vttermost parte of their lippes what the iustification of faith is. But if any wrangler doe yet carpe and aske, why in so small distance of place we take the name of fayth in Paul so diuersely: I haue a weightie cause of this exposition. For sith those giftes which Paul rehearseth are after a certaine manner vnder faith and hope, because they pertaine to y knowledge of God, he comprehendeth them all by way of recapitulation vnder y name of faith and hope: as if he should say both prophecie, and tongues, and the grace and knowledge of interpretation tende to this marke to leade vs to the knowledge of God. And wee know God in this life none otherwise but by hope and faith. Therefore when I name faith and hope, I comprehend all these things together. And so

& 109.

Colo. 3. 14.

there remaine these three, Hope, Faith, Charity: that is to say, how great diuersitie of giftes soeuer there be, they are all referred to these. Among these the chiefe is charity, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If Charitie be the bonde of perfection, then it is also the bonde of righteousnesse which is nothing else but perfection. First, to speake nothing howe Paul there calleth perfection, when the members of the Church well set in order do cleaue together, and to grant that we are by charity made perfect before G O D: yet what new thing bring they foorth? For I will alway on the contrarie side take exception and say that we neuer come to this perfection vnlesse we fulfil all the partes of charity, & thereupon I will gather, that sith all men are most far from the fulfilling of charity, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9 I will not goe through all the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorbonistes rashly snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hande, and do throw them against vs. For, some of them are so worthy to be laughed at, that I my selfe also can not rehearse them, vnlesse I would worthily be counted fonde. Therefore I will make an end, when I shall haue declared the saying of Christ, wherewith they maruelously please themselues. For, to the lawyer which asked him what was necessaric to saluation, he answered: if thou wilt enter into life, keepe the commandementes. What would we more (say they) when we are commaunded by the authour of grace himselfe to get the kingdome of God by the keeping of his commaundementes? As though forsooth it were not certaine, that Christ tempered his answers to them with whome he sawe that he had to doe. Here a doctor of the lawe asketh of the meane to obtaine blessednesse, and not that only, but with doing of what thing men may attaine vnto it. Both the person of him that spake and the question it selfe led the Lord so to answer. The lawyer being filled with the persuasion of the righteousnesse of the lawe, was blinde in confidence of workes. Againe, he sought nothing else but what were the workes of righteousnesse, by which saluation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily sent to the lawe, in which there is a perfect mirrour of righteousnesse. We also do with a loude voyce pronounce that the commaundementes must be kept, if life be sought in workes. And this doctrine is necessary to be knowen of Christians. For how should they flee to Christ if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the hedlong downfal of death? But how should they vnderstande howe far they haue strayed from the way of life, vnlesse they first vnderstande what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the sanctuarie to recouer saluation is in Christe, when they see howe great difference there is betweene their life and the righteousnesse of G O D which is contained in the keeping of the lawe. The summe is this, that if saluation be sought in workes, we must keepe the commandementes by which we are instructed to perfect righteousnesse. But we must not sticke fast here, vnlesse we will faint in our midde course: for none of vs is able to keep y^e commandements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteousnesse of the lawe, we must of necessity resort to an other helpe, namely to the faith of Christ. Wherefore as here the Lorde calleth backe the doctour of the lawe whom he knew to swell with vaine confidence of workes, to the law, wherby he may learne that he is a sinner subiect to the dreadfull iudgement of eternall death: so in other places, without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to me all ye that labour and are laden, and I wil refresh you, and ye shal finde rest for your soules.

Iohn. 6. 29.

10 At the last when they are weary with wresting the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and sophisticall argumentes. They caull vpon this that faith is in some places called a worke, & therupon they gather that we do wrongfully set faith as contrary to workes. As though forsooth faith in that it is an obeying of the will of G O D, doth with her owne deseruing procure vnto vs righteousnesse, & not rather because by embracing the mercy of God, it sealeth in our hearts the righteousnes of Christ offered to vs of it in the preaching of the Gospel. The readers shall pardon me if I doe not tarry vpon confuting of such follies, for they themselues without any assault of other, are sufficiently ouerthrowen with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the way confute one obiection which seemeth to haue some shewe of reason, least it should trouble some that are not so wel practised. Sith common reason teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular sinnes are imputed to vs for vnrighteousnesse, they say it is meete that to all particular good workes be giuen the praise of righteousnes. They do not satisfie me which answer, that the damnation of men properly proceedeth from onely vnbeliefe, not from particular sinnes. I doe in deede agree to them, y vnbeliefe is the fountaine and roote of all euils. For it is the first departing from God, after which do followe the particular trespassings against the law. But wheras they seem to set one selfe same reason of good and euill workes in weying of righteousnesse or vnrighteousnesse, therin I am compelled to disagree from them. For the righteousnesse of workes is the perfect obedience of the lawe. Therefore thou canst not be righteous by workes, vnlesse thou do followe it as a streight line in the whole continuall course of thy life. From it so soone as thou hast swarued, thou art fallen into vnrighteousnesse. Hereby appeareth that righteousnesse commeth not of one or a few workes, but of an vnswaruing & vnwearied obseruing of the will of God. But the rule of iudging vnrighteousnesse is most contrary. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath stolen, is by one offence guilty of death, because he hath offended against the maiestie of God. Therefore these our suttile arguers do stumble, for that they marke not this saying of Iames, that he which sinneth in one, is made guiltie of all, because he that hath forbiddē to kill, hath also forbidden to steale, &c. Therefore it ought to seeme no absurditie, when wee say that death is the iust rewarde of euery sinne, because they are euery one worthy of the iust displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrary side thou gather that by one good worke man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserueth his wrath.

Iam. 2. 10.

The xix. Chapter.

Of Christian libertie.

NOwe we must entreate of Christian libertie: the declaration whereof he must not omitte whose purpose is to comprehend in an a bridge-ment

ment the summe of the doctrine of the Gospell. For it is a thing principally necessarie, and without the knowledge whereof conscience dare in a man an enterprise nothing without doubting, they stumble and start backe in many thinges, they alway stagger and tremble: but specially it is an appendant of iustification, & auaileth not a litle to the vnderstanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly feare God, shall hereby receiue an incomparable fruite of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucianicall men doe pleasantly taunt with their scoffes, because in the spiritual darkenesse wherewith they be taken, euery wanton railing is lawful for them. Wherefore it shal now come foorth in fit season: and it was profitable to differre to this place the plainer discoursing of it, (for we haue already in diuerse places lightly touched it) because so soone as any mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either filthie lustes doe boile, or mad motions doe rise, vnlesse these wanton wittes be timely met withall, which doe otherwise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For, some men by pretence of this libertie, shake off all obedience of God, and breake foorth into an vnbridled licentiousnesse: and some men disdain it, thinking that by it all moderation, order & choise of thinges is taken away. What shoulde wee here doe, being compassed in such narrow straites? Shall wee bidde Christian libertie farewell, and so cut off al fit occasion for such perils? But, as we haue saide, vnlesse that bee fast holden, neither Christ, nor the trueth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly knowen. Rather we must endeavour that so necessarie a part of doctrine be not suppressed, and yet that in the meane time those fonde objections may bee mette withall which are wont to rise therevpon.

2 Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three parts. The first, that the consciences of the faithfull, when the affiance of their iustification before God is to be sought, may raise and aduance themselues above the lawe, and forget the whole righteousness of the lawe. For sith the lawe (as we haue already in an other place declared) leaueth no man righteous: either wee are excluded from all hope of iustification, or wee must bee loosed from the lawe, and so that there be no regarde at all had of workes. For who so thinketh that he must bring somewhat bee it neuer so litle of goodworkes to obtaine righteousness, he can not appoint any end or measure of them, but maketh himselfe detter to the lawe. Therefore taking away all mention of the lawe, and laying aside all thinking vpon workes, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when we intreate of iustification: and turning away our sighte from our selues, wee must beholde Christe alone. For there the question is not howe wee be righteous: but howe although we be vnrighteous and vnworthie, wee bee taken for worthie. Of which thing if consciences will attaine any certaintie, they muste giue no place to the lawe. Neither can any man hereby gather that the lawe is superfluous to the faithfull, whome it doeth not therefore cease to reach, and exhorte; and pricke forward to goodnesse, although before the iudgement seate of G O D it hath no place in their consciences. For these two thinges, as they are most diuerse, so must they be wel and diligently distinguished

Rom. 11. 2.
Rom. 6. 12.

6 And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, referreth all the good woikes that are red of in the holy fathers, to faith, & weyeth them onely by faith. Touching this libertie there is a place in the Epistle to the Romanes, where Paul reasoneth that some ought not to haue dominion ouer vs, because we are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. For when he had exhorted the faichfull that sin should not reigne in their mortall bodies, and that they shoulde not giue their members to bee weapons of wickednesse to sinne, but should dedicate themselues to God, as they that are aliue from the dead, & their members, weapons of righteousnes to God: and whereas they might on the other side obiect that they do yet carry with them the flesh full of lustes, and that sinne dwelleth in them, he adiouneth that comfort by the libertie of the lawe, as if he should say: Though they doe not yet throughly feele sinne destroyed and that righteousnesse yet liueth not in them, yet there is no cause why they should feare and be discouraged as though they had bene alway displeas'd with them for the remnants of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the lawe, that their works should not be examined by y^e rule of the law. As for them that gather y^e we may sin because we are not vnder the law, let them know y^e this libertie pertaineth nothing to them, the end whereof is to encourage vs to to good.

7 The third part is, that we be bound with no conscience before God of outward things which are by themselues indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime vse them, and sometime leaue them vnused. And the knowledge of this libertie also is verie necessary for vs, for if it shalbe absent, there shalbe no quiet to our consciences, no end of superstitions. Many at this day do thinke vs fond to moue disputation about the free eating of flesh, about the free vse of dayes, and garments, & such other small trifles as they in deede thinke them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when consciences haue once cast themselues into the snare, they enter into a long and cumbersome way, from whence they can afterward finde no easie way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether he may occupie linnen in sheetes, sherts, handkerchiefes, and napkins, neither wil he be out of doubt whether he may vse hempe, & at the last he will also fall in doubt of matters, for he will wey with himselfe whether he cannot sup without napkins, whether he may not be without handkerchiefes. If any man thinke deintie meat to be vnlawfull, at length he shall not with quietnes before the Lorde eat either brownbread or common meates, when hee remembreth that he may yet sustaine his bodie with baser foode. If he doubt of pleasant wine, afterwarde he will not drinke dead wine with good peace of conscience, last of all he will not be so bolde to touch sweeter and cleaner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it vnlawfull (as the common saying is) to treade vpon a strawe lying a crosse. For here is begonne no light strife, but this is in question, whether GOD will haue vs to vse these or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsels and dooings. Hereby some must needes bee carried with desperation into a confuse deuouring pitte: some must, despising GOD, and casting away his feare, make themselues away through de-

8 I knowe (sayth Paul) that nothing is common (meaning by common, vnholly) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which wordes he maketh all outward things subiect to our liberty, prouided alway that our mindes haue the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into vs any doubt, those things which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to vs. Wherefore he addeth: Blessed is he that iudgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that iudgeth, if he eate, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrow straites, who so neuertheless with carelesly venturing on all things shew themselves boulder, do they not asmuch turn themselves away from God? But they which are thoroughly peared with some feare of God, when they themselves also are compelled to doe many things against their conscience, are discouraged and doe fall downe with feare. All that are such, do receiue none of the gifts of God with thanksgiuing, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our vse: I meane the thanksgiuing that proceedeth from a heart that acknowledgeth the liberalitie and goodnesse of God in his giftes. For, many of them in deede doe vnderstande that those are the benefites of God which they vse, and they praise God in his workes: but sith they are not perswaded that they are giuen to themselves, howe should they thanke God as the giuer of them? Thus in a summe we see, wherto this libertie tendeth, namely that we should vse the giftes of God to such vse as he hath giuen them vnto vs, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of mind. by which confidence our soules may both haue peace with him and acknowledge his liberalitie towards vs. For here are comprehended all ceremonies that are at libertie to be obserued, that our consciences should not be bounde with any necessitie to keepe them, but should remember that the vse of them is by Gods benefit subiect to themselves vnto edification.

9 But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the parts of it a spirituall thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing fearefull consciences before God, if either they be vnquieted or carefull for the forgiuenesse of sinnes, or if they be pensie whether our imperfect workes and defiled with the faultes of our fleshe doe please God, or if they be troubled about the vse of indifferent things. Wherefore they doe wrongfully expounde it, which either doe make it a cloke for their owne desires, that they may abuse the giftes of God to their owne lust, or which do thinke that there is no liberty but that which is vsed before men, and therefore in vsing it haue no regarde of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men do at this day much offende. There is almost no man which may by his abilitie of wealth be sumptuous, which deliteth not in excessiue gorgiousnes, in furniture of banketes, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kinde of stateliness: which doth not matuellously flatter himselfe in his fineness. And all these things are defended vnder the pretence of Christian libertie. They say that they are things indifferent:

I graunt, so that a man indifferently vse them. But when they are too greedily coucted, when they are proudly boasted, when they are wastfully spent, it is certaine that those things which otherwise were of themselves lawfull, are by these faults defiled. This saying of Paul doth very well put difference betweene things indifferent: All things are cleane to the cleane: but to the defiled and vnbeleuing, nothing is cleane, because their minde and conscience is defiled. For why are accursed the rich men, they which haue their comfort, which are satisfied with meate, which do nowe laugh, which sleepe in beds of iuory, which ioyne lande to land, whose banketes haue lute, harp, taber and wine? Verily both iuory, and golde, and riches, are the good creatures of God, permitted yea and appointed by the prouidence of God for men to vse. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meate, or to ioyne new possessions to their owne old possessions or of their auncesters, or to be delited with muscical melody, or to drinke wine. This is true in deede. But when they haue plenty of things, to wallowe in delites, to glut themselves, to make their wit and mind dronke with present pleasures & alway to gape for new, these doings are most far from the lawfull vse of the giftes of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wasting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely vse the gifts of God, When the minde shalbe framed to this sobrietie, they shall haue a rule of the lawfull vse. On the other side let this moderation be wanting, euen base and common delicates are too much. For this is truely sayde, that oftentimes in frise and course cloth dwelleth a purple heart, and sometime vnder silke and purple, lieth simple humilitie: Let euery man in his degree so liue either poorely, or meanely, or plentifullic, that they all remember that they are fed of God to liue, not to be riotous: & let them thinke, that this is the law of christian liberty, if they haue learned with Paul to be contented with those things which they presently haue: if they can skil both to be humble and to excell: if they be taught in all places and in all things to be both full and hungry, to haue plenty and to suffer want.

10 Herein also may men do erre, because as though their libertie should not be sounde and safe vnlesse it had men witnesses of it, they doe vndiscretely and vnwisely vse it. By which vnseasonable vsing they many times offende the weake brethren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their libertie can not stande, vnlesse they take possession of it by eating of fleshe on fryday. I blame not that they eate: but this false opinion must be driuen out of their mindes. For they ought to thinke that by their libertie they obtaine no newe thing in the sight of men but before G O D, and that it standeth as well in absteyning as in vsing. If they vnderstande that it maketh no matter before G O D, whether they eate flesh or egges, whether they weare redde or blacke garmentes, that is enough. The conscience is nowe free, to which the benefitte of such libertie was due. Therefore although they doe afterwarde absteyne all their life long from flesh, and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they doe with a free conscience absteyne. But they do most hurtfully offende because they nothing regard the weaknesse of their brethren, which we ought so to beare with, that wee rashly commit nothing with offence of them. But sometime also it behoueth that our libertie be set forth before men. And this I graunt. But there is a measure most heedefully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake of whome the Lorde hath so earnestly giuen vs charge.

II I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be auoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon wee may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like wel that common diuision, which teacheth y there is of offences one sort giuen, another taken: for asmuch as it both hath a plaine testimonie of the Scripture, and doth not vnfitly expresse y which it meaneth. If thou do any thing by vnseasonable lightnesse, or wantonnes, or rashnesse, not in order, nor in fit place, whereby the ignorant & weake are offended, that same may be called an offence giuen by thee: because it came to passe by thy fault that such offence was stirred vp. And it is alway called an offence giuen in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwise not euilly done nor out of time is by euil will or by some wrongfull maliciousnesse of minde drawn to occasion of offence. For in this case was not offence giuen, but these wrongfull construers doe without cause take one. With that first kind of offence none are offended but the weake: but w this second kinde sower natures & Pharisaicall scornfull heades are offended. Wherefore we shal call the one, the offence of the weake: the other of the Pharisees: and we shal so temper the vse of our libertie, that it ought to giue place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigorousnesse of the Pharisees. For, what is to be yelded to weakenesse, Paul sheweth in very many places. Beare (saith he) the weake in faith. Againe, Let vs not hereafter iudge one another: but this rather, let there not be layde before our brother any offence or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to y same entent, which are more fit to be red in the place it self, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong shoulde beare with the weakenes of our brethren, and not please our selues, but euery one of vs please his neighbour vnto good for edifying. In another place, But see that your libertie be not in any wise an offence to them that are weake. Againe, Eate ye all things that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience: of your conscience (I say) not another mans. Finally be ye such, that ye giue no offence, neither to the Iewes, nor to the Greekes, nor to the Church of G O D. Also in another place, Ye are called, brethren, into libertie: onely giue not your libertie to be an occasion to the flesh, but by charitie serue ye one another. Thus it is. Our libertie is not giuen towards our weake neighbours, whose seruaunts charitie maketh vs in all things: but rather, that hauing peace with God in our mindes, wee may also liue peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Pharisees, howe much it is to be regarded, we learne by the wordes of the Lorde, whereby he biddeth them to be let alone, because they are blind, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them

12 But yet still the matter hangeth doubtful, vnlesse wee knowe who are to be taken for weake, and who for Pharisees: which difference being taken away, I see not among offences what vse at all of libertie remaineth, which might neuer be vsed without great daunger. But it seemeth to mee y Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our libertie is either to be tempred or to be defended though with offences.

When he tooke Timothee into his company, hee circumcised him: but hee could not be brought to circumcise Titus. Here were diuerse doings, and no change of purpose or of minde: namely in circumcising Timothee, when he was free from all men, he made himselfe a seruant to all men: and he was made to the Iewes, as a Iewe, that he might winne the Iewes: to them that were vnder the lawe, as if he himselfe were vnder the lawe, that hee might winne them which were vnder the lawe: all things to all men, that he might saue many, as he writeth in another place. Thus wee haue a right moderation of libertie, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What he had respect vnto, when he stoutly refused to circumcise Titus, hee himselfe testifieth, writing thus: But neither was Titus, which was with mee, although he was a Grecian, compelled to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had priuily crept in to espie our libertie which we haue in Christ Iesus, that they might bring vs into bondage, to whome wee gaue not place by subiection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when wee must of necessitie defend our libertie, if the same be in weake consciences endaugered by the vniust exactings of false Apostles. We must in euery thing studie to preferre charitie, and haue regarde to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (saith he) are lawfull for mee, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawfull for me, but not all things do not edifie. Let no man seeke that which is his owne, but y which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that we must vse our libertie, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbor: but if it be not so expedient for our neighbor, then we must forbear it. There be some which counterfait the wisdom of Paul in forbearing of libertie, while they doe nothing lesse than apply the same to the duties of charitie. For so that they may prouide for their owne quietnes, they wish all mention of libertie to be buried, whereas it is no lesse behouefull for our neighbors, sometime to vse libertie for their benefite and edification, than in fit place to restraine it for their commoditie. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therfore graunted him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charitie.

13 But whatsoeuer I haue spoken of auoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For, those things that are necessarie to be done, are not to be left vndone for feare of any offence. For as our libertie is to be submitted to charitie, so charitie it selfe likewise ought to be vnder the purenes of faith. Verily here also ought to be had regarde of charitie, but so farre as to the altars, that is, that for our neighbours sake we offend not God. Their intemperance is not to be allowed, which do nothing but with troublesome turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to rende all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkned to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand sortes of vngodlines, yet do faine that they must behaue themselves so y they be none offence to their neighbours. As though they do not in the meane edifie the cōsciences of their neighbours to euill, specially whereas they sticke fast in the same mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleasant men forsooth, whether their neighbour be to be instructed with doctrine or example of life, say that he must be fed with milke, whome they fil with most euill and poisonous opinions. Paul reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Masse had then beene among them, would he haue sacrificed to giue them the drinke of milk? No: For milk is not poison. Therefore they lie in saying that they feede them whom vnder a shewe of flattering allurements they cruelly kil. But, granting y such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they fede their children with milke? For if they neuer growe bigger, y they may at the least be able to beare some light meat, it is certain that they were neuer brought vp with milke. There are two reasons that moue me why I do not nowe more sharply contende with them: first, because their follies are scarcely worthy to be confuted, sith they worthily seeme filthy in the sight of all men that haue their sound wit: secondly, because I haue sufficiently done it in peculiar bookes, I will not nowe doe a thing already done. Onely let the readers remember this, y with whatsoeuer offences satan & the worlde go about to turne vs away from the ordinances of God, or to stay vs from following that which he appointeth, yet we must neuertheless go earnestly forward: & then, that whatsoeuer dangers hang vpon it; yet is it not at our liberty to swaue one haire bredth from the commandement of the same God, neither is it lawfull by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giueth vs leaue.

14 Now therefore sith faithfull consciences hauing receiued such prerogatiue of liberty as we haue aboue set forth, haue by the benefit of Christ obtained this y they be not entangled with any snares of obseruations in those thinges in which the Lord willed that they should be at liberty: we conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is vnmeete, that either Christ should lose the thank of his so great liberality, or cōsciences their profit. Neither ought we to thinke it a slight matter, which we see to haue cost Christ so deere: namely which he valued not with gold or siluer, but with his owne blood: so that Paul sticketh not to say, that his death is made voyd, if we yelde our soules into subiection to men. For he trauelleth about nothing els in certaine chapters of the epistle to the Galathians, but to shewe that Christ is darkned or rather destroyed to vs, vnlesse our consciences stande fast in their liberty, which verily they haue lost if they may at the wil of men be snared with the bondes of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthy to be knowne, so it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For so soone as any worde is spoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by & by great troubles are raised vp partly by seditious men, partly by slanderers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and ouerthrowen.

15 Therefore that none of vs may stumble at this stone, first let vs consider, that there are two sorts of government in man: the one spirituall whereby the conscience is framed to godlines and to the worship of God: the other ciuill, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanitie and ciuility which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not vnfit names called the Spirituall and Temporall iurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of these two formes of government pertaineth to the life of the soule, and the latter is occupied in the thinges of this present life: not onely in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spende his life among men holily, honestly, and soberly. For, that first kinde hath place in the inwarde minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outwarde behaiours, The one we may call the Spiritual kingdome, the other, the Ciuill kingdome. But these two, as wee haue deuided them, must be either of them alway seuerally considered by themselves: and when the one is in considering, we must withdrawe and turne away our mindes from the thinking vpon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both diuerse kings and diuerse lawes may gouerne. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spirituall libertie, we shall not wrongfully drawe to the ciuill order, as though Christians were according to the outward gouernment lesse subiect to the lawes of men, because their consciences are at libertie before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the fleshe, because they are free according to the spirit. Again, because euen in those ordinances which seem to pertaine to the Spirituall kingdom, there may be some errour: we must also put difference betweene these, which are to be taken for lawefull as agreeable to the word of God, & on the other side which ought not to haue place among the godly. Of the Ciuil government there shall be else where place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiastical lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entreating of it shall be fitte for the fourth booke, where wee shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I haue sayde) of it selfe not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accumer many, because they do not suttly enough put difference betweene the outward court as they call it, & the court of conscience. Moreouer this encrease the difficulty, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed, not only for feare of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bound by the ciuill lawes. If it were so, all should come to nought which we both haue spoken and shall speake of the spiritual gouernement. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to knowe what is conscience. And the definition thereof is to be fetched from the deriuation of the worde. For, as when men do with minde and vnderstanding conceiue the knowledge of thinges, they are thereby said (Scire) to knowe, whereupon also is deriued the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they haue a feeling of the iudgement of God, as a witnesse ioyned with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes but that they be drawen accused to the iudgement seate of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine meane betweene God and man, because it suffereth not man to suppress in himselfe y^e which he knoweth but pursueth him so farre till it bring him to giltines. This is it Rom. 2, 1, which Paul meaneth, where he sayth that conscience doth together witnes with men, when their thoughts do accuse or acquite them in the iudgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man: Therfore this feeling which presenteth man to the iudgement of God, is as it were a keeper ioyned to man, to marke and espie al his secrets, that nothing may remaine buried in darkenesse. Whereupon also commeth that olde Pro-uerbe, Conscience is a thousande witneses. And for the same reason Peter 1. Pet. 3. 21.

 hath set the examination of a good conscience for quietnesse of minde, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ, we do without feare present our selues before God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, setteth to haue no Heb. 10, 2.
 more conscience of sinne, in steede of to be deliuered or acquitted that sinne may no more accuse vs.

16 Therefore as works haue respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is nothing els but the inward purenesse of the heart. In which sense Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conscience and faith not fained. Afterward also in the same chapter 2. Tit. 1, 5.
 he sheweth how much it differeth from vnderstanding, saying that some had suffred shipwrecke from the faith, because they had forsaken good Conscience. For in these words he signifieth it is a liuely affection to worship God, and a syncere endeouour to liue holily and godlily. Sometime in deede it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he en-deuored himselfe to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But Act. 24, 16.
 this was therefore saide, because the fruites of good conscience do flow and come euen to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God only, as I haue already sayd. Hereby it commeth to passe that the lawe is said to bind the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without hauing any consideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbid-deth all maner of filthinesse of wordes and outward wantonnesse whatsoeuer it be. To the keeping of this lawe my conscience is subiect although there liued not one man in the world. So he that behaueth himselfe intemperatly, not onely sinneth in this that he giueth an euill example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bounde with giltinesse before God. In things that are of rhemeselues meane, there is an other consideration. For we ought to absteine from them if they breede any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consecrate to Idols. If any (sayth he) moue any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine 1. Cor. 10. 28 but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned should neuerthelessse eate such flesh. But howsoeuer in respect of his brother, it is necessary for him to absteine as it is prescribed of God, yet hee ceaseth not to keepe still the liberty of conscience. Thus we see how this lawe binding the outward worke, leaueth the conscience vnbounde.

The xx. Chapter.

Of Praier, which is the chiefe exercise of faith, and vvhich by vve daily receiue the benefites of God.

OF these things that haue beene hitherto spoken, we plainly perceiue how needy and voyde man is of all good things, and howe he wanteth all helpes of saluation. Wherefore if he seeke for reliefes whereby he may succour his needinesse, he must goe out of himselfe and get them else where. This is afterwarde declared vnto vs, that the Lorde doth of his owne free will and liberally giue himselfe to vs in his Christ, in whome hee offereth vs in steede of our miserie al felicitie, in steede of our neede welthinesse, in whome he openeth to vs the heauenly treasures: that our whole faith should beholde his beloued son, that vpon him our whole expectation should hang, in him our whole hope should sticke and rest. This verily is the secret and hidden Philosophy, which can not be wrung out with Logi- call argumentes: but they learne it whose eyes God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that we are taught by faith to acknow- ledge that whatsoeuer we haue neede of, whatsoeuer wanteth in vs, the same is in God and in our Lord Iesus Christ, namely in whom the Lord willed the whole fulnesse of his largesse to rest, that from thence we should all drawe as out of a most plentiful fountaine: nowe it remaineth that we seeke in him, and with prayers craue of him that which we haue learned to be in him. O- therwise to knowe God to be the Lord and giuer of all good things, which allureth vs to pray to him, and not to go to him and pray to him: should so no- thing profit vs, that it should be all one as if a man should neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle, to shew that true faith can not be idle frō calling vpon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospel springeth faith, so by it our heartes are framed to call vpon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a litle before said, that the Spirit of adoption, which sealet in our hearts the witnesse of the Gospell, raiseth vp our spirites that they dare shewe foorth their desires to God, stirre vp vspeakeable gronings, and cry with confidence Abba, Father. It is meete therefore that this last point, because it was before but onely spo- ken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, should now be more large- ly entreated of.

Rom. 8. 26.

2 This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that we attaine to those riches which are layd vp for vs with the heauenly father. For there is a cer- taine cōmunicating of men with God, whereby they entring into y^e sanctua- ry of heauen, do in his owne presence call to him touching his promises: that the same thing which they beleued him affirming onely in worde not to be vaine, they may when neede so requireth finde in experience. Therefore we see that there is nothing set forth to vs to be looked for at the hande of the Lorde, which we are not also commanded to craue with prayers: so true it is that by praier are digged vp the treasures, which our faith hath looked vpon being shewed to it by the Gospel of the Lord. Now how necessary and how many wayes profitable this exercise of praier is, it can by no wordes be suffi- ciently declared. Vndoubtedly it is not without cause y^e the heauenly father refuseth, that the onely fortresse of saluation is in the calling vpon his name namely whereby wee call to vs the presence both of his prouidence, by which he watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which he susteineth vs being weake and in a maner fainting: and of his goodnesse, by which he receiueth vs into fauour being miserably loaden with sinnes: finally whereby we call him all whole, to giue himselfe present to vs. Hereby groweth singular rest and quietnesse to our consciences. For when wee haue disclosed to the Lorde the necessitie which distressed vs, wee largely rest though it were but in this onely that none of our euils is hidden from him, whom we are perswaded both to be most well willing toward vs, and most able to prouide wel for vs.

3 But (wil some man say) did not he know without any to put him in mind of it, both in what part we be distressed, and what is expedient for vs: so that it may seeme after a certaine manner superfluous, that hee shoulde be troubled with our prayers, as though hee winked or slept, vntill he were awaked with our voice? But they which so reason, marke not to what ende the Lord hath instructed them that be his to pray: for he ordeyned it not so much for his owne cause as rather for ours. He willethe indeede, as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatfoeuer men require or doe perceiue to make for their profite, and doe testifie the same with wishings. But the profite also of this sacrifice wherewith hee is worshipped, commeth to vs. Therefore howe must more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselues and other of the benefites of G O D, so much the more sharpely they were pricked forward to pray. The onely example of Elias shall bee enough for vs, which being sure of the counsell of God, after that he not rashly had promised raine to Achab, yet busily prayeth betweene his knees, and sendeth his seruauent seuen times to espie it: not for that he did discredit the oracle of God, but because he knew y it was his dutie, least his faith should waxe drowsie & sluggish, to lay vp his desires with God. Wherefore although while we lie senselesse and so dul that we perceiue not our owne miseries, he waketh & watcheth for vs, and sometime also helpeth vs vnderired, yet it much behoueth vs, that he be continually called vpon of vs, that our heart may be enflamed with earnest and feruent desire to seeke, loue, and worship him, while we accustome our selues in euerie necessitie to flee to him as to our shoot anchare. Againe, y no desire and no wishe at all may enter into our minde, wherof we should be ashamed to make him witness, while we learne to present our wishes, yea and to poure out our whole heart before his eyes. Then y we may be framed to receiue all his benefits with true thankfulness of mind, yea and with outward thankesgiuing, of which we are put in mind by our prayer that they come to vs from his hand. Moreouer, y when we haue obtained y which we desired, being perswaded y he hath answered to our prayers, wee may be thereby the more feruently caried to thinke vpon his kindnesse, and therewithall embrace with greater pleasure those thinges which we acknowledge to haue ben obtained by praier. Last of all, that very vse and experience may according to the measure of our weaknes assure our minds of his prouidence when we vnderstand y he not onely promisseth that he will neuer faile vs, & that he doth of his owne accorde open vs the entrie to call to him in the verie point of necessitie, but also hath his hande alway stretched out to helpe them y be his, and y he doth not feed them with words, but defendeth them with present helpe. For these causes, the most kinde Father, although hee

he neuer sleepeth or is sluggishe, yet oftentimes maketh a shewe as though hee slept and were sluggishe, that so hee may exercise vs, which are otherwise slouthfull and sluggishe to come to him, to aske of him, to requite him to our owne great benefite. Therefore they doe too foolishly, which to cal away the mindes of men from prayer, babble that the prouidence of GOD, which maketh for the safekeeping of all things, is in vaine wearied with our calling vppon him: Whereas the Lorde contrariwise not in vaine testifieth that hee is nie to all them that call vppon his name in the truth. And of none other sorte is that which other doe triflingly say, that it is superfluous to aske those things which the Lorde is of his owne wil readie to giue: wheteas euen the verie same things which flowe to vs from his owne free liberalitie, hee will haue vs acknowledge to bee graunted to our prayers. Which thing that notable sentence of the Psalme doeth testifie, wherewith many like sayings doe accorde. The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his cares vnto their prayers. Which saying so setteth out y^e prouidence of God bent of his owne accorde to prouide for the safetie of the godly, that yet he omitteth not the exercise of faith, whereby slouthfulnes is wiped from the mindes of men. The eyes of God therefore doe walke, y^e hee may succour the necessitie of the blinde: but hee will againe on our behalves heare our gronings, that he may the better proue his loue toward vs. And so both are true, that the watchman of Israel sleepeth not, nor slumbereth, and yet that he sitteth still as hauing forgotten vs when hee seeth vs dull and dumme.

Psal. 145. 18.

Psal. 121. 8.

4 Nowe, to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the first rule, that we be no otherwise framed in minde and heart, than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. Which verily wee shall attaine as touching the minde, of the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughtes wherewith it may be called away or withdrawn from the right and pure beholding of God, doe not onely bende it selfe wholly to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted vp and caried aboue it selfe. Neither doe I here require a mind so at libertie, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the seruentnesse of prayer must by such carefulnesse be kindled in vs (as we see that the holy seruants of God doe sometime declare great torments, much more carefulnesse, when they say they vtter to the Lord a bewailing voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the middest of the Iawes of death) But I say that all strange and foraine cares must be driuen away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring hither and thither is caried about, and being drawn out of heauen is pressed downe to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted vp aboue it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those things which our blinde and foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selfe bounde within the compasse of her owne vanitie, but rise vp to purenes worthy for God.

5 Both these things are specially worthie to be noted, that whosouer prepareth himselfe to pray, should therto applie al his senses and endeuours, and not (as men are wont) be diuersly drawn with wandering thoughtes: because there is nothing more contrarie to the reuerence of God, than such lightnesse which is a witnessse of too wanton licentiousnesse and loose from all feare. In which thing wee must so much more earnestly labour as we find it more hard, for no man can be bent so to pray, but that he shal feele many bythoughtes to creepe vpon him, either to breake of, or by some bowing & swaruing to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let vs call to mind, how great an vnworthinesse it is, when God receiueth vs vnto familiar talke with him, to abuse his so great gentlenesse, with mingling holy and prophane things together, when the reuerence of him holdeth not our mindes faste bound vnto him: but as if we talked with some meane man, we do in y^e middest of our prayer, forsaking him, leape hither and thither. Let vs therefore know that none doe rightly and well prepare themselues to prayer, but they wh^o the maiestie of God pearceth, that they come to it vncumbered of earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremonie of lifting vp of handes, that men shoulde remember that they bee farre distant from God, vnlesse they lift vp their senses on hie. As also it is saide in the Psalm. To thee haue I lifted vp my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes vseth this manner of speech, to lift vp prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, shoulde not sit still in their dregges. Let this be the summe: that howe much more liberally God dealeth with vs, gently alluring vs to vnloode our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we vnlesse his so excellent and incomparable benefite doe with vs ouerwey all other things and drawe vs vnto it selfe, that we may earnestly applie our endeouours and senses to pray: which can not be done vnlesse our minde by strongly wrastling with the hinderances doe rise vp aboue them. An other point we haue set forth, that we aske no more than God giueth leaue. For though he biddeth vs to poure out our heartes, yet he doth indifferently giue loose reines to foolish and froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the will of the godly, he proceedeth not to so tender bearing with them that he submitteth himselfe to their will. But in both these pointes men doe commonly much offende. For not onely the most part of men presume without shame, without reuerence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelesly present to his throne whatsoeuer liked them in their dreame: but also so great foolishnesse or senselesse dulnesse possesseth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, euen al their most filthie desires, whereof they would greatly be ashamed to make men priuie. Some prophane men haue laughed to scorne, yea and detested this boldnesse, yet the vice it selfe hath alway reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men haue chosen Iupiter to bee their Patrone: couetous men, Mercurie: the desirous of learning, Apollo and Minerua: warriers, Mars: and Lecherous foolke, Venus. Like as at this day (as I haue euen nowe touched) men do in prayers graunt more licence to their vnlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their Egals. But God suffereth not his gentlenesse to be so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our prayers subiect to his authoritie, and restraineth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this saying of Iohn, This is our affiance, that if we aske any thing according to his will, hee heareth vs. But forasmuch as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe so great perfection, wee must seeke a remedie to helpe vs. As wee ought to bende the sight of our minde to God, so the affection of the heart

Psal. 25. 1.

1. Ioh. 5. 14.

ought also to followe to the same ende. But both doe stay farre beneath it, yea rather doe faint and faile or be caried a contrarie way. Therefore God to succour this weakenesse, in our prayers giueth the spirite to be our Schole-master, to instruct vs what is right, and to gouerne our affections. For, because we knowe not what wee ought to pray as wee ought, the spirite cometh to our succour, and maketh intercession for vs with vnspokeable groanings, not that it indeede either prayeth or groaneth but stirrieth vp in vs affiance, desires, and sighings, which the strength of nature were not able to conceiue. And not without cause Paul calleth them vnspokeable groanings which so the faithfull sende forth by the guiding of the spirite, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they bee so holden in perplexitie with blinde cares, that they scarcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea while they goe about to vtter stammering wordes they sticke fast incumbred. Wherevpon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gifte. These thinges are not spoken to this purpose, that we fauouring our owne slouthfulnesse shoulde giue ouer the charge of praying to the Spirit of GOD, and lie dull in that carelesnesse, to which wee are too much inclined (as there are heard the wicked sayings of some, that wee must lie negligently gaping to waite vntill hee preuent our mindes occupied else where) but rather that we loathing our owne slouthfulnesse and sluggishnesse, shoulde craue such helpe of the Spirit, Neither doeth Paul, when hee biddeth vs to pray in Spirite, therefore cease to exhorte vs to wakefulnesse: meaning that the instincte of the Spirite so vseth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endeuour: because God will in this behalfe prooue howe effectually faith moueth our hearts.

6 Let also an other lawe bee, that in praying wee alway feele our owne want, and that earnestly thinking howe wee stande in need of those thinges that wee aske, wee ioyne with our prayer an earnest yea feruent affection to obtaine. For, many doe slightly for manners sake recite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendered a certaine taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessarie remedie for their euils, because it is to their destruction to be without the helpe of God which they craue: yet it appeareth that they doe this dutie for custome, forasmuch as in the meane time their mindes are cold, and doe not wey what they aske. The generall and confuse feeling indeede of their necessitie leadeth them hereunto: but it doeth not stirre them as it were in a present case to aske reliefe of their neede. Nowe what thinke wee to bee more hatefull or more detestable to God than this fayning, when a man asketh forgiuenesse of sinnes, in the meane time eyther thinking that hee is not a sinner, or not thinking vpon this that hee is a sinner, euen wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such peruersnesse (as I haue saide) mankinde is full, that for manners sake they many times aske many thinges of God, which they certainly iudge that without his liberalitie to come to the from some other where, or that they haue them already remaying with them. The fault of some other seemeth to bee lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which haue onely conceiued this principle that wee must sacrifice to GOD with prayers prayers, doe mumble vp prayers without any musing of minde vpon them. But the godly must principally take heede, that they neuer come into the sight of God to aske any thing, but because they do both boyle with earnest affection of hearte, and doe therewithall desire to obtaine it of him. Yea and also though in those things which wee aske onely to the glorie of God, wee seeme not at the first sight to prouide for our owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse feruentnes and vehemenes of desire. As, when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) feruently hunger and thirst for that hallowing.

7 If any man obiekt, that we are not alway driuen with like necessitie to pray, I graunt the same indeede: and this difference is profitably taught vs of Iames: Is any man heauie among you? Let him pray. Who so is merie, let him sing. Therefore euen common feeling teacheth vs, that because we are too slouthful, therefore; as the matter requireth we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this Dauid calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, feares & other kinds of tentations do presse vs, so much freerer access is open for vs, as though God did cal vs vnto him. But yet no lesse true is that saying of Paul, that we must at all times: because how-
Iac. 5. 13.

focuer things prosperously flowe according to our hartes desire, and matter of mirth doeth compass vs on euery side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our neede doth not exhort vs to pray. If a man haue abundaunce of wine and wheate: yet sith hee cannot enioye one morsell of breade but by the continuall grace of God, whole cellers or barnes full shall bee no let why he should not craue dayly breade. Nowe if wee call to minde how many dangers do euerie moment hand ouer vs, y verie feare it selfe wil teach vs that we haue no time free fro prayer. But this we may better perceiue in spirituall things. For, when shall so many sinnes, whereof we knowe our selues guiltie, suffer vs to sit still without care and not in humble wise craue pardon both of the fault and the paine? When do tentations graunt vs truce, so that we neede not to hast vnto helpe? Morcouer the desire of the kingdome and glorie of God ought so to plucke vs to it selfe, not by fittes but continually, that it should alway be fit time for vs. Therefore not without cause we are so ofte commaunded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseuerance in prayer, wherof mention shalbe made hereafter: but when y scripture warneth vs that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slouthfulnesse, because we doe not perceiue how necessarie this care and diligence is for vs. By this rule all hypocrisie and craftinesse of lying to God, is debarred, yea driuen farre away from prayer. God promiseth that he will bee neere to all them that call vpon him in truth, and he pronounceth that they shall finde him which seeke him with their whole heart. But they aspire not thither which please themselues in their owne filthinesse. Therefore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in the Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are accursed, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightfull that they finde the eares of GOD shutte, which doe locke vp their owne heartes, and that they should not finde God easie to bowe, which doe with their owne hardnesse

Esa. 15. 15. prouoke his stiffnesse. In Esay hee threateneth after this manner. When ye shall multiplie your prayers, I will not heare you: for your handes are full of blood. Again in Ieremie: I haue cried, & they haue refused to heare: they shal likewise crie, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most hie dishonour, that wicked men should boast of his couenaunt, which doe in al their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Esay. hee complaineth, that when the Iewes come neere to him with their lippes, their hearte is far from him. Hee speaketh not this of onely prayers, but affirmeth that hee abhorreth faining in all the partes of worshipping him. To which purpose maketh that saying of Iames. Yee aske, and receiue not: because yee aske ill, that yee may spende it vpon your pleasures. It is true indeede (as wee shall againe shewe a litle hereafter) that the prayers of the godly which they poure out, doe not rest vpon their owne worthinesse: yet is not that admonition of Iohni superfluous, if we aske any thing, wee shall receiue it of him, because wee keepe his commandentes: forasmuch as an euell conscience shutteth the gate against vs. Wherevpon followeth that none doe rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whosoeuer prepareth himselfe to pray, let him be lothfull to himselfe in his owne euils, and (which cannot be done without repentance) let him put on the person and mind of a begger.

8 Hereunto let the third rule be ioyned, that whosoeuer presenteth himselfe before God to pray, shoulde forsake all thinking of his owne glorie, put off all opinion of worthinesse, and finally giue ouer all trust of himselfe, giuing in the abacing of himselfe the glorie wholly to God: least if wee take any thing be it neuer so little to our selues, we doe with our owne swelling fall away from his face. Of this submission which throweth downe al height, we haue often examples in the seruantes of God: among whome the holier that euerie one is, so much the more hee is throwne downe when he cometh into the sight of the Lorde. So Daniel, whom the Lord himselfe commended with so great a title of praise, said: We poure not out our prayers before thee in our righteousneses, but in thy great mercies. Here vs Lord, Lord be merciful to vs: Heare vs, and do these things that we aske, For thine own sake: because thy name is called vpon ouer the people & ouer thy holy place. Neither doeth hee by a crooked figure (as men sometime speake) mingle himselfe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather sferually confesseth his owne guiltinesse and humbly fleeth to the sanctuarie of forgiveness, as he expresly saith: When I confessed my sinnes and the sins of my people. And this humbles Dauid also setteth out with his own example, when he saith,

Dan. 9. 18. Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, because in thy sight euerie one that liueth shall not be iustified. In such manner Esay prayeth: Loe, thou art angrie because we haue sinned, the worlde is founded in thy wayes, therefore we shal be saued: And we haue ben all filled with vncleannesse, & al our righteousness as a defiled cloth: and we haue all withered away as a leafe, & our iniquities doe scatter vs broad as the winde: and there is none that calleth vpon thy name, that raiseth vp himselfe to take holde of thee: because thou hast hid thy face from vs, and hast made vs to pine away in the hand of our wickednes. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our our fashioner, & we are the worke of thy hand. Be not angrie O Lorde, neither remember wickednes for euer. Behold, look vpon vs, we are al thy people. Lo, how they stand vpon no affiance at al, but vpon this only, y^e thinking vpon this y^e they be Gods, they dispaire not y^e he wil haue care of them. Like-wise Ieremie: If our iniquities answer against vs, do thou for thy names sake. Ier. 14. 7. For it is both most truely & most holy written, of whomsoeuer it be, which being written by an vnknown author is fathered vpon the Prophet Baruc: A soule heauie & desolate for the greatnes of euil, crooked, & weake, a hungry soule, & fainting eyes giue glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the righteousnes of our fathers do we poure out prayers in thy sight, & aske mercie before thy face O Lord our God: but because thou art merciful, haue mercie vpon vs, because we haue sinned before thee.

9 Finally the beginning & also the preparing of praying rightly, is crauing of pardon, with an humble & plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that euen the holiest man may obtaine any thing of GOD, vntil he be freely recōciled to him: neither is it possible that God may be fauourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no maruaile if the faithful do with this keie open to themselues the dore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Psalmes. For Dauid when he asketh an other thing, saith: Remember not the sinnes of my youth, remember mee according to thy mercie for thy goodnes sake O Lord. Againe, Looke vpon my affliction, & my labour, & forgiue all my sinnes. Where we also see y^e it is not enough, if we euery seueral day do call our selues to account for our newe sinnes, if we do not also remember those sinnes which might seem to haue bene long ago forgotten. For, the same Prophet in another place, hauing confessed one hainous offence by this occasion returneth euen to his mothers wombe wherin he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lesse by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the sinnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning him selfe, so much more easie he may find God to entreat. But although the holy ones do not alway in expresse words aske, forgiuenes of sinnes, yet if wee diligently weye their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shal easily find y^e which I say, y^e they gathered a mind to pray of the only mercy of god, & so alway tooke their beginning at appeasing him because if euery man examine his owne conscience, so farre is he from being bold to open his cares familiarly with God, that he trembleth at euery comming toward him, except that he standeth vpon trust of mercie & pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they aske release of paines, that they also pray to haue their sinnes forgiuen: because it were an absurditie to will that y^e effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For wee must beware that God bee fauourable vnto vs, before that he testifie his fauour with outwarde signes: because both he himselve will kepe this order, & it shoulde litle profit vs to haue him beneficiall, vnlesse our conscience feeling him appeased shoulde throughly make him louely vnto vs, Which we are also taught by the aunswere of Christ. For when he had decreed to heale the man sicke of y^e Palsey, he said, Thy sinnes are forgiuen thee: lifting vp our mindes thereby to that which is chiefly to be wished, that God first receiue vs into fauour, and then shew foorth the fruit of reconciliation in helping vs. But beside that speciall confession of present giltines, whereby the faithful make supplication to obtaine pardon of euery special fault and peine, that generall preface, which procureth fauour to prayers, is neuer to be omitted, because vnlesse they be grounded vpon the free mercie of God, they shal neuer obtain any thing of God. Whereunto may be referred that saying of Iohn: If wee confesse our sinnes, he is faithful & righteous to forgieue vs, & cleanse vs from all iniquitie. For which cause it behooued praier in the time of the lawe to be halloved with expiation of bloud, that they might be acceptable, & that so the people should be put in mind that they are vnworthie of so great a prerogatiue of honor, til being cleansed from their defilings they should of the only mercy of God conceiue affiance to pray.

10 But whereas the holy ones seeme sometime for the entreating of God to alleage the helpe of their owne righteousness (as when Dauid saith: Keepe my soule, because I am good. Againe Ezechias: Remember Lorde I beseech thee, that I haue walked before thee in truth, and haue done good in thine eyes) by such formes of speaking they meane nothing else than by their verie regeneration to testifie themselues to be the seruants & children of God, to whome he himselfe pronounceth that he will be merciful. He teacheth by the prophet (as we haue alreadie seene) that his eies are vpon the righteous, and his cares vnto their prayers. Againe by the Apostle, that we shall obtaine whatsoeuer we aske, if we keep his commandements. In which sayings he doth not value prayer by the worthines of workes: but his will is so to stablish their affiance, whose own conscience well assureth them of an vnfained vprightness and innocencie, such as all the faithful ought to be. For the same is taken out of the verie trueth of God, which the blinde man that had his sight restored, saith in Iohn, that God heareth not sinners: if we vnderstand sinners after the common vse of the Scripture, for such as without all desire of righteousness do altogether sleepe and rest vpon their sins: forasmuch as no heart can euer breake foorth into vnfained calling vpon God which doeth not also aspire to godlinesse. Therefore with such promises accorde the prayers of the holy ones, wherein they make mention of their owne purenes or innocency that they may feele that to bee giuen them which is to be looked for of all the seruants of God. Againe it is then commonly found that they vse this kind of prayer, when they do in the presence of the Lord compare themselues with their enemies, from whose vniust dealing they wished themselues to be deliuered by his hande. In this comparision it is no marueil if they brought forth their righteousness & simplicitie of heart to moue him the rather by the rightfulness of their cause to help them. This therefore we take not away from the godly heart of a good man, but that he may vse the purenes of his conscience before the Lorde, to strengthen himself in the promises wherewith the Lord comforteth & vpholdeth his true worshippers: but our meaning is, y^e the trust of obtaining stand vpon y^e only mercy of God, laying away al thinking of their own deseruing.

11 The fourth rule is, that beeing so thrown downe and subdued with true humilitie, we should neuertheles with certaine hope of obtaining bee encouraged to pray. These be things in deede contrarie in shewe, to ioyne
